Private enterprise governments of various levels in this country and other parts of the world have long since recognized and operated on the basis of anything that is a public utility is, in most instances, publicly owned and controlled as a Crown corporation. Or, failing that, there is a strong and strict requirement for that privately owned corporation operating a public utility to be accountable to a legislature or a parliament. Our experience with the regulatory agencies in Canada, CTC or CRTC, as far as the majority of the public is concerned has not been too good. In the overwhelming majority of decisions made, those two illustrious agencies have come down on the side of the corporation wanting some benefit, and wanting to be relieved of some responsibility or liability. No matter how many briefs and submissions have been made by ordinary citizens or members of parliament, organizations or members of the other place the decision almost invariably of the so-called regulatory agencies have come down on the side of CPR, Bell Canada or some such outfit.

So the experience of what regulatory agencies do historically has been bad as far as the people of this country are concerned. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the actual regulation provided by the CTC, and later the CRTC as far as we are concerned is unacceptable. They have been, in my opinion, from their actions and the results of their decisions, unwilling to act on behalf of the public, on behalf of the consumers of telephone service. They have allowed telephone rates to go up even when Bell's increases have been unjustified. In 1976 this candidate for expansion into the private sector, the beneficiary of this bill if it were to pass, had a net income, after taxes, of $289 million. They not only have that kind of profitable operation, but accumulated deferred corporation taxes as of 1976—and God knows what they will be by the end of 1977—of $719 million. That is an interest-free loan from the people of Canada. Included amongst those people of Canada are the subscribers of Bell telephone. They are paying twice. They pay the rates that Bell charges and they lose the benefit of taxes that should have been collected from Bell.

● (1722)

I hope the day comes when the total deferred taxes of Bell Canada are equal to what would be a reasonable purchase price of the whole damn company. We could just say to Bell Canada, "Now we are even. Your unpaid taxes equal the value of the company, and we are taking it over". We could give them $1 to make it a legal agreement.

Mr. Rodriguez: And bus fare.

Mr. Benjamin: We could write off the books of Canada the amount Bell owes in the form of deferred taxes. The people of Canada would then take over ownership of the company.

Mr. Kaplan: What about the 22,000 shareholders?

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member asks about the 22,000 shareholders. I have a list of all the widows and orphans who own Bell Canada. I could use up all my allotted time by reading it. There are "poor" shareholders like Canada Life, Canada Permanent Investment, Canada Permanent Pooled, which is the same investment, Canada Trust Investors, Canada Trust RSP—I wish it read "RIP"—Canadian General Life, Canadian International Investor Trust, Capital Growth, Commercial Finance, Confederated Life, Confederated Dolphin—I suppose that is some kind of fish outfit—and Crown Life.

I bet these are all welfare cases. If corporate investors did not get their earnings from their investment in Bell Canada, I am sure they would have to apply for welfare! The list also includes Crown Life, Dominion Life and Eaton Commonwealth. We must make sure the Eaton family does not end up in the line-up at the Toronto welfare office. There is also Economic Investments. It is an economic investment. If you had the bucks and bought some shares over the past few years, you would have done pretty well. I wonder if I have provided the hon. member who asked me about the 22,000 shareholders with enough names to satisfy him. If not, one of my colleagues would be glad to finish reading the list. In our list of these "widows and orphans" are the likes of names that I have already read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This might be the time to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. Before he carries on or opens another line of discussion, it will be necessary to seek the unanimous consent of the House. That is the only way he can continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I should perhaps caution my colleagues to be a little careful with their applause until they have heard me speak. Life in Ontario is somewhat more complex than life in Saskatchewan when it comes to these issues. I sometimes envy the rather straightforward manner in which these matters can be tackled under these circumstances. I want to speak to some extent as a person who has always admired Bell Canada. In my view, Bell Canada is one of the best companies we have in this country. I have been around the world, as have most of us who are here. I do not think there is a finer telephone system in the world. I say this as a preamble because I have some criticisms to make. However, I want to put it in that kind of perspective.

With regard to nationalization, I am not particularly fussy about nationalizing Bell Canada. I do not see that it would save the taxpayers of Canada any kind of money. I should point out that while some of the companies who hold shares in Bell Canada may not exactly be starving widows and orphans, we are looking at a lot of corporations, whether it is the Eaton Corporation or others, who are investing on behalf of many thousands of shareholders. As I said, I wish things in Ontario were as straightforward as in Saskatchewan. However, there is no way that anyone is going to nationalize Bell telephone without paying compensation to the people involved. We are not talking about a faceless corporation but a lot of people who have invested their money. Whether carefully or otherwise is beside the point. The point is there will have to be compensation. I would just as soon Bell telephone had the headaches as a government corporation.

If nationalization takes place, it will not be because the government can make more money with Bell Telephone than what it is costing at the moment. The complexity of the arguments back and forth about how much money Bell is making, how much they are entitled to make, and the government's efforts to discount those arguments, as well as all the complex arguments that take place, will be so great that somebody will throw up their hands and say enough is enough.

I wish to make a few comments on Bell telephone. It is one of the few companies in this country that is Canadian. Were it not for Bell telephone, that part of our industry would be dominated by foreign ownership. Were Bell telephone not as big and powerful as they are, they would have been taken over by foreign corporations a long time ago. I realize we now have legislation which prevents that. However, in terms of effective research, and this is not to say that Bell telephone does all it should or does not get very considerable benefits from our tax system as do other corporations, to some extent they utilize those benefits to a greater extent than other corporations. Bell Canada gets blamed for almost everything that goes wrong. Sometimes I think that corporation does not have a friend in the world. A lot of that is not the fault of the corporation, but a lot is. To some extent, this debate demonstrates what the problem is with Bell Canada.

Let us talk about the things that are not Bell's fault. You cannot help but be big if you are in the telephone business. It is silly to have competing corporations. You cannot help but be a monopoly if you are in the telephone business. In many ways, Bell telephone is a kind of government within a government. This is really important. Like governments, they cannot please everyone. The difficulty is that Bell does not recognize that it is unique. Sometimes they say they understand it. My feeling, from talking to people in Bell, is that they have not sufficiently recognized the kind of responsibility that goes with being big, with being a monopoly and with having to please everyone as governments in fact try to do but not always successfully. Like governments, all kinds of things get heaped on their head by virtue of the fact they are like that. Bell wants to operate and be a business like other business, when in fact it is not a business like other businesses. This is the critical difference and why Bell gets itself into far more difficulties than is necessary.

I started my remarks by saying there are many things about Bell for which we should be happy and grateful. However, when Bell starts to behave in the way it does, it never seems to put its best foot forward. If it does, it winds up with that foot in its mouth.

One senses a feeling of resentment among Bell executives that they should have to go to the House of Commons and ask for the powers they feel they should possess. But Bell is in a very special position. It is not a business like other businesses because it is a monopoly and because it plays a social role in our society. Telephones are no longer a luxury, they are a necessity, a public service. In this situation Bell should be prepared to explain in some detail the reasoning behind its requests and to answer rationally to the House of Commons. Bell Canada is almost a government within a government. It should recognize its social responsibilities and be prepared to subject itself to the same kind of examination as, for example, government agencies.

Some people talk about nationalizing Bell Telephone. I do not want to nationalize Bell Telephone. But if the corporation argues that it is only a private organization whose only concern is to satisfy its customers and its shareholders—and I believe an effort is made to do this—then all those responsible will find themselves in trouble. If the company were to recognize its special responsibility I think it would do very well when it came to the House of Commons to ask for certain additional powers, and so on.

I believe the company has a very good case to make in terms of its expansion. I, for one, believe that if Bell is open about things and is subject to the scrutiny of the House of Commons, there is no reason why it should not expand into other fields. However, I am reluctant to see it expand in the absence of some justification for such a course. Bell executives want the House of Commons to give the company a blank cheque with which to do as it pleases.

Perhaps the actions the corporation has in mind are good, but we should not be called upon the accept this automatically. It sometimes happens that the severest criticism voiced in the House of Commons is directed against Crown agencies and other instruments of public policy. If my hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre, whom I admire greatly, thinks that nationalizing Bell is likely to solve all the problems, he need only look toward AECL, or Air Canada, or some of the other agencies which have been the subject of attention from time to time in this Chamber. There is no guarantee that bringing industries under nationalization will automatically make things better. What makes agencies responsible to the public purpose is the fact that the House of Commons can scrutinize their operations.

I realize it is a nuisance for a private corporation to be obliged to come to the House of Commons where, for example, my hon. friends from Northern Ontario can ask questions about their constituents getting adequate telephone service. They bring up the case of constituents living two miles or so from a telephone line and ask why they cannot be connected to the service without having to pay very large sums of money. Well, we are trying to help not only the service from person to person but from province to province and from region to region. We do not say to a person that because he was silly enough to live outside the main centres of population he should be deprived of the services of hospitals, of television, education and so on. I am sure Bell Telephone executives would agree that a person should not be left without hospital services—from what I know of them, they are decent, humane people. But when it comes to telephone service they take a different view, though access to a telephone might be just as vital in some circumstances as access to a hospital. They say, "If you want to get a telephone it will cost you $2,000 to spring a line because we are not in your district."

We say that a company in the position of Bell Canada has a special social responsibility, but I know what the answer would be. It would be along these lines: "If we accepted such a responsibility it would be unfair to our stockholders or to telephone users in other areas, because people in those other areas might be paying more for telephone service if we extended uneconomic lines to people living in more remote areas."

I am sure that people in Waterloo-Cambridge, for instance, are already paying out money to help those in other areas of Canada. And they are happy to be doing it. That is part of being a Canadian. We had a flood in my area a few years ago and we were helped by people in other communities. That is what being a Canadian is all about. This is what we find so hard to get through to the consciousness of Bell Canada—the idea that it is not a business like other businesses. If the corporation insists on taking the line that it has responsibility only to its shareholders then it will invite the kind of answer given by my hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre who says, "If that is the situation we shall have to nationalize the company." It is an understandable response.

In some ways Bell behaves like a government and it has to be treated like a government. Governments have always complained that the opposition wants to criticize their actions too much. Consider the system of dealing with estimates in the House. There are some advantages about the new system, but a great deal has been lost since the practice of examining estimates directly in the Chamber was abandoned. Members of the House of Commons could say, as we have been saying during this private member's hour, that they would not allow certain items to go through or certain estimates to pass until they had been given satisfaction. The government complains, of course, that the opposition is being irresponsible, that it is holding things up. But how else in a society like ours, where the government exercises a virtual dictatorship, particularly in the years just following an election, can members air regional grievances? How do you force the government to back off its high horse without the opposition performing its function of saying it is not prepared to let legislation go through unless these grievances are satisfied?

The same can be said of Bell. How do you get Bell to back off its very lofty, estimable, but nevertheless very real high horse? We cannot, unless they come to parliament and get approval. When they come to parliament for approval we will raise issues which we have raised with them privately over the years, and regarding which we have not yet received satisfaction. Either we get that satisfaction or Bell will not get what it wants. That is the situation. Surely Bell should understand its role and should meet the members of the House who have grievances such as I have outlined. Members from northern Ontario in particular have longstanding grievances with Bell. It is not a matter of losing face or hurting pride but of recognizing the social responsibility of a company with a charter like Bell Canada.

Bell would be well advised to understand its role. It is not like other companies. If a person is not satisfied with the service of a particular company he can go somewhere else. It is not like going to the government. Of course, if you are not satisfied with the government you can take care of it at the next election, but how can you take care of Bell? Without a vigilant opposition to scrutinize the operations of Bell when it comes to the House of Commons, Bell is relatively unfettered. I realize there are controls, regulatory agencies and so on, which do a reasonably good job, but they cannot deal with the special problems of different regions caused by grievances against Bell Canada.

I see you are getting somewhat restless, Mr. Speaker, so I will sum up. Bell creates problems for itself by not accepting with pride the fact that it is an effective corporation. It does a good job, but it also has a special public responsibility. It must admit it is not a company like others and that it must accept its social responsibility. It must admit that it understands the sort of grievances which are raised by members of the opposition and that it must work harder to persuade members of the opposition of the correctness of its position. If this sort of change in attitude were to take place in the boardrooms of Bell, I think everyone would be happier and Bell might have more friends in this country, among whom I hope I am numbered.

Bell Canada

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate because I represent the riding of Brant where the telephone was first conceived, I believe in 1874. In my riding there is a very fine Bell homestead, the upkeep of which costs Bell Canada very little, though it nonetheless likes to take pride in the fact that Alexander Graham Bell spent a summer there, during the course of which he conceived the idea of the telephone. I only wish Bell were a little more charitable to some of its customers than it has been to the Bell Homestead Foundation in Brantford.

I realize that the state of Massachusetts and the mayor of Boston, when we were celebrating a couple of years ago the 100th anniversary of Alexander Graham Bell's concept, took some exception to the claim that the telephone was actually invented in Brantford, Ontario, rather than Boston, but I think that all those very mute Liberals who have not spoken on this bill will agree that it is nice to know that the telephone was at least conceived in Canada, not another country.

We are discussing here a very significant and important bill. Bell Canada has a monopoly in its field. It is a privately owned company which is sustained as a monopoly through legislation in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and to some degree in New Brunswick, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon, and perhaps in other parts of Canada as well. Not only is its presence in those provinces guaranteed; it must also accept the guarantee of service.

I should like to relate to the House for a few moments a rather tragic situation—I do not mean emotionally tragic—which exists in my constituency. It has to do with the Six Nations Indian reserve and is really a legal problem. In 1959 the Band Council passed a certain resolution, and passed another one in 1960. According to Bell Canada's lawyers, Bell cannot upgrade service until these two resolutions are withdrawn. I was on the reserve a few weeks ago for the opening of a beautiful new school on the Six Nations reserve called the Jamieson Memorial School. The Jamieson family on the Six Nations reserve has made an outstanding contribution to the field of education, medicine, and other endeavours, particularly agriculture. I do not know how much the school cost to build but I would say it was in the neighbourhood of $300,000 or $400,000. Yet this school had no telephone, and the reason for this was some legal hang-up with Bell going back to 1959.

Since Bell cannot instal a telephone in this brand new school, Mr. Speaker, what would happen, as has happened in schools in other jurisdictions, if a child gets ill or injures himself at sports, or suffers some mental or physical affliction? How can the school call an ambulance if this brand new elementary school, the teachers in which are doing a fine job, cannot use the telephone? It cannot even telephone the parents of children in need of assistance.

I think Bell Canada pays its top executives a salary of around $200,000 a year gross, yet because of some legal hang-up going back to 1959 Bell cannot put one damned telephone into this new elementary school on the Six Nations Reserve. Obviously something is wrong with Bell Canada.

I have waited a long time to make these remarks. The people on the Six Nations reserve did not ask me to make them, but I am now putting them on the public record. If we examine the situation in other remote areas of Ontario and Quebec, just to take these two provinces alone, we will find the same kind of hang-ups with Bell Canada. Rural service is not the same as urban service. Something has to be done about this.

If Bell Canada is given carte blanche to expand its investments and enter into new ventures, without being accountable to the House of Commons or one of its committees, and at the same time enjoys a monopoly, then we are not assuming our responsibilities as members of parliament. Bell Canada cannot have it both ways. It cannot be a government sponsored monopoly, and then move into the private sector and expand.

Although I was not present when the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) made his remarks, my understanding is that he indicated the answer was to nationalize. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) indicated that perhaps it was not the best idea, but if Bell Canada did not clean up its act, the only alternative would be to nationalize it. I am not saying that we should nationalize Bell Canada, although other members of my party believe in that concept. If Bell Canada were nationalized, the cost of buying out that very large corporation might be borne by Canadian taxpayers, and the net result might be higher rates and poor delivery. Crown corporations properly managed by their personnel, and not by Liberal appointees, can make a profit and provide a good service. Further, they are required to take a loss now and then in certain rural and remote areas of the country where private enterprise would never dare to enter.

How can a monopoly have the best of both worlds? Taxpayers are backing up big corporations like Bell Canada, even though it is providing a certain minimum level of service and it is a privately owned corporation that is making a profit. Bell Canada has been given money by an act of parliament through the CRTC. Regardless of the Anti-Inflation Board, that firm has received one increase after another in the past three years. If we are going to provide it with money in this way, it cannot earn money in the private sector as well. If the company finds it more lucrative, obviously it will move more and more into the private sector and less and less toward providing a service to its customers.

It has been argued that if the government goes against "Ma Bell" a lot of shareholders will suffer. The unwillingness to eliminate widows and orphans has been emotionally presented. I am not trying to downgrade or be critical of the orphans or widows of Bell Canada employees; but I should like to point out some of the large companies which have holdings in Bell Canada. Confederated Life holds 63,087 shares; Manulife Diversified has 101,200 shares; United Corporations has 80,142 shares; and the list continues.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. How many stockholders or policyholders do these corporations have? I am talking about the large stockholders of Bell Canada which have been referred to here.

Mr. Blackburn: We are referring to private investment versus public investment. We are not talking in terms of individual shareholders of other corporations. We are referring to the amount of money invested by large corporations in a private corporation which has a monopoly attached to it. That is what we are talking about.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Blackburn: In fact, I think the hon. member's question is quite out of order. If the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) is now appearing in this Chamber as a great champion of big corporations backing Bell Canada, I will sit down and let him have the floor. What about the subscribers? Are they not entitled to a choice? We are talking about the shareholders of Bell Canada, the subscribers of Bell Canada, and Bill C-1001. If the hon. member wants to make a speech, as far as I am concerned, he can. I think his constituents will be very upset if he rises and makes a speech right now championing large corporations that have invested in Bell Canada. That corporation is increasing its prices for services to private people, industries and corporations. Perhaps the hon. member should think of that before he rises to his feet.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose this afternoon clause 6 of the bill, as amended, was under consideration.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Chairman, just before we rose for the dinner hour I was pointing out that, to a great degree, I was in sympathy with the minister's interpretation of remarks relating to spending. I suppose the task for the minister and for all of us is to rationalize spending into those areas where it could do the most long term good, and simply eleminate it in those areas which are non-productive.

During second reading debate on Bill C-11 I raised a question as to whether the minister has considered the roll-over provision for primary property. The question was whether the roll-over provision for primary property would allow the sale of a family farm or family business, and whether taxes could be deferred by buying into a bigger unit. Can a farmer or businessman roll over his farm or business to a close family member without the assessment of capital gains? I am willing to put an upper limit, that is, a dollar value, but without question capital gains taxes militate against sons and daughters taking over farming operations. Can the minister give me some indication as to why that was not extended?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I understand that 98 per cent of farmers qualify for that roll-over, so I do not see why the hon. member is preoccupied with this. Most family-owned farms can be rolled over.

Mr. Epp: I am not speaking about the roll-over of a farm where a farmer buys a larger unit. Because the average age of Canadian farmers is now approximately 60, many people want to get out of their farming operations and roll them over to close family members.

Mr. Chrétien: They can be rolled over for children or wives, but not for third parties. If this is done within the family, there is no problem.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I want to make one last attempt to see if I can talk any reason into the Minister of Finance. I doubt that I can, but I am going to speak dispassionately. I do not want to get excited or to rouse any partisan impulses on the part of any member. I want to speak in a tone of sweet reason. I have not tried this tone with the government opposite before, but I am going to try it now just to see if I can get through to it.

Before getting into this insulation business I would like to mention that the minister of mines and energy from Newfoundland is in the gallery. He is not in the distinguished visitor's gallery or in the diplomatic gallery. He is a humble man, and he is in the people's gallery tonight. He is in Ottawa attending a conference.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All Newfoundlanders are humble.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that all Newfoundlanders are humble. That is very true, and one of the most humble is the person now speaking.

I would like to get back to clause 6(5) which has to do with the Minister of Finance and the government wanting to make taxable certain grants which will be paid to people who want to re-insulate their homes in all the provinces of Canada except Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I want to make it plain that we are not suggesting that more money be spent in Canada. We are saying we believe the Nova Scotia and PEI programs are good programs, and we are delighted that the people of Nova Scotia and P.E.I. have them and are going to get grants to help them insulate their homes, which will save on the use of oil, coal and so on for heating their homes. What we say, however, is that the same program should apply to anybody in Canada no matter where he lives, and that the half-baked program which now applies in the other eight provinces should be changed to correspond with the Nova Scotia and P.E.I. program. However, if the government will not do that, at the very least the grants it makes in the other eight provinces should not be added to taxable income, just as they are not added in Nova Scotia or P.E.I.

The Minister of Finance has stated what the government has said from the start of these two programs, and that is that the reason there is discrimination in favour of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island is that they have higher electricity costs and that they are highly dependent on oil for the production of electricity. I agree that they are more dependent on oil to produce electricity than any other province, but that is no reason to give them a special program for the insulation of homes. If we are going to institute a program on the basis of need, we should look at all the costs which face the householder.

For example we have a man who lives in Nova Scotia with his family and makes $10,000; a man and his family in Quebec who makes $10,000; and another man and his family who live in Newfoundland who make $10,000, so we have to try to see who is the most needy of these people. It may be the man in Nova Scotia who has the highest electricity bills because in Nova Scotia they use oil more than the rest of us do to produce electricity. Let us assume, which is not true, that the electricity bills are higher in Nova Scotia and that they are lower in Quebec and Newfoundland. But, then we have to go and look at everything that affects the requirements of that man and his family. We have to look at the cost of living in Nova Scotia compared to Newfoundland and Quebec; where is it highest? We have to look at taxes and all the costs the man has to bear, what he has to spend his disposable income on, and we have to look at the people in that province to see what their per capita disposable income is. You have to look at all these factors before you can decide where there is the most need.

Simply because Nova Scotians have the highest electricity costs, which I do not agree they have, but if we assume for the purposes of argument because they have the highest electricity costs, it does not mean they have the most need.

Mr. Chairman, in Newfoundland in 1975 the per capita personal income of an average Newfoundlander compared to the national income per capita was 69 per cent. In Prince Edward Island it was 68.6 per cent. Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island were pretty well the same as far as disposable personal income per capita was concerned. In Nova Scotia it was 79 per cent. The average Nova Scotian was considerably better off than the average Newfoundlander or Prince Edward Islander in 1975. In New Brunswick it was 77 per cent. So that the New Brunswick citizens were slightly worse off than the people in Nova Scotia. The people in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island were considerably worse off than those in Nova Scotia. Let us say that the average Newfoundlander had a lower income than the average Nova Scotian. Then you have to look at their living costs and which province has the highest cost of living. I can assure you it was the Newfoundlander.

On the basis of need for this program, and looking at the need on a provincial basis, a better case could be made out for the Newfoundlander than the Nova Scotian. There is simply no point in plucking out of the air one aspect—the cost of living of a Nova Scotian and a Prince Edward Islander and comparing that to the cost of living of everyone else in Canada, and saying because that is higher, therefore they need a better home insulation program than the rest of Canadians.

If anyone is listening with any kind of dispassionate approach at all, the reason the government gives for a better program in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia falls to the ground. There is no rationale, except a political one. There is no use in the minister getting up and saying because electricity costs are higher in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island that they need this program more. As I explained yesterday and this afternoon, they do not heat their homes in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia through electricity, they heat them through oil principally, and some coal. Ninety per cent of the homes in Nova Scotia are heated through oil fired furnaces or stoves, and 98 per cent of P.E.I. heat their homes through oil. This program helps them to save oil, but it does not help them to save electricity. It has no connection to electricity. The electricity is only a wet blanket or a red herring thrown out ten months ago to justify having a program in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and not having one in the rest of the provinces. It is federalism in reverse.

Not only that, but the program offered to the rest of Canada is regressive and inequitable because you receive the same program no matter which province you live in—whether it is a wealthy province or a poor province. Newfoundland has the highest unemployment and the lowest average income and they have the highest petroleum product prices of any part of Canada, yet Newfoundland is offered an inferior program and Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island the superior one. It makes no sense. The program offered to Newfoundland and the other eight provinces is worse than that offered in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

I will just recapitulate the seven reasons very quickly. This program is uniform in the eight provinces and it gives the richer provinces exactly the same amount of subsidy as the poorer provinces. It does not take into consideration the fact that in some provinces there are higher energy costs, with the exception of electricity in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. There are higher energy costs in Newfoundland than in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island especially when you take into consideration the cost of petroleum products, together with the fact that electricity rates have gone up in Newfoundland I would say at least 100 per cent in the past two or three years. You should be looking at energy costs not just electricity.

In Newfoundland you have the highest unemployment and lowest average income levels in Canada and the highest petroleum product prices. The highest prices for gasoline are in Newfoundland. The highest price for oil which you burn in your furnace at home is in Newfoundland. That is where the program is most needed. I am not saying it should not be in effect in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but you can make a better case on the basis of need in Newfoundland.

Then you look at the climate—where is it the coldest? My God, it is much colder in Labrador, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Ontario, northern Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta than it is in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have relatively mild climates. There should be one program and it should be uniform across Canada and it should be the Nova Scotia-P.E.I. program. The grants should not be taxable and they should be administered on the same base. There is no justification for a different program in eight of the ten provinces, and a better one in N.S. and P.E.I.

As I said before, if it is a question of money, and we realize and we do not want the Minister of Finance to spend more than he can, he has a huge deficit this year—$8.5 billion or $9 billion is it?—the figures stagger the mind. I suggested the solution yesterday, take the N.S. and P.E.I. program and start applying it in part of the country this year, based on the greatest need, based on the unemployment rates, the income levels, the cost of living levels, the climate or whatever and start over the next three years applying it to the whole country, so that all the costs do not have to be implemented immediately. If you do not have the money to apply it in all ten provinces at once, you have already done it in P.E.I. and N.S. for some peculiar reason—which I think is a political one—but in the rest of Canada start to do it over three or four years. Do not continue this half-baked program that is now before the House in clause 6.

Today at the conference of ministers of energy, the eight provincial ministers, excluding P.E.I. and N.S., have made suggestions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of Canada. They have made a lot of compromises but the one thing all eight provinces are agreed on is that these grants should be non-taxable. I do not know whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources agreed with the suggestions because he would have to go back to the cabinet. However, a very reasonable proposition was put to him today by the other ministers of energy, aside from agreeing that grants should be non-taxable, and that is there be no preconditions in every province. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that there were four conditions to comply with in order that a province would be able to enter this program—other than N.S. and P.E.I., they did not have to agree to any conditions. I said how unfair it was for the federal government to try to dragoon and push this program into effect to make the provinces agree to certain conditions. Today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has agreed to drop that. He has agreed to stop this bully-boy federalism, this Kung Fu federalism which he and the hon. member for Rosedale were so fond of.

● (2022)

If you did not agree with the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale—Kung Fu—you got the fiscal foot right in your mouth. You had to bend to him, or else. We hope that the present Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Shawinigan—

Mr. Chrétien: Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Crosbie: —the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, will be a more flexible federalist and not as Kung-Fu-ish as his predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources today agreed to drop these provisions. Quebec and Alberta apparently are going to join the program because there are no pre-conditions. If the government can drop the pre-conditions, surely it can do justice to the ordinary taxpayer and householder in Canada and stop this nonsense.

In Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Quebec and Alberta you are going to be taxed if you insulate your home, because any grant will be added to your taxable income. However, if you are in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, the new tax havens of Canada, you will not be taxed. Surely we should stand this clause over until the Minister of Finance can get the cabinet to ratify dropping this ridiculous, discriminatory, illiberal, undemocratic, and certainly un-Tory measure that he has before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I do not want to be criticial of the government, as you know, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chrétien: You would never do that!

Mr. Crosbie: Our objection to this clause is not the raising of tax revenue in the right way, or to the tax itself. We object to the fact that it is discriminatory.

The Minister of Finance got up in the House today. I have some respect for his intelligence until I hear some of the things he says. Then I temporarily lose that respect, but my hope rises again. Perhaps he is not as unreasonable as he sometimes appears. He tried to justify this discrimination by saying that the government spends more on Canada Works in some provinces than in others. Sure it does, because there is more unemployment in some provinces than in others. That is why it spends more. But that has no connection with the home insulation program. That is our whole point. It is not footing the money for the home insulation program in areas of need equally across Canada.

It is not just in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island that this is needed. The man in Newfoundland or Quebec who earns $5,000 a year needs it just as much as the man in Nova Scotia.

The estimated cost of insulating the average home is $900. Outside of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island the maximum grant is $350. You still have to put up a great deal of your own money to insulate your home.

Along comes the government to encourage you to insulate your home in order to save energy. The department says if your home is properly insulated, you will save 38 per cent of your heating costs. The government will give you $350 if you spend the maximum, but you will be taxed on it. On the one hand they encourage you, and on the other they take it back.

The principle seems to be that the government feels we need to have this tax because it is progressive. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre said that he agreed with the taxation principle because the higher your income was, the greater the amount of the grant you would pay back to the government. That is the real NDP principle, progressive taxation. We all happen to agree with that.

The point is that it is not being applied everywhere in Canada. The government should apply that principle to everyone in Canada. Why should the rich in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island get the advantage of these grants without tax? If the principle is right, the grants should be taxed all across Canada.

If you want to encourage people to insulate their homes, you do not add the grants to their taxable income. This is the most illogical proposal the government has made in at least two or three days. It makes a lot of the illogical proposals, but this is the worst since I have been here. I am speaking more in sorrow than in anger, as hon. members can see.

The hon. member for Fort William is, according to my observation, an intelligent man. He is very interested in the energy field. He supports the government's program because they use oil more for electricity in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. That just does not wash. It has nothing to do with that. If we are going on the basis of need, it should apply to all ten provinces. The needy in all those ten provinces should get the same treatment. That is not the way it is now. I want to move a motion as follows:

That clause 6 be amended by deleting subclause 5 and renumbering the remaining subclauses accordingly.

Subclause 5 deals with this iniquity which makes the grants taxable. The people who live in the eight provinces outside of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are going to put up a statue to me, if I am successful. It is like no taxation without representation. They have not got any representation on the Liberal side of the House if this is not carried.

If there is a member in this Chamber who can argue that the people of his constituency should be taxed simply because they do not live in Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island, and his people re-elect him, I say there is something fundamentally wrong with the communications system in Canada. We will somehow have to get to every household to be sure they are defeated.

If members opposite who come from Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories vote to tax their people for insulation grants, when those in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are not going to be taxed, they deserve the ultimate punishment, banishment by the electorate. It cannot be justified.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman—I am sorry—I thought the hon. member had finished.

Mr. Crosbie: I am not finished. I was only taking a breath. If the minister is getting up to agree to withdraw the clause, I will subside and we can get on with this.

There are a couple of other items. Heating bills will be reduced by 38 per cent. This afternoon I made the mistake of speaking for five minutes and asking a couple of questions. I never got another chance to speak until tonight. I will not make that mistake again. I will speak my full time, and then ask my questions at the end.

I do not want the Minister of Finance to be thought of by some people as Mr. Slippery Heels. I know he does not mean to be a slippery heel. He wants to give us the full information and not try to slide around or slip out of anything. I have a great deal of regard for that hon. gentleman.

This afternoon I asked him two questions which he did not answer. The first question was: what do the minister's officials calculate will be the tax return to them by having these grants taxable in eight provinces of Canada? What, if anything, will that be for the government?

The other question was: what is the estimate of the cost of the program excluding Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources introduced this program, the estimate was that it was going to cost $45 million by the end of March, 1978, and that the program would cover 133,000 units. Their estimate was that next year it would cover 462,000 units and cost $145 million.

I gave figures to the committee this afternoon which showed that up until November 25 there had only been 5,000 applications and only half a million dollars spent. Obviously it will not cost $45 million this year. People are not going for it. They do not like it. They know it is inequitable. Obviously it is not attractive to them despite the fact that they should insulate their homes better. Can we have these figures?

These are my questions that were ignored when the Minister of Finance got up this afternoon and made a political reply, which he should not do. As Minister of Finance, he should not be political. He should be like his predecessors who were never political, the hon. member for Rosedale and the former member for Ottawa-Carleton. They were predatory, but not political. The minister should just deal with the facts.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

● (2032)

Mr. Chrétien: I think I have to reply to this point because I should like to have the amendment disposed of very quickly. I would point out that the cost of the program is $4.7 billion over seven years for the eight provinces to which he referred, and the cost of the program if it were not taxable would be $560 million more, and would increase the total cost of the program to $5,160 million.

The hon. member discussed the design of the program at length. There was further discussion about it today involving the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his provincial counterparts. I gave the reasons why the government had to move in two stages. It is a difficult proposition. I find it extraordinary that, after four weeks spent here in discussing the financial situation of the nation, one member of the House should get up and propose an extra item of expenditure, like $560 million over the next seven years. I say once again that I hope that proposal will be defeated very quickly, and I shall be watching the hon. member for Provencher closely to see what attitude he takes toward it.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not like to interrupt the minister, but he is not factual. Our proposal would be to extend the same program as they have in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island over a period of four or five years. I did not advocate spending another $560 million this year. The hon. member should not twist my words. I do not want to lose my respect for the hon. gentleman, because I did not have too much to start with.

Mr. Paproski: Might I ask the minister a question concerning the insulation program which Alberta has now agreed to join? What was the deal with Alberta, and what other deal did the federal government abandon in order to get Alberta into this program? The answer might shed a little light on things, so perhaps we could have an explanation.

Mr. Chrétien: There was discussion on this subject between the ministers today and they reached an agreement. I do not know the terms of that agreement. I have been in my place here all day, and I cannot be in two places at the same time. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is responsible for that program, will be in the House tomorrow and hon. members can put questions to him at that time. We have spent a lot of time in this Chamber today discussing a program which does not come under my department. I merely want to say that if the proposal of the hon. member for St. John's West is adopted we shall be spending another $560 million. You know, Mr. Chairman, I shall be very pleased in my speeches around the nation to draw attention to the double-talk of the official opposition.

Mr. Paproski: I want to know whether this involves any tax. Surely the Minister of Finance must have had a conversation with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before he went into the meeting today. What kind of sweetheart deal did he make? Some provinces have stayed out of it, and there must be a reason for them to want to get back into it.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member can address his questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tomorrow. I must say I should like to get agreement to this clause quickly. After all, we are on the verge of completing our fourth week of debate on a bill of 160 clauses, and we have reached clause six. We have a long way to go.

Mr. Epp: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have a fair amount of respect for the minister but I do not think he would wish to give an incorrect impression of what I was saying. What I said to the minister was that I would support him in whatever cut he was willing to make to reduce the present 43 per cent of the GNP which represents public spending. I also said there were many ways in which government spending could be reduced.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Epp: If the hon. member for St. Catharines had been in the committee today and had seen some of the things we spent money on and some of the estimates of the Secretary of State, he would have blushed with shame. I say to the Minister of Finance: Spend money wisely; spend money on projects such as insulation which will enable us to reduce energy consumption and improve the balance of payments. That is the way to go; cut back on programs which are of little or no value.

Mr. Chrétien: I was merely pointing out that if the committee were to adopt the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's West and make these grants not taxable over a period of seven years, it would cost the treasury $560 million. People can make their own judgment.

Mr. Paproski: The Minister of Finance is trying to convey the impression that he never speaks to the Minister of Energy. I do not see why we should vote on the amendment at this time when the minister cannot tell us what the deal was with Alberta. It is important that we should know. Surely he knew what was happening at that conference.

Mr. Chrétien: I have great confidence in the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I am very pleased he was able to make a deal with the two provinces which were not included in the program. I must admit I was not there during the negotiations. Apparently, though, an agreement was reached and I am pleased about it. I am sure my colleague did not go beyond his mandate; I know what it was. I hope the hon. member will not vote in favour of an amendment which will cost more than $500 million. Perhaps he should go and help the Eskimos of Edmonton to play a little football.

Mr. Paproski: I want to ask the minister this: what was that mandate? He will not tell me what the mandate was. He does not know what the mandate was. Maybe Alberta is going to save money for the treasury. The minister is not telling us the truth. I am surprised that the minister should stand there and talk about something he doesn't know.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, is the only way to get the floor here by rising on a point of order?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. He has told us it will cost $560 million if we accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John's West. May I remind him that that amount would be spread over a period of seven years, which would mean $80 million a year, or less. In the interest of establishing the principle of fairness and equity in all provinces, rather than just two at the moment, would the Minister of Finance say that this is an unreasonable amount to pay?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, there is a very funny atmosphere here. The suggestion appears to be, "What's $80 million a year?"

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I have a very simple observation to make to an otherwise generally intelligent individual. I think that the Chamber, or those in it who are listening to the minister, would reject the sophistry of the position he has been taking in the last 20 minutes, and I think he is aware of that. I would commend to the minister some reading as to why we have a Canada today, such as that by Joe Howe. I would also remind him that he knows precisely what is the position of the opposition in this regard, and I suggest he review his Canadian history. Or is he so narrow minded that he only reads some other histories of Canada?

I say to the minister, don't use that argument unless you want to be divisive in this country. I have watched him and some of his colleagues debate and argue in this Chamber for 10 or 12 years, and I am accusing him of sophistry in the casual, offhanded manner in which he rejected a serious amendment. The minister knows exactly what I am talking about. Nova Scotians and Prince Edward Islanders do not want to be accused of being alone in this nation. Don't stand there and tell me half truths, Mr. Minister, tongue in cheek; because you know differently. Do not ever let me privately believe that you are capable of going to such an extent with respect to a serious amendment to your proposal.

Mr. Chrétien: I want the hon. member to know that the first program was designed to assist two provinces in Confederation which rely almost absolutely on imported oil for their energy. The energy crisis hit those two provinces more than any others. The federal government designed a special program to aid people in this land who were worse hit by the cost of oil than others. Those two provinces were more dependent on oil, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. We tried to find a solution that would give the people in those two provinces assistance, since unfortunately they were the victims of the increase in the price of imported oil.

We were aware that this might create some resentment. It was not an easy thing to do. I am a member from Quebec and this did not assist my province. As I recall it, I was President of the Treasury Board at the time and I had some qualms about it, but I understood that the principle of our Confederation is that when one province is hit by disaster more than any others, it is the duty of the government to come to its aid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Since people said it was a good idea to make money available for home insulation, we decided to apply the program to the rest of the country, making availale $350 for everyone, part of which was to be taxable. I agree that making the program applicable to two provinces only was a difficult idea to sell to the nation; but any observer will recognize that that action had nothing to do with politics. Prince Edward Island is 100 per cent dependent upon oil for electricity; Nova Scotia is 84 per cent dependent. Those two provinces depend on oil, not only for home heating but for the production of electricity.

Since there was so much complaint about this, the government decided to set up another program of the same type. I wish we had been able to provide $500 for everybody. In the first instance the grant was given to compensate individuals who were hit by the increase in the price of oil more than others. The new scheme has been accepted by all provinces, including my own province of Quebec, and Alberta.

Mr. Forrestall: What are you talking about? Just look at the distribution of wealth in Montreal.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have tried to give a down to earth, clear explanation of the reason the government took action. In my judgment, that was the way we should have operated. If a drought occurs during the summer in one area of the country, then we have a special program to aid that area. If there is a flood, again we have a special program. When these two provinces were hit more by the increased price of oil, we designed a program to help them. We wanted to help those who were suffering most from the increase in the price of oil. I should like to have a vote on this matter right away to see who are the responsible members of the House of Commons and who are not.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Fort William on a point of order.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to clarify one point. We are talking about $560 million over seven years—

Mr. Forrestall: That is not a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Fort William has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. McRae: No, Mr. Chairman, I do not have a point of order. I have a question I want to put to the minister. He mentioned $560 million over seven years as being the additional cost of this amendment. He is in no way giving the same benefits to the whole country as exist in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; this only refers to making it totally tax free?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Chairman. If the amendment carries this will mean the $350 would not be taxable at all, and the cost to the treasury will be $560 million over seven years.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, I have five questions for the Minister of Finance, and the fifth question will determine how I vote on this amendment. I was in committee this afternoon with his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, so if my questions have already been answered I hope he will forgive me for asking them again.

Does the minister have any plans to extend this home insulation program to any home built at any time, rather than the various years depending on the province?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this is a question on the administration of the program, which does not come under me. Thus I am not in a position to give a precise answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Whiteway: My second question is: if the Minister of Finance has ever been out in the prairies and has been subject to those howling prairie winds in January and February, he will know that, as important as insulating the walls may be, insulation for windows and doors, such as double and thermal glazed windows, is as important. Would the minister consider extending the program to the insulation of windows and doors?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this is another question about the management of the program, which does not come under me. That comes under the jurisdiction of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs. As far as the big winds of the west are concerned, I know a little bit about it, even if I am from Quebec. The hon. member should know that my grandfather arrived in St. Paul, Alberta, in 1905.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, I will group my third and fourth questions together, because perhaps the minister will consider them better answered by his colleague who did not answer them in committee this afternoon.

Miss Bégin: Are these questions as to the amendment?

Mr. Whiteway: They have to do with the amendment. The fifth question, depending upon the minister's answer, will affect how I vote on the amendment. I know hon. members opposite are anxious, but I am now dealing with my third question, and then I will deal with my fourth and fifth questions.

There are many problems in relation to those who sell the insulation and those who install it. Some Johnny-come-lately and Mickey Mouse companies have sprung up overnight in order to make a quick profit on the insulation program.

Mr. Blackburn: It is called free enterprise.

Mr. Whiteway: Has the minister looked at this?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I wish I could give the hon. member a precise answer to his question; but those questions concerning the administration of the program should be asked in committee when the ministers responsible are present. I will not comment on their behalf in regard to those technical questions.

Mr. Whiteway: My fourth question is: as was indicated this morning on the CBC, there were approximately 60,000 grants applied for, and only 3,000 cheques were sent out in reference to the program. Does the minister project that all the funds will be used this year? If not, will he carry the surplus funds left over into next year's program?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member would be well advised to deal with his fifth question right away, because this is another question about the management of the program for which I am not responsible.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, my fifth question is critical to me because I grew up on the south shore of Nova Scotia, although I represent the keystone province of Manitoba. My question will be very simple. It will put my mind to rest, as well as the minds of hundreds of thousand of Canadians, particularly from Nova Scotia. My question is—

Mr. Paproski: Will the minister resign?

Mr. Whiteway: Was any political consideration given to making the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia tax-free under this program?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to tell the hon. member that there was absolutely no such consideration. It was strictly relative to the fact that Prince Edward and Nova Scotia were dependent on oil. All the figures were looked at before a decision was reached, because we were aware of that very difficult problem. It would have been easier to include another province which had the same situation. Then we would not have been accused of acting in the way we did because these two provinces have Liberal governments. We are not stupid—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't mislead the House.

Mr. Paproski: Once a Liberal, always a Liberal.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): We have to have a chance to speak once in a while.

Mr. Chrétien: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. There was absolutely no such consideration given to that. It was related to the fact that these two provinces have been hit more than any other province by the increase in the price of oil.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Chairman, I have a supplementary to my fifth question.

Mr. Benjamin: He has had his five questions.

Mr. Whiteway: This is question No. 5(b).

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk has 20 minutes in which to make his speech.

Mr. Whiteway: When I was growing up down on the south shore of Nova Scotia, one afternoon I had my dog out in the woods, and I had my old twist steel 16-gauge shotgun. I wanted to teach my dog how to retrieve. I had my gun loaded. I threw a stick out, shot, and the old dog never moved.

An hon. Member: It must have been a Liberal.

Mr. Whiteway: Rather than shoot the dog, I decided to give the old boy another chance. Therefore I will give the minister another chance. I am wondering whether, on closer reflection, the minister might repent and decide to tell us the truth—

Mr. Fraser: Or be shot.

Mr. Whiteway: We will not hold it against him. There are only two provinces in Confederation with Liberal governments. We realize those provinces are struggling. Perhaps the minister might come clean and tell us if there was any political consideration given to making Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia tax free under the program?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat what I said when the hon. member was not in the House. I should like to give the figures for the percentage of electricity generated by thermal processes. Newfoundland is 1.7 per cent; Prince Edward Island is 100 per cent; Nova Scotia is 83.1 per cent; New Brunswick is 32.5 per cent; and Quebec is 0.3 per cent. Therefore the figures indicate those provinces which were suffering most because of the increase in the price of oil.

We have designed a scheme to help those provinces face their difficulties. We have applied the normal principle in this land: when there is a disaster in one area, we attempt to help. All day long members have been accusing us of doing our job because of the political stripes of those provinces. That is absolutely not true.

I am pleased that the hon. member asked his question. I am a little bit of a politician, and I had a funny reaction when I was confronted with that scheme. Sometimes we have to make difficult decisions, and the cosmetics of them are not easily defended. Not only did we want to help those provinces in regard to insulation, we wanted to find a way to help those people who, by sheer accident of nature, were dependent more upon oil than any other part of Canada.

Mr. Whiteway: Perhaps the minister can answer this question: why was the principle not maintained of having those best able to pay being given the least from government help, which they do not need? Why was the grant in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island not $1,000 or $2,000, and maintain the deductibility or the taxability of the grant? There are some rich people in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Why did the minister not maintain the principle of its being taxable and simply increase the grant to maintain consistency for our provinces?

Mr. Chrétien: I tend to agree with the hon. member. The two programs were designed in different contexts. Today we are debating an aspect of one of the programs. The second grant was made taxable. It was felt that it would be more just if the people with some means receiving that grant were to pay tax back to the government. However, the poor would not pay any taxes at all. Perhaps we should have gone to $1,000 for P.E.I. and Nova Scotia and taxed it, but it was not designed at the same time or under the same circumstances. I recognize that the hon. member has a point, but there is nothing I can do.

We are debating these programs at the same time. One program has been going on for a few years, and the other one is a new scheme. From the experience of having a grant taxable we felt it would be more just in order to cope with the two personal positions. However, I have to admit candidly that the programs were designed at different times, and sometimes we are faced with some difficult situations like the one we have here. I cannot withdraw anything I have said. They were designed at different times for different purposes.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening carefully, and I must confess that I have some sympathy for those who support the amendment, but I also have some sympathy for the Minister of Finance. At the outset I want to say, as the minister himself has said, that he might be ignorant, but he is not stupid. This minister is a nice fellow, but he would not be so stupid as to bring in a program which would benefit the only two Liberal provinces left in Canada. I believe him. I do not believe the hon. member for Selkirk, or any other accusations or intimations. I believe the minister when he says that the two programs were set up in two different contexts.

I would like to ask the minister a question. If the programs for the people in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are equitable and fair, regardless of the different contexts surely they are equitable and fair for the people of all the other provinces? The programs have an excellent principle. We support the programs 100 per cent. The amendment only suggests that they apply evenly all across the country.

When the minister responds I would also like him to tell us how he calculates the $560 million. That is very important, because we were hit with $580 million the other day.

When the minister spoke about imported oil I understood him to say—I certainly got the impression—that all of a sudden it was just Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia which relied heavily on imported oil. The minister and everybody else knows that that is the case in all five eastern provinces.

[Mr. Whiteway.]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, with the hon. member's permission I would like to clarify this right away. I said that they were more dependent because there was an element in their internal economies which made them more dependent on oil. They need oil for heating their homes, running their cars and so on, but in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. the production of electricity is dependent on imported oil, and when the price of imported oil was increased those provinces were hit hardest. That is why we tried to design a program to help them in a different way. Perhaps we should have used another vehicle, but that was the vehicle chosen at that time. There are statistics to prove that there was a need.

The other eastern provinces are also dependent on imported oil, but because of the use of oil in the production of electricity, Nova Scotia and P.E.I. have more dependence.

Mr. Benjamin: I thank the minister for that reponse. I think he is correct, except that while all five eastern provinces rely on imported oil—and not just for the generation of electricity—I would like the minister to have his officials look at the costs for home owners in Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland as well as for those in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. In the former three provinces there are a larger number of homes to heat.

This matter has to do with home insultation and whether the cost of it can be deducted for income tax purposes, but the cost of the generation of electricity in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. is not the only consideration. There are people who may have to heat their homes with electricity, and the minister's argument is perfectly valid in that regard, but there are people who have to heat their homes with oil, and the majority of them live in Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. These people suffer the same kind of handicap as power companies which have to create electricity from oil.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I just want to repeat that we have chosen a vehicle to help the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island because the increase in the cost of oil caused a large increase in the price of electricity over a short period of time. At that time we tried to find a mechanism to help home owners. It could have been in the form of grants, but some said that we should also give an incentive to people to insulate their homes at the same time. We designed a program like that. It was not in relation to the fact that houses were heated with oil, because that is the case in Quebec and elsewhere. It was a vehicle to reimburse those who were affected not just by the increased cost of heating homes but also by the increased cost of electricity. We used that vehicle.

There are people who ask why we have done this just for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and why not for the rest of the land. We designed another program which was less generous. It amounts to grants of $350 of which part is taxable for those who pay taxes, so part of that will come back to the government. The departmental advisers examined the question of who would apply for these grants. They have made calculations. If a person is in the highest income bracket, he will return more than half of his grant to the government in taxes.

My officials have calculated that the program will cost $1.4 billion. In fact probably $1.9 billion will be disbursed, and some $560 million will come back into the coffers of the government in taxes.

Mr. Benjamin: I am glad to get that clarification from the minister in terms of why it was felt certain things had to be done, and why later on there were two separate operations. I appreciate that, and I accept it completely, but I am still not convinced about the $560 million. However, I will leave that aside.

I believe that the principle of re-insulation has to be followed no matter where we live, and the government's desire for energy conservation is laudable. Any benefit the government wishes to use, whether it be a tax benefit, a grant or any other mechanism, should be used if it conserves energy. The government might, however, try to prevent the rip-offs by wholesalers and retailers of insulation materials which are going on all across the country. That would be a benefit. Before the AIB dies an unnatural death, perhaps it should be turned loose on checking the prices of insulation materials at the wholesale and retail levels. Alleged shortages in some cities should be looked into. I recognize that there are legitimate shortages in other cities. Looking into some of these things might be of as much benefit as any grant or tax benefit.

I would like more explanation from the minister about the $560 million. I would like to know how he arrived at that figure. I would also like to remind him of a question I raised earlier, which he has still not answered. In terms of insulating homes, energy conservation and the costs of imported oil, he has really begged the question of what it costs a person in the five eastern provinces who heats his home with heating oil rather than electricity. My suggestion to the minister is that there is the need for a blanket program to cover all of those. Maybe he will do it in his next budget, I hope so and I hope he is making a mental note of this.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not have the answer as to the cost of heating a home with oil in different provinces. I am not the minister responsible for the program, it is a program in the energy field, and I am the Minister of Finance. I am in a handicapped position tonight to answer for a program which has been designed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I am trying to be explicit but those technical questions you are putting to me could probably be answered by an expert in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I do not know that as I am not a specialist in that field. I have to admit that with a lot of humility.

Mr. Benjamin: The government's program of aid for insulating homes may be valid in the Atlantic provinces where no doubt there are many more homes which are older than homes in the more recently settled parts of Canada, for example, Ontario, the prairie provinces and British Columbia. One of the problems confronting myself and other members from similar parts of Canada, when you talk about aid and comfort for a person who insulates a home built prior to 1921 is to find one. I have been looking around in my city, Mr. Chairman, and also around the rural part of my constituency for homes still occupied and being used for something else besides a granary built prior to 1921 and it would be easier to find a sod shack that an immigrant lived in. If there were still a sod shack on the prairies, he could take advantage of the program because there were always chinks and holes in the shack the blizzard and wind blew in, and maybe he could save some coal and wood that was burned in that sod shack. The year 1921 indicates to me that the minister and the government are not serious. They do not really mean business about energy conservation. My goodness, even the couple of provinces who have said 1941—that is a remarkable improvement over what the federal government has at the moment. Surely he cannot expect ordinary citizens in this country, let alone members of this House, to really take seriously a program that provides aid to homes built prior to 1921. I do not know how many homes my colleagues on all sides of the House would find in their particular ridings, if they took a reading on it, but there are not many still occupied and built prior to 1921. I have a couple of slum landlords in Regina, but they are not taking advantage of the program, because they are collecting the welfare cheques from people who are living in them.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Benjamin: The minister expects us to accept all the arguments. I do not agree with various and sundry mean aspersions and motives that have been cast upon him, I know he is not that stupid. But I think he is extremely stupid in trying to somehow validate a way of implementing an excellent program and idea. The amendment brings some equity into a laudable objective. The $560 million even if the minister is accurate, I am not sure whether it is $560 million of taxable income or $560 million in income tax that would be lost—which one is it?

Mr. Chrétien: Income tax we lose.

Mr. Benjamin: If it is $560 million in income tax he would lose, he can recover twice that amount by forgetting about the rest of the provisions in Bill C-11.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not want to carry a debate too long on that because I am not the minister responsible for the design of the program, and I cannot have an argument with him. I know the cost of it and when they designed a second program, they included an element, rather than $250 for everybody, they felt it was better to have $350 for everybody and make it taxable, so the rich will return a portion of it to the Crown. Because they have included that in the program, I have one little amendment to Bill C-11. If you have any quarrels with this, you always have the privilege to take that up with the minister responsible when he is here in the House of Commons or in committee.

An hon. Member: You are stuck with selling it.

Mr. Chrétien: I agree.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, it is nice to have the Minister of Finance back with us today. I understand he was looking for me earlier in the House, and I want to assure him that I am here and very eager to get on with the passage of this bill.

If I could take a little different tack dealing with this amendment, I direct the minister's attention to the income tax motion which states that for the 1977 and subsequent taxation years a grant received under the Canadian Home Insulation Program be included in the income of the recipient, or in the case of a married individual residing with his spouse, and the income of the spouse with the higher income. My question to the minister is this: the income tax motion deals only with the Canadian Home Insulation Program, but we find that the wording of subsection 5 refers to an amount received under a program that is a prescribed program of the Government of Canada. Could the minister indicate why we have what appears to be a much wider wording than was initially set out in the income tax motion?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not understand. There is not a fundamental difference between the two.

Mr. Stevens: I realize the minister might be quite tired. But I read the difference. That is unbelievable. The difference is in the income tax motion. It refers to only one narrow program, it refers to the Canadian Home Insulation Program. But when we find the provision in the act, which after all is just across the page, it does not refer to insulation at all. It says it is applicable to a program prescribed by the Government of Canada. That, Mr. Chairman is an entirely different reference, and in fact, let me underline it. I question whether the draftsman have the authority to draft the section the way it is now, bearing in mind that the original income tax motion was a very much more narrow motion than it has ended in the bill that is before us.

Mr. Chrétien: I can explain, Mr. Chairman, why the drafting looks a little broader than in the actual act. If there are programs of the same nature, it could be that the ministers responsible come to us to extend those programs. If we change the program, the act as drafted will permit us to proceed in the same way. We will have the same legal authority.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, for the record, the minister better clarify his earlier answer. He just got through telling this committee there is no essential difference between the income tax motion and subclause (5) before us as far as the bill is concerned. Now he has told us there is in fact a difference.

Let us be blunt about it. What the government is asking for in this subclause is an extremely wide power to tax, with no further reference to this House. If you read the technical wording, what it is saying is from now on, if it prescribes a program to be taxable, it is automatically taxable. In other words anything this government chooses to do in the line of new grants or new programs, rather than coming through us as it did in the income tax motion and saying that it would like to tax the Canadian Home Insulation Program, in future we will never hear of it. It in fact will simply prescribe a program to be taxable. If you like, I will in due course read the impact of what it is doing here. First, I think the minister should clarify for us what exactly he and his colleagues have in mind when they say prescribed program of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I explained this earlier. I thought it was quite clear. We can introduce a program. It is not a question of having the right to tax. We can decide to extend or modify a program or decide to give more grants, for example. This bill will authorize the government to make it taxable, if it wishes. It is not a matter of taxing.

Mr. Stevens: That is bad.

Mr. Chrétien: We are not asking for the right to tax.

Mr. Stevens: You cannot ask us to give you that power.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, of course we can. It is related to a grant program that we can initiate if we want. We can initiate a program without coming to the House of Commons. Eventually we come, at the time of estimates. In the drafting of this, the drafters have forecast that it could be modified in the future. If we want to apply the same system of giving a grant and taxing it, we are getting this authority for that kind of program and it is related to a program of the same nature. This is the way the advisers are informing me of their purpose in designing this clause.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I point out to the minister again that if that is his wish, his draftsman or his officials should have so indicated in the tax motion, but they did not. It asks for a very simple provision, to tax grants received under the Canadian Home Insulation Program. With all due respect, I suggest that is all the minister can attempt to legislate tonight. That is all he has asked for. However, he has now gone further. His officials are attempting, secretively, quietly if you like, to change what they had asked for in the income tax motion. They have drafted the provision before us which broadens it so that now any program that is a prescribed program of the Government of Canada will be taxable. All they have to do is prescribe a program to be taxable.

I feel it is important that we, as members of this House, find out from the minister exactly why they have so extended the ramifications of this subclause. Frankly, the minister in most of his replies kept referring to grants within the insulation field. However, the proposed subclause (5) does not limit itself to insulation. The word is not mentioned. It could be any program. Will it cover, for example, grants under DREE? If they decide to make a grant under DREE, are they at the same time or some time in the future going to say that is a prescribed program under this subclause, and automatically taxable?

Let me emphasize the section we are amending here, 56(1), which starts off by saying:

Without restricting the generality of Section 3, there shall be included in computing the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year—

Then there are all kinds of subheadings right down to (r) in the present act. A little later I will read (s) which is the one they now want to bring into effect. It would say that they may tax any prescribed program of the Government of Canada.

My question is: what authority has he which allows them to shift from an income tax motion that is quite narrow in its ramifications to a proposed subsection in this act that is much wider?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do not have anything to add to what I said in my explanation earlier.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister why the section is not clear and why does it simply not refer to a grant received under the Canadian Home Insulation Program, period? Then there would be no doubt.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I explained what the government is seeking. If we have to change the program, we want the power to make the added grant like the original grant. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Stevens: Will the minister go further and indicate what his officials have in mind? Obviously he is not familiar with the subsection. What do his officials have in mind as to the things they will include as prescribed programs of the Government of Canada that might subsequently fall under this subsection?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I explained to the hon. member why we want this broader power. If we decide to give a grant in a fashion that it can be taxable and part of it therefore returned to the Crown if it goes to a different class of citizens, the principle is there. The hon. member is right when he says that is what we are seeking. That is exactly what we are seeking. I admit that very clearly to the committee.

I am not hiding anything. It is not for the officials to decide what kind of grants there will be in the future. It is up to the government to decide.

It is the government that is the government, not the officials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, those backbenchers have to do that periodically just to stay awake. They somehow remind me of seals. They have to flap their flippers now and again.

On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may we have a ruling as to whether subclause (5) is in fact within the income tax motion before us. In short, is it proper? Bearing in mind the income tax motion and the wording before you, Sir, has the government got the authority under that motion to propose subclause (5) the way I have outlined it?

The Chairman: I am very much aware of the point raised by the hon. member and his preoccupation with it. However, I must say that the point of order he is raising is being raised at the wrong time. The clause as it is is in front of the committee in its entirety. I find great difficulty in accepting the point of order and making a judgment on a subclause in regard to which there is already an amendment put forward by the hon. member for St. John's West which is proposing to eliminate the subclause. This does not prevent reconsideration at a later moment, but right now, looking at the matter technically, we are considering the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's West to delete that subclause. The matter is not closed, but hon. members will find it hard to convince me that this is the right time to deal with this matter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The difficulty here is that what is contemplated in the statute goes beyond the recommendation of the Governor General. This is very serious, if it is the case. I suggest, with respect, that an issue of this magnitude can be raised at any time, notwithstanding the fact that an amendment has been put to a clause which may well be invalid, depending upon the finding of Mr. Speaker. You have suggested, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has no power to deal with that aspect but, with respect, I ask you to reconsider that opinion. I do think this is an issue of such magnitude that the clause ought to be allowed to stand until the point of order has been dealt with. In the meantime we could go on to deal with another clause. In my view, the members who have spoken have raised a valid point, and I respectfully suggest we let the matter stand in anticipation of a ruling by the Speaker of the House after hearing argument from members on both sides, should that be considered necessary.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I find it quite funny that hon. members are assuming rightly that the motion of the hon. member for St. John's West will be soundly defeated when the vote is taken and I entirely agree with them. As for the point of procedure, Mr. Chairman, I gave the explanations deemed necessary to the committee and I leave it to the Chair to decide on the point of procedure.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: It is not a question of having any fear about the amendment being defeated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: The minister laughs, but I am being quite sincere in making my contribution to this argument. One of the fundamental principles with respect to any taxation legislation is that it must be warranted by the Governor General and it is usually brought in under very restrictive terms. Thus, the application of the tax legislation is confined to the home insulation program. What the government is seeking to do in this legislation is to apply taxation to any program, not simply the insulation program, which takes from parliament the right to tax these other programs and gives that power entirely to the cabinet.

Centuries of our parliamentary practice make it clear that all taxation measures must be introduced by a message from the Governor General in specific terms. I suggest respectfully that the government has exceeded the terms of reference which were brought before the House and that the clause we are considering now, if passed in its present form, would give the cabinet the right to tax instead of the House. My House leader has made a reasonable suggestion. Because of the importance of the substantive point involved, in view of the length of the bill and the progress made to date there can surely be no good reason for objecting to the clause being stood for consideration by the Speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: It is very often the case that propositions are put before the House of behalf of the government and debated, with the understanding that the rules will be established by regulation. We were discussing that the other day when I had a very agreeable exchange with the hon. member for York-Simcoe. We were talking about when the rate would be fixed. I said it would be fixed before the fall. We were discussing whether the rate would be flexible. I attempted at the beginning of the debate to explain why we were seeking the authority to make detailed arrangements of this kind.

In order that we should not spend the entire evening dealing with this point, I would make the following proposal: let us first vote on the amendment to scrap the whole thing. If that amendment is adopted there will be no need for the point of order. There will be no need to discuss whether it is legal or not. If, later, members on the other side want to take the whole clause into consideration, I can see no objection. There is some validity in the point they raise and I believe they have the right to raise it. There are a lot of precedents for the government's position, but I do not have them here. However, the Chair will look into them.

If the Chair rules that there is too much of a spread and that we should be confined precisely to the prescription in the ways and means motion, I will go along; it will not be the end of the world for me. I am not seeking broad powers. I just want to be fair. I am afraid that in any case we will not pass the bill tonight. It is not in the cards. I would point out that we are on the verge of closing our fourth week on this debate. I like it very much. I am happy. I am smiling all the time. We are having a lot of fun.

Mr. Stevens: That would be agreeable to us, Mr. Chairman. I do have a few comments to make and a few questions to put to the minister before we vote on the amendment, but after we have finished making our observations and asking any questions which hon. members may have in mind, there is no objection to voting on the amendment and then turning to some other aspect.

The Chairman: I want to satisfy members of the committee as far as possible, but I must say I still feel this question was raised at the wrong time. I would point out, too, that even the proposal by the minister, one which seems to be acceptable, indicates that the Chair was right in asserting that this point of order was raised at the wrong moment.

I do not want to restrict expressions of opinion. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has requested that Mr. Speaker make a decision. We are in committee of the whole and the question is before the Chairman of the committee. I am sure the hon. member will accept my feeling that I should not request the Speaker to make a ruling on the operation of the committee over which I am presiding, unless my ruling is questioned. I would be ready to stand the clause by unanimous consent, leaving the way open to the hon. member to make his request when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, rather than to me. Otherwise I would be more or less making a decision which strictly I have not been asked to make, the request being made of Mr. Speaker.

I hope we can resolve this problem without forcing me to make a decision, since there is apparently unanimous agreement among the committee. If hon. members are so agreed, I would be ready to listen to comments on the clause by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and perhaps permit the committee to vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, on the basis of your observations I should like to direct the minister's attention to the actual wording of the clause which appears at page 35 of the bill, paragraph (s). In considering my colleague's amendment, which really seeks to strike this provision, it is important we get the full purport of what the provision proposes to do.

The reason I refer to paragraph (s) is that, with all due respect to the draftsman, I do not believe is comprehensible. Essentially, Mr. Chairman, it is worded in such a way that it could be non-applicable. It provides that the income of a taxpayer will be taxable if—and then paragraph (s):

> —the amount of any grant received in the year under a prescribed program of the Government of Canada by
> (i) the taxpayer, other than a married taxpayer who resided with his spouse at the time the grant was received and whose income for the year is less than the income for the year of his spouse, or
> (ii) the spouse of the taxpayer with whom he resided at the time the grant was received, if the spouse's income for the year is less than the income for the year of the taxpayer.

I am sorry the minister has left because I wanted him to explain in relatively simple language what on earth the officials have in mind by such complicated wording, wording which I have been advised by tax lawyers is incomprehensible.

Mr. Lumley: Basically, Mr. Chairman, what the provision is saying is that it is brought into the income of the husband unless the income of his spouse is higher, when it would be brought into her income.

Mr. Stevens: The officials may have told the parliamentary secretary that that is what they thought they had said, but that is not what they have in fact said. If my colleague's amendment is defeated, then this is another matter we may have to consider. If paragraph (s) cannot be reworded so that it says what the parliamentary secretary has apparently been told is what the bureaucracy thought they were saying when they initially drafted the provision, then we will have to reconsider our position. Would the parliamentary secretary, between now and the time when we reconsider this clause, presuming that it is going to be stood, take a new look at paragraph (s) to see whether the officials feel the wording is as clear as it might be?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, obviously we will take a look at it, as the hon. member suggests. I remind him I am not an expert in drafting either, but this paragraph has been approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. Stevens: I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not here, Mr. Chairman, because my next question is really a question of policy. It has to do with the fact that one department seems to have said something in regard to taxing insulation grants which is different from what is now put before us by the Department of Finance. I am referring to the little booklet published by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources called "Keeping the Heat In". At page 91 of this little booklet various kinds of insulation are discussed, and the following appears: "Unlike many other forms of dividends, these are 'tax free' ".

My question to the parliamentary secretary is this. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has put out a booklet, chapter nine of which deals with what they call the dollars and cents. First of all, it encourages people to insulate their homes, to take the steps we have been discussing today. The department then represents that these steps will be "tax free", in quotes. Then on October 20 the Minister of Finance comes charging in with a proposal to tax the very grants which the government has been offering certain people in Canada for home insulation purposes. I am asking, is this really fair?

Mr. Lumley: Obviously, Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I will ask him the reason for this.

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister attempt to have this matter clarified before we deal with this clause again, and report to us in the House? I see we have a babbling socialist over there who is always trying to speak on behalf of the government. I would remind this babbling socialist that the parliamentary secretary did not say he would report to the House; he simply said he would have a word with Energy, Mines and Resources. Let me assure you, Mr. Chairman, that when you have dealt as long as I have with this rabble on the other side, you have to get it right on the record or you won't get any place with them.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, I have been endeavouring to make an intervention since 20 minutes after eight and have finally been recognized. I rise in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John's West. I represent an area which is a reasonably cold part of this great country of Canada, an area where the economy is not as good as it is in other parts. Therefore I feel the government should consider this amendment. I am quite sure if most members opposite searched their consciences they would feel the same way.

I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not here, but I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister if he would confer with the whiz kids, those mathematical mandarins beside him who figured out that it was going to cost $560 million extra if the $350 grant were tax free, in order to determine if that is correct? Is this correct in terms of dollars and cents in lost taxes?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, it would cost that much more to implement exactly what the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Darling: Is this on the basis of $350 for every grant?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Darling: Have they given consideration to the statement made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs that the average grant is not $350 but is $211? Let us see the whiz kids answer that.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member seems to enjoy taking shots at the so-called whiz kids. I think they are two hard working servants of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: Yesterday these so-called whiz kids came up with a figure off the top of their heads of $175 million for the motion proposed by the Social Credit party. Hon. members opposite have criticized that as well. Approximately 24 hours later, these so-called whiz kids came up with an accurate figure of $160 million. Thus, for whiz kids they are pretty well on.

Mr. Darling: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary. I did not mean it in any derogatory way. I am delighted to see the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs has just entered the Chamber. If the parliamentary secretary wants to get it straight from the horse's mouth—

Mr. Paproski: The horse's what?

Mr. Darling: —the Minister of State for Urban Affairs stated in committee this afternoon that the average grant authorized by his department, and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, is only $211 and not $350. Therefore that will reduce the amount considerably. I should like to have the comments of the parliamentary secretary on that.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, obviously when one looks at a program like this there are a lot of assumptions which have to be made. The $211 figure referred to by the hon. member is based on the applications received so far. Obviously that may not apply, depending upon the number of applications received.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that. I am delighted to see the Minister of Finance returning to the Chamber. I am sorry he was not here to answer my earlier questions. I have the greatest sympathy for the hon. minister. I appreciate what he has stated this evening. He is endeavouring to do a good job. He has to make a decision which would be a difficult one even for Solomon. His decision with regard to the $350 grant is whether it will be taxable or considered part of the income of all taxpayers, other than those in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Despite the logic of this, it is a difficult thing for members of parliament to return to their ridings and explain this.

Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have high costs of electricity, but they will receive tax free $500, almost a third more than other parts of the country which have been just as hard hit economically and where unemployment is very high. Those other provinces should receive the $350 tax free. The government will be in receipt of increased income taxes. That $350 should be given across the board.

Since I thought the minister had flown the coop for the night, I directed a question to the parliamentary secretary concerning the $350 grant. The minister's assistants have figured that it would cost $80 million a year, or $560 million for seven years, on the basis of present grants paid out. I am sure the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will verify that the amount paid out now averages $211. Out of the $80 million paid by the government, it will receive moneys back in income taxes from the people installing the insulation. It is on this basis I think the minister should reconsider, and I am sure the wonderful citizens of Saint-Maurice will bless him for it.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I would like to agree with the members of this House. Nothing would please me more than that. But when it is costing $560 million to be nice, I should like to reflect on that before it is called to a vote. I have some sympathy for the hon. member because he has to go to his riding and explain the difference.

We started on this program because we were looking for a vehicle to help the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island who were worst hit by the increase in the cost of imported oil. They use oil for their automobiles, their homes, as well as their electricity. That was the area most affected. Part of being in Confederation is that when somebody is in worse shape than others, as good Canadians we rush to help them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I am sure the people in Parry Sound-Muskoka will be proud of the hon. member. It should be pointed out that we are ready to help when someone in Canada is in bad shape.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, when I spoke this afternoon at 3.30 o'clock I asked the minister for an estimate of what would be collected in taxes during the next taxation year because of the fact that these grants are taxable in the eight provinces other than Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. As yet I have not received an answer to that question.

Now we have this amendment which proposes to eliminate this clause in order for the grants not to be taxable anywhere.

The minister has indicated that it will cost $560 million. That is a misstatement, that is not true, and that is not correct. Before voting on this clause, the minister should provide a calculation of the $560 million in order for us to see how it is reached. The estimate of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was that it would cost $45 million this year, and next year it would cost $145 million. The entire amount paid out in grants will be paid back in taxes, according to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Thus there is not a word of truth in the Finance Minister's calculation. He has indicated that it will cost $560 million over seven years. There is not a smidgin, a particle, a crumb, an iota of truth in that statement. It is a positive untruth. Let us have the figures.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: I have more to say. I am only getting warmed up.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PENITENTIARIES—MILLHAVEN—REASON FOR WITHHOLDING NAMES OF INMATES INVOLVED IN HOSTAGE-TAKING

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight pursuant to a question which I put to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on November 23. This matter arose as a result of the refusal of the Department of the Solicitor General to make public the names and records of the convicts who, a week previous, took a hostage at knifepoint at Millhaven, barricaded a section of the prison for several days, created serious trouble and, under duress, obtained certain concessions from prison management which, I am thankful to say, have since been repudiated by the Department of the Solicitor General.

Previously I asked why the Department of the Solicitor General gave the public the names of three guards who did their duty by protecting Canadian persons and property in the ultimate shooting and wounding of escaping convicts. The revealing of the names of these guards placed their safety and that of their families in jeopardy because of potential reprisals. I asked the minister to explain why his department could not be consistent and cease discriminating against public servants who perform their duties. The Solicitor General promised me at that time that he would look into the matter and get in touch with me. He has done so, and I thank him for the letter I received from him yesterday.

Although the minister's explanation is not to my entire satisfaction, the minister states that, and I quote:

> The names of the 20 convicts were not released to the public so as not to prejudice the result of any criminal procedures that might follow and so as to avoid influencing a jury.

Then in reference to the three officers who did their duty in protecting the public, the minister sloughed that off by saying that the names of the officers were not released by the penitentiary service but by the police force. He was referring to the Ontario Provincial Police in the district.

By what stretch of the minister's imagination would he presume that it would be necessary to try the 20 convicts before a jury? They took a hostage, but did not kill him. They were resorting to a new prison fad of blackmailing through hostage-taking. In this regard I want to congratulate the minister for stating that he will not recognize negotiations with convicts, undertaken under duress. To do so would encourage more hostage-taking in our prisons. Most convicts have a better life than many free Canadians on the outside under our present economic conditions.

However, to get back to the two classifications, the minister protects the names and records of 20 convicts and is still doing so, at least until a judge and jury try them—which I predict will not be the case—yet he would allow the provincial police to publish immediately the names of the three respected prison guards, all men who have given worthy and long service to the Canadian public, and all with families.

It is evident that there is no rapport between the penitentiary service and the provincial police. It should have been understood long ago, when under the new liberalism autonomy was taken away from our prisons, that policing authority was taken away from the wardens and their staffs. What always was a federal authority was tossed into the lap of the province through the provincial police. When that was done, rules and guidelines should have been laid down, and it should have been understood between the two authorities that in every case of this kind the names of public servants doing their duty would be protected.

At the time of this sad incident—the attempted escape of three convicts when two were wounded and one was killed by necessary gunfire—the Department of the Solicitor General let it be known that the case of the three guards would be reviewed in Ottawa and that it could entail a trial. It was even stated that the men might be responsible for their own defences and the expenses thereof. That being the case, and if those circumstances came to pass, the Department of the Solicitor General should be warning the provincial police immediately not to divulge the names of those three men who did their duty to the Canadian people in protecting persons and property.

Some system, Mr. Speaker, this penal system under the new liberalism! Convicted men in prisons are still first class citizens and the men who guard the public from them or, in reverse, guard them from the public are nobodies. In terms of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) statement they are nobodies—away down at the bottom of the Liberal totem pole. Does the Solicitor General not realize that the safety of these guards and/or their families was jeopardized when their names were immediately released? Reprisals could be taken by friends or accomplices of those 20 convicts. Yes, some system we have today—from a government that will not govern. Protection of persons and property is the chief and original reason for government and in these faculties this government is extremely deficient.

Of course the debacle of the penal system under the Liberal government started when autonomy was taken away from each penitentiary, when authority was taken away from each warden, when the warden's courts were abolished, when the government began to listen to the do-gooders, the idealists and utopians—whose basic principles and tenets are worthy and desirable if we were living in a social Shangri-la, far beyond our lost horizon. This will not work in our sick and troubled society in the protection of persons and property when confronted with convict violence in our penitentiaries. We must meet force with force to maintain security and protection of persons and property. And I want the minister to assure me that never again will the name of a security officer or guard be divulged under the same circumstances we are discussing tonight.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I note the remarks made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) and I want to thank him for providing me with a copy of a letter that he received from the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on the matter. The Solicitor General did indicate he would respond, and he did so.

I would like to correct two impressions that were created that would appear not to be correct. First of all there is no suggestion that these people would have to be tried by jury, but rather the fact is they could be tried by a jury, and it was to this the Solicitor General was referring. The other point I wish to make clear—in the case of the three officers involved in the wounding and shooting of escaping inmates—the names of the officers were not released by the penitentiary service and the penitentiary service had nothing whatsoever to do with it; it was by police forces, probably the Ontario Provincial Police. I do agree, however, with the hon. member that maybe the penitentiary service people and the Ontario Provincial Police should have a greater rapport. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, there are a few other comments I would like to put on the record.

I would like to point out that on Thursday, October 20 last, a hostage taking incident took place in Range 2 of the special handling unit at the Millhaven institution. One of the inmates celled on this range was taken hostage by one or more of the inmates celled in the same range. The hostage was freed on the following day. The police forces were informed of the incident and are still investigating, so I understand. The names and records of the inmates involved in this incident were not released to the press so as not to prejudice the police investigation. This, I understand, is normal procedure, and of course if it were otherwise the result of any criminal-legal procedures that might result from this investigation would be out in the open.

The decision not to release the records of the inmates involved was to avoid influencing a jury which may have at a later date to rule on the guilt of the person or persons who are likely to be accused of a criminal act.

In the case of the three officers involved in the wounding and shooting of inmates, referred to by the hon. member during the question period on Wednesday, November 23, 1977, their names were not released by the Penitentiary Service but by the police forces. There was no inconsistency in the penitentiary service policy governing in such circumstances. It is my understanding that all the inmates celled in this particular range of the Millhaven institution are incarcerated therein as the result of the commission of violent crimes, or because of their violent behaviour which consist in a danger to the staff and other inmates in our institution. In fact some of these inmates' records indicate that one officer of the penitentiary service and three police officers have been the victims of murders, that six officers of the penitentiary service have been the victims of hostage-takings,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary because his time has expired.

PUBLIC SERVICE—DELAY IN CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH NURSES IN INUVIK AREA—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to raise again a matter which I brought to the attention of the House on November 22. This matter concerns the registered nurse members of the Professional Institute of the Public Service working in the Inuvik Zone of the Northwest Territories and Yukon who have been without a contract since December 28, 1976.

The Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada has warned that the country is headed for a strike by the 2,000 nurses employed by the federal government, and the Inuvik Zone nurses are a part of this group.

It seems a disgrace that persons providing essential services must go for such a long period without a contract. Negotiations between the nurses and Treasury Board have been dragging on for nearly a year, and I submit that the attitude of the Treasury Board has not been conducive to an effective settlement of this dispute.

I believe it is also important, Mr. Speaker, to point out to the House the special conditions obtaining in Canada's north with which the nurses must deal. The nurses perform essential services in northern communities, and often work under harsh and difficult conditions for long hours.

Many times nurses there have had to risk their lives trying to get their patients to hospital. More than one nurse has lost her life as well as that of the patient in plane crashes on their way to hospital. Nurses often have to work as dentists. Indeed, they have had to do some surgery. They do many jobs that in the south are the responsibility of a doctor.

Nurses in the north are also being discriminated against by being given "compensatory allowance and leave" instead of overtime pay received by all other nurses in the bargaining unit. This compensatory allowance is a fixed sum which does not reflect the amount of overtime, stand-by or call-back time done and earned by a nurse in any one month. Nurses who work in hospitals in the south receive overtime, stand-by and call-back pay, but in the north they do not. The nurses are determined that this inequity be rectified.

I would also like to point out that the nurses are most emphatically not bargaining only for a salary increase, even though their salaries are far behind their provincial counterparts in certain categories. In the view of the nurses, and especially the nurses in the north, working conditions are extremely important and the Treasury Board has been unwilling to discuss this issue.

At the moment both sides are awaiting the appointment of a conciliation board, but this cannot be done until a decision has been reached regarding the number of designated employees who must remain on the job in the event of a strike. I would therefore request the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) to instruct his officials to sit down and bargain in good faith with the nurses, in the hope that an effective agreement can be reached very soon. I certainly hope this dispute can be settled before Christmas.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we must agree with the hon. member who has brought this subject to the attention of the House on at least one previous occasion when he expresses the hope that this dispute will soon be settled. We must also congratulate the nurses on their devotion to duty in spite of the arguments which have been going on for almost a year with regard to this matter. All Canadians are proud of them and of the great service they are rendering on behalf of the Government of Canada. Indeed, one of the nurses who were mentioned by the hon. member was honoured posthumously by the creation of the Judy Hill Foundation which will make moneys available to help train more medical people to serve in the north.

The collective agreement for the nursing group of the scientific and professional category of the Public Service of Canada expired on December 28, 1976. Negotiations for its renewal between the employer and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada reached an impasse during the latter part of May after nine bargaining sessions. As the group had previously selected conciliation as the method for the resolution of bargaining disputes, the Institute, on May 26, requested the Public Service Staff Relations Board to appoint a conciliation officer. Mr. Clive McKee of Vancouver was appointed and met with the negotiating parties on June 29. Mr. McKee was successful in convincing the parties to return to the bargaining table. Early in August, however, and after three more bargaining sessions, negotiations again reached an impasse, and on August 15, the employer requested the board to appoint a conciliation board. In view of the many outstanding issues, the board again appointed a conciliation officer. Assisted by this officer, Mr. Ken Strike, the parties again met on September 12, 13, 14 and 15. Once again, no progress was made.

Parallel to the negotiations taking place for the renewal of the collective agreement, consultations between the employer and the institute were being conducted on the designation of the nurses considered to be essential to the safety and security of patients of federal institutions. No agreement having been reached by early November, the employer on November 4 referred the designation of nurses to the board for decision. Initial hearings are scheduled for December 6, 7 and 8.

The Public Service Staff Relations Act prohibits the board from appointing a conciliation board before the matter of designations has been settled either by agreement between the parties or by decision of the board. Consequently, the appointment of a conciliation board for the resolution of the disputes in bargaining the renewal of the collective agreement must await the board's decision of the designation of nurses as essential to the safety and security of patients.

As I mentioned earlier, little progress was made during negotiations for a new collective agreement on the approximately 126 pages of demands submitted by the Institute to the employer. Much of the substance of the demands was for changes in the language of the expired collective agreement. The fact that only two grievances, both on the same subject, were referred to adjudication indicated that the language had served well the purposes of the employer and the employee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

INDUSTRY—PULP AND PAPER—EFFECT ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY OF LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES TO ESTABLISH PLANTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I appear tonight to elaborate on the reply given me by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on the state of the pulp and paper industry in my district. This is an industry which is the lifeline of our economy in Newfoundland, one which the government should be protecting through every means available. This industry is hurting seriously, not only as a result of the loss of markets, markets which it is capable of competing for, but more so because of the narrow thinking of our government, which proclaims that what it is doing through the Export Development Corporation is helping the country.

Not only is the pulp and paper industry of Newfoundland seriously impeded by the destruction of its raw resource by the spruce budworm infestation, which if allowed to continue will destroy the viability of this industry in Newfoundland; not only is the industry hindered by the lack of a reasonable transportation policy, which is hurting the industry in cost effectiveness and competitiveness due to distance from markets; but the government, through the Export Development Corporation and CIDA, is assisting countries which are and have been potential customers by granting to them interest free loans, technical assistance and engineering expertise to establish industries which compete directly with us. The justification for this is that we are helping Canadian firms sell them equipment, thus creating jobs in Canada. This may be true to a point, Mr. Speaker, but it would be interesting to see in whose favour is this trade-off over the long term.

Notwithstanding that even part of the government's reasons are factual, what are we doing at the same time to allow our industry to compete after we have provided the financial assistance which, in the end, is directed to our foreign markets? A case in point is the related linerboard industry in Newfoundland which had to be closed down due to losses resulting from wood costs and lack of markets. What has the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce done other than to give the usual stock answer that it was not its responsibility, instead of the predecessor to the present minister taking the initiative and offering help?

If I can give the House an example, it was said that one of the reasons for the closure was inability to break through the market barrier. This linerboard mill in my province is perhaps the most modern in North America, yet it has to close down at a cost of some 2,000 jobs, affecting perhaps 4,100 jobs indirectly. Yet at the same time an American mill in Alabama, having increased its capacity just last summer, has announced expansion of its Union Camp Mill at a cost of $250 million so as to increase capacity by 1,000 tons a day.

It is time for the government to attempt to help our economy. It is fine to offer all kinds of incentives to establish new industries. I have no quarrel with such an objective. But what the government is doing really is ignoring what common sense dictates, namely, that we should be protecting, consolidating, and monitoring what we have, industries which have been successful through their own initiative and entrepreneurship but which are now hurting because of inflated costs of production. I refer particularly to the industries of Newfoundland which need assistance in view of their distance from markets. These industries in Newfoundland established themselves when conditions were normal, but now hesitate to continue operation because of encumbrances which exist as a result of the complacency of the responsible agencies of government.

I hope the parliamentary secretary will give me a more responsible answer than to relegate the matter to some other department. I hope he will give me something positive which I can take to those who require jobs, those who are losing jobs and industries which are deteriorating, so I can give them some hope for the future. I know he will.

● (2227)

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I must comment on the generous applause from all of my colleagues here in the House tonight. When I was just an ordinary backbencher, approximately 100 or 150 people would listen to me speak. I am sure Your Honour is aware of the size of my audience tonight. I had two briefings in order to come to the Chamber and give the hon. member an answer.

Perhaps there is a small misunderstanding of the nature and the reason for the operations of the Export Development Corporation. The corporation makes loans only to foreign buyers of Canadian-made equipment and Canadian services. The fact the equipment will be installed in a project in another country, which in theory or in fact may compete at a later date with a Canadian industry, would not be sufficient reason to deny jobs to those plants making equipment which the Export Development Corporation is financing. The only reason for such a course of action would be that it would prevent the development of a rival industry in another country.

The idea that Canada in this manner, or any other, could prevent another country developing a project is incorrect. Yet somehow the idea persists in some quarters that if the Export Development Corporation did not finance the sale of Canadian equipment to these projects, then these projects would be halted. If one is aware how fierce international competition is in the sales of equipment to these projects, one would realize the projects will proceed easily without Canadian participation. The only measurable result of not financing such sales will be a drop of Canadian exports.

As the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) pointed out, there is a paper industry in Poland. In making this loan we do not believe the Polish industry would serve any markets served by our country. Also we believe a loan made to them for the procurement of pulp and paper machinery in this country would create jobs needed in the manufacturing sector. This would ensure Canadians in our plants would have a chance to keep their jobs. Also they would make money to support their families, and indeed help the country.

Our industries should not be denied the chance to sell their products to other countries. This should be borne in mind by all members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

CANADA COUNCIL

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE TO REVIEW OPERATION AND PERFORMANCE OF COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the Auditor General's condemnation of the financial documentation procedures of the Canada Council and the revelations that the Canada Council is supporting, with public money, individuals to write what anyone in this chamber would term as offensive and demeaning pornography, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Secretary of State request the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts to completely review the Canada Council's mandate, accountability, financial procedures, performance to date and that this same committee then issue a report of recommendations that will assure Canada Council accountability to the minister and to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

SUPPORT FOR DESIRE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO BECOME MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact the Montreal Gazette has quoted the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) as saying "I have told the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that in the next cabinet shuffle I would like to become Minister without Portfolio", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House supports the request of the Solicitor General.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROTECTION OF CONFIDENTIAL DATA STORED IN COMPUTERS—USE OF PRIVATE COMPUTER ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): The Liberal party must have had a Christmas party last night or something.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): What did you have, a New Year's party?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. The Auditor General's report points out that confidential data stored electronically in computers is yet another instance where the government has been totally lax in fulfilling its responsibility to protect the security of these confidential data. Given the seriousness of this problem, can the minister tell the House what special measures, if any, are being taken by the government to ensure that private and confidential data will no longer be within the easy reach of those who might profit or misuse such data.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I share with the hon. member and other hon. members the seriousness of the necessity for utmost confidentiality. I disagree with some of the adjectives he has used which overstate the case with regard to access to confidential records on computers. Nevertheless, we are concerned about them. We join the Auditor General in his efforts to identify areas where more security and more effective and efficient methods of using computer techniques and computer instruments is going to be forthcoming. Indeed, much of that work is underway now throughout the various departments. We use a great quantity of computer techniques throughout the government as does any large institution today. It is still an imperfect art or science, whichever you want to call it. There is still much to be done.

Mr. Andre: The Auditor General's report states that the RCMP upon request conducted a number of security reviews of outside service bureaux which process government data.

While none of the outside service bureaux so reviewed have been cleared by the RCMP to process such data, the Auditor General points out there are a number of instances where private and confidential data have been processed by these bureaux which have not been cleared in terms of handling highly confidential data. How long has this been going on and what types of confidential and classified data have been handled by these outside bureaux which have not been cleared by the RCMP?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would not be able to give the hon. member on this occasion such detail as he is requesting. All these measures are being brought to our attention. Indeed, effective correctional measures are being taken in almost every case. There will be the odd one that the Auditor General has developed in his report which may be fresh to us and which we will act on as quickly as possible.

INCOME TAX

USE OF PRIVATE COMPUTER ORGANIZATIONS FOR STORAGE OF CONFIDENTIAL TAX INFORMATION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Has National Revenue contracted with or have any of these outside service bureaux which have not received RCMP security clearance been used to handle or process income tax data?

● (1112)

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say I certainly appreciate the comments of the Auditor General because everything he said pertaining to my department has already been rectified.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am pleased indeed that he brought these matters to our attention. With regard to the other point concerning the use of computer services, yes, we do make use of computer service: there is one firm in Ottawa with whom we have an arrangement and I would point out that when we turn the material into the computer there are no names or social insurance numbers attached; the material is coded and we have a man there at all times who is the only person who can decode it if and when we need him to do so. So there is no problem there. Everything is in good hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONSULT WITH CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS ON LEAKS OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Two days ago the minister told the House that after two weeks of intensive investigation into the leaks from his department of personal and confidential information relating to individual taxpayers the only cases he has been able to turn up where this has happened were the four cases reported two weeks ago by Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton. In view of the fact that there have been a number of radio interviews with chartered accountants from various parts of the country indicating that his department for years has given out personal and confidential information over the telephone, why did those engaged in his investigation not consult with those accountants to determine how extensive this practice has been and whether or not the privacy of individual taxpayers has been violated?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member keeps getting up and repeating the same thing at all times. I should like to repeat to him again—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): —that one of the reasons I am not giving a report pertaining to the RCMP is that I do not wish to interfere with the investigation which is taking place and spoil it—that is about the size of it; that is what members over there would like to see happen. If hon. members opposite have any names, anything specific to give me so that I can investigate those cases, I can guarantee that I will make the inquiries. It is all right for you and your group on the other side to make all kinds of allegations. There is nothing in them—

Mr. Clark: The IQ of a rock!

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INVESTIGATE CLAIMS BY CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS THEY OBTAINED CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I hope the minister will try to keep himself under control. We can accept on this side of the House that the minister needs all the help he can get and we are pleased to assist him in any way possible. In view of the fact that on Wednesday of this week, following the minister's statement in reply to me in the House, he was not able to uncover any cases besides the four presented to him two weeks ago, may I ask the hon. gentleman why he has not been able to get one of his 9,000 employees to listen to broadcast reports, including the one on Wednesday by News Radio which quoted a chartered accountant in Toronto that despite the minister's claim that security had been tightened up he was still able to get information about individual taxpayers over the telephone? Why has the minister failed to look into these widespread broadcast reports?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay(Minister of National Revenue): Once again, the allegations are not factual at all. I should like the hon. member to give me the name of the firm involved. I should like to have it. It is easy for members on the other side to make these allegations.

The hon. member for St. John's asked me the other day whether or not we were giving information to the RCMP or receiving it from them. My answer, according to my belief at the time, was "No". I want to rectify that, Mr. Speaker, by saying "Yes, we do". We did it even before 1972 and we continue to do it, benefitting taxpayers by collecting the money which rightfully belongs to the treasury, because that is all we are, collectors, and we should collect the money and we should do it.

Mr. Beatty: The minister has asked me to cite specific instances where chartered accountants have said they were able to get this information over the telephone. Is the minister aware of an interview which took place on the "As It Happens" program on the CBC on November 18 of this year with Mr. David Ingram, a tax consultant in Vancouver with CEN-TA Tax Services, who indicated in the interview that it has been a long standing practice in the minister's department to give this information out over the telephone. Mr. Ingram indicated that he had had this information himself over the telephone, and so had his officials for a long period. He also indicated that the security practices in the minister's department have been totally inadequate for years, and that although Mr. Ingram has raised the matter publicly before nothing has been done about it. Why is the minister not aware of that broadcast interview with an individual saying that he had been able to get this information?

● (1117)

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me a name; I will certainly look into the matter. I do hope that it will be better than the other name of Thompson which he gave me before, regarding which I indicated by letter that what the hon. member said was not true. However, I am willing to look into this case and I will give the hon. member an answer shortly.

As for whether I listened to the program, no. I was too busy in my office until about 11.30 at night to look at any program. Perhaps I should look at a program once in a while.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO FAILURE TO ENFORCE SAFETY REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Transport has had in his hands for a number of days now a report on the dangerous state of aviation safety in northwestern Ontario and that subsequent revelations have disclosed that top officials in Ottawa have blocked attempts by regional officers to enforce safety standards, will the Acting Prime Minister inform the House that his government is prepared to institute a full public inquiry into this matter so that we can find out why safety regulations have been disobeyed?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport indicated before the committee, first of all, that the message which went out from the Ottawa office was not at his request. He did not agree with that particular approach. He felt that a decision should not be taken arbitrarily but that both sides of the issue should be looked at before a licence was in fact taken. I would commend to the hon. member the minister's answer to the committee. In addition to that, the department is in fact studying the report and will make its appropriate decision after it has studied the report.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding what the acting minister has said I would put a further question. In view of the revelation that one of the criteria regional aircraft inspectors were to consider in suspending a licence, to quote the memo, was "the possibility of embarrassment to the minister and any other potential political implications", does the minister not consider that statement alone sufficient grounds for a public inquiry? Surely the minister does not believe that political expediency takes precedence over public safety?

Mr. Cullen: Very definitely not, Mr. Speaker, and that is precisely what the Minister of Transport said in the committee. He did not authorize the message to be sent. He did not agree with the conclusions reached by the individual who sent that particular message, and he spelt out very, very clearly that the report would be studied most carefully and any appropriate action taken, be it an inquiry or simply a tightening up in some areas.

Mr. Symes: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I still have not had an answer regarding the public inquiry, a question which I have asked twice. We cannot get to the bottom of who is responsible for issuing such orders and what the results have been. Again I ask the minister, can we expect a full public inquiry so that we can get to the bottom of this and the travelling public in northwestern Ontario can be protected? It is not good enough to say that some procedures will be tightened up. Obviously for too long something wrong has been happening, and we deserve to know who gave the orders and to clean up this mess.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I simply mentioned that as an alternative. Again I would commend to the hon. member a careful reading of the Minister of Transport's answers before the committee, when he said that the report would be studied and the appropriate action taken, be it a public inquiry, the tightening up of regulations, or whatever action seemed appropriate. It seems to me that the study, which is an excellent study, should be looked into before conclusions are reached.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RECOVERY OF OVERPAYMENTS OF BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In light of the report submitted by the Auditor General which indicates among other things that in 1976 the Unemployment Insurance Commission had made overpayments of $95 million, could the minister explain how the commission intends to recover that amount without victimizing the persons who were eligible and what steps will be taken to put a stop to so many mistakes?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my French teachers and to the hon. members but I must answer in English.

[English]

The Auditor General has performed an excellent service for us. He has indicated he will continue to do so. The commission has worked very closely with the Auditor General. In fact, he did not say there was an overpayment. He said that it was possible there could have been that kind of an overpayment, and that control mechanisms had to be tightened up. Some of the recommendations of the Auditor General are already in place. We have asked him to monitor the action we have taken on the administrative or the control mechanisms to see to it that it is made as perfect a system as possible. We do not want to expand the number of man-hours required to meet all the requirements of the Auditor General in order to make it a perfect control mechanism system.

MANPOWER

ALLEGED WEAKNESS OF ADMINISTRATION OF TRAINING PROGRAM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his report, the Auditor General indicated also many deficiencies in the administration of the Canada Manpower Centre programs. He emphasized for instance that the master client registration forms were not employed effectively, that there were no verifications required of the number of dependents claimed by the client, and that overpayments resulted from the policy of assumed attendance by those who supposedly take training courses sponsored by a manpower centre. Could the minister advise the House of the steps he will take to correct these weaknesses found in the administration of these services, which account in fact for 55 per cent of all the payments made by his department?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General, true to his word, monitored the actions taken by the government last year, and complimented the government for many of the moves taken. Needless to say, as a result of the honest and unbiased report which he has made, in so far as my department is concerned, we will look into those particular areas and will expand on them somewhat when we appear before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. I do not think I can give all the responses the hon. member would like during oral question period. I can assure him that very, very close attention will be paid to the recommendations of the Auditor General.

REQUEST FOR MORE TRAINING PROGRAMS FOR HEAVY EQUIPMENT OPERATORS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Hundreds of people have been on the waiting list for 18 to 24 months to be trained as heavy equipment operators. Is the minister prepared to increase the number of training centres providing this kind of training to give those people, particularly the younger ones, the opportunity to qualify for heavy equipment operators which will give them a better chance to get a job?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the initiative in this particular area must be taken in fact by the provinces. I should like to commend the Turner Valley operation in the province of Alberta. It is a private enterprise initiative taken by a gentleman there, when he could not find the appropriate number of schools and professors who would stay on the job, or when he could not get heavy equipment operators. In fact, he used the old Canadian private initiative system and established an excellent school. I would recommend that to all provinces that have waiting lists of people who want to become heavy equipment operators.

CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

ALLEGATION KICKBACKS WERE PAID—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. The Auditor General has stated that his examination of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation accounts for 1976-1977 show evidence that the corporation has engaged in questionable trade practices by paying out something like $400,000 in kickbacks. In some cases these kickbacks were deposited in bank accounts outside the country of the recipient.

In view of the fact that this corporation comes under the direct control of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and therefore the direct control of the government, did the government authorize this practice? Will the government take any disciplinary action against the chairman responsible for this practice under the Financial Administration Act? Will the government make available from the books of the company the names of those receiving the kickbacks in order to clear the good name of the many hundreds of citizens who do business with this corporation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): The government did not authorize these practices. In fact, when they were brought to the attention of the government by the Auditor General, who is the auditor of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, and has been for several years, action was taken. The action which the President of the Treasury Board took was to consult with the minister to whom this Crown corporation reports, and indeed the Auditor General and the Minister of State for the Environment, who is the minister to whom this corporation reports, took the necessary action to see that this practice ceased. As to disciplinary action, I am not in a position to give the precise nature of that yet. As to the disclosure of the exact names of the recipients, I would prefer to deal with that when we are before a committee and after consultation with my colleague.

Mr. Crouse: Since the Auditor General's report states that this practice was followed last year as well as in previous years, can the minister say how much money was kicked back in total and what action the government plans to take in determining whether there is evidence of tax evasion, and that this information be provided to the tax authorities in the countries concerned to enable them to collect taxes that are due, since the minister knew about the kickbacks as long ago as August 4, 1977?

Mr. Andras: The date of August 4 to which the hon. member referred may be accurate. It strikes me as being quite likely. That is the time when these practices were brought to our attention by the auditor of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation who is the Auditor General. With regard to the exact amount of money, I do not have that figure in my mind at the moment but I will undertake to make sure that the hon. member is informed of it.

EXTRA PAYMENTS TO LANDLORDS FOR BUILDINGS RENTED BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. The Auditor General also called into question the payment of $508,000 by the Department of External Affairs to landlords in host countries. Can the minister inform the House which countries are involved, why the government has accepted this as normal practice over the past 20 years and how much money was paid in such a manner over this 20 year period?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I think the amount of money has already been identified by the hon. member in his question. As to naming the countries, I will not do so for very obvious reasons.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Andras: For reasons which I think any hon. member would anticipate.

An hon. Member: Tell us. This is Canadian taxpayers' money.

An hon. Member: What reasons?

Mr. Andras: Some measures are being taken to discuss this in the Public Accounts Committee.

An hon. Member: What are the obvious reasons?

Mr. Andras: It will be discussed in the committee with, I hope, a prearranged understanding of the delicacy of dealing with practices in other countries. The hon. member has spoken about this practice having gone on for 20 years. The fact is that this has been a fairly standard practice in almost every country in the world where there is a diplomatic representation, such as in certain of the countries involved. Indeed, the action we are taking now may be somewhat unprecedented. I think hon. members would recognize that.

Mr. Gillies: Is it unprecedented to be honest?

Mr. Andras: It is not unprecedented. The practice may be unacceptable, but it has been the practice of every other country we know. No benefit has been conferred on any member of the Department of External Affairs. It is a practice that has been going on for years in almost every other diplomatic mission in the countries involved.

Mr. Gillies: That makes it all right. That justifies it.

Mr. Andras: As a matter of fact, this issue arises because we are probably one of the few countries, if not the only country, that has established new guidelines in that respect. In fact, I have enunciated them on behalf of the government on December 16. I also said at that time that it will cause some difficulties. If we establish the principles under which we want to operate it is going to be expensive, but our action is unprecedented in changing this practice. This is not a question of the practice up to now having been different from that of other countries.

● (1132)

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, it is not obvious to me why the government will not reveal the names of the countries. I think it is quite important to the taxpayers of Canada to know which countries are involved and how this practice is going to effect our relationship with those countries now that it has been exposed by the Auditor General. Considering the fact that the Auditor General has revealed that both cash and cheques were involved, and that the payments were made both within a host country and outside that country, and since there is considerably more to this than initially meets the eye, will the minister assure this House that a thorough investigation of this matter will be made, especially in respect of the possibility of kickbacks to members of the department who made such payments in the unsavory way the Auditor General has now exposed, after a 20 year period in which the government of Canada has allowed this.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I really regret that the hon. member would go so far as to make allegations about kickbacks to members of the Department of External Affairs, but that is exactly what he has done.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Andras: The Auditor General has clearly indicated in describing his concern about this practice that all such payments were fully accounted for; there is no question about them not being accounted for, and there have been vouchers and all the necessary documentation involved in this. He has not said there has been any discrepancy in that area. Therefore, to leap from what we all say is a practice we want to see stopped, and hope other countries will join us in stopping it—a situation which we say is unacceptable—to the allegation implied that there was a kickback, when it has been clearly indicated that there was no such kickback, is regrettable.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I would finally ask the minister whether he will assure the House that a thorough investigation will be made precisely because of the strange nature of payments in this matter which were made outside the host countries involved, and because the fact that payments were made in cash as well as by cheque does lead to some interesting questions?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, over and above the actions by the Auditor General such an investigation and analysis of what has taken place is under way.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF CHARGES BEFORE COURT BY YUKON COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development having to do with ministerial responsibility imposed upon him not only by practice but by statute. The minister is, of course, aware of the action of his Yukon commissioner in causing certain charges before a judge of the supreme court of the Yukon to be withdrawn, a gross intrusion into the administration of justice in the Yukon. Will the minister tell the House whether this highhanded interference with the judicial process by his commissioner was on the instruction of the minister, and how does the minister explain this highly improper conduct of one of the officials of his department?

[Mr. Roche.]

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it was not on my instruction. I do not accept the explanation of the description of the events offered by the hon. member for Yukon. He knows as well as I that on November 8 the commissioner made a rather complete explanation of the actions that led to the withdrawal of the charges. He also knows that yesterday the commissioner launched an inquiry under Justice Stratton where all these issues are going to be examined. It seems to me that the proper course now is to let that commission of inquiry complete its work and respond to the sort of charges that have been floating around the Yukon for the past several weeks.

REASON MINISTER DISALLOWED BILL TO AMEND YUKON INQUIRIES ORDINANCE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the minister also, I believe, instructed the same official, his Yukon commissioner, to refuse to assent to a bill to amend the Yukon Inquiries Ordinance which had passed all three stages of the Yukon house, which bill would have enabled the elected members of the house to request the setting up of an inquiry into the conduct of this commissioner. In view of the fact the bill itself in no way encroached upon his powers or those of his commissioner, will the minister explain his aggressive action toward the Yukon through this rather savage and raw use of his powers?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon is becoming rhetorical, if not almost poetical. He knows perfectly well, and we seem to have a disagreement on what the powers imposed on the minister are under the Yukon Act. The refusal of assent by the commissioner is not a customary practice and not even a desirable one but when the members of the council clearly in their own minds go beyond the powers vested in them under the Yukon Act, and if I am to observe the law which this parliament itself has established, it seems to me I have only one course of action, and that is to instruct the commissioner to refuse assent. I do not enjoy or like doing this, but when I am faced with that choice it seems to be my obligation as a member of this House of Commons to uphold the law this parliament has passed.

An hon. Member: Then change the law.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, we have a useful suggestion from the NDP and I think we should follow it up, and that is that we should change the law. The hon. member for Yukon knows that when I was in the Yukon three weeks ago I met with the council and proposed to it then that instead of getting at the constitutional issues in this sort of piecemeal approach I was prepared to engage with them in a discussion of what sort of process we could set in place to review the natural evolution of constitutional development in the Yukon. That seemed to strike at least the chairman of the Yukon committee dealing with it as a positive suggestion. I offered it in good faith and I plan to follow it up. I think through that process we will get at some of these rather nasty issues. I would tell the hon. member for Yukon, and I am surprised he would not support me in this, that when I am faced with a choice of upholding the law passed by parliament or acceding to what may be a legitimate request which clearly is ultra vires, I have only one responsibility as a minister and as a member of this House and that is to uphold the law, but that has to be seen in the context of also being prepared to change the law.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since this action taken by the minister is taken for the first time in the 70 year history of the Yukon house and is a precedent setting action, and since under section 20 of the Yukon Act passed by this House, clearly all bills that pass the three stages of reading in the Yukon house would be tabled here, and because this bill now will not see the light of day in this House, will the minister at least table the report of the standing committee on rules, elections and privileges of the Yukon house dealing with this matter so that all members will have full knowledge of the circumstances surrounding these events?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to look at that suggestion and I will get back to the hon. member. I think it is important to recognize that on this side, and clearly on that side as well, there is a disposition to move toward natural constitutional development, although there may be some difference between this side and the Conservative party as to the pace and immediate goals. I understand the commitment of the Leader of the Opposition, but I made it quite clear to the people of the Yukon when I was up there, and to their elected representatives, that I was anxious to engage in a discussion now as to what are the next logical steps. I think it is unfortunate if these incidents of refusal of assent confuse, confound or compromise that process. My ultimate goal is to respond to their needs up there, and I am committed to doing that. I have to reiterate that there is a law which was passed by this parliament. That law may need updating, and I am not disputing that, but as long as it remains the law of this parliament it seems to me my fundamental obligation is to interpret it with the advice of the law officers of the Crown as best we can and to insist on it. I am surprised there is some dispute about that on the other side.

EXCEEDING OF DEPARTMENTAL APPROPRIATION—POSSIBILITY OF DISCIPLINARY ACTION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who has just enunciated his duty to uphold the law. I should like to ask what action he has taken when an appropriation for his department of $1 million has been exceeded by $400,000 on a deliberate basis? Has he taken any disciplinary action on that matter?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have taken disciplinary action. He was told that in the committee.

Oral Questions

DATE OF ACTION ON MOVING BRANCH TO CAPE BRETON

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as the minister in charge of the decentralization program. I presume he still has that job. Could he give us some idea when the 310 jobs that were announced for the industrial area of Cape Breton are actually going to be put in place there, because we are in a desperate situation, as he knows, from an unemployment point of view?

• (1142)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add to the statements that were made at the time of the announcement in Cape Breton. If the hon. member is not aware of the precise date, I will forward the information to him. This announcement was made a few months ago and I do not have the precise date for Cape Breton. In any event, we are anxious to move as quickly as possible.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, the date announced was 1981. Will the government try to push that up a little and add at least 300 jobs to this area of the Atlantic provinces as a recent economic study found that among women of workforce age, this area had the lowest labour force participation rate in all of Canada. Will he give us at least 600 jobs?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member clearly makes a representation rather than asking a question.

ENERGY

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM TO CONSERVE ENERGY—MINISTER'S POSITION ON CHANGES REQUESTED BY PROVINCES

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday the minister met with energy ministers across Canada. For the first time he actually drove them into a united front. I understand that eight provinces put forward suggestions for changes in the home insulation program. One suggestion which the minister accepted was to remove the precondition to all provinces joining. One submission made by the provinces is that the home insulation grant should be non-taxable in the other eight provinces of Canada as well as in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and that the program be decentralized. What is the minister's position on these requests from the eight provinces?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that yesterday the citizens of Alberta and Quebec became eligible for the national home insulation program. The reasons for the preconditions have now been removed. I am also pleased that the provincial ministers were able to put forward a number of constructive proposals for most of the national home insulation program.

These are now being considered by my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The hon. member mentioned several points in his question. One was with regard to non-taxability of these grants. That was handled yesterday by the Minister of Finance. As to questions on regionalization with regard to inspection services, monitoring and administration of the program, that is under consideration. I expect the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to make an announcement very shortly.

Mr. Crosbie: In taking away these pre conditions, the minister has engaged in the greatest surrender since Premier Regan forced him into the program for Nova Scotia. The provinces suggested to the minister that the grants be contingent on an energy cost basis. They suggested that grants be greater in higher energy cost areas of Canada rather than selecting electricity as the only energy cost and that they be non-taxable. Is the minister stating that the government is not going to consider the non-taxability in the other eight provinces, that the grants will continue to be taxable in all provinces other than Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Is that the final decision, or is he going to consider changing it to a higher energy cost basis?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is going over the same ground he went over yesterday in question period. It was made very clear to him yesterday by the Minister of Finance as to the government's position with regard to taxability. It was also made very clear that the reason for the difference in the two systems, that is the system that applies in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and the system that applies to the rest of the country, is that over 60 per cent of all the electrical energy which is developed in Nova Scotia and 100 per cent in the case of Prince Edward Island is generated from oil. It is because of that one factor, the dependence on oil with regard to electrical generation, that there are two systems across the country.

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM TO CONSERVE ENERGY—POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVING ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has had his wings clipped by the provinces and rightly so for intruding into provincial jurisdiction. Since the minister responsible for housing is not in his seat, I will direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. One area of criticism yesterday, and rightly so, was the administration of the program. A number of provinces complained about the way it is now being administered. Indeed, the location of the bureaucracy for administering in Montreal was criticized. What steps is the minister taking to improve the administration of the program? Will the administration be decentralized? What further steps can we expect to encourage Canadians to take advantage of this program, even with all its shortcomings?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered the hon. member with regard to the administration question. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs has taken note of the representation of the provinces and will be making an announcement very shortly. The hon. member seems far more interested in continuing some kind of a dog-fight in which some provinces wish to engage with regard to federal-provincial matters. I do not think the people of Canada are well served if we get into jurisdictional disputes, quarrelling, squabbling and that kind of thing. It is far more important for the Canadian people to see that the two levels of government can work together co-operatively, that we can both attack problems of conservation. Now that a new sense of urgency has been made manifest by the provinces, I hope we can get on with it.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, all of this could have been avoided if there had been proper consultation in the first place. The minister knows that. That is why he is in trouble with this program. What is the position of the six provinces which had to meet the unfair conditions imposed upon them by the minister which was a direct interference in provincial sovereignty? Now that Alberta and Quebec have forced the minister to sign by dropping these preconditions, what is the position of the program now, especially in those provinces which have already started implementing some of these unfair conditions?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am awfully glad that the hon. member has asked that question because it makes a point that I was trying to make to him a moment ago. They have accepted the need for these kinds of policies. They have put into place policies which in many instances they would not otherwise have put in and would not have put them in as quickly. That is the reason.

IMMIGRATION

REASON FOR DELAY OF DECISION IN CASE OF ROBERT EPP

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns the case of Robert Epp. I think the minister had some notice and knowledge of this situation, since it has gone on since June of this year. This Canadian has moved back to Canada. One of the children of his American wife by a former marriage has some kind of learning disability. This Canadian who is now in Canada has three children in the United States, one of whom is the subject of this investigation. Why has it taken all this time to determine whether this child should be brought into Canada or be refused? Can the minister tell us what has happened in this case because the personal tragedy for this family is very great?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the details of why it should take so long. Frankly, I do not like to discuss individual cases of this kind. Quite often it is necessary to have consultation with the provinces because in the final analysis, charges and expenses may go to them. As I said, I do not like to discuss individual cases. I am prepared to check the matter out today and I will get an answer to the hon. member today.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED SUBSIDIES FOR FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC FOR BILINGUAL TRAINING

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In the light of the most recent scandal regarding the distribution of bilingualism subsidies, can the Minister of Finance tell the House whether he seriously considers correcting the unfair formulas which enable the province of Quebec to get the lion's share of subsidies for official language teaching, and whether he will correct that procedure so that such subsidies will be used to support, develop and help the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec to survive?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take due notice of the hon. member's question. This program is administered by the Secretary of State, and I shall discuss the matter with him.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGATION CONTROL PROCEDURES LACKING—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RECOVER OVERPAYMENTS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Auditor General in his report produced yesterday indicates that the Unemployment Insurance Commission lacks sufficient control procedures and often even those are not followed, resulting in overpayment of some $100 million. I would like to refresh the minister's memory of what was actually said because in an answer earlier today, the minister indicated that it was not an actual but possible overpayment. The Auditor General said and I quote:

> Based on a statistical sample of claimants to whom benefits were paid in 1976, the amount of overpayments not previously identified by the Commission's regular control activities is approximately $95 million.

That is in addition to the $5 million in overpayment identified by the department. What steps have been taken to improve the procedures and when will an adequate system be in place?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): First of all, I would commend a careful reading of that section. The Auditor General says "based upon"; that is why I indicated it was not an actual figure.

We have put in place many control mechanisms but we have to balance the application of those mechanisms against the fact that people pay unemployment insurance premiums and they are entitled to get their cheques as quickly as it is possible for us to make them available. This is important because very often individuals who are unemployed have no money in reserve. So we must concentrate on making every effort to get these cheques out to those who are entitled to them while keeping a protective mechanism in place. I would point out that we deal with between two and three million people each year involving an expenditure of some $3.6 billion. This will give the hon. member some idea of the scope of the problem with which we have to deal.

Mr. Clarke: I quite understand the minister's problem and I certainly agree that the cheques have to go out to the people who are entitled to them. I should like to ask now what steps are taken once it has been determined that there was an overpayment, and, in this instance, what steps will be taken to recover the $95 million or whatever the figure is?

Mr. Cullen: Those steps have been taken. We in the department, using our own resources, did find there had been an over-expenditure of about $65 million and $60 million of that has already been recovered. So the recovery mechanism is already in place. What we want to do is head off this situation in advance, thus obviating the collection procedure. Those who are ripping-off the system are representing only a small minority of the claimants concerned—I ask the hon. member to check the media, to check the newspapers, for reports of the number we are catching and the fines which are being imposed. I might add that we are now getting much more co-operation from members of the public who are prepared to tell us who is working while still collecting unemployment insurance. With the co-operation of all, we shall have a better system.

CANADA COUNCIL

PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE REVIEW MANDATE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the Canada Council acts under a legislative mandate from the Parliament of Canada and in the light of the concern expressed by the Auditor General regarding inadequate financial documentation, and having regard to the unfortunate pornographic documentation you have in front of you associated with a grant by the Canada Council—and I wish, Mr. Speaker, that I could quote this—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Wenman: I am sorry. Will the minister recommend that the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts review the mandate of the Canada Council with particular attention to the accountability of the Council to the minister and to parliament?

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The hon. member will recall that when a similar question was asked of the minister yesterday before that committee the minister indicated to him quite clearly that parliament has directed the minister, in a general way, to administer the funds under votes and estimates of the Canada Council but has withheld from the ministry the opportunity in an administrative way of prejudging or judging after the fact the way in which the Canada Council, or the Film Board or similar bodies, have handled the money. If parliament should decide that the department ought to be second-guessing where grants should be going, or for what projects, then parliament can give that kind of authority to the ministry.

VIEW OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON GRANTS FOR MR. BISSETT'S POETRY

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statement by the former Secretary of State that the Canada Council has given assistance to Mr. Bissett because he is recognized as a fine, creative artist, that the Canada Council based its decision on the advice of experts, and, further that Mr. Grace of the Canada Council had recognized the talent and excellence of Mr. Bissett, and having surveyed the disgusting and pornographic exhibits of Mr. Bissett's published works, sponsored by the Canada Council, which are now before the minister on his desk, may I ask whether the Minister of Finance supports the granting of public tax dollars to this poet and to the publishing houses which have printed such outrageous abuse and affront to the Canadian parliament?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must tell the hon. member that I have here a document which I left unopened because I was following the oral question period. I am going to open it now but not without some apprehension.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PURCHASING OF TAX REFUNDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO LIMIT CHARGES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or for the Minister of National Revenue, but I would prefer to address it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Prime Minister in 1974, in a pre-election speech, referred specifically to members engaged in the purchasing of tax refunds and old-age security cheques. Since some of these loan sharks are making between 400 and 600 per cent profit on these transactions does the minister propose to take action to deal with this situation before the new tax filing year which is fast approaching?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): It is our intention to reintroduce a bill dealing with depositors and borrowers. We hope to do that soon. But I would point out that part of the problem referred to by the hon. member comes under provincial jurisdiction and I understand the provinces are prepared to take action as well.

Mr. Paproski: Would the minister contact and help the community income tax service of Alberta which is part of the student legal service in Edmonton, a non-profit organization providing low-cost tax preparation and tax advance services? Maybe he could make available some of the offices in the federal building which are not in use by his own department in Edmonton?

Mr. Allmand: I am pleased to say yes to the first question. I will look into the second.

INCOME TAX

DECISION ON WHETHER OR NOT OXFAM CANADA IS CHARITABLE ORGANIZATION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I have given him notice. May I ask whether in light of the documentation I have provided to him he has had an opportunity to review the activities of OXFAM Canada and whether he has decided that OXFAM Canada is not a charitable organization under the terms of the act?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I have prepared an answer for him. OXFAM Canada has not requested that its registration be revoked nor has it requested a registration order under another name. In 1972 its name was formally changed from OXFAM of Canada to OXFAM Canada but this did not entail a new registration. OXFAM Canada is a registered charity under the Income Tax Act. Registration is an ongoing status until such time as the charity ceases to comply with the requirements of the Act concerning registered charities. A charity which ceases so to comply may have its registration revoked by the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I should like to thank the minister for his epistle and turn, now, to the gospel. In the light of the fact that OXFAM has indicated that it would set out to deceive some segments of the public in obtaining its funds, would the minister now tell me, in the light of the documentation provided him, whether or not he intends to cancel OXFAM's registration as a charitable organization?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I am not able to give any details with regard to the position of OXFAM bearing in mind the secrecy provisions contained in the Act. I cannot make any comment on that matter.

PRIOR KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue which relates to the state of knowledge of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: On November 18 the minister was asked by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo whether he could tell the House why he, as minister, was not aware of the practice referred to in the broadcast by Messrs. Templeton and Berton. The minister went on to say—and this is where the confusion arises—"I do not accept the statement made by the hon. member in the first place as to whether or not I was aware of it". What I should like to ask the minister is: What did the minister know about the ease of access to confidential files prior to the broadcast revelations? The question is quite simple—

• (1202)

Mr. Lalonde: "Yes or no".

Mr. Clark: It is, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chrétien: You would do better to read your question again!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor.

Mr. Clark: The minister is a little confused, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chrétien: No, you are confused.

Mr. Clark: It is not we who have to read questions, it is the minister who has to read answers. My question is quite simple: What did the minister know?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): In spite of the hon. gentleman's long preamble, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to receive a pie in my face.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In regard to the other part of his question, I must sincerely say that before the program came on the air I did not know anything about the case to which the hon. member is referring, and that is the truth. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knew something about it before but he failed to let me know.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister's memory is short. He knows we have been through this before and he knows he has been proven wrong in connection with that particular allegation. Knowing he is wrong does not prevent him from repeating it. The minister for once was quite careful. He said he did not know about that particular case before it was brought to the attention of the Canadian people. Our question is: Did he know of the practice? Did he know in advance of that revelation about the ease of access on the part of unauthorized persons to the confidential tax files of Canadians?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not know of that practice. If there is such a practice the hon. member would be helpful to me if he divulged the type of practice he knows of. In fact, if anyone is aware of the ease by which one can get information from the department, I should like to know so we can make a better investigation and benefit the Canadian people as such. In fact, sir, it is the hon. member's responsibility to do just that.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I find it curious for ministers of this government to be telling anybody anything about responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATURE OF DEPARTMENTAL INVESTIGATION INTO BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF INFORMATION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): So that we might help the minister get to the bottom of this matter, and I am referring to the departmental investigation which the minister says is now underway, will he tell the House of Commons the nature of this departmental investigation? For example, has he requested his public officials to get in touch with major chartered accounting firms across the country? Has he requested his officials to monitor broadcast or other allegations, including those on "As It Happens" and other programs, and to follow up any allegations which might have been made? What is the precise nature of the departmental investigation which the minister has ordered?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the investigation conducted both by my departmental officials and the RCMP is a very good one. We are going into every detail. If I were to start giving the details to the House, I would probably jeopardize the investigation that is taking place. There is no reason why I should make a report at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did indicate over the last 48 hours that I would hear argument today on dollar items. I think we should get to orders of the day first, and then to it at that time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WENMAN—READING OF PORNOGRAPHIC POETRY TO HOUSE

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I hope I have not already offended my privilege as a member of the House by forwarding to Your Honour copies of pornographic poetry which is now in front of you. My question of privilege is to ask whether, by repeating this particular poetry from my place in the House of Commons, I would be abusing my privilege as a member of the House of Commons. Therefore, I ask Your Honour, would I, as a member of parliament, be offending the House of Commons and my privilege as a member by repeating this kind of garbage in the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not, of course, the kind of judgment that I would make in advance, since I have not seen the documentation to which the hon. member refers. I think his difficulty is that in any case it would not seem to be very relevant to any particular matter before the House at this time.

1. Was the McGill University awarded contract numbered 07SU.3237006 for $40,025 to perform a study of terrain evaluation related to Canadian Forces vehicle mobility and, if so (a) for which vehicles (b) which department at McGill is performing the study?

2. Were there personnel in the Department of National Defence who were competent to perform such a study?

3. Does the contract cover (a) field work (b) laboratory or simulator type tests (c) other forms of activities and, if so, what are they?

4. Has any of the work been sub-contracted to any other person or agency?

5. Under which of their four main roles is the contract designed to make the Armed Forces more efficient?

6. Is the terrain analysis for off-road vehicle mobility contracted by DND for operations (a) in (b) outside Canada and, if so, in which locations or countries?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes. (a) The study is technology base research and hence is not related to any specific vehicle. (b) The Department of Geography.

2. No.

3. (a), (b) and (c) The contract covers filed work and analytical investigations such as the applicability of remote sensing techniques to vegetation and terrain analysis, in parts of NWT, the use of colour infrared and thermal infrared to analyze surface vegetation imagery, maximum depth of the active terrain layer and the occurrence of permafrost, etc.

4. No.

5. Sovereignty and defence of North America.

6. The work relates to DND operations in northern Canada.

ENVIRONMENT—PCB RELEASES

Question No. 439—Mr. Leggatt:

1. In what locations, on what dates and how have P.C.B.s (polychlorinated biphenels) been significantly released to the environment from supposedly closed systems?

2. What methods and procedures were used to contain the releases?

3. Has the government or any provincial government prosecuted anyone who has released P.C.B.s to the environment and, if so, what convictions resulted?

4. What methods has the government recommended to the provinces for the disposal of P.C.B.s?

5. Are there P.C.B. disposal sites in Canada and, if so, in which locations?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): 1 and 2. (a) Sheridan Creek, B.C.: between 1972 and June 1976 an unknown quantity of coolant escaped from buried capacitors. Discarded capacitors and contaminated earth were removed and sent to approved disposal area in the U.S.A. (b) Dowling, Ontario: November 9, 1973; train-truck collision caused derailment and rupture of cargo transformers; approximately 1000 gallons of transformer oil spilled onto the ground. Contaminated earth was initially removed in two stages and disposed of by encapsulation. Later sampling revealed high PCB levels in the vicinity of the original spill. In July 1977, the Ontario Environmental Appeal Board issued an order to excavate contaminated soil and to hold it in leak-proof containers until final disposal can be arranged. (c) Crookston, Minnesota: April 3, 1976; while pumping out a flooded powerhouse, one transformer was found to be leaking. An estimated 70-90 gallons of coolant were pumped with the flood water into the Red Lake River which meets the Red River 60 miles downstream at Grand Forks, North Dakota. Pumping into Red Lake River was stopped; contaminated flood water remaining in the powerhouse was removed for disposal in the U.S.A. (d) Regina, Saskatchewan: August, 13 1976; a pipeline, from a coolant storage tank to an electrical manufacturing plant, broke and 1500 gallons of coolant spilled onto the ground. Interceptor trenches and sumps were dug to collect water-coolant mixture. Contaminated liquids and earth were removed for disposal in the U.S.A. (e) Prince Rupert, B.C.: January 21, 1977; it is alleged that a transformer ruptured and approximately 200 gallons of coolant entered Porpoise Harbour via a water drainpipe. Contaminated sediment will be covered carefully to a maximum depth of approximately 35 feet and then capped for scour protection. (Dredging is considered to be environmentally unacceptable).

3. In the Prince Rupert case, the Crown has proceeded against Canadian Cellulose Company Limited on (16) charges of violations under the Fisheries Act. The intentions of or actions taken by provincial governments with respect to PCB spills are not known. Provinces are not obliged to report hazardous material spills under their jurisdiction to federal agencies.

4. The federal government has prepared interim guidelines for the management of waste materials containing P.C.B.'s. The guidelines recommend storage of the materials until such time as environmentally acceptable disposal methods have been approved or have been developed.

5. At the present time there are no licensed P.C.B. disposal sites or facilities in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated two days ago, it is our intention to raise a point of order to the propriety of two items included in Supplementary Estimates (A). In particular, I served notice on the House at that time that we took exception to vote 31a of Regional Economic Expansion and vote L56a of Transport. The point of order has to do with the general question of what are called $1 votes, which has been dealt with a great many times over the years and was dealt with very extensively in March of this year.

At that time you made a ruling on the matter which was very clear and precise and with which we agree. May I quote from the March 22, 1977, issue of Hansard, where at page 4221 Your Honour said:

> On the general question, it is my view that the government receives from parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item, in my opinion, ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation.

That was a very clear and precise decision taken by Your Honour in March after a great deal of debate on both sides of the question by a great number of learned experts on House of Commons procedure. In light of that ruling, I should point out that vote 31a under Regional Economic Expansion, dealing with the Cape Breton Development Corporation, contains two parts. The first part of that appropriation calls for payment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to be applied by the corporation in payment of the losses incurred in the operation and maintenance of the coal mining, related works and undertakings required by the corporation under section 9 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act.

In my opinion, that is a very proper, normal type of vote. It is an accepted part of estimates of the House. We have no objection to that vote. If the government wanted to appropriate more money to open up new mines in Cape Breton, indeed we would consider that as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The vote continues by indicating "and notwithstanding section 31(2) of the act for grants to municipalities on Cape Breton Island not exceeding the amount equal to the taxes that might have been levied for their 1977-78 fiscal year by the municipalities in respect of the personal property in the corporation, if the corporation were not an agent of Her Majesty".

In other words, by use of the conjunctive "and", a $1 item has been attached. It is a legislative item, and it is calling for a minor change. It essentially changes the words "any lands" to personal property. It is a change to legislation and therefore it is a legislative item which is improper, according to Your Honour's ruling on March 22, 1977. Prior to your ruling, under the old system that probably would have appeared as a separate vote with the $1 attached to it. By use of the conjunctive "and", it has been attached to a very proper, legitimate appropriation.

Also, I should like to draw attention to vote L56a under the Department of Transport which has a similar type of circumstance. This vote is divided up into (A) and (B). Rather than using the conjunctive "and" to associate two parts, (A) and (B) have been used. Part (A) is a ligitimate, normal type of estimate which would be part of an appropriation act. We have no procedural objection to that part.

Part (B) indicates that all borrowings by VIA Rail Incorporated be exempted from the interest rate limitation of 6 per cent per annum imposed by section 72(5) of the Railway Act, and all such borrowings for a term of more than 12 months be subjected to the approval of the minister of finance. Part (B) of that vote is in direct contradiction of Your Honour's ruling of March 22 because it effectively legislates. It has the effect of causing people who want to know the law with regard to VIA Rail to root around in appropriations to discover which law applies. I believe that was a basic reason behind Your Honour's decision in March. We find this particularly offensive in view of the fact that VIA Rail was created by a $1 vote in Supplementary Estimates (B) of 1976-77. In my opinion, that is an improper use of the estimates and appropriation procedures.

These two votes in particular are a violation of Your Honour's ruling. The substantive proportion of those appropriations is legitimate. Therefore, if Your Honour rules that those two votes are improper and should be struck down, certainly we would be willing to grant unanimous consent to add back the proper and substantive portions of those votes, since we have no desire to effect the appropriation that Devco requires, nor do we have any desire, on a procedural ground, to try to eliminate the $100,000 appropriation for VIA Rail.

We would be amenable to finding some way to ensure that these proper appropriations become part of the appropriations Act. In view of Your Honour's ruling in March, we submit, respectfully, that these two votes as presented are out of order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I almost feel like saying that this is where I came in, because a long time ago I became interested in and concerned about $1 items. However, as is clear, what we are discussing this morning are not items for only $1; they are items of more substantial amounts, although the hon. member for Calgary Centre has made the point that in his view the effect in two cases is the same as if we had $1 items before us.

I have fought a good many of these items. I hope the struggles of many hon. members in this House have had their effect. In fact, I believe they have. Certainly, there are far fewer items in these supplementary estimates that can be attacked procedurally than has been the case for a long time.

I have studied both of these cases. I am ready to support the hon. member for Calgary Centre with respect to the item on page 142, namely, vote L56a of the Department of Transport. However, I shall take the opposite view to the one he has taken with respect to the item on page 108, namely, vote 31a of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

From the rulings that other occupants of the Chair have made, as well as Your Honour, as I see it what we do when we pass a supply bill is, of course, to enact legislation. A supply bill is just as much an act of parliament as any other act that is passed. Practice and tradition have made it clear, however, that a supply bill should not be used for purposes other than the voting of money for specific purposes. In other words, a supply bill should not be used, especially by means of a $1 item, as a way of smuggling in an amendment to some other statute on the books, in other words as a means of avoiding all the procedures necessary for that kind of amendment.

The act has been cleaned up a good deal and a good deal of that credit goes to Your Honour for the rulings you have made in the last two or three years. In the case of the Transport item, I suggest the drafters of this vote were not as careful as they were in many other respects. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre indicated, vote L56a has two parts. Part (A) calls for the payment of $100,000 and the $100,000 is there. There is no problem; that is clear. Part (B) has not attached to it any money for the purpose involved, but in effect is an amendment of section 72(5) of the Railway Act.

Section 72(5) of that act is the part of that legislation which enables the railways to borrow money and pay interest thereon. Very clearly it is indicated in the statute that the rate of interest shall not exceed 6 per cent per annum. Part (B) of this item removes that limit. It does not remove it on a one-shot basis; it does not remove it for some stated purpose; it removes the ceiling on the rate of interest. Presumably, these borrowings can be borrowings that may take 2 years, 5 years, 10 years, 20 years, 50 years or 100 years to pay back. Thus, for a long period of time the act is being amended. It is declared by (B) of this item that section 75(2) with its ceiling of 6 per cent per annum does not apply. I think Your Honour will have to look very carefully at that item.

I am on the opposition side of the House and have a long history of opposing legislative items in the estimates, but I have to say that I do not feel that way about vote 31a under Regional Economic Expansion which provides for the payment of $21,976,000 to the Cape Breton Development Corporation. My friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, says—if he can prove this point, I wish him the best—that the use of the word "and" makes the latter part of that long sentence just a $1 item.

As I read the wording of the vote, we are being asked to provide the sum of money I just indicated to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to cover certain losses and a few other things, and also to make payments in lieu of taxes to the municipalities on Cape Breton Island in a manner slightly different than is provided in the act. The act says that Devco can make grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes only on lands that are owned by the corporation. This is being expanded by the terms of this wording to cover what is called the personal property of the corporation. But there are two things that seem to make it different from other kinds of votes, the kinds that Your Honour has properly ruled out of order. In the first place it is not just a dollar put there in the legislation; it is a huge sum of money. I take it that the money which Devco is to be allowed to pay to the municipalities in grants in lieu of taxes is included in that $21,976,000.

The other thing that is significant is that it is not an ongoing item, as is the case with the Transport item; it is a one-shot item; it is for the year 1977-78 only. I am sure my friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, is not objecting, nor is my friend down the way, the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, objecting—

Mr. Muir: The hon. member heard what the hon. member for Calgary Centre said. He has no objections whatsoever to the vote for the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In fact, we want to increase it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will say that if the wrong means was being employed to achieve the end, we would have to object, but I do not think there is anything wrong with this means of granting the extra money to Devco to make these payments in lieu of taxes. If it was a $1 item amending the act, I think that would be questionable. If if was being amended for all time, that also would be questionable. But in fact it is a grant of a certain number of dollars that are right there in the estimates which are to be used for this purpose for this year only.

Just as I feel very strongly that the Transport item is a piece of ongoing legislation which changes the act, so I feel that this is not ongoing legislation, this is not a $1 item but a grant of an actual number of dollars for a specific purpose.

My friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, said to me—and I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys feels the same way about it—that some other corporations down there, such as Atomic Energy, and so on, ought to be doing the same thing, and that the municipalities on Cape Breton Island which are suffering because the Crown corporations there are not paying taxes should get the compensation or the reimbursement they need. This has been mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, and by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys in his interjection.

No one is opposed in principle to what is being done, and I am ready to say that if I thought the means were wrong we would have to propose that this item be dropped and that a special one be brought in. But I will simply repeat the point I made. It seems to me that this item is not in the category of $1 items which we have opposed so relentlessly time and time again; it is not a $1 item but a $21,976,000 item which is a proper matter to be contained in a supply bill.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Therefore, my submission to Your Honour is that you should find the item on page 142 out of order with respect to the (B) part and that the necessary piece of legislation separate from this bill should be brought in. We will then give it quick passage. But, I see no reason to object to handling in this way the extra money to Devco to make these larger grants in lieu of taxes to the municipalities on the Island of Cape Breton.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, last March, the Chair ruled on the procedural acceptability of legislative items in the estimates, and last Wednesday the President of Privy Council and Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) told the House that we had prepared the supplementary estimates and examined very closely the Chair's rulings, and that we had tried to take them into account and to amend the supplementary estimates accordingly.

[English]

You made it very clear, Mr. Speaker, that you will not permit items in the estimates the purpose of which is primarily to legislate other than with regard to annual expenditures. My friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre, quoted you correctly on what you said last March 22, and I do not want to repeat the quotation. I would add that you then indicated that the amount of the item was irrelevant, whether it is $1 or $5 million. You proceeded then to reject two items of estimates the primary purpose of which was to amend legislation other than appropriation acts.

In the present set of supplementary estimates, objection has been raised to a number of items. First, objection has been raised to item 31a under Regional Economic Expansion. This item, in the amount of $21,976,000 reads as follows:

Vote 31a—Payment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to be applied by the corporation in payment of the losses incurred in the operation and maintenance of the coal mining and related works and undertakings acquired by the corporation under section 9 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, including administrative expenses chargeable to the coal division—

This is where it becomes interesting.

—and notwithstanding section 31(2) of the said act, for grants to municipalities on Cape Breton Island not exceeding an amount equal to the taxes that might have been levied for their 1977-78 fiscal year by the municipalities in respect of the personal property of the corporation if the corporation were not an agent of Her Majesty.

The objection appears to be to the phrase "notwithstanding the said act". In effect, this expression amends the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act. At first glance, this may be taken to offend against your proscription. A closer examination, however, raises some serious doubts.

The legislative items rejected by you were generally amendments to statutes and were not in any way related to the granting of authority for expenditure. The item under consideration has as its purpose the granting of authority for the expenditure for the support of the coal mining and related industries in Cape Breton and for grants in lieu of taxes to municipalities in that area; that is to say, to give assistance to an economically distressed part of the country. The municipalities which I think would be affected are in the constituency of Cape Breton-The Sydneys and Cape Breton-East Richmond, and would include Glace Bay, New Waterford, Sydney, Sydney Mines and the county of Cape Breton. They would lose in the amount of close to $1 million, that is, $978,616.23.

The amendment to the act is limited strictly to the purposes of the proposed expenditures and it is not a general amendment to the act, as well stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is merely incidental to the purpose of the item. The intent in your ruling was to proscribe the legislation from estimates that properly belong in ordinary bills. It was not your intent to eliminate from the scope of the business of supply a large number of items the purposes of which are restricted to expenditure. Scores of items every year must contain similar phrases that have a strictly limited amending effect to statutes other than appropriation acts. For instance, items that would grant funds for agricultural support programs incidentally amend the Senate and House of Commons Act so that MPs and senators who are farmers are not putting their seats in danger by accepting funds available to all farmers. I think this example illustrates well the point I want to make.

To extend the prohibition against items the purpose of which is to make general amendments to statutes other than appropriation acts, to incidental and strictly limited phrases in items that are for the purpose of granting authority for expenditure would be, in my view, a misapplication of an important parliamentary principle.

As far as the second item is concerned, Transport vote L56a, I should like to ask that the remarks I have made be extended to that item, and I just add that this item is merely incidental, and of a financial or expenditure nature dealing with a Crown-owned company. What I have said in respect of the first item discussed here today I would suggest should apply to the second item, and I would merely add that we are dealing with a Crown-owned company and it is merely incidental, and of a financial expenditure nature.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am grateful to hon. members who participated in the argument today. The argument and the references will be of great help. We did go through a rather thorough review of this about a year ago. I will, of course, draw rather heavily on the rules I attempted to set down to the House at that time in attempting to determine whether the two items that have been put in question today offend those guidelines I set forth to the House; that is to say, whether they seek, through the supply process, separate legislative authority from that which already exists, or whether they are simply another application of funds under a program for which legislative authority is already in existence.

That is basically the test I had in mind, and I will take some time to examine it. That was the purpose of inviting these arguments for the first time in advance of the final supply day, to take away from it the eleventh-hour atmosphere with which we have been faced before. I certainly hope it is as big an improvement to our procedures in the minds of hon. members as it seems to be to me, because it is a great help to me to have a little time to reflect on this question before prejudicing or jeopardizing, as it were, the very vital process of supply which has to take place on the last day of this part of the session. Therefore, I will examine the matter and try to rule on it as expeditiously as possible.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58(11)—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO DEAL WITH HOUSING, TRANSPORTATION AND ENERGY PROBLEMS

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton) moved:

That this House condemns the Liberal government and, in particular, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, whose policies have failed to meet the critical needs of housing, urban transportation and energy conservation.

Mr. Speaker: Members will be remembered that proceedings on this motion will expire in accordance with Standing Order 58(11).

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry we kept the minister from Quebec City today, but it is delightful to have him with us. I am very grateful I can speak on this motion, because I am concerned about urban living and also about the particular aspect of housing. I think the great Irish poet, William Butler Yeats said, "In dreams begins responsibility"—and housing is an important part of every Canadian's dream. The Ministry of State for Urban Affairs bears a responsibility for helping to achieve this dream.

Housing has become a major socioeconomic issue of the 1970s. Housing is now everybody's business. That simple fact could be easily illustrated by reciting virtually lists of programs and agencies which affect housing. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, from the extent of federal, provincial and municipal involvement in housing that all three levels of government must work together in this field. It is equally important that co-operation exist between the various governmental levels and the private house building, development and financial sectors. Their resources, know-how and diversity are necessary to make the housing wheels turn. Most important in the housing equation is the co-operation and support of Canadians at large whose attitudes and actions make housing succeed or fail as a valuable part of the quality of Canadian life.

Federal involvement in housing began with the Dominion Housing Act of 1935 and accelerated after the federal task force on housing and urban development in 1968, culminating in the establishment of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs in 1971. Housing, however, is a provincial responsibility in law and a regional responsibility by virtue of its character. Above all else, the business of urban affairs is not just to improve the supply of houses and roads; it is to improve the lives of the people who use them. Perhaps a story will illustrate how difficult it is. At a conference on the urban environment, discussions covered many related topics. After an hour or so the talk began to set specific problems in a wider context and to seek their fundamental causes. Eventually some long-term solutions were suggested. During lunch, two members of the group, one a politician and the other a senior official, began worrying about the more immediate concern of surviving the day to day pressures of re-election and red tape. The interesting thing is that they did not think to relate their ongoing lives and the specific problems of their responsibilities to the earlier discussion. Their goal was not improvement of the urban environment but maintaining their position of authority.

Mr. Speaker, it was Sir William Henry Beveridge who said:

The object of government in peace and war is not the glory of rulers or of races, but the happiness of the common man.

It is critical to relate questions of urban affairs not to statistics about housing starts but to the extent to which we foster communities in Canada. Being community minded in urban planning is not a folksy experiment; it is the encouragement of an environment that makes possible and in fact promotes individual growth.

I wish to speak for just a moment on how real this is to me as the representative of the constituency of Ottawa-Carleton, because Ottawa-Carleton is basically a necklace of neighbourhoods to the south and to the east of this great city. One thing I have discovered, not only in walking the streets of Ottawa-Carleton but also in meeting every Wednesday night with community associations, is that people are genuinely, honestly concerned with the environment in which they live. They do not wish to make a final decision—that is left to the elected people—but they do want to have input. They do care about the use of public buildings within their communities. They do care about where roads go. They do care about clean air, sewage, water, garbage—about all of these things, because it does affect not only the assets they own but also their neighbours and the quality of life they have.

A community is so much a way of life; it is not merely houses, stores and streets. Its people enjoy feelings of security, pride, self-respect and hope. It may have different interests: spiritual, cultural, political, business, industrial, educational and social. It may have a number of problems such as shabby housing, inadequate street lighting, overcrowded schools and hospitals, and low health standards. However, the good community is correcting these things through redevelopment, conservation, industrial expansion, rising standards of living, promoting racial harmony and ever-widening ideals of what that may be. It takes the wants and aspirations of its people and writes them into terms of action.

The quiet, stable pattern of the small community in Canada has been disrupted and people are discontented with the emptiness of life aboard commuter trains and buses and in crowded buildings. An example which I would like to put on the record concerns an event which happened last year during the by-election. I was standing in a shopping centre when an elderly couple came by, and they asked for one of my political buttons. When I went to pin it on, the old gentleman said, "Would you mind pinning it in the middle of my back?" I was a little dismayed but I pinned it in the middle of his windbreaker. Then he said, "Would you do the same for my wife" The lady turned around and I pinned the button in the middle of her back. They then said, "Now we can be travelling billboards for you" and I said, "Really, what do you mean?" The gentleman answered, "You see that old age home up on the hill? We live there. We come down here to the shopping centre every day and walk up and down 24 times. In that way, you see, we can touch people. It is very lonely living in only one room in a senior citizen home." Although we can provide decent homes for older people, it still remains that people have to touch people. Therefore, the quality of our communities are very vital and very important.

When an urban development is allowed and encouraged to become a community, the commuter leaves the anonymity of the city and becomes a person intimately associated with his neighbours and keenly aware of his dignity and his worth. Imagine working downtown in a large Canadian city. How often are you likely to get home for lunch? If you work downtown in a large city, it is almost impossible and most of the time you do not even try. I drive to work here at the House of Commons every day, and my heart is often very heavy when I look across at Place Portage. It is not that I dispute the fact that public servants should live and work in the great city of Hull, but how can we—when we have such wonderful neighbourhoods in Ottawa-Carleton—place 25,000 public servants in a ghetto like that?

Why could we not have taken those buildings and placed them in our nice communities, such as Lucerne, Gatineau or out in Kanata—the kinds of places where public servants could live and work near their centre. We must think more about these matters, rather than just placing people in a group of buildings like that, far away from their families and unable to go home for lunch.

Another incredible problem we have concerns cars; the multitude of cars and buses in our core areas. Not only do we shape our cities, they shape us. One of the greatest cities in the world is London, England. I once asked an urban planner why London was still a city where people wished to live. He said that the secret about London is its 1,000 years of history and the fact that it has always had the boroughs' system, where people could live in a community. Then he said a very interesting thing, "In a borough you get to know the policeman, the postman, and you don't need a postal code; they know whether you live there or not. Also, you know the grocer." But the last sentence was the one which was so revealing. He said "When you die, someone mourns you." I believe it is so important that as we create urban cities and as we build houses in clusters in neighbourhoods we remember that what we are basically doing is to make certain that our great cities and our small cities will have 500 or 1,000 years of history.

It has been suggested that in the Middle Ages western man learned to think systematically about the realm of the personal. From the twelfth to the eighteenth century western man learned to think systematically and to manage the material world. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries we learned to think systematically and to manage organic things. We have not yet learned to understand persons as persons; we are still treating persons as things. To accomplish anything worth while, people working together with similar objectives and principles must replace programs and the erection of buildings.

Let me just tell you one very interesting experiment that happened in the heart of this city, which I think is perhaps one of the best things because it points the way. With respect to the Alta Vista Medical Health Centre in this city, the governors of the University of Ottawa after heart rending debate decided to take their medical faculty and put it out in the complex instead of keeping it in an educational ghetto in centre town. They are moving it out, and there the young medical students will be in touch with the community in which they will eventually practice. This is what we must do.

A philosopher once said, "We are made for co-operation, like feet, like hands, like eyelids". True co-operation co-ordinates the various parts for the general welfare of the community. It is through joint discussion and planning that we achieve action. In pioneer Canada, effort was co-operative. A home was built locally in a "house-raising". Tragically, today we inhibit local community-based action. We have almost come to the point where all help must be institutionalized and made part of some government structure. We establish a particular program with offices, a building, a budget, and everything starts to become impersonal and controlled. On one hand we urge responsibility and private initiative, and on the other we develop a society which is institutional and crushes human initiative.

One of the things I am most concerned with is this amalgamation of the ministry of housing and urban affairs with CMHC. It concerns me that we take what was to be structured, in my reading of the original act, as a think-tank, as a group that would bring together the forces in this country which plan urban development and housing, and suddenly it becomes, to use the Ottawa expression, the buzz word around here—something that has clout and can talk to the ministries and to some of these large urban centres. I do not think that is what it should have been and what it should be. The kind of clout that ministry should have is the clout of good ideas, the clout of bringing together all the forces which affect housing and urban planning. This ministry should have the clout of vision and co-operative thinking, not the clout of some large ministry.

I would like to talk about some of the things that disturb me in connection with this part of government. The government has become institutionalized. It is too far from the real world. Changes were recently announced for 400,000 Canadians who have already invested in the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. This was done in midstream. Perhaps the alleged loopholes which are now closed were unjustified. Nevertheless, these changes impose hardships upon Canadians who have already invested in RHOSP's to purchase furniture or to engage in other purposes which were quite legal until April, 1977.

If you wish to buy furniture before the deadline, you must remember that only certain types of furniture and furnishings qualify. But these rules are vague. According to the regulations "eligible furnishings" means "furniture, appliances, curtains or carpeting, but for greater certainty does not include listed personal property or outdoor furniture or equipment." There are, however, many inconsistencies. Stair carpeting or wall-to-wall carpeting qualifies, apparently because of the word "carpeting". Bathroom or kitchen tile does not. That is a funny distinction. There is something that worries me. People who have lived and worked in this city are quite used to broadloom. The officials are used to large broadloomed offices. They forget that in other parts of Canada there is an awful lot of good old linoleum.

I often worry about those in the glass house across the way who are supposed to plan our industrial strategy. I do not know of many small or medium sized offices which have broadloom. Members opposite are so used to thinking in terms of football field offices with broadloom that they forget about the rest of Canada. They forget that most houses in this country have linoleum.

I now wish to talk about land. In my analysis of the challenges and problems of economic housing for Canadians, I found that the basic commodity is land. Five years ago in this city it was possible to buy a lot for less than $10,000. Today a 60-foot lot costs between $25,000 and $30,000. While it can be argued that this is a provincial and municipal responsibility, the federal government should take a leadership role involving all parties in order to be certain of an adequate supply of land on the market. We must address ourselves to the land question.

I understand that a joint study is now in progress. I recognize that the cost of land is a very complicated issue. I hope the minister will address this whole area of land costs in order that there will be a meeting of minds and we can bring forward all points of view and philosophies. We cannot meet the future expectations of the Canadian people unless we address ourselves to what can be done about land costs.

Many of the programs of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs have been directed at numbers. I can understand that. In September of this year the president of Central Mortgage and Housing looked forward to 1978 and expressed the housing future of Canada in terms of an anticipated 240,000 starts. It is very important that the department not evaluate this in terms of starts, or evaluate all our programs in numerical numbers. We must look at the 25 or 30 programs of the department to see whether they address the deepseated problems of housing. It is not right to think we are curing our housing situation by enumerating starts.

The AHOP program has been a considerable success. However, we must recognize that there are some problems. Because of the economic conditions in the country, there is a bit of a glut. People are finding that the cost of real estate fees and repainting often represent more than their equity. The spectre of a significant number of mortgage defaults must now be faced. I understand this is particularly troublesome in the eastern provinces.

I now wish to deal with the RRAP program. Regulations have recently been changed in the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. These changes seem likely to lead to smaller loans and smaller applications, since the program has been changed from one of rehabilitation to one of patching up. For example, it is no longer possible for an applicant to replace dilapidated ancillary buildings.

Mr. Blais: Hold your breath.

Mrs. Pigott: I will not hold my breath, not with the mails the way they are today. I am sorry; I could not resist that.

An hon. Member: The minister's whisper is quite loud.

Mr. Blais: Never mind my conversation with my confrère.

Mrs. Pigott: There is the very fine Housing and Urban Development Association. These people have put forth very constructive programs. I was in association work before coming to this great chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue to express some of my concerns about what is happening in the housing and development market at the present time. One of them relates to the apparent flight of some of our developers to the sunny climes. I believe they have a long list of good reasons for deciding to take their development money south of the border, and I think it is important that the ministry take the time to inform itself about those reasons. I am sure the Housing and Urban Development Association could be very helpful in identifying the reasons for this flight.

We must not only address ourselves to eastern Canada and to the Montreal area; we must look at what is happening to the Toronto market. I understand that unemployment in the industry is around 50 per cent and will probably climb to around 60 per cent in the course of the winter. There is great concern that no housing starts are taking place at the moment. I sense that the ministry is preoccupied with just one jurisdiction and that it is more concerned about organizational charts than with the real world and the fact that we need more development in our major urban centres.

Another area I wish to address relates to the intrusion of the federal government into provincial capitals and municipal centres, areas which really belong to the jurisdiction of the provinces. Housing is a provincial responsibility, but over the years the federal government has taken over the provincial responsibility of deciding land type and housing competition in urban projects.

The recently announced Canadian Home Insulation Program is one more example of federal entry into provincial jurisdiction. Other speakers from my party will be addressing this question in more detail later. Why are CHIP grants given directly to individuals, rather than to the provinces, when housing is under provincial jurisdiction? Why were representatives of the various provinces moved to say that no meaningful consultation took place before the program was put in place? Why was it only yesterday, three months after initiation of the insulation program, that meetings took place? It is a sad commentary, too, that the one province which did not agree to participate in the program at the beginning was given the head office. That was another example of intrusion into provincial rights before they had expressed a willingness to accept the program.

One cannot but be very concerned about the people who live in such areas as are represented by my hon. friend, the member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), who face a very bleak winter in houses which are in need of repair as well as insulation. But applications for this necessary work are held up because of the heavy workload in local CMHC offices.

The growth of direct federal entry into municipal affairs began with CMHC involvement in urban renewal. Federal assumption of real estate around harbours, airports and railways within its jurisdiction followed. Then Ottawa began to see urban problems as being in the national interest. Here I would like to remind hon. members of the fact that in 1970, when the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was formed, it was vowed that the federal government intended only to co-ordinate urban activities relating to its jurisdiction over federal property. At the same time as the government was talking about national objectives, the phrase "urban problems" which was felt, somehow, to be federal, replaced "municipal affairs" which had a provincial connotation. In June, 1971, when the motion proposing the establishment of the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs was presented, it was said—and here I want to quote because I think it is very important to note that we are straying from the original concept.

—its direct operational role is non-existent. The ministry's role will be co-ordinative as between federal policies and their departments . . . It will be consultative with the provinces and their municipalities in achieving, hopefully, with the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities an integrated approach to solving urban problems that one of the three areas of jurisdiction can solve on its own.

I urge the government to return to its mandate and renew the co-ordinating and consultative role that was outlined in 1971. This ministry could be so supportive with research and development concepts, working with the trade associations and financial institutions to find answers to these problems.

I want to talk about one specific area, the cost of mortgage funds. In Canada today, a $40,000 mortgage amortized over 25 years at 12 per cent carries a monthly rate of $413. In order to repay this mortgage and stay within the guidelines of 25 per cent of a family's income, it is necessary to earn $19,800 a year. The same mortgage with an interest rate of only 6 per cent will cost $256 a month on an annual salary of $12,300. Has the government considered alternative forms of mortgage financing? Has the government explored the possibility of measures to encourage small investors to enter the private mortgage market? Has the government considered measures to reflect the wide variety of needs found in our country and to respond in a flexible way to regional housing problems?

Mr. Blais: Yes, we have.

Mrs. Pigott: No, Mr. Speaker, they have not. I am being heckled by the other side. The hon. member knows perfectly well that he is not being accurate. May I mention one other area where cost has an effect on housing construction. Has the government investigated abolishing the federal sales tax on building materials? I realize that this is an old one, but it is a very important one. Would the minister also put pressure on the finance department to review the double taxation which has plagued municipalities in regard to sales tax on electrical supplies for subdivisions? Do the priorities include aid to the provinces to deal with the needs of urban transit?

Housing is not merely a matter of shelter, Mr. Speaker. Urban affairs is not just a question of logistics in crowded cities. Part of the current unrest in Canada can be traced to the effects of the urban environment on Canadians. Decent, reasonably priced housing, just like food, clothing and warmth during our long winter, helps raise morale. Good housing raises hopes and aspirations. The children of today's houses will be the adults of Canada's future.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to remind the hon. member who just sat down, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), that it is rather surprising that she be the one to introduce such a motion to deplore the Canadian government's achievements in housing, especially since she lives in one of the ridings that has very likely benefitted more than any other in that regard. Of course that riding is home to thousands of Canadians who live in very decent and in many cases luxury units, or again in accommodations which meet the needs of low income families or, in an infinite number of cases which would be too long to list here, in homes for the aged which have been built in the Ottawa-Carleton riding. I merely want to say, Mr. Speaker, that obviously all these things have not been achieved by the present member of this riding, but rather by her two Liberal predecessors, Messrs. Tardif and Turner, who greatly contributed to the development of this electoral district.

On the other hand, it seems to me that the hon. member has shown good disposition toward the housing and urban affairs problems, and I want to congratulate her for the seriousness of most of her remarks. Furthermore, I do appreciate the number of very appropriate suggestions she has made; I shall be happy to consider them and I hope to follow them up. Nevertheless it remains that her speech was so far removed from the motion introduced today that I am wondering if she really wrote it. I find her much too charitable and too just to draft such a motion. Perhaps her colleague in front of her wrote it, it is more his style than that of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker referred to certain problems in the housing field, and, of course, to certain difficulties concerning the role played by the Ministry of Urban Affairs in Canada.

I do not have to remind the House of the basic role that the Ministry of Urban Affairs must play in this country. The ministry was established following requests from all parts of the country and the wishes expressed by members on both sides of the House, and it is quite natural for the Canadian government to be interested in urban affairs, even though this interest is unfortunately often misunderstood and badly misconceived by certain provincial authorities and I was disappointed to see that the hon. member, who is the urban affairs critic for the official opposition, has failed to understand the importance of the Ministry of Urban Affairs to serve the best interests of all Canadian citizens. We must realize that the majority of Canadian citizens now live in urban centres. This situation involves many problems and it is obvious that the Canadian government cannot ignore the welfare of the increasing number of urban residents who need government help.

There is a second reason that justifies the existence of the Ministry of Urban Affairs within the Canadian government: In addition to the natural interest of the Canadian government in the welfare of all Canadians, most federal government projects, policies, programs and activities influence the lives of urban Canadians and the quality of the cities where they live. For instance, our immigration, transportation and economic expansion policies as well as the activities of the Department of Public Works certainly have considerable influence on the urban environment. We must therefore play a coordinating role to ensure that the activities of the Canadian government, through its many departments and agencies, does not hinder the establishment, the growth and the natural and orderly development of major Canadian cities.

Of course, the Canadian government owns numerous properties in all major cities such as harbours, airports, office buildings, national parks, post offices, warehouses, penitentiaries, customs and excise buildings. All such buildings are found, if not in the core, on the outskirts of cities and have a considerable impact on the general development of large cities.

The government insists that all those urban properties serve the people and comply with the major policies and master plans advocated by the municipal authorities themselves. There was, therefore, a need for a ministry to coordinate federal activities in the cities, and such is the role played by the Department of Urban Affairs. It is a complementary rather than a priority role and it is subordinate to the master plans advocated first and foremost by the municipalities and the provinces.

We certainly do not intend to interfere in jurisdictional issues and try to take away from the municipalities and the provinces their crucial function. However, it is important to be fully aware, particularly in this House, of the fact that the Canadian government has a complementary role to play. Often that complementary role contributes to a better master plan and allows a municipality to undertake urban planning studies that it could not have done alone. But with subsidies from the Ministry of Urban Affairs, those cities and municipalities undertake these studies and thus enable their citizens to enjoy a better urban environment.

I think that regardless of the remarks made by the hon. member, regardless of the questions asked recently concerning the administrative reform carried out within the Ministry of Urban Affairs, I can state categorically that it was never intended to make basic changes in the ministry's function. We intend rather to make a more rational and orderly use of our departmental staff so that it can provide a more efficient service to municipalities.

It has also been said that this government's record in the housing field has been more or less impressive. Yet, the figures prove the contrary. After consulting the municipalities, the provinces and those responsible in the housing field, large builders associations like UDAC for instance, have determined that we needed about one million new housing units within the next four years. Now that building program of one million new housing units in Canada is already under way. In order to reach that target, we have set up an assisted home ownership program through which we give a fairly large subsidy to individuals, particularly young couples, who wish to buy their first home.

We have made every possible effort to urge contractors to build not only medium-cost homes in order to meet the needs of the more fortunate who do not really need government assistance to become homeowners, but also low-cost homes to make home ownership easier for thousands of young Canadian families who wish to own their own homes. Now I can say—the figures speak volumes and are irrefutable—that we are reaching our target of one million new housing units based on a four-year period. We will reach that target and at last enable Canadians to realize that very legitimate dream for every citizen to live in his own house if he so wishes.

One cannot help but note that over the years the housing sector has made tremendous progress in Canada. The so-called housing problem of the late 60s is no longer that serious today. Nobody can talk seriously of any housing problem in this country. There is no such problem.

For some citizens of course it is harder to get low cost housing, and I must say in that respect that the Canadian government has asked for close provincial cooperation in an overall review of the economic housing situation in Canada. This in my view should be our main goal, more housing units for low income people and senior citizens. If there is an area that may possibly be somewhat critical that would be it.

But all in all, I have no hesitation in stating that Canadian housing is indeed better than in any other nation. We have in Canada the best built, the most highly subsidized housing in the best environment in the world. It is a fact that the Canadian government, through a series of programs, helps Canadians pay cheaper rents or assists them in owning a home at reduced interest rates, thanks to very significant subsidies. I challenge opposition members to find anywhere in the world a more advantageous series of housing subsidy programs.

Certainly there has been in recent years a significant drop in the crowding index. The number of units with more than one person per room dropped some 20 per cent to 5 per cent only over the last 15 years. While 43 per cent of building units occupied in Canada had no running water, hot or cold, in the early 50's, the proportion has now dropped to an approximate 3 per cent. Figures are similar for units without water closets, they dropped from some 35 per cent in the early 50s to 3 per cent only. As far as bathrooms and showers are concerned, the figures were 43 per cent in the early 50's and 5 per cent at this point. All data concerning basic conveniences conform to that general trend, which confirms in my view that Canadian housing is among the best in the world. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) says this is due to private enterprise. My suggestion is this is due to private enterprise, the initiative of Canadians and the help and support of the Canadian government.

The fundamental role of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is indeed to guarantee loans to builders and private enterprise, so they can build the type of units that put Canadian housing among the best in the world. I state emphatically that the hon. member is in error, probably unwittingly, when she implies that the Canadian government housing policy has failed to meet the stated objectives and does not fill the peoples' needs. I am certain the hon. member is in error because she is new here, and probably she did not have time enough to review all the programs aimed at meeting the housing needs of our Canadian citizens.

Perhaps it would be useful if I sent her again this information kit published by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which describes a series of programs set up by the Canadian government to answer the needs of Canadians in the field of housing. This information kit features the Assisted Home Ownership Program and the Low Rental Housing Assistance Program which has enabled us to get more apartments built by private enterprise in the great urban communities of Canada in order to raise a vancancy rate which was too low and so as to provide people who want to get housing with the possibility of a greater choice in the type of apartment they want to rent.

Let me mention programs that work quite well namely the Non-Profit Housing Assistance Program and the Cooperative Housing Assistance Program which are another aspect of the various activities of the Canadian government which aim not only at helping and supporting private enterprise in the crucial role it can play regarding housing construction, but also enable people with middle or low income to get together in a housing cooperative or a non-profit corporation precisely to benefit from grants from the Canadian government there inhabiting housing which cost much less than similar housing which can be found on the conventional market.

We have tried through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to put forward a series of programs dealing with the development and the improvement of urban and municipal environments. We have noticed that one of the greatest difficulties presently encountered by municipalities has to do with their financing, the result of which being that provincial governments are subsidizing them to a certain extent but also that all the funds they are getting are always associated with particular conditions in such a way that Canadian municipalities do not truly enjoy the freedom of action they should have. So, the Canadian government in an important effort to help and support municipal priorities has decided to create the Municipal Incentive Grants Program for the municipalities, the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the Land Assembly Assistance Program as well as the Municipal Infrastructure Program which are precisely designed to help municipalities to better serve the needs of their citizens, especially the Municipal Incentive Grants program which provides a grant given directly to a municipality which does not have to be accountable for the use it decides to make of these funds except before its own citizens so that this annual injection of several thousand dollars in municipal finances is a way through which the Canadian government acknowledges the legitimate and fundamental role played by municipal governments in Canadian society. There is, of course, the provincial level of government which plays a priority role which we acknowledge but no one should be under the impression that if there are administrative difficulties with certain programs one must necessarily entail that they should be handed down by the federal government to the provincial level.

I say that the idea that there is an absolute need to decentralize from the federal to the provincial level is wrong. In several cases it would be much better to decentralize from the provincial to the municipal level. We agree that we would be better able to carry out a certain number of our responsibilities at the federal level and that they would be carried out better, in the better interest of the people, at an another level of government than the federal level, but not necessarily the provincial level. If it is true that the grassroots people would be better served by the government which is closest to them, what does this mean? It means the municipal level. Through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation programs we have fully recognized this important role that municipalities have to play vis-à-vis the people and we want through those programs to give them large grants to enable them to take their full responsibilities at the municipal level. I think that this uttering of accusations that the government of Canada is getting into provincial jurisdictions will have to stop because that is not where the problem is.

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that provincial authorities are too jealous of their responsibilities. Every time Ottawa does something they start crying that Ottawa should not be doing it. So I am very disappointed at the attitude of the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative Party, and to see that they are opposed to the government of Canada trying to help municipalities fully assume their responsibilities in the area of the development of master plans for municipalities and urban development. I think there is an absolute need to give the municipalities more financial resources and immediate responsibilities so they will be able to assume a role they can fully play and much better than the provinces themselves.

Mr. Paproski: We want you to do some work. Never mind being a campaign manager for Quebec. Do what you are paid to do.

Mrs. Pigott: No wonder you are in Mr. Lévesque's black books.

Mr. Paproski: Because of you the Parti Québécois won the last election. We know what happened on November 15.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I think hon. members of the Progressive Conservative Party do not like to hear the truth but I think they have been caught in their own trap by trying to criticize the Canadian government, simply repeating the same nonsense we have been hearing for years from some provincial politicians who are fundamentally overly jealous of their responsibilities. Mr. Speaker, I want to say once again that the Canadian government does not make it its ambition to take up responsibilities not given to it by our constitution. The Canadian government, through the Ministry of Urban Affairs or through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, only wants to help those who have a direct responsibility in this field, namely the municipal authorities, to play their part and to provide Canadians with better services by co-operating with municipal and provincial governments. This is our part and we want to play it.

As a conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I can only come back to the criticisms passed on by the Progressive Conservative Party with regard to the Canadian Home Insulation Program; they tried to make us believe that there had been no consultation with the provinces. The facts, Mr. Speaker, are that before my hon. colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) asked the Canadian government to establish this program, a meeting was held where all his provincial counterparts asked for the establishment of such a program.

The provincial ministers themselves wanted the implementation of a national energy conservation program and specially a home insulation program. Now what has the federal government done about it? The government said: Here is a program ready to be implemented. We would give up to $350 to any Canadian who would want to insulate his house according to a seven-year plan. The provinces, on the other hand, must do something tangible as well to show that they are serious in this collective effort toward energy conservation. The provinces were asked to take concrete steps, or what has been called conditions to allow the residents of the provinces to be eligible for this program.

The conditions that the provinces were asked to implement are not impossible to realize, they are simple and natural conditions; first, to implement reduced speeds on highways; second, to install in new constructions what is called "block meters" which replace central systems in apartment buildings and gives each apartment its own individual system, as a means to save energy and reduce excessive heating cost; third, the provinces were asked to accept new building standards which would enable people to build not for the past but for the future so that the new residences be better insulated. Many people are forced today to spend money to improve residences which initially were badly built and badly insulated, a mistake which we should not make again.

The provinces were asked to raise insulation standards as part of home construction standards. What they were asked was not out of this world. But now the opposition seems to object to the provinces being asked to do their share in energy conservation. This is what is happening. The Canadian government gives $350 to anyone who wants to insulate his house, and now that the provinces realize it is a good program they would like to use these $350 to improve the program and let people believe that our program was not that good and should be improved. Of course, Mr. Speaker, in any program there is always room for improvement.

But to the hon. member and the provinces which have criticized our program I say that if they want to improve it they should use their own money; they should not try to take the money the government of Canada wants to give out to citizens, leading people to believe that they are going to offer that program themselves.

I think the Canadian Home Insulation Program is exceptional and that it meets the present needs when it comes to energy conservation. I am pleased to see that all Canadian provinces, after a lot of shuffling, finally understood that their people wanted it and that this program will now be available in all parts of the country and not only in a few provinces.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Mr. Paproski: Do you know what consultation means, André?

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Out of respect for the minister I let him finish his speech without interrupting him, but on five occasions I could have called a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Whiteway: The point of order is that five times—and the record will show me to be correct—he used the word "consultation". Specifically, he said "consultation with the provinces and municipalities".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This is not a point of order; it is a difference of opinion. The hon. member will have an opportunity to seek the floor and make his point.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope the hon. member has a real point of order.

Mr. Whiteway: My point of order is not on a difference of opinion but on a difference of fact. My point of order is that the minister was misleading the House. I will quote him to prove that he deliberately misled the House in reading this document in front of me, the report of the western premiers' task force.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be the one responsible for the point of order if he uses the language he has used right now. I think he can make his point when he speaks in the debate. He has a difference of opinion with the minister. I do not think this point of dispute is a point of order. If he wants to, he can make a charge and then he will have to suffer the consequences of that charge.

Is the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine rising on a point of order?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would allow me a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House, as the allotted time has expired. Does the House give its unanimous consent for the hon. member to ask a question?

[English]

Mr. Paproski: No.

Mr. Ouellet: Paproski said no.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, we in the NDP welcome the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) and we wish her well in her new position as the Conservative party critic on housing. One might have hoped that in her first speech she would not only have thrown creampuffs but would have added a few brickbats. Probably in the next speech she will do so.

The motion condemns the government in three areas, that of housing, that of urban transportation and that of energy conservation. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is in charge of housing, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is in charge of transportation, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is in charge of energy conservation. I say without any hesitation that the policies and attitudes of these three ministers are cruel, crass and cocky. Those are the three adjectives that best describe them.

The housing policies of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs are the result of bowing and begging and giving land speculators, developers, builders and financial institutions almost complete control over the number and types of housing, the interest rates, the land costs and the financing of housing in Canada, with the result that 80 per cent of Canadians cannot afford housing today. This situation is imposing hardship on young married couples and elderly people who wish to obtain reasonable housing accommodation. Mr. Speaker, this really amounts to criminal cruelty. I read the speech the Minister of State for Urban Affairs delivered in Toronto on November 2 before the Property Forum and this is what he said as the commitment of the government:

We, as a government, have a commitment to the people of Canada. We have undertaken to ensure that all Canadians—wherever they may live—have access to good housing, at an affordable cost, and in a safe and satisfying community environment.

That commitment, or statement, really amounts to fraudulent advertising.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: When we take into account the three components of housing, which are land costs, building costs and interest rates, what is the picture of this government and, specifically, the job this particular minister has done and is responsible for? Let me quote from a study of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which contains 2,000 pages with regard to housing conditions in Canada. These are some of the highlights of the housing picture today in Canada. I am quoting from the Montreal Star of March 29, 1977, which is commenting on the report.

About 7 per cent of city households have serious problems, says a Central Mortgage and Housing Corp. study . . .

The corporation yesterday released a summary of a bulky 23-volume, 2,000-page report on housing conditions in the country's 23 metropolitan areas in 1974.

It goes on to say:

But 40 per cent of households face at least one of the major housing problems of overcrowding, poor housing conditions and housing cost, the report said. Of these, 7 per cent or 225,000 households are burdened with at least two of these problems and are in serious difficulty.

Housing

The CMHC report concludes that "renters appeared to be worse off than home owners—they constituted about three-quarters of the 225,000 households with serious difficulties."

The survey report says the largest single housing problem is cost.

About 547,000 households are paying more than 25 per cent of total household income in rental or mortgage payments.

About 298,000 households are overcrowded and 198,000 are living in substandard housing.

Then the CMHC report draws this biased view and says by almost any measure Canadians in the urban part of the country are well housed. It just indicates, from the attitude of the minister—and he displayed it this afternoon—that Canadians should be mighty thankful to the Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: When he criticized the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton for her remarks concerning housing conditions, he said that in her particular riding she should be very proud because of the actions of the two previous Liberal members. The only inference to be drawn from that is that unless you are a Liberal member you do not get any money for housing or anything. Mr. Speaker, this just indicates the crassness and cockiness of this particular minister.

I would like to point out to the minister just what housing costs in Canada. These figures are from the Globe and Mail of November 19, 1977, showing the cost of a three-bedroom bungalow with one garage. These are the costs across the country: Cornerbrook, Newfoundland, $55,000 this year compared to $54,000 in 1976. In a province with roughly 25 per cent unemployment, can you imagine a worker paying $55,000 in Corner Brook, Newfoundland? In Montreal, in one area, $47,500; another area, $43,000; and yet another area, $39,000. In Toronto, in the Thornhill area, $83,000 this year compared to $76,000 last year; Scarborough, $67,400 compared to $65,000 last year; Richmond Hill, $65,000 compared to $60,000 last year; Ottawa, $62,400 compared to $60,300 last year; Calgary, $78,000, compared to $72,000 last year; Vancouver, in one area, $94,000 compared to $93,000.

These are examples of what it costs for houses across the nation, knowledge of which the minister should have. I say to the minister, "How can young people afford to pay those prices—

An hon. Member: They have other types of houses they can buy.

Mr. Gilbert: —so they can establish themselves?" I can appreciate that the truth really hurts this particular minister.

An hon. Member: That is why they lost the November 15 election.

Mr. Gilbert: All these homes have an average mortgage of $50,000 to $60,000 and an interest rate from 10 per cent to 12 per cent. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, just what the payments are for the particular house they purchase.

The second component is land costs. For an NHA single, detached lot in 1977 the cost is $9,918. The Malvern Project—all the Toronto members are very familiar with because it was supposed to be utopia concerning housing in Ontario—in 1972 the book value, which is the cost of assembling, servicing and holding the land, was $6,100 per lot. In 1976 the book value was $11,760. More important, the market value is $26,000.

An hon. Member: For a lot?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, for a lot in the Malvern area. In Edmonton, in the Mill Woods development, which is land owned by the government of Alberta, lots sell for between $10,000 and $15,000. In the same city, lots owned by private individuals sell for between $20,000 and $30,000.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Gilbert: With regard to land assembly programs in Ontario, where they assembled land for the purpose of reducing the cost of land, they have now scrapped that program and are selling the land. In Kitchener they sold some lots with a $3 million profit on a $5 million investment—which is a 60 per cent profit. On that basis, if they sell the 23,000 acres which they possess, they will make $540 million.

An hon. Member: Which company?

Mr. Gilbert: This is the Ontario government. I am drawing it to the attention of the Conservative party, because one of the main costs is land. Is it any wonder that we have high cost of housing, when governments put profits before people? With regard to vacancy rates, the latest report indicated there is a 2.3 per cent vacancy rate across the country, which is a shift from the 1.6 per cent vacancy rate in October. The experts indicate the vacancy rate, to have any impact, should be at least between 3 per cent and 5 per cent, and we are a far distance from that. In fact 18 of the 24 countries included in the survey are under the 2.3 per cent. It just indicates the importance of that.

My time is running very short, but I want to cover three areas. With regard to the transportation policies of the government, may I say that the Minister of Transport is cruel, crass and cocky. His policies have been disappointing and deceiving.

In Toronto on June 17, 1974, the Minister of Transport made the statement that $270 million would go for transportation. Shortly after the Liberals were elected as the government, what did they do? They scrapped that $270 million program on the basis that they had to show government restraint. The Toronto members screamed because of the serious problems of grade separation, commuter traffic, and rail relocation, but it fell on deaf ears.

What does the Minister of Transport do now with regard to housing? He announced a new urban transportation assistance program. It merges the moneys for the programs of railway relocation and crossing programs and commuter service programs. There is no new money. All he is doing is merging the moneys of those two programs and calling it an urban transportation assistance program. There is a need across the country for a transportation policy which will take care of the grade separations, rail relocations and commuter traffic. However, we have no direction or financial assistance from the government.

The Ontario minister of transportation, Mr. Snow, said that the recent program is nothing but stunting and does too much for too little. In Ontario alone, $72 million is needed to take care of grade separations. The minister has offered $49.5 million over three years to take care of grade separations, rail assistance, urban transportation and relocation. Is it any wonder that I say his policies are cruel, crass and cocky? If there was ever a time for job creation in the field of transportation it is now, and the government has failed.

The home insulation program refers to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. With a great deal of fanfare, the government announced it would spend $1.4 billion over seven years, which amounts to $200 million a year. We can appreciate the special case of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island because of their high energy costs to produce electricity. Therefore the $500 non-taxable grant is justified. However, all of us on this side believe the other eight provinces should not be restricted to two-thirds of the cost of the insulation with a limit of $350 which is taxable.

When you look at the $1,400 million over seven years, which is $200 million a year, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said last night if it were not taxable they would lose $560 million, subtracting that from the $1,400 million, it amounts to $120 million a year in energy saving across the country for insulation.

Looking at Bill C-11, the government has given $1.2 billion in tax savings and incentives to corporations and high income individuals, and is only prepared to give $120 million to people who indulge in energy conservation. All I can say is that the government is not serious about energy conservation. Ministers are not serious about insulation and the insulation program. If they were, they would be putting a tight check on the manufacturers of home insulation materials and insulation installers other than a mere government monitoring department.

The government should have included within the insulating materials such things as storm windows, storm doors, and double glazing, which would help many people with regard to this problem. It should have consulted with the provinces with regard to the increased assessments and increased taxes people have had as a result of participating in the home insulation program. Is it any wonder that we in this party condemn the government and these three ministers in particular for their policies on housing, conservation, and transportation? It is really a cruel, crass and cocky approach that these three ministers have taken.

I notice I have a few minutes left. I am going to take advantage of them. If we are serious about housing we will set forth programs to produce reasonable housing for all Canadians. That can be done by government initiatives with regard to public housing, co-operative housing and non-profit housing in the social housing fields. Instead of paying more than 25 per cent, the target should be 20 per cent at the very most.

When I think of how young people are struggling today with housing, it does not make me feel very happy. When I think of the interest rates and the high amounts that people are paying, and the total over-all payments with regard to their $40,000, $50,000 or $60,000 mortgages, I feel we have a social responsibility to have interest rates of no more than 6 per cent. That is with regard to housing.

With regard to transportation, surely that should be the easiest job creating function of the government. It should be putting in millions of dollars to update the railway system across the country to develop a commuter system and to develop the relocation of railways. Then we would have an up-to-date policy. We would be saving energy and we would be leading the way.

With regard to the home insulation program, the so-called CHIP program, it really is a chippy program. Three thousand grants have been made under it, to date. Is it any wonder people say the government is not indulging in principles of equality and equity but is doing otherwise?

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, opposition days may seem like wasted at times to the public. However, if our procedure provides for such opposition days, it is to allow parliamentarians to scrutinize a particular subject, and the procedure calls for this to be done by a motion censuring the government—it is a tradition that exists in all British-type parliaments and since our parliament adopted that procedure, it is normal that we should proceed in this fashion but in a rational and objective manner. Generally the motions are debated on those opposition days, but those motions deal with very specific issues, and they are generally serious motions.

I heard this week on another allotted day a member on the government side complain that the opposition often raises economic matters, unemployment. Mr. Speaker, members cannot be blamed for raising those issues very frequently, since it is a current problem—inflation is eroding the savings of those who worked hard all their lives, inflation is getting young people into debt for the rest of their lives, and those issues must be dealt with in order to find a solution, to change the methods used, as the speech from the throne suggested. Unemployment is the same thing, there are causes for it. One of the consequences of inflation is that in the area of construction under consideration today, in the area of housing, young people are concerned all across Canada and particularly in Quebec, in Montreal.

After the Olympic follies last year, the situation is much worse there than in the rest of Canada. Unemployment increased dramatically because construction declined both in my riding and elsewhere, and skilled workers are unemployed. Plumbers are out of work, electricians as well, young people can no longer borrow to build a home because they fear for the future. It costs four times the cost of a house to build a hopefully stable home.

It is not because the government does not have any housing policy, the CMHC has several excellent programs, but in order to implement them, non-profit organizations, individuals and municipal corporations must absolutely have the money required to take advantage of those housing programs, of those environmental public utility programs designed to make access to ownership easier and allow people to become homeowners without having to commit themselves for 40, 50 or 60 years. That is the flaw in our present system. Mr. Speaker, I will just give this one example not to criticize or for the sake of criticizing, indeed not, but because if we are to consider this issue, we should do it carefully.

What is happening in the area of housing? First of all, I wish to say this: Housing is a need for everybody and every family and it is also a right just as important as clothing and food. Therefore, if it is such an important right, I believe it is quite proper to take appropriate means to make sure every individual and every family of this country enjoy this right. As I said earlier, the Canadian government, the provinces and municipalities have taken all means available to them to enable Canadians to emphasize this right. But as the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) said in his remarks, municipalities have not got enough revenues to be able to take fully their responsibilities, to provide services that go along with housing such as water and sewage systems, highways and so on. He was right to say that municipalities cannot afford it and that there should be a provincial decentralization in their favour. I fully agree with that.

Not so long ago, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, with its policy on housing, dealt with the Quebec Housing Corporation—I speak of the province of Quebec—and the latter dealt with municipalities for the building of nursing homes or low cost housing. Today the situation has changed. Why? Simply because municipalities did not have enough money to meet the obligations which were imposed upon them by the provincial government. Therefore, Quebec municipalities have given up their responsibilities, and today the Quebec Housing Corporation is responsible for the implementation of programs concerning nursing homes or low cost housing for middle or low income families.

What is happening, Mr. Speaker? I will give you an example which is taking place throughout Quebec, and not only in one specific case, but I believe it is the same throughout Canada. In order to build a nursing home three years ago the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation contributed up to 90 per cent through a loan of $537,863 at an interest rate of 10⅜ per cent—if at least it had been simple interest but it was compound interest. The Quebec government has undertaken to reimburse the federal government the amount of $2,880,862—five times the amount of the loan granted. Why? Because of the interest over a period of 50 years. Interest is therefore too high.

Many projects have been shelved; plans and specifications are ready, the population is waiting for the construction of those homes to start, but nothing is done because it costs too much. People who are to live in those homes have to pay increasing rents, and even though old age pensions are raised every three months through the Department of National Health and Welfare, people are forced every six months to pay rent hikes to allow the Quebec government to collect the money needed to reimburse the loan granted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We cannot go on like that any longer. We must absolutely change our financing system if we really want to revitalize the housing industry. In the past, and I think it is still true, it was said that if construction was going well, so was the whole economy. Today, many builders operate on a slow-down basis, bidding on smaller contracts, mainly maintenance contracts, but actually there are no new developments.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention and my colleagues' to another excellent program, RRAP. In my riding, there is an RRAP project that has been going on for two years and the program is doing well when there is money but gets stalled whenever there is no more money, and it has been going rather slowly for the better part of the year because there were not enough funds for all the applications that were received, to carry out all the rehabilitation projects in that community. Some people may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a long-term program, a five-year program. True enough, but I am satisfied that the program is now being implemented, but because there is not enough money, many municipalities in the province of Quebec and in my own riding have filed applications with the Quebec government because they wanted to become designated areas where RRAP programs would apply. Those municipalities are still waiting for an answer and as long as the provincial government will not respond to their application, the RRAP program will not operate.

However, as it has been said, this is the best program. Why is it the best, Mr. Speaker? Because, under that program, any owner of a dilapidated house or housing unit could benefit from a very special advantage. Let us say you have to borrow $10,000 to repair your home, to rehabilitate it, under RRAP the federal government will allow a grant of $3,750. This amounts to granting a loan at a rate of interest anyone could afford. This is called a grant, a rebate, or whatever you want, as long as the owner is taking advantage of it. But as things are going, there will not be many grants of $3,750 because few projects are allowed and few muncipalities can take advantage of the program. So, that generous program is not being raised, people do not take advantage of it, and those programs which are expensive, people go for them when they have to, but then they must pay five times more.

Mr. Speaker I have five sons. My children have learned to work, or at least, I have tried to show them that work is a tool for success in life, and they want to have a home, like the sons of all other Canadians, but they find that it is very expensive to build a frame on a good foundation if you must borrow money at the present high interest rates.

We cannot impress too much on the government the fact that this is the source of the problem and that we do not have to look elsewhere for it. If we could solve this, we could make some progress, and even though interest rates would sometimes be excessive, there would be new housing starts and new homes would be built. The plumbers who are now on unemployment insurance would find work and so would the workmen, the carpenters, the electricians and the roofers. That is the secret, Mr. Speaker. The construction sector is among those who provide the most jobs in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the reply given this week by the right hon. Prime Minister to a question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), who wanted to know if the government was planning to introduce amendments to the Bank of Canada Act to enable the government to provide loans at lower interest rates. The Prime Minister is aware of the problem and is an intelligent man, but he evaded the question by replying: "If the hon. leader of the Social Credit party can convince many Canadians to make interest-free loans to the government, we, in turn, will provide interest-free loans." But this was not the essence of the question. The Prime Minister knew this. In my opinion, there are other alternatives. If the Prime Minister was really serious in his reply, Mr. Speaker, there are 8,600 million banknotes now circulating in Canada and the money supply represents more than $80 billion. The issue of banknotes is the responsibility of the Bank of Canada. Again, there are 8,600 million banknotes and a money supply of $80 billion. Who created this difference?

This is where the Prime Minister should have talked about the issue of the nation's credit which is today between the hands of private institutions that are getting richer than any other economic sector in Canada because they have the privilege to issue the credit of the nation at their advantage. I encourage all hon. members to review that issue further. One might say that financial issues are quite difficult. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult because we make it difficult to the benefit of those who take advantage of such a system and the Prime Minister knows it as he himself declared recently that bankers are the most demanding in Canada and he said himself that under his administration they became richer than anyone in Canada and that he was ashamed of that situation.

Mr. Speaker, we should make some effort, we the members of this House, to help the Prime Minister go further and ask him to bring back before the House Bill C-206 that I already tabled.

This bill would amend the Bank of Canada Act so that our bank could issue the credit of the nation in the same way as chartered banks but it would grant loans to provinces and, through them, to municipalities at administration cost. If we did that, Mr. Speaker, there would be a recovery in the building sector, the RRAP program would be operating and unemployment decreasing. We could applaud this government not only for its good programs but also because it would allow us to implement them without further delay.

[English]

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, today I do not intend to make any reference to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) since I have no time for a minister who has no time for his job. The minister had known for several days that today was going to be an opposition day, that we were going to deal with housing, transportation and energy, matters falling within his area of responsibility. Yet today he left the House early. Why, Mr. Speaker? To go to Quebec City for a political function. I realize that he is the lieutenant for the Liberal party—

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I hope unintentionally, is misleading the House. The notice of motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) was tabled in the House some time after three o'clock yesterday afternoon. Unless the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) had some sort of intuitive knowledge of the intentions of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, I fail to see how he should have known of the nature of this particular motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway).

● (1532)

Mr. Whiteway: I certainly do not want to mislead the House. If the minister did not know for several days, I stand corrected. He has known for an adequate length of time, however, and surely his first responsibility is to this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: If the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) does not know what ministerial responsibility is I will give him a lecture on that, but I assume he knows it.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I find the comment of the hon. member quite distasteful. I must remind the House that the minister was in committee yesterday when the hon. member was present, and he was in committee again this morning when the hon. member was present. The hon. member knows very well that at five o'clock yesterday afternoon when we learned about today's motion, the minister had planned a trip outside the city and had to cancel it in order to accommodate the hon. member this morning in committee, and this afternoon in the House. Let us be fair.

An hon. Member: Where is he now?

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite will have to get their act together. One knew at three o'clock, the other did not know until five o'clock—I cannot help with the problems on that side. The fact is, the minister is not in the House. He is a Quebec lieutenant for the Liberal party, but judging by his performance in the provincial election a year ago he ought to be a buck private. For his performance as Minister of State for Urban Affairs he should receive a dishonourable discharge. From the way he spoke today, however, you would think he was a general.

I should like to deal specifically with two areas, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to deal with Liberal lies, but that is unparliamentary language so I shall call them Liberal "misleadings." I shall quote from certain documents on that score. Secondly, I shall deal with the question of federal-provincial relations and how the minister deliberately misled the House today. He had a document in front of him which I saw—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that the words "deliberately misleading" are not parliamentary. We hope he will not use unparliamentary language.

Mr. Whiteway: Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw that. I do not want to be unparliamentary, but I shall prove that what he said was not in accordance with the facts, and let members attach their own definition or colloquial expression to it.

The minister gave us some of these facts this afternoon. Given that 75 per cent of Canadians live in urban centres and that 12 years from now the figure will be 90 per cent, given that most of these people will be concentrated in four major urban centres in Canada, given that 50 per cent of our energy consumption takes place because of intra-city transportation—given those background facts, I should like now to recall June 17, 1974. Hon. members opposite will recognize the occasion immediately. It was in Vancouver during the election campaign when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claimed the Liberal government "will pay"—note the word "will"—he did not use the word "may" or "should"—he said the Liberal government "will pay 100 per cent of the cost of new commuter vehicles." Has that been fulfilled?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Whiteway: He also said the Liberal government "will pay 25 per cent of the capital cost of all vehicles purchased." Has that been fulfilled?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Whiteway: He went on to say that financial support "will be made available to encourage Canadian design and engineering." Has that been fulfilled?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Whiteway: He then said that the Liberal government "will offer assistance" and that Canadian industry would be encouraged to develop "off the shelf" standardized systems and equipment. Has that been fulfilled?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Whiteway: Next he promised that the Liberal government "will encourage" urban transit systems. He said that the Liberal government is "committed"—mark that word, Mr. Speaker—is "committed." Now this is what they were committed to—"committed to removing the 12 per cent sales tax". If that was a commitment I would hate to see a promise. Then he went on to say that the Liberal government "will offer" the best use of existing railway rights of way and that the Liberal government "will rapidly implement" the railway relocation act.

Those were Liberal promises—commitments—the clear, unadulterated policy that the Prime Minister promised the Canadian people in Vancouver on June 17, 1974. What has happened since? The $270 million promised for this program has been withdrawn. A former minister of finance, no longer a member of this House, withdrew those funds and reneged on the promise. We have nothing, and we do not see the prospect of any action.

There is a matter of more grievous concern, Mr. Speaker, and that is in the area of housing. I should like to quote something for the record and give hon. members opposite five seconds to guess the source. If the Minister of State for Urban Affairs were here he might help hon. members opposite, but he has left them to hold the fort so they will have to fend for themselves. I would ask hon. members to listen to the following statement:

> When 280,000 families in Canada pay more than 50 per cent of their family income for housing and 500,000 families in Canada pay more than 35 per cent, and 820,000 families pay more than 25 per cent, and when two-thirds of those Canadians in need of housing cannot afford to buy or rent a home without a government subsidy, we have a problem of fundamental proportions. We must take decisive action now or face unparalleled problems later.

The five seconds are up and hon. members opposite have not guessed that statement was made by the deputy minister of urban affairs, William Teron, chairman of CMHC, only one year and two months ago in the city of Calgary. I was there and I heard him. He talks about taking "decisive action now or face unparalleled problems" in the future. Since then the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has been going about his political activities in the province of Quebec—and not too successfully. He has been alienating the municipalities and provinces.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) interjects with some figures pertaining to our representation in this House from certain parts of Canada. If he is as bold and confident as he appears from his seat, why does he not call an election now? Then we will see who comes back with the corporal's guard.

The Prime Minister is also in Quebec politicking for the next election, whenever it comes. There is a critical problem in Canada which is being intensified by the attitude the minister expressed in the House today. We have a conflict between the provinces, the municipalities which are the creatures of the provinces, and the federal government. We have to determine who has the constitutional right to act in the various areas relating to housing and urban affairs. Some provinces take block funding, unconditional grants, non-designated equalization payments, and then there is the federal government taking the federalist attitude.

Today in committee I quoted from the Financial Post, but the minister objected that it was not an accurate recollection of what he said. I have the paper here and should like to quote from the Financial Post of October 8 where the minister is reported as saying "I am not prepared to see federal funds used in Quebec without making the population aware that it's thanks to their Canadian government."

The attitude of the minister is clearly that he wants to get credit for federal moneys spent in the provinces. The minister wants his name up in lights for everyone to see his wondrous works. I am not a shorthand writer, but I believe this afternoon the hon. minister indicated that the intervention of federal government into urban affairs is natural, that his department helps to co-ordinate activities, and that their role is complementary. He went on to explain that this complementary role makes for a better general plan. Approximately five times the minister used the word "consultation", and that nothing was done without consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Andres: That is right.

Mr. Whiteway: I will prove to the hon. member how wrong that is. I should like to tell him not to get excited. I realize the little fish bite even before the hook is baited.

Particularly in Quebec there is a new developing hostility between the provincial government and the federal minister. Let it not be said, or thought even for a fleeting moment, that members on this side of the House take the position of the Parti Québécois on any issue. Members on this side are clear federalists. The minister violates the constitutional authority of all provinces and the Parliament of Canada.

The situation in Quebec has developed to the point where a document called the black book or the black file is being compiled. It contains all the instances where the Minister of State for Urban Affairs has lied. That is not my language. It is the language of Mr. Jean Foisey, who is the special adviser to the minister of municipal affairs in Quebec City. This black book will be made public. I hope the minister will refer it to an appropriate committee of the House in order for us to see if there is any substance to the allegation that the minister has somehow wrongfully misled the province of Quebec.

The fight among the provinces, the municipalities, and the federal government is not restricted to Quebec. I should like to refer to a report entitled "Report of the Western Premiers Task Force on Constitutional Trends". The minister had that document with him today in the House. Referring to page 31 of that report, I read as follows:

> As a rule, consultation by the federal government has never preceded major changes in legislation or regulations. Consultations at the officials' level are usually in the vague context of "policy research." In the broad areas of housing and urban affairs, consultation has been virtually nonexistent.

How can the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) defend the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who told this House that nothing took place among the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government without full consultation with the provinces? Clearly that is not so; clearly it is wrong.

Mr. Andres: You are misguided.

Mr. Whiteway: It is the Canadian people who are being misguided because of the government in general, and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in particular. Has the hon. member not heard what I have said this afternoon? Does he want to stand in his place now? I will yield the floor to him to defend the promises made on June 17, 1974. I say to the hon. member: defend them if you can, defend them if you will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: In fact I see there are three ministers present in the Chamber this afternoon. I will yield the floor to them if they want to defend the Liberal promises of June 17, 1974.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: The performance of the hon. member this morning reinforces the fact that Manitoba is still ahead in some respects. I see none of the members opposite have risen to defend those promises. In fact I should like to have one Liberal rise to defend the statement that there has been always full consultation with the provinces. That is not so. I will provide hon. members opposite with a copy of this report. They can attempt to defend that, if they wish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiteway: It is easy for members opposite to speak from their seats. I want them to stand and put their comments on the record for everyone to read.

Several of my colleagues want to speak today, therefore I will end my remarks. Before doing so, I should like to summarize for the benefit of hon. members opposite. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs, while singing his own praises, attempted to give the notion that matters among the federal government, municipalities and the provinces are in complete harmony, and that it was to the benefit of Canadians to have the federal government doing the job which has to be done, rather than not at all. Should the rights of provinces under the constitution be ignored? It is blatantly wrong and misleading to indicate that there is harmony among the provinces.

In so far as energy is concerned, the minister has attempted to tell us what has been done. In my opinion, what has been done is a dismal failure. The least the minister can do is resign his seat.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

● (1552)

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) brought out a very good point when she said at the commencement of her remarks that housing is the dream of every Canadian. I agree totally with the hon. member that a family, whether it is a young family or a middle aged family, puts priority on the purchase of a house in order to raise a family. I would say also that as a result of government policy, whether it be the former Conservative party or the present Liberal government, we have now made that dream a reality for the majority of Canadians who wish to own a house.

If I may reminisce for a minute, I recall growing up in Saskatchewan in the early 1930's and 1940's. In that period of time it was the exception rather than the rule for a family to own a house because, before purchasing a house, you pretty well had to have the full amount in your pocket. At that time banks did not give loans for that purpose, nor did financial institutions. You had to save for a period of perhaps 20 or 30 years, at which time you were in your late forties or fifties, before you had a sufficient amount of money with which to buy a house. That was the way the system went. Now when I look around in my riding I see people who are 19, 20 and 21 years of age getting married and purchasing homes under AHOP.

Some hon. members may say that in Toronto, Vancouver and some other larger cities this is pretty difficult because the price of houses in those large centres, especially single family dwellings, is very high. I am pleased to inform hon. members that in my own area of Comox-Alberni on Vancouver Island, in cities such as Nanaimo, Port Alberni, Courtenay, Campbell River or Port Hardy, we are able to build single family dwellings at around $38,000. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), who is not here at present, was quoting prices of houses in Vancouver. I have no doubt that in Vancouver the average price of a three bedroom home is $60,000 or $70,000.

I must say that I myself am opposed to the concept of people in Canada congregating in three or four large centres. If you look at Vancouver, you find that the city cannot expand any more. Fraser Valley is under a land freeze and there is no more room available for the city of Vancouver to expand. I say that is sad. It is not for the province or for the federal government, nor is it anyone's wish, to stop expansion. The city is surrounded by mountains on one side and the ocean on the other, and inevitably the cost of housing is high. Perhaps the solution to that problem is not to encourage industry, business and government to locate in Vancouver. What we should be talking about perhaps is having government, industry, etc., locate in other parts of the province where land is available and cheap and where houses can be built, and not have everyone congregate in large cities such as Vancouver and Toronto.

Instead of criticizing governments for allowing the price of housing to rise in these large cities, what we, along with provincial and municipal governments, should be doing is to make plans for the future to decentralize away from large centres such as the greater Toronto area.

I think there should be some rationalization in housing. We cannot keep making plans for Toronto which will bring in more people and drive up the price of land when there are places in northern Ontario which would welcome the establishment of more industries. People there would be able to live in uncluttered communities, close to nature, and they could hunt and fish. I am sure there would be less crime in such areas and less stress upon the people who live there. Also, this would help the taxpayer in the smaller communities.

It is obvious to me that there must be some rationalization in cities such as Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto. I say that with all due deference to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway). I did not realize that he was so knowledgeable about urban transportation, coming as he does from a largely rural area. I think that governments would serve the public better if, instead of starting massive projects in Toronto and Vancouver, they would seriously consider whether that is in the best interest of those areas, or whether it would not be in the interest of the provinces to build better homes in the more isolated areas so that people would stay there instead of converging on the large centres.

Let me give you an example on Vancouver Island. We do not yet have a highway connecting communities such as Port Hardy with the rest of the island, and in most cases people do not have television either, yet we have the largest copper mine in British Columbia. We also have several large pulp mills. We are trying to keep people there but we are not providing them with transportation or communication. Then we say that we should be spending many more millions of dollars in the larger areas. I submit to you that one of the answers may be to improve some of the rural areas. If we spent more money on transportation and communications in the more remote areas, perhaps we would not have such a problem in the larger cities and the core areas.

I would like to make a few remarks now regarding energy conservation, but first let me give you as an example the case of my daughter who was married a few years ago at the age of 23, and she and her husband purchased a home. When I was 32 or 33 I thought myself fortunate to be able to purchase a house. The young age at which my daughter could purchase a house made very apparent to me how fortunate we are in Canada. Obviously you want to have a house when you are raising a family—you do not need a house when you are 40, 50 or 60 years old. AHOP has done a great deal for Canadians.

I recall the time when I went to Europe for the first time in 1974 to attend the Law of the Sea Conference which was held in Geneva. I was surprised to find that in Geneva banks do not lend money for mortgages. If you wish to purchase a home, you must pay for it in cash. I asked about the price of houses and was surprised to learn that a house which would normally cost $30,000 or $40,000 in my area, in Switzerland costs approximately $160,000 in Swiss francs. A person buying a house in Switzerland is supposed to pay for it in cash because Swiss banks do not make loans on mortgages. People in Switzerland, as well as in Germany and many other European countries, do not approach home ownership the way we do. They do not expect to own a house. It is only in exceptional cases that people own a house. We in Canada consider it our right.

With AHOP and the government's policy to construct a million new homes over a five year period we have taken a step in the right direction to assist younger people especially to purchase housing they can afford. If they require assistance, we provide it in the form of a subsidy. This has also been true with regard to single parents. Before AHOP there was no chance for a single parent to purchase a single family dwelling. Now they can do it under AHOP. I am not taking credit for it. I think that the ministers, the government and the various people who have worked on this program for many years deserve the credit. This is progress. If you had listened today to some of the comments you might have believed most Canadians were living in caves, rubbing stones together to make fire. I assure you this is far from the case.

Regarding energy conservation which is mentioned in this motion, I think that over a period of years Canadians have been used to an abundance of cheap energy which has allowed all of us the luxury of wasteful ways. I believe sincerely that it will be a wrenching experience for most Canadians to adopt less wasteful ways because of the disruption and confusion that the increased cost of gasoline for their cars and fuel oil for their furnaces will cause. I believe also that as a result, government, industry and various institutions in our country will be severely criticized because people have to pay a very high price for a commodity which previously was cheap. We have been very wasteful.

May I quote an article which is apropos, and although it applies to the United States I think in many ways it can also be put in context in Canada. This is from the New York Times and the quotation is from an editorial:

> Our political leaders have the formidable, almost impossible task of convincing over 200 million Americans, living in the midst of an apparent abundance of energy, that the catastrophes of energy exhaustion are lurking just around the corner . . . In a democracy, the government cannot dictate energy policies. The American electorate has the ultimate power to choose either to accept on faith that the energy crisis is real (if it does not want to verify personally the technical details on which the predictions are based) or to ignore the warnings, thereby hastening the exhaustion of energy resources and its inevitable catastrophic consequences. If the public cannot be convinced of the seriousness of the energy crisis, the necessary actions (energy conservation and development of new energy sources) cannot be taken. If we wait for the tangible evidence of energy crisis, it will be too late.
> Indeed, perhaps future historians will point to the failure of our nation to respond to the warnings of an energy crisis as an example of the obsolescence of the democratic form of government in a modern world with limited resources.

In my opinion that summarizes what we as Canadians are facing. It is important to treat this as seriously as possible and to convince, not only members from this House because I believe most members of this House are aware of the crisis we are facing, but to get this message across to the people of Canada. And also to get the message across that it is not necessarily a question of good guys and bad guys that have caused this situation, but perhaps the depletion of a renewable resource and our cartel which has quadrupled the price of world oil over the last three or four years. Maybe it is a good thing that a cartel of this sort did come in, because it has made us realize that we cannot continue the wasteful practices which in the past we have been justly accused of practising. I do not think we should be proud of the fact that if we wanted to go to the store for a package of cigarettes, there was no thought—we would just take the car and run down. If you have forgotten something, you just run down to the store again.

Many times we can be accused of wastefulness. What do we do about it now? One of the ways a government can react to a situation like that is to discuss the issues with the people of Canada, but I suggest that without an increase in gas prices very little heed would be paid. I am not sure if this is the total answer in conservation, education, plus a demonstrable increase of bills both for fuel for homes, and fuel for cars. We talk about energy and the federal government's responsibility, but the provinces have a fairly large stake in the energy field because it comes under their constitutional responsibility. For example, hydro, if we are actually serious about conservation, why would hydro throughout the various provinces, say British Columbia, not give a lower rate for those people who consumed less hydro energy rather than giving a lower rate to the individual in his home the more he uses?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Anderson: Is that really the way of telling the people of Canada that we have an energy shortage, a crisis? Governments are aware of it. That is fantastic. I can see industrial companies that spend thousands and thousands of dollars on energy perhaps they should be given some break because of the quantity of energy they are using. But I am talking about the homeowner. What incentive has been given to him to turn his lights off? To conserve on his electricity bill, when most companies say the more you use the better the rates. Why not the other way around? It is not only the responsibility of the federal government, I think it is the responsibility of all levels of government, and especially the people of Canada who must realize the importance of curtailing our energy uses otherwise the situation as far as employment is concerned will worsen, and certainly our balance of payments will not improve and thus affecting our standard of living.

It is a wrenching experience, and I know many people resist the prices of fuel oil and gasoline. They express the opinion it is not Arab oil, but oil from Alberta. Why do we have to equal the world price?

There is another side to it that whatever energy we obtain from programs such as Syncrude, the Mackenzie Delta, the Beaufort Sea, from the High Arctic, or if we bring natural gas from the maritimes, this is not going to be any cheaper than the world price of oil now. I understand the predictions are we are at the cheapest level that we will have in our history. Prices will continue to rise. The Arctic gas oil is our next source of energy. The Alberta fields will gradually diminish, and we will be going into programs such as those mentioned before, but it is not going to be inexpensive. To develop it it will be expensive. To transport it to southern Canada it will be expensive, and the people driving eight cylinder cars now, when they have no conception of energy, are going to be paying a much higher price in the future. I believe it is our job to make Canadians aware that with the non-renewable resources we are dealing with, we would be foolish to count upon foreign sources of oil and not develop our own.

In order to develop them, we have to pay a price and more money must be funnelled into the oil companies. I completely agree they must be regulated to make sure those extra profits do go into Canadian exploration. If it does not, tax it back. We will take it and use it some other way such as the insulation program. It is important that the concept of good guys and bad guys regarding this crisis be removed. Look at the problem and try to solve it to the best of our ability without playing games, whether it be federal, provincial or between political parties.

We have, through a variety of incentives in the research and development field, sources we can tap which we are not using now. I have been a strong proponent, as many members know, of the development of methanol to blend with gasoline. This progam has been tried out in Germany using a fleet of one hundred cars over a period of a year and it has proved satisfactory. In fact from a pollution point of view it is extremely satisfactory. With all of the wood and wood products we have in Canada, we have a renewable resource that can be blended with gasoline with approximately 85 per cent gasoline to 15 per cent methanol that can be put into the tanks of cars of every Canadian. It will burn better and could be put into effect today. That would result in a 15 per cent saving immediately, and that 15 per cent would extend our resources over a longer period of time.

In the maritimes where they have the horrible problem with the spruce budworm and the forests that have been deciminated, that could be converted into methanol. To convert methanol, the kind of wood you use does not matter. It does not matter whether it has worms in it or is diseased. It can be converted and burned in the tanks of cars in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in the debate on the motion presented by our housing critic. I see the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) is leaving. I want to commend him on some of his statements. He said that the government or the powers that be should not spend too much money on urban transportation and should try to keep the cities small. As a representative of a rural area, I cannot agree more. I go further and say they should blow up some of the roads and not let the people in and out of the cities. That might help the economy in some of the rural areas, certainly industry and housing.

The hon. member made a very good point when he stated that if industry gets into the rural areas, jobs and housing will follow. I wholeheartedly agree with that statement, but it is easier said than done.

As a member of the DREE committee, I have worked to try to attract industries to rural areas and then help them to succeed. To our sorrow, a good many industries have gone into these remote areas but, to put it mildly, they are having pretty tough sledding.

I have listened to speeches made on both sides of the House. Some members on this side took exception to certain statements by the minister and members opposite. Members on that side have taken great exception to the fact that we have even raised our voice in one word of criticism about the wonderful Ministry of Housing and Urban Affairs. I am aware that the department has accomplished certain things. It certainly should have.

I had the privilege of attending the housing committee meeting last night and early this morning. I was able to get some figures from the minister. A great deal was said about the AHOP program. So far, a total of 39,000 homes has been built under the program. That is all well and good for those who have their homes, but it is a far cry for those who feel they should qualify under that program.

The minister also gave figures with regard to defaults as far as AHOP is concerned. He stated the figure is about 2.2 per cent. That seems within reason.

Something I am interested in seeing enlarged is the RRAP program. I questioned the minister about this program because many people do not qualify for regular housing under CMHC, AHOP and so on. They do not have the income required to be able to qualify. Therefore the RRAP program is their only hope for better housing. This is one case where the government should go the third or fourth mile, or even further.

These programs are of particular interest to areas outside the cities. I admit there is bad housing in some cities, but there is much more need for this plan in the rural areas. I plead with the minister and his department to channel more money there and to do away with a lot of the red tape.

I have received telephone inquiries from my constituents who were turned down under the RRAP program. I admit you have to be in a position to repay the amount that is borrowed. I am also aware grants are available under that plan. Earlier this week I was told of persons who had made application under the RRAP program. I mentioned this to the minister. I want to put this on record because he and his deputy minister, Mr. Teron, stated it was not correct.

Certain people applied for loans under RRAP. They had certain ideas about what they intended to spend. For example, they may have intended to spend $5,000 to upgrade the worst features of their homes or to make other renovations. When the inspector visited their homes, these people were told there were other things that had to be done and it was an all or nothing deal. I feel that is wrong. I intend to get back to that branch office in North Bay, in the area of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), to get a ruling and to tell them that I have heard differently from the powers that be. The RRAP program is doing a job in the rural areas in this country.

There is a requirement for homes that can be put up in a hurry on land that does not cost a great deal. I listened earlier to current lot prices. I do not dispute those figures. Lots costing $20,000, $25,000 or $30,000 are absolutely prohibitive.

The Canadian Mobile Home Association has been making presentations to the government to try to get some assistance. I brought this to the attention of the minister in committee this morning. He gave me the impression that something would be done. A great many people could purchase a mobile home which could be set up in a mobile home park without having to pay a very high land cost. There could be a rental for the land which would be within their means.

You can go from one extreme to the other. Mobile homes are suitable for the young and the old. For many retired senior citizens, their homes are now too big. They would find a mobile home much more economical. In addition, their homes could be put on the market and available to those with growing families. This is one phase of housing which would suit lower income people.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) referred to the prophetic statement made a year or so ago in Calgary by Mr. Teron. He stated that only a very small percentage of people can look forward to owning a home. That is a tragedy in a country like Canada. This is a reasonably well housed country. Most of us are very lucky to have good homes. However, that is small consolation to a great many people still looking for adequate housing.

Something else has been very much to the fore this week. I refer to the government's insulation program. I am delighted to learn that the two provinces which had not joined the insulation program have finally been brought into the fold by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), who recanted and allowed them in without any strings attached. In other words, he did not use the rubber hose on them that he used on the other six provinces. I commend the government on having removed that obstacle.

I hope the government has learned its lesson. When the matter of provincial jurisdiction is again involved, I hope the government will not try to use strong tactics to get its way. The key word with the provinces is co-operation, and consultation instead of arbitrary decision.

The federal government certainly has a role to play in the area of housing. To a very large extent the federal government determines the environment, or the conditions of the housing market, because the housing market is so dependent on the current economic situation. It is the federal government which has a major part in creating the economic conditions—perhaps in the present circumstances I should say in the destruction of the economic conditions prerequisite to a healthy housing market.

The government has abused its role. Instead of creating an environment of co-operation between the federal department and the provinces, it has played blackmail games. Surely the government must be aware, as everyone else in Canada is, that we have entered a period in which the powers and jurisdictions of the provinces vis-à-vis the federal authority are subject to severe strain. The relationship is a tenuous one at best.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is fond of analogies. He once told the Americans our relationship with them was like being in bed with an elephant. I wonder how he would describe our relationship with the provinces. More important, I wonder how some of the provinces would describe their relationship with the federal government. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that it is not the cosiest of relationships at all times.

It is probable that the government does not like to hear this. Members on the cabinet benches like to think they are experts in federal-provincial relations. It is a fact, though, that there is tension in this country with respect to areas of jurisdiction. I am not saying that all the complaints are justified. There is one province whose government wishes to opt out completely from the federal framework. I would not support that and neither, I am sure, would the majority of Canadians. The fact remains, though, that provinces are resorting to extremes because the government has been too rigid and uncompromising.

Housing is an area in which more real consultation and co-operation are necessary and desirable. There are, of course, areas in which the federal government could and should take the initiative. I have mortgages in mind. The cost of mortgages is far too high in Canada. In the United States the cost is considerably less—below 9 per cent—and for longer periods, up to 50 years I believe. Also, in most states mortgage interest payments and expenditures on home improvement are tax deductible as are municipal taxes.

Our housing committee has suggested a number of alternatives to present policy and these items are worthy of close consideration by the department and by the government as a whole—I am aware that the approval of other departments would be required. Under RRAP, federal funds are available to assist in improving substandard dwelling, but except by special agreement with the provinces assistance is available only to those living in a NIP district. In some localities boundaries are often so close that one house might be eligible for assistance while another on the next street is not.

To be a successful applicant, one must live in an approved neighbourhood. This presents no difficulty in certain areas, but I am in a position of representing federally two provincial ridings, the territorial district of Parry Sound and the regional municipality of Muskoka. In Muskoka, an area must be approved as a NIP area before a RRAP grant can be made. A great many people have written to me complaining that such and such a municipality had not felt it worth while to obtain approval as a NIP area. In the district of Parry Sound, which is part of Northern Ontario, this condition does not apply. I am not sure what arrangements exist in other provinces, but with regard to rural areas and small towns and villages especially, it would seem to me the government could say, "If a municipality does not wish to act on its own we shall lend the money on an individual basis." To my mind this would be a step in the right direction and this would lead to better and more housing.

I am aware that time is going by, Mr. Speaker, and that there are others who wish to take part in the debate. While the department of housing and urbain affairs has accomplished certain things we feel it still has a long way to go. Consider the insulation program in the light of the $350 grant now available to regions outside Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. A great many of us were disappointed. I am not denying the statements made by the minister and by other members of the government that Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island face certain very high costs. But this is also the case in other parts of Canada where, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is darned cold. Try telling people in Northern Ontario and Northern Manitoba anything to the contrary. Yes, Prince Edward Island does have to bear high costs, but I am sure those who live in the Northwest Territories, for example, or some of the other areas I have mentioned, would be willing to compare their heating costs with those in Nova Scotia.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) categorically turned down a suggestion made by me, in the course of a question put to him, that the $350 grant be made tax-free. It does not seem likely, now, that the government will ever agree to that proposal.

There is one other matter. The $350 is supposed to cover up to two thirds of the cost of the material. Well, two thirds of a loaf is better than none, but we must bear in mind that because of the high cost of insulation and service the average cost per home runs at about $900 on the basis that 1,000 square feet have to be insulated. Possibly the government could say "Although we cannot agree to making the grant tax deductible we will at least cover the cost of the total amount of insulation."

The minister gave us an interesting figure in committee yesterday. I believe the average grant already paid out amounts to $211, not $350. I assume some of the people who occupy very modest homes are the ones who need as much money as possible. Could the grant not be paid regardless of the percentage of the total expenditure which it represents? I do not think this would cost the treasury a great deal. The response to the program has not been as good as the government anticipated, and I am sure those in charge of the program would admit that. I have figures here which show that as of November 25 some 60,000 kits have been distributed; slightly more than 5,000 applications have been received for grants, and 2,270 cheques have been mailed out to a total value of $508,619. It has not been a great bonanza with, as the government thought, people lining up for it.

Speaking of people lining up brings another thought to mind. As most of us are aware, anyone who is interested in an insultation loan must write or telephone Montreal and get a kit. We are also aware that Her Majesty's mail does not always move as fast as some of us would hope, but I will give the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Department of Urban Affairs credit for forwarding to each member of parliament 25 or 30 of these kits. I think that is a very good idea. I drive back to my riding on Friday afternoons and this is a much speedier way of getting these kits into the hands of my constituents. I would suggest that CMHC regional offices be assigned the task of information centre, where people—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my hon. friend is unable to conclude his very interesting remarks this afternoon. From my own point of view, owing to the shortage of time I intend to try to limit my remarks in order to give my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and another hon. member opposite the opportunity to participate in what has turned out to be a very interesting and worth-while debate.

I should like to deal very briefly, though I may not even be able to do it briefly, with four particular points this afternoon. The first is federal housing policies in general under this government; secondly, housing policies as they affect and have affected my home province of Saskatchewan; thirdly, urban transportation policies under this government; and fourthly, the programs and the steps taken by the government, particularly by the Department of Transport, relative to implementing the Hall Commission Report in so far as it relates to energy conservation in serving transportation needs in the prairie provinces.

I believe it was the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway) who, earlier in the debate this afternoon, was critical of the government for its lack of consultation and discussion with the provinces. I can certainly say that there has been ample discussion and consultation with federal, provincial and municipal officials in the province of Saskatchewan. I am not sure if the hon. member is aware of what has transpired with respect to Manitoba, but each and every one of the wide variety of federal programs is implemented and operated jointly.

I have the information sheets of a number of programs here. For example, with the Neighbourhood Improvement Program criteria are set out for the participation of municipalities and neighbourhoods. This is set out in an agreement between the federal government and each of the provincial governments. There has certainly been discussion. There has been a good deal of tailoring and developing of programs in Saskatchewan over the last eight to nine years in order to meet the needs of smaller urban communities which so often were left out of the early CMHC and federal programs. I can testify to this personally, Mr. Speaker, from my days in the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan.

I am aware that more federal programs are now available which hitherto had perhaps been available only to larger urban centres. These are now being tailored and being made available to meet the needs of smaller centres throughout the prairies and across Canada. So that kind of consultation has been taking place.

I appreciated the tone and thrust of the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) when opening the debate after moving her motion. Her remarks were not nearly as crusty and as critical, in a sense, as the tone of the motion which is before us, which asks the House to condemn the Liberal government, particularly the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), for policies which fail to meet, and so on. The kinds of programs, the numbers of projects and the tremendous developments in the housing field, not only in my province of Saskatchewan but right across the country in the last several years, put the lie to the thrust of the motion now before the House.

In typical fashion, to which we have grown quite accustomed in the House when listening to remarks of hon. members opposite, we do not find any new solutions, policies or programs put forward. There is criticism of existing programs and efforts, but in general no new solutions have come forward. There is no new formula or direction for the government to pursue.

The programs which have been of particular value so far as the province of Saskatchewan has been concerned are those which have already been referred to by others in this debate, such as the RRAP program, the AHOP program, and the Neighbourhood Improvement Program. Then we have housing for senior citizens. I think we have a national record in the province of Saskatchewan in terms of the number of senior citizens per hundred thousand of population who have been housed. Only last week I participated in the opening of a new apartment complex which provides excellent housing at subsidized rental for senior citizens over the age of 65. Some 70 couples or so were accommodated in that project, and this is but one of a dozen or more which have been constructed in the last number of months in my province alone.

One program I should like to dwell on for a moment or two is the rural and native housing program. This is a program which has been of particular interest to the province of Saskatchewan. It is one which has met a need but which has some considerable distance to go in the province of Saskatchewan so far as housing is concerned. What we need in my constituency and further north, as well as in urban centres, is an adequate supply of good housing for our native people.

Several programs have been worked out in co-operation with CMHC and the government of Saskatchewan in an attempt to improve both the number and the quality of housing units on Indian reserves throughout Saskatchewan—in the northern Saskatchewan communities which are Metis and Indian, and also in cities like Regina and Saskatoon where providing adequate housing for native people continues to be a problem.

In this respect the province has seen completion of over 1,700 such units which have been financed under this program. There have been 500 odd projects to repair existing housing, and another 1,000 emergency type repairs made to existing housing units in my province, all designed to meet a specific need. So, good efforts have been made by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, his colleagues, and CMHC.

The same can be said of the government of Saskatchewan. Jointly the province has participated in the program, though there is still a great distance to go in meeting the housing needs of native people in the province, particularly in the northern reaches of Saskatchewan. So far as urban centres are concerned, we find more and more people off reserves heading to the cities, leaving behind them perhaps better housing than they will be able to find in those cities.

I should like to make another comment of a general nature in response to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). Like him, I receive many complaints about housing and the high rates of interest with the resultant large payments required on even a modest dwelling. Other problems are the cost to the smaller urban municipalities of providing serviced lots—paving, water, and sewers are particular problems for some of the smaller communities. The Municipal Incentive Grants Program, devised and developed by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, has been helpful, but I am sure it could go further. As with any of these programs the problem is in finding the money to put them in place rapidly enough.

Comments were made this afternoon and in yesterday's debate about the insulation program. If every house in the country were eligible for assistance I am sure we would be faced with a shortage of supplies and of workmen. In Saskatchewan we are already having difficulty finding the supplies to meet the demand, and if these were further grants or programs of this kind, industry would not be able to meet the demand.

I should like to conclude by referring to the efforts of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to implement the recommendations of the Hall Royal Commission on Transportation. That commission was established two years ago to look into the problems of the 5,000 or 6,000 miles of rail lines on the prairies. It reported in May, and since then steps have been taken to implement the major recommendations. One major step of which we see evidence all across the prairies is the federal government's contribution of $100 million for rail line rehabilitation. Branch lines which were allowed to deteriorate over the years are being rebuilt.

In Saskatchewan we see newspaper headlines such as the one in the Wilkie Press which says, "$880,000 Program for Upgrading CPR Lines in the Wilkie Area." Another one appeared in the Lloydminster Times which serves both Alberta and Saskatchewan, "$1.62 Million Project to Upgrade Rail Lines Going East and West Out of Lloydminster." There are tremendous developments in the rehabilitation of rail lines and there are many other steps which will serve to review the question of good, efficient rail service in western Canada, and which are designed to make the best use of energy in terms of how far it is advisable to truck grain, how far to move it by rail, and so on.

We are moving quickly to implement the Hall Commission Report. This is only one example of vast and immediate action by the government to meet the needs of the country.

I want to urge the government, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, the Minister of Transport and others who are involved in departments and programs which directly affect the subject under debate, to continue developing positive programs to increase and improve the supply of good housing. We are about top of the list in the world. Let us keep it that way, and continue to meet the needs of Canadians who are still looking for better housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I speak so often on the late show that I see I have been left seven minutes.

First of all I want to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott), for bringing in such a timely and worth-while motion condemning the government for failure to meet the critical need for housing. This is a topic that everybody knows is a serious one.

I should like to put two quotations on the record, Mr. Speaker, the first from the Poverty Task Force, Division of Mission in Canada, The United Church of Canada. In their conclusions appears the following:

> There can be no doubt that housing remains a cause of anxiety, discomfort, and social tension in Canada.

They go on to say:

> A housing policy should be based firmly on widespread good will between jurisdictions, in which all jurisdictions accept, without apology, the ongoing necessity for government policies, initiatives, participation and supervision directed at the expansion of social housing.

The report concludes with the following statement:

> The jurisdictional fences must be broken down. We call on all levels of government to put the low income public at the centre of the housing concern, and to create properly budgeted, long-range social housing programs across Canada.

We seem to have forgotten that poverty exists in Canada. Ten years ago 5 million of our population were living at the poverty level, as pointed out in the Fifth Annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada. There has been a white paper on income security, a working paper on social security, a Senate committee on poverty, and a three-year federal-provincial social security review since then, yet 5 million people are still living in poverty.

I think the minister was quoting a speech made by Mr. R. V. Hession, the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, made to the Conference Board on September 22 when he spoke about the number of people who had no toilets, wash basins, plumbing or insulation, and gave the figure of 5 per cent. We are concerned about those people because they cannot afford anything. We have good programs such as AHOP, NIP and RRAP, but they are not reaching the people who need them most. The government does not seem to realize that the NIP program is designated in the provinces, and often those very municipalities that need it cannot afford it.

The town of Stephenville in Newfoundland was given a $400,000 grant as well as the loans from the province, and was finally designated as the third municipality in Newfoundland to be a NIP area so that people in the NIP area who have low incomes could also take advantage of the RRAP program. I have a letter from the council of the town of Stephenville saying that it is not in a position to take on the additional burden of a $400,000 loan and has no intention of placing the town in the position where the federal or provincial government would have to bail them out of debt. That is pride for you, Mr. Speaker, but they cannot serve the people they are supposed to serve. Recently they lost an industry with 2,100 jobs. In the rural municipalities, often poverty is a social stigma.

The former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has agreed with me and has answered my questions on a number of occasions during adjournment debates. As I have said many times before, the RRAP program is a fantastic program. But the areas have to be designated by the provinces, and there is not enough money to help those people. When one asks for more money, the government indicates that there are financial restraints. Yet the government turns around and provides $1.4 billion for a home insulation program. That program reaches a lot of people, but people in the low income class cannot afford to pay $500 in order to receive the advantage of the $350 grant. These people are not worried about whether that amount is taxable or not, because they do not care about income taxes. They do not pay taxes, because they are not earning enough.

The government has come out with a fancy yellow folder which reminds me of the old comic books. It is titled "Fix-up Your Home With Federal Government Money". When one opens the folder, one is confronted with the colours yellow, orange, red, and many fancy pictures. The folder indicates that people can do anything and receive $3,750 for nothing. Is that a wonderful program? Even people with incomes of $11,000 can receive a $750 grant. Why did we need the home insulation program? Poverty stricken people are spread right across Canada. They cannot afford to insulate. This RRAP program will do what is required: you can fix up your walls, roof, storm windows, screens, stairs, steps, porch, verandah, plumbing, electrical wiring, heating system, floor joists, foundation, and basement. Also the program allows you to put in insulation when it is necessary.

With regard to people on low incomes, I should like to refer to the attitude of various ministers in the government in their attempt to help. When the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) was the minister of state for urban affairs, through his good graces and the good graces of the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), the government gave Newfoundland $40,000 to perform a survey. Obviously the government recognized that the veterans of Newfoundland needed their homes repaired, and they could not do it because of their low incomes. There should be a survey done right across Canada of all veterans' homes, requiring repairs including the homes of the widows of veterans. There should be a program for those people to fix their homes. It should not cost anybody anything, because it should be done under the RRAP program. Instead, the government hesitates and gives stupid excuses for it not being done. These people continue to beg and borrow, and all they receive from the Minister of Veterans Affairs is an indication that the program is under consideration. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is so famous for the word consideration that it should go down with him in history.

I should like to deal with the Neighbourhood Improvement Program. Members on this side will agree that it is a reasonable program. It helps municipalities that cannot otherwise afford to select neighbourhoods and select plans to be implemented in those neighbourhoods. Under this program the minicipalities can acquire land, provide recreational facilities, and water and sewage systems. This is what the country needs. The country will never advance unless the lower income people are protected and provided with jobs in order to earn a livelihood and be good Canadians. They want to be good Canadians, but they are becoming hostile because of the attitude of the government.

As I indicated yesterday, and as the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) indicated, it is obvious that the bureaucrats must have gathered around a table to discover how they could create new jobs and senior positions for people in the Department of Urban Affairs. They concocted a program which splits up the country rather than uniting it. They discriminated against various sectors of the country by providing different favours or advantages under this program. Some provinces will receive non-taxable grants, while other provinces will receive taxable grants. It has been indicated that it costs more for fuel in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. No one objects to those provinces having the benefit of the program. No one objects to anyone having any advantage in Canada. But why discriminate against the province which is isolated and needs help the most?

Over the years most people in Newfoundland have built their own homes. A fisherman builds his own home because he does not trust the banks. It takes approximately six or seven years for him to build his home. If he makes $1,000 in one year, he builds his basement. If he makes $2,000 the next year, then he puts the walls up. He continues along like that, because it is the only security he wants. He wants the security of a home and a piece of land. Those are the people we have to protect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), the proceedings on the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) have expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HAMILTON—REQUEST FOR APPROVAL OF EXPANSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of unwarranted, inexcusable and unacceptable delay on the part of the Minister of Transport in selecting Hamilton Municipal Airport for expansion to a regional airport, for which there is no defence, an announcement regarding expansion having been made by the government some time in the early part of 1972, and because such indecision not only frustrates the citizens of Hamilton and district, but, as well, is unduly restricting the growth of the regional municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth in terms of business opportunity, employment, growth and revenue, all of which is known, or ought to be known, by the Minister of Transport, I seek to move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Transport approve forthwith the site of the existing Hamilton Municipal Airport for expansion to a regional airport and that he make a definitive statement in that regard in this House prior to December 25, 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SUGGESTED STIMULATION OF FARM ECONOMY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The gravity of the slide in farm incomes—down about one quarter from 1975—has been brought home once again by the recent layoffs of 500 workers by Massey-Ferguson in Brantford.

To remove some of the uncertainty facing farmers and the industries that depend on them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House urge the government to announce immediate steps to stimulate the farm economy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED PROTEST TO FRANCE OVER CRUELTY OF PÂTÉ DE FOIE GRAS INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the government of France in a most insincere and hypocritical manner has banned the importation of harp seal furs into France because of the alleged cruelty of the seal hunt, and since the government of France continues to ignore the fact that in the production of pâté de foie gras the Frenchmen treat with great cruelty the French goose—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —which is force fed and otherwise handled in an outrageous manner to satisfy the palates of the Frenchmen and the jaded appetites of the wealthy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the Government of Canada send a diplomatic note to the Government of France drawing to the attention of that government the cruelty practised by the pâté de foie gras industry of France and the abhorrence this practice arouses in all civilized countries and requesting the French government to outlaw this practice, and further, that this House directs the government to make the necessary orders in council to forbid the importation of pâté de foie gras into Canada immediately as requested by the Save the French Goose Society.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Before such a motion can be presented, unanimous consent is required under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXPRESSION OF REGRET TO SOUTH AFRICA AT MANNER OF DEALING WITH DEATH OF MR. BIKO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House, having taken note of the mysterious circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Biko, a respected black leader of the South African people, and the extraordinary findings by a court that no one was responsible for his tragic death, instruct the government to express to the authorities of South Africa its regret, both at the tragic event itself and at the manner in which it has been dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the proposed motion. Is there consent for it to be presented?

SUGGESTED PROGRAM TO TRAIN EMPLOYEES FOR NUCLEAR POWER STATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that the builders of the nuclear power project at Douglas Point have found it necessary to import skilled tradesmen from the British Isles to work on this project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That this House urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to refer this matter to the Manpower Retraining Division in his department and instruct it to set up a program whereby Canadians will be provided with the necessary training to fill these positions.

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF TARIFFS ON IMPORTATION OF NICKEL CARBONATE AND FLUORSPAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that layoffs in the nickel industry now number over 4,000 and that while this is happening we continue to import nickel carbonate for refineries in Fort Saskatchewan, and in view of the fact that Alcan is laying off workers in a fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, and then turning around and purchasing fluorspar from Noranda in Mexico, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

[Mr. Speaker.]

That this House instruct the government to impose a temporary 13 per cent import tariff on nickel carbonate and fluorspar similar to the 13 per cent temporary import tariff on refined nickel by Japan.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be presented for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INCOME TAX

ALLEGATION MR. LILLIE CAN OBTAIN CONFIDENTIAL TAX INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. On Saturday, the Toronto Globe and Mail carried a front page report which indicated that an unlicensed Toronto private investigator by the name of James David Lillie had stated that he was the individual who had made available to Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton the personal and confidential tax information from the files of individual Canadians. Further Mr. Lillie was reported to have said to the Globe and Mail that he would be able to get the same information about members of the federal cabinet and the Speaker of the House of Commons. May I ask the minister whether he has investigated the claims made by Mr. Lillie in the Globe and Mail, and in particular has the minister investigated the possibility that Mr. Lillie may have information from the confidential tax files of the Speaker of the House of Commons?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the RCMP have been investigating Mr. Lillie in connection with this affair right from the outset. To say much more about it at this time might hamper our investigation. I may say further, Mr. Speaker, that the investigation has determined that no access to computer records was involved in this case. The information was obtained from the Vancouver, Montreal and Ottawa district offices of the department by a man who phoned these offices, representing himself as an official of the department needing the information in the pursuit of some taxation matter. The caller—

Mr. Beatty: Amicus curiae.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Don't be naive. This was before the Pierre Berton show; keep that in mind. The caller had sufficient knowledge of the internal procedures to fool the employees whom he reached, and these employees innocently supplied him with the information from the paper records. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, that I immediately ordered changes in procedure to guard against a recurrence. Investigation is continuing into the possibility that an employee in our department was involved in a violation of the confidentiality provisions of the Income Tax Act. It must be appreciated that the department has 16,000 employees.

POSSIBILITY CONFIDENTIALITY OF MR. SPEAKER'S TAX INFORMATION HAS BEEN BREACHED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We now learn from the minister that he is in fact investigating that the RCMP has talked to Mr. Lillie. In view of the fact that just last Wednesday the Minister of National Revenue indicated in the House that the only cases that he was aware of where the confidential tax information of individuals had been passed on to unauthorized individuals were the four cases mentioned by Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton, may I ask the minister why it is necessary, with this two weeks of intensive investigation, for Canadians to learn who was responsible for this from the front pages of the Globe and Mail? Specifically, may I ask the minister whether he has conducted further investigations to see whether such individuals as the Speaker of the House of Commons and other persons have had their confidential tax information leaked to unauthorized individuals by his department?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I said last Friday, and as I have said many times before to the same hon. gentleman, I would rather the report had not appeared in the Globe and Mail because it would jeopardize the investigation which is taking place. When I explain it in that way I hope the hon. member will understand the meaning of it. In fact, I think anything we may say about this particular case may jeopardize what is now taking place. I have said this before and I will repeat it again and again.

POSSIBILITY OF UNAUTHORIZED PERSONS OBTAINING TAX INFORMATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the only thing the minister is concerned about having exposed is his own lack of knowledge about what is happening in his own department. When the House opened today the minister passed me a letter in reply to my questions about an interview on "As It Happens" with Mr. David Ingram of CEN-TA Tax Services of Vancouver. In the minister's letter he indicates that Mr. Ingram confirmed that for years he had been able to get tax information about his clients from the tax department without showing specific authorization. Is it the minister's position that because of the fact that Mr. Ingram was not obtaining this information for fraudulent purposes, in spite of the fact he could get the information without showing any authorization from the individual in question, it is impossible for a person posing as a chartered accountant but who is totally unauthorized and wants the information for improper purposes to get that information from his department?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to you that this question was placed to me on Friday. I told the hon. gentleman I would have an answer for him today. I have supplied him with a letter, and it is unfortunate that the hon. member either cannot read or does not understand the second paragraph in the letter. If I must, I will quote the letter in the House. Let me quote this part:

> Mr. Ingram's allegations, like your own, are general and his examples so hypothetical that it is quite evidently incumbent upon him to support his generalities with specifics.

I suggest that is what the hon. member should also do. I stated in addition:

> I will go over his interview point by point with that in mind.

I did that in the whole letter, and every point is defined in that letter I have given the hon. member. If he would take the time, and I know I gave it to him at two o'clock, to read the letter, he will find that the contents of that letter show that there is nothing behind the allegation.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGATION UNAUTHORIZED PERSONS HAVE ACCESS TO CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I see that the minister is a little up tight because of his incompetency and the incompetency of his department, so let me pose my question to the President of the Treasury Board who I know is interested in the good and well wishes of all his employees. I will quote from the particular Globe and Mail article, and I see the Prime Minister does not care as he is smiling.

Mr. Trudeau: I am smiling at you.

Mr. Alexander: The article states:

> Mr. Lillie and Mr. Meredith say they can get information from income tax returns, police records from the RCMP's computer in Ottawa, family allowance and unemployment insurance records, Canada Pension Plan files and change-of-address forms filed with the Post Office.

Having heard that, I wonder whether the minister is prepared to say now that this type of alleged statement coming from Lillie and Meredith would certainly necessitate an investigation under the Inquiries Act, and because of the ineffectiveness of the Postmaster General's inquiry, is the minister prepared to recommend that an inquiry under the Inquiries Act be implemented immediately in order to get to the bottom of this entire matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the investigation by the Post Office department and the Postmaster General, as he has indicated, is proceeding in a beneficial way. I think the facts are going to come out, and wherever we do have the specific information, as my colleague, the Postmaster General has said, and as it appears some hon. members have, we most certainly will investigate it to the full.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INVESTIGATE POSSIBILITY OF LEAK OF MR. SPEAKER'S TAX INFORMATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact the minister indicated eight or nine days ago he only knew of four persons involved, as disclosed to him by Messrs. Templeton and Berton, will the minister advise this House how his department missed the possibility that these gentlemen involved in questions regarding this information had the Speaker's income tax returns? Does that not show there is a certain amount of inefficiency regarding his investigation of this matter? How did they miss reference to the Speaker's tax information?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that I did know before the broadcast. Although I said on Friday I did not know before the broadcast, I did know. I knew it when the Prime Minister's office told me at 8.10 in the morning and that was about two hours before the broadcast. I did not know the day before as did some hon. members of the opposition. Having regard to the allegations, and I use that word "allegations", the hon. member is making, they have reference to four specific cases in mind and there are no others to my knowledge. If there are other cases, please be specific and tell me which ones they are. Since those four cases were brought to my attention on the day of the Pierre Berton and Charles Templeton show, the investigations have been ongoing. More harm has been done by the allegations made by hon. members opposite than anything else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF LEAKS OF TAX INFORMATION—LENGTH OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the hon. Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister advise this House as to how long the investigation has been going on? Did he know of Mr. Lillie and Mr. Meredith prior to the time the Globe and Mail exposed the story? If so, why was he not more honest to this House when he made his declarations in this regard?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that a good lawyer, such as the hon. member who is speaking to me, cannot deduce from what I have said the reason there was no public statement. We knew Mr. Lillie was involved, but we did not want to spell it out. That was for obvious reasons. It was because of the investigation.

Mr. Whiteway: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Selkirk often speaks from his seat, rather than rising. He should remain in his seat.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: From whom did you learn that line, Joe?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I do not believe I have to repeat what I said before. I will answer the question as to how long the investigation will take place. We will take all the time necessary to make a thorough investigation, so that you will receive all the details of it, if and when they come out. I hope those details will be revealed as soon as possible.

LAY-OFFS IN MINING INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of unemployment. In view of the fact that Falconbridge Nickel, INCO and Alcan have recently announced lay-offs which total 4,000 or more; and in view of the fact that authorities in the mining industry have predicted by next spring as many as 20,000 mine workers will have been laid off, can the minister confirm the accurary of those predictions? Can he tell the House what steps he intends to take to ensure that such drastic lay-offs do not occur?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for the edification of the hon. member who cannot read my title is Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: This kind of hyperbole does absolutely no good, and discourages any hope which people working for INCO or Falconbridge might have that their jobs will be secure or that they might find jobs in the future. In the month of July I indicated, before this kind of hyperbole was being used, that my department alone placed 1,400 miners in jobs. Thus, all is not the gloom and doom that is being spread by the hon. members of the New Democratic Party.

POSSIBILITY MINISTER WILL MEET WITH MINING EXECUTIVES TO DISCUSS LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that this minister and the government has never been on top of the employment situation in the mining industry of this country; and in view of the fact that Falconbridge Nickel Mines has announced already hundreds of lay-offs, and hundreds more are going to be made, can the minister tell the House if he intends to meet with the boards of directors of Falconbridge Nickel Mines and the other mining companies that are threatening lay-offs in order to discuss that situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, already I have met with the chief executive officers of INCO. I have also been in touch with the chief executive officer of Falconbridge. There may well be further meetings with respect to these companies and others. A number of mining companies have been to Sudbury trying to recruit miners for their operations across the country. They have not yet been successful in being able to recruit very many. This seems to support the contention of my colleague who has just answered questions on this particular point. I can assure the hon. member, if there are miners in the Sudbury area looking for employment with Eldorado or with some of the other significant mining corporations, that there are openings available.

FINANCE

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF TARIFF ON IMPORTED NICKEL CARBONATE AND FLUORSPAR

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the mining companies which have gone into Sudbury looking for employees have asked for three years of experience, and the lay-off date is two years, 161 days. Therefore, the minister's reply is full of baloney. I want to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that a certain amount of unemployment in this country is due to decisions by corporations to purchase minerals abroad which could be mined in Canada, such as the decision by Alcan to close down their fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence and the action of Sherritt Gordon in importing nickel carbonate for the Saskatchewan plant, can the minister tell the House if he is now considering placing a temporary tariff on the import of fluorspar or nickel carbonate, possibly in the neighbourhood of the 13 per cent Japanese tariff against imported nickel?

● (1427)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question a few weeks ago. We have examined that proposal and the product imported by the Aluminium Company of Canada Ltd. does not replace the one produced in Newfoundland. So one cannot be replaced by the other. I am no expert but that is what the experts told me in my department.

As to the other part of the question, I think that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has already given an answer in the House a few weeks ago.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT FOLLOWING SIGNING OF HIGHWAY AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On June 22, 1977 the minister announced the signature of an agreement with a minister of the Quebec government dealing mostly with forestry development and some road systems in Quebec involving $440 million. Could the minister tell the House if following that agreement there have been other new developments or whether only that agreement dealing mainly with road construction was signed?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, some steps were taken since the signature of the agreement. Some contracts were awarded by the provincial government responsible for carrying out the agreement as such for highways, access roads in forest areas and reforestation. In those three areas, agreements have been signed. Action is under way, jobs have been created and others will be created in the next few months.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBILITY POLITICAL EMBARRASSMENT RESULT OF ENFORCEMENT OF SAFETY REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the telex that was released to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, which was sent by the Director of the Aeronautical Licensing and Inspection Branch of MOT which alluded, among other things, to the possibility of political embarrassment as a result of the enforcement of air regulations. Has the minister had an opportunity to review the telex and to discuss the contents with the director, Mr. Bolduc, and, if so, can he provide an explanation to the House in connection with that matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have found that similar words have been used in other cases in connection with investigations into air carrier licensing and the like. At this point I understand that the words were meant to mean that very important civil liberties issues are involved for the carriers since licences might be suspended. I have indicated that I do not think the words used carry that message very effectively or very well and they will no doubt be revised accordingly.

Mr. Mazankowski: Having regard to the fact that this is now the second example of suggested political interference or undue political pressure—the other example being the report that was made by the two members of the minister's department in the investigation of air safety in northern Ontario—and having regard to the fact that the minister has indicated he wants to be as wide open as possible in regulatory problems, I am sure he has now had an opportunity to review the report of the two members of his department. If so, is he now in a position to table that report, and now that we have these two specific examples, can he outline to the House what action he intends to take in that regard?

Mr. Lang: I do not think the hon. member is really being fair in suggesting that the message from headquarters to the people in the field is an example of political interference because what it suggests simply is that in moving to remove the licenses from an air carrier there should be concern in the interests and the rights of the carriers and of the citizens who are served by that carrier and a broad view should be taken of the impact of that removal of service. That is an important point for officials to bear in mind when they are moving against citizens and depriving citizens of their rights.

On the other question, I have had a chance to look at the report. Parts of it contain what I think will have to remain confidential descriptions of specific people and carriers, and it would not be fair to them to have that made public. However, I am looking at what can be published. I can say that I have had a chance to compare the report with the story in the Globe and Mail, and I will confirm for hon. members that the Globe and Mail story contains a pretty useful summary of the analysis and conclusion. I will also indicate that the investigation which was made by my officials was very far-reaching and without any limitations or restrictions upon it. That is a pretty good basis upon which to act, and we have already begun to take action in relation to it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Is the minister now saying that he does not intend to follow through with a public inquiry, or at least a reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to investigate the specific charges of undue political interference?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will want to reflect somewhat further on the kind of action which we can take immediately, and I expect probably at a fairly early opportunity to be able to indicate to hon. members of this House and to the public what we have done and why that really does deal with a number of problems which were cited in the course of the investigation. I think that is the most important thing. Indeed, I have already acted on a number of fronts. The investigators indicated that a good deal of the problem was due to enforcement problems. I have instructed that additional inspectors be hired and a significant number of them made available to the north. I have accepted another recommendation of the investigators, which is that the regional controllers have some power to act immediately to suspend operating licences and the like in order to make the investigations by inspectors more effective, and I have taken action on that as well. It is that kind of action which I think will at the earliest date restore confidence in the operation of all carriers. I think we should also remember that it is just a few carriers which cause most of the problem, and we should not let all carriers be labelled because of that fact.

POSSIBILITY MR. MACLEISH ISSUED DIRECTIVE SAFETY INSPECTORS NOT REMOVE LICENCES FOR BREACH OF SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister inform the House whether Mr. Walter MacLeish as air administrator sent a similar directive to safety inspectors to the effect that they were not to ground airlines over safety infractions? Did he issue a similar directive following Mr. Bolduc's directive?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would have to identify a little more precisely what kind of directive he means, and if he is asking a sweeping question about whether an official issued a certain directive I would obviously need time to check that. I did indicate to the hon. member for Vegreville that the actual four points or items listed in Mr. Bolduc's telegram I have found repeated in another letter, but not by the official named by the hon. member. It was by another official, so I can check to see whether it was a form or a standard caution or practice, and I am also seeing that it is changed.

INQUIRY WHETHER MR. BOLDUC STILL EMPLOYED

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Is Mr. R. L. Bolduc, the director of aeronautical licensing, still in that position, has he submitted his resignation or is the minister requesting his resignation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I am certainly not requesting it, and I do not know if the hon. member is again abusing privileges by even suggesting it.

HOUSING

POSSIBILITY OF SUBSIDIZING RENTAL ACCOMMODATION AT OLYMPIC VILLAGE

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. I should like to ascertain what the Canadian government intends to do concerning the Olympic Village. More specifically, has the responsible minister decided to help financially a non-profit organization buy the Olympic Village from the Quebec government, although this organization may be a sort of subsidiary of the Quebec government's own housing corporation? Is the minister prepared to subsidize housing to make sure that Montreal senior citizens and low income families may also find shelter in the Olympic Village?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate that the Canadian government intends to make it possible for senior citizens and people with low incomes to become tenants of the Olympic Village. We could help these people by paying part of their rentals by way of contributions under section 44(1)(a) of the National Housing Act. On the other hand, we are seriously wondering why the Quebec government is demanding $33 million from the non-profit organization which is apparently to become the owner of the Olympic Village. We feel that this purchase should be made against payment of a nominal fee, which would spare the future owner the problem of capital financing.

TRADE

SUGGESTED INITIATION OF TRADE FAIRS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the Canadian Manufacturers Association has stated that if this country could overcome its $11 billion trade deficit each year in manufactured products, it could make available 800,000 additional jobs for Canadians to work at, would the Prime Minister seriously consider initiating "operation world markets" which would bring principal buyers from the most important industrial countries of the world to this country to see our manufactured products at giant trade fairs in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver and our heavy machinery in the plants where it is made across the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member surely is making a representation rather than asking a question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York-Simcoe.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSITION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE ON INDEXING PENSIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Speaking to a group of businessmen in Toronto last Wednesday the minister very boldly told them that he and the government were considering capping public service pensions. By Friday the minister got away from that bold position. During a CBC interview he stated: "I don't think we could get away with it". It now being Monday, could the minister bring us up to date concerning his present position with respect to the indexation of civil service pensions?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have talked about this in the committee. I have said nothing different from what I said to the businessmen in Toronto. This is a problem about which the President of the Treasury Board has spoken. There is much concern about the level of the pensions of some of the higher echelons of the civil service, and one solution could be the capping of those pensions. The President of the Treasury Board has already mentioned that. As usual, the hon. member takes only a little part of my remarks to make his point. When I was asked about the lower echelons, I said that it would be most difficult. That is exactly what I said, but that is not what the hon. member wants to say to the House.

EQUALIZATION OF SALARIES WITH PRIVATE SECTOR—CAPPING OF PENSIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, last July a letter was sent on behalf of the government to business and labour leaders. One part of that letter indicates that the government would attempt to lower compensation for civil servants to the level of their counterparts in the private sector. The Minister of Finance was asked to comment on this at his meeting in Toronto on Wednesday. Would the Prime Minister indicate what progress has been made with respect to bringing civil service salaries down to the level of salaries in the private sector?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member may be inadvertently misleading the House when he indicates that civil service salaries should be lowered to the level of private sector salaries. What we have said is that salaries should be comparable as much as possible so that the public sector would not lead the private sector but would be able to pay a fair compensation comparable to the private sector. There has been a great deal of progress made in this regard. The President of the Treasury Board has met with his opposite numbers in the provinces to discuss this matter. It is a matter which has been very very central to the meetings I have had with the premiers in my current visits with them. I am sure that we will have occasion to report further on this matter to the House in due course.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister would brief his Minister of Finance a little more fully before he speaks to his business friends in Toronto. The Minister of Finance at that time was not referring to an upward revision of civil service salaries or compensation, but one to bring them down to a more comparable level with the private sector. Would the Prime Minister indicate if from his remark today he is implying that what was in mind in July when he wrote to the business and labour leaders in the country was a general increasing of the civil service salaries and, specifically, what is the Prime Minister's attitude on the capping of pensions as far as indexing is concerned with regard to civil servants?

● (1442)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the Tory position on that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when we speak of compensation we talk of total compensation. This, of course, includes the fringe benefits such as pensions. On pensions, the President of the Treasury Board is conducting a study into the whole pension question as it applies to all employees and persons paid by the federal government. We expect a report on that soon. I believe the first question was asked of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, on the basis of pensions. The hon. member then asked me a question on general compensation. It was to that question I was replying.

In that area, Mr. Speaker, one must realize that the upper echelons of the public service are paid considerably less than the private sector. I refer the hon. member to the last report of the Lambert commission which indicates that the Public Service of Canada in the upper echelons is way below comparable jobs exercised in the private sectors. The hon. member asks should they come up. The hon. member knows we have implemented the recommendations in part of the Lambert commission, previously the Clyne commission, and we discussed this before the House. He can refer to that to see what action we took. He will find that there was general criticism from the other side no matter what action we took.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DATE OF INCREASE IN DOMESTIC PRICE—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGING FORMULA FOR FIXING FLOOR PRICE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is now some five or six months since he began promising an increase in the price of domestic wheat under the two price system. As the minister knows, the price has been steady at $3.25 a bushel and production costs are now as high as $3.96, according to the Department of Agriculture. When will the minister announce that increase, or is he trying to weasel out of it since he has now been talking about it for five or six months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is once again using the word "promising". What has been the case is that we have been talking about it with farm organizations and looking at the issues involved. I indicated to the House only last week that I expected a resolution and decision on the question within this month. Of course, the hon. member is misleading the House, again unintentionally I suppose, in saying that the price was fixed at $3.25 a few years ago. The truth is in 1973 it was set for seven years in the range of $3.25 to $5. For most of the period since that time, it has been well above the $3.25 floor. Notwithstanding that, it is our intention to review the question of how inflation moved faster than expected in the period between 1974 and 1976. That is what we are now taking into account in our discussions.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the floor price has indeed been set at $3.25 since September 1973. Is the minister considering introducing any changes to the act so that this floor price will be automatically indexed to farm input costs, in other words, the cost of production?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is ignoring that what was entered into in 1973 was a seven year arrangement with a price between $3.25 and $5. It was not suggested that the floor line would necessarily be adequate in terms of return by the farmers. The key is whether that price range, given some highs as well as some lows, would be fair. Dealing with the legislation in the House and in committee, we recognized that inflation at that time had already moved rather rapidly, probably more rapidly than had been anticipated in 1973. Accordingly, we built a potential review factor into the legislation. It is that review which is now going on.

RUMOUR DEPARTMENT TO BE ELIMINATED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Last Thursday, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Matane, the Prime Minister confirmed that rumours reported in the press that the government intends or is contemplating eliminating the Department of Regional Economic Expansion were false. I therefore ask the Prime Minister to confirm that the rumours reported in the press over the weekend that the government intends or is even contemplating eliminating the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are also false. I ask this in view of the fact that most of the work of that department is to administer statutes adopted by parliament in the interest of consumers and in fact of all Canadians who come together in the market place and the government has said it intends to rely primarily on the market place in order to enable Canadians to achieve their goals of well-being.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that as far as I know there is no foundation to such a rumour or to the other rumours which accompanied that one. I should say to the House that every once in a while the government or members of the public service have an urge to reduce the number of ministries. There may be some place in the civil service where work is going on with regard to reducing the number of ministries. I can assure the hon. member there is no present policy for the government to reduce the number of ministries or, for that matter, to multiply them. I can say that if there were such a movement, it certainly would not begin with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of which the hon. member was such a distinguished minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will ask my original question and defer from asking the Prime Minister about eliminating a few ministers. My question is to the President of the Privy Council. Does the government intend before Christmas to present to the House for consideration the green paper on access to government information to be referred to the Joint Committee of the House and Senate on Regulations and Statutory Instruments?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is responsible for that particular document. It was issued in his name. The moment he is ready to proceed, I will he happy to put the motion on the order paper.

Mr. Baldwin: I thank the minister for that information. Can he assure the House that it is not because the government has found too many skeletons still rattling around in the government closets that he refused to bring it in?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN GATT NEGOTIATORS AND CERTAIN INDUSTRIES

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It is further to a question asked earlier when I asked the minister if he would arrange for a committee of the House to meet with the various economic sectors in Canada and with the negotiators for the upcoming GATT negotiations to determine whether the rates on certain goods entering Canada can be upgraded for the increment of employment and the greater viability of certain industries in Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last week the President of Privy Council stated that we are willing to ensure that in these negotiations the negotiators meet the different parties that have an interest in the Geneva conference. The policy is still the same. If there are some sectors in which the hon. member has a specific interest, he can let us know and we will ask our officials to be in touch with those groups.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR MEETING BETWEEN INDUSTRY REPRESENTATIVES AND GATT NEGOTIATORS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the impact that trade negotiations could have on agriculture with regard to improvement, will the Minister of Agriculture attempt to have the government reverse its position in general on such a committee, in particular on agriculture, so that those who have any complaint about the proposals of the tariff board can put these complaints directly before members of the House, the negotiators of GATT and members of the cabinet as well?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not intentionally implying that there has been no discussion between these groups. There has been a tremendous amount of discussion. There was discussion this morning at the food strategy meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Food Processors Association and the Meat Packers Council on Tariffs. They all had some input. I have already discussed with the President of Privy Council, the House leader, the possibility of members who have expressed an interest in agriculture, fisheries or industry, being on that committee in order that they will have a better understanding of what is going on in the tariff negotiations.

Here is my question: During his recent African tour, with what types of supplies and services did he provide the countries visited?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Naturally, the services of the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Canadian International Development Agency as well as the good offices of Canada towards the Third World.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to put a question to him concerning the various countries visited. Did he go to the Central African empire with a view to soliciting the support of Emperor Bokassa in his proposed Francophone Commonwealth centered on Canada?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I went neither to Central Africa nor to Uganda.

ACCEPTANCE BY MANUFACTURERS OF AUTOMOBILES OF VOLUNTARY CODE AGAINST CORROSION—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

As, at this time of the year, rusting of their automobiles is of particular concern to Canadians, can the minister tell the House if all the manufacturers of cars sold in Canada have voluntarily accepted the code against corrosion that was proposed by his predecessor, and if not, what steps does he intend to take to force the industry to solve that problem?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): When the draft anti-corrosion code was published earlier this year my predecessor and his provincial counterparts set up a task force to develop and implement the code. That work has been continued. I hope early in the New Year to announce the code in its final form as well as instructions for car care and other measures. I must add that if the code is not complied with voluntarily we shall have to consider legislative measures.

POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATIONS TO JOIN EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET IN VIEW OF DETERIORATING EXPORT TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Having regard to the serious economic conditions in Canada today and, in general terms, the serious deterioration of our export trade, may I ask whether it is a fact that negotiations have been going on for some time on the part of the government with members of the European Common Market with a view to arriving at a basis upon which Canada can join the ECM?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I should inform the right hon. member that last year we had a trade surplus of one billion dollars and that this year it will be $2.5 billion. As to joining the Common Market, no such discussions are going on that I know of.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Statistics by the minister are as far removed from the truth as it is possible for a statement to be.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder if we can get silence from that chorus of geese over there. I ask the minister this: is there no foundation for press references to the effect that a minister is presently in Europe with a view, among other things, to looking into the admission of Canada to the European Common Market?

[Mr. Goyer.]

Mr. Chrétien: I always want to be extremely nice to the right hon. member. I cannot tell him we will have a deficit of $2.5 billion when we will have a surplus of $2.5 billion because I would then be lying to the House. I cannot escape telling the truth. We had a minister in Europe last week, the very good Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I know the right hon. member shares my views about the qualities of the hon. member for Crowfoot. I am sure that his visit impressed the Europeans very much but I am also sure he has not offered to join the ECM.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise only to congratulate the minister on his inability to know the constituency of the latest recruit to the Liberal Party.

CANADA'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA—POSSIBILITY OF REVIEW

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State in September referred to Canada's attitude to the behaviour of Canadian-owned multinational corporations in South Africa as "a bit of a cop-out". Is the government reviewing its stand on tax concessions or other support for Canadian corporations in South Africa involved in taking advantage of the South African policy of apartheid which discriminates against the majority of the population?

It relates to a speech given by the Secretary to the Cabinet for federal-provincial relations on the subject of government secrecy. Will the right hon. gentleman tell the House whether it is government policy that, in the words of the Secretary to Cabinet, freedom of information is "directed by a curiosity about the internal processes of government which does not have much purpose behind it except curiosity" and, in addition, will he assure the House that Mr. Robertson is removed as far as possible from the formulation of government policy on information dissemination?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Robertson is regarded very highly by this government and by myself in particular. I should like to refer to the speech. ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED ILLEGAL OPERATIONS OF BANK OF MONTREAL IN VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF INVESTIGATION

On April 19, I asked the hon. gentleman to confirm that the commercial crime section in Vancouver was investigating alleged illegalities involving the operations of the Bank of Montreal in Vancouver as they have affected a constituent of mine, Mr. Larry McHale. The Solicitor General confirmed that this was the case and on June 23 stated during the adjournment debate that auditors were currently examining books and records. The audits have been complete for some time, now, and I ask the Solicitor General whether it is the intention of his department to press charges in the near future.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the matter is being reviewed by the crown attorney in order that a decision may be made as to whether or not a charge is warranted in this matter.

Mr. Friesen: A supplementary question. This has happened on several occasions in the past. Several times the attorney general has apparently referred a case back to the commercial crime section. Would the Solicitor General forward this matter with some urgency to the attorney general to make sure action is taken?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure what type of action the hon. member would like to see taken, but the matter is being examined in as expenditious a fashion as possible.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WALTER BAKER—PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE VIS-Á-VIS SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO JUDGMENT—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Several days ago the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raised, by way of a question of privilege, a matter concerning the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Ontario by the Chief Justice of that court, Chief Justice Evans. The specific motion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is to be found at page 935 of Hansard, namely:

> That the portions of the judgment of Chief Justice Evans of the Supreme Court of Ontario, given November 9, 1977, which appear to restrict the right of members of parliament to full and accurate reporting in the press, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

It would, of course, be possible to take a very close technical stand on that motion and to indicate that it is too general to qualify for a question of privilege; but in fairness, the hon. member in his opening remarks, which are to be found on the previous page, cited the relevant part of the judgment of which he complained, which is as follows:

> Following the authorities set out above, I have come to the conclusion that a member of parliament may utilize information proscribed by reg. 76-644 in parliament and may release that information to the media. However, I hold that the privilege of the member cannot be extended to protect the media if they choose to release the information to the public. Nor do I consider that the "real" and "essential" functions of a member include a duty or right to release information to constituents. The cases indicated that the privilege is finite and I would not be justified in extending the privilege to cover information released to constituents.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton put forward four submissions. First, he submitted that the judgment of Mr. Justice Evans, in its comments upon parliamentary privilege, are not in accordance with interpretations in this House on privilege as it relates to the relationship between members and the press; second, that the judgment is a clear and present source of intimidation to press gallery members which would prevent them from fairly and accurately reporting House proceedings; third, that the judgment usurps from the House the responsibility of determining itself when its proceedings are to be secretive and in camera; and fourth, that the judgment makes an addition to the body of legal precedent on the question of privilege which the House must challenge as soon as possible because it violates the right of the House to determine the extent of its own privilege.

I am asked, in other words, to find a matter of privilege in the judgment on the ground that it has in some way formulated an addition to the law on privilege which has lessened the definition which we have followed in this House, which has always been that it is the sum of peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the high court of parliament, and by members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions, and which exceeds those possessed by other bodies and individuals. This has come to be refined in our own practices in the more positive definition of requiring, before a breach of privilege can be founded, actual interference with or prevention of a member's functioning in his capacity as an elected member of parliament.

In order to determine the validity of the points which have been raised, I think we have to examine the judgment which was put forward by the learned Chief Justice. First of all, we must realize that the nature of the application required the learned Chief Justice to examine the areas that he did. Here I refer to page 3 of the judgment which sets out the terms of the application that was made to the court. At page 2, being part of paragraph 4, the court was asked for, among other things, "a declaration that if the said regulations do prohibit the release or disclosure referred to in the"—three paragraphs above—"the said regulations are ultra vires the governor general in council and therefore of no force and effect because"; and then two or three reasons are set out, the most important of which for the purposes of this discussion appears at the top of page 3, subparagraph (iii):

> The regulations abrogate, abridge and infringe the privileges, immunities and power of the applicants and other members of the official opposition as members of the House of Commons.

In other words, the court was asked for a declaration that this order in council was in fact invalid because it infringed or continues to infringe the rights and privileges of members of the House of Commons. Therefore, obviously the Chief Justice had to come to some understanding or appreciation of our privilege. But before doing so, I think it is significant that even in that exercise the Chief Justice said this, and I refer to pages 15 and 16 of the printed version of his judgment which I have before me. At the middle of page 15, the learned Chief Justice warned of the dangers of attempting to proceed on academic grounds. He says:

> There is one aspect of this application which does concern me. In their alternative submissions, they seek a declaration that a member of parliament cannot be prevented from using the information in parliament. Moreover, they seek a declaration that the regulations do not abridge the solicitor-client privilege. In this respect they are seeking "absolution before sinning". In my view, they should advance these two arguments as a defence if they are charged. Practically speaking, they may not be charged, in which case this part of the application is simply an academic exercise.

Then, again, at the middle of page 16 he says:

> Counsel for the applicants argued that the applicants could not obtain meaningful legal advice due to the refusal of counsel to receive information which might contravene the regulations. If the applicants are willing to release the information but counsel refuse to receive it, it is counsel not the applicants who are seeking the exoneration of the court in order to justify the receipt of the information. Once again, I am concerned that these proceedings are inappropriate.

Therefore, after warning us of the dangers in the academic exercise, the Chief Justice goes on to deal in the pages leading up to page 30 with the dualism that exists between the courts and the House of Commons with respect to a matter of privilege, where each has tended over a long period of time to interpret "privilege" in its own way. As far as I am concerned, the dualism that exists in this case was adequately referred to and quoted by all participants in the debate. My attitude to it remains as I stated on the day the argument was raised, to be found at page 939 of Hansard. At the conclusion of the first round of arguments I said this:

> There is one thing that is very clear. There is no doubt in my mind that the privileges, rights and immunities of members of this House are in the first place to be decided by this House and not by any other body.

I have no reason to change that opinion.

> The second is that there is, as I indicated in previous discussion on this order in council as it might affect members of the House of Commons, a very real danger in anybody, including this House, attempting to deal with matters of privilege in the abstract or in theory.

I have no reason to change that opinion, either. The learned Chief Justice, after going through an explanation of the dual roles of interpretation of the courts and the House of Commons, then proceeded from page 30 to page 37 of his judgment to find the following: first, that all of our definitions in regard to privilege of a member of parliament related to "proceedings in parliament". I think that is a very important term. His first finding is that all of those definitions and precedents that we have followed are accurate, correct and intact, and in that finding, of course, I can find no question of privilege.

Second, the learned Chief Justice finds that nothing in the order in council diminishes the right of a member of parliament to deal with the uranium cartel during—again—"proceedings in parliament". With that finding, of course, I can make no quarrel with respect to our privilege here.

Third, the Chief Justice finds that the regulations do not prohibit the applicants, or in fact any member of the House of Commons, from releasing or disclosing any such documents in the course of parliamentary debate to the press. Again, I can find no quarrel with the Chief Justice's finding. I find no infringement upon our privilege in any of those conclusions.

The problem seems to arise when we reach page 38 of the judgment, concluding at page 42, to which I will now refer. This is the language which seems to be causing the difficulty. At page 38 the Chief Justice said this:

Counsel for the applicants argued that the members are entitled to release the information to the press. They argued that the right to release the information to the press would have no practical value unless the press were covered by a similar privilege. Finally, counsel submitted that the members have the right to release the information to their constituents.

● (1512)

I cannot accede to these latter two arguments. The privilege of the member is finite and cannot be stretched indefinitely to cover any person along a chain of communication initiated by the member. The privilege stops at the press. Once the press have received the information the onus falls on them to decide whether to publish. They cannot claim immunity from prosecution on the basis of the parliamentary privilege which protects the member releasing the informaton. Whether they have a valid defence under the regulations is another matter.

I think the following is the operative language:

Finally, the member does not have the right to release the information to anyone he chooses outside of parliament. The concept of "proceedings in parliament" cannot be extended beyond all logical limits. I am not satisfied that the privilege enables the member to release the information to his constituents.

I quote those words and emphasize them because clearly, in my opinion, they are significant as to whether or not the learned Chief Justice was speaking about proceedings in parliament. Again from page 42 I quote the following:

Following the authorities set out above, I have come to the conclusion that a member of parliament may utilize information proscribed by regulation 76-644 in parliament and may release that information to the media. However, I hold that the privilege of the member cannot be extended to protect the media if they choose to release the information to the public. Nor do I consider that the "real" and "essential" functions of a member include a duty or right to release information to constituents. The cases indicate the privilege is finite and I would not be justified in extending the privilege to cover information released to constituents.

My observations on these remarks by the learned Chief Justice, which are the ones that seem to be causing the trouble, are as follows: First of all, the Chief Justice was asked for a declaratory judgment which by its very terms requires the court to make some kind of pronouncement in advance of the application of the law. Therefore, the Chief Justice was required by the terms of the application to attempt to make an assessment in advance, or in the abstract. Furthermore, when he had concluded that there was no infringement on the rights of members in parliament, it was argued before him that unless there was an unfettered freedom in the media to use this information under any circumstances, members' privileges would be constrained. Therefore, the Chief Justice had to address himself to that argument and had to attempt a declaration, in the abstract, on that theoretical proposition.

The substance of his declaration on this troublesome ground is, I think, significant in several aspects. First of all, in my opinion, a point which I think was missed in most of the argument relating to this difficulty is that the Chief Justice was then talking about proceedings outside parliament and not proceedings inside parliament. He made it perfectly clear there was no restriction on the rights of members to participate in debate in this chamber and, furthermore, obviously no constraint on the right of the press—indeed, it was their duty—to report fairly and accurately the proceedings that take place in this chamber.

The question arises as to whether or not there is an absolute privilege when members go beyond this chamber, take information which comes into their possession and hand it to the media. Is there a risk in the media? In some circumstances I suggest there is. Is the privilege finite? Yes, I suggest in some circumstances it is. When we are relating to proceedings outside the House, I think we have to realize this. For example, in our very recent experience three examples have come to light, two of which were argued in the House and one was not.

The first, which was argued in the House, was the draft report of the committee on immigration. The second was the draft report of the penitentiary subcommittee of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Both of those in one way or another came before the House on a question of privilege because documents which had come into the possession of members during the course of their work in the areas of these committees had been released. The third situation to which I am referring, which has not come up, is a recent briefing—a regular occurrence—of members of the justice committee on security matters affecting the security branches of our federal police forces.

Again, I cite these examples only to illustrate that there are, in our own very recent experience, circumstances in which not only does a member suffer restriction in the right to communicate to constituents and to the press, but in fact it would in some cases, and has in recent memory, become an application under our privilege practices for a member or a journalist to communicate or publish documents in those circumstances.

The conclusion I have come to, therefore, is this: In the abstract, there are many situations in which at the one extreme it would constitute a matter of privilege to interfere in the slightest way with the full and complete communication by a member either to his constituents or to the press or, in turn, to interfere in the slightest way with the press's publication to the public. At the other extreme there are circumstances, again in the abstract, in which it would constitute privilege for a member to release information to his constituents and might constitute privilege, indeed, for a newspaper to publish it. In fact, there have been cases, and there are precedents in which newspapers have been brought before the bar of this House and the House of the United Kingdom on the ground that they have, in fact, breached privileges by publishing documents which were premature and which were confidential in nature.

I am only saying that the circomstances can vary from one extreme to the other, and that as long as we are dealing in the abstract, and as long as we are dealing with activities outside parliament, I do not find as much concern with the reasoning of the Chief Justice who felt that he had to deal in general pronouncements on abstract situations. I understand the reasoning of the Chief Justice in having to do so, and in the generalized way with which he dealt with matters outside parliament. In my opinion, he created no addition to the law which in any way lessens the privileges of members of this House.

Finally, even if he had done so, his pronouncement is obiter dicta, clearly, by any understanding of any lawyer who examines his reasoning, and is entirely theoretical in a nature. If and when such a question is transformed into reality, it will, I am sure, take the form of an application by a member to this House. This House will then and there decide whether that reality has, in fact, constituted an interference with the real or essential functions of a member.

Therefore I find, first, that the Chief Justice was asked to make a declaratory judgment which required a response from him, firstly, on the general nature of a member's privilege and, more particularly, on the general nature of the relationship between a member and the press in the question of privilege.

Second, I find that nothing which was said by the Chief Justice alters in any way the privileges, the powers and rights possessed by members in the relationship with the press in respect of proceedings in the House.

Third, I find that nothing said by the Chief Justice alters these privileges and relationships in respect of activities of elected members which are outside of proceedings of parliament. But even if my opinion is wrong in this respect regarding activities outside parliament, in the first place the Chief Justice was dealing in abstract terms, by his own description, and in the second place he had gone beyond the basic reasons for judgment to obiter dicta and, therefore, did not make an addition to the law.

Finally, the Chief Justice was, I think, quite correct in indicating to us all the dangers that are inherent in attempting to deal with an academic situation. I feel strongly that this house should not—I have said so in the past—and cannot deal with this question in the same abstract form. On that ground, as well, I find that the matter ought not to go further.

I say, again, that this House remains the master of its own practice, particularly on the question of privilege, and this House will exercise its own judgment on our practices and precedents if and when the matter is raised in a real way before this House. At that time, this House will decide whether or not it qualifies and ought to be dealt with under the heading of privilege, and no other body.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it would not be appropriate that the judgment in question be placed on record in Votes and Proceedings. Otherwise, it will be very difficult to follow the several points that you have enunciated, however clearly you did so.

Second—and this is just an observation—any infraction or invasion of the rights of parliament must be opposed strongly in the House.

I tell you, sir, that the ruling you have just given shows a Solomonesque capacity. It will be read in future years as upholding the rights of parliament, making it clearly understood that declarations outside parliament shall not in any way impede, interfere with or diminish the rights of parliament or, indeed, the rights of the press, for those rights were determined under the Bill of Rights passed by this House in 1960.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his suggestion. I want to say, in passing, something I intended to say during the course of my ruling, namely, that the contributions made by all hon. members to this very important point were, first of all, in agreement, because every member of the House who participated in the discussion rejected the idea that our procedure could be determined externally. However, I thought it was incumbent upon me, in respect of all these arguments—all of which were very valuable—to reject as firmly as I could that idea, and indicate that I did not think it was necessary to go further, for the deliberation of the House, in order to make that rejection.

I thank the right hon. member for his remarks. With respect to his precise suggestion, I have the copy of the judgment to which I referred during my study of this matter. It is rather marked-up with my own notations, but it is the only copy which would relate to my remarks. I cannot think of any reason why it should not be tabled forthwith as part of Hansard, since the reasons I have just given will not make much sense without it. In any case, I am more than happy to comply with the suggestion made, and table it forthwith.

MR. BEATTY—LEAKING OF PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL TAX INFORMATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, during question period for the past couple of weeks I have raised the question of leaks of personal and confidential tax information to an unauthorized individual. I have cited a number of cases in the House concerning the possibility of an individual, posing as a chartered accountant, getting this information without producing proper authorization to the tax authorities.

Last Friday the minister asked me to substantiate my claim that chartered accountants have said publicly that they are able to get this information without having specific authorization. I cited to the minister an interview on "As It Happens" a couple of weeks ago by Mr. David Ingram of CEN-TA Tax Services, of Vancouver. Also, I could have cited a similar interview on radio station CFNY in Brampton two weeks ago last Friday. In that interview, a chartered accountant indicated that it was possible for him to receive confidential tax information about individuals without showing the proper authorization.

Today, the minister delivered to me a letter, as the House opened, in which he reported on his study of the transcript of Mr. Ingram's remarks on the CBC. The minister quoted one or two sentences from the letter. However, he did not quote from the operative paragraphs of the letter in which the minister confirms what Mr. Ingram said about the facility with which chartered accountants, or people posing as chartered accountants, can get information from the Department of National Revenue without showing any authorization whatsoever. Instead, the minister extracted one sentence from the letter in which he concluded that Mr. Ingram's allegations were general in nature and that his examples were so hypothetical that it made his observations meaningless.

If the minister had put the entire letter on the record it would have been possible to look at the report made and to compare it with the facts. That letter substantiates everything I have said. It shows that although Mr. Ingram was not trying to get information for fraudulent purposes, an individual posing as a chartered accountant could very easily have access to personal and confidential information from the Department of National Revenue about individuals.

My point of order is that the minister quoted, in the House of Commons, an extract from the letter. He did not quote the entire letter. It is incumbent upon him to table the letter and to have it appended to today's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: I will wait for the response of the minister on the argument. The point raised by the hon. member, on the face of it, conforms in many ways to our practices. I am not aware of any defences the minister may have. It is an extraordinary situation, where obviously the minister does not have to ask the recipient of the letter for permission, which is often the case. In any case, the minister may have something to say. But the hon. member has raised a point which conforms with similar suggestions in the past. Surely the minister is forewarned that when he comes into the House tomorrow, he will have to meet the point. He can either argue the point, or table the letter. We would expect the minister to do so tomorrow.

INCOME TAX ACT

PROCEDURAL REGULARITY OF BILL C-11

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, when Bill C-11 was being dealt with in committee of the whole, I raised a point concerning the appropriateness of a subsection within Bill C-11 which in no way is in keeping with the income tax motion. At that time, the Chairman of committee of the whole indicated that he was not sure whether it was the appropriate time to deal with it. The discussion ended with the Chairman stating, as reported at page 1480 of Hansard for December 1, 1977:

> I would be ready to stand the clause by unanimous consent, leaving the way open to the hon. member to make his request when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, rather than to me. Otherwise I would be more or less making a decision which strictly I have not been asked to make, the request being made of Mr. Speaker.
> I hope we can resolve this problem without forcing me to make a decision, since there is apparently unanimous agreement among the committee.

Then the Chairman indicated that he would go on to hear me on another point. I spoke on the other point. My point of order is this. When may I put the fundamental point of order to Your Honour concerning the appropriateness of the section in Bill C-11 which I raised last Thursday in that it is not in keeping with the income tax motion which is set out on the opposite page? If now is the appropriate time, I would be prepared to make my argument as to why I feel the legislation in its present form is quite improper in that it does not conform in any way with the income tax motion to which I am referring.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the point raised by the hon. member for York-Simcoe about the substance of the substantive point and the procedural one. The proper course of action would be to get some determination, since the bill is still in committee of the whole, from the chairman, from which an appeal would be taken to the Chair. Whether that might be done in a very brief way to avoid repetition of argument on both sides could be explored.

As a result of a motion initiated last Friday by the hon. Minister of Finance, I understand that today we will launch into a two-hour debate under the provisions of Standing Order 75. That being the case, we would have two hours, and during the supper hour as well, in which to explore whether some arrangement can be made. Perhaps after the vote this evening would be an appropriate time to deal with it very briefly in committee and then have it referred, by way of an appeal, to the Chair. Perhaps during the debate on time allocation, negotiations could take place to see if there is a convenient way to do it.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I feel the committee of the whole anticipated what Your Honour has said. My understanding is that there was unanimous agreement to stand the clause, as far as committee of the whole stage was concerned, with a view to making a stated case to Your Honour in order to receive your decision with respect to whether the clause is, in fact, appropriate or not.

Mr. Speaker: In either case, perhaps we could agree to deal with it right after the vote on the procedural motion today. That would be the most convenient time for me, if it is to go ahead in that way.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, our only handicap is that we have a great deal to consider during committee of the whole stage on this bill. I understand we are now being limited to three further sitting days. Being a jurisdictional and a procedural type of problem, it would be most unfortunate if the bulk of the debate during that closure period should turn on a procedural problem, as opposed to being dealt with at a time such as now. Once we were within the "gag" limitation of the closure motion, it would be most unfortunate to spend a considerable amount of time arguing this motion within the limited time-frame, as opposed to advancing our arguments at this time.

Mr. Speaker: My hands are tied. I cannot make a decision on a matter which is now in committee of the whole unless it is referred to me by the Chairman of that committee by way of an appeal. Perhaps that could be arranged very quickly. Aside from that, there is a possibility that if the vote is taken with reasonable expedition tonight, on the precedence that the time available during the balance of the evening would not be counted in terms of one day, and three more days would be allowed, that might be an appropriate time do deal with it. In any case, unless I have an appeal by way of the Chairman, I am powerless to deal with the matter at this moment. I will deal with it at the first possible moment.

Mr. Blais: There is no mandatory provision requiring that a full two hours be taken up in debate on the limitation motion. I suggest that if the hon. gentleman is anxious to have his point of order argued, he might consent to having a vote taken now, followed by a debate on the merits of his point of order.

Mr. Stevens: With reference to my point of order, as I indicated, I felt we had the unanimous consent of the committee of the whole on Thursday to have the matter considered at the earliest opportunity by yourself, Mr. Speaker. I was simply trying to expedite the procedure. It might be helpful if we could have a ruling with respect to when the three sitting days will commence, in that if it is clear that there will be extra time tonight after whatever length of debate takes place on the closure motion, it would facilitate an argument being made with respect to my point of order later tonight.

Mr. Chrétien: If the hon. member is willing to consider today as the first day of the time allocation, I would have absolutely no objection. I do not want to debate that matter once more. The points were made. I tried to give explanations. There are some differences between the ways and means motion and the provisions in the act, and I tried to explain them in the best way I could. Now I leave the matter for the Chair to decide.

I do not want to argue with the hon. member once more. It is up to the Chairman of the committee to make a decision, or to refer it to you, Mr. Speaker. I am completely agreeable. If we were to vote on this motion right away and proceed today with the clause by clause study in committee of the whole, and consider today as the first day, I think everyone would be happy.

Mr. Speaker: It would be most helpful, under any circumstances, if we moved quickly to resume committee of the whole proceedings. If the Chairman does report to me any decision he has made, then I can take action on it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, it is germane to the matters under discussion by the House, but in view of some of the comments made I wonder if the deputy House leader on the government side would indicate the intentions of the government with respect to the business of the House tonight in the event that we complete the debate on rule 75C. Can he tell us what he has in mind with respect to the business tonight and for the next few days, on the assumption that today is not counted as the first day of debate? I know that ministers are very anxious to avoid discussing this matter in the House, but possibly I will get an answer from the deputy government House leader.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, obviously, the preferable course is to complete the debate in as short a period as possible and move on to the balance of the day as the first day of debate. But in light of the point made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, we may not arrive at that point, and if that is the case, then obviously the first day will be tomorrow.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: It is not for me to decide on matters that have not yet arisen, but I do not think there is any way without strenuous objections on the basis of some pretty clear precedents, that the House will be able to consider today as the first day under the time allocation order. it might be worth a try. I see indications, however, that it will not be very successful.

Mr. Cafik: I have indicated that if the two-hour debate did not last two hours, that may be a possibility. But I would certainly agree with Mr. Speaker and all hon. members that if we cannot count today as the first day, then obviously the first day will be tomorrow and the last day would be on Friday, with an opposition day intervening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, surely the picture is clear on that point. We have not yet seen the actual motion the minister will move this afternoon, but on Friday his notice read:

> —that I shall move . . . that three additional days be allocated to the study of the said bill in the committee on the whole.

Surely those three additional days cannot start until after the motion has been passed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This was my understanding, Mr. Speaker, and I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; but unfortunately the deputy House leader did not understand my question. On the assumption that the first day will not start today, has he any idea what business the government has to present to the House for consideration after we finish this debate, whether it be two minutes or two hours, and whatever time it takes for a vote? What has he in mind for House business? Or is this another demonstration that the government does not know what it is doing?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for the government to indicate what business will take place, when we do not know whether there will be an opportunity for any business at all beyond what is presently before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE VIS-À-VIS SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO JUDGMENT—JUDGMENT TO BE PRINTED IN HOUSE RECORDS

Mr. Speaker: Earlier in the day it was suggested that the reasons for judgment of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, to which I referred in making my ruling, be printed as an appendix to Hansard and in Votes and Proceedings, but there was never a House order to that effect. Does the House agree that it be done?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED LIMITATION ON COMMITTEE STAGE OF BILL C-11

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved:

That in relation to Bill C-11, an Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, three sitting days shall be allotted to the further consideration in committee of the whole stage of the said bill;

That, on the third of the said days, at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, any proceeding before the committee shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the committee of the whole stage to the said bill, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to debate this motion, I wonder if it could be made clear as to what it means with respect to time. Since the motion refers to three further sitting days, that sounds as though it means Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. I draw attention, in particular, to the reference to the vote taking place at 15 minutes before the end of government business on the third day. In other words, is the proposal that any votes at the end of the committee of the whole stage take place at a quarter to four on Friday?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, depending on the length of the debate we are now proceeding with, if we have two or three hours today that could be considered the first day and the vote could take place on Wednesday afternoon. However, as Thursday is an opposition day, and if today cannot be considered the first day, the third day would be Friday and the vote would have to be taken on Friday afternoon. If hon. members would like to consider today as the first day, and we get through this motion quickly, we could dispose of the vote on Wednesday as the last item of government business.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am really asking for a ruling from the Chair as to what the motion means.

Mr. Speaker: I have not, of course, been met with any argument on the precedents as to what is meant. It is difficult for the Chair to determine what a motion means, when the motion has not been carried. But the motion refers to a number of additional days; therefore, at the time the motion is carried it would speak of additional days from that moment.

It is also clear—and the point has been argued—in all our precedents that the day on which a decision is taken is not one of those days. The question is not before me as an argued point, but decisions of the past are quite clear that decisions of the House take effect the moment they are taken. Obviously, if that is at nine o'clock tonight, five o'clock this afternoon, or even now, the precedents say that since the motion says "sitting days", it does not mean today.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would be agreeable to some alternative. We could have those votes on Wednesday, if we consider today the first day. I understand that there are problems for many hon. members on Friday afternoons. I would agree to postponing the votes and making them the first item on Monday after the question period. At that time we would begin the third reading stage of this bill. It has been the first priority of the government since the end of the throne speech debate more than a month ago. We want to finish it as quickly as possible. If there is no accommodation with regard to what the motion means, the votes would be taken as the last item of business on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems that hon. members are trying to carry on negotiations, albeit in good faith, on the floor of the House. I remind hon. members that we are talking about the committee stage of this bill, and I do not think it is necessary to envisage that on Friday afternoon the votes would take place because that is simply the automatic conclusion, by virtue of this order, of the committee stage of the bill when the committee would deal with the questions necessary to stop at that time, rise and report the bill to the House. That does not, of itself or in its own terms, constitute a recorded division. Therefore, the sensible thing must be to let some time go by in an attempt to negotiate the easiest way around this question between now and either late Wednesday or Friday, depending on what time is available. I think I have made clear what the decision on the precedents would be if the point were argued.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length about this motion. During consideration of Bill C-11, on November 22, 1977, the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) tabled a motion in my name regarding the need for the government to have an order passed by the House to shorten the debate.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-11 follows the budget put forward by my predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). The bill was tabled last spring. Consequently, there was a six day debate on these budgetary measures. In addition, when the House was reconvened last fall, the opposition had clearly indicated to the government that they would use the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne as a means to discuss our economic policy. All matters which have been discussed in the House as well as the motion put forward by opposition parties during the debate that followed the message delivered by Her Majesty the Queen and lasted eight days dealt with the economic situation. Later on, we did have a ten day debate on second reading of this same bill. At that time, we were obliged to impose closure and restrict the duration of the debate in order to progress. We have already had four days of consideration in committee and yet, Mr. Speaker, we have done virtually no progress on a bill which contains 120 clauses. We have dealt with five of them after four days of discussion. Obviously, opposition members do not intend to pass these measures which are extremely important to the economy of this country.

The budget speech made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), who was then finance minister, provided for substantial incentives to the private sector, to encourage it to make new investments to promote a more adequate growth of our economy.

As I have noted in my many conversations with Canadian businessmen and in a great number of newspaper articles, businessmen have always said they did not believe we were going to approve the legislation introduced by my predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), and even though I have reassured them several times about this, many believe that we shall change our mind and they are waiting for this legislation to be passed before making any decision. I understand that our system is different from the American system, but under the American system, the president introduces a budget which is then completely changed by the House of Representatives or the Senate. In Canada, when the government introduces a budget, the House must dispose of it, otherwise there are elections, but this is not always understood.

I suggest today that we spend three full sitting days to finish the debate in the committee of the whole. Then we should have one or two days for the third reading stage, and if we compare this with other debates, and I would refer to the bill introduced by my predecessor in 1976, Bill C-22, we see that the House took 11 days to study this bill, plus the six days of the budget debate, which gave a total of 17 days.

To this day, we have spent six days debating the budget in the spring. During the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, we spent in fact eight days studying economic problems. We have now been studying this bill for 14 days, we expect to study it in committee of the whole for another three days, and as is traditional, we shall probably have one or two more days afterwards. This means, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have spent 32 days studying the budgetary legislation introduced in the spring whereas this used to take 12 or 15 days. It is with great regret that I introduce this motion.

I think the people of Canada are entitled to some decisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: At second reading of this bill the opposition did not have the courage to vote against it. Hon. members opposite voted for it because they knew they could not vote against the budget measures which had been proposed. Now they are dragging their feet. It was said that one of the obstacles was that for much of the debate I was not in the House, so I have made it a point to be here all the time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is our problem.

Mr. Chrétien: If that is the problem, I will leave it to my parliamentary secretary, because I have an excellent parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1552)

Mr. Chrétien: If I do that, they will say I did not take my responsibility. I know the parliamentary secretary is better than any of the critics they have on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I missed only one day last week when I went to talk to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I would like to say to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who is asking me questions about that meeting, that he obviously has a friend there. I do not mind—

An hon. Member: More than one.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not mind. I do not have to withdraw anything. While talking on the phone with the executive secretary of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, he was appalled—

Mr. Stevens: You raised it first.

Mr. Chrétien: —that someone would go rushing to the hon. member right away—

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, I believe the minister very carefully explained to the House that he first raised the meeting with the Chamber of Commerce before the standing committee of this House, and took it upon himself to say that he had made certain observations to that meeting in Toronto. If the minister is receiving flack from the executive secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, he should accept that personally—because he raised the meeting, not us.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Chrétien: The communication I have from the executive secretary of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce was to offer his apologies that I was there. In my usual style, I told him like it is, and I do not have to withdraw anything I have said. He said to me that he wanted to offer an apology that the hon. member for York-Simcoe would use one of the members of the Chamber of Commerce as his personal spy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I do not mind, they hired spies all over the place for many years, and I am not embarrassed by that. I just wanted to report to the House that I have received the apology of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and I said that in their organization, like any other, there could be some rotten apples.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know the minister is trying to get into flight here, but I wonder if he would accept a question before he flies any farther.

Mr. Chrétien: I have answered many questions from the hon. member for the last two months since I have been Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: He has not had a good answer yet.

Mr. Chrétien: After so many days here in committee and in debate, he has not scored very often.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I want to say that it is urgent, for the economic good of this nation, to pass this bill. The people who will receive tax exemptions on January—are entitled to know exactly where we stand. If hon. members on the other side do not agree with what is proposed, why did they vote for these measures at second reading, and now are dragging their feet? For what good? The people of Canada who are watching us on television will find it incredible that we have spent a month on such an item. I am just doing today what Westminster is doing every day; they allocate the business of the House of Commons. As a Francophone from Quebec, I am not embarrassed at all in taking a traditional mood from Westminster, England.

Today we have decided, in the name of the government, that there is going to be a vote on these measures at the end of the third day. I have moved such a motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member, but his time has expired. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. Chrétien: I have to move the following motion:

That in relation to Bill C-11, an Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, three sitting days shall be allotted to the further consideration in committee of the whole stage of the said bill;

That, on the third of the said days, at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, any proceeding before the committee shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the committee of the whole stage to the said bill, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Stevens: Obviously, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is getting forgetful in his tired state. He did not even realize his own motion had already been moved.

An hon. Member: Wasted time.

Mr. Chrétien: We have a problem understanding, sometimes.

Mr. Stevens: I always find that when the minister is a little weak in argument, his ire is raised. He expresses himself in a louder voice and shows his emotion. Clearly, the government has no legitimate reason to bring closure in to gag the members of this House the way they are doing today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I find absolutely contemptible the way this government is not only overtaxing the Canadian public but is completely impatient when their representatives try to discover a few facts concerning the Income Tax Act itself.

The Minister of Finance has outlined what he feels is the position respecting debate on this bill. Frankly, he has misled the House. As we know, this matter arose first of all, out of a budget brought in by the then minister of finance on March 31. For reasons known only to the then minister, he did not choose to bring in the Income Tax Act arising out of his budget until June 15 of this year. I refer to Bill C-56.

All of us realize that the government, in complete contempt of this parliament and in contempt of the Canadian public, refused to bring that bill in for debate. There was not one day's debate during that period, at second reading stage or at any other stage, with respect to the Income Tax Act and Bill C-56. To have the minister now stand and make representations that this has been a continuous debate—in referring to the March 31 six days of debate—and somehow leaving the impression that the bill before us is one and the same as the legislation which started with the March 31 budget, is not the fact. That is why I say he is misleading the House. Bill C-56 never proceeded.

The bill before us arose after the October 20 statement of the Minister of Finance. It was a new budget in everything but name. As a result of the new budget on October 20, we have Bill C-11 which was given first reading on November 2. I would point out Bill C-11 is an adaptation or an extension of Bill C-56; it adds 24 pages to the bill.

The last time closure was used on Bill C-11, how many of us realized that the minister himself, at the time he was proposing closure, brought in ten further amendments to his own bill, Bill C-11? Let us not forget that not only did they bring in ten amendments after bringing in closure at second reading of Bill C-11, but after announcing here on Friday that he proposed to bring in his closure motion today, his parliamentary secretary informed us that they were proposing to bring in an additional eight amendments to Bill C-11.

I do not believe any other minister of finance has had the colossal audacity to move closure on a bill that is before the House, and within minutes propose that he will have new amendments with regard to the bill when we get to committee of the whole. It is unbelievable, especially when you bear in mind that the amendments announced last Friday deal with one of the provisions that we on this side of the House are most concerned with, namely, government's proposal to tax life insurance policies in this country. That is some of the background. The fact is that there has not been undue delay in considering this bill. Many Canadians are, in truth, very concerned about some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

The minister has represented that his friends in the business world are saying that, somehow or other, they do not want to make the investments they otherwise would make, because Bill C-11 is not passed. What absolute poppycock! If that is what is holding up the Canadian economy from further progress, God help our Canadian economy. Clearly, the Minister of Finance is again misleading the House. He referred to the private little meeting that he thought he was having in camera in Toronto, where he obviously went to tell certain businessmen what he thought they wanted to hear. He referred to that in the course of debate on this motion. What he forgot to make clear to this House was that he was the one who first raised the fact of an incamera meeting, before a standing committee of this House. Having raised the subject, he is obviously now a little embarrassed that some of us at that standing committee happened to know what he said at the meeting and put a few questions to him.

We have a Minister of Finance who is, first, beyond his depth on Bill C-11. He does not understand the provisions he is asking us to accept. I point to the record. Read what transpired in committee of the whole stage, the number of times the minister obviously did not know what the clauses meant. In fact, after they were explained to him he could not re-explain them to members of the committee.

Second, we have a minister who wants to suck and blow at the same time. He tends to want to go to the business community and meet with them in private to get their confidence, telling them what he thinks they want to hear. He knows in his heart that what he is telling them is not what his master is willing to have them do. The only thing that counts on that side is what the emperor, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), at any particular time thinks should be the law. It really does not matter what our little Minister of Finance happens to be saying at any particular time.

Let me be more specific about Bill C-11. Let me tell the members of the House that we are quite concerned about some of the provisions of this bill. In committee of the whole stage, for the first time since capital gains tax was introduced in this country—January 1, 1972—we dealt with a review of what, in fact, has been the impact of capital gains tax in this country. We brought out that it is a confiscation at the present time, to the extent that capital gains are not being indexed in order to allow for inflation.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that we reviewed the tax for employment benefits that is proposed. We suggested it was not what was needed. We felt there should be a greater exemption given with regard to the employment expense deductions that are in the Income Tax Act. Unhappily for the workers of Canada, the government ramrodded it through and said the allowance it was proposing was sufficient; that it would not go along with anything higher. Surely it is not wrong for us in this House to ask for a little better treatment. The provision to which I am referring simply allows the expense allowance to be raised from $150 to $250. We voted for it to go to $400 on the basis that many people in business are able to get almost unlimited expense allowance simply by showing receipts. Surely it is not unreasonable to suggest that employees should get a bigger allowance than $250.

We also dealt with the question of the proposal to tax the grants that will go to those who attempt to insulate their homes in order to save energy. We feel the government should not be taxing those grants. We made some effective arguments to back up that position. It was on this point that the Minister of Finance really lost his head. We pointed out—and we will be arguing this further—that the income tax motion with regard to the taxation of insulation grants is not in keeping with the legislation they are trying to foist through by means of this bill. If the bill in its present form passes, the government in future will be able to proscribe, as they say, any program and from this day on such programs will be subject to taxation. We say that provision is wrong, and we wish to have it deleted from the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the unfairness of this motion must be very obvious to anyone who takes the trouble to discover that there are 116 clauses in the bill and thus far we have dealt with only six of them. That means the other 110 clauses will have to be dealt with in what amounts to about 2½ days, since Wednesday is only a half day. In addition, we have the various amendments of which the government has already given us notice, plus other amendments which we understand are to be made. Therefore, I say it is very unfair to the House and the country to ask that this legislation be put through committee of the whole stage under a closure motion of this kind.

I enter the debate on this closure motion mainly to express, again, my disappointment at the ease with which the government brings in these motions. After all, every time the government uses a closure motion to end debate, it is copping out on its responsibility to participate in some significant discussion on the procedures of this House. I want to say frankly and categorically, I do not believe it is the right of the opposition to be able to decide that debate is going to go on forever.

Mr. Cafik: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to have that 'Hear, hear". I hope there will be a similar "Hear, hear" when I state the other side. I do not think the opposition should be able to engage in filibuster after filibuster and stall the work of the House in that way. However, the other side of the coin is there as well. I do not think it is fair for the government to be free to decide unilaterally, by its own fiat, that a debate must end whenever it says so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Surely there is somewhere a compromise, somewhere an accommodation between unlimited debate or filibuster on the one hand and the constant use of the guillotine on the other. What I do not like is that the government, having got 75C on the books, finds it easier to use that than the old Tory closure rule of 1913, and resorts to it time and time again as the easy way out. Some day we are going to have to come to an arrangement to handle the business of the House on the basis of common sense.

On a radio program yesterday, I think it was "Cross Country Check-up," I heard the voice of my good friend, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). He made a remark to the effect that this House of Commons will have to be yanked into the twentieth century. I think the government has to face its responsibility in matters of procedure, as well.

In my opinion, a better way should be found. I will take a few minutes in which to lay out a proposal I have made a number of times because I feel it has common sense in its favour. I do not think every motion or every bill which comes before the House should be debated without any time limit. On the other hand, I do not think the government should have the right to cut off debate unilaterally.

We ought to have an arrangement based upon an understanding between both sides under which at the start of a session of parliament the government would be required to list all the measures it proposes to bring down during the session. The government, having provided such a list, a meeting should take place among the representatives of the parties to divide those bills into three categories. It should be possible to agree that a number of those measures are purely housekeeping in nature and ought to take very little time by way of discussion in this House or, perhaps, no time at all.

I have seen many bills debated at length on second reading when they could have gone to committee without any debate at all. At the other end of the scale, there are measures which are so important that the opposition ought to have the right to debate them at any length it wishes. In between are the routine bills which, I suggest, could be dealt with under some firm rule. So there are the three divisions: housekeeping measures which could go through with little or no discussion, routine bills which could be subject to a two-day limit, and then the controversial matters which would be open to full debate without time limit.

I suggest the opposition should be given the right to pick out five or six, or eight or ten bills—whatever the agreed number might be—which it felt should be open to unfettered debate. Having been given that right, the opposition should agree to housekeeping measures going to committee with little or no discussion, and to a two-day time limit on the debate of other legislation. I put this forward as a common sense approach to the present situation in which, on the one hand, the opposition says, "This debate must go on forever," and the government says, unilaterally, "The debate must end."

A scheme of this sort involves, of course, a degree of understanding which does not now exist. Oh, we do have a form of consultation; we meet as House leaders and discuss these things, but in the final analysis the decision is with the government. I have proposed an idea of the kind I have just outlined on a number of occasions over the years. It has been considered by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. In the last session, that committee produced a report which was supposed to streamline the work of the House. That report got nowhere because it did not meet with general acceptance.

Mr. Speaker, the only approach the government takes toward the provision of time is to cut or limit. It never wants to give anything; it just wants to take away. We came out of that committee last session with a report to which there was no possibility of getting agreement. No consideration was given to the kind of proposal I am putting forward. I am not suggesting, of course, that the regime I propose is perfect in every detail, but something along those lines would make sure that our procedure worked much better than it does.

Someone said to me, when I was discussing this approach, "What would happen in the case of bills which were not on the list at the start of the session?" Well, if the government was not smart enough to list all the bills it wanted at the beginning of the session, bills which were brought in later would be in the third category, the category which would be debated without time limit. The government always objects, of course, to any program of that sort because it looks at part 3 and says it does not like a provision for unlimited debate. But, Mr. Speaker, we have it now unless closure is brought in, and when closure is brought in everybody is unhappy. Surely the time has come—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard from the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) very valid suggestions which deserve our consideration. In my opinion, the government and the opposition should carefully consider these proposals and accept them. If those proposals require some amendment, this can be done, as the hon. member said himself. Certain governments, including the Swedish government, operate in a way somewhat similar to that mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. For the second time, we are debating a closure motion on Bill C-11, that is on the same bill. This must stop since it embarrasses everyone.

Until recently, in Sweden at least, sittings are held on a set schedule and debates are divided into three categories and also held on a set schedule, as for bills on financial legislation. They also must be debated within a certain period. Routine bills, for instance, are debated on a set schedule and finally, there is the general debate. So I think, Mr. Speaker, that to be logical we should use a similar approach and better organize our parliamentary debates. I think that one of the main points we could adopt here would be the set schedule for sittings. It could improve many aspects of our proceedings.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) told us earlier that we have now been debating Bill C-11 for fourteen days. It seems very long to him but for the opposition that must study a bill as badly drafted as Bill C-11, it is certainly not exaggerated. At almost each session we have a similar and as voluminous a bill amending the Income Tax Act; if those bills were better drafted, I think we could adopt them much faster.

In this long debate, I think that both main parties are to blame. First, as I said earlier, if this bill had been better drafted, its study would be easier. This government systematically refuses all suggestions made by the opposition. It rejects the amendments proposed by the opposition. Last week, my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Allard) proposed an amendment extending the provision that allows any worker to claim a tax deduction of $250 a year. Before, this exemption was $150. We believe, and I think it is accepted by all workers, that this amount falls far short of meeting the substantial increase in transportation costs in Canada.

My colleague from Rimouski suggested to raise that amount to $400. Yet, the majority party massively rejected this amendment. Other suggestions have been made in other areas but the same thing happens. The only amendments accepted by this government are its own. We should almost adopt them without any study, without any debate, particularly in a closed debate like this one.

Mr. Speaker, I think there was also some exaggeration on the other side. I often heard the Progressive Conservative Party repeat the same thing. Instead, I think that they might have made more precise suggestions and particularly a larger number of amendments to improve Bill C-11. Mr. Speaker, I have participated in the whole debate on Bill C-11 and I often asked myself certain questions. Everybody knows that the Liberal Party is recognized as a tax prone party but people know also that if the other party were in power, I mean the Progressive Conservative Party on the left side of Your Honour, it would probably be the same.

We should only remember the situation in 1962, when we had a Progressive Conservative government. We were facing the same economic problems. We had a frightening rate of unemployment. The inflation rate was going out of hand. The U.S. dollar was at a considerable premium over the Canadian dollar, which in effect was responsible for the Progressive Conservative defeat in 1962-63. And we are now back to the same position. For that reason, a number of people feel that no matter which of those parties is in power, it is always the same thing.

I for one believe that neither is better than the other. I heard the representative for the Progressive Conservative party cry like an offended maiden against the closure motion. This is quite ridiculous. They had ample time to introduce amendments, but did not choose to do so. Suggestions they made, but amendments they forgot to introduce. I feel that if we are to proceed in a responsible way during the three remaining days, we should be thinking of bringing down amendments, at least to show the Canadian people we are making positive suggestions to the government, we really want to improve the legislation. And if the government turns them down, they will probably be treated as they deserve next year. Mr. Speaker, such are my views in this brief closure debate. This is the second closure motion we have been having these last two weeks, and I hope we will not be confronted with a third one on the same bill at the third reading stage.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue with the thoughts left with us by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about the way in which business is conducted in this House. Those of us who have watched the House of Commons in operation over a period of years, and seen the transformation that has occurred, can only agree with the hon. member when he suggests that serious consideration should be given to making the rules of this House more responsive to the circumstances of the legislation which appears before us from time to time.

The fact that we are debating this kind of motion under 75C is, I think, a reflection of the mismanagement of this government and of the way in which the cabinet, almost uniquely in the history of Canadian politics, has managed to bungle its way through the affairs of the House of Commons. When I say that, I am not sure that they do this without some motive behind their approach to the House of Commons, for it is not a very well kept secret that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of this "great" government across the way, is a man who resents the House of Commons, resents involving himself in debate in the House of Commons, and resents the fact that he has to put any programs which he wants to make into law before the House of Commons.

Therefore, the Prime Minister accedes to the actions of ministers of finance who bring forward bills emanating from budgets brought down months before. We have examples where budget bills are brought forward six months, or, in the case of Bill C-11, more than six months after the budget has been presented in the House.

What have we heard from the government side, Mr. Speaker? We have heard cries of agony and concern that "if we don't get this bill through immediately, or tomorrow or the next day, the business community will not know where they stand and this will be the fault of the opposition". The backbenchers and colleagues of the government cannot see the expression on the face of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) as he has sat through the debate on the bill in committee of the whole, whereas we on this side can. I have never seen anyone go through such anguish and express such dislike for the process of committee of the whole as the Minister of Finance. To those of us on this side of the House he was completely ill at ease and ill-prepared to deal with any suggestions and questions from members on this side of the House, or to defend a piece of legislation brought forward by his government. Since the last budget was not his, I understand his apprehension and concern at defending it.

We might get some indication of the government's motivations in this matter, Mr. Speaker, if we examine what happened in committee of the whole. The government has talked about having a full debate on economic matters. We have before us a bill which puts into effect provisions which were set forth first in the budget of last March. We went into committee of the whole on Bill C-11 for one minute on November 24. On November 25 and November 28 we spent approximately five hours debating the bill in committee of the whole. We then had an approach from the government side to enter into discussions pursuant to Standing Order 75B. After a mere five hours of discussion in committee of the whole, the government was thinking in terms of bringing in an agreement under Standing Order 75B. Having discussed the possibility of an agreement, the government is then entitled unilaterally to bring in a motion under 75C, and this after a mere five hours of debate on a bill containing over 200 pages.

Some of the provisions of the bill we agree with, but we have serious concern about many others. Not only are we concerned at measures in the bill; we are concerned at the absence of many other measures. Due to the government's bungling and mismanagement, since the budget was brought down in March there was a hiatus in time before further action on the bill was taken, rather than the budget debate following the normal course and the bills being introduced thereafter.

The government wails and complains about the fact that there is so much repetition in debate. The fact of the matter is that to avoid repetition, the government should put their house in order and bring their business before the House in a logical manner so there is some relationship between ways and means and supply and we do not have to dissect and bisect our consideration of budgetary matters. The government should show it is capable of governing the country, instead of being a bunch of bungling—the only appropriate word I can think of—incompetents.

What do they do? They sit back and say we should get this bill through because the businessmen and chambers of commerce want us to give immediate attention to this matter. Anyone who is concerned with business—and every accountant—knows that this government, with a majority, will carry the provisions in due course. Is that any reason to thwart the legitimate representations of the representatives of the people of Canada in the House of Commons or their suggestions to this government?

We had a budget early on in March, but what has happened since then? We have had substantially worsening inflation. We have an unemployment prospect for this winter which is horrifying. We now have the announcement by the minister that the government is going to withdraw wage and price controls. In economic terms, we have these developments six to eight months after the budget is brought down. We are denied a new budget which rightfully we should have had to deal with these horrendous economic prospects. Instead, we are thwarted in any discussion or in making any recommendations. This government seems incapable of running this country, economically or otherwise.

We now have the prospect of the government trying to ram this bill through by curtailing discussion. This means the people of Canada will not have full discussion of the economic matters on which the people of this country think we should be spending our time. In fact they are demanding that we spend time on these matters.

I say, therefore, to the minister—who has disappeared from the chamber after his outburst—that the fact of the matter is that it will not do him any good to try to confuse the issue by saying the opposition is responsible for the mismanagement of this country. I do not think for one moment that anyone who gives any thought to the whole process of parliament and the idea of responsibility of government will pay any attention to that kind of specious argument. The government proposes, and this forum of parliament is the place where elected representatives have the right to speak about what is happening and make recommendations based on what the people they represent are suggesting in respect of economic matters.

We would like to have made a number of specific propositions in respect of this bill. The life insurance provisions continue to be in a mess. The $100 tax cut should be made in 1977, not in 1988. I would suggest that roll-over provisions to help small corporations, farmers and small businessmen to pass enterprises over to their children should be included in this legislation. There should be no taxation on home insulation grants. It is almost an insane proposition to make these grants and then tax the money in the hands of the recipients. That is what will happen with the exception of two Liberal provinces where the rules are quite different. No wonder the government is receiving few applications under this plan.

These are legitimate suggestions which we on this side want to put to the government, but it refuses to listen to anybody. It blames the opposition for everything and refuses to bring matters before parliament, due to its basic contempt for this institution. There are a number of propositions which we in this party intend to set out. Members on our side wish to tell the House precisely what we think this government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the second time in two weeks I have had to get up—and I do not like putting myself forward to speak too frequently—to oppose the imposition of closure by the government. I never thought it would come to this day. I come from a parliamentary legislature where the value of speaking and the value of being able to express your view is well recognized. I believe the only time in my ten years in the Newfoundland legislature that we had closure was on an occasion brought in by the Liberal government of the late J. R. Smallwood, and I say "late" not in the sense of the fact that that gentleman is now deceased, because he is not; he is travelling across Canada saving us; he is speaking on the national unity question across Canada, with his trips paid for by the privy council. When I say "late", I do not mean deceased, but that gentleman brought in closure once, on interim supply. That is the only time in my ten years in the Newfoundland House it was ever done. If it has happened twice here in the last two weeks. What has the government to hide, that is the question?

An hon. Member: Plenty.

Mr. Crosbie: Apparently it must be plenty, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Incompetence.

Mr. Crosbie: Incompetence, yes; but they cannot hide that. It is pretty difficult to hide incompetence, but they have certainly got it. Let me take one instance of the difficulty we have been having in committee of the whole. In committee of the whole, for it to function properly you must have a minister who believes in parliament, a minister who believes in the democratic process, a minister who believes in giving information and answering questions. In our committee of the whole we have not had a minister who believes in any of these things.

For example, the minister was asked the other day, repeatedly—I think it was last Friday—what it would cost if clause 6 of the bill was amended, taking out the provision that home insulation grants under the CHIP program would be taxable in eight provinces but not in Nova Scotia or P.E.I. If that provision came out of the bill so grants were not taxable in any province, what would it cost? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) gave the extraordinary answer that it would cost $560 million. You might ask, Mr. Speaker, why it is extraordinary for the minister to collect $560 million in taxes over the next seven years from these grants. I hope he is listening, because he has a lot to learn. But he does not appear to want to learn, and is pacing restlessly about the chamber like a caged tiger. He cannot wait to get closure in so he will not have to answer any further. There would have to be grants to four million householders. The minister says he would collect $560 million over the next seven years from people who had received the home insulation grant. The maximum is $350 if you are living in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Quebec or British Columbia, the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. If you live in Nova Scotia or P.E.I., the maximum is $500. We will forget about that for now.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) says thay are going to spend $2.4 billion over the next seven years. They are going to get back roughly half of what they spend, according to the minister's reply. The program will cost the government $1.4 billion over seven years. The Minister of Finance says if he makes the grants non-taxable, he will lose $560 million. He has to get $560 million back from the $1.4 billion that the other minister intends to spend over seven years.

If the maximum grant is $350, you will need four million householders outside Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island receiving the grant. If you divide $350 into $1.4 billion, it goes four million times, so you would have four million householders getting the maximum grant of $350. Every one of those four million householders will have to be in the highest tax bracket, or at least the 50 per cent tax bracket, because they will have to lose half of what they get to make up the $560 million.

What the minister is saying is that there are four million householders who are going to get the maximum grant and who are all going to be in the 50 per cent tax bracket, because that is the only way he could lose $560 million if he made these grants non-taxable. It is quite obvious he is not accurate; he is not even approaching accuracy. To suggest that one-half of the cost of the program would come back in taxes if the grants remain taxable in the eight provinces is not true; it is not the fact. But that is the kind of answer we have been getting from the Minister of Finance over the last few days.

By the way, there are only 7,026,000 householders in the eight provinces, so you would require a fantastic acceptance rate. You would require four million out of those 7,026,000 householders to take the grant. To make it even more ridiculous, only 1,223,000 are eligible the first year, and it gradually goes up year by year; so you haven't got four million even eligible until four years have gone by. Never before has such codswallop been put before the House. Codswallop is something which is scraped off the floor after the cod has been dealt with pretty sternly. Thus, the minister will know what I think of his answer. When we stand up to ask questions in this chamber, this is the type of answer we receive.

The committee of the whole is the only effective committee parliament has. We can ask questions, and if the minister does not give proper answers we can ask another question. It is unlike House committees. House committees are emasculated. House committees are parliamentary eunuchs guarding the harem of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), where he hides his delights. The hidden delights of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are protected by the Parliamentary eunuchs, the committees of the House of Commons. Those committees have no power. They cannot subpoena anything. They are dominated by the majority; the majority controls them. The chairmen are Liberals for the most part. They are under the thumbs of the powerful ministers in the government, as well as the Prime Minister. One cannot expect the chairmen to be independent.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Members can only do what they are permitted to do. They sit in committee. They are given ten minutes to ask questions and receive answers. A member asks a question and he receives a non-answer from some long-winded minister for nine minutes. It is the most pusillanimous and piffling procedure ever foisted on parliament.

Mr. Boulanger: That is not so.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. gentleman opposite is too used to being a Liberal backbencher. Members on this side of the House have not been through that experience. We are full of vim, vigour and vitality. We ask questions and we want answers. We are not interested in the parliamentary eunuchism that this government enforces on members opposite and on Canadians. We want vibrant committees which have power.

Mr. Boulanger: That is good for TV.

Mr. Crosbie: We do not want these emasculated committees. We do not appreciate closure. We are like the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). He does not appreciate the Cape Breton miner. He infers that they are lazy louts who do not want to work.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We do not appreciate closure. Positively, we do not appreciate it. Also, we do not appreciate the honourable baa-baa black sheep opposite.

Mr. Boulanger: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: If the hon. member opposite wants to rise and speak on this motion, he can do so.

Mr. Boulanger: I will. You are a phony.

Mr. Crosbie: I am sure there are people who would like to hear what he has to say. Wherever these people are located, they would like to know why he is voting to cut off debate in this House on the income tax amendments which are before us. The only effective forum to put a minister on the griddle and give him a bit of a frying is committee of the whole. That gives him a bit of a frying, but not a scorching.

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) would not have had closure brought in. He was fearless in his approach. He was convinced, absolutely, that he was right. He had all the wrong ideas to back that up, but he was not afraid to put them forth for examination. The new minister is somewhat different. The new minister is a slippery eel; he will slither this bill through the House, using closure. He will seduce the senatorial promises, the sleek and sumptious growth of wealth and corporate privilege.

That is similar to what may be said by members of the New Democratic Party. The minister will rush this through because he is receiving telephone calls from the investment community. The poor fellows do not know what to do. They do not know what to expect. They cannot add two and two. Apparently they do not realize that 145, or whatever the figure is, is more than 50 per cent of 265 members. They do not understand the government has the majority and controls the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make a few comments on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I am delighted to see him conferring with his officials in the gallery: that shows he is very interested.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is being briefed.

Mr. Darling: Perhaps that is so. I am well aware of the importance of Bill C-11. Certainly, there is merit in stating that it should not be debated forever. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated, certain bills merit considerable debate. I consider Bill C-11 to be one of those.

I listened to the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) make some interventions. He stated that the Conservative party talked at some length on this bill and brought in no amendments. As far as bringing in specific amendments is concerned, the government and the Minister of Finance are aware that we have spoken against certain clauses in the bill which are in themselves amendments.

As the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicated, we have taken great exception to the home insulation grants being taxable. We have indicated that they should not be taxable. As far as the home insulation legislation is concerned, it comes under the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). Aside from the two favourite provinces, the grant is $350. That is only two-thirds of the amount of material that is purchased. Certainly, in the case of smaller houses, it could meet the entire cost of the material. Forcefully, I tried to bring that to the attention of the House on Friday afternoon when speaking on the motion presented by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott).

My party has made proposals regarding Bill C-11. I am interested in the clause dealing with life insurance. I appreciate the position of the minister and the government on this matter. It is of considerable interest to 12 million policyholders in Canada. The government has made a concession indicating that nothing is to be done at death. I give the government full marks for that.

The Minister of Finance looks as if he wants to speak. It should not be taken off my time.

Mr. Chrétien: I just want to indicate to the hon. member that more amendments are coming.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Why do we not see these amendments now, before closure?

Mr. Lumley: We are not dealing with clause 14.

Mr. Darling: I hope the amendments consider this question, because it is very important. I am referring to the loan provisions of life insurance policies which are not allowed as tax deductions. Will that be allowed?

Mr. Chrétien: Are you dealing with clause 14?

Mr. Darling: The minister can refer to clause 14, but he has a lot of amendments up his sleeve which we do not know about.

Mr. Chrétien: It was given to your financial critic on Friday.

Mr. Darling: The rest of us are as entitled to it as our critic.

Mr. Paproski: Was that before, or after, closure?

Mr. Darling: I am not sure whether I have an undertaking from the Minister of Finance and his able parliamentary assistant.

Mr. Chrétien: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Yes, he is a very able man. I have great respect for the minister's parliamentary assistant. I had occasion to work with him in municipal politics, where he did a great job. I feel he made a wrong choice when he came to the House of Commons and joined the Liberal party rather than the Conservative party.

Mr. Paproski: Why is the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) blushing? Let the cameras show his red face.

Mr. Darling: That is quite right. How can the Minister of Finance deny a business person borrowing up to the cash value of his life insurance policy at a 6 per cent interest rate? That person can borrow money more cheaply, but he is unable to deduct it as a legitimate expense. Yet you could put the policy up as collateral and borrow through a bank or another financial institution at a much higher rate, and the full deduction would be allowed. It does not make sense. In other words, if you borrow $1,000 at 6 per cent on your life insurance policy, $60 is not deductible. But if you borrow that amount from a friend and you put the life insurance policy up as collateral and give him 10 per cent, which is $100, you can deduct it. That is crazy. I hope this clause will be amended. I see the minister nodding. Praise the Lord and thank God it has sunk in.

• (1652)

Mr. Chrétien: Let us praise the Lord and thank God, and hope we go on to clause 14.

An hon. Member: Is this a Pentecostal meeting?

Mr. Darling: One other clause to which we take exception is the one which allows business expenses to be deducted for ordinary employees from $150 to $250. We consider that not to be adequate in these inflationary times and in this time of the special iniquitous 10 cent tax on gasoline. The motion presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) of the Social Credit Party, was that the amount be increased to $400. The $400 would give the ordinary workingman a break, which he does not get now as does the regular businessman who can deduct anything he can think of, and even things he cannot think of but his accountant can think of for him so that he can get maximum benefits. I think the ordinary workingman should also be given that additional break.

These are the reasons we feel this bill is important and should be debated at length on behalf of all the people of Canada, and that is why I take exception to closure at this time. I hope the amendments to be proposed by us will be accepted by the government. We will not need three days of debate if the government will agree to the common sense suggestions made from this side of the House.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is a good thing that closure has been imposed again, because I think the economic situation in Canada is worse now than it has been for many years and we need to debate measures such as the one before us. The fact that the government is cutting off debate on this bill indicates, probably, that it is not willing to face up to what lies ahead.

We find that the United States has just come out of a recession and they are discussing what efforts should be made to improve the economy. Their problems are big; their foreign trade deficit stands at $30 billion. Let us see how their situation compares with our economic situation in Canada. The United States will run a foreign trade deficit this year of $30 billion, with oil imports alone costing about $45 billion, as compared with Canada's $5 billion. Their trade deficit is relatively twice as big if we take into account that Canada's growth rate is only half of theirs, and our inflation rate is two points higher. Certainly we should discuss our economic problems in the House.

Let us consider what the minister himself said not long ago in the province of Quebec. He said that there is a loss of population in Quebec, business is moving out of the province, there is a faster growth of unemployment in Quebec than in most other parts of Canada, and Quebec has one of the poorest records for increased investment and higher rates of interest abroad. In an article which appeared in the Financier, a journal of financial affairs directed at top U.S. businessmen, it was pointed out that if Quebec separates, businessmen may find that their loans are being repaid in worthless Quebec dollars, supported by a nation without reserves, burdened by chronic domestic and external foreign payments problems, recognized by few, if any, foreign nations. These are some of the problems we have.

The budget was brought down six months ago, but times have altered drastically since then. Economic changes are coming on fast. We have a higher rate of unemployment, and an increasing budget deficit which has to be met by borrowing. We are borrowing at a rate comparable to the rate during the Second World War, in relative terms. A similar situation prevailed in the 1920s and the early part of the 1930s. Anyone who has read the record will recognize that at that time bankers and politicians were saying that the economy was fundamentally sound, yet the country was plunged into a depression.

Bringing down a budget is more difficult now than it was a few years ago. Then it was a simple revenue-raising device. Now it has come to be recognized as a major weapon by which the government carries out its fiscal, economic and social responsibilities. In recent years the government has been involved to a great extent in social problems. Everyone is complaining—particularly those involved in accounting and those making business decisions—that they are not aware of what the government is doing. Accountants and businessmen will tell you that they read avidly debates in the House of Commons carried on by members of parliament who are not necessarily the most expert financiers in the world; but, say the businessmen, they demonstrate what the governement is thinking and they represent what various members have in mind when they present their arguments for and against a particular tax change.

I find that tax accountants in particular would like to have a record of the debates in the House of Commons because it indicates to them what the government has in mind, and questioning of the government brings out what may flow from a certain tax change. It is certainly true that what we pass in the House in the way of regulations is developed by senior civil servants, and these regulations are often very difficult to understand.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment at 10 p.m. are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Unemployment Insurance—Reason for eliminating fraud squad—Possibility of reinstatement; the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—Northern Affairs—Exceeding of departmental appropriation—Possibility of disciplinary action; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Federal Provincial Relations—Meeting of resource ministers—Discussion of ownership and taxation of resources.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before proceeding with the consideration of private members' business, as we usually do at this time on Mondays, I would like hon. members to allow me to give my decision on a point of order raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on November 4 last specifically dealing with the program and selection of parliamentary measures to be discussed during private members' hour, more especially with the notices of motions moved by hon. members to that effect.

The decision which I am about to give must, in my opinion, take our rules into account, particularly Standing Orders 18(1), 19(1) and 49(1), but it cannot ignore the recent practice which has been developed in the organization of private members' business by the government.

Besides, neither hon. members nor even the hon. member for Vaudreuil seem to be opposed to that practice, except that the latter suggests it could lead to abuses in the sense that an hon. member's proposal could be set aside and not debated at the time of his choice. So, my decision was meant to conciliate those two concerns with a concrete proposal about future practice for private members' business, a uniform and orderly way of proceeding which complies with our standing orders.

The point of order raised on November 7, 1977, by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and concluded on November 28 showed that for some time the House has not been following precisely the provisions of Standing Order 18(1), Standing Order 19 and Standing Order 49 as they related to private members' business.

Standing Order 18(1) provides that private members' business be taken up according to the precedence assigned on the order paper. Standing Order 19 offers a degree of protection to notices of motions and orders not taken up when called, in that it provides that at the request of the government they may be allowed to stand and retain their precedence on the order paper. Standing Order 49 provides that a private member's notice of motion which has been called twice and not proceeded with shall be dropped. The Standing Order goes on to provide a procedure for reinstating a notice which has been dropped in that manner.

On the other hand, in recent years the House has accepted the practice whereby the government has taken a certain initiative to determine in advance the item of private members' business to be dealt with at a particular sitting. Rather than calling each item seriatim in accordance with the precedence assigned on the order paper, the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has simply requested that all items preceding the previously determined item be allowed to stand at the request of the government, and sometimes by unanimous consent, or both.

As a result of the debate last week, I am satisfied that even if this practice did not conform precisely with the provisions of the relevant Standing Orders, it has gained a large degree of acceptance by the House, for two reasons. First, it gives the House advance warning of the business to be taken up during each private members' hour, and second, it protects private members' business more effectively than the Standing Orders.

At the same time, however, I considered the point made by at least two hon. members who contributed to the debate and who claimed that the practice is open to possible or apparent abuse. Certain doubts were expressed that in arranging the business for private members' hours the government might not always be guided by the priorities established on the order paper, or might not always consult all members affected or concerned.

I must say that I was struck by the effectiveness of the arguments on both sides of the question, and in making my ruling I shall try to combine the virtues of both practice and the relevant Standing Orders. I therefore hope that the House will be prepared to accept the following proposals. First, I propose that the practice developed over the last few years be continued, that is, that the government take the necessary steps to schedule in advance the business to be considered during private members' hours, with due regard to the priorities established on the order paper and through consultation, and that the House proceed directly every day at the time of private members' business to the scheduled item, standing all preceding items by unanimous consent.

Second, a member who feels that the practice has resulted in an injustice on a particular occasion and that he should have been consulted or given more advance notice may, of course, express his dissatisfaction simply by withholding the required unanimous consent. This would oblige the Chair to call seriatim, one by one, all items preceding the scheduled item.

Third, items not proceeded with when called in this manner could then be allowed to stand either at the request of the government or by unanimous consent, or they would be dropped. Of course, the necessary notation would be made in Votes and Proceedings and on the order paper so that we would know every day what items appearing on the order paper have been stood at the request of the government.

It seems to me that this combination of rules and practice should meet the concerns of all hon. members, and I hope the house will be prepared to work within this framework at least on an experimental basis.

[Translation]

I suggest that hon. members follow to the letter, or at least as closely as possible, this procedure proposed in my decision about notices of motions presented by hon. members, unless implementation problems arise. Therefore, it seems to me that if everything works smoothly enough it might not be necessary for the time being to revise the standing orders of the House.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask just one question? Putting it that way implies readiness on my part to accept the ruling Your Honour has made. Do I take it that in future when a bill has been allowed to stand by unanimous consent, that will be the notation on the order paper, rather than the notation "at the request of the government"?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have considered both possibilities, and I think what the hon. member is suggesting would cause complications for the people who have to keep records and who have to prepare Votes and Proceedings and the order paper. My proposition is to operate every day on which there is a private members' hour by giving notice to the House that we are to proceed with one numbered item, making a request for unanimous consent to stand the previous ones. The fact that unanimous consent is given means that all the items which are bypassed are not really affected, so they should be considered as if they had never been called.

That is why I say that the developing of the practice of proceeding by requesting unanimous consent at the beginning of each private members' hour will thus allow us to proceed in an orderly way directly to an item, without having to use the right of the government to stand an item unless an hon. member withholds unanimous consent for some reason of his own. So actually we would be following a practice which would be in between what we have been following in recent months and what the Standing Order says. We would proceed by standing all items not proceeded with by unanimous consent, and only when an hon. member withheld unanimous consent would each item be called one by one.

For items where unanimous consent is not given, they would have to be stood at the request of the government or taken off the order paper because, as the hon. member knows, the Standing Order says that an item may remain on the order paper when called, if requested to stand at the government's request. If an item is enumerated and no member concerned does request it to stand by unanimous consent, and the government does not protect that item, it will have to go down the list if it is for a bill that is, for a notice of motion, it will be dropped from the order paper, but it can be reinstated. I do not know if I am clear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I understand what you are proposing. My question related only to the point as to what the notation would be on the order paper of the future; whether it would be one or the other. I now make the suggestion that in all cases the notation simply be allowed to stand. Why worry whether it was unanimous consent?

Mr. Paproski: Right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If I may refer the hon. member to Standing Order 19(1), the only way such an order or a notice of motion can be allowed to stand is at the request of the government or by unanimous consent. Because of the fact we do not want to keep a record of dates of standing an order or notice of motion on the order paper and on the Votes and Proceedings, I feel in making this practice a general one—the practice of standing all the items by unanimous consent—we can forget about those items stood by unanimous consent. We do not even have to take the trouble of putting a note in the records. On the other hand, the House is very concerned, and from what I have heard the hon. member from Vaudreuil is concerned about the number of times an item has been stood at the request of the government.

I think it will be useful to an hon. member because he will know from the order paper that an item had since the beginning of a session, been called a few times, and stood by unanimous consent. If on a following occasion that consent is refused the government would be entitled to request it to stand. Only that instance will be recorded. From then on, the next time it is called it will be automatically dropped. Does that satisfy the hon. member?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, I would leave it open to any suggestion as we go along to improve the formula. I felt while we are staying within Standing Orders we would be developing a practice that could not be challenged by any member, especially operating on the basic principle of unanimous consent.

Mr. McKinley: Just a question with regard to your ruling, so I understand exactly what the ruling is. Are we to understand these items on the order paper, up at the top, will be allowed to stand either by unanimous consent, or at the request of the government, an indefinite number of times?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What I am suggesting is a general practice that every time the House is proceeding with private members' business, the government should continue to organize the programming of private members' business, so that every time at the outset of private members' hour a representative of the government would request all the items previous to the item proceeded with be stood by unanimous consent. So these items could stay there up to the end of the session if there is unanimous consent.

But if at any time, to satisfy the right of a member to request that the orders be called one by one, then the Chair would call all items one by one up to the item that was to proceed. In so doing at that moment the Chair would request consent for each item to stand. If there is no consent, then the government could use its right to stand an order or motion at the request of the government. Standing Order 49(1) says these items cannot be called more than twice. Those items will be identified on the order paper as having been stood at the request of the government. The next time they come up, if they do not succeed in getting unanimous consent to be stood, they will be dropped from the order paper.

The Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council is absent from the House, and I would be ready to receive an indication from the government as to what order of business we are to proceed with.

Mr. Alexander: Further evidence of incompetence, short and sweet. They do not know what they are doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that motion No. 7 be dealt with and that the three previous motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Caron) suggests that we immediately proceed with the consideration of notice of motion No. 7 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) and that notices of motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5 be allowed to stand with the unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to allow notices of motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5 to stand so that the House may proceed with notice of motion No. 7 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to stand motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5 so that the House can proceed with motion No. 7.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBER'S MOTIONS

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED PUBLISHING OF MARKETING QUOTAS OF MILK BY CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of having the Canadian Dairy Commission publish the marketing quotas of the milk produced by all Canadian milk producers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the request in today's motion to publish the marketing quotas of the milk produced by all Canadian milk producers has already been made by the Quebec Liberal caucus and was even referred to the House by the present Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and member for Beauce (Mr. Caron). This request was justified in the past and seems even more justified today particularly at the very outset of what could be the third great war of milk producers.

Of course, legal advisers may object on the ground that farm producers' incomes should not be disclosed, but the motion asks that a study be made into the advisability of publishing marketing quotas for all milk producers in Canada, more particularly over the last four dairy years, namely 1974-75, 1975-76, 1976-77, 1977-78. I am even prepared to recommend that this list of producers be made available only to members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and that they be given the opportunity to question witnesses as they see fit in order to clear up things and brief the producers themselves who are the first people to be concerned with this matter.

Refusing to make these quotas public or rationalizing our opposition would amount to our entering the conspiracy of silence which would lead to a distortion of the Canadian milk policy through all kinds of tricks. Are there any reasons for such a request? Mr. Speaker, our policy in Canada is undoubtedly the best in the world, we can vouch for it but we cannot accept to have it distorted because it will remain the best possible policy only in so far as the support price can provide the producers with a guaranteed income and this guarantee is a real one.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, between 1967 and 1975 the dairy policy had the incentive effects that were being sought. On the other hand, in 1975-76 we had to realize that an overproduction was becoming totally unacceptable. That is why in 1976-77 the federal government had to ask the federations to agree to drastic cuts so as to be able to bring Canadian production in line with Canadian needs. It appears that things should be back to normal in 1977-78. However, the instruments have to be reconsidered and it should again be restated that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has the duty to determine Canadian needs and to ensure that Canadian production is directly in line with Canadian production.

The management committee, for its part, is responsible for ensuring that production is in line with Canadian needs. In such a system, theoretically the quota system allots and imposes quotas on every producer. This is a power and a duty to produce but, on the other hand, it should also be a guarantee for the producer. As far as the government, the cabinet, the Minister of Agriculture, the Canadian Dairy Commission, Agriculture Canada and the management committee are concerned, the present system is not only valid but is the instrument we must have and use properly so as to give our policy the effects we would want it to have.

Indeed, between 1967 and 1975, there was a real increase in Canadian production, and at that time the policy reached the objective that our Canadian production was more in line with Canadian production so that in fact that incentive and that lack of dependence on foreign markets had been corrected since they were the reasons why the policy had been put in place in 1967. In 1975-76, when the minister had clearly established that Canadian needs were 100 million hundredweight, we saw at the end of the dairy year that production had effectively been 112 million hundredweight and furthermore, we saw that at that time production quotas were around 136 million at the beginning of 1975-76. So the management committee had failed to put Canadian needs in line with Canadian production and only conflicts of interest within the management committee itself can be cited to explain that the committee completely distorted the dairy policy.

In 1976-77, of course, producers had to accept cuts in quotas. It is said that, theoretically, that cut was about 20 per cent but when one analyzes these cuts from the standpoint of the quotas of the producers themselves one realizes that those cuts were far from being even and one even wonders—and that is why we have the right to ask that those quotas be published—how it was that producers had their quotas cut by 20 per cent when some other producers—compared with 1975-76, 1976-77 and even going back to 1974-75—had their quotas increased 200 per cent, and even up to 300 per cent. Indeed, the government was always taken to task, and the motion introduced today would seek to have the government actually take its responsibilities as well as those who have to share those responsibilities with the government.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is about time producers know what their dairy policy is all about, that device which some dare refer to as the best possible policy, whereas in fact some producers have to suffer cuts and are in a very near future likely to have to accept more quota cuts while others seem to get quotas practically to suit their needs.

In spite of the positive recommendations we made in 1974-75 at the end of the dairy year, and in 1976-77 at the time of those drastic cuts, it has been deemed advisable not to implement the recommendations because the administration and distribution of quotas were not under federal jurisdiction but were the responsibility of federations and provincial bodies. The fact remains that we may find ourselves with new quota cuts in the very near future. We would very much like to why know some producers should face cuts whereas others are buying quotas everyday almost as they wish.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is precisely what we need to know to inform producers so that they will know exactly who is responsible. I for one, in the case of the province of Quebec, regret that the Agricultural Producers' Union did not take a firm stand. I discussed this with the chairman and he always says: If the UPA gets involved in the war between the two types of milk producers, it might disappear. Then to maintain the union, and we agree on that, the UPA does not want to say the truth to producers and prefers to get mixed up in a conflict of interest.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the UPA try to make us believe that the federal government is always to blame for everything and we have letters to that effect: Quotas cutbacks are always the responsibility of the federal government when that responsibility, and the UPA people know it, belongs to their respective federation. There are also dairy federations in the industrial milk sector. It has been said that the dairy policy for 1977-78 was a good policy, that producers could accept it when a large number of them come to our offices and say: We do not have quotas anymore and we need them. As concerns whole milk, there has been a war between the two types of dairy producers since the beginning of this year. They tried to make us believe that the federal government wanted to create this war and, as concerns the famous 25 cents, thank God, the problem has been solved as I think that the interdependency of the two types of milk has been recognized and even if they wanted to invoke established policies, they had to recognize that there was in fact an interdependency between those two types of milk and that if whole milk producers had taken advantage of a situation favourable to them since 1967, in 1977 they had to correct the actual injustice made to industrial milk producers.

Mr. Speaker, the war between the two types of dairy producers might start again and I think that we have the duty to throw light on the situation. This is why I ask the Agricultural Producers' Union to establish without any doubt that the administration and the distribution of quotas is their responsibility via existing organizations at the provincial level.

In addition, the APU and the dairy federations must reaffirm their exclusive responsibility, and take what means are necessary to make sure their members know that the administration and distribution of quotas is their exclusive responsibility. Moreover, the APU must call upon its permanent members and ask them to stop shirking their responsibilities by referring their problems to the federal government, and issue instructions to that effect; otherwise, Mr. Speaker, there will be no other choice but to ask that the list of all quotas, for all producers be published or, if it cannot be made public, then that access be given to it at least to the Standing Committee on Agriculture of the House.

Then the standing committee would be able to summon witnesses and ascertain whether or not there has in fact been manipulation of quotas because rumour has it that there is almost outright banditism in the field of quotas, their distribution and administration. We are responsible, as a government, because the government has invested millions of dollars in that sector; it has the right to know who is tampering with the data of its policy; to my mind, it behoves the House of Commons to make sure that the money granted the producers can and does in fact reach them, without any of the messing around that seems to exist now.

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that I strongly support the suggestion of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) that the Canadian Dairy Commission publish the quotas of each individual dairy producer for the reasons that he explained. When we discuss the dairy policy, we find that there is one major difficulty which comes from the fact that this dairy policy, from its development to its administration, involves several groups or levels of responsibility and authority. Unfortunately, when this policy is ineffective, only one level of responsibility is held finally responsible, which is unfair since several managers or several administration or management levels deal with this dairy policy. It would therefore be normal that each level of responsibility recognize its own errors.

I believe that if the quotas of individual producers for the last five years for instance were published, we could see which producers kept to these quotas, which exceeded them and which benefited from the generosity or the administrative laxity of those responsible for the control of quotas, which does not come under the Canadian Dairy Commission, but rather under the agencies that my colleague from Compton mentioned earlier.

It is the same every time that the dairy policy is announced for the year. One year, everyone is happy, the next, everyone is unsatisfied. When everyone is happy, no one is said to be responsible for the happiness of dairy producers, but when something goes wrong, someone is held responsible for the misfortunes of dairy producers, and that is the government of Canada or the Canadian Dairy Commission. What we are forgetting is that the Canadian dairy producer, the management committee service and the producer federations all have duties and responsibilities in the administration of this policy.

When things are going wrong, it is not the responsibility level, which must first of all assess the Canadian needs, determine the amount of the subsidies and make the necessary payments, which alone is the culprit, but it must assume the responsibility together with all those who, during the year, must check production, give out or share the quotas of this production among all individuals.

Well, Mr. Speaker, in order to point the finger at the level of all the weaknesses of this administration which jeopardize the dairy policy, I feel that it is essential for the quotas to be published as quickly as possible, in order to determine which producers have remained within their quotas between 1972 and 1977 and which have not unduly exceeded their quotas, and make sure that the over-quota deliveries have not been excessive. If compared with the other producers, there are variations to the level of production, we shall know then truly where responsibilities rest, and tell the federations of producers that, before they place the blame on the shoulders of higher levels of government for the administration of the dairy policy, they ought to properly carry out their own responsibilities, namely the administration of the dairy policy.

Mr. Speaker, this concludes what I had to say on this motion.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this is a motion which I find it difficult to support for reasons which have been outlined by the two hon. members to your right who have just spoken. I sympathize with the position of farmers who wish to keep their incomes reasonably confidential, but I submit that at any point at which a complete list of milk quotas is publicized a farmer's income is publicized by the same stroke of the pen. Therefore I find the argument based on confidentiality difficult to support.

The primary purpose of the motion is to deflect criticism away from the Government of Canada and direct it to the various organizations which are responsible for the administration of the milk quota system. It is deflecting criticism on the various organizations in Canada which are responsible for the administration of milk quotas, it is deflecting criticism on the various provincial governments under whose jurisdiction these organizations operate, and it is doing everything it can to protect the Government of Canada.

If one reviews the history of our milk distribution structure, one finds that up until about 1975 the Government of Canada had neglected the dairy industry to the point where it was virtually bankrupt. It had neglected it to the point that our production in Canada was deficient to the extent that we were importing tens of millions of pounds of butter and establishing quotas for the importation of cheese. At that point in time the dairy industry was on a slide and the bank balances of dairy farmers were nil.

The next step the government took was over-stimulative. It gave the industry too much stimulation. Then the government, by virtue of its inaccurate prediction of the requirements for milk in this country, began to lay blame on everyone but those who had calculated the quotas that they thought could be absorbed. It did not work, Mr. Speaker. In other words, the computer malfunctioned. There was no accurate prediction of what was required in Canada, and the Government of Canada found itself in the very embarrassing position of having to reduce the quotas it had already established.

As a result, the milk farmers found themselves in even worse condition. They had spent the capital required to put them in the position of producing milk to meet the quota the government had suggested in 1975 the country could tolerate.

This leaves the government in the position where it can be properly criticized, first for its neglect, and secondly for its failure to estimate the amount of milk Canada could produce and consume and which the government could afford to support. In view of this total mismanagement and the practicing of both extremes, the federal government is being criticized in Quebec, it is being criticized in New Brunswick, and the industry has felt the power of the purse. The only way the dairy industry in Canada has been able to survive for a good many years is by virtue of subsidies paid by the federal government to maintain the Canadian dairy industry. When we get to the point where we withdraw that subsidy and complaint is expressed, as it has been by the two members to your right, Mr. Speaker, then there is something the matter with the government's dairy policy.

I am quite prepared to have the provinces send the various representatives of the milk industry to the agriculture committee to express their complaints. And let the committee consider those complaints and make recommendations thereafter. If by chance the organizations in Canada want to publish the total list of quotas, then that is their position and we will support it. But out of the clear blue sky, having received no recommendation from any farm organization in Canada that we take this step, I find myself in the position where I am compelled to oppose this motion.

The latest representation I received pertaining to milk is by way of stoical complaint and complete resistance to the government's position that there should be a levy on fluid milk production in the various provinces. One or two provinces have capitulated, others have adjusted, but the dairy farmers are not necessarily in accord with this position. Therefore the federal government is subject to criticism, and let it take criticism where it deserves it, because it has brought it upon itself.

The problem in Quebec has been very serious. It was unique inasmuch as the quotas which were issued were taken up with the great encouragement of the government of Quebec. When the Canadian Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) had to back off, he embarrassed his own Liberal government of the day in Quebec and hurt the pocketbooks of the farmers of Quebec. Let us not try to deflect the blame for this on to farm organizations which are administering the policy of the federal government as issued with the full power of the purse by the Canadian Dairy Commission. This does not elicit support as far as I am concerned.

There are one or two comments which have been made in this regard with which I concur. The responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture in his dairy policy is to see that prices and subsidies as a combination do give a farmer a fair income; there is no question about that. But that, Mr. Speaker, starts in the chair in which the minister sits. It does not go back to the milk producers' organizations, the dairy commissions in the individual provinces, or whatever it may be. Responsibility for the distribution of manufacturing milk and fluid milk quotas is the responsibility of the minister, if he were in his chair, not the responsibility of the provincial organizations or provincial ministers. They have to live within the money which we vote and the distribution as prescribed under the guidelines of the minister. The guy who is responsible is not here.

I am not going to be party to laying any blame on the organizations of Canadian farmers which administer the ultimatum issued from Ottawa by the minister. If the House wants them to appear before the agriculture committee to make representations, then fine, I buy that. But I submit the minister will take a few knocks if they do come before the committee. Perhaps they will not come because they will not be invited.

I find this a very difficult motion indeed to support, Mr. Speaker. I think there would be some very serious repercussions if the House as a whole supported a motion which basically is politically oriented so as to deflect all criticism from the Government of Canada and the Minister of Agriculture on to farm organizations, placing the responsibility in their hands.

Let us instead, Mr. Speaker, bring in a motion asking the Minister of Agriculture to be responsible for prices and subsidies which will provide adequate income for individual farmers. We will then not need to know, and the farm organizations will not have a problem with how big or how small is the quota, how it is come by, or how it is distributed. That is a farm problem which should be dealt with province by province, organization by organization which deals with milk in the various areas of Canada.

[Mr. McCain.]

Mr. Florian Côté (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words only, so that there may be time left for my colleague the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Caron), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, because he knows the problem very well. I would simply like to answer briefly the comments made earlier by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain). I have been familiar with the farm problem for 25 years, especially the dairy industry problem.

I could deal at length with that problem, because my qualifications are not only those of someone in a position to criticize the government or point out the weaknesses of certain agencies that do not take their responsibilities, but those of a former producer, someone victimized by the lack of understanding of some governments, including the former Progressive Conservative one. The previous speaker forgot about that. All those problems I had to face. I felt bad when I heard suggestions earlier that the minister should be blamed for the loss of revenue incurred by farmers, when in fact our dairy policy has come an extraordinary long way since 1967. The only problem in that dairy policy is that mentioned by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier), namely that there is some mismanagement of quotas, some kind of favouritism.

Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to state that not later than this morning, I had the visit of 27 farmers in my constituency, in Sorel. Those farmers were blaming the government for not getting the required quotas. They were hearing from their producers' federation. The government was responsible. Had I more time, I could have told them about the Canadian government's contribution. The Canadian government has been looking after the dairy industry since 1963, when the Progressive Conservatives lost power. Before that I was a producer myself and I felt the consequences.

I would like to conclude now by suggesting it might be normal that the proposal be accepted, although care should be taken as far as disclosing farm revenues is concerned, although milk is not the only source of revenues. Sometimes, there are other sources. Maybe there should be further discussion on that later on. So I give a chance to my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, so he can quote some figures. Maybe this problem should have been discussed for a few more hours, so hon. members opposite might better realize the problem is caused by some agencies not taking their responsibilities.

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) for the motion he introduced before the House today to discuss the publication quotas. If hon. members wonder now about the necessity to make public the marketing quotas for each industrial milk producer in Canada, it is because the reasons underlying such a request appear to be indisputable since they aim at greater justice at the individual level. It is true that all ministers and members as well as the Canadian Dairy Commission have received many letters from milk producers complaining about injustices or the lack of quotas.

Several members as well as myself have brought the grievances of those of our constituents who are producers before the Canadian Dairy Commission. To our knowledge, according to the answers given by the commission, some of the injustices that had been underlined actually took place in many cases not as much at the level of the manipulation of the quotas as at the level of the implementation in the provinces of the regulations by the Canadian committee for the management of milk supplies.

I think that to understand perfectly the complaints of milk producers for the 1976-77 milk year in particular, one has to have a look at history. Let us go back to the year 1973-74 when Canada had to import butter because the Canadian production was not sufficient to meet our own demand. During those years, producers could buy quotas at very low prices. One has to remember that, in 1975-76 they could even get them for nothing. Such a lack of production was due to the fact that the prices paid for industrial milk were too low. The producers and their sons hardly made a living out of that production. Then, following numerous representations from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the federal government decided to rebuild confidence in that important area of Canadian agriculture by bringing the price of industrial milk more in line with production costs.

In 1975-76, the Minister of Agriculture asked the milk producers to boost their production by 5 per cent, that is from 95 million hundredweights to 100 million hundredweights in order to meet the Canadian demand. The attractive milk price, the ideal weather and the lack of appropriate control over production by the management committee resulted in the production of 113 million hundredweights of milk and in reserves which, by April 1, 1976, totalled 42 million pounds of butter and 300 million pounds of powdered milk. At the same time, world prices for milk products became disastrous; for instance, skimmed powdered milk fell from 45 cents down to 10 cents and 8 cents a pound. The export fund had a deficit of $130 million by the end of that milk year.

It was then necessary to reduce the production in relation to Canadian needs and consequently to reduce quotas allocated to each province and to each producer. The implementation of the rulings edicted by the milk supplies management committee in a period of underproduction resulted in injustices at the very level of the producers themselves, in 1976-77. These injustices which today seem to justify the announcement of quotas, do not originate from the handling of the quotas per se but rather from the implementation of the rules set up by the management committee and which was done to the knowledge of the representatives of the federations and the provinces.

We are not saying that these rules should not have been changed, that they have not created injustices, but we are simply saying that they have been applied without changes. We have nevertheless touched the heart of this issue. The Canadian milk supply management committee which is composed of 23 members had established these rules during a period of underproduction and the 1975-76 overproduction as well as the cut in quotas which took place in 1976-77 created a tremendous chaos. Apparently nobody had foreseen the mechanisms which would apply in such a situation. Is there anyone here who has forgotten those 8,000 to 10,000 farm producers who came to demonstrate on the hill?

This management committee which is so often referred to is composed of nine provinces excluding Newfoundland, and it is presided by the Canadian Dairy Commission and its three commissioners; a representative of the producers sits there for every province with the exception of Quebec and Ontario which both get two representatives and finally there is also a representative from the provincial governments. Mr. Speaker, in short, the provinces and the producers of products with a high content in milk enjoyed a definite advantage during this overproduction period of 1975-76. The uniform 18 per cent cut applied in 1976-77 bore heavily on the industrial milk producers who had increased their production only very little or not at all.

It benefited producers who produce mainly consumer milk and who had known increases of 35 to 40 per cent. Today, the problem is different and if quotas were to be made public, any increase in quotas for every producer would then be known, which would enable each of them to discuss individual increases which can occur through the purchase of quotas or by any other means. One of the drawbacks of this action, however, would be that the name and possible gross income of every producer would then be known and as a government, we must wonder whether making this information public meets the principle agreed to by our society as regards the secrecy surrounding any information concerning private people. I wish to thank above all the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) for raising the matter of the publication of quota lists.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but as the private members' hour has now expired, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6:03 p.m., the House took recess.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSED LIMITATION ON COMMITTEE STAGE OF BILL C-11

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien:

That in relation to Bill C-11, An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, three sitting days shall be allotted to the further consideration in Committee of the Whole stage of the said bill;

Allotment of Time for Bill C-11

That, on the third of the said days, at fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business in such sitting, any proceeding before the Committee shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question then necessary in order to dispose of the Committee of the Whole stage to the said bill, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the federal budget has changed in recent years because it is a means by which the government carries out economic, fiscal, and social policies. These tax changes have not developed from the earlier time when secrecy was all that important. Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has only a relatively small group of people who can advise him on tax changes before he makes proposals to the House of Commons. Thus, these substantial tax changes are often not very good, because the people who advise him cannot be expected to be aware of all the pitfalls.

At the present time, anyone can make submissions to the government and to the Minister of Finance on the pre-budget preparation in regard to things which should be in the budget; but there is no method available to the Department of Finance to decide and sift these in order to have public debate on their advisability or non-advisability. Everyone who makes submissions has their own personal interests to look after. What may benefit a small group of people may not benefit the country as a whole. This is where the House of Commons comes in to debate government proposals in the way of tax changes.

Imperfect as it may be, committee of the whole is the only means by which we can debate, pro and con, the tax changes. I am unhappy to see the government introducing closure once again. Debate on closure on second reading was finished before the actual time allocated. Similarly, there have been only five hours of debate in committee of the whole. Much of that was spent on the insulation problem. We have not touched roll-overs as yet, which is very important. It is a recognition that the capital gains tax, which was instituted at the time of the white paper, is not working the way it should. This Chamber is the only forum where we can debate these important things.

There is no way in which amendments can be instituted in this House except by the government. No witnesses can be heard on the merits of a bill or a tax change. After all, this is the place where we must act as witnesses; we must make suggestions and carry out the public interest. Even at the other place after third reading, when the bill is sent there, no substantive amendments can be made. That is the case on third reading in this House, or while the other place is dealing with the tax changes.

The government has erred in closing debate on these very important clauses, particularly those which will be dealt with next, such as the roll-over tax, which is the capital gains tax, and basically on which the whole of the tax changes proposed in the white paper and subsequently brought into the legislation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I want to join the chorus of people who are lamenting the fact that the government has been almost spontaneously invoking closure on this very important piece of legislation regarding taxation. During second reading debate, when I spoke on this bill, I made the point that the government seems to have adopted the philosophy that it ought to spend as much as possible and, in order to pay for that, tax as much as possible. It has almost come to the point that when the government sees a missed opportunity for taxing, it is looked upon as a loophole. Then that loophole has to be covered, which is too bad.

The fact that closure has been invoked means that members of the opposition, whose duty it is to examine the expenditures of the government, are foreclosed from that full opportunity which we deserve. During the closure speeches on second reading, the hon. member for Skeena, the hon. Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), rose to speak in favour of the closure motion. As reported at page 1131 of Hansard dated November 22, 1977, she said the following:

This parliament is based on Westminster, the Mother of Parliaments, yet we have not modernized to any degree whatsoever our monstrously inept rules to deal with the lightning-quick world in which we live.

I am sure hon. members will realize that I do not agree very often with the hon. member for Skeena. Usually we do not see eye to eye on too many subjects; but I must agree with her that the government lives in a kind of medieval world when it comes to the business of the House. Intuitively I agreed with what she was saying, but I thought there had to be documentation for it. I went to the "Oxford Companion to English Literature" and, sure enough, that is where I found the documentation to prove that parliament is still operating under the rules of the Middle Ages. I turned to the section under S where I found the definition for Star Chamber. This book tells me that:

The Court of Star Chamber, whose procedure in the reigns of James I and Charles I made it a proverbial type of an arbitrary and oppressive tribunal, was developed from the above judicial sittings in the 15th cent. It was abolished in 1641. In its original (Tudor) capacity, it was essentially the 'poor man's court', to do justice against great lords.

I think it is almost prophetic when it says that under the original rule of the Court of Star Chamber the poor people were protected from the oppression of the lords, but under the reigns of King James I and King Charles I—and, should I say, of King Pierre I—the poor people have lost that protection because the Star Chamber court is operating somewhere in the inner recesses of the government. I thought that was a good piece of documentation to prove the point that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport had some basis in fact for complaining that parliament was still operating under the rules of the nineteenth century, and probably according to some mediaeval principles.

Then I remembered that before the Star Chamber court was dissolved history records that there was what was called the Long Parliament. Charles I, that imperious monarch who thought that parliament should be putty in the king's hands, decided that because parliament was not automatically voting funds to him the way he wanted and allowing him to spend the money the way he wanted to spend it, and they were examining the rules too closely, did not bother to recall parliament, so they had a long session lasting a number of years. This was called the Long Parliament. I know that King Pierre would like to do the same like his forebear, Charles I, but he has not been able to summon up the nerve to do that yet. It is one of the techniques under which we have been operating in this session of the House whereby the committees have not been summoned to meet, as they should have, to examine the estimates. This is another form of closure.

I remember back in history the techniques used by William the Conqueror to assess all of the citizens of his newly acquired realm, and I remembered a big book called the Domesday Book. I should like to read from the "Oxford Companion to English Literature" the description of the Domesday Book. It says:

> . . . day of judgment, is the name applied since the 12th cent. to the record of the Great Inquest or survey of the lands of England, made by order of William the Conqueror in 1086. It contains a record of the ownership, area, and value of these lands, and of the numbers of tenants, livestock, etc. Its title originated in a popular name given to the book, as a final and conclusive authority on all matters connected with land-tenure.

If my memory serves me correctly, I recall history which tells us that the king's ministers used to ride up and down the land to meet the poor peasants. If a peasant said, "Look, I am living in these poor, abject surroundings. Obviously you can see that I do not have money to spend on myself, therefore, please do not tax me", the king's agent invariably would say, "Judging from the very fact that you have been spending your money on material things, you must have a lot of money saved up and therefore I will levy the tax on you". If the argument went the other way and the king's agent saw the peasant spending lavishy, he would say, "Look, you have a lot of money to spend, so I will tax you". In both cases they were taxed. This seems to be the way the government operates here. No matter how a citizen manages his affairs, the government finds some way of taxing him.

I was looking forward with great relish to the debate which will come, that is the debate in committee of the whole. I think that it is probably the most democratic role of the House of Commons when, from any position in the House, we can examine the minister and he will attempt on the spot, to the best of his ability, to answer our questions. I think that is democracy in action. We should be able to have as much time to examine as carefully as possible not only this bill but the minister's policy which lies behind the bill. I think it is an invigorating part of the examination and debate on this matter.

This is the one area where we have the kind of freedom we deserve to examine government legislation. The government, by its so called modernization of the rules, has taken away every other opportunity to meet in committee of the whole, and now it wants to take away this opportunity also. I think that this limiting of debate is a sham to hide the government's attempt to do what it wants to do without giving the opposition opportunity to scrutinize the estimates properly. We oppose that kind of guillotine with all the vigour we have. Because we are limited in debate in committee of the whole, we want to serve notice on the government that we will examine the estimates right down the line and as carefully as we can.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in making a brief contribution tonight I would like to say that it is pretty obvious to all members that the government has long displayed a perverse genius for deficit financing and regressive taxation. As if that were not bad enough, now we see for the second time in a little over two weeks another use of closure to limit discussion.

An hon. Member: Time allocation.

Mr. MacKay: Closure by any other name hurts as much, I say to the minister. Unfortunately the rules we have, always end up by constricting debate and reflecting on the ability of the House to do the job that the people of Canada sent us here to do.

It is pretty obvious that, in contrast to the United States where a meaningful attempt is being made to reform the taxation system and to simplify the rules of taxation, we have a monstrosity of a bill here with 116 clauses, over 200 pages long. I suppose that one reason why the government is anxious to stop Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition from studying to the end this cumbersome and contradictory bill—which could have been discussed fully had the government had the intestinal fortitude to put it before the House when it should have been brought forward—is because it is giving itself power to raise $9 billion for public works and general purposes. That provision appears at the very end of the bill, and it is not much wonder because it certainly gives the lie to any meaningful attempt by this administration to save money.

I am surprised the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who, I believe, comes from the small town of Shawinigan, who was a lawyer and who, I would expect, would have some feeling for small business and for stimulating the Canadian economy, does not have some feeling for limiting the type of taxes that are stifling the country's economy. I would have expected that he would have done something meaningful to change and modify, and in some cases perhaps do away with, certain of our capital gains taxes.

I think it will be useful for members to consider that more money has been lost to the taxpayers of Canada because of UIC fraud—according to the Auditor General, some $95 billion—than the government has realized from the capital gains tax. There has been more money spent on Petro-Canada than the government has derived in revenue from capital gains tax.

When we look at the results of the capital gains tax in this country in terms of destroying initiative and taking away that urge to do something with one's money or to get into business for the sake of realizing capital gains, in my submission we see that the results are not worth it as far as the government or the country is concerned.

I say in all sincerity to hon. members opposite that I cannot understand why, if they insist on going ahead with the capital gains tax in every field except, I suppose, the family farm, which was one instance where Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the government were able finally to come to some sort of consensus when it became obvious the harm this was going to do, the government and the Minister of Finance do not take this opportunity to rework the capital gains concept so that Canadians who are buying stocks in Canadian companies—sometimes by virtue of payroll deduction—are not treated differently, when these securities are sold, from a speculator who goes down to the stock exchange or arranges through his broker to buy 1,000 shares of a company and sells them after a few weeks and makes a quick gain.

I can see the justification for taxing in those latter circumstances, but with inflation proceeding at the rate it is, and in many cases with the taxpayer borrowing money to buy securities to add to his portfolio, I do not see how the government can possibly justify taxing people on any basis after they hold Canadian securities for a few years, long enough to demonstrate that they are buying them as an investment to educate their children or to facilitate their retirement, or for some other worth-while purpose. I urge the Minister of Finance and his influential parliamentary secretary to have another look at this concept so that the initiative which is being blunted by this capital gains tax the way it is presently applied can be freed, and so the taxpayer, the ordinary Canadian who wants to invest in his country and wants to invest in Canadian companies, can do so without having his investment wiped out by the fact that when he is taxed, taking into account present economic positions, he is worse off than when he made the investment in the first place.

Another thing I think Canadians would do well to consider is the fact that ever since the then minister of finance—I believe it was J. L. Ilsley in 1942—put into effect the confiscatory arrangement whereby taxes are deducted at source, most Canadians have not fully realized the extent of the tax moneys which have been taken from them at source. The confiscation of their hard earned dollars they never even see. If Canadians had to write out a cheque and actually pay those moneys to the government, they would be far more conscious of the tremendous amount of money which is taken away by the government, to the point where we are perhaps the most regressively taxed nation in the western world.

This bill is full of contradictions and full of the worst kind of tax fraud, as far as I am concerned. It is difficult to reconcile the so-called tax benefits whereby a tax cut of less than $2 a week is supposed to be a stimulant for the economy. As the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) has pointed out, the average person who earns $10,000 and who is subjected to a cut in his allowable wages increase from 8 per cent to 6 per cent is certainly not even holding his own in this respect. The difference between an 8 per cent and a 6 per cent raise on a $10,000 salary is $200.

With its usual hypocrisy the government is saying to that taxpayer that it is doing a big thing for him by giving him the $100 tax rebate, but when the poor fellow counts it up at the end of the year, he finds that as a result of the "charity" exhibited by the government he is actually substantially worse off than he was in the first instance.

It is obvious that the attitude of hon. members opposite and of the Minister of Finance cannot be founded on any sense of logic or equity. To suggest seriously that the opposition is stalling on this bill to the point where it is justifiable for the government to bring in closure, is just not in accordance with the facts. It has been pointed out already, and I think it should be pointed out time and time again, that this legislation is substantially the same legislation which was brought in on June 15. Because the government was either unwilling or unable to get its act in order, it found it necessary to bring it in at this late stage in this session of parliament. Having done that it seeks to shut off reasoned debate about the honest concerns of opposition parties for the sake of ramming a piece of legislation through which, on its face, is full of contradictions and deserves to be severely criticized.

If one looks at the forecasting record of the government even cursorily, one cannot really blame the government for wanting to get this piece of legislation out of sight, and hopefully out of mind, as far as the Canadian people are concerned. On March 31 the minister's predecessor forecast 4 per cent real growth, 6 per cent inflation, and a $6.4 billion cash requirement. This was not a forecast of which one could be very proud. Even government apologists would have a great deal of difficulty in suggesting that this was living up to Canada's potential as a trading nation.

As a result of further mismanagement and incompetence the forecast had to be changed to 2 per cent real growth, at least 8 per cent inflation, and a $8.5 billion cash requirement. With a performance like this, with a record like this, and with a bill which is, as I said, a monstrosity which would require many hours just to put fully on the record and to have explained, it is little wonder that the government is seeking to bring in closure to justify its own incompetence.

I wonder if this precedent is going to be used again and again because, if so, it has the potential of making this institution practically meaningless. Certainly the opposition cannot do better than have the opportunity to examine just a fraction of the important clauses of this bill which purport to change the very basis upon which Canadians have to plan their affairs. If that is so, and if the government is going to come into this place and say after a few hours' debate that it wishes to restrict the time for the scrutiny that members of parliament are bound to give legislation like this, by virtue of their mandate as members of parliament, I wonder where this institution is going to go.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, one of the earlier speakers said something about taxes and livestock, and that reminded me of something which happened to me just a few months ago. I was up in my constituency in one of the homestead areas where there are still people working who remember the days of pioneering. One of the competitions they had at the annual fair I was at was the selection of "Mr. Homesteader" or "Mrs. Homesteader of the year." Each of the people taking part in this competition was set some tasks, and one of the tasks was to milk. They could not bring a cow into the hall, so they brought in a poor old nanny goat.

None of the six or seven people involved was experienced at milking goats, and they tackled this goat from different directions, one from one side, one from the other side, two lay underneath—and I forget what the others did. Just when it was all over I was sitting on the platform, and the nanny goat looked at me. She was bleating and looking miserable. I wondered where I had seen that face before. It was the face of the Canadian taxpayer who has been milked by the last six or seven ministers of finance. The present minister is just like the last competitor who stood, if I remember correctly, astride the goat and reached underneath searching for something to milk. He obviously did not have much experience. He only knew he was supposed to get milk out of the poor old goat, forgetting his predecessor almost milked it to death. This, as I say, was reminiscent of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). He does not know where he is going to get what he is after. That is the background against which this debate is taking place.

If this bill stood in isolation I would probably say that there has been enough time on the debate, but it cannot be considered in isolation. We must consider it against the background of an incompetent, inept, scandal-ridden government which has shown its inability to deal adequately with issues which confront this country, and a calendar of ineptness, indecision, corruption, and all the things we have seen manifest in this land.

These are the people who say, "Let's get through with this budget." They treat budgets like housewives treat paper towels and toilet paper. They tear off some and use it, wait a little while, and tear off some more. They do it in budgets, mini-budgets and legislation. There is neither rhyme or reason; no sense, no intelligence. I would guess that before this budget is finished the Minister of Finance will introduce between 12 and 20 amendents.

An hon. Member: At least.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. members who were in this House at the time Mr. Benson was minister of finance at the time the famous bill that was brought in concerning the white paper and the new approach to taxation, will recall that bill was debated at very great length to the accompaniment of screams of anger from the government who said that we were taking too much time. Before that debate was concluded, hundreds of amendments were introduced and hundreds more were brought out in the Senate. Hundreds more were promised. I would wager that some of the amendments we are now dealing with were contemplated by Mr. Benson,six, seven, or eight years ago, and we are still dealing with them. We will probably still be dealing with them ten years from now in the aftermath of this unfortunate measure inflicted upon this country.

Under those conditions it is essential that we in this House take the one limited remedy left to us in the course of a debate in the Committee of the Whole, and point out the inequities, the improprieties, the bad measures, and suggest that amendments should be made. Each amendment which the government may bring in may well result in a benefit to the Canadian taxpayers to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars over a period of time. If we should take an extra five or six days in the course of this debate, as we well could and if the government would listen to us and accept the amendments which have been proposed by my colleagues, the savings to the taxpayers of Canada would be well worth the time spent.

I do not think the government will do it. It will probably introduce some amendments it has seen fit to deal with. It probably has a great many more to be processed through the bureaucracy of the Department of Finance. This is the situation. It is a sad story.

Parliament has deteriorated in its powers. It has a Minister of Finance who does not know where he comes from or where he is going. This has led to the deterioration of our parliamentary institutions, and has allowed the country to fall into decay from the point of view of national unity.

The government has failed to grapple with regional difficulties and needs. On the one hand talking about national unity, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) travels around Canada interviewing the premiers, suggesting a third option, suggesting what should be done to bind together the wounds of our country, and at the same time the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) makes a speech in Ottawa where he says we do not want a third option. The idea of a third option is to give to the federal government even more power than it has, to take away from the provinces some of the authority they now possess.

The government, in litigation pending before the Supreme Court, instructs its counsel through the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to challenge the rights of provincial governments with respect to natural resources. This is the sort of government that comes before us asking for taxation proposals contained in this bill, and at the same time says, despite the obvious inequities, despite the fact that we intend to improve the legislation before it is finished by moving amendments, "It is not for the poor peasants in the opposition to have the opportunity for adequate debate at this particular stage." However, if this bill stood by itself in isolation, I would agree with the Minister of Finance that there has been adequate time. But you cannot do that.

I suggest the Minister of Finance will be back to this House, and to this parliament within a year, admitting some of the things proposed now are not working, asking this parliament for changes to the income tax legislation, to his fiscal policy. He may be back in six months. If we are going to have an election, he will probably be back even earlier than that. Under those conditions, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is mere folly for the government not to listen to the very intelligent and earnest representations which could be made by this side of the House to the minister and to the government so that this bill, which is before us, will leave parliament in vastly improved condition.

Obviously the Minister of Finance is not interested. Nobody in the government is interested. They have their minds made up. "All systems are go. To hell with the taxpayer. To hell with the Parliament of Canada. Hurrah, hurrah for our side." This is the situation we have to face, Mr. Speaker. It is essential that we who care for the values of this place, and the things it can do, should protest not so much the element of time but the cavalier treatment which is accorded to the members of the House of Commons by the government in connection with its budgetary measures, and the steps it has taken in connection with this particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: You are in your seat.

Mr. Alexander: I am sorry, I was not in my place when I started to raise my point of order. I do not want to get involved with this debate about the government cutting the throat of the opposition—

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Alexander: Could the minister give us some indication tonight as to the number of amendments which he intends to bring in in order to make a bad bill just a little bit better? Could we have an indication of the number of amendments he has in mind?

Mr. Chrétien: I have already tabled a few technical amendments when we were in committee. On Friday I gave the opposition parties one further amendment I wish to introduce, that is, an amendment my colleagues approved only last week, so it was impossible to deliver it previously. These are the only new amendments we are proposing.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. Chrétien: The others are well known by the opposition. We have approved five clauses in the last five weeks—

An hon. Member: How many amendments?

Mr. Chrétien: —and at that rate it will be 110 weeks before we pass the bill.

An hon. Member: How many amendments?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I appreciate the comments of the minister, but unlike other ministers with whom I have dealt in terms of other pieces of legislation, we have always had the number of amendments. All I am asking the minister is this: how many amendments? Un, deux, trois, quatre, cinq, six, etc. How many amendments has the minister at 8.40 p.m. on this date? I am not asking for a rundown of what they are about—just how many.

Mr. Chrétien: They are all on paper.

An hon. Member: Get out your computer. How many?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, since we will be under closure when we get back to the Committee of the Whole, how is the minister going to get amendments before the committee to clauses we may not have reached before the guillotine falls?

Mr. Alexander: A very good question.

Mr. Chrétien: If we do not reach an item, we will not have any amendments. We will have to live with the bill as it is. As we say in French—

[Translation]

They bitterly regret it.

• (2042)

Mr. Stevens: Following on the rather evasive answers by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to my colleague from Hamilton West, I wonder if the minister could be more explicit. Are the amendments we have yet to consider in committee of the whole, beyond the technical ones that he referred to, the ones that were given to us in private on Friday afternoon, numbering eight, and there will be no more amendments?

Mr. Alexander: That is the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member received only the amendments which we will suggest if we reach that clause. I think it is clause 14. However, at the rate we are going it will at least take three weeks to come to it.

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, if one had listened to the discussion in the House since eight o'clock, one would have the feeling from listening to the opposition that this bill had only just come into the House of Commons, that it had been discussed for perhaps just one day, and there had been practically no time spent on it in the House of Commons.

I am informed that the facts are somewhat quite different. In fact the bill has been in the House of Commons for five solid weeks. There has been a great number of opportunities for hon. members to make contributions to the debate on the bill. One of the difficulties, and I think opposition members have pointed out a real problem, is that not very much time has been spent in Committee of the Whole House.

The interesting thing about the bill, of course, is that it originated in the budget of the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), sometime last spring.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think it is very much a point of order that none of us should sit here and have misstatements going on the record. This bill has not been before the House for five weeks.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. When time limitation was brought in on second reading, the opposition had five hours for debate. They could not even muster enough speakers to use the five hours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: I certainly apologize to hon. members if I was mistaken, and that we have not spent five weeks on this particular debate.

Mr. Stevens: You were misinformed.

Mr. Reid: My understanding at least is that it was four weeks.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It's coming down.

Mr. Reid: I am now informed that we spent some 32 days—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: —which seems to me, the way the House of Commons spends its time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) has the floor. We should all listen to him.

Mr. Stevens: He should stick to the facts.

Mr. Alexander: Let him say something honest.

Mr. Reid: The only point I want to make is that we had plenty of time to discuss the bill in general but not enough to discuss it in Committee of the Whole. The problem is that members are great on the generalities but not so great when it comes down to the specifics.

One of the frustrations that members have is the fact that we still use the Committee of the Whole House for finance bills. It is clear to me that this system is archaic and useless. If we had any intelligence, we would take the finance bills as we take all other bills, send them off to committees, allowing the committees the freedom with finance bills that we have with every other bill. They could call outside witnesses and outside experts who could prepare themselves before appearing in front of the committees.

When we put this bill in the Committee of the Whole House, we limit ourselves in what we can do with it. We cannot bring other people into the House to hear testimony, and find out what we can do with the bill. In effect, we limit the bill as it is before us, that is, to the opinion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and of the Department of Finance. In financial matters, we ought to try to cut a wider swath as with any other bill.

I recognize that when the rules were reformed it was considered we would make a distinction between the bills that were sent to committees and those which would stay on the floor of the House of Commons. To give greater prestige to the finance bills, it was decided to leave them on the floor of the House. It is amusing that, in the seven or ten years we have been working under this system, we have discovered that the least efficient way of handling these bills is the choice we made, that is, to deal with them on the floor of the House of Commons.

What happens? Members spend all their time on second reading. When we come to the Committee of the Whole, members are unable to comprehend fully all of the technicalities. Ministers often have that problem as well. Instead of being in a forum where we can get technical assistance and have people come before the committee or the House, we cannot do that because of what we have done. One of the things we should look at is to get rid of this archaic system of having the finance bills passed in committee on the floor of the House of Commons. It simply does not work.

The second point I want to make is with regard to the question of closure, time allocation, or whatever one wishes to call it. Basically, we do not use our time very well in the House of Commons. It is a great tragedy that, with a technical bill such as a finance bill, we will spend very little time actually going over the technical details of it. This would have happened with this bill regardless of closure or not.

We have to come to some kind of agreement among ourselves that we will limit what we do on second reading and spend more time in committee studying the details of legislation. There very seldom is legislation brought into the House of Commons without any kind of warning, that is, as a surprise. Basically we know what the government's plan is and we know what will be brought forward. Therefore we have to start focusing on how we use our time.

There is a whole series of other legislation before us. We have not been able to get to it because we have spent all our time dealing with this finance bill and the Speech from the Throne. Those are the only two items we have had, plus the elections bill.

This bill has been around since last spring when the then minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale, presented his budget. We have already passed two or three bills which he presented. What is in this bill is not new. The additions brought down by the Minister of Finance in his so-called mini-budget were not extensive in terms of technicalities.

The other point is the comment which was made in the Financial Post by a lawyer whose name escapes me. I paraphrase what he said. He stated that anyone who knows anything about tax law would have to tear out his hair in frustration if he expected to find any enlightenment about what was going on from what was said in the House of Commons. Quite frankly, that is an appropriate comment. All one has to do is look at the speeches made over the last four weeks on this bill to find out how little goes on. He also made the point that members opposite did not understand the proposals they were criticizing. Even in some answers by the Minister of Finance, he was not as fully informed as he ought to have been.

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: That ought not to be surprising because of the technicalities. At least the minister has access to some advice because of the House practices, where the opposition has none. The only point I am trying to make is that it is absolute madness—

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order—

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Oh, sit down.

Mr. Stevens: I feel that the record should be constantly brought up to date. I have just received another amendment that will be proposed to be made during the committee of the whole stage. There will be nine amendments that we know of so far which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will be making.

Mr. Chrétien: That is true, Mr. Speaker, but we are not even sure how many days it will take to get to clause 14. Perhaps that will only be on Friday afternoon. In addition, it is an amendment that is desired by members of parliament. It is all related. It is to make sure that further changes on this question of insurance companies will be brought about. I have listened to representations by members of this House as well as from outside. If members opposite do not want it, we will not have it, but we will know who to blame. It is important that the people of Canada know that we are completely on their side. It is about time we decided who is running this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I am sorry, but the time, has expired. It being 8:51 o'clock p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 75C have expired. Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Motion (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish at this time to reserve the right to raise a point of order at a later date arising from the preceding proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the deputy government House leader makes reference to some question about the application of the Standing Order on the duration of the ringing of the division bells in circumstances of this sort. I must say it would benefit the House, and certainly benefit the Chair, if either the House would address itself to the problem or the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, because the language of the Standing Order is not entirely precise regarding the application in all cases of a 15 minute bell in situations in which a vote is anticipated but not at an exact time. It would be of great help to the Chair if it could be discussed, either in the House or in the committee. The point is well taken for another occasion.

I do now leave the chair for the House to resolve itself into committee of the whole.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 1, consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at its last sitting an amendment to Clause 6, presented by the hon. member for St. John's West, was under consideration. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Stevens: Before we proceed to the debate on the amendment brought in by my colleague, I wonder if the committee would consent to the Minister of Finance tabling further amendments which he is proposing to make to this bill. Eight of these amendments were offered to us on a private basis on Friday. The minister has added a new one today. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that a week ago today the minister tabled ten or 12 amendments, and they became part of the record of the proceedings of this House. I think it would be very helpful if we could have these new amendments also tabled by the minister, if there is consent.

• (2132)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to comply with the wishes of the hon. member.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must point out to the hon. member and the minister that there is a procedural problem. Such documents cannot be tabled in committee. They must be tabled when the Speaker is in the Chair, but there is nothing to keep the minister from putting the amendments at the disposal of the members of the committee, and then tabling the documents tomorrow or on some other occasion when the Speaker is in the Chair.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think the trouble arises simply because of the wording of the request made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The last time this happened the amendments were not tabled; they were just handed to Hansard, and the House agreed that they be printed in Hansard as if they had been read. If the hon. member for York-Simcoe had put the request in that form, I think there would have been no problem.

The Chairman: I do not see any significant difficulty with the last suggestion.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: With the unanimous consent of the House, I should like to table the amendments to clause 14 and following clauses for distribution to all hon. members in the House. Those amendments on insurance companies have been asked not by all hon. members but quite a number of them, and in particular by those on this side of the House.

[English]

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that the amendments mentioned be printed as if they were read to the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Agreed and so ordered.

Subclause 14(1)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, before my amendment is carried, I would like to summarize for a few minutes.

Mr. Chrétien: Oh, no!

Mr. Crosbie: Do not get excited. I am giving hon. members a chance to vote against this.

This is a clause in the minister's bill which discriminates against the residents of eight provinces of Canada, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. This clause provides that any grant a householder gets in any of the provinces or territories except Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island will be taxable. Grants made to those lucky people in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. will not be taxable at all. We on this side propose that we do away with this discrimination and that grants to recipients anywhere in Canada be not taxable. We support the programs in Nova Scotia and P.E.I., but they should be the same across Canada. They should have the same non-taxable status. The only answer the minister has given in reply to this amendment is that it will cost the treasury $560 million over seven years if we pass this amendment to delete that clause. That is an errant piece of foolishness. The minister has produced no figures whatsoever to show that that is the case. As a matter of fact, government figures show that this year the program is supposed to cost $45 million. We know it will cost much less than that.

The program has not been successful. In the year 1978-79 the cost is to be $145 million, and in seven years the cost is to be $1.4 billion. The minister is saying that if this clause remains in this bill one half of the expenditure of the government will come back to the government in tax revenue. As I explained this afternoon, for that to happen four million householders would have to receive the maximum grant of $350, and every one of them would have to be taxed at a 50 per cent personal income tax rate. In other words, they would all have to be wealthy and earning something like $30,000 or $40,000 a year in order for the government to get back this $560 million over seven years. That is a piece of errant nonsense. It is not an accurate figure.

It is not going to cost the government much to put the people who live in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Alberta, the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory and Quebec on exactly the same basis as the people of Nova Scotia and P.E.I. That is why we are moving this amendment.

Incidentally, there are only seven million households in Canada which could possibly receive this grant over the next seven years, and only 1.223 million are eligible next year, so how the minister is going to lose $560 million through this clause there is no way of telling.

If hon. members vote against this amendment they are voting to put a tax burden on the people who live in their provinces. That burden is not justified, and it will not be placed on the people who live in Nova Scotia and P.E.I. Being from Newfoundland, I am certainly not going to vote for that. We in Newfoundland should pay the same taxes as people who live in Nova Scotia, Ontario or British Columbia. We should not be taxed differently because we live there. I have never heard such a principle being suggested before.

Because we have closure I cannot go into the other 1,000 arguments in favour of this, but any hon. members opposite who vote for this clause certainly deserve to go down to resounding defeat, particularly hon. members from New Brunswick and other unfavoured parts of the country like the north. Any hon. member who votes to have this tax apply to citizens in their constituencies and not to other citizens should be defeated. I hope hon. members opposite will break the heartless, merciless discipline they are under and vote with the opposition.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make just one clarification. I have had those estimates looked into again by my officials, and they maintain that it will probably be $560 million which will be lost in terms of revenue. That could vary, because it is an estimate of the situation over a period of seven years, and we cannot forecast exactly what will be the rate of income tax for everyone who will be receiving grants. Of that $560 million, $360 million will be lost to the federal government coffers, and $200 million will be lost to provincial government coffers. I am very surprised that a former minister of finance of Newfoundland would not care more about revenue for his own province's treasury.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Chairman, on the same question, I would like to ask the minister if he has assessed the effect upon an old age pension recipient who has supplementary benefits when she is reported to have an additional income of $350. If it is interpreted in the regular way, it means a decline of some $15 or $18 per month in the supplementary benefits which the old age pensioner would receive. Has that little snag been considered by the minister's department or by the Department of National Health and Welfare? Are old age pensioners in receipt of supplementary benefits to be penalized?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure the situation described by the hon. member will apply. There is provision in the bill that a person in that circumstance will not see her supplementary income diminished by that, and I will provide the hon. member with the clause. It is clause 115.

Mr. McCain: The reason I raise the question is that an old age pensioner in receipt of supplementary benefits in my area was advised by the officer supervising that structure in New Brunswick that she would definitely lose somewhere between $15 and $18 per month if this amount of money is considered taxable.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member would like to pass the information contained in clause 115 on to the officer who gave that misleading information. CHIP grants will not affect the amount of the supplement.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if what he is stating is confirmation of a question which was addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and a statement she made on this issue in the House earlier this year.

Mr. Chrétien: This is exactly the same question, and my colleague was giving the same information to the House at that time.

• (2142)

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Crosbie) negatived: Yeas, 39; nays, 55.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Stevens: At an earlier session of this committee I raised the procedural question as to whether subclause 5 is in order, bearing in mind the wording that we find in the income tax motion. You will recall, Sir, at that time I made the basic argument that there was a very wide discrepancy. Subclause 5 is worded as follows:

That it will apply to any proscribed program of the Government of Canada.

Whereas the actual income tax motion refers to a much more limited type of taxation, being limited solely to the Canadian home insulation program. Mr. Chairman, when we dealt with this on December 1—

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member is raising a very important point of order on which the Chair will have to make a decision. I hope the hon. members will either listen or, if they have other business to attend to, leave the committee.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. On Monday when we were discussing this point of order I asked the Minister of Finance to explain to the committee why he felt that the wording we have in this bill is proper. I pointed out to the minister that the wording in the income tax motion seems to deal only with the question of taxation of the home insulation program—which presumably means the grant—whereas the wider wording in the bill would appear to cover any program that the cabinet might proscribe. At that time the minister was very candid, and as reported at page 1478 of Hansard he stated:

> We can introduce a program. It is not a question of having the right to tax. We can decide to extend or modify a program or decide to give more grants, for example. This bill will authorize the government to make it taxable, if it wishes.

> If we want to apply the same system of giving a grant and taxing it, we are getting this authority for that kind of program and it is related to a program of the same nature.

With all due respect I would suggest what the minister has indicated is their intention is exactly the reason why we must not find the provision in the bill in order. He has, in no uncertain terms, spelled out they anticipate the provision, if passed in its present form in the bill, will be much wider than was proposed in the income tax motion.

As we know, Standing Order 60(11) states:

> The adoption of any Ways and Means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

I will repeat that:

> . . . to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

"Based on" I would suggest are the key words. Therefore, is there a substantial change between the wording in the income tax motion and the wording in subclause 5 to which I have referred? On that particular point, Mr. Chairman, I would refer you to a ruling by His Honour, the Speaker, on December 18, 1974, at page 224 of House of Commons Journals—a question of a similar nature—but I would say not nearly as serious as the one we have before us tonight. It was then reviewed by the Speaker and he made these observations:

> The question is an extremely important one because it relates to the financial initiative of the Crown and to one of Parliament's most basic processes—Ways and Means.

Later he went on to state:

> I wish to repeat and emphasize however that the terms of the Ways and Means motion are a carefully prepared expression of the financial initiative of the Crown and frequent departures from them can only invite deterioration of that most important power.
> Furthermore, I have considerable sympathy for the argument that once the Ways and Means motions have been adopted by the House, changes of a nature any more substantial than the one before us now, ought to be made by the House.
> Obviously, the most desirable practice is for the bill to adhere strictly to the provisions of the motion, and departures, if any, ought to be the subject of the strictest interpretation.

My argument is a very simple one. If you read the wording in the income tax motion which refers solely to a grant received under the Canadian home insulation program as being something to be included for the purposes of calculating taxation on a person's income, and then, if we read the wording in subclause 5 proposed by the Minister of Finance, I would say we have no alternative but to find that there is indeed a much wider interpretation being given in the bill than in the income tax motion.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think we can save some time of the committee. It is not necessary to continue arguing this point. I agree with the hon. member. I again checked this and I feel that he has a good point. Rather than having a complicated procedural problem referred to Your Honour, I want to state that I agree with the hon. member. The ways and means motion is more narrow than the bill and this should not be.

If the hon. member will co-operate with us, I will propose some amendments right now that will define that this power will only apply to the Canadian Home Insulation Program. The power will not be broad enough to be brought into all other grants. The hon. member made a good point, and I recognize it.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the Minister of Finance that he has changed his attitude very quickly tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lumley: He said that the other day.

Mr. Stevens: The fact is we do have a provision before us and I feel, if the minister is sincere in stating that he is willing to alter it—

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): He just said it.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, could I get some order? If the minister is willing to narrow his proposed amendment down to precisely what was in the income tax motion, I suggest that we give him some time, stand the subclause, and that will mean we cannot vote on the whole clause tonight.

The Chairman: I cannot make a judgment until I hear the proposal of the minister. If the hon. member has no objection, I will call on the minister at this time to let the committee know of his intention. When I have that proposal in front of me, I can make a judgment. I am ready to accept the suggestion of the hon. member to stand the clause if the hon. member wants to consider the proposal of the minister, either procedurally or otherwise. I am open to any suggestion, especially in view of the time we have now arrived at tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have here three amendments I should like to table and which will enable us to answer the objection of the hon. member. Obviously, the description in the motion introducing the bill is different from that contained in the bill and so these three proposed amendments will straighten out the situation so that the power will apply only to the program for housing insulation in Canada.

[English]

The Chairman: The proposal of the minister is made in the form of an amendment. Possibly I should read the amendment proposed by the minister applicable to this clause and, for the information of hon. members, read the other amendments in reference to the other clauses, without trying to make a decision at this time. The hon. member will then have until the next sitting of the House to consider the amendments. That will give the hon. member an opportunity to raise another point of order if he wishes. It is moved by Mr. Chrétien:

That subclause 6(5) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 38 on page 7 thereof and substituting the following:

"Government of Canada relating to home insulation for the purposes"

The next consequential amendment reads:

That subclause 23(2) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 6 on page 35 thereof and substituting the following:

"of the Government of Canada relating to home insulation by"

The other amendment intends to make the following change:

That subclause 115(1) of Bill C-11 be amended be striking out line 8 on page 210 thereof and substituting the following:

"the Government of Canada relating to home insulation for the pur-"

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I have just received these amendments for the first time. Could we stand subclause (5) of clause 6? We could have further discussion on clause 6, other aspects of which we could now debate.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that clause 6 be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, it was my intention—

The Chairman: If the hon. member is suggesting that we stand a subclause, that is impossible. The entire clause has to be in front of the committee. This does not prevent any member from raising any other relative question. However, the only way we can suspend consideration of the subclause is by suspending consideration of the whole clause and by going on to clause 7.

Mr. Peters: There is another way. Call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: I hear another suggestion. We could at this time call it ten o'clock. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Chairman: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again tomorrow at the next sitting of the House. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REASON FOR ELIMINATING FRAUD SQUAD—POSSIBILITY OF REINSTATEMENT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am calling for the reinstatement of the Unemployment Insurance Commission Special Investigation Division, otherwise known as the fraud squad.

The fraud squad was disbanded in 1975 after two hours notice, by Mr. Guy Cousineau, the then chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and now president of Loto Canada. Mr. Cousineau's reason for disbandonment was that the squad was submitting too much overtime and travel expenses. Mr. Cousineau also ordered that all fraud squad documentation be destroyed.

I am requesting that Mr. Cousineau and the former minister of manpower, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), appear before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration to explain the destruction of documents and reasons for the squad's disbandonment. At present, each district office investigates its own fraud situation, which is completely unsatisfactory. The findings of the fraud squad were becoming too embarrassing for the minister and the government and were the main reason for dropping the fraud squad so suddenly. I am also informed criminal embezzlement was reaching $100 million yearly.

At a special investigation division conference held in Ottawa in December, 1974, a UIC official, Mr. D. Coates, stated, and I quote from the conference minutes:

. . . the SID was established almost overnight at the insistence of senior management and under the direction of senior management to meet an urgent need. . . . To talk, however, of abolishing such a division cannot be a responsible position in light of the evidence of internal and external fraud.

Statements this past week that private investigators in Toronto can gain access to UIC computers and receive unemployment insurance records is further evidence that the fraud squad should be put together again.

There are other areas of concern. My informants state that internal fraud has infiltrated the pay system in the Unemployment Insurance Commission. UIC employees are receiving cheques from UIC computers. Embezzlement in the UIC is out of control.

Investigation should also be launched to confirm how easy it is to obtain extra social insurance numbers needed to defraud the UIC. One UIC embezzler working out of Edmonton and Calgary had 100 social insurance cards in his possession when arrested for UIC fraud by the former special investigation division. He was fraudulently receiving $10,000 weekly in payments when arrested. A similar racket was discovered in Montreal; an individual in possession of a collection of social insurance numbers was embezzling funds with the aid of a UIC employee who was destroying all inside files, leaving no evidence of illegal payments in the office. I am informed that this practice still continues today.

If an unemployed person holds one of these cards and has an inside contact, details are fed into a form headed "Initial Claim Data". One part of this form is fed into a computer which results in a cheque being sent out. As long as the other portion of the document is destroyed there is no evidence of anything improper having been done; they can keep feeding the computer, and cheques can be sent out by the computer indefinitely.

There was evidence just last week, in a story out of Toronto, of the possession of additional social insurance numbers by a Mr. Charles Templeton. Mr. Templeton has admitted that he has two insurance numbers—that is something else which should be investigated. Hon. members will understand that, faced with this type of misuse of UIC facilities and the easy access possible to computers, there should be no delay in reinstituting the fraud squad which was disbanded in very mysterious circumstances. I trust the parliamentary secretary will inform us tonight that this fraud squad is to be reinstated without delay.

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on November 28 the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) released a communiqué to the press in which he accused the government of doing too little to eliminate internal and external frauds under the unemployment insurance program. He claimed that a special investigation squad under the old UIC had been disbanded for political reasons. In support of his claims, the hon. member published duplicates of secret UIC documents on the special investigation squad.

In the House of Commons, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) called those allegations nonsense because they have no foundation. It is quite regrettable that a member of this House should distort the facts to that point and produce information obtained from a source which is, obviously, neither qualified nor reliable. The special investigation division of the old UIC was put together in late 1973 and early 1974 at a time when the control of UIC benefits was coming under a reorganization following considerable amendments made to the administration of the UIC program in 1972 and 1973. By the end of 1974, the situation was obviously beginning to stabilize. The operations of the special investigation division, up until then distinct from benefit control, were integrated with the latter. So they were decentralized on a regional basis under the old UIC.

Mr. Speaker, the statistical data prove that the efficiency of unemployment insurance control increased substantially since that decentralization took place. With the help of their support staff the investigators made 450,000 investigations in 1974. This number is estimated at over 675,000 in 1977. In 1974 the investigations resulted in 1,081 prosecutions. That number has increased progressively since and should exceed 6,000 in 1977. In addition to those results the number of fines imposed as a result of the decentralized benefit control process increased from 23,000 in 1974 to an estimated figure of 60,000 in 1977.

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had bothered to check the facts before making his allegations he would have realized that the decentralized control of UIC benefits represents a substantial improvement over the situation that existed before. The minister stated that he was firmly committed to continuing to improve benefit control while at the same time maintaining the quality of the services provided to jobless Canadians whose incomes must be supported while they are looking for a job.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time alloted to him is now expired.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—EXCEEDING OF DEPARTMENTAL APPROPRIATION—POSSIBILITY OF DISCIPLINARY ACTION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on December 2, as reported at page 1493 of Hansard, when the Minister of Indian Affairs was replying to my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), he said:

—I have only one responsibility as a minister and as a member of this House and that is to uphold the law—

I took this opportunity to ask the minister what action he had taken when an appropriation within his responsibility of $1 million had been exceeded deliberately by some $400,000. The minister replied as follows:

—the hon. member knows that we have taken disciplinary action. He was told that in the committee.

If I had been told that in committee, Mr. Speaker, I would not be here tonight. When the deputy minister was before the committee, he admitted that the law had been broken, and stated that under the Financial Administration Act the controls in service at the time were inadequate. He also advised that disciplinary action had been instituted—not taken; that action was put in motion this November past and that this infraction took place early in the year, or became known to the department early in the year. We were advised that the individual was up for incompetence, that as of December 2 this year the personnel officer did not have all the answers and still had the following important questions unanswered. Here I quote from the proceedings. This is the personnel officer speaking:

Did he do it on his own or was he pushed into it or asked to do it or directed to do it? Is he the only one implicated in this? That I do not know.

The disciplinary action which the minister speaks of—and this is what has happened to date—is as follows:

All signing authorities, all supervisory responsibilities, have been removed from the individual and he has been relegated to a specific task which removes him from this area of responsibility.

He is, however, Mr. Speaker, temporarily on the same pay status, and this action was only put in place approximately one month ago. The excuse given was this:

In view of the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act and some of the procedures in existence, it is not a quick process.

A $1 million appropriation was deliberately exceeded by $400,000. The official responsible for this is at the same pay level, but he has had his signing authorities removed and he has been given a special task. And the minister tells this House that disciplinary action has been taken! I say this is not good enough and that we will not stop this all too common practice of exceeding budgets and appropriations until proper corrective measures are taken.

This department of government is out of control. If you doubt what I say, Mr. Speaker, all you have to do is to read the 1976 and 1977 Auditor General's report at paragraph 18.7. There is little point in having laws if they mean nothing and are not enforced. This only lessens respect for the rule of law not only outside but within government.

I suggest that there is foot dragging on this matter and the minister was not correct when he said in the House that disciplinary action had been taken. The action taken has been surprisingly slow. The knowledge of the case is shallow. Important questions are still to be answered. When one considers that $400,000 is the amount of the infraction, and that the actual value of the inventory against the book value is in question, coupled with the serious charges contained by the Auditor General in his 1974 report, I suggest that the minister take a personal interest in this runaway aspect of his department.

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, I want to say that all hon. members should not lose their sense of perspective about this unfortunate circumstance.

Let me make it clear that no one has stolen money, no one has got away with public funds. The $400,000 by which the revolving fund's authorization was exceeded represented services rendered, and arts and crafts inventory on the shelves. Nevertheless, it is perfectly true the authority granted by parliament was exceeded, which is the important point. That is unmistakable and, as the Standing Committee on Public Accounts was told, this should not have happened. Steps have been taken to guard against a similar problem arising. In view of these facts, I think members deserve an explanation of how such a thing could occur. Therefore, let me trace the sequence of events.

When parliament authorized the revolving fund in 1972 to assist in the marketing of Indian arts and crafts, it attached certain conditions to the operations of the fund. Parliament said that all revenues and expenditures must be charged to the fund. That was a sound decision. If it had been properly followed, we would not be discussing this unfortunate error today.

Some time after the fund was established, the Treasury Board approved a submission permitting certain charges to be made, not against the revolving fund, but against the department's operating appropriation vote 5. It is at that point the authority of parliament was exceeded, because basing themselves on Treasury Board operation, the department charged certain management fees and certain advances made to the fund's managers to vote 5. This should not have happened.

When this situation was discovered earlier this year, the present management of the department immediately recognized that it was a violation of the limitations placed upon the authority granted by parliament. Steps were taken to prevent a recurrence. The charge against vote 5 was reversed, and the $400,000 was shown as an expenditure under the revolving fund beyond the fund's authority.

The hon. member essentially centred his question around what has been done in terms of the individual's responsibility. I should like to refer to page 2:29 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts of Thursday, November 10, 1977, when the Assistant Deputy Minister is reported as saying the following:

All signing authorities, all supervisory responsibilities have been removed from this financial officer and he has been relegated to a specific task which removes him from this area of responsibility.

Also I should like to refer to page 2:26 which reads as follows:

It is a serious matter, I agree. I have said that the individual is up for incompetence. I have requested personnel to document the case, to face the individual and to go through the machinery.

That is in keeping with the minister's answer where he indicated that the hon. member knows disciplinary action has been taken, and he was told that in committee.

I emphasize that funds were not spent to the benefit of any individual. They were not pocketed by anyone. The services were appropriate services, and they were rendered to the fund. The arts and crafts were purchased, and they remain as saleable inventory of the marketing service.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—MEETING OF RESOURCE MINISTERS—DISCUSSION OF OWNERSHIP AND TAXATION OF RESOURCES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to address a question to the parliamentary secretary in the absence of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) of whom I made an inquiry on November 24 with respect to the position of the federal government relating to a very important decision the Supreme Court of Canada handed down regarding the CIGOL case. At that time I attempted to obtain some information from the government as to its intentions relating to a clarification of the rights of provinces with respect to the ownership of mineral resources.

What we have, so far as the CIGOL case is concerned, is a very momentous decision which is the result of a case which has been carried on both within the province of Saskatchewan and between the province of Saskatchewan and the federal government. The decision has left the people of Saskatchewan in a state of concern. They do not know at this time whether or not they will have to bear this heavy responsibility, the potential repayment of about $600 million as a result of this one decision.

We have the spectacle in the province of Saskatchewan of a provincial government which has demonstrated a very substantial capacity for mismanagement of the affairs of our province by getting us into a form of taxation which has now been struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada, notwithstanding the fact that the government had been warned well in advance of putting on this tax that there might be problems so far as its constitutionality was concerned.

On the part of the federal government there has been a history of confrontation over mineral taxation between the federal government and the provinces. It was bad enough when the federal government took a position with respect to the deduction of provincial royalties and taxes in its computation of federal taxes on resources, but we have also the situation of the federal government actively intervening in the CIGOL case, siding with the oil company against the interests of the province with respect to the ownership of mineral resources.

I say to the parliamentary secretary that the situation was brought about by the provincial NDP government and the federal government, and it is leaving the people of Saskatchewan out in the cold. I am afraid that this decision may have far reaching implications, and it is most important that we get a clarification as to what the rights of the provinces are with respect to mineral taxation. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, the province's natural resources were handed over to provincial jurisdiction in 1930, and we have always assumed in that province that we are the owners of the mineral resources in that province. Now we find, as a result of this decision, that we have less than full ownership. It appears that we have ownership so long as the resources remain in the ground, but as soon as we try to extract them and sell them, all of a sudden the federal government appears to have the upper hand if there is a conflict between the jurisdictions of the provincial and federal governments.

It is incumbent upon the federal government, in the interests of national unity if nothing else, that it clarify immediately the extent of ownership of mineral resources, because if we do not have that, a situation will develop, particularly in western Canada, of increased alienation toward the federal government in particular if the rights of the provinces with respect to their resources are being limited. This clarification could be made at a meeting between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is going to Regina on Wednesday, and the premier, or with the appropriate ministers involved.

The basis of the decision has been twofold. One is that there was indirect taxation and therefore it was unconstitutional. The second basis of the majority decision was that as soon as a resource passes into interprovincial or international export trade, if there is a conflict between federal and provincial jurisdiction, the federal government has the priority.

I suggest that the implications of this decision, are very wide-reaching, and I think what has happened as far as other provinces are concerned is that they have come to the point where no one is really attacking the arrangements as far as the amount of the tax payable, for example, to the province of Alberta or to other provinces with respect to oil, is concerned. The federal government receives a certain portion. The oil companies receive a certain portion of the increase in value by way of increased profits, but I suggest that the principle involved here is that a federal government which is inclined to exercise its authority in that area could very well shut out a province, effectively taxing the mineral resources contained within the boundaries of the province.

This is a very serious problem. Are we going to have the concept of mineral resources being owned by the provinces, as we have understood over the years? We now have this decision staring us in the face, and if the federal government insists on exercising or flexing its muscles with respect to the provinces, one can only expect a sense of alienation on the part of the provinces. That is why I called upon the minister at the time I raised this matter to consider, on an immediate basis, a proposition that there should be some consensus as to what is involved in mineral resource ownership. In this way we could avoid a very serious confrontation between the provinces and the federal government. At a time when we have many things in dispute between the federal government and the provinces, this is one very important area which, I think, demands immediate attention.

The final point I want to make is that, judging by the way the government of Saskatchewan is talking, it may well be that it will take the option nationalizing the oil industry and the resource industry generally. Then the federal government will have to consider its position with respect to taxing Crown corporations within the provinces or taxing the provinces themselves with respect to mineral resources. However, that will be another question in another debate.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, just briefly to recapitulate, in his remarks in this House on November 24, and again this evening, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) suggested that the Supreme Court decision in the CIGOL case had far-reaching implications for the ownership of mineral resources within the provinces. With respect, I do not see such import in the decision of the court. The question of ownership of these natural resources was not in issue.

By an agreement made in 1930 between the governments of Saskatchewan and Canada, Saskatchewan was given the ownership of all public lands, mines and minerals, and the power to administer and control natural resources within the province. The agreement was in the following terms:

> ... in order that the province may be in the same position as the original provinces of Confederation are in virtue of section one hundred and nine of the British North America Act, 1867, the interest of the Crown in all Crown lands, mines, minerals (precious and base) and royalties derived therefrom within the province . . . shall . . . belong to the province . . . and the said lands shall be administered by the province for the purposes thereof . . .

The agreement was subsequently ratified by an act of the British parliament. As Mr. Justice Dickson said in the recent decision, "Subject to the limits imposed by the Canadian Constitution, the power of the province to tax, control and manage its natural resources is plenary and absolute."

What the court decided in the CIGOL case was precisely this: the impositions placed by the province upon the production of oil in the province were found to constitute taxes of an indirect nature and an attempt to regulate interprovincial and international trade in the commodity. Both of these powers are ones that lie beyond the jurisdiction of a provincial legislature. The court did not say, however, that the province was powerless to levy direct taxes and other levies on the oil resources or producers in Saskatchewan, and indeed I understand from press reports that the Saskatchewan government has now introduced new legislation to this effect.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it can be said that the province is without power to exercise the rights conferred upon it in 1930 in relation to its natural resources. It might also be noted that, in the judgment, the Supreme Court expressly upheld the provisions of the Saskatchewan legislation providing for expropriation of property rights and the imposition of property taxes.

I also understand that the premier of Saskatchewan will be proposing to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) an amendment to the constitution that will confer upon the provinces a power to impose indirect taxes upon natural resources produced in the provinces. I am sure that the federal government will be prepared to give close examination to any such proposal. As the Prime Minister has repeatedly indicated with respect to constitutional amendment, he is prepared to review any or all aspects of the constitution, including the distribution of legislative powers, with the provinces. This would obviously include those powers relating to the raising of public revenues. However, constitutional review and revision are not something to be undertaken on the basis of an isolated situation, but rather in the context of a range of subject matters where there is agreement that a review of the existing powers is desirable.

PROPOSED CUT IN FEDERAL SALES TAX—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of great urgency. Today's unemployment rate of 8.4 per cent coupled with the inflation rate of 8.8 per cent yields an economic misery index of 17.2 per cent. In view of the consistent deterioration of our economic performance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu):

That this House instruct the government to consider the advisability of an immediate substantial cut in federal sales taxes on Canadian made consumer durable goods, which would have the effect of both lowering prices and increasing employment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the reported statements by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that Canadians "have been spoiled rotten and have been living too high on the hog" and further, according to the minister, what Canadians need is a "kick in the gut", and considering that over 1.3 million unemployed Canadians want jobs not handouts or unemployment insurance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House agrees that the Minister of Employment and Immigration in particular and the federal government in general need the strongest possible kick, not in the gut but in the lower part of their anatomy, from the Canadian people in order to get them to take the leadership required to produce jobs for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTION EMPLOYMENT MINISTER PROVIDE TAPES AND TRANSCRIPTS OF REMARKS AT OTTAWA UNIVERSITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion similar to that of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) with regard to Canada's drastic unemployment. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) made a number of comments to a group of "New" Liberals at the University of Ottawa in which he was reported as saying Canadians need a "kick in the gut" and have been "living too high off the hog". Since most Canadians would like to read the full context of the minister's remarks in order to be aware of the heartlessness of this government and its dismissal of our present economic state as being not its fault but the fault of somebody else, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House requests the Minister of Employment to make both a tape of his conversation last weekend at the University of Ottawa and a transcript of those remarks available to all individuals who request such.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION ADDITIONAL FUNDS BE DEVOTED TO TRAINING STUDENTS IN LA SARRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that the Canada Manpower Centre in the La Sarre region has run out of the money it had earmarked for its adult vocational training program, and that some sixty people would consequently be deprived of their training from February 1978 to September 1978, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

Manpower

That the Department of Employment and Immigration allocate forthwith additional funds to permit these students to complete their vocational training without running the risk of waiting too long between budgets.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION MINISTER MEET PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO DEVELOP EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since young Canadians, though representing only 26 per cent of the labour force, still constitute 48 per cent of all the unemployed in Canada; since in the last year some 83,000 new young workers have joined the labour market while only 22,000 new jobs have been created for them; since that situation threatens to poison further the social climate which is perturbed enough at this time, and bearing in mind the urgent need of a very specific policy for that category of workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House recommend unanimously to the responsible minister that he convene his provincial counterparts to study together a special employment program for young people under 25.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS IN EASTERN PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Inasmuch as a very large percentage of those unemployed, over 400,000 people or 42 per cent, are in the five eastern provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House demands as a matter of urgency a program of economic reconstruction for the have-not regions of Canada which shall include the following: a system of tax contracts to encourage the industrialization of the region; the adoption of a job credit scheme in time for this winter's unemployment hardship; a special tax rebate on inventory valuations in areas of slow growth; assistance in developing the more than 30 hydro-electric sites in the Atlantic region; special assistance to small businesses investing in have-not areas; preferred freight rates for key sectors in Atlantic Canada, such as steel, wood and food products; and the use of the government's purchasing power as a tool of economic development.

PROPOSAL TO CALL INCO EXECUTIVES BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the International Nickel Company of Canada Limited, after following a corporate policy for 30 months aimed at the production of a substantial surplus, then turned around and used this surplus as an excuse to lay off 3,000 of its employees; and in view of the fact that today a confidential report from Environment Canada was made public, and that it said in part INCO was following a policy of high grading in the Sudbury basin area, a practice which will substantially reduce the amount of recoverable nickel in that area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House call the executive and directors of INCO before the committee on national resources to account to the people of Canada for the way they have mishandled this valuable national resource of this country.

THE MINISTRY

REASON FOR ABSENCE OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in light of statistics published this morning concerning unemployment, I have to express my regrets that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is not in the House. Given the fact that those figures demonstrate that Canada is still in a pitiful situation, I would like the Acting Prime Minister to tell me very precisely—and I think Canadians would like to know too—why the Minister of Employment and Immigration is absent from the House when we have to discuss such an important issue and statistics prove that Canada is still in very bad shape. Therefore, I ask the Acting Prime Minister the true reasons for the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has been in the House regularly to answer questions in connection with the economy and the unemployment situation. His absence today is in no way related to the release of the unemployment figures, but is as a result of commitments which he has undertaken in the province of Ontario.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID IN GIVING EMPLOYMENT TO YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I am sorry that the Acting Prime Minister seems to consider as normal the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration when we discuss these statistics. Since he is undoubtedly aware that young people account for 26 per cent of manpower and for 48 per cent of unemployed people in Canada, the Acting Prime Minister, just like the Prime Minister who told young Canadians a few months ago that if they wanted to work and did not find jobs in the country, they just had to leave—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. La Salle: It's coming. Just like the minister responsible, last week—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, would he put it forthwith?

Mr. La Salle: Following those two statements, here is my question to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister any new development to announce to the House in order to correct this pitiful situation for this group of young people?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would be grateful if it were possible for the opposition to pass the tax bill which, when enacted, will provide a very positive stimulus to the economy of Canada. That would be a very helpful way of easing the economic situation in Canada.

● (1417)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary. It is unfortunate that the answers are not more positive. Since the labour force increased by 83,000 new young workers in the last year and during the same period the number of jobs for young people only increased by 22,000, has the Acting Prime Minister a concrete proposal to make today in order to correct this imbalance and the threat of a climate which may deteriorate further for this group of young people?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might have noticed that there has been a slight improvement in the employment totals in his province of Quebec, which is worthy of some comment. The proposals of the government for the stimulus of the economy were put forward by the Minister of Finance in his economic statement during the throne speech debate, and it is not the intention of the government to make new policy on a daily basis in response to questions of this kind. When policy is formulated, it will be announced and made known to the House in the normal way.

An hon. Member: A lot of baloney.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTION EMPLOYMENT MINISTER RESIGN IN VIEW OF REMARKS AT OTTAWA UNIVERSITY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): I would like to point out to the President of the Privy Council first that the Minister of Finance was reported in the Financial Times last week as saying—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Crosbie: —that budget proposals are effective on the date the budget is brought in. So it has nothing to do with the budget proposals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There are 117,000 people out of work in the Atlantic provinces compared with 39,000 in 1968, three times as many. Are the comments made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration last Saturday night in connection with unemployment that we have been spoiled rotten, that Canadians have been living too high on the hog and that we need a kick in the guts, a reflection of the government's attitude towards this tragic situation in Canada, and if he is not representing the government's attitude—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: —will he be prepared to resign?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Get up and answer that, Allan.

An hon. Member: And do something.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): I want to assure the hon. member that the statements alleged to be those of the Minister of Employment and Immigration do not represent any considered policy on the part of the government, although I find much in his statements and comments with which I agree such as, for example, his statement that it is not the total obligation of the government—and I presume the hon. member would agree with that—to provide jobs. We look to the private sector to make a very important contribution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Create the climate.

An hon. Member: Get off their backs.

Mr. MacEachen: Furthermore, I should draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that the quotations to which he referred as allegedly having been made by the minister did not refer to the unemployed of Canada. They were general comments relating to what the minister conceives to have been the lifestyle of Canadians, and that is not and has never been a question of government policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You won't get away with that.

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON PROJECT TO CUT TIMBER ON LOWER CHURCHILL TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): The minister is reflecting the views of the Prime Minister who said in 1972 that we can be obsessed with unemployment. There are 117,000 people in the Atlantic provinces who are obsessed with that.

● (1422)

There are certain things the government can do. There are two Newfoundland projects upon which the minister can act. What has happened to the project suggested in June of 1977? It was suggested that a project be commenced to cut timber at the Lower Churchill water reservoir to create 400 jobs for loggers who are now unemployed as a result of the shutdown of the Labrador Linerboard Mill. That project would bring about a permanent benefit. It has been six months now, and there are 400 who could be employed on that project. Will the Deputy Prime Minister move on that and show some concern?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of the hon. member's representations and ensure that whatever proposals have been made will be considered at the earliest possible date.

INDUSTRY

FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—PROPOSED PRESSURE ON ALCAN TO OPERATE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minster of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The consultants B. L. Hodge and Partners of London, England just made a report to the Newfoundland government and this government in connection with the fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence. They report that it is feasible to operate it, and that it could be profitable if Alcan would operate it properly and make the necessary investments. Alcan has refused to do this, as the minister knows as a result of a meeting with the Newfoundland government. Will the government take steps to put pressure on Alcan, and will the government tell Alcan that there will be no tax concessions, tax relief or assistance to Alcan in any way, shape or form if Alcan does not operate the only remaining fluorspar mine in Canada, which experts report can be operated profitably?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the management of Alcan. They informed me that the fluorspar from the mine at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, was used mainly as a chemical in spray cans, and because of the drastic reduction in the use of spray cans in Canada it is no longer feasible to operate that mine, bearing in mind the conditions under which it is operating.

They also informed me that without any assistance from the federal government they are investing something like $400 million in the aluminum industry in the province of Quebec, so they are not really withdrawing from the Canadian scene at all. They are fully prepared to participate in the aluminum industry, but they have lost $10 million in recent years operating that mine in Newfoundland, and they feel they can not conceivably carry on. However, they will gradually create a number of jobs easily through their expansion in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Crosbie: What is the good of this report then?

UNEMPLOYMENT—REASON FOR DELAY OF MINISTER'S MEETING TO DEAL WITH PROBLEM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister confirm the cynical attitude taken by the Minister of Employment and Immigration at the weekend when he said that Canadians are spoiled rotten and that they need a kick in the gut, which really amounts to blaming the victims of unemployment for their own plight? Can the minister tell the House whether this attitude, which amounts to saying that the government should not be doing anything, accounts for the fact that the government does not plan to do anything to deal with unemployment until a meeting of the first ministers which may or may not take place in February or March?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are waiting until the meeting of the premiers and the Prime Minister on the economy. We have before the House at this time a bill containing many incentives. Many people are waiting for this bill to be passed so that they can make investment decisions. In the bill there is a tax cut which will stimulate consumer demand and which will take effect in January and February. We hope to be ready very soon with a tax credit for the private sector in order to create more jobs. I hope I will be able to make a statement on this program before the end of the year. Unfortunately, it has been difficult for me to work on that program because I have had to be in the House for the last four weeks on a daily basis.

Mr. Crosbie: Why don't you do away with parliament?

UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT OF TAX INCENTIVES FOR INDUSTRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Has the minister read the report which was published in the business section of the Globe and Mail three days ago? The minister should be familiar with this report. It points out that the utilization rate of Canadian industry is at the lowest level it has been in five years, which means that the kinds of incentives the minister is proposing are the wrong incentives at the wrong time because we are operating at only 83 per cent capacity. If he has read the report by a business group, does he agree with it, that the problem right now is under-utilization? If it is the problem why does he not scrap the silly bill that is now before the House and put that money into the economy directly to create jobs?

● (1427)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the budget proposition is twofold. One portion is related to giving a reduction in personal income tax for the lower and medium income people who will be spending the money, and the other is the tax incentive given to corporations to invest. Of course, if they are not investing they will not receive the incentive and if there is no incentive, they will invest less. I think it is quite important to leave the incentive there so that they can plan for the expansion that will come as soon as the economy starts to pick up again.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROPOSED WINTER CAPITAL WORKS ASSISTANCE PROGRAM TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I would be glad to send a textbook on first year economics to the minister. It makes no sense at all for a businessman to expand if he already has excess capacity. That means the whole government's program is bankrupt.

Will the minister now accept the proposal made by virtually every premier representing all political parties when they met a short time ago at St. Andrews? They suggested the federal government bring in a special winter capital works assistance program for the municipalities which will be at least up to the level of 1971-72 when unemployment was lower in Canada. Will he bring in that kind of a program now that will provide some spending money and create jobs instead of handouts?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): We have an important proposal as an alternative plan called Canada Works and Young Canada Works which will put a lot of people to work. It was decided these programs worth $600 million would enable people to get back to work faster than the route the hon. member is proposing.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO SETTLE LAY-OFFS IN QUEBEC AND FALCONBRIDGE MINE

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the unemployment minister, because it is becoming more and more difficult to call him Minister of Employment and Immigration, my question will be for the Acting Prime Minister. Contrary to what he said a moment ago in his answer to the hon. member for Joliette, that employment had risen in the province of Quebec, statistics revealed this morning that 50 per cent of the working force was at work, the same as in November, but that on the other hand the unemployment rate was now 10.5 per cent in the province of Quebec compared to 10 per cent last month. In view of the steps which have been taken last month by the government and which are not giving positive results but only negative results as we can see from this morning's reports, in view of all this, I will address my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that, following the excellent arrangements made by the government, the Falconbridge Company has announced 600 more lay-offs, is the minister prepared to maintain the same negative and passive attitude the government has shown in the case of the 2,800 lay-offs by INCO? If not, what is the government prepared to do immediately to solve this problem of lay-offs in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): In connection with the hon. member's comments on the province of Quebec, it ought to be pointed out that while the situation is serious in that province, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for November is precisely the same as it was last month while there has been an increase of 9,000 in total employment. Although the situation is serious, there is no advantage in trying to make it more difficult than it is.

In reply to the hon. member's question, I do not accept the premise that the government has taken an inactive role in the problem that arose in Sudbury.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST THAT FALCONBRIDGE MINE BE FORCED TO PAY DEFERRED TAX

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Considering that the Acting Prime Minister does not accept the fact that the government did not do anything positive, that it remained passive, I would say to him, if we could obtain intelligent answers, our questions might be more straightforward. I will ask the Acting Prime Minister a more intelligent question.

Considering that Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited owes to the Department of National Revenue $40 million in deferred taxes and that the Minister of National Revenue is not here to answer, is the Acting Prime Minister prepared to take a position and compel companies such as Falconbridge Nickel Mines Limited which owe millions of dollars to the Canadian government to reimburse that money and would he take it to create new jobs?

FINANCE

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF SALES TAX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. With today's high unemployment levels and high inflation levels giving us the highest misery index ever in this country, will the minister reconsider his decision not to reduce the sales tax in this country from the present 12 per cent which is 50 per cent higher than even during World War II? Such a reduction would not only help consumer demand but would also help employment.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the last time we met the provincial governments, a possible reduction of provincial sales tax and assistance to province to achieve that purpose was discussed but except for one, all of them rejected that alternative. As to the federal sales tax, we thought that a reduction of tax for low and middle income people would spur demand more actively, particularly in the months of January and February.

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF EMPLOYMENT CREDIT BILL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister forgot to remind us that the sales tax is the most regressive tax he has on his books. When may we see the employment credit bill that the Prime Minister has undertaken to have tabled in this House before the end of December? When exactly will we get it? How does the minister plan to ensure that the employment credits will have the effect of relieving some of the unemployment we are heading for later next year?

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can promise this House that I will be able to produce this when I can work with my officials on a daily basis. If the bill before the House is passed at the beginning of next week I hope to be able to make—

An hon. Member: What nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I am very pleased with the reaction of the opposition, Mr. Speaker. I can see their sense of guilt showing up. I hope I will be able to make an announcement in the House before the Christmas adjournment, but if I am tied to my seat in the House unfortunately I cannot be two ministers of finance at the same time.

USE OF TAX CONTRACTS TO INDUCE INDUSTRY TO LOCATE IN AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister might be reminded of the statement "if you cannot stand the heat get out of the kitchen." Bearing in mind the 30 per cent unemployment levels in some areas of the country, would the minister give consideration to entering into tax contracts with those in the private sector who might be willing to go into some of those areas and create jobs if they could get confirmation from the government of what their long-term tax position would be?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the best thing would be to pass the bill now before the House. I think the business community is pretty discouraged at this time to see that we are in the fifth week of debate on the budget bill and are on Clause 5. If we proceed at this rate the bill will not be passed for two years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Chrétien: I think if there was a little bit more intelligence—

An hon. Member: Oh sit down.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF DEPARTMENT—PLANS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT IN EASTERN PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Minister of Finance is upset because he is speaking out of both sides of his mouth. The other day in the Financial Times he indicated very clearly that the tax measures became effective the night of the budget.

I hope I can make more progress with the Deputy Prime Minister with respect to a very serious matter raised by some of his colleagues in terms of the possible abolition of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Apparently some of his colleagues have been arguing for this in recent weeks. Can the Deputy Prime Minister indicate whether that problem has been resolved within cabinet and more importantly, what initiatives are being contemplated by the government with respect to a more flexible and effective program under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to get at the serious unemployment problem in the five eastern provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member that there is no problem whatsoever about the continued existence of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and no such problem has ever existed. I can assure my hon. friend that there is absolutely no foundation to the speculation that has been current about the possible abolition of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It has been a rather useful speculation, however, in the sense that so many people have come forward to praise and support the work of the department.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Acting Prime Minister has communicated this vital information to some of his colleagues sitting near him as well as to the Prime Minister. In light of this new found interest and support can the Deputy Prime Minister indicate whether some of the excellent suggestions made by the five eastern provinces as well as a number of interested groups, such as the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce, with respect to major changes in the effectiveness of DREE programs, will be implemented rather than the patchwork programs of the last few months?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree that it may be possible to improve the effectiveness of DREE. It may be possible and to that extent I support the representations made by the hon. member. Ideas have been put forward by provincial premiers and, as the hon. member knows, in the current series of meetings and in subsequent meetings between the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers there will be opportunity to advance this particular discussion. I can reassure the hon. member on two points: First, there is no possibility that DREE will be terminated and, second, the government is diligently seeking new ways to improve the effectiveness of DREE.

REASON FOR ABSENCE OF DEPARTMENT'S PLANS FROM SPEECH FROM THRONE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A final supplementary question. Mr. Speaker, some of this equals Saul's experience on the road to Damascus. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House why there was no indication in the Speech from the Throne a few weeks ago of any initiatives within this department and, secondly, why the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion for the last two years has been prevented from making major amendments to the most important legislation emanating from that department, the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne has never been regarded as a total statement of government policy under any government whether one supported by the hon. member or this government, so he ought not to draw any conclusions from the fact that a particular reference was not made to DREE in the Speech from the Throne.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO MAKE MORE RENTAL ACCOMMODATION AVAILABLE IN HULL REGION

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the minister's answers to my valiant colleague from Gatineau at the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs as well as weekend reports published in some newspapers to the effect that the agreement concluded between the federal government and the Quebec government to subsidize housing would not apply to the Hull area, could the minister say what the Canadian government can do or intends to do to help solve the problem due to the scarcity of public housing in the Hull area and thus reduce the long waiting list of 1,600 individuals among the poorer in our community?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is obviously a very acute problem to which the Canadian government can provide two kinds of solutions. On one hand, we have just signed an agreement under the National Housing Act and the Quebec government would only have to designate some vacant dwellings in Hull for the purposes of public housing. On the other hand, if the Quebec government rejects that alternative, we could always sell it some property, some apartment buildings and I am referring to the Jardins Mont-Bleu which could be sold by the Canadian government to the Quebec government. Indeed, we could finance 90 per cent of such a sale, so that those dwellings could be used by low income families or students who could live in that area near the Quebec University in Hull.

ONTARIO COMMISSION INVESTIGATING USE OF MEDICAL FILES—POSSIBLE FEDERAL OBJECTION TO TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it relates to the inquiry in Ontario set up to investigate the use of medical data obtained from files of the Ontario Health Insurance Plan. Has the Solicitor General or his officials been in touch with officials of the Ontario government with respect to the terms of reference of that inquiry and has the hon. gentleman made known to the Ontario officials any objection he or his department might have to the commission's terms of reference?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not been in touch with the officials in question nor have I made any representations regarding the terms of reference of the inquiry.

Mr. Jarvis: Has the Solicitor General or his officials given any indication to the Ontario government with respect to co-operation with that inquiry and, specifically, is the Solicitor General of the opinion that he will make available to that inquiry procedural manuals outlining the procedures under which this confidential data was obtained?

Mr. Fox: Following the discovery of the use made of the OHIP files there was a meeting between my department and officials of the Department of the Attorney General of Ontario to acquaint them with all the information in our possession with respect to that practice. We offered our complete co-operation to the Ontario government in connection with any inquiry they might wish to set up to look into the matter.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. According to the federal officials responsible for employment training in the Northwest Territories, the unemployment rate in the Mackenzie Valley averages 26 per cent and the rates in some communities are higher than 70 per cent; in my own home village of Fort McPherson the unemployment rate is now 72.5 per cent. Can the minister tell us what specific plans his department is preparing to create new job opportunities in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I have indicated to the hon. member in private conversation we are now working in the department on a strategy for increased economic activity in the Mackenzie Valley. There have been meetings in the Northwest Territories attended by representatives of the territorial government to encourage a community consultation process. As soon as I have worked this through I shall get in touch with the hon. member to obtain his views. I hope to be making a statement in Yellowknife on the subject some time in January.

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONTRACTING OUT WORK TO PRIVATE OPERATORS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): I should like also to ask the minister to explain the government's policy with respect to contracting out government operations to the private sector. The two most recent examples concern workers on the Merv-Hardie Ferry in Fort Providence and also, I believe, maintenance workers at the Frobisher Bay airport. While the government puts out tenders to the private sector, workers involved in these operations have received lay-off notices. It appears that this policy is reducing the number of jobs rather than creating employment and I should like to know what the government intends to do about the situation. Is this government policy? Will this policy be continued in the future?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The hon. member was kind enough to let my office know an hour ago, I guess, that he would be asking this question. I have not had a chance to look into the matter but I will do so and get back to him tomorrow.

KEABLE COMMISSION—STATUS OF JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Can the hon. gentleman enlighten us as to the current situation resulting from the serious constitutional conflict between federal and provincial jurisdictions which is being manifested in the order by Commissioner Keable, directed toward the Solicitor General and the production of security files of his department directing the Solicitor General to produce documents from his departmental files concerning the security service or to appear in person to explain his refusal to do so?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The whole question of the Writ of Evocation is presently before the courts in Montreal where we are arguing the constitutional question, what exactly are the limits of the mandate given to the Keable Commission by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec and the extent to which a provincial authority can inquire into the day to day operations of a Crown agency under the guise of the administration of justice in a province.

MINISTER'S USE OF TERM "NATIONAL SECURITY"

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): On that point, Mr. Speaker, can the Solicitor General tell us this—his answer would be useful in the context of parliamentary discussion: when he uses the term "national security", as he does from time to time in our debates, is he using the term in a jurisdictional or legal sense or merely as a descriptive phrase? Is he relating it to any part of the British North America Act?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): When we are talking about national security in this House I take a great deal of guidance from what was decided upon by parliament itself as described in Section 16 of the Official Secrets Act, 1974. This set out what the term "subversive activities" is meant to convey in Canada. The mandate of the RCMP Security Service has been derived almost totally from the definition given by parliament of that term in 1974.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC GOALS FOR NORTHERN AREA

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises from the statement made by the hon. gentleman's parliamentary secretary on Friday when he told the first Alberta NWT mining industry forum, in effect, that the days of open handed government assistance to the private sector of the northern economy are over and that Ottawa will consider supporting business ventures which meet the government's social and economic goals, apparently on a joint venture basis. My question is this: is the minister prepared to make a statement on motions setting out in detail the government's social and economic goals and, further, can he tell us whether it is government policy to scrap traditional incentives in favour of state interference?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): On the last point, Mr. Speaker, the answer is, no. As to the more general question about our social and economic goals, these have been outlined by myself in meetings with the Chamber of Mines in Yellowknife and in Whitehorse. They have been outlined, as well, by predecessors of mine. It will not come as any great surprise to the hon. member that when we are considering economic development in the north we take into account not only the jobs which can be created but the number which can be made available to the native people, the degree to which a mining venture, for example, can introduce as part of its expansion plans a training program so that there might be full involvement on the part of the native people wherever mines are located near their communities. Those are some of the social and economic objectives but if the hon. member needs a more elaborate statement I would be pleased to provide it. I shall be saying something more about this subject when I speak in Yellowknife in January.

An hon. Member: We will all go up there!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT IN SOVIET UNION OF ANATOLY SHARANSKY—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. What position is the federal government prepared to take toward the plight of the Soviet dissident Anatoly Shcharansky who attempted within the Soviet Union to monitor compliance with the Helsinki Agreement and who has been seized and held for months in prison in Moscow without trial, without charges even being laid and without any contact with his family?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government at the Conference in Belgrade has been pressing other countries for the acceptance of the principles of human rights which are involved in this particular case, namely, freedom to emigrate and the freedom of an individual to monitor the implementation of the Helsinki final act which I understand was the activity engaged in by Mr. Shcharansky. We have not yet made direct representations to the Soviet Union about this particular case, although the apparent denial of human rights concerns us a great deal.

However, I understand a meeting has been arranged between the government and Mr. Shcharansky's relatives in Canada. From that meeting it may be possible to establish a basis to make direct representations to the Soviet Union. In the meantime, however, we are pressing forward at Belgrade the principles of human rights that are involved in this particular case.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISPUTE INVOLVING B.C. TELEPHONE EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the disruption of telephone service in British Columbia as a result of a labour dispute involving B.C. Telephone and its employees. It is therefore addressed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the unions concerned are asking for government intervention, the lead editorial in this morning's Vancouver Province asks for the same thing and the spokesman for our party is today speaking with both sides in this dispute, can the minister say what role he sees for himself and the government at this juncture to bring the disputants together and get B.C. Telephone service back into operating shape?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member will be interested to know that one of our most able officers, the chief conciliation officer on the west coast, has been appointed today by myself to endeavour to see what he can do to bring the parties together to resolve this dispute. We will have to count on the parties to resolve their dispute. I urge them to accept the assistance of the mediator because we have gone through the entire dispute settlement process. We have supplied the service conciliation before. That failing, we appointed a commissioner in lieu of a conciliation board. The report of the commissioner was not acceptable to the company although it was to the union. I am hopeful that because of the ability of the mediator I have appointed, we might find a resolution to this dispute.

REMOVAL FROM AIRCRAFT OF ELECTRONIC LOCATER TRANSMITTERS—POSSIBILITY OF COMPENSATION FOR AIRCRAFT OWNERS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Transport a question regarding electronic locater transmitters. The department's policy some years ago was that private pilots had to install these in their aircraft. A few months ago the department asked that they be taken out. First, has the department any program to compensate pilots who have put in these ELT's which have not acted satisfactorily. Second, has the department any program to devise new ELT's which will work more effectively?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no program for compensation. However, the department is very actively engaged in the work with the makers of the device to develop new appropriate batteries with which to recharge it. It was discovered, after it was operating, that the Lithium batteries were a danger. For that reason, they were removed. It is our hope that by the end of January something will have been developed in the way of a new facility.

Mr. Ellis: I thank the minister for his answer. Given the fact there is a possibility of a breakthrough in the lithium batteries, will the minister consider recompensing the pilots at least for the battery portion of ELT's that have gone bad?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter to which we will have to give some consideration. It was, of course, a part of an aircraft which seemed to us to be an advantage. The discovery which was made that the lithium itself caused some danger was through no one's fault and probably would not, in precedent terms, justify compensation.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

ALLEGATION COMMISSION LIED ABOUT LAND PURCHASES IN HULL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister inform the House what measures have been taken to investigate allegations by the Quebec minister of public works that the National Capital Commission is a public liar with regard to details of the purchase of land in the city of Hull?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, those who live on the other side of the river and who are well aware of the kind of statements this elected Quebec representative makes regularly are not as concerned as the hon. member by these unfounded allegations. People living on the other side of the river are used to this kind of statements and simply ignore them.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: While that may be true, Mr. Speaker, there are people on both sides of the river who would very much like to know what lands have been purchased and for what reason. Can we have a statement on this?

VIOLATIONS OF FISHERIES ACT ON KOOTENAY RIVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. TRANSPORT

SUGGESTION FUNDS BE ADVANCED TO RAILWAYS TO BUY EQUIPMENT AND ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns a proposal I made to the Minister of Transport last July and which my leader made to the Minister of Finance during this parliament. I direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. There are a few thousand miles of railway lines in Canada that require upgrading. This will involve hundreds of steel rails, millions of ties, tie plates, anchors and so forth. In order to alleviate unemployment in the Atlantic provinces, particularly Cape Breton Island and Pictou county, will the government ensure that sufficient capital is advanced so that orders can be placed now by both the national railroads and Via Rail for the steel rails, equipment and other infrastructure that will be required over the next several years? That could be produced now and stockpiled in western Canada where it will be needed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. It is one upon which we have effectively acted already to the extent that it is reasonable. We have obtained $100 million for the construction of branch lines in 1977 and 1978. That includes $47 million for equipment which was ordered to be built at various plants across the country, including Hamilton and Trenton, Nova Scotia. In addition, Canadian National has taken some steps to advance orders and obtain rails ahead of their actual needs. The rail for the branch line program will largely be obtained in the prairies from those lines which the Hall commission recommended be abandoned. CN have been pursuing the matter of additional rail for their own on-going program, including double tracking where that is necessary, in line with the railway's very vigorous program of ensuring that all of the additional capacity for moving freight is available when it is needed. The railways have been doing a very good job on that. They should be applauded for ordering steel and rails in advance of their actual need.

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

I should like him to tell me whether there is any truth in the allegation made yesterday during the CBC French network news broadcast to the effect that for a number of years I have been under police surveillance. Have other hon. members been subjected to police surveillance over the past ten years?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the precise allegation made yesterday over the CBC French network. I am advised, however, that the hon. member was allegedly under the surveillance of the Quebec Police Force and not of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

As to the second part of his question, which is more general in scope, I feel that the Prime Minister has already provided the reply in a letter which he sent to the leaders of the opposition concerning the surveillance of House members.

FISHERIES

DEVELOPMENT PLAN FOR ATLANTIC AREA—DATE OF MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO DISCUSS IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. According to the press of December 1, finishing touches have now been applied to the long awaited $900 million fisheries development plan for Atlantic Canada. The plan is now in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Since this plan is purported to have the approval of all fisheries ministers in Atlantic Canada, again I would ask the minister if he has studied the plan, and if so, when does he plan to meet with provincial fisheries ministers to discuss the plan and hopefully implement some of it in order to put some of the unemployed citizens to work in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that this plan was being sent to me. Over the weekend I was at a meeting for a day and a half with the minister of fisheries for Newfoundland. I suppose he did not have a copy of the plan with him, or he would have handed it to me then. At the moment I am depending upon my colleague, the hon. Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. According to the press, the plan purports to be concerned with broad economic terms which tie the industry to the economic well-being of Atlantic Canada. Since the minister stated in his speech in Yarmouth on November 30 his desire to develop an independently owned fisheries fleet, separate and apart from the processor owned fleet, is it the minister's intention to announce a program for the replacement of some of our aging fleet, and the development of an inshore and offshore fishery? If so, when can we expect a statement from him which will put this broad spectrum of fleet development in process?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does exactly what the press has been doing for the last 2½ months. He is speculating on a plan which does not exist yet, to my knowledge, since I have not seen it. Obviously, I owe the ministers of fisheries on the east coast the courtesy of reading what is suggested before coming out with my own plan. I intend to separate the catching operation from the processing operation in order for fisheries to be in the hands of fishermen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-11

Mr. Speaker: As reported at page 1571 of Hansard dated December 5, 1977, the Minister of Finance presented amendments to clause 14 and following clauses in Bill C-11 which is now before the House. At that time it was ordered that the amendments be printed in Hansard as if the minister had read them.

I regret to advise the House that, through an administrative error on the part of the House, the wrong group of amendments was printed in Hansard. Perhaps that will be misleading and will make it difficult for members attempting to follow the debate today and on subsequent days in committee of the whole. In order to reduce the impact of the error, I have ordered copies to be made of the amendments presented by the Minister of Finance at that time, and the correct list will be distributed to all members who wish to use it during today's debate.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-409, respecting fair foreign exchange.

He said: Mr. Speaker, tourism surveys indicate that American tourists are finding Canada a less and less welcome place to visit. One of the reasons for this is the fact that an unfair exchange rate is often offered to them and paid to them. The purpose of this bill is to make it illegal to offer or to pay an exchange rate on American currency which is outside 2 per cent of the over-the-counter rate current at a bank in Canada.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

MOTION RESPECTING COMMITTEE SITTINGS

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be authorized to hold, during the month of December, 1977, in camera meetings to examine the Solicitor General's interim report following the recommendations of the parliamentary sub-committee on the penitentiary system in Canada, and to report thereon.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we will give consent for the motion to be presented; but when it is moved, the hon. member for New Westminster would like to say a word.

Mr. Speaker: A motion can only be presented at this time with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for its presentation?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, on the copy of the motion which was handed to me, the words "and to report thereon" appear. I did not hear those words read by the hon. Solicitor General. I am wondering whether that was intended.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, on the copy of the document I will table, the words "and to report thereon" and "et de faire rapport" appear.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, before adopting the motion I should like to point out that the committee did not have very much opportunity to discuss the terms of the motion. Would the Solicitor General take the opportunity now to explain why the motion proposes that meetings be held in camera, rather than leaving it to the committee, at its discretion, to determine what is appropriate to be heard in camera or otherwise. The uniqueness surrounding this motion is that it is fairly limiting on the committee. I thought the Solicitor General would want to give the committee its head in terms of determining what should or should not be heard in-camera. Would the Solicitor General care to respond to that question?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, this matter was discussed in committee and it was agreed to by all members present at that time. The best way to ensure that a parliamentary committee has access to relevant officials, and the best way to ensure that the committee report is implemented, would be to hold in camera hearings. Also, it was indicated that the main estimates of the Department of the Solicitor General would be before the committee some time in February and that there would be ample opportunity to discuss all matters which would be of interest.

It was thought by all members of the committee who were present at the time it was discussed that it was more important to have input into progress being made in the implementation of the report than into the possibility of making a few partisan political points.

Mr. Jarvis: I think the Solicitor General has outlined to the House quite accurately what occurred in the committee. However, I take some objection to his reference to partisan political points, because it has been my information that that particular subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has worked very well and very productively. I think I would have preferred, on balance, that the motion today had not included the words "in camera" and had let the committee be the master of its own fortunes. But the countervailing force that exists here is the very sincere and deep concern of the committee to get back to work as quickly as possible.

I would take more comfort—and I think my colleagues share my view—if the Solicitor General would take the occasion now to indicate to the House his receptiveness, should the situation arise—as I anticipate if might—that the committee might ask for an amendment to this motion so that all its meetings need not be held in camera where no good reason exists.

The Solicitor General's reference to partisan political points does not have much application to that particular standing committee on penitentiaries. When it comes to some other matters the Solicitor General might bring before the committee, we agree the meetings should not be held in camera and there will be many partisan points scored.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House long. I take strong objection to the House agreeing to a motion of this kind. I do not want to precipitate a crisis or a vote, and I understand my friends' views on this, but I think for this House to give consent of this kind, in advance, without someone saying something about it, could launch us into a precedent which we might have reason to regret. I simply say, as my friend, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot said, that when a committee comes to a decision which suggests that in its opinion it should make a decision on its own and come to the House for confirmation, that is one thing; but to give blanket approval in advance is quite wrong, and I want to register my objection to it.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I want to join in that objection. I am not a member of that committee, but I have been one many times—more often than my hon. friend, I presume—and I am interested in the deliberations of the committee and in the decisions and recommendations which the committee made previously. We are interested in knowing what progress has been made on those recommendations and why some meetings cannot be held in public.

I am quite aware that there might be reasons for having some meetings in camera to discuss, for example, why a certain person has or has not been fired, or why changes have been made in personnel. Those meetings are normally held in camera. They have been held in camera because the committee agrees to that.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Peace River that if the minister thinks there is any political mileage to be made on the committee, he is wrong. Most of the penitentiary officials do not vote, and the staff members probably have already made up their minds on how they will handle this matter, so I do not think that is a good explanation. It is necessary that we protect the individuals involved in the changes that have taken place; but I for one, as a member of parliament, am very interested in knowing what the minister has done.

Occasionally we read in the newspapers about changes which appear to have taken place, and that problems are developing in various penitentiaries for reasons which seem to be exactly the same as those given years ago, which makes it apparent that certan recommendations of the committee have not been implemented.

Although I do not feel too strongly about this, I think it is certainly a very bad precedent. I have never known of a committee being set up with terms of reference requiring it to meet in camera from its inception. It is quite normal, on occasions when personnel changes are being discussed, when a report is discussed or when concessions are made in the development of a report, to have meetings in camera. This is advantageous from the political point of view and from the view of developing the best possible report. But I cannot recollect a committee ever having been established requiring it to hold meetings in camera, and I am certainly not in favour of such a precedent in this case.

I am opposed to the establishment of any such committee—which, after all, is an extension of the House; and you, Mr. Speaker, would have great difficulty, I am sure, in recalling any time when the House has met in camera—yet we are being asked to agree to a committee starting its hearings in camera by order of the House. I am violently opposed to such a recommendation.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that I come to the rescue of any minister opposite, but I rise to do so on this occasion. It is good for members of the House to appreciate the reason for the motion of the Solicitor General in the form that it was presented today.

The subcommittee on penitentiaries—on which I served throughout its lengthy travels and deliberations in order to produce its report—produced that report on an absolutely non-partisan basis. It was a unanimous report, cutting across all party lines. We want to continue that way. The report was presented, the Solicitor General's response was given, and now we are asked to consider the progress that has been made with respect to the report and the minister's response. Normally, that kind of deliberation is held in camera. That matter was discussed at the meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and it was agreed by all members present that we would ask the Solicitor General to present the motion in the terms in which he has presented it.

We in the official opposition intend to abide by that agreement which we reached in committee, and I would urge the House, notwithstanding the fact that some hon. members believe that this creates an exception to the general rule—a point with which I have some sympathy—to accept the motion which was agreed to unanimously by all members present at the meeting of the standing committee. I urge all members to pass the motion without debate. Incidentally, another matter that was agreed to by the committee was that the motion would be accepted without debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I think it is most unfortunate that several hon. members do not understand the effect of this motion. As the former speaker the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has just said, we agreed to the presentation of the motion as drawn up. Above all, I want the House to know that this sub-committee, which is an extension of the House, sat in an extraordinary atmosphere absolutely devoid of partisanship. Political considerations never entered the picture at this sub-committee's sittings. We all proved a great sense of responsibility, which is all to the credit of the members of the committee and the House of Commons. I think that, before presenting such a motion, we should be able, as members of that type of committee, to meet our caucuses and explain to hon. members of every party why an in camera meeting is held at the report stage.

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on this motion. I certainly agree with the comments of the hon. member for Yukon. I would also like to echo the comments of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot. It seems to me that while there are strong reasons for having in camera meetings, it may be that the committee will find at some point that it wishes to hold some meetings in public. I anticipate that the Solicitor General would agree to granting that power to the committee if it makes a report to that effect. I repeat the suggestion made by the hon. member opposite, that that would be the secret to unravelling this small problem.

● (1522)

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there is a big hullabaloo about nothing. The motion seems to be quite adequate for the purposes for which it is intended. It says the committee "be authorized". It does not say it shall, or has to, or that it is mandatory. It is a permissive motion which leaves it up to the committee to decide whether the meetings are to be held in camera. Actually, I see no real problem. I do not usually support any particular party or group here, but I think there is really nothing wrong with the motion. It is a permissive motion, and there is no necessity for meetings to be held in camera unless the committee decides that it wants them held in camera.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the last point made by the hon. member for Moncton is an interesting one. After the words "Justice and Legal Affairs" the motion says, "be authorized to hold in camera hearings during the month of December, 1977". I think the motion could possibly be interpreted as being permissive, but I think it is equally possible that it could not. In other words, the motion in its form is equivocal.

I understand what the minister and the members of the committee have talked about, and I listened very carefully to what the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, said about the attitude in the committee. I do not think we should be bound one way or the other to deal with an equivocal motion. I think it is possible that that is the case. What the committee may have agreed to does not necessarily bind the House, but ought to be considered very carefully by the House.

I wonder if it would be possible, in the circumstances, for the minister to withdraw the motion today, with the idea of presenting it—if he feels he must present it with the words "in camera" in it—tomorrow. I hope that overnight the minister might consider removing the words "in camera" which offend some members—who want to see this report go ahead, by the way—thus recognizing the good faith which the committee has demonstrated. I think that might bring an end to this argument and allow the committee to proceed, because I am satisfied from what the hon. member for Yukon and others have said that the hearings, where necessary to accommodate the government, would be held in camera if that was the appropriate way to do it.

Mr. Speaker: The Solicitor General has already moved the motion and spoken once. In order for the Solicitor General to speak again, there would have to be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it quite clear why the motion was put in the first place. It was felt by members of the committee that, with the early reporting date on estimates, they did not have sufficient time to consider the implementation process of that very important subcommittee report. I thought at that point it was of sufficient importance that I would like to give the committee an opportunity to examine the question during the remainder of the month of December. That was the reason the motion was put.

It was also thought that it would be a good way of handling things if the committee members had access to the senior officials of various working groups, and that perhaps the best way for the committee to bring to bear its own thoughts on the implementation as it progressed was for it to have almost informal sessions with these senior officials. However, I would be more than willing to withdraw the motion and to consult with hon. members opposite, of all parties, to see what type of motion we could set up which would be acceptable.

My impression, when I presented the motion today, was that it was acceptable to all parties and that it would be passed without debate. However, that process has obviously broken down, and I would be more than willing to follow the suggestion of the House leader of the official opposition and see what type of motion would be acceptable to all parties.

Mr. Speaker: The Solicitor General has moved the motion and it is in the possession of the House. If it were to be withdrawn at this time, it would have to be withdrawn by the minister with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the Solicitor General have the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw his motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I record the motion as having been agreed to on division?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the revelation this morning that the continuing chronic level of unemployment has now reached crisis proportions with 900,000 unemployed, the highest level since the great depression and the highest level in Statistics Canada's history; it being noted that as bad as these figures are, they do not include additional thousands of unemployed who have withdrawn completely from the labour force in recent months; and it being also noted that related to this, the government has indicated that it plans no new initiatives to alleviate unemployment at least until after a first ministers' meeting which may or may not take place in February or March. This, I submit, constitutes a crisis and an emergency situation.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby gave the Chair the appropriate notice, which has given me the opportunity to review the contents of his proposed motion and the considerations which must be taken into account by the Chair in any situation of this sort when an application is made by any hon. member pursuant to Standing Order 26 to set up a special debate on any subject.

The hon. member and other hon. members will know that several applications of this sort have been made by him and, on occasion, by other hon. members at times in the past when economic figures of one kind or another have been released. On several occasions in the past, I have—and I will now—referred to Hansard for March 13, 1974, and November 9, 1976, two recent occasions on which I have had occasion to analyse the rule with respect to its application to chronic, as opposed to acute, problems.

The hon. member now endeavours to establish as a crisis, as I think he must, an aspect of our economic situation, namely, the unemployment situation. That problem is, of course, part of our continuing economy. It is, therefore, a chronic problem. The hon. member makes what I think is a valiant effort to put the problem into crisis proportions, as opposed to one of chronic dimensions. However, I think I must continue, with faithful respect for precedents in the past, to regard economic problems as matters of a chronic nature and, therefore, unsuitable, in their very basic nature, to an application pursuant to Standing Order 26. Without some other special item or aspect—which does not occur to the Chair at the present time—I feel obliged to set aside the application for a special debate pursuant to Standing Order 26.

I do now leave the chair for the House to resolve itself into committee of the whole.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, December 5, consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at its last sitting, clause 6 was under consideration and an amendment of the minister had been presented to the committee.

On clause 6—Exchanges of Property

● (1532)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, as we consider the three interrelated amendments which the minister tabled yesterday, I feel I should put one or two questions on them. As I read what the minister is now proposing, clause 6 will be amended as follows:

(b)(i) an amount received under a program that is a prescribed program of the government of Canada for the purposes of paragraph 56(1)(s)—

From that, it would appear that any prescribed program with respect to insulation could be taxed. Am I correct in that? Does it mean that the Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia insulation programs are likely to be taxed, in that they will be prescribed programs under this new section?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, on the first part of the amendment, the hon. member's interpretation is right. On the second part, the Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia programs will not be taxed because they are not prescribed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if the Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia programs will not be taxable as they are not prescribed, can the minister indicate if he has any other programs in mind that might be prescribed, other than the Canadian Home Insulation Program referred to in the income tax motion?

Mr. Chrétien: Not to my knowledge at this moment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: May I ask the minister why he did not bring some simplification to the act, in referring specifically to the Canadian Home Insulation Program, by using the wording in the income tax motion, rather than bringing in this piece of ambiguity speaking about prescribed programs which could presumably be greatly extended over the initial program that we understood from the income tax motion would be dealt with in this section?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I understand there is a technical problem because the appropriate act has not been passed yet and we cannot describe it that way. That is why there is the difference.

Mr. Stevens: I take it that we have the assurance of the minister that, while the wording is a little ambiguous, the department has no taxation in mind at this time other than the taxation of the Canadian Home Insulation Program itself.

Mr. Chrétien: That is right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: That would be the only prescribed program?

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member is right.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: A point of order, Mr. Chairman. There are consequential amendments to clauses 23 and 115(1). I do not know if the hon. member for York-Simcoe would be agreeable to make sure that the whole aspect of the bill is covered by what the House has voted on at this moment; and, of course, the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, we have no reason to object to the minister's suggestion that we deal with the three amendments touching on the insulation question at the same time. Perhaps it would help save confusion when we come back to those amendments later.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to object. Hon. members can only go from one clause to another and come back if there is unanimous consent. There is no way we can adopt an amendment unless the clause concerned is before the committee.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to clause 23(2). I would make a consequential amendment, and by unanimous consent go to subclause 115(1).

The Chairman: There is nothing to prevent the committee from doing that, and if hon. members agree, it will have to be done one by one. The hon. minister makes the proposal, and if it is accepted by the committee I shall call the amendment to subclause 6(5) and then by consent we will go to the two appropriate clauses and put the amendments to those clauses. Then we can revert to clause 6(5). Is that agreed?

Mr. Stevens: That would be agreeable to us, Mr. Chairman on the understanding, which I take it I do not even have to express, that the clauses themselves will still be subject to debate later in committee of the whole session, as amended.

Mr. Chrétien: Agreed.

The Chairman: That is understood. The question is on the amendment to clause 6(5), by the Minister of Finance, as put to the committee yesterday. Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: By unanimous consent, the committee will go to consideration of clause 23(2). It is moved by Mr. Chrétien:

That clause 23(2) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 6 on page 35 thereof and substituting the following:

"of the government of Canada relating to home insulation by"

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: By consent, the committee will move to clause 115(1). I will put to the committee the amendment moved by the minister. It is moved by Mr. Chrétien:

That clause 115(1) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 8 on page 210 thereof and substituting the following:

"the government of Canada relating to home insulation for the pur-"

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will revert to consideration of clause 6 as amended.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, clause 6 states that the taxation year shall be referred to as a fiscal period. I wonder if the minister could explain why we need this complicated terminology in the Income Tax Act. We use the term "taxation year" in various provisions, and then for some reason it is defined as the "fiscal year" or "fiscal period". Would it not be simpler to use one term, rather than have a definition clause to explain a term that the drafters in the first place presumably wanted to read as "fiscal period"?

● (1542)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I can give no special reason. Naturally, we are dealing here with the terminology used by those who drafted the bills. I too, like the hon. member, would prefer more simple terminology. It seems, however, that the people who draft the bills are constantly up against special problems which are difficult to explain.

[The Chairman.]

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, perhaps while the minister is taking counsel on my first question he could consider the second question which is dealing with subclause (2) of clause 6. The committee should have an explanation as to why this amendment is being requested. It deals with the acquiring of property, its disposal and replacement thereof, including such things as stolen property and various options open to a taxpayer. If the minister could describe to the committee the purported thrust of this suggested amendment, it would be helpful.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could read the explanation into the record for the committee. When a depreciable asset is disposed of for proceeds which exceed its undepreciated capital cost, a recapture of the depreciation allowed in previous years may occur. The special roll-over rule eliminates this recapture to the extent that the proceeds are reinvested in a replacement property. Under a roll-over, the profit is not exempted; the tax is simply deferred until the replacement property is disposed of. Under the present rule, amounts received on expropriation of property receive the roll-over treatment if replacement assets are acquired within two years.

There are two important amendments to the present rules. The roll-over is extended to voluntary replacements of certain business and farm properties. To qualify, the property must be real property and the replacement must be acquired before the end of the year following the year of sale. In addition, the existing rules are extended to property that has been stolen.

We spent some time the other day discussing that matter in the committee. If the hon. member has a specific question, perhaps he would like to ask it.

Mr. Stevens: Some of my colleagues are quite concerned about the roll-over provisions, especially in relation to farm properties and smaller businesses and, in particular, why there is not more latitude with respect to corporate farms and corporate small businesses. Perhaps the easiest way would be for the minister to answer a few questions from my colleagues. Hopefully, he could suggest further amendments, or satisfy my colleagues.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the minister of the comments I made during second reading debate on this very important bill. I spoke on November 17 on two aspects. One was the roll-over provision for incorporated small businesses, but especially including family farms; that is, from one generation to another. In the latter part of my speech I mentioned the possibility of an income tax deferral for the drought areas of southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan. On the latter point I have written several letters to the former minister of finance and, of course, to the present minister.

My point regarding the roll-over provisions regarding capital gains tax on incorporated family farms was that because of the tremendously high capitalization now, seven years after the capital gains tax came into being—that is, after January 1, 1972—in many cases land values have increased dramatically. I cited case histories: for example, a cattle ranch in British Columbia. The land value there went up well up well over four times. There was another case in southern Alberta where the land value increased between three and four times. The impact on an incorporated family farm operation is that the ranch operation has to be sold in order for the appropriate tax to be financed by the next generation.

The tax office permits this, of course, in the case of an individual operator. They make the assumption, I am sure, that prior to the capital gains tax era of 1972 there was no need for the incorporated family farm because of the nature of passing on shares from one generation to another. Because of the ravages of inflation and what it has done to land values and non-agricultural financing money, that has come into agriculture as a hedge against inflation, surely the time is proper to take another look at this question. I would appreciate the minister's comments.

Mr. Chrétien: We have received letters from the hon. member, which we have looked into. In handling the taxation of corporations, it would be difficult to do it for one type of incorporation—whether it is an incorporated farm or not—and not for the others. This would open a whole new ball game. I am told that 98 per cent of farms are not incorporated in Canada. The fact that a farm is incorporated means the roll-over is not needed, because there is a little more flexibility when you have shares in a corporation to transfer your assets to the other generation or dispose of the assets.

Accordingly, we are still looking at this matter to find a way to meet the requirements requested by the hon. member. But my tax advisers tell me that just to extend the roll-over on incorporated farms would create all sorts of problems. That is the reason, therefore, we have not proceeded with it in this bill.

Mr. Hargrave: Further to the minister's comments, I might add that the minister has responded almost exactly the same as one of his predecessors, Mr. Turner, did on February 18, 1975. He suggested that if they allowed this provision for an incorporated family farm, they would have to do it for other incorporated family businesses. I said at that time, and I say now: Why not? Surely, the basis of our private enterprise system in Canada is the family-type business. For the minister to shake his head and say there are administrative problems is a negative approach. There has been no change in the department's view for almost three years. The impact of inflation on the capitalized value of small business corporations is such that we have to take a new look at this problem.

Mr. Chrétien: I take note of the representations of the hon. member.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make another representation to the minister and his officials with respect to the second point I raised. I made representations on November 17 respecting the very serious drought, and implications arising out of the drought that was with us all last winter and has been up to the present time. Although it is close to 40 degrees below in southern Alberta and the southwest corner of Saskatchewan, the drought is still there. I know that from personal experience.

The general public, because of the generous rains we received during the harvest and in the fall of the year in most of the grain areas, made the assumption that the drought was over. That is not the case in southern Alberta. We received very scanty rains, and the lack of moisture is every bit as serious as it was in the 1930s. To recap very briefly, the suggestion I made was that the lesson of the thirties on how to live with a drought situation, especially in the cattle industry, was to make the number of your cattle fit growth and production on the drought lands; that is, essentially with respect to grass and feed supplies. During the 1930s there was no problem; we had no alternative but to reduce our cattle numbers drastically. In many cases we reduced them to one-half to two-thirds of what they normally would be.

The situation now is different, though the drought is quite as serious. The surface stock watering situation is worse than it was at any time in the thirties. The difficulty is that when we cut down the number of our cattle to the number we can feed on our ranges, we find ourselves in a very disadvantageous tax situation.

A presentation was made to the former minister of finance, not only by myself but by every cattle organization in western Canada. It was fully supported by the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Obviously, Mr. Chairman, it would be foolish to spend three times a cow's value on feed to enable it to get through the winter. The prudent thing to do is to reduce the number of cattle to be fed. This we are doing, but we need some understanding in relation to the tax position in which we find ourselves. The drought took several years to develop, and it will take two or three years to overcome—contingent, of course, on there being plentiful rain and a good snow run-off.

I ask the minister to give serious consideration to the suggestion that income tax might be deferred until the drought is over. In my opinion, this is a sensible proposal—much better than spending massive amounts of money on feed, particularly if some of it were to come from the taxpayer.

Mr. Chrétien: I have received representations on this subject and I am aware there is difficulty particularly for some taxpayers in southern Alberta and southern Saskatchewan. A task force within the government has looked into the proposition the hon. member is making, and it came to the conclusion that the situation did not call for the use of the tax system as a remedy. I understand the task force concluded that some provision could be made through PFRA channels.

I have a good deal of sympathy for the argument put forward by the hon. member, but the solution he offers was rejected by a committee of officials, including representatives of the departments of agriculture and finance, because of the complexity of the problems it raised. However, I will take note of the representations and consider the matter again, though I do not think I can do anything at the moment.

Mr. Hargrave: A further comment with respect to the activities, first, of the cabinet committee of eight, the contingency committee which was set up under the chairmanship of the Minister of Agriculture: the Minister of Agriculture was among its members. This committee worked through the arm of a task force under the agency of the PFRA authorities whose headquarters are in Regina. As a result of representations made by myself and others about the suggestion of a tax deferral, a two-man survey team consisting of Mr. Herringer and Mr. Wiens, both of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, was sent to assess the situation and, I suppose, to ascertain whether my representations were well-founded or not. Evidently, that survey team reported to headquarters in Regina that the reduction in cattle numbers, and especially the reduction in the number of cows, was no larger than the amount of reduction which takes place normally every fall.

I am amazed that Mr. Herringer, who was born and raised in Maple Creek, Saskatchewan—not far from my own ranch in the heart of the drought area—should make such a report. I do not believe he did. Anyway, the suggestion was made that the reduction in cattle numbers was a normal one. Believe me, Mr. Chairman, it was not. The cattle population in western Canada has been reduced dramatically, and it needs to be reduced still further. This is an exceptional situation which I think should be recognized in the taxation procedure which is to be followed.

Mr. Chrétien: I should like to make myself clear, Mr. Chairman. I did not say that the gentleman to whom the hon. member referred was the one who recommended that this proposal should not be accepted. I believe his report was referred back to the task force under the departments of agriculture and finance. The task force reported to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and to my predecessor, that the situation did not call for a special amendment to the Income Tax Act. However, as I say, I take note of the hon. member's very eloquent representation and perhaps I will ask the Minister of Agriculture to take a look at the whole question, especially if the drought situation is likely to continue for some time.

Mr. Hargrave: One further short question, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the indulgence of the Chair. I should like to ask the minister whether he would consider meeting with representatives of the cattlemen's organizations on the two points I addressed in my remarks during the second reading debate—the roll-over provision for family incorporated farms, and this matter of a tax deferral, because of circumstances connected with the drought, to apply within a specific drought area. I know representatives of the cattle industry are anxious to come here and will be prepared to present a more detailed explanation of their proposal.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member for Assiniboia has asked me the same thing, and I should like to agree. However, as the committee knows, I have been Minister of Finance for the last two months and I have spent every day of the last five weeks here in the House of Commons. My possibilities of meeting people have thereby become somewhat limited. Moreover, I do not want to go back to the debate we had earlier on this point. I should, however, like to find a date which might be suitable, and I will ask my staff to get in touch with the hon. member. If this cannot be arranged, I shall certainly make sure there is a meeting with my officials on this subject.

Mr. Hargrave: Thank you.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, as one who has studied the white paper and subsequent legislation, I should like to point out how bad this capital gains tax is, particularly as it is applied to individuals who are by no means wealthy—and, unfortunately, the tax often hits small family farms. The minister told us a few minutes ago that shares were relatively easy to turn over, meaning that large businesses have few problems in the area of the capital gains tax. The original idea of the capital gains tax was to catch the individual who bought a farm one year and sold it the next: the person who was making a business of it.

• (1602)

The suggestion we put forward was this: if a person who owned a piece of property for ten years sold it the first year, he would pay 90 per cent, but if he held it ten years there would be no tax. It would have been a much better approach to the problem than this. It has turned out to be confiscation of capital rather than tax on income.

Canada needs small entrepreneurs because of our large geographic area. Small businessmen and farmers I have talked with look upon capital gains as very important. What would be the effect of expanding a business? Would a person have to pay a higher capital gains tax if he disposed of it? We have the example of herds of cattle being liquidated because of weather conditions. After ten years of work and effort, this will probably be lost to the tax department. This is very discouraging to small businesses.

There are many small businesses with three or four employees. Rather than expanding as the government would like them to do, they stay with four, five or six employees. In this way, a small businessman can have a good living, take holidays or go fishing more often—something he could not do if he expanded his business to ten or twelve employees.

I was not quite sure what the minister said in his definition. I would like to ask him whether this applies to individuals. The minister mentioned something other than farming. Does the legislation apply to an unincorporated hardware merchant, blacksmith shop or machine shop?

Mr. Chrétien: The answer is yes.

Mr. Ritchie: If an individual goes from farming to keeping a store, will he be able to take advantage of this roll-over position?

Mr. Chrétien: He has to remain in the same field. If he has a farm which he turns over and buys another farm, this provision can apply. If he is in a particular type of business and can roll-over in the same business, it applies. But he cannot move to another type of business; he must stay in the same field of operation.

Mr. Ritchie: Would moving from farming to a farm implement agency, which happens quite often, qualify?

Mr. Chrétien: In that specific case, the answer is no.

Mr. Ritchie: If a merchant sells his hardware store and goes into groceries, would this apply?

Mr. Chrétien: It is difficult to swallow hardware. It is not exactly the same type of business. I just wanted to bring a little humour to the very difficult task we are dealing with at this time.

Mr. Ritchie: Who will make the definition of what is a "like" business? Will an individual be able to get an advance ruling or some sort of indication on this? Obviously, there will be a great many cases that will be indefinite. I used the example of hardware and groceries, but there are many businesses that are much closer related. What about a person who sells his hardware store and purchases a general store which carries some hardware?

Mr. Chrétien: On the question of advance rulings, Mr. Chairman, the rulings are made by Revenue Canada. If a ruling is not acceptable to a taxpayer, he can appeal. That is the normal process. I doubt whether Revenue Canada would want to give an advance ruling in such a situation. I will try to find this out and get the information to the hon. member. It is an administrative decision, not a legislative one.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, we went through this with the white paper. It is a bone of contention. Often, if a person does not have the advantage of an advance ruling or some indication from the tax people, he will not go through with his plans. In many instances there is no assurance. A grain farmer may buy a feed lot. Obviously, there is as much difference there as between a hardware store and a general store. Unless Revenue Canada defines the rules and lays down guidelines, this legislation will lose a lot of value.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman. If everyone were entitled to an advance ruling, it would complicate the life of Revenue Canada tremendously. Even before an individual seeks advice from his lawyer or accountant on a transaction, the officials of Revenue Canada would have to make a decision on the matter. The usual procedure is that we pass the law, Revenue Canada issues some circulars informing the public and gives as much explanation as possible. From then on it is up to the individual and his advisers to decide if it is a proper course. If we were to burden Revenue Canada even more by having to make a series of advance rulings, it would increase fantastically the amount of bureaucracy in that department.

Mr. Stevens: The present minister could never handle it.

Mr. Chrétien: No minister can handle every aspect of his department, including the minister of national revenue of the day.

Mr. Stevens: Especially this one.

Mr. Ritchie: I have been involved in one or two farm assessments of capital gains on farm sales. I think the department is usually wrong in the principle it applies to the rule. The departmental officials I have dealt with do not know much about farming.

An hon. Member: Especially in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to inform the hon. member that the adviser here with me is the son of a farmer from Saskatchewan. He decided to quit the farm and work with the Department of Finance.

Mr. Ritchie: He is a smart fellow; he has come to where the gravy is, the federal civil service. No more milking cows for him. Unless the capital gains tax is applied fairly, it will be a serious problem when changing businesses. The tax accountants can advise you. In Winnipeg, where I have my dealings, there is no rhyme or reason in relation to fact. What is done at one time will be contradicted at another time.

In the white paper on taxation we were told how the problem of capital gains went on and on in the United Kingdom. A way was usually found to get around the government. It is a real problem. The minister must simplify the definition and the guidelines so that an individual will know what to expect. I agree that the department cannot be absolutely sure about any given situation. However, there must be some way in which the department can indicate whether a certain situation qualify under the rules. If not, it is a difficult problem for the taxpayer.

The definition of "like" business is also a real problem. If it is too narrow, all cases will be turned down. If it is too wide, almost every business will escape the net. How the word "like" is defined is very crucial to this piece of legislation when dealing with farms. As this is only a postponement of the tax, I presume there is no reason why the individual taxpayer cannot pay his tax when he makes the change, or if he sells his business, even though he may buy a like business.

● (1612)

Mr. Chrétien: Would you repeat the question, please?

Mr. Ritchie: If the individual decides to pay his tax at the time he makes the roll-over—which is what a smart person would do—will he have the privilege to do so?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, we are always very happy when someone is eager to pay taxes, yes.

Mr. Ritchie: Is recovered depreciation charged as a full tax liability, as opposed to capital gains which are only half?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, depreciation is fully included in income; it is not related to capital gains.

Mr. Ritchie: If an individual had an item worth $20,000 which was depreciated to $10,000, and then he sold it for $30,000, what is his tax liability?

Mr. Chrétien: He would have $5,000 of taxable capital gains and $10,000 depreciation.

Mr. Ritchie: The minister's intentions are good, but to be effective the effect of capital gains taxes on small business must be mitigated. The change would not do much good unless the Department of National Revenue lays down guidelines. If it is narrowly interpreted, hardly anything will get into it. If it is widely interpreted, almost everything goes.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take the minister back a few years to some of the comments which were made. Perhaps I might induce him to lend his ear to the farmers in western Canada, instead of his advisers in the Department of Finance. He will receive sounder advice from the producers of this country than he will from those who live off the fruits of the land.

The former minister of agriculture, Senator Harry Hays, made a comment indicating that the time will probably come when agricultural producers will not own their land. This would be the most dangerous thing which could happen to Canadian agriculture today. The minute that takes place, the cost of food will escalate 50 per cent, 75 per cent or 100 per cent. Pride of ownership makes the individual producer work harder and produce more. I am talking about the consumers of Canada and not just the Department of National Revenue. I am not just speaking for the individual producer; I am speaking for the benefit of all of us.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the roll-over provision is in the act in order to facilitate the ownership of land by individuals. I do not dispute the statement of the hon. member. In fact, something is being done about it.

Mr. Towers: When Mr. John Turner was minister of finance he agreed to do something about the corporate part of our agricultural industry. At that time it was debated adamantly that there should be a roll-over from one generation to the next. That was good and it was a step in the right direction. Mr. Turner indicated that if we would wait in order to give him an opportunity, he would bring in the corporate part.

We are not asking for a holus-bolus opening up of the corporate share of the industry. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin has a bill before this House to limit the roll-over to $5 million and, as was suggested by the hon. member for Dauphin, it should incorporate small business. It would be in the best interests of everyone if a policy of that nature came into play.

The agricultural debt will escalate to the point the industry will not be able to carry it. The hon. member for Vegreville pointed out that during the last six years the agricultural debt has risen from $4.3 billion to $8.5 billion. If the debt continues to escalate, the producers will not be able to afford to own land and thereby will lose control of it. I am not asking the minister to delete that tax entirely. He should delay it when it passes from one generation to the next, as long as the persons involved stay in the agricultural business or small business. It is difficult to separate agricultural business and small business when dealing with the corporate structure. As long as it remains within the family, it would be in the best interests of everyone if consideration could be given to delaying the tax. I would have no quarrel with that. Even if the minister would index it, that would provide some relief.

When the capital gains tax was brought in, it was argued that the tax was unfair. Also, it was argued that the department was gathering data which would not be available to those involved in sales and would be caught up in the tax. This has happened. At that time we warned the minister it would happen. It is causing problems. Now we are speaking about something which will cause greater difficulties.

The minister has indicated that he will look into this problem, but that is not good enough. We need a firmer promise from this minister than we had from the former minister, Mr. John Turner. Mr. Turner indicated at that time that he would look into it, and we are in the same position today as we were then. We need a minister of finance who is committed to this policy. Until the minister listens to those in the agricultural industry, we will be in trouble. Also, he must listen to those in small business. I am not referring to large corporations; I am referring to up to $5 million, which is the suggested figure.

Unless the minister does these things there will be a continuing problem and members on this side will delay this bill. The minister has criticized our members for the debate we have had on this bill, but I should like to indicate that we are right and he is wrong. Can the minister promise that in his next budget he will bring in something like this, if he will not bring in an amendment to the present bill?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am willing to look into that matter. I have talked with my officials about the point raised by the hon. member. We have looked into incorporated farms which do not qualify for the roll-over provision. As yet, we have not found a mechanism to cope with the hon. member's point. An individual who is not incorporated can use the roll-over technique to transfer to his son. That cannot be done by an individual who is incorporated. The tax advisers of the Crown have been aware of this problem for some time and they have been unable to arrive at a proper solution.

The elimination of the powers of corporations can be amended by additional letters patent, and so on. Apparently it is extremely difficult to find a way to confine the operation to farming. The hon. member referred to a proposition which should be attached to it. He referred to $5 million. Of course, when a corporation is in the $5 million bracket, in my opinion it is no longer a small business but is a rather important business.

We are looking into the problem. I cannot commit myself to dealing with it in the next budget, but I can assure the hon. member that I will ask my officials to try to find a way to satisfy the representations of the three hon. members opposite who have spoken on it this afternoon, and of some other members such as the hon. member for Assiniboia who has mentioned it to me privately. We do not have the solution as yet, but we are trying to find one.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would accept a formula from some of the farm organizations if they could come up with a reasonable solution to this problem, because apparently the administrators in the department will not do it and, as I said earlier, the minister is listening to the wrong people. He is listening to the people who introduced the tax in the first place. He should be listening, to the people who want the tax lifted and retain ownership of the lands in the hands of the producers. This is what is important.

I would hope that the minister could at least promise to work with farm organizations and small business, groups of people who are interested in the roll-over aspect of the provision. I would hope he would meet with them and work with them to arrive at a solution to this serious problem.

Mr. Chrétien: Of course I will be looking at any positive suggestion with regard to that problem. I welcome the proposition of the hon. member that farm organizations should meet with me or my officials. We will try to find a positive solution, and if someone has an idea, will he please let us know. We are already coping with 98 per cent of the farming people with regard to the roll-over provisions, and if we can find an acceptable mechanism to deal with the rest, that would be very good. I am told this is a very difficult problem and that no one can define it in such a fashion as to satisfy all the requirements.

Mr. Kempling: I want to say to the minister that it is very important for the corporate farm and also for the small business sector, as, I am sure, he is well aware. In my experience with business, I have seen literally hundreds of family-owned businesses destroyed since the capital gains tax was brought in. Certainly, it is a matter that must be dealt with. I would like to add my voice to those of my colleagues and urge the minister to deal with this matter.

We talk in the House about unemployment, and we hear many members quote statistics and say that 60 per cent of our labour force is employed by small business which does 50 per cent of the manufacturing in the country; but a large percentage of our small businesses are in a precarious position. Part of the difficulty lies in the fact that in order to obtain adequate financing, their bankers and auditors are advising them to incorporate. It would appear that under the provisions of this bill, they would be better off, from the point of view of taxation, not to incorporate. So they are caught in a difficult position.

I know, and I am sure the minister knows from his experience as a lawyer in his constituency, people who have a family business and who have gone to him for legal advice on this matter. They want to hand over the business to their children, but now they are facing this problem. The other factor is that, as the minister knows, it happens often in a family business that the sons and daughters work in the business and often are paid only nominal wages. They are prepared to work in the business because they know that some time in the future the business may be theirs. But now the matter of taking it over is another question. As I recall, the minister said in his remarks that because of the share structure of an incorporated company it is easier to transfer the assets. I would like him to tell us how easy this is. This is what we are told, and this is what I experienced myself. How different is it from the situation of the non-incorporated company?

Mr. Chrétien: I want to repeat what I said. It is not easy to do that with the limitation we are seeking in the roll-over provision. We have decided that it would not apply to the corporations. It applies only to businesses supplying the farms.

Mr. Hargrave: Mr. Chairman, I have one brief point which I omitted to raise in my earlier remarks. I wanted to say that in view of the dramatic increase in farm land values since the advent of the Carter commission and the days of the white paper, which is now about seven years ago, in many cases non-agricultural money has been invested in agricultural land as a hedge against inflation.

Is the minister giving any consideration to the suggestion, which I know has been made, of a new valuation date which might be introduced which would be closer to the circumstances in which we find ourselves now? I point this out in view of the fact that we are in a situation now which was never envisaged at the time the new concept in taxation was brought in; that is, approximately seven years ago. At that time, nobody would have dreamed that such a situation would arise, brought on by inflation. Perhaps this does, indeed, warrant the introduction of a new valuation day closer to present day circumstances. Would the minister comment on that point?

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to say to the hon. member that in my judgment it is not possible to change the valuation date which was established in 1972. If we were to do that for the farming community because the price of land in some parts of Canada has gone up by 400 per cent in some cases, we would probably have to do it for everyone. It was a date chosen at the time of the tax reform, and we have to live with it.

Mr. Stevens: Why?

Mr. Chrétien: One cannot change the valuation date.

Mr. Stevens: You can change the whole tax.

Mr. Chrétien: We are not planning to do so.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth. I thought he made a good point, and I do not believe we have had a sufficient response from the minister to questions regarding small businesses and what he is prepared to do to provide stimulus and incentive to people to carry on. In many small family businesses that I know, members of the family are working to make ends meet. In many cases this is much less rewarding than working in a large company, working as a civil servant or, for that matter, working as a member of parliament, because the work is carried out by family members. Also, the few employees in a small business are not paid overtime, they do not get programmed holidays nor do they get indexed pensions.

I am interested in the fact that small businesses are usually the beginnings of pools of capital which could ultimately be available to Canadians to invest in our country. In his remarks at second reading of this bill, the minister said he wanted to stimulate private investment. But we are all aware that small companies generally die with their owners; they generally die with the family or with the individual who had the initiative to get a business going. In this world where capital is so vital to jobs and to building a business, the fact of the matter is that when a small company goes out of business, instead of going on to employees, members of a family or others who might continue the business, the assets or shares usually go to a larger company. The minister knows very well that larger companies generally do not die. Companies like Imperial Oil and the big companies of this country go on and on; they have nothing to do with the life of any particular individual.

The point about farms was well made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat and the hon. member for Red Deer. Farms are vital to this country. They are the best examples of small business in Canada. They are the best examples of small family businesses, but in small businesses other than farming there are equally as many concerns and there is equally as great a need.

The minister took issue with the comment made by the hon. member for Red Deer that $5 million was no longer small business. That $5 million might be the investment only. The minister is concerned about jobs. These days an investment of $5 million would probably mean jobs for no more than 100 people. I do not know whether a business employing 100 people is a small business or a big business, but I think there is far too much concern on the part of this government that somebody in Canada is going to make money for a change. "Profit" is still a dirty word.

I think the minister owes it to the House to tell us what he intends to do to encourage Canadians. He has all kinds of answers about dividend credits and things of that nature. That is important. But small businesses with investments of $2 million, $4 million or $6 million are not concerned about dividends. Dividends have nothing to do with their motivation. They are trying to build their assets. They are concerned about building profits and creating jobs. I think the minister is interested in creating jobs, too, but I have not seen any initiatives on his part which are meaningful in creating jobs.

[Mr. Bawden.]

The development of small business is not a short-term proposition. It cannot be dealt with on a "turning the tap on" "turning the tap off" basis. We must have long-range programs which will enable the ownership of companies to be Canadian, because often when a small business is sold, it goes to foreign owners. If it has been successful and it does not go to foreign owners, it is bought up by big business. This government has a well advanced program for eliminating small businesses as well as eliminating Canadians as owners, principal shareholders or controlling shareholders of their own companies.

The minister owes it to the House to tell us what his long-range plans are and whether he has anything meaningful to offer in this area. I think he will have to hurry, because I do not know if this minister will have a chance to present another budget. Perhaps he will be replaced, or perhaps he will soon be sitting on the other side of the House.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, can the minister give us a rough idea of how much the capital gains tax brings in each year? If he cannot give us that information now, I would be grateful if he would give it to us at some later time. Second, how much does the minister's department estimate is involved in these tax changes? How much is involved in this roll-over? How many cases might be involved in a year, or were perhaps last year, and how much money is the government going to forgo based on last year or previous years?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, we have not made studies to assess what will be the loss of revenue as a result of introducing this roll-over. We do not make that type of study, and it is not extremely important.

Mr. Ritchie: Would the minister try to obtain the figures as to how much the capital gains tax brings in per year?

Mr. Chrétien: We have already answered that question, but I can provide the information later. I do not have it in front of me. This question was already answered in the debate, but I will try to find it out again and give the information to the hon. member.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance must agree that there is considerable concern in this House about the welfare of farmers and small businessmen, especially in relation to the implications of many of the matters dealt with in this bill. In view of this concern, and bearing in mind that the minister has ruthlessly gagged this parliament and prevented any type of extensive debate by bringing in his closure motion, would the minister consider making a special reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that the committee could deal with possible amendments to the Income Tax Act in order to resolve some of the problems which have been outlined here today which are faced by farmers and small business people in Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I said to the Canadian Tax Foundation meeting the other day that I was planning to introduce a new system which would perhaps be more appropriate. I would like to make some references to the committee, pre-budget, of some tax problems so that the committee could look into them before I introduce measures. The members of the committee would have an input before changes are made in some areas. I do not know if this area could be one of them. At this time I am contemplating referring possible tax changes to the committee. Of course, that would have to be done on a non-commitment basis. Because I refer a certain matter to the committee does not mean I will make changes, because that might be counter to the traditional ways of handling budgets.

Up to now there has been a lot of secrecy until the night of the budget when the minister announces changes. On an experimental basis, I would like to identify four or five areas and refer them to the committee for comments and recommendations, but I would not be bound by those recommendations because I would not want to reveal measures before announcing a budget. There might be some proposition which would make so much sense that I could not resist it. I am planning to introduce that mechanism, on an experimental basis, right after Christmas. If that leads to some positive results, I will try to persuade the government to change the system we have had for over 100 years. Perhaps the system is no longer conducive to the effective transaction of national business.

Mr. Stevens: I am familiar with the minister's idea of doing a little kite-flying in the future. Instead of just bringing in proposed changes harshly, the minister would like to test them to find out if they fly, by means of some kind of committee proceeding. I do not know if we have any objection to his trying that, but I am dealing with a much more general question. The question is not how we should react once the bureacracy decides it would like to change the Income Tax Act in a particular fashion; the idea, basically, is to familiarize this House and the public with the pros and cons of various tax measures with which we have to deal.

What I had in mind is the specific field we have been dealing with this afternoon, that is, the impact of federal tax upon farmers and business people who are deducting a relatively small portion. Could we have a reference to find out to what extent this is a hardship, to what extent provisions could be introduced to relieve some of the problems, to what extent other jurisdictions such as the United States and Great Britain are treating their small business people and farmers in a fair way?

The whole question of capital gains tax on small business people should be looked into. Rather than the narrow terms of reference the minister speaks of—which is essential when the bureaucrats have made up their minds on what kind of income tax change they would like to test—the minister is saying, in effect, "Let us try it at committee and see what happens." I say it would be more meaningful to get some input before that decision is made by the bureaucracy, to see to what extent we have a problem in a field such as that discussed this afternoon, and let a committee such as the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs deal with it.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the representations of the hon. member. The suggestion of referring problems to a committee ahead of a budget is a far reaching approach. I am disappointed that the hon. member takes a cheap shot at the bureaucrats, because I have persuaded a lot of people this is the way to go at the problem. I think the hon. member should be grateful we are moving. If the opposition were as willing as I am to make changes, we would not be stuck in the House on the same problem for five weeks as we are now.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the arrogance of this government is unbelievable. That there should be a suggestion that because they are absolutely the vassals of the bureaucracy, we should be grateful to have a preview of what the bureaucracy has in store for us in the next budget, is unforgivable. I think the minister should be asked to retract that suggestion.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member does not want to discuss these things, we can do that with the NDP or the Creditistes or independents.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the minister is obviously trying to distract the House from the very simple proposition I put to him of why there cannot be the general reference I suggest to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The committee could look at the problems raised in this closure debate and consider the impact of taxation at the present time on small businessmen and farmers. Are there relieving provisions to be considered which would put parliament back in the position of instructing the bureaucracy, instead of reacting to what the bureaucracy wants?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of this debate on Bill C-11, for days and days I heard speeches on all sorts of things except the tax aspect of the bill. I heard about the RCMP, and so on, but we were not dealing with the specific problems we have to deal with in committee. Last week they were trying to ride to power on the back of the RCMP. Now they are trying to ride to power on the back of the bureaucracy.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the seals have moved back into the arena. Obviously, the minister is not disposed to allow the people of Canada a reference that would give them an opportunity to explain to the government some of the problems they face with the present tax policy. I should like to go on to four more subsections of the bill.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, earlier the hon. member asked me a question on clause 6(1).

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chrétien: I should like to give the answer; but if he does not want it, I can keep silent.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I fully intend to ask the minister for his answer before we are through with clause 6. Now I want to refer to subclauses (3), (4), (7) and (9) of clause 6. The minister will know that these deal mainly with clause 14(4) with which we will be dealing a little later. The explanatory note refers to the income tax motion which reads as follows:

(5) That for taxation years ending after March 31, 1977, in respect of depreciable property, a taxpayer be required to deduct a terminal loss in the year in which it arises whether or not the taxpayer has a source of income in that year.

Dealing first of all with subclause (3), could the minister indicate to the House what his officials had in mind with this change? Why must a terminal loss be taken in a certain year, irrespective of income in that year? Why is the taxpayer not given the privilege of matching losses with income in an easier approach?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this is a technical deficiency in the existing terminal loss provision in the regulations which threw out the deductible loss whenever a leasehold interest is converted into a full ownership interest. This deficiency is corrected by this amendment. The amendment is related to the changes with respect to terminal losses in clause 14(4). It is applied where a taxpayer who has leasehold interest in a particular property acquires complete ownership of the same property. The amendment provides for transfer of the capital cost and undepreciated capital cost of the leasehold property to the converted property which will be included in a different class.

Mr. Stevens: Could the minister tell us why it is felt necessary to have the terminal losses fall in a year, to use the wording of the income tax motion, "whether or not the taxpayer has a source of income in that year". Why has the minister not given some facility to allow the loss to be applied against income in another year?

Mr. Chrétien: Technically, if the taxpayer does not have a source of income he is not entitled to the deduction.

Mr. Stevens: That is just what I read out, and that is true. That is what the income tax motion says, but I should like a better understanding of why this is the case.

Mr. Chrétien: It is because they found a technical deficiency in the act and wanted to correct it.

Mr. Stevens: The way the officials seem to approach this is that if somebody ends up not having to pay tax, that is a loophole and it must be plugged. I want to know why the departmental officials felt it necessary to stop the taking of a loss and applying it against income regardless of which year the income was earned. Why discriminate against the person who, perhaps for reasons beyond his control, has to take a transfer loss and has not sufficient income in that year? They say, that is too bad but they cannot apply it to income in future or past years. I think the committee deserves a better answer than just that it was a technical loophole the bureaucracy wanted to fill.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this technical change simply transfers the terminal loss rules from the regulations to the act itself. A terminal loss arises when depreciable property is disposed of for proceeds less than its undepreciated capital cost. The remaining balance, or terminal loss, is deducted from other income in the year. The amendment also ensures that a terminal loss can be claimed by a taxpayer whether or not he still operates the business in which the assets were used. Technically, under the existing act, a terminal loss arising in a year after the business has ceased is not deductible. In fact, what we are doing is making it deductible.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct another question to the minister. Are you making the terminal loss deductible in a year that the taxpayer has no income, or can he in fact make it deductible against another year—either before or after—in which he does have income?

Mr. Chrétien: It can be carried over.

Mr. Stevens: Did the minister say the loss can be carried over to a future year?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Stevens: Can it be carried back?

Mr. Chrétien: One year.

Mr. Stevens: How many ahead?

Mr. Chrétien: Five.

Mr. Stevens: Five years ahead, and one year back?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Bawden: On the question of terminal losses, there is a very related remark made by the minister. In his speech on second reading the minister stated, as reported at page 645 of Hansard:

For example, any unused commercial loss, any capital loss or investment tax credit of a corporation belonging to a group of corporations will be transferable to another corporation of that same group when there is a merger or a liquidation.

I would like to ask the minister why it is not much simpler. It is available to taxpayers in the United States. It seems that here it is a very complicated way of giving the benefit that is proposed. I have a specific instance in my constituency at the present time where the owner of several small companies is forced to merge these companies to take advantage of this particular opportunity, except that it will cost him $20,000 in legal and accounting fees to accomplish this fact. I would ask the minister if he is considering, or would consider, enabling companies that have common ownership to file a joint tax return, which would be the same thing.

Mr. Chrétien: That is a suggestion which has some merit. I am told we are looking into that already. However, it is extremely complicated to find a good formula for its application. We will be looking into it further, and I appreciate the comments of the hon. member.

Mr. Bawden: That it is extremely complicated seems to be an answer the minister is giving to a lot of things. We do not agree with that answer or many of the answers the minister has given. I am of the view that it is simply not good enough. I would like something more specific from the minister. This is something which is done in the United States. There is a pattern there to look at. The fact that it is too complicated reminds me of this whole bill.

A few moments ago I was very disturbed when the minister made reference to members on this side holding up this bill for five weeks. I think that is very unfair of the minister. This complex bill has something like 225 pages in it, and I am wondering if five weeks is too long to consider all the clauses of the bill. The minister said we are not dealing with specific problems. Five weeks is not too long to deal with this legislation.

While the minister is on his feet, I would be interested to hear why we first received the proposals contained in this bill in the House on March 31. It is something like seven months since the minister brought before the House and the committee these proposals in the form of a bill. Rather than say it is too complicated, why don't we get some action? Why don't we create jobs and get people investing, which is what we want?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member went to the United States to check the regulations concerning this proposal, he would see that even if the proposal appears very simple at first sight, it becomes extremely complex once embodied in regulations. The officials of my department studied the technique used by the U.S. Department of Revenue and they did not find it very simple. They continue to examine the problem. Perhaps, the hon. member has some suggestions on the possibility for several companies to fill in only one tax report. At first sight it looks extremely simple but I am told that neither in Canada nor in the United States has the mechanism to do this been found. Moreover we must ensure that this does not become a mechanism enabling people to avoid regular taxes.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: We now jump to subclause (11) which is a new clause brought in with the October 20 statement of the minister. It appears for the first time in Bill C-11. The minister likes to dwell on the little talk he keeps giving about how we have had five weeks on this bill. I see I do not have enough time now, but after dinner I would like to take the minister through the time, exactly, that has been spent on this bill. In no way has five weeks been spent on the bill before us. It is a misrepresentation of the fact for the minister to continually tell the House and the Canadian public that five weeks have been spent on the bill.

If there is consent, we could do it before the break. Could the minister give us an explanation with respect to subclause (11) which leads us into the insurance question, the new approach that the government intends to take with regard to taxation of insurance companies?

Mr. Chrétien: It is five o'clock, and I have a long explanation which I can read to the committee. I have another reply to give to the hon. member, and we can come to that too.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again later this day.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

Divorce Act

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved that Bill C-214, an act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (1702)

He said: Mr. Speaker, ten years ago, on December 4, 1967, the 1968 Divorce Act was given first reading in this chamber. At that time, the government felt it was time to reform our archaic divorce laws and bring them into line with the social climate of the 1960s.

Prior to 1968, the only effective ground for divorce in every province, save Nova Scotia, was adultery. Most provinces entered confederation without divorce laws or procedures, and it was not until after 1930 that they were granted the authority to establish provincial divorce courts. Residents of Quebec and Newfoundland, however, were required to apply for a parliamentary divorce because these two provinces had no divorce courts until 1968. In 1966, the question of divorce reform was referred to a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. Its Report on Divorce was presented to parliament in June, 1967, and in 1968 the Divorce Act became law. The act retained many of the traditional marital offences as grounds for divorce, but it also included a modified concept of marriage breakdown as a new ground for divorce.

One of the grounds established was a separation period of three to five years—three years separation if the petitioner is the non-deserting spouse, five years separation if he or she is the deserting spouse. This separation ground conferred on each married person significant powers of individual control as to whether he or she desired to remain married. Today, about 40 per cent of all divorces are based on this ground.

It is important to remember, Mr. Speaker, that although the government was anxious to modernize our divorce laws, it was conscious of Canadians' interest in maintaining the sanctity of marriage and of the family unit. It is in this same light that I have put forward an amendment to the Divorce Act, an amendment which will reduce to 18 months the three to five-year waiting period required for a marriage which has broken down to be dissolved. It also eliminates the question of fault under this ground for divorce. Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. members will see fit not to talk this bill out, and that it will be referred to the standing committee.

Let me take a moment to examine the divorce legislation of other countries with regard to the concept of marriage breakdown and the period of separation. Several countries differentiate between unopposed and opposed actions. For example, in England the waiting period is two years if the divorce is unopposed, and five years if it is opposed. Norway requires one year separation if the action is unopposed, and two years if it is opposed. In Australia, the family law act of 1975 states that a ground for divorce is established if the parties separated and lived separately and apart for a continuous period of not less than 12 months immediately preceding the date of filing for the dissolution of marriage. The separation need not be agreed upon by both parties.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Sweden, in 1973, introduced divorce on demand, which includes both unilateral and consensual dissolution of marriage. Either spouse is at any time entitled to have the marriage terminated on formal request, without having to show separation for a period of time, marital offence or irretrievable marriage breakdown. The state's function is to approve the request. The only qualification provided for in Swedish law is a "reconsideration" period of six months if the divorce is opposed or if the family contains children under the age of 16.

In the United States, some states—namely, California, Michigan, Georgia and Nebraska—have adopted divorce by consent. Divorce by consent subjects marriage to the joint will of the parties involved and limits the involvement of the court or state. In fact, in Canada it is argued that because 90 per cent of our divorce cases are uncontested, divorce by consent already prevails. Hence, it is often recommended that the government may as well legalize its present existence.

Since 1968 there has been a myriad of studies, reports and recommendations concerned with the divorce issue. The concepts of marriage breakdown, divorce by consent, divorce on demand, and others, are constantly being rehashed by various legal groups, people involved with the status of women and by religious affiliations. One of the most foremost bodies engaged in this study on divorce is the Law Reform Commission of Canada. In the commission's attempt to formulate a coherent legal policy for the family, the commission put forward a number of proposals. Their commitment to the concept of a unified family court is one such proposal. This unified family court would have wide jurisdiction in family law. Its jurisdiction would include dissolution of marriage, interspousal property matters, areas involving children, and other social and economic issues of a family nature which would call for legal solutions.

At the present time there are experimental unified family courts in existence. There is one, for example, in the judicial district of Hamilton-Wentworth. Central to the concept of the unified family court is the importance of resolving the weaknesses of the laws affecting family relationships and marriage and the strengthening of the institution itself.

The Law Reform Commission also examined the subject clause of my proposed bill and has advanced several arguments against the imposition of a designated period of separation as a prerequisite to divorce. It referred to the dilemma faced by an economically dependent spouse who may be forced to leave the matrimonial home, and also to the hardship faced by responsible spouses who encounter marriage breakdown yet must go through the loneliness of an enforced period of separation, being neither married or unmarried, in a coupled society.

Professor Herman R. Hahlo, who presented a research paper entitled "Reform of the Divorce Act, 1968 (Canada)" to the Law Reform Commission, also examined the three-year separation period and recommended that it be reduced to one year. He reasoned thus:

To take a large slice out of a person's life by withholding a divorce long after the prospects of reconciliation have vanished can only be explained by a conscious or subconscious desire to punish a spouse for seeking a divorce. Many experienced marriage counsellors suggest that six months are normally sufficient to determine whether there is any hope of reconciliation—

Professor Hahlo also touched upon the five-year period imposed on the deserting spouse and recommended that in this case, too, the required period of separation be reduced to one year.

Mr. Speaker, in the last few minutes I have outlined the history of divorce law in Canada, touched on divorce legislation in other countries and discussed some of the recommendations made by the Law Reform Commission. However, the fundamental question faced by everyone who examines this amendment to the Divorce Act is: how will this affect the institution of marriage and the family unit? One glance at Canadian divorce statistics after 1968 would seem to indicate that the permanence of marriage is indeed threatened. Yet at the same time the figures relating to the number of marriages undertaken each year show that in no way has the popularity of marriage declined.

Here are some statistics. In 1967, the number of divorces in Canada was 11,165, and the number of marriages 165,879. It is true that in 1969, after the new act was passed, the number of divorces rose to 26,093. The number of marriages rose in that year to 182,183. Two years later, in 1971, the number of divorces was 29,685, and the number of marriages 191,324. In 1973, the latest year for which I have been able to obtain the figures, there were 36,704 divorces and, continuing a steady increase, the number of marriages had reached 199,064.

I think everyone should bear in mind, however, that official divorce statistics merely tell us about the number of divorces. They tell us nothing about marital conflict and disruption. Not every marriage breakdown ends in divorce; a couple may choose to continue to live together in disharmony rather than participate in a divorce process which is often painful.

Therefore, the correlation between divorce rates and the collapse of the institution of marriage in indeed difficult to prove. How is the reduction of the length of required separation going to affect the stability of marriage? The Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Divorce in its report made note that in establishing the period of separation, the prime consideration should be whether the period provides a fair test that the marriage in question has broken down. As I see it, the time required must be sufficiently long enough to give the couple a chance to reconcile their differences, but not so long as to force individuals to remain in unsatisfactory and unhealthy relationships.

It is extremely important, especially where children are involved—for an unhappy marriage is a detriment to children—that the parties be able to dissolve their marriage as painlessly as possible in order that they may build a new life and provide a more healthy, positive environment for themselves as well as their children. To quote Professor Wolfgang Friedman:

People should be able to live out their lives as joyfully as possible under conditions which enable them to develop their personal capacities and potentialities. This means the right to correct errors, the right to cast off a burden that has become intolerable and may lead to the sapping of vital energies and the moral fibre of the affected parties.

My amendment which calls for a 1½ year period of separation for either party, regardless of who deserted whom, is a fair test of the state of the marital relationship. It may not be the magic figure; however, it does serve to bring our divorce laws into the 1970s at a lower social and individual cost to the parties involved, and perhaps helps pave the way for additional divorce reform and for continued strengthening of the institution of marriage. Once again, I hope the bill will not be talked out but will be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for further consideration.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a brief intervention in connection with this debate, taking heed of the request of the proposer of the bill that he wants the matter dealt with by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The proposal in the bill is simplicity itself. The bill is very brief. It purports to simply reduce the time a person must wait before being entitled to go before the courts to petition for a divorce. I understand the reasoning and the background given by the hon. member in support of his bill. He articulated many of the concerns expressed by social workers, lawyers and people involved in family law in support of his proposal in this bill.

Since I came to this chamber in 1974, the question of amendments to our divorce law has been a matter of considerable speculation and study, not only by the government but by people involved in that area. A number of suggestions have been made since 1974, if not since 1968, as pointed out by the hon. member, with regard to revisions to our existing divorce legislation. In or about the month of June, 1976, the cabinet considered, and apparently approved, the concept of no-fault divorce. The next step in that process was apparently consultation with the various provinces to determine whether this principle and concept was acceptable to all jurisdictions in Canada. After this period of time, no such agreement has been reached. There has been a series of representations against no-fault divorce and a series of representations in favour of it.

What I am leading up to is that passage of this bill in principle or otherwise will not go any distance toward solving some fundamental questions with regard to the attitude of Canadians to divorce; or, perhaps more important, toward the institution of marriage in our society. If we go over the gamut of areas of concern and the various points of view, I wonder whether we will accomplish anything by simply passing the bill, approving it in principle and sending it to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. There may be some agreement on the part of the proposer of the bill and the government to have the subject matter referred to the standing committee so that the widest possible consideration can be given to the status of divorce law in Canada today. The purport of this bill is to replace one arbitrary period of time before one can petition for divorce, with another. I am not sure that solves any fundamental questions with regard to the institution of marriage and the support we give to that institution.

I hope the proposer of the bill and the government will be receptive to the suggestion that the subject matter be referred to a committee. I would support that move. Representations could be made by all interested parties on the current standing of divorce law in Canada and the attitude of Canadians toward it. Interested groups and parties could have some input as to the kind of legislation that should be brought forward, if any, in amendments to the existing divorce law.

There are a variety of groups, such as religious groups, women's groups and family groups, which have particular points of view that could be very helpful in the formulation of legislation relating to divorce in Canada. In presenting this bill to the House, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) pointed out some of the statistics. The statistic that sticks in my mind is that approximately one family in nine ends up in a divorce situation. There are many more families that are unstable, unhappy, unhealty and non-productive.

In this and other countries there is an epidemic of marriage breakdown and the serious consequences that flow from it. Many of us are hard pressed to explain this phenomenon of destruction and deterioration of family life. A number of suggestions have been made with regard to structural changes in the forums in which divorces are heard. Those experienced in the courts, such as lawyers, social workers, the clergy and others involved with regard to family breakdown, appreciate that divorce is a very difficult situation to deal with. In addition, there are ancillary considerations which tend to exacerbate the differences between the parties involved, as opposed to providing a forum which could provide some assistance to them in their very unfortunate situation.

The matter of unified family courts is something the standing committee could consider in conjunction with its consideration of the subject matter of this bill. Support of this concept and the idea of the unified family court comes from diverse groups such as Catholic bishops and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. I am giving the range of groups which support this particular concept as far as the family court is concerned. I hope there will be some agreement to the idea I propose in order what we may have a broad and fundamental look at the entire concept of divorce in our society. There has been no substantial legislation or attention given to this question in parliament since 1968. Marriage and divorce in Canada is an important topic: we must consider this social problem.

In conclusion, I commend the hon. member for bringing the matter before the House. I understand the motivation behind the introduction of this bill. If at all possible, the matter should be referred to committee in order that the widest possible consideration may be given to it. I hope this bill receives favourable consideration from the government side of the House.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak on this matter. Approximately ten years have passed since the problem of divorce was last handled by the House. Approximately 20 years have passed since I developed an interest in the parliamentary relationship to divorce. As the previous speaker indicated, it is time to have another look at it in a fairly broad manner.

I congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for bringing the matter forward. But really this is just the tip of the iceberg. As yet, we have not had a chance to assess in committee whether marriage breakdown should be the only ground for divorce and whether we should get rid of the adversary system. Although we in the federal parliament have the right to pass substantive legislation on divorce, we have not given much consideration to the problem the family unit faces under provincial jurisdiction.

Over the years, I have encountered one problem when handling hundreds and hundreds of divorce cases and being required to go into the intimate details of those cases. The problem I am referring to is the argument that someone must be guilty and someone must be innocent. The parties to a marriage and the protégés thereof were not given very much consideration. The provinces handled the disposition of the children of the marriage in various ways. Quite often it was totally unsatisfactory.

When the legislation was put into effect, we were not in a position, because of constitutional problems, to make any recommendations in terms of who would receive custody of the children, why they should receive that custody, and whether suitable financial arrangements had been undertaken. On many occasions the former hon. member for Skeena indicated that consideration should be given to the maintenance of the family affected by divorce. Marriage is a contract entered into by two people. Marriage breakdown is an amiable way of getting out of a marriage. I am in favour of the situation in Sweden where a divorce can be obtained by either the innocent or the guilty party without any proof. That situation would differ, depending upon who made the request, but in all cases consideration would be given to members of the family and how the divorce affected them.

The new law has been in effect for approximately ten years. I was surprised when the joint parliamentary committee looking into this whole problem came to an almost unanimous conclusion that the logical reason for granting a divorce should be solely on the basis of marriage breakdown. Some people believe lthat a divorce should be almost automatic after a marriage has broken down and every effort at reconciliation has been attempted.

At one point this House handled the divorces of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. The former hon. member for Skeena, Mr. Frank Howard, and I decided that this was not the place to discuss the breakdown of someone's marriage. We felt that marriage breakdown should be handled in the courts, as was the case in the other provinces. At that time there was absolutely no support for any change. Everyone hid behind various religious reasons, but they never looked at the problem facing them.

When marriage breakdown occurs, in effect, there is no marriage. It does not really matter whether one has to wait 18 months, a year or three years; an immense social problem is faced by the family concerned. The decision as to finances is dealt with in the family courts which some provinces have. Those courts operate reasonably well in most provinces. The desire of both parties to finalize whatever decision they wish cannot be eliminated.

This is a good time to take another look at our divorce laws. Even members of parliament can change their minds and collectively improve on any suggestion by a member, even though that hon. member has acted to the best of his ability and in good faith. Divorce reform commenced in this House almost 20 years ago. At that time there were 265 members, and 263 of them were opposed to the method we were using to have the matter brought to a head. In 1967, when the changes were brought before the House, as far as I can remember there were no members in opposition to the report of the committee.

For these reasons, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the following:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-214, an act to amend the Divorce Act (living separate and apart), be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs."

● (1732)

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) for bringing in this particular bill. I would like to say at the outset that I am in favour of reducing the period of time which a person would have to wait before being granted a divorce from three years to a year and a half. I must comment on what the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has said. I understand that some years ago he engaged in a filibuster which brought about some changes in the old divorce laws. He has changed his stance now. Very rarely do I see him filibustering in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't put ideas in his head.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member says they should eliminate the whole process of divorce. I am happy they did not eliminate the hon. member along with it.

I think the bill is good. I would suggest that there are some other changes which could be considered, and perhaps the hon. member will take these few thoughts to the committee with him along with the ones he has suggested. I believe that the change he suggests would improve our divorce laws, and I hope that the suggestion I will make will be considered at the same time.

Although Canadians have always considered it self-evident that a family has a special and central place in our society, there have in fact only been a few occasions when the legal basis of the family and the legal relationship of its members have received official attention over the past century. Changes we have experienced socially, as well as changes in the composition, structure, expectations and thwarted hopes of families and their members have at best led to halting accommodations by the law to social pressures. Accommodations such as making divorce generally available, but hardly to a re-examination of the image of the family the law reflects. This image may by now be so far removed from reality that the law and its institutions may weaken rather than strengthen family life, expecially in crisis situations.

In fact, in the ordinary course of family life nothing is more remote than the use of the law for dealing with personal, economic or other needs. Not so in crisis situations, when the network of relations and understandings breaks down and personal and community resources are no longer able to relieve pressures. It is at these points that the law is seriously considered as an instrument for ordering family relationships and it is also at these points that the law and its institutions show their strengths and weaknesses.

That there are weaknesses was brought forcefully to my attention when I inquired into areas of public dissatisfaction. A great deal of concern was expressed about the divorce process and its aftermath in terms of maintenance, property settlements, and the way it dealt with children. Dissatisfaction was expressed not only by those who were or had been involved in the process, but also by agencies and professions working with families in trouble—including the legal profession.

The Law Reform Commission put out a paper with regard to jurisdictions. The following are my thoughts on the subject. With respect to jurisdiction, it is one thing to put divorce into a tidy constitutional category of federal law, and something else again to keep it there. A law is what it does. Most of what the divorce law does, in concrete reality, is anchored in issues of child welfare, property and support which, in almost all contexts other than divorce, are provincial concerns. It would be rather sterile to limit the reform approach to a consideration of grounds for divorce as if they could somehow be isolated from their consequences. I have instead taken another approach, proposing that the process for dissolution of marriage should be structured on the basis of social and economic consequences. The more important the issue—such as cases where young children are involved—the more time and resources should be brought to bear to keep families together, or where this is not possible, to diminish the harm that is invariably involved. Legal concentration on grounds for divorce, such as fault, clearly reinforces the adversary and accusatory elements of a crisis situation. Anybody who lives in a family or any other close relationship knows that this is no basis for arriving at a mutual understanding.

There is a legitimate concern about fast and easy divorce, often expressed as "divorce on demand". I do not think it should be so easy that all we have to do is simply to walk up to a judge today, and next week obtain the divorce, as is now possible in such states as Nevada in the United States, and in Mexico where you can get a "quickie" divorce in a matter of days or weeks.

It is easily overlooked, however, that what we have now is divorce on demand when, in one way or another, the legal grounds, which may have little or nothing to do with the actual problems facing the spouses, are fulfilled. Most divorces are uncontested but many are based on a bargaining process, often harmful and expensive, that not only shatters the family but also its individual members. The fact that divorce is a painful process does not foster family stability in Canada. It only fosters pain.

Traditionally, for example, the law has not considered the work of the homemaker as a contribution to or as having anything to do with the acquisition of property in marriage; equally it did not foresee that women could be independent and responsible for their own lives. Whether the changes in the position of men and women in society and their relation to each other are good or bad is a matter for partisan discussions. That the situation is different there can be no doubt, and this difference must find its expression in the law. There is an evolution in this area at this time, if not a revolution. The law therefore cannot be fixed but must have room to evolve creatively, allowing men and women to define their own roles within marriage, supporting rather than confining individual choices.

I would like to point out especially how children are affected and that they should have some say about their future. Yes, even young children should have that right, if not through their own voices then through those of others who will take the stand for them.

The position of children is even more difficult than that of parents. Although protected by a system of obligations, they have never had independent legal claims. They have no standing to make their voices heard in a system that allows one parent to deprive them of the other because of an instance of adultery. I do not suggest that they should have such a right, but neither do I suggest the retention of the system we have. What we should have is a process that tries to get to the reality of why one parent would seriously consider doing this in the first place, a process in which children are hurt, in which their interests are always important and at times dominant, one in which children do not serve as bargaining pawns or as objects to be kept and used.

Many parents involved in a marriage breakdown cannot see beyond their own needs. The process for dissolution of marriage must compensate for this. It is also important for children to understand as best they can—and this is often a great deal better than we assume—what the situation is and what their parents are facing. A new approach to the problems of children when marriage breaks down is essential.

The main thrust of this speech, therefore, is on the change of perceptions of family relationships and a change of the means for resolution of family problems. First, as was mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, we need courts which are capable of assisting constructively in such resolutions.

Second, we need a legal framework which recognizes present day conditions in dealing with the responsibilities and expectations of members of families.

Third, we need a new legal process for dealing with a family in crisis which abandons concepts received from the past which have become artificial and destructive in the context of present family life in Canada. This process should also give us a better understanding of what divides families and what is needed to preserve their stability, something which should be, although it is not now, an effective function of the law.

Changes must be made, and that must be done in close co-operation with the provinces if it is not to lead to further fragmentation. Various provinces have already made advances in this area, and others are in the process of preparing for significant changes. The Government of Canada has also made some beginnings, but further steps are necessary if the present ferment of study, exploration and experimentation is to be fruitful. I have some specific suggestions which I would like to put on the record.

I suggest that the only basis for dissolution of marriage should be the failure of the personal relationship between husband and wife.

The doctrines of matrimonial offence, matrimonial fault, collusion or connivance should be inapplicable in all future marriage breakdown cases.

All adversarial pleadings should be removed from the law of dissolution of marriage. The dissolution process should be commenced by either or both spouses filing with the court a simple and non-accusatory notice of intent to seek dissolution.

Dissolution of marriage should be a ministerial act of the court, established in a formal but not adversarial hearing.

A husband and wife should not be required to separate or live apart as a condition of participating in the dissolution process. Nor should remaining together prejudice any right or otherwise adversely affect the legal position of either spouse. I raise this because of the financial hardship which is imposed on one or the other spouse if he or she has to move out of the house while the other spouse stays in the house. There is the upkeep of an extra home, and this need not necessarily be the case.

With regard to financial settlements I suggest that the settlement of property matters and financial provision on dissolution of marriage should be done in the context of economic readjustment and kept separate from matters relating to the breakdown of the personal relationship between the spouses.

Property acquired, for example, by either spouse during the marriage by gift, inheritance, bequest, trust or settlement should be exempt from sharing.

As far as financial provision is concerned, marriage per se should not create a right to receive or an obligation to make financial provision after dissolution. A formerly married person should be responsible for himself or herself.

However, the right to financial provision should be created by reasonable needs flowing from the division of function in the marriage, the express or tacit understanding of the spouses that one will make financial provision for the other, custodial arrangements made with respect to the children of the marriage at the time of dissolution, the physical or mental disability of either spouse which affects his or her ability to provide for himself or herself or, finally, the inability of a spouse to obtain gainful employment.

I believe that a maintained spouse should have an obligation to assume responsibility for himself or herself within a reasonable period of time following dissolution of marriage unless, considering the age of the spouses, the duration of the marriage, the nature of the needs of the maintained spouse and the origins of those needs, it would be unreasonable to expect the maintained spouse to do so, and it would not be unreasonable to require the other spouse to continue to bear this responsibility.

I have one final point to make. The amount of financial provision should be determined by the reasonable needs of the spouse with a right to financial provision and the reasonable needs of the spouse obliged to make financial provision.

Am I running a little bit over?

An hon. Member: No.

An hon. Member: Yes, you are.

Mr. Parent: The amount of financial provision should also be determined by the property of each spouse after dissolution of the marriage, the ability to pay of the spouse who is obliged to make financial provision, the ability of the maintained spouse to assume partial responsibility for himself or herself, and the obligations of each spouse toward the children of the marriage.

These are the specific points I hope the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore will bring to the committee along with his very worth-while suggestion, which I wholeheartedly support.

Mr. Robinson: You have talked the bill out.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak for too long because I want to see the subject matter of this bill referred to the committee. I appreciate what the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) has done. I appreciate his honesty and his sincere concern for the worth of the family unit and the integrity of the family unit when he proposes this bill. I am not sure I agree with all the provisions in the bill, but I do know from my association with the hon. member, when I had my own private members' bill before the House last year, that he has a definite and genuine concern for the maintenance of the family unit. I certainly support him in that, but I want to point out a couple of things which I think are important.

We live in a very pluralistic society, and it is not right—and not even possible, let alone right—that we impose on all of society what some of our individual philosophies might be, as much as we might believe in them, so I tend to agree a little bit with the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that there has been a history in our society of trying to impose certain philosophies and beliefs on all of society. That we can no longer do. Much to my regret, we cannot have a more pervasive morality about the institution of marriage.

However, I think this bill circumvents the problem, and we need to deal with the problem. I do not think this bill, or for that matter any divorce act, deals with the problem, that is, marriage breakdown. We must consider that.

I would like to point out that in our society there is an ominous trend—which I think is destructive—to relieve individuals of responsibility for their decisions more and more all the time. We tend to make it easier for individuals to escape responsibility for the decisions they make, and to make it easier for them to get out of marriage. I think that is part of the trend. While I support the concern of the hon. member, I am not too sure that this bill is the solution. Rather than making it easier to get a divorce, I think we ought to make it more difficult to get married. I do not know how we should go about doing that, but I think hon. members know me well enough to know that I am firmly committed to the institution of marriage. I do not know if all hon. members know it, but at the outset of this session I celebrated my twenty-fifth wedding anniversary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: So did my wife, I hasten to add. As a matter of fact we celebrated it on the day the Queen opened parliament, and thought it very kind of Her Majesty to celebrate the occasion with us.

• (1752)

I am totally committed to this institution and I think members know I am also totally committed to the institution of the church. Because I am committed to that, however, I take the liberty of criticizing the church for its negligence. Many starry eyed young people go to a minister because they like the architecture of the church rather than the institution of marriage being sanctified by the church. I recall that my admiration for a local Anglican minister grew when he turned aside the opportunity to marry young people who came because they liked his church. He thought there ought to be a better reason for performing the marriage than simply the beautiful esthetic surroundings.

The irony is that the marriage vow says it ought not to be entered into lightly, but that part of the vow is often violated by the minister performing the ceremony.

I think that the churches and provincial governments ought to require ministers of the gospel who marry young people to call the couples for a series of pre-marital lessons or instruction on the nature of marriage. Many marriage counsellors agree that marriage breakdown is not the result of a "falling out of love" but rather that couples encounter very heavy financial obligations. Some young couples want to acquire in one year what it took their parents 30 years to assemble, and within a few months of marriage are more worried about their financial obligations than about the marriage itself. It is not just because the emotional strain is so intense that they start bickering but that the financial strain is great.

My point is that love will never hold an ailing marriage together—love is an emotion and goes up and down. What will keep them together is a commitment to each other. I do not think ministers of the gospel are doing a good job in counselling young people who come to them wanting to be married.

I do not want to talk this bill out, Mr. Speaker, as I should like to see the matter referred to a committee. The health of our society rests upon an understanding of our obligations to each other in marriage, in the home, and to our children. Members deserve an opportunity to explore this subject in committee. I should therefore like to see the bill go to committee where it could be studied thoroughly and sent back to the House with recommendations.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this bill. I have long experience with divorce and marital problems and it seems to me that a bill of this type is likely to propound the problems by making divorce easier. I know the mover of the motion would like the bill to go to committee, and if I sit down in time that may happen.

From my experience I know many cases are not reported where reconciliation has been possible through the efforts of lawyers. Sections 7 and 8 of the Divorce Act put a heavy responsibility on barristers and solicitors to try to resolve differences between persons who have been living separate and apart or where there is marriage breakdown. Many times people have come to my office—sometimes as many as three families are involved—and later I see them walk up the aisle on Sunday arm in arm. Surely 18 months is not long enough to live separate and apart to determine that there has been marriage breakdown.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) suggests that perhaps the problem is not marriage breakdown by the fact of a couple living separate and apart but is rather the cause for them living separate and apart. That is the problem we should try to resolve.

I believe this bill is tantamount to divorce on demand and will make marriage a mockery. It would make it too easy to obtain a decree nisi or a decree absolute. The last time the Divorce Act was amended divorce was made easier. I think we should be getting back to the position of trying to strengthen the family unit. There is responsibility on the church and on everyone in society to support the family unit.

It should be pointed out that this amendment has no public support, Mr. Speaker. There has been no hue and cry for this type of legislation. We have so many other problems such as unemployment and inflation that we should be trying to resolve.

A bill of this kind would not strengthen the family unit but rather would do the opposite. If people live separate and apart for some 500 days it will not necessarily cause the breakdown of marriage. During the war men lived apart from their wives for as much as five years without marriage breakdown.

Statistics have been quoted but none were given for cases where there has been reconciliation and the resolution of problems. Couples sometimes go to marriage counsellors, clergymen, and even to lawyers for help. Even though I am a lawyer I suggest this type of legislation would give lawyers a field day if divorce were so easy after one and a half years of separation.

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because of the interest shown by members and the fact that all hon. members have not been able to participate, I should like to move that you ask for consent that this bill retain its position on the order paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I still have the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private bills has expired.

Would the House give the Chair permission to go into Committee of the Whole before we adjourn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock, clause 6 as amended was under consideration.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the problem under consideration was this: By virtue of special provisions in the act, multinational insurance companies employed certain benefits which their Canadian counterparts did not, more specifically in the way their revenue income was computed, some investments located in foreign lands were deducted from income made in Canada; thus they were, or could be placed in a more favourable situation than Canadian companies without operations abroad. That is why clause 6(11) was suggested in committee: it placed Canadian insurers on the same footing as multinational insurance companies. We reached that decision as a result of the many representations made to us by Canadian life insurers. If hon. members want me to give them a highly technical explanation, I have here a four-page text I can read to them, unless they feel that the explanation I have just given them in laymen's terms is adequate.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some information on that clause. The minister changed the recommendations contained in the budget of March 31, 1977, and in his intervention on October 20, 1977, he mentioned that with respect to capital gains, the difference between the premiums paid and the surrender value would no longer be considered as a gain of income but the matter of the interest on loans was not taken out. With the recommended amendments is the person borrowing on his insurance paying interest to create income? Can that person consider the interest paid on his loan from the insurance company as an expense and reduce his income by that amount when he prepared his tax return for, let us say, the year 1977?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the hon. member is valid but I intend to deal with it later under clause 14. It is indeed my intention to consider the interest paid by an insured to his insurer when he receives part of his capital—what used to be called a loan on the insurance policy—as deductible. That would not really be called interest but a premium for the privilege of having part of his capital available immediately. Those amendments will be dealt with later in the debate under clause 14. We are now considering clause 6(11) dealing with an entirely different problem—the problem of insurance.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I put the question to the minister because I wonder at times if we are really going to get to clause 14.

Mr. Chrétien: I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will be able to get to clause 14, and I am quite pleased that the hon. member anticipated the debate. That is why if the explanation I gave earlier on clause 6(11) is satisfactory to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) then we will be able to pass that clause and move to clause 14 as quickly as possible.

● (2012)

Mr. Stevens: The minister has given us a synopsis of what we understand to be the effect of paragraph 11 of subclause 6. He did refer to a more technical, four-page description of what is happening under this paragraph. I think that very often the explanation of the reason for putting in amendments is forgotten. I wonder, therefore, whether we might take those four pages of technical comment as read, with a view to having the benefit of the Hansard record tomorrow. We would then have the advantage of a more technical description of what is proposed, and then be able to move on.

Mr. Chrétien: I have no objection to this more complete explanation being on the record, but I should also like to dispose of the clause as soon as possible. If there is no objection, I will read the description to which the hon. member has referred. I can understand that it may be painful for some people to listen to me while I am reading a technical text, but it might be good practice. That might be the better way, because I want to make progress.

This important addition to the act is one of the measures to eliminate the unwarranted tax advantages gained by some multinational insurers who benefited from certain defects in the act before 1976. It applies to those companies which were on the branch election basis for the purpose of determining their investment revenue. By exploiting these deficiences some insurers obtained a major advantage over other insurers such as purely domestic companies, multinationals which were on the branch election basis but did not take advantage of the deficiencies and other multinationals which used the alternative method—the "proportional basis"—of determining investment revenue.

The branch election basis permitted the insurer to designate as having been held in the Canadian corporation's insurance business any of its property, subject only to the requirement that the value thereof had an aggregate value of not less than its Canadian insurance liabilities. For tax purposes, only the income from such designated property was included in the insurer's income. The deficiencies in the branch election basis, when exploited, presented the opportunity for significant tax avoidance. The deficiencies permitted the artificial reduction of investment revenues wherever the company —selected cash and other assets—such as accounts receivable—that did not produce any revenue or that yielded a low return, or —selected assets that were held for only a short period of time during the year and therefore produced very little investment revenue.

By using these deficiencies those insurers on the branch election basis could reduce gross income and thereby show a loss for tax purposes or, in the more typical situation, claim less than the maximum amount deductible as a reserve or as capital cost allowance. In either event the result was that the insurer in subsequent years had a backlog of unclaimed deductions and/or loss carryovers which could be used to reduce income for many years into the future.

These deficiencies were effectively eliminated in 1976. This bill attempts to deal with the carryover problem from years before 1976. The amendments require those insurers who used the branch election basis in 1975 to recalculate their gross investment revenue for that year using the proportional basis. If the recomputation produces additional revenue, the excess will be applied to reduce two specific unused reserves that would otherwise have been deductible in 1977 and subsequent years. Any balance is referred to in the bill as "the 1975 branch accounting election deficiency."

The amount of the 1975 branch accounting election deficiency will be applied in the following order:

(a) to reduce unclaimed investment reserve

(b) to reduce unclaimed capital cost allowances

(c) to reduce loss carry forwards from the year 1972 to 1976

(d) to reduce the unclaimed reserve for group term policies, and

(e) to reduce unclaimed policy reserves for other life insurance policies and annuities.

Any remaining balance of the deficiency will be deducted on a pro-rata basis from the undepreciated capital cost of any depreciable property of the insurer.

The amendment deems the insurer to have deducted, prior to its 1977 taxation year, additional capital cost allowance on the basis referred to above. The effect is to reduce capital cost allowances that would otherwise be deductible in computing the insurer's income for 1977 and subsequent taxation years.

The addition of subsection 13(23) is one of a series of amendments related to the introduction in 1978 of a new, more stringent method of determining the policy reserves that may be deducted by life insurance companies. A life insurer is allowed to deduct certain policy reserves in computing income. The reserve claimed in one year is added to income in the following year, and an appropriate reserve is then deducted for that year. Because the policy reserves under the new method to apply in 1978 will be less than those under the existing act, the foregoing rule would force the insurer to include the entire reserve difference in income in 1978. In order to ease the impact of the transition, a special provision has been introduced—see proposed subsection 138(4.2)—to permit a life insurer to include in income in 1978, not the amount actually claimed in 1977, but a lesser amount equal to the amount the 1977 reserves would have been if they had been computed under the new method. Thus the differences between the two reserving methods will not be taxed and will in effect provide a source of base capital that will facilitate the transition.

As a corollary to this relieving measure it is necessary to scale down certain amounts which the insurer would otherwise be permitted to deduct in computing income in subsequent years. One of these amounts is capital cost allowance that the insurer was entitled to claim in the taxation years 1969 to 1977 inclusive—the years in which the old method of computing policy reserves was operative. To the extent that capital cost allowance was underclaimed in that period because of the generosity of those reserves, the amount that was unclaimed should not be available after 1977. This is accomplished in part by the amendment to subsection 13(23) of the act.

The proposed subsection 13(23) deems any unclaimed capital cost allowance to have been claimed prior to 1978.

• (2022)

Regulations under section 138(3)(a)(i) will ensure that capital cost allowance and other deductions in excess of the transitional difference will not be eliminated. The net result of this approach is that life insurers will have a level of income and deductions calculated on the assumption that the reserving method for 1978 had been in existence in the 1969-1977 period.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, having heard the great epistle from the minister, his summary or synopsis, and then the technical part, will the minister now be good enough to explain what his summary means and what he just read means in ordinary laymen's terms? A tax law should be in ordinary laymen's terms.

Mr. Chrétien: If the hon. member had been in the House, he would know I did that before reading the technical explanation.

Mr. Jones: I was here and heard both.

Mr. Chrétien: The first time it was in French. Perhaps I have to repeat it in English.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Chrétien: Stanley says no. I just explained the difficulty. There are some corporations and insurance companies which operate in Canada and elsewhere. Some were using a loophole in order to avoid taxes in Canada. It was unfair to the multinationals which are not using that loophole and the Canadians which could not use it. These technical amendments will put insurance companies on an equal basis for that purpose.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for putting his summary and technical explanation on the record concerning this clause. To the best of his knowledge is the amendment which he has described satisfactory to the Canadian life insurance companies? Has he any representation from them indicating that they feel this will plug the loophole about which they have been complaining?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, we have received many representations from all the insurance companies, both the Canadian companies and the multinationals. They could not develop a position on which they could all agree. This will meet the requirements of most of them. We are not sure that everyone will be happy with the technique we have adopted, but it will go a long way to ensure the multinationals do not have an unfair advantage over Canadian insurance companies.

Mr. Stevens: I would like the minister to confirm or otherwise that some companies still feel there is a substantial loophole that foreign life insurance companies will be able to take advantage of, notwithstanding the amendment to which he is now referring.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think that will be the case. We are quite satisfied that this will plug the loophole and everyone will be on the same footing. We will, of course, be monitoring the activities of the insurance companies in that field. If that is not sufficient, obviously we will have to implement further amendments. My advisers, the experts in the department, are quite sure this will cure the problem.

Mr. Stevens: The minister was going to give me an explanation with regard to subclause (6)(2). I believe he is ready to give that now. I trust it is not as long as his last explanation.

Mr. Chrétien: It is shorter, Mr. Chairman. With regard to subclause 6(1), the distinction between taxation year and fiscal period is crucial throughout the act. The taxation year refers to the taxpayer which, for an individual, is the calendar year. Fiscal period refers to the accounting period of business. That difference has long been in the Income Tax Act. The change in subclause 6(1) simply changes a reference.

In order to meet the requirement of the hon. member for Moncton, this is a very simple proposition. The fiscal year of any individual such as a member of parliament is the calendar year when reporting his profits or losses. When the hon. member for York-Simcoe was in the banking system, when he was reporting his profits or losses that was for what we call the taxation year.

Mr. Stevens: The fiscal period.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, the fiscal period.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on the problems regarding insurance companies. I would like to voice some of the criticisms that were made when the budget was brought down, dealing with the taxation of insurance companies. It was suggested by Mr. Patterson, president of Actuarial Consultants of Canada Limited, that the industry is mainly fighting brush fires in its attacks against the policy gains tax at death and on proposals to tax the policy gains part of policy loans and to disallow interest on policy loans as a deductible expense.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the problem being raised at this time by the hon. member for Dauphin is with regard to clause 14. If we can go to that clause, I have some amendments that cope with the problem raised earlier in the evening by the hon. member for Gatineau. He referred to the same points now being raised by the hon. member for Dauphin. If we can move to clause 14, I will deal with the problem.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions with regard to subclause (5), on insulation conservation, which is really energy conservation. The minister and his department are very conscious of energy conservation. They are doing all they can to remove the tax on energy conservation equipment and materials.

For over two years I prodded the former minister of finance to take the tax off wood stoves, which he finally did. It has now become a matter of an interpretation of what is a wood stove under the act. I just got a ruling for a Canadian company in my constituency which is fully owned by Canadians and which manufactures wood stoves. The Minister of National Revenue said that under the act these are not wood stoves, but fireplace heaters.

A company in the United States markets a similar product in Canada. The interpretation of what they are marketing is that it is a wood stove. That company manufactures a chalet model heater that can be used in any home, cottage or building. It is adaptable to a chimney in almost any type of dwelling. This unit can be used also as a cooking stove. It will fit into a fireplace and can be used in fireplaces for efficiency. Instead of there being a 93 per cent heat loss as with an open fireplace, this unit reduces the heat loss to 65 per cent. The Minister of National Revenue has made a ruling on this unit indicating that it is really a fireplace. Instead of applying the 12 per cent tax, he has indicated that it should go down to 5 per cent. I maintain this is gross discrimination against a Canadian manufacturer. It is a small business which is doing a service in energy conservation for our country by efficiently using wood.

Last week in Time magazine in the "Living" section there was an article entitled "Back to the Wood Flame". It indicated that Americans are experiencing new romance in the old flame. Also it referred to similar types of units which are being used extensively in the United States and which can be used in Canada. These heaters are highly efficient. They conserve energy such as oil, gas, and electricity. There is no tax on oil, gas or electric stoves. I brought up this topic before because there was a 12 per cent tax on wood stoves and nothing on oil, gas or electric stoves. We want to conserve this type of energy.

There has been a ruling by the Department of Finance to the effect that the tax should be taken off wood stoves, yet we have the Department of National Revenue making a ruling which indicates in fact that these heaters are not wood stoves but are fireplaces. Who has the final ruling on this type of situation? Does the minister not have an obligation to make sure that what is indicated in the act is carried out?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to the hon. member's question. I have listened to history of the problem. The Department of National Revenue has the authority to rule under the Excise Tax Act. Of course its ruling does not remedy the situation. It is necessary to have an amendment to the act. If that is not satisfactory to the hon. member, the only thing I can do, when I come back to the House with some other budget, is change it. In the present budget we are not dealing with a change to the Excise Tax Act. There is not even a possibility of an amendment at this stage.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, there is some urgency here. During this time of energy conservation these types of units have to be sold and should be sold. As far as I am concerned, the ruling of the Department of National Revenue is not correct. I should like to refer to the section of the act which deals with energy conservation equipment. That section deals with wood burning stoves, furnaces and space heaters, not including fireplaces, stoves, furnaces or space heaters which burn oil or gas. That section is something like an asparagus root, pretty badly tangled.

I listened to the remarks of the lawyers in this Chamber. As a layman, to me this section seems to indicate that the tax will be removed from woodburning stoves and heaters, unless it is necessary to use gas or oil along with the wood.

In this instance a Canadian company is manufacturing a heating unit which conserves energy. A ruling has been made with regard to an American company which indicates that it is all right for them, but it is not all right for a Canadian company in my riding. This really upsets me. Because this unit can be plugged into a fireplace, the ruling is that it is a fireplace. It has to be modified in order to be plugged into a fireplace.

For the last two months I have worked with the Minister of National Revenue in an attempt to get a ruling. I received a ruling yesterday indicating a reduction to 5 per cent. I believe heatilators should be dealt with in exactly the same manner as wood stoves or wood burning units. We have argued for over two years in an attempt to place wood stoves and wood burning units in exactly the same position as oil, gas and electricity. What kind of ruling is this?

I believe the Minister of Finance is fair and reasonable, but his department is not doing anything to remove the taxes from these types of units, machines, and materials which conserve energy. We have not got that much time. Time is running out for this company. As far as I am concerned, we must look after our Canadian companies. I realize this firm is in my riding, and I have an axe to grind because of that. Nevertheless, I believe the argument is valid. We do not have the time to look at it, and then come back with a different interpretation and a different ruling. I am asking for that now before it is too late.

The Chairman: I do not want the hon. member to think I am preventing him from speaking, but he is seeking an amendment which cannot be presented under the clause being dealt with in committee at this point.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I may find myself in a very difficult position and I support my friend, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, simply because I have encountered the same problem that heatilators conserve a good deal of energy. The majority are made in Hastings county. They should be down to zero per cent as well. The point I wanted to make to the minister is that in the United States the Senate is considering a tax credit for those people who use wood exclusively as a form of fuel. This is a step further than we have considered here. I want to make a representation to the minister that he look at the possibility of a tax credit for people who use the renewable resource, namely, wood, for heating, rather than coal, oil or gas.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, before we vote on clause 6 may I point out that I indicated before dinner that I would like to set the record straight concerning the various comments the minister keeps making about the time that this bill has been before the House. He has repeatedly stated that it has been before the House for 32 days. As you know, Mr. Chairman, the first reading of this bill was on November 2, so clearly in no way could it have been before the House for 32 days. We have not even spent a month on it yet.

But the more important point is that the bill was not even introduced for second reading until November 7, and since that time, including the time we spent on second reading, the time we spent debating the first closure motion and the time we spent in committee of the whole, only 14 days have been spent on the bill. Of those 14 days, most were short days in the sense they were either Wednesdays or days when we had extensive questions of privilege or notices of motions with which Mr. Speaker had to deal. In short, it is totally misleading to convey the impression that the bill has been unduly delayed. It is particularly so when we bear in mind that this bill is really the son, if you like, of Bill C-56, which was brought out for first reading on June 15 and came out of the March 31 budget. That bill was not debated for one day in the House. In short, I hope the minister will refrain in future from misleading the House with any suggestion that there has been any undue delay in considering this bill, because it is not true.

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I never said that the bill was before the House for 32 days. The hon. member mentioned 14 days. I think it was before the House more than 14 days, because the hon. member has not referred to the fact that there was an agreement in the House to permit longer sitting hours to make up, for example, for the day which was lost to permit the Conservative opposition party to have its national convention. On top of those longer days we spent six days debating the spring budget of the former minister of finance. I recognize that was not on the bill, but we spent six days debating those measures. Also, the opposition had warned the government that when the House resumed in the fall economic problems would be debated. In fact, in the eight day debate on the Speech from the Throne mostly economic matters were under discussion. When you add up all those days you find they come to more than 30 days.

The Chairman: In no way can the remarks of both hon. members who have spoken be related to clause 6.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if there is any significance in the fact that this bill was introduced for second reading on the sixtieth anniversary of the Russian revolution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Dealing specifically with your reference to clause 6, and before we vote on the clause, may I point out to the minister that the time we have spent on clause 6 has been very fruitful because, if we check last Thursday's Hansard, we will find that in dealing with the insulation grant provision the minister stated that he could not understand my point about the legislative provision not being in accordance with the income tax motion. He went on to state that there is no fundamental difference between the two. He reiterated that several times, and now I am very pleased to see that, as of yesterday, with the bringing in of the new amendments with which we dealt today, the minister has come around 180 degrees and he now says that he agrees with me. He said he has checked this and he feels I have a good point. He said that rather than having a complicated procedural problem referred to Mr. Speaker, he agrees with me that the Ways and Means motion is more narrow than the bill and that this should not be so. In short, the time has been well spent if we have corrected that error alone in Bill C-11. Let me assure you, Mr. Chairman that I could go on and point out at least ten other errors which we have had a hand in correcting so far.

Mr. Chrétien: I am surprised that the hon. member is belabouring this point. He put that before me and I said he had a point. It is obvious to me that he is so entrenched in the opposition that, when he has a little victory, it takes him 24 hours to realize it.

The Chairman: Is clause 6 agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7.

Mr. Stevens: Again clause 7 is one of those rather complicated clauses and I wonder if the minister could give us a quick summary of what, in his understanding, clause 7 is attempting to do.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, it reminds me of the old song "Roll over, roll over again". This clause is another roll over. I think now the hon. member will understand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am not as familiar with the roll over song as is the minister apparently. Perhaps for the record he should give us a more serious explanation of what clause 7 is about, bearing in mind it has some ramifications for certain corporations in the country.

Mr. Chrétien: Everyone knows that I am an extremely serious person, Mr. Chairman, but sometimes it is important to relax for a while and to bring in a good atmosphere to the House.

The clause is, first, to permit proceeds on the sale of eligible capital property to be offset by any costs relating to their disposition. Second, the purpose of the clause is to permit rollover when eligible capital property is disposed of and the proceeds are reinvested in the business.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 8.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, again this clause appears to provide more for one segment of the economy than it does for another. The old Section 15, according to my advisers at Osgoode Hall, was designed to prevent generally the distribution of corporate profits in a form other than taxable dividends. Specifically, Section 15(2) is designed to prevent the withdrawal of corporate profits in the form of loans to shareholders. If a loan, other than one made for the specific purposes enumerated below, is made by a corporation to a shareholder, it is considered income in the hands of an individual shareholder and a deemed dividend if the shareholder is a corporation.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Peters: The obvious loophole in the present section is that loans not made directly to a shareholder but to a person not dealing at arm's length with the shareholder are not caught by that section. Under the proposed amendments a loan from a particular corporation, a related corporation, or a partnership including the particular corporation, to a shareholder of that particular corporation, a person with whom the shareholder does not deal at arm's length, or a related corporation, will now be loans for the purpose of the section. Those are the comments of students who have looked at this and, as I said the other day, Osgoode students are going to be the government officials of tomorrow. They will replace the ones we have today. It is very good that their professors tell them to use their heads.

The minister is very practical and down to earth. He must know that that gobbledygook is for the birds. These young students have looked at it and have made some suggestions. That gobbledygook is very complicated, but it does not really have to be. It refers to "arm's length" and all that stuff. They say that the changes are a substantial step toward closing the present abuses. Loans from a closely held corporation to the provincial shareholder's wife will now be taxed under the section. Related corporations will no longer be able to lend to a shareholder of a different but related corporation.

The act will still permit corporations to make substantial interest-free loans to officers and employees for the purchase of homes and cars. This is a common method of deriving a benefit from the use of corporate surplus. Interest on similar loans is brought into the shareholder's income in the United States. It is doubtful that the tax-free status of such loans can be justified. In this regard an article appeared in the Globe and Mail on Thursday, November 24, under the headline "Company Loans to Executives Still Rated Good Perks Under Proposed Amendments", and it reads as follows:

> While interest-free or low interest loans will no longer be the perfect perk for executives if proposed changes to the Income Tax Act come into effect in 1979, they will still be a good perk, according to Lyman MacInnis of Touche Ross and Co. of Toronto.
> Under present law, no interest or low interest on a loan to an employee, for buying a house, for example, is not a taxable benefit.
> Under the proposed law an employee would have to pay tax on the difference in interest between a prescribed rate, now set 8 per cent, and the rate on housing loans over $50,000.
> Other interest-free and low-interest loans, with certain exceptions, would record the difference between the prescribed rate and the rate at which the loan was made as a taxable benefit.
> There is a deductible of $500, in total, from the benefit.
> He illustrated the proposed law by citing the case of two taxpayers, X and Y, both of whom have to borrow $50,000.
> If X borrows at the bank for 11 per cent, his annual interest cost on the loan is $5,500 and, if he is in a 50 per cent income tax bracket and cannot deduct the cost of the loan for tax purposes, the effective cost of his interest is $11,000.
> If Y receives a loan of $50,000 from his employer at no interest, before 1979, he would suffer no tax consequences and be between $5,500 and $11,000 better off than X.
> The argument against making Y's benefit taxable because it is not from employment is ridiculous, he said.
>
> 'Try to negotiate an interest-free loan from anyone other than an employer and find out just how ridiculous that argument really is.'
> There is further proof that Y's benefit came from employment, he said. If his employer gave Y $5,500 to pay the interest on the loan, Y would be fully taxable on the money. After paying the tax on the money he would not have enough to pay the interest unless the loan were fully deductible for tax purposes.
> 'All of this suggests that Y shouldn't really be too upset if Revenue Canada includes $3,500 in income as a result of the interest-free loan. At the 50 per cent tax bracket this cost is still only $1,750, compared to X's $5,500.'

I am not interested in arguing the difference between X and Y in this example, but even the newspapers indicate that it is unfair. Because of this stupid tax dodge—and certainly the AIB has pointed this out—we allow these extra perks where a person is not paid anything but is given a benefit instead. A man can get a benefit of $5,500. That is more than some of the people in my area get to live on, yet we give that kind of benefit. All the taxpayers pay for it.

The poor little guy who has to carry a lunch pail, who has to buy clothes for a particular job or who has to have transportation to get to his job, gets a maximum exemption of $250, but we give the rich people, the fat cats, civil servants, and those making $50,000, benefits of $5,500. Why do we do that? It is because they are the ones who draw up the act. They do not draw up the act for my workers or the people in the minister's riding who carry lunch pails. They do it for themselves, the civil servants of this country. Here is a case where the minister could save money if he so wanted. He should cut out those perks. Is the minister arguing that all this is wrong?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Peters: Is the minister arguing that the amendment he is putting in is to cut down some of these advantages?

Mr. Chrétien: Sure.

Mr. Peters: Does the minister agree that there are still quite a number of perks in that section? If he does not, these students are wrong and the financial expert from the Globe and Mail is wrong. If the minister is right and all these perks have been cut out, he has a batch of civil servants different from the batch he had a year ago, because that batch put them all in, and I do not think the present batch has taken them all out.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this move is to close a loophole. Prior to this there was no limit on the loans which could be given to someone buying a house. He could borrow interest-free from his company. We are plugging that loophole completely. We had a long debate last week, and the only purpose for which money can be borrowed is for buying a house when moving, and the maximum is $50,000. Many hon. members opposite said that was really too harsh. I remember many interventions by the hon. member for Churchill, who said that very often people in his area move, and they need that kind of fringe benefit. The hon. member for Churchill was not talking about management. He was talking about blue collar workers who have to move into mining towns.

We are preventing many abuses. Clause 8 will not permit something to be done indirectly which was not permitted directly. Clause 8 will not permit making a loan to a wife. We are trying to make sure that we prevent what could have become a loophole. We are moving in the same direction the hon. member is arguing about, and we are diminishing very substantially the abuse which can take place when money is borrowed interest-free. I do not see why the hon. member argues against that. If he refers to the loans that are permissible when they borrow shares from their company, any loans that are made are deductible from income. My officials inform me there is no abuse in that case.

Mr. Peters: That is not really true, Mr. Chairman, and the minister's officials are not informing him correctly, unless I misread this. It appears to me they have closed the loophole about the relationship of the wife, or have made a substantial step toward that, but where a shareholder or employee borrows money at less than the going interest rate, he is to be taxed on the difference between the prime interest rate and the rate he is being charged. He may be paying no interest or the full prime interest rate, but he will pay tax on the difference between his rate and the prime rate.

Two persons borrowing under identical circumstances may find that on $50,000 one gets an advantage of $3,500 because of his taxable income, while the other one has an advantage of $1,750. To be in the perfect position, taking the same example, a taxpayer would get $5,500. The students point out that this is taxable in the United States and claim there is no justification for such loans to be tax-free in this country.

In order, to be fair, I suggest the tax structure should be related to the total family income. The deduction should not be a flat $250 but should be related to need. In that case the minister's statement would be correct, and indeed it may be correct in certain circumstances. It would mean that if an individual got an interest-free loan or a loan at a reduced rate of interest as part of his wages, he would be in a reasonable position vis-à-vis the person earning, for example, $50,000. If that kind of tax exemption is given to some people it seems to me the same advantage should be given the average person.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think I am faced with a disagreement with the hon. member that I cannot solve overnight. He takes a different view of the situation. At this time we are trying to cope with a situation that was abused whereby a company was lending money to, say, 20 employees—and not only managers. Very often in a mining town the blue collar workers had this advantage as well, as mentioned last week by the hon. member for Churchill. That is why we decided to limit it to $50,000 for a house, and $6,000 for extras that go into the house, and the provision when it is a loan for buying shares relating to the company.

The hon. member can claim that we should abolish it completely, but that would create problems for those people who use it in an honest way to cope with the problem of moving employees. I think the method is fair.

The hon. member referred to the situation in the United States. As I understand it with interest-free loans, the benefit of the interest is not considered as revenue in that country.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On clause 10.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could give an explanation of this clause. Specifically what prescribed rate do they have in mind to substitute for the 5 per cent now in the act?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, last week we had a very interesting discussion when we decided the end of summer was before the coming of fall. It is the same rate of interest. At this time it will be 8 per cent.

The Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On clause 12.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, this is a new clause in the bill and I think the committee should have some explanation of what the minister has in mind. This deals with advertising in non-Canadian periodicals, and this is quite a controversial question.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this was a very controversial problem, but I think it is less so now. The amendment clarifies the meaning of the expression "substantially the same" by defining it to mean more that 20 per cent the same. Thus, an issue of a periodical more than 20 per cent of the content of which is the same as a foreign periodical, cannot qualify as Canadian. The amendment simply clarifies the expression of Revenue Canada. In fact it is just clarifying the decision of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Stevens: Could the minister give examples of magazines excluded as a result of this terminology, that more than 20 per cent of the content is the same? Where do Reader's Digest and Time come in?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, Time Canada, which has a continuing arrangement with the United States parent, could not meet the 20 per cent nor the Canadian ownership requirement and has ceased publication in Canada. Reader's Digest does not have a continuing arrangement with a foreign periodical and has met the 20 per cent test and complies with the ownership rules.

Mr. Stevens: Dealing with Time, what does the department feel is the aftermath of Time being deemed a non-Canadian periodical? I understand they are selling more advertising than ever in Canada although they cut the rate in half because of the non-deductible feature.

Mr. Chrétien: We do not know what they charge clients for advertising in Time. Companies that advertise in the magazine cannot deduct the cost on the same basis they would when advertising in the old Time magazine. The hon. member claims the price of advertising in Time has been cut in half in order to be competitive in the Canadian market. That could be the case, but we do not know.

Mr. Stevens: Could the minister tell us if his department or any other intends to follow up the approach taken by the government on Time and Reader's Digest? Has there been any follow-up of the aftermath on either of these magazines?

• (2112)

Mr. Chrétien: I think that the administration of this program is under the control of the Secretary of State and someone is monitoring those aspects there—I really don't know. I know since that time Maclean's magazine has decided to publish on a different basis. They are going to publish weekly, and some claim this is as a result of these amendments. The hon. member could ask that question of the Secretary of State, or if you want me to ask him to provide the information, I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. Stevens: I will be pleased if the minister is pleased to do so.

Mr. Chrétien: I am such a nice guy.

Clause 12 agreed to.

On clause 13.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, this is dealing with the question of advertising involving television stations and broadcasting. Perhaps the minister could lead off by giving a fuller explanation of what they hope to achieve by this clause.

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to give the explanation in my own words first. The amendments to clause 14—

Mr. Stevens: No, clause 13.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—unless the Minister of Finance is not finished.

Mr. Chrétien: I will allow the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie to go ahead.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, I support clause 13. It relates to Bill C-58 which we had before the House earlier. It deals with the problem of advertising placed on American border television stations which was draining about $20 million a year from Canadian television stations. This amendment is to prevent such advertising from being deductible for Canadian companies for income tax purposes. I feel there is a loophole under the legislation as it is designed because it seems to me the clause in section 19(1) does not have the anti-avoidance affect which was presumably intended by the budget resolution, because the clause only refers to the date on which the contract was paid, and not the date on which it was executed. With the present clause, there is still the potential for long term contracts to have been executed before January 23, 1975, and paid before September 21, 1977, to escape tax liability. I wonder if the minister might explain if my interpretation is correct.

Mr. Chrétien: The interpretation of the hon. member I feel is incorrect. The amendment is exactly to cope with the problem the hon. member is dealing with, and I can read this technical section or explanation here. Some taxpayers sought to take advantage of this traditional deduction by signing a series of successive one year contracts in the hope of avoiding this allowance for an extended period of years. We are just closing the loophole with this clause 13.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, for further clarity, specifically then, if a long term contract was executed before January 23, 1975, and paid for before September 21, 1977, that contract would therefore not escape tax liability, according to the minister. It is that specific time frame with which I am concerned.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not follow the hon. member very clearly, but perhaps I can read these three lines. This amendment will ensure that the expenses will not be deductible if they are incurred after September 21, 1977, one full year after the section of the act was proclaimed in force. Therefore they cannot have a long term contract because the clause will cover them after the expiry of the first year.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, as an example, a hotel chain that wishes to advertise in American journals, American magazines down the west coast and in Florida—is that considered a legitimate advertising expense, a deductible expense for the purpose of bringing business into Canada? We are interested in tourism, and I would like to know. Perhaps the minister could answer that.

Mr. Chrétien: It will be deductible because it is not directed to the Canadian market. It is advertising which is directed to the American market to induce them to Canada. However, if they were to advertise in an American magazine to ask Canadians to buy a certain car in Canada, that will not be permitted.

Mr. Friesen: Just outside of Vancouver in Bellingham, Washington, we have an American television station. There are a lot of Canadian businesses that like to advertise on that television station, both for the benefit of the Canadian market as well as for the American market. I would ask the minister what is the difference between advertising on that television station and advertising in periodicals down the west coast for the businessman in the Vancouver area?

Mr. Chrétien: The Department of National Revenue will have to assess whether the advertising is directed to the Canadian clientele. If it is not directed to the Canadian clientele but the American clientele, that could be deductible. The ruling will be made by the Department of National Revenue after looking into the nature of the advertising program. If it is buying time on American television by Canadian businessmen for Canadian clientele this is not deductible. If it is for an American market, that can be deductible.

Mr. Friesen: Is the minister then saying that for a Canadian businessman advertising on a television station in Bellingham, Washington, trying to attract American business into Canada, his advertising expense is going to be a legitimate deductible business expense?

Mr. Chrétien: According to the law there will have to be a ruling by the Department of National Revenue, as the terms of the act are directed primarily to the market in Canada. This is not deductible, and National Revenue will have to look at the nature of the advertisement. Of course, because it is a border case you are taking one of the most difficult points. To simplify it you would be better off with the first question. If the advertising in California invited the Americans to come to British Columbia, it is deductible because it is directed to the American market. If you advertise at the border to attract the attention of the Canadian consumer through an American television station, this will not be deductible.

Mr. Friesen: I asked a difficult question knowing the minister is equal to it. I simply want to establish the point that there are some deductions available for advertising on American television stations. Some are available as a legitimate tax deductible expense to a Canadian business? That is the principle I want to establish.

Mr. Chrétien: The principle is yes, it could be.

Mr. Friesen: The second question I have in relation to that is in connection with the point raised by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie relating to Bill C-58 and the effect it has had on Canada, especially the convention trade. I think there is well documented evidence to the effect that the Americans have taken issue with this particular piece of legislation which we passed two years ago, and they have undertaken seemingly retaliatory measures. At least there have been movements afoot in the American Congress to have their tax measures altered in order to combat what they think is a prejudicial tax arrangement which we have in Canada.

I know that some months ago there was talk about some kind of dialogue between External Affairs or the Department of Finance here and their American counterparts. I would like to know what is happening in that interchange and if there is any movement toward mitigating that circumstance.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not buy the argument of the hon. member that the Americans have retaliated. Their law with regard to the reduction of expenses abroad by U.S. companies was not directed only against Canada. It was directed against all the nations of the world, because there had been some abuses taking place. I do not think we can link the fact that we passed Bill C-58 with the action of the U.S. Congress affecting conventions. It was not related at all.

● (2122)

In an effort to resolve the situation when I was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I talked with my counterpart in Washington. I explained the problem which had arisen for us—that we felt the U.S. action was unfair because Canadians were spending so much on vacations and conventions in the United States, and I was told that on the first occasion possible the situation would be remedied. In fact it was almost remedied by an amendment introduced into the Senate by Senator Goldwater—an amendment which was lost by one vote. The U.S. administration tells me that in its tax reform program being presented at this time the intention is to make the provision much more reasonable as far as Canada is concerned. I do not quarrel with the fact that only two conventions are permitted; it would be surprising if businessmen would want to have more than two conventions in the same year for the same group. The difficulty is that the level of permitted expenditure is not high enough at $35 a day. If you are in Toronto with an allowance of $35 a day, you would be lucky to be able to go out after breakfast.

An hon. Member: In Montreal, too.

Mr. Friesen: Well, it seems very strange that within a year after that bill was passed Canada, according to the figures given me by a member of the government in the other place, lost something like $120 million in convention business. The minister would have a hard time convincing me that there was not a cause and effect relationship, especially since I have read the resolutions which were discussed in the United States Congress in connection with this matter.

I should like to point out further that in the Vancouver area several hundreds of jobs have been lost because of the passage of that bill. An animation company which employed scores of people went out of business because of it; advertising companies went out of business; companies which were filming advertising for television productions and other companies making short features also went out of business. All these operations ended, with consequent unemployment, because of that particular measure. I should like the minister to reconsider the provisions of the bill before us in an attempt to improve the situation.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. If the present restrictive taxation policy is to be applied to advertising over United States television stations, and since there is only a limited amount of television advertising time available, does this not amount to a conspiracy in restraint of trade? After all, the CTV station is saturated. The CBC station is saturated, and the new television station has about as much advertising as it can take—anyway, the ratings are so low that many of the advertisers do not want to be on there. The Prime Minister says we are not producing enough—that we are producing at only some 85 per cent of our capacity. Well, we could be producing at 100 per cent of our productive capacity but if there is no opportunity to tell people about the products which are available, all the productivity in the world will not do any good. I ask the minister to reconsider this policy and to make it less stringent so that those who wish to advertise in the Vancouver area over stations south of the border would have the right to deduct expenses for advertising carried, say, by KVOS.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I cannot begin once again the whole discussion on Bill C-58 which was debated last year. Obviously the hon. member did not agree at that time. I said earlier that I did not see any relationship between Bill C-58 and the restrictive situation concerning U.S. conventions on Canadian territory. There is no relationship because, as a matter of fact, U.S. conventions are limited not only in Canada but also in Mexico and in Europe. Even in Canada, we imposed some restrictions because there was abuse in conventions abroad. Each country would like to protect its treasury by plugging up these sometimes very large holes of which some groups in society take unfair advantage, but there was no relationship between the two. So I note the fact that so far the hon. member is certainly less than enthusiastic over Bill C-58.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Does the minister have any figures as to the practical results flowing from that legislation? It seems to me that in the Winnipeg area some of the television stations in the United States are still carrying fairly extensive advertising which obviously originates in Winnipeg. I am wondering whether the minister has any information on the effect of this legislation restricting advertising over foreign television stations.

Mr. Chrétien: We do not know exactly what the effect is on the monetary side. It is very much a matter of cultural policy for Canada. Obviously, under the bill we passed last year, a company in southern Manitoba which is advertising in the northern states will have to pay more in exchange for time there. The goal of the policy was to make such advertising expenses non-deductible against Canadian taxes. If the hon. member wishes an assessment in terms of the benefit to the Canadian television industry, perhaps he would address his questions to my colleague, the Secretary of State.

It is evident that with respect to magazines this has permitted Macleans to expand considerably in Canada since Time is not considered a Canadian magazine. Macleans magazine went from being a monthly publication to one which is published every two weeks, and I am told that next year it will be on a weekly basis. I might also mention that there were two bills but each was addressed to the same principle—the protection of the Canadian market.

Mr. Orlikow: Since any revenue which American Television stations get from Canadian companies is, really, an extra bonus to them, gravy, we would call it, I understand that what those stations have done is to cut the price charged for commercials by half. In that way, Canadian companies are able to advertise and really not pay any more than they did before. Has the government given consideration to further restrictions on this kind of advertising which is being sold in the United States?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, you cannot do more than we have done in terms of the tax system. Perhaps the solution is to black out American stations in Canada. However, I am not about to promote that.

Mr. Orlikow: Perhaps it is not the minister's business, but I suggest that blacking out the commercials is not only a good idea but, according to our courts, legal.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister when he says that these magazines which advertise outside Canada should pay taxes pursuant to the Income Tax Act. There is something I should like to ask the minister: Are Macleans and Reader's Digest the only two magazines Bill C-11 is dealing with?

Mr. Chrétien: Bill C-11 simply clarifies the provisions which the Department of National Revenue uses as a basis for its decisions. Yes, those are the only two magazines, because they were in fact the only two foreign magazines published in Canada. Naturally, we are receiving magazines from all over the world, including France, England, and the United States. But in the case of Time magazine, Reader's Digest and Sélection du Reader's Digest, those were American publications published right here in Canada. One qualified as a Canadian publication and the other could not. The others are not attempting to publish here in Canada. Therefore, advertising expenses in foreign magazines directed to the Canadian market are not deductible.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, since those magazines are near-multinationals, can the Minister of Finance who is responsible for the bill tell us how he can check these two magazines' revenues for the purpose of Bill C-11?

Mr. Chrétien: Well, we do not have to check that. We say that a corporation inserting ads aimed at Canadian readers in Time magazine cannot deduct this as a legitimate expenditure. It can spend wherever it likes, but such expenditure is not tax deductible. This is the kind of checking being done. Any corporation wishing to spend $100,000 or $200,000 on advertisements in Newsweek magazine or any other U.S. magazine for that matter is perfectly free to do so providing this is not aimed at the Canadian market. Where a corporation wishes to buy space in a U.S. magazine to invite Americans to come to Canada, the expenditure is deductible, because it is not aimed at the Canadian but the American market.

Mr. Beaudoin: There is something I do not understand. You are saying that a corporation advertising in those two American magazines cannot make a deduction for it. This is what I cannot understand. How come you can check the impact of advertisements relative to the Canadian market, whether the expenditure is deductible, because this in my view is a one way proposition. You want to prevent those corporations from advertising in a U.S.-Canadian magazine, you are preventing them from advertising profitably, without checking across the board their advertising expenditures in Canada. This is what I do not understand.

Mr. Chrétien: I would first like to clarify this. Reader's Digest magazine qualifies as a Canadian magazine. So, in order not to confuse committee members, let us forget about it. All advertisement expenditures in the Reader's Digest magazine which is published in Canada, are deductible from the advertiser's income. But where an advertisement is inserted in Time magazine, the cost of that advertisement is not deductible from the corporation's revenues for income tax purposes. That's crystal clear. When an advertisement is directed to the Canadian public, when that advertisement has a Canadian content, when Canadians are for example invited to drink vodka by an advertisement which reads: "Drink Canadian vodka"—and Time has an advertisement section directed to Canadians only—no deduction is allowed. When the U.S. issue of Time publishes an advertisement to invite Americans to visit Canada, a deduction will be allowed. The Department of National Revenue has to compare the two advertisements and decide whether one is directed to Canadians or whether the other is directed to Americans.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, before I give my explanations, I would like to table some amendments related to clause 14(1). Next, I will present an amendment to clause 14(2). So I will table the amendments forthwith and give the explanation.

I move:

That subclause 14(1) of Bill C-11 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out lines 32 to 35 on page 21 thereof and substituting the following:

"the end of paragraph (ee) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraphs:"; and

(b) by striking out line 7 on page 22 thereof and substituting the following:

"365; and

Policy loan repayments

(hh) an amount in respect of all or any part of any policy loan repaid by the taxpayer in the year not exceeding the amount, if any, by which

(i) the amount required by subsection 148(1) to be included in computing his income in the year or a previous year from a disposition described in subparagraph 148(9)(c)(ii) in respect of that policy

exceeds

(ii) the part of any loan on that policy repaid by the taxpayer that was deductible under this paragraph in computing his income for a previous taxation year."

That subclause 14(2) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 21 on page 22 thereof and substituting the following:

"March 31, 1977 except to the extent the amount thereof it verified by the insurer in prescribed manner and prescribed form to be interest paid in the year on that loan that is not added to the adjusted cost basis (within the meaning given that expression in subsection 148(9)) of the policy.

"Life insurance policy"

(2.2) For the purposes of paragraphs (1)(c) and (d) a "life insurance policy" does not include a policy referred to in paragraph 148(1)(b)."

He said: Mr. Chairman, these very important amendments are being introduced following the many representations that I have received and which were mentioned earlier this evening in the committee by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont). Mr. Chairman, these amendments concern what the hon. member called insurance policy loans, but this expression can be misleading. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) also made many representations in this regard. This is what the government has decided to do. Mr. Chairman, in spite of what was provided in the bill, when someone borrows, to use the popular expression, a certain amount on his insurance policy, the amount he must pay and which was previously considered as interest but which legally constitutes charges, will actually be considered as tax deductible within the year for businessmen as well as for ordinary taxpayers. The amount of the charges or interest will be considered as a payment on the policy and will be deductible when the policy comes to maturity. To make myself better understood, I should perhaps read a very long—no, it is shorter than what I have already read. I shall therefore read more technical explanations after giving a layman's version of these changes.

These amendments relate to the treatment of advances on insurance policies, the so-called policy loans. I have carefully gone over the recent representations I have received on this matter, particularly from small businesses, and I have reviewed the comments on second reading of Bill C-11. The impression I have formed is that there is general satisfaction the bill will, for the first time, give tax recognition to the vast majority of policyholders for the interest they pay to an insurance company when they take out a policy loan. I want to clarify this. It is not really a loan. It is an advance. The word "loan" was used to facilitate the discussion. It will do this by an upward adjustment in the recorded cost base of the policy. However, I have also formed the impression that the small proportion of policyholders who use the proceeds of policy loans to earn income would prefer to receive such relief in the form of a current deduction from taxable income, rather than through an adjustment to the cost base of their policy. Amendments to clauses 14 and 74 will achieve this.

Furthermore, the amendments will enable a policy holder, on repayment of an advance on a policy, to reduce his current taxable income by the amount it was increased as a result of taking out the advance. In the bill this tax adjustment takes the form of an upward adjustment in the cost base of the policy. Representations to us indicate that policyholders would prefer to have the relief in the form provided by the amendment, rather than in the form provided by the bill as it is.

In short, there were some changes which were advantageous in the bill. They will remain. It will provide an added option to the person borrowing on his policy to deduct from his income the payments made on a yearly basis. I can see the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is listening. I appreciate that. Many members on the government side have asked me to reconsider that. Everyone knows I am an extremely flexible person.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions for the minister. Dealing with subclause (1) of clause 14, would the minister agree that this amendment provides, on the repayment of a policy loan, that the taxpayer may deduct from his income any amount previously included in income by virtue of his policy loan?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Dealing with subclause (2) of clause 14, would the minister agree that this amendment provides for interest payable on a policy loan being deductible, subject to the insurance company making certain recommendations concerning how they are treating the loan interest?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, if the loan is used to earn income, the answer is yes.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that he must choose his words but he is not sure, he did not accept that it could be considered as a loan; he called that an advance. But I could quote a great number of experts who claim that it is actually a loan which complies with the requirements of a loan made by a financial institution, a bank or a credit union. So in the case of a policyholder who applies for a loan—I do not have to be as cautious as the minister—for, say $3,000, from his insurer for the year 1978 only, his loan will be considered as income and if it is reimbursed in 1979, it could be charged against his income in 1979.

Mr. Chrétien: I will use everyday language instead of the legal jargon I tried to use a few minutes ago. Let us suppose a person borrows, as the hon. member suggests, $3,000. If that $3,000 is to increase his income, if he is a businessman, if he wants to invest in his business or earn additional income, the interest he must pay back annually to the insurance company, if he does pay it back, will be considered as an expense on his tax return for the following year.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, that was one of the remaining problems about life insurance. With respect to the loan will the two amendments tabled in the House correct the two problems I see with clause 14. The first one is taxing the policyholder when he takes out a loan on an insurance policy; the second is prohibiting in any case the interest on a policy loan from being deductible as an expense. So I understand that, as one of the amendments, the interest paid by a businessman or the head of a small business on a loan made on his insurance can be considered as an expense. But at page 31 of his Economic and Fiscal Statement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says, and I quote:

That where, after March 31, 1978, a life insurance policy is surrendered or matures, otherwise than on death, a policyholder be required to include in his income the excess of the amount received in respect of the surrender or maturity over the greater of the cash surrender value of the policy at its first anniversary date after March 31, 1977 plus the net premiums paid after that date and his net cost of the policy.

Mr. Chairman, I gave the example but I am sorry the minister did not answer it. Here it is again: In 1978, I borrow $3,000 on an insurance policy I have with a certain life insurance company. In 1979, according to clause 14 I must consider that loan as income and add it to my income for 1978. But if I pay that loan back the same year or the year after I have the right to deduct it from my income. Is my interpretation correct or not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the interpretation of the hon. member is partially correct that in the sense that if you borrow money on your policy, there are two aspects to consider. First is the life insurance and second the gains made by the company on that policy. If you withdraw a part of what is called gains, it will be considered as an income but if you repay it to the company, the situation will then be corrected. So, on those $3,000 there might be $2,700 that are strictly a loan on the policy and $300 that will be considered as the company's gain, the $300 being considered as an income.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, the minister has given in to 90 per cent of the representations made by several of his colleagues on the government side.

Mr. Chrétien: No, 100 per cent.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I do not withdraw my thanks, I maintain them, because they have corrected, first the question of an eventual tax on policy proceeds at death and also the other two problems I just mentioned. As the minister said, he is very generous and understanding, particularly when his colleagues on the government side make representations to him.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, the minister underlined earlier in his remarks that there are some people who borrow money on their insurance policy and do not pay back these loans. If I understand correctly the minister's interpretation, if for a reason or another you repay this amount, you then diminish your income accordingly. If for instance you keep the loan over a period of years, can you claim its costs, which are minimal incidently, but as being an expense on this loan for a period of years, because policyholders contract loans on their insurance policy and never intend to pay back these amounts of money which, in certain cases, are rather considerable? Are the costs of these loans or the service cost of this loan by the insurance company going to be deductible over a period of years?

Mr. Chrétien: The cost of the loans will be considered when they are reimbursed as being payments which are tax deductible.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister's explanation because he has been very clear about it. What I mean is whether this does not apply to the loan per se. I am talking about the cost, the interest which the insurance company charges the borrower. In certain cases, the sum of $3,000 was mentioned earlier, but there are people in business who have borrowed fairly large amounts, so the question is whether the cost of this loan toward the insurance company is going to last over a period of years because in certain cases this amount is never paid back to the insurance company, then it is deducted from the proceeds instead of being reimbursed?

Mr. Chrétien: The interest that will be reimbursed will be included in the cost of the policy when it comes to maturity, and at such time it will be deducted from the part of the insurance policy which is taxable as we are all aware. There is the part which is strictly life insurance and the part which represents an investment and the interest costs will be deductible from the tax to be paid on the investment part of the policy.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, as the minister knows, I am interested in these particular clauses and I want to pay him full marks, as well as his parliamentary secretary and, I am sure, a great many other colleagues on the other side of the House—

An hon. Member: Is this a love-in?

Mr. Darling: —who have considered the representations made by some of us at the very beginning, and the representations made to the hon. member for Rosedale when he was minister of finance. It is certain that he did not give us the same consideration as did the present minister, so again I commend him for this.

I was interested in some of the comments made regarding interest. Of course the interest for legitimate business is deductible, and that is plain common sense because the government will end up with more money in its coffers by making that allowance than by having businessmen borrow from some place else and putting the policy up as collateral.

Although it might be difficult to come up with the exact figure, I would assume that the amount in insurance policies is in the billions of dollars and the great majority of these policies are of a long term nature. The ones on which loans would be made which would be eligible for business interests would be, for the most part, whole life policies or even an endowment. In those particular policies there would be no profit on the policy whatever so far as the cash value is concerned. In other words, the amount of loan value on them would certainly not bring a profit, if the minister understands what I mean, because if you borrowed $10,000 on it, you would have paid in at least $10,000 and perhaps $12,000. So there is a very small percentage of people who will apply. Because of the small number who might, I do not know why the minister would keep this provision. In other words, a few will borrow more than they paid in, and I bet you could count them on your fingers and toes. Does the minister not think that?

Mr. Chrétien: I think the hon. member is right. Because of the very small proportion involved perhaps we should not have imposed that, but I would like to give the technical explanation to the hon. member tomorrow when we resume discussion on this bill.

[Translation]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Adjournment Debate

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—REASON FOR GRANT TO ITALIAN COMPANY TO MANUFACTURE REFRIGERATORS IN QUEBEC

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the time I have been here I have learned not to expect Liberal economic policies to make sense, but I must admit that the action the government has recently taken with the small refrigerator and freezer industry makes less sense than most other policies it has enunciated.

● (2202)

We know that a few years ago the government permitted the merger of the appliance division of GSW Limited and Westinghouse Canada to form a new venture, Canadian Appliance Manufacturing Company Ltd., or CAMCO, located in London, Ontario. This was done to rationalize that industry and make it more cost competitive, with the eventual hope that CAMCO would eventually capture foreign markets. There was surely some hope for this because is this sector of the small appliance industry Canadian firms have done very well. In fact in 1975 close to 500,000 small appliances were sold in Canada, and 99.3 per cent of them were produced in Canada.

Yet, in spite of these government policies and some success in the industry, what has the government done? It has turned around and given an Italian firm, Merloni Finanziaria, over $2.5 million as an incentive grant under DREE to set up a compact refrigerator firm in Granby, Quebec. What is the rationale for the grant by DREE? In its release the department said the company would create 179 jobs and that within three years 50 per cent of its products would be exported.

As it happens, Merloni is expected to produce somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100,000 units a year. That means that at least 50,000 units a year are going to go into the Canadian market, a market which this year has declined to less than 300,000 units.

The only thing more baffling than the DREE decision was the decision by the Foreign Investment Review Agency last May to permit the investment. If the rationale by DREE was sublime, then the FIRA rationale was ridiculous. They said in their release that "imports of compact appliances should be reduced considerably" by the Merloni investment. I suppose the considerable reduction in imports will cut into the 0.7 per cent of the market which is presently served by imports!

So if the company is not going to reduce imports and it will throw thousands of units onto a market which is already using only 60 per cent of its capacity, what will be the result? The obvious eventual result will be that they will take part of the market from the other four Companies in Canada—or rather five, because in the minister's response to my question he alluded to the fact that DREE is giving yet another grant to a compact refrigerator company, Astral Refrigeration, this time in Moose Jaw.

What will happen is that, as this company begins to produce more refrigerators, the other companies will produce less in Canada. What will happen is that as jobs are created by Merloni in Granby and Astral in Moose Jaw, others will be lost in other companies in other parts of Canada. Obviously a game of musical chairs is being played with the unemployed and being paid for by Canadian taxpayers.

If there are foreign markets which could have been exploited, why did the government go to an Italian company? We have Canadian businesses as in this sector which have proven their ability. Why were they not given the chance to open a branch plant in Quebec to service foreign markets? Why could the government not have given Canadian business money to expand in foreign markets?

Instead, the government has followed a course of action which will cause unemployment in other parts of the country, reduce the level of Canadian ownership in this industrial segment, and subsidize a foreign competitor.

It is obvious that in this proposal DREE violates its own mandate to reduce unemployment by simply shuffling the unemployed. Even more seriously, the criterion of FIRA has been violated, as Merloni will not reduce imports, will not improve productivity in this sector, and surely cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be considered of significant benefit to Canada.

I call on the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) to withdraw immediately his offers to Merloni and Astral Refrigeration. To do less would be a disservice to Canada and Canadians.

Mr. Donald Wood (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has made an offer of assistance of $2.6 million to the Merloni Group to establish a facility in the province of Quebec to manufacture compact household refrigerator units. This offer was made under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act. This project is expected to create 179 jobs and generate investments of some $11 million in a region of the province facing very high unemployment at the present time.

● (2207)

Before going into details concerning the case raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), I would like to explain briefly the approach used by this department when evaluating an application made by a firm for a development grant under RDIA. Before offering an incentive to any applicant, the government—DREE among other departments—undertakes an extremely careful analysis of the project, in order to satisfy itself as to the net benefits that will accrue from it.

In the case of the firm to which the hon. member is referring, the principal product to be manufactured will be compact refrigerators for use by owners of hotels, cottages, condominiums, and recreational vehicles. In addition, a secondary product line of compact freezers will be manufactured which will represent only a relatively small proportion of the company's output.

At the present time Canada is importing a very large proportion of its requirements for compact refrigerators, that is, with a capacity of less than 10 cubic feet. With the anticipated arrival of the Merloni Group in Canada, we would expect that Canada would become more self-sufficient in the production of this line.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that the implementation of this project meets the regional development objectives set by the Canadian government, since the new company will contribute to creating new export outlets for a Canadian firm. It will reinforce Quebec's industrial base and create a substantial number of jobs in a region that suffers from high unemployment.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House will agree with me that these are important factors which justify our decision in this case.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY—OXFAM—PROPOSED STUDY OF FUNDING

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on November 16 and again on December 2 I raised questions concerning the organization of Oxfam Canada. On November 16 my question was put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) who formerly, at least, had a connection with CIDA. My concern at that time was that in certain statements contained in documents that came to me there was an indication, not an outright suggestion or recommendation but an indication, that it was possible to deceive CIDA about certain funds because CIDA might have poor accounting practices.

I found that alarming in itself but what I found even more alarming was that when I addressed a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) on December 2 to the effect that, according to further documentation and information that had come to me, it was possible, on the basis of the statements made by an officer of Oxfam, that Oxfam could set out to deceive large corporations and well-to-do citizens deliberately by failing to inform them that one of the motives of an officer or officers of Oxfam was to equalize distribution of wealth in Canada.

I am not prepared to argue whether that doctrine is acceptable, but I am certainly prepared to argue that political overtones of this nature should not invade meetings or discussions of directors of an organization that is registered as a charitable foundation or organization with the Department of National Revenue which qualifies subscribers to it for tax deductions. On the basis of information that I have provided to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to the Minister of National Revenue, I have sought from the Minister of National Revenue an indication of whether he is prepared to take action.

It may well be that certain individuals on the board of Oxfam have political philosophies that have seeped into the structure of the organization. If that be the case then let me draw to the attention of the House the fact that over a year ago I happened to see an advertisement which had been passed, as I remember, to two members of the opposition—the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and the hon.

member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). It was a newspaper advertisement from an overseas paper making clear reference to the fact that Oxfam Quebec—and I divorce Oxfam Quebec from Oxfam Canada but nevertheless an organization carrying the same name, an organization of international repute—that Oxfam Quebec was soliciting funds to aid it in gaining its independence. If these are indeed the aims and objectives of the Oxfam organization, be it Oxfam Canada or Oxfam Quebec, surely as a charitable foundation, to which Canadians are asked to subscribe, it should come under the most close scrutiny by the Minister of National Revenue.

In connection with the comments of one of its officers regarding the accounting practices of CIDA—it should also come under the scrutiny of the minister responsible for CIDA who in turn provides funds to some non-governmental organizations. I find it regrettable that I should have to stand and speak about an organization which has in the past done a great deal for the aid and comfort of those, particularly in the Third World countries. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, if this organization has now taken upon itself a political flavour, which I personally find unacceptable, then I think it is incumbent upon the government to inquire as to whether or not it should be entitled to qualify for tax deductions as a registered charitable organization.

In addition let me say that the practice of deception by any officer of any charitable organization which seeks funding from willing Canadians, and Canadians are well known for their charity, and which would attempt to deceive the public by failing to reveal the true political intent of the organization when it should have none, opens that organization to the most serious question. I find it regrettable that I should have to throw into question this particular organization.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to reassure my distinguished colleague from Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) concerning the operation of Oxfam Canada. I will begin by telling him that I am not divorcing Quebec Oxfam from the Canada operation; there is only one Oxfam operation.

CIDA has recently completed a careful analysis of the Oxfam Canada financial position, covering the period May, 1973, to April, 1977. This analysis was done in consultation with Oxfam and was based on a review of their annual audited statements for this period, all of which are on file with CIDA NGO division. No problem concerning advance payments was noted during the CIDA review.

[Translation]

CIDA supplies OXFAM with funds for special projects sponsored by the latter abroad and payments are made through Treasury Board. When OXFAM asks for co-financing of a project, it also advises CIDA of when funds will be needed. Small and medium-sized projects are usually financed through a single payment made in a single fiscal year. More important projects are usually spread out over a period of several years and the second and third payments are made by CIDA only on the strength of descriptions and financial reports which meet its requirements. Upon receiving funds from CIDA for a specific project, OXFAM supplies the agency with copies of the document through which both CIDA and OXFAM funds were transferred overseas. In 1975-76, CIDA granted OXFAM-Canada a total amount of $324,940, and in 1976-77, $418,664. This year, total contributions by CIDA are estimated to reach from $320,000 to $350,000.

CIDA will continue to exercise regular control over the financial statements published by OXFAM-Canada, as it does for all organizations that receive funds through its Non-Governmental Organizations Division.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—DELAY IN RESPONDING TO STEVESTON OIL SPILL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RECTIFY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on November 22 I rose to ask a question of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand), who is one of the ministers representing British Columbia in the cabinet. I rose to ask him about the oil spill which took place on August 29 at Steveston on the Fraser River. I pointed out that the spill had been reported at 11 p.m. on the evening of August 29 but that, according to all reports, nothing was done until 15 hours later, some time in the afternoon of August 30, and that the bulk of the equipment did not reach the spot until over 40 hours later.

I asked the minister whether anybody in his department had been sacked as a result of that gross exhibition of negligence and mismanagement, and the incredible answer the minister gave me was that no one had been sacked following the Steveston spill. He went on to say:

> I was satisfied that everything possible had been done. There was a little delay in getting the spill reported, but once it was reported, Environment Canada officials were on the spot right away and did a very thorough clean-up.

Mr. Speaker, that is simply not accurate. There was no delay in reporting the spill. The delay was in the department's reaction to that report.

Ever since I was elected three years ago I have been pressing the minister for the environment, whoever he might be, to assure us that there was adequate clean-up equipment available in British Columbia to deal with a major spill on the west coast. And always I was informed that there was ample equipment available and that it could be deployed very quickly if necessary, with the use of up-to-date computer techniques and so on. But it still took almost 15 hours for the equipment to get through in spite of all those technological marvels in the department. It so happens that the man in charge, the regional manager of the emergency operation, Captain Young, said the spill was reported to him but he was not asked to supply any clean-up equipment. Mr. Speaker, I hope that man is never in receipt of a May-day signal because his response would be, "Do you want me to come and help?"

I went to look at this particular spill. It was an incredible sight. Here was a blind slough—there was no place for the spill to go except into the main stream. If you were to take a boom and string it across that slough—it would need to be no more than 200 years long—you would enclose that entire spill and prevent it getting into the main stream of the Fraser River. But because the department was so slow or negligent, the main part of the spill got into the Fraser and was swept as far down as Cherry Point.

Maybe the officials of the department think that oil spills can be so regulated as to occur between the hours of nine and five when they would not interfere with normal office hours. Incidentally, that particular spill is supposed to have cost anywhere between $70,000 and $200,000, which represents the labour cost of cleaning up. That does not include the cost of supplies and equipment. It certainly does not include the wages lost by the fishermen who were out of commission for about ten days. Meanwhile all the salmon were going up stream. The Americans were continuing to fish. They are getting their catch. The Canadians are losing it all. I wonder if the loss by the fishermen is not upwards of around $1 million because of that one spill.

I asked whether anyone had been sacked. The minister had the audacity to say no. He said he looked into it thoroughly, they gave him a run-through, and no one was sacked. Why did heads not roll? Had that happened in a free enterprise company dealing with the logging industry or something like that, heads would have rolled.

Anyone acquainted with the operations of MacMillan Bloedel on the west coast knows that they wanted a more efficient operation and heads rolled. However, in the government it is necessary to protect these people. I assume there was not even a lateral transfer.

We know it was not the fault of the equipment. It has to be the fault of the personnel. What kind of protection do the fishermen on the west coast have when we have that kind of personnel and this minister who protects that personnel?

This is the reason I have been asking for stand-by equipment in Surrey and White Rock, which would be the first to get the effect of a spill should it come north from Cherry Point. It is not because the equipment will be any better there, but because the people living there have a vested personal interest in making sure that equipment will get out to where the oil spill is doing damage.

Maybe the minister will now respond to my request and provide us with that kind of emergency equipment. We cannot depend on officials in Environment Canada in Vancouver to deploy that equipment from as close as 15 miles to Steveston.

I would like a categorical answer from the parliamentary secretary as to what will happen to the officials in the department. Will they share some of the responsibility? Will we get some equipment in Surrey and White Rock to make sure that people who have a personal interest at heart will get that equipment there and give them the opportunity to protect themselves, because Environment Canada sure is not going to do it?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, on November 22 the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) questioned the Minister of the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) about his department's response to the oil spill from the Canadian Fishing Company Limited at Steveston, B.C. The hon. member stated that officials did not follow up on the spill report until the next day and that it took 44 hours to get equipment to the spill scene.

The facts are as follows. On Monday, August 29, 1977, an abandoned fueling pipeline under the Canadian Fishing Company Limited, known as CANFISCO, cannery dock began leaking heavy bunker B fuel into Steveston harbour. In-coming fishermen reported the presence of oil to the CANFISCO manager who investigated the cannery wharf area at about 7.30 p.m. He found nothing out of the ordinary and took no further action.

At 10.50 p.m. the DPW dredger Fort Langley, inbound to Steveston harbour, reported to the Canadian Coast Guard's Vessel Traffic Management Centre the presence of oil in the Fraser River channel. The centre then began to alert responsible agencies. At 11.45 p.m. the environmental protection service duty officer called the resident departmental officer at Steveston and asked him to investigate. Contrary to the hon. member's allegations, immediate action was taken. The departmental officer carried out an on-site investigation and reported that he could see very little oil.

At 6.45 a.m. on August 30 the two departmental officers began a careful search for oil under the old wharves at Steveston harbour and soon found an estimated 5,000 gallons of oil among the debris, logs and abandoned nets under the cannery wharf. The source of the spill was soon identified as a broken six inch pipe leading to the CANFISCO storage tank. Some 10,000 gallons had spilled. CANFISCO officials assumed responsiblity for the spill and Clean Seas Canada Limited were called in to contain and clean up the spill. By 8.45 a.m., a small crew from Clean Seas were on the scene and spread peat moss in the oil to consolidate it under the wharves. Environmental protection service officers asked that the area be boomed to ensure containment during recovery operations. The contractor did not manage to do this until 1.45 p.m.

The facts speak for themselves. Departmental officers did not fail to respond immediately to notification of a spill. It did not take 44 hours to get equipment to the scene. While I regret the inconvenience to the fishermen, I believe the delay in opening of the salmon fishing period was the prudent and responsible course of action to take.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF ADVANCED BOOKING DOMESTIC AIR CHARTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission permitting domestic air charters, but only on a highly restricted basis. In view of the CTC's decision to hand over the air charter market to the very interests which have most consistently opposed the concept in the first place, and also in light of the extremely limited nature of the charter operation for the first year of operation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That it is the opinion of this House that the question of a massive travel deficit, which is currently draining our prosperity, and of national unity, which threatens our collective future, are too important to permit the restriction on the use of the very important tool of widely available low cost air travel, and, further to these ends, that the decision announced by the CTC be extended to allow both the full participation of Canadian charter airlines and a greater use of the program by the Canadian public during the first year of operation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

USE OF PART OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFIT AS EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

As an unemployment person receives two-thirds of his former pay when he is drawing UIC benefits, and as the government at present pays about half the cost or about $2 billion of the $4 billion that will be paid out in UIC benefits this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government make available to potential employers an employment incentive amounting to half of the UIC benefits which an unemployed person is receiving so that the potential employer can then bid on contracts which were formerly out of his reach because of the low wages paid in the country from which the competition comes, and stand a good chance of obtaining the order. In this way he will be able to provide employment for those who would otherwise remain in idleness, and enable them to earn a pay cheque on which they will be paying income tax, and making a positive contribution to the economy.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paproski: Marc Lalonde said "no".

PROPOSAL TO STOP PAYMENT OF GRANTS TO NORTHERN TELECOM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I too have a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding a matter that is both urgent and pressing. In view of the fact that Northern Telecom has announced lay-offs in Canada of over 1,000 workers, and more lay-offs are expected, and in view of the fact that the federal government through the Minister of Finance's budgetary statement has provided to this company $2 million in tax incentives, in addition to $10 million in federal grants and $44 million in federal income tax deferrals, and whereas Northern Telecom has just announced the purchase of two firms in the United States at an expense of $92 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House urges the government to stop all federal grants and tax concessions which might assist Northern Telecom to purchase firms outside of Canada and lay off Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTED CONGRATULATIONS TO POLICE FORCES ON APPREHENSION OF DRUG TRAFFICKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the recent revelations about the RCMP operations and considering also that we forgot of late the positive actions of that police force as well as the recent arrest of an important group of drug traffickers due to the combined efforts of the RCMP, and the Quebec and Ontario provincial police forces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier):

That the House commend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Quebec Police Force and the Ontario Provincial Police for these outstanding operations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION THAT MIRABEL NOT BE EXPANDED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to put forward a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Mirabel airport has been described as the mistake of the decade, "a white elephant", suffering a $47 million loss last year, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), has recommended "mothballing Mirabel for a couple of years", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport not to allot any further funds for the recently announced building of a second air terminal at Mirabel, and that the funds be assigned to assist municipalities in major works programs such as the city of Winnipeg's storm drainage upgrading program which has a much higher priority than expanding Mirabel.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is presenting a motion which can only be discussed with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION EXECUTIVES RATHER THAN OPERATING PERSONNEL BE LAID OFF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas railways are the most energy efficient form of transportation, and major employers in this country, and in view of the impending nationwide lay-offs of CNR personnel during a time when employment is at unprecedented heights in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the Minister of Transport recommend cutbacks in the executive structure of the CNR, rather than laying-off personnel at operational levels, and request CNR management to become more competitive with other modes of transportation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO REDUCE DEFICIT IN AUTO PARTS WITH UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity connected with the news released yesterday that the average deficit on auto trade with the United States has increased by some 38 per cent over last year for the first ten months of this year, so that it is currently, to the end of October, over $969 million, and that the deficit in auto parts alone is expected to be $3 billion at the end of the year. In light of the large and growing deficit on auto trade, and in view of the 20,000 jobs lost because of this huge trade deficit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the government be instructed to lay before this House before we adjourn a plan to reduce the over-all trade deficit in auto parts with the United States within a reasonable period of time, and to ensure that henceforth the Canadian economy receives its fair share of auto related jobs, both skilled and unskilled.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL BUSINESS

PROPOSED MEASURES OF ASSISTANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity related to the highest unemployment level in Canada since the war. Because, by the government's own definition, small business in this country even as recently as last year was responsible for 60 per cent of the labour force and roughly 50 per cent of the manufacturing sector; and in view of the fact that the government continues to ignore the problems and potential solutions of this vital sector of our economy, evidenced by the fact that not one realistic incentive oriented program has been introduced thus far, nor did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) see fit to even mention small business in his so-called minibudget on October 20, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House instruct the Minister of State responsible for Small Business, along with the Minister of Finance, to introduce forthwith realistic and comprehensive programs in accordance with numerous recommendations by various interest groups across Canada including those made by the official opposition regarding such specific programs as the employment tax credits, government set-asides, investment tax credits and many others.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be directed to the Minister of Finance whom we understood would be in his place in parliament today. In his absence, I should like to direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance has admitted to Canadian people that the tax measures in Bill C-11 are in effect already in the country. It is clear from the unemployment statistics this week that they are not working.

I see the minister entering the Chamber. I will wait for him. I welcome the minister to the House of Commons 15 minutes after the hour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Outside the House the minister admitted that the tax measures in Bill C-11 are already in effect in the country. The unemployment statistics indicated this week that those measures are not working well enough. Yet, as we look at the order paper of the House of Commons, we see that there is not a single new finance measure proposed by this government to create jobs or growth for the economy. What new measures does the minister propose? Where are they? Why are they not on the order paper? When will they be before this parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not made any remarks when the hon. Leader of the Opposition was away trying to raise money, with great difficulty, for his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: When the hon. Leader of the Opposition was away, I said in the House that if Bill C-11 is passed, I hope to return very soon with tax credits for businesses to enable them to employ more people. It is very difficult for me, having been tied up in the House with Bill C-11 for five weeks, to be in my department at the same time.

● (1417)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I do not know when the Minister of Finance will stop crying to parliament and to the people about his problems and when he will bring before the House of Commons some new measures. I do not want to hear about hopes. I look at the Order Paper of this parliament, the agenda of the House, and I see that this government is proposing nothing at all that is new. I want to know when we are going to have these proposals, and I say this to the Minister of Finance and to the government: If the government can come up with some new proposals to bring before the House of Commons, then we on this side of the House are prepared to come back early after Christmas to deal with them. We want to know that there is business here to deal with, and I want to know from the Minister of Finance now what those measures will be.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there are some measures in front of the House at this time. The Leader of the Opposition would be well advised to tell his colleagues to pass Bill C-11 so that the business community will realize that despite the fact that those measures are in force since the spring budget, many of them do not believe that it is so—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They don't believe you.

Mr. Chrétien: Every day I receive phone calls from the business community inquiring about what we are doing with Bill C-11, and I have to tell them it is being filibustered by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You don't know what a filibuster is.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House that if this legislation is adopted, people will see that all middle and low income taxpayers are entitled to $100 tax cuts for both January and February, which will increase the demand in this country, and if only I can find the time to work on the tax credit formula for companies which will hire new employees, I shall do so before Christmas. Mr. Speaker, I only hope that I shall be able to devote all my time to this, without having to remain in the House a couple of weeks more, just because the opposition will not adopt Bill C-11.

[English]

Mr. Clark: The minister—who for the second time refuses to answer my question—says that nobody believes the government. Of course, they do not believe this government. There is no reason why the business community or anyone else in the country should believe that the government will do anything to bring growth and direction back to the economy, particularly since the minister continues to refuse to tell us what is on the agenda of the House. My question—

Mr. Chrétien: I would advise the hon. member to be in the House at the time when I make my speech and not to abuse the rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Sit down, you are not Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition could ask his final supplementary question.

Mr. Clark: First of all the Minister of Finance refuses to answer questions that are asked and then he tries to answer questions that are not asked. In refusing to tell us what business he has for the House of Commons—there is a great deal of shouting from across the floor. This government hopes it can shout down questions from the opposition. Well, they cannot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDITS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Finance has talked about employment tax credits. He has been talking about that for a long time now. Any normal Minister of Finance, whatever the pressures, would have been able to bring a bill before the House of Commons. Will the minister tell the House when he will be in a position to bring to parliament a specific proposal to embody that employment tax credit, when it will be before the House, and will we have it this month, as the Prime Minister promised?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I will be able to come to the House with a statement seven days after Bill C-11 is passed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Clark: What I want to know from the Minister of Finance is if that bill regarding the investment tax credit is ready, can he bring it to the House of Commons today or tomorrow so that the people of the country who want to know what is in that measure will know exactly what the government is preparing, or will the minister admit that he does not know what to do in this matter?

● (1422)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the opposition has known since March what was in the budget of the hon. member for Rosedale. Hon. members opposite have not as yet been able to make up their minds about it. I know exactly what will be in that bill, and I will make a statement in the House before Christmas, if Bill C-11 can be passed.

Mr. Clark: When will it be a bill? You have nothing to propose.

UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT OF INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance, who has indicated that as of March 31 certain budgetary measures were in place. One of those budgetary measures was an investment credit plan costing the government about $485 million. The investment credit was a 5 per cent allowance to those corporations which chose to use that credit. Would the minister indicate to the House, now that it is over eight months since that March 31 announcement, to what extent he feels the credit has worked? To what extent has it been a stimulant? How many jobs does the minister feel have been created in Canada due to that $485 million tax credit?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member thinks that credit is not good, he can vote against it in the Committee of the Whole this afternoon.

Mr. Paproski: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Clark: Chrétien never answers questions.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTION INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT BE CONDITIONAL UPON JOB CREATION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the minister has not even attempted to indicate to the House to what extent the credit has worked for the jobless in this country. Speaking of the Committee of the Whole this afternoon and dealing with the investment credit to which I have referred, would the minister consider moving an amendment this afternoon to make it clear that those investment credits will be conditional upon job creation and for first decisions on future investment as far as corporations are concerned?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a question which should be asked and answered in the committee, not here.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT THAT CANADIANS ARE SPOILED ROTTEN

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the financial spokesman for the Conservative Party should think about a bill before he votes for it at second reading.

Mr. Alexander: Just get on with your question.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday when it was revealed that more Canadians are unemployed now than at any time since the great depression there were attributed to the minister some totally insensitive comments which I would like him to have the opportunity to clarify. He was quoted as saying that Canadians are "spoiled rotten," they are "living too high off the hog" and, presumably as a consequence of this, they "need a kick in the gut." I would like the minister to inform the House if those are accurate quotations.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have received an apology from the newspaper which printed that. The newspaper indicated it was wrong. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation apologized this morning. I intend to raise a question of privilege on this particular statement because a false impression has been enunciated not only in newspapers and on radio but it has also been spread across the country by the hon. member, who had the gall to say he checked to confirm that this particular expression had been used. However, he did not bother to check the context, and I will be raising a question of privilege on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Before the minister raises a question of privilege I suggest he check the facts carefully.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: They are behaving like hoodlums.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the reason for my question—and I did not get a clear answer from the minister—is that I understand he has denied saying that Canadians need a kick in the gut. However, my understanding is that he did not retract his statement that Canadians are spoiled rotten and that they are living too high off the hog. That is why I asked him the question, and I would like him to clarify the record. Did he or did he not say that Canadians are spoiled rotten and are living too high off the hog?

• (1427)

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to aid and abet the hon. member in spreading any false rumours. I am going to put everything in context which the hon. member has refused to do and I will do it on a question of privilege.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY BANK OF CANADA WOULD PRINT MONEY FOR INDEPENDENT QUEBEC

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

During his visit in Frankfurt those last few days, the Quebec Minister of Finance, who thinks of himself as a demigod, is reported as having said this, and I quote:

If Canada were to refuse a monetary union with Quebec, we would establish a Quebec currency.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if in such conditions he would accept that the Bank of Canada print the Quebec currency, as it has done for other foreign currencies.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not have much comment to make in that regard except that I know that many people now buying Quebec bonds on the market insist that it be made clear on the bonds that they will be redeemed in Canadian dollars.

REQUEST BANK OF CANADA ISSUE MONEY TO FINANCE PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL PROJECTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance, the premiers of every province and the Prime Minister of Canada would agree that the problem we now have in Canada, that is the lack of understanding between the federal government and the province of Quebec, depends mainly on our economic problems; as the creation of money is the work of man, why does the Minister of Finance not recommend to the Bank of Canada that it grant new credits to the federal government, in agreement with the provinces, in order to develop or finance new public services for municipalities and school boards, and that, with a view to alleviating unemployment and creating new jobs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our monetary policy is public knowledge in Canada; it was set by the governor of the Bank of Canada and I do not intend to ask him to change his policy.

REASON INTEREST RATES ARE SO HIGH

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary. Could the Minister of Finance say why we have to buy money at high interest rates the moment it is created, particularly with a stroke of the pen?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate during the oral question period to have a long debate on the monetary theories of the party which the hon. member represents.

AIR TRANSPORT

DOMESTIC AIR CHARTERS—REQUEST THAT WARDAIR BE ALLOWED TO PARTICIPATE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the Minister of Transport is not here today. In his absence I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission for the provision of charter air services within Canada—a decision which effectively excludes Wardair, the pioneer of Canadian charters. Will the Deputy Prime Minister exercise the government's prerogative and ensure that Wardair is allowed to participate in next summer's experiment with domestic air charters?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows most certainly that the report of the committee of the Canadian Transport Commission was tabled only yesterday. I would like to tell the hon. member there is in this report an indication that the committee may happen to allow other Canadian carriers who have a class 4 licence to operate regional ABC's if a regional air carrier does not provide the service needed. I think we should be pleased about this report which will bring at last a little more competition in air fares in Canada. It is still too early to indicate how the government will react to this report.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary did not answer my question in connection with Wardair. It is my understanding that Mr. Ward has decided to appeal the decision of the CTC. In light of the fact that restricting the interregional domestic charters to the two main carriers which over the years have opposed the domestic charter concept and by restricting the number of flights to 50, the program will provide little change from the present situation, will the parliamentary secretary—if the Deputy Prime Minister is not going to answer—undertake to communicate with the Minister of Transport to see if he will expand the program to provide the option of low-fare travel for Canadians this summer?

● (1432)

Mr. Lapointe: I think Mr. Speaker, that I already answered this question. Obviously we are not yet in a position to say how officials will react to this report as it was tabled yesterday. As far as the appeal of Wardair is concerned, they just have to make it and then the minister will certainly accept to consider it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

AVAILABILITY TO McDONALD COMMISSION OF MATERIAL REFUSED KEABLE COMMISSION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Acting Solicitor General, who I presume to be the Minister of Justice. Will the Solicitor General be making available to the McDonald Royal Commission the information which he has resisted, and is continuing to resist, providing to the Keable Commission of inquiry?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): I would not want to answer that precisely because I have not reviewed the affidavit that has been filed with the Keable Commission. The Solicitor General has made it very clear in this House and elsewhere that he will be providing to the McDonald Commission everything that is pertinent to its terms of reference, and including all of the investigating techniques and practices—as I say, everything that is in any way relevant to the McDonald inquiry.

REASON KEABLE COMMISSION ASKED FOR PROCEDURAL MANUALS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I want to thank the minister for his answer. I gather,then, that the position of the government is not that it will be restricting material or providing only those files which in its sole discretion it deems relevant as this would reflect very badly on the bona fides of the inquiry. I would like to ask him, as a supplementary, if he knows the reason that the Keable Commission requested procedural manuals was to determine precisely which requirements had to be followed by the security service regarding authorization for entries to be made by officers of the security services for the installation of any sort of listening devices.

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that that is why the Keable Commission wanted those documents. I am not aware at the present time whether the Keable Commission has ever explained why they wanted those particular documents.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO URANIUM SHIPMENTS TO FRANCE UNLESS SAFEGUARDS ACCEPTED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the embargo on the shipment of uranium to the EEC pending the adoption by those nations of Canadian safeguards. Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure the House that no agreement will be concluded with the EEC which allows France access to Canadian uranium without that country accepting the full scope of Canadian safeguards on its use?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs advised the House last week that he has had discussions with the commissioner speaking for the EEC, and that quite a number of difficulties had been removed. The negotiation, as I understand it, is with the community as such and the safeguards arrangement would apply to the community, and accordingly to all members of the community.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This is the important point, Mr. Speaker, because as the minister knows one of the tenets of the Treaty of Rome is a full and absolute commitment to free trade within the community. Will the minister tell the House, assuming France will not accept our safeguards, whether the nations of the EEC have then agreed to abrogate the Treaty of Rome to accommodate the Canadian interests in this regard?

Mr. MacEachen: I realize the question by the hon. member is an important one, but at the moment it is a speculative and hypothetical situation to which he is addressing himself. We ought to wait for the final result of the discussions to reach the conclusion the hon. member is suggesting.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON QUEBEC-FRANCE AGREEMENT TO DEVELOP COPPER MINES

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Yesterday the Quebec government signed a general agreement with the French government about mining in Quebec. Under this agreement, prospecting for copper in northwest Quebec will cost $240,000. On the other hand, on March 29, 1976 the government of Canada and the Province of Quebec signed a $28 million agreement for mineral resources development. Would the minister tell the House if the Quebec-France program mentioned yesterday in the agreement might have been realized through the Canada-Quebec agreement under which the federal government gives a 60 per cent contribution?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, just as the hon. member, I have heard about this agreement signed in Paris by the Quebec and French governments about a $5 million participation in prospecting and mining for the next five years. In fact, according to press reports, since of course I have not seen the text of the official agreement, those works will cover research in geological and geophysical surveys. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is precisely the type of works covered under the agreement which has been signed with the government of Quebec 18 months ago and under which I committed the federal government to pay $17 million over the next five years. I would like to add this, Mr. Speaker: Probably it would have been much more profitable for the Quebec economy and especially for the mining sector had France preferred and judged wiser to buy the surplus copper that we have now in Canada and especially in Quebec and this would have helped create more jobs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TWO DAY DEBATE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Having the high regard I have for him as a parliamentarian who understands parliament, I direct a question to him. It concerns international affairs and the kaleidoscopic changes which have taken place in the Middle East, in the contemptuous way the U.S.S.R. is treating the Helsinki Agreement, and the refusal of the U.S.S.R. to assure fair treatment to dissidents whose only offence is to disagree democratically with what has been done. Would the minister set aside, between now and Christmas, two days of government time so that parliament will have some idea of what is going on other than what it reads in the press and understand at first hand what is taking place. It would also give the government the benefit of the views of other political parties concerning matters which have to do not only with the peace of the world now, but in the years ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the general direction of the right hon. member's suggestion, that it would be an extremely good idea to have an opportunity to debate these international issues. The right hon. member may recall, following a similar suggestion he made in the last session concerning debates on international affairs and questions of national unity, that there was arranged an opportunity to debate the issue of national unity with very good results—otherwise the House would not have had an opportunity to make its views known.

With respect to this particular suggestion, which I think is a good one, I will consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns and try to arrange a time for discussion in the House on international affairs. I think it would be an extremely good idea and maybe, in the spirit of constructive co-operation which the right hon. member has shown, we may be able to accelerate other business so that time can be made available.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—ACTION TO ENSURE GREATER PRODUCTION OF PARTS IN CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises out of the news released yesterday that the ten month trade deficit on auto trade with the United States had reached a new high of $969 million, which is some 38 per cent higher than at the same time last year and that this deficit arises chiefly because of a whopping deficit of $2.2 billion on our parts trade with the United States. In light of the fact that this continuing deficit means a loss of jobs that has been estimated to be in the range of 20,000 and that it is likely to get larger, can the minister be specific in telling the House what success he has had in convincing the major auto makers to either manufacture or buy more of their auto parts in Canada, particularly since the devaluation of the Canadian dollar has made our industry that much more competitive?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, nothing would please me more than to be specific. However, talks with the three major auto manufacturers are still going on. As yet, no conclusion has been reached. Some of them are interested in expanding their automobile plants. They have not yet determined whether that will be in Canada or the United States. However, negotiations are continuing. We are aware of the deficit in parts manufacturing. I have spoken on this subject many times in the House. All I can say is that in the spirit of this time of the year, we hope we can reach a conclusion before the new year.

APPARENT REFUSAL OF ANACONDA TO SELL CANADIAN PLANT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, may I give the minister a chance to be specific in a case with which I know he is familiar. In connection with the growing auto trade deficit, it is my understanding that the minister's department has been involved in the attempt to find a buyer for the Anaconda plant in Toronto which makes radiator parts and other auto components, which will be forced to close down, with the loss of some 750 to 800 jobs unless a buyer suitable to the American parent is found. Rumours abound that several potential buyers for the plant have been found, but that the American parent would prefer to simply close the plant rather than face a potential competitor if the plant were to continue to operate and export to the American market. What has the minister done to attempt to find a buyer? In light of the fact that the plant is, potentially, a major exporter of parts to the American market and a major employer, can the minister say what he plans to do if the American parent continues to refuse to sell? This is an indication of why we are having this problem of deficits.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I met with the management of the Anaconda plant and the union leaders at that plant some months ago. We were able to convince the parent company to keep the plant open until next April to give us time to find a buyer for the plant. It is now my understanding that the owners of the Anaconda plant have contacted an agency and, in essence, have put the plant up for sale. We have a couple of interested buyers. We are doing everything we can to assist with the successful transfer of ownership of the Anaconda plant in the hope of keeping it in production in Canada.

HEALTH

REASON FOR REFUSAL TO TAKE ACTION ON MERCURY POISONING—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF SCIENCE COUNCIL

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is related to the serious problem of mercury poisoning, in particular among our native people. It relates to the recent figures of December 5 which revealed that 56 individuals had mercury levels above 50 parts per million. In the October report "Policies and Poisons" published by the Science Council of Canada, they stated and I quote:

> In respect of mercury, the scientific community was asked to prove damage before action was taken, whereas more commonly, the demonstration of the existence of a hazard has provoked action, for example with vinyl chloride.

I would like to ask the minister how she can justify, for example, the banning of saccharin on the basis of rat studies, or the action taken to control the hazards of vinyl chloride, and yet refuse to take meaningful action with respect to mercury poisoning with the knowledge that cases of Minimata disease exists.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to inform the House that on the contrary we are going to sign within a few days an agreement on a research project in which, incidentally, we will have the participation of the Quebec government, of McGill University and of various associations representing the Indian communities of Quebec, which proves that we are very much interested in research related to the control of mercury poisoning.

[English]

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, that has to be one of the most irresponsible answers I have heard yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Holmes: May I simply say to the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary, will he please put it?

Mr. Holmes: I would like to ask the minister if she would give very serious consideration to referring the report of the Science Council of Canada to the appropriate committee or subcommittees, and give very serious consideration to their recommendation to establish a national advisory council on occupational and environmental health in order to correct this serious problem with regard to mercury poisoning.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I believe that question should be directed to the minister responsible for the Science Council. I understood the question to be on the urgent need for research. I assured the hon. member that a major research project was going to be signed in a few days by myself and authorities of the Quebec government, McGill University and a representative of the Indian groups of Quebec. I can also say that further to the press release I issued on November 25, results of decisions made by my department for which I am responsible, and about which I am knowledgeable, are now being discussed with leaders of bands across the country.

DATE WHEN HARBOUR PATROL BOAT WILL BE PROVIDED FOR VANCOUVER

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the acting minister. In view of the fact the Minister of Transport has put four Vancouver shipyards, all in need of work, to the expense of preparing tenders and design specifications for a new Vancouver harbour patrol boat, and has called for requotes on these tenders, when will the minister take the initiative to provide a Canada built harbour control vessel for the port of Vancouver, the largest and busiest harbour on the west coast of the North American continent?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the hon. member is very interesting and I will surely tell the minister about it as soon as he is back.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Why did the Minister of Transport purchase through a straw company called Halifax Fishing Ventures Limited a United States built vessel that is nothing but a pile of junk, is not seaworthy and lies high and dry in shame under a Vancouver bridge?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question seems to be somewhat argumentative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Members will realize that the question asked by the hon. member is argumentative and seeks information which is available on the order paper.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Algoma.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MICHIGAN-MANITOULIN FERRY SERVICE AND DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHEASTERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the special development problems facing northeastern Ontario—

Mr. Stevens: Argumentative.

Mr. Foster: —and in view of the minister's recent meeting with Ontario government ministers responsible for regional development in the province of Ontario—

Mr. Gillies: Argumentative.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: Come on, let's have some order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Foster: In view of the special problems facing northeastern Ontario regarding development and in view of the minister's recent meeting with Ontario ministers, can he tell the House what progress has been made on new initiatives for regional development in northeastern Ontario, especially concerning the Michigan-Manitoulin ferry service which I understand was discussed.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we held a meeting this morning in Toronto where I took part in the discussions on possible joint development projects of both governments in this vast area of northern Ontario. I must say that our discussions were very positive, that several proposals were submitted to me and that we have agreed to carry on our negotiations. Indeed, I am confident that in the very near future we could conclude some agreements dealing with projects submitted this morning.

As for the specific project suggested by the hon. member, it is included among the many projects considered and we have agreed to continue to analyze it and possibly include it among those to be carried out.

GRAIN

DATE AND AMOUNT OF STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. When there will be a payout under the grain stabilization act and how much will it be?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the member of the cabinet who administers the payout under the grain stabilization act is the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, and following discussions I have had with him no decision has yet been made at this time.

Mr. Malone: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister tell us whether or not the formula has been calculated yet?

Mr. Whelan: I am not in a position to say, sir.

WHEAT—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN DOMESTIC PRICE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Given the fact that farm income has dropped very dramatically, particularly in the grains industry, given the fact that under the Two-Price Wheat Act there is provision for an annual escalation in the price of domestic wheat used for human consumption commensurate with the increase in the cost of production, and given the fact that Supplementary Estimates A have revealed a slashing of some $35 million under the provisions of the Two-Price Wheat Act, would the minister advise the House why the government is so reluctant to live within the spirit and intent of the Two-Price Wheat Act, and does this reduction of $35 million mean that we cannot anticipate an upward adjustment in the minimum price under the provisions of the Two-Price Wheat Act?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this matter is still very much under discussion.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question. These discussions have been going on since last July. I wonder whether the minister would tell the House when these discussions will be concluded?

Mr. Whelan: I hope by Christmas, Mr. Speaker.

MULTICULTURALISM

DATE WHEN MINISTER WILL IMPLEMENT PROMISES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) who has been running up and down the country indicating to the 30 per cent of the Canadian population who are minorities that this government has looked after the Anglophones, is now looking after the Francophones, and that the 30 per cent have been woefully neglected and he is going to see to it that some recognition is given to their talents so they will be brought into the public service. Would the minister indicate to the House when he is going to be in a position to give a definitive statement regarding his intentions in this matter, or is this window dressing just prior to the election?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can be assured that all actions taken under my portfolio will be more than window dressing. We are deeply concerned about the ethno-cultural communities of this country and are equally concerned, as is the hon. member, with seeing that all Canadians have equal opportunity to work and participate in the mainstream of Canadian life at all times.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have heard that statement for the past three or four months. My question to the minister—I hope he has also kept his colleague the President of the Treasury Board involved in this respect—is: When is the minister going to stand up in this House and give a definitive statement respecting how he is going to implement this very laudable project of his? That is all I want to know.

Mr. Cafik: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that hon. members are that much interested in the activities of my portfolio. I will give consideration to coming forward with a statement on motions in due course.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter and I think I should be allowed one supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for New Westminster.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISPUTE WITH B.C. TELEPHONE EMPLOYEES—POSSIBILITY OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO SETTLE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and it concerns the telephone strike in the province of British Columbia. Since 1972 this House has introduced dispute settlement legislation in a number of abrasive disputes, five of which affected workers on the coast of British Columbia. In view of the fact that the company has now rejected the intervention of the Minister of Labour in this increasingly bitter dispute, and in view of the fact that labour union has now accepted the conciliation report of Dr. Noel Hall, is the Minister of Labour intending to introduce legislation in the House in the near future based on the Noel Hall report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think technically and legally this situation is considered a strike. I do not think it would be beneficial at this stage to start talking about further legislation to end the strike, or a lockout if that is how the hon. member personally may wish to interpret it. The fact of the matter is that I am hopeful we can still find a means of settling this dispute without provoking a situation where we agree we have to start talking about legislation. Mr. Collins is there. He was appointed yesterday, as the hon. member knows, and I think we should give him a chance to see what he can do over the course of the next few days.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I agree with the minister we should give Mr. Collins perhaps a couple of days, but this is a strike which is becoming increasingly bitter and it is over just one clause in a previous union contract, namely the question of job security. The report called simply for an 18-month study of that particular clause. In view of the fact that seven times since 1972 we have forced workers back to work, is it not time that for once in this Housewe asked a company to accept a reasonable proposal and put the dispute back where it belongs?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has a rather short memory. The last time I came in with legislation in this House affecting my own department was to end a lockout in the port of Halifax.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED LACK OF CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs may I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. It has to do with the report of the western premiers' task force on constitutional trends. Page 31 of the report talks about consultation with the provinces being non-existent. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us specifically what the government has in mind that it is going to do to correct the situation which is spoken about in this report, namely that consultation with the provinces in the area of housing and urban affairs is non-existent?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not studied the report referred to by the hon. member, but he will realize that the Prime Minister is currently holding a series of consultations with the provincial premiers, and I am sure that housing is one of the subjects which will be brought forward. In any event, I think I am fairly well founded in my statement that housing is one of the elements which will be in the minds of the Prime Minister and the premiers when they meet in the new year, as has been suggested. So I believe the hon. member need not be concerned that housing is being neglected in federal-provincial consultations.

PROTECTION OF PRODUCER INTERESTS DURING GATT NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF TARIFF BOARD REPORTS

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Up to now, at least, the minister has refused to give any commitment or guarantee that Canadian agricultural interests would not be traded off at the present GATT talks. Is the minister prepared today to give any guarantee or commitment?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish any member of the government could give a full commitment or guarantee regarding his desires for agriculture or for whatever department he is responsible. These negotiations are held at a very confidential level. We have made submissions. I am sure the hon. member knows fully my views on what I think should be done to protect agriculture, and I have not changed those views.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious that the minister is not prepared to give a guarantee, but would he be receptive to the suggestion that the two tariff board reports be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that the industry would have a further opportunity for input?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I think I intimated the other day that I had no objection to this. I have had discussions with the House leader and I will be discussing this further with him tomorrow.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON UNIVERSALITY OF OLD AGE PENSIONS AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On November 23 when I asked her whether she was planning to rearrange family allowances and the old age pension in order to get funds to pay for her proposed guaranteed annual income, as reported at page 1164 of Hansard she said she was studying rearrangements which would "take away from those who do not need universal programs." I asked her the same question on December 1, namely, whether she would take away from those who did not need the universal programs, family allowances and old age pensions, and she responded by saying there is no way that these programs will be modified. Her answer on December 1 directly opposes her answer of November 23. I should like to ask her now whether she is taking the position that she can have it both ways; that she can have these two programs simultaneously universal and selective?

● (1502)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I just read in the clippings of today that the hon. member issued a press release yesterday nurturing unfounded fears and anxieties among the Canadian population as to the universality of payments of old age pensions and family allowances, which I think is absolutely unacceptable, irresponsible and wrong—false, of course. I should like to say that unfortunately they probably did not have the number of my office and I did not receive a copy of the member's said press release, and I would like to study that before answering the question.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from Hansard. If the minister will review Hansard of November 23 and of December 1 she will see where the quotations were found. In view of the fact that she seems to be unwilling or unable to explain herself, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he will tell the House if family allowances and old age pensions will be made selective in order to pay for a guaranteed annual income, or will they remain universal programs? I would like an unequivocal answer?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can be quite unequivocal on that point. No decision has been made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REMUNERATION OF MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before hearing the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on a question of privilege, of which he has given the Chair notice, I have two matters outstanding which I think I ought to address to the House. The first has to do with members' remuneration.

As the end of 1977 is approaching rapidly, I felt certain that all hon. members would want me to give some consideration to the question of the application of increases of indemnities paid to members for 1978 and their relationship to anti-inflation guidelines.

Members will recall last year, in an effort to conform with both the letter and the spirit of the anti-inflation program, arrangements were made to pay members less than the $2,400 permissible maximum, which was arranged through an increase of $2,200 consisting of $1,500 in salary and $700 in expense allowance.

It is not easy to express these kind of increases in terms of an individual member's remuneration because, as is well known, there are regional variations in the allowances for members and, of course, there are some members who receive salary differentials on the basis of additional responsibilities over those of the ordinary member. However, using the formula provided in the anti-inflation program, that increase translated last year, under this formula which basically relates to the global amount paid to all as a group, to 5.59 per cent of the total sum paid to members for salaries, allowances and benefits.

It was evident that members wanted to continue with a similar arrangement for 1978 and so, after consultation with House leaders and through them with the party caucuses, I wish to advise hon. members that the 1978 increases will be $2,100, consisting of $1,400 in salary and $700 expense allowance. On the same basis of calculation this represents an increase of 4.96 per cent over the total sum paid to members of the House of Commons in salaries, allowances and benefits.

Special allowances, I think it should be emphasized, paid to members with additional responsibilities will remain unchanged, for the third consecutive year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A point of order was raised in respect of some items in the estimates which will be finalized tomorrow in the supplementary estimates. This relates to a point which was raised the last time around when items were contained in the supplementary estimates which were described as $1 items, and which basically were objected to on the grounds that they were not purely supply items but in fact went beyond the limits of the supply procedure and extended into legislative authority.

I think all hon. members understand that the supply process is confined in its method of debate and exposure to the House in that it is put forward by way of an estimate which is examined by the committees of the House, and, at the end of that process when the estimate is deemed to be reported or in fact reported back to the House, it is dealt with rather quickly by way of a supply bill on the final supply day of the particular semester in which the estimate was originally advanced.

This is a process which has long been adhered to by the House which provides for an examination of the estimates in rather great detail, but does not provide for extensive debate between the various stages of the supply bill. As a result of that, it has long been a tenet of the House that supply ought to be confined strictly to the process for which it was intended, that is to say, for the purpose of putting forward by the government the estimate of money it needs, and then in turn the voting by the House of that money to the government, and not to be extended in any way into the legislative area, because legislation and legislated changes in substance are not intended to be part of supply, but rather ought to be part of the legislative process in the regular way which requires three readings, committee stage, and, in other words, ample opportunity for members to participate in debate and amendment.

Accordingly, the last time this argument was raised I indicated I thought it unfortunate we felt cramped by the process of argument on these points and, in the future, we ought to experiment with a process which would give the Chair an opportunity to hear these arguments in advance, rather than attempting to deal with them on the last allotted day when the whole supply process is finalized.

Accordingly, last Wednesday I gave notice of the intention to hear arguments on this, and points of argument were registered with the Chair on Thursday, and arguments in fact took place on Friday. Since tomorrow is the final day I thought I should adjudicate on that now.

The argument put forward last Friday concerned two items raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) in a very able way. These related to two items in these estimates, the first being vote 31a under regional economic expansion concerning the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I think I should read it as follows:

Payment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to be applied by the Corporation in payment of the losses incurred in the operation and maintenance of the coal mining and related works and undertakings acquired by the Corporation under Section 9 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, including administrative expenses chargeable to the Coal Divison,—

And the following was the part objected to:

—and notwithstanding Section 31(2) of the said act, for grants to municipalities on Cape Breton Island not exceeding an amount equal to the taxes that might have been levied for their 1977-78 fiscal year by the municipalities in respect of the personal property of the Corporation if the Corporation were not an agent of Her Majesty . . .

Then the amount stipulated is $21,976,000.

The second objection was in respect of Vote L56a under transport, which is as follows:

To authorize,

(a) the Minister to purchase on behalf of and to hold in trust for Her Majesty in right of Canada all of the issued common shares of VIA Rail Canada Inc. and to pay $100,000 in consideration thereof; and—

The following is the portion to which objection was taken:

(b) that all borrowings by VIA Rail Canada Inc. be exempted from the interest rate limitation of six per cent per annum imposed by subsection 72(5) of the Railway Act, and all such borrowings for a term of more than 12 months be subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance . . .

The total amount indicated is $100,000.

Members will recall that on the last occasion which I have referred to, we attempted to devise this better procedure which has led us to this point. The point at issue is whether the two items seek legislative authority which does now exist or does not exist. That is the nub of the problem, for if indeed the government already has legislative authority to do these things, then whether the amount is $1 or a billion dollars makes no difference to the Chair. If, on the other hand, the government does not possess the legislative authority to do these things, then neither does the amount of $1 or $1 billion make any difference. The test to which I put them is whether or not in these items the government is putting forward a spending estimate under authority it already possesses, or whether it is seeking new legislative authority for these two items.

In respect of the first vote, 31a, a reading of Section 31(2) of the act, which is the relevant section, clearly indicates that the government is entitled to pay to the Cape Breton Development Corporation amounts of money not to exceed amounts which would be levied in lieu of property taxes if in fact the Cape Breton Development Corporation were not a Crown corporation. As it turns out, the proposal here is to pay a sum of money to that corporation which in fact exceeds that which could be levied as property tax of the corporation and extends it to a new concept which is in lieu of personal tax, that is a tax on personal property. That seems to me to be directly contrary to the section because the section puts the limit as taxes that could be levied on property, and introduces a new kind of replacement. Therefore I feel that the words beginning "and notwithstanding Section 31(2) of the said act" must be deleted from the item.

In my view the item can remain in. The total amount of money can remain a proper part of the estimate. If it turns out to be an over estimate of the amount that is required to pay amounts in lieu of property taxes, so be it. That is an administrative matter which can be dealt with. I do not think the amount ought to be altered. I think the item has to come out which relates to the new concept being introduced into the statute.

In the second item, paragraph (a), it is significant that the same principles apply, but even more so because it is noted that paragraphs (a) and (b) form part of the $100,000 estimate. Paragraph (a) seeks that exact amount of money, the full $100,000 for the purchases of stock in VIA Rail Canada Inc. Therefore, obviously paragraph (b) is not an estimate in any sense of the word, because it does not seek any money, not even $1. The whole amount of $100,000 is the total amount of the estimate. All of that is contained in paragraph (a). Therefore no money is sought in paragraph (b). In any case, even if some sum of money were sought, the language of it is simply to release the restriction, which is contained in present legislation, of a ceiling on interest rates that ought to be sought by way of an amendment to the legislation.

In respect of both cases, I accept the argument of the hon. member for Calgary Centre, pursuant to the ruling which I made in March of this year: both of these items seek legislative authority which does not now exist. In all cases I am encouraged by the fact that the dispute by the House was not with the principle but with the approach to be taken to these programs. In fact the House is interested in the programs, particularly with respect to Cape Breton Development Corporation, and espouses an extension to the program. Simply, the House wants to see it done in a regular way. Therefore I would be encouraged by the prospect that if legislation is introduced to regularize this intention through an amendment to the legislation, it will receive speedy consideration by the House at least. In saying that I am drawing upon the arguments made by all members.

Also I hope all members have gained from this experiment, which has enabled us to argue these very important and significant subjects in a more orderly and regular way than we have done in the past. By coming to this point today, we are able to indicate what items, by order of the Chair, must be deleted from the supply bill tomorrow, again to encourage a repetition of the practice we have followed in the last two or three years of seeing the introduction of a supply bill at an early hour during the day, rather than have it introduced at the last hour of the day, which has always been an affront to members who are asked to make these considerations at a late hour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Thus, I hope the entire process has been beneficial to members. I thank all members for their co-operation in this very interesting discussion.

Mr. Speaker: May I just take one minute to indicate to the House, as I intended to do earlier in the day, that we are all delighted to see back among us, after a bout of very serious illness, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. It is important to feel part of a club which sends greetings from all sides of the House. Certainly I have mentioned to my own members of caucus my appreciation for their efforts. I have a greater understanding of those who are in hospital, and I should like all members to know that their kind wishes and words were very important to me. Certainly they played a great role in my being back here, where I intend to stay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. CULLEN—STATEMENTS AND QUESTIONS ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in my approximate ten years in the House of Commons, this is the first occasion I have had to rise on a question of privilege. That will give Your Honour some idea of the importance I attach to stances which I take as Minister of Employment and Immigration and the attitude I have to the unemployed.

My question of privilege arises out of statements made and questions asked in the House by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Both left the impression that I said Canadians need a "kick in the gut", and the further impression that 8.4 per cent unemployment was the way to achieve it. Later the hon. Leader of the NDP stated that he had checked and confirmed that I had made that expression, but he carefully avoided the context.

In talking to a group of new Liberals at the University of Ottawa—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Was it Jack Horner?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Beatty: Both of them!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that is their title, and they are proud to wear it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: At that time basically we were discussing the question of unemployment, primarily among young people, and I said the following:

> The main feature this morning as I understand it is the question of unemployment and youth unemployment and the government's response to that specific problem. In so far as the federal government is concerned we look first of all at the statistics, which are frightening at the least, namely, that unemployment among youth is about twice the national average so that if unemployment is around eight or seven or eight among the adult male, among young people between the ages of fifteen and twenty-four it's somewhere in the fifteen per cent mark. And so that is a target group for us. The other area that we have to be so careful with and we get locked in all too often is "What in effect is full employment?" I was absolutely delighted, I guess I should say, that the NDP were finally coming around to recognize that full employment doesn't mean that everybody in Canada is working but they picked a very conservative figure of three per cent unemployment as full employment. Darcy McKeough, you may remember, picked 5.5 per cent and if 5.5 per cent of the work force was unemployed at any particular time that in fact was full employment. The truth probably lies somewhere in between the two figures.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is your question of privilege?

Mr. Cullen: If the hon. member will wait, I will get to my question of privilege.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is what you are supposed to be doing now.

Mr. Cullen: I continued by saying:

> As a politician I'm not going to get locked into that. I don't think it's a particularly fruitful game for a member of parliament, particularly one on the government side, and particularly a minister who has responsibility for employment policies. Given those particular figures, I think we should remember that about 95 per cent of the people in Canada who wanted work are working and so our target group is that other 5 per cent or 6 per cent depending upon whose figures you're using.

That was the context of the unemployment debate and the words I used at that particular time.

Later I was asked a question by a member of the audience who said: "Mr. Cullen, is it not true that people are living beyond their means in Canada?" She went on to express in various ways how she thought this particular thing was taking place.

My response was as follows:

> Well, I think your first comment is dead-on with what the Prime Minister has been saying, that you cannot get more out of the economy than you are prepared to put into it. I think one of the problems that we've had in Canada is that we've been spoiled rotten and that we've been living pretty high off the hog and, as a result of that, we expect that that is, in fact, going to continue. We haven't had what I call a kick in the gut the way the States had when they had this all-of-a-sudden oil embargo. They couldn't get what they required, they had to line up for gasoline and they had such an economic and psychological jolt that they're being a little more realistic in the prices they charge for their products. People that are bargaining as union leaders are taking a much more responsible attitude because they've had this shock value. Now, we've tried to shock the Canadian economy with wage and price controls and we've tried to give them a psychological shock.

At no time did I indicate that Canadians needed a kick in the gut. In fact I indicated that it had been administered in the United States.

When we brought this information to the attention of the CBC, they checked out the true facts, and this morning they apologized on the radio. When we brought this to the attention of the Ottawa Citizen, where the story had its birth, they put a correction in the newspaper today.

My responsibility, as Minister of Employment and Immigration, is to get across to the unemployed of this country that I am concerned. As a son of an individual who was laid off and unemployed, and as an individual who has suffered unemployment when working my way through school, I have a feeling for the unemployed. That kind of thing is important to me in acting as the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I have received two apologies from the media. I think the very least I could expect from my colleagues is an apology that they made an error.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what member the minister had in mind when he was making his comments.

Mr. Goodale: You.

Mr. Broadbent: I hear one of his backbenchers answering for him. Evidently the minister expects to receive apologies from this side of the House. He referred to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and myself. I thought perhaps he would refer to the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. MacEachen).

● (1522)

If the minister looks in yesterday's Hansard he will find some interesting quotations, not coming from this side of the House but coming from his own side.

The minister raises an important question which pertains directly to what he has brought before us, as well as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), members of the Conservative party, and some from our party, namely, questions that are raised in the House about quotations that are attributed to people outside the House. I want to tell the minister that questions were raised yesterday from this side. I moved two motions under Standing Order 43. In my motion I used the phrase "alleged statement," and subsequently during the question period I sought some clarification. The word "alleged" was used from time to time by members of the Conservative party and indeed by the Deputy Prime Minister, but sometimes it was not. Yesterday the Deputy Prime Minister said, as reported at page 1583 of Hansard, that he was dissociating himself—

An hon. Member: Apologize, Broadbent.

Mr. Broadbent: —that it is not stated government policy. He said:

> . . . I find much in his statements and comments with which I agree such as, for example, his statement that it is not the total obligation of the government . . . to provide jobs.

Further on he said, with reference to the statement which he took for granted was uttered:

> They were general comments relating to what the minister conceives to be the lifestyle of Canadians,

My point is, and I want to stress it, that before I raised the issue in the House I saw not one newspaper but two, with two different stories, one a CP story and one a story by a reporter under a by-line in the Ottawa Citizen, presumably differently written stories—it could have been the same story but the paragraphs are quite different, the sequence is different—and in both stories the quotation is attributed to the minister. It seems to me that it is quite responsible for members on this side of the House to raise such questions.

At least when you use the word "allegation" there is a strong reason to believe—when you have two news stories before you in two different papers, presumably written by two different reporters attributing the words to the minister—that the story is true. But I want to go further, that if the minister really thought he had a case, as he says he has before the House now, yesterday morning he could have conveyed through his parliamentary secretary to members of the House of Commons—the story in the Ottawa Citizen is two days old—that he has been misquoted and we would have accepted his word. He could have conveyed this also to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Apologize.

Mr. Broadbent: I am saying—oh, shut-up over there!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) had put questions to the minister today which were deferred because the minister had indicated his intention to raise this question of privilege, and I think it is appropriate that the hon. member should have the opportunity to make his remarks.

Mr. Broadbent: If the minister thinks he has a question of privilege on this, the least he could have done before making accusations against members on this side of the House was to have informed his parliamentary secretary yesterday morning that what was alleged to have been said was not said, and he could have told the Deputy Prime Minister the same thing. As everyone in the House knows, yesterday the Deputy Prime Minister believed that the quotations were accurate and he was doing his best to disassociate the government from them. If the minister was so incensed about the opposition, why did he not ensure that the Deputy Prime Minister himself knew yesterday that he did not utter the words?

I will reply to what I think is not a question of privilege at all and end up my comments by saying that the minister has withdrawn his statement—and I accept his word entirely. He says he did not say Canadians deserve a kick in the gut, and I accept that. What he has not withdrawn, in fact he confirmed it, was that he said that Canadians have been spoiled rotten and that Canadians have been living too high off the hog. I say to the minister, let him go down to Cape Breton and tell them that.

Mr. Alexander: The minister is a cry baby.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief intervention in connection with this question of privilege. I believe, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) pointed out quite rightly, that this is not a question of privilege but rather an attempt to give an explanation of a rather unfortunate speech which he made to a group of Liberals, trying to tell them what they wanted to hear.

The minister, during the course of his so-called question of privilege, read from a transcript. He also has a recording of what he said during his speech or presentation to those students. I think it might be appropriate for the minister, if he wants to put the matter to rest, rather than read to the House an explanation and selected excerpts from his speech, if he would table the whole transcript and do us a further favour of allowing anyone who cares to hear the tape, which was recorded by his assistant at that meeting—because we on this side have checked the authenticity of the remarks quoted, we looked into the matter, and we understand that a recording was made by an assistant in the minister's office.

All I can say is that the minister has made utterances in the past outside the House which would lend credence to the authenticity of the statements that were attributed to him in the newspaper article, and I want to give a couple of examples. On March 31 of this year in the Ottawa Journal there was a report headlined "Tough-Talking Bud Cullen Finds Commons Irrelevant". It goes on to suggest—and there was no question of privilege raised in respect of this allegation—that he appears to enjoy developing a reputation as a tough guy since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed him to the portfolio last September. He said that he regards parliament as being irrelevant to the point of embarrassment. Now he comes to parliament and attempts, on a question of privilege, to explain precisely what he has said.

At other times he indicated, with respect to the unemployed, that it was his contention that opposition members of parliament want to spoon feed the young people. He was alleging that, in defending the proposition which the Prime Minister put forward that if graduates from our universities could not find work in the country, they could go elsewhere. He underlined that kind of approach with the problems in seeking employment, so it is only natural, when we read another report of a tough guy speaking against people looking for jobs, for us to want to check it and to find out precisely what he said.

As the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby says, when the minister speaks in the House, it is our obligation to accept what he says, and we accept the fact that, as he says, he did not say he wanted to give Canadians a kick in the gut. But I want to suggest to him that if he wants to demonstrate his sincerity to us, he will table a transcript of his statement and allow members of the House or of the media to hear the recording that was made of his statement. I think that in this way he would do far more to clarify the situation than by trying to explain it as an alleged question of privilege.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), I take it that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is attempting, while contributing to the question of privilege which remains open for decision, to import into the discussion a point of order relative to the tabling of a document. I am not sure that any of the precedents would apply to a document which is not now in existence and make them apply to some document which would have to be brought into existence presumably by the transcription of a tape. That would be an extension of the principle. However, it may be a matter for further consideration.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I personally feel that I am an aggrieved, innocent party in this matter, and I submit that there is now a question of privilege here with reference to myself. If we look at yesterday's record we will see that a motion under Standing Order 43 was moved by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and seconded by myself, a party who has been seriously impugned by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), which stated with regard to this matter that the minister made a number of comments to a group of new Liberals—whatever they are, they must be few in number. I am quoting from page 1581 of Hansard. He was reported as saying that Canadians need a kick in the gut and have been living too high off the hog. The motion went on to say:

> Since most Canadians would like to read the full context of the minister's remarks in order to be aware of the heartlessness of this government . . .
> That this House requests the Minister of Employment to make both a tape of his conversation last week end at the University of Ottawa and a transcript of those remarks available to all individuals who request such.

That was our motion, from which it can easily be seen that we were requesting the whole transcript so that we would know exactly what was said. I seconded that motion.

● (1532)

When I read the minister's comments in the newspaper, I was not surprised because he was merely following the lead of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who has said that we are obsessed with unemployment, who has shrugged his shoulders at unemployment for the last four years, and who has suggested that Canadians are soft. It is all in the same pattern, so when I read that the minister said—and he has admitted it—that we have been spoiled rotten, I recognized that as part of the same campaign of stating that it is all our fault that Canada and the government are in the position they are in. When he said that Canadians have been living too high off the hog, which he admitted today, I felt myself that the pig has nothing left but a squeak.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: When I asked my question I was careful in phrasing it. It is found at page 1583 of Hansard. I asked the following:

> Are the comments made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration last Saturday night in connection with unemployment that we have been spoiled rotten, that Canadians have been living too high on the hog and that we need a kick in the guts . . .

I quoted the minister as saying that we need a kick in the guts. I know the minister thinks we on this side of the House need a kick in the guts, but apparently he was not saying that all Canadians need a kick in the guts. He was saying we need an upset like the Americans had. I accept that.

Any mistake I made in my question is a very slim one. However, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) assured me that the statements alleged to be those of the Minister of Employment and Immigration do not represent any considered policy on the part of the government. In other words, it was an aberration of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and not an aberration of the government, although the Deputy Prime Minister found much in the statements and comments of the Minister of Employment and Immigration with which he agreed.

Then the Deputy Prime Minister went on to say, as reported at page 1854 of Hansard, and I quote:

> Furthermore, I should draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that the quotations to which he referred as allegedly having been made by the minister did not refer to the unemployed of Canada. They were general comments relating to what the minister conceives to have been the lifestyle of Canadians, and that is not and has never been a question of government policy.

The Deputy Prime Minister was guilty of whatever I am guilty of, if Your Honour finds me guilty, but I plead not guilty in this matter.

Finally, the hon. gentleman made these alleged remarks Saturday night. They were in the press on Monday. The minister did not get up in this House on Monday to object—

An hon. Member: He wasn't here.

Mr. Crosbie: —to the fact that he had been wrongly quoted in the newspapers. He did not come to this House on Tuesday to object. I believe he went to his district. I suppose it is important for a member to go to his district but, if he was seriously concerned, he should have been in the House on Tuesday, and the record could have been corrected then.

The minister's parliamentary secretary could have corrected the record. The Deputy Prime Minister could have corrected it, but he did not do so. He endorsed what the minister said and agreed with it. The Deputy Prime Minister did not say the minister was misquoted.

Therefore, while I am willing to submit to Your Honour's ruling if Your Honour rules against me—I have great respect for Your Honour and Your Honour's rulings—I submit that I am an injured party.

Mr. Speaker: Before hearing the contribution of the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury), I think I ought to move now to clarify something said by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) during the course of his remarks. He made reference to some quotation by the minister and followed that immediately by saying—if I am not mistaken; I had to catch this quickly—"I thought to myself that the pig—"

Mr. Crosbie: "Has nothing left but a squeak".

Mr. Speaker: I do not know if the hon. member for St. John's West was intending to use some sort of expression, but to me the clear effect of his language was that he was calling the minister a pig.

Mr. Alexander: Oh no, Sir. We wouldn't do that.

Mr. Speaker: To me that was the effect of the hon. member's language, and I do not think it was intended seriously.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: This is a very serious matter of decorum. I honestly believe that the hon. member for St. John's West was attempting to introduce into his remarks an expression rather than an epithet about the minister, and I think it would be better for all if the hon. member were able to confirm that.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister said that Canadians are living too high on the hog, and I said I felt that the pig, meaning poor old Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —has nothing left but a squeak. I was not referring to the minister.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Westmount): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nystrom: Just "boar" in there, Bud!

Mr. Drury: —I would like to address myself very briefly to the intervention of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I take exception to two of his propositions. Your Honour has dealt with them partially on the question of precedents, but I think it is even more fundamental than that. In this House we operate on a system of trust.

An hon. Member: Ha!

Mr. Drury: We do, in spite of the "ha". Some people do not seem to understand that. The machine will not work unless this assumption is made, and when the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar suggests, first, that reading from a transcript is inadequate and if the minister wishes to be believed and before—by implication—he, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, and his party will believe the minister, let him table a recording, that is an absence of trust, and I think contrary to one basic rule and that is: an hon. member's word, given in this House, is taken. Unless we operate on that basis the machine will not operate. Parliament will not work.

There is a second fundamental principle against which the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, wittingly or unwittingly, has offended, and that is that you do not question the motives of other members. The hon. member suggested that he, because of the alleged previous performance of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), had every reason to believe that the minister was a tough guy and so forth, and therefore he said those things. That is an example of questioning motives. Instead of examining what was said or not said, or its rightness or wrongness, the hon. member proceeded to try to impugn both the motives and the trustworthiness of the minister.

Unfortunately, recently we saw in Canada, through the polls, a popular referendum taken in which the public was asked in effect, "In matters of security, who would you sooner trust, the politicians or the police?" and the answer came back overwhelmingly, "We would sooner trust the police". I can understand this, and I suggest that unfounded allegations of untrustworthiness, and proceeding on assumptions that the motives and the trustworthiness of politicians should always be questioned, lead to a general public unwillingness to trust politicians, who themselves say they should not be trusted.

I suggest that the House should not follow or adopt rules or procedures which advertise or advocate untrusworthiness on the part of its members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Before I hear the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) on a separate point of order I would like to deal with this matter.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has raised, by way of a question of privilege, that which has been raised frequently in the past by way of questions of privilege, particularly in circumstances relating to incorrect quotations by the media which in fact turn into questions or points of some sort which have been raised in the House.

We have always in the past, in circumstances of this sort where there have been incorrect quotations which were perhaps misleading to the public on very important matters but which further have become matters of issue of some sort in the House, allowed, under the heading of privilege, opportunities for matters to be exposed to the House and for comments to be made by other parties perhaps affected. That does not, however, in any way alter the question, which is not a question of privilege under the circumstances, and therefore I feel it should not be considered as a priori a question of privilege, but ought to be finalized at this time.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which relates to comments made by the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury) and by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I am very much concerned about the course of events this afternoon related to the question of privilege raised by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen).

● (1542)

In dealing with this matter Your Honour has referred to the fact that this was not just a question of the recollection of the minister, I assume, on the occasion of last Saturday. The minister quoted extensively, both by way of introduction and by way of exchange in terms of the specific events later referred to in the press story. There has been a long-standing tradition in this House that when documents are quoted from, as different from when they are referred to—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Official documents.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): No, any document. I am sorry that the former minister of finance (Mr. Macdonald) and one-time House leader does not recall. We have had a series of experiences, and my recollection is clear over the last 12 years that from time to time when ministers referred to documents and then quoted from them, that quotation was sufficient to require the tabling of that whole document. On occasion we have had some fairly stormy sessions about this, but the Chair has always upheld the principle that documents quoted from are subsequently tabled in this House. If this were not to be the case ministers who quote from documents would have a special advantage in dealing with the nature of the documents in the course of debate.

We are in a situation where the minister is not simply relying on his memory—I am sure he agrees with this, and I will give him a chance to clarify it if I am wrong—but he is obviously quoting from a transcript of the actual events as they took place. At this point the transcript is only available to the minister. To my mind it is a strange situation. If the minister is—and I believe he is—honestly attempting to clear the air on this matter, because I am sure he does not want to be identified with the comments as they were carried in the press last week, he would make the total document available. I assume that he has reviewed the total document to make sure there is no other comment made that would contradict what he said on the question of privilege this afternoon.

To be fair to the House, however, and more important to be consistent with the traditions of the House, Your Honour has referred to the fact that we are in a somewhat different situation. Normally when ministers refer to documents and quote from them in order to clear up a misunderstanding, or in this case a question of privilege, there is no question but that the documents are subsequently tabled.

In this case we are dealing with a document, in effect a transcript that the minister has made available to himself so that he can clarify the record. He quotes from the document specifically but selectively. What members are asking for here is, I think, reasonable and is consistent with the traditions of this House—that the transcript which is the basis on which the minister made his statement this afternoon should be tabled in this House. Only in that way can we be in conformity with the traditions of the House as well as satisfactorily clear the air, which is the minister's prime objective in this instance.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in response to the invitation of my clansman and friend I would refer him to paragraph 159 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which makes clear that it is state papers which must be tabled by the minister and not private documents or memoranda.

As a member who does not expect to be very long in this House I can only say that I agree with the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury) that the approach taken by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is not in the best interests of the kind of parliamentary debate that we should be seeking in this House. I join the hon. member for Westmount in saying that I hope this kind of attitude will not continue.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the point of order was raised, I gather, on three misquotes, or on statements that were not made. The minister has now read from a document that indicated two of them were correct and the other one was apparently misinterpreted as to whom it was applied. It did not apply to Canadians but to Americans. It was also in the past rather than the present. The point was raised on these three matters. I believe it should not be left for a member to rise on a question of privilege, making these three allegations of incorrect statements being attributed to him and then only be prepared to discuss one of them as not being factually correct and, on the other two, reading from a document which indicated they were correct.

I think if the documents were tabled that would re-establish this matter of trust. If someone claims he was misquoted and then reads from a document which indicates he was correctly quoted in two thirds of the quotations, it seems to me it would be to his advantage to have the document tabled so that the matter could be finalized.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as regards the obligation to lay down documents when a minister refers to them, I simply direct you to May's nineteenth edition, page 431, bottom of the page and upper part of page 432, where it is clearly stated that a minister is not bound to lay down a document if it is a private document or a memorandum. I quote:

[English]

The rule for the laying of cited documents cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda.

[Translation]

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in this case the minister was merely quoting an abstract from a personal note relating to a speech he had already delivered.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, you may want to reflect on this matter overnight and look at the precedents established in this House. I am reminded of the point raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) with respect to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) reading from his own letter. While the matter did not come up for further discussion the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, saw fit to table the letter, and that was acceptable and in accordance with the practices and traditions which have been developed in this House. I think it may be appropriate for Your Honour to consider this matter and reserve decision. It is something that comes up from time to time, and it may be worth making sure that all precedents have been properly attended in this case.

A final comment, Sir, with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury): I appreciated the tenor of his remarks, but as soon as the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) made his contribution I realized I was on the right course.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to give the matter some consideration. I think my initial impression from the arguments made here today and from my knowledge of the precedents is that the extension of the precedent relating to the tabling of documents by ministers to cover speech notes would be an extension that goes quite far beyond the established precedent in that regard, and therefore it would seem most unlikely to me that it could be extended to fit that situation. This is particularly so in view of the fact that the minister has come into the House and said "I was misquoted. The relevant part of the speech is this." He has notes in front of him, and the argument is that then he should be able to go out and prepare the entire memorandum for the purpose of tabling it. In other words, the document is not in existence at the time he is citing it. That is not the document that must be tabled without alteration when that precedent applies, not one that will be brought into existence for the purpose of tabling. I think that is an important distinction.

In any case I indicated that I would reserve, and I shall do that and give a ruling just as soon as possible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which relates to my attempt to be recognized during the question period on a question of privilege when Your Honour, in effect, made a judgment subsequently or did not recognize another questioner after the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) presented a supplementary question. I raise this point of order because, as Your Honour will be aware, the temporary Standing Order with respect to the prohibition against raising questions of privilege during the question period is no longer in effect.

I think Your Honour has taken the position that only points of order are raised in this area that relate to questions of privilege. Your Honour will at least hear out a member rising on a point of order for the purpose of determining what precise point of order he or she raises.

● (1552)

As I understand what happened today during the course of that particular time, and I was not recognized, Your Honour then made some reference to the reasons why he did not allow the hon. member for Capilano to pose or have his question answered on the basis that his question appeared to you to be argumentative. My point is this: I would have thought it would have been possible within the rules now followed that, before the decision was made, Your Honour would have wished to have heard some representations as to the adequacy or otherwise of the member's question. It will be interesting to see the transcript.

I think there is a distinction to be made between an argumentative question and one which contains adjectives. For example, as I understood it, the hon. member referred to a vessel as a piece of junk. I do not believe that is necessarily argumentative—it may be a statement of fact. Members in the House, during the course of presenting strongly held views, may use that kind of language and it should not necessarily be considered argumentative unless it goes beyond the line of being an information-seeking question.

Another point I wish to raise with respect to the question period is that I think we should be entitled to be heard on points of order until other rules are adopted. At the present time I understand we have the right to bring up points of order and to be heard prior to a decision being made with respect to a point of order.

A further point which occurred to me during the course of the question period concerned the operation of the microphones in the House. They are switched from the person asking the question to the government side or member of cabinet who is to reply, without any direction from Your Honour. What occurs to me most vividly is the occasion on which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was engaged in questioning the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and Your Honour stood, which I understand is a signal to have the microphone switched off. Indeed, what happened was that the microphone was then switched over to the government side, to the minister under question, without any direction from Your Honour or any recognition of the minister by the Chair.

I understand that when Your Honour stands up to intervene in a question there is some point you wish to make, either to rule the question out of order or for some other purpose. I have noted on occasion that the switching takes place automatically, to the point at which the cabinet minister being questioned apparently has the right, by virtue of this automatic process, of answering before the balance of the question can be put.

I bring these matters to Your Honour's attention because I believe them to be important if we are to conduct the question period in an orderly manner. You can understand, Sir, that we on the opposition side wish to co-operate as much as possible, but unless the rules are quite clear then there will of course be a sense of grievance. It is my feeling that Your Honour should recognize a person on a point of order when it arises as a result of procedures in the question period, and I would appreciate Your Honour looking into the question of the mechanical operation of the microphones without direction from yourself.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member in asking me to hear representations of the sort he has just made is asking me to offend the regulations under which we now proceed. The precise terms of the procedures which we now follow are that I am not to hear points of order raised by way of objection on the part of members who are not recognized—that is the way it was before—I am not to hear those points of order until after the question period is over. That is precisely what I am doing now. I follow this procedure every day. If there are members who have grievances to raise which formerly they might have raised during the question period—I hear them at this stage, just as I have done today.

For me to entertain applications on matters of privilege or order during the question period when a member feels in some way aggrieved by a decision of the Chair would, in my opinion, be running counter to the order under which we are operating. Therefore I would invite the hon. member, if he wishes to do so, to persuade the House to return to the old procedure, one which I feel would be a retrograde step. However, it is the hon. member's right to decide that. For me to recognize the hon. member today, in his capacity as acting House leader, or to recognize the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), or any other member who wanted to raise a grievance about not being recognized for a third supplementary, or things of that nature, during the question period, and stop the question period at three o'clock, would be a method of proceeding which would create great difficulty. Instead, the House has directed that such matters should be left until the end of the question period. I believe it to be a preferable course, and one I am bound to follow.

If the hon. member wishes to examine the language of the hon. member for Capilano on his supplementary question today to try to persuade me that he indicated that a purchase was made in a manner it was made, which may be a proper allegation, but that it was nothing but a piece of junk—that was the language he used, I believe—if that is an information-seeking question and not an argumentative one in the terms I understand it, I would have a great deal of difficulty knowing what is an argumentative question. If I can be changed in that opinion, fine. The supplementary question attempted by the hon. member for Capilano was, in my opinion, very clearly argumentative in its terms, and I therefore went on to another question.

Another difficulty we faced today, for example, was posed when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) put a question and was interested in pursuing a supplementary. His question was answered in the affirmative in every respect. It seems to me that the Chair, by attempting to control supplementaries in the interest of getting a broader participation in the question period, can scarcely permit a supplementary question to one which has been met with a full, affirmative answer. The right hon. member asked for something to be considered, and the leader of the government stood up to answer the question which he said contained a worthwhile suggestion, and promised active consideration. If I am to grant a supplementary in a situation like that, to follow up some further attack, I cannot imagine what the attack would be.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) also was seeking another supplementary, as indeed were others. I have to make judgments every day, and the judgments I am inclined to make are those which benefit the cause of greater participation by the opposition in the question period.

I can easily relax and let every front bench member ask three questions. The result would be that only eight or nine members would be recognized in the question period, and it would be easier for me to do that. I can go in that direction, if that is what the hon. member is proposing. I believe, though, that the majority of members feel I should keep a tight rein in order to see to it that some members on the back benches have an opportunity to be recognized during the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jones: I do not know how other members feel about the question period, but it seems to me that if we were to have points of order raised during the 45-minute question period we would not have any question asked. The entire time would be taken up by points of order and questions of privilege. I would suggest Your Honour continue with the procedure which is presently followed. If the Conservative party decrees it should ask all the questions in the question period, then some of us in the south end will not get any, and are not likely to get proper answers. I find the questions from this end are often more intelligent than theirs.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this matter has now been raised several times during the course of this present session, the third session of this parliament. I am somewhat confused by some of the comments Your Honour has just made.

I seem to recall that in the course of the second session, on the recommendation of the Committee on Procedure and Organization, certain changes were made with respect to the question period. One of the major changes was the deferment of points of order and questions of privilege until the end of the question period. I recall that this was a major recommendation of the committee, and it was agreed to by the House for the duration of the second session. As I further understand it, that was to have expired at the end of the second session. It was, I believe, very definitely just a recommendation of the committee. I see the chairman of the committee at that time shaking his head, and I would urge him and other hon. members to check the record.

It seemed to me that this particular recommendation and its acceptance by the House were for the period of time of the second session of this parliament. As I understand it, Your Honour, no subsequent agreement has been formally registered by the House to cover the third session. It may well be the Chair is utilizing the agreement covering the second session as a precedent in terms of the third session. That is why I am raising the point.

I very much accept what Your Honour has said with respect to the difficulties created by the number of questions which can be raised. There have been periods in previous parliaments where we have had far too many questions of privilege and points of order that cut off a number of questions and the chance of broader exchange during the question period.

I want to be clear in my understanding that the difference between the situation we are in today and the one we had during the second session was that during the second session we had agreement on the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, whereas in this session, if we are operating by that practice, it is basically because of some general acceptance of the precedents and not by any decision of this House. I do not think this decision has been taken with regard to this third session.

I invite Your Honour, officials of the House, and others to review that decision so that we can be clear as to the exact basis on which we have taken the position you have just enunciated.

Mr. Speaker: On the point just raised by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), it seems to me that at the beginning of the third session I made a number of remarks to the House and indicated that I would continue to be guided by that during the course of this session. I left it in that way until the House directs otherwise. I will turn up that reference, if I can. In any event, if I did not say it then, I say it now. It seems to me that the only intelligent choice is to continue the way we are now, unless the House requests me to do otherwise.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on the same point of order. In Your Honour's summation you did not come to the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). At the risk of sounding unduly ingratiating or obsequious, I and all members of this House very much appreciate the job you do in your difficult position.

There is one thing, however, that I believe has been changed as a result of television in this Chamber and, perhaps, with the installation of the sound system. That has been alluded to by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. I have personally noted it. I believe other members may find some measure of agreement with me.

The synchronization between those who operate the microphones and those who occupy the chair has suddenly changed. While you, Sir, are undoubtedly the one to control the validity of the interpretation of the types of questions asked in this House, I have noticed at times the microphones of members are turned off before Your Honour has time to adjudicate on whether they should be closed off. That is the point, I believe, that should be considered.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) raises a point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I did not refer to it. My understanding is that, as soon as I stand up, these microphones here are activated, and this de-activates all other microphones in the room. As long as I am on my feet to deal with or adjudicate upon a disputed point, even with the case today where I was on my feet and both the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) were talking, they were not talking into active microphones. If it happened otherwise, it is extraordinary. When this microphone here is on, the other microphones are de-activitated. In any event, it is a legitimate point of concern and one we should watch.

I have no difficulty with the concept that if I get to my feet and my microphone is activated, the others are de-activated. I think everyone agrees with that basic concept. It would be unfair by that action to be able to precipitate the discontinuance of one microphone on one side of the House and activate the other. We shall check that.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I wish to elaborate briefly on the same point. It might be useful for Your Honour to review a tape of today's question period, the television tape of the House proceedings. When one of my colleagues to my left, I forget which one, was asking a question, the minister in question began to stand up. I was watching. My colleague's microphone was turned off and then turned back on. It had nothing to do with Your Honour. I do not believe you were standing at the time.

The concern I have is now that television has been introduced into the House of Commons, if this happens it is impossible to have a proper electronic Hansard of the proceedings of parliament. It is impossible for a microphone across the House to capture what is being said by a member on this side if his microphone has been turned off. This was an instance which I think will show on the tape where Your Honour did not stand, but the microphone was temporarily turned off and turned back on. That might assist Your Honour in your work.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I want to support you in the comments you made earlier about the way in which you would deal with points of order and questions of privilege during the question period. As I recall the rules, when we made the changes that put the Standing Order 43 motions at two o'clock and the questions following not later than 2:15, we made a great reform in this House. Up until that time there had been a question period of a certain length. It was always very difficult to determine when that question period came to an end. The intervention of points of order and questions of privilege sometimes resulted in the question period extending for a great deal longer than apparently was provided for in the rules.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, we will not revert to that situation. I believe it is important for order in this House that the question period should end at a particular time. That being so, I hope that you will follow your present practice of considering points of order and questions of privilege after the question period is over.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I support the idea of taking points of order and questions of privilege following the question period. It is more orderly. I would, however, ask Your Honour to give some consideration to this particular period. It has now gone on for an hour.

A number of matters have been raised. The House would be better served if these matters were discussed privately in Your Hounour's chambers rather than in the House. Many problems affect Your Honour's particular jurisdiction. I have been very satisfied with Your Honour's decisions, something that was not always true with some of your predecessors.

I suggest that Your Honour be a little more firm with regard to disallowing pseudo points of order or pseudo points of privilege. I suggest it would be more orderly if Your Honour invited an hon. member to make his point directly. Many of these points of order and questions of privilege do not serve much purpose being raised in this House. I am sure that if Your Honour errs with regard to a certain matter, you will be pleased to make a correction.

I strongly urge Your Honour to be more firm and maybe rap the knuckles of those who raise questions of privilege which are in fact no questions of privilege.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I simply asked about the rules that apply during the course of the question period. My purpose is not to suggest that the previous rule is better than the current rule under which we have been operating. The point which is important is that the rules were arrived at and instituted by agreement.

There are ancillary considerations that flow from the question of what rules apply, whether we have re-instituted these rules in the third session or not. I simply ask Your Honour to allow us to reserve our right, because this is an important matter of procedure, so that we can come to some understanding by virtue of the agreement that existed before. It is important for us to be able to understand the ramifications of what has transpired. I ask Your Honour to allow us to reserve our right so that we can find out precisely the terms of the order and agreement entered into, and whether they still apply.

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing I can do or say today to take away the hon. member's right. If he wants to ask the House to go back to the other method, he ought to put his arguments forward.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

MEASURE TO ADMIT EVIDENCE RESPECTING CRIMINAL CONVICTIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-410, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to accede to the request of my colleagues to explain my bill. The purpose of this bill is to allow evidence of a criminal conviction to be admitted in a subsequent civil action founded on the same facts. Such evidence was held to be inadmissible by the English Court of Appeal in the 1943 case of Hollington v. Hewthorn. Although Canadian courts have not applied the rule uniformly in this country, it poses a potential obstacle to evidence which is both relevant and of substantial probative value.

HANDBOOK FOR THE EVALUATION OF PROJECTS

Question No. 495—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the Treasury Board developed a handbook of the approach and methods for the evaluation of projects to be used by departments?

2. What reporting procedures are required when projects have been evaluated?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The Treasury Board has not developed a handbook solely dedicated to the approach and methods to be used by departments for the evaluation of projects. Projects are extremely diverse in nature ranging from major unique construction projects to repetitive project activities of a social or scientific research nature that are evaluated utilizing specific techniques. A considerable and rapidly expanding volume of relevant literature exists relating to evaluative techniques and methodology. The need to apply these techniques where appropriate is stressed in the Treasury Boards' policies on program performance measurement and program evaluation. Specific aspects of the evaluation of projects are referenced in such documents as the Treasury Board's Benefit Cost Guide.

2. Widely diverse procedures pertain to the appropriate reporting of project evaluations depending upon the scope, nature, magnitude and significance of individual projects within departments and agencies. Departmental project evaluation procedures may be categorized in three broad areas: (a) prospective evaluation in support of project selection; (b) evaluation during project implementation, and (c) post evaluation of completed project results and benefits.

2. No.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the papers requested deal with negotiations now under way which will probably lead to an agreement between the two governments and therefore cannot be divulged. COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE, AGREEMENTS AND DOCUMENTS RELATING TO FINANCING OF SUGAR COMPLEX IN REPUBLIC OF THE IVORY COAST

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have been in the habit in the past when members are not present to move these motions rather than simply demanding that someone move them on their behalf, to have them dealt with at the time they are raised. I may be taking a liberty with the procedures of the House in doing this. The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) does not happen to be in his seat at the present time. I wonder whether I could have some indication if it is agreeable that, in circumstances of this sort, it is expeditious to have the motion dealt with in this way when it is called, and to assume that it is transferred for debate. This would seem to me to be the most expeditious way to do it. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil will be transferred for debate.

COPY OF LEGAL OPINION CONCERNING LATEST POSTAL RATE INCREASES

[English]

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the legal advice provided by law officers of the Crown on a matter of state policy falls into the class of confidential documents. I would therefore ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Last Wednesday at this time I drew attention to the fact that notices of motions Nos. 7 to 43 appearing on the order paper had not been answered. There has been no response or comment made with respect to these notices. At that time the parliamentary secretary stated that he would follow up on the matter and notify us when he had received word from the department. I was wondering whether the parliamentary secretary today could indicate to what extent he has been pressing the department for a response to these notices, bearing in mind there is an appeal pending with respect to Chief Justice Evans' decision. Some of these documents would be very helpful in framing that appeal.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I remember that last week I said to the hon. member that he alone had monopolized two thirds of the notices of motions on the order paper. I had then asked him to be patient. I think that if his patience can last another week, he has excellent chances of getting satisfaction next week.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND BILL C-11

The House resumed, from Tuesday, December 6, consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose on Tuesday, December 6, 1977, clause 14, with amendments, was under consideration.

On clause 14.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I hope the committee will note that we have lost one hour and 20 minutes of our time, substantially due to a question of privilege raised by a minister of the Crown. I hope the Minister of Finance will bear this in mind and consider extending closure time, if necessary, in view of the fact that this is an extremely important bill. We have 116 clauses to deal with and we are only on clause 14. It is most unfortunate, when we are put under closure and gagged, to find that now is the time ministers choose to raise rather spurious questions of privilege in order to delay the House still further.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, at ten o'clock last night I was on my feet on this particular clause.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, when ten o'clock was called last night I was questioning the minister on insurance items which are of great interest to a good many people in Canada. I commended him, much to the chagrin of some of my colleagues, on what he had done in allowing interest on business loans as a deductible expense, and other items which have been approved. I pointed out to the minister that the government had gone a considerable distance with the request of the opposition and of a great many members on his own side of the House. I said that in view of this step the great majority of the loans made on insurance policies would be made on policies of the type where no portion of the loan could be declared to be an investment but would have to be added into taxable income.

I pointed out that in most cases these would be long-term policies such as whole life policies.

● (1622)

In the interest of the minister and his officials I have two specimen life insurance policies here from a reputable Canadian company, the National Life Assurance Company of Canada, a company with which I have had some dealings down through the years as an agent.

The first specimen policy is a whole life policy in the amount of $10,000 paying an annual dividend. The individual is 29 years of age and pays a premium of $182.30. If that policy continued for a considerable time, to age 60, he would have paid in $5,651.30. He might then want to borrow on the policy, in which case the loan or cash surrender value, these incidentally in most cases are pretty much the same, would be $4,810. In other words he would have paid in more than that amount.

In the other example I have the insured person is aged 35. This also is a policy for $10,000 with a premium of $193.90. If he paid for a 25 year period he would have paid in $4,847.55. The loan or cash surrender value would be $3,920. Again after that long period of payment the insured would not get back as much as he had paid in.

I have pointed out to the minister and his officials, and they have agreed, that in respect of probably 999 of every 1,000 policies the holders would not have any loan investment in them. Because of that I asked the minister why in the name of heaven he did not scrap the whole thing and forget about it. I can see the former minister clenching his fists. When I questioned him during the summer he took strong exception to the situations I have been presenting at this time to the government and the minister.

I have a letter here from the Life Insurance Underwriters of Canada, a part of which I should like to quote. They wrote the letter after hearing my comments in the House regarding the government's arguments. The letter states:

> You mention the government's argument that taking out a policy loan is an unfair tax shelter. We suggest this argument is wrong. There might have been an argument that a policy loan could be used as a tax avoidance scheme when we were looking at the prospect of a tax being levied at death. A policyowner in later years might conceivably take out a maximum loan in anticipation of death and thereby reduce or eliminate tax. But this argument disappeared with the dropping of the death tax.
> If a policy lapses as a result of failure to pay either premiums or policy loan interest or both, the present section 148 tax on a surrender comes into effect and the policyowner will be taxed as if there had been no loan and the entire cash value was received at that time. So there is no possibility of tax avoidance there.

In a later letter from the same association, again commending me for bringing this to the attention of the government, the following is stated:

> We sincerely hope that the efforts being made by you and some other members in the House will be rewarded by the withdrawal of the Bill C-11 provisions which discriminate against policy loans.

I give full marks to the minister for going the second, the third and the fourth miles, but the clause which is left is insignificant, not worth while and should be scrapped. I would ask the minister how he intends to police this. Will he set up another bureaucracy, a lot of officials with adding machines checking policies to determine cash value? I suggest it will cost more than it is worth. If you collect $50,000, which is probably the maximum under this provision, I am sure it will cost $200,000 to do so. Would you let me have your comments on that, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Chrétien: I have looked into the problem referred to by the hon. member. We believe we must maintain the clause in the bill because of its importance. It is important that we retain the provisions included in a policy holder's income relating to the excess of policy loan he receives over his cost of the policy, otherwise this would lead to serious abuse.

The abuse is that a taxpayer would be permitted to withdraw his income on a policy without paying any tax at all. This would constitute a massive loophole. This probably does not apply to small policies, but let me give you an example of a man purchasing an insurance policy for the single payment of $100,000. It is reasonable to assume that, after a 12 year period, the cash surrender value of that policy would probably be about double the original investment, that is, $200,000. Treating the policy loan as a real loan would permit that person to withdraw the $200,000 entirely free of tax. He could then, by paying the policy loan interest, maintain the policy in force until his death. Since there is no tax at death, he would have received his earnings entirely free of tax.

I would like also to emphasize that our proposal will not mean a tax on all policy loans. In fact it will mean a tax on very few, as I said earlier. This is because of the example I have given the hon. member. A policy holder will be entitled to recover his costs before any income arises. Thus, if a policy holder has paid $3,000 in premiums he will be allowed to recover $3,000 in policy loans before any income arises.

Let me also remind the hon. member that we have made other provisions relating to policy holders exceedingly reasonable. Certainly in relation to policy loan interest, the rules are now far more generous than under the present act. For the first time we have given the majority of policy holders recognition for the interest they pay on policy loans. In addition, we continue to make it possible for Canadians who borrow through policy loans, for the purpose of earning income, to deduct policy loan interest currently.

As I indicated, if policy loans were to continue to be treated as loans, a major tax avoidance vehicle for the wealthy would result. It would also make the tax on surrenders during lifetime totally ineffective. We have to treat policy loans on the basis of what they are, and we need to keep the proposed rules relating to policy loans to prevent a major loophole for the wealthy.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the minister with interest. He was talking about the wealthy policy holder who will be the expert in getting around government regulations, beating the government out of the tax. The minister mentioned a $100,000 policy. Let me tell him that anyone putting money into a $100,000 policy as an investment certainly ought to see a psychiatrist. That person should be investing in something like real estate where he could get a much better deal and a better return than from life insurance. This provision certainly will not be a moneymaker.

Let me quote again from this letter from the Life Underwriters Association. I was not going to read more of it, but in view of the minister's remarks I would like to continue. It is from Mr. R. L. Kayler, executive vice-president of that association. He has stated:

● (1632)

The argument that the interest rate on policy loans is low really begs the question because the policy loan privilege obviously costs something and this is paid for by policy owners as part of their premium cost. Actuaries do not normally give anything away in their premium structures.

Perhaps the minister is accompanied by some actuaries today. The letter continues:

If policy loan interest seems low one can be sure the policy owners are paying for that advantage either in higher premiums, lower dividends or both.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the Minister of Finance knows anything about the material he read. I do not believe he can sell a policy on the reading that he gave in the House today. No life insurance company will lend more than the value accrued. If the policy is to be used as collateral, then it has to be taken to a bank, and the policy owner is required to pay bank interest on the loan.

My next point has been well demonstrated by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. I sold life insurance. People do not buy life insurance for the purpose of investment, because of the type of other investment opportunities which are available today. Every year they would lose 2 per cent under the present scheme. How much is expected to be gained? His actuaries are with him now. The minister should know what he is doing.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is telling me that I do not know much about insurance.

Mr. Rynard: That is correct.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member is a doctor, and he has sold insurance policies. My father was the director of a small insurance company for 49 years. Also he sold insurance as a part time job for more than 50 years. Even though I am not an expert, I know a little about life insurance, but probably not as much as the hon. member.

Sometimes policies are designed by insurance companies in order to attract funds to create potential loopholes. As the hon. member said, I was reading from a text. I could recite it again in French to indicate that I understand a little bit about it. If people were to invest in one-payment insurance policies, a loophole would be created when their money is drawn out of the policies and they avoid paying taxes. We have been apprised of examples where people have done just that. Therefore we felt it was necessary to move in that direction. It is always the abusers who create the necessity for the government to plug loopholes such as this.

I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. This aspect will not be applied very often. We do not want to create a situation where life insurance companies will go to people who have money and suggest this loophole.

It is not a good investment if one has to pay taxes. If a person avoided taxes, it would be extremely attractive for him. We do not want to provide a tax shelter for these people. I realize people cannot draw more than they have contributed. That is the case in so far as most policyholders are concerned.

Mr. Darling: Ninety-nine per cent.

Mr. Chrétien: Ninety-nine per cent. Therefore this additional requirement is created for one person in a hundred. I do not want to create the impression that a new tax shelter has been devised because of one person abusing the system.

Mr. Rynard: Can the minister cite one specific instance where this loophole was used? How can it protect a person's investment?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I just gave that answer. If a person buys a one-payment policy of $100,000, his investment will grow in the books of the company. After 12 years it will have a value of $200,000. On that gain, $100,000 will have been earned without any taxes. If this clause were not in effect, the person could withdraw the $200,000 and not be required to pay any tax on the second $100,000. He would be required to maintain his policy in force, but he would avoid paying taxes on $100,000 of gain.

Mr. Rynard: The same principle applies with respect to Canada Savings Bonds. People buy bonds and hold them for ten years in order to double their investment. I challenge the minister on this point.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, when a person cashes Canada Savings Bonds, he is required to pay taxes on the interest. That is also the case if he cuts his coupons. If this loophole were not plugged, a person could avoid paying taxes on the interest earned, namely, the second $100,000 which I referred to earlier.

Mr. Rynard: When a person borrows money through his life insurance company, he is required to pay an interest rate of 6 per cent, whereas the ordinary interest rate is approximately 10 per cent. How long will it take for the interest rate provided by insurance companies to catch up? What mortality table is used? One must take into account the age of the person, as well as the much lower rate of interest.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the much lower rate of interest applied on old policies. At the present time the interest rate on new policies is closer to the prime rate offered by banking institutions. Old policies with the 6 per cent interest rate are still in existence, but the new ones have an 8 per cent rate of interest, or a rate of interest closer to the prime rate. This was changed a few years ago.

Mr. Rynard: My impression was that the interest rate is 6 per cent. Certainly the prime rate is more than 6 per cent at the present time. It must be approximately 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Chrétien: In so far as old policies are concerned, a person can borrow and pay interest at the rate of 6 per cent, and perhaps even 5 per cent. In so far as new policies are concerned, the formula used is closer to 8 per cent or 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to retirement plans as they relate to insurance policies. As the minister knows, at age 70 policy holders are required to convert their retirement policies into an annuity program. Age 70 is a difficult time to face becase it is a period of transition. Sometimes when people reach that age they move from one locality to another. In fact I spoke to a constituent who indicated that last year he moved from Edmonton to White Rock. For these people this time is an unsettling period of life. They have paid for ten or 15 years into a retirement plan through an insurance policy, and had started their payments when the value of the dollar was much higher, and now they have to convert those hard earned and more expensive dollars into another form because this period in their lives is also unsettling in another way. There are many vicissitudes that come to elderly folk at this period in their lives and many emergencies, and therefore they need to have that liquid capital available to them in ready form.

Simply to convert all of their retirement savings out of their life insurance policy into, say, a series of small annuity packages so that they can be as available to them as possible, makes it more difficult for them. I understand the principle that the savings in that policy have been untaxed and therefore, from the government's point of view, they deserve to be taxed when they are converted into an annuity program. I understand that principle, but for the person who has been a small wage earner and who has worked hard for those dollars, the $8,000 or $10,000 that he has saved, which looked good 15 years ago, does not look very good now. I wonder if it would not be a reasonable proposal in the case of a retirement couple who have only $5,000 or $10,000 saved through the savings plan and insurance program, during an inflationary period not to tax the first $5,000 or $10,000, but where there are annuity programs going beyond that amount, they would be taxable because, as I said at the outset, these have been hard earned and good dollars which they invested and now they have to live off inflationary dollars. Is that an unreasonable question to ask, and would that not be a reasonable proposal to make on behalf of people who are retired and who do not have much in the way of savings?

Mr. Chrétien: We are aware of this problem and we are looking into it. We are reviewing many aspects of pension plans and the problems of citizens with their pension plans. We will take note of the hon. member's representation. It is not directly related to the problem we are discussing at this time. I would like to mention to him that if you take a small amount of money such as $5,000, it can be converted into an annuity, but there is a $1,000 exemption a year on it. So if you have converted that $5,000 into an annuity, it is likely you will have to pay less in payments at 70 years of age, and in fact it would not be taxable because of the $1,000 exemption. I know there is some problem with larger amounts of money, but inflation is a problem which faces everyone in the country and it is not a particular problem of the retired people.

Mr. Friesen: What the minister is saying is that if that amount is converted into an annuity, obviously they can escape further taxation at present. My point is that people in this position need some liquid capital and it should be accessible to them. They should be able to have at least a small lump sum available to them, and that should escape taxation.

I want to draw the minister's attention to a related problem arising out of Canada Savings Bonds. I received a letter some time ago from a constituent, which I would like to read to the minister so that he can understand the problem which arises for people who plan for their retirement years and face the problems to which we have already alluded. My constituent, Mr. Schlichter, writes the following:

> In November, 1969, a few months prior to my retirement, I purchased Canada Savings Bonds, S.24, in the amount of $20,000.
> This particular issue was the first one to feature compound interest in the form of bonus coupons payable at maturity provided all coupons remained attached.
> On November 1, 1978, series S.24 will mature and I have calculated that the interest due to me, at that time, will be $22,300.
> My taxable income for the year 1975 was $1,397.20, for 1976 $919.84 and 1977 will be about the same. Adding $22,300 to this and the income tax payable will become quite substantial.
> It is my intention to purchase an income averaging annuity contract which not only would reduce the tax payable to a more manageable level but would be a great help to me in coping with present day inflation.
> In order to determine whether or not this payment would be considered as "qualifying income," I went to the taxation office in Vancouver and put the question before them. The spokesman there referred to Information Circular No. 72-21 dated August 29, 1972 which however does not specifically mention such income.

Perhaps the minister's officials could make note of that. The letter goes on to read:

> His personal opinion was that this payment could very well qualify and as the situation would not arise until the taxation year 1978, an amendment covering it might be forthcoming.

That, basically, is my question: Will there be an amendment forthcoming? The individual goes on to say:

> I then decided to write to Ottawa for a ruling whether or not I can go ahead with the plan to purchase the annuity for a term of ten years or less. Perhaps there is even a better suggestion and if so I would, of course, be happy to hear about it.
> Not knowing to whom to write makes things difficult and I would appreciate it very much if you would be good enough to pass this letter along to the appropriate department or person.

What better place is there to do it than here where we have the accumulated wisdom of the minister and his officials who can give us an immediate and quick answer and a solution to Mr. Schlichter's problem? Will there be an amendment that will take care of this problem?

Mr. Chrétien: Of course this is a very common problem for people who accumulate savings by not cashing their coupons and then decide to cash them at some point. They can decide not to cash them all at once but to spread them out. There is the averaging provision in the Income Tax Act that might be of some help to them. However, I will look into the matter mentioned by the hon. member and make sure that a reply is provided to his constituent.

Mr. Friesen: May I make one other point to the minister? He makes the point that an individual does not have to cut the coupons, but the point of this series of bonds was that they accumulated interest, provided he would not cash in the coupons. In other words, the government wanted the advantage of a secure capital over these ten or 11 years and therefore asked the purchase of those bonds not to cash in the coupons. Is he going to be punished for doing what was helpful to the government and obviously providing the government with some capital?

Mr. Chrétien: When we go into the market to raise some money, we offer many forms of bonds, and every individual decides what bonds he wants to purchase. When that series of bonds was offered, there were some advantages in the immediate future for the purchaser if his income was high enough at that time. Some people would buy those bonds and have the interest on them accumulate, knowing that in five years time they could cash them. Let us suppose that a member of parliament buys them knowing his average years of survival as a member of parliament and that in five or ten years time he will want to cash the bonds, so he can make some provision for that. Other people who are at the age of, for example, 50 and planning to retire at the age of 60 will have an incentive to buy that type of bond.

However, he knew what he was buying, and he is not punished when he cashes his coupons. Perhaps the person who sold the bonds to him misled him, but on the bond itself it is very clear that when cashing it the accumulated interest must be paid.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Chairman, I think this will be my final question to the minister on this topic. The gentleman is not complaining about the bonds, and he is not complaining about having been misled. He knew what he was buying, and he was satisfied with the bonds he bought. He is concerned that there is now no government information on what the requirements are relative to his income at this point. The only circular the official could give to him was circular 72-21, which does not fit the situation. Is there a specific piece of information in printed form which we can send to people like this who are facing a problem with an S-24 bond and facing problems arising out of that accumulated income?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly look into the matter to try to find some more precise information, and I will give it to the hon. member. We will be in touch with the Department of National Revenue on that. Would the hon. member be gracious enough to send us a copy of his letter?

Mr. Friesen: Sure.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister about the reasoning behind the change which is going to be brought about by the amendment to clause 14 in relation to interest on insurance policy loans. I am delighted to see that the interest which is paid to earn income is now going to be allowed as a deduction from business income. I am glad, because I made this point in my speech at second reading, but I specifically want to ask the minister what it was that caused his predecessor, in explaining at the introduction of this in the budget of March 31, to say that in the opinion of the government loans on insurance policies are not loans because there is no obligation to repay the amount received from the insurance company?

It seems that the government has had a change of heart and is now considering these amounts as real loans, and the interest which is paid to earn the real income is going to be allowed. I think I will stop there.

Mr. Chrétien: I have no comment to add, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Clarke: I was not asking for additional comments. I wanted an answer. Perhaps I can strip all of the preamble from my question. What was the reasoning of the government in saying, when Bill C-11 was initially introduced, that the interest on insurance policy loans would not be allowable as a deduction from income?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think there were many good reasons, not the least of which was one given before a committee of this House by the insurance companies themselves. They did not want to be covered by the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act. The insurance companies argued in that committee that those advances were not loans. Perhaps I can read from page 16 of the presentation of the Canadian Life Insurance Association to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs with regard to the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act.

In January of this year that association said the following about the nature of policy loans:

> "Policy Loans" represent an area in which the life insurance industry, in the eyes of the public, might be seen as making "loans". These are not, however, really loans at all despite the common terminology used to describe them, as the Supreme Court of Canada concluded in the case of Equitable Life Assurance Society v. Larocque, (1942) S.C.R. 205. There is no advancement of credit; no debt is created; nor is there any right on the part of the insurer to demand payment either of principal or of interest. Rather, the process represents essentially an advance of the benefits payable under the policy.

The same thing was argued in the Senate Banking Committee on March 16, 1977, as recorded in issue No. 22. The subject matter of the proceedings then was Bill C-16, the Borrowers and Depositors Protection Act. The life insurance companies themselves argued that this is not a loan, and consequently my predecessor said, "If I accept your argument

I have to amend the act and treat those advances as if they were not loans".

No one saw all the implications, so I examined the matter. I do not want to lay blame on anyone. The insurance companies made their presentation. I do not blame the insurance companies or my predecessor. I do not have to comment on their motivation. However, I examined the matter. There was not much money involved. Some people were unhappy. I said "Let's change it". I used the only yardstick for measurement I have, my own judgment.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the minister sometimes listens too much to the vested interests, in this case the insurance companies. If these are not loans by insurance companies to policy holders, how is it that when a policy holder dies the amount of the advance, loan or whatever is, at that time is collected from the estate by way of deduction from the payment of the proceeds of the policy?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry. I was talking, and I did not hear the question. Would the hon. member repeat it, please?

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I would be delighted to repeat my question. If it is not considered a loan or if it is decided that an advance is not a loan, how can it be explained that upon death an insurance company collects the amount of a loan or advance from the proceeds before paying out the net proceeds to the estate?

Mr. Chrétien: It is already paid out. It is calculated out of the payment which is being made on the policy. It is considered an advance. It was previously paid out, so it is not collected, unless the hon. member knows of a mechanism which is different from the one I know about. Perhaps there is a misunderstanding between the hon. member and me. However, a combination of changes proposed by me and changes proposed by the hon. member for Rosedale gives a better break to the ordinary policy holder than he had before because the cost base of the policy is adjusted.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, to help remove any uncertainties about the government's position, now that it has brought in the amendments we have before us, I think I should refer the minister to a letter sent by his predecessor to all members of the Liberal caucus. The letter is dated August 3. The then minister set out an 18-point memorandum explaining why he felt the provisions he announced with respect to life insurance policy holder loans, the treatment of interest on those loans, and the taxation of that investment income at death were justified. In this memorandum the minister asks questions and then sort of answers them. I thought we should get on the record whether the minister differs or otherwise with his predecessor.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

• (1702)

Item 11 reads as follows:

The statement has been made that Canada is the only country in the world to tax the gain on a life insurance policy. It this true?

The former minister gave the following answer:

This statement may be true, but it must be recognized that one must consider the level of taxation the industry as a whole must bear and not just one isolated area.

Could the present minister tell us whether he agrees with that?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, in this bill there are some changes to the rate of taxation applicable to insurance companies where they are dealing with one aspect related to policyholders and what we consider as a loan on the policy. There are all sorts of changes applicable to the reserves and we have to calculate the reserves so that those companies can bear a reasonable share of income tax like other companies.

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question. The statement was that we in Canada are the only country in the world to tax the gain on a life insurance policy. In other words, using the little formula that the bureaucracy has worked out where you take the cost of the policy and if there is a cash surrender value greater than that cost, then somehow there is deemed income, the statement was made that taxing such a gain would mean Canada is the only country in the world to do so. The previous minister said that was true. Does the present minister agree that what we are proposing makes us unique?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to comment on that. I have looked at the problem and decided to make changes. I have not read this letter and I should like to analyze it before commenting. I do not have the letter but I do not think it will add much to the debate to see whether my thinking is the same as that of my predecessor. When I listen to the hon. member for York-Simcoe I know that very often his own thinking changes from one moment to the other.

Mr. Stevens: On that last point, Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will draw it to my attention anytime he believes my thinking has changed on a particular point.

Mr. Chrétien: With pleasure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is an old Tory; he never changes.

Mr. Stevens: Let us forget about the letter. We are pleased that the minister has watered down the previous life insurance taxation even to the extent that he has. I should still like to know if the taxation of the gains contemplated in the amendment to subclause 14(1) makes it unique in the world.

Mr. Chrétien: I am told we are not the only one, Mr. Chairman. I have not checked all the policies of all the world but those gains are taxable in different ways in different nations.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder if the minister could indicate one nation where the gain we are proposing to tax is taxed in the same way?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I just said other nations tax in different ways, some indirectly. The gains are taxed in different nations. I do not have the repertoire of all these things in front of me. I can humbly admit I do not know which one, how much and so on. I think, with due respect, it is a little irrelevant. The hon. member says he is happy with the changes, so the best thing he could do at this time is let us vote.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I will be very direct with the minister. We are happy with the changes, but why can the minister not go all the way and delete this silly tax? Why do we have to live with a mistake that the bureaucracy attempted to get by us?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I took the trouble earlier of explaining twice why we keep the taxation on certain parts of the insurance policy when we borrow. I gave the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) and the hon. member of the riding next to his a lengthy answer and I think it will not be necessary at this point to repeat it. I explained that it is possible in certain circumstances for some people inheriting a single policy to earn over a period of 12 years an amount equivalent to the amount of the investment and they could take it out without paying any tax. In the case of a very large amount this could provide a way of evading taxation and that is why we are keeping it in. But I explained that this would not apply to perhaps less than 1 per cent of the policies and hon. members should bear in mind that we should try to avoid allowing certain people to use this provision of the act to create loopholes for tax evasion.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I think that half the time the minister does not understand the questions. We have many more clauses to deal with and I propose that we get on with this amendment. I wish the minister had dropped the idea of taxing gains on life insurance policies, but if we cannot talk reason into him we have no alternative but to accept the amendment.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I think if the hon. member had been here when I gave the explanation he would have understood.

Mr. Stevens: I was here.

Mr. Chrétien: That is even worse. After two explanations that satisfied everybody I could not satisfy the hon. member because he did not have any understanding at all.

The Chairman: Maybe I should intervene at this point. The hon. member for York-Simcoe refers to the amendment and it is brought to my attention that while the minister moved the amendment yesterday, it was not put to the committee by the Chairman. Maybe I should put the two amendments to the committee. I have to put them one at a time, and after the vote on one I shall put the other.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 14(1) of Bill C-11 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out lines 32 to 35 page 21 thereof and substituting the following:

"the end of paragraph (ee) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraphs:"; and

(b) by striking out line 7 on page 22 thereof and substituting the following:

"365; and

Policy loans repayments

(hh) an amount in respect of all or any part of any policy loan repaid by the taxpayer in the year not exceeding the amount, if any, by which

exceeds

(ii) the part of any loan on that policy repaid by the taxpayer that was deductible under this paragraph in computing his income for a previous taxation year."

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, in my earlier questions I am afraid I may have confused the minister about the interest on policy loans because we got on to the definition of whether an advance was a loan. I think we dealt with that adequately, however. My question intended to address the problem of deductibility of interest. I refer to Section 20(1)(c) of the act which says that an amount can be deducted pursuant to a legal obligation to pay interest, and it mentions borrowed money, accounts payable and so on. Surely there is a legal obligation to pay interest on a loan or advance from an insurance company because they do make a demand for that, whether they demand the actual principal amount, before the death occurs.

Who decided that this interest which was legitimately laid out to earn income, which is a basic tenet of the Income Tax Act, should be changed and not be deductible?

● (1712)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is asking me about something which is no longer part of the legislation. I do not see why the committee should spend its time on something which is no longer in the legislation. I would not mind giving an explanation, but as it has been changed I would now rather discuss what we are doing than what we were doing before. I cannot give all the reasons why things were done during a time when I was not even there. I have looked at the problem again. I have changed it and now I want to discuss what is before the committee rather than what is no longer in the legislation, and therefore not part of the debate.

Now we will be permitting persons who borrow money on policies to deduct from their business income the payment they would be making, that is, the interest. It is not specifically interest and I do not want to get into the reasons why technically we have to use different language. We are re-establishing the situation as it was before, and the hon. member should be satisfied with that without forcing me to get into the same old debates I have carried on with my officials and other people.

Mr. Clarke: May I ask the minister if he could give the committee his assurance that it is not the intention to change the basic principles embodied in the Income Tax Act, that is, legitimate expenses for commercial purposes? Will they continue to be deductible?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not intend to change it.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: I will now put the amendment to subclause 14(2), as moved by Mr. Chrétien. Shall the amendment to subclause 14(2) carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if we could stand clause 14 and perhaps deal with the other insurance subclauses, as we did with the insulation grant amendments? I think it is much easier for those who wish to join in the debate to deal with it all in a package rather than jumping back and forth into the same type of debate on subsequent clauses. I suggest we stand 14 for the time being and jump ahead so that we can deal with the amendments with respect to each of the clauses as we come to them.

Mr. Chrétien: I think that is an excellent suggestion. We have a another series of consequential amendments related to this problem. One is related to subclause 52, and others on subclause 74 which I will table. Then we can clear up these amendments in one shot.

The Chairman: I have no objection to this as long as we follow the same procedures as yesterday where, by unanimous consent, we suspended consideration of the clause before the committee. By unanimous consent we could go from one clause to another—move the amendment to the clause, adopt it and then, again by consent, go on to another clause and final clauses, and then return to clause 14. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Does the committee give consent to stand clause 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 52.

The Chairman: The committee will then proceed to the consideration of clause 52 on which there is an amendment moved by the Minister of Finance, which reads as follows:

That subclause 52(4) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out lines 18 to 20 on page 100 thereof and substituting the following:

"(b) the amount, if any, by which

(i) the amount included by virtue of subsection 148(1) in computing the income of the taxpayer for the year in respect of the disposition of an interest in a life insurance policy

exceeds

(ii) the portion thereof arising from a disposition described in subparagraph 148(9)(c)(ii) in respect of that policy."

The Chairman: Shall the amendment to subclause 52(4) carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, before we deal with the amendment, I thought that perhaps the minister could give us a brief description of how he understands it integrates with the previous two amendments.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is consequential upon the amendment to subclause 14(1) dealing with life insurance policy loans. The excess of a loan over the cost base of the policy is included in the policyholder's income at the time the loan is received. This amendment deals with loan repayment. Under the existing bill repayment of the loan is added to the cost base of the policy. The amendment to subclause 14 permits a deduction on the repayment of the loans which have previously been included in income. Because the policy loans may be deducted when repaid, it is no longer appropriate to allow the loans to qualify for the $1,000 investment income deduction provided in subsection 110.1 of the Income Tax Act. This amendment denies the $1,000 deduction for income raising on policy loans and is required to prevent abuse.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) carried.

Clause 52 stood.

The Chairman: By unanimous consent the committee will now move to the consideration of subclause 74(4) on which there is an amendment by Mr. Chrétien.

On clause 74.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 74(4) of Bill C-11 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out line 44 on page 161 thereof and substituting the following:

"year, subsection (1), section 16 or para-"

(b) by striking out line 3 on page 162 thereof and substituting the following:

"of interest thereon or any repayment of a loan that was deductible pursuant to paragraph 20(1)(hh), and"

(c) by striking out lines 9 to 12 on page 162 thereof and substituting the following:

"as it would have read on that date if subsection (8) had not been applicable) of his interest in the policy on that date"

Mr. Stevens: I was wondering if we could have an explanation of each of these amendments as they come up.

Mr. Chrétien: Several technical changes are proposed to clause 74. Section 148 deals with insurance policies. The first change is in subclause 74(4). The amendments to subparagraph 149(a)(iii) adds a reference to Section 16. This section requires an amount to be included in the taxpayers' income where in the past he cashed in a part of a life annuity. To avoid double taxation the amount to be added to income should increase the adjusted cost basis of the policy. This amendment provides for that result. Do you want me to read them all?

Mr. Stevens: No. Read them each time we deal with an amendment.

Mr. Chrétien: Subparagraph 148(9)(a)(iv) is consequential on the amendment to subclause 14(1) previously announced. This amendment avoids double-counting. It ensures that where a deduction has been made on the repayment of a policy loan, the deductible amount does not also increase the cost basis of the policy.

The amendment to subparagraph (v) is strictly technical. It merely clarifies that the time referred to in the parenthesis is the first anniversary date after March 31, 1977, and not the particular time at which the "adjustment cost basis" calculation is made.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment to subclause 74(4) carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: I will put to the committee another amendment moved by Mr. Chrétien. It is the amendment to subclause 74(6) of Bill C-11.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, the explanation is a very short one. Subclause 74(5)—

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order. I thought the Chair said we were on subclause 74(6). I think we should be on subclause 74(5). The minister is responding to subclause 74(5).

The Chairman: We are on clause 74 in which you find various subclauses, and the first amendment I just put to the committee was an amendment on subclause 74(5) which was carried.

Mr. Stevens: No, that was 74(4).

• (1722)

The Chairman: The next one I have is on 74(6). I do not have an amendment on 74(5).

Mr. Chrétien: While the amendment is being tabled, Mr. Chairman, I will read the explanation. This is a minor technical amendment to the definition of a disposition of a life insurance policy. It is nescessary to treat all policy loans the same.

The Chairman: I have the feeling that I mentioned the amendment to subclause 74(6). I want to make sure that the amendment to subclause 74(5) has been put and carried.

Mr. Stevens: Not yet.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 74(5) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out lines 37 to 40 on page 162 thereof and substituting the following:

"(ii) a policy loan made after March 31, 1978,"

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 74(6) of Bill C-11 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out line 28 on page 163 thereof and substituting the following:

"respect of a policy loan other than interest deductible in the 1978 or any subsequent taxation year pursuant to paragraphs 20(1) (c) or (d);"; and

(b) by striking out lines 8 to 12 on page 164 thereof and substituting the following:

"(ii) in respect of a policy loan made after March 31, 1978, means the amount of the policy loan;"

He said: The amendment to paragraph 148(9) (e.2) of the Income Tax Act is related to the addition of paragraph 20(1)(hh) of that act. Paragraph 20(1)(hh) restored the deduction for interest paid on policy loans, the proceeds of which are used to earn income. If the interest is deductible in computing income it will not be treated as premium, and will not be added to the adjusted cost basis of the policy. Conversely if the interest is not deductible it will be treated as a further premium and added to the adjusted cost basis of the policy.

The amendment to paragraph 148(9)(e.2) is a minor technical amendment to the definition of proceeds of disposition of an insurance policy. It is necessary to treat all policy loans the same.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 74(7) of Bill C-11 be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out lines 15 to 24 on page 164 and substituting the following:

"subsection:

"(10) For the purposes of this section,"; and

(b) by striking out line 34 on page 164 thereof and substituting the following:

"a reference to an annuitant under such a life".

He said: The first amendment to subclause 74(7) deletes subsection 148(10) of the Income Tax Act. This subsection is no longer necessary because of the decision to allow a deduction for interest on policy loans used to earn income.

The second amendment to this subclause is a relieving technical amendment. It affects life annuity contracts. The amendment will ensure that where a life annuity contract is terminated by death, no tax will arise on any death benefit paid under the policy. This change is necessary to fulfil completely our commitment to remove the tax on death.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclause 74(8) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 36 on page 164 thereof and substituting the following:

"(8) Subsections (1) and (2) are appli-"

He said: Amendments are also required to subclauses 74(8), (10), (11) and (12) of this bill.

The amendments to subclauses (8) and (10) affect the date on which the new rules in section 148 take effect. The new rules for determining the adjusted cost basis of a life insurance policy are to be effective as of March 31, 1978, as proposed in budget resolution 71 rather than for the 1978 taxation year. Several technical anomalies would result if this change in the effective date were not made.

The changes affecting subclauses (11) and (12) and the reference to subclause (7) in subclause (10) are consequential upon deleting subsection 148(10) of the Income Tax Act.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: The last amendment to be put to the committee is on subclauses 74(10), (11) and (12).

Mr. Chrétien moved:

That subclauses 74(10, (11) and (12) of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out lines 1 to 9 on page 165 thereof and substituting the following:

"(10) Subsections (4), (5), (6) and (7) are applicable after March 31, 1978.

(11) With respect to the 1972 to 1977"

The Chairman: The explanation has been given by the minister. Unless the minister wants to add something, I will ask whether this amendment carries.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Chrétien) agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 74 stand and shall the committee revert to the consideration of clause 14?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I take it it is agreed that these amendments will appear in Hansard as if you had read them in full each time.

Mr. Chrétien: Agreed.

The Chairman: Definitely they will. Does the committee give consent to stand clause 74 and accept the fact that 52 has been stood, I do not know if I mentioned that at the time, and revert to the consideration of clause 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 74 stood.

On clause 14.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, my advisers from the city of Toronto have an interest in this.

Mr. Stevens: Who is that who is advising?

Mr. Peters: Osgoode Hall.

Mr. Stevens: Who is the author?

Mr. Peters: How do I know? It is a whole class. They all took sections and forwarded it to me.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Mr. Stevens: Who forwarded it to you?

Mr. Peters: The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

Mr. Stevens: Whom did he consult with?

Mr. Peters: You are too curious.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, it seems evident that every party on the other side has spies.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Peters: As for the political direction, I am not sure. For at least an hour and a half I have listened to a discussion on clause 14 with regard to the problems of insurance. I do not think anyone in his right mind could decide on the political stripe of the various participants in that discussion. Therefore I am not sure there is too much politics in this very large income tax bill.

I am referring to the problem in clause 14(1)(gg). At present, taxable business income includes holding gains in inventory which are merely a result of inflation. As the system is now, taxation is based on accounting measurements that largely ignore the effects of inflation and do not, for example, take into account the increased cost of replacing inventories in an inflationary period. Canadian tax laws require companies to calculate, using the FIFO—first in, first out—system of accounting, profits using costs of oldest, and during inflation, cheapest inventory. Increasing amounts of funds are required to maintain inventory levels, and although these funds are not available to business, they are being taxed as profits under FIFO.

The government expects this measure to provide a tax relief of $300 million a year and correspondingly increase the flow of internally generated funds available for business expansion. This goal is in response to the perceived need for liquidity relief and the problems of the high cost of financing the replacement of depreciable assets and inventories.

Specifically, this special inventory allowance is seen by the government as a simple and direct mechanism to provide business with relief from the taxation of illusory inventory profits arising from the impact of inflation on inventory values. This goes on to point out some of the effects that this will have.

● (1732)

I am curious from a personal point of view to know what has happened to this $300 million. Although this bill has not been passed, anything which goes into the budgetary hopper, so to speak, becomes law. I am curious to know how much this $300 million has been responsible for lay-offs at INCO and Falconbridge and may be responsible for the blowing up of power stations at INCO in the city of Sudbury.

This student points out that inventories may be purposefully inflated at year end in order to achieve excessive, unreprensentative deductions. It seems to me this may have been one of the reasons for so much overtime. Obviously there has been the accumulation of a very large inventory and this may result in another large lay-off. This gentleman goes on to say this:

> The government has introduced the inventory deduction to indicate recognition that the liquidity problem facing business is urgent and requires an immediate response. (a) The lack of constraint on purposely-inflated inventory levels at year end will lead to excessive deductions. This danger is diminished by the high carrying costs of inventories to businesses which would tend to offset any benefit derived from the deduction. In any event, firms would be hesitant to choose a year end which is at high inventory levels as this usually denotes the "busy" season, one in which firms would be unwilling to stop and count inventory.

This is not necessarily true of INCO in Sudbury. Their inventory is in the form of ingots or concentrates which would not be difficult to maintain at very high levels for the purpose of year end accounting. The accountants at INCO are very competent in income tax matters. Their experts are a hell of a lot better than the government's. It would be very interesting to find out how much income tax they pay and how much profit they appear to accumulate. I would be curious to know whether the minister or his parliamentary secretary could tell me how much INCO has been able to save as a result of this particular change.

This student goes on to say:

> While this resolution is expected to provide an additional $300 million to business, there are no guarantees that it will be used for business expansion, although this may well be felt to be irrelevant.

This is really our objection to the whole bill. A concession of $300 million is no small indication that companies are being given an advantage. Today the "minister of unemployment" stood in the House and said that he was going to make a supreme sacrifice on behalf of the country to help the unemployed; he was going to give the unemployed a new program costing $100 million. Under this bill the minister is giving away $300 million. At a time when one out of every ten workers in Canada is unemployed the government gives the unemployed a concession of $100 million. Yet corporations and business in this country receive $300 million to do something which this young expert feels is probably irrelevant.

He continues in this way:

> In addition, there is some doubt whether there is, in fact, a liquidity problem facing Canadian businessmen, rather than excess capacity and no desire for expansion.

This student must have been reading some NDP speeches. In fact, he puts it probably better than we have put it. He goes on to express doubt whether this $300 million would ever be used for expansion purposes, or whether there is even any desire to expand. We are pretty sure, and so is every sane businessman, that when plants are operating at only 80 per cent a business would be very foolish to expand capacity to 120 per cent, having 40 per cent of the plant's capacity unproductive instead of 20 per cent. This does not seem to me to make much sense.

The last point he makes, presumably for the benefit of the minister and the civil servants advising him, is as follows:

> It is likely fair to say that the most important implication in this budget resolution is that it is a step towards accepting inflation accounting for tax purposes. The budget document implies that this is only an interim measure until an accounting system is found that fully recognizes the impact of inflation. However, due to the difficulties in finding a system satisfactory to all, this "temporary" measure is likely to be in effect for an extended period.

I should like to ask the minister one or two questions of concern to me which have been touched on by these experts in training at Osgoode Hall, who frankly, I think, have done a very good job. If they are able to make some sense out of the bill and all its amendments, then they are a lot more qualified than all the members of parliament put together. Certainly I have not heard too much which has impressed me either from the officials or from members of parliament.

My first question is this: do the minister and his officials disagree with the contention of this budding young citizen who says there is no guarantee that the $300 million to be provided to businesses is going to be used for expansion purposes, even though this may be irrelevant since we already have over capacity in the business world?

Secondly, what is the calculation of the department of the amount of money that INCO, and probably Falconbridge as well, will receive from maintaining an unreasonably high inventory, and what will be the effect of the inflationary factor for inventory purposes when that inventory may be worth less today than when it was accumulated and may be worth even less a year from now?

Lastly, has the minister taken into consideration the decrease which may be involved in the establishment of this inventory allowance? If there are serious downturns in the business community and we have this inventory allowance, will consideration be made for a decrease in the inventory?

● (1742)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to determine the impact of this measure. I think the hon. member is in fact dealing with two different problems. When he talks about inventory allowance I should point out this is not really intended for the creation of more jobs, in a sense, but to help a corporation carry its inventory because of the inflation aspect. For the benefit of the member I could give him a more precise explanation.

The effect of inflation is to produce a very serious cash flow problem for business. Businessmen must replace existing inventories with ever higher priced goods. This measure responds to this cash squeeze. It makes it easier for companies to operate in Canada in the face of inflation.

The 3 per cent inventory allowance makes it easier for companies to carry inventories. The ability to finance inventories is directly related to jobs. The relevant question, which is obviously a matter of opinion, is how many jobs would have been lost if we did not have these measures? We think the answer is probably a very great many.

The inventory allowance is particularly necessary to maintain our competitive position while our inflation rate is above that of the United States and some other countries. I, too, wish we did not have to make concessions of this kind, but it is a simple fact of life that if we do not compensate to some extent for the effects of inflation we are going to lose more jobs. I see this measure as extremely necessary and urgent in these circumstances and worthy of support from the entire House.

Let me now move to the hon. member's reference to INCO. INCO has been able this year to do something it has not done in the past. The problem arose because there has been a decrease in the market for nickel in the last two years. As a result, the company started to stockpile. This 3 per cent inventory allowance will help the company carry the cost of stockpiling. The company has never financed such a stockpile before. It has the equivalent of seven months' supply of nickel at this moment, and this allowance will permit the company to carry the cost of that stockpile even longer. This is probably one of the factors that allowed the company to postpone its decision to lay off some of the miners, and it has allowed them to carry the large inventory.

In fact, one of the propositions put forward by the hon. member for Nickel Belt was that the company should do even more stockpiling than it is at the present time. We discussed this with the company but felt it was not advisable at this time because, if the company were to stockpile even more, this would depress the market even more, and the prices the company would get from whatever sales it had would be lower and would diminish profits, eventually making life even more complicated for the company than it is right now. This 3 per cent inventory allowance has been of help to other companies, but especially INCO.

The hon. member has talked about tax credits. Of course if the companies do not invest for the creation of new jobs they will not have the tax credit. If a company does not have a tax credit it cannot be calculated as an advantage. It is a credit for people to invest in such a way as to create jobs. If they are not investing in Canada they will not be using the credit. Often the leader of the NDP refers to this tax bill as a rip-off for the corporations while some of the same corporations are ripping-off the people. That is not true. If a company is not investing in a way to create new jobs it does not have the advantage of the propositions we have before the House at the moment.

Mr. Peters: I thank the minister for his explanation, but I think he is confused about what we have asked in terms of the inventory at INCO. What we have suggested is that the government could hold an inventory of nickel, as it did in respect of uranium. In this way it would not provide the company with finances for inventory. Let us not fool ourselves, INCO is not a poor company. It is the major nickel producer in the world and controls the price of nickel. It does not control the market and that is why the difficulty arises. The consumption of nickel is not as high as it has been.

I am sure the 3 per cent inventory allowance to offset the affect of inflation has resulted in INCO and Falconbridge working overtime for the last eight or nine months in order that it could end the year with an inventory as large as possible, getting as much in the way of an allowance as possible.

When we talk about maintaining an inventory we are talking about the government stockpiling and maintaining control of that stockpile. The government might find itself, as it did in respect of agricultural products, in competition with other segments of the economy. In this way the government might find itself in competition with INCO, and I am not sure that would be such a bad thing.

As the young gentleman indicated, what the government is now putting into the law will stay in the law until another budget or financial bill is brought forward making the change. The government has not written into the bill any method of decreasing the inventory allowance when circumstances change. It has not spelled out why the inventory should be allowed to increase. In addition, as I understand it, the government has not written into the bill a year end basis for the taking of inventory. I suppose this will vary because of different fiscal year bases for different companies and other calendar year arrangements.

I am sure the minister will wish to consider the difference between the type of inventory or stockpiling by INCO and the inventories of other manufacturing sectors. Replacement costs represent a major factor, but INCO does not have such a replacement cost. It probably will not cost any more to produce nickel until the current contract runs out. It will not cost more to produce nickel this year than it did last year because the company has control. All it needs to do, as it has always done, is high grade. You always maintain the price of your product by the grade of ore you use. If you want to produce a cheaper product you use a higher grade, and if you want to produce at a more costly rate you use a lower grade. In this way the company has control. Is the minister giving consideration to other companies that experience a replacement factor in respect of inventory? Replacement will be a factor in—

The Chairman: Order, please. I interrupt the hon. member as his time has expired. He posed a question to the minister and the minister answered, and the allotted 20 minutes are ended. I will now have to go to another member, and perhaps return to this hon. member afterward.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, when I mentioned clause 14 of Bill C-11 yesterday, as reported at page 1626 of Hansard, respecting a loan taken out by an insured against his policy I gave the example of a $3,000 loan. In view of the answer of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) I believe he gave clarifications today when he answered other questions.

But if my loan is $3,000 and I have paid $3,200 in premiums so far, in the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I do not have any amount to add to my income for the current year. Is this right or not?

Mr. Chrétien: Offhand, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont) is right.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, I think this is right because based on my questions and the answer this can be correctly interpreted as such although in the discussion yesterday I believe the Minister of Finance gave clarifications in that respect. That is why I wanted to put the question directly to the Minister of Finance to correct the impression that might have been left by him or myself—myself in my questions and him in his answer.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, if the premiums paid by the insured exceed the amount of the loan, then no part of the loan can be considered as income. If, for example, it is less, it may be that part of the loan could be considered as income but in the case of small policies, as was explained this afternoon, 99 per cent are not covered. This is mainly to cover the case of single premium policies.

As I explained this afternoon, if someone had purchased a $100,000 insurance policy against payment of a single premium twelve years ago, his insurance policy would be worth $200,000 today, and he could borrow $200,000, so that there is an increase of $100,000 on which he would have paid no tax, and the only thing he would have to do to keep his insurance in force is to pay the interest. This could become a sort of loophole which he could use to circumvent the income tax legislation and we know people have used it as such in the past. That is what we want to prevent.

However, in the cases of most normal policies, people can rarely borrow less than the total value of their premiums.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, while trying to catch 1 per cent of the people who borrow money on their insurance policies, is not the government overburdening the administration of insurance companies?

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, in response to the hon. member for Timiskaming I understood the Minister of Finance to say that the 3 per cent allowance which a company might receive on its inventory at the beginning of the year is something it would not be entitled to unless the money was invested. I am quite sure that is what the minister indicated. I know it is wrong, but I think the record should be corrected.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I indicated that or not. If I did, it was inadvertently. The allowance relates to inventory and not investment.

Mr. Stevens: The minister was using INCO as an example at that time. He said INCO could not invest money in other countries because it would not be entitled to this type of allowance.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I was referring to the investment tax credit at that time, and not only the inventory allowance. I was trying to deal with the totality of the arguments by the New Democratic Party on that issue. I was attempting to segregate that from capital cost allowance. Members of the NDP party claim that it is a rip-off and there is no benefit from it.

Mr. Stevens: When the previous minister of finance brought in the 3 per cent allowance with respect to inventory, he indicated that he was awaiting an acceptable inflation accounting system. Can the minister bring us up to date? I think most chartered accountants are familiar with this. They feel it is a lame duck, stop gap affair. What progress has the department made in getting an acceptable inflation accounting system with which businesses can live?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that this is a very difficult technical problem. Work is ongoing in the department with respect to this, particularly with the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. The department is endeavouring to develop a proper mechanism to alleviate the problems created by inflation in terms of holding inventory. I hope the department, in association with the institute, can arrive at a solution in order for us to move on it.

Mr. Stevens: When this scheme was first announced, the estimated cost to the Treasury Board was approximately $300 million. Is that still the situation eight months after the estimate?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I am informed that we have no reason to change that estimate.

Mr. Stevens: As I understand it, this is a 3 per cent allowance regardless of the circumstances. A man may have $1 million worth of inventory on hand. For some reason he starts every year with $1 million worth of inventory. He receives a $30,000 deduction from his income per year. At the end of ten years he would have received the benefit of $300,000 because of that $1 million worth of inventory. Is my observation correct? Why is there no recapture provision if that person finally sells his inventory and receives $1 million? As I understand the present provision, it would be a complete windfall to the company under the circumstances I have just described.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I do not see any benefit to that person holding the same $1 million worth of inventory year after year, because inflation continues. He would receive a $30,000 deduction per annum for that $1 million worth of inventory. Therefore I do not consider that to be a loophole or a bonanza. I should like to advise the hon. member that I will check into that to see if there is any validity to his argument.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.02 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONDEMNATION OF SOVIET UNION FOR IMPRISONMENT OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion concerns the case of Anatoly Shcharansky, a citizen of the Soviet Union who has been held in a prison without trial in that country for almost nine months, because authorities allege that he was an agent for the United States Central Intelligence Agency. In view of the Prime Minister's refusal to take a strong stand in denouncing the government of the Soviet Union, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That this House strongly condemns the government of the Soviet Union for violating the provisions of the Helsinki Accord in its imprisonment of Anatoly Shcharansky. This House further condemns the Prime Minister and his government for failing to show more concern for the rights of individuals in countries like the Soviet Union.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION NOT TO INCREASE BASIC DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because the matter is urgent I ask leave, under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), to move:

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to take back to cabinet the question of restoring the basic rate of the war disability pension to the level of the take home pay of the five categories of federal public servants so designated in 1973, it being the view of this House that good faith calls for such restoration to take place without further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED EMBEZZLEMENT OF FUNDS AT OTTAWA NORTH BASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It concerns the fact that Department of National Defence auditors are presently engaged in a top secret and classified investigation of alleged embezzlement of public funds of Canadian Forces Base Ottawa North, formerly Rockcliffe, such information having come into my possession and subsequently confirmed to me today by the base commander and the office of the Minister of National Defence. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the House be advised of full details of what has transpired, specifically including whether or not reports are correct that upwards of a quarter of a million dollars has already been found to be involved, and finally, that the House be assured that where necessary charges will be laid in a civilian court, rather than the matter being in any way hushed up by courts martial under military jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires, for the presentation of such a motion for discussion, unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

THE MINISTRY

COMMENT ON POSITION TAKEN BY INDUSTRY MINISTER ON USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce moved a motion under Standing Order 43, as reported in Hansard at page

1357 in 1976, that the whole matter "nannygate" be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for study so that the Minister of Transport's continued abuse of the public trust could be examined; and in view of the recent change of attitude of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with reference to abuses of the public trust, induced by his change of position, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House regrets the attempt by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, before he discovered the secret of upward mobility into the cabinet, of attempting to ride into office on the back of a nanny.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSAL GOVERNMENT CONSULT FEDERATION OF FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC BEFORE ADOPTING POLICY ON MINORITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter.

The Secretary of State announced on October 27 that he would soon introduce a policy concerning minorities of both official languages. In a letter dated November 22, the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec stated that the government has not consulted them in the process of developing that governmental policy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the House ask the government to consult the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec and other groups involved before setting their policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUGGESTION RESEARCH BE CONDUCTED TO ACHIEVE GREATEST USE OF POWDERED MILK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an issue of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that powdered milk surpluses are likely to have on the dairy policy an influence that would cause prejudice to dairy producers, and considering that many industrial milk producers will not have a production quota until April 1, 1978, a fact that will place them in a difficult financial situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

[Mr. Crosbie.]

That the House urge the Minister of Agriculture to initiate research with a view to promoting greater use of powdered milk in the making of feed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can only be debated with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

TRADE

PROPOSAL THAT COMMITTEE HEAR REPRESENTATIONS ON TARIFFS FROM PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the representations made by agricultural organizations and the associated food processors asking for changes in the recommendations of the Tariff Board as they relate to fresh and processed food, and in view of the strong representations made by other business organizations in Canada asking for a realistic trade policy which would allow Canadian product producers to have a reasonable sales opportunity in Canadian markets, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That a reference be made to a committee of the House to hear representations from all facets of Canadian economy to explain their needs to the Canadian GATT negotiations and members of this House.

SUGGESTED STOCKPILING OF NICKEL TO PROTECT JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Falconbridge Nickel has today announced the lay-off of a further 750 people or 20 per cent of its work force in the Sudbury basin, and in view of the fact that this brings the number of lay-off notices in the Sudbury basin over the last few months to over 4,000, and in view of the fact that this government in the past has dealt with such crises in other industries, such as the uranium industry, by initiating stockpiles to protect the jobs of the workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instruct the government to immediately commence a program of stockpiling nickel to the extent which is necessary to protect the jobs of the employees of INCO and Falconbridge Nickel in the Sudbury Basin.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RECOMMENDED REVISION OF POLICY TO ASSIST MINORITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Francophone minorities outside Quebec are in a precarious situation, that they are progressively and irremediably assimilated in spite of federal financial assistance, that they might be less in need of money than of rights and privileges, and also that considerable amounts are being spent in Quebec to protect its Anglophone minority whose linguistic and cultural existence is not jeopardized at all, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the Federal government streamline its policy of financial assistance to the minorities of Canada in order to render it more equitable and effective.

RESOURCES

NICKEL MINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS—SUGGESTED CONFERENCE WITH NORWAY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, in view of the deplorable fact that over 20 of the cabinet ministers are absent today, some of whom at least should realize, even if the Prime Minister does not, that out of town cabinet meetings should not be held while this House is in session—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where is Joe?

Mr. Lawrence: He is not attending an out of town cabinet meeting, I can tell you that. My question therefore is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the announcement this morning by Falconbridge Nickel Mines and of the fact that not long ago the minister had a conference with the chief executive officer of the corporation and that he has had a report in his possession dated at least a year ago prophesying exactly what would happen to the nickel industry, and because these matters were not unanticipated,—as a matter of fact, fairly well known—what specific steps is the government taking to alleviate the situation in the Canadian nickel industry, and what is the government going to do about the unemployed workers in the Sudbury basin?

● (1417)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the hon. member that when the cabinet goes out of town it uses its time very effectively.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: It deals with the nation's business. We do not spend our time raising money for our party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Even Allan smiles at that one.

Mr. Gillespie: Where is your leader today? I do not think the preamble to the hon. member's question was particularly helpful, but he did ask an important question, and I would like to deal with it, if his colleagues would just quiet down a little bit.

If the hon. member has informed himself about this situation, he must know that the nickel industry in Canada, and to some extent the rest of the mining industry in Canada, is facing a very difficult time right now because of a softening in our major markets. This is not a situation the companies have created. It is a situation which the government is trying to ameliorate in any way it can. There are a number of different programs which are aimed at ameliorating this painful situation. You know, Mr. Speaker, about this perhaps better than most of us because of your own particular interest in the area, but there have been a number of meetings with representatives of the company, the union and the community involved.

I think all hon. members recognize that this situation has not been created by the companies or as a result of any government policies. It was created as a result of a weakening of markets. We are trying through various measures, through the Unemployment Insurance Commission—and the Minister of Employment and Immigration can deal with questions on this—and through discussions with the industry and with the provincial government, to find some way of easing the situation. At the present time I am not in a position to indicate that we have any solution.

However, we have advised a number of Crown corporations that there are likely to be people looking for work in Sudbury. Syncrude, for example, has sent recruiting teams to Sudbury, and so has the Crown corporation, Eldorado. They have been actively looking for people who are looking for work and who have the trades these corporations are looking for.

Mr. Lawrence: Regardless of the admission that the minister and the rump cabinet which is left over here today have no solutions whatsoever and regardless of the minister's advocacy that perhaps this is more a provincial matter than a federal matter, has the minister taken any specific steps? The Falconbridge decision affects not only the economy of Sudbury and Canada but also the economy of Norway and the whole European market for Canadian nickel. This is something with which only this government can deal. Have any of the ministers who are left here today had any conferences, for instance, with any of the western European governments about the weakening position of the Canadian nickel industry and about products in Europe? Have there been any discussions with the Norwegian government about this matter? It affects Norway as well.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have not had a discussion with the Norwegian government, but I have had discussions with the responsible minister of the Ontario government, the government which I think is most intimately concerned with this question.

Mr. Lawrence: I am emphasizing that you should be concerned.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member seems to question whether the province of Ontario has any jurisdiction in this area. I point out to him that the provinces own the resources of this country.

● (1422)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why did you intervene in the Supreme Court?

Mr. Gillespie: Hon. members opposite seem to find it to their benefit now to suggest that the federal government owns the resources of this country.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

An hon. Member: No we don't.

Mr. Gillespie: I remind them that not only do the provinces own the resources and set royalty rates, but the provinces also set the pollution control standards for the mining industry. It was against this kind of background that yesterday I contacted the mines minister for the province of Ontario to see if it is possible for him and his colleagues and I and my colleagues to meet in the very near future in order to prepare for a federal-provincial conference of mines ministers. I hope it will be possible to have a national conference of mines ministers in January. I have already sent out a telex to the ministers suggesting the date of January 20.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, what I am trying to emphasize to this particular minister and the other ministers present today is that this is not only a national problem, not provincial but is an international problem in which only this government, unfortunately, can act. Is anything being done in the international area on which this industry depends for markets? The government has been warned about difficulties on the international scene for over 12 months.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think it might be of interest to the hon. member and the House to know that I sent instructions to our ambassador in Jakarta, which is the host of a conference of copper producers taking place at the moment and suggested that they should take action—this is the CEPEC organization—to reduce production of copper. The copper industry could well face the same kind of situation that the nickel industry finds itself in today. I was pleased to read today that the majority of copper producers have taken the position of reducing production and to that extent their action should ease or stabilize copper production in this country.

LAY-OFFS AT FALCONBRIDGE MINE—CONSIDERATION BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister has referred to a national conference of provincial and federal mines ministers to be held sometime next year. Is the minister aware of the meeting of the national advisory committee of the mining industry tomorrow? If so, could he inform the House if he has taken any steps to have that committee consider what might be done to relieve the situation that has arisen in the mining industry with not only the loss of jobs at Falconbridge but the other loss of jobs? Does he intend to put any proposal to that committee tomorrow that might help the situation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meeting of the national advisory committee on the mineral industries tomorrow is to prepare for the kind of round I have discussed with various provinces leading up to a federal-provincial conference. The meeting tomorrow will be focused primarily on the mining industry as a whole, not just the nickel industry though quite clearly senior representatives of that industry will be present.

We will be dealing with the industry as a whole. I will be seeking the advice and suggestions of the industry on how best to deal with this very difficult situation.

MANPOWER

REASON FOR SUSPENSION OF PUBLICATION OF LAY-OFF STATISTICS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration who apparently is another minister not needed in Montreal today. Is the minister aware that the monthly report with respect to lay-offs reported by Canada Manpower Centres has been suspended as of this month? I ask this in view of the lay-off situation we are dealing with. If he is aware that this report has been suspended, could he indicate to the House why this time has been chosen to suspend this monthly report bearing in mind that it reflected 61,000 lay-offs so far this year up to the last report which was in October?

● (1427)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, let me say first of all that I was in Montreal and we received a series of excellent briefings from both management and labour, and other individuals. It was a very worthwhile operation. I thought it was appropriate that I return today. Some of the ministers are still there and participating in very serious government business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I don't know why the hon. member persists in the cheap kind of shot that he takes.

Mr. Alexander: Answer the question.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would invite the hon. member for York-Simcoe to do a little studying to check what has been done on behalf of the miners in that particular region, as well as the services we have made available. At the same time we recognize the primacy of the union. We do not want to usurp their particular role. We met with the union and management and they said they wanted to have some time to see if they could work it out themselves as part of collective bargaining or part of an agreement. They are endeavouring to work it out, and they do not want us to move in to undermine the role the union has to play. Once we have the green light in that particular region we are prepared to move in and do that which is necessary to help those who are laid off.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister of unemployment and immigration. The question relates to the report about which I asked the minister in my first supplementary. The report for November with respect to lay-offs in Canada has not been published. We understand it has not been published under the direction of a director within the minister's department. Would he indicate why that report is not being published, bearing in mind that it is extremely pertinent that the monthly lay-off situation in Canada be known not only to every member here, but to the Canadian public, so that we can judge the government's activities in trying to relieve this jobless situation in the nation. In other words, why is it not forthcoming? It looks pretty fishy.

RESOURCES

NICKEL MINES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS AND AID COMMUNITIES AFFECTED

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I was going to place my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but in light of his insensitive attitude to the unemployed workers in the Sudbury basin I will put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister and hope I receive a positive reply.

In view of today's announcement of 750 lay-offs by Falconbridge Nickel Mines—this brings to over 4,000, the recently announced lay-offs in the Sudbury basin, Thompson, Manitoba and Port Colborne—and in view of the fact that these lay-offs are precipitating an economic crisis within these communities as the thousands become jobless and find themselves with no alternative employment, contrary to the statements by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, will the Deputy Prime Minister now give this House a guarantee that he will come before it within one week with a specific economic strategy to deal with the present crisis within the nickel industry; the crisis faced by the communities that house these corporations, and the crisis of unemployment faced by thousands of workers within this sector?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a substantially similar question has already been addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In my view he expressed the government's attitude with a good deal of concern and sympathy toward the workers in Sudbury. Of course, it is not possible for me to give an undertaking to the hon. member along the lines he put forward in the latter part of his question.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that the unemployed workers in Sudbury cannot eat sympathy, and the fact that the government has moved in the past to protect industries and their employees when they are going through such a crisis—the most recent example of this was the stockpiling of uranium for seven years—and as well that economic forecasts, including those of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have predicted the probable recovery of nickel markets within one year, my question will be specific to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will he tell this House if he is prepared now, after today's announcement of still more disastrous lay-offs to finally take the necessary step of initiating a temporary stockpile of Canada's nickel?

Mr. MacEachen: That particular proposal has already been considered, and in view of the situation in the market and the very large supplies of metals available, it does not appear to be a workable or appropriate proposal to adopt in these particular circumstances.

● (1432)

Mr. Rodriguez: Remember what happened with uranium.

Mr. MacEachen: The uranium situation, I suggest to the hon. member, was quite different from the one that prevails at the present time.

NICKEL MINES—PROPOSAL TO IMPOSE IMPORT TARIFF ON NICKEL TO PROTECT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I shall be specific once again. In view of the fact that it is now known that a portion of the metal used by the Canadian Mint to make nickel is purchased from Sherritt Gordon and that this nickel is refined by Sherritt Gordon from nickel purchased from overseas, and in view of the fact that there is at least a seven month stockpile of Canadian nickel available for such usage and that refusal to use this nickel is costing jobs in Canada, will the Deputy Prime Minister state, either yes or no, if he is now prepared to act by initiating a temporary import tariff on unrefined nickel into this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand exactly the way the hon. member brings together in his mind the two aspects of his question, but I will be happy to give more thought to this complex question and see whether his representations deserve further action.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

INQUIRY WHETHER UNITS WILL BE TRANSFERRED TO ABITIBI-TÉMISCAMINGUE REGION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and it relates to the decentralization policy in the federal public service. Could the minister tell the House whether he considers moving administrative units in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue region and what are his projects for this region?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Finance has announced all the planned decentralization moves presently being considered by the government. No further moves are being considered at this time.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

REASON FOR FAILURE TO LOCATE OFFICE IN ABITIBI-TÉMISCAMINGUE REGION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary to the Secretary of State. Considering that the National Film Board has established regional offices everywhere except in Abitibi-Témiscamingue, could the Secretary of State tell the House why this region has been forgotten and whether he intends to establish one of these offices in this region as he did in the rest of Quebec?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I intend to meet the representatives of the National Film Board tomorrow and I shall draw the Chairman's attention to the hon. member's representations.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO DEAL WITH HIGH LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN CERTAIN AREAS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, now that we know who the government's "second string" is, I should like to direct a question to a distinguished member of that second string, the minister of unemployment and immigration. To use his words, Mr. Speaker, now that the people of northern Ontario in the Sudbury basin have received another kick in the guts, since we can now identify serious critically high pockets of high unemployment, specifically in the Sudbury basin and in the five eastern provinces where 50 per cent of the one million unemployed Canadians reside, what initiatives is the minister taking, given the responsibility he has, to address himself to these specific and identifiable pockets of unemployment?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at the end of the question period I will rise on a point of order to indicate why I did not respond to the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Nor do I intend to respond to the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of some of the one million Canadians who are unemployed and apparently living too high off the hog, I should like to ask the minister of immigration whether he is prepared to tell the House, given the responsibility he has in regard to manpower and unemployment, that he is going to take special initiatives to co-ordinate activities within the government with respect to addressing himself to identifiable pockets of critically high unemployment, such as the Sudbury basin, the five eastern provinces, St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, Thompson, Manitoba and Stephenville, Newfoundland? We know where the critically high unemployment is; what is the minister doing about it?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Employment and Immigration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: —let me just say that the initiatives recommended by the hon. member are not to be taken; they have in fact been taken. There is an interdepartmental committee established to study these specific problems and that committee has come up with some excellent representations. To give just one example, Mr. Speaker, under phase 2 of Canada Works 116,000 people were working in jobs who would not have been working without that particular effort. That is only one of a series of steps this government has taken to help the unemployed.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PRIME MINISTER WILL MAKE STATEMENT IN HOUSE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will address to the Deputy Prime Minister since we can get nothing but empty rhetoric from the minister of unemployment. Given the fact that the only response we have had from the government is Canada Works, and since barely 10 per cent of the unemployed in the province of Newfoundland, for example, are able to enjoy the benefits of phase 2 of the Canada Works program, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure the House that the statement promised by the Prime Minister for tomorrow on new employment strategies will be made in the House, that there will be an opportunity for members to respond on motions and that the members of the House will be given adequate opportunity to examine the Prime Minister's statement before it is made in the House?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any promise made by the Prime Minister that a statement would be made in the House tomorrow. I noticed in a headline today that a statement from the Prime Minister had been expected but that was the first I had heard about it. I asked the Prime Minister this morning in Montreal, and it is not his intention and had never been his intention to make a statement in the House tomorrow.

POST OFFICE

WALKOUTS IN TORONTO—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESTORE SERVICE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that postal walkouts in Toronto are increasing to the point where only 200 out of 800 employees showed up for work this morning in one location alone, would the minister report on these apparently illegal walkouts and advise the House what steps he is taking, (a) to return postal service in Toronto to at least the snail's pace to which we have become accustomed, and (b) to assure that this discontent does not spread to the national level?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the figures given by the hon. gentleman; I understand that sometimes communications can be difficult. In this instance, half of the regular employees are at work. Indeed, 900 of the work force of 1,400 are at work at the south central plant. In regard to the remainder of the force, we are now taking the necessary action through court injunctions to secure their return.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I want to advise the Postmaster General that the figures I quoted I received from the head of his department in the Toronto post office. By way of a supplementary question, may I ask the minister whether he could ascertain if the operations which have caused the slowdown were alleged violations of the current CUPW contract which stipulates that part-time workers are not to use automatic equipment, or is this just another meagre excuse by the union to slow down mail service prior to the Christmas rush? Which is it, and what is the minister going to do to rectify the problem?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. gentleman that the dispute with the union relating to the use of mechanized equipment has been resolved. It was agreed by both sides that there was no conduct which was contrary to the collective agreement.

• (1442)

Mr. Jelinek: If the minister is so confident, can he assure this House and Canadians generally that they do not need to worry about the Christmas mail being stopped any time this year—or next year, come to that?

Mr. Blais: I am pleased to advise the hon. gentleman that we are doing everything in our power to ensure delivery of Christmas mail both this year and in the future. Discussions with the unions are proceeding at the present time. We are prepared to secure legal sanctions should those negotiations fail.

AGRICULTURE

MEASURES TO HELP FLUID MILK PRODUCERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture who is surely aware of the difficulties now being experienced by a high percentage of manufacturing milk producers because they have reached the limit of their quotas. In view of those circumstances and in order to prevent a large number of those producers from going under between now and April, has the minister discussed the matter with the federation of Quebec producers? If so, what steps does the federal government intend to take? If not, does the minister still intend to discuss the matter in view of its importance and the insecurity of which those producers are the victims?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Milk Supply Management Committee met in Ottawa. Both the dairy groups from Quebec, one from the fluid milk producers and one from the industrial milk sector, with Mr. Mailloux and Mr. St-Martin. Again, this morning in Montreal I met with the representatives of the UPA who made representations about the problem they face in the distribution of their quota within their province. The Co-op Fédérée and the UPA presented a joint brief to the members of cabinet on the panel. We had a lengthy discussion with them. The ones we met today are the ones who distribute the quotas within the province. They admit they are having some problems and the Milk Supply Management Committee which was here yesterday has promised to come up with what they hope will be a solution to this problem within two weeks. They will report back to me at that time. The Minister of Agriculture does not, as many people think, exercise total control. The farm organizations and the marketing boards within the provinces have authority over the distribution of the quota to the farmers in the area. The committee hopes to come up with a plan to solve the problem within the next week or two and it will be submitted to the Canadian Dairy Commission at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. I find it very interesting to hear the minister speak of the meetings and discussions he has had. Because of the situation, the minister will understand that several dairy producers are extremely worried and ask us, as members of Parliament, what is going to happen to them. Can the minister at least assure the House that he is willing to co-operate in the study of any reasonable and acceptable proposal the producers' federation might make?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: I am sure even the hon. member will admit that the present Minister of Agriculture is probably one of the most reasonable that Canada has ever had.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I am willing to meet any reasonable suggestion the producers put forward. I think I have been more than generous and I do not believe anyone could say I have been conservative with the dairy farmers. They could say I have even been very liberal with them.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Whelan: The amount of money we have put into the program to make sure there was a healthy environment and a proper income for the work done is to be seen in the records. But they have some responsibility for administering the quotas. They have the responsibility of administering their share of the national quota which is provided for them. I know that approximately 90 per cent of dairy producers in Canada have no problem—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY PRIME MINISTER WILL MAKE STATEMENT ON JOB-CREATION PROGRAM

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In answer to a question by the hon. member for St. John's East the hon. gentleman said there had been no undertaking given by the Prime Minister that he would be making a statement in this House tomorrow, nor was there such an intention on his part. My question is this: Is the Prime Minister planning to make a statement at a press conference outside the House tomorrow with respect to a job creation program as is mooted in the press today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister): I cannot preclude the possibility of the Prime Minister meeting the press tomorrow, but that was not the question which was put to me by the hon. member for St. John's East. Nevertheless, I can say specifically, I think, that the Prime Minister will not be making a statement in the House or elsewhere tomorrow on the subject of a job creation program.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is the Prime Minister planning to make a statement outside the House tomorrow in respect of any program involving the Canadian economy? If the answer to that question is yes, would the Deputy Prime Minister instruct the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —that with television in this chamber, because members opposite insisted on it, the Prime Minister ought to make his statement here or else he will be judged accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL CODE

REASON FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTING GUN CONTROL PROVISIONS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Bearing in mind frequent incidents of hostage-taking and other acts of violence carried out by the use of guns, I should like to ask the minister what is preventing the implementation of the gun control laws which were passed last session?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have signed an order for the proclamation of many of the sections of the Act effective January 1, 1978. We are continuing to hold discussions with provincial attorneys general in connection with the acquisition certificate system. The provisions which will be coming into effect on January 1 relate to search and seizure, and the increased penalties in connection with the possession or use of guns in certain circumstances.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REASON FOR FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR CANADIAN SUPERIOR OIL TO DRILL IN DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is addresed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the government's stated policy of moving toward self-reliance in energy, can the minister explain how he reconciles such a goal with today's announcement that Canadian Superior Oil Limited, a subsidiary of the American company, Superior Oil, has been given $25 million in insurance support by the Export Development Corporation to cover exploration for oil in the Dominican Republic?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): This is a very interesting venture by the Export Development Corporation. For the first time it has supported in this way the oil industry engaged in a drilling venture in another country. For that service the corporation is, of course, being paid a premium. Besides that, Canada gets the right of first refusal on any oil found in surplus to the requirements of the Dominican Republic. So, we are looking to the future and providing a means of sourcing our future requirements.

Mr. Symes: I would have thought self-reliance would be better achieved by encouraging the Canadian industry to explore resources in this country more energetically. Might I call attention to a statement the minister made, according to today's issue of Ottawa Today, in which he expressed the view that, having regard to the projected scarcity of oil supplies it would be wise to have a guaranteed source of imports. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman this question: if this oil is assured to Canada why is it necessary to give Superior Oil a $25 million guarantee against the interruption of supply due to political interference? Surely, the loan is made on the assumption that there is a political risk involved and, this being the case, Canadians could end up with no oil and a loss of $25 million in public funds.

Mr. Horner: I am certainly glad the hon. member misunderstands the position to the extent he does, since he has given me the opportunity to explain it. First, we are encouraging oil exploration in Canada. All drilling rigs are very busy and hard to obtain. Superior decided it wanted to venture into the Dominican Republic, where it will drill its first exploration well. It has indicated that seismographic exploration would be in the neighbourhood of $4 million. If it does not find oil it will not cost the federal government one cent. If it finds oil but is not able to recover the money in hard currency from the Dominican Republic, then it will collect from its insurance funds. If the company finds oil and is able to bring hard currency out of the country then nobody loses. The insurance premium, though, is paid every year Superior Oil is in the Dominican Republic.

TRADE

POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES FOR EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether Canada had or presently has a delegation in the United States to negotiate the terms and conditions for additional gas exports from Canada?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject has been a matter of discussion between the two governments during most of last fall, but any application would have to go through the normal regulatory bodies.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a November 1 release indicated that the United States was willing to accept more gas in return for trade concessions, and that it depended upon the initiative of the Canadian government, why is it that the Canadian government has not taken that initiative to have those ongoing discussions for gas sales to the United States?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not hear me. I said that discussions did take place from time to time all fall, but first of all there has to be an application. That application has to go before the National Energy Board, and that board has to declare that a certain amount of gas is surplus to Canada's needs before we can export additional amounts to the United States.

AGRICULTURE

VETERINARY COLLEGE FOR ATLANTIC REGION—INQUIRY AS TO COMMITMENT TO FINANCE—REFERENCE OF HOWE REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government has made a commitment to finance the establishment of a veterinary college in Atlantic Canada, notwithstanding the fact that the Atlantic provinces may not be able to agree on the site for that college.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, we have not made any decision to establish a veterinary college. I think the hon. member is well aware of the proposal the premier of Prince Edward Island has put forward. As I understand it, he has even gone so far as to advertise for a dean for the school. We have made no decision or commitment at this stage of the game. We are hoping there can be that harmonious relationship that is the desire, I am sure, of even the hon. member and myself, between those great Atlantic premiers and provinces.

Mr. Nowlan: It must be the spirit of Christmas, Mr. Speaker, as I do agree in part with the Minister of Agriculture, which really leads me to my supplementary question. In order to get this off dead centre and remove it from the obvious provincial conflict of interest I go back to a question I asked last week or the week before: will the minister use his good offices, along with the Deputy Prime Minister and, I guess, the present government House leader, to have the Howe Report on the establishment of this college referred to the committee on agriculture in order that the various people interested in the establishment of this college, including Dean Howe, could come before a non-partisan body like that committee on agriculture and have this whole matter ventilated so that something can be done?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the provinces themselves agreed to this educational commission, I believe it was called, composed of highly learned and skilled people who made an inquiry, talked to the people of the provinces, made surveys, and I understood the provinces were to accept that commission's recommendations. I am sure that if the commission had said Nova Scotia in its recommendation the hon. member would not be asking these questions.

INDUSTRY

PLASTICS—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the plastic industry of Canada which is experiencing difficulties. There are 1,400 manufacturing establishments which have a market of $2.6 billion, of which only one-third is supplied by imports. The industry covers and affects a huge sector of the market place and represents more than six per cent of the total manufacturing industry. This industry is operating at an estimated disadvantage in respect of raw materials and manpower of approximately 22 per cent. What proposal does the minister have to offset this destructive 22 per cent disadvantage which in the long run will put many of these establishments out of business?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not as pessimistic as the hon. member. For one thing, I think the 90 cent dollar will help the Canadian plastics industry, and the ability of Canada to supply raw materials to the Canadian plastics industry should stand it in good stead. We have a number of specific projects which will help specific manufacturers in the industry at any time they want to apply to the department.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider a monetary proposal such as a reduced interest rate to offset capital costs?

Mr. Horner: That is an interesting thought, Mr. Speaker, but if we reduce interest rates that will cost the federal treasury some money.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INDEXING OF PENSIONS—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF STUDIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. If he answered this question in the last while I would apologize to him. Can he tell us what progress is being made in the filing and studying of actuarial studies for indexing of public servants superannuation, and, if progress has been made, when does he anticipate being in a position to release both the government study and that study which has been commissioned by independent actuaries?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that the report will be in my hands very shortly, perhaps within a matter of days. I have been away for a day or so and it might even be in my office now. I anticipate being able to table it, providing that it may be translated, perhaps before Christmas, but if not it will be upon resumption of the session after the Christmas recess.

MANPOWER

BILINGUAL POSITIONS—REASON SOME EMPLOYEES DO NOT RECEIVE BONUS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

An hon. Member: Unemployment.

Mr. Herbert: I would like to ask the minister whether he is aware of a situation in offices in the Montreal region of the Department of Employment and Immigration in which, because of percentage limits on the number of designated positions, there are persons working in both languages who cannot receive the bonus for bilingualism, whereas in the same offices, because the language of work is French, there are unilingual Anglophones who do receive the bonus for bilingualism?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with respect I would suggest that this problem might more properly be directed to the President of the Treasury Board, but I will say, because it is our office, that in other areas we have similar problems—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It exists all over the public service.

Mr. Cullen: —where an individual who speaks both languages but is in a designated unilingual position does not get the benefit of the bonus, but performs that particular service. I think it is appropriate that we should be looking at the situation. I think we should do everything we can to help our civil servants, not what the hon. member across there is doing.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why don't you repeal the damned thing and help the whole country.

INDUSTRY

PLASTICS—SUGGESTION INDUSTRY BE EXEMPTED FROM TARIFF CUTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the proposed tariff cuts under the current round of GATT negotiations. As Canada is already the world's largest per capita importer of plastic products, and actually imports more than are imported by the entire population of the United States, will the minister consider exempting the plastic fabrication industry from the tariff cuts at this time in order to protect our own Canadian native product?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the tariff negotiations going on now we hope to be able to deal on a sector basis with non-ferrous metals, and that may well include plastics.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT OF RULES COMMITTEE OF YUKON LEGISLATURE ON REFUSAL OF ASSENT TO CERTAIN BILL

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. On December 2 I asked the minister if he would table the report of the standing committee on rules, elections and privileges of the Yukon House dealing with the refusal of assent to a bill that had passed all three stages of that House, and the minister said he would be pleased to look at that suggestion. I would ask whether that will be tabled and, if so, when?

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the minister to table it as soon as translation is completed, very possibly tomorrow.

PRIVILEGE

ANSWERS BY MINISTER RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, Yesterday a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Egmont, contributed to by other hon. members, including the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, having to do with the position of the Minister of Employment and Immigration in respect of a reference he made during the course of answers in the question period.

● (1502)

During the exposition of the question of privilege and the speech an application was made. Consistent with previous practices, the minister, having made reference to a document, would be required to table it. The relevant references appear in May's nineteenth edition at page 431, and in citation 159 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. Both references make it clear that the documents which ought to be tabled when cited in debate, in accordance with precedents referred to, are "public documents", "dispatches" or "state papers". Clearly, these citations refer only to official documents.

There is a British case cited in May's eighteenth edition in which a minister was asked to table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day in answering a question. The minister replied that he had made the statement on his own responsibility, and he was not obliged to table the document. The Speaker made a ruling accepting that argument. Accordingly, that sets a precedent as well.

In the case presently before us, the hon. minister has been asked to table a transcript of a speech which he gave outside the House. He has given the House, on his own responsibility—to quote from previous precedents—the contents of the speech, which the House must accept. Since the transcript is not a state paper or an official document in any sense, my view today is the same, after referring to the precedents, as it was yesterday. We ought not to extend that precedent to cover the particular situation involved.

During the question period the minister indicated that he would rise on a question of privilege at three o'clock.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for York-Simcoe referred to me by something other than the title of my department. I represent approximately 25,000 people in that department. I hope they are as proud of the department as I am. If members opposite want me to answer questions on behalf of the department, I think it is a small courtesy to those 25,000 people, who are working hard, to address me correctly. I am not sensitive as a politician—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Cry baby.

Mr. Cullen: I am proud to represent the department. In future I will answer questions, no matter how hon. members opposite address me. I had to make this representation on behalf of the 25,000 public servants I am proud to represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order raised by the hon. minister, I wonder if he would be less tender if we referred to him as the minister of employment and immigration responsible for unemployment?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Being no longer a minister, no one can accuse me of being sensitive on this issue. When I was a minister, I was attacked on many occasions. I never resented that; it was what I expected. I am sitting here, as a member of parliament, listening to the question period and it seems to me it is courteous for members to address ministers by their official titles. This is creating a very bad impression throughout the country. I hope I will not be in a position of having to tell members opposite that they are being dishonourable.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, with regard to this rather frivolous point of order raised by the minister, I merely ask: Is it out of order to call a spade a shovel in this House?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is asking me if it is in fact out of order. I am not altogether certain. It may well be. I hesitated to intervene. I am aware that this has happened several times in the past and I wondered if it would be raised in any way. Perhaps I ought to examine the question and make a definitive expression as to whether it is out of order to make that kind of misdescription of a minister when asking a question. I really do not know. Now that the hon. member has asked me to examine the question, perhaps I should, to see whether it is unparliamentary language. I do not know. I will take a look at it and see.

[Later:]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I will not be too long. I just want to register my concern about the sensitivity of the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration whom I have shadowed for a considerable time. I would ask him to keep in mind the old statement: If you cannot stand the heat, get out of the kitchen. As a result of his activities in the House during the past couple of days, all I can say is that he should get out of the kitchen, because now he can be called one of the biggest cry babies who sit on the treasury benches.

* * *

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, my very brief point of order is with regard to a scurrilous Canadian Press article which appeared in many metropolitan newspapers today. This article would seem to indicate that the people of Belleville are racists and anti-French. This is a totally untrue picture of life in Belleville. It affects my ability to fairly represent these people. I want to clear the record and disavow any such prejudices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government House leader concerning the business of the House. On other occasions we have discussed the legislation he was proposing to bring forward. Can he confirm today the order in which legislation will be brought forward when the House has concluded its consideration of Bill C-11?

While he is doing so, I wonder if he could tell the House about the pipeline legislation, which has been the subject of questions in the House, and also the contracts that are important to Canadian industries? What is the government's intention with respect to introducing the pipeline legislation into the House? Is it the intention of the government to introduce that bill into the House prior to the Christmas adjournment? If the answer is yes, I would appreciate receiving that answer. If the answer is no, can the government tell us when that piece of legislation will be coming forth, so that those interested in it can study it after it has been printed?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the pipeline legislation, it was my expectation that the legislation would be introduced prior to the Christmas break. Now there is no possibility for it to be passed. The intervening period would give all of us more time to work on what is a very complex piece of legislation. Certainly, it is the intention to bring in the legislation immediately upon the resumption of the House in January of next year.

The list of business is the same as was indicated last Thursday when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton asked the question. I should add that if the elections bill now in committee comes out, it is my intention to call it as a priority item.

Also, I should like to refer to a comment made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert yesterday with respect to a debate on foreign affairs. Is there any way to accelerate the item now before the House, and the elections bill, in order to have a day or so on that subject before the Christmas adjournment? I put that forth as a possibility.

● (1512)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think we are making progress, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the government will take it upon itself to set aside the period of time it has in mind after the normal discussions have taken place with respect to a very important debate on that matter. But that is something we can discuss, as time goes on, in the usual co-operative way.

I want to raise one other important matter with respect to the business of the House. The hon. member for Eglinton touched upon it. I know people will remember that the hon. member for Eglinton, aided by others both on the government side and on this side of the House of Commons, worked hard and long to bring the electronic Hansard and television into the House of Commons, and as a result of that it was the hope of all hon. members of the House that parliament would become more accountable in terms of the people of Canada and more relevant to their need to understand public affairs. We had hoped as well, that the government would not continue the practice of making announcements outside the House of Commons where television cameras were used exclusively, although they are now, here.

We had hoped there would not be a continuation, if an announcement were made outside the House—particularly now—of what would be an affront to parliament and to the people of the country. I raise the matter quite seriously. I looked upon the bringing of this great innovation in parliamentary reporting—I hope the view was shared generally by members of the public—as something that could involve the House of Commons and the utilization of the procedure with respect to statements on motions on important government matters.

I just want to say to the government House leader that I think the Parliament of Canada would be very greatly disturbed if tomorrow, or at any other time, ministers did not take advantage of the existence in this chamber of an electronic Hansard which is made available every day to a wider and wider group of Canadians, at great public expense, so that the people of Canada could see important statements made in the setting of the House where members have the opportunity to question government members through the electronic Hansard, as representatives of the people, about what the government intends and expects from the various policies it announces.

I ask my colleague, the House leader of the government, to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet the very high importance that all members of the House attach to the provision in our rules with respect to statements being made here. If a statement is made outside the House tomorrow, now that statements can be made publicly in the House, I think parliament will have been let down by this government and the people of Canada will be affronted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the assumption that we are still on the question of House business, I have two questions I should like to put to the government House leader. In the first place, will the government shortly be introducing bills to replace the two items in the supplementary estimates that were struck out of that bill, procedurally, yesterday? I refer to an item having to do with DEVCO and to another item having to do with VIA Rail.

My second question has to do with the future business of the House. In view of the fact that the government did not provide us at the beginning of this session, as is frequently done, with a list of the measures it intended to place before parliament could we be provided with such a list before the Christmas recess?

Mr. MacEachen: I do not see very much hope in bringing legislation on VIA Rail or the items that were struck out of the supplementary estimates providing relief to a number of municipalities in Cape Breton if there is no chance of having the legislation passed. Almost nothing has been passed in this session, and it is already December 8. Therefore, I do not see much point in trying to bring in items on these two matters in light of the pace legislation is being dealt with.

In reply to the other part of the hon. member's question, I will attempt to provide an advance forecast of what legislative items will be attempted in this session, but there has not been much encouragement to prepare a legislative program—although we have been working on it—in view of the present situation in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question on what he has just said, before he goes on to another subject? The minister may be right about VIA Rail—I do not know—but I am thoroughly satisfied that all members of the House will readily grant a bill with respect to the money that was intended for Devco. That was said very clearly by those who raised the procedural objection. I was on the other side of the argument; I did not join in the procedural objection. I put this question to the minister: Will he canvass the possibility of getting at least the Devco bill passed without debate?

Mr. MacEachen: I think it is the responsibility of hon. members opposite, who put procedural niceties ahead of the hard-pressed needs of the communities in industrial Cape Breton—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't look at me on that one.

Mr. MacEachen: —and not plead now, having struck out the item on a procedural subtlety, and come to me and say, "Do something about it", as a result of the very misguided and unwise intervention made by members of the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be that the last two or three words of the government House leader will meet my point of order, but I suggest the minister has no right to suggest that I had raised a procedural nicety about the Devco matter. He knows I fought very hard, in procedural terms, for the regularity of that item which I thought was in order.

Mr. MacEachen: Obviously, I agree with the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I did not have him in mind when I referred to the rather bewildering action that was taken by the official opposition in light of the very severe unemployment situation which exists in industrial Cape Breton.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raised a matter with respect to ministerial statements. He is dealing with a purely hypothetical situation. He is saying that if the Prime Minister were to make a statement tomorrow, then he would like to raise a question in advance to make sure that the Prime Minister will not make it tomorrow. I think that is not a valid point of order. But the hon. member does give me an opportunity to tell him and members of the opposition that we on this side do not think that that proceeding has been working very satisfactorily.

If you look at the Standing Order and see how it has been applied, you will see a very vast difference between the rule and the application, because instead of commenting directly—as is required under the rules—members of the opposition have taken the opportunity to discourse on a variety of subjects and bring up criticisms relating to the government that are not involved in the original statement. So it is not a very satisfactory proceeding from our point of view, but we have used it frequently under that disability. However, I would tell the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that I am surprised he would use the introduction of television as a way of persuading us that the traditional procedures of the House should be changed.

As the hon. member knows, there is no obligation on a minister or on the Prime Minister to make every single statement on policy in the House of Commons. If we did that, we would be taking up a great deal of time in the House of Commons. So it has become the practice to make statements in the House under that proceeding only on relatively few occasions. If hon. members want the practice to be extended any further, I think we will have to come together and improve it somewhat. I just wanted to make that comment.

Mr. Speaker: We have to clarify the basis upon which hon. members are participating. We have recognized, as a point of order, something which is not—in the pure sense of the word—really a matter of order; but after the question period on Thursday of every week we recognize, under the general heading of inquiry about House business, points which are taken by way of points of order. I do not see any way in which I can limit unduly the participation of hon. members. The matters which have been raised do relate to House business or to anticipated House business, but are not strictly connected to the point of order. If there are hon. members who want to participate in the discussion as it relates to House business, I think I have to permit that to be done.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you clarified the situation, because we were getting a little fuzzy and ranging from one point of order to another. I hesitate to disagree with my good friend and colleague from Cape Breton, the government House leader, but it was not worthy of him to make the statement which he did make. We know the purpose for which he made that statement was purely political. When the hon. member for Calgary Centre raised his point of order, he specifically stated—and it is recorded in Hansard—that we were absolutely in favour of vote 31a for Devco. A little later the hon. member said we would have to increase it so we could open new mines and provide employment in Cape Breton.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

The government has not been willing to do that, has not been doing it, and is not yet prepared to do it. The reason the hon. member for Calgary Centre raised the point was that the government is trying to sneak in a legislative item with a vote for a specified amount. Your Honour corrected that. Your Honour is the first commoner in this House, and any reflection on what was said yesterday is a reflection upon you. I think Your Honour brought in the right decision. As has already been stated, if the Deputy Prime Minister would like to bring in a bill this afternoon to cover these moneys for municipalities in Cape Breton, I can assure him that no member of this party would debate it: we would vote for it as a whole. I am sure members of the New Democratic Party and members of all parties in this House would be quite happy and willing to go ahead unanimously, without one word being said.

Some hon. Members: Hear,hear!

Mr. Muir: Far be it from me to get involved with points of procedure in this House. That is one thing I do not believe in—not too much, anyhow. Many things happen which should not happen. But in this instance I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to get on his feet and say he will bring a bill in Monday afternoon when we meet, or tomorrow—whenever he wants to bring it in—and it will go flying through very quickly. At the same time, he might add another $20 million, $30 million or $50 million, whatever is required. It seems we have $100 million here, $50 million there and $70 million somewhere else, to go all around the world. All we want is enough money in Cape Breton to open at least two mines to put some people back to work.

The Deputy Minister knows that there are between 3,000 and 4,000 applications for work in the coal mines now, despite the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says derogatory things about Cape Breton coal miners and their work ethics. Bring in the funds and we will vote for them unanimously.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, if I had had the opportunity before the government House leader spoke, I would have liked to have risen on a point of order affecting the business of the House and sought an assurance that statements made about the economy and employment be made here, so that hon. members could question the Prime Minister or the relevant minister.

Unfortunately, I am called upon, now, to rise on a question of privilege because I was, quite frankly, astounded at the remarks of the government House leader when he indicated that now the government apparently is taking the position that it does not like the way in which one of the procedures of the House operates. In this regard, he seems to reflect on the judgment of the Chair with respect to the relevance and the importance of matters which are raised in terms of responses on motions and questions which are asked.

I am disturbed and offended that the government House leader takes the position, on behalf of the government, that major statements will not be made in the House because that offends the government's sense of order or because it takes time. That deprives hon. members on both sides of the House of the right to question and examine the specific initiatives which are being taken by the government. That is a considerable affront to our responsibilities as parliamentarians. I find it inexcusable that the minister, who normally stands for the rights and privileges of members of this House, would simply waive aside this particular area of initiative which is one of the areas of responsibility we have here, that is, to hear statements on motions on initiatives taken by the government and to have an opportunity to make statements in reply, or to question.

Apparently, a new principle is now being enunciated by the government House leader, that because this particular procedure is not satisfactory to the government, on future occasions these statements will not be made in the House. I find that unacceptable and feel that it very much affects the privileges of all members of this House.

Mr. McGrath: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize other hon. members, but we have been through this before; it has a familiar lyric. We have argued on previous occasions, both under existing procedures and under previous procedures, whether the making of a statement outside the House constitutes a question of privilege. It has been ruled consistently that it does not. I do not know how the general proposition can be any different from the specific one. But in any case, I will hear the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I offer a suggestion to the government House leader because this matter is in his hands. If he finds the present procedure for ministerial statements provided for under the new rules which provide for relevant responses, and only Your Honour can rule whether responses are relevant, not the government House leader, and for questions unsatisfactory—and I suspect he finds it unsatisfactory because it cuts too much into his time—why does he not bring a motion to refer this matter back to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization so that we can have a look at it?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to precipitate a question of privilege today, especially inasmuch as this discussion is eating into the time reserved for the opposition, which I always protect diligently. Therefore, I will make my remarks briefer than usual. All I am saying is that, under the Standing Order on statements by ministers, we find the following:

> On motions, as listed in section (2) of this Standing Order, a minister of the Crown may make an announcement or statement of government policy.

It is an option that is open to a minister which is provided in the Standing Order. It is not a breach of order or a breach of privilege if the option is exercised one way or another. I have said—and it is not intended to be a reflection on any ruling made by the Chair—that from the point of view of the government, the procedure has not been working satisfactorily. That is all I have said, and I think hon. members have found from time to time that certain other procedures in the House are not working satisfactorily. This procedure is not working as satisfactorily as we expected; that is all. As ministers, we will continue to make statements on motions. There is, obviously, no indication that that is to be changed, but I suggest that when a minister makes a statement outside the House he is not in breach of order or in breach of the privileges of any hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: He is in breach of our practices.

Mr. MacEachen: In fact, I believe that if ministers exercised this option as often as they could exercise it, it would be a very chaotic situation because hardly a day goes by but ministers issue information which could be put together in the form of a statement. I believe that this proceeding has to be looked at again to give proper satisfaction to hon. members in the way it used to give proper satisfaction.

● (1532)

The appeal of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys is very touching. He asks me to move quickly to restore the Devco votes. I enjoyed the public penance. It has moved me greatly, but I am not so sure I will take the political chestnuts of the Tory party out of the fire on Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about your own?

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE—PERSONNEL OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 320—Mr. McKenzie:

AIRPORTS—OPERATING SURPLUS OR DEFICIT

Question No. 339—Mr. Stevens:

For each year 1972 to 1976 and the nine months ended September 30, 1977, what was the operating surplus or deficit for the (a) Toronto International Airport at Malton (b) Montreal International Dorval Airport (c) Vancouver International Airport (d) Calgary International Airport (e) Winnipeg International Airport (f) Montreal International Mirabel Airport (g) Ottawa International Airport?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport):

Operating Surplus (Deficit)
1971-72 to 1976-77
($000's)

	(a) Malton*	(b) Dorval*	(c) Vancouver*	(d) Calgary	(e) Winnipeg	(f) Mirabel*	(g) Ottawa
1971-72	3,521	3,953	(227)	73	(1,455)	—	(1,965)
1972-73	3,591	5,035	302	174	(1,811)	—	(2,178)
1973-74	540	5,847	635	42	(1,726)	—	(2,497)
1974-75	4,675	6,706	1,257	488	(2,882)	—	(2,725)
1975-76	15,288	9,669	1,845	3,263	(880)	(18,382)	(2,040)
1976-77	22,389	1,983	5,722	4,468	2	(49,821)	(787)

*These airports are in revolving fund, financed with interest-bearing loans. Other airports are financed with budgetary appropriations.

The surplus or (deficit) for these airports has been re-calculated for each year to exclude any return on investment or capital charge.

The deficit at Mirabel Airport in 1976-77 is largely due to interest on loans of $29 million and depreciation of $16 million. For 1975-76, the period covered is December 1, 1975 to March 31, 1976.

Data for the period April 1, 1977 to September 30, 1977 is not available at this time.

[Mr. Pinard.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—COMTEAMS

Question No. 367—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Do COMTEAMS currently form part of the Post Office Department and, if so (a) what is the description of the term (b) on what date and for what reason were they established (c) what are their functions?

2. (a) What component or components of the Department in Ottawa is/are responsible for matters relating to COMTEAMS (b) what is the composition of a COMTEAM (c) how many are in existence across Canada (d) at which postal headquarters/facilities have they been established?

3. (a) Which categories of postal employees normally form part of a COMTEAM (b) to which unions do they belong (c) how frequently are they rotated?

4. (a) Do COMTEAMS hold regular or periodic meetings with local union officials (b) does the (i) Canadian Union of Postal Workers (ii) Letter Carriers Union of Canada generally accept the concept of COMTEAMS (c) do senior officials of the Department in Ottawa and senior officials of Regional/District Headquarters generally consider COMTEAMS an essential element of the postal organization?

5. Are official directives disseminated to COMTEAMS by the Public Affairs Branch of the Department in Ottawa and, if so what is the nature of the information?

6. What is the nature of information disseminated by COMTEAMS at subordinate levels of the postal organization?

7. Will COMTEAMS cease to be a part of the postal organization and, if so, on what date?

8. Has provision been made in the Main Estimates for COMTEAMS and, if so, since what date?

9. What has been the cost to the public for COMTEAMS since their inception?

10. As of what date were the answers to the above question prepared?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): 1. COMTEAMS as outlined do not exist. (a) COMTEAM is a contraction of "Communications Team" and is the term applied to an internal information process. (b) They were established in October 1976 as one result of the present Postmaster General, the Hon. Jean-Jacques Blais' recognition of the need to stimulate two-way communications within the Post Office Department. (c) The COMTEAM process is intended to stimulate two-way communications within the Post Office Department.

2. (a) The Promotion of the COMTEAM principle is the responsibility of the public affairs and personnel components; it also involves every functional group. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable. (d) Not applicable.

3. (a) See 2 (a) above. (b) Members of all unions representing Post Office Department employees would be involved in the process in one way or another. (c) Not applicable.

4. (a) No. (b)(i) No. (ii) Yes. (c) As explained, COMTEAM is not an element of the postal organization; however, the Postmaster General and senior postal officials are pleased with the way the COMTEAM process has assisted in keeping employees at all levels informed. Strong and effective communications among members of an organization are essential if people are to be fully informed and to act soundly on facts and data about the business. COMTEAM is a process for opening up the channels of communication within Canada post and is therefore essential to the organization's effectiveness.

5. No.

6. COMTEAM information covers a wide variety of topics of interest to all employees and is often in response to request for clarification.

7. COMTEAM is more concept than a group, and is considered as ongoing.

8. The main estimates contain general provisions for communications, of which COMTEAM is simply a process.

9. Since COMTEAM is made up of existing personnel and functions through existing communications channels, there have been no additional man-year costs to the department.

10. The government takes responsibility for the answers it provides to questions and for the process involved in replying to such questions. It is not appropriate therefore to provide information about internal administrative arrangements.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND THE ENVIRONMENT—NEW BRUNSWICK EMPLOYEES

Question No. 553—Mr. Howie:

How many persons were employed in New Brunswick by the Department of Fisheries and the Environment to protect the fisheries resources from illegal activities in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 to date?

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment):

Year	No. of Persons
1975	199
1976	188
1977	185

SUBSIDIES TO FERRIES OR FERRY SYSTEMS

Question No. 557—Mr. McKinnon:

1. How much did the government pay in subsidies to ferries or ferry systems on the (a) East Coast (b) West Coast in December 1976?

2. How much does the government plan to pay in subsidies to ferries or ferry systems on the (a) East Coast (b) West Coast in 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. The government of Canada provided the following assistance to water transportation during 1976 and is presently budgeted for 1977:

Subsidies	1976	1977
(a) East coast	$13,028,110	$14,368,678
(b) West coast	2,654,046	8,230,000
Deficit Payments
In respect of Constitutional Services to P.E.I. and Newfoundland	$85,863,184	$101,990,000
Other East Coast Services	2,701,081	3,705,000

The 1976 subsidy figures are not final since existing contracts contain profit limitation clauses and all excess profit recaptures have not been completed.

The above figures were provided by Transport Canada and the Canadian Transport Commission.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF WORKERS BY FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL COMPANY—PROPOSED MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the announcement today by Falconbridge Nickel that it intends to lay off 750 workers, or 20 per cent of its work force, in its Sudbury operation in addition to the 500 already laid off since July of this year.

It is noted that today's Christmas present from Falconbridge to the Sudbury community aggravates an already serious situation there caused by Inco's cutback, not to mention the problems created in Thompson and Port Colborne by Inco and in St. Lawrence by Alcan; and it being further noted that at the same time the employment picture in the mining sector is deteriorating and is threatening to worsen appreciably, according to the government's own figures. Inco, Alcan and Falconbridge have committed large amounts of capital to foreign investments in Guatemala, Indonesia and Chile, Ireland and Chile, again, respectively.

It is noted, finally, that these lay-offs, among others, clearly demonstrate the government's failure to pursue its intention to increase diversification and growth of national and regional economies based on minerals, which I submit constitutes a crisis and an emergency situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I think all hon. members will agree, it is proper that this chamber ought to have machinery for bringing to the attention of the House matters of serious importance which would not otherwise come under our consideration in our regular practices or procedures. That has been the general purpose for existence of Standing Order 26. I think it is appropriate, therefore, to read parts of the Standing Order. Subparagraph (1) reads as follows:

> Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration must be asked immediately before the calling of government orders.

I think it is appropriate to read two other subparagraphs. Subparagraph (5) reads as follows:

> In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker shall have regard to the extent to which it concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or could come within the scope of ministerial action and he also shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

Finally, I should read subparagraph (16):

> The right to move the adjournment of the House for the above purposes is subject to the following conditions:
> (a) The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration—

I think the Chair has, for those reasons, recognized that matters of crisis ought to be brought before the House in this way if they are not going to have the attention of the House in any other way. On the other hand, the Chair is naturally reluctant to take individual problems in individual constituencies—even when they are very close to home—as representing qualification under this Standing Order. The obvious would follow: every member who had anything of critical proportions affecting his constituency would want to bring it forward for the same emergency treatment.

In this situation, there have already been extensive discussions both in this House and in the Ontario legislature, as well as ongoing meetings at every level, to discuss the situation which has been precipitated in the nickel mining industry and expressed by lay-offs at the International Nickel Company. Indeed, the very language of the motion put forward by the hon. member indicates that the situation that Falconbridge announced today aggravates an already serious situation.

I am also influenced by the fact that the announcement by Falconbridge Nickel Mines today allows for some six months before the lay-offs are to take effect, in order to continue the kind of discussions that are already going on between the company and the union and government at the provincial and federal levels.

To a certain extent, I am also influenced—although I put this at the end of the list—by subparagraph (5) of the rule and by the language of the supply motion for this afternoon. This is a rather wide-ranging motion having to do with industrial strategy in Canada and is critical of the government, including in its terms the resource industries. I am sure that those participating in the debate this afternoon will have an opportunity to express themselves on the subject either incidentally or entirely and will still be relevant to the motion now before us.

I want to stress however, that this is not my main reason. My main reason is that which I set out before, that this is a situation which is under considerable negotiation. Meetings and discussions are taking place, and I think it would be inappropriate to grant an application under Standing Order 26 at this time. I do not rule out the possibility of a further application at a later date which might receive different consideration if the circumstances vary. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

TRADE—ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED GOVERNMENT FAILURE TO ESTABLISH INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West) moved:

That this House condemns the Liberal government and in particular the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and his predecessors from 1963 onward, for their failure to develop an industrial strategy to govern industrial development in Canada, their failure to develop adequate policies to assist export trade and to improve the domestic market in Canada for Canadian goods and services by strengthening the Canadian manufacturing industry, and their failure to provide a mechanism for effective consultation with Canadian manufacturing industry, and their failure to provide a mechanism for effective consultation with Canadian manufacturing and resource industries, including the fishing and agriculture sectors, in the Tokyo Round of the GATT negotiations under way now in Geneva and during 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair notes that not later than 9.45 o'clock p.m., every question necessary to dispose of proceedings shall be put forthwith in accordance with Standing Order 58(10).

Mr. Crosbie: Your Honour has just read the motion which I hope the House is going to adopt today. If we adopt this motion, I imagine it will terminate the life of the government—which is a desirable move. This is a serious motion because the manufacturing industry of Canada is in a serious condition. There will be at least four other speakers, besides myself, from the official opposition who will speak on different aspects of the motion.

When I was asked to become critic of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce by our leader in September, I had to confess that I was by no means an expert in the field, particularly in view of the fact that the part of the country I come from is not heavily industrialized. I have had to do considerable homework over the last several months to try to find out the condition of Canadian industry and what the prospects are for trade and commerce. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have discovered that the state of our industry and our prospects in the negotiations at Geneva are shocking.

● (1542)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I regret that the new minister appointed in September is not improving matters which were left in pretty poor shape by his predecessors. Mind you, he has had a lot of predecessors. This department, like many others of the government, has had five ministers since 1972. In November, 1972, Mr. Pepin left the portfolio at the invitation of the Canadian electorate in his district. Then the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) took over for two years and ten months. Then came the present Minister of External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for a year, and then came the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for a year. Finally, in 1977, came the present minister.

Mr. Speaker, no minister can do justice to a department if he is there for only 12 months. It takes 12 months to understand what the department is all about. This is an example of how little the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) cares about how well his ministers in the department perform. He has this whirling dervish fancy of changing ministers every year. I note his predecessor, the late Mr. Pearson, did not do that. In the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for example, the present member from Montreal, Mr. Drury, was five years in that portfolio. This department has not had a real star as a minister since our member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) left the portfolio in February, 1963. He was the last Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Canada who made any impact on the world—or Canada—and he is the gentleman I am so proud to sit with here on the Progressive Conservative side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Our present minister is apparently sanguine and satisfied with the present state of affairs of our Canadian industry, our trade and commerce. He is soporific about them. He is not worried. He is steer-like in his attitude toward his portfolio. He is contented. I asked him the other night whether he had read the report which I am going to refer to in a few minutes. It is a report prepared by the Science Council of Canada on the uncertain prospects of the Canadian manufacturing industry, showing that our industry is in an extremely grave state, with poor prospects at the moment.

At the finance committee meeting on Monday night, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said he was familiar with the report, and did not accept it. He told me why he did not accept it. He felt the Canadian manufacturer has tough competition, but that he is not that pessimistic about his opportunities. The minister is not pessimistic. It is great not to be a pessimist, Mr. Speaker, but we have to face reality. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not facing reality when he looks at the state of Canadian industry today and is sanguine about our prospects in negotiations at Geneva. If this debate does anything to prevent his continuing being content, satisfied and steer-like, sanguine and soporific, it will have done some good. A rolling stone gathers no moss. A rolling minister develops no new policy.

Mr. Hees: Right on.

Mr. Crosbie: He appears, Mr. Speaker, not to understand the problems. Not only that, he is doing nothing about them. I have two quotations giving examples of the minister's attitude toward Canadian industry. According to a report in the Globe and Mail of November 25 from Brussels, the reporter, Mr. Ian Rodger—covering Mr. Horner—said:

> Mr. Horner said businessmen seem most concerned about the prospect of Canadian tariff barriers being lowered in the Tokyo Round, leading to more import competition. But he showed little sympathy for that concern.

Imagine, our Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce shows little sympathy for the concern of the Canadian businessman! He went on to say, quoting Mr. Horner:

> The Canadian businessman perhaps isn't as aware of the changing world market patterns as, say, the Europeans.

A gratuitous insult to the Canadian businessman—that he is not supposed to be as aware of world market patterns as the European. He does not hold much regard for the Canadian businessman's astuteness. In fact, he infers they are stupid. Further in the same interview, the reporter says:

> Nor is he much worried about dislocations in Canadian industry that might be caused by freer trade.

This is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: He is not worried about dislocations that might be caused by freer trade.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Crosbie: The 1.9 million people who work in the Canadian secondary manufacturing are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The people who work there and who have businesses are concerned.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Hees: Right.

Mr. Crosbie: Then he quotes the minister as follows:

> It's a funny thing. It may create some dislocation of specific jobs within the manufacturing industry, but I see tremendous growth because the Third World countries require our technology and our manufactured products. I don't see the manufacturing sector failing as much as many of the Canadian businessmen do.

The minister is indeed very sanguine. The Third World countries and every other country of the world—Germany and Japan, etc.—will be competing for business. What makes us think that Canadian industry is in such a state today that it can compete better than the Japanese, Germans and the European Common Market? Manufacturing employment now is 6.3 per cent below its peak level of September, 1974. That is something the minister should be concerned about. He should be trying to increase manufacturing employment in view of our situation. I do not have time to dwell on this, but the minister is travelling so much that he does not have time to attend to the concerns of Canadian business.

The Retail Council of Canada and various sectors of that industry have been asking for a decision for some months from the minister's department, and from the minister, respecting import quotas for the second half of 1978 with respect to clothing, textiles and that kind of thing. The council has pointed out to the department that they have to order eight to ten months in advance. They have to order now; they cannot wait until the end of December for a decision. If it is going to be that late, they are going to be risking loss of trade and loss of merchandise. They will lose money. There has been a series of letters to the minister from the Retail Council to the minister asking him for a decision in this area. As yet, the minister has not yet replied. They were apparently promised a decision in August, according to a letter of November 3 sent by the Retail Council to the minister. As yet, however, the minister has not replied.

Mr. Speaker, what kind of behaviour is this? The whole retail industry of Canada, some wholesale and even the manufacturing part of the industry of Canada, is involved in selling clothing and textiles. They want a decision concerning quotas for the last half of 1978. They cannot get it. The minister is not worried whether they get it, but they themselves are worried. One would think a minister of this department would be very concerned about that kind of thing and quick to give an answer. If he is unable to give an answer, he should explain why. If it is because some kind of negotiations are going on bilaterally with certain other countries—unsuccessful to date—or there is a good or convincing reason, he should say so. Even so, I doubt whether it is justified that our whole retail industry should be in a state of uncertainty as to what they can order, what they cannot order or import for the last half of 1978.

The first part of the motion deals with our industrial situation. I can quote any number of sources. For example in the November 17 edition of the Globe and Mail, Ronald Anderson, a business columnist, wrote:

Ministers of industry, trade and commerce for the past half-dozen years have been talking intermittently, but without concrete results, about developing an industrial strategy for Canada.

Further, he said:

Now, Jack Horner, the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has returned to the attack and has promised to announce some form of industrial strategy before the end of 1978.

The head of the manufacturing industry says, "Better late than never." But are negotiations under way now, Mr. Speaker, to reach a serious point in January at the GATT negotiations in Geneva? We should have had our industrial strategy many years ago. But for the purposes of these GATT negotiations, certainly a year ago—not that the industrial strategy is going to come at the end of 1978 when the negotiations are completed and the decisions made—what kind of a way is this for the government of Canada to do business? You might excuse them if they only came into office three months ago or six months ago, but they came into office in 1963, and the present lot in 1968.

I now turn to the report of the Science Council of Canada, which is an independent body formed by the government of Canada, financed by the government of Canada, commendably given freedom to express its opinions uncensored. I trust that will continue. What do they find, in their report of October, 1977, to be the prospects for our manufacturing industry? In discussing the first stage of a long-range industrial program which they are undertaking, they say:

Canadian industry is chronically and gravely ill. Indeed, the country, industrially, is rapidly falling behind other nations, and, by default, placing its hopes for the future on a resource sector, which, in its present form, is inadequate to the task of raising or even maintaining the standard of living which most Canadians take for granted.

That is the conclusion of the Science Council of Canada study. When I asked the minister what he thought of it, he said he did not accept it. It was surprising enough that he did not accept it, Mr. Speaker, but he did not give any convincing reason for his non-acceptance. However, later on in the same meeting of the finance committee, when I pointed out that this was a body financed by the government of Canada which had no axe to grind, the transcript of the committee proceedings has the minister saying, "not the best businessmen in the world though". So he denigrated and insulted the people on the Science Council of Canada. This was an observation which demolished their report. I do not know whether they are the best businessmen in the world, but they are a very impressive group of businessmen and university graduates, and it ill behooves the minister to shower them with a gratuitous insult of that nature.

Let me go to the report of the Science Council of Canada, which is not all that long. At page 2 they point out that it is apparent that the technological capability of Canadian industry has not improved, but has in fact deteriorated. They say exports of technology-intensive goods have fallen in relative terms, and many of the industries which produce them are unable to meet foreign competition in the domestic market, much less export, Mr. Speaker. They point out that job opportunities for scientists, engineers, MBAs, executives and other specialists are scarce and non-existent.

They conclude that almost every branch of Canadian manufacturing shows signs of weakness. The mature technology industries, such as textiles, clothing and leather goods, are succumbing to fierce foreign competition in the Canadian market. The resource sector, they say, may also be faltering. These conclusions are reached after an intensive study by a group of intelligent people. They go on to point out that in 1975 we experienced a record deficit of $5.1 billion on current account of the balance of payments. I checked the figure today, and the latest adjustment showed a $4.78 billion deficit. In 1976, the figure was $4.19 billion. For the first three quarters of this year the adjusted figure estimated is now $4.63 billion. I suggest that is a pretty grim record.

At page 5 of the report it is pointed out that industrial capacity in Canada fell to a low of about 81 per cent in the third quarter of 1975. In the first three quarters of 1977, the figure has gone from 81.4 per cent to 84.3 per cent to 83.4 per cent. In other words, Canadian industry is working to only 83 per cent of capacity. According to the report, employment prospects in 1976 were the worst confronting graduates from universities or people joining the labour force since the depression of the 1930s. These are not partisan statements, Mr. Speaker, but conclusions reached by the Science Council of Canada report.

The report goes on to list various industries where difficulties are apparent. There is a lack of competitiveness in our manufacturing industries. On page 6 reference is made to the productivity gap between Canada and the United States and the rapid increase in wages and salaries. In 1975, for the first time since 1960, Canada had a deficit on our merchandise trade account of $639 million. I believe that figure has now been adjusted by StatCan to $534 million. We had a $1 billion surplus in 1976, and it is projected to be $2.8 billion this year, though that is less than the surpluses we used to have, particularly when you take into account inflation over the last three or four years. So we see nothing to be optimistic about anywhere in this document. At page 8 of the report the following statement appears:

Canada's share of world exports has fallen from 5.4 per cent in 1970 to 3.8 per cent in 1975. During the same period, imports (expressed as a percentage of the domestic market) moved from approximately 26 per cent to 33 per cent—

There has been a rapid rise in imports of clothing. In 18 of 19 higher technology groups, Canada has experienced growing deficits since 1970. I have not the time to refer to them all. These are some of the problems we are facing, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, this is not a situation which would lead one to be sanguine, soporific or steer-like.

The only answer that the minister has given to the questions we have asked both in the House and in committee about our economic situation is that the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar to 90 cents has been a good thing. He has been ecstatic that it has dropped in value, and he would brutalize it down further if he could. Today it stands at approximately 91 cents

American. He says it is the answer to all our ills. The only strategy adopted by the Minister since taking over his portfolio has been to believe that the fall in value of the Canadian dollar would solve all our problems.

Other people do not think so, Mr. Speaker. For example, Mr. George Post, acting chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, does not think so. In a recent speech to the Canadian Men's Club, he said that the recent depreciation of the Canadian dollar was only a temporary remedy for the country's trade problems and should not be relied upon to correct underlying inflationary tendencies in the economy. That gentleman has no political axe to grind, and I will take his word over that of the minister every time. I can quote dozens of similar opinions, but I will not.

In the November 25 edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail there is a report of a study conducted by the Conference Board of Canada on the competitiveness of Canadian industry. Between 1966 and 1975 the competitiveness of Canadian industry, compared with that of the United States, has deteriorated. This confirms the present state of Canadian industry. The president, Mr. Rene de Cotret, said in an interview:

—another devaluation of the Canadian dollar "is not the answer to the problem". He stated that the behavioural and structural elements that led to the deterioration in cost competitiveness remain in place and that a further devaluation "would just set us up for a continuation of cost deterioration, but at a lower exchange rate." This would bring Canada close to the British disease of a devaluation-inflation spiral, as rising import prices boosted the Canadian inflation rate, he explained.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I will take the explanation of Mr. Rene de Cotret before that of the minister. At least the Conference Board of Canada know their subject. I should also like to point out that in the report of the Science Council of Canada exactly the same conclusion is reached at page 11. I quote:

The depreciation of the Canadian dollar will provide Canada with a short-lived and limited economic respite arising from a temporary boost in export earnings and a tendency for the volume of imports to be cut back. However, as the experience of Britain and other countries whose currencies have been depreciating has shown, a falling exchange rate tends to start a self-perpetuating slide.

They go on to say a falling exchange rate is inflationary because it raises the costs of imports, and so on. At page 12 in this statement:

One wonders just how much depreciation of its currency Canada will have to experience before recognition is given to the most fundamental problem—structural weakness in Canadian industry.

I do not have time to quote further from this report, Mr. Speaker, but anyone who has looked at the situation objectively concludes that Canadian industry is in very poor shape at the moment. Canada has no industrial strategy. We were promised a series of sector studies and strategies when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources headed the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but these have not yet been completed. Therefore, we are groping around without any strategy. That is, unless the minister introduces one this afternoon. We will be very interested to see just what he comes up with.

Suggestions for what our strategy should be have been put forward. The Science Council of Canada, as quote in the December 6 Globe and Mail, put forward a possible strategy, according to the column of Mr. Anderson to which I referred previously, Dr. Kates, chairman of the Science Council of Canada, suggests that a strategy should include Canadian ownership of companies in key areas; that government policies should support technical advances in those areas. The government has not yet decided what these areas are. There should be a "Buy Canada" policy and development of a small number of technology-based firms of international stature. There should be a range of innovative firms and the establishment of minor technology-oriented programs, such as in the field of liquefied natural gas carriers with ice-breaking capacity. These are areas in which Canada should be pre-eminent because they are suited to our geographic location.

This is the kind of strategy suggested for Canada, Mr. Speaker. We must decide what we, as Canadians, are best at and concentrate on those matters. That is what we are not doing at the moment. If we continue conducting unstructured negotiations in Ottawa, then we will be unable to determine what is going to happen to our industrial sector.

In connection with the negotiations in Geneva, every industry, every manufacturers' association that I know of, complains there is no feedback from the government, no mechanism by means of which they can find out from the government what is happening. They will not be involved in decisions made at Geneva; they will not be asked for their views on the negotiations from January on. I could cite instance after instance; the electronics association, the manufacturers' associations, the plastics industry—the list goes on and on. They are not being consulted.

In the United States, representatives of trade and industry are accompanying the delegations to Geneva. They will be there when decisions are made. Industrialists in this country want to know about these things now. They want to know what assistance they are likely to get in case of certain decisions being taken, certain adjustments being made. These are questions which have not been answered. As far as I know, members who sit on the opposition side of the House have been allowed no input. I wrote the minister asking whether we would be briefed and allowed to know what is happening, but so far I have received no answer from him.

The President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has, it is true, indicated that we shall be briefed. I imagine this will be done in a casual manner. We have not been consulted or told how this is being done. As I say, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of uncertainty in Canadian industry today.

We want to know what strategy, if any, the government has decided to follow. We want to know what are its goals for industry. Every other country which has advanced and prospered in the last 15 years—I think of France, Germany and Japan—has designated certain areas, more or less specific, in which it was their intention to become competitive. In Japan, for instance, it is electronics; Japan is making computers which compete with those of IBM. It will not risk the success of that industry by permitting the import of IBM equipment. France and Germany decided to concentrate their efforts on the manufacture of certain products and to protect the industries concerned until they become sufficiently strong, on the basis of a domestic market, to compete successfully with the rest of the world. The Canadian government has made no decision along such lines. What is our defensive strategy? We know other countries will want us to drop our tariffs, and that in return we shall ask them to drop their non-tariff barriers.

We also know there are a thousand ways of increasing non-tariff barriers. Our industrialists know they cannot get a chance to compete in a number of markets where they might otherwise be successful. How is this to be stopped? Canada does not impose many non-tariff barriers, yet we are faced with non-tariff barriers put up to protect other countries. What is the minister's industrial strategy? He should be addressing himself to the state of the electronics industry. The plastics industry is another industry we should be helping, especially since the petrochemical industry is the base from which the plastics industry gets its supplies. But the chemical producers are in a state of alarm, as our correspondence indicates. These industries should be brought into the dialogue.

We realize that everyone was allowed to submit a brief to the committee on tariffs and trade; but there has been no feedback. There is, I believe, a tendency in the department to regard spokesmen for industry as not being sufficiently in the real world, not sufficiently in favour of free trade. Mr. Speaker, we are not against the concept of free trade when it can be implemented fairly around the world. It is a question of degree. We have to protect our interests, too. No other country is going to sacrifice its national interests because of the holy slogan "Free trade". The other countries around the bargaining table will protect their interests as far as they can and, hopefully, lower trade barriers too. Who will be sacrificed? Who will lose their jobs? How many exemptions will be allowed at Geneva and on what percentage of our trade? Perhaps the minister does not have the answer to these questions.

I do not believe we need to be pessimistic about Canada. There is nothing which cannot be remedied, provided the government goes about its business correctly, gives out the appropriate information and squares with the industries involved. Surely, the hon. member who heads this department and who was in opposition for 14 or 15 years should be one whose desire it is to involve industry and the resource sector in these negotiations. He might at least let them know what is happening.

The same applies to agriculture and to the fishing industry. We have to get trade barriers lowered in these cases. What does the minister hope to accomplish for them? What will he be obliged to give up if he is to accomplish anything for them? Wherever we look in the business sections of our newspapers, we are reminded of the difficulties presently faced by industry. One independent and objective study shows that in the 1960s, when we thought we were well off, Canada's position vis-à-vis the rest of the world was deteriorating. The report even says Canada might become—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Of course, he may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to thank the opposition for enabling me to put a few facts on the record and set aside what appears to be their growing fear.

I listened very closely to the speech of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), but I failed to find in it any indication of the direction in which he thinks Canada should be going, though he did express a host of fears. One moment I thought he was in favour of greater protection, and the next I thought he was in favour of free trade. At any rate, he did seem to play around a great deal with the term "industrial strategy" and read something out of the report of the Science Council which he felt constituted an industrial strategy. It certainly did not, to my mind. An industrial strategy has to take into consideration a whole variety of matters, including taxation policy, what markets in the world are we capable of meeting, what proportion of the domestic market is to be reserved as far as possible, what kinds of goods and services we are best fitted to produce for sale abroad. One element should include a policy of upgrading as many of our own resources as possible.

To my mind, the word "policy" means a plan of action. Around here, the word "policy" has always fascinated me. In my interpretation, "policy" means a plan of action, and "industrial strategy" means several plans of action. Certainly, there are several plans of action in place right now, and I will enlarge upon them during my remarks.

● (1612)

It is true to say that politics for industrial development must be rooted in a realistic assessment of Canada's strengths and weaknesses and in the context of a dynamic world environment. On the positive side, this country has a lot going for it. We are among the most favourably-endowed nations in terms of natural and human resources. Our labour force is growing more rapidly than it is in some other developed countries and, while relatively small in the numerical sense, it is among the best educated and most highly skilled anywhere. Our industries enjoy strong technological interrelationships with those of other industrial nations, so we have access to the most scientific advances that occur throughout the world. Therefore, we do not have to be as pessimistic about Canada's future as some people would like.

What are we doing about meeting with and aiding industry within Canada? Just recently, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce reorganized several programs—I think they number about seven—into one called EDP. We have set up provincial boards in every province. These boards will have jurisdiction to underwrite credit at a chartered bank up to as much as $200,000, and that may well be increased to $300,000. The national board will have jurisdiction to underwrite credit to the extent of something in the neighbourhood of $300 million in loans.

These boards will assess, first of all, whether a business is viable and should be retained in Canada. If it reaches the conclusion that it should be, then the board will take a look at management and, thirdly, at equity. A chartered bank takes a look at the situation in the direct reverse: it looks at equity, then management, and then, I suppose, at the business. The EDP will look at it in completely the opposite way, with the hope it can maintain permanent jobs in Canada and create more permanent jobs here. It certainly has a very good record in creating and maintaining many industries that may well have folded had they not received a last resort line of credit through EDP.

Having regard to export trade, the department does many things. I might point out that in 1976 we had a surplus in export trade of $1.1 billion, after a deficit in 1975 of $640 million, and in 1977 we expect to have a surplus of $2.5 billion. To me, that is a strong indication that we can, and are, competing in world markets.

Mr. Stevens: In respect of manufactured articles?

Mr. Horner: I will come to manufactured articles later. We have bilateral agreements with a whole host of countries, including Poland, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Brazil, Iran, China and the U.S.S.R. These involve major contracts which will assist us in selling a whole host of commodities, mostly manufactured, to these under developed countries. The bilateral economic agreement with Poland, for example, was a $300 million business deal. Just recently, about a year ago, we carried out a framework agreement with the EEC. That framework agreement is an industrial agreement through which I am certain there will be a continued expansion of our trade with the European Economic Community.

Having just returned from Brussels, with 164 businessmen, I can certainly vouch for the fact that they returned to Canada far more enthusiastic about their ability to do business in Europe than when they left. It is easy to say that you cannot do business with Germany and Japan because they are too keen and too sharp as businessmen. I do not think we should accept the fact that we cannot do business with any country. We can, and should, be prepared to compete with any country. I priced many articles in Europe and decided in my own mind that we can compete with them quite well.

We have 89 offices, in 63 countries, aiding foreign trade. There are 300 foreign service officers, 170 of whom are engaged in assisting commercial trade. The idea that this department has not done much to serve Canada's domestic export trade in the past 13 years, or during the life of this resolution which began in 1963, is really quite ridiculous because many promotional trade projects have gone forward with fairs, missions and export market programs, expending something in the neighbourhood of $13.8 million in support of export trade and resulting eventually in increased trade in the neighbourhood of $640 million.

There have been many turnkey projects in which we have assisted in getting contracts for Canadian businessmen, such as the Venezuelan railway project and the hydroelectric project in Brazil for which we are competing right now. The Export Development Corporation has been a boon in assisting Canadian businessmen to get their exports abroad and get paid for them. In 1969, the EDC was empowered to undertake direct and contingency liabilities totalling $1.6 billion. It is currently empowered to undertake direct and contingency liabilities totalling $6.8 billion. The annual level of loans provided by EDC in support of Canadian capital goods exports has increased from $98 million in 1963 to $784 million in 1976.

Mr. Stevens: To set up steel mills in the United States and pulp mills in Poland.

Mr. Horner: I do not know what is wrong with a pulp mill in Poland.

Mr. Stevens: Ask our pulp and paper producers.

Mr. Horner: I imagine they can read, too. The EDC has done a tremendous job promoting the export of Canadian goods in many innovative ways, one of which was mentioned today in the question period. It is an interesting one which will encourage the export of oil exploration activity and technology. This is a major step and I think it is just the beginning of that concept. Much has been said about the manufacturing trade and exports. I should just like to give the House some figures. Domestic exports have increased at an annual growth rate of 4 per cent in live animals; at 9.3 per cent in food, feed and beverages; at 13.7 per cent in crude materials, inedible; and at 10.7 per cent in fabricated materials, inedible. That is an annual increase in our export of these commodities.—

Mr. Hees: Over what period?

Mr. Horner: From 1962 to 1976, the period of this resolution.

Mr. Stevens: What will be the deficit this year?

Mr. Horner: There will be a surplus this year.

Mr. Stevens: In the manufacturing trade?

Mr. Horner: Just let me finish. In end products.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1622)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has the floor.

Mr. Horner: The annual average increase of end products from 1962 to 1976 was 23 per cent, which is an amazingly large increase. The average annual increase of total exports has been 13.7 per cent.

Mr. Hees: What will be the deficit on fully manufactured goods this year?

Mr. Horner: I will get to that.

Mr. Hees: Well, get to it now.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we will be here all day and all night listening to the various speeches, if the interruptions continue. The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. Horner: In 1962—

Mr. Stevens: This is 1977.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner: I did not draft this resolution. The resolution commences in 1962. Perhaps the hon. member can keep quiet, if he does not want to listen to the figures. His party asked for them. In 1962, approximately $68 million worth of livestock were exported. By 1976, that was doubled to $119 million worth of livestock.

Mr. Stevens: Is that manufactured goods?

Mr. Horner: I will get to manufactured goods.

Mr. Hees: We are interested in fully manufactured goods.

Mr. Gillies: Is that in real terms?

Mr. Horner: If hon. members opposite want to hear those figures now, I will give them. In 1962, we exported $654 million worth of end products. In 1976, we exported $12,539,-232,000 worth of end products. That is a substantial increase.

Mr. Horner: Yes, it is real terms; it is real dollars.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the consent of the House to table this document, since hon. members opposite do not want to hear the figures. It can be appended to today's Hansard and then hon. members can read and study the figures themselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that it be printed as an appendix to this day's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed, and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For text of document, see appendix.]

Mr. Horner: It is obvious that hon. members opposite do not want to hear the figures.

Mr. Hees: Give us the import figures.

Mr. Stevens: That is what we want.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I realize there is a long list of speakers who want to deal with this matter. Some are on this list, and will have their turn to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: We have heard a lot about manufacturing trade, shipments and the Canadian market. In 1976, our exports were $25 billion and our imports were $30 billion. Thus, the trade balance was minus $5 billion, which I have acknowledged. The shipments, as a share of the Canadian market, were 95 per cent. That indicates that we were not far off our total percentage.

Mr. Stevens: What was the deficit?

Mr. Hees: What was the deficit in fully manufactured goods last year?

Mr. Horner: Minus $5 billion. Much has been said about the Kennedy Round in tariff negotiations and the entire Canadian economy. With those trade figures, the gross merchandizing trade surplus will be $2.5 billion. Our labour negotiations are in far better shape than they were some years ago, with the average settlement down at 7 per cent instead of 14 per cent. In the last third quarter, the growth in productivity in Canada went up 4 per cent, whereas it went up only 2 per cent in the United States. Thus, one can see that our loss in competitive ability is narrowing. In fact, the growth in the third quarter in the gross national product was 5.2 per cent.

It is all well and good for the hon. member for St. John's West to suggest that we should return to being hewers of wood and carriers of water, in agreement with the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Certainly, that would not be my concept and it is not the attitude of the Canadian delegation in GATT. We want to maintain a strong industrial industry, and will do so. In the 1963 GATT negotiations, the cutting of tariffs and the improvement of the anti-dumping legislation was mainly dealt with. This round will cut tariffs and deal with the non-tariff barriers. The non-tariffs barriers are far more important than the tariffs. The hon. member can suggest that there are millions of ways to create a non-tariff barrier, but in my study with the delegation in Geneva, I was greatly pleased to speak to Oliver Long, the secretary-general of GATT.

Also, I spoke with the American, Japanese and other delegations who were there. I was pleased with the calibre of the man the Canadian government sent there. He was fully knowledgeable in trade and tariffs. The suggestion that Canadian manufacturers should know all about it all the time would be disclosing to the entire world Canada's deck of cards. I am sure no one would want that done.

Mr. Crosbie: What is the United States doing?

Mr. Horner: I will deal with the United States in a minute. In our trade today with the United States, 66 per cent is moving there at something like 5 per cent or less. With the suggested cut in tariffs something like 90 per cent of our trade would move into the United States with 5 per cent or less tariff. Thus, we have to concentrate on the non-tariff barrier.

On November 11 Canada tabled a long list of non-tariff barriers and restrictions to trade with regard to agriculture and fish. The Americans were not particularly pleased with that because it indicated to the world that they were not "Mr. Clean" in the world of trade. It indicated to the world that Americans were not the great free traders that they were professing to be. Much of the items tabled dealt with commerce moving from Canada to the United States. There is no doubt the proper strategy was adopted when that long list was tabled at Geneva. The United States tabled a small list, and after Canada tabled its list they realized their list should have been longer.

With regard to the non-tariff barriers, seemingly Japan, the United States, the European Common Market and the Swiss are prepared to agree on the setting up of a series of conduct codes for governments to adhere to. These codes would specifically address themselves to four areas. The first area would be government purchasing practices. Government purchasing practices have been one way in which non-tariff barriers have effectively prohibited penetration into some markets. One could list a number of countries which have government purchasing practices that prohibit our sales into their markets. If something can be done to set up a standard code of ethics for governments to adhere to, certainly it would remove many of the non-tariff barriers dealing with that subject and in my opinion help particularly the electronics and the electro-cable industries.

The second area would be subsidies, countervailing duties and restitutions in the European community. In my opinion there is not much difference between a tariff and a subsidy. I am pleased that subject matter will be dealt with and considered in the non-tariff barriers code of ethics. Custom valuation is certainly very, very important. Quite often it is used between Canada and the United States. It delays the shipment of goods. Technical barriers with respect to the trades, such as product standards, is another way in which non-tariff barriers are developed. With regard to the setting up of a code of conduct for nations, it is widely believed that a surveillance team would have to be set up to make certain that all nations adhere to that code of conduct, nations which have signed the GATT treaty.

● (1632)

Also, some thought is being given to the changing of article 19 in GATT. Article 19 now deals extensively with industries which are severely hurt by imports. Under article 19, these industries could be protected, but action must be taken indiscriminately and must apply to quotas on all nations importing to a particular country. The thought was expressed in Geneva that article 19 should be amended to allow countries to move discriminately in protecting a market which appears to be threatened. In my talks with Mr. Long, he assured me that if countries were allowed to move discriminately under article 19, a strict set of procedures would have to be established and would have to be tried out before action could be taken discriminately because, as can be readily seen, if one were allowed to move discriminately without following a particular procedure, the whole movement toward the liberalization of trade could be harmed.

An hon. Member: What did you say?

Mr. Horner: If the hon. member does not know the meaning of the word, he should look it up in the dictionary. The hon. member spoke about the textile industry and professed not to know why the Retail Council of Canada was in a quandary with respect to the purchase of textiles. As I have explained many times, in accordance with the international fibres agreement we, as Canadians, should attempt not to keep global quotas any longer than necessary. In an attempt to free ourselves of the global quotas which are now in effect in the textile sector, we would have to negotiate bilateral arrangements with the countries importing into Canada. This fall it was our hope that we could get seven of the major countries importing to Canada to agree to some bilateral arrangements. I told the Retail Council of Canada and the Textile Council that we would attempt, until January 1 at least, to establish bilateral agreements.

An hon. Member: Far too late.

Mr. Horner: That is a discretionary opinion. I believe it is not too late. The textile people believe that they must start purchasing now for next fall. I think they can start purchasing on January 1 for next fall from abroad, or they can purchase here at home for next fall. We just moved under article 19 to protect the shoe industry in Canada. We have made considerable inroads in the protection of the textile industry. Many people in that industry have been very grateful for the action which the government took to protect their industry. The shoe industry has been severely hurt in recent years. In 1970, Canadian producers had around 79 per cent of the market. In 1976, they had 58 per cent of the market. In the first seven or eight months of this year, their percentage of the market dropped to 41 per cent. That is why we had to move under article 19 to bring about some kind of stop to the flooding of Canadian markets by imports.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments regarding the over-all concept about the strength of the Canadian economy and the 90-cent dollar. I know that hon. members opposite refer to the drop in value of the Canadian dollar as an indication of the weakness of our economy. I suppose that now it has gone back up to 91.2 cents, they will say it is not an indication that our economy is strengthening.

Mr. Stevens: You like the 90-cent dollar?

Mr. Horner: Yes, the hon. member is right that I like it. Anybody who is an exporter or believes in exporting should like it. It does something to the price of cattle, to the price of wheat, to the price of oil, to the price of gas, to the price of pulp, paper and timber products—all the products we export.

Mr. Stevens: What does it do to our inflation?

Mr. Horner: It has an effect on inflation, but not nearly equal to the benefits gained.

Mr. Stevens: Four per cent is a pretty telling figure.

Mr. Horner: That is your figure, not mine.

Mr. Stevens: It is Dr. Hood's figure.

Mr. Horner: But not mine.

An hon. Member: What about farm machinery?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member is worried about farm machinery. If you manufacture farm machinery in Canada, it should not affect you too much. In any case, I would like to see the Canadian economy take advantage of the 90-cent dollar to push our exports into foreign markets. If we are careful and do not allow excessive prices and excessive wage increases to swallow up the advantage we have gained, we should be able to make substantial gains in markets of the EEC, the United States and even in Japan if we are successful in overcoming their trade barriers.

Certainly, it is my belief that the multilateral trade negotiations which are in progress now will succeed. If they do not, the tendency toward protectionism in this country, in the United States and in the European Common Market, will affect world economy detrimentally because if the multilateral trade negotiations fail and protectionism wins, one country will move ruthlessly against another, costs will soar, the economic balance of countries will be disrupted and everyone will suffer as a result. I do not want to see that happen. It is my belief that we as a nation should work toward greater liberalization of trade. If you study any figures with respect to trade, you will find that as world trade increases, the economy of our country improves.

In my recent travels to the industrial community of Germany, and in my talks with the chairman of the chamber of commerce in Germany and people in Geneva and Brussels, I found that they all assured me that without doubt the future of Canada looks brighter than that of any other nation in the industrial world because we have the ability to become self-sufficient in energy, we have high technology available to us, and we have a highly educated and capable work force.

An hon. Member: And a lousy government.

Mr. Horner: We also see the government cutting down on its growth, with growth in the civil service this year of less than 1 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

● (1642)

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, in listening to this debate, my Francophone friends remind me of a phrase which goes like this, "plus ça change, plus c'est pareil". Translated into English, that means "same old gang". I am glad that this portion of the proceedings of the House of Commons has only limited exposure on television, because I fear for the nation trying to understand these kinds of peregrinations, as a former prime minister used to describe them. At one time, the government which friends on my right used to represent devaluated the Canadian dollar and defended that in growing terms. Members on the other side denounced that as the worst thing which ever happened to the Canadian economy. Now the roles are reversed and we are getting the same conversation but from different people.

I have had the pleasure of listening to the minister in many previous incarnations, and I must say that I enjoyed his speeches more when he wrote them himself rather than having them written for him.

Mr. Horner: I assure you that no one wrote this one for me.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I can believe that.

Mr. Saltsman: I detected a somewhat different style and tone from the intervention which took place today. I also suspect that I have heard this speech before. In the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce there is a standard speech which comes off the shelf, depending upon which minister comes in. It is dusted off, changed a little bit and then paraded before the House as a new policy. Because I am going to be so negative in this speech, I think I should say at least something positive. The positive thing I want to say about the minister's intervention today is at least we have some inkling of the thinking which went on at the trade conference in Tokyo. However, I would be far more confident about the state of negotiations and the outcome of the negotiations if we laid our negotiators on the table rather than papers.

There is something incredibly naive in the position which is being advanced. Tariffs are something we can deal with. Tariffs are something we can argue about if they are transgressed or if they are not honoured, but when it comes to things like non-tariff restraints, how can we really police them? What good is an agreement which is signed respecting something like that? There are many ways by which these things are contravened. For instance, we know that in a number of countries in the world with which we trade and which have non-tariff barriers which are direct government policy nobody, either at the government level or at the business level, will admit that they are practising these things. Somebody has to admit that. Bids are simply lost; something happens which is wrong. The thing is laid out in such a way that we cannot get to anyone in order to talk or to decide.

How can people be taken to court on something like this? How can we make a case if these things are working against us? I think it is naive to believe that we can sign an agreement, knowing the policies of various countries to protect specific industries they feel are sensitive, and come away with some assurance that we have accomplished something, if this is what our negotiators are doing. I agree with the minister and his advisers that the most serious barriers are those invisible, implied non-tariff barriers. They cannot be dealt with. If we are going to give away something and make the position of our industry worse in return for somebody's promise to drop his non-tariff barriers, I think we are going to be the laughing stock of the world. I wish I had more confidence in our negotiators, but I do not, based on past experience.

I have had a lot of experience with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I have had two kinds of experience with the department. One has been good. When I deal with the department on the basis of a fire brigade on an emergency, I have nothing but the highest commendation for the kind of help which has been given to industries in my riding which have been in danger of folding up or which have needed assistance. There are excellent people in the department, and it is unfortunate that they always have to operate in this fire brigade atmosphere. At the last desperate moment they come to an industry's assistance.

However, when it comes to forward-planning or ideas about the future, the performance of the arson squad of the department has been absolutely pathetic. The planning in that department has to be the worst in the government, if there is such a thing as the worst. Perhaps I am being unkind but, frankly, I do not know whether the officials in the department are giving bad advice to the government or whether the officials of the department give the government good advice and it is rejected. In fairness, I suppose we have to hold the government responsible for the things which go wrong.

Minister after minister—and there have been many of them in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—has come before this House and pooh-poohed the whole notion of industrial strategy. I am at least glad to say that as inadequate—and I will come to that—as the minister's suggestion for industrial strategy has been, there is at least some recognition that we need an industrial strategy. What is the sense of going to Tokyo to negotiate concessions when we do not even know what is good for us and when we do not even know the consequences of those negotiations? It is like making love in the dark. I am sure the people who are taking part in the activity are probably aware of what is going on, but nobody else knows what is happening.

Mr. Nystrom: With all these bugs around, are you sure of that?

Mr. Saltsman: We do not know what is going on. We do not even know which industries should be developed and encouraged. Our industrial strategy, to the extent we can say it exists at all, has simply been for the government to say it has done certain things and agreed to certain things, and that is the strategy. It is strategy by accident. But that is not strategy; that is not planning. I think that accounts for the terrible state we are in.

I understand it to be the minister's responsibility to put the best face forward on Canada's trade position. He gives us a list of statistics about increases in the amounts of exports in every single area, but he very carefully omits mentioning imports because that would destroy his whole argument. How much we export is not important; the only things about trade which are important are terms of trade. Are we getting any benefit from our trade? To give an indication of the kind of deep thinking which has always gone on in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I remember one minister who congratulated himself one day and said that we increased our exports by 17 per cent. That was wonderful. But we also increased imports by 18 per cent. That minister could not understand that we had suffered a net loss. It was like a potlatch: we were giving commodities away all over the place, but there was no net benefit.

Why do people bother to trade at all? They trade because they want to get something more or, hopefully, something they want for the things they exchange. They hope for some benefit. We have been trading in a vacuum. We take pride that we are one of the great trading nations of the world, but trade itself is not important; the only things which are important are terms of trade. The United States trade less than 5 per cent of their gross national product. Does that make the United States any less a great nation? We trade infinitely more than that, yet the more we trade, the more we lose in many ways. The minister carefully avoided explaining that kind of equation to this House, because he could not explain it. If he tried, it would be obvious that we are going deeper and deeper into a deficit position, particularly in sensitive employment-creating industries. We have one of the worst records in the world. We have the pattern of an underdeveloped country rather than that of an industrially developed country.

The excuses put by ministers before this House for the absence of an industrial strategy have been of a number of kinds. They always laugh at it, saying it cannot be done and that we do not need it. If pushed hard enough by the opposition, they occasionally talk about sectorial strategies and about a study of the textile industry or the furniture industry, without understanding the role of either in the economy. They go on and on like that, but occasionally someone is honest and straightforward enough to admit that it is politically difficult.

I can understand that argument. The moment you start to plan and design, you create difficulties. The easiest thing is to do nothing. That is what this government has done—it has taken the easy way out and done nothing. It has said that Canadians are spoiled rotten. It is this government that is spoiled rotten, Mr. Speaker. It has done nothing in this area, and then expresses surprise that the economy is in the shape it is.

From what we have heard, it seems to me that in some ways the government is moving in the direction of freer international trade. They are doing what was done in England when the government there found it could not manage the economy. They wanted to move into the common market, not because of the obvious advantages but because they saw it as a way of disciplining their economy. This government is talking about moving in the direction of freer trade despite the alternatives that are open to it. It is admitting it does not know how to handle the situation and that perhaps if Canadians are thrown to the wolves—kicked in the gut, sort of thing—they will find some way of surviving. In other words, the government will get the international community to do the things it is afraid to do and cannot accept responsibility for. The fact that a kick in the gut hurts, or that it may be pretty deadly, is overlooked.

The minister accuses friends on my right of talking out of both sides of their mouths—not that they are not capable of doing it, for all of us are capable of doing it sometimes, but he does not understand that by and large people have a commitment to free trade. Most people want to see trade liberalized around the world. We do not want a situation that does not benefit us. However, particularly when this government does not have a clue where it is going and what constitutes benefit, this is the real dilemma. I wish we had some sense that the government has done some planning and studying. Perhaps it has, but if so, we certainly do not know about it and there has been no indication of it.

A few years ago I participated in an experiment at the University of Waterloo through a course on designing an industrial strategy. The university decided on this because the minister of industry, trade and commerce of that time kept insisting it was not possible to have an industrial strategy, and that it was a laughable concept—just for kids. Now, of course, the government is a little more amenable to the idea. There is a way of planning an industrial strategy, and we did it; but not in the vague way the minister put before the House today.

We are not a stupid people, Mr. Speaker. A lot of people in this country could assist the government to design an industrial strategy if they cannot do it themselves. A great deal has been written on the subject. The Science Council of Canada has done excellent work. The Economic Council of Canada has done excellent work, and even Mackenzie King, following World War II, put out a good development paper on full employment. The foreign policy review for Canadians also put forth an industrial strategy.

What is important is that all industrial strategies have to start with some objectives. You do not start in a vacuum; you have to ask what we are trying to do for the country. One of the things that runs through the four studies I mentioned is full employment. This has been a constant Canadian goal and a constant Canadian failure. Despite every commitment to full employment, except for very brief periods we have not been able to achieve it because nobody followed through on the political objectives set out in the study papers.

In developing an industrial strategy, you ask questions about what industries would best survive in the kind of Canada we see, and what kind of industries would meet your objectives. If you are looking for full employment, it does not make sense to pursue the policies this country has pursued almost from its inception of encouraging vast sums of money into resource development. There have been tragic failures when those resource developments are depleted and promises are not kept, as was the case in the province of my friend.

It would cost almost $1 million today to create one job in those gigantic resource developments, so when you need 300,000 jobs in a year these gigantic projects are not going to be very fruitful. You have to concentrate on more labour-intensive industries.

Mr. Speaker, my guide, mentor and leader is indicating to me that I have two minutes left. I have an amendment to move. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House expresses its concern at the apparent strategy being used at the current GATT negotiations, which will sacrifice some sectors of our manufacturing industry, and the jobs associated with them, in return for increased export opportunities for unprocessed and semi-processed raw materials, thus condemning Canada to remain as an exporter of raw materials to more industrially developed nations.".

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, if we consider all the debates that we have about the industrial sector, it is apparent that there is a real problem in this area. Last week, we of the Social Credit Party of Canada proposed a motion in this regard. Today the official opposition has also moved a motion related to the possibility of developing our Canadian industries so as to create more jobs and to stabilize the industrial sector.

I do not want to criticize simply for the pleasure of criticizing or to condemn the present administrators more than necessary, but I would like to tell the House how the industry should be organized and what means we should take to try to put some order where disorder now prevails, and mostly much concern on the part of Canadian manufacturers. The representations that we make regularly and the practical suggestions that are sometimes made show that the federal government should consider the suggestions of the people who are familiar with this area.

I remember quite well that at the beginning of the present session, on October 18, 1977, the Speech from the Throne said that high rates of unemployment and inflation were clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies appropriate to simpler times. They are also signals of the urgent need for important structural adjustments in the economies of Canada and other industrialized countries. Also according to the Speech from the Throne, they are the symptoms of an illness which can be cured only by a re-adjustment of our values, and by a rediscovery of the merits of self-discipline and fair sharing. During another debate, I said that the intentions of the federal government to re-adjust the economic situation should result in legislation better adapted to present needs.

All hon. members are aware that much time has been lost in useless discussions; because of the installation of a television system many of us have tried to get more coverage without giving enough thought to the serious attitude which should prevail in this Parliament so that we may find real solutions to the many difficulties facing Canadians.

There are many problems and it is quite difficult to choose one that should be given priority: unemployment is increasing continually as is inflation created by a financial system in constant contradiction with present economic realities. The control methods implemented have shown that it was easier to control wages than prices. As we approach the decontrol stage, let us wish that results will be better. There is also the problem of distributing quotas to dairy producers and the delay in payments to fluid milk producers. The farming industry is a very important sector. Those who are responsible for that distribution have certainly been very careless in coming to grips with that kind of problem.

We all know that Canadian manufacturers have many difficulties to orient their production in an economically efficient way considering the inconvenience of the competition which is often unfavourable to them on several aspects. In the field of textile and footwear particularly, the government will have to make a decision and it is urgent, to find something else than slowness, inefficiency or motherhood statements which until now did not give Canadian manufacturers the guarantees needed to contribute positively to maintain and create the jobs so badly needed at this time of chronic unemployment.

A paper entitled Action Program submitted by the Canadian Manufacturers Association to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and all hon. members of the House pointed out the main factors of the productivity unsteadiness of manufactures. The contents of that paper is a recapitulation of valuable and practical suggestions made by people who have to face the day to day problems caused by international competition on the Canadian market which is too often directly responsible for lower employment in Canada. I shall quote clause 5 of part 1 of that action program which draws to the legislator's attention what could be done to improve the situation. I quote:

> The competition policy should be enshrined in our statutes. It should promote the dynamic trends of the market and allow the interference of government only in cases where the abuse of the market power is a barrier to the realization of actual cost savings. To that end, Bill C-42 should be significantly changed particularly as concerns amalgamations, joint monopolies, price differentiation and indirect actions as we pointed out in our separate paper on that bill.

As a matter of fact, they were saying that they had already mentioned the delay which may result from Bill C-42. The November 26, 1977 edition of Le Devoir featured a large size advertisement which was paid by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and which indicated that some 45,000 medium and small size businesses in Canada are demanding a reorganization of our economy. The purpose is to develop a system of free competition in Canada and obtain for independent businessmen a greater say in the administration of the legislation which governs business and the nation.

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

Those who are in favour of restricting the imports of clothing in Canada argue that keeping people at work is better than paying them unemployment insurance and other welfare benefits. Our textile industry generally meets the international standards of productivity; it should not have to compete unfairly with an industry situated in world areas which are providing special tax concessions as well as cheap labour.

The establishment and expansion of an industry in any region will never take place by chance. The establishment of an industry requires several favourable factors: first of all the entrepreneur, manpower and capital. Those are the three main factors, but several others are needed to ensure the survival and expansion of an industry; a climate of security and stability is sought by any industrialist.

It is obvious that the serious entrepreneur wants to be sure that the investments in a new industry will be secure and stable. In our ever changing world, small and medium-sized industries are faced with problems of adaptation, the solution of which is closely related to their survival. The vulnerability and fragility of small and medium-sized industries are facts which have to be taken seriously, first of all by governments and also by employees who owe their subsistence to the jobs thus created. The present circumstances are well suited to show that the private sector's role is not to deal with and settle all the society's evils. It does not exist to do that. There are some who ask for the suppression of private enterprise and its replacement by state enterprise, under the pretense that private enterprise has not been able to solve the problem of the fair distribution of goods and services. It is not the duty of private enterprise to see to it that the goods which it produces be fairly distributed. Such is the role of the government which is endowed with all the powers to act in the distribution of goods. The prime function of enterprise is to provide goods and services at the cheapest possible cost in order to satisfy the existing needs.

It is not by entrusting to state enterprises the role which is presently played by private enterprise that the issue of distribution will find its solution. The same problems will keep existing because, in fact, only the name and the owners of these enterprises will have changed but the root of the problem will have been left intact. The distribution of goods is a role which belongs to the state. And so long as the state will not decide to assume such a role, there will still be problems of distribution. Modern production capacity is practically unlimited, with regard to both volume and diversity. Usually when we do not choose to carry out massive destructions, such as in war-time, or by creating artificial shortages, products are offered or can easily be offered in great supply to answer the needs of consumers. The economic issue of modern times is not therefore a problem of production but a problem of distribution.

The final objective of production must not be profit, but the satisfaction of human needs. However, profit is an incentive which has proved itself and to suppress it completely would result in taking the chance of considerably reducing the production output and thereby frustrating consumers by imposing a shortage. If it is necessary to denounce abuses committed by certain enterprises which are monopolies, it is not by replacing them with state corporations which are in fact another type of inefficient monopolies, most often running large deficits, that consumers will find their advantage, no matter how small it is.

An economic system capable of maintaining a reasonable profit incentive while ensuring a fair distribution of produced goods would serve the interests of both producers and consumers. Instead of criticizing private enterprise, let us see what can be improved in it. By trying to get private enterprise to accomplish things beyond its realm of competence, all levels of government have surrounded it with a stiffening bureaucracy which prevents it from functioning well and providing all the output it is capable of. It should be more appropriate to howl against the bureaucracy which has everyone at wits' end instead of criticizing private enterprise. Furthermore, the cost of that inefficient bureaucracy is tremendous and increases every day. So it is not surprising that government budgets should constantly go up without an expansion in services. The cost of the bureaucracy is added to the cost of goods, and in the final analysis the consumer and the taxpayer must foot the bill.

Quite regularly, Canadian businesses call to the attention of the government, through briefs or other means of pressure, the amendments they would like to see brought in to the legislation to ensure the development of existing industries and the creation of new ones. It would be absolutely necessary that our administrators take into account the representations made by industry leaders and fashion their legislation so as to allow those concerned to contribute more to the improvement of economic conditions and reduce the rate of unemployment which has become the number one problem in Canada.

Most of the over one million small, independent businesses in Canada are small operations and many are sole proprietorships. In numerical terms, they form the greater number. Although 90 per cent of Canadian companies employ more than 200 people each, collectively, they account for 65 per cent of the country's labour force. To say that small businesses are the backbone of Canada's economic life is not a banal thing—it is a fact. Outside its impact in terms of employment, as we just saw, small businesses can offer solutions to socio-economic crises such as the migration toward urban centres or the quality of life.

An article published in the newspaper in my area, the St-Laurent dated February 9, 1977, under the heading:

Industrialization, maturity and moderation—

—pointed out various factors that contribute a great deal to the establishment of new industries.

In these circumstances some reference to that article are in order. Here is the first quote:

Advantages include a climate of security and stability under which the firm can feel it is making a safe and lasting investment.

A welcoming spirit in the community, both municipal authorities and the people; a perception by community leaders and citizens of the contribution made by a firm to the local economy; the desire among the industry's workers to ensure not only good performance but also expansion, through a sense of responsibility and understanding going sometimes to the extent of voluntary sacrifice are also worthy of consideration, especially in the current circumstances where job opportunities are getting scarce.

In areas where it is desired, industrial development is also a matter of maturity and restraint.

Maturity means a sense of realities which, among citizens and leaders and government authorities may be described as a pragmatic, serious approach under which discrimination is made between wishful thinking and reality, between those things that can harm the common good and those that must rationally be accepted in a common betterment perspective.

On the restraint theme at the national level, the article goes on to state, it has often been indicated:

That in a number of areas excessive union claims as to industrial wages and fringe benefits are mainly responsible for the excessive costs of production making our products less and less competitive on the international market place.

Further on, coming back to the local aspect of the situation, we read, and I quote:

. . . not only is it important for industrialists to feel that they are welcome in the area, in addition the work force must understand that excessive wage demands can at times impede the expansion of the industry and its competitiveness in the markets where the goods it produces are sold.

The problem of the salaries the employer must pay his employees is the key problem of any industry. It is the cause of its success, of strikes and a constant source of difficulties. Too often we forget that salaries are a flexible tool, always perfectible, with which an able manager can win the good services and the respect of his employees. Management, through it, can avoid having to deal constantly with the touchy problem of discipline and thus considerably decrease maintenance costs and losses. Often wise administration of salaries, plus the competence of the manager, guarantee a company a dynamic management.

If seems difficult at times to inspire the employees the interest they should have in the industry on which they depend for their livelihood; yet, it is quite normal to have some interest, even as an employee, since the daily bread served on the family table depends on its revenue. Unfortunately, today the attitude it very often quite different. In some cases, people do no more than what is necessary to keep their jobs. Yet, the workers do determine what salaries will be since they are the ones who keep the business or the industry operating. Often the financial success of a business depends on their behaviour. In fact, it would seem that when once we have managed to make the worker wholly responsible for his salary, and that of his fellow workers, the problem will have been solved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has now expired.

● (1712)

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that in his remarks this afternoon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) chose to put on the record only one side of the equation when talking about fully manufactured products. While we gave the trade figures for exports over a span of years, he failed to indicate what were the import figures and what was the surplus or deficit during that period. Therefore, I thought it might be interesting to read into the record the various trade balances between the period 1970 and 1976. In 1970 the trade deficit on manufactured products was $2,973 million; in 1971 it was $3,232 million; and in 1972 it was $4,613 million. In 1973, it was $6,188 million; in 1974 it was $8,796 million; in 1975 the deficit was $9,812 million; in 1976 it was just under $10 million; and for the first six months of 1977, Canada is showing a trade deficit in fully manufactured products of $5,484 million. If this is placed on an annual basis, the result will be a trade deficit of $10,968 million and some people in industry say it will be $11.5 billion. Mr. Speaker, that is a deplorable record, and I suggest it is deplorable for any minister to try to defend it.

Our second concern—and it is one of the main reasons for the initiation of this debate today—relates to unemployment consequent upon industrial weakness. As we know, the total number of unemployed, according to figures released the other day, is some 900,000. Relating the figure directly to the manufacturing industries, we find there are 295,000 unemployed in the major manufacturing areas of Quebec and 235,000 in Ontario. In the manufacturing area directly in this past year, employment in Ontario has fallen by 18,000 jobs and in Quebec it has fallen by 25,000 jobs. So it is frightening for a minister to stand in his place and tell us things are rosy or that he is really not very much concerned about what is going on in Geneva.

We on this side are very concerned about the GATT negotiations, mainly because representatives of the manufacturing industries have contacted us to ask what is going on. We get back to them and say, "You should know, through the tariff board or through your trade associations. After all, you submitted a brief, along with other Canadian industries." They say, "Yes, we did all that, but we cannot find out what is going on."

Every time members on this side ask a question about what is happening, all we hear from whichever minister chooses to answer is, "We cannot reveal our negotiating position." Mr. Speaker, our party went so far as to send one of our own members to Geneva a couple of years ago to try to find out informally what was happening. He did his best to do so, but eventually he came back and said, "All I got was the usual PR briefing which is given to the press." To my mind, the best thing would be to have Mr. Gray or Mr. Ward go there and let members of parliament talk to them. I should like to see a wide open meeting at which we could talk to them for a day, if we wanted to do so. This might give us a chance to learn what is going on. I am sick and tired of getting back to people in the manufacturing industry, presidents of companies, and telling them, "I don't know what is going on any more than you do, because I cannot find out from the ministers concerned."

One manufacturer and I tried the unusual route of getting in touch with Washington to see if we could find out, through the Americans, what Canadians are doing. I suggest this reflects a sad state of affairs. I do not accept that we ought not to be told what is going on. The way this government operates as far as secrecy is concerned, about the only piece of paper which is not labelled "secret" or "confidential" is what we find in the washroom. I apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); sometimes I get a little wound up on these matters.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce recently returned from a visit to Brussels. Members will recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was there a few years ago for what were known as the "contractual link" meetings. A document was signed and everything looked great—links with the ECM were to be strengthened and things were to be great for Canadian suppliers. I happened to be in Brussels about a month after the Prime Minister was there. I have some friends who work in the ECM office in Brussels, and I asked them what went on. They said, "Our position is very simple. What the Community wants is a long-term agreement with respect to certain basic raw materials produced in Canada, principally iron ore and uranium. We want them with no strings attached. We want a long-term supply at fixed prices, and if you are prepared to negotiate this with us, we are prepared to give you some special status as far as the Common Market is concerned." That is the position in reality, Mr. Speaker, and very little has happened since.

Now the new minister has given us the same platitudes. We are told, "There are great plans afoot. A lot of things are on the drawing board. Other prospects are coming up." These words should stick in his throat. I have heard this kind of thing from four or five ministers of industry, trade and commerce—and nothing comes up. The ECM is a private community dedicated to free trade for manufactured products within its own members. There is a prohibition on the import of all food products which compete with those of its own farmers. I am interested in what the government intends to do beyond going cap-in-hand to the ECM. Surely, there is some other position Canada can take.

Speaking recently in western Canada, Ambassador Enders proposed a package deal between Canada and the U.S. under which the U.S. would be prepared in certain circumstances to offer substantial tariff cuts. I happen to think this is a good starting point. But what is Canada's position? Do we have a clear idea of where we wish to go and what we want from the Americans? I do not think we have.

● (1732)

I thought I noted a glimmer of hope in the comments of the minister today. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) commented on the quality of the minister's speech, so I will not say very much about it. Like that hon. member, I have heard it all before. There was very little new in it. We could probably go through Hansard and pick out most of his comments from speeches made by previous ministers of that department. Perhaps a good part of it was from a pat speech that lies on the shelf over in that department which the officials pull out and hand to a new and inexperienced minister so that he can retread it all over again.

I noted a little glimmer of hope in the minister's speech when he began to speak of industrial strategy. I am really sorry that he did not continue. I think he might have made a considerable contribution to this debate today had he expanded his remarks about an industrial strategy.

The minister began to talk about taxation and tariff policies, and said a little bit about co-ordination of taxation policies. Herein lies many of the difficulties we face. I do not know how much co-ordination there is between the Department of Finance and the Department of Industry; between the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; between the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but can you imagine at a time when our industry is producing at about 73 per cent or 80 per cent capacity this government introduces competition legislation?

An hon. Member: It is ridiculous.

Mr. Kempling: Can you imagine that?

An hon. Member: It is very Liberal.

Mr. Kempling: Can you think of a more ridiculous position at this time? It is very Liberal, but it is a very ridiculous position. Any number of people in business have said that this is the last thing we need.

Any industrial strategy that is put forth has to reflect and deal with co-ordination of government departments. We see this sort of thing going on continually. One of my colleagues was speaking yesterday on Bill C-11 and referred to the difficulties one of his constituents is having with the Department of National Revenue. This gentleman manufactures a wood burning heater almost identical to a unit imported from the United States. The one manufactured in Canada is classified differently by National Revenue from the imported unit, consequently its price is 12 per cent higher in Canada by reason of some bureaucratic decision. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) did not really answer the question, but suggested to the hon. member that he would have to wait until the next budget before any change could be made to the regulations under which the gentlemen of the Department of National Revenue are working. That is a lot of nonsense. Somebody in the Department of National Revenue made an assessment of this piece of heating equipment which was wrong. We do not require an act of parliament to change a regulation set in place by a bureaucrat, let me assure you of that.

An hon. Member: Just one word from the minister is required, that is all.

Mr. Kempling: All we need is one word from the minister; that is correct, as my colleague suggests.

If we look broadly at Canadian industry I think we can divide it into five rather distinct groupings. First we have natural resource development and production. The second group would fall under basic manufacturing of resource products, that is, oil, natural gas, raw metals, pulp and logs—into fuels, plastics, textiles, sheet metal, wire, tubes, paper and lumber. The third group would be product manufacturing, such as automobiles, tractors, computers and appliances. You could break that down into probably three subgroups of component manufacturers who manufacture clothing and special assemblies and controls for large component manufacturers. The fourth group would be public utilities, that is, regulated natural monopolies such as hydroelectric commissions. And the fifth group would be services.

It seems to me, having these five groups, it would be relatively simple to look into the tariff structure and taxation policies within these groups and make some adjustments. My colleague has reminded me that I have only five minutes left so I want to get to another thought, but as I said earlier, I wonder what we have beyond GATT and an attempt to get into the EEC with hat in hand.

My colleague, the former leader of our party, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), suggested in a speech some while ago that perhaps we should be taking a hemispheric approach to our trade. It is my hope that we are not going to hang all our hopes on negotiations at Geneva, because I do not think we will get very far.

In spite of what has been done so far I believe there is a feeling of protectionism around the world. All European countries are concerned about unemployment, just as we are in this country. I think it is only natural to be somewhat protective. I do not think this country or European countries can afford to be expansionary, going into freer trade. Probably some concessions can be made, but I think we must have another bargaining position. I hope members opposite will consider very seriously the proposition put forward by Ambassador Andrews, as well as by the former leader of our party, that we should take a hemispheric approach to trade.

We should look at North America first, Canada and the United States. We should then consider Central and South America. Following that we should perhaps see if we can encompass New Zealand and Australia, and, if they get their problems worked out, perhaps we could encompass South Africa as well. In this way there is a tremendous avenue for trade, and we talk of trade not only in terms of manufactured products but in terms of some of our raw materials as well. If we limit ourselves in future to the one approach to trade for our manufacturing industry we will not be doing a service to the citizens of Canada or, of course, to solving the immediate problem of unemployment here.

We have to look beyond GATT and beyond the European Economic Community. We must ask ourselves what happens if GATT negotiations continue for another year. We must ask ourselves what happens if this feeling of protectionism continues; where do we go from there and what alternatives have we? Are we going to do anything to reduce the tremendous trade deficit which now exists? Where are we going if the market for basic materials continues to be soft? If the pulp market continues to be soft in future, what do we do then? How will we compete with the pulp production that will be coming from Brazil, and the great increase in pulp production from Indonesia and the southern United States?

What strategies should we develop to overcome these situations, and should we be looking at a little different approach and a little different market? Perhaps we should be suggesting that our place is not in the European Economic Community as a major trader, but rather we should be developing a trading zone or area of our own. It would be proper, in my opinion, for Canada to develop this theme at this time because of the situation in Europe now. Unemployment is very high there, as you know, and those countries are very concerned and protective. I do not think we are going to get very far with them. It would be a good lever for Canada to have another approach to the idea of how and where we are going to place our products in future. We must have an industrial strategy. Certainly we are not going to find continuous markets for our resource products. We will have to develop more manufacturing in this country in order to employ our people. We have a good labour force which is experienced, intelligent, and which I know can produce.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in this debate and I want to get as quickly and as directly as I can to the subject of the motion. However, I cannot resist the temptation to comment on a suggestion made by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) in the course of his remarks, that this is not the time for Canada to seek to improve its competition policy. Why is it not the time for Canada to seek to improve its competition policy? He says it is because any number of businessmen in this country will indicate that this is the wrong time to do it, with unused capacity in the economy. Perhaps there are businesses that do not want to see the competition policy in this country improved, but those are the big businesses in our society. They benefit to an extreme degree by being able to concentrate their production.

There is more concentration in the Canadian industrial economy than in any other industrial country in the world. This is a very serious problem. It is not something, as has been suggested, about which we should be patting ourselves on the back. It should not be allowed to persist, because at this time there is a 70 per cent or 83 per cent unused capacity in our economy.

Recently at Queen's Park there was an example raised of coffee being produced and processed in Canada. That very product sold for nearly double in Canada the price it sold for in the United States. There are various reasons for this. There is sales tax, which is different in both countries. There is a difference which relates to the size of the store concerned. One of the reasons that the prices to the consumer are higher in Canada is the higher degree of concentration which exists in the Canadian marketplace. Perhaps that means someone in this country is making profits. I am in favour of profits. Profits is not a bad word; but higher prices do not necessarily mean higher profits. Companies can be less efficient, which is the trouble with having inadequate competition in the Canadian economy. There is not the same efficiency which would be produced if competition were taken more seriously and improved.

[Mr. Kempling.]

The competition bill has had first reading. It has been reviewed by committee. I am disappointed the hon. member opposite is not in favour of seeing that bill coming forward as quickly as possible, because it does and will improve the state of competition in our economy.

An hon. Member: How many jobs will it create?

Mr. Kaplan: The question raised by the hon. member opposite has been asked before. It is relevant to discuss the concept of creating jobs. Many members have suggested ways of creating more jobs in Canada. I should remind hon. members that if the problem were simply finding work for people, it would be easily solved. It is possible to introduce programs which would have everyone in Canada working tomorrow, or one week from now. But, what would they be doing?

Members opposite have suggested various programs which should be created, particularly members of the New Democratic Party. These programs would result in everyone working, but they would not be producing things which people want to pay for, either to pay for themselves, to pay for on the part of consumers in other countries, or to pay for within our own economy as taxpayers.

People in my constituency have reminded me about the war experience. They have said that during the war it was easy, and the government had no difficulty finding jobs for everybody. In fact there was a shortage of labour even though we were a newly industrializing society with many unskilled hands around. These people ask why we cannot have programs like that now. There is a very big difference. During the war, while everyone was working, this country was getting poorer and poorer. If the wartime economy had continued, the shortages of goods and services would have continued, and the country would have continued to get poorer and poorer, as we were making things for which price did not matter, because the items were required, sent across the sea, and destroyed in war. There is little to learn from an experience like that.

What would be achieved if work is created for people by implementing some of the suggested programs? Perhaps these things would benefit or improve Canadian society or the economy, such as make-work projects, environmental clean up projects, and capital works projects. In a sense those things are beneficial, but they are not things Canadians are willing to buy and pay for. They are not things Canadians are willing to see their governments increase public spending to pay for, and certainly they are not things foreigners want to buy.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) dismissed the resource industry. He indicated that the trouble with the resource industry as a creator of jobs, as an economic factor, and as one of the bases of the Canadian economy, is that it costs $1 million to create one job today. How far off the mark can one be? The jobs which have been created historically in that sector, since this country was formed, are the source of the standard of life of Canada today. More than any other sector, the resource sector has been the one which Canadians can thank for the major contribution it has made to our way of life, for giving us the industrial tools to open up new parts of this country, and for holding this country together as a viable economy.

I wish the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) had been present in the Chamber when his hon. colleague was writing off the resource business and indicating that it was not a business for Canada to be involved in, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Nickel Belt has been on his feet continuously asking the government to support the resource industry in his constituency. He has suggested some proposals which were sincerely motivated, but some of which were unrealistic. These proposals were an attempt to make sure Canada remained in the resource industry. There is nothing wrong with the resource industry. If it costs $1 million to create one job, one must remember we simply do not want the creation of one job. We want the creation of jobs which enrich the standard of life for Canadians. The resource sector has produced that type of job for Canadians and will continue to do so, unless the philosophy being advocated by members opposite is adopted by the government.

Our objective is to get Canadians working at doing things which are valuable to them, saleable in foreign markets, and which will give us the necessary foreign exchange in order to purchase things being produced in other countries.

Turning to the concept of free trade, I should like to put forward some thought about that in the remaining time I have. Canadians, perhaps more than anyone else in the world, are attached to the idea of free trade. It seems to be more than simply an economic theory, as far as Canada is concerned. When free trade is mentioned as a concept, it has an ethical value. Canadians feel free trade is correct. There is a great deal in that. It is a philosophy which leads to a better international community which gives opportunities to developing countries to climb on to the engines of prosperity and do the various things other countries have done themselves. Some underdeveloped countries have developed to the point where they are able to give their citizens a high standard of life.

Developing countries have been too literal in their search for models and have tended to copy the example of eighteenth century and nineteenth century England. At that time the United Kingdom went through its industrial revolution, which was built on the textile business. Later it was developed into the shoe business. In various developing countries the literal message taken has been, "let us get into the textile business because it worked in England in the nineteenth century. Let us get into the shoe business—it worked in England in the late nineteenth century." The result of all that has been a glut in those two industries, which has caused serious problems for the textile and shoe industries in all developed countries, in ours perhaps more than others.

I do not know very much about the textile and shoe business in other countries, but in Canada I know that these industries are in very serious trouble because of the glut that has been created by the developing countries copying that model. In a sense I do not think I have heard anyone in the House attack the government measures that have been designed to support these industries, but those measures adopted by the Canadian government for these industries—which, incidentally, I support as well—are not consistent in the long term with the kind of free trade goals for which most Canadians stand. So we have responded in the way that other developed countries have responded, with some kind of anti-free trade temporary measures.

There are other measures that operate against the goal of free trade which, as I indicated, is generally supported, as a concept by all Canadians. There are all kinds of non-tariff barriers which have been developed, and I think that in Canada perhaps the non-tariff barriers are far less significant as a block to imports than they are in any other country.

I heard last night from one of my constituents that his neighbour is an importer of cocoa mats. He told me that the importer was very unhappy with the government and that he would never vote Liberal again because of his experiences recently. I asked my friend for details, and it turns out that a shipment of cocoa mats from India arrived at the customs in Canada. This man had ordered the mats. He went down to start processing them. Incidentally, these cocoa mats are one third the price of the rubber doormats that are manufactured in Canada. They are not nearly as durable, but they are far less expensive.

He tells me that, in his opinion, the officials of the Canadian government were deliberately delaying releasing those cocoa mats so that he could bring them into Canada and sell them. "Is this the kind of thing for which the Canadian government wishes to claim responsibility, to make it more expensive for consumers to buy these cocoa mats, because it costs me $50 or $60 a day to be there every day, fighting to get the cocoa mat documentation approved to get the mats into the country?" he asked.

I did not know whether in fact the delay which he encountered was really caused by deliberate stalling as a kind of non-tariff barrier, but I was able to tell him some of the adventures which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) had related in the House about the difficulty Canadian farmers have met in getting products into the U.S. market, about how trucks full of strawberries and tomatoes going down to the U.S. market from Canada in the summer will be kept sitting for days and days while they rot, while documentation is examined and they are searched for marijuana and other products that are not on the list, in other words, by a whole variety of measures whose purpose, at least to the exporter from Canada, appeared to be to slow down trade.

We know very well that there are a great many non-tariff barriers which have to be addressed. If anything, Canada has been a boy scout with respect to non-tariff barriers. You do not see that anywhere as markedly in Canadian society as you do in government procurement. I noticed that this government seems ready to accept foreign goods virtually on the same terms as Canadian goods, provided of course that the price is lower. I recall hearing about the turbines purchased recently from the Soviet government by B.C. Hydro.

An hon. Member: Alberta Hydro.

Mr. Kaplan: Or was it Japanese turbines purchased by B.C. Hydro, when we have perfectly good industries which are, unfortunately, in central Canada. Perhaps that was held against them in B.C. I am not certain if that was the objection to them, but it is obvious that these non-tariff barriers will make it very much more difficult for us to approach the goal of free trade that I think we would find to be in our own best interests.

It was argued from the other side that free trade is not really the goal of the other industrialized countries but that, for example, the EEC countries, as the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth said, want free trade in manufactured goods within their own territory. I think he is wrong about that. I would not want to guess what the public opinion in EEC countries is, but I know that protectionism is a very easy option for the man in the street who feels his job is threatened or who finds his son or daughter has difficulty getting a job.

The problem of the high number of unemployed in Europe will not be solved by increasing protectionism and closing the doors tighter, except at the price of reducing the standard of living of the people in western Europe, and I do not think that is a desirable option for them. Their leaders know that, and they know that opening their doors in return for having increased access to other markets would bring more benefits to them.

Then there is the problem of Japan. Japan wants increased access for its own goods, but so far it has managed to keep its doors shut relatively tight to make it very difficult for Europe, for Canada and for the United States to have the opportunity to get into its markets. What a shot in the arm it would be for the economy of Europe, of the United States and for our economy, to have a chance at an open door into Japan on the same kind of terms that Japan has had here!

The hon. member member for Waterloo-Cambridge said a moment ago that his past experience with tariff negotiations had made him very pessimistic. He said that our record in the past justified a lack of confidence in how successful our negotiators at Geneva will be in this round. I do not know what experience he is looking at, but if he is looking at the Kennedy Round, the last liberalization of tariffs, he would have to concede that that particular venture was extremely beneficial to Canada. Canada came away from the Kennedy Round with many more opportunities than it had before, and with relatively fewer sacrifices by its industries than were made other countries.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. this day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I speak tonight on this opposition motion. I consider this to be one of the most important debates we are going to have in this House in this session because the government has not really addressed itself to the question of the GATT negotiations at Geneva. It is also one of the most important issues which will affect Canada not only at the present time but also well into the 1990's and possibly beyond. I think that can be borne out by the number of questions which have been asked by members of the opposition over the past few months. I would like to deal tonight with what I consider to be the most important parts of the GATT negotiations at Geneva, and also to deal at some length with agriculture as it pertains to GATT and with what we in Canada would like to see in terms of our negotiations.

The long-term goal for the Canadian economy still should be one of free trade. That should be something to keep in the back of our minds. I believe it should also be in our minds when any policy is formulated, but the reality in Canada today is such that to pursue a free trade policy at this time would be in my opinion—and I think this is emerging as the consensus in the Canadian community—sheer madness. The following illustrates this point.

In terms of our total merchandise trade our country has had a surplus since the early 1960's, with the exception of 1975 when our exports were severely curtailed by the recession in the United States. On the face of this evidence one might conclude that we really do not have a trade problem at all. Unfortunately, this long string of surpluses in total merchandise trade has tended to obscure some of the rather alarming trends in the secondary manufacturing sector, and this is the area to which I would like to address myself tonight.

All during the 1960's there was an annual trade deficit in manufactured products of about $3 billion. This deficit has been growing larger since the beginning of this decade, and last year it was well over $10 billion. This worsening trade deficit in manufactured products cannot be attributed to just one or two areas. The sad fact is that Canada's trade deficit in manufactured products is getting worse in every single commodity group and with every important country with which we trade. Up until just a few years ago we were content to let our exports of natural resources offset the growing deficit in manufactured products, and this has certainly been well documented. However, in the past few years we have been jolted into a realization that our resources are not infinite.

The question which must be asked is: how much longer can we continue to rely on our exports of raw materials and semi-processed goods to offset our inadequate performance in our secondary sector? How much longer can we continue to ignore the number of lost job opportunities resulting from this inadequate performance? In very rough terms, last year's $10 billion trade deficit in manufactured goods translated into somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200,000 jobs for the Canadian economy.

The federal government's rationale appears to be that Canadian manufacturing companies are not competitive because the market is too small to provide economies of scale in manufacturing such as those available to companies in Europe, Japan and the United States. Therefore we should seek access to those markets, and the mechanism to achieve this is a reduction of tariffs and the removal of non-tariff barriers. This philosophy, in my opinion, is based on theoretical consideration, and it ignores the reality of world trade as it functions, and the realities of the economic environment in which we operate here in Canada. Canadian companies are not competing with French, British or Japanese companies but against the combined efforts of those companies and the governments of the countries in which they operate.

The negotiating strategy of those countries at Geneva are part of the industrial strategies of the countries, and those industrial strategies reflect the philosophy that a strong domestic base for industry is a necessary prerequisite to a competitive export position. However, in Canada we do not have that equivalent, articulated industrial strategy. In addition to this we do not have a competitive and economic environment from which to operate.

Trade issues for Canada are very complex but there are two outstanding matters that must be given serious consideration. First is the cost crisis, and second our proximity to the United States. I should like to deal with both very briefly.

Dealing first with cost, we find that material costs in Canada are in general higher than they are in countries with which we compete—those being the EEC, the United States and Japan. While the basic raw materials may not carry substantially higher costs, the semi-processed materials going into manufacturing carry the higher cost of wage rates, taxation, interest rates and social programs that are in advance of those in other countries with which we compete. That is one of the reasons why it is extremely difficult for Canada to attain a comparable standard of efficiency. Secondary manufacturing, in turn, has the higher cost of plant construction, equipment costs, labour rates, interest rates, and social programs.

The average labour rates in manufacturing in Canada are now about 65 cents per hour above those in the United States. Particular rates show an even greater spread depending on the various commodities and areas about which we are talking. We are therefore vulnerable to lower cost imports, and the $10 billion deficit in manufactured goods is a tangible manifestation of our problem.

In short, we are in no position to take advantage of the access we are trying to negotiate, and we are vulnerable to the further access we are prepared to grant.

Cost regulations on such matters as packaging and minimum wages, the cost of running the public service, the rapid and accumulated moves to enrich social programs, are all problems that we, as a country, must face up to and try to solve if we are to be competitive.

What is really being said is that we must get our house in order before seeking access to lower cost markets and before granting easier access to Canada for producers in those markets.

This brings us to the matter of Canada's proximity to the United States. We cannot talk about our economic position or the GATT negotiations without talking about Canada vis-à-vis the United States. In recent months several studies have been made on the cost of manufacturing in the United States relative to such costs in Canada. They all indicate that the cost to manufacturers in the United States is 20 per cent to 25 per cent lower than in Canada, and it is not the scale of manufacturing that determines the difference, as the government would have us believe. The difference is in the cost of plant construction, cost of equipment, cost of labour, cost of capital, and cost of many forms of taxation. The scale of manufacturing does have an effect but it is certainly not as drastic an effect as the above-mentioned factors.

If we were to seek a greater share of the United States market with the greater access that is being negotiated, I do not believe that we would be able to compete from Canada. The threat we face is that large, efficient, low-cost manufacturing exists today in the United States, and a significant cut in tariffs will make it just that much easier for it to sell in Canada.

In summing up our negotiating position, I do not believe that the government has conducted adequate studies of the impact on unemployment and on investment that will arise from the result of the current round of trade negotiations. This is one of the things that makes the Canadian public so uneasy when we talk about these negotiations and where they may lead us. What is of concern to most Canadians is that government policy appears, at this time, to pursue maximum across the board reductions in tariffs.

In the area of agriculture it should be noted that nothing has been done—no policy put forward, no idea about where we are going. The Canadian agricultural community is truly concerned that it could be traded for some industrial concessions. The agricultural community is also concerned that time will not be available for the government to put forward a meaningful proposal.

Time and time again members on this side of the House have asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) for a clear indication of what the government is preparing to do. I should like to examine a few agricultural commodities because

I think it is important that we review the situation in its proper context. I should like to start with that very important industry, the horticultural industry.

As expected, imports of horticultural products in 1977 will be over $1 billion, with further decreases in the degree of protection offered the industry due to the inflationary factor and our specific rate of duty. This is truly shocking for an agriculturally enriched country like Canada. Many Canadians do not realize the importance of Canada's fruit and vegetable processing industry which is part of the total horticultural industry, the one most concerned in our trade negotiations.

Although the total value of processed fruit and vegetable products in Canada in 1975 was $981,885,000 it was only 1.1 per cent of the total gross national product. To put this figure in perspective, it should be pointed out that the economy of such regions as the Okanagan and the Fraser Valley in British Columbia, southwestern and central Ontario, the Niagara region, and Prince Edward and Hastings counties in Ontario, the eastern townships of Quebec, the Saint John River Valley in New Brunswick, and the Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia are, to a large degree, dependent on the horticultural industry.

In fact in British Columbia fruit production accounted for 36 per cent of the total receipts from all crops, and 12 per cent of all cash receipts in 1975.

The vegetable industry accounted for 53 per cent of the 1974 total farm value cash receipts from crops in the Maritime provinces and 45 per cent in Quebec.

It has been proposed on various occasions that Canada should concentrate on those agricultural crops with which it can compete on world markets, such as wheat, oilseeds, white beans, apples, and perhaps potatoes. It should be pointed out, however, that the agricultural industry in Canada is, by its very nature, regional, and only certain crops can be produced economically in specific areas and under certain conditions.

Before I leave the horticultural industry I should like to state that what it is really asking for is a degree of protection so that it could develop increased production and supply a greater portion of the domestic market. It is asking for fair tariffs, an equalization of tariffs. If this were granted and there was increased production, the industry would become more competitive on the export market.

The dairy industry is looking to the Geneva talks in the hope that fairer tariffs will be negotiated. The meat industry is seeking better access through negotiations to the United States markets and lower tariffs on processed and semi-processed meats. We would like to see greater access to the European Common Market for oil seeds, barley, and wheat. In terms of pork we would like greater access into Japan. These are all areas of concern to agriculture in the trade talks that are continuing. Up to this point, Mr. Speaker, nothing has been done.

What should our policy responses be in terms of our GATT negotiations? In evaluating the present government's policy response, the conclusion must be a somewhat blind move to significantly lower tariffs. I would like to deal with two or three areas that the government has been looking at, and come up with what hopefully would be a conclusion.

If we move during these negotiations to freer trade, which means lower tariffs, it is my contention that many industries in the country would not survive. Among the ones that would survive would be most resource industries, any industry producing on a world scale, and some agricultural production—grains and oil seeds. While the above mentioned areas of the economy are important, they constitute only a small portion of our total economy.

The second option would be if we, as a country, move to a more protected market or increase our tariffs, and this would also be unacceptable. The eventuality of increasing tariffs would be that the tariffs would have to be increased from time to time to keep up the protection that many industries would become used to, and while this would benefit some industries, for the whole country it would be incorrect.

The third option would be a move to adjust our tariffs to be nearer to our competitors' level and, if needed, use the proper sections of GATT to stop dumping from other countries. In other words, what we should be looking for in Canada is not freer trade but fairer trade. This approach would place agriculture and industry on a similar tariff basis to that of other countries. While no one would deny that our long-term goal should be freer trade, it would be politically and economically stupid to lower tariffs significantly at this time. As an example, our horticulutre industry would be virtually wiped out.

The approach most appropriate should be an equalization of tariffs where necessary, coupled with a commercial policy to assist industries that need help, or to help industries relocate, if that need should arise in the coming year. A commercial policy that recognizes the burden of social programs, excess taxation, labour rates, interest rates, etc., is absolutely critical at this particular stage in our history.

In conclusion, I have proposed no profound economic theories, or no quick cures. What I have tried to state tonight is that the government must first inform the Canadian people as to what is taking place in terms of our international negotiations because they are so important, and then move in a realistic manner to deal with our tariffs as they apply to Canadian industry—agriculture and manufacturing. If this is done, Canada could move with certainty into the 1980's with a positive trading position on which we could build sound, constructive policies here in this country.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this evening we have a very general motion which really seeks to cover the whole waterfront in relation to a wide variety of domestic and international economic affairs.

It is difficult, in reading the motion, to distil from it its essentials. I shall not attempt to cover all of the issues raised by it. I do note references in the motion to world trade and to agriculture. That brings me immediately to a very crucial matter, the development of a new world agreement on wheat marketing, including economic provisions affecting both grain reserves and prices. It will be useful this evening to spend some time on this subject. It is an important part of Canadian trade policy in so far as western Canada is concerned, and it is especially important for prairie grain producers who are facing a very serious cost-price squeeze situation, who are concerned about the development of proper and effective measures to strengthen their grain income positions.

Some very useful measures are already on the books in this connection, for example, the Western Grain Stabilization Plan, the two-price system for wheat, and the action taken this year to hold this year's initial payment at the same level as that existing for the last crop year. There are a number of others as well. The list of modifications and improvements in our grain production, handling, transportation and marketing operation in the past decade or so is extensive and remarkable when you take the time to consider it.

Taken together all of these changes give us a rather effective package of policies to assist prairie producers in coping with what otherwise could be an extremely difficult income situation. But one useful addition to that over-all package of policies which I would like to see, and which undoubtedly would provide Canadian grain producers with the most comprehensive protection against adverse market conditions internationally, would be a new, effective, and workable arrangement on world wheat marketing. Traditionally the development of such an agreement, including economic terms, has been a part of Canadian trade policy.

Sometimes our trading partners have agreed with us and sometimes some of them have not. Probably Australia has been one of our most consistent allies in this regard. In the United States the attitude has varied from time to time, but the present administration and the present United States secretary of agriculture, Mr. Bergland, have been positive, helpful and enthusiastic.

From a domestic point of view Canada's starting point in these discussions is important, and our first concern is the position of the Canadian grain producer. The farmer's opinions and aspirations are crucial. While the Government of Canada must formally be the international negotiator, the negotiation will be done directly on behalf of producers, and any world agreement we sign must be acceptable to and supported by Canadian grain producers.

Our basic idea is first and foremost the establishment of a range of prices which would be regarded as sound and reasonable by both exporters and importers around the world. To keep prices from falling below the lower end of that agreed range we would want to have a mechanism for accumulating excess stocks in a world reserve which would be stored off the market and not over-hanging the market in order to keep the downward pressure off the price.

Secondly, we would want all participants in such an agreement to help bear the costs of that storage because it is an advantage not only to exporters such as Canada, which would want to have an inventory on hand in order to be able to meet the various exporting opportunities that present themselves, but it is also a very real and practical advantage to the importers of this world to benefit from a fundamental security of supply. Up to now North American farmers have essentially borne the world's storage costs. We believe that is unfair. We want to see the burden of those costs shared around the world among the grain trading nations.

Of course, at the upper end of the agreed price range which I described earlier, as we see the proposed agreement, the reserve stocks could begin to be released into the world's markets once again. That is the gist of the kind of agreement toward which we should be working. I suppose the fundamental question at this stage is—can we achieve it? I believe so. I am optimistic about our prospects in that connection. We made substantial progress in this past year.

The interest of the present minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in a new and workable international wheat agreement goes back many years, to the late sixties and early seventies, just after he was first appointed. Unfortunately, some other major grain exporters at that time were not as enthusiastic. Early this year the minister responsible for the Wheat Board had occasion to discuss the situation once again with the new United States secretary of agriculture, Mr. Bergland. Mr. Bergland and the Canadian minister were largely in agreement about the desirability of a new world wheat accord and on the fundamentals upon which it could operate effectively. The ball finally was rolling in a positive direction after a good many years.

The next step was to have informal discussions with the Australians and the Argentinians to confirm a common view among the world's major grain exporters. Then the focus shifted to the sessions of the International Wheat Council in London. That council is composed of some 45 to 50 nations, the world's major importing and exporting grain nations. All the major international interests are represented there, with the one major exception of the People's Republic of China. It has proven, this year particularly, to be a very useful forum for the preparatory talks which have been going on toward what we hope will be the successful negotiation of a new world wheat accord.

For some weeks now officials of the International Wheat Council countries have been working to assemble the fundamental international basis upon which a formal agreement might proceed. It is Canada's hope that those talks will bear fruit within the next couple of months or so, in order that a final formal round of negotiations could be held in the late winter or early spring, probably in Geneva under the auspices of the United Nations. Canada is determined to do everything it can to help resolve any international differences which may exist so that these world discussions can prove, in the final analysis, to be successful.

In this effort it is useful to bear in mind that the sucessful negotiation of a new world wheat accord, which would bring a new measure of stability to world wheat prices, would also make it easier for some countries to implement certain other commitments with respect to international trade which might be under negotiations in the MTN. The MTN and the international wheat talks are, of course, quite separate items, but if we are able to negotiate the new international wheat agreement successfully, that could have, in addition to its obvious direct impact, a positive bearing on the MTN discussions, making certain trade undertakings of certain countries somewhat easier to accept and to fulfil.

There is one further aspect of Canada's initiative toward a new world wheat agreement which deserves attention, Mr. Speaker. I refer specifically to the Canadian trade and diplomatic mission led by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, which visited a number of Pacific rim countries in September and October of this year.

Mr. Kempling: Who went with him?

Mr. Goodale: Work on the international wheat agreement was a priority agenda item for Canada to discuss in Australia, China and Japan in particular. In answer to the question just asked from across the way, I was indeed pleased and honoured to have an opportunity to participate in those talks.

A whirlwind tour like that one was, covering many thousands of miles in just a few days and including a heavy schedule of serious discussions, is an exhausting experience, to say the least, but at the end it is gratifying to be able to report positive progress in the work that has been undertaken. Our talks with senior representatives in the countries which were visited were encouraging and productive, particularly with respect to the development of a new international agreement on world wheat marketing. I believe we are closer now than ever before to the successful negotiation of a fair and workable grain arrangement, including provisions affecting price ranges and reserves.

In Australia we met with the deputy prime minister and minister for overseas trade, the right honourable Douglas Anthony, and also with the minister of primary industry, the right honourable Ian Sinclair, and senior Australian trade officials. In these talks we wanted to review with them the major elements of proposals for a new world wheat accord in preparation for the international talks involving both importers and exporters which are taking place this fall in London. We believe that it is important for Australia and Canada, two of the world's leading grain sellers, to have a consistent fundamental approach in this matter so as to ensure the best possible arrangement for our respective grain producers and the greatest beneficial impact resulting from the enthusiasm in the United States for a new world agreement. We were able in those discussions to confirm the understanding between Canada and Australia regarding the fundamentals of such an agreement.

In China and Japan the development of an agreement was analysed primarily from the importers' point of view. Together these two buyers account for almost one half of Canadian grain exports. It was obviously important to reassure our good customers about our intentions in this matter and to report on the work done to date.

[Mr. Goodale.]

In China we stressed our view that the Chinese, who are not currently members of the International Wheat Council, should join these wheat talks to represent directly at the bargaining table one of the world's largest consuming nations. Senior officials in the Chinese government have that suggestion under consideration and Canada is hopeful that they will give the idea careful attention.

In Japan we found support for the search for ways to bring stability into the world's grain markets. The Japanese have already involved themselves usefully in the discussions so far. Incidentally, it is probably also useful to note that virtually everywhere we went on the mission, buyers of grain commented upon the quality of Canadian grain as probably the best in the world, and expressed general satisfaction about Canadian grain delivery services. They were pleased to learn of our current plans to expand storage space on the west coast and to revitalize our prairie rail network, which will render our export operations that much more efficient. Canada is generally regarded as a trusted and reliable supplier of grain, and with the continuing solid performance of the Canadian Wheat Board I believe we will figure prominently in future grain trading operations in the Pacific rim region.

This mission to the Far East and the work I mentioned which is being done on world wheat marketing are of fundamental importance to Canada, particularly to the west, and represent, I believe, a positive, practical initiative to support and strengthen a key part of the Canadian economy.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as we all know only too well, this country is faced today with an $11.5 billion trade deficit in fully manufactured products. Those are the products which produce jobs or, if we do not get sales, cause unemployment. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has stated that if we can overcome this very large deficit we will be able to provide more than 800,000 new jobs for Canadians. That, Mr. Speaker, would just about wipe out the present very serious unemployment existing in the country today.

In order to overcome this huge deficit we must make our products more attractive to prospective buyers, both in Canada and abroad, in terms of price, quality and design. The reason we have this enormous deficit in manufactured products is that not only Canadians but many people living abroad have found that foreign-made products are lower in price and better in quality than those we have been turning out. They have been buying foreign goods in ever increasing quantities in preference to Canadian goods.

● (2042)

To make our products more competitive we must do three things. First, we must improve our productivity in order to lower costs and selling prices. Second, we must encourage more industrial research in an effort to develop new and more efficient methods of producing goods which are of better quality and more attractive design. Third, we should encourage our producers to make more trips abroad with the object of getting into personal contact with potential buyers and finding out what is required to meet competition in the markets visited. The products which are turned out as a result of the information thus gained ought then to be displayed at foreign trade fairs and in the course of personal calls on overseas buyers.

To persuade Canadian businessmen to do these necessary things, the government must make available generous incentives, to be paid in direct proportion to the effort that is made and the results achieved. It is a waste of money simply to make large sums of money available to industry in the hope that the money will be used in the way the government wishes it to be used. The reason for this is because businessmen have three options open to them. They can pay out the extra money in additional dividends, or they can put the money into the company's reserve, or they can use the money to carry out the government's wishes. If the monetary rewards are paid in direct proportion to the results achieved, the government, which is the Canadian taxpayer, receives 100 per cent value for the money which is spent.

Speaking in this House on October 21 last, I outlined in detail the incentives I believe should be offered to industry to bring about the results which are necessary, and there is no need to take up the time of the House to outline them again at this time.

I would now like to deal with the trade negotiations under GATT. In the negotiations which are now being held under the world organization known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Canadian government has indicated it is willing to allow manufacturers in other countries to have freer access to the Canadian market in return for easier entry of our raw materials into those countries.

Such action as the government is planning at the present time, and which is being negotiated behind closed doors at Geneva, will make it much harder for Canadian companies to sell Canadian products in Canada because our much larger competitors have lower costs of production as a result of their much greater size. They can therefore undersell our producers and bring about higher unemployment in this country.

I want to remind the government that we must overcome this enormous adverse trade balance in manufactured goods amounting to more than $11 billion, which is the main cause of the present high figure of unemployment, 8.4 per cent, which prevails today. The kind of action in which the government is engaged in Geneva will make this figure considerably higher. It seems to me there is no check upon what the government is doing in Geneva. We are given no information by the government directly; in order to find out anything one has to talk to those who are actually taking part in the negotiations. In my view the government should advise the negotiators that the prime objective of this country is to overcome the huge trade deficit in manufacturing production which I have mentioned, and in this way to begin making available to Canadians the 800,000 new jobs which will be made available by so doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate and to be able to follow the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). The years since he was minister of industry, trade and commerce have obviously not served to bring to him to understand the realities of the world trade situation if what he said is any measure of his true analysis of the situation rather than an attempt to put the current figures in a partisan frame for the purposes of this debate.

Mr. Hees: Is the hon. gentleman referring to my speech? Of all the impertinence! I have never heard anything like it in my life.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member has quoted himself in sanctimonious assurance that everyone accepts without question what he was saying.

Mr. Hees: I was simply giving the facts.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member, as a true Tory, is loathe to face the world in a competitive spirit. He is more inclined to fear the unknown, to be fearful that Canada's participation in the world trade conference is certain to result in disaster.

Mr. Hees: I just fear the obvious.

Mr. Abbott: In the few minutes he spoke he told us he was not able to get any information except from the people who were directly taking part in the negotiations. One is bound to ask who, in Geneva, he was speaking to, because the information we have—

Mr. Hees: They are even keeping it from you. I guess the cabinet will be the last to learn.

Mr. Abbott: The fact is, Canada must play a part in these negotiations. It is no use fooling ourselves into believing that the world is ordering its trade arrangements in order to suit Canada. It is no use trying to delude ourselves we can avoid the consequences of being one of the largest trading nations in the world. If these negotiations were to fail, if we were to sink back into the kind of trade wars which took place in the thirties, the same disastrous consequences would recur. The consequences of a country like Japan finding itself barred from the markets it enjoys today by walls of protection, as far as the political stability of the Far East and the world is concerned, would be very dire indeed.

● (2052)

The fact is we are participating actively in these discussions. Any real analysis of the negotiations will show the protections being built into them, the complexity of them, and the objectives which are part of the tariffs. The objectives give us an opportunity to enjoy much greater trade. If we walked away from the table and indicated that we were not participating in this negotiation, because we were afraid it would damage our ability to export, the very reverse would happen: we would be cast behind our own walls attempting, with a narrow market of 23 million or 24 million people, to survive in a world well prepared to go aggressively forward and cut tariffs in this manner.

The Tokyo Round had four objectives when it was commenced. First, there was the reduction or the elimination of trade restrictive or trade distorting effects of non-tariff measures, and the bringing of such measures under more effective international scrutiny and discipline. Second, there was a significant improvement in the terms of access for agricultural exports. Third, there was an examination, as a complementary technique, of a comprehensive attack on all barriers to trade in certain carefully defined sectors, especially from the Canadian perspective where these impede the processing or upgrading of resources in the country of origin. Fourth, there was an examination of the adequacy of the multilateral safeguard system with a view to furthering trade liberalization and preserving its results.

The working out of the ways and means has been a difficult and complicated chore. At the outset there was the intent of the Americans to achieve deep cuts of some 60 per cent. This was countered by the expectations of the European community to have shallow cuts of some 25 per cent. It would appear the track being followed by the key nations now is that which is known as the Swiss formula, and perhaps it will be in the nature of 40 per cent.

As our economy has demonstrated, this is a difficult time for these cuts to be contemplated. Other nations face the same prospects and are voicing many of the same concerns. In addition to the level of the tariff cut, there has been a recognition that there must be a phasing in. In actual fact, the general phasing-in period is over some ten years. In effect it could be something in the order of 5 per cent or something a little more per year, if this were accepted. In any event it gives the nations of the world an opportunity to adjust to the cuts over some ten years.

Members of the opposition are failing to recognize that over the last year the effective devaluation of the Canadian dollar against the United States dollar, coupled with the very substantial devaluation of both dollars against the currencies of Europe and Japan, have provided us with a far greater advantage or cut in the tariffs of those countries than will be contemplated by these tariff negotiations, even after the ten year phasing-in period. The challenge is to utilize this opportunity we have with a devalued dollar.

We must not kid ourselves. The devalued dollar has a very high price for consumers in the importation of goods, and it is a painful dilemma for those who have regularly enjoyed the importation of goods. For those concerned, the opportunities provided by the devaluation, if exploited, can result in very substantial improvements in our trading position. Canadian industry has indeed demonstrated an ability in natural resource areas such as fishing and the products produced by western Canada. Great opportunities are already being exploited.

The hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) indicated that last year Canada sold some 40 per cent more steel to the United States than the year previously. That indicates we have competitive industries, and we are making great inroads in the world trade.

The published reports that are being made about our tariff negotiations indicate the exceptions which will be built into the program, the opportunities, the flexibility, and the fact that if Canada exploits its opportunities it will enjoy great trading advantages. The deficiencies we suffer because of our narrow population base can be removed. We can look at the major industrial countries of the world and recognize that there are great possibilities to be taken advantage of by us.

In these negotiations we are seeking the elimination of some tariffs of 5 per cent or less, particularly in our resource based industries. It is of interest that two thirds of the dutiable goods we sell to the United States are in this category. A more serious, thoughtful, and careful analysis of our trading and negotiating posture, and the actual realities of the Geneva negotiations, will show that we have great opportunities.

Apart from the tariff cuts there was a more important feature, that is, an attempt to develop a code dealing with non-tariff barriers. People I have spoken to in industry, in my own constituency and elsewhere, do not necessarily complain about tariffs, nor do they complain about imports making competition impossible. They believe the only reason some countries are able to sell in Canada is because of the artificial opportunities created by measures which are unfair and improper, and not because of the lower wage rates. On the other side of the coin, the difficulties faced by our exporters in markets such as Japan and other countries are the barriers which are occasioned by complex paper work and other things apparently designed to foreclose the opportunities for trade. The acceptance of a working code for non-tariff barriers by countries such as Japan will provide great benefits for this country and its export programs.

In tariff negotiations such as this, there must be a number of safeguards. It is essential to the negotiations that these safeguards are real, carefully designed, and enforced in order for Canada to deal effectively with the problem of its industries being victimized by imports dumped in this country.

● (2102)

I have attempted in a few minutes, somewhat informally, to view the areas of concern and to show that our friends opposite are not attempting to provide the House with the real facts, are not attempting to look at these GATT negotiations in a positive and optimistic fashion, and are failing to recognize that we are in a real world, not a dream world, and we have to trade in this world. We have spent our time telling the rest of the world what a great trading nation we are, that we are one of the great trading nations of the world. That implies we have to sit at the table and participate in trade negotiations. The fact is that the Tory mentality leads them to put their heads in the sand and let the troubles pass over, whereas the Liberal party, faced with the governing of this country, has to participate in these negotiations, to recognize its responsibilities, and to make certain that they continue successfully.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Some day you will talk to some real businessman and you will have a great revelation.

Mr. Abbott: I have talked with businessmen and I know that many of them are concerned with the consequences of these negotiations. Many of them are concerned with a variety of problems, and this is one of them, but no one doubts that if the trade negotiations result in reduced tariffs this will impose some additional challenges on Canadian businessmen. The problem is that if these negotiations fail, there will be no market whatever for Canadian products, and the only thing we would be able to do to protect our manufacturers is to follow the old Tory principle of erecting higher and higher tariff walls in the vain hope that we can keep our industries thriving and alive, whereas those of us who know the real world and know that there is no prospect, however high your tariff walls, of hiding behind them in a narrow market such as Canada's, know that it is only in a world of freer trade that real prosperity can be enjoyed by all countries and that the kinds of markets that we need for our products can be found.

Mr. Hees: You are not even convincing yourself, Tony.

Mr. Abbott: I know that I could not convince the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). He is a long veteran of the wars here and he has gone back and utilized the experience of his own successful career as minister of trade. But those distant, early years are gone. We have now moved on; we are living in a different world. We are living in a highly competitive world now.

Mr. Hees: Yes, we have a $5 billion deficit in trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Abbott: These are not the days of the early 1960's when the hon. member had an easy time summoning trade commissioners and handing out cuff links to them with his name engraved on them, urging them to go out and sell. We are now living in a complex trading pattern.

Mr. Hees: You are telling stories your daddy told you, Tony.

Mr. Abbott: You know, Mr. Speaker, it is a pathetic thing to see a distinguished figure like the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings lowering himself to uttering a jibe like that. I would have hoped he could have said something a little more stimulating. That is not good enough.

I know that others have some valuable comments to offer us tonight.

Mr. Hees: Thank God something new is coming up.

Mr. Abbott: I thought it was essential to relieve the monotonous recitation of fallacious rubbish, which we have heard from the other side, with a few, hard, cold facts about what is going on in the trading world, and I hope that when the hon. member stops barracking he will recognize he has a great deal to learn, and he will start talking to some enlightened businessmen in Toronto and set himself straight.

Mr. Hees: Tony, you are a great performer.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I think the most sensible thing to do is ignore everything that came from the previous speaker and to go on to something that is perhaps more worth while.

Those were interesting times and ones I certainly remember well when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), used to be able to speak well in the House. Today, of course, it was sad to hear him. He did not even read well the speech which was prepared for him by his department. In fact it was very painful to recognize that here was a man having to say things which went against his grain and against his beliefs as he stated them previously.

We live in a nation filled with economic problems. We have a $9.2 billion deficit. That is more than the total budget when this government took power. We are in a situation where our dollar dropped to 89 cents this year, and here is the minister trying to tell the Canadian people that our economy is one of the strongest in the world. He is trying to tell the Canadian people that, by golly, it is a good thing that the dollar dropped that low. His reasoning is that it is good for our exports and that, when the value of our dollar drops, we can move our exports into the international marketplace. But what he failed to admit is that whenever there are exports, there are also imports. The low value of the dollar has affected our imports very much.

I was appalled to hear a man who comes from a rural, farming, ranching riding defending that kind of a position, knowing full well that the low value of the dollar is having catastrophic effects on farmers and ranchers in connection with the importation of farm machinery throughout western Canada and the Atlantic region. The truth of the matter is that when we asked him today what was going to happen to farm machinery, he said the Canadian people could buy from Versatile or from Co-op Implements, knowing all the while that those are two of the smaller manufacturers of farm machinery on the North American continent and that, even though Versatile is a Canadian company, the president of that company is on record as having said that he will not expand any more in Canada. According to the president, economic conditions in Canada are too poor, and any expansion of the Versatile company will take place in the state of North Dakota.

We witnessed a very sad performance by the minister who tried to convince us that we have a strong economy. If you took a look at the Financial Post of a month or two ago you would have found an insert the size of Time magazine which said that the reason why the Japanese are not investing in this country is that our labour wages are too high, we have too many strikes, we have lost our competitive position, and our productivity is down in comparison with that of other major trading nations. The same situation prevails in West Germany. But here we have a minister telling us in a speech written for him, that we have one of the finest and strongest economies in the western world. He knows full well that the people of this country know better than that, that this is simply not the case.

Just 20 years ago, 28 per cent of our gross national product was going into government expenditures. Under the Trudeau regime that grew to 42 per cent of the GNP going into government expenditure. The minister promised us a rose garden. Then he went on to smell, feel and pat the roses, all the while leaving the citizen out there nestling among the thorns. There is no justification for saying that Canada's economy is in a position of strength, especially when you recognize that when the government took power this country had the second highest per capita income in the world. Today we are in the tenth place, with Belgium one place above us in the ninth. No amount of rationalization, no amount of selective data, no amount of searching in a particular corner of industry, trade and commerce will justify saying that Canada has had a good performance in view of the tremendous slippage in the international market place.

I would be remiss if I did not point out how disappointed I am that, at a time when the economy is one of the major concerns of our country, the minister stayed in the House today only to give his own speech and to wander around occasionally. A few days ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) moaned about having to spend so much of his time sitting here because he has a bill before the House. At least he was conscientious enough to stay here while something of importance to his department was before this House. Today we are zeroing in on a major department on a critical matter, and I think it is a real slap and an affront to parliament to avoid being present.

We on this side cannot say that we love a 90 cent dollar. Canadians will have to pay dearly for imports. During the winter months more than one third of our food is imported. A devalued dollar means that every consumer who eats imported food will be paying an extra cost. It will not be possible to tell consumers that the devalued dollar is good, because it will have an obvious and definite sting.

We have an expensive government. This government has put us into a $9.2 billion debt. Who pays? People from Newfoundland to Vancouver pay. Of government revenues in this country in 1968, 34 per cent came from personal income tax. Of government revenues in 1976, 53 per cent came from personal income tax. The average personal income taxpayer has had to pay for this government's overspending and economic mismanagement.

This country is a land of hope but no promise. We are adrift without the rudder of a strategy for industry. This could not be better documented than by the fact that Canada, with all its educated human resources and mineral and other natural resources, pays $12 million per day in unemployment insurance. That is absolutely appalling. We spend $1.97 billion more on unemployment insurance than we spend on national defence. We spend about $4 billion per year on unemployment insurance in a country with the greatest potential in resources in the world. The government thinks that is acceptable. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says we have the farmers could buy Versatile or Co-op farm implements. He Trudeau) says we expect and demand too much of our society. The Minister of Finance tells the Canadian people to spend more. Canadians can choose from any of those three cabinet viewpoints. However, it would be nice to have some consistency for a change, and a government with a sense of direction and a sense of purpose.

How insulting it must be for the people of Cape Breton to listen to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce saying that the people there have an "inappreciability" about attaining employment and that that is one of the reasons the government is slow in stimulating Cape Breton industry at a time when between 3,000 and 4,000 people are registered at the employment offices and looking for jobs in the coal industry. There is a minister in the cabinet who says that the people of Cape Breton have a lack of desire and that somehow they do not have the willpower to work, when 3,000 to 4,000 of them are lined up looking for work.

Mr. Muir: He more or less said they were lazy.

Mr. Malone: I am sure that was the connotation perceived by the average citizen.

This year's trade imbalance will be $11.5 billion, which in human terms means the loss of 850,000 Canadian jobs. The reason for this is a failure to adapt to the world market place. Regardless of what the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) said a little while ago, the government has totally failed to recognize the shift in international trade patterns over the past ten years, the strengthening of the Japanese yen, the power of the Middle East oil countries, the development of the European Economic Community, and the strength of the American trade. While that was going on around the world, this country was preoccupied with internal matters. The Canadian government was talking about language and culture and forgetting that we had an international market place to keep pace with. I recognize that all countries need to be concerned about their internal problems, but never at the expense of their position in the international market place. This failure to be concerned about our economic position has resulted in Canada, as a nation, not being able to keep pace with the major shift in trade patterns which has taken place. That is one of the great downfalls of the government. It was so preoccupied with the internal self-consciousness of Canada that it failed to see that the world around us changed.

The Minister of State (Small Business) might try to show that he has the facts, but I submit to him that all he has to do is look at our status relative to our major trading partners to see that a country does not slip from the second highest per capita income in the world to tenth, behind Belgium, in a ten year period, without something obviously being wrong.

Canada has paid other countries to steal its markets. It does not make sense to close down cheese factories when Canadian cheddar cheese is being rationed in England because there is so little available there. More important, the Export Development Corporation has been embarking upon programs which are and will continue to be a disadvantage to this country's economy. The EDC gave $160 million to finance a pulp and paper mill in Poland. It supported that project in spite of the fact that our own pulp and paper industry is struggling to survive, and in spite of the fact that once the Polish people, with their cheaper labour force, start to produce pulp and paper for the international market, Canada will be at an even greater disadvantage. Today the minister attempted to defend that EDC action. He said that the Polish people can read, too. Of course they can, but Canadian money is being used to encourage industries in other countries which will hire workers in those countries and which will compete with our own industries at a time when we have a high rate of unemployment here. That is not acceptable.

Last summer the EDC announced that it would put $47 million into a mini-steel mill in Perth Amboy, New Jersey. That is not in Poland or in some Third World country. That is in the United States, and that brings to $100 million the amount Canadian taxpayers have lent to steel mills in St. Paul, Minnesota; Midlothian, Texas; and Sheerness, England. Meanwhile our own steel industry in Hamilton and Nova Scotia is encountering stiff competition and the prospect of further lay-offs in the Atlantic region, where the unemployment rate is already alarmingly high. The government argues that a Canadian firm got the contract to build the New Jersey plant, but that is merely a demonstration of the small-mindedness of this government. It says that if we build a plant in the United States, that will create Canadian jobs, but that is only for the short-term. In the long run we will have to compete with other countries which process steel. Those other countries will get the jobs, and they will compete with Canada, with the help of money lent to them by Canada in the first place. That also is not acceptable.

The Japanese have the strongest economy in the world. The Japanese strategy is to increase international sales efforts for existing products and to develop new products through government sponsored research. The Japanese spent $214 million over the last five years to help their computer industry compete with IBM's series 370. Canada has no similar program, but this year will spend $580 million on the CBC. I submit that when Japan tries to get its major competitive companies into the international market place they spend money on research. One of the things that Canada sadly lacks is that kind of competition research.

In 1971 foreign investment in this country amounted to $925 million. By 1976 it had decreased to $400 million, and at the present time we find that Canadians are investing more money outside this country than other countries are investing here. That underscores the fact that the average business person in this country has lost faith in the government and does not believe he can invest successfully any more. Canadian investors are transferring their money to other countries because the government does not have an industrial strategy.

In his speech today the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that because it did not matter about imports, farmers could buy Versatile or Co-op farm implements. He failed to recognize the 40 per cent increase in input cost in farming in 1976. I concede that there was a gross increase in farm income of 2 per cent, but that means a 38 per cent decrease in net income for farmers. The Minister's policy will simply squeeze them even harder. Such rash statements make his speech look as if it has the measles.

I am not prone to quoting Liberals, Mr. Speaker, but Senator Harry Hays has stated that, with the exception of Denmark, Canada has the lowest support for agriculture of any western cultured nation.

I think I ought to point out once again that there simply is no strategy for agriculture, for manufacturing, or for other kinds of industry. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a package of celestial promises that spill as out of a popcorn popper without a lid. I applaud many of his concepts, but what we are seeing are promises and no action. That is the real problem. The minister talked about developing secondary petrochemical industries in the west. We would like to see that happen, but when we questioned him today about what is happening in the United States with reference to the sale of Canadian gas to that country and the promise that their State Department made to allow Canada new trade concessions if we send more gas, the minister said negotiations had been going on during the fall. The document I quoted from was dated November, and there was no evidence of a course of action at that time. I do not know when the minister thinks fall begins, but surely there ought to have been action by November and we know very well there has not been any. We note also—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Now we will get the message.

Mr. Anderson: I hope we get the message better than we got it from the last speaker. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) but I wonder if he was actually espousing Conservative party policy when he said—he can correct me if I am wrong—that the Export Development Corporation should not support any industry in other countries that may compete against Canada.

An hon. Member: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I understood him to criticize the policy of this government for exporting technology to countries whether they be underdeveloped countries or one such as Poland which would not be called underdeveloped. I assumed that was the policy of the New Democratic Party. I know their policy is not very realistic, but I am surprised when a member stands up on an opposition day and criticizes the government for providing jobs to Canadian workers to send technology to other countries.

Surely the hon. member is not falling into the trap into which the NDP has fallen. They usually fall into economic traps quite easily. He seems to have fallen for the fallacy that it is Canada alone that has this technology and that if we do not sell it to other countries then those people will never obtain that technology. Surely anyone who has studied economics and who has looked at the world market can see that if we do not sell it to them they will buy it from somebody else, and we will have a greater trade deficit.

If the hon. member for Battle River suggests that this should be government policy, then let the House leader for the Conservative party stand up and say that is their policy. I respect the former minister of industry, trade and commerce in a former Conservative government. I know that would never be his policy, so I would appreciate it if he would stand up and say that is not a policy he supports. If the economic reasoning of the Conservative House leader is similar to that of the hon. member for Battle River, we would like to hear his comments as well.

If I may digress, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised and a little ashamed this afternoon during question period when hon. members opposite made reference to the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and some of his cabinet were not present. The Prime Minister was not, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), crossing the country during times of high unemployment and in a national unity crisis, holding $125 per plate dinners.

An hon. Member: With the biggest turnout in Canadian history.

Mr. Anderson: Hon. members opposite are getting angry. They do not like the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. We have only a few minutes left and there is another speaker. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Anderson: I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition thinks that the way to find out about unemployment is at a $125 a plate dinner. The Prime Minister is away on the nation's business, so perhaps hon. members opposite should be less critical.

The message that the Leader of the Opposition is giving out in Edmonton, Vancouver, and Toronto is that assistant deputy ministers and senior bureaucrats should collect garbage in the summertime or work on the wharves so that they can become workers. The government of the country might come to a standstill, but this is the message the Leader of the Opposition is giving out. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that is only phase one of the program. I am sure phase two would be if the Leader of the Opposition were elected, he and his cabinet would be out there doing the same things.

● (2132)

Mr. Gillies: When he is elected.

[Mr. Anderson.]

Mr. Anderson: So he would have a total breakdown. I am sure they are saving that for some other $125 a plate dinner in another part of the country.

Mr. Gillies: I have never heard of such garbage in my life.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The House always recognizes the right of a member to make a fool of himself, but it also requires that he remain relevant. I would like to hear the hon. member's comments respecting the motion before the House. That would be most helpful.

Mr. Anderson: Our side take this opposition day very seriously. We only wish the Leader of the Opposition did also. That was the relevancy.

Since time is limited, and as I agreed to make time for a member of the New Democratic Party to speak, I will end my remarks here and allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) to speak.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the motion which we are debating says in part that it condemns the government for its failure to develop an industrial strategy to govern industrial development in Canada.

I was amazed, Mr. Speaker, to listen to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) talk so cheerfully about the economic situation in this country. I wonder which world they live in. Here we are with 900,000 unemployed. Those figures were given to us two days ago by Statistics Canada.

I have a report in front of me prepared by the Science Council of Canada, entitled "Uncertain Prospects", released just two months ago. I will quote from that document:

> In 1971 the Science Council was especially concerned about the viability and survival of medium and high technology industries. In 1977 there are real fears about the prognosis for Canadian manufacturing as a whole.

Further on in the document it states:

> It is apparent that the technological capability of Canadian industry has not improved. It has in fact deteriorated. Exports of technology intensive goods have fallen in relative terms, and many of the industries which produce them are unable to meet foreign competition in the domestic market. Job opportunities for scientists, engineers, MBA's, executives, and other specialists are scarce or non-existent. Government employment is frozen. This year's university graduates face the most dismal job prospects of the last 40 years. Human resources, which have been created at great cost, are being squandered.

That is part of an analysis by an agency appointed by this government, staffed in the main by business and university people who are not, by any stretch of the imagination, very radical. It will take several years at least to develop a successful industrial strategy, which we do not have at the present time. However, in the next few months this country will have to conclude tariff negotiations which will have a profound effect on our economy. The Tokyo Round of the GATT negotiations, which has been going on for about four years, is at the point where some firm commitments will have to be made shortly.

We have grave doubts that our negotiators have developed a successful strategy for this country. I do not even know how that would be possible since the government has given no sign that it indeed has an industrial strategy. It appears to us that the negotiators are bargaining away a good part of our manufacturing sector in return for advantages in the resource sector.

The most recent annual report of the Economic Council of Canada noted that there are no plans for industry to adjust once trade barriers are lowered, to which the federal government is committed. Indeed, the Economic Council said the element that appears to be lacking is a clear plan to foster the adaptation of Canadian industry to the trade concessions to which Canada would agree. At present it appears that the government is prepared to negotiate so that the winners in Canada are going to be in the resource base industries which export unprocessed and semi-processed goods. These industries are, by and large, more capital intensive industries, and the losers will be the manufacturing sector of the economy.

We have seen in recent weeks how poorly the resource industries have managed things for us. We have seen thousands of people laid off, with no prospects of jobs in the foreseeable future. In return for more concessions to the resource industry so that they can sell abroad, it seems to us pretty obvious that the government is prepared to sacrifice a substantial part of the manufacturing industry which, in most countries, is where the interesting, exciting and better paying jobs are provided, and especially in that sector of the economy where jobs have been disappearing at a steady and rapid rate.

It seems to us that the government is naive in its assumption that Canada stands to benefit from the next round of the lowering of trade barriers. If we were talking about real free trade there might be something to it, provided of course there were adequate transition measures to cushion these industries and those people who are injured. We are confident Canadians can be as productive and efficient as anybody else. To develop productive and efficient industries is something which we have not done recently, and which cannot be done quickly. It is our feeling that our negotiators, and we believe they are doing this in consultation with the government, are dealing with these questions in a theoretical way, believing as if by lowering tariffs then immediately Canadian industries will adjust to world competition and will be able to manage.

We have seen in recent years in old established industries in Canada, such as clothing and textiles, a very sharp increase in imports from other countries, countries in Asia and so on. Our industries have not been able to adjust. We have had some very desperate attempts on the part of the government in the last few months to reach agreement on so called voluntary quotas with these countries which are exporting goods to Canada. This has been done when our textile and clothing industries have been virtually driven to the wall.

In the New Democratic Party we have had some interesting experiences in the last few weeks. We have had groups, which in the past have not been very friendly, ask if they could meet with us and outline their problems, such as the Canadian Manaufacturers' Association and the Electrical and Electronics Association of Canada. I have been here 15 years, and this is the first time they have asked to meet us.

● (2142)

We are not talking about an inefficient, old fashioned industry. We are talking about the electrical and electronics industry, companies like Northern Telecom. These people are very worried, Mr. Speaker. Not only are they worried about expanding, they are worried about maintaining the position they have and the employment that they now provide. They feel that major multinationals, particularly those located in Japan, are determined to break into the Canadian telecommunications market, and are attempting to do so on the basis of price.

They are not worried about fair competition. They feel that they are as efficient as any company anywhere in the world. However, they do feel that the pricing structure of Japanese companies is close to dumping. They point out that this is difficult to prove because of the complexity of the price structure in the Japanese market.

They also believe that while the Japanese are determined to break into our market, as they have broken into the market in the U.S. and the markets of other countries, they are not prepared to let foreign manufacturers break into the Japanese market. They have used, and are very effectively using today, non-tariff structures to keep Canadian, American, British and German products out of the Japanese market. They also told us that similar non-tariff methods are being used by te Germans, the British, and others.

They are predicting, Mr. Speaker, that this government's policies, this belief in freer trade without any thought given to what it does to Canadian industry and jobs, will mean a decreasing number of people working in the Canadian manufacturing industries which have traditionally provided a large number of jobs, indeed the best jobs in the country.

We are not opposed to the cutting of tariffs, but we believe that it must be done keeping in mind the real needs of the Canadian people in this modern society—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section (10) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion, Supplementary Estimates (A), and for the passage of all stages of the bill based thereon.

The question is on the amendment in the name of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Saltsman) which was negatived on the following division:

INDUSTRY

PROPOSED INCENTIVES TO IMPROVE PRODUCTIVITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In order to overcome our trade deficit of $11 billion a year in manufactured products—the ones that produce jobs—we must improve our productivity, and to do so, we must offer incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery and production systems they will have to buy in a reasonably short space of time, and in this way make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures involved. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government allow all capital expenditures involved in improving productivity to be written off in one year; and second, a plant to be rewarded in the form of a cash bonus at the end of the year in direct proportion to its increase in productivity during the year.

By improving our productivity, we can lower costs and selling prices, and in this way greatly increase sales of our manufactured products.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED SUSPENSION OF PURCHASES FROM BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN BANK NOTE COMPANY PENDING SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43 to move a motion, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That since the British North American Bank Note Company is, according to the federal government's status of women co-ordinator, in clear violation of the principle of equal work for equal value, which is an integral part of the new Canadian human rights legislation, this parliament calls on the minister responsible for the purchase of bank notes to stop such purchases from the British North American Bank Note Company until that company settles its labour dispute by paying its women employees wages equal to those paid to men doing similar work.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

SUGGESTION ELECTIONS BE HELD AT FIXED DATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that under the constitution the date of the general election is determined according to the whims of the Prime Minister; considering that this procedure is obsolete and has an effect on the national economy due to the suspense experienced by those who have an economic and financial impact, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House direct the government to introduce in the House a bill aimed at including in the Statutes of Canada a provision stating that from January 1978 the federal general election will be held every four years at a date set under the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON PROPOSED MEASURES TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has now returned from his visit to the capitals of the nation I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House request the Prime Minister to make an immediate statement on motions as to the state of our economy and on what new measures he intends to institute forthwith to relieve our unemployment, lessen inflation, narrow both our federal deficit and current account trade deficit and restore real growth in the country to its potential level.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION IMPROVEMENTS BE MADE IN ECONOMIC BASE OF NATIVE COMMUNITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The commission created by the Native Council of Canada in 1975 has recently reported its findings on the number of natives in jail. It has discovered that the major contributing factor to the disproportionate number of natives in jail is the lack of meaningful economic bases in the majority of communities from which the prisoners came. In view of the seriousness of the problem, which correlates with an unemployment rate of over 75 per cent in the native communities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the appropriate federal departments and agencies in consultation with the native communities meet immediately for the purpose of introducing programs to correct this serious problem.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation for such a motion for debate can be done pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, Robert J. McCleave, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Halifax-East Hants, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS—SUBJECTS ON THE AGENDA

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Since this is his first opportunity to report to the House following the completion of his visits to the provincial capitals and since I know he will want to divulge to the House any concrete plans he has arrived at with the provincial premiers, would the Prime Minister inform the House as to the dates, the format and the topics of discussion at the forthcoming federal-provincial conference which have been arrived at and agreed upon with the first ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be tabling later at the proper point, according to the rules of the House, copies of my letters to all the premiers on this matter. I would gladly table them now if the House desires it, but I certainly can answer in a sketchy way the questions of the hon. lady. We are suggesting a conference at the first ministers' level on February 13, 14 and 15. The dates are not absolutely final yet, but it looks as though those will be the dates upon which all the premiers and myself can meet in Ottawa, hopefully in an open meeting.

The agenda will cover, obviously, the economy and its various aspects. The final agenda will not be established until the premiers have put forward their suggestions to me in writing and we have agreed upon them, but the proposed agenda would cover general discussions of the economy and a series of reports on various sectors of the Canadian economy by region upon which the first ministers will attempt to take action resulting in increased jobs in Canada and an upsurge in the economy.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister has suggested that the tabling of the documents, which would normally be done later during routine proceedings, might be done now. I presume that the House gives its consent to that. Perhaps with the consent of the House the Prime Minister could table them forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1117)

PROPOSED CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CORRESPONDENCE CONTAINS ALL DETAILS OF AGENDA

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister to give the House the assurance that this exchange of correspondence which we have not yet had an opportunity to see will contain all the details I have asked for and that he will not be giving additional details later this day at a press conference which he would deny to the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members opposite will be every bit as intelligent as the press in asking questions and I shall try to be every bit as co-operative.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSSIBILITY OF CONFERENCE ON REFORM

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, having given that explanation, I trust that the Prime Minister will remain so that we will have an opportunity on motions to put these questions when we have had an opportunity to read the correspondence. I should like to ask him a further question. In view of the fact that press reports on the Prime Minister's discussions with the premiers have focused on matters relating to the economy—something we in the official opposition have been saying for some years is the most serious problem in the country—did the Prime Minister during his discussions with the provincial premiers arrive at any agreement with the first ministers on when a conference on constitutional reform will be held? Did he arrive at any agreement on subjects like patriation, an amending formula or jurisdictional changes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unlike the official opposition which has been saying the economy is important for some years, we have been saying it is important for the entire life of the government.

An hon. Member: It is important to the life of the government.

Mr. Trudeau: For that reason discussions were centered mainly on the economy. The letter I sent the premiers refers essentially to a meeting on the economy. No mention is made of any further meeting on the subject of the constitution or national unity. We have, of course, discussed these matters but there is no plan for a meeting at this time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES ON MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Following his meetings with the provincial premiers, could the Prime Minister indicate if any consensus was arrived at during those meetings which would allow new measures to be taken immediately to relieve the unemployment situation in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the premiers and I in those conversations did exchange information on measures which have been taken to relieve unemployment in Canada in the short-run. It will be clear to the hon. member from the tenor of the discussions that most premiers, like members of the government, realize that in the short-run they are likely to be faced with unacceptably high unemployment. That is why all discussions between the premiers and myself centered on the immediate problem.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister follows on his answer to my last supplementary. Would the Prime Minister indicate if what he has just said means it is inevitable that we will be living with something over 8 per cent unemployment in the coming months—possibly one million people out of work. Is there no short-term measure that he intends to institute to try to relieve that situation?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The final part of the question contradicts my earlier answer. There are many short-term measures we have taken—

Mr. Stevens: New?

Mr. Trudeau: —and will continue to take. The first part about the likelihood of an unemployment figure reaching up to 8 per cent within the next months is already there.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF PROVINCES AGREEING TO REDUCTION OF SALES TAX

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary question to the Prime Minister. The Minister of Finance has repeatedly stated in this House that he has failed to reach agreement with the provinces with respect to the possible reduction of sales tax across the country. Would the Prime Minister indicate if that subject was discussed with the provincial premiers, and if so was there any agreement worked out with respect to reduction of sales taxes which would lower prices, create consumer demand, and hopefully lower the jobless level in the country?

● (1122)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member will recall the Minister of Finance did raise this question with his provincial counterparts in the October meeting they had together, and the federal government did propose such a measure be embarked upon jointly by both the federal and provincial governments, each paying half of the cost for the total reduction. This measure was not accepted or desired by the overwhelming majority of the provinces. Therefore, we did not proceed with it, and it was not raised in the meetings I have just had.

CAPITAL WORKS PROJECTS—SUGGESTION PROJECTS BE ANNOUNCED BEFORE CHRISTMAS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): My question is also directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The indications from the press on Wednesday were that the Prime Minister had stated he had won support from all ten provincial premiers for a massive job creating economic development program. In view of the fact in August the Prime Minister also won support from the ten premiers for job-creating programs, and more particularly a capital winter works program on a shared provincial-federal basis, can the Prime Minister announce today in the House that Canadians are going to receive at least some Christmas consolation that we will see some federal capital works projects for this winter before the Prime Minister has his election meeting with the premiers next February?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reports as quoted by the hon. member are not correct. There was no talk of an immediate setting forth of a massive job creation program. I answered in the House earlier today that we were in a series of meetings looking at mid-term measures for the recovery of the economy.

Mr. Leggatt: Incidentally, while the Prime Minister was away there were approximately 3,000 more people laid off in the country. It might be more useful if he were here in the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

INDUSTRY

REASON FOR PURCHASING SHIPS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES RATHER THAN GIVING CANADIAN SHIPYARDS WORK

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): In any event, my question relates to the shipbuilding industry on the east and west coasts which have suffered probably the worst conditions since the depression. Approximately 90 per cent in that industry are idle. At the present time the cabinet has approved the building of 20 ships under the ship replacement program, six of which will either be built or purchased in foreign countries. Could the Prime Minister advise the House why, in view of the continuing unemployment crisis in Canada we cannot build all of our ships in our own shipyards, and put some of our shipyard workers back to work.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of the particular program to which the hon. member is referring. Ships are being built around the world all the time. The hon. member is suggesting all ships should be built in Canada regardless of the cost. The hon. member would perhaps need a short course in economics, which I can arrange at a later date.

Mr. Leggatt: I would be happy to accept a course in economics if the Prime Minister would accept a course in civil liberties from me.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED INDISCRETION OF OFFICIAL—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Considering that the minister has sent to hon. members a letter on individual income tax statements and that he has given directives to keep those statements highly confidential, would he tell the House whether or not this decision stems from the indiscretion of an official who is alleged to have revealed the confidential information from a personal tax return and, if so, could this official who would have failed in his duty be brought before the courts in order to reassure Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would rather not comment on the details of the hon. member's question but, to give him a straightforward answer, and considering the letter I have sent to hon. senators and members, I would say yes. I am thinking of the double security measures within the department which I have already mentioned in the House.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR ELABORATION OF PLANS TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the Prime Minister's recent meetings with the ten provincial premiers and the tabling of the letter today in which he talked about the development of a medium term economic program as well as a restructuring of the economy, and since there does not seem to be any specific definition as to what the Prime Minister has in mind with regard to that, does the Prime Minister plan to elaborate on these concepts later today? Will there be a tabling in this House or a presentation by him or senior ministers with regard to this in order that members of this House and the general public will have some idea of the leadership being provided by the federal government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to answer this and any other questions bearing on this matter. I am not planning an announcement. The project put forth in the letter is for a series of meetings at the federal-provincial ministerial level on various sectoral subjects. The so-called structural reform of the economy is not a concept we have entertained. We are talking about structural reforms in various sectors of the economy, but certainly no restructuring of the whole economy of Canada. The list of possible federal-provincial meetings is alluded to in the letter, but the final list has not yet been settled. I would indicate to the House that just as we had earlier this week meetings of the energy ministers of Canada, we will have meetings of ministers concerned with agriculture, fisheries, tourism and various other subjects upon which the premiers and myself have agreed or will agree.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Prime Minister is trying to be helpful in this, but there is not much by way of information provided in this letter. In the letter he states "I believe if the process were to be explained carefully, there would be full public appreciation and understanding of what is being attempted." I would like to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to do this. He does not seem very able or willing to do it. Can he establish for members of this House what the priorities are, in which sectors? I, of course, am specifically concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation of employment in eastern Canada, the growing separation question and the forecast in terms of employment levels in the four Atlantic provinces. Can the Prime Minister indicate what priority he attaches to which sectors, when he will be providing the specifics in terms of the initiatives proposed by the federal government, himself or his ministers, or whether any of these priorities were given to the premiers for their reflection?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, after the premiers have had time to consider my letter and the propositions that were discussed with them, we will want to make public as soon as possible the list and dates whereupon these various sectorial meetings will be held and where. I gave some examples of various sectors such as fisheries, energy, tourism, mining, manufacturing industries, where we intend to set up and continue a whole series of meetings of that nature. However, dates and subjects have not finally been agreed upon by all premiers. For that reason, I cannot announce them today. I can say that as soon as the list is final and the agenda has been agreed upon, I will hasten to acquaint the House with the results of it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): There is no doubt the Prime Minister is going to solve the employment problem in ministers' offices with additional staff rushing to meetings. I want to know whether any initiatives are going to be placed before this House before we adjourn in a couple of weeks. In light of the fact the House will be in recess for a month, will there be any opportunity for members to participate in a responsible way with regard to the initiatives being proposed by the federal government? Will there be any advance warning to the people of Canada about the proposals made to the first ministers, bearing in mind the amount of discussions that will take place under the shopping lists of departments and issues that the Prime Minister enunciated? It is not clear to me that the government knows what it is going to do with regard to the serious economic problems facing the country.

● (1132)

Mr. Trudeau: The government is always ready and anxious to hear constructive proposition from the opposition. The process we envisage will culminate in a federal-provincial conference to be held, open, I hope, in February. Until then the sectional meetings will proceed and, of course, in connection with any of the subjects which are debated the opposition will be invited to submit whatever constructive proposals it might have.

ENERGY

LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS PROJECT—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question specifically: Could the right hon. gentleman tell us what specific proposals were discussed in some of the meetings he attended in areas of high unemployment, especially in the five eastern provinces where half the unemployment in the country exists, for example, when he met with Premier Moores in the province which has the highest rate of unemployment? He alluded to the fact that now the arrangements for the pipeline in western Canada have been completed attention could be turned to energy development in eastern Canada. Is the government prepared, for example, to think in terms of a joint venture in developing power from the Lower Churchill Falls in Labrador?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is presently studying a variety of projects which would be productive of energy in the eastern part of Canada. There are many such projects on the table. I have alluded to them or discussed some of them with the various premiers. However, it is not for the federal government to make an announcement today of a unilateral nature. It is for the provincial and the federal governments together to determine which of these projects is most likely to enhance Canada's future and, in particular, that of the Atlantic region. That is the whole object of the operation—to make preparations at the official and ministerial level before any announcement is forthcoming.

Oral Questions

FISHERIES

PROPOSED STRUCTURAL CHANGES IN INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Given the importance, for instance, of the fishing industry in the Atlantic provinces, may I ask whether the Prime Minister discussed with the Atlantic premiers what he described as structural changes in that industry and can he tell us what he means by "structural changes"? This is now a matter of jurisdictional dispute.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member will realize that thanks to this government a 300-mile limit has been proclaimed—

Some hon. Members: Two hundred.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, in the face of an opposition which belittles everything I am inclined to overstate the case. In these new circumstances there is obviously a need for a structural change so that our fishing industry can equip itself in the years to come to take advantage of this great new bonanza for Canada.

TARIFFS

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES AND INDUSTRIES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary to the Prime Minister with regard to the nine pages of verbose generalities in that letter. I note that among other subjects not mentioned is one which certainly cannot wait until the middle of February—its importance applies right across the nation and is not restricted to regions or sectors. I refer to the great uncertainty in the nation concerning current negotiations in Geneva with respect to GATT and the very real sense, not only in the minds of the premiers but in the minds of people engaged in industry, that there has not been any meaningful consultation between industry, the provinces and the government with respect to Canada's position at the Geneva talks. Would the Prime Minister tell us whether the tariff negotiations were discussed at these meetings and, if so, whether he intends to make more meaningful consultative arrangements not only with the provinces but with industry right across the country with respect to those negotiatons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The subject of GATT and international trade was discussed at every meeting, generally at my initiative. But nowhere did I meet the kind of negative criticism the hon. member makes in his question.

Mr. Lawrence: The Prime Minister can say it is negative. But what I am asking for—and I do not think it is negative—is some indication that there is to be immediate and worthwhile consultation with industry across this country. The Prime Minister can interpret that as a negative approach but I am asking him to tell us whether there is to be consultation with regard to these negotiations apart altogether from premiers' conferences, apart altogether from conferences of officials.

Mr. Trudeau: I described the question as negative because the hon. member in his preamble indicated there had been no such consultation. On the contrary, we have received from many of the provinces many detailed briefs on this subject. We have responded to them and discussed them and made provision for further discussion.

ENERGY

FUNDY TIDAL POWER PROJECT—POSSIBILITY OF CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): One brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. During the discussion with Premier Regan in Nova Scotia did the Prime Minister, in the light of the high level of unemployment in that province and the reluctance of industry to locate in an area where there is not a sure supply of energy at a reasonable cost, discuss the possibility of making a start on the Fundy tidal power project which would put a lot of our people to work and, in the long run, encourage industry to establish itself in Nova Scotia in particular and in Atlantic Canada in general?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this subject was raised and discussed along with other energy projects. The feeling was expressed regionally that it was a good thing the government has taken the initiative in carrying out several studies in depth of the possibilities of Fundy tidal power and that we now possess the basic information to permit us to make a more informed decision.

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF NEGOTIATING STRATEGY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister concerns the negotiations in Geneva. Bearing in mind that those engaged will be getting down to serious talks some time in the New Year can the Prime Minister outline to the House the government's negotiating strategy, at least in general terms? We on this side have received requests for information along these lines not only from the provinces but from representatives of industry and agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether an answer of that kind could be given within the constraints of the question period, though the Prime Minister might wish to try.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR HALIFAX-EAST HANTS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure members on the other side of the House, as well as those in my own party, would like to join me in wishing a fond farewell to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants when he was such an excellent Deputy Speaker when he served in that capacity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUPREME COURT

POSSIBILITY OF MODIFYING STRUCTURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the decision given last week by the Supreme Court of Canada which confirms the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government in matters pertaining to cable television; and also in light of the dissent expressed by the three judges from Quebec who sit on that court, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether, in his opinion, the credibility of the Supreme Court of Canada in constitutional matters is threatened by that situation, especially in the eyes of Quebecers? In addition, can he tell us whether he would be willing to suggest changes with regard to the participation of the provinces in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada, changes which could even go beyond what he proposed in the Victoria Charter or, again, to the provinces in the spring of 1976?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question concerning the credibility of the Supreme Court of Canada, I doubt that the citizens of Quebec, provided they are well informed, would reach that conclusion. We need but consider, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this decision of the Supreme Court confirmed that of the Court of Appeal, that is, a provincial tribunal whose decision, unless I am mistaken, confirmed a decision of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec. In other words, the various levels of jurisdiction reached the same conclusion.

Concerning the second part of the question, Mr. Speaker, during the meetings I have had with the provincial premiers, we did in fact discuss the possibility of various reforms, including the procedure for appointing judges to the Supreme Court. I must say that no province made any formal or specific proposal to me in that regard; on the other hand, we did make some suggestions, namely those of the Victoria conference mentioned by the hon. member. We are anxious to discuss the matter further with the provinces when they have had time to formulate a few proposals on their own in that regard.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY BETWEEN FORT McMURRAY AND FORT SMITH—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. About two or three weeks ago I met with the minister of transport of Alberta to discuss the idea of building a gravel highway from Fort McMurray to Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. I find that the Alberta government has done some studies on this question. I would ask the Prime Minister whether his government would support such a project.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might want to seek an opportunity to rephrase that kind of question, but he is clearly making a direct representation as opposed to asking a question.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DIRECTION OF CHANGE IN POLICY-MAKING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would direct to the Prime Minister. While I have only had a cursory glance at the letter, is it the Prime Minister's view that what is suggested in the letter represents a major change in the direction of economic policy-making in the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it depends on what you consider "major". Of course, I suppose for Conservatives it would appear to be major.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think all Canadians would like to see some changes made in the direction of policy making. What I was really trying to find out from the Prime Minister concerns a matter which I think is very important, and it is this. Is the government moving away from reliance on basically macro-economic policies, major national policies, tax and fiscal policies, to more of a micro development in terms of doing things for specific sectors? Is that the direction in which the government is moving?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very serious question. I would want to make sure that nothing in my answer could be construed as indicating that we are moving to a new society of any kind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Wait till Christmas Eve, Pierre.

Mr. Stevens: How about a "jobless society"?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member looks at the proposed agenda, he will see that we are concerned with both levels of preoccupation. There will be discussions of a macro-economic nature, but many of these proposals will, in effect, be attempting to ensure more efficient and effective structures of the macro-economy.

SUGGESTION DISCUSSIONS BE HELD WITH VARIOUS SECTORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. From the discussions at the conference there are bound to arise matters of great interest by sector. Would the Prime Minister consider holding a national conference which would involve representatives from the sectors discussing economic policy for individual sectors, such as mining, fishing and so on, thus involving the private sector in the process as well as the public sector?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This very intelligent and constructive idea was explained in some detail in the government's policy paper last year, "The Way Ahead", and in the "Agenda for Co-operation". The hope was expressed there that there would be the type of consultation, the kind of consultative forum, to which the hon. member is alluding. We have run into some difficulty in that the CLC has cut its willingness to participate with the federal government and the management side in these discussions; but we are still hopeful that they will be able to resume in some more particular forum rather than in a general forum.

PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT ABSORBED BY GOVERNMENTS—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES ON PROPER PERCENTAGE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The letter deals basically with the relationship to the economy of the private sector, although there is some reference to the public sector. In the course of the Prime Minister's meetings with his colleagues in the provinces, did the Prime Minister discuss that part of the gross national product, now up to 43 per cent, which is absorbed by government, really the highest jump of any industrialized nation? Was any agreement reached by the Prime Minister and his colleagues on what might be done about this; and was any target set as to what would be the appropriate portion of the gross national product to be occupied by government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject was very present in our meetings with the premiers. I believe the hon. member is exaggerating the figure when he says it is 43 per cent; I believe it is presently closer to 40. The position has been taken by the federal government and shared, I would say, by most provincial governments that the share should be brought under control. Once again, in the policy statement we made in the publication "The Way Ahead" we indicated that it was our desire to reduce the growth of the public service and of the public sector. The hon. member will realize, of course, that we have done this in the past two years, reducing the growth of the public service to something under one per cent.

The provinces have different views, of course, about the final figure which should be considered as an objective, but I think it is fair to say that on one point, the point of considering the government as an employer, we are all determined to ensure that public service total compensation not be permitted to surge way out of line with compensation in the private sector.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister indicated that there was some concern among the ministers as to bringing this aspect under control. Was there any consensus reached at the conference between the Prime Minister and the first ministers as to what the appropriate target might be? Was a consensus reached in this cross-Canada tour as to this very important question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has in mind a precise figure as an objective, the answer is no. Various premiers have different views on what should be done in their province. I repeat that the over-all concern was great enough that there was a consensus on the desirability of having the respective ministers of the treasury or other relevant departments in the provincial case come together with the Minister of Finance to attempt to reach such general goals as the hon. member is seeking.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. I gather from the letter that the sectorial meetings will be between his ministers and ministers of the provinces, with a view to suggesting some mid-term strategies within those sectors. I would simply ask the Prime Minister what in the world his ministers are doing.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY BETWEEN FORT McMURRAY AND FORT SMITH—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL AID

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning the idea of building a gravel highway from Fort McMurray to Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories, a project which the government of Alberta has been studying and is seriously interested in. Is it the intention of the minister and his government to help in the cost-sharing of this project?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am prepared to look at that, Mr. Speaker. I have had discussions with the hon. member about it but frankly I thought priority should be given to the Liard highway. Given a period of restraint, we will have to decide where our priorities are. That is where mine are at the present time.

● (1152)

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY BETWEEN LIARD AND FORT NELSON—DATE OF DECISION ON FEDERAL AID

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Has a decision been made regarding the building of a highway to link Liard with Fort Nelson? Is the answer yes or no? If the answer is no, when can we expect a decision on that matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that question should be directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED CENTRE FOR OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY—DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. A recent editorial in the Toronto Star reports that 13 million man-days were lost last year due to illness and injury. As these figures obviously beg prompt preventive measures, can the minister tell the House when he plans to set up his proposed centre for occupational health and safety?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hope legislation comes before the House early in the new year. That particular legislation has some degree of pertinency with reference to Bill C-8, which contains provisions for the setting up of health and safety committees at the plant level, as well as certain rights to the workers when conditions of work are perceived as unsafe. I hope the House will consider that particular legislation soon.

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR PARTICIPATION OF COMMODITY AND INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a very specific question for the Prime Minister. There have been many calls for more involvement from the non-government sector in advising our trade negotiators at GATT. Will the Prime Minister agree to representatives of commodity and industrial organizations sitting in on the negotiations at GATT in order for them to be involved in the actual negotiations, as is being done in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the hon. member's question was not clear; but I will take notice of it and perhaps raise it with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

SUGGESTED PROTEST TO UNITED STATES ABOUT TALK OF FREE TRADE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is a suggestion which was made by the Minister of Agriculture in a speech on November 29. Will the Prime Minister also consult with the Minister of Agriculture who said: "Representatives of commodity organizations and industrial associations should sit in at GATT"?

My supplementary question is: has a diplomatic note been sent to the United States complaining of the United States ambassador running around talking about free trade, in accordance with the statement of the Minister of Agriculture on November 29 when he made a speech in Hamilton? He said that he was "sick and tired of the U.S. ambassador running around talking about free trade".

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

MINISTERS VIEW OF IMPORTANCE OF SAFE OPERATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding aviation safety. The minister has stated in the House that the very important matter of civil liberties respecting both the carrier and the citizens of that carrier service are most important in the enforcement of air regulations. Also he indicated that these factors must be taken into consideration when applying the regulations, particularly with respect to the suspension of a licence. For the purpose of clarification, is the minister suggesting that providing the service and keeping the carrier in business are more important, or of equal importance, to ensuring that the carrier is carrying out a safe operation? Or, does it imply that in some instances regulations can be overlooked because they are not mandatory in carrying out a safe operation? Is this an area where there may be room for political interference?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, obviously safety is an overriding consideration. The regulations and the degree of safety implicit in them is very clear evidence of this. The point I was making, which is referred to in the correspondence from my officials at different times, is that to give inspectors the power on their own judgment to close down a service, without going through due process of law, is clearly a very strong level of power to have in the hands of any official or person, without giving a chance to appeal or to go to court before the effects of the judgment are suffered. It must be understood that what was in issue was whether our licensing inspectors who find something wrong are able to impose a penalty upon a carrier by closing that carrier down, with resulting serious effects for the carrier and the communities served, without having first the judicial process which would give the carrier and the community the right to make their case. It is only in that narrow area that hon. members opposite should have seen the very important point ensuring that the civil liberties of the subjects are defended before penalties are imposed.

PROPOSED PUBLIC INQUIRY ON ENFORCEMENT OF SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister is not in a law class right now. There is a great deal of uncertainty and confusion in the application and the enforcement of the regulations. Since it is not clear in the minds of those people who are charged with enforcing the regulations, is that not a good case for having this matter referred to a public inquiry, or at least referred to a parliamentary committee so that the matter can be fairly aired? Obviously there is a conflict. The conflict is weighing the matter of civil liberties against the primacy of air safety. The minister has not clarified that for me, for any member of the House, nor for the public, in particular the passengers who are using that service. Will the minister seriously consider a public inquiry into this whole matter, or at least table the document in order for us to have a look at it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to try to clarify it too much for the hon. member, because when I do he suggests I am giving him a law lecture. From his question and his lack of knowledge as to how the system works, it is clear a few extra lectures would be useful.

There are some very important issues in terms of civil liberties that perhaps should be looked at by a parliamentary committee. In the meantime, we have had an investigation by officials of my department. Surely hon. members opposite have to agree, because of the report furnished to the public by the Globe and Mail, that the investigation was very thorough and revealed significant problems. These significant problems related to the way the regulations were enforced, and also that there was a lack of inspectors. We moved immediately to add to the number of inspectors. We have passed the necessary regulation to transfer some power to regional directors to suspend operators' licences and the like, in order to make enforcement more effective. In other words, it is very prompt action to ensure safety will be guaranteed. On the other hand, if the civil liberty question is a problem, we will be glad to look at that further.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REASON FOR FAILURE TO CONSULT TERRITORIES ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the continued and growing reliance on the resources of Canada's north, why were the territorial councils not consulted in the Prime Minister's across-Canada quest for consensus?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will realize the constitution of Canada does not provide provincial status to the territories. They come under the direct jurisdiction of this House, and particularly that of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, my brief supplementary is for the Prime Minister. Does he not feel, however, that the territorial councils might have a different view than the minister, and that they might be able to contribute something to the quest for consensus?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE PREMIERS WILL ATTEND

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question flows from the letter tabled by the right hon. Prime Minister. In the discussions, does the Prime Minister have assurances from the ten premiers that they will attend the first ministers' conference, and that their respective ministers will attend the sectorial meetings proposed in the letter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member please repeat his question?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the letter confirms a lot of the discussion the right hon. Prime Minister had with the ten premiers. Is this letter confirming in effect what has been tentatively agreed upon between the Prime Minister and the ten provincial premiers and in effect do we have the assurance that all premiers will attend both the first ministers' conference and the central meetings?

● (1202)

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, barring the upset of any government between now and February, the premiers and ministers said they will be there.

Mr. Nowlan: I did not quite get the first part of the Prime Minister's answer but I will come to the second part of the question and try to summarize what this letter said. Is it fair to say that after the three weeks of meetings in the ten provincial capitals the Prime Minister had nothing specific to put before the provincial premiers? Judging from the thrust of his letter there was nothing specifically put before the central meetings by the federal ministers.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order relates to the question period, and I hope the Prime Minister will remain in the House for just a moment. It has to do with my question on the negotiating strategies at Geneva about which we were questioning him. I feel it is a serious question, certainly one of the most serious questions that can be posed right now.

In my opinion, the answer would not have to be any longer than a good many answers in the House. I think the Prime Minister indicated he was willing to rise and at least give as much of an answer as he could to my question. I am wondering if I could be permitted to request the Prime Minister to give an answer to the question in terms of the negotiating strategies in Geneva, and Canada's position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a point which I think is well taken. His question was seeking very general information on strategy or policy, which is not a proper question for the question period although I could not anticipate the length of the answer. However, I have some regret that I did not give the hon. member an opportunity to put a supplementary question in which he could have been more precise. As the hon. member said, the Prime Minister did want to give some kind of reply. Under the circumstances, if there is a minute now, perhaps the House could give its consent to allow the Prime Minister to give a brief answer. The question was put by the hon. member for Lisgar. Perhaps, with the consent of the House, he might be permitted to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

TARIFFS

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF CANADIAN STRATEGY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, if I have the consent of the House, I should like to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister in relation to Canada's negotiating strategy at the Geneva talks. Could he outline to the House the areas of discussions he had with the provincial premiers, and could he outline to the House what position Canada has taken in the Geneva negotiations which will evolve into final negotiations early in the new year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I sense that the hon. member himself realizes that it would be inappropriate for the government to make public for all concerned the strategy we are going to follow in Geneva in order to attempt to get a better deal for Canada than others will get out of us. So I do not think I could answer that question, for strategic reasons.

With regard to my second answer, it is as you yourself said earlier, Mr. Speaker: it would take a great deal of time. But I could propose to the House, if it so wishes, to attempt to arrange general briefings perhaps by Ambassador Jake Warren who could meet with various caucus groups, if it would be helpful to them, to give them some outline of Canada's position, and perhaps when the Leader of the Opposition gets back to the House or to Ottawa some time, he might want to suggest some arrangements along those lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CNR PENSION FUND

Question No. 249—Mr. McKenzie:

1. For each year 1952 to 1976, how much has (a) CNR (b) CNR employees contributed to the railway employees' pension fund, excluding the cost of running the pension department, associated professional fees and the return on investment?

[Mr. Speaker.]

2. Will Dr. Noel Hall's recommendation on the trusteeship of the Canadian National Railways pension fund be formally implemented to remove the trusteeship from the hands of the Directors and place it in the hands of someone completely independent and, if so, on what date?

3. Notwithstanding the change in acturial assumptions in 1968 whereby the unfunded liability of the CNR pension plan was reduced from $671 million to $300 million, does the $371 million difference represent any of the pre-1952 liability in respect of the obligation of CNR to match employees' contributions under the 1935 pension plan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian Railways advises as follows: 1. Following are the contributions by years to the CN Pension Fund made by the CN and by its employees:

Year	CN Contributions (millions)	Employee Contributions (millions)
1952	16.200	2.275
1953	17.400	1.012

1973	87.700	36.923
1974	95.900	47.897
1975	109.500	51.610
1976	141.800	50.058

2. CN cannot identify any additional benefit or security which would accrue to its employees if the Trusteeship of the CN Pension Fund were changed. The General Chairmen's Association has formally informed CN that it is opposed to the CN Pension Fund being administered by an outside trust company as proposed by Dr. Noel Hall.

3. Any obligation of the Company to match employees' contributions under the 1935 Pension Plan was not affected by the reduction in the unfunded liability from $671 million to $300 million. The full liability in this respect is included in the $300 million.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, December 7, consideration in committee of Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds—Mr. Chrétien—Mr. Turner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Wednesday, December 7, 1977, clause 14, with amendments, was under consideration. Shall clause 14 carry?

On clause 14—Inventory allowance.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in the proposed bill concerning terminal loss and depreciable property. Subclause (4) of the amendment reads:

That for taxation years ending after March 31, 1977, in respect of depreciable property, a taxpayer be required to deduct a terminal loss in the year in which it arises whether or not the taxpayer has a source of income in that year.

I can see that would present difficulties to certain taxpayers, and I wonder if the minister or the parliamentary secretary—since the minister does not seem to be here—could explain the reasoning behind that clause.

Mr. Lumley: First of all, Mr. Chairman, before replying to the hon. member I want to apologize for the minister's absence. Unfortunately, he is stuck on the tarmac in New York, where he was speaking to some businessmen last night and this morning. We hope he will be here for this afternoon's session. However, he wants to apologize to the House for his inability to be here. I wonder if the hon. member would be kind enough to repeat his question.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Clarke: My question was with respect to the amended subclause (4) of clause 14. Can the parliamentary secretary give an explanation of the subclause, because I can see a number of instances where it would be a definite hardship on the taxpayer to deduct a terminal loss, especially in a year when he had no other income.

Mr. Lumley: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I think we have discussed this clause. The hon. member should be aware that one of the important reasons for this clause was to move this out of the regulations and put it in the act. It was the result of representations made to the department and to the minister. That is an important change from the past.

• (1212)

The technical change simply transfers the terminal loss rules from the regulations to the act. This loss arises when depreciable property is disposed of for proceeds which are less than the undepreciated capital cost. The amendment also ensures that a terminal loss can be claimed by the taxpayer whether or not he still operates the business in which the assets were used. Technically, under the existing act the terminal loss after the year the business has ceased is not deductible.

Mr. Clarke: Is the parliamentary secretary saying that it is simply the same provision taken out of the regulations and put into the act?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It also ensures that the terminal loss can be claimed by the taxpayer whether or not he still operates the business in which the assets were used. That is the new part of this section.

Mr. Clarke: That was my next question. It now extends the right to that deduction in the event there is no income from that same business? It is an extension to that degree, is it?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure if this matter relates to the proper clause. I will let the Chair decide that, because I do not know where else this could fit in. A number of times the minister has said there would be reductions in federal tax because of the amendments in this bill, that people would therefore have more income, that that would help stimulate the economy, and so forth. It has come to my attention that, with the changes which have been made in provincial income tax rates, the average taxpayer will in fact have no extra income in his hands because the provincial tax will in many cases more than sop up the reductions allowed by the federal government. In support of that, instead of a provincial rate of 32.5 per cent in British Columbia, we will have a rate of 46 per cent. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can comment on that.

Mr. Lumley: First of all, Mr. Chairman, that affects provincial taxation; it does not affect federal taxation. However, some of the changes referred to by the hon. member are because of changes in the fiscal arrangements act.

Mr. Clarke: I thought I had conceded that in my preamble. Of course it is a provincial tax, but it affects the federal tax. The minister claimed credit for granting a reduction of some $200 and that taxpayers would have this money in their pockets in January and February so that they could spend it and stimulate the economy. I believe it is also a fact that the new provincial rates came about through negotiations between the provincial and federal governments. My concern is two-fold. This seems to be a result of negotiations with the federal government. Furthermore, it seems to give the lie to what the minister says; that taxpayers will have extra money in their pockets. Will they, or will they not? Can we find that out? Does the federal government take any responsibility for these negotiations?

Mr. Lumley: The changes referred to by the hon. member are over and above the changes which were announced prior to the fiscal arrangements act changes.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, like the parliamentary secretary, I regret the fact that the Minister of Finance is not able to be with us today. Is the government proposing an amendment with respect to the clause we are now considering?

Mr. Lumley: I understand that we have already carried two amendments, 14(1) and 14(2), but I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the amendment to which I am referring is the second amendment which became part of Hansard on November 28. It is the amendment dealing with line 21 at page 22.

Mr. Lumley: That was alleviated by the second amendment which we passed the other day, 14(2).

Mr. Stevens: I take it, then, that the earlier amendment has now been superseded by the new amendment?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, if I may put you at ease, it will be a considerable time before clause 14 carries.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair always remains cool at all times.

Mr. Faulkner: Advance notice of a filibuster!

Mr. Stevens: What do you know about it? You do not even know what bill we are discussing.

Mr. Faulkner: I know a hell of a lot more than you do. A lot of people are impatient with you. You are a total washout. You are wasting our time and everyone's time.

Mr. Stevens: Come on, give us some more.

An hon. Member: Harold Cardinal is going to get you.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, my question to the parliamentary secretary arises out of an inquiry which I know has been put to the minister by a group of chartered life underwriters in Montreal. They are concerned about an amendment to section 20(1)(c) which they feel has been made in what they regard as a subtle way. They referred to the amendment which is proposed by the government to section 138(12) and, if I may, I would like to read to the parliamentary secretary what these Montreal chartered life underwriters stated in order to get the parliamentary secretary's response. They stated the following:

> In order not to attract attention to a change in section 20(1)(c) of the act the department in a subtle way has amended section 138(12) to read "in this Section and in addition sections 20(1)(c) and others etc."
> This is so that attention will not be drawn to the fact that interest on a loan from a bank in order to buy an annuity will no longer be deductible.
> We feel that this is an unethical procedure and should be brought to the attention of the Commons.

Would the parliamentary secretary, after consulting his officials, comment on this allegation raised by these Montreal chartered life underwriters?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of the specific letter to which the hon. member refers, but I understand from the officials that they will have to look at the details in that clause. They will bring an answer back to the House.

Mr. Stevens: Can the officials indicate the thrust of the amendment with respect to section 138(12)? Does it, in fact, have an impact on the clause which is now before us?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, with your permission, we would like to come back to this specific matter.

Mr. Stevens: One of the most important aspects of clause 14 is the question of the inventory allowance which we discussed last time this clause was before the House. What is the anticipated impact of the 3 per cent inventory allowance on industry? To what extent will it help reduce corporate liquidity problems? This is one of the stated reasons for allowing the 3 per cent inventory allowance. Could the parliamentary secretary give us some help on the extent that corporate liquidity will be improved?

● (1222)

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, it is "guesstimated", obviously, that business liquidity will be improved by $300 million in the current year.

Mr. Stevens: Is the only improvement in liquidity, in effect, the tax saving or loss, depending on which side you look at, industry will share with respect to this new 3 per cent provision? I understood the $300 million was a federal loss of income or revenue. Is there not a provincial loss of revenue, as well, that might improve the liquidity of industry?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there will be a corresponding provincial loss as well.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder if we could go further with that. My main question was: If the 3 per cent allowance with respect to inventory is to help the liquidity problems of industry, what is the extent of that help? I understood the $300 million was simply the federal tax loss of revenue. Could the parliamentary secretary indicate whether there will be an additional provincial loss of revenue? If so, to what extent, and what is the aggregate benefit in terms of liquidity as far as industry is concerned?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, obviously, that will depend on the various provincial rates. We do not have those figures on hand. They can be obtained, however, if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. Stevens: I think that would be helpful. Perhaps we could get an estimate on that during the luncheon recess. I should like to deal with the general question of whether the government regards this as a stop-gap. I think all members of the House acknowledge that industry has been put in a disadvantageous position with regard to inventory and the inflationary impact on earnings. In short, earnings are often reported which are artificial in the sense that they are not true earnings if inventory is taken into account. As I understand it, the 3 per cent formula that applies to inventory as of January 1 is a sort of stop-gap thing, realizing it is not the most satisfactory approach. Could the parliamentary secretary indicate if any alternative approach is being considered that would be more equitable than this shot-in-the-dark, 3 per cent allowance?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member indicates, a serious cash flow problem faces Canadian business today. Many approaches have been examined by our officials and discussed with industry, and this was the one that appeared would obtain the quickest results. Obviously, this will have to be monitored on a regular basis to see if it has achieved the desired results with respect to economic conditions in the future.

Mr. Stevens: I take it that as of now the government has no immediate alternative to bring in with the next budget, for example?

Mr. Lumley: The hon. member is correct.

Mr. Stevens: I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could indicate the impact of the investment credit that is almost running tandem with the inventory allowance. I believe that at the time of the March 31 budget it was estimated the tax credit would result in a loss to the federal treasury of $485 million. Could the parliamentary secretary confirm if that is still the estimate, that the benefit of the tax credit will cost the federal treasury about $485 million?

Mr. Lumley: That is still the best guess, Mr. Chairman. Obviously, it is still an estimate and perhaps later, if we approve some of these clauses, we will get to the investment tax credit and have a good discussion on it.

Mr. Stevens: In order to give us the complete package, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could indicate if the $485 million is the best guess at the federal level? Is that the total impact of that credit, or is there also a loss of revenue at the provincial tax level on account of the investment tax credit?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, the investment tax credit does not affect provincial revenues.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary secretary may wish to hold this question until the minister returns. The day before yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance if he could indicate whether any consideration was being given, with respect to investment credits, to tying them to some employment condition in the sense that an investment credit would be forthcoming provided the company could show some job-creation, and also that investment credits be tied to first-decision situations. As I understand it, in many cases industry is looking on the investment credit as a bonanza. A company might have planned to spend $1 million; that decision was made two or three years ago, so the investment credit is really a $50,000 windfall income because this is not a new decision. Has consideration been given to having the investment credit carry a little more clout, in the sense of being linked to some type of employment standard or first-time investment standard, in order to ensure it will provide the stimulus needed in the economy?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, this was contemplated at the time and it was felt it would be better to have an employment credit independent of this as opposed to including it with the investment tax credit.

Mr. Stevens: I take it that what is visualized is three or four main industry-related tax benefits. There is the inventory allowance of 3 per cent, an investment credit ranging from 5 per cent to higher levels, some kind of employment credit is contemplated which will be worth about $100 million, and the dividend tax credit has been sweetened. The last figures we had were back in March or April. Could the parliamentary secretary indicate what this package of business-oriented incentives or benefits will cost the federal treasury?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will wait until after lunch, I will total the figures. At the moment, all we have are the figures stated on October 20 by the minister. Since we have not firmly decided on the details for the employment credit, it would be difficult to give the hon. member a more exact figure.

Mr. Stevens: We will be very pleased to get the figure after lunch, Mr. Chairman. Do I take it there has been some change of thought with respect to the $100 million the minister referred to in his statement on October 20 with respect to the employment credit program?

Mr. Lumley: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stevens: Then what is the uncertainty to which the parliamentary secretary refers?

Mr. Lumley: I just do not have the total of the figures. I do not want to give the figure off the top of my head. The first chance I have, I will add it up.

● (1232)

Mr. Clarke: I wish to follow up on my colleague's questions concerning the 3 per cent allowance on year-end inventories. I ask the parliamentary secretary if this is not an allowance which in some measure may overcome the effects of inflation on profits. First of all, why was a fixed rate of 3 per cent of year-end balances arrived at, when inflation was obviously much higher than that?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, this provision was made to assist the cash flow of industry. It was a judgment call, rather than a figure of 3 per cent.

Mr. Clarke: Could the parliamentary secretary tell us why some other method was not used? An arbitrary figure of 3 per cent of inventory surely affects different businesses in different ways. If, for example, a business has a large inventory and a small turnover, it would get a bigger benefit than a business with a small inventory and a large turnover. There are many other methods of accomplishing what I think the government wanted to accomplish by giving this allowance. One would obviously be by the last in, first out method.

If the attempt is really to enable businesses to match inventory costs with revenues, then surely the system of last in, first out would be more equitable, and therefore a preferable system. I am not sure that it would not be simpler, as well. Why was something like that not adopted?

Mr. Lumley: As I indicated earlier, Mr. Chairman, many methods were discussed by officials. We looked at what other countries were doing. This method was chosen because it was very simple to implement. The LIFO method, which the hon. member refers to, is a very complicated method, and although that could still be discussed with respect to the future, in terms of alleviating the situation in the short-term it was decided to use the simpler method which would also be beneficial to both large and small corporations throughout the country.

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure it is any simpler, Mr. Chairman, to try to fix the rate at 3 per cent. But if that is the case, if it was a matter of simplicity, I am surprised that the government has finally concerned itself with simplicity in income tax matters, because there has not been any simplicity or equity in the last little while. When one is attempting to match costs, the most recently purchased goods are probably what one is selling in any event. I suppose we cannot except the parliamentary secretary to change his answer; we will have to accept it.

Mr. Lumley: I don't know if the hon. member has taken a look at the LIFO method which is used in the United States. If he has, he will see very readily the complicated area which he is addressing. As you know, one of the points the government is trying to implement is to eliminate a lot of paperwork particularly for small businesses. When trying to solve some of the cash flow problems, we felt very strongly that the simpler method would be the one most readily acceptable for small businessmen throughout Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, dealing with subsection (5) of clause 14, there is some wording which I feel should have a little explanation. With respect to applications concerning companies with fiscal periods after the end of March 31, 1977, they then go into a formula that the 3 per cent inventory allowance which may be claimed is an arithmetic calculation based on 365 days. Could the parliamentary secretary indicate why this arbitrary March 31 cut-off is put in? I understand it is causing problems to people who have year-ends that are following in the short period defined here. Unfortunately, sometimes it is the smaller businesses and retailers falling into this period who are having difficulty living with the provision as it is now worded. Could the parliamentary secretary explain why we have the date March 31—beyond the obvious; it was budget night—or could we not simplify it and say January 1 and save the problem of the distinction that is obviously being made?

Mr. Lumley: The hon. member is right when he indicates that this is a problem area. If you will allow me, I would just like to read specifically some of the reasons for the change. The original ways and means motion of March 31 indicated that the measure would only be applicable to taxation years commencing after 1976. Many representations were received pointing out that this was inequitable for those taxpayers whose fiscal periods commenced in 1976 but were substantially in 1977. In response, the scope was expanded to cover a taxation year which started in 1976, in which case the new inventory allowance would kick in on March 31, 1977. This means some companies could start receiving the inventory allowance up to three months later than other companies, but that minor imbalance would have been costly to avoid.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the parliamentary secretary could indicate if any consideration is being given to perhaps relieving whatever the inequity is in time for the next budget.

Mr. Lumley: After the first year, there will be no inequities, so there will be no consideration given to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Stevens: My next question concerns the applicability of the 3 per cent allowance with respect to inventory. What is the position of a company that is newly incorporated, going into business during this, if you like, transition period? When may they claim a 3 per cent allowance on their inventory?

Mr. Lumley: They will not have any opening inventory, Mr. Chairman, so obviously it will be the beginning of their second year of operation.

Mr. Stevens: As the parliamentary secretary has agreed to give answers on three questions that we have put to him under section 14, I wonder if we could stand clause 14 and consider some of the subsequent clauses, with a view to returning to clause 14, hopefully, right after lunch.

Mr. Lumley: I can answer one question now with respect to total revenue cost for these incentives to industry. If you look at page 4 of the March 31 supplementary papers tabled by the Minister of Finance, you will see there are basically three figures which total approximately $700 million. The first is the tax relief with respect to business inventories, of $275 million—this is the fiscal year 1977-78—the federal investment tax credit of $385 million, and the enhanced depletion for the high cost of oil and gas wells is approximately $20 million. I would agree to stand clause 14 until I obtain the other answers which the hon. member has requested.

Mr. Peters: Because of the time limit and the shortness of time remaining, I would object to standing clause 14 unless we can come back to it at a specific time. I would suggest, if someone wants it stood, that we have an understanding to come back to it at 2 o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the hon. member suggested we come back to it right after lunch.

● (1242)

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, before we go to the next clause, assuming that we will be standing clause 14, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could reconcile the figures he has just given us, the tax relief as far as inventory allowance of $275 million, and the investment credit of $385 million, with the earlier figures on which we all agreed, $300 million for the tax allowance on inventory and the investment credit of $485 million. I take it one is a short year, the remaining part of a fiscal year, whereas the other figures would be the total for a 12-month period.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, the figures I referred to are for the year 1977-78. Figures of $300 million for inventory allowance, $485 million for the investment tax credit, and $20 million for depletion in the current year, are for the first full year.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we stand clause 14 and take it up again at two o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 15.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, before we deal with clause 15, perhaps the parliamentary secretary can give us a brief summary of what the thinking is at the departmental level with regard to this clause, and what they hope to achieve by the amendment.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, this is a technical change consequent on the extension of the investment tax credit to scientific research expenditures. Expenditures on scientific research, both of a current and capital nature, may be deducted in the year incurred. However, since the investment tax credit will now apply to such expenditures, the effective cost to the taxpayer is reduced. Thus, the amount deductible by the taxpayer is limited by this amendment to his net cost; that is, the amount of expenditure minus the investment tax credit. This is consistent with the tax treatment generally accorded government grants. The cost reduction is also consistent with the treatment given expenditures on machinery and other capital property eligible for the investment tax credit. The credit in these circumstances reduces the cost that may subsequently be written off by way of capital cost allowances. For example, the 5 per cent with the investment tax credit will come right off the tax payable, and the other 95 per cent will be deducted on the income side.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16—Election re: disposition of Canadian securities.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know from the minister the purpose of this amendment. As I understand it, there will now be an election for corporations and trusts, as well as individuals. Previously, it was only individuals. It is one thing to permit an individual to elect so as to guarantee that his eligible gains will be taxed as capital in nature. However, to grant such an election of lifetime duration to a corporation may show a severe want of prudence. Can I have some indication as to why this lifetime permission is being extended to corporations? I agree that by law a corporation can be called a person or an individual, but to give them the same kind of grant does not mean it will be once in a lifetime or for the duration of life.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, this clause is written not only to assist individuals, but primarily venture investment corporations.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this is really the point. There is some merit to it being granted to individuals. An individual can establish his eligible gains as a capital gain over a lifetime. As indicated by the students at Osgoode Hall, this will create a decrease in litigation arising from the ability to guarantee one's capital gains. It is likely to more than compensate that which will flow from this potential to develop schemes to guarantee capital gains while still ensuring capital losses. When an individual plays his income losses against his capital gains over a period of time, that is one thing. However, for a corporation to do it would indicate great difficulty in being able to develop new schemes to avoid paying taxes.

God knows, the corporations do not need more schemes to avoid taxes. Even if they are multinational corporations or Canadian-controlled, like INCO and Falconbridge, they have enough ways of doing this. I am interested in knowing how much money this will give to the corporations. What is the estimate? If there is no estimate, what is the justification for putting it in?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, we do not have an estimate with regard to this provision. Under the existing rules, a number of investors faced the possibility that profits arising from the disposal of their investments would be taxed fully as ordinary income because of the frequency of transactions in securities or the speculative nature of the investment. This was a particular problem for the venture capital companies who frequently invest significant sums in the equity of small Canadian corporations. As I recall, during the second reading debate the NDP was encouraging the government to do everything it could for small business. This clause falls into that category. Also, these investment capital companies hope to sell shares at a profit once the business becomes established. This amendment is designed to remove any uncertainty faced by such investors.

Mr. Peters: The amending clause disqualifies a trader or dealer in securities from making this election. This provision probably intended to refer to security brokers and not simply to individuals who buy securities. Nevertheless, the wording in this clause will provide unnecessary litigation that could be circumvented by removing this ambiguity. If it is for the purpose of allowing small businesses to get an advantage, that is one thing. However, this does not only apply to small businesses. We would have to get rid of the ambiguity and put in a designation as to how extensive we want it to go.

If it goes to the individual, that is perfectly all right. However, if it goes to large corporations as well as small ones, and we put them into the same category as the protection for the individual in relation to his capital gain, we may be providing a benefit that is almost incalculable.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, in order to alleviate the hon. member's concern—which I think is justified—dealers who trade in securities, banks credit unions—this provision does not apply to them. I assume this is what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, I want to follow the questioning of the hon. member for Timiskaming. I apologize to the parliamentary secretary: I think I missed the first question. As I read subclause (2), it is only an individual, a resident taxpayer, who can make this election and shall be deemed to have capital gains or capital losses. At the moment, the individual may be subject to paying regular tax; that is, having his profits and losses included in his income. I am not clear as to the initial intent of the government for proposing this change. Perhaps we should start there.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, basically, there are two points to this particular clause. The first ensures that the proceeds of a life insurance policy are not treated as capital gains except to the extent that the policyholder has, through his insurance policy, invested in a segregated fund. Second, the amendment permits taxpayers to elect to treat profits on Canadian securities as capital gains. This provision will be of particular benefit to venture investment corporations, and in that sense it particularly affects small business.

● (1252)

Mr. Clarke: Is it possible that subclause (2) could be used to the peril of an individual taxpayer who makes an election? I presume it is one he makes for life. A taxpayer might find himself in a position where he was in the business of trading in securities. If he had not made that election, he would have the right to declare his income and losses in the regular way. What about the man who might find himself in such a position?

Mr. Lumley: The hon. member is correct: it is a very difficult decision for an individual to make. However, it is one he must make at a particular time; he cannot change his mind halfway through the process.

Mr. Clarke: Election is optional: he could put a decision off until such time as he believes it would be to his own benefit?

Mr. Lumley: It is optional to the extent that he could do it whenever he wished.

Mr. Clarke: How would this affect a man who treated his capital gains as profit without making an election? I presume he is not obliged to make one. What would happen if subsequently the Department of National Revenue decided he was in the business of trading in securities? Could he then make an election retroactive to the year for which he was under examination?

Mr. Lumley: I would answer no, but I will verify that opinion. We cannot see any reason why that would be possible.

Mr. Stevens: The parliamentary secretary has referred to venture investment corporations in relation to this clause. Could he tell us how they are defined? I do not see any definition in the Income Tax Act. Is this made clear somewhere in Bill C-11?

Mr. Lumley: There is no definition in the act.

Mr. Stevens: I think it would be helpful if we were given an outline of what the government has in mind when it refers to venture investment corporations.

Mr. Lumley: Basically, we are saying this applies to any small company which operates in the manner described.

Mr. Stevens: I had hoped we could get a closer definition than that. By "a small company," does the hon. gentleman mean that the venture capital corporation would be small, or does he mean that it would invest in small companies? Again, what is meant by "small"? I know "small" is supposed to be "beautiful", but what does the department have in mind, and when does a company become not small?

Mr. Lumley: Basically, we have in mind any company which has a pool of funds for investment in small or medium-sized companies.

Mr. Stevens: Would that include, for example, open-end mutual funds? Would it include closed-end investment corporations? I think we all know what open-end mutual funds are.

But would this cover an Argus-type holding company or investment company?

Mr. Lumley: I would not call Argus Corporation a venture capital company. But it could take advantage of this procedure.

Mr. Stevens: Did I hear the parliamentary secretary correctly? Did he say that Argus and similar corporations could take advantage of this provision?

Mr. Lumley: Unless they are among those specifically excluded, such as dealers in securities, or trustees, banks, trust companies, credit unions, and so on, such as I mentioned in reply to a question by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Stevens: As there is further reference to venture investment corporations later in the bill, I am wondering whether, over the lunch break, the parliamentary secretary could arrange to let us have a better definition of what the department has in mind with regard to such corporations. I make this request particularly bearing in mind that legislation has been proposed by the government of Ontario looking to the special incorporation of such companies. It would be helpful to ascertain whether the federal thinking is to co-ordinate its tax arrangements with what the provinces may be doing in this field.

Mr. Lumley: This was certainly one of the factors which was taken into consideration, but we would prefer to discuss that aspect when we reach the particular clause.

Mr. Stevens: Could we not stand clause 16? I believe one of my hon. friends has a couple of questions to which he is awaiting answers. Maybe we could go on to the next clause.

Mr. Lumley: Much as I would like to accommodate the hon. member, I would remind him we still have many clauses to pass, and we would prefer to complete consideration of the clause before us.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I, too, was surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary say that Argus Corporation could qualify under this clause in certain circumstances. I should like to ask about the position of a number of other holding companies, particularly those engaged in mining, the field in which I am most closely interested. Speculation there is not practicable at the present time, but if this capital gains requirement were modified to the extent that only 50 per cent were collected, we would probably get much more money into the mining field. I am interested in the position of Rob Roy which operates, I believe, under the Canadian Imperial Bank in the forest industry particularly.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

• (1402)

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. When the House took recess at 1 p.m., the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) had the floor on clause 16. However, we agreed to return to clause 14 at 2 p.m. Perhaps the House would let the hon. member for Timiskaming continue his speech, and then return to clause 14. Is there unanimous consent?

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the reference of the parliamentary secretary to holding companies which could declare that they wanted to use their gain as a capital gain rather than income. It was said that this was a lifetime decision not only for an individual but for a corporation. The parliamentary secretary said that as a long as holding companies like Argus were in the venture capital field, they would be able to make such a declaration. We have a very immediate and deep interest in venture capital going into primary development, such as the forest products industry or mining, although most of the companies in the venture field do not have much money or stocks available.

I should like to ask two questions. First of all, does this provision apply to companies like Noranda, Hollinger Exploration, or Lakeshore? Many companies in the mining field are, in effect, conglomerate holding companies—they engage in exploration—but at the moment there is very little money flowing into these venture corporations. Will mining companies, therefore, be able to benefit from this provision? So far as venture capital is concerned, the Argus Corporation is not really in the venture capital field. Much that they have is not ventured; it is assured.

Mr. Lumley: As I indicated to the hon. member before we broke for lunch, Mr. Chairman, under subclause (2), if these companies are not on the excluded list, then the provisions apply to them.

Mr. Peters: Supposing they make a lifetime decision and declare that they are in the venture capital field: they are allowed to take their profit in the form of a capital gain, and this gives them a tax advantage, I presume, of at least 50 per cent since capital gains are taxed at 50 per cent. But how is the rest of a company not involved in this field operated? The Argus Corporation, Noranda, Hollinger, McIntyre and such companies have holding companies in various fields, and sometimes they operate mines. I am sure we would not want indefinitely to keep such operations in this preferred category.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, this provision basically gives these companies an opportunity to make a declaraton. By and large, the companies the hon. member refers to will not make such a declaration because in most instances their share gains are already capital gains. So they know exactly what situation they are in.

Mr. Peters: Not if they are actually doing exploration, Mr. Chairman. Many segments of the Argus Corporation produce sure gains. I imagine there are other cases where, as the result of amalgamation, properties are acquired which are not sure gain propositions. In fact, their losses are more assured than their gains. This is why the capital gains tax section applies to them. It seems to me the only companies which will benefit are those which count on their losses being more frequent than their gains. They can handle these losses in a holding company because they have something with which to offset losses. If it becomes all venture capital, Argus will not take advantage of it, but some of the small mining companies might. If this provision is designed for them, that is good, because it is a method by which those industries may receive considerable help.

● (1412)

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, certainly this procedure will help investment in small mining companies. This does not apply to mining properties; it only applies to Canadian securities.

Mr. Peters: The money raised on securities for the development of the property would have to be established as a separate entity. The companies which handle the securities have been given a lifetime designation. They will operate on the basis of capital gains as a profit, rather than the normal profit and loss method?

Mr. Lumley: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: Primary development in Canada is the only field which can be developed today. It must be in forest or mining products, because we cannot expand in agriculture any more. Agriculture is being taken care of by the moneys available in that field. There is no money available for mining exploration or development at the present time. This cannot be raised on the stock markets because of the ups and downs.

If a company sells the securities and still retains control of the property, it can raise money against the property and perhaps can bring about development. It will be hard for those companies to operate on a security basis. The brokers and the money market have been excluded as such. The holding company will raise money to develop the property. Noranda Exploration, which is separate from Noranda, is the type of company that will develop if money can be raised. If a person puts money in exploration companies, he is gambling more on losses than on gains.

The present price of gold provides a potential of starting 20 or 30 gold mines in Ontario if money can be raised. Is this section sufficient to allow holding companies to raise money on the normal market, on the basis that profits can be written off at 50 per cent? Will this raise money for that type of development?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what this procedure is used for. I apologize to the hon. member for misunderstanding his previous question. The answer to his well-taken point is yes, including small business generally and not just particularly in the mining venture corporation field.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: As was agreed prior to the luncheon adjournment, at this point we shall revert to clause 14 before continuing the discussion on clause 16.

On clause 14—Inventory allowance.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, prior to lunch, the hon. member for York-Simcoe asked some questions with respect to clause 14. I am prepared to answer those questions.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. member for York-Simcoe is behind the curtain. He will return to the chamber shortly. My understanding of the situation before one o'clock was that the parliamentary secretary would return equipped to answer the questions posed. Since those questions are on the record, perhaps we could have the answers.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, I see the hon. member for York-Simcoe is entering the chamber. The 3 per cent inventory allowance which will reduce federal revenue by $300 million will also reduce provincial revenue by $130 million, for a total of $430 million. The hon. member's second question indicated that the effective changes proposed to section 138 was to make interest on money borrowed to buy annuity contracts non-deductible. The interest on money borrowed to buy annuities has always been non-deductible. Therefore, this bill does not change the intent of that treatment.

Clause 14 agreed to.

On clause 16—Election re: disposition of Canadian securities.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Chairman, this morning I asked the parliamentary secretary about the election which can be made under subclause (2). I am concerned about this because it appears to affect individual taxpayers. The hon. member for Timiskaming was concerned about the promoters, the developers and the corporations, but I am concerned about the individual taxpayer. When an individual resident of Canada decides to make an election, he is bound by that election for the rest of his taxpaying years. Subclause (2) (5) indicates that an election under subsection (4) does not apply to a disposition of a Canadian security by a taxpayer who, at the time the security is disposed of, is a trader or dealer in securities. Whether a person is a trader or dealer in securities is a matter for argument. Often the Department of National Revenue has argued that a taxpayer has been a trader or dealer when that person claimed he was not. If the taxpayer made an election, under subclause (2), that all of his gains and losses would be treated as capital gains and losses, and if there was a dispute later on, the department could consider this man to be a dealer or trader in securities and the election he made under subclause (2) would not apply. Is my understanding correct?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question is yes. There is always a question of fact to be resolved in cases of this nature.

Mr. Clarke: Why did the government feel it was necessary or desirable to dig this large hole for taxpayers to fall into? The taxpayer has to make the election. He has to indicate that he wants this treatment. This morning, the parliamentary secretary indicated it was a serious decision which would not be taken lightly. Under what circumstances does the parliamentary secretary envisage any taxpayer wishing to make the election, since his gains can be treated as capital gains and his losses can be treated as capital losses under the present rule until he is challenged for being a trader or a dealer?

● (1422)

Mr. Lumley: I think that most individuals will know whether we are dealing in capital losses or gains, but the basic premise is to try to reduce uncertainty where there is doubt.

Mr. Clarke: I like the thought which the parliamentary secretary is putting forward, but I cannot see how the clause removes any uncertainty. If a person was later adjudged to be a trader or dealer, he would then lose the exemption that he claimed under subclause (4).

Mr. Lumley: We are talking about a professional, rather than an individual doing something on his own. I think the definition is pretty explicit. I do not think it would be an area where there is uncertainty or doubt.

Mr. Clarke: When I was practising as a chartered accountant, doing some tax work, it was a matter of whether a transaction was a capital transaction or an income transaction, which gave rise to many court cases and certain reassessments and appeals—frequently court cases. So for the parliamentary secretary to say that it does not apply to the ordinary individual because he is not a trader or dealer in securities is only good so long as the tax department holds that view.

Very often an investor will have a large portfolio and will be doing quite a lot of trading. On many occasions there has been a genuine dispute as to whether he is a trader or an investor. If he is a trader, then already the profits and losses are income items, and also he would not be able to take advantage of the exemption in subclause (4).

At the risk of repeating the same question, I have to ask what is the difference between a man who elects under subclause (2) to have all his gains treated as capital gains or losses, or the man who does not make that election because that is the law today, but claims that his gains and losses are capital gains and losses and continues to do so without making the election? So if he makes the election, there is no difference: he still does the same thing. Then we see that the only person who has the right to undo that election, if he makes it, is the income tax department and the courts, if they decide that the man is a trader. So I am afraid I have to restate the question more clearly. Under what circumstances would anyone want to make an election under subclause 2?

Mr. Lumley: For example, the Venture Investment Company would know exactly where they stand before the fact, and that eliminates the uncertainty which we are trying to do away with in this clause.

Mr. Clarke: Like my friend to the left, the hon. member for Timiskaming, I have not examined the plight of the Venture Capital Company. I am looking at it from the point of view of the individual resident taxpayer. The phrasing used is "resident taxpayer and his income," so I presume it applies to individuals as well as to these venture corporations. On that basis, I suggest that if I asked the question again, perhaps the parliamentary secretary would answer it at this time.

Mr. Lumley: We acknowledge there is some ambiguity in that situation with respect to individuals, but by and large that would be satisfactory.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, we would be ready to have the vote on clause 16, but we will be voting against it.

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the clause will please rise. All those opposed will please rise.

Clause 16 agreed to: Yeas, 36; nays, 11.

On clause 17.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I would be pleased if the parliamentary secretary could give us an explanation—we hope, a fairly full explanation—of clause 17 as it deals with principal residences.

Mr. Lumley: These are fairly technical changes to section 40 of the act. The section sets out general rules relating to the calculation of capital gains and losses, technical deficiencies and formulae for determining exemptions for capital gains tax when a taxpayer has disposed of his principal residence. The final change removes a provision that is no longer necessary. If the hon. member for York-Simcoe wants me to give details on the two subclauses, I would be more than happy to answer his question. Clause 17(1) is on principal residence change in use. This technical change deals with the formula for determining the exempt portion on the gain on the disposition of a taxpayer's principal residence.

A defect exists under present legislation when there has been a change in the use of property that has previously been a taxpayer's principal residence. The defect would operate where, for example, a taxpayer ceases to reside in his home and rents it to others. In this case, there is ordinarily disposition of the principal residence when it becomes a rental property, and any gain accrued to that point is exempt from tax. Any subsequent gain while the property is rented should be taxable when the property is eventually sold, and under the current formula the portion of the gain accrued during the rental period will remain tax exempt. I have an example of this case, but I think it would be too long to read. We could have it appended, if the hon. member so desires.

The second subclause to clause 17 deals with principal residences with respect to land used in farming. This is the general explanation of the situation when the house is part of the farm and the two are separate because the house is also the principal residence. The third change is a technical amendment which repeals an unnecessary provision.

Mr. Clarke: Could the parliamentary secretary tell us whether this provision having to do with principal residence would relieve the case where an individual, through illness and infirmity, has left his principal residence but not sold it prior to death and then resides in a hospital or nursing home until death? In such cases, until now the department has assessed that as a non-principal residence because the person has not ceased to reside there. Will that relieve the case?

● (1432)

Mr. Lumley: That does not apply in this case. This amendment does not relieve the situation referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Clarke: What consideration was given by the government to relief in a case where a Canadian taxpayer has, through illness or infirmity, had to vacate his principal residence with the hope of recovering and moving back into his principal residence, has spent some time—months or years; it does not really matter—in a hospital or nursing residence and subsequently has died before he could go back? The estate, or the widow, suffers because the sale is no longer considered to be the sale of a principal residence and it is taxable as if it were an investment, when in fact it was never intended to be an investment and it was only through unfortunate circumstances that the individual no longer resided there.

Mr. Lumley: I am not aware that there is a problem in the short term, but if the hon. member would care to refer this case to us, we would be more than happy to give it consideration for future budgets.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in a matter which is even more split up than the example cited. In this case the residence is a farm. As is quite often the case, an acre of land with a house is separated from the farm operation. Formerly, it was all part of the farm operation. When it is split up, what is the disposition of the farm operation? The disposition of that part is deemed not to be the same as if the whole package were sold in a single sale. It is an arm's length disposition.

Mr. Benjamin: Short arm.

Mr. Peters: Yes, a short arm. However, it is deemed to have changed from a business proposition to a residential proposition. There is another situation where there is trouble, not so much with tax officials in Ottawa but with district offices. In this situation, property does not change hands but its use is changed from that of a rental property to that of a residential property, or vice versa. A sale is deemed to take place where no sale actually does. There is a change from one type of taxation to another. There is deemed to be a sale, and the capital gain on that sale must be taken care of although no sale has taken place.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the example used by the hon. member, the $1,000 deduction with respect to capital gains would in essence provide for a situation where one acre would be involved.

Mr. Peters: What about the second case? I am not sure whether it is covered by this clause or by the next one, because there is a similarity to both clauses as to what category is involved. In my example, a house is purchased for residential purposes. The owner is not resident for a period of time, and then moves into it. When he does, the rental property ceases to exist and he is considered to have sold it at whatever the market value might have been and whether it was voluntary sale or a forced sale.

In my example, it is considered to be a voluntary sale to a willing buyer from a willing seller, which in most cases is not the situation. Is there any relief offered in clause 17 for that problem? I understand that the proposed changes in clause 17 do not substantially affect the operation of the present law. Clause 17 is basically administrative in nature, correcting minor problems which have arisen in consequence of the wording used in the current legislation, but changing wording often changes the direction of legislation in more than just a minor way. Has that problem been given any consideration?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct the previous statement I made with respect to the $1,000 allowance of capital gain. I was incorrect in my answer. This is an area which the officials are examining. With respect to the second point, the answer is that this will not take care of that particular situation.

Mr. Peters: I had the feeling that the parliamentary secretary was not correct about the $1,000. With farm taxation it is never so simple that there is a penalty of $1,000 and it is let go at that. If the parliamentary secretary wants to move an amendment to solve this problem where father or grandfather are given the family home with an acre of land, and if it can be settled for $1,000, I am prepared to second the amendment and give it speedy passage. However, I am afraid it is not quite that simple.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, if it were that simple we would probably have done it, but it is a very complex issue.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, would the parliamentary secretary clarify whether this amendment will make it impossible for a husband and wife who own two properties—for example, a home and a summer home, one in the name of the husband and the other in the name of the wife—to dispose of the two properties, or either one, without a capital gain being realized?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, the situation referred to by the hon. member is not affected whatsoever. They are treated as two individual situations.

Clause 17 agreed to.

On clause 18—Exchanges of property

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss a matter with the parliamentary secretary. I have consulted some of his colleagues and I understand that this clause refers to replacement property under capital gains. The bill now relieves a taxpayer who makes a capital gain on the sale of a property—a farm or small business—and puts all the proceeds from that sale into a larger and better farm or small business. That person would be exempt from the capital gains tax on a first sale. However, he would be liable to pay capital gains tax if he subsequently sold the replacement property. He would be exempt from the capital gains tax on the first sale, but would be liable if he sold the second or replacement property.

● (1442)

I have specific cases in mind—there are probably a dozen other cases in my constituency of farmers and small businessmen who sold a property two, three or four years ago and used all the proceeds to purchase a more economic farm unit or small business enterprise. They were liable for the capital gains tax even though they used all the proceeds from the sale, plus additional borrowings, to acquire a more economic enterprise. I appreciate the fact that the bill makes provision to exempt such people from capital gains tax on the first sale, and that this provision came into effect on March 31, 1977. Could the parliamentary secretary tell me if he and his officials would sympathetically consider and act upon this suggestion right away, or perhaps we could stand the clause for 20 minutes while an amendment is drafted to make this retroactive or deemed to have been in place when the capital gains tax came into force.

I appreciate that the officials would need a few minutes to assess what such refunds would cost. I do not want to be misunderstood: I am fully in agreement with the principle of capital gains tax. I agree with Mr. Carter who said "A buck is a buck.". In the case I give as an example a small farmer who sold two small farm units and realized a capital gain of $8,000 in each case, so is liable for $3,500 capital gains tax. He used the proceeds to acquire a larger farm so that he and his son would have a unit large enough that they could farm together. The problem is that this took place prior to March 31, 1977. Therefore, I appeal to the parliamentary secretary to see if the wording of the clause cannot be changed. Perhaps a limitation of so much money or so many acres could be inserted. I would agree to that. Those who do not need the benefit should not get it.

Has the parliamentary secretary had time to consult his officials and come up with some fast wording that would allow a capital gain on the sale of property where the proceeds of the sale are used to buy another property in all such cases in the last three or four years. I am sure it would not involve too many cases. I would limit my request to small farmers and businessmen who are not out to make a capital gain but who want a more economic unit. I sense, from conversations with members on all sides, that there is some support for this idea.

It may involve $500,000 or $1 million in refunds, but surely that is a small amount to set against a fair application of the principle of capital gains tax.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member understands that in any tax issue there is always the question of retroactivity. Nobody is totally satisfied when the government introduces changes. Obviously, we are very sympathetic to the hon. member's representation. I have made representations along the same lines on behalf of my constituents. Where would we draw the line, however? This could be an administrative nightmare. There would be reams and reams of work. Why pick on this particular tax change to be retroactive, and not some other area?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a long argument with my colleague. I know he agrees with me in principle, but I wish he would not obfuscate or run in back alleys with the matter. Obviously, the line would be drawn at a purely replacement sale. Where a person has bought and sold half a dozen farms in the last four years, exemption should not be considered. Such person is obviously out to make a capital gain without paying taxes, so I would not exempt this kind of transaction. Where there is a legitimate instance of replacement for the economic well-being of a small farm or small business, that is where I think retroactivity should apply.

Since the capital gains tax is relatively new, it is not as though it would be necessary to go back 100 years or even ten: at the most, it would involve five years. There should be no administrative nightmare either, because as I see it there would be no exemption or refund unless the taxpayer made application. It would be a relatively simple matter for the department to review the tax returns for the previous four or five years, and if they were satisfied that the capital gain on the original sale was totally reinvested in replacement property, an exemption or, if necessary, a refund could be made. At most, a few hundred or a few thousand cases would come to the department's attention, and surely they could handle that.

It seems to me, the way the bill reads, that in the area of replacement property there is sufficient limitation to eliminate people who have turned property over four, five or even ten times in the last five years. Obviously, such people are not trying to improve their farm or small business and should not be eligible for refund of capital gains tax on the first sale.

I appreciate that since the minister is not here, another minister might have to move an amendment to the bill on his behalf; but I appeal to the parliamentary secretary to give us better reasons than we have heard for not doing it.

● (1452)

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, if the principle number of retroactivity which the hon. member suggests were applied, this would indeed be discriminatory. He is forgetting about all the small businesses in the country to which this clause also applies. Thus there are tens of thousands of files to be investigated, and this is an administrative nightmare.

Mr. Benjamin: Why wouldn't they apply?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): One of the principle reasons the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is under some misapprehension and I think the parliamentary secretary is at cross-purposes in answering him—is that if they went back to the Income Tax, and saw what section 44 was dealing with, it is exactly the deferral of gain on involuntary dispositions.

The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has been talking about the example of an individual who had sold or exchanged properties three or four times in a row. That is not an involuntary disposition. If we look at the involuntary dispositions that are considered in clause 44, we can go either to clause 13 or to clause 54 where the definitions of the dispositions envisaged by this particular clause are considered. These are, first of all, compensation for property unlawfully taken. That is compensation under an insurance policy for property that has been stolen and which by reason of inflation there has been, shall we say, an increase in value. Or there could be instances where land may have been unlawfully taken and compensation has been made to the rightful owner.

Second, I refer to the case where property has been destroyed, whether real or personal property. In the case of a house which was built or acquired 20 years ago, and this year is destroyed by fire, then of course the insurance value will be much greater than the acquired value.

Lastly, the one I am concerned with is where there has been expropriation. These are the rules that might apply, and there is a change in the whole of clause 44.

I say, Mr. Chairman, we would have had less refinement and amendment over the years if the government had heeded the advice and the action taken by the opposition at the time of the income tax changes in 1971. I then proposed, on behalf of the official opposition, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, who was then the financial critic of the New Democratic Party—at least, he supported me up to a point—that all farm lands sold or disposed of, or passed to heirs, which would continue in bona fide agricultural purposes would not be subject to capital gains, period. If that motion had been accepted, we would not have all these refinements. However, we have had some refinements since that time.

The then minister of finance, Mr. Benson, refused to accept that farm lands should not be subject to capital gains. Then there was the first amendment—if there was a legitimate passage from father to son, or from father to daughter—either by sale or by death—but it had to be in the immediate family: it could not be sold to a neighbour who was carrying on farming. Of course, it did not apply to family incorporated farms, which was absolute nonsense—bureaucratic nonsense. It still is, if I may say so.

In many parts of the country farmers have been encouraged to incorporate their farms for a number of valid reasons. When there has to be disposition of an incorporated farm, immediately the capital gains guillotine falls on them. This is wrong. As a matter of fact, we would not have a good number of these refinements with regard to farm land if there had been a total exemption provided the lands continued for bona fide agricultural purposes. I think the House would generally agree to that. But no, there has been this absolute insistence by the government that farm lands, unless they are exempt—even if they are going to be sold and continued as farms—will be subject to capital gains.

I notice that in this clause the effective date, where there has been an expropriation action, is deemed to be the date of the judgment of the lawsuit. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that is wrong because there is a great deal of difference between the date of a lawsuit and the date the funds payable under the lawsuit become available to the affected landowner, who then has to go about to effect changes in property as envisaged under the act. In this connection I quote from page 28 of the bill which refers to the day on which the taxpayer's compensation for the property is finally determined by such tribunals or courts. That should be the day on which the compensation is paid following the determination by such a tribunal or courts.

In the case of the government of Canada—I think everyone here will agree—by the time the judgment of the Department of Justice traced through to the department affected—say it is an expropriation by the Department of Transport—the Department of Transport will have a demand on the Department of Supply and Services to issue a cheque. This can take not only weeks but months.

If there is any recalcitrances as I saw in the parks department following the decision concerning perpetual leases, it could take years before the department will acknowledge it was wrong and that it must accede to the decision of the tribunal. Here, again, is a complication following capital gains on farm land. I advise the minister, if I could have his ear, that capital gains tax as such brings in very little, relative to the administrative complexities not only of the Department of National Revenue taxation officials but also the ordinary citizen.

● (1502)

Having recourse to tax consultants, whether they be accountants or lawyers, from a national point of view is much ado about nothing. The mountain of labour is tremendous. There is a bureaucratic mountain on one hand and the public mountain on the other. The result of that joint labour is but a puny mouse. It is not worth a candle in this country at the present time.

Capital gains is nonsense. It is much more of a nonsense where it affects farm lands that are going to be destined for bona fide agriculture.

This tax came about as a result of claims that land developers were making great amounts of money and not paying taxes. Any lawyer worth his salt knows that in so far as income is concerned under the Income Tax Act, that is any income arising out of a venture. The purchase of a parcel of land for the purpose of subdivision or otherwise, other than for bona fide farm purposes by a farmer or one who intends to farm, is known as a venture. There are judgments galore in the Supreme Court of Canada which determine that the profit on such a venture shall be income and therefore subject to income tax.

There are those who want to be demagogic about property development, academics who could not find their way out of a paper bag when it comes to tax matters. Others give a cosmetic appearance about doing something about a particular problem that has been already covered. There are those who motivate on both sides who travail on these mountains.

I am sure the Minister of Finance would be the first to admit that the yield on capital gain, bearing in mind the action of the stock market and the value variations in other fields, has produced little tangible revenue. However, the pages in the Income Tax Act have been expanded inordinately. First, they set up the capital gains tax. Second, they set up and describe the exceptions. Those exceptions take pages and pages and pages. Precious few people understand them. The minister, like myself, is one who cannot understand them because the complexity is so great.

There is one value of a tax system which the minister and his officials always forget. In order for a tax system or a tax law to be just, it must be readily understood. That is fundamental to any tax system. If anyone in this country, barring a very limited number of people, understands the workings and ramifications of the Income Tax Act, whether they apply to individuals or corporations, I have sadly missed my guess.

In 1971 the government introduced legislation, Section 44 as it then stood. Now it is all being replaced. Why? Because there are some hard cases under it. If hard cases make bad law, then bad law makes hard cases. In so far as this act is concerned, most of the capital gains legislation and the exceptions thereto are bad law because they make hard cases. One should look at this amendment in the context of what I have said. I hope that some day we will be able to excise a great deal out of the Income Tax Act.

Income tax reform basically would be the simplification of income tax. Every time one seeks an exception or an exemption of a particular kind, the act is complicated. The return is complicated and the act and the tax are less understood. From the public's point of view, this is an extreme loss.

I hope we can get a full confirmation from the minister of what he wants to do other than tinkering with this section which, frankly, I do not think should be in the act. Capital gains on farm land for farm purposes should not be there.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the hon. member for Edmonton West. He was about as helpful as the parliamentary secretary. Some of the points he made had nothing to do with the point I raised. I was talking about voluntary sales, for example where a farmer sells a three quarter section farm to buy a one and one half section farm so that he has an economic unit.

I agree that in the case of an expropriation, an involuntary sale where the Department of Highways pays him "X" number of dollars for his farm, there is a capital gain. My point is this: if he spends all the proceeds of that voluntary or involuntary sale on replacement property, will he be exempt from capital gains tax, and only liable to capital gains if he sells the replacement property?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

I am not interested in exempting the doctor or lawyer who buys a farm every three or four years as a hobby. That is not his prime occupation. That person should be liable for a capital gains tax.

The hon. member for Edmonton West was accurate when he said we supported his contention in 1972 to exempt bona fide farmers or storekeepers if that was their only livelihood. However, we are not interested in exempting a doctor or lawyer, who has a piece of land as a hobby, from capital gains tax. He should not be exempted if he only uses land to horse around on or make a few extra bucks. I am not talking about that kind of case.

The hon. member said we are just complicating the act. I am more interested in it being fair, with the good principle of a capital gains tax being applied in a good manner. The provisions in clause 18 give effect to what I am proposing. If this is a good principle in the bill to be effective March 31, 1977, why is it not a good principle effective March 31, 1972, or 1973, whenever the capital gains took effect? It is equally valid. I do not think it would be impossible from an administrative point of view. The onus would be on the taxpayer to prove that all the proceeds from a sale went into the purchase of replacement property. If he could not do that, he should be liable for capital gains tax.

I am asking that the principle of clause 18 be taken to apply as far back as the date upon which the capital gains tax was put into effect. In a case where a farmer or a small businessman was obliged to pay capital gains tax in such circumstances he would be eligible for a refund. I hope the minister's officials have been able to devise an appropriate amendment to give effect to what I have requested.

Mr. Chrétien: I was not here for the discussion, but I understand it would be extremely difficult to adopt the hon. member's suggestion. There is no justification for it.

Mr. Clarke: It seems obvious there is some discrepancy between the views of two hon. members on this side of the House and I am wondering whether the minister could not follow the precedent set by his parliamentary secretary and let us have an outline of the changes which are contemplated.

Mr. Chrétien: I have nothing to add which could be clearer than what my parliamentary secretary had to say to the House on the subject.

Mr. Clarke: The point is that the parliamentary secretary, who has been giving us clear explanations throughout the day, was not asked to do so in this case; it might have saved time if he had been allowed to do so in this instance.

Mr. Chrétien: I will read the explanation to the committee.

This is an important change. The section deals with the roll-overs on certain dispositions of capital assets used in a business. These rules permit a roll-over, that is, a deferral of tax, for amounts received under an insurance policy as compensation for property lost or destroyed that are reinvested in the business. The rules are extended to insurance proceeds received for stolen property. The rules are also extended to cover proceeds received on a voluntary sales of certain capital properties that are reinvested in replacement properties. To qualify, the proceeds must be reinvested in a replacement property within a specified time—two years in the case of involuntary dispositions and one year for voluntary sales.

These rules are similar to the rules for depreciable property and eligible capital properties dealt with in clauses 6 and 7 of the bill.

While I am on my feet I should like to have the unanimous consent of the committee to table nine amendments, all technical in nature—some of them are intended to repair mistranslations or grammatical errors. If there is not unanimous consent I shall not table them. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. They have already been tabled. I should just like to advise the committee, then, that I should like these amendments to be passed before the end of the day.

Mr. Peters: I have no objection to the amendments being tabled, but there is a violent objection to the second request.

Mr. Chrétien: I was indicating to members of the committee that I shall be trying later to get these amendments passed. However, I shall not seek to do so unless there is unanimous consent; I wanted to determine the will of the committee so that we might avoid a cumbersome situation later on.

Mr. Benjamin: I should like to tell the Minister of Finance that when I made inquiries about this particular matter I received an excellent letter from the Minister of National Revenue in which he said:

> Section 18 of Bill C-11 proposes an amendment to the Income Tax Act dealing with the reinvestment of proceeds of disposition of a former business property in a replacement property. If the taxpayer so elects, the gain from the disposition of the former property would be the lesser of:
> (1) the gain therefrom otherwise determined, and
> (2) the excess of the proceeds of disposition of the former property over the cost to him of the replacement property.

I agree with that interpretation. I also agree with the intent of the amendment. I am asking the minister this: would he not agree that the good principle being applied to the capital gains provision in this case might not just as validly be applied retroactively to the bona fide farmer or small businessman who uses all the proceeds from the sale of his property to invest in a replacement property so as to continue his primary, if not his only, means of livelihood? The Minister of National Revenue told me that unfortunately for my constituent this amendment took effect only as of March 31 last. Surely it would be a relatively simple matter to deem this benefit to apply some three to five years earlier than that date. I ask the minister to reconsider his policy and not to allow the matter to be complicated by side issues such as were raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Chrétien: For the third time, Mr. Chairman, I have to tell the hon. member that we have listened to his representation but we have no intention of changing the date.

Mr. Peters: The minister has told us that if the change is of an involuntary nature involving a third party the term is two years, and if it is voluntary the term is one year. In the first case the person concerned has some control over whether he should make a disposition. I am interested in what happens when the government cannot make up its mind on certain issues with the result that a period of time goes by, as happened, for instance, in the case cited by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Does the two-year limit run from the time the court decision is made?

● (1522)

It seems to me we have not corrected anything here. Insurance companies will not make a decision within the two years if they are engaged in lengthy litigation, and there likely will be lengthy litigation because this is an involuntary disposition resulting from, say, expropriation by government, fire or theft. I do not see the purpose of the two year limit.

I agree with the minister that there is some sense in a one year limit, because then it is voluntary. There is control over it. In that case there is a rollover. But in the second case I do not think there is a rollover. It is not voluntary. The rollover is caused by extraneous considerations, something over which a company has no control. If a company is half way through litigation and it gets an offer, it will have to take the offer as being within the two year period.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think so. According to the act, section 44(2), the situation is quite clear. Paragraph (a) reads "the taxpayer has agreed to an amount as full compensation to him for the property lost, destroyed, taken or sold". If the taxpayer does not agree, later on in the act section 44(2)(b) provides that the day is "the day on which the taxpayer's compensation for the property is finally determined by such tribunals or courts". This means that if the taxpayer does not agree, the time starts to run once the court has made a determination or the taxpayer agrees to a settlement.

Mr. Peters: Paragraph (c) reads "where a claim . . . has not been taken before a tribunal or court of competent jurisdiction within two years of the loss . . . the day that is two years following the day of the loss" will be the deciding date. My point is that in the first case a rollover is made on a voluntary basis. In the second case where a third party is involved, if the taxpayer goes through the courts he will have two years following the court's determination. In many cases the taxpayer does not want to take the matter to court, but he is under a compulsion to do so.

Every day I handle compensation cases which are 10 or 12 years old. People have been waiting for the company concerned or the compensation board to do something for them. I am sure many members of parliament are sitting back waiting for their automobile insurance companies to do something for them. We wait for other people to take action. If a person is not in the wrong, then why the hell should he go to court? We are not talking about a voluntary action but something a person is forced into.

The hon. member for Edmonton West, who was trying to help the minister out, referred to a case where a considerable period of time elapsed following an expropriation and the government never got around to making out the cheque.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, if I heard the hon. member correctly he is completely misinformed. He said that I was trying to help out the minister. My point was that the provision in this act is wrong. It provides that the period of two years shall run from the date of the order of the tribunal. To me, the date should be the date of payment of the cheque. Oftentimes government departments take months and months to pay money to the intended property owner. I was not trying to help out the minister; I was criticizing the proposed amendment.

Mr. Peters: May I thank the hon. member. In my roundabout way that is the point I was trying to make. The two years was at the discretion of the department, or the courts, or somebody other than the person concerned. If the hon. member for Edmonton West was arguing the other side of the coin, I apologize for having misunderstood. I understood him to say that the delay in issuing the cheque was not the fault of the individual.

I appeal to the minister that this is a field where we could be more flexible. It seems to me that in so many fields today we are asking Canadians to defend themselves against government, whether it be in connection with unemployment insurance, compensation, expropriation, damages or income tax. I have had dozens of people write to me in connection with income tax problems they experienced last year. This silly department is now sending out unpleasant letters to everyone, informing them that it is time to start making payments and to fill in their 1977 tax forms. If I do not pay my income tax because the government is at fault, why should I have to pay interest on the money that I have not paid? After all, the government has made the mistake.

The roll over which takes place from a smaller operation to a bigger operation is only a portion of the business operation, the same as the purchase of a tractor, a combine or any piece of machinery. No restrictions should apply to that once in a lifetime, or once in an every-20-years proposition. Businesses are pleased to deal with capital gains because their capital losses can be written off. As far as the rollover in the agricultural field is concerned, that person is not talking about losses. He had those losses before making the transfer. He will not roll over that proposition and replace his present farm with a new farm in order to take a loss. There will be an expenditure involved, and it will take some time for him to pay back the money borrowed.

The point in time that should be considered is when a person receives insurance money for his property being destroyed, and not two years hence, or at the conclusion of litigation. I should point out that a buck is a buck is a buck. A single farm operation cannot be put into the same category as the individual who turns over 50 farm properties a year. In both instances capital gains tax must be paid, but it should only be paid when the moneys are received.

People in the London and Chatham area are finding it impossible to acquire replacement land for one reason or another. Thus they travel to northern Ontario in order to look around. There is a vast difference between the type of farming in northern Ontario and that of southern Ontario. Prices are being exaggerated and accelerated because of this. These people require time because the farming structure is different, the season is different, and the types of crops are different. If these people are in receipt of money from the first proposition, it is mandatory for them to invest it within one or two years. They are faced with the possibility of not finding property in northern Ontario which is within their price or borrowing range. This is not a voluntary situation because they have been forced out due to the fact that no land is available in their area. They are hemmed in and boxed in thus they have to sell.

If hon. members give consideration to this section, they will be opposed to passing it as it is structured. Also they will oppose it because of the way Section 44 has operated over the last three or four years in relation to capital gains. I will vote against this because I think it should be turned down.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the arguments put forth by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Edmonton West. They have put forth hypothetical cases which I will examine. These hypothetical cases could lead to problems in the future. I do not know if a change will be possible, but I think the representations have been useful.

I apologize to hon. members for arriving late, but I was stuck in the snow in New York city. I hitchhiked on a plane because I wanted to return to the Chamber.

Mr. Peters: I commend the minister for his diligence to duty and his compassion for the problems raised. In the case of a rollover, perhaps it would be possible to make a deposit with the department. Even though this rollover is considered voluntary, actually it is mandatory because the farmer is hemmed in, cannot expand, and is having difficulty acquiring additional property.

When a person is dealing in $200,000 or $300,000 worth of property, considerable time is required for the paperwork and the legalities of the transaction. A year is not enough time for that to be done. Is it possible to give consideration to making a deposit with the department? In many cases the Farm Credit Corporation and other agencies are involved. Perhaps the deposit could be held in trust for a period of four or five years until the rollover takes place. Would that be possible? At the present time the entire transaction has to take place in a year, which means the purchase of the second property has to occur before the sale of the first property. It is difficult for lawyers to complete the transfer within one year. I am referring to properties used for agricultural purposes. Is the idea of a deposit possible? Can the minister give consideration to that?

Mr. Chrétien: Certainly I will look at the suggestion of the hon. member. It is difficult to make exceptions in the case of farmers alone. Either a principle is good or bad. I think it should apply to everyone. To have to exempt one class of citizens from a rule that applies to others, even if it is a class of people who deserve special consideration, is a bad approach to solving problems arising under the Income Tax Act. I will certainly look at the suggestion of the hon. member, but with the caveat I have put forward.

● (1542)

Mr. Benjamin: I must disagree with my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming. I am not opposed to this clause of the bill because it brings about an application of the capital gains tax in a much more fair manner, so I agree with the clause as it reads and as it applies from last March 31. I also agree with the minister that if we are going to apply the principle to one group, we should apply it equitably to all the groups because the same thing would apply in the case of a fisherman with a small boat. If he does not get a bigger one, he will go broke all the quicker. If he sells his small boat, makes a capital gain on it and uses all the proceeds to purchase a larger boat, and thus has a better chance of making a living. The clause would exempt him from the capital gains tax on that first sale.

I am sorry that my colleagues on all sides of the House have raised a lot of matters that do not touch on the point I raise, to apply the principle back to the time when the capital gains tax took effect. That is all I am asking. The move you are making in clause 18 is as valid and effective on March 31, 1972, as it is in 1977 and it is not some horrendous and insurmountable problem. It is a principle that I find, from talking with hon. members on all sides, meets with agreement. I do not understand the reluctance of the minister to extend a good provision in clause 18 back to the implementation of the capital gains tax. There is no justification for not doing so.

The other points raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Edmonton West are only partially in tune with the point I raise. Surely the minister is correct in saying that this provision should apply right across the board. All I am saying is: let us apply it right across the board back to the time when the capital gains tax came into effect. I plead with the minister again. There is no substantial reason for not agreeing to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to the answer I have already given the hon. member. I do not feel it would be either useful or desirable to make a change at this time.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being 3.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to the order made on December 5, 1977, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the committee of the whole stage of Bill C-11, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds.

Shall clause 18 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the clause please rise. All those opposed to the clause please rise.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

PARLIAMENT HILL CURATOR ACT

MEASURE TO PRESERVE ARTIFACTS FOR POSTERITY

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie) moved that Bill C-212, to provide for the establishment of the office of Parliament Hill Curator, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-212 has been on the order paper now for two or three sessions of Parliament. It has as its objective the creation of the post of Parliament Hill curator.

[Translation]

Bill C-212 provides for the establishment of the office of Parliament Hill Curator. I came to think about such a bill because of an incident which occurred in the House last year or two years ago when I sought information from those people responsible for removing the glass windows in the House when it became necessary to replace them by these beautiful coloured windows we can see now around the House. The removal of those leaded windows was done quite simply—they used a sledge hammer to smash them off and not a single piece of those historic windows was salvaged. I am sure that museums and numerous other historical associations in the country would have been quite interested in keeping some of those window panes but none were saved.

[English]

For instance the episode when these windows were removed with a sledge hammer and replaced by the present beautiful coloured windows representing the floral emblems of all our provinces and territories was as close to a sacrilegious incident as you can come in the House of Commons. Every museum in the country would have treasured an item from this Chamber. This is one incident of many which have occurred here resulting from the fact that there is no one in charge of ensuring architectural integrity, that the furniture, the works of art, the sculptures in wood and stone are preserved or conserved in a way the people of Canada would expect them to be safeguarded.

Over the years furniture belonging to historic Canadian figures has either been sold, disappeared, or simply thrown away. Furniture of this kind is probably around Ottawa and would be worthy of a place in any museum if it could be found. It would certainly be appropriate for the refurbishing going on in the East Block. It has disappeared because there is no one individual who has taken it upon himself to keep an eye on these antiques.

During the refurbishing of the House of Commons this past summer I came in one day and discovered that under this carpet there was a teak wood floor of great value, which had been left during all the demolition period not covered—not even plywood or plastic over it. The workmen were just throwing things from the ceiling on to the floor. Some day an architect may come along and say in the interests of esthetics that the carpet should be removed and this beautiful floor exposed. Whether or not that happens, I simply make the point that no one is checking on all this. I feel strongly that because that is the case—

[Translation]

—because there have been many mistakes made here, either by Public Works or by Parliament staff, a member of the staff of the House should be entrusted with the necessary responsibilities to supervise.

[English]

I would hope that this person who would be appointed as curator for Parliament Hill would be able to advise the people responsible both in Ottawa and Hull as to what action they may or may not take with respect to all these items.

There have been a number of instances during the last few years where gradually the Parliament Hill panorama has been cut off from a large percentage of the people living in the Ottawa-Hull area. The view of the Peace Tower and Parliament Buildings has been obliterated by the skyscrapers which have gone up in central Ottawa. The same thing is now happening on the Hull side. It is too late now to do anything about that. Before it is impossible for anyone in the surrounding area or anyone approaching Ottawa to see the Parliament Buildings and Peace Tower from afar, we should move to arrest further deterioration of this view. It means a lot to most Canadians.

I feel that the post of parliamentary curator would carry with it an obligation to advise and use whatever avenues are available to encourage the authorities who have responsibility for the height of buildings in the vicinity of Parliament Hill to use their discretion and prevent a further downgrading of the importance of Parliament Hill.

I do not feel that the wording of this bill is sacrosanct. It can probably be improved substantially. Frankly, what I would like to see is the subject matter of the bill referred to a committee. I understand it would normally be referred to a committee dealing with members' services. If so, I would be prepared to accept that. I hope the subject matter will be referred to that committee. If it meets with the consent of members of the House, I would ask one of my colleagues to move that the subject matter of Bill C-212 be referred to the committee dealing with members' services.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member wish to move a motion for the purpose of withdrawing his bill and another one for the purpose of having the subject matter of his bill referred to the committee? If so, I respectfully submit the hon. member would have to move a motion to withdraw his bill, obtain the unanimous consent of the House, and then move a motion to have the subject matter of his bill referred to the committee, pursuant to Standing Order 50.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the hon. member has finished his speech. He may have missed that opportunity. I want to assure him there is a willingness that the subject matter go to a committee prior to the end of this day. There are one or two who want to speak for a short time with regard to it. It is an excellent subject.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I think the parliamentary secretary has perhaps misinterpreted the rules. It should be done by another member, not by the member who proposed the motion.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to so move at the appropriate time.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise very briefly to congratulate——the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) for his bill, an outstanding bill indeed, and I want to commend him for his interest in Parliament Hill.

[Translation]

[English]

I do not want to hold up the bill. It should go to the committee.

From time to time I have been concerned about changes that occur in this building. There does not seem to be any consultative process. Occasionally things that are historic, traditional, and meaningful, disappear. The most recent instance struck me a few weeks ago when I was showing visitors from the constituency through the Parliament Buildings. As I approached the Railway Committee Room, I stated that the room was full of tradition and history and that it contained some marvellous paintings. As I opened the door, there were no more paintings. Entirely without notice or indication, they had somehow been moved. I do not know where they are. I would be interested in finding out whether they can again be displayed somewhere in the building.

The Railway Committee Room was turned into a sort of boudoir by some interior decorator who was allowed to run tame, using every stale cliché in the interior decorator's trade. That room has lost its history, tradition, and significance. It had impressed many people. It had many functions.

When the bill goes to the committee, I hope we can have some explanation of what happened, particularly with regard to the vast painting of the Fathers of Confederation. I know it features fine old Conservatives such as Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Georges Etienne Cartier. It had a place of honour. That place seems to have disappeared along with the excellent painting of the Vimy Ridge Memorial. That haunting picture has also vanished from the scene.

We very much need someone who cares to take care of and be concerned about the decisions that are made in this place, particularly when something may well be lost if someone who is sensitive to the nation's history is not in a position of some authority.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise for only a moment or two. In doing so, I want to echo the sentiments that have been expressed by the mover of the bill and the previous speaker. I agree with them completely. I, too, would like to see either the bill or the subject matter thereof referred to the appropriate committee so that it can be studied. I hope that will not be a way of getting rid of it. Instead, I hope that committee will make a recommendation back to the House.

The points that the two previous speakers have made are well taken. It is a shame that some of the artifacts of this building have been destroyed or lost. Certainly we ought to do better in the future. The idea of a curator with responsibility is an excellent one.

If the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) did not have my support before he made his speech, he certainly got it when he referred to the way in which high rise buildings were going up around Ottawa, blotting out the view of the Peace Tower. I felt offended many years ago when this process started. It was a serious mistake. Like him, I hope it will not be pursued any further. If the curator proposed under this bill could at least have powers of recommendation, that would be a good idea.

I said I would be very brief. I shall keep my word on that. If there is a motion to refer the subject matter of this bill to an appropriate committee, it will have our full support.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move the necessary amendment. However, I would like to say a word or two first. I totally disagree with my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), with regard to the last remarks he made. But I agree with him on very many other things.

I had the privilege not long ago of visiting Washington where the planners had free rein in preserving the so-called vista. The net result was to preserve a series of obsolescent buildings within view. It created a slum within the heart of the city.

I remember visiting that city in 1970 with other members of this House, including the hon. member who sits opposite, an old friend and former Speaker of this House, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). We did a tour of the dome. I am sure he can remember 1970. Every shop, every place of business had been burned by arsonists. They looted the centre part of that capital city. It was spoiled by misguided policies which prevented the erection of new buildings and drove all new offices out into the periphery. Thank heavens we have not repeated those errors in this city. But I agree with this bill and so I move:

● (1632)

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the bill be not now read the second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services.

I believe I am seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette).

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) on his Bill C-212 for the establishment of the office of Parliament Hill Curator.

I am convinced that the aim of this bill is quite laudable, according to the remarks made by hon. members who have taken the floor on this issue. I remember that some three or four years ago maybe, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had raised before this House the issue of building construction in the vicinity of Parliament Hill, skyscrapers whose impact on visitors who come to the Hill is that they hide from them the sight of Parliament and tend to make visitors and Canadians alike forgetful that they stand before Parliament or if you want the Parliament Hill of the National Capital of Canada, since, when arriving in Ottawa, which is after all the nation's capital, one would expect the Parliament buildings to espouse a predominent perspective in their own immediate surroundings.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert had at that time received the support of all parties represented in this House and the National Capital Commission was given a mandate with very limited powers to protect this environment and make representations to the authorities of the city of Ottawa, and also on the Quebec side to the city of Hull, so as to ask them not to engage in or make any progress toward the construction of skyscrapers.

Unfortunately, and I do not know exactly for what reason, the National Capital Commission has not been able to make its view prevail since year after year we notice that this trend continues unabated. And now we realize it is a little late to act, as the hon. member for Laprairie just said when he gave explanations on Bill C-212. In my opinion, starting from now, I think that we should take all the means at our disposal to preserve this surrounding.

The purpose of the bill is to preserve all that can be preserved from an historical point of view, and I am in favour of this bill. It should be passed as quickly as possible, precisely to stop other valuable things from disappearing for one reason or another.

Mr. Speaker, the motion just introduced by the hon. member who preceded me to have this subject matter referred to an ad hoc committee is quite rational. But the committee will have to consider the matter very seriously within the spirit of the bill. That committee will then have to report to the House and the House will then have to take the means to bring about the results sought under Bill C-212. Otherwise it would be a waste of time, nothing would get done and in five or ten years there will still be members around to regret here in this House the fact that we did not think far enough to protect things we should be proud to leave to the generations after us.

So I think this is a very serious matter, a matter of national pride and real, genuine nationalism, and I am convinced that if we go at the bottom of things we will be able to do something very practical and that in years to come this will give results. So the administrators who will come after us will continue in the same way and we will be able to preserve as much as possible what can be preserved.

[English]

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to add a few words to this debate. I have been here so short a time that I come with a fresh approach to these wonderful buildings and this highly cherished part of our national life.

I would like to see an advisory group established by the curators of our museums. It could perhaps be called the Friends of Parliament Hill. People in communities across the country might wish to loan things to the parliament buildings so that they could be shown to the whole country.

I have often wondered why our committee rooms do not have things hanging in them. I find those rooms just a little sad and I wish that, say, in the Parliamentary Restaurant, we could see some of the wonderful pictures which I know are in storage. We do not have a national gallery as yet and perhaps this place could be made even more beautiful if there was a committee which could plan to display these things in our wonderful buildings.

One of the things I could not get over last summer, as we sat here in July, was that when I went out in the evenings for a walk I would find whole families standing just outside the doors. They came from all across the country. If you asked them where they came from they would often ask about these wonderful buildings. I think there should be far more going on here in the summertime when families come to reach out and see their parliament buildings. There are public servants in this city—I think of those in Public Works and in the National Capital Commission—who dearly love this building and who have cared for it over the years. I do not think they get the support either from public opinion or from within the parliament buildings themselves to stage events out on that wonderful lawn in the summertime in order that the people who come here from across the country could see or do more right on the Hill.

Perhaps because I am a local member I see many classes of children coming here in the spring and at Christmas time. I tell them a little about parliament, and I know the security service here is wonderful about conducting tours for them. Children, when they return to schools, are often asked to write essays about their visit here and are asked to tell about what they saw.

I wish we had the kind of brochures I have seen given out at Queen's Park. They tell a little of the history of that place and some anecdotes about it. I think if we had a curator or someone who really cared about it perhaps he would turn out to be not only safeguarding our heritage but one who would be something of a marketer who would tell about this wonderful place.

● (1642)

Every time I take round a school group I always show them Vimy Ridge stone. To me, this was the first great national event in our history when we became a nation. Only recently did I hear the wonderful story about the masonic plate which fell down in the fire, how they found it, and it is now hanging outside the Library. These are all real stories concerning the history of this place. Whatever happens to the bill, I hope my hon. friend will think of it not only in terms of safeguarding our past but of telling our story to the Canadian people.

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will speak only briefly. I hope that when the subject matter of the bill goes to committee the committee will take what I might call judicial notice that a number of the areas touched on by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) have also been dealt with very recently by a commission set up under Mr. Justice Abbott.

Parliament Hill Curator

The Commission on Parliamentary Accommodation, composed of members from both Houses of Parliament, dealt with other possible facilities for housing members and staff. It dealt not just with the chambers here but with other buildings where we work. I recommend that when this matter goes to committee and is studied with some care and in some depth, reference should be made to some of the material in the hands of one of the deputy ministers of public works seconded to Mr. Justice Abbott's staff, Dr. James Langford. There is a lot of good material there which would be invaluable in assisting the hon. member for Laprairie, his aims and objectives.

I am not going to take up time because I believe that private member's bills, if they are good, should go to committee. I do not intend to talk out this bill, as was the case last week when we were debating a bill having to do with by-elections in Canada. The amount of time before a by-election can be called in Canada is the longest of any western democracy. Liberal members, including the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) in particular, decided they did not want to follow the democratic practice of representing the people, people who remain unrepresented because of the death or resignation of their member, and talked out a bill which would have required that a by-election be called earlier. I hope this bill goes to committee and I wish it the best of luck as I resume my seat.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know you were otherwise engaged a moment ago when the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) misrepresented some of the statements I made in the House last week concerning a bill which is not before us today. I do not want to encroach upon the time allotted to this bill because I fully share the sentiments which have been expressed, but I believe we should set the record straight. In no way did I oppose the sentiment expressed by the hon. member's bill last week.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I join with other members in supporting the hon. member's bill. Judging from the opportunities I have had to visit other legislatures around the world, we have in Ottawa one of the finest examples of a parliamentary facility. Anything we can do to enhance this facility, especially to tell Canadians about it, is very worth while.

I hope that as this information is organized and prepared, not only will it be made available in book form but as a film, film strips or slides so that students, not only in Ottawa but across the country, can see for themselves how the Parliament of Canada—the House of Commons, the Senate, and the Governor General—functions.

Yesterday I attended a luncheon for Dr. Vogel from the Federal Republic of Germany, who was presented with a new book on the Parliament of Canada. I had not had an opportunity to see the book before but it really is an excellent document and I hope all members have the opportunity to see it. It would make an excellent document to present on formal occasions.

Parliament Hill Curator

As this committee studies the subject matter of the bill before us, I hope that someone, perhaps under the auspices of the chairman of that committee, will consider the advisability not only of documenting the information about our wonderful parliament buildings but providing the information in a popular, readable form for student groups.

I should like a short film running for about 15 minutes to be prepared for the use of student groups. Then when student groups visit us here, or when we go to high schools in our ridings, we can show them parliament in action—something it is difficult to summarize in a short space of time. For example, we often get off on one aspect of parliament, such as constituency work, committee work or the question period, and as a result I do not think the students get an over-all view. This sort of information should be made available to members for use with students and school groups. We should also have a short written summary of the functions of the Parliament of Canada.

I will not take up any more time of the House. I support the bringing forward of this important topic in the House this afternoon, and I am sure that the standing committee which will consider this bill will come up with many worth-while suggestions as a result of its study.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I support this bill and I am not going to talk it out. I just want to make a comment or two, prompted by my hon. friend from Ottawa-Carleton who talked about Canadian paintings. I should like to see more of these in the parliament buildings and in other buildings on the Hill. Members of parliament, not only ministers, should be given the privilege of hanging Canadian paintings on their walls. We have an abundance of such paintings hidden away in buildings in Ottawa.

When talking about the Parliamentary Restaurant recently some of my colleagues asked me about the big long hall which leads to the parliamentary restaurant. Some of my colleagues in Quebec have asked me why, since we have pictures of Prime Ministers of Great Britain, a country for which I have great affection since it gave us our British parliamentary traditions, which I support as one of the best of parliamentary systems, we do not hang pictures of prime ministers of France, since we believe in the two founding nations. I disagreed with them entirely. I do not want to create friction with anybody, but I think that when we have this museum in the new East Block we might transfer these paintings of Prime Ministers of Great Britain to the East Block, and this will relieve me of the pressure of explaining the presence of foreign prime ministers.

I should like to recommend the establishment of the office of Parliament Hill curator. I am sure the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) will join with me in my effort. Visitors to parliament hill have different ethnic backgrounds, and they should be able to see the creations of Canadian artists adorning the corridors. There is a richness in Canadian paintings because of the multicultural background of this nation.

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. Perhaps future improvements could be made to it at committee stage. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) referred to various things which have occurred on Parliament Hill. One must think of things such as C. D. Howe recommending that it would be a good idea to tear down the Parliamentary Library in order to put up a more efficient structure; the vulgarity of the carpet in the Parliamentary Restaurant; and the ersatz grandeur of Room 200. These things deserve over-all authority by someone who can contribute taste and a sense of history in the selection of materials and decor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Shall the amendment carry?

SUGGESTED REFORMS TO IMPROVE RELATIONSHIPS WITH EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the current dispute in the Toronto post office which, if not resolved immediately, could precipitate a work stoppage which would have a devastating effect on Canada's economy, which is already crippled by government mismanagement. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House urges the government to proceed with urgently needed reforms in collective bargaining procedures in the public service which were proposed by the retiring chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Jacob Finkelman, over two years ago, and urges the Postmaster General to proceed with the long delayed reforms in the Post Office recommended by the Official Opposition which would introduce co-operation and co-determination by management, labour and postal users in post office administration, in place of the continuing confrontation which threatens to destroy Canada's once efficient postal service.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED REINSTATEMENT OF SUSPENDED TORONTO EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning the vitally important matter of the postal dispute which is now taking place in the city of Toronto and which could tie up the total postal service across the country at this particularly serious time. In light of the fact that the particular dispute which caused this demonstration has been settled to the satisfaction of both sides and in light of the fact that the union is willing to cease picketing as soon as the suspended workers are reinstated, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the Postmaster General be instructed to reinstate immediately the nine suspended workers at the Toronto Central Post Office, and further that an independent adjudicator be appointed to investigate and make final recommendations regarding the suspension of the nine postal workers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF CANDIDATES DURING ELECTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that section 16(3)(c) of the Official Secrets Act makes possible the authorization of wiretapping directly by the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) without a judge's consent in connection with activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by any criminal means—and I emphasize "any criminal means"—and in view of the complexities of the federal Canada Elections Act regarding the raising of money and other matters it is quite possible that a candidate for membership in the House of Commons could unintentionally break the law during election time and have his telephone tapped, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the government amend the said act by providing an exemption for any violation of the Canada Elections Act, as it has nothing to do with national security and therefore candidates in a federal election should be guaranteed privacy at their campaign headquarters and other places during federal elections.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION "HANSARD" BE DISTRIBUTED FREE OF CHARGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that French-speaking news media are very reluctant to report interventions made in the House by a number of hon. members, that the number of Hansard subscribers for the current session of the 30th Parliament hardly exceeds 10,000, and that it is of paramount importance that all Canadians be informed of the work being done in the House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House urge the government to take all necessary technical steps to make sure that French or English copies of Hansard are made available free of charge to all Canadians who are asking for them in writing, so that they may acquaint themselves with the daily activities of the members of this illustrious assembly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

INDUSTRY

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN WRITEOFF OF COST OF RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As Canadian industry must greatly increase its industrial research if we are to lower our costs and improve our quality and design in order to begin to overcome the $11.5 billion per year adverse trade balance we now have in manufactured products, the ones which produce jobs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the government allow industry to write off 200 per cent of the cost of all current and capital expenditures on industrial research in excess of those made in the base year, the year before the plan goes into operation.

Such a program would induce the additional industrial research we need to make our manufactured products more competitive in the marketplace and capable of increasing sales production and jobs.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION INTO SAFETY OF OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the tragic air crash at Churchill Falls on December 9, 1977 with the loss of eight lives which represents the second fatal crash for the company; in view of the conflict between Air Canada and MOT over the towing of jet aircraft and other equipment across two major runways at Winnipeg Airport to the new Air Canada hangar which will be a safety hazard, and the reported lack of air safety in northern Manitoba, involving illegally operating aircraft, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That this House direct the government House leader to provide a reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to launch a full scale investigation into aviation safety in Canada, and for the calling of any or all witnesses to appear before the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

PROPOSED FINANCING ARRANGEMENT TO ENABLE FISHERMEN TO RECEIVE PAYMENT BY CHRISTMAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The board of directors of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has decided not to make the final payment to fishermen of about $2.6 million for the 1975-76 season, the reason being that the corporation has reached its borrowing capacity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the government take immediate action to arrange bridge financing so that fishermen will have their final payment for Christmas.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO RELIEVE COST-PRICE SQUEEZE ON PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing order 43. In 1976 net farm income dropped by 20 per cent. Today it was announced that a further drop of around 11 per cent in net farm income has occurred. The forecast for next year is a 5 per cent drop. Operating costs continue to rise. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That this House instruct the government to take immediate steps to relieve the cost-price squeeze.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTION FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL MAKE NEW STATEMENT ON KNOWLEDGE OF APLQ BREAK-IN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The former Solicitor General, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), made a statement on motions in this House last June 21, outlining his knowledge of the events surrounding the surreptitious entry by various police forces into the premises of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec. In the statement, the minister said: "Let me first address myself to the question of whether or not I had any prior knowledge of the October 6-7, 1972, break-in at the APLQ. My answer to the question is a flat no." He further stated: "Had I prior knowledge of the operation, I would have intervened to prevent it from happening." Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That this House requests the former Solicitor General, now the Minister of Supply and Services, to review his statement in this House on June 21 to determine if all matters referred to therein are still factually correct. Should any statements be determined to be at variance with the facts as now known, this House instructs the minister to make a new statement on motions to outline his knowledge of the APLQ break-in.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

POST OFFICE

THREATENED STRIKE—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In light of his assurances that there would be no postal strike this Christmas and the recent statement by the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers that there would be no wildcat or national strikes during the Christmas season unless the employer provoked the union into a strike situation, can the hon. gentleman inform the House how the post office got itself into the present mess?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows the series of events that led to the present impasse in Toronto. Indeed the reporting has been relatively accurate. If the hon. member had listened to the motion brought by the leader of the New Democratic Party under Standing Order 43 he would know exactly what led to this particular impasse. I want to advise the hon. gentleman that the discussions with the local leaders of CUPW are ongoing and I am still optimistic that we will have the matter resolved in the near future.

• (1417)

Mr. Dinsdale: Inasmuch as the outstanding issue is the suspension of the nine employees, can the Postmaster General assure the House and the country that this grievance will be dealt with through the normal grievance procedures, rather than necessitating the usual resort to strike action.

Mr. Blais: As I have advised the hon. gentleman the matter will shortly be discussed with the union. We had discussions with the local union leadership over the weekend, both Saturday and Sunday. Indeed the issue which the hon. member has called to our attention is one under discussion. I would rather not comment until those discussions are fully underway and we are in a position to make a joint statement with the union.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the vital importance of a reliable mail service to small business, to the recovery of an economy faced with high unemployment and inflation, and the general wellbeing of the country at a time of stress and strain in national unity, would the Postmaster General inform the House what special steps he is taking at this time to respond to the overwhelming demand from the long suffering Canadian public that the Christmas spirit not be destroyed by yet another postal strike? And would he use the goodwill of Christmas to assure his workers that he will introduce modern labour-management relations into the post office as has been advocated for a long time now by the official opposition.

Mr. Blais: I am glad the hon. member has brought the Christmas spirit into his question. We are hopeful that that is perhaps going to be the determining factor in this instance. I call to the attention of the union and all hon. members of this House that we are, Mr. Speaker, in a very volatile situation, in a period of national life when emotions tend to be very high. Every effort that I and my officials can muster, will be used in order to pacify the situation and not inflame it so that indeed solutions can be arrived at reasonably by reasonable people.

I trust that the hon. gentleman by the very reasonable approach he is using this afternoon is going to use his own good offices in order to communicate with his friends within the post office to ensure that the spirit of goodwill will prevail and that we will be able to resolve this issue this afternoon, or as soon as possible, and get the mail moving again.

THREATENED STRIKE—POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATED SETTLEMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to hear the Postmaster General talk of sweet reason.

However, if I may put this question to the Postmaster General: in the event of a complete breakdown in current negotiations, is the government preparing legislation to cope with the threat of a nationwide strike?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I can indicate to the hon. gentleman that the strike is illegal and is in contravention of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I cannot see how the Parliament of Canada can impose another legality on a present illegal situation. I simply indicate to the hon. gentleman that the operations in Toronto are ongoing. There are interruptions now, but we have one post office operating and we have one postal installation operating without the intervention of pickets. There are pickets at two other main installations, but some of the trucks are crossing those pickets. We are attempting to carry on with the mail that is available to us in the hope that within a short period of time, after reasonable minds prevail we will have the system in full operation. For that I seek the co-operation of hon. gentlemen.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is also obvious that if we are to settle disputes we would need that the spirit of Christmas, which is essential at this time of the year, be not undermined and that people recognize that the important thing is to provide Canadians with a complete and efficient postal service during a period which carries so much feeling.

[English]

ACTION TO ENSURE DELIVERY OF OLD AGE PENSION CHEQUES IN VIEW OF THREATENED STRIKE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): If I could pose a supplementary to the Postmaster General. What action has the government taken to ensure delivery of old age pension cheques and other government cheques on time, and what other emergency procedures has the government and the Postmaster General come up with to cope with this possible strike and ensure that Christmas mail will go through.

● (1422)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has identified that there are transfer payments that are presently in the post office. We have family allowances in the mail stream as well as provincial guaranteed annual income cheques. With that sort of valuable mail within the system and the dependence of recipients on the amounts that are forthcoming, especially during this Christmas season, and the vulnerability of the small businessman which the hon. member has so well identified, I again publicly urge the national directors of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to recognize the difficulties that we might be incurring if we leave this matter unresolved for a period of time.

THREATENED STRIKE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): On the question of the injunction requested by the Postmaster General, did the hon. gentleman approach the federal or the provincial judiciary and what is the current situation on this front?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the application for the injunction was made to the Supreme Court of Ontario, as is normal under the circumstances. The hearing was adjourned in order that there might be negotiations under less pressure. We are going to resume the hearing tomorrow morning at nine o'clock and hope that in the meantime we might be able to make an arrangement.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT THAT ACTION UNWARRANTED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. A report tabled in the Ontario Legislature on Friday by the attorney general of that province makes it clear that the RCMP carried on a systematic investigation not only of the Waffle group within the NDP but also of the party itself between 1970 and 1973. In his letter to me dated August 26 of this year the Solicitor General states that he agreed completely with a point I made in an earlier letter that the security branch should only be concerned with "groups believed to be committed to the use of non-democratic means in pursuit of their objectives". In light of this assertion, will he take this opportunity to assert publicly that this kind of systematic surveillance of democratic groups in Canada was totally unwarranted?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the position that I gave the leader of the New Democratic Party in the letter that I wrote to him is, of course, the position of the government. The RCMP has no mandate whatsoever to do any systematic surveillance of legitimate activities of any political party in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister simply repeated what he said in his letter. I ask him to follow up his assertion, which I welcomed in the letter, with a judgment about the revelation that has been produced in the legislature in the province of Ontario, namely that the RCMP security branch between 1970 and 1973 kept systematic surveillance of the activities of the Waffle group within the NDP and, indeed, the New Democratic Party itself during that time. If that is the case, I would like the Solicitor General of Canada to make his civil liberties position well-known at this time and to say that that kind of activity is something of which he disapproves.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report that the hon. member refers to which has been tabled in the Ontario legislature. To my knowledge at the moment, there is no information to indicate that the New Democratic Party was the object of systematic surveillance, as the leader of that party puts it in the House today, during that period of time.

There may or may not have been some surveillance of individual members, as we have stated time and again in the House. The fact that one belongs to a political party does not give one immunity from surveillance if there is reason to believe there may be cause for surveillance along the lines I indicated to the hon. member in the letter he is now quoting back to me.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I find it strange the minister is not aware of the specifics that went into that report. The letter is some months old from the attorney general of that province to the Solicitor General making inquiries about this subject matter. This was followed up, I understand, by the attorney general of the province of Ontario when he was not satisfied with the reply the Solicitor General gave him some time ago. It was followed up with officials within the RCMP. The report is as a result of information provided to the attorney general of that province by the RCMP within the minister's own department. In that report, the attorney general of the province of Ontario said that the inquiries "were broadened sufficiently to put the activities of these individuals in proper perspective". That is a reference to the investigation of the Waffle group being broadened within the framework of the NDP itself.

That is a sheer euphemism for saying that the party itself was being investigated. I therefore ask the minister to assure us that the New Democratic Party were not under surveillance between 1970 and 1973 in a systematic way. Will he clear up the point that is of concern to hundreds of democratically oriented Canadians who were taking part in that Waffle group that they were not in any way indulging in any subversive activities? Will he assert once again that he sees a distinction between dissent and subversion—

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OUTLINING PROBLEMS IN FINANCING, LABOUR RELATIONS AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Postmaster General and refer him to a news release from the Canadian Union of Postal Workers—I know he has seen it—in which the opinion is expressed that the Postmaster General has not been bargaining in good faith and that he has been hiding the facts. The news release goes on to say that because of the attitude of the Postmaster General the union will continue to do everything in its power to inform the public, the information media and all its members as to the solutions which must be adopted in order to resolve problems within the Post Office involving administration, labour relations and financing. Since the union is prepared to do this, is the minister willing to make a statement on motions as soon as possible, preferably before Christmas, making clear just what the problems are in relation to administration, labour relations and finance so that Canadians may know just what is going on? After all, they are paying a very high price for service they are not getting.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I thank the hon. member for providing me with an opportunity of making a clarification. The press release from which he has read is one which was issued by the President of CUPW after I had made an application for the appointment of a conciliation board in connection with the main negotiations between the parties which are being conducted at the national level. The hon. member will recall that in the press conference which followed that press release Mr. Parrot did say that in his view there would be no interruption of the mails before Christmas. He was referring to the main negotiations between the Post Office and CUPW in connection with the renewal of the collective agreement which terminated on June 30. The questions to which I was replying earlier concerned a different situation, one which has arisen at the Toronto local, and I would beg the hon. gentleman not to mix up the two situations. The dispute at Toronto is completely separate and apart from the main negotiations.

Mr. Alexander: I am not mixed up. The Postmaster General is mixed up. I am simply pointing out that people are paying exorbitant prices for services they are not getting. We understand, now, that there are problems. I will read the press release again because it seems the Postmaster General was not listening. Mr. Parrot said there were problems in the Post Office in connection with labour relations, administrative matters and financial matters and that the union intended to bring those problems to the attention of the Canadian public so that they would know what is going on. All I am asking the Postmaster General is to stand up on motions, without giving us any lessons, and make a complete and definite statement as to what is going on in the Post Office so that the Canadian people may know where they are going. The service is costing a lot of money and there is no assurance of mail delivery.

Mr. Blais: Two or three weeks ago at most I made a statement on motions and subjected myself to inquiries from opposition members. If the hon. member, in his belated interest in the Post Office, had been concerned then he could have directed questions to me at that time. I was here, and I replied to questions by opposition members and some of those questions were directed to the problems we face in the Post Office. For the hon. member for Hamilton West to try to reveal all of a sudden that there are problems in the Post Office seems to be rather strange. I wonder where he has been since 1975. In 1975 we had a 42-day strike. We have had some interruptions from time to time, but I have indicated to hon. members opposite exactly the measures we were taking. One of those measures is to avoid inflaming a situation by making unsubstantiated statements and by engaging in dialogue with CUPW in surroundings which are more conducive to agreements and arrangements than in confrontation, as the hon. member is suggesting.

● (1432)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, will the Postmaster General agree with me that the position held by many people in this country is that the Post Office is in a mess, and it will not get any better under the leadership of the present Postmaster General?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF USING POWDERED MILK IN PROCESSING OF FEED GRAIN

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that a number of industrial milk producers will be without any income for several months because they have met their production quotas, and considering also that the Canadian Dairy Commission is selling powdered milk on the world market below the Canadian support price, which will inevitably involve considerable expenses both for milk producers and for the state, would the minister tell the House whether he has ordered research into a greater use of milk powder in the processing of feed grain as a way of reducing powdered milk stocks?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that skim milk powder is being used in many, many different products today. It is highly nourishing. We are doing more research. If the hon. member has any suggestions as to how it can be used, we would be pleased to hear them also. This year in Canada skim milk powder is being subsidized by practically a third or more of its cost, yet consumption went down. I do not know the reason. It was provided in Canada cheaper than in any other country of the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I think either I did not make myself perfectly clear or the minister did not want to understand the meaning of my question. It was obviously a suggestion I was making in putting this question, because these suggestions come from feed grain producers themselves. Has some research been done on that by Department of Agriculture researchers who are given a budget for that? Did they study the possiblity of using more powdered milk in processing feed grain as well as the effects it will have on the prices of feed? It is only after this kind of study that we will be able to see whether it will be advantageous or not.

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, research is continuing in our department and research is continuing in the private sector. The government has allocated $4 million for research into all dairy products and not just skim milk powder. Part of that money is being used for research into different ways to use skim milk powder in the baking industry and for total human consumption. There are many ways it can be improved. There is a tremendous amount of skim milk powder, and I do not think Canadians could consume it all. There may be ways to make it more palatable for certain parts of the world, which are not used to eating milk products. There are certain ingredients in milk which have to be taken out, and there are ingredients which can be added to it, in order to make it digestible for them.

LABOUR RELATIONS

CONFLICT AT RADIO-MUTUAL STATIONS—INQUIRY WHETHER MEDIATOR HAS REPORTED

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Since a few weeks ago the minister appointed a mediator in the dispute involving Radio-Mutuel stations, a dispute which has been going on for 11 months now, could he tell the House whether this mediator has submitted his mediation report and, if so, when we will be informed of the recommendations it contains?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the mediator has not submitted his report because he is presently involved in discussions with the parties endeavouring to arrive at a settlement.

ALLEGATION NOT ALL UNION MEMBERS INFORMED OF STRIKE VOTE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General as well. In view of the fact that less than 10 per cent of the CUPW membership in Toronto voted in favour of the current strike action, and because it has come to my attention this weekend that not nearly all the membership was notified of the meeting, as evidenced by the light turnout, will the Postmaster General consider challenging the legality of the meeting and the ultimate outcome of the strike vote? At the same time, will he give the majority of the responsible membership an opportunity to truly express their opinions on this vital issue?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has drawn to the attention of the House a very important factor. The eventual vote indicated that only something like 634 ballots out of a potential 4,000 had been cast. A small minority of people expressed their support for the continuation of the illegal strike. In view of the situation and my preoccupation with arriving at some arrangement at this time to resume the postal service in Toronto, I will refrain from commenting on the other aspects of the hon. member's question.

ALLEGED THREATS OF REPRISALS AGAINST SOME EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's concern in this regard; but there are a number of very serious matters related to this whole subject. I have it on good authority, after having met with a large number of CUPW members in Toronto this weekend, that many members have expressed not only dissatisfaction with the outcome of the strike vote, but more importantly, have expressed a genuine fear of reprisals which could be taken against them should they even complain publicly of ongoing antics by a number of radical leaders responsible for this disruption of mail at this vital time. Can the minister investigate this very serious charge on behalf of the majority of the membership of the union, a charge which I am sure he is well aware of?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's representations into very serious account.

KEABLE COMMISSION—SOLICITOR GENERAL'S REACTION TO JUDGMENT OF MR. JUSTICE HUGESSEN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Now that the third attempt to restrict the Keable commission has been unceremoniously refused by Mr. Justice Hugessen, what is the Solicitor General's next step? Has he been cited for contempt as yet? Has he appealed? Has he thought about greater co-operation? Can he bring the House up to date?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to bring the House up to date. As hon. members opposite know, the judgment was handed down by Mr. Justice Hugessen late on Friday afternoon. That judgment raises very important and far-reaching questions of law. That judgment indicates that a provincial commission of inquiry has the necessary powers to investigate into the operations and the functioning of a federal Crown agency. In my mind that raises very far-reaching constitutional principles. In view of that, I have instructed my counsel to appeal the decision to the Quebec court of appeal.

BREAK-IN AT AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DATE FORMER MINISTER AUTHORIZED WIRETAP

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. As we approach the bottom line of ministerial responsibility in this issue, despite the previous equivocation and evasion, will the Solicitor General tell us when his predecessor, the present hon. Minister of Supply and Services, authorized the surreptitious entry and wiretap operation? I should like to know whether it was done retroactively or whether it was done in advance? Is this the practice, or have we swapped the traditional doctrine of ministerial responsibility for a new one called ministerial ignorance, which is one implication of the Prime Minister's press conference on December 9?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, and as all members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs know, particularly those who served on that committee in 1973, something like 1,912 wiretaps were authorized in this country between 1963 and 1973. Also, all members of that committee know that wiretapping was not illegal prior to 1974 and that it was indulged in by every major police force in this country, including the Ontario police, the Quebec police and the RCMP.

ROLE OF MINISTER IN SUIT AGAINST MEMBERS OF FORCE BY EDMONTON POLICE OFFICERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered this question so I will try one more, with your indulgence. What role, if any, is the minister or his department playing in the extremely interesting civil law suit where the RCMP are being sued by some Edmonton police officers as a result of a bugging incident in Winnipeg. Is the minister doing anything to try to come to a proper conclusion in this matter for the benefit of all concerned? Is he taking any part in this?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a statement of claim was filed late Friday in Edmonton or Winnipeg in connection with this alleged case of bugging. As the hon. member knows, the matter has already been the subject of inquiry in front of the Laycraft Commission in Alberta and I presume that the officers who have been sued by the local police will of course wish to file a statement of defence. I would be the last one to wish to prevent them from exercising rights that every Canadian citizen enjoys in this land.

Oral Questions

INFORMATION TO BE SUPPLIED TO VARIOUS COMMISSIONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. On December 7 in the absence of the Solicitor General, the Acting Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice, in reply to my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova, indicated that everything that is pertinent to the McDonald Commission's terms of reference would be made available to it by the Solicitor General. I paraphrased the answer. I want to find out from the Solicitor General whether information would be made available to the McDonald Commission which would not be made available to either the Keable Inquiry or the Krever Inquiry. In other words, will the Solicitor General sit in judgment of what will be made available to the various commissions, because that is what I take to be the implication in the reply of the Minister of Justice. If the Keable Commission is constitutional, as it is so far according to our courts of law, is the Solicitor General still of the view that he may refuse to supply that information to the commission?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the position I have taken in front of the courts is that there is a division of constitutional responsibilities, that some matters come within the constitutional responsibility of the provinces and other matters come within the constitutional responsibility of the federal government. I have always taken for granted that when parliament sets up a federal Crown agency, it reports to the federal parliament not to the provincial legislature. The appropriate place for the investigation of day to day activities or policies of that Crown agency is in front of the commission of inquiry set up by the federal government with the powers to look into its complete operations.

Mr. Broadbent: It was not what you said last June.

Mr. Fox: I am not about to refer the complete workings of a federal Crown agency over to the examination of a provincial commission of inquiry which was created, as the hon. member knows, by the provincial legislature and therefore should not have more powers than the provincial legislature which gave it birth.

Mr. Jarvis: That, in my view, is not what the Solicitor General said last spring. But leaving that aside, the Solicitor General still did not answer my question. Is he to be the judge, not the courts of the country, of what he will supply to a constitutional provincial inquiry, whether it be in Edmonton or whether it be the Krever Inquiry in Ontario or the Keable Inquiry in Quebec? Despite the fact that the courts say those commissions are acting within the constitution, will the Solicitor General be the final judge of what material will be supplied to each of them?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, if I were to be the final arbiter of what would be supplied to the Keable Commission I would not have filed an appeal to the Quebec Court of Appeal.

[Mr. Fox.]

KEABLE COMMISSION—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those just asked. The minister has indicated that he intends to appeal that most excellent decision and, as a result, I presume we are going to waste a little more of the taxpayers' money. In any event, I want to ask him about his position in front of the Keable Inquiry. He was subpoenaed to appear today at two o'clock. Since he is here in the House, I presume he has not answered that subpoena. Will he advise the House whether he has answered that subpoena with another affidavit under section 41(2) of the Federal Courts Act by refusing the documents that the commission has requested under that act?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that if I were to follow the advice of Mr. Justice Hugessen whom the hon. member has just quoted, I would indeed file affidavits under section 41(2), or I would at least consider it. It is my position that the question of filing affidavits does not arise until one has decided whether or not a commission of inquiry has jurisdiction to inquire into those matters. If that commission of inquiry does not have that jurisdiction, I do not see why I would even consider the possibility of issuing affidavits under section 41(2). On the other hand, if the commission of inquiry is finally held to have such jurisdiction, which I believe would be a fundamental change in the constitution of this country, then I would re-examine the documents to see whether or not an affidavit under section 41(2) would be advisable under these circumstances.

McDONALD COMMISSION—NUMBER OF INCIDENTS REFERRED—POSSIBLE EXPANSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Would the minister say, just so I understand his answer, whether he is now telling the House that up to this point he has done nothing in response to the subpoena from the Keable Inquiry? In any event, my question deals now with the terms of reference of the McDonald Inquiry. Will he now give an unequivocal assurance to the House that all the 26 items which the minister listed in his affidavit of October 12 before the Keable Inquiry, and which he refused to submit to the inquiry, will be submitted to the McDonald Inquiry and, second, would he also advise the House whether the terms of reference of the McDonald Inquiry which are limited to illegal acts, not legal acts, in view of the evidence now of provocations and dirty tricks in the province of Quebec, will be expanded since it can be held in camera? Will he now expand the terms of reference so that the total operation in terms of immoral activity on the part of the security force can be examined as well as the baldly illegal acts?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to reply to the hon. member's question as to what I intend to do in connection with the subpoena from the Keable Inquiry. As I have indicated to the House before, I have already instructed my attorneys to file an appeal of the judgment handed down by Mr. Justice Hugessen. My attorneys will be appearing before the commission of inquiry in Montreal this afternoon to make representations on our position. As to the question of whether or not I would undertake to file with the McDonald Commission the 26 items to which the hon. member referred, I would not undertake to do so because I have indeed already done so. So far as the terms of reference are concerned, I think they are extremely wide. If the hon. member cares to refresh his memory he will see that the terms of reference include the right to inquiry into all the practices and procedures of the RCMP, and I cannot think of any terms of reference that could be wider.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFINEMENT OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY IN SOVIET UNION—EFFORTS TO UNITE WITH RELATIVES IN CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he confirm that, as reported in the press during the weekend, the government will be asking president Brezhnev of the Soviet Union in an urgent way to allow Anatoly Shcharansky to leave that country to be reunited with his relatives in Canada, and if Mr. Shcharansky is then allowed to leave, that the government will expedite his admission to Canada by order in council, if necessary? I am confident that these steps, if promptly undertaken by the government, will be supported by Canadians generally as being consistent with the cause of human rights in this country and throughout the world, especially as confirmed by the Helsinki agreement.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I called in the Soviet ambassador at 1.15 p.m. this afternoon and I made representations to him which reflected the declaration of various members of parliament on all sides. I think there were some 57 or 58 members involved, but I am sure they reflected the views of the House. I also assured the ambassador that there were relatives in Canada who were prepared to sponsor Mr. Shcharansky and that while, as the declaration of the members of parliament said, we did not wish to interfere in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union, I wanted his government to be aware of the fact that the government of Canada would issue an order in council expediting the entry of Mr. Shcharansky into Canada if that were deemed by the Soviet Union to be an appropriate course of action.

KEABLE COMMISSION—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have refrained from referring to matters that have gone before the commissions. Today I heard the views of the Solicitor General in connection with this matter. Do I conclude correctly, after having read the generalizations, philosophical and otherwise, of the Prime Minister in a press conference, that the ministers of this government regard themselves above the law with the rule of law not applying to them? I ask that in view of the statement just made by the Solicitor General that he is not going to appear and that he has it in mind to appeal. If that is so, is the first step not to secure a stay of proceedings rather than stating that some day or some place an appeal will be taken? What manner of qualification within the rule of law is it which will permit a minister day after day and week after week on behalf of this government to engage in diversionary tricks in order to cover up?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of difficulty understanding the question being put to me. It has always been made extremely clear in this country that we have a government of laws and not of men and that everyone is equal before the criminal law.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: There is no immunity from the law. However, what the right hon. member is suggesting is that I be derelict in the pursuit of my own duty, which is to see to it, as a minister of the Crown, that federal Crown agencies are not turned over holus-bolus to inquiries of provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a doctrine which has never before been espoused by any responsible parliamentary government in the history of the British tradition. What the minister says now is that he is here to protect Crown agencies, but he should be here to protect the rule of law and Canadian rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister laughs. No wonder he laughs. Look at the way he has diverted from the facts.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: If the right hon. member has a question, would he put it forthwith.

McDONALD COMMISSION—NUMBER OF INCIDENTS TO BE INVESTIGATED PRIOR TO ESTABLISHMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, you are a prominent lawyer, and you realize that when the Prime Minister places himself in the position of a judge and laughs hysterically he invites what I have said, and I repeat it.

I have followed everything that has been said. I have read every item, and I have a couple of questions arising out of the conduct of McCleery and Brunet. Before the McDonald Commission was set up was there any incident to be investigated by that commission other than the one the minister described as an isolated incident in connection with the break-in at a left-wing newspaper in Montreal? Was there any other incident to be investigated at the time the McDonald Commission was set up?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite clear as to what the hon. member is referring to because when the McDonald Commission was set up it was because we obtained additional evidence indicating that other possibly illegal acts had been committed. The reason for setting up the commission was that there was evidence brought to our attention indicating the commission of other possibly illegal acts or questionable practices.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that was not the explanation given earlier by the minister. He said there was an isolated incident. When did he secure information from McCleery and Brunet in connection with these other incidents? Was it before or after the commission was set up?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the evidence referred to by the hon. member was secured during a meeting between the deputy attorney general of Canada and Mr. McCleery on, I believe, June 23, 1977. That matter was the suject of a memorandum to me which was then referred to the RCMP for analysis and examination. The Commissioner of the force reported back to me on June 29 that some further allegations were indeed substantiated. He at that point requested that a commission of inquiry be set up. The government heard his recommendation and decided to follow through with it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESUMPTION OF EXPORT OF URANIUM TO EUROPE—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN POLICY ON SAFEGUARDS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has just returned from meetings with the European Economic Community in Brussels. Has there been any change in Canadian policy with respect to the full scope safeguards on the export of uranium in order to reach the draft agreement with the EEC to resume sales of Canadian uranium, and specifically will Canada retain its veto over reprocessing of Canadian uranium without our specific consent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to answer in detail at the moment because the agreement which was arrived at on an ad referendum basis in Brussels has not yet been discussed among my colleagues or referred to the council of ministers in the European community. As perhaps the hon. member noticed, I did decline to answer those questions in Europe on the ground that I wished to reveal it first in the House of Commons, and I can assure the hon. member that as soon as word is received from the European community as to whether it has accepted the ad referendum arrangements, I will make a full statement in the House at that time.

EXPORT OF URANIUM—AGREEMENT OF FRANCE ON INSPECTION OF FACILITIES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because members of this House deserve a statement that we are inviting the minister to make one at the earliest moment and particularly to bring the proposed new agreement with the EEC before parliament for ratification.

I have a supplementary question. Has France agreed to international inspection procedures on facilities which use Canadian uranium, since that is also at the heart of the issue?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question correctly, and without going beyond the parameters I laid down just a few moments ago, I can say that I believe that the arrangements which have been arrived at vis-à-vis the Canada-France relationship would meet the requirements the hon. member has just stated.

REASON CANADIAN DELEGATION IN INDONESIA TO DISCUSS POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN COAL MINING PROJECT

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his continuing absence I will direct it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I expect is knowledgeable about this matter.

Given the situation of both the copper and nickel industries in Canada and in the world today can the minister explain why a delegation led by the assistant deputy minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and including a representative of the Canadian Export Development Corporation should be in Indonesia discussing possible Canadian participation in a $1 billion coal mining project in South Sumatra, a project which, if completed, would almost certainly be in direct competition with Canadian coal mines in British Columbia and Alberta and certainly with the maritimes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not completely familiar with that particular delegation. However, I ask the hon. member to recall that the province of British Columbia in particular has been in constant contact with us—and indeed with me personally in Vancouver some time ago—asking us to arrange for a mission overseas with regard to various forms of international agreements on coal sales from Canada. So it is not just a one-way street.

In terms of any co-operation with Indonesia I suspect—although I do not know the details—that there is involved the sale of Canadian mining equipment or some other high technology or manufactured goods from this country. However, I will make some inquiries for the hon. member and give him a full response.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I accept some of the points made by the minister about the sale of mining equipment, but I think we are engaged in the short-term rather than the long-term. There is another dimension involved in this particular mission at this time. At a time when Amnesty International in its Indonesia report can say that in no other country of the world are so many political prisoners held without trial for so many years and the unchanging pattern of imprisonment in Indonesia presents the gravest challenge to the concept of international responsibility for human rights can the minister explain why the Canadian Development Corporation should be involved in a venture which could compete not only with Canadian industry but could possibly also involve large scale use of the forced labour?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the situation in Indonesia has been the subject of many public comments by the government of Canada and by others. Recently I said that the situation continues to concern us, although in fairness one has to acknowledge that there has been an improvement in recent times. The hon. member is opening up a very large question. The same kind of forced labour, for example—if it is indeed that, and I put in that reservation—is undoubtedly presently employed in a $50 million or $60 million cement plant which was also sold by interests in the province of British Columbia and elsewhere.

AIR TRANSPORT

ADVANCED BOOKING DOMESTIC AIR CHARTERS—RIGHT OF WARDAIR TO PARTICIPATE—LIMIT ON NUMBER OF FLIGHTS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to change the CTC decision of last week and to allow Wardair to compete with Air Canada and CP Air in providing domestic air charters on the ABC concept?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had a chance to review the decision of the CTC or the question of our position and right to do so. My understanding of the decision was not that it excluded any particular carrier but that it gave the right of first refusal, in effect, to the main carriers in the cross-Canada service. I will be looking into the decision further.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question. While looking at that decision, bearing in mind the very real impact upon Canadian unity that can flow from having more Canadians see more parts of the country, in that context will the minister very seriously review the decision of the CTC with a view to changing the ruling that would limit to a total of 50 the number of domestic air charters allowed next year to the two airlines that have in effect been granted an opportunity to operate in this field without competition?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, obviously I do not think it would be right to argue with the Leader of the Opposition or indeed to have him argue that kind of issue at this point in advance of looking thoroughly at all the issues. Of course the Canadian Transport Commission has the public interest very much in mind in trying to balance charter class fares with the development of ABC charters in this country. The issue is not free of complexity. I do not have to assure the Leader of the Opposition that this government is very interested indeed in trying to encourage the most efficient and economic way for Canadians travelling inside Canada. That will be very much our purpose but of course we have to bear in mind the desirability of retaining scheduled services for the purpose of moving from one part of the country to the other.

Mr. Clark: Will the minister give an undertaking that the principle that guides the review by the government will be that of allowing the maximum possible travel at the cheapest possible cost in Canada by Canadians rather than the principle of the protection of Air Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of the government to protect Air Canada or any other airline in any pejorative sense. I think it is important in this country that our regional, mainline and other air carriers have the proper scope for operations and to provide scheduled services in an efficient and economic manner. The question of what kind and combination of services is available is, of course, one with which we are concerned and we will be looking at the issue from that point of view. Without any doubt we will be trying to assure that there is as much cheap travel for Canadians in Canada as possible but if the Leader of the Opposition seems to think a miraculous wave of the hand is going to produce more of that as though costs disappear and scheduled services can be disregarded I think he is missing some very important points.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—PRIME MINISTER'S REPLY TO QUESTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which deals with an answer given to a question I asked on Friday, December 9, and reported in Hansard at page 1729. If statements made outside the House are to be taken as correct, then the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave an incorrect answer to a rather important question.

My question to the Prime Minister concerned a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in Hamilton on November 29 to the effect that he was "sick and tired of the U.S. ambassador running around talking about free trade." I asked the Prime Minister whether a diplomatic note had been sent to the United States complaining of the U.S. ambassador "running around talking about free trade", in accordance with the statement by the Minister of Agriculture.

I was trying to find out if this is a statement of the policy of the government, that it is sick and tired of the U.S. ambasssador running around talking about free trade. In reply the right hon. Prime Minister said, "Yes, Mr. Speaker." That means that a diplomatic note was sent to the United States protesting that the government is sick and tired of the U.S. ambassador running around talking about free trade.

Since returning here this morning I see from the Ottawa Journal, in which the earlier report appeared, that someone called Richard O'Hagan in the Prime Minister's office says it was all a misunderstanding. He said it was one of those half distracted answers and that one could not have listened without wondering if he knew what he was replying to. This is quite an explanation—that the Prime Minister in the question period is distracted and does not know what he is listening to and does not know what he is replying to.

This is an apparently incorrect answer on a serious matter, given by the Prime Minister. It affects the United States and must be embarrassing to the U.S. ambassador. I personally do not agree with the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that the ambassador is running around and should not be talking about free trade. I think he is entitled to talk about what he likes and that he is quite an outstanding representative of the United States. The Prime Minister has not told the House that this was a mistake of his, a wrong statement, and that no diplomatic note has been sent. I raise this question now because I think it is a breach of our privileges and is certainly not calculated to improve relations between this country and the United States of America of which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) is so fond. Could we have the record straightened out?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) raises a question of privilege which he would not have had an opportunity to raise at any earlier time as a portion of his remarks depended upon the presence of the right hon. Prime Minister in the House today to make some clarifying statement. I would presume that in the ordinary course the hon. member's remarks will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister who will have an opportunity to comment, presumably when next in the House.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—RECRUITING

Question No. 132—Mr. McKinnon:

1. How many (a) men (b) women applied to join the Canadian Armed Forces between January 1 and October 1, 1977 and, in each case, how many were rejected?

2. In each case, how many were rejected for (a) education (b) physical (c) psychological reasons?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence):

Enrolled	8,265	1,295
Difference	13,849	3,585.

2. (a), (b) and (c) Statistical data for rejection is not maintained since the DND selection system is based on the evaluation of the whole person and may be based on a single major deficiency or a combination of several minor deficiencies and this in turn will vary depending on the trade. The differences listed above are not all rejections, but in many cases include applicants who have either made applications for trades in which there are no vacancies and such applicants are then placed on waiting lists, or who have withdrawn their applications prior to being enrolled.

MONEY PAID TO MR. CALVERT BY CNR

Question No. 250—Mr. McKenzie:

Did Canadian National Railways contribute or donate money to Mr. Geoffrey N. Calvert, an actuary, to compensate him for writing and publishing a book entitled Pensions and Survival—The Coming Crisis of Money and Retirement and (a) if so, in what amount and on what date (b) if not, is CNR a member of the Canadian Pension Conference and did the Conference contribute money to Mr. Calvert to induce or reward him for writing and publishing the book?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Canadian National Railways did not contribute or donate money to Mr. Calvert. Canadian National is a member of the Canadian Pension Conference. Canadian National's information is that the Conference did remunerate Mr. Calvert under arrangements related to the study that led to the publication of the book referred to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH

Question No. 481—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. Did the Department of Labour receive any inquiries concerning occupational health matters from private citizens or businesses in (a) 1972 (b) 1973 (c) 1974 (d) 1975 (e) 1976 and, if so, how many?

2. Does the Department have a policy respecting responses to such inquiries and, if so, what is it?

3. Is the Department in any way obliged to deal with complaints relating to occupational health matters of national scope?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): 1. Labour Canada receives many inquiries from private citizens or businesses related to occupational health matters. No comprehensive departmental records are maintained because inquiries are received in our Regional Offices and at Headquarters by telephone, letter, and personal visits to our offices. However, the following information pertains to the number of written inquiries to the Minister's office concerning occupational health matters: 1972—0; 1973—4; 1974—6; 1975—6; 1976—6.

2. Responses to inquiries dealing with occupational health are prepared by knowledgeable occupational safety and health specialists who work in the Regional offices or the Occupational Safety and Health Branch of Labour Canada.

3. Labour Canada is obliged to deal only with complaints relating to occupational health in those businesses which fall under the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code—Part IV (Safety of Employees).

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on November 7 I replied to the minister on second reading of this bill. Since that time we have heard the minister repeat ad nauseam, and quite frankly in a way that I think is totally unworthy of him, that he had been sitting here listening to debate on this bill for 32 or 33 days and that he has been forced to move closure on two occasions because the debate has taken an unconscionable length of time.

● (1512)

Just for the uninitiated I have before me a copy of Bill C-11. It contains some 100 clauses, with 225 pages of text. It covers a great diversity of sections within the Income Tax Act. For example it introduces amendments to the Old Age Security Act. Then, lo and behold, just a little trailer, well hidden under the back end of what you might call this huge vehicle, is an increase in borrowing authority of $9 billion. Well, the former minister of finance had tried to tuck it in on another occasion in an appropriation bill for supplementary estimates, where there was no opportunity to debate the increase in this borrowing limit. Fortunately, we spotted that attempted bootlegging. And it was a straight bootleg, Mr. Speaker, of an authority which would be slipped through the House. I am sure there was not even two members on the backbench who were aware of it—possibly the Cabinet knew about it; certainly the Minister of Finance knew about it; and possibly the parliamentary secretary. That is dishonest government. Legislation should not be handled this way when it deals with more than one particular statute and becomes an omnibus bill.

Certainly there are different principles involved in this bill. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, just what might be the principle of it. It is described as an act to amend Income Tax. It comes into the Committee of the Whole as provided for by the rules of the House. All other legislation should go to committee, but a provision to amend the borrowing authority of the government is tacked on to this bill illegally, I suggest, because of the principle of it not being an amendment to the Income Tax Act but an increase in the borrowing authority.

There are changes in the Old Age Security Act included. Therefore the bill then becomes an act to amend a number of statutory enactments. Under that guise it should not be in this House but in the Committee of the Whole. The House cannot have it both ways.

I did not speak on a point of order at second reading with regard to this matter, nor did I speak in the debate on closure, but I am going to have a good deal to say about closure with regard to this bill. In the House over the past month a picture of misrepresentation was given. What else could the minister expect than what has happened during the past month?

We commenced in October with the Throne Speech debate. It was interrupted on October 21 on the Thursday of the first week of debate by a mini-budget, which in itself should have had a six-day debate. But no, it was bootlegged into the middle of another debate, which by tradition gives ministers and members of this House an opportunity to canvass conditions socially and economically, generally or in particular—whatever their choice may be.

On top of that along came the INCO lay-offs one day later, October 21, and Mr. Speaker refused a motion under Standing Order 26 saying that the matter could be discussed during the Throne Speech debate. Of course it could. Of course it was, but I think improperly. There was ample opportunity to use Standing Order 26 for sittings at night to discuss the whole question, instead of directing that a debate should take place with regard to a particular subject to the prejudice of other members. There were many members, Mr. Speaker, who were deprived of their right to speak during the Throne Speech debate because of those two actions, the introduction of the mini-budget and, secondly, the deliberate intrusion into the debate of the INCO situation which should have been handled in a different way.

Therefore when Bill C-11 came up for debate, many members who wanted to touch on subjects which were germane to income tax spoke on second reading, and the debate was there. The material was there. When was this going to be debated later? Next spring? The situation was now, and one could readily expect that the debate on second reading would be extensive. As reported at page 661 of Hansard, during second reading I said:

I hope some of the provisions will merit the fate they deserve and be defeated in the Committee of the Whole.

There were some very minor changes, but they do not go nearly far enough because the minister has had the temerity—I would not say gall—to use closure in committee of the whole. He is faced with this intriguing process. For purposes of information, he tabled a number of amendments to sections which were not reached before the guillotine fell. The net result is that he could not present his amendments or have them moved by one of his colleagues so that even without debate the House could consider the amendments.

In the end this bill will pass. The amendments will have to be introduced in the other place, and the bill—if they pass it there—will have to come back here for approval as amended by the other place. Of course those amendments will then be subject to debate. What does the minister hope to gain? He gains nothing by the premature use of the guillotine.

● (1522)

Let us look at how much time was taken up by the debate on second reading. There was a total of 27 hours and 20 minutes from November 7 to November 24, with interruptions for opposition days and Remembrance Day. On Monday, November 7, there was two hours and 53 minutes of debate; Tuesday, November 8, three hours and 14 minutes; Wednesday, November 9, two hours and 32 minutes—

An hon. Member: Too much time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Members opposite feel there is too much time spent on legislation. They have not even seen it. They are not interested in it. Their participation in legislation is nil.

On Thursday, November 10, there was one hour and 18 minutes of debate; Monday, November 14, three hours and 25 minutes; Tuesday, November 15, opposition day; Wednesday, November 16, two hours and 23 minutes; Thursday, November 17, three hours and ten minutes; Friday, November 18, two hours and 30 minutes; Monday, November 21, two hours and 45 minutes, for a total debate on second reading of 24 hours and ten minutes.

There was a time allocation debate of two hours and 17 minutes. On Tuesday, November 22, there was the grand total of 30 minutes. On Wednesday ther was no debate because it was an opposition day. On Thursday, November 24, there were three hours and ten minutes. Therefore there was a total of 27 hours and 20 minutes for the bill, and two hours and 18 minutes for time allocation.

Let us look at committee of the whole. On Thursday, November 24, after the vote there were eight minutes; Friday, November 25, two hours and 56 minutes; Monday, November 28, three hours and 52 minutes; Tuesday, no debate, opposition day; Wednesday, November 30, two hours and 54 minutes; Thursday, December 1, three hours 40 minutes; Friday, December 2, opposition day; Monday, December 5, the debate on the allocation of time, two hours and five minutes, and then 30 minutes in committee; Thursday, December 6, three hours and 28 minutes; Wednesday, December 7, one hour and 42 minutes; Thursday, December 8, last opposition day; Friday, December 9, two hours and 50 minutes, for a committee stage total of 22 hours and one minute on a 225 page bill with more than 100 clauses.

Do members opposite have any idea of what is income tax and the number of subjects covered? How can they say we have spent too much time on this bill considering that it covered the income tax provisions of the March 31 budget plus the so-called budget in October? I am sorry, it was not March 31 but June, because it was in July that we passed certain amendments to the March 31 budget, if my memory serves me right.

During that time we did raise certain subjects that merit a great deal of attention. I am sorry that the government members did not feel persuaded to read in particular clause 75 of Bill C-22 passed in July under the guillotine, whereby it is a condition for purchasing and cashing Canada's Savings Bonds that the owner thereof shall have a social insurance number. This is nothing but pure bureaucracy run rampant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is totally contrary to the words of the late Prime Minister Pearson when introducing the concept of social insurance numbers some 13 years ago. Not only that, but the forms for purchase of this year's Canada Savings Bonds provide for the inclusion of a social security number. All the minister said is that we have been using them here and using them there, and they are on the income tax forms. There have been a number of salami slices from time to time, and some of their use is absolutely debatable. The use of the social insurance number is not compulsory at this time. There are thousands upon thousands of senior citizens, married women who have never had employment and children who are too young to take employment who are the owners of Canada Savings Bonds. In future they cannot cash any coupons on Canada Savings Bonds without obtaining a social insurance number.

I have had scores of elderly persons come to me. Frankly, a number of them never had to have a social insurance number. They retired before the social insurance number scheme was even introduced. Therefore there was absolutely no need for them to have a number.

I invite hon. members on both sides of the House to examine the application form and the requirements and the instructions for obtaining a social insurance number. With the rush that is now on, in many instances there is a delay of three to four weeks. It is centralized in some office over on Riverside Drive.

The law does not state that one has to have a social insurance number. Why should a housewife who has never worked and has no intention of working be forced to take a social insurance number if a husband or a relative makes her a gift of Canada Savings Bonds, or if she should inherit them?

What about children? It is one of the better habits of parents that can afford it, and it is surprising how many can, to start their teenage children on the useful pattern of saving by giving them a Canada Savings Bond or two. It used to be one could get them for $50. Now they cost $100. It sounds somewhat ludicrous that a 12-year-old child should get a $100 bond as a birthday gift, but with inflation that kind of value is no longer strange. Yet what else could one do in order that a child might get interest?

I thought, speaking privately to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), that he had not heard of this particular provision when it went through as part of the March budget. I spoke out on second reading, but it is evident he soon hardened his mind. I must say it is my intention, if my bill is reached—I have a private member's bill already on the order paper—to seek the repeal of that section. I hope there will be an opportunity to have the subject debated because I am sure that the correspondence and telephone calls I have received duplicate those which have come to the attention of almost every member in this House.

I am against the principle that there should be this watchdog over me and over everyone else in the country in the form of a social insurance number. It is wrong. Oh, it is nice from the point of view of the bureaucrat, but it has been proven time and time again that anything which is administratively convenient deserves to be looked at three times, not twice, and I am sure this system is likely to infringe upon the ordinary rights of the citizens.

We are getting so wrapped up in controls of one form or another, whether at the federal level or at the provincial and municipal levels, that we can scarcely call our souls our own. I think people are fed up with this, totally and utterly fed up with it. And it is time we did something about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The government is for the benefit of the people, it is not the people for the benefit of the government and those who administer government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If that is what qualifies me as a Conservative then I am proud to be a Conservative when I say those words.

My hon. friend from York-Simcoe led a long fight with regard to the taxation of income benefits from insurance policies. There was, it is true, a retreat from the proposals contained in the original June budget; I am glad to say the minister did withdraw, the result, I imagine, of pressure from his own back benches as well as from pressure by members on this side.

Insurance looms very large in the minds of the citizens of this country who are not rich, and often not in receipt of moderately high incomes. There are many, many people who pay in a pittance on small policies which represent their conception of how they can best put money aside within their means, modest as they may be. These savings provide a well of investment funds for this country to use—they would amount to a great deal more if the state at all three levels did not take 43 per cent of the gross national product, in which case a lot more money would be available for insurance and investment by the people generally, and they would not then be obliged to rely on the great, God-Almighty state to provide for them after retirement.

Somebody asked me today: Do you think the demand for social services, homes for the aged, day care centres and so on, is the result of government action? Mr. Speaker, it is hard to say which is the chicken and which is the egg. Is it because we are now in the seventies that we feel the state should have the responsibility of looking after each and every one of us beyond the age of 65, and that it should also have the responsibility of providing facilities for the care of children while they are of pre-school and elementary school age? Is that the state of our society today?

To get back to the subject of insurance and taxing the benefits thereof, certainly there have been changes. Even now, the minister has backed away from the idea that interest for a loan from an insurance company would not be counted as an expense of business if the money had been borrowed for the purpose of carrying on the business. I think the original proposal was nitpicking, a process of making it more difficult for citizens who must comply with the Income Tax Act. There are too many examples of this.

Take the loans for the purpose of home insulation. What a joke! They are subject to agreement by all the provinces and are subject to a maximum limit of $350 restricted to homes built prior to 1941. I understand that some of the provinces may make supplementary loans or grants. But it is all subject to income tax. What incentive is there, Mr. Speaker? What encouragement is there to insulate a home at a cost probably in excess of $350 in many cases only to find that the money, when eventually received, is subject to tax?

We want as many people to insulate their homes in order to conserve energy. The principle of the plan is quite good, if we want to save energy. I have saved energy. I doubled the insulation in my home this year, and I spent the $350 on an aluminum door. My wife has told me that already it is very apparent that we are going to save a fair amount on our heating bill this winter. Even with the severe cold and heavy snows we have had so far, the house is much more comfortable. Why tax the plan? I regret that part of this particular bill.

I had hoped to see much more in the way of incentives in this bill. There are some incentives, hopefully for scientific research. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) spoke in this debate earlier. Of course he stressed, as a caveat, that there should not be bureaucratic bungling or the insistence on so many rules that, no matter how well-intentioned the plan, it would be totally negatived by the philosophy that a good idea must be smothered with paper work. I might not agree with the hon. member on a lot of things, but on this one idea I do.

There are a number of other subjects which will be covered by my colleagues in this third reading debate. I do not promise it will be short, because closure is counter-productive.

Mr. Alexander: Right on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If there has been a few more days allowed for consideration by committee of the whole, third reading would have been a matter of formality.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. "kid freshmen" in the back benches on the government side speak as if they are wise veterans in this House. They have not seen the operation of this House from both sides. I learned about parliamentary procedure when I was a parliamentary secretary on the other side and from sitting in the chair. This House has a certain temper. By agreement between House leaders legislation moves. There is far more achieved by consensus between House leaders. I have participated in a lot of negotiations conducted in that manner.

An hon. Member: Since 1867.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): After the hon. member is here another two months, he will change his mind, because two months is a relatively long time to him. If there is agreement between the House leaders, legislation will move. The worst one can do is impose the guillotine. It has been used fairly frequently of late. I suggest to hon. members that its continued use will be counter-productive. Government members have been invited to speak, to participate and to represent the ideas of their constituents. Far too many of them indicate the representation of their constituents in important legislation by sitting in their seats and remaining silent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They do not express themselves in caucus; they do not look at the legislation in caucus.

An hon. Member: When did the hon. member even sit in government caucus?

Mr. Alexander: We can hear you through the wall.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Government caucus is less important than opposition caucus. Hon. members opposite should find time to participate in caucus. They should ask their fellow members to participate, and then they will see how much time is spent.

I do not like this bill because of the number of things it does and because of some of the things it has omitted to do. I do not intend to vote for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I agree with one thing that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said, and that is on the problems which have developed as a result of the use of closure in regard to this tax bill.

The government had a large number of amendments which it wanted to incorporate in the bill, but it was unable to incorporate most of them. In fact seven or eight essential amendments should have been incorporated, but most of the government amendments did not get into the bill. There were approximately 70 or 80 amendments to this bill, most of them from the government side.

Mr. Lumley: No.

Mr. Peters: Am I wrong?

Mr. Lumley: You are wrong.

Mr. Peters: Well, there were 40, 70 or 80. It seems to me there were a lot, because on two or three occasions thick sheafs of amendments were tabled. At least there were 25 or 30.

Mr. Lumley: Less than 30.

Mr. Peters: In any case, this bill was so bad that the government wanted to amend it in a number of ways. Perhaps this is the help the government receives from its backbenchers. If that is so, they deserve all the more credit. Backbenchers on the government side should be aware of the fact that their input has been restricted because of closure, and many of the proposed amendments did not get into this legislation.

● (1552)

A tax bill is an important piece of legislation. It is certainly important to the government and to the country, and if there ever were a time when the country needed help, it is now. I think that the major problem in Canada, now with 1.5 million unemployed, is the creation of jobs, and one of the things which the income tax system can achieve is to change the distribution of income, usually by providing those who are in a position to make more income with the possibility of making more purchases, thus creating more jobs. That is not what the government has done.

The government said that what we have to do is to give corporations a sum of money which will allow them, as one hon. member said, to modernize their production facilities, and to provide incentives to them to increase their production so that more people can be employed. What the government has allocated for that purpose under this tax bill is $1.2 billion. Opposition members and Liberal backbenchers should have said to the government that that is not the way to do it. The 1.2 billion will not increase productivity but will go into savings. It cannot go either into increasing productivity or into modernization. It is estimated that, on the average, production capacity in Canada is operating at about 80 per cent.

One of the clauses in the bill which we did not reach because of closure makes this clear, and I am sure that some government members have done surveys and would be able to indicate to the government that it was making a mistake in spending $1.2 billion to increase our production capacity when already we are operating at only 80 per cent of that capacity. This has resulted in very few jobs in the past. Other incentives of a similar nature have not produced much in the way of jobs.

There are many people who are in great need of consumer goods and in great need of housing. In fact they are in need of almost all goods that our factories can produce, yet they do not have the money with which to purchase these goods. If these budget resolutions now translated into this tax bill were to produce jobs in Canada they would have to do so by reducing the income tax of those who do not have enough money with which to buy the goods which they need, and which are necessary to provide jobs and to increase our productive capacity. We have not done that. Again we are providing corporations with assistance which we know will not be of much help in that respect. The only justification for this is that they have contributed heavily to a particular political party during an election, and $1.2 billion might probably be well spent in that regard.

We did discuss several clauses of the bill and it seems to me that one of them had a great deal to do with the unity of our nation, namely, the provisions regarding the insulation program. This program could not be better designed to divide the country if René Lévesque had decided to bring in that kind of legislation himself. People in one part of Canada do not get the same breaks as people in another part of Canada.

We have a joint program in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia under which the people in those two provinces will receive $500 to insulate their houses, but in other parts of Canada, such as in Ontario, people cannot receive money to insulate a house unless it was built before 1921, and the maximum amount is only $350. This is a small program. Anyone who has bought any insulation material or done any insulation work on his property will know that $350 does not go very far. Now it is to be considered as part of one's taxable income anyway, so it will not amount to a full $350 for the purpose unless you have no income. And if you have no income, you could make better use of the $350 than to use it to insulate your house because you would probably be using wood to heat the house, and the more wood you cut, the less wood you will need because you get warm cutting wood.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Is the hon. member suggesting we should burn our houses?

Mr. Peters: This is probably what the hon. member from New Brunswick believes. He is probably the kind of man who would do that. He is probably too lazy to shift his ass to cut down wood for burning so he would probably burn his house. I hope he does not decide to burn his neighbour's house as well. He has not had experience in cutting wood, although he comes from a province where there is wood and where people do cut down wood. The point I am making is not for that kind of member. He will go his own happy way to Brockville one of these days anyway, so we will not have to worry about him.

We are interested in having uniform programs across the country so that a Canadian in New Brunswick will not have to burn down his house to keep warm. People in New Brunswick, in British Columbia or in Prince Edward Island should have the same kind of insulation program.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? To begin with, the hon. member who has just been wasting the time of the House has used some very unparliamentary language.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am prepared at any time to put up my knowledge and ability in wood cutting against the hon. member's abilities in that regard, and I am also willing to put up my knowledge of the bill. The hon. member has just referred to some 80 amendments. There were only 26 amendments proposed, 15 of which have been passed, and 11 of which are very technical amendments. If he wants to participate in this debate, he should stick to facts instead of making erratic statements.

Mr. Peters: I did not identify the hon. member. He identified himself in his remarks. If the shoe fits him, let him wear it. If the hon. member has something to say, he should stand up and make a speech like anyone else. It seems to me that we have given him credit which he does not deserve.

The point I was trying to make is that if we are interested in establishing unity in this country, sooner or later we will have to establish an insulation program that will be made available to all Canadians at the same price, that will operate in the same way and that will provide the same benefits to all. Frankly, I think we should establish such a program because it is an excellent way of reducing the heating bill, but if we are to have a program, not only should we be able to assist people in insulating their homes but we should ensure that there are not rip-offs by producers of insulation material.

There are insulation shortages in many areas. In the last two years the increase in the cost of insulation has been fantastic.

It behooves the national government to set more rigid production standards than we now have. We have quite often found, after re-examination of insulation, that specifications have been considerably lower than they should have been. There are facilities for testing the R factor, but they are not good enough, and we are being ripped off. We have found that the standards set for insulation have not been met.

Everyone is interested in heating, and we should be giving some consideration to the specifications of electricity, oil, gas, and all the other fuels which are used. While the R factor for insulation has been checked and been found wanting, it is also true that at peak periods Ontario Hydro does not provide the same heating capacity as it does at other periods. Electricity with a factor close to 120 volts, bought several years ago can be reduced in stages of two volts at a time, bringing it down probably four or six volts. Anyone who has electric heating can find at certain times, no matter what their thermostats indicate, that their heating units are not operating at nearly the capacity they do at other times.

This is also true with gas. The BTU rating of gas was considerably higher when gas was first brought to Ontario by Trans-Canada than it is today. Since that time plants using that raw material have been established. They have been able to take out high energy materials such as butane so that a person buying fuel today quite often finds that it does not produce the same number of BTU's as it did previously. We should be able to control those factors. If we are going to subsidize the re-insulation of houses we should guarantee that people get what they pay for.

We should also be providing some benefit to those who buy small cars with small motors. This would bring about a saving in fuel, which will without a doubt be necessary before too long.

Other problems with regard to the Income Tax Act have been discussed at some length. One matter was the roll-over of property. There should certainly be no objection to taxing the capital gain which may result from a roll-over of property, but in addition to expropriations there are other occasions when we should give people at least two years to buy a second property. We have allowed one year for those who have to move for one reason or another.

Ordinary people who get involved in roll-overs are not speculating and are not wanting to make any particular gain, but through the death of a spouse or through inability, because of age or poor health, to operate a business, whether it be a farm or a small business, a person may have to acquire other property he can manage. Two years is an arbitrary figure, and even it would not necessarily allow for changes which are made necessary. A two-year period quite often might work a hardship.

There are a number of changes proposed in this tax bill. Normally a tax bill has very little appeal, but this one seems to have some for larger companies. We are making it possible for large companies to do things which are not necessarily in our interest. At second reading the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) pointed out that many problems have developed as a result of giving corporations and small businesses more money than they can spend. When that happens businesses increase savings and, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said the other day, we may be saving ourselves right out of business. I read in a newspaper the other day that Canadians have $285 billion tied up in insurance plans.

When we give money to corporations and that money is retained by them, we find the same thing that is happening in the resource sector. Last week it was announced that 750 miners are to be laid off at Falconbridge. Prior to that 4,000 lay-off notices were given to employees of INCO at Sudbury, Thompson, Port Colborne and Timmins. Aid should be given to the resource sector to help it develop new mining propositions and new sawmills, and to help it modernize. However, when a mine or forest industry develops, management has some control over profits. Mining companies have the control of people's resources. They have some control over the costs involved in the development of resources because they can either "high grade" or "low grade". It is not impossible to know approximately how many tons of ore are available in a particular place and what the price for that ore might be. If the price of the product goes up, the amount of ore can be increased because low-grade ore can be mined. On the other hand, if the price of the ore drops, high grade ore can be mined; in other words, they use only the ore which produces a profit on the international market.

This bill would give companies like INCO a 3 per cent increase on their inventories. I agree that for manufacturing industries this is for the most part necessary. This means that if companies replace their inventories, this 3 per cent will help compensate for the inflationary trend which has developed over the period they have been holding their inventories. However, INCO, Falconbridge, Texas Gulf and other companies have built up inventories of base materials, paid overtime, and produced too much. They now have large inventories. It has been said that Sudbury has a seven or eight month inventory at the present time.

• (1612)

We paid a 3 per cent allowance to INCO to provide for that inventory inflation which they were already able to control by the type of ore they were mining. With the huge profit they had accumulated, the undistributed dividends and taxes they had been able to defer, they decided—and from a corporate point of view there is nothing wrong—to take their mining venture to Guatemala and Indonesia. With the help of export credits and of some other federal agencies they established themselves in countries that will allow them to compete with their own development in Canada. The result is that workers have been laid off in Canada, in many cases permanently, and the indication is that unless the world market increases within a relatively short time they will close the Canadian operations completely.

Miners are very important people, Mr. Speaker. We sometimes forget that there are only 750,000 miners, forest workers, farmers and fishermen who provide all the wealth of this nation. Except in the financial area of lending money and collecting interest, all our wealth comes from these basis resources. The other ten million or so workers in one way or another are parasites on these industries. Now we find that 4,000 or 5,000 miners may be laid off permanently, and as well we have almost lost that many by attrition. We may soon find that communities supporting these industries are not viable, and that not only 4,000 or 5,000 people will be affected but rather up to 80,000 or 90,000 people who rely on the resultant business.

In spite of the mistakes of the past this income tax bill offers little help. The personal expense allowance has been doubled, but inflation has increased the cost of tools and expenses of the job by about 50 per cent, so this year workers would need $150 just to break even. The worker does not really receive any benefit from this provision and so cannot increase consumption to any degree. It was argued during debate that where it was absolutely necessary for a worker to drive long distances to and from the job, an allowance should be made for this, but the government refused. Concessions have been made to corporations and professional people but not to the working person.

If we are to receive any benefit from a budget and the income tax bills that flow from it, our purchasing power must be increased and jobs provided for those seeking them. These things should be the main purposes of a budget and I hope the Minister of Finance will bring one in without delay. Unless the young people of the country are assured of jobs we will have failed them and ourselves. No country of only ten million workers is rich enough to carry one and a half million unemployed for very long. The burden on the workers is too great and they will revolt. The one and a half million people looking for jobs that are not available will revolt as well, and we will all suffer the consequences. If we could decide on a redistribution of purchasing power perhaps we could eliminate this. Now is the time to look at redistributing the income of the ordinary Canadian rather than looking at handouts to the corporate welfare bums.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on third reading of Bill C-11 I recognize that in one way we are simply debating with a ghost, namely, the former minister of finance who provided the bulk of these proposals. We have to direct some remarks to the present minister, however, because there was a mini-budget since then.

I should like to start with the question of closure on a tax bill. I do not happen to believe in the principle of closure in a free parliament, and one of the reasons for that was demonstrated in this debate. Rightly or wrongly, this party decided to support the bill on second reading. If my memory is correct I sat in this House for a good many days on second reading and saw the debate winding to a close. We had only a few more speakers when suddenly closure was dropped upon us, and of course second reading was extended by the time necessary for debating the closure motion. To my complete surprise on the important part of the bill, discussion in committee of the whole, when it was clear that members of the opposition were seriously concerned about several matters of great import to their constituencies and the whole country, closure was again imposed.

To give an example, Mr. Speaker, one of the subjects on which I did not contribute, but which engaged the attention of many members on this side, was insulation. Perhaps in no other country except the U.S.S.R. is insulation more important than in Canada. At no time in our history have fuel costs been so high and the subject of insulation so important. The government had obviously erred and was caught in a differential type of treatment for the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island as compared with the rest of Canada. Instead of the minister admitting that the point had been well made and that he would do something to correct the situation, we debated it on and off for four or five weeks, and then the government surrendered outside the House in a meeting with provincial ministers.

My point is that if the government wants to govern, it must learn to recognize the feeling of the House and that discriminatory legislation cannot be put through without a long fight. My point is that closure is wrong, but when it is used it should be used with some sort of judgment and assessment. The House does not like closure, and unless there are matters of great national emergency it should never even be considered. The wrong place to apply closure is on the mundane things of tax law.

This budget did see some tax changes. I think it could be agreed now by all sides that the handling of the insulation program by the government was a failure, and it was made very clear in the debate.

Discussion of other points by hon. members should have been allowed, but this was not possible. We were cut off due to time allocation and closure. In particular, I felt the registered home owner savings plan was a good idea when it was brought in some three years ago. It encouraged the individual to save toward something necessary. The vast majority of people in Canada want to own their own homes. This program was cut off by the government without any consideration given to the tax liabilities of the poor devil who was encouraged to enter the program.

All of us, on both sides of the House, have many cases on file. I cite the example of a clergyman who does not receive much money by the very nature of his calling, who is provided with a free manse—as they call it—and who intends to retire in twelve years. He puts his money aside, a few hundred dollars a year into a registered home ownership savings plan, reduces his tax, and is pleased with the program. It means that down the road when he does retire, without a great pension, he will have a start toward purchasing his new home or the furniture therein. But suddenly it is announced that the program is cancelled. He has the alternative now of taking all that money back this year and paying full tax on it. He does not have the alternative of spreading it out, except if he buys an annuity, which does not meet his needs.

That is merely an example of the type of things that we, as members of parliament, should be debating, bringing the effect of tax law on individuals in Canada before the minister and before parliament. If I have a dozen examples, I would assume that every other member on each side of the House has an equal number. We cannot all participate in these debates. However, if just a few people had put their views forward, perhaps the minister would have been receptive and a change would have been made before the end of the year. This could have been done if there was a good mood in the House. You can only have a good mood in the House when it is obvious that the government is receptive to a positive, constructive idea.

The member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) dealt with the subject of the social insurance number. We know from personal conversations with the minister that he was as deeply shocked as we were that the civil servants in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada would deliberately break a solemn promise of a former Prime Minister made on the floor of this House. The Minister knew that was wrong. He knew the people of Canada did not want this closing in of regulations and controls, and for them to be known after a few years as only a number, not as persons any more. The majority of people in this country, and all members of parliament know I am right. We know that the member for Edmonton West is right. We are only expressing truth. The late Prime Minister Pearson gave his solemn word that this would not be applied to income tax.

When the Minister gave his answer to our proposals in the House that this should be eliminated, he was very impressed with the arguments of the member for Edmonton West, of myself and of one or two others. But then he said, "The civil servants have have told me that it has been on the income tax form since 1966. Therefore, apparently, it is the law of the Medes and the Persians—it cannot be changed. God has spoken! I am simply saying that one wrong in 1966 in breaking that pledge of the Prime Minister made in 1964, does not make it right now—to break it again for the second time.

This is not only with respect to bond coupons. You find out in many places throughout the country that they are demanding social insurance numbers. I am saying to the minister and to the Liberal government: you know that I am right, you know the people of Canada are right. There is not a single solitary argument to support the requirement for giving a SIN number when you buy a Canada Savings Bond. The only argument advanced on the positive side is that if a bond is lost, it will be easier to trace. Do you take away the civil liberties and freedom of 20 million individuals on the argument that you might save or find a lost bond—like a lost $10 bill? It does not hold. Then we have the ministers statement that since the SIN number is on the income tax form since 1966, he could not do much about it today, and so it is an accepted part of the law of the land. In the debate concerning this issue that will continued across the country for the next eight to ten months, the government will be on the defensive, trying to argue itself out of this position on the SIN number.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

The government stands condemend of allowing the civil servants of Canada to change a promise of a Prime Minister and to contravene the wishes of parliament by applying the SIN number to everything. Until the government is willing to stand up to these termites who eat away at our freedom, then that government does not deserve to sit in office, and has to go. Ten years, even one hundred years from now the reduction and loss of our freedom will be more important than the mistakes made on the tax side of this particular budget.

We have endured bad taxes for years, and will continue to endure them. But we do not want to have to endure restriction on our liberties. The hon. member for Edmonton West should be congratulated because he was the only member who spotted this when the bill went through last March or April. I certainly take full blame for the fact that I missed it. When I did find out, I did what I could in a constructive way to ask the government to get rid of this silly SIN number on things that are not necessary.

Closure has prevented me from discussing this fascinating principle of the roll-over of capital gains on property. There is certainly no justice in what the government has done in suggesting it apply to farms and suggesting it apply to small business because these forms of private enterprise, these people as a rule do not receive much money during their working years. A small businessman who owns a store, a farmer who owns his farm, from the records we can show that he receives an average income well below that of the working class, and well below what people should be getting for the tremendous investment that they have at the present time. It may interest the House to know that in 1975 the average income of a farmer across Canada was approximately $8,000 per farm. This year, 1977, with the figures in for the first ten months, the average farmer will end up with approximately $4,000 a year. This does not include any reward or return on his interest, labour or management. It is simply the amount of money he will have after he has paid his expenses from his gross income.

● (1632)

This is at a time when labour is going up 6, 8, 10 or 12 per cent a year, and that is a restraint. Government costs are going up about the same level. However, for one important segment of our income earners, the agricultural sector, and equally important to miners, there has been a reduction of 50 per cent of their net income in a two-year period from $8,000 to $4,000.

This question of roll-over should have been discussed as part of an attempt by the government to make it a little more fair for this chap. When he finally comes to the end of his work period, he should have a chance to roll his enterprise over and move into a similar type operation without having to pay a tax on the move.

I did not get the opportunity during the committee of the whole to ask why this principle of roll-over is not applied to ownership in the form of shares. We, as a national objective, should be trying in parliament to do everything we can to get Canadian as individuals to own their own country.

Our tax laws discriminate against Canadians owning shares in companies in their own country. That is why we in this country, in major segments of our economy own such a small proportion of the shares of large international companies. Our tax laws discriminate against it. We double tax any person who goes into ownership in the form of shares. We are not going to double tax them under this principle of roll over if they buy in the form of land or property.

We have moved a little bit on shares in the legislation where we have agreed to give privileges to the person who gets options. However, this privilege of being able to be treated differently on options under this legislation, Bill C-11, only applies to a person who gets options in a Canadian-owned private company. Why could this principle not be applied to the foreign-owned private company?

Many Canadians find that the only way they can be rewarded for doing something in Canada or abroad is to take their reward in the form of shares. They not only get their reward in the form of wages, but in the form of shares. But the first thing that happens when a company begins to make money is that they buy out the Canadians. There is usually a by-law of the company, as a type of protection, that you sell back to the company you have joined.

Usually these companies are foreign owned. If they are in newly developing nations, they cannot pay a Canadian very much money for his know-how to make things work so they give him a share interest. If his ideas are good, and the majority of shares are owned by the nationals of that country, the minute the company does well and share dividends on shares are going to be paid, they think of how they can buy you out. When things are going well, they want the dividends to stay in their own country. One can understand that reasoning because we have it here in Canada.

I suggest, as a constructive type of proposal, that we should allow this concept of roll over of capital gains to extend to all forms of property. The accepted philosophy is to make it possible to tax a person when money is taken into income, but when rolling over from one form of property to a similar type of property, the roll-over principle should be allowed to cover all forms of property ownership.

The minister did not respond to the second proposal I made. I hope his staff, including the parliamentary secretary, will bring this proposal to him. These proposals were made for the simple purpose of directing to a new minister, who is not responsible for most of this bill, some ideas to make this a better bill. It is the duty of every member of parliament in the House, including the opposition, to put forward proposals.

Our party voted for this legislation on second reading with the understanding that when it would go into committee of the whole we could put forward proposals to be included in the legislation. We found out, through inexperience maybe, and through a philosophy present on the other side of the House, that they do not want to accept proposals from the opposition. I still hope they will learn to be democratic and learn that parliament is a place for talking.

Parliament is a place where you can put forward ideas in the hope that occasionally they may be a accepted. I am going to continue that policy of putting ideas forward. However, with the way this bill has been handled, with no sign of compromise and no sign of willingness to accept positive ideas, it is very difficult to keep up this belief.

Another subject that was not discussed in this legislation but should have been was the Turner budget of 1974. This budget we have now and this tax legislation are part of a series of continuing bits of tax law which all add up to disaster in Canada. I suppose everyone looked at the headline in this morning's Globe and Mail. I will read it to the House so that it will show on the record. It reads:

PM lost fiscal gamble; Canada pays with ailing economy

Then follows a fairly substantive analysis of all the mistakes the government has made since 1973 when Turner was the finance minister. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) was not able to change this drift and resigned from the portfolio. We see the very well-liked member from Shawinigan, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), coming into the position with great enthusiasm that he might be able to turn it around and end this drift of blunders that have been consistently the same since 1973. They have put Canada, a very strong country, having the products that the world wants and having every reason to be going at full blast, into a position where it has lost four years. We have not only been in recession but in stagflation throughout the whole period.

The key phrase that has to be remembered about the Turner budget of the spring of 1974, and repeated again in the fall of 1974, is that it applied double taxation to the resource industries of Canada. That budget of 1974 said to the provinces which owned the resources, "You have gone too far. You have been too greedy in raising your taxes three or four times on the resource industries. We are going to get back at you by doubling the penalty on these resource industries and not making those provincial taxes deductible."

Today in several of our provinces, with the provincial governments having doubled and quadrupled their tax level and the federal government not making the provincial taxes deductible, we have tax liability of 85 per cent to over 100 per cent.

As you look at the mines, they are going down. It is not just the big Inco, Falconbridge and Cominco mines. It is the small Canadian mines which are only producing $100 million worth of stuff a year, pretty small I admit. Craigmont is closing down. It is running out of high grade ore. Gibraltar is closing off. Most people in Canada have not heard of these mines. Nothing was more successful than Gibraltar until Turner's budget came in 1974. I am simply pointing out the obvious. It is not only the 4,000 miners in Ontario, but the miners in every province in Canada—they are going down the drain in a fast slide because of the double taxation imposed in this country in 1974. No attempt has been made in the bill before us to deal with this vitally important issue. So here we have a nation which should be strong, walking along on crutches.

● (1642)

Things are so bad that even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has realized he cannot fool the people any longer talking about unity when the policies of his own government are dragging a powerful country to its knees. Here is a mining industry, the most efficient in the world, with the ore the world needed, forced to its knees, going bankrupt, going out of business. Yet all we are talking about in this House is what kind of temporary, stop-gap measure we can devise to keep the workers employed for a few weeks longer or induce them to share what work there is.

The answer is simple. Tax law is competitive law, and if our tax laws are more severe than those of our competitors the industries which suffer from them will go out of business. Canada does not have a monopoly in world markets.

The budgets of the last couple of years have been bad budgets because they have failed to deal with the great mistake which was made in 1974, the mistake of imposing double taxation. That mistake arose, naturally, from the philosophy of the government and the mandarins who advise it. Events have shown that it was not to the benefit of the mining industry, and now the administration must face the fact that the tax flowing into the treasury is being reduced rather than the contrary.

The only way in which a government which is bringing this country to its knees can win salvation under these circumstances is by admitting that it made a colosal blunder in 1974, changing its philosophy, and ending double taxation. This means letting the provinces keep what they have; let their tax be non-deductible, and then approach the provinces with the argument that, in line with the action taken federally, they ought to cut their own taxes closer to the 50 per cent level than to the 60 to 100 per cent level which prevails today.

In my opening remarks on second reading I spoke directly to the minister in connection with the theory of potential budgeting. I pointed out that the Economic Council of Canada has already mildly recommended that we move in this direction. I pointed out further that potential budgeting would only work during periods of slack employment and unused plant capacity. These two conditions have now made potential budgeting possible.

Potential budgeting consists simply of making tax reductions applicable to things which are not being done and which the nation wants to see done. This process helps the minister to balance his budget because he is not spending money. Let me give an example—there is only one example, to my knowledge, in the whole world, namely, the experience of the United States in 1964 when a young president, soon to be assassinated, accepted the concept, brand new as it was, and dropped the budget level by $10 billion. Everyone expected there would be a deficit at the end of the year of an additional $10 billion. But because tax reductions were applied to things the country wanted, and because additional productive capacity was put into existence, government revenues increased; instead of going down by $10 billion the treasury ended up with an extra $19 billion. This was how the American Republic was pulled out of the slump and placed on a rising cycle which lasted until 1968.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

I gave that example to the new Minister of Finance and, after talking to him later, I sent him a letter in which I put these ideas on record so that he could make use of them if he wished. To make sure that no one will think this is a secret matter between myself and the Minister of Finance I propose to take the time of the House, in closing, to put those observations formally before the chamber.

Following up my budget proposals in my speech of November 17, 1977, I submit the following paper at the request of your parliamentary secretary.

At this particular moment Canada's interests require a dramatic incentive for individuals to move towards some form of solar assisted energy savings. This need fits in with the opportunity for potential budgeting.

In almost every case solar hardware is capital intensive. In other words, one large capital investment now versus the usual 20 years of annual energy bills.

My proposal is that any type of capital expenditure to reduce utilization by the individual of traditional energy sources should be given the same tax treatment that business gets, namely:

(a) 100% write-off for proven hardware

(b) 150% write-off for hardware still in experimental stages (See Income Tax Provision 1959-1971).

Then I listed the cases where the hardware has been proven and should be eligible for the 100 per cent write-off. Later, I listed 11 cases of experimental types of hardware which are still unproven. I will mention the 11 items on that list because they are the ones to which the House should pay attention. First, heat pumps. The reliability of heat pumps, whether air sourced or water sourced, has yet to be proven. Then there are the concentrator collectors for solar thermal energy conversion, commonly known as STEC.

The rest of the list reads as follows: heat storage facilities, methane production, vertical axis windmills, solar absorption air conditioning, residential photovoltaics, individual water recycling and conversion of waste to energy, conversion of cow manure to protein, energy plantation and the production of hydrogen. This is a first draft list of items which are within the performance capability of individuals and within reasonable economic parameters—I quote my source for that statement. Finally, I said to the minister:

What we are talking about in terms of national energy demand is small in percentage but important in dollars. Windpower, by 2000 A.D., could provide between one per cent and 5 per cent of our total national energy needs. Solar assisted heating of homes and water could by 2,000 A.D. provide between 10 and 15 per cent of our total national needs. Ten per cent of our national energy requirements would cost several billion dollars by 2,000 A.D.

In making these positive proposals I am trying to inject into this debate a constructive idea as to the way in which the minister could balance his budget without going further into deficit. I am proposing incentives in favour of the individual who takes the risk of developing techniques which have been carried out in the laboratory but which still remain to be proven by actual experience in a northern climate. Most of these things have been done in Canada, but still are not proven. Canada should move swiftly into using renewable energy forms in replacement of the non-renewable forms which are being used at the present time.

What will happen from 1985 to 2000 if we continue to drift along utilizing oil, gas, and coal for our energy? Everyone in North America is dependent on those three forms. The cost will rise far beyond what it is today. It will put the United States and Canada into a tremendous deficit position in their international accounts. We are aware of what that means to our balance of payments position and inflation in our country. The danger should be clear from these figures.

Parliament should back the individual who is willing to take a risk providing things in the energy field. His proportion of the total energy field runs to approximately 15 per cent to 20 per cent. What we are doing is no more than what has been done for business. When business invests money in order to make money, that is tax deductible. That same principle should apply to the individual, if he spends money to reduce the amount of oil and gas necessary to heat his home, heat his water, and operate his car.

Our scientists and engineers have produced the ideas, but they are not allowed to go out and sell them. The knowledge contained in the laboratory report must be translated into an object which works, and that object has to be proven. In order to help the minister balance his budget, in order to alleviate the danger ahead as far as our balance of payments is concerned, and in an attempt to help the individual reduce his costs, I put these ideas forward.

We have not distinguished ourselves in the last two stages of this bill, on second reading and committee stage, because closure was used twice. I hope that these ideas will be accepted by the minister, the parliamentary secretary and those who make decisions. Then they can tell the mandarins in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada that these things will be incorporated into the next budget.

I am too late to save this bill because of the attitude of the government at the present time. We will have another budget in two or three months. Perhaps some of the constructive ideas regarding insulation, roll-over, and capital gains can be implemented. This is what parliament is for: we must be allowed to help the government get this country moving, balance its budget, and at the same time help Canadians. If that is the case, some of the dignity and usefulness will be restored to this place.

Some day a minister of finance will come into this House and realize that for the last 30 years every minister of finance has been under the thumbs of the financial advisers of the government. These financial advisers can be dedicated, sincere, and charming, but they do not know what they are doing. They have been consistently wrong for 30 years. This is a year of miracles, because economists are beginning to admit that they do not know what is wrong. The public servants who advise the Minister of Finance have not faced up to this truth. Perhaps it would not hurt to see a minister of finance applying ordinary common sense and a theory slightly different from the one used at present.

I reminded the Minister of Finance that he came from Shawinigan. Surely a person with common sense from Shawinigan has an obligation not to follow the sheep who come from the big city, because they are only taught to obey orders. Canadians would like to see some common sense from Shawinigan. The minister should take over the Department of Finance and be reasonable about some of these changes, not to mention the fact that parliament should operate in a slightly more democratic manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) have dealt extensively with the matter of the government using closure on this bill. I had intended to speak to that point at some length, but I will not, since they have covered it so expertly.

An hon. Member: Do you feel the same way?

Mr. Kempling: I feel the same way as my colleagues, because it is a regressive step for the government to use closure at any time. It was particularly regressive in this instance, because we were beginning to get into the nub of the bill. The government has brought in several amendments, and I am sure many more would have come to light had the debate continued.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment at 10 p.m. are as follows: the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan)—External Affairs—Imprisonment in Soviet Union of Anatoly Sharansky—Efforts to obtain release; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Minister's use of term "national security"; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—Northern Affairs—Proposed construction of highway between Fort McMurray and Fort Smith—Inquiry as to federal aid.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I propose that the House proceed to the consideration of notice of motion No. 8 and that the preceding notices of motions on the order paper be allowed to stand, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before seeking unanimous consent, perhaps this is the right time to regulate the situation which is shown on the order paper where there are motions stood by unanimous consent previously. There is no difficulty in regard to most of these, but there is with respect to the motion of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), which was stood at the request of the government on a previous date. I would not want my ruling of December 5 to be retroactive. I do not know under what condition that motion was stood. Was it because of the practice that has developed, because there was a need for the government to use its right to stand a motion at the request of the government? To put fully into effect my ruling of December 5?

● (1702)

I hope the House will agree that all notations appearing below the motions listed be eliminated and that, starting from today, we ensure that only those motions which are stood at the request of the government, after the refusal of an hon. member to give his unanimous consent to proceeding with those motions, be listed as having been stood at the request of the government as distinct from those which have been stood by unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement then to standing motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5, as requested by the parliamentary secretary, and to proceed with motion No. 8 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SUGGESTION SPECIAL SUB-COMMITTEE INVESTIGATE NEEDS OF HANDICAPPED CITIZENS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should set up a special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, to investigate and report on the needs of Canada's physically and mentally handicapped citizens; in order to provide a basis of information, necessary in avoiding the current costly duplication and overlapping of services, and essential in planning legislation for a comprehensive program of services at the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government to support and supplement the excellent work of voluntary organizations; all with a view to making it possible for the handicapped to live a creative, fruitful and independent life in the family and community, and thereby placing Canada in a position of leadership in the rehabilitation movement in preparation for the XIV World Congress of Rehabilitation International to be held in Winnipeg during June 1980.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think this is about the fourth occasion in the pre-Christmas season that I have had the privilege of bringing in this motion, or a similar motion, before the House of Commons.

I would like to say right at the outset that last year, as an indication of the fact that this motion is basically humanitarian and has no partisan overtones, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) seconded the motion. I am sure the hon. lady is still in sympathy with its purpose. This year I would be very happy if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would second the motion, because again I want to indicate that it is bi-partisan in all respects and also because this is the year that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been specially honoured in the House because of his long years of service. I might also say that he is a representative of the geriatric sector of the population which is becoming one of the largest segments of the population in percentage terms, standing at about 10 per cent and increasing fast.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Also the wisest segment.

Mr. Dinsdale: The resolution that is before the House this afternoon affects very directly the problems of our senior citizens. The reason I like to have it debated in December is that in the Christmas season we are always more responsive and sensitive to humanitarian issues.

Every hon. member is aware of the fact that one of the most popular persons in the rehabilitation movement is Tiny Tim. He represents the large number of children with handicaps. He himself comes from amongst their number and represents them in that successful fund raising program known as the Easter Seal Campaign.

Tiny Tim is associated intimately with Christmas in that famous Christmas story of Scrooge who, in the midst of Christmas activities many years ago, had a change of heart and Scrooge the hard-hearted, turned out to be Scrooge the humanitarian. I hope against hope that this afternoon any reservations that the government might have had in the past with respect to approving this motion will dissolve in the warmth of the Christmas spirit and that today we will be able to obtain unanimous consent for this motion.

It is a very simple motion proposing the setting up of a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to give consideration to the needs of Canada's handicapped population in preparation for the World Congress which will be held in Winnipeg in 1980.

Last year we came within a hair's breadth of having this motion approved. The speakers who took part in the debate at that time all indicated that they were strongly in support of the motion, and the one deterrent was expressed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), who was then parliamentary secretary to the minister of national health and welfare, in the following words:

Mr. Speaker, the motion is an excellent one. I have only one reason for not accepting it at this point. It could have been accepted much earlier. However, we are now only a matter of weeks away from a new social services bill being dealt with in this House.

The handicapped in this country have been studied a great deal. It is now time for action. The bill to be introduced is an action bill. Action for the handicapped in this area will come sooner if we follow the normal procedure rather than setting up this subcommittee.

We know now that action has been deferred. I am not going to harp on that theme this afternoon, but the legislation has disappeared from the order paper. There is a promise in the Speech from the Throne that it will be resurrected.

I believe that in anticipation of this important congress in Winnipeg in 1980 we should get on with the very important business of gathering together all the data that is available so that we will have a comprehensive picture of the rehabilitation situation in this country in time for Canada to host that important congress adequately.

I have the assurance—perhaps that will help the government in making up its mind on this matter—from the government House leader that he sees no impediment to establishing a subcommittee of that kind. Perhaps I should read that assurance from the hon. gentleman into the record again:

● (1712)

As you know, the government will be introducing legislation during this session on the subject of social services, including rehabilitation of the disabled. This bill, after second reading, will be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs where witnesses may be called and every facet of the bill considered. I do not think that anyone would object to the kind of work to which you refer being done at that time, perhaps by a subcommittee.

As I have indicated, the circumstances have changed from last year with respect to the legislation. That is largely because the funding formula has been changed, and it will be necessary to renegotiate the changed formula with the provincial governments, which have ultimate responsibility for the implementation of any legislation of this kind.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, who is now the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson), and who is with us today, indicated in his statement last year that he was in favour of the resolution as it appears on the order paper today. His only concern was that it be integrated with the proposed legislation. I trust that he will continue his support of the resolution today and also see to it that it gets consensus, because I think it is absolutely essential to have the reassurance that Canada was in earnest when it extended its invitation at the World Congress of Rehabilitation in Tel Aviv in 1976 to host the next congress in 1980. We are one year closer to that congress. There are only two years left. The congress will involve 7,000 people from all countries of the world, and it will consider in depth the problems of rehabilitation of the handicapped in all their aspects, including physical and mental handicaps.

There will be a series of seminars in all major centres in the week preceding the congress, which will have a major input in the expansion of knowledge in this field because only the professionals will be involved in the seminars. These will be the various professionals involved in the rehabilitation movement: physiatrists, doctors of physical medicine, social workers, occupational therapists, physiotherapists, psychologists, and other specialists in the field of human relations. There is going to be a post-conference series of seminars throughout North America, so I think hon. members can see that there will be a major breakthrough in the rehabilitation movement.

As I have intimated, the debate last year indicated that there was a misunderstanding of what we are trying to do. We do not want this subcommittee to be set up as a fact finding committee because there is much information available in Canada. It is an attempt to bring it all together. There are at least 48 volunteer agencies which are doing an outstanding job in the field of rehabilitation, but governments have not become too intimately involved in the process up to the present time.

There are rehabilitation centres in every major community of Canada. Recently Nova Scotia opened an excellent rehabilitation facility. A seminar was conducted there under the auspices of the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled. A new organization known as COPOH, the Committee of Provincial Organizations on the Handicapped, has just come into being. An executive director has been appointed. He is a well known leader in the field, Mr. Wilf Race. He has worked for the government in several capacities with respect to handicapped citizens. He is handicapped himself, and he will carry the responsibility for the input of physically handicapped citizens in the rehabilitation movement itself. There are outstanding leaders of international repute. I previously mentioned Dr. Gustave Gingras.

Canada has been accepted as the host country for 1980 because of our outstanding reputation in this respect. We are not trying to indulge in a fact-finding operation. We want to bring all the facts together in a formal report so that it will be available to the people who visit Canada in 1980. There is an upsurge of interest in Canada and all over the world in the problems of the handicapped. The desire for independent living is being expressed at the present time all over the world.

Last week I attended a debate at the United Nations Third Committee where I was asked to make a statement on behalf of Canada with regard to a resolution which very closely parallels the resolution we have before the House today. Canada is a co-sponsor of that resolution, and its intent is to establish an advisory committee—that is the intent of my resolution here—which will sponsor the Year of Rehabilitation which is scheduled to commence in 1981. This will flow out of the congress which will be held in Canada in 1980, so hon. members can see that the two go hand in hand.

Let me quote briefly a short excerpt from the statement I made last Thursday afternoon in the United Nations Third Committee as follows:

> We view the Committee's primary task as that of promoting greater public awareness of the disabled and the problems with which they must cope. For too long they have been ignored by the community or thrust onto the sidelines with a pension and a shrug. There has been the usual discrimination that kept the handicapped people out of sight and out of mind, hidden away in institutions that were little better than human warehouses. Most severely disabled people died at an early age. Those who survived and made it did so through exceptional ability, family resources, hard work or just plain luck.

Then I went on to congratulate the international community for becoming involved in this process. I am sure hon. members will be pleased to know that the resolution passed unanimously—by consensus, as they say—in the United Nations body. Canada was a co-sponsor and took an active part in the debate. It was supported by a series of other countries, and I will name just a few: Algeria, Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Costa Rica, Cuba, Democratic Yemen, Egypt, Finland, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, India, The Philippines, the United States of America, Yugoslavia, and so forth. This resolution was unanimously supported.

The congress will be much more significant in terms of humanitarian causes sponsored in Canada than was the Habitat Conference in Vancouver. We hope that the federal government will give the same financial support to the Rehabilitation Congress as it did to the Habitat Conference because I am sure the results will be much more positive.

In closing let me give some of the priorities, as I see them, as we prepare for the 1980 congress. It is imperative that the new social service legislation be in operation. I picked up a publication at the United Nations last week entitled "Recent Trends in Legislation Concerning Rehabilitation Services for Disabled Persons in Selected Countries." Unfortunately, Canada is not included in this presentation. I think it is important that Canada proceed as quickly as possible with its social service legislation so that we might be in the forefront of leadership in this regard.

The second priority we should establish is an advisory committee to keep the government abreast of developments in the field of rehabilitation in anticipation of the 1980 congress. Advisory committees should be operating at the provincial level as well, and the province of Ontario has already set up such an advisory committee.

The third priority is to provide funds for a resource and information centre. We have all this information and we have all sorts of expertise. We have outstanding leadership as well, but it all needs to be brought together so that it can be readily available for the 6,000 or 7,000 people who will come to Canada looking for leadership in two and a half years. The Department of National Health and Welfare has already sponsored a study through the Chedoke Institute at McMaster, establishing the need for a resource and information centre. It must now assist the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled in setting up such a centre.

Fourth, the government should provide funds for a co-ordinator to assist the Canadian Council for the Disabled in organizing the congress. It will be largely a congress of voluntary agencies supported by the federal government, the provincial government, and the municipal government of Winnipeg. This means it will be people talking to people rather than governments talking to governments, and with this sort of dialogue I think we can achieve positive results.

Finally, we should have a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs bring in a report on much the same basis as the excellent report brought down by the subcommittee that dealt with the problems in Canada's penal system, operating as a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

These are all positive recommendations, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to speak at great length, and I wish to allow other members an opportunity to take part. I hope we will get a consensus for this resolution in the Canadian parliament on the same basis as we achieved unanimous support last Thursday at the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate once again my wholehearted support of the motion presented by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I also want to commend him for the persistence with which he pleads in this House the rights and needs of our disabled people.

The hon. member made some reference to the years that some of us have been here. I believe he is a member of that club himself. In years of service he is about No. 3. There is an advantage to being in this club of members with longevity in that one realizes if he sticks with an issue that is right and just, sooner or later it will be achieved. It is tragic that so many of these issues are won later rather than sooner, but if we have to cope with a government that moves slowly it is a good thing that there are members who stick with an issue until it is won.

I hope today may be the day when the effort of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is rewarded and this House agrees to the motion which simply states that, in the view of the House, the government should arrange for the appointment of the subcommittee to which the hon. member has referred.

It seems to me that to take that position, especially in view of the international congress that is to be held in Winnipeg in 1980, is an important gesture in showing our increased concern for the rights and needs of our disabled people. It is as recent as during the days when Mr. St. Laurent was Prime Minister that the first disabled persons' act was put on the statute books of this country. There was, of course, a blind persons' act many years ago, but the fact is that we have been slow to recognize the rights of this particular group of people at the federal level. We all subscribe to the theory that there should be more equality of opportunity in our society. We tend to think of that in terms of the greater equalization of incomes of people, but it seems to me this is an area where something more than money is required.

Persons with handicaps or disabilities, start the race of life on unequal terms. They deserve not just sympathy or adequate compensation but every possible opportunity for rehabilitation and training so that they can have a life as nearly normal as possible. I think it is fair to say, as has been said by so many people, that civilization is judged very largely by what it does for those who are old or young or handicapped or disabled in various ways. We have made some strides in this direction in this country but they have been too few and are terribly disjointed. Not long ago the Canadian Council on Social Welfare published a volume entitled On Again Off Again, or something like that, about the disjointed nature of the services and legislation for our disabled people.

I do not want to take the time of the House because I should like to see the motion considered and passed, not just given the usual treatment of being talked out. I am pleased that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris brought this forward again. I think this House owes it to the disabled people of Canada and to Canada's good name to get more active in this field than we have been to this point. For that reason I hope the House will agree to pass this motion this afternoon.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At the opening of the debate in this private members' hour Your Honour associated my name as seconder of this motion. I am very proud of the association because I have spoken before in this House on these matters and in support of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I understand it was the intention of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, however, to have the motion seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in order to demonstrate this year, as was demonstrated last year, that the motion enjoys the support of all parties.

If it is possible I should like the unanimous consent of my friends in this House to withdraw my name as seconder and substitute therefor the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre so that this very appropriate indication of support could be made to this House and the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the request made by the seconder of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to make the change and replace the name of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) with the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre agree to second the motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With pleasure.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I take a second to bring to the attention of the House that before voting on this motion or accepting it, something in the motion might have to be changed. The motion is addressed to the government. I think the House of Commons is master of its own committees and the motion should be addressed to the House of Commons. In due course we will come to that aspect of this problem.

● (1732)

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) for bringing this very important matter before the House. He has done it before and has shown a great deal of persistence, and he should be congratulated for his persistence as well. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed that out quite adequately. I would also like to congratulate him on the recommendations that he has suggested in his remarks, which I am sure will be considered very carefully by the government when this whole matter is being considered. Whilst I am handing out accolades, I should mention the tie he is wearing today, which I understand has emblazoned on it a wheelchair, being the symbol for disabled people generally. He is to be commended too for this outward manifestation of his feeling for people who are disabled in this country.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I speak on this motion today because I feel that the government has accomplished much in the field of services for the disabled to date. However, as the country is evolving, the services should also expand to serve a larger target group. Society would benefit more if it could give to all of its members a better quality of life that would lead them to become more independent, to participate in industry and society according to their abilities.

Those considered physically handicapped represent a sizeable 10 per cent of the population, and yet, whenever normalization and integration of this group is discussed, two kinds of barriers are mentioned with respect to the physically handicapped, architectural barriers and attitudinal barriers; and for the mentally and socially handicapped, attitudinal barriers. According to a number of professionals in the rehabilitation field, it is really a toss-up as to which kind of barrier is the most important cause preventing the handicapped from full participation in community life. Many of them, in fact, are convinced that attitudinal barriers are the most pervasive kind of negativism. They feel that eradication of these should be a first priority.

In connection with attitudinal barriers facing the handicapped, a Canadian researcher, A. Ruth Hilland, in an article published in Rehabilitation Digest of February 1975, suggests that the roots of this prejudice lie in the fact that society values people because they have social standing, wealth, beauty, are active, useful, productive and efficient. When such criteria are applied to the handicapped it is surprising that they are devalued. She feels that before our attitudes with respect to the handicapped can be changed, society's values must be changed. I quote from her statement as follows:

And should it not be possible for differences not to lessen a person's worth, not to mean that he should be treated as 'less than human'? A change in attitude on the part of the non-disabled will come about through increased exposure to the disabled.

She stresses that the exposure should be "normal". In other words, people must see the handicapped every day in normal situations; in the classroom, in ordinary jobs, housing, neighbourhood, clubs, communities, using ordinary transportation and so on. Entertainment channels, she feels, are also a good source of depicting the physically unattractive as esteemed, valued and respected, such as the television serial we have all become acquainted with entitled "Ironside".

The handicapped have always wanted, and are now demanding, respect of their basic rights: the right to rehabilitation, the right to work, and the right to be integrated into society. The handicapped person needs others to understand and to truly realize that he is a person like any other with the same requirement to love and to be loved, to work and enjoy himself, and the ability to overcome his handicap if he is given the necessary technical aids. The sentiment is strongly reinforced by a comment made by Jacques Couillard, the Director of Social Rehabilitation at the Quebec Workers' Compensation Board, and I quote:

Each time that we put the handicapped apart, each time that we treat him differently, we do not help the way he views himself nor the way the public views him . . . instead we make his job of integrating himself into society even more difficult.

This statement is most real to those handicapped individuals confined to institutions, most often homes for the retarded, the aged, or the chronically ill. Granted, they are treated, housed and fed, but nothing else. Is it any wonder, then, that an alderman who lived in an institution in Thunder Bay was first in line for a place in a "group home", an alternative concept in housing, preferable by far to these disabled individuals who do not require nursing care. The disabled want and are entitled to live with dignity and as independently as possible. But more adequate housing fulfils only part of the need; it is also necessary to provide these persons with the services required to live independently. They might include the following:

1. Attendant care to permit a disabled person to perform such activities as dressing and bathing.

2. Day care services for those who work and have family responsibilities.

3. Homemaker services.

4. Meals on wheels.

5. Recreation services.

6. Adequate transportation services.

7. Access to all community services and employment.

It is possible for the provinces, at the present time, to provide a number of these services through the Canada Assistance Plan, in particular, day care services, homemaker services, and meals on wheels, when the recipient is a person in need. The disabled, however, are also quick to remind governments that programs in Sweden, for instance, indicate that it often costs less to provide a person with the services necessary to make him independent than it does to maintain him in an institution. For example, when our older population experience difficulty in keeping their homes going, they frequently have no choice but to move into an institution where they could be separated.

No institution can provide the warm, comfortable, normal day-to-day life we all become used to. Disruption of this pattern of life tends to destroy the life of older folks. There are more disadvantages. They have found that a lack of privacy is the worst thing about institutions, especially when it is combined with a feeling of solitude; life then becomes hardly worth living. This situation was portrayed vividly in a film from the National Film Board shown recently on French television and entitled "Au bout de mon âge" by George Dufaux.

Many handicapped persons are looking forward to the day when they will be able to return to or join the labour market. Employment to the majority of the handicapped means a regular pay cheque and independence. They do not want special treatment; they want jobs that society accepts as valid work. In essence, the handicapped call for greater employment opportunities within a broader range of formats. They want a job and a chance to prove themselves; they also ask that their abilities and not their disabilities be stressed.

At the Employability of the Handicapped Conference held in Toronto in November 1976, one of the most frequent remarks was that employers in diverse trades and work situations found handicapped individuals to be among some of their best employees—dependable, honest, self-starting and hard working. Despite this well established fact, handicapped people still often find themselves hampered by the attitudes of personnel officers, the physical barriers in many work places, problems of transportation, and by a general lack of awareness of what they can do. Welfare rolls are swollen by handicapped persons who are far from being there by choice but yet have not been able to find any work. Estimates for reducing the welfare rolls paid for by our tax dollars through employment of handicapped individuals range as high as 40 per cent. Only a small segment of the physically handicapped is incapable of working. In a society as technologically advanced as ours, work is no longer defined in terms of physical labour.

The motion now before the House deals mainly with the needs of the physically handicapped. The mentally handicapped, the mentally retarted in particular, have the same need for community integration. Why confine them to expensive institutions and pay for their upkeep when they could be in the labour force earning their own living and or participating in their community's development? In 1967, the Department of National Health and Welfare authorized a special mental retardation fund of $2,500,000 to be allocated over five years to health and welfare research and demonstration projects. In addition, support for research has been made available under the public health research grant. The Canadian Association of Mental Retardation receives sustained assistance in the form of an annual operating grant from the federal government and assistance from the provincial governments.

They will be studying, over a period of time, the actual operation of model systems of community services for the mentally retarded in order to arrive at sound decisions concerning the mechanisms and timing of transfer from institutional to communal living. Great interest has, I know, been aroused in the pilot program in Lethbridge, Alberta and its progress will, it is hoped, chart guidelines for the future development of services to the mentally handicapped in Canada.

● (1742)

With regard to employment, it is very unfortunate that a large percentage of retarded adults are embarrassed about working in sheltered workshops and are discouraged by the low status jobs they must do. Employment plays an important role in their life and contributes in many ways to self-confidence and self-esteem. The kind of training they receive often does not prepare them for a regular job. I am sure that there are many valuable and meaningful jobs retarded adults can do and should be encouraged to do. I strongly believe that we should establish proper training programs which will prepare and encourage them to undertake a rewarding job. Consider for a moment that mental retardation is one of the major handicapping conditions of childhood, and is one of the most common disabilities.

"The question of income maintenance", states a brief presented by the National Steering Committee of the Physically Disabled, "has been an issue of great concern to Canada's physically disabled population for decades". The advent of the Canada Pension Plan and the Canada Assistance Plan in the mid-sixties provided the disabled with income to meet their basic needs.

The disabled have pointed out, however, that their basic needs are not the same as those of the non-disabled and that, in fact, "any disability", as one of them said, "is a luxury I can ill afford". The same brief explains that the question of protecting a disabled person's income from the erosion of costs incurred as a direct result of the disability is as important as the income itself and has equal applicability to those in receipt of social allowances as it does to those who are able to provide for themselves. For example, many physically disabled persons are capable of accepting remunerative employment, but the costs of transportation to and from work, if the individual cannot use public transportation or buy his own car, may be so high as to make employment unprofitable.

To assess the impact of inexpensive, reliable transportation services for the disabled in terms of employability alone would be an impractical task, and to assess the impact of such a service on other areas of a handicapped person's life would be downright impossible. What I am saying is that this service is not a special favour to the handicapped but a necessity, a right.

As most hon. members are now aware, a block financing proposal has recently been made to the provinces to cover the costs of social services including transportation services for the disabled. It represents the substituting of one financing arrangement, namely block funding, for another, the conditional shared cost arrangement associated with the new social services legislation, Bill C-57.

Under the block financing arrangement, the provinces will have more latitude in deciding upon those services which may be funded with the assistance of the federal contribution. It will be the prerogative of the provinces to establish the criteria for eligibility as well as for the specific needs identified within their respective communities.

In the event that the block financing approach is adopted, it will be made clear that one of the purposes of increased federal financing is to support the development and expansion of social services which respond more adequately to the needs of the mentally and physically handicapped and various other groups.

Canada's disabled are entitled to a more "normal", a more equal and a happier lot within our society. Adequate social services legislation is just one step toward achieving this goal.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of standing, but when I noticed that another member from the government was going to stand, I became a little concerned because this is the type of motion we can all easily support.

As has been pointed out by my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is a mentor of mine and, I think, of a good many members of this House, this motion is not a demand but only an expression of the opinion of this House. Therefore, I wanted to stand up for one or two minutes to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who I believe is talking about leadership from the federal level.

The hon. member is trying to have us understand that we must create a climate of acceptance in terms of our handicapped and disabled. We at the federal level must create a climate for concern and a climate for action. This is what he has done in his motion, which states we should set up a subcommittee.

Canada will be the host country in 1980, as I understand it, to some 7,000 people from across the world who have the same kind of concern that the parliamentary secretary just delineated with some emotion. We all have the experience of associating with handicapped people who, in my humble opinion, are seeking equality of opportunity. We all have handicap clubs within our constituencies. I have been very fortunate to attend some of these and have been very impressed with what I have seen. I have been very involved in trying to bring their concerns to my fellow citizens who are more fortunate.

What we are trying to do here is to indicate that there should be leadership from the federal government. In fact, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) indicated there was a study on his desk which states that it is time for action, time for the federal government to show its concern by bringing the handicapped into the public service. This is a very commendable suggestion which we hope will be looked at by the President of Treasury Board.

As the hon. members indicates in his motion, we are trying to make it possible for the handicapped to live a creative, fruitful and independent life in the family and community. Like many people, they do not want handouts or welfare. They believe they have the physical and mental capacity to be productive. That is the message they are bringing to us.

In conclusion, I say without any hesitation or reservation that there is a skilled bank in the ranks of our handicapped, mental and disabled from which we have not had sufficient withdrawals. Those are not my words; I have heard that sentiment expressed. It is very touching and moving.

This motion of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris must have our support. The hon. member has had this motion before the government on three, four or five occasions. He must have that support and this sub-committee must be set up in order that we can delve into this vey important matter, hopefully to come up with the required solutions so that these very productive Canadians have an opportunity to be even more productive than they are now.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking my friend, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart), for allowing me to take a moment of time that was designated to him to indicate my support and enthusiasm for the resolution.

I hope that if a subcommittee is set up and it embarks on this work, it will be very cautious about adopting ideologies with regard to treatment of the handicapped. Those of us who watch events taking place in the United States will be aware of a federal law recently passed which is in the process of implementation now. It is referred to in the trade by the nickname "mainstreaming".

Mainstreaming of the handicapped, particularly handicapped young people, involves removing them from institutions and putting them back into the general community schools. The theory is that in the general community they will learn to integrate better. They will avoid the isolation that comes from being educated and growing up only with the handicapped.

As much as this is an interesting idea, an idea that in the case of many, many handicapped people should be pursued, I want to warn the House and indicate to hon. members that it is extremely dangerous to move so rapidly from one ideology to another. Surveys and studies are indicating now that these institutions which are being abandoned have indeed worked very well for the majority of people who have gone through them.

● (1752)

As for the small minority which might be capable of "mainstreaming", the benefits to them might be outweighed by other factors, for example, the lack of the individual attention or special consideration available to them in schools or institutions specifically set up to serve their needs.

I wish the hon. member well. I hope a committee of this sort could be launched to do the work he has in mind. I hope, too, that it will learn from the mistakes of the United States, that it will not swing from one ideology to another but adopt a middle course and be guided by the many years of experience, both good and bad, which are available to those dealing with the handicapped.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so ably pointed out about a year ago in debate in this House:

> One of the ways to measure a society is to see what it does for the less fortunate. The more we do for the disabled and the more we give them the chance to live normal, natural lives, the better is our society.

Access is the key toward promoting this normal, natural life for the disabled. Barrier-free environments benefit everyone. Studies of improved access to the University of Chicago showed that 80 per cent of non-disabled students chose to use the new entrances. Insurance companies report that buildings which have been made accessible to the handicapped by using non-skid surfaces, freely opening doors, suitable step dimensions, and so on, have shown a decreased accident rate for all users.

People in special categories are people who work, pay taxes, answer summonses, and are asked to contribute to voluntary organizations. Too often, however, they are not able to get into places of business, into the office where tax errors can be discussed, into the building where the traffic fine is to be paid, or into the church or "Y" where they would like to participate.

I have said nothing about the inaccessibility of places of education and employment. In view of these facts of life, is it any wonder that somewhat close to 40 per cent of the handicapped are unemployed—note, I did not say unemployable. That this figure is not higher is a credit to the determination, ingenuity and ambitions of those disabled individuals who continue to function in society in spite of the fact that at times it seems to be designed to frustrate and discourage them.

The latest available statistics show that the number of people age 20 to 64 injured in car accidents alone in Ontario increased from 54,053 in 1971 to 62,018 in 1975. This is an increase of approximately 12.5 per cent. Though there is no way of calculating how many were permanently handicapped, it can safely be assumed that a substantial number of these people have been disabled to the extent that they must now depend more on society for aid in the activities of daily living than they ever did before their injury. The enormity of this problem is put in more tangible perspective when you consider that one is seven people in this country cope daily with some form of handicap which significantly affects not only the style, but the quality of their lives.

It is not possible to calculate the number of lives that could be positively revitalized and the amount of potential that could be freed by simply making every building, every facility, and every area of a given community, accessible. Total and automatic accessibility must be recognized as essential before the quality of life available to able bodied individuals can also be truly shared by the handicapped.

Some may say, "This is an ideal, a dream; that it is simply too expensive to consider the concept of total accessibility". Is it? In 1967 a cost study report in the United States conducted on a one-story building on a level site, a multi-story on a sloping site, and so on, showed a range of 0 to 2.5 per cent increase to accommodate the handicapped, with a saving in one case. The increase was less than 1 per cent unless an elevator had to be added.

The National Research Council of Canada has maintained since 1963 a standing committee on building standards for the handicapped which updated the standards issued with every new issue of the national building code. It is presently called supplement No. 5; a new code was issued in the summer of 1975. This supplement has been adopted by the government of Canada for new buildings but not for buildings which it leases. A number of provinces and cities have also adopted the supplement or are in the process of developing their own provisions or expanding on the established codes, using supplement No. 5 as a guideline. For example, the social planning and review council of B.C. has a committee on architectural barriers which prepares reports and briefs and encourages the adoption of its version of the supplement. This demonstrates the dynamic and growing involvement of each province with the problems of accessibility and the fact that access is the right of everyone.

The handicapped simply "want in". They "want in" to employment, to community living, to maximum participation in community life, to the planning of systems and services designed to help them. At the same time, they "want out"—out of institutions, out of dead-end sheltered workshops, out of welfare, out of being pitied, out of being thrust on to the sidelines with a pension—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has made it clear that she is dedicated to aiding, and, indeed, most anxious to aid, the disabled in their desire to leave the institutions, to achieve integration and to becme full and contributing participants in Canadian society. All of us here will have a part in the achievement of this goal in our capacity as legislators. For this reason it is my pleasure to commend the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) for having proposed this motion. It is the type of motion, the type of sentiment, which will focus the awareness of all members on such things as barriers.

Some hon. Members: Carried!

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): It is not, however, by means of a subcommittee that this should be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time allotted to the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying at five o'clock, one of the tragedies of this bill is not what is in the bill but what is missing. It is an act to amend the Income Tax Act, and it could have been used as a lever to get the economy moving. Whatever plan is brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the months ahead most assuredly will contain amendments to the Income Tax Act.

I was shocked to see in one of the major newspapers a headline referring to plant closings and lay-offs. We read more and more about inflation, plants closing, unemployment, increased trade deficits and a staggering balance of payments deficit. We had an inflation psychology before, and now we have the reverse of that in our economy today. People are reading and seeing so much about gloom in the economy that it affects decisions which should be made in conducting business. When one looks at manufacturing industries in Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec where the bulk of them are located, and when one looks at the trade deficits those companies face, which are estimated to amount to $11.5 billion by the end of this fiscal year, one realizes that industry is eroding.

In 69-70 the trade deficit in manufactured goods was approximately $1.5 billion. From 1972 the trade deficit increased to a point where it was better than $10 billion in 1976, and unfortunately it is estimated to be $11.5 billion in 1977. The budget should have had provisions which would be beneficial to the manufacturing trade, but there is little for them. There is a great deal of discussion about low productivity in Canada, but little in the bill to offset that.

Some people regard productivity as a matter of labour, but it is also capital availability, interest costs, energy costs, management expertise, labour talents, transportation costs, machinery efficiency and the kind and quality of research and development. All of these things play a part in productivity. The $11.5 billion deficit is directly connected with research and development in Canada.

Comparisons have been made between Canada and Japan, and Canada and Germany. In Japan in 1969-70, something in the order of 26 per cent of the GNP was spent on research and development, new plants and machinery. Today they are reaping the benefit of that decision and action. The investment tax benefit in Quebec is 7.5 per cent, in the Maritimes it is 10 per cent, and in the rest of Canada it is 5 per cent. When it is looked at closely, the investment tax credit for research and development is also subject to tax. It is like the insulation tax: the grant is given and then it is taken away. In this case the same thing is being done. The net income from the 5 per cent investment tax, when it is netted out, is approximately 2.5 per cent.

Once again we see the government dealing in sleight of hand taxation. It announces a tax incentive and then taxes that tax incentive. In the case of research and development, people will find that in practice they must deduct from their research and development the 5 per cent investment tax credit before they calculate their tax, and then they must deduct the investment tax credit from the tax payable. The net effect is that they get only half the rate the government says they will get. I say that is absolute fraud. Many decisions are going to be made by some people who will not look very closely into this or discuss it with their auditors. Many decisions are going to be made based on the fact that people will feel they are going to get 5 per cent, 7.5 per cent or 10 per cent investment tax benefits, but they will not. They will realize that when they make up their income tax returns next time around.

It is like the insulation grant. The government makes grants because of the energy crisis and comes along after and taxes part of those grants away. The problems facing Canada are real and deep, and the solutions should not be saved or stored for some appropriate political time. That is what is happening now.

The government could have put into Bill C-11 many measures which would have stopped the disastrous attitude which is being instilled and the doom which is abroad in the country today. The government could have stopped a good deal of that with a little bit of blue sky in the budget speech or in Bill C-11, but it is not there; and judging from what we hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all others who speak on these matters, we cannot look forward to a tax cut, in spite of the recommendations of major organizations in this country such as the Economic Council of Canada, the Conference Board, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. All these organizations have recommended tax cuts at the sales tax level, at the corporate level and at the personal income tax level. Why has the government not done this? We see the disaster which is upon us in the resource industries and the difficulty our mining industry is in right now. We are now beginning to feel the effects of the 1974 double taxation which was imposed by a former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, and much of our mining industry is in serious trouble today and will be in the future.

Where will employment be created? The government says that new employment initiatives have to come from industry. What is there for industry? There are no particular tax benefits. As I said, the research and development tax credit is a sham. It is only half of what the government says it is, when it is worked out. If industry is to be required to employ the unemployed in this country, it will need much more stimulation than that. That additional stimulation should have been in the budget. There should have been some stimulation for the manufacturing sector of our economy.

It is estimated that if our economy grows at an annual rate of 5.5 per cent, it will take something in the order of five years to bring our rate of unemployment down from its present 8.7 per cent to 7 per cent. There is a tremendous job to be done. At a time when our plants are operating at 80 per cent capacity the government introduces a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act and has even suggested that the committee hearings on that legislation be limited. This is the wrong time to introduce that type of legislation. Every major economic body in Canada has suggested to the government that there be a major cut, particularly in sales tax and in personal income tax.

The submissions of the Economic Council of Canada, the Conference Board, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association all agree that personal and business tax cuts are needed. They all agree that retail sales tax should be reduced and in some cases removed. They all agree that productivity must be improved if we are to compete in the marketplace in the months ahead.

To the business community the picture facing us is pretty dismal. We are not competitive in any of the minerals we are selling. We have seen what has happened in the nickel industry, and it is suggested that the copper and iron ore industry could be in as much trouble in the months ahead. We have some difficulties in the agricultural industry. They may right themselves, but they are there. Only a few years ago we controlled the world's nickel supply. We had about 95 per cent of it in our hands, and now that share is down to about 40 per cent.

In view of this situation I would have thought that the government would have used this last budget to do something about the double taxation on our minerals. Depending upon which province is involved, that taxation runs anywhere from 85 per cent to 100 per cent. In one province that taxation was over 100 per cent until the residents there saw to it that the government of the day was turned out. We face a tremendous balance of payments problem, and the amount of money that is going into investment in industry is shrinking each month. I wonder why the government contributes to organizations like the Economic Council of Canada and then does not heed its recommendations. I read with a great deal of interest the 14th Annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada. One recommendation which is found at page 87 of the report is as follows:

> We recommend that, over the next two fiscal years, the federal and provincial governments implement permanent personal income tax cuts that would increase the annual disposable incomes of consumers by a total of $2 billion in addition to reductions resulting from indexation.

At page 88 we find the following recommendation:

> We recommend that provinces reduce their sales taxes by at least 1 percentage point on taxable consumer goods and services other than such items as gasoline, alcohol, and cigarettes.

Recommendation No. 4 at page 91 is as follows:

> We recommend that the federal government, together with representative organizations, establish appropriate advisory and consultative mechanisms (with adequate staff resources) to examine serious long-term structural issues.

The following remarks are very appropriate and are as follows:

> It is possible to move the economy back to a more desirable growth path, but this will require structural change as well as demand stimulation. Even with the initiatives that we are suggesting, unemployment rates will probably not fall below 7 per cent until after 1980. Inflation will persist roughly in line with the inflation rates of Canada's major trading partners. Without improvement in this country's capacity to control costs and improve productivity, we face the prospect of persistent overall government deficits, no improvement in current account balances, and rising foreign indebtedness. Neither federal nor provincial governments will have much flexibility for new expenditure programs. A concerted effort to improve the structure of the Canadian economy over the medium term is obviously needed.

● (2022)

They finally conclude:

> The Council believes that Canadians and Canadian Institutes can cope with the challenges foreseen. This task will require a realistic assessment of problems; it will require imagination to perceive opportunities; it will require confidence to achieve change; and it will require greater trust and understanding among the different groups in the Canadian economy.

How true that is and how wise that group of people was to put those words into the report. The tragedy is that no one on the government side appears to be listening and the shame is that they do not seem to care.

I know that some other of my colleagues want to contribute to this debate and I have said what I wanted to say. I am unhappy with the progress of this budget; I am unhappy with the fact that closure was imposed on the debate; I am unhappy that more was not done. There was plenty of time between the introduction of the budget last March and the introduction of this bill when many things could have been put into the ways and means motion, but the government saw fit to do less than nothing on it.

I am particularly unhappy that the minister has not seen fit to come forward with a concrete plan. In fact, he seems to be telegraphing to the community at large that nothing will be done about taxation; we will have the same level of taxation in the months ahead. He says there will be no personal income tax cut and no business tax cut.

We see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) arranging a conference of first ministers, and one wonders what they are going to talk about. One of the commentators today said there cannot be too much to that conference because the press and the media will be allowed to see what is going on, which in itself is a change of base. The other comment was that the letter of invitation which went out to the first ministers was 11 pages long. The Prime Minister had not much to say in those 11 pages. We are drifting and floating.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) was in Toronto a few months ago. Speaking to a business group he said that if the business community was not prepared to increase its investment and create more jobs, the government was going to do it. When we look at the mess in the Post Office, I wonder who on the government side will do this.

Look at Air Canada, and at the mess in CNR and DREE. You name it, Mr. Speaker, there is hardly a department in government that has not some real problems. These are the people who plan to bring the Canadian economy back into some semblance of order. I do not think they have the horse sense on the other side to do it. These are the people in the main who got us into this mess and I cannot see them getting us out. The only way in which I can show my indignation over the lack of action is to say that when the vote comes, I do not intend to support the bill.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, thank God we are on third reading of the bill so that we do not have to consider it clause by clause; but I think it is important that the appropriate place to have considered the bill clause by clause was during the debate in committee.

The matters which I wish to speak about have been, to some extent, untouched as a result of the closure motion which was imposed on the debate. It is really a sad comment upon the way we do business in this place that somehow we cannot find a rational way of examining something which is as important as a tax bill. Perhaps we could spend less time on some legislation, but surely a tax bill deserves an intensive and meaningful examination by experts in the House, members of parliament who specialize in this matter, with a committee of people considering it over an extensive period of time. We should all have a look at the procedures in this place so that we do not keep running into the problem of our most important piece of legislation going through by default. That is exactly what will happen this week with regard to the bill, I am sure.

The purpose behind any income tax legislation from time immemorial has been the redistribution of income. Along with that question of redistributing income, the spin-off from that has been that we use it as a lever in the economy to increase employment or to cure whatever ills there may be from time to time. There is no question that today unemployment is the key problem right across the country. When you examine the fiscal approach to income tax which this government has displayed you find that this legislation will have a negative effect on employment creation.

I want to deal with that a little more extensively, but before doing so I would like to take a look at what we have been doing over the last 10 or 15 years with regard to our fiscal approach to income tax. Since the Second World War most modern western industrial governments have been engaged in creating what I think is probably improperly called the welfare state. We have attempted, through income tax and through various welfare schemes, to redistribute income. It has been the conventional wisdom amongst all political parties that in fact it is desirable that we provide for those who live in our society more equality of income; in short, that we provide more at the bottom and, if possible and necessary, reduce the incomes of those at the top.

In fact, in 1951 when professor Gillespie of Carleton University did an extensive study of this, the poorest fifth of our population accounted for 4.4 per cent of the money income in Canada. In that same year the richest fifth were taking 42.8 per cent of the money income in Canada. Twenty-five years later, after the alleged progressive income tax bill, after significant changes in the old age pension, significant changes in family allowance and significant changes in unemployment insurance, in 1975 the poorest fifth of our population has had their share of the money income reduced to 3.9 per cent and the richest fifth of the population has continued to take 42.4 per cent of the money income. After all these years we have not changed the relationship between the poorest and the richest in Canada.

We have, of course, increased the pay packet. How much real increase there has been is debatable, but the increase in the pay packet has not been the problem. The problem in Canada continues to be the disparity in incomes between regions and between people, and this particular bill not only does not redress this problem, as I will argue, but it makes the problem considerably worse because of the tax provisions, particularly under RRSPs and child care deductions. It continues to redistribute income in reverse by giving those with higher incomes the largest benefits.

We have not had very much in original throught from the government in terms of income tax changes. In the United States we have had the new administration, the Carter administration, starting to examine some of the realities of income tax. One of these realities is something referred to as the three-martini lunch.

● (2032)

Mr. Kempling: The three-beer lunch.

Mr. Leggatt: The three-beer lunch is equally deductible if you are lucky enough to be a businessman. If we look at the present deduction provisions in Canada, the amount of revenue that is lost as a result of those unreal deductions—deductions that are only marginally connected to the question of whether they were incurred in the course of doing business—we could find that the amount of tax we would have to impose on the average or lower level taxpayer could be substantially reduced. I agree with those who say we have to plug the loopholes that lead to waste in public expenditures, but let us remember there is also waste in the private sector.

As I travel across Canada at public expense and see my friends who travel from Vancouver to Toronto and back to attend important meetings, I am not always convinced that such meetings are necessary. If they were not tax deductible there would not be so many. As a result, companies would have more profit, or more money to invest in employment, or, as the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) suggested, in research and development.

We have to look at the three-martini lunch in this country too. We have to look at a tax structure which shows the operator of a Shell gas station paying a lot of tax whilst the Shell company pays almost none. The operator wonders about the tax system that allows major multinational oil companies to escape with massive deferred taxes whilst he pays through the nose. Those are some of the changes that have not been examined, Mr. Speaker.

If we went back to the Carter Commission principle and decided to tax money as it flows, from whatever source, we could begin to have a genuinely progressive tax system. We have built in so many exemptions, so many anomalies, so many devices that were apparently justified at the time they were argued for, we have given in to so many pressure groups, that only accountants can understand the statute and sometimes not even they.

We have a tax system which lacks principle and lacks a theme. The real tragedy of the rejection of the Carter report is that we could have begun to provide some principle to back up the income tax system. Carter said we should not make distinctions between types and sources of income. When we rejected that principle I believe we also rejected our capacity to redistribute income in Canada. As long as we continue to permit anomalies and loopholes, they continue to exist in a graduated tax scheme, to the advantage of those at the upper end of the tax scale.

If in the last 20 years we compare the percentage of income tax paid by the corporate sector and the personal sector, the corporate sector continues to pay less and less of the total. I offer the following examples. In 1961, 30.5 per cent of the total revenues of the federal government came from personal income tax and 22.7 per cent from corporate income tax. In 1976 the personal sector was paying 43.5 per cent and the corporate sector share dropped to 15.7 per cent. That argues for a further examination of the way we tax.

Since I am arguing in favour of the Carter position, I should point out it was also his position that we should integrate entirely personal and corporate tax. Instead of having a 20 per cent dividend credit, Carter argued that the entire scheme could be integrated. I could accept that as rationalizing the tax system as long as those rates were genuinely progressive.

What we have had is a tax system which has not redistributed income because in the corporate area the capacity for deductions is almost endless. People in business have a tremendous scope and range in their deductions. If we eliminated corporate taxes, if we integrated it entirely, as long as it was progressive and redistributed income in Canada—which it does not—then I would say Carter was on the right track.

We talk about the person who runs a gas station, works long hours and pays what he believes to be an unfair tax and what I believe to be an unfair tax. The total amount of deferred tax from the oil sector alone—and I am only talking about major companies—is $1,036 million. That kind of money would go a long way toward a guaranteed annual income. If we do not think about moving toward a guaranteed annual income or a refund of tax credit, then nothing is going to be done about unemployment. The idea that unemployment is something out there is a vacuum does not work. Unemployment is created when there is a lack of purchasing power over a large section of the community. It grows like a snowball, and each time someone is laid off, the consuming public is reduced by one.

When the president of Ford Motors asked Walter Reuther what he was going to do when the plant was automated, he replied that he did not see that as the problem. He said, "Who are you going to sell cars to when nobody is working in the plant?" We have to adjust the income tax system to provide purchasing power for people at the low end of the income scale. When you help people of low income you are doing more to spur the economy than at any other level. Someone earning $7,000 or less will spend tax credits if they are made refundable. The money will go back into the economy for food and essentials and thus is a spur to the economy. This income tax bill fails to look seriously not merely at the distribution of wealth but at the whole question of creating employment.

In 1974—and I am sure the latest figures are worse—there were 252 people in Canada with incomes of over $50,000, who paid no tax whatsoever. Under the provisions of the Income Tax Act this was perfectly legitimate. But I would like to examine the equity of each and every one. I think that those who have consistently paid their tax, have not looked for loopholes and have not gone for setting off holding companies etc., to pay their tax, have a right to be represented in this place when 252 people pay no income tax whatsoever.

Of people who file income tax returns, the lowest 70 per cent receive 40 per cent of the tax subsidy benefit. The top 11 per cent get what is an incredible 33 per cent. That has been the effect of what has been alleged to be a progressive income tax system. The National Council of Welfare estimates the federal government lost $6.4 billion in revenue as a result of the exemptions and loop holes, and all of the funny little things that had been built into this system as a result of lobbyists from one part of the community or the other. If you had that $6.4 billion you would not have to worry. You would have a guaranteed annual income scheme. You would not need to worry about it in the future. That represents something like 20 per cent of the federal budget. There is not much question that we have not been redistributing income in Canada.

When the RRSP system came in, people ran around and said, "Good, we have this nice tax shelter for the average guy instead of somebody who is really well off". The facts are the reverse. People of average income get almost no benefit whatsoever from the RRSP.

Mr. Baker: What income did you say?

Mr. Leggatt: About $12,000. This provision of the income tax cost Canadians in revenue $513 million. That is another provision which not only does not redistribute income, it redistributes it in reverse. For example, if you were earning less than $5,000, your tax saving with an RRSP would be $1.02. If you are earning over $20,000, your tax saving is $551.88. So on a dollar basis the RRSP has done a wonderful job of making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

I agree it is desirable to try to keep Canadian capital at home to encourage Canadian savings. But this is the wrong way to go about it. It does not make any kind of contribution. At the moment Canadians are saving as if it were going out of style. The problem is not Canadians saving; the problem is Canadians are not spending. To move the economy forward, Canadians must spend. Ask any bank manager or credit union manager and they will tell you savings were never better. But they are also finding that foreclosures were never more frequent than they are right now. Funds that people are now starting to squirrel away must be shaken loose in terms of consumption, not in terms of capital investment, because as so many speakers have indicated before in this House we have lots of unused capacity. There is not much point in increasing our capacity. What we need to do is increase our purchasing power.

The next area of income redistribution in reverse is the provision for child care deductions. Those deductions have been doubled under the bill. The child maximum is now $1,000, rather than $500, and the per family maximum goes up from $2,000 to $4,000. If you are at a $10,000 income level, a $1,000 deduction is worth a tax saving of $210. If you are in a $50,000 income category it is worth $430. Exactly the same process. Those with the highest incomes receive the most benefit from this particular tax legislation and those with the lowest incomes receive the least benefit. I see the Parliamentary Secretary shaking his head. In fact, that is unassailable logic. There is really no argument that can be presented with regard to that particular provision.

What can we do? What are the positive things that we can do in terms of making this bill a progressive bill?

An hon. Member: Scrap it.

Mr. Leggatt: First of all, it has been said many times that we have $1.2 billion in tax concessions. If we took that $1.2 billion and put it in at the lower level as a tax credit, we could create 100,000 to 150,000 jobs in Canada as a result of increased demand. Again, that should go in the form of tax credits. In other words, let the person who does not have sufficient income to pay tax file a return and receive a refund cheque. That cheque will be spent as soon as it is received, and it will be spent on the products of manufacturers who are crying for purchasers. They are not crying for any more tax hand-outs. They have all the tax hand-outs they need, and they have not done anything. They have not created any employment. But it will create employment if we provide people with purchasing power at the low end who will spend it on essentials—food, clothing and furniture.

The $400 million capital works program was supposed to create 60,000 jobs. That is the same program that was in place in 1971, and is as cautious and as conservative as anyone can get. We have moved so far right in this country that even that one does not appeal and it makes the Conservatives blush when it is rejected by a Liberal government.

We have $500 million allocated to housing and urban transit. That is hardly revolutionary. Certainly the urban transit section was promised in the last election and I am sure we will have it promised again in the next election. There is one thing the government does not like, and that is to waste a promise by keeping it; they like to make the same one over again.

Last but not least, there is $50 million assistance to the small businessmen. Let me tell the government what they are doing to the small businessman in my community. If I want to buy textiles or shoes made in central Canada, I am happy as a Canadian to pay a tariff to keep workers working in Ontario and Quebec, and to some extent in the Maritimes. But what I object to is when the government not only puts a tariff on such goods, but puts a quota on them as well. This means you cannot bring goods into the country, no matter what the price is. In British Columbia the people of the lower mainland say: "Well, if that is what you are going to do I will just go to Bellingham and buy it, because it is available there." Who suffers? The small businessman in my community who cannot bring those products into his store but whose competitors do across the border.

We complain about Canadians being competitive. Here we are with a provision which denies the merchants of the lower mainland an opportunity to compete with the people across the border—at any price. Many people purchasing goods in British Columbia would be happy to pay more if they could obtain the product, but they cannot. I can recite a whole range of products that are not available because of this dumb quota system that has been imposed. It has driven the small businessman absolutely round the bend in British Columbia. What happens when we in British Columbia stand and say we will pay the tariff, but at least let us bring the goods in? When I asked the Prime Minister the other day about where we were going to build our ships in our twenty-ship replacement program, why, we are going to buy six of them abroad! We are not going to use the shipyards in British Columbia or Nova Scotia. We are going to go abroad for that. British Columbians are tired of that kind of attitude. We are willing to pay the price of being Canadian, but do we have to pay double? That is what we are going to do. Canadian workers and Canadian shipyards are not being used sufficiently to build those ships. We will not merely be paying more for products that are being protected, but we do not even allow our merchants a decent chance to compete with their competitors across the border. That is an example of the industrial strategy that this government exercises.

● (2052)

The last thing I want to deal with is an idea that is long overdue. That is the question of a refundable tax credit system. Call it a guaranteed annual income. Call it anything you want. Almost every province in Canada has gone on record as favouring a refundable tax system. I can go through the provinces, starting with British Columbia which did a study in August 1977. I quote from page 2 of the August 1977 study of that cautious and conservative government:

> The province of British Columbia recommends, therefore, that the premiers appoint a committee representing all provinces to inquire into the basis upon which a refundable tax credit scheme could be developed and implemented for all Canadians.

The point is the same. A tax credit or tax refundable system puts money in the hands of those who will spend it, and will start getting this economy back on its feet. As long as we have this dog in the manger attitude, this completely cautious, unchanged attitude in terms of the way this government treats income tax, we cannot spur the economy. Another example is the cautious Ontario Conservative government, and I quote:

> —the recently announced federal tax credit of $50 per child is a further improvement to the current structure—because the value of this reduction is generally independent of income. However, the credit is not refundable, and so its advantage to low-income persons is limited.

That statement is found in the Ontario tax study No. 14, Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs. Other governments have done some thinking about this, but not this one. There is no original thinking going on.

I will give one minister some credit for having done a bit of thinking about it. Unfortunately, we can never tell if she is being quoted accurately. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said some very interesting things about the idea of a guaranteed annual income or refundable tax credit. I hope she will not be up in her place tomorrow denying that she said this, but I quote from the November 8 issue of the Globe and Mail:

> This is sometimes called a negative income tax.
> She said three groups—low-income workers, one-parent families and unemployed workers between 50 and 65—would be the initial targets of a program which ultimately could reform the entire welfare system—
>
> Tax credits, such as those for political contributions, are set at fixed levels and give rich and poor the same benefit at tax return time. Rich and poor, for instance, deduct the same amount on their tax forms for children—
> "Tax exemptions favour the rich but tax credits favour the poor," she said. "The tax system shouldn't be loaded in favour of any group."

I certainly welcome that statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope it represents government policy, but I wait in some agony when I look at this tax legislation, which does not have an iota of this principle behind it. In fact, it has gone in the reverse direction. I wish the minister had fought a little harder in cabinet to get these very fine principles that she enunciated. I see the former minister of national health and welfare is agreeing to this. In any event, somebody should have been fighting in cabinet to get these refundable tax credits into the piece of nothing tax legislation we are now looking at.

I left out reference to two very important governments. One was the government of the province of British Columbia which pioneered this question of providing a "mincome" for people, seeing that poor people are well looked after. The NDP government of Manitoba of all governments has probably done the most. They actually instituted and have in place a negative income tax scheme.

I want to give a few examples of that previous government's program; I hope their successors will continue it. In that province, if your income is at the $3,000 level, you can receive a tax refund from the provincial government of $529. That is the maximum they allow. Imagine the effect that could have on the total economy, having a cheque in hand and being able to spend the money on products of manufacturers who are sitting idle looking for purchasers and consumers. There is no indication, other than the obiter dicta of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that anyone has any real appreciation of this problem.

Let me put it another way. We spend a lot of time talking about DREE grants and regional disparities. The real regional disparities are not DREE grants. They result from the income tax system. The poorest people get the worst break on income tax. Newfoundland and the maritimes, which have the lower average income people, have been shafted by this Income Tax Act. They have not been shafted by DREE because those provinces have not enough attention in terms of capital direction. But their people remain at the low levels of income and are not given the income tax breaks that the rich are given. That is where you find the real disparities of income tax. I wish the rich people of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia would pay some attention to that particular problem. On an average basis, they have suffered the most in terms of this particular principle.

In order to redistribute income, we have to abandon the principle of universality. It is a principle that has been cherished in my party for a very long time. I can understand the rationale behind it. In fact, the provincial governments for some time now have accepted and realized you cannot redistribute income on the universality principle.

If we decided to raise the old age pension to $250 using the principle of universality, that would result in only an additional $7 a month to an income tested recipient. However, it would result in an increase of $107 to someone who is not income tested; in other words, someone who already has a substantial income. It is time we in this House, and I might say we in this party, abandoned that particular principle. In fact, it militates against the redistribution of income to those at lower income levels.

I feel exactly the same way about the debate that raged before I came to this House on the FISP program, or the question of family allowances. Family allowances have to be based on an income tested basis in order to be just. You can no longer use the argument that it is a tax back. I will not accept that argument until we get to a 100 per cent level of tax, and it is probably not desirable that we ever do.

We have to go to the income tested principle behind the payment of a guaranteed annual income and the payment of family allowances—the whole umbrella of welfare services. There was a time when it was very degrading to have a means test. That has now gone. We are now able simply to look at tax returns to determine income levels. Since that onerous provision has been taken away, we in this House must now abandon the principle of universality and get down to the job of redistributing income to the poor. We cannot do that when we make every program universally acceptable. It is just not cost effective and it is not wise because we do not tax all of that money back.

Mr. Lalonde: Will the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) tell me whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) agrees with his philosophy on this matter?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He knows I don't.

• (2102)

Mr. Leggatt: The answer is no. I think this Chamber would be a very odd place if we all agreed with each other on everything. I know one thing, though. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I are going in the same direction and we are members of the only party that is; everyone else has abondoned the concept.

Since reference has been made to my hon. friend I might say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made a larger contribution to the redistribution of wealth in Canada than any other person I know; so when we do have a difference of opinion about the best approach to take—and we do disagree publicly in this party from time to time; we disagree in this chamber—it does not detract one whit from my hon. friend's contribution.

I end with a plea to the government. I have no hope we can block this bill, but surely in the next piece of legislation of this type we could begin to go about the serious business of providing a guaranteed annual income or a refundable tax credit for those who fall below the income tax line. Until we do this we shall not be able to accomplish anything meaningful with respect to the redistribution of income in Canada.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before I make my main speech I would like to mention something I had not thought of till now. There is in my town an experiment started by the NDP government, funded primarily by the federal government, on the effect of a guaranteed income in a community of approximately 10,000 people both rural and urban. While the details of minimum income are closely guarded there are certain obvious things one can see, and from what I understand after discussing the matter with the people involved there is evidence that most interesting and untoward changes have occurred. For example, people arrange their incomes so as to take advantage of the income guaranteed, by the state. If everyone was on a salary and if every dollar that came in by whatever means could be recorded, administration might be easier, but in many cases it is extremely difficult to determine the actual income of a particular person or family.

I think we should wait for the results. It appears they will not be assessed for some time but I understand from those who are knowledgeable on the subject that the figures really do not prove anything. They do not prove whether a guaranteed income would work or not, though there are instances where industry was perhaps retarded among individuals who were content to accept what the pay was and let it go at that. I might just add that if anyone wants to think a guaranteed annual income is an easy thing to administer, that it is a cure-all and a panacea, he is mistaken.

In this third reading debate I would like to comment on one or two things. The budgetary changes are not particularly sweeping. Despite a little tinkering here and there they have not changed the situation a great deal. It is unfortunate that closure was invoked in the Committee of the whole stage because certain clauses should have been tested and discussed more carefully.

I would like to dwell on the roll-over provisions, especially with that portion which has to do with capital gains. The mere fact that the government has had to introduce modifications to this tax shows that it is virtually impossible to administer with any degree of fairness without causing serious loss of business, which is the lifeblood of our communities.

During the long debate on the capital gains tax and in dicussion of the white paper on taxation and the subsequent legislation arising out of it, the issue of capital gains arose time and again and we heard a great deal of evidence about the difficulty of assessing capital gains and their subsequent taxation. We heard how in the United Kingdom such files were laid aside because only very senior tax people could work on them. This meant that many years elapsed before complex situations were clarified with resultant uncertainty and dislocation in business. If capital gains tax were introduced on the basis that it was a fair way to tax—and on the surface there is much to suggest this—time has proved that increase of property values which occurs over a lifetime of business is largely a reflection of the inflationary situation of our day. Slavish adherence to the capital gains tax is really a salute to the philosophy of Carter that a buck is a buck and should always be taxed by any manner or means.

In the United States, where the experience was similar to that of the United Kingdom, Congress at the turn of the century passed laws imposing capital gains tax and then spent a great deal of time passing further laws providing loopholes in order to obviate undesirable effects on the economy.

Capital gains tax is difficult to administer. It is regressive and inimical to family business continuity, let alone expansion. No one quarrels very much with the theory that those who buy and sell farms, properties, et cetera, should pay a tax if they do so regularly and are making a living out of it. But the capital gains tax is detrimental in that it hits hardest at those who buy for production, those who spend a lifetime building up a business or establishment only to find that much of their gain is lost through the capital gains tax. If there were no inflation or if the capital gains tax took into account the inflation rate, there could be some redress. But the situation with respect to capital gains shows there should be a wholesale re-evaluation of the value of this tax. We should examine whether or not it should be done away with altogether or whether it should be drastically changed.

When the capital gains tax was introduced its main intention was not to unduly tax businesses and proprietorships that were of long standing, but to catch the individual who was using the no-capital-gains-tax-situation to buy and sell on short intervals, thus circumventing the normal income tax levies. But the Department of National Revenue had moved to close many of these loopholes before the capital gains tax was even instituted, so it is possible that this tax is now doing considerably more damage than its value. It is felt most severely not by the extremely wealthy or by the large corporations but rather by individuals whose assets are tied up in a small business. If there is to be a capital gains tax it would seem to be more logical that we introduce it on a diminishing basis, as is common in some western countries. If it is meant to catch the individual who buys and sells for profit rather than for the sake of acquiring a productive instrument, surely a diminishing rate of tax should be paid on the capital gains portion. It seems logical to me that if a person holds a piece of productive property for ten years he should pay no capital gains tax.

The present legislation broadens the capital gains principle but in theory at least it recognizes that the tax has serious disadvantages and that it impedes the roll-over of farms and small businesses. Its effect is merely to postpone the tax bill and sooner or later a business will be largely wiped out by the tax liability it will incur. Nevertheless, a quarter of a loaf is better than nothing.

I would like to reiterate the comment I made during committee of the whole, that the important thing will be what is the interpretation of the changes which the government has proposed. As regards farming, it seems that it is going to be very narrowly interpreted and perhaps confined only to land. There should be some way in which regulations should be at least outlined when legislation is introduced.

Furthermore, the intentions of the government can be seriously reduced by the actions of tax officials. My experience has been that our tax system is not particularly sympathetic to individuals who are in business on their own. There is a general feeling amongst many, perhaps because most people are wage earners, that individual businessmen and farmers make too much money and somehow are able to not pay their fair share of tax. There seems to be some change in the public perception of business, as many now realize that a high standard of living necessitates a vigorous and active business climate.

I should like to refer to what is being said about our general economic situation. The present issue of "Canada's Energy Resources", issued by the Canada-Japan Trade Council, at page 8 reads as follows:

> Canada is a nation heavily dependent on foreign trade. We cannot achieve prosperity by continuing to borrow many billions yearly, much from outside Canada, to pay for governmental deficits and provide social services or offset deficits in balance-of-payments. That's the road, if followed too long, to national bankruptcy. It is employment of people in producing goods and services, generating what can be sold at a profit in Canada or abroad, that is needed to bring better balance to both the internal and the external accounts of the nation. Our "Energy Potential" is one of Canada's greatest means of achieving these desirable and needed ends.

There is no point discussing the merits of a guaranteed annual income if we do not have the goods and services necessary to bring that into effect.

A veteran political columnist, Bruce Hutchinson, in the Ottawa Journal of December 1 published a column called "Two Nations Deep in Economic Trouble". He pointed out economic policies in Washington and Ottawa have followed a course of zig-zags and U-turns, with an unknown destination. It seems that experts in the economy certainly agree that the North American economy is not likely to become much richer in the immediate future, and if there is not wise management, can be a lot poorer.

In the United States the Carter administration has deserted its original design of high prosperity and low inflation and has gone into pump priming, reminiscent of the new deal decade with its tax cuts and huge budgetary deficits. Nor is there much disagreement in Congress about these tax reductions except on details. The U.S. government will run a deficit estimated at $58 billion and next year this will be much larger. Even so, considering the size of our economy, our national deficit of $9 billion plus is still relatively one-third higher than that of the United States. In fact, we are considerably worse off than the United States, and anyone can ask whether larger spending and deficits will assure satisfactory economic growth and full employment. Furthermore, the provincial budgets are showing real deficits.

Turning to the international side, the United States will run a foreign trade deficit of $20 billion to $30 billion, but as Canada's net deficit will be $5 billion, in U.S. terms this would mean $60 billion. Canada's growth rate will be half or less than the U.S. rate, while its inflation rate will be 2 percentage points higher. By most standards, in a country well endowed with natural resources we have brought ourselves to a sorry spot in our economy.

If it were just the economy alone that was in trouble, that would be one thing. We are in trouble in a political way—whether or not Quebec remains within confederation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has listed the problems that are piling up: loss of population, businesses moving out of the province, and a faster rate of unemployment than in the rest of Canada. Slowly but surely Quebec is divorcing itself from the rest of the country, as is evidenced by the Globe and Mail article entitled: "The Black View of Canada from Abroad".

The latest indication of this is in the francophonization of companies. A corporate official of a national company headquartered in Quebec had this to say: "It is becoming more and more apparent to us that employees in English Canada are becoming less and less enthusiastic about working for a Quebec based corporation." Some Quebec executives are complaining that there is an unfortunate nationalization taking over in English Canada. Buyers will purchase products from all over the world, but some say: "We wish you weren't located in Quebec." It is the hardening in the rest of the country against the unreasonable situations that are present in that province, which is quite understandable. Telephone calls by private individuals in the rest of Canada to business in Quebec invariably turn up only francophone speaking individuals, and the smaller the individual businessman, the worse the situation is. Naturally distributors and merchants in other parts of Canada attempt to procure new sources when their supplies are diminished. Some might say this is unfair but it is quite a natural reaction. Not only is this political situation hurting Quebec, but it is also hurting the rest of Canada. It is hurting our image abroad.

When Mr. Davis of Ontario went to Japan, as well as the usual complaint that Canadians produce poorly, he had to refute the possibility of Quebec separation, a refutation that one can question is seriously valid. Fortune magazine has told its business readers that the threat of separation has produced a lack of capital, securities and potential investment in Quebec. There is a very black view taken by a correspondent writing in Finance-Seer, a journal directed to businessmen in the United States. He points out that the PQ leaders are greatly underestimated, and because they have downgraded their plans for a new currency, a new Quebec central bank and a Quebec army, it does not mean they have given them up. He points out that foreign bankers and investors might wake up to the fact that their loans are being paid for in worthless Quebec dollars.

Many of the problems of the Canadian economy may be traced to excessive government spending, with a whole host of programs in the social welfare field. As Canadians found that the necessity to pay and save money for individual care diminished as in the health field, their tax dollars were funnelled to Ottawa and redistributed to the provinces.

This has created great strains on confederation, so much so that it is now in danger of breaking up. Canadians were a lot happier when the people of each region had to look after their own health, welfare and education. This may have brought with it a certain amount of inequity, but this was preferable to the present situation.

Some of these untoward effects in our economy were initiated long ago, but certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a past minister of finance, who now lives in Toronto, Mr. Turner, must bear a great deal of the blame for the bad news. That national unemployment rate is 8.4 per cent. Inflation is accelerating. The real labour income of the worker is diminishing, estimated by some to be 4.3 per cent last year. There is a record high current account deficit, with record borrowing abroad. Our budget deficit is some $9 billion and will be higher next year. Our resource industries are falling behind. They have been one feature of the economy which has presented us with stability, stemming from the decision of the budget of 1973, when Mr. Turner said, in speaking of overshooting the target, the following:

We recognize that we are running a risk, and that the risk is on the side of overshooting. That is a risk worth taking at this time in the interest of dealing more effectively with unemployment.

It is clear that the Prime Minister and Mr. Turner have lost the gamble. The long years of increased social benefits culminated in the rich and expensive unemployment insurance scheme. With low interest rates and a booming economy, there was too much money in circulation and inflation became double digited.

● (2122)

The decision to keep the domestic oil price significantly below the U.S. level has had its effect, and we have not adapted to this. With our domestic supplies of oil diminishing, we have still to take this step. There does not seem to be any doubt that the increase in the price of oil which will eventually have to come about, will come about when we least wish it. High unemployment was aggravated by the long period of wage and price controls. Had they been short and sharp, the high rise in unemployment would have been stopped, but the uncertainty of many companies in dealing with the Anti-Inflation Board has caused the economy to slip into stagnation. How things have changed since the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, said in his May, 1974 budget:

We Canadians today have reached at threshold of great challenge and great opportunity.

We have a great opportunity to demonstrate our ability to deal with the deflated economy, with unemployment and with our political realities in regard to the province of Quebec. Nearly all top flight financial people feel that the most important mistake was the overexpansion of our money supply in the 1972-1974 period. It was aided by the high profits accruing to resource and corporate producers, with higher government taxes and higher wages which were not reduced once the commodity boom was over.

Our economy has been badly managed in these few years and we are seeing the result of it still. Even the Prime Minister has said there is no immediate turn around in sight. This budget does little to give confidence to Canadians that we are doing anything more than what the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) called drifting.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on third reading of Bill C-11. I have been in my seat most of the time listening to various speakers. I listened with considerable interest and participated myself during committee of the whole stage. This bill, as we know, suffered the guillotine of closure last Friday. As I mentioned at that time, the opposition and parliament as a whole should not debate this bill ad infinitum without any foreseeable end to the debate, but I believe there were about 16 clauses which we had considered in detail and the 16th clause was passed around 3.30 p.m. Friday afternoon. But the 100 clauses that were left went through by 4.15 p.m. or 4.30 p.m. with great speed and with no debate. As was pointed out by some hon. members during the debate today, a good many of these 100 clauses merited some thought and discussion. I wanted to bring that to the attention of the House.

I am particularly interested in some of the clauses. I am not a lawyer and I am not too familiar with some of these tax credits, but there were certain items which, speaking as a layman and speaking on behalf of a great many taxpayers in the low tax bracket or even on behalf of those who do not pay taxes, merit some comments from me.

First and foremost, the ordinary working man who, prior to this legislation, received an allowance of $150 for business expenditures has felt that this was not sufficient, and the government in its generosity has increased it to $250, which is certainly not very much. I know hon. members opposite will agree that $250 is not a great deal of money in this inflationary period because there are many workers who must drive some distance to their place of work and who must have meals away from home during the pursuit of their jobs. As I said, this includes construction workers. I mentioned to you in particular, Mr. Speaker, that this applies also to railroaders with whose problems you are certainly familiar. I assume you were more familiar with them a few years ago than you are at present, but I am quite sure you have lent a sympathetic ear to that request.

An amendment was brought in requesting that the government reconsider the amount and bring it up to $400. This amendment was defeated and I am sorry that was the case. A great many of these workers have legitimate costs which are pretty high and which they can document. It seems rather unfair that a businessman can deduct his expenses but a good many other workers who have as just a cause cannot. I might say, having been a rural insurance agent for a great number of years and a real estate broker later, that I am well aware that it cost me a lot of money to do business, but I was able to deduct legitimate business expenses. The tax man probably did not look at them all as legitimate and threw out a good many of them, but I guess that is the name of the game.

One other item which was of particular interest to me was the amendments dealing with life insurance. The clauses were amended and the bill, so far as life insurance is concerned, was certainly considerably improved. Originally, when life insurance proceeds were to be paid at death, death tax would be imposed which was, as we said, almost robbing the grave and stealing from widows and orphans. I think that struck home and the government amended the clause.

Another legitimate amendment concerned deduction of interest on a legitimate insurance loan for business purposes, and I recall government members' reaction at the time I proposed this. I can still hear the former minister of finance as much as telling me I was crazy to even consider that. Thank the Lord the majority of the House is crazy along with me, because the government has accepted my proposal to deduct the interest on insurance loans as a legitimate business expense.

There is only one kicker left and I wish to bring it to the attention of the House, namely, that if a loan is made on a life insurance policy and happens to be more than the premium, it is considered as income for the year. As I pointed out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and his parliamentary secretary, I doubt there would be more than one in a thousand loans that would qualify under that provision, because in a great number of loans made on life insurance policies the interest which would be eligible as a deductible expense would not be as much as the loan. I felt that because of the bookwork and all the problems the department—I assume it would be the Department of National Revenue—would have in trying to collect those isolated taxes, it would be hardly worth the candle. I wanted to bring that to the attention of the government and in particular the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley), who I am pleased to see present here.

The so-called budget—"so-called" because at the time it was supposed to be just a ways and means motion—is supposed to do a good deal of things to generate activity in the economy and provide jobs, but when we ask how many jobs will be generated as a result, many of us are pessimistic, to say the least.

We all know that the unemployment rate is at a high 8.4 per cent. I believe that is the highest since 1940, and it is a cause of serious concern to all of us. Programs are in place to provide jobs. The Canada Works Program is of a temporary nature. It is certainly welcome—there is no question about that—but in my riding there is high seasonal unemployment. In Parry Sound-Muskoka I believe we were allotted $1.1 million, which was considerably more than many other ridings, but considerably less than some others. That amount will provide only 311 jobs, and only for a fixed period of time. Something has to be done to put more money into the economy.

It has been suggested—and I agree—that the sales tax is a regressive tax. It hits everybody. It hits those people who do not make enough money even to pay income tax. If the sales tax was reduced, a great deal more money would be put into the economy. People would benefit because they could purchase more goods and services. That would certainly improve the economy.

I come back to what I suppose is a pet theme of mine, that is, the 10-cent federal sales tax on gasoline. To me that is a very bad tax. I believe it was imposed on July 1, 1975. It was imposed to balance our oil accounts, I suppose. Then we were told it was to help conserve gasoline. However, the amount of gasoline which has been saved or which has not been used because of that 10-cent tax is infinitesimal. I said earlier that we might have saved 100 gallons, but it has probably not even been that amount. People are still driving their cars. They still need their cars. Many people use their cars for business purposes. For them, using their cars is a necessity. Working people can deduct the cost of their gasoline, trucks and cars as legitimate business expenses, and I agree with that. However, the majority of people are not pleasure drivers; they are not Sunday drivers; they have to use their vehicles, whether they be half-ton trucks or cars, to drive up to 100 miles a day and return. Sometimes they drive even further than that. In order to keep their jobs they have to pay those expenses, and many people feel like quitting because it costs so much to get to and from their jobs. The alternative is welfare or drawing unemployment insurance for the first while.

Most people are proud and want jobs, and if the government will not cancel this 10-cent gasoline tax, the tax should be reduced by seven cents to three cents. A recommendation of that kind was made by the tourist industry. The amount collected by the government since July 1, 1975 with this 10-cent surtax is absolutely astronomical. I would be very interested in knowing what that amount is.

We must cut down on the cost of government. Government expenditures are very high and are very difficult to restrain. We are living in a time of restraint. Various ministers including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have stated that because of this restraint the public service has been or will be reduced. Last week the latest figures showed an increase in the public service of, I believe, about 15,000 persons. I believe the public service now numbers 480,000. At this rate the number will be half a million before too long. The government should be looking into this very seriously.

We have made certain concrete and positive suggestions with regard to this bill. The $100 tax allowance for taxpayers is supposed to take place in early 1978. That amount is not very high, and I do not think it will generate very much economic activity. We hoped that allowance would be put in place in 1977 as well as in 1978 and successive years.

As a member of the housing committee I have spoken with some feeling and force on the insulation program. The grant is to be $350 for eight of the provinces. The unfortunate thing is that that $350 is considered to be taxable income. I admit that many old age pensioners, widows and others who are re-insulating will not pay tax on this grant, but many low income families who are receiving just enough to pay income tax are going to have to. They will probably think two or three times before bothering to apply for a re-insulation grant. I was given astronomical figures by the minister, after consultation with his officials, as to what this is going to cost the government. Of course, I took that with a grain of salt. If the government wants the re-insulation program to get off the ground, it should make the grants tax deductible just as it does in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I am aware of high electricity costs in those two provinces, but Parry Sound-Muskoka is not exactly the banana belt of the Dominion of Canada. Yesterday morning it was 34 below zero in Burks Falls where I live, and that is the good Christian temperature, not that crazy Celsius.

Insulation is very necessary for the homes in my area and in other northern areas. Surely to goodness if there are high energy costs in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, there are other items of just as much importance which are also expensive in northern Ontario, northern Alberta and other northern parts of the country. People in those areas should also qualify under the re-insulation program so that grants can be deducted from taxable income. There is still some time for the government to recant. I hope it will think this over and admit that its proposal is nonsense. We know the number of people who have applied under this program. I mentioned this during the committee of the whole last week. We also know the number of grants which have been approved and paid. The number is very small compared with what the government expected. Those figures prove that the plan cooked up by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is not successful in creating work. If people would take advantage of this program, that would cut down on energy consumption. I hope something will be done in this regard. Clause 116 provided authority for the government to borrow $9 billion. That is another thing that was sneaked in that a lot of us are wondering and worrying about.

• (2142)

The member who spoke previously, the great socialist from New Westminster, made some comments that had merit. He pointed out that 43 per cent of the income tax revenues came from individual taxpayers and a much smaller amount came from corporations. It is because of the items I have mentioned that so much is collected from the ordinary taxpayer. A reduction in the sales tax would benefit everybody and generate more money for the economy. There is also that iniquitous 10-cent tax on gasoline. It is an unfair tax because it penalizes people who cannot claim expenses for driving to and from work as deductible, even in cases where the distance is considerable.

In view of these items, Mr. Speaker, I hope something can be done to amend some of the clauses on third reading. I know the bill will probably go through but I am not prepared to vote for it in its present state.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a few short comments to make in this third reading debate which will relate fairly directly to the comments I made on second reading debate on November 17 and in committee of the whole on December 6. On those occasions I dwelt on two major aspects of the impact of this tax bill on Canadian agriculture and I want to dwell on them a little more in some new ways tonight.

The first matter is the serious consequences of the capital gains tax on the roll-over of incorporated family farms and partnerships to the next generation brought about by the ravages of inflation since the advent of the new capital gains approach to the tax system that has been with us for about seven years. This change is distinct from the situation of an individual farmer—one who is not incorporated or in a partnership—who has this privilege of roll-over.

The second matter I dwelt on in some detail referred to my representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and other ministers who made up what I think is properly called a contingency drought committee composed of eight Cabinet ministers. This committee was quite active last spring and summer and I think it is still active in regard to the continuing and worsening drought in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan. In this area I called for a tax deferral program that would recognize the particular problems brought on by this drought in the cattle industry in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan. The program would have to last until the drought is over and grass and feed supplies return to more or less normal. This, of course, may take several years.

The proposal to allow a tax deferral program would encourage the necessary cow numbers to be reduced to levels that could be supported on local grass and feed supplies in spite of the considerably larger taxable incomes that would result from this conditional scale down of cattle. I think it was a reasonable suggestion that I made in the course of the earlier debates. It is the prudent course to follow under severe drought conditions instead of buying expensive feed over a long winter. There is now every indication of an extremely cold and long winter. This was the lesson we learned in the drought and depression days of the 1930's, but there were no tax problems then and we did not have to worry about the level of taxable income.

I am pleased to report three weeks after the suggestions were put forward that I have received good support for them from the farm audience over a wide area, including a big part of western Canada, parts of Ontario and even within this House from members of other parties. This gives me some satisfaction. Since preparing those earlier remarks some additional background information has come to my attention with respect to the capital gains roll-over item.

I should like to refer to the 1971 census figures. In that census tabulation there were 21,019 family farm partnerships or 8.1 per cent and another 7,011 family farm corporations or 3.1 per cent. These 29,000, which the census describes as commercial farms, made up 11.2 per cent of all farmers in Canada in 1971 and accounted for at least 20 per cent of total farm production. Some 113,000 commercial farms accounted for about 77.5 per cent of the total production in Canada in 1971. In other words, incorporated family farms and partnerships account for a disproportionately large share of Canadian farm production.

The figures given by the Minister of Finance showing only 2 per cent of farms being incorporated leave the wrong impression. Not only is the percentage too low but the minister did not look at what the 3.1 per cent produced on their farms—over 20 per cent of the total farm production. This is, of course, together with the partnerships. These categories do not enjoy the roll-over privileges for intergenerational transfer that individual farmers now enjoy. I submit that incorporation does not resolve either the liquidity problem or the ability to pay capital gains tax.

Recently there has been some research announced just within the last month. It was done at the University of Guelph, in a study by Gellner and Brinkman. This study found capital gains were an important component of farm returns. Between the years 1971 and 1974 covered by the study, capital gains amounted to 35 per cent of total farm returns. However, the study pointed out that capital gains by contrast on comparable nonfarm business amounted to 25 per cent. The point I am making is, if a distinction can be drawn between unincorporated farm operations and other businesses, and this is so, the same distinction can be drawn between incorporated family farms and farm partnerships on the one hand, and other incorporated businesses on the other hand.

Surely, we now have a travesty of justice as a result of the critical impact of capital gains under extreme inflationary conditions, wherein efficient farmers and ranchers are being taxed out of existence. There can be no real long term gain for government or the nation in taxing our best farmers in a manner to drive them out of their successful business, preventing a logical transfer to the next generation.

I want to associate myself with the remarks made this afternoon by my colleague from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) on roll-over in the corporate structure. His approach to this same subject was most appropriate. I also want to associate myself with his appropriate reference to today's lead story in the Toronto Globe and Mail with the headline—it is a catchy headline and an excellent story—"PM Lost Fiscal Gamble—Canada pays with Ailing Economy". I suggest this should be required reading, not only by members of this House but any Canadian who is concerned about our critical economic situation today.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the committee of the whole in reference to this capital gains roll-over item, there has been no change in the Department of Finance's views for almost three years, yet there has been an incredible increase in the impact of capital gains tax on family and incorporated farms due to our continuing and increasing inflation. Surely a new look now is absolutely essential. I would like to remind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) of his closing statement to me in the committee when he said:

> I should, however, like to find a date which might be suitable, and I will ask my staff to get in touch with the honorable member. If this cannot be arranged, I shall certainly make sure there is a meeting with my officials on this subject.

This, of course, was a reference to my suggestion that Canadian cattle producers would like and deserve the chance to meet with the Minister of Finance and his senior staff on this very important subject. I take this opportunity to remind him of that statement and hope that something will come of it. I did not mean to imply at that time, nor do I now, that it should take place in the heat of this long debate with which we are still involved. I hope, however, that such a meeting, when it comes, is more productive than the last meeting three years ago, at that time with a former minister of finance, Mr. Turner. In spite of two closure motions to get this tax amendment bill to this third reading stage, it is still not too late to call upon the minister to recognize the genuine sincerity of at least some suggestions coming out of this debate. I suggest he implement at least some of them. If not now, then certainly he should make appropriate plans to incorporate them in the next budget.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): I am not going to take much of the House's time, Mr. Speaker, but this debate does provide me with an opportunity to tell the parliamentary secretary, and through him the minister, just what I think of the economic policy of this government. I welcome the few minutes available to me before ten o'clock.

I would like to say to the parliamentary secretary, in the minister's absence, that while there has been much political hay about the economic mess, for which the government is responsible, we must try to make the best of what we have. We have heard about the delays, the stone-walling and the holding back of this important measure, but I wonder if the government knows what it has done to Canadians since last March, even a small group of Canadians, some of whom may be represented in the Liberal caucus. There may even be one or two in ours and elsewhere. Chartered accountants have been sitting behind their desks since March with clients flooding in their doors on the basis of the original budget, which was allowed to die an ignominious death. But no CA has been able to file a return with any degree of certainty whatsoever on the basis of that budget statement.

What has transpired has been this. A client will come in during this last fiscal year and the chartered accountant will say to that client: "I have no idea whether to file under the March budget statement; that was the previous law, I will find out for you". First of all he phones the regional tax office, and they reply: "We do not really know, but you may have an option to file under both; send us an accompanying letter".

Put yourself in the position, not only of the chartered accountant, but of the client to whom he must have given advice since March of this year, almost nine, ten months ago. It is simply inexcusable. If the opposition, according to government spokesmen, lacks integrity for delaying this bill, that lack of integrity is minuscule compared to the lack of fiscal integrity that this government has exhibited since March of this year. Not only has the government been callously indifferent to the economy of the country, but it failed to implement the so-called budget of last March. Then they come roaring in after the throne speech debate and, I suppose, expect passage of the bill within hours. This is simply indefensible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member because in accordance with Standing Order No. 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved and seconded at this time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—MINISTER'S USE OF TERMS "NATIONAL SECURITY"

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister, on December 6, when asked to define the term "national security" put in the context of the BNA Act or in jurisdictional or legal sense, replied that he took a great deal of guidance from section 16 of the Official Secrets Act. He stated, sir, that the mandate of the security service was derived, almost totally, from that definition—which talks about subversive activities, not national security per se.

What I would like to say to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) tonight, in an attempt to be a little provocative, is that he is bandying about the term "national security" as little more than a parliamentary buzz word. He has not, so far, related it in a definitive, constructive way to justify the tactics, legal or political, that he is using vis-à-vis provincial inquiries that are attempts to gather information.

● (2202)

In a recent report dealing with governmental operations with respect to intelligence activities, Mr. Commager noted that in the United States——The emergence of intelligence over the past quarter-century as an almost independent branch of the executive, largely immune from either political limitations or legal controls, poses constitutional questions graver than any since the civil war and reconstruction.

Mr. Commager goes on to say that:

The metamorphosis of the two concepts of national security and secrecy are extremely ominous.

He decries the audacity with which the claim of national security is used as a cover for almost anything the executive wishes to do, and notes the casualness with which the term national security has been accepted, a term or phrase unknown to the constitution. He describes it, not as a substantive power, but as a principle in search of a definition, a definition which the Solicitor General, in Canadian parliamentary terms, is unable to provide.

Recently in a Toronto newspaper the Solicitor General was quoted as saying that national security was clearly a federal responsibility under the constitutional provision to provide peace, order, and good government. Of course, he was quoting section 91 of the British North America Act which outlines not only the power of parliament but the restrictions as well. Section 91 reads:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the consent of the Senate and House of Commons to make laws for the Peace, Order and Good Government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the Classes or Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

In my opinion, the term "provide" used by the minister cannot be construed to mean "make" in the act. The latter term means to "legislate"; the former to do a service. To "provide" peace and order can only mean to "administrate and enforce". Thus the government in this case cannot with certainty say that it is responsible constitutionally to provide peace and order in the provinces. That exclusive power is contained in section 92 of the BNA Act, and it relates solely to the provinces. The 1871 addition to the BNA Act in which it gave temporary authority to parliament to "administer peace and order" in the Territories is support for that opinion.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

If an attempt is made to determine just what national security involves, we must refer to law in its present context. There seems to be no statute or definition of national security. The term has been pulled out of thin air. We can therefore only surmise what it may mean.

Section 46 of the Criminal Code deals with treason, et cetera. It also deals with offences such as spying. The Official Secrets Act and War Measures Act are both likely being used to uphold the term "national security". Yet these acts, including the Criminal Code, are, within the meaning of the administration of justice, a provincial responsibility. The Protection of Privacy Act reveals that subversive activity as defined comes within the same meaning.

In an attempt to strengthen or provide legality for federal responsibility, the Solicitor General is in fact saying that the administration of justice in the field of national security is its responsibility. This pseudo axiom is supported by him in the Commons debate of November 15, 1977, page 885 of Hansard:

By convention, the responsibility for national security devolves upon the Prime Minister and is shared with those ministers charged with specific responsibility for the police, external relations and the administration of justice.

It would appear that the present government is on the one hand running the country by convention, but, finding that hat does not fit, is falling back on section 91. The term "administration of justice", as used by the Solicitor General, clearly reveals his government is under the illusion it is responsible for that function. He has yet to face section 92 and the forbidding clauses in section 91.

The divisions of powers between parliament and the provinces are explicitly set out in sections 91 and 92. No matter how the present government attempts to circumvent these sections in justifying its role in national security, it cannot be certain to do so without violating the constitution.

The next step of the government can easily be anticipated. In order that they may constitutionally provide legality for the RCMP Act, they will once again refer to "provide peace and order" under section 91. They might be better advised to look at section 91(27), but that is a variation of a theme. To repeat myself and bring this into context, I am of the firm opinion that the legislating of a police act, excepting in the Territories, can only be done under the authority of section 92 which reads:

In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subject next hereafter enumerated, that is to say:

14: The Administration of Justice in the Province . . .

The administration of justice requires laws to be enforced, one of which is a police act. Each province has therefore legislated its own police act. Now if we return to section 91, we find that parliament is expressly forbidden to pass laws coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. It, therefore, has absolutely no constitutional authority to pass a police act involving provincial jurisdiction. To me, it is as clear as that.

To continue to fiddle and fuddle around "peace and order", "administration of justice", "conventions" or whatever, is to only further compound those sins of omission and commission which have brought about the present controversy.

● (2207)

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the royal commission on security in 1969 made it clear that it was the duty of the state to protect its secrets from espionage, its institutions from subversion and its policies from clandestine influence.

The national security of Canada, understood in its domestic context, includes all of these responsibilities.

The maintenance of such national internal security is the responsibility of the government of Canada. This responsibility is derived not only from statutes and regulations such as those relating to the RCM Police but also from the provisions of the constitutional framework requiring the federal government to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada.

In its operational context, the maintenance of national security is upheld by the RCM Police, specifically the security service. The scope of the mandate of this group is found in law at section 16(3) of the Official Secrets Act. In this section, subversive activity means: (a) espionage or sabotage; (b) foreign intelligence activities directed toward gathering intelligence information relating to Canada; (c) activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means; (d) activities by a foreign power directed toward actual or potential attack or other hostile acts against Canada; or (e) activities of a foreign terrorist group directed toward the commission of terrorist acts in or against Canada.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY BETWEEN FORT McMURRAY AND FORT SMITH—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am taking this opportunity to raise an important matter, one which I have brought to the attention of the House previously on November 9 of this year. It concerns the development of a transportation system which would serve the Northwest Territories, specifically, the construction of two highways directly affecting the economy of the north and more particularly the western part of the Northwest Territories.

The first of these proposed developments is the construction of a gravel highway to link Fort McMurray, Alberta with Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories. I recently met with the deputy premier of Alberta, Dr. Hugh Horner, to discuss this project. Dr. Horner, who is also the Alberta minister of transport, expressed serious and favourable interest in this proposal on behalf of the provincial government. He and I both agree that a highway along this route would provide long term benefits for the province of Alberta and more immediate benefits for the Northwest Territories.

It is clear, however, that a massive project such as this should not be financed solely by a provincial government. I am therefore seeking support from the federal government to enable this development to take place. I am urging that representatives of the government meet with me and with representatives of the Alberta government to discuss the possibility of proceeding with this project. I hope the government of Canada will see to it that a satisfactory financial agreement can be reached in order that work may begin as soon as possible.

The second proposal concerns the construction of the Liard highway to link Fort Nelson, B.C., with Fort Simpson in the Northwest Territories. Construction of such a highway would bring about important benefits for the Northwest Territories, for the Yukon and for British Columbia. In addition, it would open up the agricultural possibilities of the Liard area. I do not think many people are aware of those possibilities but I am firmly of the opinion that there is great agricultural potential in that area.

At present, the British Columbia government has paid for a 20-mile section out of Fort Nelson and a 50-mile stretch which exists in the Northwest Territories from Fort Simpson to Fort William. However, there have not been any serious efforts made to complete the project. I would like to know why the federal government has dragged its feet on this project. I would also like to know when the Treasury Board and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are going to make a decision on the construction of the Liard highway. I raised this issue with the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) recently in the House, and was informed that I should have directed my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner). I would like some indication from the government whether or not they will proceed with the construction of this highway; I do not care where the answer comes from.

I am not alone in urging the completion of the Liard highway. The Northwest Territories' finance committee is also urging the federal government to complete the Liard highway. In view of the high unemployment rate at the present time, a project such as the Liard highway and the highway which is to be built from Fort McMurray to Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories would provide much needed work. I hope a favourable decision will be reached shortly. I also hope the government will look seriously at the policy recommended by the previous minister of Indian affairs and northern development, and that the policy of northern preference will be adhered to.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) indicated on Friday, the department would be prepared to look into the matter raised by the hon. member. Up to this time, however, the department has not been involved. The study referred to by the hon. member has been undertaken by the Alberta government and refers to a road in Alberta included in the DREE-MOT-Alberta northlands area. This road has not been included in the current three year western northlands agreement which ends this year. Depending on Alberta's priorities regarding road construction, it is possible that a highway to Fort Smith could be included in future western northlands agreements.

Should such a highway be considered for construction, naturally Parks Canada would be concerned over the proposed route in light of the ecological impacts on Wood Buffalo National Park. Parks Canada would seek preference for a route along the east side of the Athabasca river lying outside the park which would have minimum impacts on the important animal and waterfowl habitats inside the park.

The department, through the northern program, would also take an interest in any portion of the proposed road which would lie in the Northwest Territories. However, the department's participation in the construction of such a road would be subject to departmental priorities for road construction in the Northwest Territories. As the minister himself stated on Friday, at the present time we are in a period of restraint and will have to decide among the different priorities. As the hon. member will recall, the minister expressed his view that his priorities lie with the construction of the Liard highway which he has been discussing recently with Treasury Board and from whom he is expecting a decision early in the new year.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

SUGGESTION LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS PROJECT BE DISCUSSED AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. A statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on the CTV program "Question Period" indicated that the development of the Gull Island site in Newfoundland is the type of project that could provide long-term employment. This is worthy of serious and urgent consideration since such a development would assure benefits to not only the Atlantic region but to Canada in added energy resources. I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the development of the lower Churchill hydro project be placed on the agenda for the federal-provincial conference on the economy in mid-February as a matter of priority.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

PROPOSAL TO PERMIT WAGE INCREASES TO EQUAL INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The rate of inflation, contrary to the assertion made in Vancouver yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), is increasing, not decreasing. We are now experiencing an average for the last three months of almost 11 per cent which is substantially higher than it was at the time when wage and price controls were imposed. In view of the fact that the government has indicated that wage and salary increases will be restricted to six per cent which will mean a decline in the average Canadian family's standard of living of about $450 for 1978, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the government to permit wage and salary increases within the framework of the controls program to at least match increases in the cost of living and thereby avoid any losses in our standard of living.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL COMMISSIONS TO INVESTIGATE ALLEGED CRIMES BY FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the need to bring to light certain RCMP activities which are at least compromising, if not outright criminal, the reluctance of the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) to co-operate with the inquiry commission which has been set up by the Quebec government, the doubts which are entertained regarding the objectivity of the McDonald Commission, which appears to be a duplicate of the Keable Commission, and because the whole thing is aimed apparently at covering up an ill advised authorization issued by the federal government, especially before, during and after the October 1970 crisis, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the House request the attorneys general and the justice ministers of all provinces to set up a fair and impartial joint inquiry commission to look into the criminal activities of the RCMP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSAL TO REDUCE SALARY OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Last Sunday on the CTV network program "Question Period", the Minister of Employment and Immigration repeated his contention that Canadians were not suffering from unemployment. He said and I quote "... they've had income and they're drawing unemployment insurance now and doing very nicely." Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister has obviously insulated himself from the cold reality that one million Canadians are facing this winter by virtue of their unemployment and rising food and shelter prices. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

● (1412)

That the minister's $1,200 a week ministerial income be reduced to the average unemployment insurance benefit of $100 per week.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

COST OF FILMING COMMONWEALTH GAMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): I rise under the provision of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that amateur athletes and supporting organizations are struggling to raise money for training in preparation for next year's Commonwealth Games, and in view of the fact that the minister has recently announced a federally financed $840,000 film production of these same Commonwealth Games, and in view of the fact that a satisfactory film of the 1974 Canada Games cost only $12,000, I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek):

That the Canada Council give the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) a home movie camera and air fare to the commonwealth country of her choice to make and star in her own movie and the money saved from her $840,000 extravaganza be spent to send athletes for training and competition opportunities in preparation for the games.

EXTENSION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF McDONALD COMMISSION TO ALLOW EXPOSURE OF ACTIVITIES OF FOREIGN POWERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the fact that late last week during the hearings of the McDonald Commission Chief Superintendent Donald Cobb was denied the right to name a foreign power operating within Canada let alone the possibility to elaborate on what potentially could be a very damaging factor in our nation's security. My motion therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) is as follows:

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to extend the terms of reference of the McDonald Commission in such a way as to allow witnesses not only to identify foreign powers operating within our national boundaries but to allow detailed exposures of any or all questionable practices by foreign interests operating in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion for debate?

REQUESTED ACTION TO PROTECT COMMUNITIES AND JOBS IN SUDBURY AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of this House to deal with a matter of urgent, pressing and most serious necessity. In view of the fact that thousands of people in the Sudbury basin now face the catastrophe of unemployment at a time when there are no alternative jobs for them to go to, and in view of the fact that this government has so far refused to take any action on this matter to protect the jobs of these Canadian workers and taxpayers, and in view of the fact that I now have before me approximately 28,000 cards signed by Sudbury area residents calling on the Prime Minister to take action to protect the jobs of the workers and the lives of the communities in which they live, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House instruct the government of Canada to take the following actions as have been advocated by more than 28,000 Sudbury area residents and listed on these cards addressed to the Prime Minister.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR NEW MEASURES TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will recall when he announced the imposition of controls he projected that unemployment in the country—excuse me inflation—well unemployment is as bad as inflation, and it is difficult to know which crisis of mismanagement we should be addressing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister at that time projected inflation would be down to six per cent last year and down to 4 per cent this year. The figures indicate that in fact we are dealing with a rate of 9.1 per cent inflation now; that the Prime Minister was more than 100 per cent wrong in his projections. The fact facing this parliament is that there is no economic legislation on the agenda of the House of Commons now to deal with the twin crises of inflation and unemployment. What economic measures does the Prime Minister and his government intend to introduce to change the direction of an economic program that has obviously failed?

• (1417)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and myself have indicated that over the three-year period, that is to say by the end of December 1978, we expect to be on course and to have inflation down to a rate of six per cent or lower. I gave these figures in the House about a month ago and so did the Minister of Finance. Of course, if you look at a month-to-month basis, there are ups and downs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: They are all down.

Mr. Trudeau: Even members opposite know that in the first and second years of controls we were ahead of target and we reached a lower rate of inflation than had been forecast in the guidelines.

Mr. Hees: Through no fault of your own. It was agricultural prices that went down themselves.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings saying "It is through no fault of your own because agricultural prices went down by themselves." Agricultural prices are now going up by themselves. It is part of the up and down which has not been controlled by the government or by the controls program. As members opposite know, this recent spurt in inflation is caused essentially by energy and food prices. Energy is responding to a world level of prices. Food is also responding to a world level of prices. We never pretended we could control those. I remind members opposite that in July and the month preceding July in 1974, we said that those were two elements we could not control since in the one case the price is set by the OPEC nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We now have a yo-yo theory of economic management in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister asks us to believe that because he was wrong in the past, he is somehow going to be right in 1978. The CPI figures released today provide further evidence of the failure of the economic policy of this government. I want to repeat this question to the Prime Minister since there is nothing on the agenda of parliament to bring some leadership to the Canadian economy. Will the Prime Minister of Canada introduce to the parliament of this country immediate measures to try to turn around an economy in which economic leadership has clearly failed under his government? Will there be measures?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition talks as though he does not know what is in front of the House. Even this very day we have bills proceeding through the House, such as Bill C-11 of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Hees: You mean that tired old bill?

Mr. Trudeau: It is a tired old bill because the tired old member from Prince Edward-Hastings is making it that.

Mr. Hees: Get some new writers, Pierre. You are running down. I have heard you bad, but that is the lowest you have ever been.

Mr. Trudeau: These lines happen to come from the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. On inflation, we have indicated that decontrols will begin in April and that before they begin, parliament will have to pass several measures relating to the post-controls period. We are waiting for the opposition to deal with measures in front of the House before putting those forward.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister well knows that Bill C-11 which will be passed today has been in effect since June of this year. It is not new. It is not dealing with the problems that are facing Canadians right now. The Prime Minister seems unprepared to bring in the kind of basic reforms that are needed or to recognize that his decade of economic management has been a tragedy for the country. The CPI figures released today indicate that the Canadians who are suffering most are those who can least afford that kind of impact. Will the Prime Minister introduce, preferably before Christmas, measures or announcements of policy assigned to bring immediate relief to unemployed Canadians and Canadians among the working poor who simply cannot afford to pay 16 cents more for every dollar's worth of food they buy?

• (1422)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the day after we introduce measures of this kind they are always described by the opposition as being insufficient. They say: You did that yesterday; what do you propose to do today? Now, the Leader of the Opposition is complaining about a tax bill which gave considerable relief to the Canadian people and which his party has not yet seen fit to pass. I would remind him, if he wants immediate relief for those hit by unemployment, that this government introduced what is probably the most forward looking unemployment insurance scheme in the world—and it was criticized by people on that side of the House.

Mr. Stevens: People want jobs, not hand-outs!

Mr. Trudeau: It was this government which established indexing in connection with family allowances and old age pensions, a provision which does provide relief for those who are hardest hit by the high cost of living. These are measures which the government introduced and which we had to push through parliament, always against the resistance of people on the other side of the House.

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister can treat this as a joke or as a matter for some kind of debate. The fact is that because of the policies of the government there are countless Canadians who cannot afford to pay for the food, the clothing and the shelter they need. What we want to know is whether the right hon. gentleman intends to go on ignoring the plight of the hundreds of thousands who are in desperate need in Canada today or whether he intends to introduce emergency measures to help the unemployed and working Canadians on low incomes who need help right now.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition has referred to those who cannot afford to buy food and clothing. I am not sure whether he was making a dramatic speech or whether he is really concerned with the plight of these people. I would point out that the Canada Assistance Plan is designed precisely to meet such circumstances. It is administered by the provinces and the federal government pays some 50 per cent of the shot to the extent, currently, of some $7 billion a year. If the opposition is proposing that we increase old age pensions, increase family allowances, increase payments under the Assistance Plan—

Mr. Peters: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Give them jobs!

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My supplementary is addresed to the Minister of Finance and I can assure the Minister of Finance that this no laughing matter. The people of this country want jobs, not welfare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I should like to take up where the Prime Minister left off. Given the fact that of the one million or so Canadians who are unemployed 35 per cent have been unemployed for three months or more—their right to unemployment insurance benefits has expired and they must now fall back on welfare and the humiliation of the means test—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McGrath: Since this places an increasing burden on the provinces, which provide 50 per cent of the welfare payments, I ask the Minister of Finance whether he supports the view of his colleague, the Minister of Employment, that the unemployed are doing very nicely, thank you, or whether he intends to bring in immediate measures to deal with the spectre of hardship which hangs over the unemployed of this country right now.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we delivered on October 20 last an economic speech in the House which is now considered by the House and I would like to remind the opposition that they voted on second reading for those economic proposals. I would like to say that beginning next month, some substantial tax cuts will be granted to average and low wage earners to stimulate the economy and increase demand. I hope to be in position in the next few weeks to introduce a program urging contractors to add to their staff thus allowing a greater number of individuals to find employment. However, I do not think that a substantial increase in the federal budget or federal expenditures would improve the competitive position of Canada. What is important at this time is to keep our markets and I am pleased to report to the House that for 1977, we have increased our trade surplus from $1.1 billion to $2.5 billion, which means that Canada's economic situation is improving in relation to other countries. Yesterday, I read in the press that according to American economists in 1978 Japan alone would do better than Canada.

• (1427)

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I would remind the Minister of Finance that in so far as the working poor and the unemployed of this country are concerned his tax cuts are mere tokenism, and they will only last for two months. Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance, given the fact that the only positive response we have had from the minister and his colleagues is that they are going to have a first ministers' conference dealing with the economy some time in February—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister of interprovincial relations stick to his own business of looking after the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member complete his question.

Mr. McGrath: If the minister of intergovernmental relations, or whatever it is, will contain himself.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government, instead of waiting for medium term measures to be decided on by a first ministers' conference at the end of the winter, to do something now to relieve the spectre of hardship which hangs over the unemployed of this country who have to get by on $125 a week, or those who no longer qualify for unemployment benefits but have to fall back on welfare? What does the government intend to do about this right now?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on January 1 the federal government, through its budgetary measures, will be putting back into the economy $1.9 billion in tax incentives. Those matters were discussed with the treasuries of all the provinces in October and they agreed with the trend of the policies I was proposing. I will be having another meeting with them in January to review the situation, but I hope that the measures that we will be bringing in on January 1, 1978 will be passed very rapidly by the House of Commons.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

SUGGESTION WAGE INCREASES BE PERMITTED TO EQUAL INCREASES IN COST OF LIVING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister knows that his great tax credit amounts to only $2 a week for the average family. Considering that the rate of inflation now is almost 11 per cent, and given the fact that the minister has decided to change the regulations governing wage and salary increases to restrict them to six per cent, which will mean a substantial drop in real family incomes for all Canadians in 1978, will the minister at least change the guidelines and permit Canadians to have wage and salary increases which are commensurate with the increase in the cost of living?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to change the announced policy on controls. We should begin to lift them on April 14, 1978.

[English]

PROPOSED INCREASES IN COST OF AUTOMOBILES AND PETROLEUM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Considering that there are two aspects of the cost of living in which the government does have a direct role to play and which are seriously affecting Canadians now—I refer to the increases in the price of petroleum and cars—and considering the fact that General Motors, Chrysler and Ford all have profits substantially higher on the Canadian side of the border than on the U.S. side, according to a government report, would the government now take steps to ensure that the announced price increases which are coming in the automotive industry in January do not take place in Canada, and will he take steps to order the oil companies not to announce price increases in the petroleum sector which are also coming in January?

• (1432)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the price of petroleum in this country has been kept, through enormous subsidies, below world prices, since the fall of 1973. Even the Leader of the NDP should understand that Canada cannot continue to subsidize forever its citizens with the taxpayers money and buy our oil in Canada at prices below world prices. This government, over a period of five years now, has brought these prices up slowly. They are moving towards world prices but have not yet reached them. Canadians will have to realize that the world prices for petroleum, the cost of investment in petroleum research and development in various parts of the world, these prices are at datum and we have to live with that. Once again the government has heavily subsidized in particular the five provinces of this country, and done it partly at the expense of the two western provinces, namely, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The NDP Premier of Saskatchewan has always complained that we have kept his prices too low; the NDP Leader in Ottawa is complaining that prices are too high. Mr. Speaker, this government has taken the view that a gradual phasing in of that price was the proper policy to adopt. But Canadians will have to face reality eventually, they will have to face the fact that those are the world prices for petroleum products.

There was also a second question. Perhaps I can deal with it next, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the Premier of Saskatchewan, contrary to what the Prime Minister is alleging, has always maintained that any price increase should only take place if all the additional revenue were to go to the people of Canada instead of the oil companies, in flat contrast to the policies of this government, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider adopting the policy that has been implemented by the Premier of Saskatchewan for the whole of Canada.

Second, to come back to the question he did not answer that pertains directly to the increases in the consumer price index that were announced today, which pertains to automobiles that are owned by 80 per cent of the Canadian families who are paying anywhere up to $1,000 up more per car than Americans for vehicles produced in Canada, will he stop these companies from increasing the price of cars to Canadians this January?

Mr. Trudeau: In October of 1975 we introduced a measure to control the cost of living, control prices and control incomes. The NDP has never supported it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It has not worked.

Mr. Trudeau: Many of the union leaders in the country have never supported it. We are bringing the controls to an end in April. I find difficulty with the logic of the Leader of the NDP who, now that controls which he never supported are coming off, is saying we should start controlling certain products. It does not seem very logical to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY WHETHER ALL AGENTS OF FORCE WILL BE APPEARING BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Would he tell the House whether his government will bring all cases of RCMP agents provocateurs before the McDonald Commission, including those of agents who have been reported dead, missing or held in jail?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we intend to put before the McDonald Commission all the information we have concerning every aspect of any "irregularity" on the part of the RCMP or of any other security force in this country. We want this royal inquiry commission to know all the information which we have in our possession and which might have any kind of relevance to any irregularity or any misconduct on the part of our police forces.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO DEATH OF MICHEL VIGER

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

In order to further enlighten the House on the very serious cases concerning the 1970 October crisis, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether his government is prepared for instance to inquire into the death of Michel Viger, the one who sheltered and hid those responsible for Pierre Laporte's death? And in spite of all denials that could be made by RCMP authorities, would the Prime Minister agree to bring before the commission all evidence related to the role played by this same Michel Viger within the RCMP?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will do better than that. I will urge the hon. member to testify in person before the commission, to put before this inquiry commission all the information he seems to have in his possession. We are sure that the hon. member will be invited to display all his knowledge and to prove, if he can, the allegations he is putting forward.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether his government will give me the same cooperation as to the government of Quebec? If the answer is similar to the ones given to the House in 1970 and in 1971, or if these questions concern the security of the State, I should like, of course, the Prime Minister to tell me to what extent I may count on his co-operation when I appear before the McDonald Commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to give evidence before this commission on matters coming under federal jurisdiction, namely on the RCMP, he will have the cooperation of the government. If he wants to give evidence before the federal inquiry commission which would tend, for example, to investigate the Quebec Department of Education, on the pretext of telling about some teachers in that province who show their students how to make bombs, we will say that, unfortunately, such facts should not be brought before a federal commission but rather a provincial one.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—REASON FOR UNITED STATES SUCCESS IN COMBATING WITHOUT CONTROLS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Faced with the 10.8 per cent annualized inflation which we have had in the past three months, and bearing in mind the Prime Minister's reference to earlier questions that somehow our inflation record is being unduly influenced by world conditions, would the Prime Minister indicate to the House why the Americans have been able to get their inflation level down to approximately one-third of ours in the past three months to which I have referred, and secondly, could he indicate in what way controls have contributed to our inflation level, bearing in mind that the Americans have succeeded in bringing their inflation down to one-third of our level without controls?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not too difficult to understand. If the hon. member looks at the record of the U.S. performance and Canada's performance in the past three years, he will see that whereas Canada's economy slowed down to the rate of nearly 0 per cent, the U.S. was in a recession; that country's eco..omy was getting smaller by close to six per cent. In that period of time Canadian unemployment was one per cent to two per cent below American unemployment. When you see that trend in an economy, when the American economy actually receded whereas ours was merely growing very slowly, when they had a recession whereas we had a slow-down, when they had very high unemployment compared to high unemployment in Canada, which is now even higher than in the United States, you get deflationary pressures, which means that inflation does not go up quite so fast, which again means that when you reach a recovery stage, recovery from minus six per cent to plus four per cent, recovery is somewhat faster.

These are matters which must be looked at in perspective. In the second part of this question the hon. member asks about controls. He has a figure now on a month-to-month basis which shows high inflation, but he could have looked at any period of time in 1976 and he would have seen that whereas our guidelines for inflation were eight per cent, a factor of six plus two for productivity, the CPI was growing at something like 5.6 per cent on a year-to-year basis. So the hon. member will see that over the long run we have performed much better than our guidelines have shown.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hear guffaws. I ask you, as a reasonable man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INFLATION—EFFECT OF DEVALUATION OF DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the Prime Minister likes to deal with this subject in a very abstract way, as if he has had no hand in the unsatisfactory economic condition of this country at the present time. I noticed the Prime Minister made no reference to devaluation in this country. Would he indicate if he feels devaluation to date has had any hand in raising the inflation level in the country, and if so, how much?

● (1442)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the inflation has an influence in increasing the cost of living in this country.

Mr. Chrétien: Devaluation.

Mr. Trudeau: Devaluation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the Canadian dollar is worth less, it means we have to pay more for our imports. Therefore the price of our imports and our import substitutes are higher, which is an addition to the cost of living. This translates itself into a higher CPI figure. That does not mean there are indigenous forces which are forcing the prices up. This means the world is judging that the Canadian economy is not performing up to par, and therefore, the Canadian dollar is not worth as much. This is why the dollar falls and CPI goes up as a consequence.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's answer with respect to devaluation, I was wondering if he could indicate if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was expressing government policy when he stated last week in this House that he liked the 90 cent dollar, notwithstanding its inflationary impact?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I stated in the throne speech debate that the fact the Canadian dollar was worth less was a signal that we were—

An hon. Member: Worthless!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It was a signal the markets of the world were giving us to the effect that our costs were too high and our productivity was too low.

Mr. Hees: Why don't you do something about that?

Mr. Trudeau: I am being asked once again by the indomitable hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings why we do not do something about it. I will remind the hon. member that when we brought in controls he voted with us.

Mr. Hees: Right.

Mr. Trudeau: The controls have the effect which I stated in my previous answer.

Mr. Hees: But, that did not increase productivity.

Mr. Trudeau: During the entire year of 1976, we had inflationary rates below our objectives, and we outperformed the inflationary projections. Thus, over the long period, we expect to be on target.

Mr. Hees: But, productivity is away down, and you will not do anything about it.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION ON REQUEST OF FRENCH AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS FOR DISAFFILIATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

In December of 1976, Quebec air controllers filed a petition for disaffiliation from CATCA. The hearings of the commission ended in June of 1977, that is six months ago, and since then not a word has been said by the commission about the report it was to produce. Can the minister tell us today when he expects a public announcement about the decision of the Labour Relations Board with regard to the petition of the Quebec air controllers last June?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be surprised if any minister would know that in advance of the commission actually finishing its report; but in any case, the commission does not answer to parliament through me.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: On a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

On November 2 last, the Minister of Transport promised, on behalf of the government, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act so as to give the board the power to grant the petition of the controllers, and the Minister of State responsible for federal-provincial relations reiterated that promise at a later date. In other words, he added that the federal government had said to the Gens de l'Air: "If you lose your appeal before the board, we will grant it through another act". In view of the circumstances, does the minister still intend to keep his promise of November 1976 which, as I said, was confirmed by his colleague, namely that if need be the government would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in order to meet the request of the Gens de l'Air du Québec?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not state accurately the change which was proposed or which was promised. If the hon. member goes back and gets the exact words of our statement at that time, I will inform him that that continues to be our policy. We had discussions with various parties during the course of the last number of months as to when we would make a legislative change or introduce one to the House. There was general agreement not to do so until the judgment of the commission came down.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

REASON FOR DELAY OF FINAL PAYMENT TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Due to a ceiling on borrowing, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation board has decided not to make the final payment of $1.5 million to Manitoba commercial fishermen for the 1975-76 season. The payment was due the first of December. This final payment was to help fishermen to prepare for the winter season and also to provide them and their families with some money for Christmas. Mr. Speaker, this final payment belongs to the fishermen. I ask the minister what action he is taking to ensure that the fishermen will receive this final payment before Christmas. Also, what action is being taken to market the 14 million pounds of fresh fish which is now in cold storage in Winnipeg? Have there been any negotiations with the Food Prices Stabilization Board?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member forgot to indicate that this decision was made by the board. The board of the corporation consists of ten members, four of whom are active fishermen. Also he forgot to indicate that the fishermen received some $4 million over last year's payments to them, because of the chance the corporation took by accepting a much larger volume and having the problems which the corporation now has. The board's decision was made with full knowledge of the facts. The corporation is endeavouring to liquidate the surplus which has been accumulated. At the moment, I will reaffirm my confidence in the board's ability to make this sort of decision.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister why the chairman of the FFMC, at a meeting in Thompson, Manitoba on November 21, with the Northern Manitoba Commercial Fishermen's Association, made absolutely no mention to those fishermen that there would not be a final payment for the 1975-76 season?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the chairman is not a dictator. He consulted the board, and the board made its decision in a vote.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO PERMIT USE OF FRENCH IN ONTARIO COURTS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Since the use of French in the Ontario provincial courts is tolerated only in a discretionary way and without any legal guarantee, and since section 127 of the Ontario Judicature Act formally forbids the use of any other language than English in Ontario courts of justice, what pressures does the Minister of Justice intend to bring to bear on his Ontario counterpart, Mr. McMurtry, to make sure that section 127 of the Judicature Act is amended so as to allow the use of French in all Ontario courts? Moreover, when does the minister intend to table the amendments promised in the Speech from the Throne aimed at correcting that injustice?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, obviously neither I nor this parliament has any authority over the Ontario Judicature Act. Each province is free, under its Judicature Act or its Juries Act, to provide for bilingual juries in civil and criminal trials within its own province. In the Speech from the Throne we announced that we would be proposing amendments to the Criminal Code to make provision for bilingual juries for criminal trials under the Criminal Code. That legislation will be introduced in due course after consultation with provincial attorneys general.

INDUSTRY

PROPOSAL TO STOCKPILE NICKEL TO PROTECT JOBS AND COMMUNITIES IN SUDBURY AREA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the people of the Sudbury basin are disgusted with this government's callous and insensitive attitude toward the lay-off notices of INCO and Falconbridge, which can be proven by the 30,000 signatures and cards that I have; in view of the fact that the Sudbury Regional Council last Saturday unanimously voted to call on the government to stockpile nickel; and in view of the fact that France has undertaken the stockpiling of nickel since 1975, can the Prime Minister tell this House, in light of this information and in light of the massive damage unemployment will do to the thousands of families in the Sudbury basin, Thompson and Port Colborne, if he is now prepared to undertake a program of temporarily stockpiling nickel in order to protect the economic integrity of the Sudbury basin and the jobs of the people who will be affected.

● (1452)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the steelworkers union who represent the Sudbury workers attended a meeting with government ministers and officials this morning. A very important discussion took place during which several proposals were made by both sides, and I am confident that with this type of co-operation the unfortunate circumstances prevailing in Sudbury will be alleviated.

RESOURCES

SUGGESTION INCO AND FALCONBRIDGE OFFICIALS APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE TO EXPLAIN METHOD OF OPERATION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that an internal government study recently made public states that the INCO operation in Sudbury is highgrading, a mining process whereby the lower grade ores are bypassed or used as backfill, and in view of the fact that this will make those lower grade ores much more difficult to recover economically and may in fact reduce the useful life of the Sudbury ore bed by many years, can the minister inform the House if he intends to call the management of INCO and Falconbridge before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works so that we can find out the manner in which they are husbanding, exploiting and developing this non-renewable and depleting resource?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have already met with senior officials of INCO and asked them for the information they are in the process of supplying to the Ontario government. I believe that is the kind of information to which the hon. member is referring.

TRADE

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF TEMPORARY TARIFF ON IMPORTED NICKEL CARBONATE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I have not had much success, I will now turn to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: Lots of luck.

Mr. Hees: That will be a dead end.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Canada is still importing raw nickel carbonate from Australia for processing at the Sherritt Gordon refinery at Fort Saskatchewan which is then sold to the Royal Canadian Mint for coinage, can the minister tell the House if at this time of high unemployment in the nickel industry he is prepared to impose a temporary import tariff on raw nickel in order to protect the jobs of workers in Thompson, Manitoba and Port Colborne and Sudbury, Ontario?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this matter will be looked into.

ENERGY

LA PRADE HEAVY WATER PLANT—REASON FOR INCREASE IN COST ESTIMATE

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House well remembers that last July 18 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to give me an up-to-date estimate of the total construction cost of the La Prade heavy water plant which is being built by and for AECL, one of the minister's Crown corporations, near Gentilly, Quebec. Now, six months later, I have finally received a letter from the Minister. I am sure there is a misprint or a typing error in the letter because it indicates that instead of being $453 million the total estimate is now $846 million. That is almost $400 million more than the original estimate of just a few years ago. Is this a typing error? Is there some mistake? Can the minister confirm that this figure, which is almost double the loss on the Argentinian fiasco, is the correct figure?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had been doing his homework, as he claims he has been, he would have known that the chairman of AECL provided information to the committee of which the hon. member is supposed to be a regular member.

I suppose there are occasions when the hon. member cannot to present, but if he had been present or if he had read the transcript he would know that the figure earlier in the year was of the order of $751 million. However, that did not include, as my letter indicates, some $50 million of subsidiary or secondary services supplied by Hydro Quebec. That is why the figure he has is higher. There is an escalation in the estimates of about 5 per cent. This is a very large capital project, and the hon. member must know that the cost of very large capital projects in this country, as in other countries, has a habit of escalating during inflationary times.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the original estimate of $453 million increased by 5 per cent can equal $846 million. Is this the new math? Inflation is hitting this country hard, but not that hard. Would the minister please explain what other factors besides inflation contribute to this financial sinkhole which the minister refuses to supervise or control.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Lawrence: Sinkhole, s-i-n-k. It is a financial sinkhole.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Buchanan: There is only one "Sinc" around here.

Mr. Lawrence: What factors other than inflation affect the construction costs with respect to this matter?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member should go back, do his homework and read the transcript of the committee meeting.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN MODERNIZING SYDNEY STEEL MILL

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He recently had discussions with the provincial premiers. During his meeting with Premier Regan did the question of federal financial assistance regarding the modernization and rejuvenation of the steel mill operated by the provincial crown corporation, SYSCO, at Sydney, come up? As the right hon. gentleman knows, if proceeded with, such a program would provide quite a number of jobs. Can he tell the House if he has anything encouraging to report on this matter as a result of his meeting with Premier Regan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my private meetings with the various premiers they undertook to concentrate on the overall economic picture, but some time was left in my meetings with them to raise bilateral matters such as the one raised by the hon. member in his question.

Various premiers made several points relative to their provinces, and instead of making a long and indiscreet revelation of all the points they raised with me I prefer to say in general terms that many points of strictly provincial interest were brought to my attention. Those matters could have an impact on the overall economic situation. Premier Regan indeed mentioned several local and provincial projects.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

BANK ACT

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that business requires much more easy financing, is the minister in a position to say when he will bring in amendments to the Bank Act and whether this will happen before Christmas, or is he thinking that he will require only a one-line amendment to postpone the deadline date of the Bank Act?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be introducing today a bill to extend for one year the operation of the Bank Act. I will be introducing additional legislation as early as possible when we come back in January so that the committee will be able to start the very difficult work of reviewing the Bank Act again.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What a courageous government!

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXPECTATIONS FOR PRICES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport by virtue of his being in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. What has he to say by way of encouragement to the western farmer concerning the degree to which the price of wheat has gone down in the last couple of years? What are the expectations, having regard to the tremendous increase in the cost of production and the fact that wheat prices today are scarcely higher than the cost of production?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are quite a few encouraging things to say. The price of wheat has gone up some 80 cents or 90 cents since its low point last August. That is very encouraging. While that is not the total answer, exports of wheat are at absolutely stupendous levels and will be very much higher than last year. In the course of this year we will have delivered and sold not only our whole crop but likely 100 million to 150 million bushels of reserves from the previous year as well.

In addition, we have made it part of the law of the land that there is a grain stabilization program which does take cost of production into account. That can be a very significant income support to farmers in the event their net cash position deteriorates. In addition to all that, we have held the initial prices of wheat, barley and oats at levels higher than might ordinarily be expected, having regard to what the level of those prices was. This government has always recognized the importance of the grain farmer and his production to this country and accordingly took that risk.

● (1502)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today the minister has conveniently divided one of his speeches—a summary of what he has been delivering. I should like to ask him what he meant when he said in Melfort the other day:

However, in the case of wheat, costs of production have increased so sharply that several successive years of reduced returns might very well put a producer out of business—

Was he speaking of fact then in his very enthusiastic personalized statement that the western farmer cannot accept, or was he simply trying to cover up the fact that he realizes an international wheat organization cannot be secured?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am a little puzzled by the right hon. gentleman's question. I have not been in Melfort for many, many months. He may be confusing me with Roy Atkinson. Certainly, I know no two sources more reputed for gloom than Roy Atkinson and the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have before me a copy of the Melfort Journal of November 30.

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says he has not been there. All I have to say is that he must have been in dreamland because what he said is reported and the western farmer realizes that it is the usual nonsense that he produces.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, not only was I not there but I should just like to say that does not express my view. My view is of course that low prices such as we saw last August are unacceptable from the point of view of the grain farmer—quite unacceptable from the point of view of cost of production. That is why I have been dedicating so much of my effort not only to programs like grains stabilization, not only to wheat sales and farm credit but also to trying to get the best international wheat agreement which will assure a proper return for our farmers.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—PRIME MINISTER'S REPLY TO QUESTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rose on a question of privilege yesterday involving the Prime Minister, who has just darted out of the chamber like a scared rabbit. I rose on a question of privilege involving an answer the Prime Minister gave last Friday, which he now has had his agents contradict outside the House, which is embarrassing to the United States ambassador. The Prime Minister stated that a diplomatic note had been sent to the U.S. ambassador complaining that he is running—

An hon. Member: He has darted back.

Mr. Crosbie: Since the Prime Minister has returned, Mr. Speaker, I shall sit down and see if he is going to answer the point.

An hon. Member: What point?

Mr. Crosbie: My point is that on Friday the Prime Minister stated that he had sent a diplomatic note to the United States government complaining that this government was sick and tired of the United States ambassador running around talking about free trade. This was to back up a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in a speech on November 29, in Hamilton, to the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. At that time, the Minister of Agriculture said that he was sick and tired of the U.S. ambassador running around talking about free trade.

Last Friday, the Prime Minister stated that a diplomatic note conveying that view had been sent to the United States authorities. I want to know whether this is so, and whether his agents who spoke outside this House and who have no status in this House, no matter who they are or how awe-inspiring they may be outside, are correct. If no note has been sent to the United States authorities, has any verbal or written objection been sent protesting or complaining about the statements or actions of their ambassador in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member did not himself use a little bit of ingenuity to find the answer to this apparent contradiction. It could easily have been done, even by him, if he had referred to his own question in Hansard at page 1729. The hon. member, as often happens, was very wordy, very verbose and rambled on and on. He asked two questions and the Hansard reporter was perceptive enough to put them in two paragraphs. There was a first question and there was what the hon. member calls a supplementary question. My "Yes" answered the first question, Mr. Speaker, and by the time he got into the supplementary I had dozed off.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised a question of privilege. He raised it yesterday, exposing an answer he had received which he said was evidently misleading. The process which we always follow is that an hon. member who is alleged to have made some remark or answer which may be misleading is entitled to give an explanation of his answer. The right hon. Prime Minister has done that. The matter does not constitute a question of privilege; it constitutes a question of disagreement on the interpretation of questions and answers given. It is a matter for discussion and debate, not a question of privilege.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have here some 30,000 cards which are signed and which call on the government to do three specific things, namely, to rescind the lay-off orders at Inco and Falconbridge, to make sure that any tax concessions are related to job creation, and to develop industrial strategies for communities like Sudbury. I know that this does not follow exactly the form of a petition, but it clearly calls on the government to do three specific things. I would appreciate it very much if Your Honour would put a question to the House and ask it to receive unanimously these 30,000 cards signed by 30,000 people in the Sudbury basin as a petition to the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member wants to present those 30,000 signatures as a petition, it would require only a minor adjustment in form, on which the House may give him some advice. There is, however, no opportunity for the House to amend its already established procedures in that regard.

Order Paper Questions

HMCS "ASSINIBOINE"

Question No. 414—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What are the details concerning the unscheduled docking of HMCS Assiniboine which resulted in Shelburne Marine Ltd. of Shelburne, Nova Scotia getting a $110,062 contract?

2. Were there other costs in connection with the unscheduled docking?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. In reply to a request for proposal, Saint John Shipbuilding and Drydock Co. Ltd., Saint John, N.B. offered a price of $172,754.58 for the known work, plus an allowance of $31,558 for estimated work arising, for a total estimated cost of $204,312.58. The Department of Supply and Services judged the price to be unacceptable and issued an invitation to tender to six companies. Only one bid was received, that of Saint John Shipbuilding and Drydock Co. Ltd. who tendered the same price as before. DSS did not consider this price to be acceptable for the work to be performed and led them to seek another source. As it happened, the delay in finalizing the price with Saint John Shipbuilding allowed another company to bid on the requirement since, in the interim, that company's docking facilities had been certified by DND as being able to dock the vessel concerned. Shelburne Marine Limited submitted a price of $110,061.68 for the known work plus an allowance of $30,540 for a like amount of work arising, as considered for Saint John Shipbuilding, for a total estimated cost of $140,601.68. The contract was therefore awarded to Shelburne and negotiations were terminated with Saint John Shipbuilding and Drydock Co. Ltd.

2. The total job including all work arising was completed at $146,914.36.

Question No. 435—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did Ian Martin and Associates Ltd., Ottawa, receive a contract numbered 08MY.3616002-11 for $45,108 for technical services-Leopard Tanks and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) were there personnel in the Department of National Defence who were competent to perform such services?

On all major DND contracts it is the practice to have a technical representative in the contractor's plant representing the operational and technical agencies of National Defence Headquarters. In regard to this major contract there was a need to supplement the skilled manpower available to DND by one additional skilled engineer knowledgeable of tanks. This engineer will be located as a DND technical representative, at the contractor's plant.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): 1. The implementation of the Bilingualism Bonus has been effected relatively quickly and employees are either in the process of now receiving the Bilingualism Bonus payment or are being notified that it is forthcoming. (a) Unilingual persons filling an identified bilingual position are not eligible for the bonus; (b) Yes, a degree of competence in the second language will be necessary. Each bilingual position has been assigned a linguistic competence level. Position incumbents are tested by the Public Service Commission to determine whether or not they meet the required level.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, December 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this bill has had considerable examination; in fact, longer than the government wanted. After two weeks in committee, I still have a few comments to add. I refer, first, to the statement that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) included in his economic and fiscal statement. At page 8, he said this:

First, I am cutting taxes for low and middle income taxpayers by $100.

He went on to say how that was to be done in order that there would be stimulation in the economy during the months of January and February. In committee, I raised the matter of these cuts with the minister or his parliamentary secretary, and asked whether they would really be effective. It had been drawn to my attention, through negotiations with the Minister of Finance and the ministers of finance for the provinces, that certain adjustments had been made in provincial tax rates, resulting in substantially increased provincial income tax rates.

A constituent of mine who is an income tax consultant worked out two examples, and I was able to show the minister that in fact a taxpayer would not be saving the amount of money through the tax cuts for which the Minister of Finance took credit. In some cases it would appear that with the increase in provincial tax rates, even though the federal rates had dropped, giving a saving in federal taxes, the additional increase in provincial taxes would actually result in a much smaller gain, or in some cases a loss. In other words, the taxpayer would end up paying more than he had previously.

Whilst we are at third reading stage of this bill I would like to refer to the life insurance provisions. We note the minister's own words at page 9 of his economic and fiscal statement. He said:

As a result of representations from members on all sides of the House, I will not be proceeding at this time with the measure for taxing the investment income realized by a policyholder on the death of the person insured.

It is nice to know, Mr. Speaker, that the government can be influenced by pressure. I wonder, at times, why they bring these things in in the first place. If they had thought them through initially, they would not have had the problem. During the committee stage, the minister introduced amendments which we were only too willing to receive on this side of the House. Interest on loans really is interest on loans, and following the time-honoured traditions of the Income Tax Act, money laid out to produce income should be deductible for income tax purposes.

We on this side of the House felt it was only fair that this should apply to anyone who has borrowed—it does not matter whether it is a policy loan—and some arguments were made that it is not really a loan when you borrow from an insurance company. I never could follow that argument. In any event, the government has finally realized that interest paid on that kind of loan should continue to be deductible. We welcome that move.

Now, this 3 per cent inventory allowance which may affect some individuals was, in the admission of the parliamentary secretary, an arbitrary figure. There does not seem to be any logical basis for having chosen 3 per cent. However, if one looks at the inflation rate, which surely must affect inventories as well as everything else, 3 per cent on inventories at a time when we have inflation of 8 per cent or 9 per cent is not going to have the desired affect. It certainly will not solve the problem. The reason for having this provision in the first place was so that inflationary profits would not be taxed, and the effort that is being put forth by this 3 per cent allowance will not solve that problem.

I asked the minister, during the committee stage, why the last in, first out method had not been examined. I believe it was the parliamentary secretary who replied that it had been considered but was deemed to be more complicated. As an accountant, I wonder what could be fairer than trying to match current costs, that is, inventory purchases of today, with current revenues, that is, sales of today. It has always been a principle of good accounting practice that current costs should be matched against current revenues. However, the government do not seem to have gone that route and we are glad they are doing something in the area of relief on inventories, but I am not sure they have chosen the correct route.

I now turn respect to clause 16(2) of the bill. I should like to read part of it:

"15) That where a resident taxpayer so elects in his return of income for his 1977 or any subsequent taxation year, all his gains and losses for the year and all subsequent years from the disposition of shares (other than prescribed shares), bonds, debentures, notes or similar obligations issued by a Canadian Corporation shall be deemed to be capital gains and capital losses of the taxpayer, except where the taxpayer is a dealer or trader in securities—

● (1522)

There is a fundamental problem contained in this little section. I see it as the government digging a great big hole beside the taxpayer and inviting him to fall into it. I wish to refer to the committee hearings because the questions and answers are quite important here. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) asked whether it was going to affect individuals, entrepreneurs, explorers, and so on. He was talking about corporations. The parliamentary secretary said:

Mr. Chairman, this clause is written not only to assist individuals, but primarily venture investment corporations.

There we have it. It is designed to do both things, help venture corporations and assist individuals. There we have it in the words of the government. As reported at page 1739 of Hansard, I asked the parliamentary secretary the following question:

It it possible that subclause (2) could be used to the peril of an individual taxpayer who makes an election? I presume it is one he makes for life. A taxpayer might find himself in a position where he was in the business of trading in securities. If he had not made that election, he would have the right to declare his income and losses in the regular way. What about the man who might find himself in such a position?

The parliamentary secretary replied:

The hon. member is correct: it is a very difficult decision for an individual to make.

Already, under the law, an individual who is selling securities has the right, without making any election, to declare his gains and losses as capital gains and losses. Already, under the existing legislation, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) has the right to decide that that individual is in the business of trading or dealing in securities and to say that the income therefrom is not a capital gain but, rather, is income in the ordinary course of a taxpayer's business.

A taxpayer can already make that decision on a year by year basis. The government can already make the claim, which the taxpayer would have to disprove, that he is not entitled to make that declaration of that gain as a capital gain. What is the purpose of having a section like this, which is supposed to aid the individual, when obviously if you follow it through only harm will come to the taxpayer? If he makes the election, he has made it for life. That is quite clear. He can no longer go back and say that he wants to be in the business, if he should happen to be in the business; but the government has the option to come along later and say that in fact he was in the business.

I have another reference to the committee debate on this same point. I was quite surprised at the results. After lunch, on the same day, I asked the government about that election. I stated that I was concerned about this because it appeared to affect individual taxpayers as well as promoters and developers. I pointed out to the government as follows:

When an individual resident of Canada decides to make an election, he is bound by that election for the rest of his taxpaying years.

I explained to the government:

Subclause (2) (5) indicates that an election under subsection (4) does not apply to a disposition of a Canadian security by a taxpayer who, at the time the security is disposed of, is a trader or dealer in securities.

That is quite clear. The response by the parliamentary secretary was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the answer to the question is yes. There is always a question of fact to be resolved in cases of this nature.

I asked:

Why did the government feel it was necessary or desirable to dig this large hole for taxpayers to fall into?

The parliamentary secretary replied:

I think that most individuals will know whether we are dealing in capital losses or gains, but the basic premise is to try to reduce uncertainty where there is doubt.

I submit the government has not done that at all. All they have done is put this terrible problem before the taxpayer who already has many problems arising out of the tax system. I do not want to take any more of the time of the House than necessary. I will conclude by urging the government to look at these situations before putting them into the proposed legislation which, with the action of closure that was imposed by the government on the House, means that these problems are not solved.

Since 1970, this government has been promising us simplicity and equity in our income tax law. That was the reason given for the tax reform legislation put before this parliament. It is obvious to anyone who has been studying Bill C-11, and to all taxpayers in Canada who in the next four months will be wrestling with their income tax returns, that we have neither simplicity nor equity in the tax system in Canada.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to thank the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) for pointing out an error which I had not noticed previously. At page 1742, instead of "we are dealing in capital losses or gains", it should read "they are dealing in capital losses or gains". I thank the hon. member for bringing that to my attention: I had missed it.

[Mr. Clarke.]

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, even if, like the government and my colleagues, I would like to end the study of Bill C-11, I will want to participate in the debate on third reading to make some positive criticism on this piece of legislation.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that a bill with 116 clauses could not be studied in one scoop. As far as we are concerned, the government has no reason to complain about filibuster because we have limited our speeches as much as possible. However, it is our duty to express our views by defending the interests of our constituents. First of all, I appreciate that the employment expense allowance has been increased from $150 to $250 starting from 1977. However, it is not sufficient. The government should consider that workers who must travel a long way to and from work have increasing expenses because of inflation. Corporations have the privilege of entering the travelling expenses of their employees as deductible expenses but it is not the same for an individual. Therefore, my colleague the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) put forward an amendment to clause 4 of the bill proposing to raise the deductible amount to $400. The amendment was turned down by the government majority.

I therefore urge once again the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to accept an amendment increasing the deduction to at least $400. I think that would be fair to workers who must necessarily incur expenses each day to go to work. The government is now convinced that it is urgent to boost personal income to stimulate the national economy and for that purpose, it is granting a $100 income tax reduction. Taking into account the fact that individuals get only 40 per cent of the national income comparatively to 60 per cent for corporations, while individuals pay 60 per cent of taxes and corporations only 40 per cent, it is urgent that the government seriously consider a readjustment of tax distribution to make it more reasonable.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-11 provides an economic incentive for the Maritimes and the Gaspé Peninsula through tax benefits. However, I wonder why the Minister of Finance has excluded from those benefits the south shore area between Lévis and Rivière-du-Loup. I even wrote to the Minister of Finance in that connection to ask him to introduce an amendment to clause 60(10) to include in Bill C-11 the Bellechasse constituency which is part of the south shore. Unfortunately, the amendment was not introduced, so the industrialists and private concerns of this area will be deprived of those benefits since, even if they are limited it is with those scraps that an area can develop and provide employment for workers. Montmagny is a town of 13,000 inhabitants founded many years ago with many activities, but it has remained stagnant for some years, not because it has been represented in the Canadian Parliament by this speaker, this is not important, because what is important is to use local benefits, in Montmagny as elsewhere, to urge the industries to grow and other individuals to set up business to allow a normal development.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give an example. There are three textile industries in Montmagny and it is because of the tenacity of the administrators of those industries that they have managed to survive, even if the number of jobs has come down. I would like to give certified figures which do show that imports have had harmful effects on the development of the industries located in Montmagny. For example, take the case of Bermatex Inc., an industry which was set up a few years ago and provided many jobs. That little business provided a livelihood for 60 people three years ago. Today, as I am speaking to you, there are about 37. This means that there has been a substantial drop. Yet in spite of all the inconveniences, the fact is that the price for a pound of texturized polyester thread, which was $1.85 three years ago, is now $1.30. That is why I say the administrators of those companies are making unbelievable efforts to try and continue to operate and maintain a reasonable level of employment.

In 1973, only four years ago, Consolidated Textiles provided employment for 187 people and there are now 123. And in 1975 the company had to make a choice: close its doors or continue to operate without profit. It chose the second option and continued to operate with very modest or no profits. So, for the last two years, the Montmagny plant has been operating at near capacity but it must sell its product at cost prices. It is also producing inventory but it is starting to get very high. These are details I obtained from the administrators themselves. They cannot do any long-term planning now because of market uncertainty and they could very well be closing down in a month or two. They have been waiting for an economic recovery for two years and they are beginning to get discouraged.

I also met the owners of Dionne Spinning. They told me of their concerns about the market because of massive imports which are not curbed fast enough and if we continue in that direction, we are soon going to see another gearing down in the operations of those textile companies. Unemployment is going to go up and we are going to find ourselves in an excessively serious situation.

To administer is to foresee; that is why I draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) those very important matters. I should also like to give some figures to prove what I just said about the textile industry. In 1976, retail sales in the clothing industry amounted to $5.5 billion in Canada. The textile and clothing industries give employment to 200,000 Canadian workers. Those jobs represent one in twelve in the Canadian manufacturing industry. In Quebec, those jobs represent one in four jobs. In other words, they have considerable importance, representing as they do 70 per cent of all manufactures and 65 per cent of all jobs in the Quebec clothing industry.

● (1542)

But Quebec city is in Canada, and I hope that it will continue to be, even though some people occasionally try to spread the rumor that the Social Credit Party of Canada is a separatist party. For my part, I do not believe this. I know what I am. I am in favor of a true Canada, but I want all the regions of Canada to be treated fairly. This is what a central government should do. It should ensure fair distribution and give equal opportunities to all areas of the country, and when one area has certain economic difficulties, it is the responsibility of the federal government to take action and try to give special treatment to this area so that its residents can have a standard of living that is at least equal to that of other Canadians. Mr. Speaker, more than ever today, we must find immediate answers to help the remote areas of Canada since the businesses, companies and industries which operate in these areas do not have the same advantages as those in large centres. This is why there must be special programs to enable those businesses to operate at a production cost comparable to that of plants established in major centres so that they will receive orders for their products, sell those products, stay in business and give employment to the workers of the area who will then be able to pay the same taxes as other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, many of these businesses are in small communities which depend on them for their survival. These industries are established in high unemployment areas. I would like to quote a few figures to show that the Textile and Clothing Import Control Board did not do its job. From 1970 to 1976, imports increased by 145 per cent. Imports from Taiwan increased from 973,000 units in 1961 to 80 million units in 1976. Imports from the Republic of Korea increased by 1,000 per cent between 1970 and 1976. Mr. Speaker, clothing imports per capita in Canada are among the largest in the world. But the percentage of total Canadian imports subject to limitations are among the smallest. In the United States for instance 71 per cent of imports are restricted and Americans spend $11.50 per capita on imported clothing.

What is then the situation in Canada? Only 7 per cent of imports are restricted while Canadians spend $19.50 per capita on imported clothing. That is why I say that while the 1970 Canadian textile policy may have helped the Canadian industry, it certainly did not succeed in curbing the steady rise of imports. Even the new quotas imposed on November 29, 1977 did not bring much change. Again, we must acknowledge the failure of this policy since it has not led to significant improvement.

Mr. Speaker, I shall quote another example: Old quotas allowed the importation of 726,000 sweaters from the Republic of Korea. New quotas allowed the importation of 704,000 sweaters over the same period of time, that is only a 3 per cent reduction, which is not enough. Now, as far as the market is concerned, in 1971, the domestic market share was 73 per cent and the importation market share, 27 per cent. In 1976, importations accounted for 45 per cent of the Canadian market while in 1975, they were almost stable. One year later, they had increased by 10 per cent while the domestic market fell from 73 per cent in 1971 down to 55 per cent of the market.

Mr. Speaker, I quoted those figures to demonstrate that we should apply our control policy more strictly to help our industries face these difficult times. It may seem a good idea to import sweaters for $3.00 when it cost $3.25 to manufacture them in Canada. There is a 25 cent difference, but if our youth is unemployed, do you think we are better off buying those sweaters for $3.00 when with 25 cents more we could buy them here and provide jobs for our people? If we keep buying foreign goods because it is cheaper, while Canadian workers are unemployed or on welfare, we can be sure of one thing: People who are working will be taxed and overtaxed and one day or the other, they will get discouraged and refuse to support all those who are doing nothing while they have to work around the clock.

Mr. Speaker, here again it is the duty of the government to use every possible means to give all able bodied men and women an opportunity to contribute to the gross national product and work in our country even if it means spending a few dollars more on consumer goods.

We just voted before the weekend special estimates under which the government is empowered to borrow an amount of $9 billion for administrative purposes in Canada. And certainly, what with the borrowing policy of this government and the public sector financing needs, a major part of those $9 billion will go in debt servicing. Further opportunities for profit will be given to those who are in control, who have the monopoly over the process of monetizing the nation's credit. This is the most outraging aspect of the management of public affairs. In this country, we are forced to crawl before those who control the nation's credit in order to produce things, to ensure the services needed by the people.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to put forward a proposal to change the situation. We are told sometimes that we never make any positive suggestions, well I just made one, and I would like to make another. Namely that the federal tax on building materials be lowered. That tax significantly increases building costs because it adds to the cost of materials and to the provincial tax. Tax over tax, this is senseless. What would happen if we abolished the tax on building materials? I am just about convinced that if we lowered the interest rates and the tax on building materials, then we would see the realization of many projects dear to the hearts of Canadians. Construction would gain momentum. Masons would be at work and so would bricklayers. For houses and buildings made out of bricks, bricklayers would be necessary, carpenters and day labourers would be at work, as would roofers, electricians, plumbers, merchants and those people who engage in transportation. Just imagine the impact of two such proposals as lowering interest rates and lowering or repealing the tax on building materials. Just imagine how many workers could be given employment, not to mention office personnel who would have more work to perform because there would be more invoicing, more collections, more phone calls, more communications—

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Nystrom: Except for the economists!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Except for the economists, that's right, for they work only when everything goes well. They give recipes when everything is working well. But when everything goes sour, they just withdraw by saying: Find your own solution to your problems! This is just about what they are doing with this present government which has to tackle with major problems and even if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said today that economists have told him that only Japan is going to be in a better economic position than Canada next year you may find another economist who is going to say just the opposite in January. They are not numerous yet they cannot seem to agree among themselves.

It is quite a problem today to trust economists. Why? Not because they do not know anything. Of course not. Indeed they know a lot of things, but they want to administer in 1977-78 with old formulas dating back to 25, 30 or 40 years ago, when there were fewer innovations, less progress than today, when it took more manpower to accomplish all sorts of things. They want to administer in the same way, though it is impossible. We are not going to scrap our tractors, do away with innovations for the sheer pleasure of saying that we are going to put men to work. If this is the objective, if such are the formulas chosen by our economists . . . Incidently during the weekend I saw a power shovel in my riding and it did a very good job, there was only one operator, but if we are to do away with progress and innovations in order to be in tune with the spirit of the day, namely to hire 100 workers with small shovels that are three feet long, small round shovels, and if there are still people without jobs, to hire them to work with teaspoons, that does not make any sense. What is being suggested to us looks very much like that.

Mr. Speaker, there is also an electrical panel box manufacture in Montmagny; its operations were a real success and helped, I believe, 90 workers; today it has barely 30 employees and the business is having a hard time of it. Why? Because construction is at a standstill, the plant gets no orders and therefore manufacturing has stopped. In other words, the situation is really serious on the south shore. That is why I should have liked the Minister of Finance to take that into account in clause 60(10) of Bill C-11. I am asking him once again to consider seriously the possibility of amending that clause.

I should also like to speak for a few minutes of a problem concerning the Canadian economy. Unfortunately, as early as a month or even five weeks ago, too many of our dairy producers exhausted their quotas until next April. To those of them who send their milk to the processing plant, a penalty will apply, namely a fine of $7 per hundredweight. It is better for them not to send it. If they do not deliver it, the milk will have to be thrown away and this does not pay much. These people have obligations to meet, they must live and if we do not find a way out pretty soon, many of them will go bankrupt. The bank will force them to go under; because they have obligations, whatever they own is mortgaged, and they will go belly up. Yesterday I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to find out if the research staff in his department have done something to use more powdered milk. The problem is, when we make butter we have to make powdered milk. This powder is sold on the world market at a lower price than the support price on the domestic market, and producers are paying for the difference in order to maintain our dairy industry and from time to time the government also grants subsidies to compensate and adequately sustain the dairy industry.

Sometimes we can even hear some members say: consumers are paying for that. Consumers are being penalized. Mr. Speaker, as regards the subsidy of $2.66 per hundredweight which the government gives to industrial milk producers, if the government did not subsidize them, consumers would have to pay for it because the value of the product depends upon the established support price. Therefore I say it is the duty of the government to maintain our dairy industry but without imposing too heavy a burden on the consumer. That is why this support policy is a good one and I want to say it. This policy must be maintained. But given the surpluses in milk powder inventories, some feed and milk producers have made the suggestion—which I made yesterday to the minister and which I repeat again today because I feel it is worth considering carefully—that more powdered milk be used in animal feed.

How could that be done? I believe this powder should be sold to feed producers at the same price as elsewhere, it would then result in a homemade production, to be used at home. Therefore, we would be in a position to lower our inventories and to enable those who are presently without quotas to have some in January or February of next year. At least let us consider the issue, let us be serious about it. We have qualified people who can do this kind of research and get at the root of the matter. We should move immediately before it is too late, because that is now the only industry, the main industry in Quebec which ensures a rather stable income to most farmers. That is why once again I am urging the government to go ahead without any hesitation. If we spend money on research in this field, it will be a good investment and you can be sure that Canadians would not be angry at the officials who will make such a decision. I hope these few remarks I wanted to make on third reading of the bill will make the government understand that hon. members are here to represent the people and to submit their problems and bring to the attention of the government a number of solutions we sincerely find appropriate. We have nothing to lose by trying them. Those we have tried have put us on the verge of bankruptcy and cost us money, so it could not be worse than it was.

[English]

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there has been a multitude of complaints lodged by the government that this procedure has taken a little too long to suit them. I think it has taken too long because the government has continuously assumed an adamant position which is unacceptable to a great many Canadians.

Any government which is prepared to recognize the demands which the public is making to give the concessions which are necessary to facilitate the economic development of this country can expect to get support from all parties in the House, and can expect that there will be reasonable limitation of time consumed in the debate of amendments to the budget. But as long as virtually all of the subjects which have been suggested for change have been called out of order, or by other means given no consideration, certain members of the House will make remarks in addition to those they have already made.

On behalf of those who have been helped by the moderate changes which have been made, I want to express appreciation. While there was a change in the insurance structure, the government was not prepared to go all the way. They would not recognize that basically there are those whose only estate when they leave this world may very well be their insurance, whose only means of borrowing may be their insurance. They have ignored this, and they have taken a step in the wrong direction inasmuch as those who might have practised an element of frugality, who might have desired to be self-dependent and not at a later date dependent upon the state, have instead been denied that by the introduction of frivolous and discouraging tax regulations remaining in respect of the life insurance industry.

On behalf of the multitude of Canadians who have used this as their means to acquire self-dependence rather than government dependence, let me say that I think the government has taken a very retrograde step in leaving any part of that insurance legislation in place.

There are other subjects which have been mentioned in the House in a very repetitive way and to which the government has paid little attention. The preceding speaker constantly takes in this House the part of the farmer. I commend him for that, because there are too few voices on Your Honour's right to have any influence; therefore, the voices must come from Your Honour's left. The problem of the transfer of farm property has been recognized to some degree by the government, but the fact that federal and provincial governments have encouraged farmers to incorporate has been ignored. There is no vehicle available to transfer the incorporated farm to the next generation without the imposition of capital gains tax.

I received a telephone call this morning from a family of six, a father and five sons. They accepted the encouragement of the governments to incorporate. The sons have worked for their father, at virtually no return to themselves, in order to establish a rather valuable property. The have watched the land enhance in value. Now they are faced with the fact that their father is not as young as he was and there is no vehicle for that family to retain the farm if the father passes away. The enhancement of land value in their area is such that they would have to sell in order to pay capital gains tax.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is familiar with this problem. I plead with him to have the problem recognized at the next cabinet meeting and before the next budget. Farmers should not be left stranded, which is the case at the moment. The corporate tax return of the farmer is beyond the ordinary farmer's means. He does not understand it and is required to employ a qualified accountant. If a farmer filed his income tax return as an ordinary wage earner, he would break the law in many ways. I appeal to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is a farmer, to look at this provision and to have it changed in the next budget.

Many phases of agriculture have suffered hard times as a result of lack of protection for certain products grown in Canada and, to a degree, imported from foreign sources. For the last four years this fact has been a topic of discussion among the various farm organizations. Because of the tariff report and its various recommendations, once again farmers are protesting that it does not meet the needs of certain aspects of New Brunswick agriculture.

If the recommendations of the Horticultural Council and the National Food Processors' Association were accepted, and if the duty were imposed upon imported processed and fresh foods, the cost to Canadians would be 48 cents each per year, which is less than the cost of two cups of coffee. That is what it would cost consumers to provide an element of protection to the Canadian agricultural industry. Such protection would increase processing and the production of many horticultural products. This would increase employment, particularly as it relates to the agricultural area.

These recommendations have fallen on deaf ears. The opposition has requested that the problem of tariffs be referred to a committee of the House. Also, they have requested that the various organizations in the agricultural field appear before that committee, in the presence of our GATT negotiators, in order to put the cards on the table so that the problems will be understood first-hand. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) promised a few weeks ago that I would receive an immediate answer on that subject. The question has been repeated and it was presented under Standing Order 43. Still no action has been taken.

The Canadian negotiator who will deal with agricultural products in Geneva is in Ottawa until December 21. I appeal to the government to immediately convene a committee of this House, while agricultural representatives are here for the Outlook Conference and while the Geneva negotiator is here. That committee should convene tomorrow morning in order to have farmers, negotiators and members of this House exchanging views on what Canada requires. We require action, which was not included in the amendments to the budget. No doubt my suggestion will be ignored.

When the agricultural chemical industry of Canada was in trouble, restrictions were imposed on the import action of chemicals by farmers, which resulted in a 50 per cent increase in the cost of their chemical requirements in the pesticides field. Why cannot the users be protected to the same degree as the chemical pesticides industry? Why cannot we receive something for something? I do not quarrel with the protection of that industry; I quarrel with the downright, flagrant neglect of the protection required for a healthy agricultural industry.

Complaints have been received because containers were coming into Canada too cheaply. The can manufacturers received a 30 per cent duty on cans coming into Canada. I do not quarrel with that, because it provides some Canadian employment. However, I quarrel with cans being filled with food produced by Canadians and being sold at prices which Canadians cannot afford. There must be an element of protection for our industry as a whole, but certainly it should be extended to agriculture. Agriculture has requested a surtax, or a vehicle by which the importation of products which destroy various sectors of our horticultural industry is prohibited. There has been no mention of a surtax, no suggestion that it will be part of the structure which will be negotiated at the next meetings to be held in Geneva.

Farmers cannot find adequate vehicles in order to move their products safely from coast to coast. There was nothing in the mini-budget to stimulate transportation in order to move horticultural products. Hon. members opposite want this legislation passed in a hurry, but this is our only opportunity to discuss the subject.

There have been complaints regarding the effect of capital gains. Last night I discussed this problem with a gentleman who indicated that there was an excellent business opportunity in his community. He indicated that his family could establish a little business which in approximately 10 years or 15 years would grant them an element of independence. Also, he said that after ten years of work on the part of his family, the government receives his money in the form of tax on capital gains. Therefore, he indicated that in his old age he might as well join the rest of the people who draw unemployment insurance, welfare benefits or other forms of assistance.

The Canadian tax structure is detrimental to economic development. It discourages investment and entrepreneurship. It encourages the flight of accumulated capital from this country.

● (1612)

I do not think anybody has any idea of how many entrepreneurs in this country have created vehicles outside this country by which to avoid the capital gains tax, income tax and other taxes which this government has imposed in a non-competitive way. The government wants money in a hurry.

Any budget which encourages employment development and entrepreneurship will pass through this House quickly, but any measure discouraging agriculture, the small businessman, the big businessman or the family businessman, will take time because opposition parties are going to seek breaks for Canadians. They will take as much time as is necessary, in the hope that there might be a little chink somewhere in the armour of the Minister of Finance and that he will no longer consider himself the god of knowledge in the field of finance, which he seems to think he is.

The agricultural industry needs a change in the tax structure and in the tariff structure. The policies of the Department of Agriculture need changing. Further recognition of the requirements of Canadians with respect to transportation is needed. Speeches have been made on behalf of family businesses in Canada, and they will continue to be made until economic policies furthering the development of Canada are put into play. These policies should include tax relief so that development can be encouraged. Until such time as measures like these appear in budgets, it will take time to put measures through this House. It would have been much more appropriate to alter the bill we are dealing with than to impose closure on two occasions. That is inexcusable and Canadians do not accept it.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) has done, I would like to say a few words about one issue which is not dealt with by this bill; that is the issue of agriculture and farming. The time has come when we should examine our taxation system as it affects farmers. One need only look at the income figures which were released yesterday to determine why that must be done.

At the Outlook Conference here in Ottawa yesterday, it was announced by the Department of Agriculture and by Statistics Canada that the net income of farmers will fall 11 per cent in 1977 over 1976. To put that in perspective, the net income of farmers in 1976 fell by some 20 per cent over 1975. The forecast for next year, as reported in all the newspapers today, is that net income for farmers is likely to fall by another 6.1 per cent in 1978. When a situation like that exists, I do not think any member of this House has to be convinced that many farmers across the country are in dire financial straits at the present time. Their income has fallen for two years in a row, and will fall again in 1978.

What should be done about this situation? There are many things which could be done. As other hon. members have done I have in the past made many speeches about farming, food and agriculture in general, but I want to point out one or two things today about which I think all of us should be aware.

As we know from the statistics released yesterday, farm income has fallen but the consumer price index in respect of the price of food is rising. Just this morning we received statistics which show that the price of food went up by 13.9 per cent between November of last year and November of this year. The price of food consumed in the home went up by 15.9 per cent. When farm income is going down at such drastic rates as 20 per cent last year, 11 per cent this year, and another 6 per cent next year, why is it that the price of food is going up by 12 per cent, 13 per cent and 14 per cent?

The time has come when the government should take a serious look at the middlemen in the food chain and find out why the price of food is going up so sharply while farm income is going down. Our consumers need protection, but the government should also be doing a number of things to protect farmers. Some of these things can be done through our tax system. As the previous speaker said, a number of things can be done now to help farmers. The price of wheat has gone down sharply in the last two years; it has dropped radically. The price of wheat is so low that when a farmer produces wheat, he barely meets the cost of production. It costs him almost as much to produce wheat as he is getting for it when he sells it to the grain elevator for sale overseas or for domestic use.

I think the government in general, and the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board in particular, should be moving to ensure that farmers now receive a pay-out from the western grain stabilization fund. That pay-out should be made now, not when an election is announced, which will probably be next March, April or May. The government now has figures on farm income and that income is away down. Farmers deserve a pay-out and I suggest that one should be made now.

As we conclude this debate on taxation and income and how we distribute wealth and income, we should take a few moments to consider the farm income statistics to which I have been referring. We should study the net income of farmers, that is, farm income after costs, depreciation, and so forth. In 1977, net farm income will be $3.3 billion. In 1978, the figure is expected to go down to $3.1 billion. That will be a drop of 6.1 per cent.

At the same time, farm costs are going up and will go up very rapidly. In 1976, farm costs amounted to $7.3 billion, according to federal government statistics revealed at the Outlook Conference yesterday. In 1977, farm costs will rise to $7.8 billion. In 1978, they are expected to rise still further, to $8.3 billion. Hon. members can see that despite the fact that farm income is going down rapidly, farm costs are going up. Thus, the farmer is caught in the cost-price squeeze, the classic phrase we have used on the prairies for so long. The amounts farmers receive for their commodities are going down or staying at the same level, but the price farmers have to pay to produce a bushel of wheat, to raise a steer or a hog, or to produce vegetables or fruit, is going up. How long can this situation continue before farmers are forced off their land? At a time like this the government should be examining farm income and proposing changes which we could pass in this House in order to alleviate the problem.

I want to discuss farm costs for a moment. Many things could be done about high farm costs. I have in my hand a document which was produced for the Outlook Conference, entitled "Farm Inputs". It is dated December, 1977, and was produced by Agriculture Canada. This document states the following:

> Although 1977 was a poor year for farm machinery sales compared with 1976, next year looks worse. Manufacturers and distributors of machinery in Canada will face a large decrease in sales volume; their inventories will continue to grow; their margins and profits will fall; and farmers will have little relief from price increases.

Despite the fact that farmers are buying less and less farm machinery—and making fewer repairs because their income has fallen—and despite the fact that the inventory of farm machinery in this country is very high the price of farm machinery remains very high. There is no law of supply and
