Seen at a distance, they ap peared mere white specks on the blue water, but as the steamers gradually approached them, their true dimensions were seen and noted as a marvel, not alone by the captains and their crews, who unanimously agreed that an Arctic panorama of equal magnitude had never taken place in such a latitude or longitude, but also by those of their passengers, whose artistic temperament out-weighed their dislike of intense cold and impelled wonder at the startling spectacle. By day and by night the beauty of the scene remained equally great and equally impressive. As daylight died the moon shone upon the waters and lit with a ghostly splendor those white way with an imperturbable Sphynx like gravity. If the weather was was not, we struck that later on his arsenal of rays and touched with his golden wand the scene and its strange denizens. A profusion of colors, such as sunlight beaming upon crystal can alone produce, straightway glorified the icebergs, until it seemed as though they were no longer white insensate masses of solidified water, but had been quickened into life and

On Sunday morning, while we were passing between the icebergs, I no-ticed that the water around the vessel was sending up a heavy steam-so heavy, in fact, that it caused a regular fog. I got a bucket from one of the men and lowered it into the water. When I drew it up I put in the thermometer, and to my amazement, I found that the water was fifty-two degrees. It was quite warm, in fact.
While I was puzzling over it I heard a
