Mr. HANSELL: My question to the honmember for Témiscouata, now that he has returned to his place in the house, is this: He said that the opinions he was expressing were the opinions of his constituency and of the majority of the Canadian people. I ask him if those opinions are the opinions of his government?

An hon. MEMBER: How can he answer that?

Mr. POULIOT: I will let my diminutive friend finish, and I will answer afterwards.

Mr. HANSELL: That is quite all right with me. I am beginning to wonder, if when my hon. friend speaks, he really has his feet on the ground.

Mr. POULIOT: I said "diminutive" because the attack was small.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Will the hon. gentleman please continue?

Mr. HANSELL: I have nothing else to say with regard to the speech of the hon. gentleman, except to add this. While he has ridiculed the group in this corner of the house on more than one occasion, we have told the Prime Minister that we are here to help. Any suggestions that we have made with respect to monetary matters have been made with only one thought in mind; that is to try to help, to throw some light upon the subject. We are not here to tear down. We are here to build up. We realize that this government has had imposed upon it a responsibility such as perhaps no other government in the history of Canada has had to shoulder. We are here to help, and we resent such ridicule toward this group as my hon. friend has offered tonight. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. POULIOT: I have something more to say. In the first place, truth hurts. In the second place, I will read a few lines from a book everyone knows, the Parliamentary Guide. This is the biography of the hon. member for Macleod:

Educated at Bible Institute of Los Angeles and Southern Divinity School, Dallas, Texas.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can you match that?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir; and I am proud that I do not mix politics with religion. Then it says:

Minister of the Church of Christ.

There is one thing the hon. gentleman evidently does not know; that is the commandment of God, "Love thy neighbour."

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you practise it?

Mr. POULIOT: I have done so, but I hate the fallacies of utopia. I do not laugh at the hon. gentleman; I pity him, and I regret—

Mr. HANSELL: I am not looking for your pity.

Mr. POULIOT: Silence, please. I regret that the hon. gentleman, who has studied theology and the bible—I hope he has not studied only the old testament—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like to draw the attention of the committee to certain fundamental rules of debate which have been violated time and again during the present debate. I read from May at page 297:

The use of temperate and decorous language is never more desirable than when a member is canvassing the opinions and conduct of his opponents in debate. The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged; misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn, of misrepresentation; charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind;—all these are unparliamentary, and call for prompt interference.

I do not like to charge one member more than another, but I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this rule has not been lived up to constantly during the present debate. I believe this matter is too important to have the debate carried on in any way other than by strict adherence to this rule.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that such remarks are made only to the hon, member for Témiscouata and are not made to those who say he hides behind the curtain.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have not addressed my remarks to the hon. member for Témiscouata. I have addressed my remarks to all hon. members of the committee of the whole. I have drawn attention to the fact that during the course of the debate many hon. members do not seem to have adhered to the rule I have just mentioned. Therefore I do not believe that the hon. member for Témiscouata should take my remarks as applying to him more than to any other hon. member. As a matter of fact, I should have made this remark earlier in the debate, but now I think the time has come when the attention of hon. members should be directed to this rule.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand, sir, and I bow to your decision. I know what you said did not apply only to me, but it was said when I was speaking; and it is not the first time. On the other hand I came down to the committee to-night because I was notified by at least three of my colleagues, if not more, that the hon. member for Macleod was saying that I was hiding behind the curtain when actually I was reading my correspondence upstairs in my room. I had a friend with me, my colleague, the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), with whom I was discussing the letters I had received during the day.

The CHAIRMAN: And for that reason what I have said applies to that remark as much as it does to some of the language of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I did not use any profane language. I was speaking of theology and, with all due respect, of the old and new testaments. But, sir, I found it was insinuated that after I had spoken I was hiding myself. I have never had reason to do that; this is the first time any member of the house has made such a charge. I thought it was insulting, and that was why I came here, just to tell my hon. friend that he was all wrong in this as in all that he has said since he has been a member of parliament.

Now I come to the point. We are here to discuss a most important matter, a loan of $750,000,000. The Minister of Finance does not go into churches to say that the doctrine of the Liberal party is a religious doctrine, but the protagonists of social credit dare use churches for propaganda. I blame them severely for that. I think it is a shame and a profanation. When I listen to the bible class of Mr. Aberhart, who speaks in a church where truth is supposed to be spoken, and hear him from the pulpit telling people his political policies, I am ashamed for those who do such things. I consider it hypocrisy, and I can say that of Aberhart as I can say it of Herridge, who dared to say the same thing in his first speech at Ottawa, because they are all hypocrites. I do not say that of the hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite, because they are members of this house; but I say that of their leaders, and if my hon. friends had a sense of propriety and of decency they would feel as I do. There is nothing I despise more; there is nothing more contemptuous, than a hypocrite. There is nothing I despise more; there is nothing more contemptuous, than a man who uses the church and the cloak of religion to deceive the people. One man, who was either the secretary or the president of the Social Credit party in the province of Quebec-

Mr. CRERAR: I dislike to say it, but I think the hon. member is taking unto himself very great latitude under the rules of the house in discussing these matters. After all, the question before us is the wisdom or propriety of giving the the government authority to raise a very considerable sum of money. I am sure the hon. member for Témiscouata, for whom I have a high personal regard, will realize that the remarks he is making at the present time are not appropriate to the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right; I am through with it. And I would add this, that we shall be very careful in respect of the theories respecting finance.

One thing I regretted to see was the moving of the gold reserve and the financial backing of the country from the east block to the Bank of Canada, and then the transfer to the foreign exchange control board. The fortune of this country is not in the east block which houses the office of the Prime Minister, that of the Minister of Finance and the council room. I know the former auditor general complained of the condition of the vaults in which the fortune of the country was kept in the east block. I point this out particularly to the Minister of Mines and Resources, for whom I have a high regard. But vaults could be repaired. Often I pass near the east block and I see government trucks carrying loads of gold to the Bank of Canada, where new vaults have been built. There might have been reason for making that transfer, but otherwise I cannot understand why that reserve has been placed under the foreign exchange control board. I know that if I ask questions about that board, I shall probably receive no answer.

When last year I asked some questions respecting the mint, I was told by the previous Minister of Finance that no more reports respecting gold, coinage and the mint were published. For a time it was not a Canadian but rather an English institution. After that, control was transferred to Canada, and supervision was exercised by the Minister of Finance. However, I am wondering now if control is exercised by the Bank of Canada, the foreign exchange control board or the Minister of Finance himself. Those are serious matters.

Of course every man has his legitimate pride, and I have no doubt my very good friend the Minister of Finance knows that the hon. member for Témiscouata has studied these problems just as carefully as has the minister, and if at times that hon. member expresses personal views he does not do so with any desire to handicap the government. Rather it is done in order that the hon. member for Témiscouata may remain as proud of the government as he has been in the past.

I should like to have from the Minister of Finance all orders in council which have been passed regarding foreign exchange loans since July last. We have the official gazette; we know that the information I seek appears in the Canada Gazette. I am quite ready to admit that fact. I began making a scrap book of those orders in council, so that I might understand the financial condition of the country, but I found it impossible to follow them. I am asking the minister if it is not possible to supply every hon. member with those orders in council which were passed during the recess concerning the foreign exchange control board. We must have them. At times we come in contact with regulations we cannot understand, because it is impossible for a layman who has not the up-to-date legislation by order in council respecting the foreign exchange control board to understand what is being done. This is a most important point.

Why, sir, is it impossible for me at times to go into technical details about these matters? It is because I have not been supplied with that recess statute. It is just as necessary for us to have it as to have statutes passed by parliament. And I have very good reason for saying that, because by virtue of the War Measures Act those orders in council have the same authority as any piece of legislation passed by parliament. Therefore, sir, I should like to have some help in this regard, and I hope I shall receive it in due course.

I warn the government again about the danger of experiences in the matter of finance. I have made a few observations before about the Social Credit party, but there is the modern university teaching which is dangerous in that regard. I warn the minister, as I warned his predecessor, against accepting dangerous views which come from people who try interesting experiments at the expense of the nation. warn my hon. friend in all earnestness, and as a strong supporter of the government. If I express personal views, he will understand that I do not do so in order to create trouble or embarrassment, but rather in order that each hon, member may follow the policies of the government and at times make suggestions which might be useful.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall make inquiries at once with regard to the orders in council to which the hon. member has referred. I had an idea they were laid on the table of the house, but I shall look into the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: It is impossible to follow them, because they are all mixed up.

Mr. RALSTON: I will ascertain what is published, and see if I can satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not mean to participate in this debate, because our group, as I think has been noticed, is endeavouring not to speak, except when we feel we can help matters along. We are not indulging in any carping criticism whatsoever respecting the government. We have come here with a frank, open, honest desire to help in this day of great peril. That is one reason why the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) became somewhat offended.

I believe it would be good for the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to learn two or three little things. I make these suggestions to him in the most straightforward way, and I suggest that he read them in Hansard to-morrow and give them careful contemplation. If I remember correctly, he said that social credit produced a different kind of money. May I tell the hon. member for Témiscouata that he is just one hundred per cent wrong in that. No wonder he has whipped himself up to such a fury when all his information is false! Social credit uses exactly the money used by the Dominion of Canada-just exactly. The only reason why Alberta tried to use a different kind was that she did not have power to issue currency. She was trying to escape the currency laws.

The first thing to bear in mind is that there are two kinds of money being used in Canada to-day. One is currency and the other is credit. Credit is nothing more or less than figures in a book, as was made abundantly clear in the banking and commerce committee which sat last year. As the hon, member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) now realizes much to his chagrin, currency in Canada has nothing at all behind it in the way of gold. Since all gold has been transferred to the exchange fund, there is no gold whatsoever behind the Canadian dollar. The hon, member for Témiscouata is now at his wit's end to know what it is that gives value to the Canadian dollar, because all that he thought would give it value is now gone. All this indicates that the poor man has been entirely at sea in connection with all these matters pertaining to finance and currency. Is it any wonder that he cannot get sense out of what we social crediters tell him? We are going in a straight line, but he has never gone in a straight line since he started.

I am going to mention another matter to my hon, friend which I feel quite sure he will find instructive.

Mr. MacNICOL: The good book says, "What is crooked cannot be made straight."

Mr. BLACKMORE: We still have hope for the hon. member for Témiscouata. The hon. member referred to assignats. It will probably come as a surprise to him when he learns the following facts regarding assignats. They were issued by a revolutionary government which had no power to tax. That is an exceedingly important matter. Money issued by any government so unstable that it cannot tax has the cards stacked against it right from the beginning. That is the first important fact to remember in connection with assignats. The second is that the government had no source of funds, and yet it was charged with the responsibility of governing France and beating back the countless foes who were endeavouring to overrun the country. And those foes would have succeeded but for the device of the assignat which the French government adopted in extremity. The fact that the French government came through that crisis is evidence beyond any question that the assignat succeeded.

The next important thing to remember about the assignat is that it was a treasury bill. I assume the hon, member for Témiscouata knows enough about treasury bills to know that they are not legal tender. A treasury bill is not legal tender and neither was the assignat. That was another point against it. The next important point to remember is that the word "assignat" means assignment, as should be evident to anyone who understands the French language. The assignat was a claim to a piece of land. I ask hon, members: If you had a $20 bill in Canada which represented only a claim to a piece of land, say in Témiscouata, would you expect a merchant in Ottawa to accept that claim to a piece of land in Témiscouata when he was not in position to go and claim the land? Would he be likely to accept such an assignat at its face value? Certainly not. The assignat was simply a claim to a piece of land in no particular location. The result was that to merchants and business men it was almost a liability.

The next important thing to remember is that assignats were not issued in denominations under twenty francs. You would suffer considerable embarrassment if you set out to do business in Ottawa with, say a thousand $10 bills and there were no $5 or $1 bills or 50 cent pieces with which to make change. Your good Canadian money would soon tend to fall in value under such conditions. There was no way to change the assignats with assignats, and the people of those days were afraid to change them with other money.

Mr. POULIOT: How is it that at one time you could buy three million assignats for ten francs?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Apparently the honmember has not that keenness of perception which would enable him to see the significance of what I am saying. Does he know so little about currency that all this has no weight with him? If it does not, then I must say he is just a little above the kindergarten stage.

An hon. MEMBER: Just wasting time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You do not mind my making this observation: It is most interesting that hon. members can rise in their places and devote thirty minutes or so to makings demands that the Prime Minister should resign without any intimation that they are wasting time, but the very minute that social crediters begin to discuss matters of such vital moment as monetary science, we are accused of wasting time.

Mr. MARTIN: Wasting time on the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is good; I did not catch the drift. I have boundless faith in men, and I have still faith in the hon. member for Témiscouata.

The next important thing to remember regarding assignats is that the first three issues, which went into the hundreds of millions, the total being more than a billion, were successful to the highest degree. Every bit of evidence that can be found bears out that statement. If any hon, member wishes to discuss this matter with me in private, I will take him to the library and show him the textbooks which bear out this statement.

The next thing to remember is that the government of that time had no mechanism to control prices. Hon, members will recall that a few days after war was declared the price of lard and sugar in Canada shot up considerably. If a definite method of price control had not been brought into being and applied rigidly, where would our price structure be to-day? If the French government of that day had had the power to control prices, as we have to-day, it would have made a tremendous difference in the success of the assignat.

Then the assignat was used in France at a time of scarcity. The Minister of Finance and other hon. members know-I do hope the hon. member for Témiscouata knows also -that it is the goods and services that can be bought with money that give value to money. You could have the best money ever made by man on a desert island and it would have no value at all. It is the abundance of things which can be bought that gives value to money. That is what gives value to our money in Canada to-day now that our gold has been removed. In France at that time they were just emerging from a terrible civil Years of struggle had been engaged in by the French people during which industry had been disrupted and agriculture had been more or less compromised, shall I say? The result was a scarcity of goods and services to be bought with the assignat. We are living in an age when there is an abundance of every kind of commodity. Not only do we have that abundance, we have also the productive power by which we can greatly increase the goods and services which can be bought. There is no comparison between Canada as it is to-day and France at the time of the issue of assignats.

One more thing and I am going to conclude. The British government was blockading France while the assignat was being issued. Let the ports of our country be blockaded right now and what will happen to the value of our fine Canadian money? It certainly would not be worth as much after a few months of blockading as it is to-day.

I apologize for taking up the time of the committee, but I did want to show the hon. member for Témiscouata that he was completely wrong in his concept of what social credit would use for money. Having shown him too that he was so absolutely wrong with regard to the assignat, I believe I have shown that his judgment might not really be of much value.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ralston thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting the appointment of auditors for Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

JOINT USE OF CERTAIN TRACKS AND TERMINALS FOR PURPOSES OF NEW ENTRANCE INTO VANCOUVER

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to ratify and confirm a certain agreement respecting the joint use by Canadian National Railways of certain tracks and premises of the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company, at Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps the minister will be good enough to make a statement on the bill for the purposes of the record. I know nothing about the bill myself.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this bill ratifies an agreement that has been made between the Canadian National Railways and the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company, for the use of about fourteen miles of track between the city of New Westminster and the city of Vancouver. The bill provides for the use of this trackage as an entry for the Canadian National Railways into their terminal station at Vancouver. The matter is in evolution. Formerly the Canadian National Railways had its own track running down one of the streets of Vancouver. By agreement with the city a number of years ago, the city undertook to remove the tracks, provide a grade separation, and thereafter to enter into an agreement for the use of this particular trackage as an entrance for the Canadian National Railways. The grade separation has now been completed and the terms of the agreement have been approved by the board of transport commissioners; but as this is a permanent arrangement, representing as it does the only entrance for the Canadian National Railways into Vancouver when their own track is lifted, it is desired to make this a perpetual agreement, which requires the approval of parliament. If it were an agreement for twenty years only, the approval of the board of transport commissioners would be sufficient, but for a perpetual agreement the approval of parliament is necessary. This bill is simply to ratify the agreement which has already received the approval of the board of transport commissioners and all interested parties.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the Great Northern come into this picture?

Mr. HOWE: They are not parties to this agreement. I am not sure whether they use this trackage or not, but their station is adjoining.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean that the three companies will use this trackage, that the Great Northern will have running rights over this fourteen miles?

Mr. HOWE: Not under this agreement, not exclusive running rights. This simply provides for running rights for the Canadian National Railways in perpetuity over this trackage. It does not affect any of the rights of the Great Northern.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nor confer any upon them?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement ratified and confirmed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One of the Vancouver members who is not present tonight might be interested in this bill. As it is nearly eleven o'clock, perhaps the committee might rise now.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 31, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

L. P. Duff,
Government House, Administrator.

WHEAT BOARD

ANNUAL REPORT—QUESTION AS TO TABLING OF WEEKLY AUDIT REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Would he have the report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year 1938-39 tabled at the next sitting of the house, or as soon thereafter as possible?

I should like to ask another question. Under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, provision is made for a weekly report from the board to the minister. Would the minister consider having these weekly reports tabled, covering the period since August 1, 1939?

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) was good enough to intimate to me that he intended asking these questions this afternoon, and I took occasion to discuss the points raised with the advisers of the department and officials of the wheat board who are in the city at the present time.

The report of the wheat board to which the hon member refers was tabled in this house on the 17th day of this month, immediately after the opening of parliament.

Regarding the weekly audit reports, this is a matter which has been up for discussion before with this department. I think all I can say is that this report exhibits the exact position of the board from week to week, and it is not considered in the best interests of the country that the figures contained therein should be made available to the public. I am sure the hon, member will fully appreciate that. The figures would be of special value to the people to whom we look to sell wheat, and the publication of them would put us in an unfair position. The regularly published statistics containing the figures of Canada's whole wheat position are available through the bureau of statistics, and the report of the board of grain commissioners, and with respect to a monthly report I think these same remarks would apply.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS BY INDIVIDUALS, CORPORATIONS AND MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Has the attention of the government and of the minister been drawn to the voluntary offering to the government of various kinds of mechanized equipment by municipalities, corporations and private individuals, as a contribution to Canada's war effort? Will the government lay down a policy and rules and regulations on this matter and let the Canadian people know that such contributions will be welcomed as they were in the last war?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply intimated to me that the hon, member was going to ask this question, and it was thought that I might reply because of the fact that the offers to which the hon. member refers generally come in the form of offers of money to be used for a particular purpose. Members well understand that it is extremely difficult in practice to earmark a particular sum of money for a particular piece of equipment; it would mean the maintaining of a special fund for each particular purpose. Therefore we are indicating to the donors that it would be preferable if they would permit that money to be put into the consolidated revenue fund, and we have pointed out to them that the consolidated revenue fund will be devoted. among other things, to the purchase of equipment of the kind.

I should like to add, however, that if there are offers of special pieces of equipment for particular purposes the government will be very glad to give consideration to them, having regard to what fits best into our requirements. The government welcomes and appreciates, on behalf of the people of Canada, the offers which have been made of funds for particular purposes which afterwards have been permitted to be put into the consolidated revenue fund under the conditions I have mentioned, and the offers of equipment as well.

Mr. CHURCH: I thank the minister. During the great war Sir John Eaton at his own expense equipped a battery, and I should think help of that kind would be very acceptable.

MANUFACTURE AT HAMILTON OF TANKS OR BREN GUN CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (York North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Has his attention been drawn to a report appearing in the Hamilton Spectator of Wednesday, May 29, wherein it is alleged that certain charges of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) are borne out by the statement of an official of the Sawyer-Massey firm of that city, in these words:

His firm, said the Spectator informant, was prepared, in the event of being awarded a [Mr. Church.]

contract, to start production on a form of tank known as the Bren gun carrier, without delay.

I should like to ask the minister whether tanks or Bren gun carriers were involved in the matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): It never occurred to me that a Bren gun carrier and a tank were near relations. I suppose if anyone suggests that the Bren gun carrier is a form of tank the opinion is in the eye of the beholder; but they are of very different construction. Several hundred Bren gun carriers are in the process of construction in Canada. It occurs to me that this may explain statements which I thought were preposterous in connection with the manufacture of tanks. Perhaps those speaking had in mind Bren gun or universal carriers, which are capable of being produced entirely in Canada, but the tank is a much more difficult matter. Instead of carrying Bren guns or ammunition it carries men and the machinery of war, and in my mind there is no relation between the two except that they may look alike.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): What about the whippet tanks?

Mr. HOWE: Well, there is a vast difference between a whippet tank and a Bren gun carrier. They may look somewhat alike but they are very different.

INDUSTRIAL SURVEY

TABULATION OF AVAILABLE MANUFACTURING RESOURCES FOR PRODUCTION OF MILITARY REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) asked whether the registration of the Canadian manufacturing industry made by the Department of National Defence had been completed and was up to date. In reply I may say that all the information obtained by the Department of National Defence prior to the outbreak of war in the registration of the Canadian manufacturing industry, along with the personnel employed in making the registration, were transferred to the war supply board by order in council dated October 21, 1939. I am informed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that this information has proved to be most valuable and is being kept up to date.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RECRUITING FOR SECOND AND THIRD DIVISIONS—
ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT RECRUITING STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I should like to answer a question put by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) regarding arrangements with respect to recruiting. Instructions have been issued to district officers commanding to recruit up to establishment reinforcements of the second division Canadian active service force. Instructions also have been issued to take all necessary administrative steps to mobilize units of the third division and to recruiting as early as possible. commence Steps are being taken to extend our recruiting organization to include permanent recruiting stations, so that those desirous of enlisting may avoid long trips involving considerable expense, and the department may have available, for use when required, a registration of personnel.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I wonder if I might ask the minister to go a little further on the question of recruiting. Is it his intention to open recruiting stations in parts of the country where units are not being definitely recruited? I will give as an instance the interior of British Columbia, in which province recruiting previously has taken place at the coast. It is a long journey from the interior to the coast.

Mr. ROGERS: It is the intention to establish recruiting centres in the interior of British Columbia at certain selected points in relation to certain units that will be included among those now being mobilized. Obviously I cannot give the house a statement of the various permanent recruiting stations which will be established. Normally they would be located where there were either headquarters or subunits of the non-permanent active militia units. But if a certain part of the country, even under those conditions, finds itself discriminated against, I shall be very glad to consider the advisability of opening recruiting stations there.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Will that be true also with respect to the northern and northeastern portions of New Brunswick, where there has been very little opportunity of recruiting?

Mr. ROGERS: I can also give my hon. friend an assurance in that regard.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

INQUIRY AS TO TAKING OF STEPS TO PROTECT PUBLIC PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) for some information, which might be given to me privately as to what is being done with regard to certain matters which I brought to the attention of the house generally and to his personal notice more particularly, having to do with certain protection in the areas I described. Definite questions are being asked me and the press have reported things which I hesitate to believe with regard to the protection being afforded. Could I have, even privately, some information which might serve to allay the fears of those who have spoken to me?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I should like to thank my hon. friend for the suggestion he has made, and I shall be very glad indeed to discuss the matter with him this afternoon at his convenience.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE
UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR PUBLIC WORKS AND GENERAL PURPOSES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like an assurance from the minister that there will be an accounting to parliament of the moneys expended under this act. I realize that this is a bill designed to bring money into the consolidated revenue fund and that with respect to the ordinary services of the country expenditures must be made under votes of this parliament, which are subject to the audit act and to the scrutiny of the auditor general. As to the portion of the moneys which will be devoted to loans, what provision is there in the law now with respect to an accounting to parliament? Is it covered by the audit act? I know that details will appear in the auditor general's report, but it is so late when the report reaches one that it is not of much use.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend immediately what does appear in the audit act with respect to this matter. He will understand that in the case of refunding the issues themselves are a charge on the consolidated revenue fund, and that the bonds on maturity really amount to a cheque against that fund. That is the way the payment out of the fund would be effected. The payment is indicated in the accounts when the loan disappears from the liabilities side of the balance sheet.

Mr. QUELCH: I believe the minister mentioned the other day that the government had sold to the chartered banks and to the Bank of Canada $65,000,000 worth of bonds bearing interest at two per cent. Will he now give the percentage sold to each respectively?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I have not the amounts before me, but if my hon. friend wishes I can get that information for him.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister explain why a greater percentage of the bonds could not have been sold to the Bank of Canada, rather than to the chartered banks?

Mr. RALSTON: As I remember it, the bonds were held partly by the chartered banks and partly by the Bank of Canada, and the bonds held by the chartered banks were refunded by the issue of new bonds. The difference between $65,000,000 and $80,000,000 was paid off, and the balance was issued to the Bank of Canada.

On section 2-Loan authorized.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that this section, which is the enabling section of the bill, is based largely on the principle used by corporations. Full power and authority is given the governor in council to regulate the sale, pledge the security, state the rate of interest and set all the terms and conditions, as provided in this section. What is the policy of the government with respect to loans made under the authority of this measure in respect of (a) the lifetime of the security, and (b) the rate or rates of interest? And (c), will the government under section 4 make regulations with respect to callability?—a very important feature which should not be and no doubt is not being forgotten by the financial advisers of the government. If there is one reflection which might be made on financing which has been done in the past it would be that provision was not made for the calling of long-term, high-interest-bearing debentures. I urge upon the government that, in respect of every issue, some provision be made for calling obligations which will mature after the cessation of hostilities. I know that such a provision may interfere with the price received for the security, because as a rule financial institutions, if they are receiving a good rate of interest, purchase non-callable in preference to callable securities. One reason for this preference is that in the case of institutional investments, holdings of callable securities may interfere with the establishment of a satisfactory portfolio. But in the interests of the country we should be certain that this provision is made. If the minister has a policy in respect of these different matters I should like him to state it to the house and country.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend would no doubt expect me to say that at the moment one cannot lay down or formulate a definite line of policy with regard to the terms of issues which may be made in the future. With regard to maturity, one of the major factors—I cannot give them all—is obviously to endeavour to find a maturity which is at such a date that it will not involve too great a burden of refunding in any particular year. That is one factor.

Another factor which must be considered is the length of term of the bonds which are being refunded and where they are held. Rate of interest will of course depend on the length of term for which the money is asked, and on what the market may be for bonds of a comparable maturity which are outstanding at the time of the refunding operation.

Obviously a third factor in connection with rates of interest on issues being made at this time is the readiness of Canadians to help. While we want to be sure that the issue is taken, at the same time we want to be sure that the money shall be secured at the cheapest possible rate. We believe we can depend on the Canadian people to see to it that the issues made by the government at reasonable terms will be taken up.

With regard to the callable feature, we took advantage of a feature of that kind in connection with the 48-52's which were issued in January last. One always has to consider the price and coupon rate so that the call feature will not mean that you are paying a long-term rate of interest for a short-term bond. I agree fully with my hon friend when he suggests that, in so far as it does not interfere with the salability of the bond or make the money too expensive, it is most desirable that there should be a call feature in a bond. That is perhaps somewhat more applicable in respect of bonds bearing a high rate of interest, such as those to which my hon, friend has referred. But generally speaking I think the government's being able to call bonds on such terms as they may see fit, after leaving a reasonable time for the bond to run, is a proper precaution to take.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this the only authority for the renewing of the $230,000,000 of treasury bills? Is there any other authority for their renewal?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not looked into that matter thoroughly, but I anticipate that the supply bill, that is the general appropriation act which we will pass, based on the estimates, will contain the usual provision which allows the government to borrow up to $200,000,000. I think that is broad enough to cover the issue of treasury bills. This bill and that provision in the appropriation act would, I think, be the only ones—with the exception, of course, of the $700,000,000 authorization received yesterday or the day before, which would authorize the issue of treasury bills.

Mr. CHURCH: During the last great war, for war purposes, a much larger sum was charged to income and not so much was received by way of borrowing. I hope the minister will not be unmindful of the fact that during the last great war 550,000 men were in the army, many being young business men from the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec, from the maritimes and British To-day many of these business Columbia. men are paying income and sales tax on what they must buy for their families; the men who fought in the last war have had to pay a great part of the taxes made necessary by that war. I am sorry to see this clamour and demand for increased income taxes, especially when income is not available. The main recruiting provinces were the industrial provinces and the maritimes and British Columbia. Ontario and Quebec pay about eighty per cent of the cash taxes, according to a return made in 1924 to the then hon. member for Sherbrooke. Many of the men enlisting for this war have given up all their income, and if additional taxes are imposed their families will have to pay them.

There has been a great change in our financial structure. During the last war real estate did not have to bear the federal and provincial burdens it bears to-day. The federal and provincial authorities have taken over the right to levy many taxes which were previously the exclusive right of the municipalities. From confederation to 1917 the income tax was exclusively the right of the municipality, but at that time the federal authorities took it over. Then the provinces came along with a duplicate tax, and in British Columbia there are three. Our municipalities are carrying relief burdens which were never contemplated by the fathers of confederation.

We all realize the minister is carrying a tremendous burden and he deserves and will get the support of all the country. Many of the men enlisting to-day are professional men. I know of a doctor in Toronto, one of the best eye and ear specialists in Canada, whose income was $19,000 a year. He has gone to the war and has had to give up all his income. His wife is doing war work, but still these taxes have to be paid. It is a great mistake to attempt to charge too much to income. Other countries are not doing it. No doubt there will be some demand from the prairie provinces that this should be done, but we should not forget who pays the taxes. I appreciate the difficult problem the minister must solve to raise this money, but we must not forget that those who are going to pay the taxes will be those who have always paid the taxes. The minister has had more experience than I in many spheres of activity and I have no doubt he realizes the heavy burden being borne to-day by real estate.

A proper proportion of these taxes should be levied on bonds and securities. A previous minister said that he could borrow money for two-thirds of one per cent, but there was no war on at that time. There will be very little salvage after the war, and the bonds and securities of the country should pay a proper share of these taxes. Our men are going overseas to fight to protect these bonds and securities owned by the insurance companies and other financial institutions. They are risking their lives for this country, and that is not being done by those who stay home and do not pay taxes.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend will understand that the subject with which he has been dealing will be given the most careful attention and study in connection with the budget. After all, that is when such a matter would be considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Bank of Canada, I believe, is the fiscal agent of the government and I suppose the governor and the directors of the bank are the financial advisers of the government. As I understand it, the Bank of Canada as the fiscal agent of the government puts out an issue which is allocated to the banks and the investment bankers—if that term is in order; I believe at one time a ban was placed upon the use of that term. These institutions are paid something for selling the bonds, which is quite proper; but I should like to know the cost, in percentage if it can be given that way, to the treasury of selling the bonds. I should like to know also what is paid by the treasury to the chartered banks for servicing the loan after it has been placed in the hands of the investors, that is, cashing coupons. Is that service paid for by the first cost, or not?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot give my hon. friend the over-all cost of loans. He will understand that in a number of cases the loans were simply refunding issues, and there was practically no commission cost. As I understand it, what my hon. friend is referring to particularly are loans similar to the one issued in January. That loan was sold to the public and the commission allowed was threequarters of one per cent. However the individual who happened to procure the subscription of an insurance company or other institution making a large subscription would not receive this three-quarters of one per cent on that transaction. What was done was this. A large number of what we called national subscribers were put in one group and all amounts arising from commissions on their subscriptions were pooled and distributed among the banks and those who sold bonds to individuals in proportion to those sales. That was one factor in the distribution. The share in the pool was based on the amount sold by that individual house to what I would term private subscribers. That provided an inducement to sell as many as possible to those outside the national group. There was another factor in arriving at the distribution, namely the record in previous government issues. That system was found to work quite effectively, and I think I can add that it was satisfactory from the point of view of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The cost to the country was three-quarters of one per

Mr. RALSTON: Plus expenses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be the cost of preparing the bonds and advertising.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot answer at the moment the other question with regard to the charge made by banks for cashing coupons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I recall it, in previous war loans the first commission to the bank covered the cost of cashing coupons during the lifetime of the issue. The arrangement was a good one, and I was wondering whether it was being perpetuated. I understand that the coupons are payable at par at any branch of a chartered bank in Canada, no charge being made to the investor.

As far as he is concerned, that is all to the good. The point is not of great importance. I was merely asking for information, but if the minister cannot give it, all right.

Mr. RALSTON: I can give my hon. friend the information now. I knew there was some difference having regard to when the issue was made. The chartered banks receive one-eighth of one per cent of the face amount of the coupons cashed from all issues sold since 1923. In the case of the war loans 1915-1919 the charge for cashing coupons was included in the issue commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now they are paid by the government.

On section 4-Orders and regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose this section is necessary. I regret that we cannot write the regulations into the legislation itself, but it is impossible to foresee every contingency and orders or regulations may be necessary to suit conditions as they arise.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

JOINT USE OF CERTAIN TRACKS AND TERMINALS
FOR PURPOSES OF NEW ENTRANCE INTO VANCOUVER

The house resumed from Thursday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 10, to ratify and confirm a certain agreement respecting the joint use by Canadian National Railways of certain tracks and premises of the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company, at Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia—Mr. Howe—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Agreement ratified and confirmed.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that this bill merely ratifies an agreement between the Great Northern and the Canadian National Railways. Is the city of Vancouver interested at all? And if so, has the city approved the terms of the bill?

Mr. HOWE: The entire arrangement is by agreement with the city of Vancouver. It has been approved by the transport board after hearing all parties. The principal purpose of the change in the westerly end of this section of the line was to eliminate a level crossing, which was done under orders of the city of Vancouver. I am sure there are no objectors to the bill.

Mr. GREEN: This is just to complete the arrangement made between the city and the two railways?

Mr. HOWE: That is true. Practically it completes the agreement of 1915, which required certain work to be done, the abolition of grade crossings and the improvement of streets. All that has now been done and this permits the last part of the agreement to be carried out—the removal of Canadian National railway tracks from a certain street.

Mr. STIRLING: I understood the minister last night to say that the Great Northern was not included. The member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—perhaps it was a slip of the tongue—referred to the railway as the Great Northern. I asked the minister about that last night.

Mr. HOWE: The Great Northern is not a party to the agreement in any way unless it should be the owner of this particular railway.

Mr. STIRLING: That is what I was getting at.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friends opposite may know whether the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company is owned by the Great Northern. I do not know. I think it is probable, but I asked the question of my officers, and no one could tell me.

Mr. GREEN: The Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway is a subsidiary of the Great Northern, I understand.

Mr. HOWE: I dare say that is true, but I cannot say positively whether it is or not.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand from the explanatory notes that the original agreement of 1915 gave the right to run over the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway's tracks from New Westminster into Vancouver, right into the terminal; that this was made an agreement in perpetuity some time ago, and this bill covers that part of the railway from where the viaduct goes over the track to the terminal. That being so, I would ask if the terms of this agreement are identical with the terms of the original agreement.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot answer that definitely, but it is my belief that they are. As the matter had been thoroughly examined by the board of transport commissioners and approved by them, and would have ended there had it not been that the agreement was for more than twenty years, I confess I did not examine into the terms of the agreement itself. The whole purpose of coming to parliament is to extend the term of the agreement from twenty years to perpetuity.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER COMPANY

PROPOSED APPROVAL FOR DIVERSION OF ADDITIONAL 30,000 CUBIC SECOND FEET

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, respecting the Beauharnois, Light, Heat and Power Company.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the bill is given second reading and is considered in committee I think we should have a clear statement from the minister with respect to its purposes, so that the house and the country may be clearly seized of its objects and effect. I do not wish to make any remarks on the bill until the minister has made his statement, and I invite him to do that now; then I shall have something to say.

Mr. HOWE: The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company now has a lease of certain power rights from the province of Quebec in the flow of the St. Lawrence river. It was granted, by act of parliament passed in 1931, the right to divert the water of the St. Lawrence river through its power canal to the extent of 53,000 cubic second feet. The act of 1931 declared that the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power canal and works were works for the general advantage of Canada; and by that act control of the power canal, in fact, the ownership of the canal, was vested in the federal government. The same act provided that no more water could diverted from the St. Lawrence for power purposes except by act of parliament. Some eighteen months ago the government received an application for a further diversion of power from the St. Lawrence through the Beauharnois canal. The company pointed out that it held what is called an emphyteutic lease from the province of Quebec for an additional 30,000 cubic second feet of water, and asked the federal government to implement that lease by authorizing the diversion of an additional 30,000 cubic second feet. The circumstances were looked into carefully. It was found that at that time no particular shortage of power existed, and there seemed then to be no great public interest which required the federal government to authorize that diversion. Since then the situation has been changed tremendously by the war. Large blocks of power are being used by such industries as the alloy steel and electric steel industries.

Mr. MacNICOL: Aluminum.

Mr. HOWE: Well, aluminum does not apply largely in this particular case. It has been a very important factor in taking up power generally. Also flour mills, which are large users of power, have greatly expanded their production; with the result that in a very brief time, measured in months, the power problem has changed from an easy situation to a very limited situation so far as obtaining large blocks of power is concerned. The Beauharnois company is the largest and the principal supplier of power in the Montreal area. It also sends power across the provincial boundary into Ontario, where it is retailed by the Ontario hydro-electric power commission. The government has had representations from that commission that it is urgently in need of enlarged blocks of power. It has also had a report from the Quebec electrical board to the effect that the unsold power in the Montreal area is reaching a dangerously low point.

As Minister of Munitions and Supply, it has become my duty to ensure an adequate supply of power for the manufacture of munitions of war. Plans have been made for industries within the Montreal area which cannot be put into effect unless there can be an assurance that increased blocks of power will be available when these projects are completed. If I had doubts some eighteen months ago whether it was greatly in the public interest to grant this additional diversion, as Minister of Munitions and Supply I now have not only no doubt of the necessity, but I feel I should be negligent in my duty to that department did I not press as strongly as I could to have this additional power made available without delay.

So far as I know, this Beauharnois project represents the source of additional power which could be made available most quickly. With very little improvement the power canal can handle the additional water. The power house is of sufficient size to permit additional turbines to be installed. I am not sure whether the power house is now large enough to take the entire capacity, but I do know that a considerable increase in capacity can be made without enlarging the present power house. In other words, we have the power canal, the power development itself, and a power house adequate to receive the additional generators. So that we have at Beauharnois a source of power located in a great industrial area, the greatest industrial area we have in this country, and capable of immediate enlargement.

I believe I have given the house the pertinent facts of the matter. Of course the lease of water power is a provincial matter. The provinces own the power rights, and the province in which this industry is situate has already taken steps to lease the water power rights needed for this purpose. The government is interested primarily in navigation; and I have looked into that question and can assure the house that no navigational interest will be prejudiced by the diversion of this water. I understand that only one boat travels, or has travelled for many years, between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis. That is a tourist boat, the Rapids Queen, operated by Canada Steamship Lines; and I think no public interest will suffer greatly if the operation of that boat, which has become hazardous because of the lower water conditions over the years, is made to cease entirely. I believe that the public interest as affected by power for industrial purposes, and particularly for the production of munitions, will be greatly benefited by this additional diversion, and I am satisfied that no navigational interest will suffer by the diversion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is indeed reassuring to hear the minister say that no navigational interest will suffer by the diversion of this additional water. I quite agree that under present conditions it is not likely to interfere very much with the excursions of the Rapids Queen, but for quite a while now this country has been talking about a St. Lawrence waterway, and this area will be an integral part of it; the diversion of this water will have a bearing upon that scheme if it ever goes through. I do not intend to-day to rake up old scandals or anything of that sort, but the country's mind might well be refreshed after a period of nine or ten years with regard to this whole project.

I agree that the interest of the dominion is through its control of navigation, and navigation solely. I have lately been reading the argument made in this house by the Minister of Justice when, I think it was in 1931, certain Beauharnois bills were before parliament for enactment, in regard to which he took a different point of view; however, it is a settled opinion that if the Dominion of Canada has any interest in this project at all it is by reason only of its jurisdiction over navigation. I think that is a very sound legal position, notwithstanding the view that may have been taken in former years by eminent counsel, including my right hon.

friend, with respect to that question. I do not think there can be any doubt that the province of Quebec, in whose territory this power site lies, owns or controls the water, at least so far as hydro-electric power purposes are concerned. But because of its jurisdiction in respect of navigation the position has been affirmed from the very beginning, and I desire now to maintain it, that the dominion parliament has complete control over the diversion of water from the St. Lawrence river. The power company must first get from the Quebec government a grant of title to the waters for power purposes and the right to divert it must come from the dominion. So we are probably on common ground with regard to that.

The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company, which I believe is the operating company, was incorporated by the Quebec legislature as long ago as 1902. The statute was amended in 1928 when the present development was promoted by a group in Montreal about which a good deal has been heard in days gone by; I think I can just leave it at that. The act referred to, the Quebec statute of 1928, 18 George V, chapter 113, gives the company the right to build a new canal between lake St. Francis, the upper lake on the St. Lawrence river, and lake St. Louis, the lower lake, into which the water from this canal runs.

On April 27, 1928, an order in council was passed by the government of the province of Quebec authorizing the issue of an emphyteutic lease for a period of seventy-five years to the Beauharnois company of the rights of the province of Quebec to such part of the hydraulic power as could be developed from the diversion of 40,000 cubic feet per second. The lease that was issued under and by virtue of that order in council was conditional upon the company's authorization from the federal government to divert the flow of 40,000 cubic feet per second. On December 5, 1929,—in point of time, I believe, subsequent to the dominion authorization of such diversionthe company was granted by the Quebec government the right to an additional 13,072 cubic feet per second.

On application made by the company to the governor in council some time prior to March, 1929, and following a hearing before the then minister of public works and two other federal ministers, the celebrated order in council No. 422 was passed on March 8, 1929, authorizing the construction of a canal by Beauharnois and the diversion of 40,000 cubic feet per second. I have the order in council here. It is an historic document, containing a great many provisions no doubt intended, and properly so, to safeguard the public interest. It will be noted that the authorization was by order in council, not by parliament, on the theory, as I understand it, that under the Navigable Waters Protection Act jurisdiction was in the governor in council and an order in council was all that was necessary. Probably that is a correct statement of the position.

In June, 1929, about ten weeks after order in council No. 422 was passed, an agreement was entered into between the Beauharnois company and His Majesty the King in the right of the dominion, incorporating the terms and conditions of order in council No. 422. This agreement was approved by order in council No. 1081 of that date. I refer to the numbers and dates so that if any hon. member wants to look into the contents of these orders in council he may do so. They are all set out, I believe, in the evidence and minutes of proceedings of the Beauharnois committee of 1931, where they may be found in a convenient form.

In that same year the governor in council passed three other orders in council, Nos. 2201, 2202 and 2203, which authorized the transfer of three water-power leases previously granted to Montreal Cotton company. These leases were assigned by the Montreal company to the Beauharnois company, and under and by virtue of that transfer and assignment the Beauharnois company acquired the right to use and divert into the canal the 13,072 cubic feet per second which together with the 40,000 cubic second feet authorized in March, 1929, make up the total of 53,072 cubic second feet which they are authorized to divert at the present time. The diversion of the 13,072 cubic feet had been authorized by previous arrangement and was I think vested in the Montreal Cotton company, and no question arises with respect to that.

The question of the diversion of this water arose in the house in 1930. Nothing took place. It was raised, if I recollect aright, by the then hon. member for Acadia, who is not now in parliament. Again it was raised in 1931 because of allegations made across the country with respect to what had taken place after the passing of order in council No. 422 in 1929. I recall very well the sittings of that committee, some of the results that flowed from them and some of the controversies that took place in this house in connection with the report of the committee and the legislation that resulted from it. I do not intend to go into that to-day. The committee made a report on July 28, 1931, and as a result two statutes were passed by this parliament, which are chapters 19 and 20, 21-22 George V, assented to August 3, 1931. The preamble of the first statute recites:

—grave doubts have arisen as to the validity of order in council P.C. 422, dated the eighth day of March, 1929, as amended by order in council P.C. 1081, dated the twenty-second day of June, 1929, which purported to be made under the provisions of the said Navigable Waters Protection Act, and also as to the validity of an agreement based upon the terms and conditions of said amended order in council, made between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, and His Majesty the King, which was executed on the twenty-fifth day of June, 1929—

In the enacting sections the statute goes on to annul order in council P.C. 422, dated March 8, 1929, as amended by the second order in council to which I referred, as well as the agreement. Section 2 provides:

The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, its successors or assigns, in so far as it may be within the competence of parliament, is hereby granted the right to divert from lake St. Francis up to but not exceeding 53,072 cubic second feet of water of the flow of the river St. Lawrence, to be returned to lake St. Louis—

That is to say, having rescinded the authority previously given, in the manner in which it was given, parliament then gave this company the right to divert water up to that limit. Then section 3 contained an absolute prohibition against the governor in council consenting to any further or additional diversion of water by that company from the St. Lawrence river except with the express approval of parliament. The result of that legislation was to grant the diversion the company was then expected to operate under, to put it on a sound and safe basis so they would be sure they had what they wanted up to that point. But the primary object of the legislation was to prevent any further diversion being permitted by the governor in council and to retain control in parliament, I think in the interests of navigation. As is well known, of course, this company went through the throes of a reorganization—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is there not a section which reserves the rights of the province of Quebec in the use of the water?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; I am coming to that. I may as well deal with the two statutes at once; I want to be as coherent as possible and not take up too much time.

A moment ago I stated that there were two statutes, and I have given the house the substance of the first, together with what appear to be the reasons for that statute. At the same time parliament passed a second statute, which is chapter 20 of the statutes of that year, the preamble of which deals with the question of jurisdiction. This has to do with inland navigation, and I think it was upon that basis that the act was passed. At all events that was one of the reasons. The preamble states:

Whereas the improvement of inland navigation by the development of a deep waterway, which is now in progress, from lake Superior to the sea—

I might interject that we were then either finishing or had just finished the great Welland ship canal.

—through the great lakes and connecting waters and in part in, over or along the St. Lawrence river, requires that the canal now being constructed or to be constructed by the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, should hereafter be under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada and be made available for navigation for vessels of such size and draught as may use the new Welland canal upon its completion—

This company having been given the right to divert 53,000 cubic feet per second, the effect on the flow of water for purposes of navigation will be appreciated at once. My information is that the canal was designed, constructed and in fact conceived to take the whole flow of the river, about 250,000 cubic feet per second; and it was because of the idea that eventually this company might gain the whole flow of the river that it was deemed desirable that the canal should be vested in His Majesty the King, while built at the expense of the company, so as to take the place of that portion of the St. Lawrence river bed which would be denuded of water by the entire diversion of the river.

I understand that the canal cost $16,000,000. Anyone who has seen the canal must be impressed with the magnitude of the whole undertaking. This statute, chapter 20, was designed to vest the canal in His Majesty the King, and to declare that the work was for the general advantage of Canada, so as to give jurisdiction over the canal to the government of Canada, having regard to the appropriate provisions of the British North America Act. Section 3 contains a provision empowering the governor in council to acquire such lands and works as may be deemed necessary or useful for the improvement of navigation by means of said canal between the two lakes, and finally section 4 contains a provision safeguarding the rights of the province of Quebec, whatever they may be. I recall very well the discussion backward and forward at that time between Mr. Cahan, who was in charge of the matter, and my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Certainly the rights of the province of Quebec are adequately safeguarded, and no question arises out of that.

One point further in this brief history of the undertaking. I understand that subject to the passage of legislation in 1931—and I have not the exact date before me—the Beauharnois company secured from the Quebec government of the day the right to use an additional thirty thousand cubic feet per second of water, and I understand the company were made to pay pretty well for that right, too. I do not know just what right and proper rentals should be, but I thought that if a company were receiving a public franchise from a province it was only right and proper that that company should pay proper compensation.

Mr. ROWE: They still have it cheap.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may still be cheap hydro power; I think perhaps it is. So far I do not think it has been an especially cheap hydro-electric installation, based on horse-power cost. But if they get this additional diversion of thirty thousand cubic feet per second, and if they ultimately secure the diversion of the whole of the waters of the St. Lawrence river, it will be a gold mine for the Beauharnois company. The country should get something out of it, and so should the province of Quebec. That is the history of the situation, as I know it.

This application is one for the diversion of an additional thirty thousand cubic feet per second of water from the St. Lawrence river. Under the existing statute application must be made to parliament. But before parliament passes the bill there are some considerations to which the House of Commons, the government and the public ought to give attention. I am not raising these matters in any hostile attitude. I understand that to-day the company has two contracts, one with the Ontario hydro-electric for 250,000 horse-power and the other with the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company for 150,000 horse-power. It should be noted by hon, members that at the present time, and I believe since 1931, the Beauharnois company has been a whollyowned subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company.

I know there was a great deal of recrimination in connection with the acquisition by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company of the Beauharnois company. The original company, namely that of 1928, which might properly be described as the promotion company—I am at a loss to know how to characterize it—was in financial difficulties; and if the government had not taken action and guaranteed the banks over an interim period, this great enterprise might have gone into liquidation and been purchased for a song. There were some who thought control of the Beauharnois company ought not to go into the hands of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company. But it was developed at the time and subsequently that no other group was capable of coming to the rescue of the Beauharnois company and of carrying its operations through to a successful conclusion. Whatever one may think about power monopoly, he must realize that there are practical considerations which have to be taken into account, particularly in a situation such as that which confronted the Beauharnois com-

I shall not go into that phase of the matter. Suffice it to say that the Beauharnois company is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company. I think I am correctly advised when I say-and if not I shall accept correction—that about 400,000 horse-power is being generated and sold, such horse-power being allocated as I indicated earlier in my observations. It is contended, and I have no doubt genuinely, that the Ontario hydro-electric authorities are approaching a time when more power will be needed from Beauharnois, notwithstanding what we have heard in recent years about selling Quebec power in Ontario. I shall not discuss that aspect of the matter at all, but I have no doubt power is needed in Ontario. I do not know what the situation is in the Montreal area.

I am wondering if the minister has any information as to what portion if any of the power is now being or in the future may be exported to the United States. My information is that the 150,000 horse-power to which I referred earlier goes into what is known as the Montreal power pool, and is used in various ways and through various channels. I have no information which would lead me to believe that any portion of that power is directly exported to the United States. made some inquiries respecting the power exported to the Aluminum company located in the state of New York, and my information is that the power they import from Canada is developed at the Cedars. My understanding is that the development at that point is not a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company, but is one in which they have a very substantial interest.

Will the minister indicate what portion if any of the present output of this power can be said to be exported to the United States, and what portion of any increased output will be so exported. It may be that none of it will go to the United States; I have not been informed on the point. In any case the public ought to know something about it. If Canada is giving the right to the Beauharnois company to divert 30,000 cubic feet per second from the wholly enclosed Canadian portion of the St. Lawrence river, and if a portion of that increase is to be exported to the United States, we ought to know about it. No matter how friendly we may be to the great republic to the south, after such observations as I have been able to make I am led to the belief that once an agreement is made to export power to the United States we shall never get back the rights to that power.

I realize that there are two schools of thought on the subject. Frequently I have heard it urged that power is one commodity Canada can sell, and that we have an excess supply. It is stated that the sale of power would bring in money. The other point of view is that we should not permit any further export of power to the United States because after a time they might claim a vested interest and we should never get back the rights.

I remember clearly a debate which took place in this chamber in 1925 on a resolution moved by an hon. member then sitting on this side of the house, and seconded by myself. The government of the day was led by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government; I believe the late Sir Lomer Gouin was minister of justice and my right hon. friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was minister of marine. On that occasion the principle of the resolution was accepted, namely that there should be no further export of power without the consent of the province involved.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Was that Mr. Stewart's motion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it was the motion of Mr. LeSueur. That gentleman is now connected with the Imperial Oil company, but in the years I have mentioned he sat in the house. I believe that principle has prevailed ever since, and I agree that it is a sound one. The view that we ought to sell our power in order to obtain ready money is a short term view. We ought to take the long term view of this matter. However, that is one point to which I should like the minister to give consideration. I am sure the information must be available to him and he should inform the house. I do not imagine for a minute that any of the 250,000 horse-power sold to the Ontario hydro is exported to the United States, but I should like to know definitely. Is any of the 150,-000 horse-power sold to the Montreal company exported? Will any of the power to be generated by this additional diversion of 30,000 cubic second feet be exported to the United States?

There are three other considerations of a national character to which I desire to direct the attention of the minister. First, I should like to know what effect if any this additional diversion will have upon the water levels of Montreal harbour. I know that many people will say right off that it will have no effect, because this water is simply to be diverted at one point in the river, passed through the canal, and then expelled in the lower lake to go down the St. Lawrence river. However, it must be remembered that in order to make the best use of a water diversion, the water must be controlled. I think this is something about which the government should consult an independent hydro engineer. I have the highest respect for Mr. Henry's ability, but I think we should have some other opinion. To put it frankly, he is rather interested in the project. This diversion may result in a periodic lowering or raising of the water level at Montreal. I hope I have made it quite clear that I am not objecting; I simply offer this for the consideration of the government.

The next matter to which I would direct attention is the possible effect of this diversion upon the Soulanges canal, which is on the north side of the river opposite the Beauharnois development. I should like to know at what stage of this diversion or of future diversions will there be an effect upon the government-owned canal.

Mr. REID: Can the hon, member say whether or not the diversion which has taken place up to the present time has had any effect upon navigation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I understand it, for quite a number of years there has not been much navigation. The only steamboat plying these waters was the Rapids Queen. I made that trip several times. I understand that this boat does not go down the rapids at the present time, but I am not prepared to say that that is because of any diversion that has taken place. Any navigation on the river is taken care of by the canal on the north side. If the hon, gentleman has ever travelled up and down the river he will know that that canal provides the only feasible way of getting up the river. I should like to know what effect this diversion will have upon the Soulanges canal. I can visualize the time when, if this company succeeds and additional diversions are permitted by future governments, the whole flow of the river will go through the power company's canal, thus rendering the canal on the other side useless for navigation or any other purpose. This is a consideration which we ought to keep before us.

The next matter which I offer for the consideration of the minister and the government is this: If the present diversion or future diversions seriously interfere with navigation through the Soulanges canal, what arrangement is there in existence or what arrangement will be put into effect to permit navigation through the company canal? That is the canal which was built by the company and which has been vested in the federal government by legislation. At what stage of the diversion will the Beauharnois development be considered a navigation project as well as a power development? To-day it is only a power development, but if future diversions should change the course of the river it will become a navigation proposition. The government is in duty bound to see that provision is made to protect the rights of navigation. I hope there will always be navigation in the St. Lawrence river.

If my reading of the public press is correct, at this very moment the government is negotiating with the government at Washington for a new treaty to establish what is known as the St. Lawrence waterway development. My view is that in war time all such demands might very well wait. I am not going to say anything more about that at this time. This scheme has no friends in the maritime provinces, no matter what government promotes it, and I doubt if it has many friends in Quebec. I would not venture to speak for the hon. members from that province, who are well qualified to speak for themselves; but I do venture to speak for my own and neighbouring provinces. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) is a maritimer, and I am just throwing this out as a hint to him. This scheme has not many friends down there.

Mr. McCANN: There are lots of them in Ontario.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true. It just shows what a sectional country Canada is, which is a pity. I am not so sure that all of Ontario is in favour of it, neither am I so sure that all of the United States is in agreement. I have read many press reports and I have received many communications, but why labour that point now? I mention the matter merely in passing.

Let me ask this further question. What would be the feasibility and desirability of diverting the main flow of the St. Lawrence through Beauharnois, making it fully navigable and abandoning the Soulanges canal? What works would be required for that purpose, and is the government looking ahead to that situation? I think that parliament in granting this very important and very valuable franchise ought to take as long a view as possible of its every effect on the economy of this country, and I have endeavoured to present these considerations as best I could and bring them to the attention of the government. Having done that, I feel I have done my full duty. I am trying to do that, and I think hon. members will give me credit for presenting the matter in as judicious a way as possible without opening up any old sores. I could talk of "valleys of humiliation" and $500,000 election gifts, but I am not going to do so because that is past and done with. Perhaps I am sorry that I did not get part of that money to help elect myself. But that is all over.

There is a further consideration to which I would direct the minister's attention. What is the potential gross power development at Beauharnois? What is it capable of doing? Is it not sufficient, if fully utilized, to render completely unnecessary any further plans for the St. Lawrence waterway considered as a power project?

I would also ask the minister about the Chicago diversion. It may seem a little far afield to speak of that here, but I followed this matter in days gone by when I was here, and I was astonished at the absolute disregard by the Chicago municipal authorities of the agreement made between the two nations. I ask the minister now: Is the Chicago drainage commission complying with the terms of the judgment of the supreme court of the United States?

There is one further consideration. With this additional diversion, with this increase in the flow of water and the increase in the company's power production, will there be any effect on the capital structure of the company? Hon. gentlemen may say that that is none of our business. Possibly not; it is a matter of property and civil rights, the company being incorporated under a Quebec act. But I would remind the house that large sums of money were subscribed by the public and put into this enterprise in days gone by and were absolutely lost to the enterprisenot by the present owners, because I do not think any money has been lost by any action of theirs. But in days gone by there is no doubt that huge profits were made by the promoters of this Beauharnois scheme. Some of it did not stick very long with some of the recipients but it all came out of the public, every dollar of it, and it is loaded into the capital structure and into the rates which this company may charge. Will this new diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second have any effect on the capital structure? Will it have any effect on the rates? It should have, because this new diversion will make the cost of the installation very much lower per horse-power than it is to-day. I understand that the capital cost to-day is about $200 per horse-power. The figure may not be accurate; it is an estimate, and it is estimated that this additional diversion will reduce the capital cost per horse-power to $150, which as hon. gentlemen will observe is a very marked improvement in the capital cost of the installation.

I have already alluded to Mr. Henry. Mr. Henry's position with respect to this matter ten years ago occasioned a good deal of censure and recrimination. Mr. Henry was deputy minister of railways; Mr. Henry was head of the Beauharnois corporation. I cannot recall whether he occupied both positions at the same time. My colleague from Yale (Mr. Stirling) says he did not. But I know there was a great deal of criticism with respect to Mr. Henry's relationship to this project and the application that was granted in March of 1929. Mr. Henry is now the head of the Beauharnois corporation, and I understand that he is the minister's right hand man.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is a liaison officer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is liaison officer with the minister. I am not going to pursue that—

Mr. HOWE: To get the record straight I may say that Mr. Henry is a member of the executive, first of the war supply board, now with the Department of Munitions and Supply, serving without salary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very good.

Mr. HOWE: And I suggest that a man doing that should not have unnecessary disapprobation piled on his head.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the minister. You will not find me slinging any mud at Mr. Henry. I am simply calling attention to the present situation which is somewhat similar at least to the situation which existed in 1929.

I am not going to vote against this bill. I believe that the company is up to the limit of the power which can be developed from the present diversion. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just about up to that. I understand from the minister to-day, and this is a very important point to which we should give consideration, that in the area served by this development there is need for more power. I am quite prepared to accept the minister's statement on that. I believe it is correct, and that is one fairly good reason—it may not be the best reason in the world—for putting this bill through. The only reason I have occupied the attention of the house for so long was to call its attention to the relationship of this development to the national interests. The government in the final analysis must take full responsibility for putting this bill through; by making it a government measure they have taken that responsibility.

In closing I commend to the minister's attention the different aspects of the matter to which I have referred. There are questions of a serious public character to which consideration should be given and in respect of which there should be a statement from the government before the bill is finally passed.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask my hon. friend and the house if the bill could be allowed to go to committee, so that the minister might be able to give the information which has been asked for?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that would be the proper procedure.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister intends to put the bill into committee right away?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Immediately.

Mr. HOWE: It is merely for the purpose of allowing questions to be answered.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1-Authority to divert.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not rising to oppose the bill, but I have some questions which I wish to ask, so if the minister is replying later on to any other hon. member, he can at that time also answer my questions. At the same time I wish to say something about the whole matter which is involved in the bill.

As I understand it, the authority of this parliament is strictly confined to navigation. That being the case, all we can do is either approve or disapprove the bill, because the production of power is wholly a matter for the province of Quebec. Since the government sponsored the bill, and in view of the fact that the diversion of 83,072 cubic feet of water per second will destroy the river, so far as navigation is concerned, from lake St. Francis down the rapids section of the river to lake St. Louis, I should like the minister to inform the committee if the government has ascertained and satisfied itself that so far as navigation is concerned from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis, the St. Lawrence is "through"; for, as I said a moment ago, the diversion of $3,072 cubic feet per second will destroy navigation; in fact at present, during the summer time, navigation is destroyed through the diversion of the present 53,072 cubic feet of water.

Mr. HOWE: It is not very good in the winter time either.

Mr. MacNICOL: Occasionally, when high water is available, the Canada Steamship boat, the Rapids Queen, can go down that section, but navigation is precarious excepting during high water.

I might, perhaps, give a little background regarding the flow of the water at the point where it is affected by the Beauharnois canal and where it flows down the river to lake St. Louis. This is one of the greatest sites of potential power wealth in the world. Behind lake St. Francis the area of the St. Lawrence watershed, outside of the Ottawa river watershed, is 250,000 square miles, more largely in Ontario than in the United States, but shared almost equally between them. The total flow of the river at the outlet on lake St. Francis in high water is about 230,000 cubic feet per second; it varies from that amount down to 180,000 cubic feet per second in low water. As I have said, in low water the diversion of 83,072 cubic feet from 180,000 cubic feet of water would destroy the value of the river for navigation purposes. I want to have it clear in my mind whether the government has decided that so far as navigation is concerned between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, the St. Lawrence river is "through."

The river from the gulf of St. Lawrence to the head waters-and I have followed it from one end to the other—is about 1,870 miles. It has immense potential power value. Right at the outlet of lake St. Francis at present what is the situation? Beauharnois diverts 53,072 cubic feet of water per second, from which it develops, or can develop, on an 85 per cent basis, 400,000 horse power. As any engineer in the house knows, the horse power is based on the height that the water drops, which is 83 feet. The level of lake St. Francis above the sea being 152 feet, and the level of lake St. Louis being 69 feet, this makes the difference of 83 feet. The flow of the river, which is taken normally at 230,000 feet per second, multiplied by the height of the fall, which is 83, and divided by 11, will enable anyone to figure out the normal power, which would be approximately 1,750,000 horse power on that basis. I believe that to-day the Beauharnois company are developing all but one-half of the power of one generator. As my leader said, they are developing practically all they can. A little down the river from the outlet of lake St. Francis there are two other power sites in operation: The Cedars on the north side of the river developing about 225,000 horse power, and the St. Timothy on the south side of the river developing 30,000 horse power. In other words, at the moment there is being developed from the flow of the river east of lake St. Francis in the rapids section between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis, approximately 655,000 horse power.

Now my leader referred to the possible diversion of the full flow of the river, and asked the minister what the horse power would be if the full flow of the river were diverted through the Beauharnois canal. The full flow is 230,000 cubic feet per second. I suppose it could be regulated back west through the reservoirs of the five great lakes, commencing with lake Superior, the largest, having an area of 31,800 square miles, and lake Ontario, the smallest, having an area of 7,760 square miles. Therefore I have no doubt that remedial works west of Kingston, Ontario, to the sources of the river could provide enough water that the flow of 230,000 cubic feet per second could be maintained. That being the case, the total power which could be developed by the full flow of the river at Beauharnois is 230,000 multiplied by 83 and divided by 11, or approximately 1,750,000 horse power. There we have an everlasting and perfect potential power development, which so far as I know is not surpassed anywhere in one unit.

There is one feature that I do not like—not about this development itself; I think the development is a splendid one—but I do not like one phrase that is in the bill because it recalls another very sad event that happened to Canada. In the preamble are these words:

. . . urgently required to meet the increased demand incident to manufacture of materials for war purposes.

I have in mind that in 1918 there took place in the St. Lawrence river another diversion in regard to which somewhat the same words appeared in the submission presented to the International Joint Commission when the Aluminum company at Massena applied to that commission in August I believe, at any rate during the summer of 1918, for permission to erect a weir in the south channel of the St. Lawrence river between Long Sault island and the New York shore. The same argument was put up for permission to divert waters, namely "for war purposes." The International Joint Commission granted the Aluminum company the right to erect a weir in the river, the first result being that the river was raised five feet, and the second result was that navigation was totally destroyed in the south branch of the St. Lawrence river. The commission gave the Aluminum company the right to erect that weir on condition that it should be removed at the end of the war, or in any event within five years. That has not been done; that weir is still across the river between Long Sault island and the south bank of the river. I have made a careful examination of it, photographed it, and what I am stating I know to be a fact. There is no navigation down the south branch of the St. Lawrence river, and for years-for generations, from the commencement of navigation in the St. Lawrence—the south branch was a navigation channel. That weir has not been removed in spite of the express order of the International Joint Commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I tell the hon. member that there was no navigation in the south branch of the river before the weir of which he speaks was built.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon, friend evidently is not familiar with navigation in the south branch of the St. Lawrence river. I may tell my hon. friend that this matter has had long study by me, and from the commencement until 1896 the south branch of the St. Lawrence river could be navigated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is correct. May I interrupt the hon. gentleman? What I was telling the hon, member is that prior to the construction of the weir there was no navigation south.

Mr. MacNICOL: And I am telling my hon. friend again that he is wrong. I repeat what I said; up until 1896, about the time the Massena canal was first commenced, the south branch of the St. Lawrence could be navigated. I was up and down it myself from the town of Prescott when I was a boy. I am not in the habit of making statements here that are not correct. In spite of the order of the International Joint Commission the weir is still in the river, and the Massena company is diverting 25,000 cubic feet per second with which they are generating 90,000 horse power at Massena.

However, I am not opposing these words in the bill; I am merely stating that they recall to my mind another diversion from the St. Lawrence river that has been wholly unsatisfactory so far as Canadians are concerned, for we receive no revenue from that diversion.

Something was said about the export of power. I also am generally opposed to the export of power. Years ago when the development of the St. Lawrence river for power purposes was proposed, the late Sir Adam Beck, who was then chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, stated, in a protest against the exportation of hydro-electric power, with special reference to a power development that at that time was proposed to be erected on the Ottawa river at Carillon, as reported at page nine of the report:

I am not alone.

That is in the opposition to the export of Premier Ferguson of Ontario and Premier Taschereau of Quebec on different occasions have expressed themselves most forcibly against the exportation of electricity upon any terms such as those outlined for the proposed Carillon

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the date of that?

Mr. MacNICOL: The report of 1925, page 9.

My leader asked: Is there any power being exported by the Beauharnois company? My information may not be correct, but as given to me it is that in consideration of the United States interests at Niagara releasing the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario from the agreed export at Niagara falls of some 40,000 horse power, that amount is now exported from Beauharnois to compensate for said release. Of course that is not an additional exportation; it is only taking the place of the said exportation that would have been carried on from Niagara falls according to agreement.

One reason why I am not against the diversion of the water, provided the government have decided that navigation is "through" east of lake St. Francis, is that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario does require power. And it has a right to expect to be able to purchase power from the Beauharnois company because, in a pamphlet issued in 1928, entitled "St. Lawrence waterway project" are these words:

We believe the situation justifies consideration of the present problem from the broad national standpoint by both the provinces

That is, Ontario and Quebec.

That is, Ontario and Quebec.
—and that in the national interests such arrangements should be made as will enable Ontario to secure her power requirements for eastern territory from the purely Canadian section of the river pending the development of the international reaches. We are of opinion that, in the light of the good understanding presently obtaining between the two provinces, this would not be difficult of arrangement, and that power could be thus secured at rates which will compare most favourably with present cost of Ontario power.

That merely goes to show that Ontario should expect to obtain power from Beauharnois and have it delivered to the Ontario hydro commission. As I said a moment ago, the hydro commission does require more power. Prior to the depression I believe the demand for power increased at the rate of about ten per cent a year, but during the depression the demand decreased. In one of the last years of depression, 1937, the power generated by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission direct was 1,094,504 horse power. In 1938 it was about the same-1,086,729 horse power. In 1939, however, I suppose owing to the demand made by industry in preparing to produce munitions, the government having gone into that work to some extent, the power produced rose to 1,228,552 horse power, an increase of thirteen per cent in one year. From other hydro interests and companies producing power for commission, the commission the hydro obtained 1,484,650 horse power in 1938 and 1,669,335 horse power in 1939, or an increase of twelve per cent in that period. So to-day there is a substantial demand, and I am told that at the present time the hydro electric power commission has a reserve of not more than 300,000 horse power.

There are other places where electricity can be developed. One such place is the Nipigon river. They are now developing a large block of power there, but just south of the point where the Nipigon river leaves lake Nipigon there is a most magnificent falls called Virgin falls, and just down the river there are two other rapids. From those three rapids I am told some 75,000 horse power could be developed. And if we can obtain an agreement with Quebec we can develop about 225,000 horse power at the Carillon, and agreement between the two provinces another 600,000 horse power can be developed between Chats falls, where they are developing, and lake Temiskaming. None of that power, however, could be brought into operation quickly, so there is some merit in the request of the Beauharnois company to develop more power.

As someone said not long ago, the Beauharnois development is a wonderful project. In my surveys up and down a great number of rivers I have always been struck with the way God, in laying out the courses of the rivers, provided many wonderful places for the development of vast power resources. The river may take a turn one way round a bend and go down a series of rapids, but God has left, between where the river starts to bend and where power can be developed, a narrow flat table-land, so that all man has to do is dam the river, dig a short canal and develop power. The Beauharnois canal is fourteen or fifteen miles long and something like 3,000 feet wide. It is a wonderful sight, running across a tableland, the edge of which is the shore of lake St. Louis, where there is a fall of 83 feet. In that distance of fourteen or fifteen miles the river drops down its natural bed over a series of rapids of which the Coteau, Cedars and Cascades are the principal three. So at Beauharnois there is an opportunity to develop power rapidly. I believe they would have to erect another power house, since I understand that now they are developing to capacity with the exception of half of one turbine. However, they could construct a new power house more rapidly than the Ottawa river could be dammed and a power house erected at that point.

I want to take this opportunity to warn the government in the strongest way possible that if they make any attempt whatever to permit the diversion of water from the Albany river watershed, I will fight it as long as I can, I care not who introduces it or who supports it. I am wholly opposed to the diversion of water from one great watershed to another. I am told that the hydro power commission have stated that they will do this if they are permitted, and I believe there is some talk of writing such a provision into the St. Lawrence treaty, but I will fight any provision in that treaty in regard to the diversion of Albany river water into the great lakes. They have erected dams on a branch of the Albany river, namely the Kenogami river, as the minister knows, at a cost of one and a half or two million dollars, and they cannot use a drop of that water without the consent of this parliament and the congress of the United States. I do not think we should do anything like that; I believe we can get all the power we want in Canada without that, but of course that is another matter.

A few moments ago my leader said something about what took place in 1931. I am not going to enlarge on what he said. I was in this house at the time and I well remember the speech made by the Prime Minister. I felt very sorry for him at that time. I am convinced of this, that if there is one thing we can say about the Prime Minister it is that he is absolutely honest personally. I do not believe anyone could point a finger at the integrity of the right hon. gentleman, but at that time there was a rather sorry mess associated with the development of Beauharnois. I always regret that such a great, Godgiven treasure to Canada should have been mixed up with such a dirty mess at that time.

Perhaps I might answer a question which was asked by the leader of the opposition with regard to the Chicago drainage canal. I keep in constant touch with the diversion at Chicago and know it perhaps as well as it is known by most people. At the moment the Chicago diversion is down to the amount set out in the judgment of the supreme court; that is, the diversion for dilution purposes, which is 1,500 cubic feet per second. On the other hand, Chicago has increased its takeage of water for domestic purposes until to-day it exceeds the per capita takeage for domestic purposes of any great city in the world. It is said it is now taking for the 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 citizens in the Chicago sanitary district, over 300 gallons per day per citizen. That means it is taking somewhere between 1,250,000,000 and 1,500,000,000 gallons of water per day, or the equivalent of about 2,000 cubic feet per second. That amount is much more than Chicago took for domestic purposes before the judgment was issued by the United States Supreme Court. So that when the government is considering the diversion at Chicago, in connection with the St. Lawrence river development, it should keep in mind the fact that Chicago is taking far too much water for domestic purposes, and is thereby in a position to dilute its water more than it would otherwise do. It is still a Chicago steal in that regard.

My leader said something about the Soulanges canal. I believe that canal starts about Coteau Landing, or just east of that point. The Beauharnois diversion is constructed in such a way that a long weir runs out into the lake. The lake being level, I should not imagine that a further diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second would interfere with the present operation of the Soulanges canal. However, it might do so. Certainly it might well interfere with power production farther down the river, and would eliminate possibilities of navigation down the river.

When the minister speaks, I should like him to answer these questions:

(a) Does the government propose to abandon navigation down the river between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis? If it does, then I presume there will be no further objection to any further diversion.

(b) What effect will the additional diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second have on the production of power at the Cedars power plant and at the St. Timothy power plant? If the power development at either of these plants is affected by the increased diversion, who is going to compensate the present producers of the power?

(c) Is the government going to permit the export of power generated by the further diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second at Beauharnois?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

(d) As the diversion will destroy navigation, and as it will destroy navigation for small pleasure craft and ships operated by the Canada Steamship Lines, will the minister tell the committee if the Canada Steamship Lines have any vested rights in the river in connection with the passage of its ships, and if so, who would compensate that company for the loss of the privilege of sailing boats down the river? We must realize that the boat trip down the St. Lawrence is one of the greatest scenic trips in the world.

(e) Provided the Beauharnois company is given the right to divert this water, and when or if the St. Lawrence canal or whatever navigation canal the government is going to construct through the Beauharnois canal is constructed, will Canada be in any way obligated to pay for navigation purposes part of the cost already expended by the Beauharnois

I ask that question because I am told that there will be a clause in the new St. Lawrence agreement to the effect that the cost of the development of the St. Lawrence waterways will be divided as follows: Purely power purposes, so far as Ontario is concerned, to be paid by the province of Ontario; purely navigation purposes to be paid by the Dominion of Canada; purposes common to both power and navigation to be paid equally by both. I have in mind that when the Beauharnois bill went through the house nine or ten years ago I was fully convinced, and I believe all hon, members were convinced, that if and when the Beauharnois canal became a navigation canal it would not cost the Dominion of Canada anything, apart from the building of the locks.

That is all I have to say on the matter. I am not going to vote against the bill, if the government gives satisfactory answers to what I have asked. I am sorry that the greatness of this power project was in its early stages somewhat marred by the dirty mess which surrounded its inception.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is probably one of the most important bills we have had before us for a considerable length of time, and one which, in the opinion of hon. members of this group, should be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, in order that a thorough investigation may be made into what the proposed bill involves.

In discussing the bill this afternoon the minister said it was necessary to obtain this right to divert a further 30,000 cubic feet per second as a requirement of war production. May I point out to the committee that the bill provides for the diversion of this water after the war is over. On the grounds of a war necessity we are extending the concession of one of the most valuable resources of our country to a private corporation. As has been shown already by hon, members who have spoken, the amount of the diversion will be so great that in reality we are giving a virtual water-power monopoly to the Beauharnois company.

It is proposed to increase the amount already granted by 30,000 cubic feet per second, and thereby bringing the total amount up to about 83,000 cubic feet per second. As shown by the hon, member who has just taken his seat, that involves more than one-third of the possible flow of water in the river St. Lawrence. In view of the circumstances it is perfectly obvious that parliament has a duty to all the people of Canada, and that such a right should not be granted to the Beauharnois company until the whole matter has been thoroughly investigated by the proper committee and a report made to the house.

The present application carries the Beauharnois company's control of the water of the St. Lawrence river one step farther towards complete control. That, it seems to me, involves something else; it involves the whole of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. Before we vote upon this bill, the minister should tell us if the proposed additional diversion has been submitted for the approval of the International Joint Commission. If this has not been done, should the government not consider the obtaining of their approval in view of the boundary waters treaty? I have before me an opinion given on December 21, 1928, by the deputy minister of justice, Mr. Edwards. The boundary waters treaty between Canada and the United States was made on January 11, 1909. That treaty contained certain terms, and article IV states:

The high contracting parties agree that, except in cases provided for by special agreement between them, they will not permit the construction or maintenance on their respective sides of the boundary of any remedial or protective works or any dams or other obstructions in waters flowing from boundary waters or in waters at a lower level than the boundary in rivers flowing across the boundary the effect of which is to raise the natural level of waters on the other side of the boundary, unless the construction or maintenance thereof is approved by the aforesaid International Joint Commission.

Article VIII states:

In cases involving the elevation of the natural level of waters on either side of the line as the result of the construction and maintenance on the other side of remedial or protective works or dams or other obstructions in boundary waters or in waters flowing therefrom or in waters below the boundary in rivers flowing across the boundary, the commission shall require, as a condition of its approval, that suitable and adequate provision, approved by it, be made for the protection and indemnity of all interests on the other side of the line which may be injured thereby.

Then Mr. Edwards goes on to say:

I am of opinion that the plain intent of these articles of the treaty, as regards the present case—

That was the former application.

—is to require that the construction of the proposed works shall be approved by the International Joint Commission, if the said works, when constructed, would have effect to raise the natural level of waters on the United States side of the boundary; but if the construction of the proposed works would not be attended by that effect, then I am of opinion that the construction of the works may be authorized without reference to the International Joint Commission.

I am not in a position to say just what the effect of this would be; but in view of the fact that if such projects are proceeded with, the Beauharnois company will control the whole canal system in that part of the river, I am of opinion that, before this bill is passed, a thorough inquiry should be made into this application.

There is another question which I think the minister might answer. Is it the policy of the present government to allow this section of the St. Lawrence river to pass completely to private control? This is a navigable water. If this is not their policy, is this not a good time to stop any further progress in the direction of private exploitation? I know nothing about the technical problems involved, but along with many other people in this country I am alarmed at the growth of monopolies in various forms. These monopolies have increased largely because of the granting of the right to exploit the natural resources of Canada. Probably the greatest natural resource that we have left to-day is water power, and private corporations are endeavouring to obtain control of this public asset. In our opinion our water power ought to be developed for the public benefit rather than for the benefit of private corporations. In view of the scandal which surrounded the granting of the original application some years ago, I think it would be in the interests of the government itself to refer this bill to the proper committee. Then the application can be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. MARTIN: What would be the proper committee?

Mr. COLDWELL: The committee on rail-ways, canals and telegraph lines. We could then have available the technical advice that we require in order to arrive at some opinion regarding the application. I am not an engineer and I do not know very much about engineering practice. There are probably many other members like me in that respect, and before we are asked to vote upon this bill we should be better informed as to its implications. In any event, before the bill is passed, there should be a thorough investigation and the whole matter referred to the International Joint Commission for its approval. This is a good time for the government to prevent the extension of private monopoly in connection with our power resources.

This afternoon we were told by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that the Beauharnois corporation is now a subsidiary of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power consolidated, which has subsidiaries all across Canada and is rapidly becoming a giant corporation controlling the very life of this nation as far as the power situation is concerned. That is not healthy. That is not good. In our opinion this bill should not be passed to enable this corporation to further fasten its grip upon the Canadian people. We should not give to this company the right to divert from our waterway system an additional amount of water which would permit them to control more than one-third of the flow of the whole river. We urge, therefore, that the government give these suggestions their consideration and that the matter be referred to the committee to be thoroughly investigated. If that suggestion is not adopted, then we urge that the matter be referred to the International Joint Commission before this concession is granted.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman, recently there was in a Toronto paper an editorial entitled "Is Beauharnois too hot to handle?" I do not know if that is the reason why there are at this time so many empty seats on the government side. I notice that there are fewer than thirty members in their seats. I rise to protest against the principle of handing over the natural resources of Canada to private corporations which are rapidly becoming monopolistic in character. We maintain that our duty here is to protect the natural wealth of Canada, which we contend belongs to the common people of Canada., and it should not be handed over to these corporations.

I find from the Annual Financial Review of July, 1939, that Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated has several subsidiary companies: The Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power company; the Provincial Light, Heat and Power company; the Quebec-New England Hydro-Electric corporation; the Beauharnois Power corporation, and under that the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company; the Montreal Island Power company. I believe we should be remiss in our duty if we did not voice a protest against the giving away of these natural resources. I cannot understand why the wealth of Canada, which we maintain is the heritage of the people of this country, should be given away without remuneration. In that connection I should like to know what profits the Beauharnois company derives from these great natural resources. I should like to see the Canadian people a fifty per cent shareholder, let us say, in some of these large corporations which are deriving their wealth from our natural resources and from which the people receive mighty little in return.

Mr. HOWE: There have been so many questions, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps it would save time if I attempted to answer them briefly before we proceed with the bill section by section.

First, as to the profits of Beauharnois, I would point out that the disposal of electric energy, or of the water in the river and the energy generated from it, is a matter entirely for the province. The province owns the flow of the water and can dispose of it as it likes except when it interferes with navigation, and there the federal government has sole and paramount jurisdiction. But so long as navigation is not interfered with, the use of the water in the river is the concern of the province.

The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company, as has been stated, is now wholly owned by Montreal Light, Heat and Power, and the rates that it can charge for the sale of power are controlled absolutely by the electricity board of the province of Quebec. The leasehold arrangements for the water dealt with in this bill are a matter entirely for that province.

As for the use of the power, the province of Quebec has taxing power on the corporation, and if the province has not sufficient taxing power I think my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) can help them out with his war profits tax. It would hardly be good business for the company to attempt to pile up undue profits for itself out of any lowering of capital cost per horse power resulting from this diversion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The company has been giving back its profits in reduction of rates to its customers, and it ought to get credit for that.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so, and good business would justify that practice in this particular case because otherwise they would simply be piling up profits to be taxed by the province and the dominion. The price at which power is sold in the province of Quebec is a matter for the province, and not for the federal government.

As to the export of power to the United States, it has been the policy of this government since I have been a member of it, and I think consistently for a good many years prior to that, not to sanction the export of new power to the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Without the consent of the province.

Mr. HOWE: No new power has been exported since I have been a member of the government. My knowledge does not go beyond that, but I think for many years past no new power has been exported to the United States. Two or three years ago application was received from three separate interests to export power: the Montreal Light, Heat & Power company, the Aluminum Company of Canada, and the Ontario hydro-electric power commission, for the right to export a block of 40,000 horse power to the United States. Permission to export was refused by the government to all three interests.

In the 1938 session a bill was introduced by the government and passed by this chamber prohibiting the export of power from Canada except by act of parliament. That bill was rejected by the upper chamber. I read from the Journals of the Senate, June 29, 1938, page 361:

The standing committee on banking and commerce to whom was referred the bill (21 from the House of Commons), intituled: "An act to amend the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act," have in obedience to the order of reference of 5th April, 1938, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report thereon as follows:

The committee recommend that the bill be not further proceeded with at the present session, circumstances having changed since its introduction in this house.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

F. B. Black, Chairman.

Then at the bottom there is this note:

With leave of the Senate, the said report was adopted.

In other words, this House of Commons passed a bill the purpose of which was to prohibit the export of new power except by consent of the parliament of Canada, but that bill was rejected by the upper chamber.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This house passed the bill?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROWE: And it was rejected by the upper chamber?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was a government bill, was it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and it was killed over there.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It did not come back here.

Mr. ROWE: No.

Mr. HOWE: The question was asked, what portion of the power to be generated is intended for export? The answer is that none of it can be exported without the consent of the government, and I think the government has demonstrated fully that it is not disposed to authorize the export of new power from Canada for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the minister's permission, I think he is correct in saying that none of this power could be directly exported without the consent of the government, but as I understand it, this 150,000 horse power goes into the Montreal Light, Heat and Power pool, from which there is to-day express authority to export. So some of this power may be exportable.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I am looking for someone who can distinguish power after it goes into the pool; I think it would be very difficult. The only change I know of in that situation is that we had an application for permission to change the point of export for the Ontario hydro grid. The Ontario hydro grid is supplied with power from a good many sources—the Gatineau, Beauharnois, Niagara, and other points. Its transmission lines were overloaded in the Niagara area, and it was desired to change the point of export, for a part of its commitments to the United States, to Cornwall. That was granted; it was only a small block and no new export of power was involved. It is quite possible that the Cedars have an old contract extending over a good many years to export power to the Aluminum Company of America at Massena, New York; if the power is pooled, it is quite possible that some of the Cedars power will go in the Montreal area and some of the Beauharnois power will go across the line, and I am sure no one can tell which power goes across, because, of course, two sources of power feeding into the same wire are hardly distinguishable from that point on.

Mr. MacNICOL: Massena power would hardly be exported to Canada. They develop only 90,000 horse power, and in addition they buy large quantities of power.

Mr. HOWE: The Cedars export power to Massena.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know. Massena itself could not export any.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We have a boundary waters treaty with the United States. I should like to know whether this proposed additional diversion has been submitted to the International Joint Commission for their approval.

Mr. HOWE: These are not boundary waters. The waters are wholly within Canada. My hon. friend (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the hon. member's group, read an opinion from the Department of Justice indicating that if there were put in boundary waters any obstruction which would raise or lower the level of those waters back in the other country, the matter must be submitted to the International Joint Commission. In this diversion it is simply water passed from one lake to another, rather than changing levels. Every precaution is taken to see that levels are maintained in both lakes. However, I might say that this project, the Beauharnois canal, is an essential part of the St. Lawrence waterways development, which is an international plan. It is constantly being studied by engineers chosen by their respective governments for that purpose; and the proposed diversion and all the works connected with it have received the full study and approval of the engineers responsible for the St. Lawrence waterways development.

Mr. COLDWELL: On both sides of the line?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister any reports which he could appropriately give to the committee?

Mr. HOWE: I should be glad to table the publications in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway which go into this matter fully. I have quite a library on the subject.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do they go into the question of diversion?

Mr. HOWE: I am sure they have been tabled in the past, but I should be glad to table them again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not exactly what I had in mind. What I was thinking of was any study of the effect of this proposed diversion upon navigation, and the kindred subjects to which I referred.

Mr. HOWE: I have a report from a member of my own staff, Mr. D. W. McLachlan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should be glad to have that. I have great faith in him.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. McLachlan has been in charge of the St. Lawrence, for many years for the former department of railways and [Mr. Howe.]

canals, and now, for the Department of Transport. Mr. Guy Lindsay, our hydraulic engineer, is also an expert on the matter. Both are Canadian representatives on the international board which is studying the development of the St. Lawrence. I might point out that any diversion into the Beauharnois canal, which is the canal that will be used for navigation in the St. Lawrence development, is compensated for in the flow of the river.

This bill will be supplemented by regulations which will set down certain obligations on the Beauharnois company to build compensating works. A very careful study is made to determine the effect of the diversion on water levels in that section, and compensating works are built to maintain the levels of the river.

A question was asked as to what effect this would have on the Soulanges canal. It will have no effect.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just before we leave the other point, I might have gone on and read the opinion of the deputy minister in which he says this whole matter should be referred to technical engineers and so on in order to establish whether any diversion would affect the agreement under the treaty, that is as to the water levels. The point I was making is, that report having been made, can we have it produced here in order to satisfy the members of the committee?

Mr. HOWE: I believe that such a report can be produced. It is difficult to produce specific reports on this particular subject because it is involved in a larger plan of development. Studies of the St. Lawrence have been made and agreement reached as to what compensation, for example, is necessary at certain stages of development of the work, as regards the water in this canal. The statute for the Beauharnois provides a limit on the flow of water in the Beauharnois canal. I think the limit is 21 feet per second. So much has been decided in an international way about this particular diversion that I cannot say what reports we have on this particular phase of the matter, but I can say that every phase of the development is a matter of international agreement and has been agreed upon by engineers responsible to their respective governments for the development.

Then comes the question as to when the Beauharnois ship channel will be put in operation. Navigation from Montreal harbour to Prescott is maintained at a 14-foot level, and very large expenditures are required both in the international section, above the Beauharnois development, and in the Lachine section below the Beauharnois development, before the 27-foot depth of navigation will be obtained. As I say, the development proposed in this bill does not in any way affect 14-foot navigation in the Soulanges section or any other section of the river. At such time as 27-foot navigation is a feasibility, we have a power canal some sixteen miles long, I think it is, developed at the cost of the Beauharnois company, which would otherwise have been required to be developed at the expense of the federal government, at least as far as the government's responsibility for navigation is concerned.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWE: At the request of the hon. leader of the opposition I table the report on the application of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for approval of plans to divert 40,000 cubic feet per second from lake St. Francis to lake St. Louis and from the St. Lawrence river via the south shore. This report was made by an interdepartmental committee of federal government engineers. It gives data on the effect of diversion of various amounts of water.

I also table a plan dated May 8, 1935, showing the development of the St. Lawrence at the present time.

I also table a plan dated January 8, 1940, showing the navigation features of the canal, with the future locks that will be built when needed for navigation and the development required for the 83,000 cubic feet per second diversion contemplated by this bill.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the diversion of this water affect the locks already there, render them obsolete?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing that is there will be changed in any way. Compensation works will be built in the river to take care of the proposed diversion through the canal so that the level of the water at the head of the Soulanges canal locks will be exactly the same after the diversion as it is at present. The water levels from there down are of course controlled by the locks themselves. There will be no change whatever in the navigation feature of the river by the 14-foot canal system now in operation.

Mr. NICHOLSON: While I understand we are concerned chiefly with the navigation aspect, could the minister state the amount of power developed as the scheme now stands and the amount that will be developed with the additional quantity of water?

Mr. HOWE: The present amount developed is 450,000 horse-power, and the additional diversion will generate an additional 250,000 horse-power.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the minister has completely covered the situation as set forth by myself. There are several considerations to which he has not adverted at all.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to continue. My notes are a little disorganized.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very short bill, just one clause and the preamble. If it goes through now, there will not be another opportunity to get the information for which I have asked. Besides, the minister has now tabled something which I think we should have had before; that is the report. I have not been able even to look at the outside of it yet. I would ask the minister if he would be content to have the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again the first of next week. Meantime, perhaps I shall have an opportunity to look into this application.

Mr. HOWE: Before doing so, perhaps I could continue and cover the points that have been raised, and then I shall be glad to comply with the request of my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just in a cursory way.

Mr. HOWE: When the committee rose at six o'clock I think I was discussing the regulation of the water and the compensation works. In addition to the bill, certain regulations will be set up by the Department of Transport with regard to compensation works. Studies have already been made, and the department have determined the requirements in that regard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be under the statute?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister tell us what they consist of?

Mr. HOWE: They consist of dams set in the rapids to cut off the flow of water down the river, to compensate for the flow of water through the canal. In other words, the area of flow down the river will be reduced to compensate for the diversion.

The question was asked as to when the Beauharnois ship channel will be in operation. The Beauharnois ship channel is part of the 27-foot navigation in the St. Lawrence river and would obviously be of no value until the international section and also the Lachine section below the canal are improved for 27-foot navigation. All that requires to be done to complete the navigation feature of the Beauharnois canal is to build flight locks alongside the power-house at the lower end of the canal. Speaking from memory, I believe the estimates of the St. Lawrence development provided for twin flight locks estimated to cost $14,000,000. As these are purely a navigation feature, their cost will be for the federal government account.

In the matter of the Chicago diversion, I think the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was approximately correct in his figures. The diversion at present for dilution has been brought down to the amount set in the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, that is to 1,500 cubic feet per second. In addition to that, the court permitted Chicago to divert water required for domestic and sanitary purposes. I had understood that the figure on that was about 1,500 cubic feet per second. The hon. member for Davenport I think stated that the actual figure was more like 2,500.

Mr. MacNICOL: Two thousand, to be correct.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. So while the judgment of the court, as we interpreted it, contemplated a diversion of about 3,000 cubic feet per second, the actual diversion is about 3,500 cubic feet per second. I do not think Canada can complain particularly about the way in which the diversion at Chicago has been handled. We can hardly begrudge Chicago an ample amount of water for its sanitary and domestic nurnoses.

The question was asked whether the government proposes to abandon navigation in that section. The government takes the view that the only real navigation to-day, as for several years past, is navigation through the Soulanges canal, which was provided for the passage of lake carriers past that section of the river. As I have stated previously, navigation in the Soulanges canal will not be affected in any way. For years the only navigation in the river itself has been the down trip of the Rapids Queen, a tourist boat that was able to carry passengers downstream from Prescott to Montreal, returning upstream by way of the St. Lawrence canals. To the best of my knowledge and belief that boat has not been operating on regular schedule for some time past, and the government believes that no public interest will suffer greatly if the boat does not operate in future.

A question was asked as to what effect a further diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second would have at the Cedars and St. Timothy. The answer is that it will have no effect whatever, on account of the fact that any water taken from the channel itself will be compensated for through the construction of dams, so the present water levels will be maintained and the present flow to the power canals at both these developments will be fully protected.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did I understand the minister to say that the diversion of this water would mean an expenditure of $11,000,000 in order to maintain navigation facilities?

Mr. HOWE: Not at all. As I have said, the government is under no obligation whatever as far as maintaining the status quo of navigation is concerned. We have 14-foot navigation through that section in the Soulanges canal, and we shall continue to have it after this diversion takes place. Compensating works to protect the levels will be built at the expense of the Beauharnois company, under our supervision.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not by the government?

Mr. HOWE: No; the government is under no financial obligation whatever. As far as 27-foot navigation is concerned, at the moment we have benefited to the extent of $12,000,000 by having the canal provided without cost to the government; and instead of being faced with an expenditure of some $38,000,000 for a navigation canal with locks, we are faced only with the cost of the locks themselves and other facilities, which I believe is estimated to be about $26,000,000. In other words, we are about twelve million dollars to the good, as far as 27-foot navigation is concerned, as a result of this development.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are to the good to the extent of the cost of the canal, anyway.

Mr. HOWE: I think the figure mentioned by my hon, friend is approximately correct. I believe the figure mentioned in the company's original application was $16,000,000. It was stated here that the canal was built for the full flow of the river. That is not entirely true. The banks themselves that were built above the land level were built wide enough so that it would be possible to excavate between them to take the full flow of the river ultimately, but of course that excavation has not been made. In connection with the present development additional excavation will be required, to widen the usable part of the canal to take the additional flow through the canal.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STIRLING: For the whole length of it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the government will not have to pay anything in future if and when the full flow of the river is turned into the canal? The excavation at that time, to take care of the full flow, will have to be carried on by the Beauharnois company?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The government is under no obligation whatever to spend any public money in developing this project, either now or in the future.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do I understand that the entire cost of constructing the present canal was borne by the Beauharnois company?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked the minister one question which evidently escaped his notes. In the course of my remarks I asked: What is the potential gross power development at Beauharnois? What is it susceptible and capable of being? Is it not sufficient, if fully utilized, to render completely unnecessary any further plans for the St. Lawrence waterway, considered as a power project?

Mr. HOWE: The total flow of the river, when diverted through the canal, will amount to 240,000 cubic second feet, which would develop 1,920,000 horse-power at that location. How long that would meet the needs of that district of course none of us can estimate, since the consumption of power seems to rise very rapidly. At the end of this development some 700,000 horse-power will be developed, and after that it will be possible to develop a further 1,200,000 horse-power less the output of other plants.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are those figures from the reports of the minister's engineers, or are they the company's figures? I had an idea that the full flow would develop something in excess of that horse-power.

Mr. HOWE: I obtained this information from my own engineers this afternoon, and I might add that all the data and figures I have used have been supplied by the department's own engineers, who I think are more familiar with the river and have done more work on it than any other engineers.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): How long would it take to complete all this work? How long would it be before they could start generating this additional power?

Mr. HOWE: Fifty thousand horse-power is immediately available. The machines are there and could be used at once. Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Without any further time extension at all?

Mr. HOWE: By putting through the additional water, as I understand it, those two machines can be brought into production. They are stand-by machines, capable of being used with the others, but of course that would leave the plant without a stand-by.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That would not be sufficient to meet their total requirements?

Mr. HOWE: No. Fifty thousand horsepower is not a great addition. For instance, we have a plant for the production of explosives that we wish to start as soon as we can be sure of power, and that plant alone would require 12,000 horse-power.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then how long would it take to build up this equipment to the point where you could get 200,000 horse-power?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps it will take two years before the full 250,000 horse power will be produced, depending on deliveries of equipment. It is my understanding, however, that the power will be progressively increased as the equipment is delivered and as improvements to the channel are proceeded with. It is my information, both from my own engineers and from the company, that the 250,000 horse power will be in full operation within two years of the passage of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It would not be very useful for immediate war purposes, would it?

Mr. HOWE: We are in the fortunate position of having 50,000 horse power that can be turned on immediately. That is a fair-sized block of power, in itself. And as additional units are installed and completed, they can be turned on immediately. In my opinion this is the most readily available source of additional power we have in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: If that additional horse power is developed at once, it would mean that there will be no stand-by turbines to operate in the event of any of them being out of commission.

Mr. HOWE: Correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What will be the extra cost of the development of this 250,000 horse power? What extra amount of money would have to be put into it?

Mr. HOWE: I am sure I do not know. The matter of cost is entirely that of the Beauharnois company, and we have not interested ourselves in that phase of the matter particularly. We pay no part of it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Through the development of this 250,000 horse power would there be a reduction in power rates to users? Certainly this development could be done very cheaply, in comparison with the development which has already taken place? Is there any safeguard stipulating that the people of Canada will get power more cheaply?

Mr. HOWE: As I said earlier, the production and sale of power are entirely under the control of the province of Quebec. That province has its own electricity board, and I feel certain that the company, as lessees of the province, will be controlled to the extent required to protect the interests of the power users.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the power house now erected sufficiently large to take care of the installation of the new equipment necessary to develop the 250,000 horse power?

Mr. HOWE: I stated before the hour of adjournment that I was not sure, but I have since ascertained that it is not. An expansion of the power house will be required. However, there are units installed as present standby units which are immediately capable of producing 50,000 horse power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister takes the stand that the question of rates is outside his jurisdiction. It is a pity that this is so. I am inclined to agree with him, from the legal point of view. This company will get the whole flow of water of the St. Lawrence river; certainly it is going to be a bonanza to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company.

Mr. HOWE: As I said before, both governments have taxing power. If it is a bonanza this year, it will be a bonanza for my colleague the Minister of Finance as well, because practically all the additional profit will flow into his coffers under the present system of taxation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest to the minister that he is taking a very narrow point of view. What about the poor public? Surely they have some rights. I have had something to do with power in days gone by. In fact at the present time I am in the throes of a power controversy in my own office. I have often wondered if those of us in authority, either in parliament or in our provincial legislatures, adequately take care of the rights of the man who has to pay the bill. I do not think we always do. That is all I have to say in the matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One or two further points run through my mind. In Ontario there are two or three points at which further power could be developed. There could be a possible extension at Niagara falls. There are possibilities on the Ottawa river, and there is the further possibility of development in the international section of the St. Lawrence river development, if it ever takes place.

Coming from Ontario, I am particularly interested in any increase in the development of power at Beauharnois. There is the possibility there of a development of about 2,000,000 horse power. Although it is in the province of Quebec, it is quite likely that that province cannot take all the power in the meantime. We are in the midst of a war, and it will be some time before we can make heavy capital expenditures. I am particularly interested in seeing that in any future development which takes place at Beauharnois the people of the country may receive the benefits flowing therefrom. Through this measure we are giving away certain rights to the Beauharnois company, and it seems to me that before we give up the use of this water to the Montreal, Light, Heat and Power company, the government should take steps to protect the people of Canada against any exploitation or any attempt to monopolize power. Although the development would be in the province of Quebec, yet it seems to me the province of Ontario must be vitally interested in any water diversion under the control of the dominion government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have Mitch to protect it.

Mr. HOWE: Would my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? I am wondering how the Ontario hydro-electric power commission would like the idea of our attaching conditions to the cost of power in connection with developments we lease to them. We do lease developments to the Ontario hydro. Does my hon. friend think it would be a wise thing to attach conditions?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think the minister's answer is sufficient at all. I am stating what I think should be done; I do not know whether the province of Ontario would like it. I would say, however, that if the dominion government has it within its power to give cheaper power to the people of Canada, then it should exercise its rights.

Mr. HOWE: My hon, friend has hit on the exact point, namely that we have not the power to place restrictions on it. The power inside a province belongs to that province. The navigation belongs to the dominion, and is a paramount right over the power. But the jurisdiction of the dominion government ends in either granting or not granting the diversion of water for power purposes.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But you could attach a proviso when water is diverted.

Mr. HOWE: I would not answer that without the advice of counsel. It may be that we could, but in my opinion we would be usurping a right that is not ours.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The true position is that in respect of power the jurisdiction to control rates is not in this government at all, but rather in the government of the province of Quebec. That may be unfortunate, but it is so.

With respect to the question the minister directed to the hon. member for St. Paul's, may I suggest this, that if in one of its developments this government produces power which it owns and which it can dispose of, by reason of having the development as a public work of Canada, and if it sells that power to the Ontario hydro-electric or to any other power consumer, whether for immediate and direct use or for resale—as in the case of hydro—it would be a proper thing for this government in making a lease of that power to put in some provision or to retain some control over the rates to be charged the public, always having regard to competitive conditions obtaining, and all other factors which might enter into such a situation. I do not believe the dominion government has done that in the past, and I think it is something it might consider doing in the future.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I take the same position in regard to this bill as was taken this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I am opposed to the principle of the bill. I am opposed to handing over the public domain to private individuals or corporations to be used for the purpose of exploiting the people of this country. That is what the power companies have done with the privileges we have given them. A moment ago the minister told us that the government had no power to do certain things. The explanatory notes to the bill say this:

By chapter 20 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, the canal then being constructed by Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and the works appurtenant thereto, were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and the governor in council was authorized to make any orders, rules and regulations which might be deemed necessary or convenient with respect to any diversion of waters of the St. Lawrence river by said company.

As far as I have been able to find out, the only advantage Canada ever got out of this project was the privilege of guaranteeing the bonds that were used to complete the work begun in 1929.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that the government guaranteed no bonds.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe they guaranteed the bankers against losses in that regard. I am not quite sure, but I think that was the case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government guaranteed the interim financing as between one financing and the other.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the government did undertake certain financial obligations in that regard. Further down in the explanatory notes I find this:

The nature of this power development will enable additional power to be made available within a relatively short time, and it is considered desirable that steps be taken to ensure an adequate supply of power to meet increased demands arising from the war.

Instead of giving private corporations further rights and privileges at this time, I think we should follow the policy adopted by the governments of Great Britain and New Zealand. The government should take over these works. We are supposed to be fighting for certain things worth fighting for. We are supposed to be fighting for our country, and yet we are continually handing over to private individuals everything of value in the country. If we want to show people that we are sincere in what we are saying, the first step we should take is to put an end to that sort of thing. I remember a statement made by a former Prime Minister during the debate on another bill. During the session of 1932 the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett made this statement:

I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret to-day that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people.

It is time that the government should realize that they are administering the natural resources of the country for the people. In so far as what has occurred in the past is concerned, it would seem that the common people have no rights at all.

I should like to refer to another matter. A few evenings ago the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) if government contracts had been given to corporations controlled by those leaders of industry who had offered their services to the government. The minister would not give an undertaking that such was not the case. The name of Mr. Henry was mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: I think we are all agreed that we do not want to sabotage Canada's war effort. Mr. Henry is a most valuable man and I wish I had half a dozen more like him. If I had, my efforts on behalf of munitions and supply would have better results. Mr. Henry is one of the most highly respected engineers in the Dominion of Canada, a man with a unique experience. Is it good business to slander the reputation of a gentleman who is doing extremely valuable work for this government?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Nothing of a slanderous nature has been said.

Mr. MacINNIS: I take strong exception to the statement of the minister that because we criticize certain things or because we mention certain names, we are sabotaging the government's war effort. That is unjust; that is unfair, and it is not necessary on this occasion. If the minister has a clear conscience in regard to the matter, he can stand whatever may be said.

Mr. HOWE: I can stand whatever my hon, friend says. Go right ahead,

Mr. MacINNIS: I would advise the minister to go slowly. I would save him and his government from another trip into the "valley of humiliation." We have been watching things in this corner. All we are asking is that there should be a complete investigation by a committee before which competent witnesses could appear so that we could get an understanding of all that is involved. I was just going to tell the committee that this is the Mr. Henry who was referred to in a report which was supported by hon, gentlemen on the other side. This was a unanimous report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. It was not a unanimous report. I demurred.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That still makes it unanimous.

Mr. MacINNIS: That report had this to say:

It is worthy of note that the three orders in council numbered respectively 2201, 2202 and 2203, approving of the transfer of the leases from the Montreal Cotton Company all dated the 6th November, 1929, each contain the following:—

"The minister, on the advice of the chief engineer of the department, concurred in by the deputy minister, recommend that authority be given"—

And so forth.

Mr. Henry was deputy minister at that time and continued in that position for some time afterwards. All this came out in the investigation. I suggest to the minister that before he proceeds further with this bill, he give hon. members an opportunity to have all relevant facts.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STIRLING: I understand that before recess the minister stated that no portion of the 150,000 horse power developed from the existing flow is exported, but I did not understand him to be specific with regard to the second part of the question asked, whether any portion of the 250,000 horse power which will be created by the diversion mentioned in this bill, is or is not to be exported. Could he clear that up?

Mr. HOWE: I can say definitely that as long as this government is in office, no portion of that will be permitted to be exported. There was a slump in the use of power during the depression, as my hon, friend knows, in 1933, 1934, 1935 and subsequently, and there were applications for the export of power, but they were consistently refused even in those times. I think that no government in Canada to-day would permit the export of new blocks of power. I think public opinion is definitely against it. I know that this government is definitely against it, and I think that any government sitting on the treasury benches here would also be against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A few moments ago I asked if it would not be possible to have a proviso added when granting a permit to divert water, and the minister said he did not know if that would be possible. But in section 1 the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power company are asking power to divert water, and in line 10 the section says:

... to be used for the development of hydroelectric power . . . in such manner . . . as may be prescribed by order of the governor in council.

So it would seem that under the government's authority there are terms and conditions that could be imposed upon any company that is being granted a permit to divert water in this way.

Mr. HOWE: These provisoes depend upon the way in which the water is handled; that is to say, compensating works, the safety of the canal banks, all of which affect navigation, and the physical handling of the water. We can prescribe as much as we like, but we must remember that we do not own the water itself and that the power rights are the sole concern of the province. But I have seen no indication that the province of Quebec is not just as jealous of the rights of its citizens as we would be or as any other province would be. When we are giving over a valuable asset, divesting the public resources, to private gain, to use the words of hon. members opposite we have to take a realistic view of the situation. Without going into the history of why the development is there, it has been built up at a tremendous initial cost; and if the potential power of the river is now a valuable asset to the well-being of the people, there is only one practical way in which it can be used for the benefit of power consumers in that area, that is by sending the water down that canal. The government would hardly be justified in going to the expense of building another power canal, and the only alternative would be for the government to expropriate and pay for the present work. I am afraid that my colleague the Minister of Finance would hardly rejoice over that proposal in war time, even if we had the privilege of selling power in the province of Quebec, which we have not. Nor do I think the province of Quebec is to-day in a position to take that step either, but they can always do so in future if they deem it wise.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Under the stress of war Great Britain is doing something very close to it at this moment.

Mr. HOWE: Great Britain is in a very different position. There is only one government there for all purposes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has any work been done by the company in anticipation of this permit being granted to divert water?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that there is a dredge at work, although I do not know whether it is in anticipation of this or not, but some dredging is done there every year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Any construction?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are these water power rights not both exclusive and perpetual?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure what the Quebec lease says. We give the company power to divert water, and once it is diverted we have no power to recall it. I am not aware what the terms of the lease are for the use of the water.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To clarify the matter, perhaps I might say that when the canal was vested in his majesty in the right of the dominion, we gave to the Beauharnois company an exclusive easement for the use of the canal for power purposes. In Quebec they call it a servitude. In addition, the company acquired rights from the province of Quebec. The effect of it is that nobody else can use that water.

Bill reported. 95826—27½

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

EXTENSION FOR ONE YEAR OF INITIAL SUBSIDY PERIOD DESCRIBED IN ACT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, to extend for one year the initial period described in the said act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair,

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, this is a simple amendment to the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act. The act provides that the rates to be charged for the carriage of mail will be set automatically in January of each year, based upon the experience of the previous year. At the start, a rate of 60 cents a mile for the carriage of mail was adopted, with the proviso that until January, 1940, the government would bear any deficit arising out of the operation of the line. The belief in which the bill was framed was that by January, 1940, we would have had one full year of experience with the Trans-Canada Air Lines, and that we would have struck an operating rate in 1939 which could have been applied to 1940. It turned out that 1939 was not a typical operating year; for, instead of getting a full year of operation, we commenced to carry revenue mail only on March 1, and passengers on April 1. We also did not open in that year the full service that we had originally intended. The maritime extension was opened only this year, and we have yet to open the extension from Toronto to western Ontario. Therefore 1939 is not a typical year. If we followed the act strictly, the rate for carrying mail would automatically increase from 60 cents to slightly over 70 cents, whereas we know very well from operating results that a proper rate for this year would be less than 60 cents. We feel certain that the automatic application of the rate a year from now will bring the rate per mile down considerably below that figure. The amendment proposed will make it possible to continue the 60 cent rate for 1940, and defer the automatic application of a new rate until January, 1941. That is its only purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not read the statute. Does the minister say that the only object of the bill is to extend for one full year, a typical year, the rate charged for mail on the system?

Mr. HOWE: That is the only change in the bill.

Mr. CRERAR: The resolution states that it is an extension for one year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At some stage—this may or may not be the appropriate place; perhaps it is just as good as any other—would the minister tell the committee what feeder lines have been established on the Trans-Canada airways?

Mr. HOWE: The position of Trans-Canada Air Lines to-day is that it operates a service from Vancouver on the west to Montreal. At the present time there are two services daily over that distance; and the service also connects into Toronto, so that we can say that Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal are connected with two services daily. The Trans-Canada also operates its own service from Lethbridge to Edmonton, and from Montreal to Moncton, New Brunswick. It has made arrangements with private operators for a service connecting Vancouver and Victoria, operating, I believe, three times daily. It has arrangements with Prairie Airways for the operation of a service from Regina to Saskatoon, to Prince Albert, to Battleford, and to Moose Jaw and Regina, a loop service operating daily. It also has arrangements with private firms to operate services from Moncton to Charlottetown and Summerside, from Moncton to Halifax, and from Moncton to Saint John. I think that is the present position.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 23, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON ACT AMENDMENT

VALIDATION OF YUKON FUR EXPORT TAX ORDINANCE ACT ASSENTED TO MAY 20, 1919

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to amend the Yukon Act—Mr. Crerar—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 2—Coming into force. Retroactive.

Mr. CRERAR: When this bill was before the committee a few days ago, the question was raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) that some litigation was pending under the provisions of this act regarding the tax on the export of furs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the Yukon ordinance.

Mr. CRERAR: Under the Yukon ordinance. I stand corrected by the leader of the opposition, and I thank him. We have no record in the department of any litigation under the act. It is possible that there is some litigation under a game ordinance of the Yukon territory. However, in order to make certain beyond any question of doubt, I wish to present an amendment which my colleague the Minister of Finance will propose.

Mr. RALSTON moved:

That section 2 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"2. The provisions of section one of this act shall be deemed to have come into operation on the nineteenth day of May, 1919, but so as not to defeat, disturb, invalidate, or affect any penalty, forfeiture or liability, civil or criminal, incurred before the time of its enactment or any proceedings for enforcing the same had, done, completed or pending at the time of such enactment."

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The amendment as suggested by the minister has exactly the same effect as the amendment I proposed, and I am quite content to see it go through.

Mr. CRERAR: I might just say that, being Scottish and therefore rather cautious—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad the minister didn't add, "and tight."

An hon. MEMBER: Not on Friday night.

Mr. CRERAR: —in order to be very certain I submitted the question to the law officers of the crown, and the amendment that I have just read is the one they suggest.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. McLARTY: As this bill merely reenacts the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act of 1939 which, on account of its duration for only one year, expiring at the end of each fiscal year, must be reenacted each year, I trust that to-night I shall not have to give any lengthy statement concerning it. I would suggest, with the permission of the committee, that perhaps any debate upon it might well take place on the second reading of the bill. I say that for two reasons. In the first place, while the bill is a reenactment, there are certain amendments which I shall endeavour to outline. In the second place I am advised that the report of the commissioner under the 1939 act will be tabled on Monday and will give a more complete explanation of what has been done than any explanation I could possibly give this evening.

There are three amendments to the act, all predicated and based upon the altered conditions arising by reason of this country being at war. There is a change in the preamble, the only effect of that change being to direct our effort under the act in the coming year to developing our economy and fitting it more for war.

There is an amendment by the elimination of what was section 3 of the act of 1939. Broadly, that section provided that the dominion itself would undertake works and projects in connection with the relief of unemployment and the promotion of employment. It was felt that owing to the wide activity that is taking place as a result of the unfortunate circumstances in which we find ourselves to-day, it would be unnecessary for this government to take measures under that particular section. But if works become of vital necessity and it is apparent that they are so, they can still be initiated by means of an estimate which would require presentation to this house. In other words, the control of this house in connection with unemployment projects which may be taken up by the dominion alone is broadened.

A third amendment is that to section 5 of the act of 1939. That section provides that the dominion may lend to the provinces that share which the provinces themselves are required to pay under any agreement entered into under section 4 of the former act. It is thought that under existing circumstances, bearing in mind the wide obligations that the dominion is carrying in other ways, it would be only fair and reasonable to make sure that any such advances are more or less restricted, to the extent that the undertaking must be clearly in the national interest.

Those are the only three amendments, subject of course to the necessary change of dates. I would suggest, if it meets with the approval of this committee, that if debate is to ensue, it might be well if that debate could take place on second reading of the bill, when hon, members have the advantage of seeing the precise wording of the amendments and also seeing the report of the commissioner on unemployment and agricultural assistance which I shall be glad to lay on the table on Monday next.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not at all impressed with the reasons given by the minister why this resolution should be advanced to the stage he has indicated tonight. To me the very fact that the report of the commissioner has not been tabled and is not in the hands of hon. members is substantial reason why this resolution should not be proceeded with until we have had an opportunity of seeing the report and reading and digesting it. This is an important matter, even in war time. I recall some debates I have heard in this house on the question of unemployment relief in days gone by, and the hammering that hon. gentlemen opposite gave to us between 1930 and 1935 over this vexed question. I recall too that notwithstanding all that was said by hon. gentlemen while in opposition, when they came into power they hardly altered in any degree at all the policy dealing with this difficult matter.

The government have had substantial cooperation from the official opposition with respect to their many bills. We have put through this week important resolutions and bills, including the war appropriation bill and the loan bill. This house has accomplished in one week's time more in the way of advancing important legislation I suppose than ever occurred in the history of parliament, save and except perhaps during other war sessions. And this is an important matter. I have not been able to give any study to it, and I think the minister ought not to proceed with this resolution to-night or until we have had an opportunity to study their record for the past year.

In addition, may I point out that in the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, there are specific references to this very question, which references ought to receive some consideration in this connection. I have not been able to read the recommendations of the commission with respect to unemployment relief, and I doubt whether many hon members have read them. Therefore I think the minister ought not to press this resolution at this time. I suggest that the government have made substantial progress. This is an extremely important matter, and I believe more time should be given hon members to study the question, in view of the fact that the report to which the minister has referred, and which we hope will be an illuminating one, will be laid on the table so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of studying it.

I know the desire of the government to expedite their legislative programme. Now that we have got rid of some of the bile that has accumulated as a result of the election and the sporadic political warfare that has taken place recently, I say to the government that we on this side of the house are prepared to cooperate in putting through the programme in an orderly and decent way. But we must not abrogate our function as an opposition. That function is neither to obstruct nor to throw ourselves into the arms of the government and say we will pass anything and everything they want to pass, but rather to study each question on its merits and contribute what we may, having regard to our ability to make a contribution.

That is what I believe we should do at this time. I could elaborate on that at much greater length, but I do not think I need do so. With respect to the war effort, let me repeat what I said a while ago, that so far as money is concerned, so far as the granting of supply for war effort is concerned, the official opposition will support the government in any and every measure it may lay before parliament and ask to have enacted into law. We believe the Canadian people are anxious to support the government's war effort if the government will but give the proper lead, and we are prepared to support any and every measure leading to the winning of the war, so far as money is concerned. Every other power the government may require for its war effort is already vested in it under the War Measures Act. There are, of course, certain other collateral matters arising out of the war effort, such as aid to certain basic industries in this country: wheat, apples, dairy products, and I should like to include our fishermen and our potato farmers. These must be considered, and perhaps the government may take some action by way of legis-'lation and financial assistance. These we should like to examine in the light of the information given us.

I would ask the minister not to press this unemployment relief measure to-night. I do not think it would be quite fair to do so until we have the commissioner's report. So I am going to ask the minister to be good enough to report progress on this resolution at least until we have seen the report.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to embarrass the leader of the opposition in the least. Naturally I am anxious to have this legislation move forward as quickly as possible, because Mr. R. B. Hanson.] of the fact that we have several commitments which must be met. I believe the resolution has been on the order paper since parliament opened.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Since May 21.

Mr. McLARTY: At any rate it has been on the order paper for some time. I am not going to press the matter, in view of what the hon. gentleman has said, although probably there is no point that could be brought up on this resolution that could not be debated upon the second reading of the bill, and that would include the reference of the dominionprovincial commission to the matter of unemployment and direct relief. However, if the leader of the opposition feels that he has been placed in an embarrassing position by our proceeding with this resolution to-night; if he feels that there is something he would like to say on the resolution that he cannot say on the second reading of the bill, in view of the cooperation he has shown I think it only fair that we show an equal measure of cooperation. So I would ask that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you. Progress reported.

SEEDS ACT

MEASURE TO EMPOWER THE MINISTER TO PRE-SCRIBE FEES FOR SEED CONTROL SERVICES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, to amend the Seeds Act, 1937.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1-Regulations.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if the minister would explain to what extent the revenue he anticipates will provide the services.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not expect that the revenue will provide a very great part of the cost of the service. I am not in a position to estimate just to what extent it will cover that cost, but possibly this amendment will have the effect of considerably cutting down the expense to which the department is now put. At the present time the act provides that tests of seed will be made by the department, and up to the present these tests have been made free of charge. In the beginning the intention was that these tests should be made in order to give certificates to those growing registered seed, but the practice has developed of farmers sending in for test samples that could be easily tested by the farmers themselves. It is a very simple operation, consisting of placing seeds between blotters, keeping them properly moistened and then counting the results, but the farmers have begun to follow the practice of sending these seeds to the department to have the tests made. It is considered that a very heavy expense has been added in connection with this practice and that the imposition of a small fee will tend to decrease the number of applications and also help defray the cost to the department.

Mr. STIRLING: What sum of money is involved in the transaction at present, and does the minister expect it will be considerably increased?

Mr. GARDINER: I doubt if I have that information before me at the moment.

Mr. QUELCH: Does this not also apply to inspection for purity as well as for germination?

Mr. GARDINER: No; this inspection is largely for germination. It is covered by this particular section.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister says "largely," but not "altogether."

Mr. GARDINER: No, not altogether, in so far as certificates are concerned.

Mr. QUELCH: In so far as that is concerned, the farmer cannot do the testing himself; he has to send a sample to the department to have it tested.

Mr. GARDINER: In all those cases referred to, a sample will still come in, but in other cases it is not necessary to send one in. In cases of tests being made for germination, samples will not be sent in to the department in anything like the number of instances that there have been in the past.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What do those services cost the government a year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that information at present, but I can give it when the estimates are before the committee of supply.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me that the minister's own statement rather damns the bill, when he says it will rather considerably decrease the number of people using this service. The minister is one of the men, along with many others in Saskatchewan and other parts of western Canada who have tried to encourage farmers to have seed tested, so that they may get into better grades of seed. I should think the government would be anxious to expand this service, rather than to see it contracted. If the charging of a fee is going to have the latter effect, as the minister just said, then surely that would not be for the good of agriculture. If the amount of money which will come in is not very great, and is not going to reduce the government's expense to any appreciable extent, surely the harm of charging this fee is going to offset any good it may do.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there will be any great harm done. As a matter of fact, I do not think any harm will be done. Those who have been associated with this kind of work will realize it is a very simple thing to test seed for germination. The department will still give instructions to anyone who does not know how to test the seed. Not only will it save the work that has to be done in the department itself, or in other places under the department's direction, but it will also save the cost of sending seed and having it sent back again, where it is necessary to send it back, throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does this increase the cost for inspection as to purity? I believe my question is along similar lines to that asked by another hon. member. For instance, where one has to obtain certain certificates to sell pure seed, will this measure add to the cost of obtaining those certificates?

Mr. GARDINER: To the extent that the fee is put on, it will add to that cost, but in connection with the quantities of seed that are to be sold, under certificates, it will amount to a very small charge per unit. If a person were sending in a small package of seeds for testing, as a sample of the seed he is going to sow, of course the charge would range higher on the quantity for which the test is made.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH

COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS AND

PROCESSORS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939, to provide for agreements with cooperative associations and processors, and to provide also for the calculation and payment of liabilities of the minister under any agreement and for the payment of administrative expenses.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister please explain?

Mr. GARDINER: The proposed amendments provide for a clarification of the terminology of certain sections of the act as a result of one year's experience in its administration. Some of these amendments are necessary also in order to bring sections into line with current practices of cooperative associations. Amendments also provide that the creation or naming of a selling agency to represent a cooperative association or processor may not be required except where necessary, and agreements under the amended act may be made direct with the cooperative association or associations or with the processor or processors, as well as with the selling agency.

The proposed amendment also includes two new sections to the act similar to those which were explained in connection with the Wheat Cooperative Marketing Act. One is to provide for a report to parliament of proceedings under the act, and the other to provide authority to pay any liability which may arise under any agreement, as well as to pay administration expenses.

Mr. PERLEY: How many cooperatives were formed last year, and what has the minister's experience been in respect of them?

Mr. GARDINER: Products handled under the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act to the end of April, 1940, are these:

 Manitoba honey

 Saskatchewan alfalfa seed pounds
 1,158,750

 Ontario onions
 168,000

 30,000

Those are the principal commodities. The organizations are: The Saskatchewan Honey Producers Cooperative Association, the Manitoba Cooperative Honey Producers Limited, the Saskatchewan Alfalfa Growers Cooperative Marketing Association, the Ontario Onion Growers Cooperative Limited, and the Fox and Mink producers across Canada. Then, there is also an organization in British Columbia which handles grass seed.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister mean that six cooperatives were set up under this legislation, or that on six occasions assistance was given to existing ones?

Mr. GARDINER: There are more than six concerns set up. There is the Saskatchewan Honey Producers Cooperative Association, with headquarters at Fort Qu'Appelle. I believe that is in the constituency of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Then, there is the Manitoba Cooperative Honey Producers Limited, with headquarters at Winnipeg; [Mr. Gardiner.]

the Saskatchewan Alfalfa Growers Cooperative Marketing Association, consisting of eleven local cooperative marketing associations with headquarters at Prince Albert. There is the Erie-St.Clair Onion Growers Marketing Board at Leamington, Ontario, and the Saskatchewan Registered Seed Growers of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan. In connection with silver fox pelts there is the Canadian National Silver Fox Breeders Association. Then there are the Dominion Silver Fox Furs Limited, Summerside, Prince Edward Island; and the Charlottetown Fur Sales Limited, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. These two have one central agency. Then there is the Prince Edward Island Fur Pool Limited, Summerside, Prince Edward Island, and L'Association des Eleveurs de Renards de la Province de Quebec, St. Hyacinthe, Quebec. Then there is the Dominion Fur Auction Sales Limited, Winnipeg, Manitoba. In connection with silver fox and mink pelts there is the Maritime Fur Pool Limited, Moncton, New Brunswick.

Mr. STIRLING: What about British Columbia?

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has forgotten the corn growers of Kent and Essex.

Mr. STIRLING: Did not the minister mention one organization in British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: There is one there, but I do not think it is listed. There is a seed growers' organization in British Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN: Has the minister listed the corn growers of Essex and Kent? If he has not, he has missed a most important one.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not have that on my list.

Mr. MARTIN: There must be something wrong with the minister's statistician.

Mr. PERLEY: How many pounds of honey were produced by the cooperative at Qu'Appelle? Can the minister give the committee the number of pounds of honey shipped through Churchill, also how many pounds that particular point in Saskatchewan contributed to that particular shipment? He will recall that a considerable shipment of honey went out through Hudson bay last fall.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the figures, but the Saskatchewan honey handled under the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act totalled 511,000 pounds.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the total value of the products handled under the act during the last fiscal year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not all the products here, but Saskatchewan honey, Manitoba honey, Saskatchewan alfalfa seed, Ontario onions and fox and mink pelts totalled $906,000. There are some others which I have mentioned and for which I have not the figures.

Mr. QUELCH: What percentage of the whole would that be?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the figures here. I put most of them on Hansard the other night. With regard to honey, it would be a considerable part so far as the west is concerned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the value of alfalfa in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: The total was 1,158,750 pounds, valued at $150,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Could we have some information as to the terms of the agreements entered into last year between the department and these cooperatives? Also could we know if there is to be any change this year in the agreements?

Mr. GARDINER: Each agreement made with these different organizations is based upon the practices followed in the marketing of the particular product, but generally speaking the principle upon which agreements are made is that the government guarantees a percentage of the average price for the pre-ceding three years. The bill itself provides that the government cannot guarantee more than 80 per cent of the average price obtained for a product during the previous three years. In actual practice, most agreements cover about 65 per cent of the average for the previous three years. Under the bill, the organization set up uses the guarantee for the purpose of financing their operations, making initial payments to the producers and providing for the cost of administration throughout the season. When the product has been sold, if more than the initial price and the cost of administration is obtained, then they make interim and final payments on the product.

Mr. PERLEY: What will be the liability of the department to these cooperatives under last year's operations?

Mr. GARDINER: There has not been a full year's operation under the act. As the hon. member knows, the act came into force about July 1 last year and has been operating only from that time. Many of these organizations were not set up until quite late in the year. Here are some of the products and dates:

Honey—August 31.
Alfalfa—August 31.
Onions—November 28.
Registered seed—December 20.
Silver foxes—December 8.
Silver fox and mink—December 19.
Silver fox and mink—pelts, maritimes—January 4.

These organizations are comparatively new.

Mr. PERLEY: I understand that the fox farmers of Saskatchewan did not organize.

Mr. GARDINER: They have been negotiating, but I do not think their organization has finally been set up. I would not be absolutely certain of that.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it anticipated that there will be any loss in connection with any of these operations?

Mr. GARDINER: The only case in which there would appear to be any possibility of a loss is in connection with onions, and that situation has improved recently.

Mr. SENN: Do I understand that the list of firms read out by the minister include all firms? If so, has the minister any idea of the quantity of goods handled, how much land area would be covered by the operations and how many producers are involved?

Mr. GARDINER: I placed certain information on Hansard a moment ago in connection with the volume of honey, alfalfa seed, onions, and fox and mink pelts. In connection with furs it will be noted from the names of the organizations that they are spread pretty well across the eastern part of Canada, covering the maritimes, Quebec and Manitoba.

Mr. SENN: Would that be all one organization?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there are six organizations in connection with furs.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister give us any idea as to how many producers have availed themselves of the benefits of this act and what have been the costs of administration of the act?

Mr. GARDINER: I just stated that most of these organizations came into being after August, while others were not set up until November, December and January. As yet no organization has completed a full year, so we have not the necessary returns to complete an estimate of the cost of administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many producers have availed themselves of the benefits of this legislation? Would not the different cooperatives and selling agencies that have applied for benefits under this act furnish some record of the number of producers they represent?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not those figures, but these organizations cover most of the fur producers from the maritime provinces to Manitoba. I think practically all of them are now covered by this legislation. As hon. members know, the alfalfa seed growers are all located in the Whitefox country in northern Saskatchewan, and I think practically all of them are now under this legislation. The same thing is true of certain alfalfa growers in Manitoba.

The honey producers are organized into one organization covering about the eastern half of Saskatchewan. The organization has its head offices at Yorkton. The honey producers of Manitoba are also organized under the act, and so are some of the grass seed growers in British Columbia.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister any figures of administration costs to the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be impossible to have them until we get the accounts of the companies themselves.

Mr. MARTIN: Is the hon, member criticizing the act?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) seems to have become the custodian of this end of the house. We are interested in trying to get information about the government's administration of its affairs. We were sent here for that purpose, although nobody has yet been able to determine what my hon. friend is here for. I think we have a right to get the information.

Mr. MARTIN: My question was intended as a very serious one.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure.

Mr. MARTIN: I usually do not have an opportunity of putting a serious question to my hon, friend, but I was trying to do so to-night. This is an act which I think has great merit. The committee will possibly remember that I took almost one whole afternoon here discussing a problem concerning the corn growers of southwestern Ontario.

An hon, MEMBER: It has forgotten by now.

Mr. MARTIN: But I have not. This act has the great merit of encouraging among the corn growers of that part of Ontario a movement somewhat along the lines of that initiated by St. Francis Xavier university. As a result of this act the corn growers got together and formed an association which since July has had, I think, 1,500 paid-up members. They conduct study clubs and run the whole thing by their own efforts. I think the essential credit for this endeavour is due to the inspiration that came from this act, and my reason for putting the question to my hon. friend was to bring out the fact that the act was not without merit. I am glad to find that the new leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and myself agree on that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have no quarrel as to whether there is merit in the act, but we are trying to find out what percentage of the producers have availed themselves of its benefits, whether it is working to the best possible advantage, and whether changes might not be made in it before the bill itself comes down that might give the act a greater appeal among the producers of agricultural products. Surely the hon, member can find no quarrel with us for seeking that type of information.

Mr. MARTIN: I find no quarrel with my hon, friend. He is protesting too much; that is all.

Mr. WRIGHT: Have any guarantees given to producers under this act been equal to the maximum which might have been given?

Mr. GARDINER: No, I do not think any guarantees have reached the 80 per cent which the act provides might be given. The guarantee has been less than the 80 per cent by agreement between the organizations themselves and the department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister information as to the set-up of the alfalfa industry in northern Saskatchewan, the average price over the past few years and the initial payment last year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not statistical information here on these questions. It has usually been the practice to bring down all such statistical information when the estimates are before the committee of supply. Then all these matters will be open for discussion.

Mr. SENN: I have on several occasions advocated the cooperative marketing of farm products. The questions I have asked to-night, and the questions asked by different members of the committee, have been for the purpose of getting real information. As farmers we are interested in the operation of this act. It takes the place, to some extent, of what was known as the Natural Products Marketing Act, which was later declared ultra vires, and I am surprised that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) casts a reflection upon us for trying to get information about the act. I very much want to see the act a success.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure the hon. member does not want to misinterpret my remarks.

Mr. STIRLING: Order.

Mr. SENN: I was rather of the opinion from what the hon. member said and from the way in which his questions were framed that he implied we were criticizing for the sake of criticism. I want to assure him and the minister that nothing of that kind was in my mind at least, and I doubt if it was in the minds of other members of the committee who have been seeking information.

As I have said, I have always been interested in cooperative marketing, and I hope the day will come when more of our farm products will be marketed on that basis. We are interested in the operation of this act, and I am only sorry that it has not reached the stage where the minister can give us some real information as to its value and as to its success.

I was going to ask him if any time limit is set with respect to the full crop of a particular area. I have no doubt whatever that there will have to be different times set, because one product will come on the market at one time and another product at a different time of the year, which makes it impossible to have a uniform date when all these agreements shall end their fiscal year. But I believe that some date should be fixed so that a surplus not disposed of cannot be held over from one period to another. It must be apparent that sooner or later there must be an end and an accounting, not only to enable the department and the government to know whether they are to sustain a loss or not, but in order that the farmers may get their final payment. The act as I read it makes it compulsory that not more than 80 per cent of the total shall be paid to the farmer until the department gives the organization its consent to finish up and give the farmer his final payment.

I would ask the minister two questions. The first one is with regard to the final payment. In cases where 65 per cent is the total guaranteed, is the other 35 per cent held back until the end of the year, or is it only the 20 per cent that is over and above the 80 per cent which is allowed under the act?

Mr. GARDINER: The 35 per cent, which is an estimate based on the average of the last three years.

Mr. SENN: The full 35 per cent is held back. That is a serious handicap to a great many farmers who depend on that crop for their revenue for the year. It seems to me that to hold back 35 cents out of every dollar until the whole crop is disposed of is a hardship upon the farmers, and I would suggest to the minister that there might very well be interim payments at least, so that the farmer would not be out so much of his revenue.

Mr. GARDINER: The main objective in this legislation is to assist the farmers to finance. Those who are growing alfalfa seed sell a considerable part of that seed in the United States and some in different parts of Canada. They found it very difficult to sell seed, particularly in the early stages of the seed growing industry there. In the earlier years they were engaged in the growing of alfalfa seed in that section largely because of the fact that many of these farmers had come from the south country, while others who had been living there for some time had found the country not suited to other things which they had been trying to grow. Finally they found that alfalfa was a seed which could be grown to good advantage in that section of the country. In other words, they were men who were trying to establish themselves on farms of a certain type, for the first time. As a result of that condition prevailing, among other reasons, they had to sell their crop almost as soon as they had harvested it and take what they could get for it. Under this act they are able to spread the sale of it over a considerable part of the year, or over that part of the year which passes between the growing of it and the seeding of it the next year, and get better results from the market as it goes along.

Of course the government in common with the farmer has this object in mind, that none of these organizations should lose money. If any considerable number should lose on that advance in any one year or over a period of years, I am afraid the house would want to repeal this legislation. So that whenever any of these organizations come before the officials of the department, the first thing we do is to try to reason with them to get an advance which everyone feels will be safe.

If the committee will permit me-and I do not think they would want to bear with me while I read all this material, which will give a considerable part of the information for which hon, members are asking-I should like to place on Hansard the record I have before me. It covers all of the cooperative organizations of which I spoke a moment ago and the names of which I read to the committee. To indicate the type of information it gives, I will take the first item, which is honey. The name of the association is the Saskatchewan Honey Producers Cooperative Association of Fort Qu'Appelle; name of selling agency, P. M. Pugh, Fort Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan. Then it gives the initial payments to primary producers: grade No. 1, 3 cents a pound; grade No. 2, 21 cents a pound. Then there are the processing, carrying and selling charges—this is right in the agreement —in connection with a product of this kind. We limit the charge which can be imposed in connection with the handling of this product to 2 cents a pound on both grades. Then there is the percentage that initial payments and charges are of average wholesale price for past three years; this one is approximately 55 per cent in both cases. So the committee will see that the initial payment is about 55 per cent. There is added to that a possible cost of 2 cents a pound on this honey for all processing, carrying and selling charges. That whole amount is guaranteed. It is not only the 55 per cent of the average price of the three years which is guaranteed; the carrying charges, the selling charges and the processing charges up to 2 cents are also guaranteed. That information is given on this statement which I have before me with regard to all of these organizations; and if it would meet the wishes of the committee and give the information required, I would be pleased to place this table on Hansard.

Mr. SENN: I think that information should go on Hansard. It will be of value to those of us who want to make a study of it.

Mr. GARDINER: The table is as follows:

(Interim payments of one cent per pound have been made to honey producers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Interim payments aggregating $25,686.65 were made to alfalfa seed producers in Saskatchewan. No registered seed was delivered under the agreement which was concluded with the Saskatchewan Registered Seed Growers of Moose Jaw.)

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. SENN: What length of time will be allowed each of these organizations?

Mr. GARDINER: I should have answered that. The surmise of the hon. member is correct, that different times will be inserted in different agreements, depending on the way in which the different products are handled, the times of the year at which they are harvested and the times they are used for certain purposes. For example, for seeds, harvested in the fall and planted in the spring, there will be a different time as contrasted with furs, which are marketed throughout the year.

Mr. SENN: It is very important that one crop should be cleared up before the next one comes on the market. I should like to know if it will be possible for the department to insist on there not being any carryover at all?

Mr. GARDINER: Details with regard to these matters are written right in the agreements in order to deal with each product as it is or always has been handled on the market by the different organizations.

Mr. SENN: I believe it would be of value to the committee if a copy of some agreement, of a general character, were placed on Hansard or put at the disposal of the committee so that we could study it and have some idea of its terms.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that any particular one of them would not be of much value. I would suggest this, that I attempt to get a copy of each one of these agreements and have those copies placed on the table of the house so that hon, members can go through them before we take up the estimates in connection with the expenditures under this act. I believe we would then be in a position to discuss all details in connection with them.

Mr. STIRLING: Has there been under this act a considerable number of applications, of which the number the hon. member has referred to were successful?

Mr. GARDINER: I am speaking only from memory, I thought I had the details here. My recollection is that some twenty-seven or twenty-nine cooperatives all told have been set up under control selling agencies. I am not in a position this evening to say to what extent all of them have been doing business since they were set up, but I believe that nearly all of the organizations which have made application have finally entered into agreements with the department.

Mr. QUELCH: In British Columbia and Alberta cooperative marketing acts were passed, but have the boards of those provinces taken any steps to take advantage of this act?

Mr. GARDINER: I think an organization in connection with grass seeds has been set up in British Columbia. Speaking from memory, I believe that is the only one that we have had under consideration in that province. I do not recall that any organization has been set up in Alberta. I will check closely on that and bring the information down.

Mr. WRIGHT: The alfalfa growers' cooperative organization of northern Saskatchewan was formed a year before this act came into force. It came in under the legislation afterwards, however, during the past year.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes. I think that would be true of most of these organizations, that they were in existence as cooperative organizations before this act came into being. They have come under the act for the purpose of assistance in financing.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What steps have the department taken to get these cooperatives formed? I am surprised that a larger number of cooperatives have not availed themselves of the benefits of this act. I thought it would be much larger than the list the minister read.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the list is larger than the one I have read. Apparently only the ones for which we had statistical information were placed on the list I have. The department has not gone out to promote the organization of the cooperatives. Most of them are set up under provincial charters; sometimes they have been encouraged by provincial promoters of cooperative organization to come under this act. In most instances they have simply written to the department for information; we have sent out the information; and as a result of their obtaining it they have formed control selling agencies.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 24, to amend the Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

AMENDMENT OF ARRANGEMENT ACT AS TO PRO-POSALS FOR COMPOSITION, ETC., IN MANITOBA

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, to provide inter alia that proposals for a composition, extension of time or scheme of arrangement may be made under the said act by farmers in Manitoba.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: The object of the bill which is to be founded on this resolution is to provide that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act shall be in force in Manitoba as it is in Alberta and Saskatchewan. It will be remembered that this matter has been the subject of legislation at two previous sessions. In 1938 I think it was, by amendment of the senate if I remember correctly, provision was made whereby the act was terminated, as far as its effect in Manitoba was concerned, as of June 30, 1939. Then in 1939 legislation was introduced similar to that which I am proposing now, to provide for reopening the act in Manitoba. That legislation was not carried by parliament although it passed this house. Since that time further representations have been received. The situation up to June 30, 1939, was as follows: From the time the act came into force until June 30, 1939, when it expired, as to future applications, 11,369 farmers in Manitoba had interviewed official receivers regarding their debts, and 4,714 had submitted proposals, of which 867 were awaiting final settlement on June 30, 1939. Since that time the board in Manitoba has been sitting, dealing with those cases which were outstanding as of June 30, 1939.

Representations are made that of those who failed to submit proposals a large number were from districts where adverse crop conditions had prevailed for a period of years, and therefore farmers had become so hopelessly involved that a proposal was not practicable at the time. Another suggested reason why proposals were not made before the expiration of the act is that farmers who had not availed themselves of the benefit of it, a number of them at least, were those whose creditors, realizing that there was not any hope of collection, did not exert pressure and therefore there was no incentive to ask for the benefit of the act's provisions. The point is made now that one fairly good crop has changed this situation. It is said that the farmers are faced with legal proceedings by foreclosure, seizure and dispossession, and that every effort ought to be made to retain the farmers on the land as efficient producers. Hon, members will recall that according to its preamble the act was enacted originally not as a bankruptcy act for farmers but rather as a measure for the purpose of inducing farmers to remain on the land.

In April of this year the legislature of Manitoba adopted a resolution which is in the following terms:

That the legislature of Manitoba unanimously requests the passage by the parliament of Canada of adequate enabling legislation to make the King's Bench Amendment Act, 1939, effective in the province of Manitoba; or if the dominion parliament be not prepared to pass such enabling legislation, that in order to remove the present condition of injustice from which the Manitoba citizens suffer as compared with those of Alberta and Saskatchewan in the matter of debt adjustment legislation, the dominion parliament should reenact the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as applicable to the province of Manitoba at the earliest possible time; and that copies of this resolution should be sent to the right honourable the Prime Minister of Canada and the members of the House of Commons and of the Senate.

Resolutions have been received also from the Manitoba Federation of Agriculture, Winnipeg, and numerous local farm organizations requesting the reenactment of these provisions.

It is with these conditions and representations in mind that we propose, if this resolution passes, to present to the house a bill founded on this resolution for the purpose of extending the provisions of the act to apply in Manitoba.

As I recall, there is another section with regard to the matter of official receivers. This section may be dropped; it is only a formal section anyway. Its effect is to provide that in provinces in which there are no further proposals to be made, the official receivers appointed under the act shall cease to hold office, because there is no necessity for having provision for receivers if there is no work for them to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection at all to this resolution. I rise only for the purpose of asking for information in respect of the situation in New Brunswick. Does the minister know whether the act has lapsed in New Brunswick, and if so, has there been a deadline?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, there is a dead-line, but I am not sure if the operations of the board were completely finished. The board was operating until a very short time ago, but operating on proposals which had been presented before the act had lapsed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then in effect the act has lapsed in New Brunswick as far as new applications are concerned, and they are just cleaning up?

Mr. RALSTON: That is so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear that, because really it has been a racket.

Mr. BROOKS: I think, as far as New Brunswick is concerned, they are still hearing proposals of soldier settlers.

Mr. RALSTON: That is so in all provinces.

Mr. BROOKS: Does this prevent any further new applications from farmers in Manitoba?

Mr. RALSTON: On the contrary, this would permit new applications.

Mr. BROOKS: How about soldier settlers throughout Canada?

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand, the act still applies to them.

Mr. NEILL: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not looked at the act, but I noticed statements in previous debates.

Mr. NEILL: I was under the impression that as far as Ontario is concerned, it is absolutely cut off, and I think in British Columbia also. The soldier settler was exempted for a period, but I thought the period had lapsed.

Mr. RALSTON: In reading the debates of last year, I got that impression, but I have not looked at the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That information could be obtained.

Mr. RALSTON: I will get that information for my hon, friend.

Mr. SENN: Has the minister information as to whether the board of review is still operating in Ontario?

Mr. RALSTON: That is really what we are talking about here. The board is not operating as far as any new cases are concerned.

Mr. SENN: But to clean up cases.

Mr. RALSTON: If there are any cases left, although I do not think there are any, I have not heard of any reports of operations. I find that I was quoting my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) regarding soldier settlers; I knew I had some authority for the statement I made. In the debates of last year this question was asked by Mr. Weir, as reported on page 2678 of Hansard:

Mr. Weir: ... I have just one question to ask of the minister. Is it a fact that all soldier settlement board cases where compromises are made are dealt with under this legislation?

Mr. Crerar: So far as soldiers under the Soldier Settlement Act are concerned, througout Canada they all come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

It may be that the way in which it is stated there does not justify the statement I made, but certainly I gathered that impression from what my colleague said at the time. However, I shall certainly look at the act to see.

Mr. BROOKS: I believe a time limit should be set under this act as far as the soldier settlers are concerned. I know in New Brunswick they have waited months and months, but the judge who was supposed to look after the matter has not heard the cases yet.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the New Brunswick court is sitting and cleaning up the cases. Is my hon. friend asking that a time limit be fixed?

Mr. BROOKS: It seemed to me there should be a time limit, because the thing seems to be going on indefinitely. I know soldier settlers there have waited a long time to have their cases adjudicated, and nothing has been done.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon, member means a time limit on the board?

Mr. BROOKS: Exactly.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Has the minister any thought of bringing down enabling legislation so that a land court might be established by the provincial government of Manitoba? That has a distinct bearing on this matter.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Quite frankly, there are some aspects of the administration of this act that I do not like, but I am quite satisfied that it is absolutely necessary that the farmers should have some recourse, owing to the condition of agriculture in western Canada to-day. During the last several years the cost of production has advanced tremendously. At page 58 of Hansard for this session the leader of the social credit group placed on record figures showing that the average cost of some twenty-one articles necessary on the farm has advanced 66.7 per cent since 1914. Then the other night the Minister of Agriculture placed figures on record indicating that there was very little difference between the average prices of wheat and certain other agricultural products for the five year period prior to the commencement of the last great war and the average for the same period before the beginning of the present war, which is quite true. Notwithstanding that, as the minister went on to point out, the dollar has not nearly the purchasing power to-day that it had then.

We in the west are in an exceptionally bad situation at the present time because the average of $1.02 for the five years prior to 1939 was almost twice what we have received so far for the crop of 1939, on the basis of 70 cents at Fort William, which nets the farmer in my district about 55 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern. Therefore I do not think any argument is necessary to point out that it is utterly impossible for the farmer, no matter how well he may manage, to exist and raise his family and pay his way under these circumstances. So, while personally I do not like some aspects of this act, we must have some means of recourse, and I am glad that the minister has seen fit to bring in this act so that our people in Manitoba may have a chance to reestablish themselves. We need something that will enable the farmer in the west to go along on a sound business basis, as other industries in this country are permitted to do.

I do not want to get mixed up with any theories in what I am about to say, but I think in western Canada, and for that matter throughout Canada, we have one of the finest economies in the world. Let me give an example of what I mean. In South Africa the people are directly dependent for their livelihood upon their output of gold and the demand for that product. If something un-expected should happen, as it may, those people cannot eat that gold or clothe themselves with it. On the other hand, I do not have to point out that in Canada, and especially in western Canada, with which I am much better acquainted, we have the finest cereals and live stock in the world. Farther north we have our immense mineral and timber wealth, so we have everything that is absolutely essential for the maintenance of life in this country. I do not know that we really appreciate what we have here; it is a matter of the administration of those vast resources. Probably before we are through this terrible crisis we may to a greater extent appreciate our great natural resources and what we can produce. At present, however, we are forced to resort to some legislation such as this, and therefore I commend the government, instead of criticizing them, for doing something for our people in the west. Certainly the farmers of Manitoba require some legislation of this kind until the government sees fit to put the agricultural population on a sound basis which will enable them to make their own way without need of adjustments of this kind.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am glad that the benefits of this legislation are to be made available again in Manitoba. Personally I thought it was a tragedy when this act was made inoperative in that province. I should like to make an appeal to the Minister of Finance, however, before he brings down the bill, if I am not out of order in so doing. This act was passed originally in 1934 and was by way of an experiment, as the minister has said. It was not bankruptcy legislation; it was an attempt to retain farmers on the land as efficient producers. Boards of review were set up, but they tackled the job very gingerly. I need not take time to read the statistics now; I can place them before the committee when we are on the bill, but in the first two or three years the reductions were very small, in some instances as low as 16 or 17 per cent of the whole accumulated debt.

This government came into power in 1935, and in 1936 a new board of review was set up in Saskatchewan. In the meantime there had been two crop failures. The figures given by the Sirois commission show that in those two years the agricultural income of Saskatchewan dropped drastically; and the board of review, faced with those conditions, saw that it was necessary to tackle the question of cutting these debts much more courageously.

As a result, from 1936 to 1939—I have not the figures for this year—the percentage of reduction of the accumulated debt grew until in the last year debts were practically being cut in half. It is easy to see why that was necessary. In the meantime there had been four or five crop failures; prices of other commodities had increased; debts had piled up, and the boards of review were compelled to meet the situation. I think they met it very well, and I believe this legislation has been extremely beneficial.

What I want to point out is that the people who came under this legislation in the first two or three years now find that the proposals made to them are most inadequate in the light of subsequent events; and they find their debts now as high as when they went before the board of review, if not higher, with the exception of a few districts. In the greater part of Saskatchewan it is not possible for the farmers to meet the terms of the proposals that were made in those years, and the result is that many of those people now find it absolutely impossible to keep up with proposals that looked fairly proper and safe in 1934, 1935 and 1936. Therefore I am asking the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his bill, to consider the possibility of allowing rehearings in Saskatchewan for people who came before the board of review in those first few years, when the board was more or less experimenting so far as the question of keeping farmers on the land as efficient producers was concerned.

I know what the minister has in mind—and it is quite valid-namely, that you cannot continue to have rehearings ad infinitum. Under those circumstances we would have a board of review sitting constantly for years. But I would point out to him that in the first two or three years of operation this act was in an experimental stage. Boards of review had no precedent from which to judge what reductions should be made, nor did they know what amount could be paid. After these years of experience the boards of review have done much better, and they are doing a very good job to-day. I do say, however, that the people who came in the early stages, in 1934, 1935 and 1936, have been penalized because of this lack of experience. If the people who came before the boards of review in those years could be allowed rehearings now, it would enable many, who otherwise are going to find it impossible, to remain on the land.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ralston thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Monday, June 3, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 26, to incorporate The Alberta Provincial Bank—Mr. Blackmore.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPEAL OF PROVISION FOR THE MAKING OF CERTAIN APPOINTMENTS BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Department of National Revenue Act provides, among other things, for the appointment by order in council of certain officers of the customs and excise divisions. These are preventive officers, appraisers, investigators of values and drawback officers. The practice, however, has fallen into disuse. The preventive work is now done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and since 1934 appointments to all the other offices I named have been made by the civil service commission. It has been done in that way as a matter of policy by succeeding ministers, and it is now considered desirable to repeal the provisions that empower the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, to make these appointments, leaving it entirely in the hands of the civil service commission.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

- 2. What quantity is imported: (a) direct through Canadian points, and (b) via United States?
- 3. Does Canada receive credit as the importing country for coffee imported via United States?

3. In Brazilian statistics the destination of merchandise exported is that declared in the manifests; however, that is not always the ultimate destination. It is stated in the Brazilian trade returns that there are no means of accurately determining in their statistics the final destination of merchandise. It is also stated: "As Brazil does not have direct navigation lines to all countries, it so happens that many countries are not shown as importers of our products, whereas others are shown, unduly, with larger quantities than those which they really import."

The situation with respect to Venezuelan exports is similar. Accordingly, exports of coffee from these countries to Canada tend to be somewhat smaller than the amount actually purchased and consumed in Canada.

4. Yes. The Department of Trade and Commerce has recently made an investigation of the discrepancies between Canadian statistics and those of other countries covering the same trade. The Canadian government has, from time to time, as occasion required, made representations to various South American and other countries drawing attention to the true position of Canada as a market for their products.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

RELEASES FROM INTERNMENT CAMPS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a return showing a list of all persons released in 1939-40 from internment camps in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Ontario, together with the dates of release and reasons therefor.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In answer to some questions with regard to the same matter I have already stated that circumstances connected with the internment and release of enemy aliens cannot be disclosed to the public. Such disclosures would involve the publication of sources of information which it would not be in the public interest to disclose. As a matter of fact some of the information it would be impossible to disclose, coming as it does even from the secret services of other countries, neutral as well as allied countries. This matter is of somewhat the same nature as questions relating to the release of prisoners, ticket-of-leave, and the like. It has been the policy of all governments that such information is of a highly confidential nature and that it would be against public policy and the interests of the state to give it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize the motion is not debatable, but I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the argument he has advanced—and to this extent I agree with it—relates entirely to the last part of the motion, which asks for the "reasons therefor." The government, however, might produce, as the hon. member moving the motion requests, a return showing the list of persons released, with dates of release. To do that, it seems to me, would not be in contravention of any public interest.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should like to consider the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. I do not think, however, that the names of the persons interned should be given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The order asks for the names of persons "released," not "interned."

Mr. POULIOT: All the K.K.K. should be interned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Order; this is a serious matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All right; let it stand.

Motion stands.

INTERNMENT OF F. K. SCHNEIDER

Mr. MAYBANK:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the internment as an enemy alien of F.K. Schneider, of Lockport, Manitoba, and the subsequent release of the said F.K. Schneider.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): For the same reasons I object to the carrying of this motion.

SURVEY OF ENGINEERING SHOPS IN CANADA

Mr. BRUCE:

For a return of the survey made by Lieutenant-Colonel Ogilvy, of the Department of National Defence, relating to the engineering, machine and metal-working shops of Canada, in which was set out the capacity of these shops which are now being used for munitions, as well as their maximum capacity.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out that Lieutenant-Colonel Ogilvy and his staff are continuing to make the survey referred to in this motion. The last time I had a report the surveys then made totalled over 2,200. Each survey is contained in a voluminous document, and I suggest that it be quite impossible to produce in the form of a return what is here asked for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate the magnitude of the reports to which the minister has referred. However, if the order were allowed to stand some plants might be selected on which copies of reports could be received. I have not conferred with the hon. member sponsoring the motion, but I should not like to see it dropped. I agree with the minister that to produce in its entirety what is requested would involve a huge task.

Mr. HOWE: I would try to table the information with respect to specific plants, if that were called for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let it stand.

Motion stands.

NELWAY, B.C., UNEMPLOYMENT PROJECT

Mr. ESLING:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, claims and other documents in connection with claims for damages resulting from a fire at unemployment project No. 65, Nelway, British Columbia.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MANUFACTURE OF TANKS $\hspace{1.5cm} \text{IN CANADA}$

Mr. STIRLING:

For a copy of all correspondence, cables, telegrams, memoranda, notes of telephone conversations, and any other papers or documents passing between this government and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and/or any agent or authorized representative of either government, and between this government and persons or corporations, relating to the manufacture of tanks in Canada since January 1, 1938.

Mr. HOWE: I must point out that communications between governments are privileged, and in any event could be released only with the consent of the other government concerned. If there are any communications they are supplemented by conversations between the British mission in Canada and the Department of Munitions and Supply or the war supply board, which in any case would not be available to table. I suggest that under all the circumstances this motion be dropped.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if it would be possible for the government to bring down those portions of the request which do not apply as between the two governments—for instance, the agents for other firms who have been communicated with?

Mr. HOWE: I shall look at the files to see what communications there are. If there are any such as described by the hon. member, the matter could be further considered.

Motion stands.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING

SPEECH OF ACTING DEPUTY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR BEFORE OTTAWA SERVICE CLUBS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Is it true that during an address which Mr. James S. Duncan, acting deputy minister of national defence for air, delivered at noon to-day before a joint meeting of service clubs he made several announcements concerning important changes in governmental policy in connection with the commonwealth air training plan? If so, when did it become the practice to have important announcements of government policy with respect to matters of vital national interest made by an acting deputy minister, no matter how able, important and valuable he may be, to the public while parliament is in session? It seems to me that such a course is directly contrary to correct practice and to the repeatedly expressed conviction of the Prime Minister, and is not in keeping with responsible government. I think some explanation is due to the house and the country.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I happened to be present at the joint meeting of service clubs which was addressed to-day by Mr. Duncan. I do not know that one could describe the declarations or statements made by Mr. Duncan as indicating important changes in government policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have the speech here, and that is how I interpreted it.

Mr. POWER: However, it may be that certain information was given to the public with respect to the commonwealth air training plan which up to that time had not been made known. I believe that it was in the public interest that such information be made known.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but here in this house.

Mr. POWER: Complaints have been received that the public have not been taken into our confidence. Although very often we have taken parliament into our confidence, apparently the information did not get to the public. If Mr. Duncan took this means of making this information generally known to the country, I think he is to be commended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have an advance copy of the press release of the speech, and my interpretation of it is that it is an announcement of vital changes in matters of public policy respecting this scheme, an announcement which should have been made to parliament.

Mr. POWER: It is an announcement of certain means taken to accelerate the commonwealth air training scheme.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Why not adjourn parliament and let us go home?

WHEAT BOARD

WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE OPEN UNTIL END OF CROP YEAR—SALE OF WHEAT TO BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) based upon a report which appeared in to-day's Ottawa Journal, a copy of which I hold in my hand. The report is headed "Grain exchange open to July 1st." The second paragraph states that the government has decided not to close the Winnipeg grain exchange for the remainder of this crop year. The third paragraph reads:

The Canadian wheat board sold 50,000,000 bushels of wheat to the buying agency of the British government at a price considerably above the present market.

Is the minister prepared to make a statement with respect to the sale of this considerable amount of wheat? Would he mind stating also what was the price and who is the British buying agency? Is there any intermediary, such as members of the Winnipeg grain exchange, between the Canadian wheat board and the British buying agency?

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister whether the British government or the British buying representatives have at any time since last September made representations to this government to have the Winnipeg grain exchange closed.

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall accept this as a notice and make a statement to the house to-morrow.

Mr. PERLEY: I think the matter is of sufficient importance to warrant an answer to parliament to-day.

ENEMY ALIENS

REPORTED ARRIVAL AT QUEBEC OF GROUPS OF GERMANS WITH BRITISH PASSPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. P. MULOCK (York North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). Has his attention been called to a report in the Globe and Mail of to-day which states "Ship passengers are angry as 50 Germans reach Quebec." The article is as follows:

More than 50 Germans, all of whom were born in Germany, but now hold British passports, were among the passengers arriving in Quebec to-day from overseas. Most of them, it is believed, are en route to the United States.

I should like to ask if this newspaper report is correct and if any of these Germans are remaining in Canada. If so, what is going to be done with them?

Hon, T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it will not be difficult to answer this question. My attention was drawn to this matter just a few moments before I came into the chamber. Officials of the immigration department had seen this dispatch, I believe in the Toronto Globe and Mail, and immediately made inquiry of the officials at Quebec. The story is entirely inaccurate and without foundation There were three refugees with American visas who disembarked from the ship, and they are on their way to the United States. That is all the foundation there is for this story. While I am on my feet may I suggest that newspaper stories of this kind going out to the country naturally have a disturbing effect upon the people. I have no doubt that within the next twenty-four hours I shall receive several telegrams and letters protesting against it. Such stories result in taking up the time of the officials of the department, including myself. There is not a shadow or shred of foundation for this story.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REVIEW OF DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS SINCE SEPTEMBER, 1939—STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) what action is being taken in connection with enemy aliens who are now resident in the lower mainland of British Columbia, particularly in the locality where the entire power production of British Columbia is developed and in the area where the oil refineries are located. In those particular areas there are now located approximately 25,000 Japanese. I should like to ask also if Japanese in these areas are still allowed to have powder.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman handed me a telegram, I believe on Friday, which he had received from the secretary of the Fraser Valley Mayor and Reeves Association of British Columbia. I communicated the telegram to the committee officials who are cooperating and helping me in this matter, and perhaps I cannot do better than read the memorandum they have given me about it. The secretary of the Fraser Valley Mayor and Reeves Association for British Columbia telegraphed me as follows:

Mayors and reeves representing sixteen municipalities Fraser Valley passed following resolution: That the dominion of Canada do forthwith intern all enemy aliens and investigate all persons alien origin whether naturalized or not; further that all arms, ammunition and explosives be confiscated forthwith. This matter urgent owing to large percentage of enemy aliens resident in British Columbia who are openly showing their anti-British sympathies. Immediate action is necessary and the seriousness of fifth column activities brought to the attention of authorities.

With regard to the first part of the resolution, many such resolutions were forwarded to me from all parts of the dominion and as a result I instructed the committee on enemy aliens to review the defence of Canada regulations dealing with enemy aliens in the light of the experience obtained of nearly nine months of war and having regard to these representations. The committee's report is as follows:

The most important question which was considered by the committee was a suggestion that all enemy aliens in Canada of military age should be interned. After a careful discussion, the committee unanimously reached the conclusion that it could not at present recommend the internment of all enemy aliens in Canada of military age. The reasons which led the members of the committee to this conclusion may be summarized as follows:

- 1. The necessity, in the public interest, of this step was not at present apparent. The police authorities intimated that alien enemies had been registered under regulation 25 and that they were satisfied that they had reasonably sufficient information concerning those alien enemies not presently interned whose conduct seemed to require quiet investigation and observation.
- 2. Very large expense would be involved in guarding and maintaining internment camps and providing for the dependent families of the 16,000 enemy aliens now registered and reporting to the police.

May I add in passing that many have suggested that all persons of German origin or German descent, whether naturalized or not, should be interned. That would mean the internment of 495,000 persons.

- 3. It was realized that of the 16,000 enemy aliens presently registered and reporting, there were many who, while technically enemy aliens, by reason of birth or citizenship in Czechoslovakia, or other districts now occupied by the enemy, did not adhere in sympathy to the cause of the enemy.
- 4. It was further recognized that many of the alien enemies lived on remote farms, in isolated districts, where possibilities of sabotage or civil disorder were practically negligible.

On the other hand, the committee recognized that the situation might change and is of the opinion that it is very desirable that the police authorities should not in any way relax their vigilance.

With regard to the suggestion that the police investigate all persons of alien origin whether naturalized or not, the answer to this is that the police have been investigating such persons and watching their activities for some time. Quite a number of such persons were arrested at the outbreak of war. As additional information is received, or where the police have reasonable grounds to suspect that activities prejudicial to the interests or safety of the state are being carried on, further arrests will be made.

With regard to the suggestion that all arms, ammunition and explosives be confiscated forthwith, it should be pointed out that on the 11th day of October, 1939, P.C. 3042 was passed prohibiting the possession of firearms or any ammunition therefor or of any dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive by any enemy alien.

The said order further provided that every such person within Canada having in his possession or upon his premises any firearm or any ammunition therefor or any dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive, should, within ten days from the publication of the order in the Canada Gazette, that is ten days from the 21st day of October, 1939, cause such firearm, ammunition, dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive to be delivered to a justice of the peace residing, or to an officer or constable of a police force of a province or city in or near the locality where such firearm, ammunition, dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive is had in possession or to an officer or constable of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This order further provides that if any enemy alien within Canada is reasonably suspected of having in his possession or upon his premises any firearm or ammunition therefor, dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive, he may be searched or his premises or any place occupied or believed to be occupied by him may be searched by any peace officer or by any officer or constable of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police without warrant, and if any such articles be found upon the person or premises of any such enemy alien or in any premises occupied or believed to be occupied by him, the same shall be seized and the property forfeited to the crown; and further, the person upon whom or upon whose premises any such article is found shall further be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500 or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months.

The order further provides that it is an offence for any person to give, sell, hire, lease or transfer possession of any firearm, ammunition, dynamite, gunpowder or other dangerous explosive to an enemy alien, and any person so doing shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $100 or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one month.

The order further provides that if any question arises under the order with reference to anything done or proposed to be done thereunder as to whether any person is an enemy alien, the onus of proof that any person so suspected or charged is not an enemy alien shall lie upon the accused in such proceeding.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police report that the provisions of this order have been carried out. Any persons having information to the effect that enemy aliens are in possession of any of the articles mentioned in the said order should report the facts to a peace officer or officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

With regard to the statement that a large percentage of enemy aliens resident in British Columbia are openly showing their anti-British sympathies, it should be pointed out that cases of this nature should be reported to the police.

It is a great disservice to Canada and the allied cause to spread stories that Canada is filled with enemy agents and enemy sympathizers. We have never believed that Canada, before the outbreak of war, was free from nazi sympathizers. There were some here as there were in every country. The government knew about them, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police knew about them too. Where it was thought necessary, they were placed in internment camps after the police rounded them up at the outbreak of war. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who have a uniformed strength of 2,450-by the way, this strength will be increased by 500 additional men-and their secret service are in control of the situation, and have built up an organization which keeps constant watch over the activities of subversive elements throughout the country. It is obviously not in the public interest, and would, in fact, be giving useful information to the enemy, to give details of the preventive and counterespionage measures which have been and are being taken by the police.

All enemy aliens in Canada have been registered, examined and fingerprinted. People have been writing to urge: Why don't you do as they do in the United States, have them fingerprinted? We fingerprinted them long before the United States did.

Those who are believed to be a source of danger to this country in war-time are being interned. Those who are not interned are all known to the authorities and their activities are closely watched by the police. Naturalized Canadians of enemy origin whose activities cast doubt on the loyalty they have sworn to this country are being investigated. When the results of the investigation warrant it their naturalization certificates will be revoked with a view to their eventual deportation. Pending such action, naturalized Canadians in this category are liable to internment in the same way as enemy aliens.

The public must rely on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other police authorities who are collaborating closely with them to do what is necessary to safeguard the country against the activities of the "enemy within". It will be nothing but a clear sign of unjustified alarm and weakness if arbitrary and indiscriminate action is taken to harass a small minority of persons in this country, most of whom are loyal to Canada and the allied cause.

As an added precaution against sabotage, from which, thanks to splendid police work, we have so far been free—after many months of war there have been no complaints that the precautions have not been effective; there has been no actual case of sabotage—the government has announced that a home guard to be composed of veterans will be formed. This action has been taken to meet the needs of war as they arise. I should, however, like to emphasize the fact that every unnecessary man and dollar engaged in work of this kind is a man and a dollar taken away from the winning of the war.

No punishment is too severe for those who, living within our shores, seek to give comfort to the enemy. But let us be careful not to mistake for pro-Germans, persons who have German names and German descent. Most of them came to Canada to escape the Prussian yoke. The overwhelming majority are passionately anti-nazi. Any persecution of racial minorities in this country, as I said the other day, is unworthy of our people, and a betrayal of our traditions, our national spirit and the very freedom we are fighting to preserve. Nothing the ordinary Canadian can do will help the nazis more than the spreading of rumours and creation of suspicions which set race against race and class against class. The nazis, of course, want to spread division and dissension in Canada, to destroy our unity and cripple our war effort. This is a well known nazi tactic which already has worked to divide and weaken by mutual distrust the small countries of Europe.

The so-called "fifth column" is being dealt with by the police and the authorized military guards. They are on the job; they know their business. If any citizen has evidence of what he thinks are enemy activities he should report it at once to the police, but he should not mention it to his neighbour. Remember that secrecy is essential to police work of this kind.

May I say in conclusion that it is necessary, indeed it is imperative, that we in Canada maintain our calmness, do not become unduly nervous and restless, and more particularly do not spread wild rumours which can only hamper the work of the police. I wish I felt at liberty to repeat what the police officers tell me about those who are hampering their work the most at the present time. We must, all of us, try to help, but not spread suspicions which are unwarranted and which can only handicap the progress of our war work.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the Minister of Justice one question in connection with the statement he has just made? He referred to 16,000 enemy aliens.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who are registered.

Mr. STIRLING: Included in that number are there any naturalized Canadians?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No. All those are not naturalized.

VETERANS HOME GUARDS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIT IN MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 2

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Can the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) tell the house when the veterans home guard for military district No. 2 will be established, and the name of the senior officer who will be in charge of the organization of it?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I shall be very glad to take note of the question and to supply the hon. member with the information when it becomes available.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER COMPANY

PROPOSED APPROVAL FOR DIVERSION OF ADDITIONAL 30,000 CUBIC SECOND FEET

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the third reading of Bill No. 9, respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, when this matter was before the house, we urged that the application should be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; and we are still urging that that procedure should be followed before this bill is given its final reading.

At the outset, when this company endeavoured to get permission to divert a large amount of water from the St. Lawrence river through the Beauharnois canal, they applied for permission to divert all the water from the river, and after vigorous protests in this house and across the country they amended their application so that it provided for the diversion of 40,000 cubic feet per second. I was looking up the debate which led to the investigation into the granting of the right to this company, and I find that on May 19, 1931, Mr. Robert Gardiner, who was then the member for Acadia, said this:

The lease which they obtained from the government.

—size of their canal, the order in council, their plans filed, all absolutely limit them to a diversion of 40,000 cubic feet per second.

Does this lease and the order in council represent the honest and real intentions of those concerned? Was it an honest transaction? What are the real facts? Scarcely had the ink dried on this order in council when these very same promoters proceeded to violate not only the letter but the very spirit of the provincial lease and of the order in council. They prepared plans that provided for the diversion of the whole flow of the river; they sold their bonds on the representation that they would eventually get the whole flow; and they are now building without authority a canal which will take the whole flow of the river. Further, they have acquired 13,000 cubic feet from the Montreal Cottons. To add insult to injury, they have secured this past winter 30,000 additional cubic feet from Quebec, and are awaiting a favourable opportunity to ask for another order in council from this government.

It is apparent the then government and these Beauharnois promoters entered into an agreement which they never intended should be carried out.

I quote that because we have before us the application to which Mr. Gardiner referred in 1931 and which he contended at that time was intended further to facilitate the taking over of the entire flow of the river and the building up of a great power concern which would have a stranglehold on the province of Quebec and the electric power generated by the St. Lawrence river.

To-day, of course, we are told that under the pressure of war conditions an additional amount of diversion is warranted and is necessary. I think that that is a point into which the committee should inquire very closely, because my information differs from the representation of the company in that regard. Are they to-day using the limit of the power they can generate through a diversion of the 53,000 cubic feet per second already granted; and in reality are we dealing now with the Beauharnois corporation, or are we really dealing with a subsidiary of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, which, I am also told, is exporting power to the United States?

I want for a few moments to look at the record of the Beauharnois company during the past few years, in order that I may give the house some reasons why I think we should thoroughly investigate this application.

In 1937 the authorized number of capital shares of the Beauharnois corporation was 762,000, all the shares having been issued. Official reports state that this company at that time was already entirely controlled by Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, which means of course that the latter company must have held more than half the shares, or at least 381,001 of them.

In 1938—this was mentioned in the house at the time—the company was reorganized financially; the authorized capital was increased to 1,431,559 shares. The Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated took 579.559 of the additional shares, which if my first figure is correct, gave it a minimum total of about 960,560 shares. It does not appear that at that time the increased capital was made necessary by any business expansion. At that time the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated was, it would seem, its principal creditor as well as its principal customer. In 1938 Beauharnois transferred all its physical assets to Montreal Light, Heat and Power, and they appeared on the balance sheet of that company; a fact which was at the same time stated authoritatively, in spite of some denials that appeared in the press.

I think we are interested also in the question whether the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated was the principal if not the only shareholder of the company at that time, as well as its principal creditor and principal customer, and if as a matter of fact it was the owner of all of the assets of the Beauharnois company.

On Friday last the hon, member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) raised some question as to this application and this bill. He stated that the maximum capacity of the installation with the present diversion of 53,000 cubic feet per second is 400,000 horse-power. I understand that the reports of the company state the present capacity to be some 500,000 horse-power, of which 400,000 is now being produced.

The company to-day has certain contracts. In order to see whether the application now being made to parliament is valid and whether the additional diversion is warranted by the amount of power necessary for war and other purposes, we should see what those contracts are. The company at the moment is obligated to supply the following: To the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, 150,000 horse-power; to the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, 125,000 horse-power.

In connection with the latter figure account must be taken of the fact that in 1941 they will have to supply the Ontario hydroelectric power commission with an additional 25,000 horse-power, bringing the amount up to 150,000; in 1942 under the same contract the amount will have to be increased to 200,000 horse-power, and in 1943 to 225,000 horse-power. No further increases are foreseen until 1976. If these figures are correct, as I have every reason to believe they are, this means that they have a total of 375,000 horse-power contracted for from 1943 and following years. This leaves, according to the company's own statement, a margin of 125,000 horse-power. Why, then, are they asking for more water to produce another substantial increase of power when following 1943 they will have a surplus of 125,000 horsepower?

The question was raised on Friday whether the company is exporting power to the United States. We are told that the company itself is not exporting power to the United States, and I believe that statement is correct. But the Ontario hydro-electric power commission is taking a substantial amount of power from Beauharnois, and some of that may be exported to the United States. The Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated is exporting power to the United States. In 1935—I have not the figures subsequently; there may be some alteration one way or the other-the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated exported to the United States 696,641,320 kilowatt hours, which at that time was about 22 per cent of its production. I am also told that on this power exported the company takes a substantial loss. Of course the argument may be raised that this is surplus power and that if a large amount of power is generated other than that exported it can be sold at a cheaper rate to other classes of consumers. But does it work out that way in actual practice? I am informed, and believe the information is correct, that Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated sells its electric energy at the following average prices:

Domestic current, 2.99 cents per kilowatt hour, or $195 per horse-power year. The commercial rate I am told is 2.8 cents, or $183 per horse-power year. The general rate is 1·1 cent or $76 per horse-power year, and the export rate is 1·23 mills per kilowatt hour, or $8 per horse-power year. I am told also that certain classes of favoured consumers benefit by a special rate which, if higher at all, is not much higher than the low export rate charged.

It seems to me one of the first obligations of this house to the people of Canada is to see to it that our people get services such as this, originating in our great natural resources, at prices as low and reasonable as possible. If these figures are correct, as I have every reason to believe them to be-and that is why I think this matter should go before the committeethere is an enormous difference between the rates for the two types of power, the difference between the export rate of $8 and the top domestic current rate of $195. The people of Quebec and the people of Canada ought to receive the benefit of this great Canadian natural resource; and our principal objection to all bills of this description is that we are constantly alienating our resources to powerful corporations who are monopolistic in their character and ownership and who charge the public much higher rates than are warranted if we take into consideration the output and the rates which ought to be given to the domestic consumer.

Again, if we examine the cost of production per horse-power, according to the records of the company itself, we find that figure, all costs included, to be about 4 mills per kilowatt hour. That is the figure for Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated; but the average cost for the Beauharnois plant is 2·1 mills per kilowatt hour, or about half the average of the whole of the corporation's power plants.

In view of these facts and the circumstances surrounding the granting of the original charter I am of opinion that the government would be well advised to accept the suggestion I offered on Friday and have the whole matter referred to a committee, where we could get the technical and other advice we require. If we accept the statements the company has been making in its literature for the last ten years, we find that it can generate some 500,000 horse-power from the 53,000 cubic feet per second now diverted from the St. Lawrence through the Beauharnois canal. That being so, as I have indicated already, from 1943 to 1976 they will have a surplus of some 125,000 horse-power with which to assist the greater industrial development of this country.

I want to emphasize that we are creating great power monopolies in Canada, and there is no greater power monopoly in this country to-day than Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, which has subsidiaries here and there across the country. I think we should know that Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated and the Beauharnois company are almost identical as far as their officers go. The chairman of the board of Montreal Light, Heat and Power and of Beauharnois is the same, Sir Herbert Holt. The president of the two companies is the same, Mr. J. S. Norris. The vice-presidents are the same, Mr. G. H. Montgomery, Mr. C. S. Bagg, Mr. Severe Godin and Mr. R. A. C. Henry. Mr. Henry, of course, is the gentleman who to-day is on the executive of our war purchasing board and who was deputy minister at the time the original agreement was made with the Beauharnois company. The secretary is the same, Mr. C. C. Parkes. The assistant secretary is the same, Mr. W. R. McLeod. The treasurer is the same, Mr. P. C. Drake. The assistant treasurer is the same, Mr. A. M. Ste-Marie. Finally, they have the same manager, Mr. C. S. Bagg, and the same offices in the Power building on Craig street in the city of Montreal.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we should bear in mind the circumstances which surrounded the original application, and the fact that as far back as 1931, when Mr. Robert Gardiner made his charges in the house which resulted in the investigation, the company planned to obtain an additional diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second. To-day, nine years later, we have the foreshadowed and identical application before us. In laying out its plans originally the company constructed a canal sufficiently large to take the entire flow of the St. Lawrence river. I know it is said that to-day that canal is an asset of this dominion. It was a year or two after the parliamentary investigation and report that a statute was passed by this parliament taking over the canal as a work of public importance.

The other evening the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) told us that the additional power was required because of the war. Well, we are being asked to grant this diversion not for the duration of the war but for all time, in perpetuity; and we should beware lest the war necessity of this country is used as an excuse by which this private corporation may further its original plan to obtain control of the entire flow of the St. Lawrence river. That is our obligation to this country. I do not know what figures have been given the minister by the company to substantiate their claim that more power is required due to war industry expansion. I understand that one large munitions plant is being constructed at Sorel by the Schneider-Creusot company. I understand further that in its last annual report the Shawinigan power company mentions this plant as a possible customer and foresees an initial demand for further power to the extent of about 4,000 horse-power.

These are some of the considerations which impelled me to rise and to suggest to the house that before the bill be given its third reading, and before this resource be alienated in perpetuity, we ought, in the interests of the people of Canada, to inquire very carefully into both the application and the terms of the bill. I am not going to rake up the old scandal about Beauharnois. Every hon, member knows that at least to some extent that brought about, shall we say, a reprimand of the government of the day, and we know the Prime Minister stated that the Liberal party went into the valley of humiliation.

In view of the position taken at that time and the fact that the application now before us is for the very amount of power that Mr. Robert Gardiner indicated would be sought in the future, I suggest that we ought to beware of this application and inquire into it very carefully indeed. I am not going to refer to the report of the Beauharnois committee presented to the house, which, as the record shows, represented the unanimous opinion of the committee which sat at that time, but I do—

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon, friend will permit me, he has heard more than once my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) say that he did not concur in that report. My hon, friend may tell us what the record shows, but he must have heard the minister say on several occasions that he did not concur in it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to have that point cleared up, because the minutes of the proceedings of the committee state this:

The committee resumed at 2.15 p.m.

Members present: Messrs. Dorion, Fiset (Sir Eugène), Gardiner, Gordon, Jacobs, Jones, Lennox, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Stewart (Lethbridge).

On motion of Mr. Lennox,-

Ordered that,

(1) Counsel for the committee;

(2) The secretary to Mr. White, K.C., of counsel for the committee; and

(3) The auditors employed by the committee, be retained until the committee's final report is disposed of by the House of Commons.

On motion of Sir Eugène Fiset,-

Certain moneys were ordered paid. And then:

The committee resumed consideration of the draft report submitted by the chairman.

It was unanimously agreed that the following be presented to the House of Commons as a fourth report, viz:—

[Mr. Coldwell.]

And then comes the report of the committee, as finally adopted in the house.

Mr. RALSTON: And is it signed?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; I believe it is signed by the chairman.

Mr. RALSTON: The Hon. Mr. Gordon?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is signed by John T. Dun, clerk of the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): He must have demurred mentally.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of these considerations, and of the fact that it is the obligation of this parliament to protect the people of Canada both now and in the future, it is our contention that this bill and the matters connected therewith should be referred back to the committee of the whole. I move, therefore, seconded by Mr. MacInnis:

That the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with a view to further amendment.

Mr. HOWE: I am not a parliamentary expert, but it seems to me that the amendment is not in order, in that the motion should be that the bill be referred back to the committee with certain instructions. The reference back should include some specific direction to the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There must be an instruction.

Mr. SPEAKER: This amendment is moved under standing order 77, which states:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Paragraph 813 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms states the following:

When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular. The motion for third reading is debatable under standing order 38.

The amendment we now have before us is in conformity with that requirement, and moves that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with a view to further amendment. In my opinion the amendment is in order. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But there is no instruction.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand Mr. Speaker's ruling has been given.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am now informed that the bill was not amended at any time, and it is drawn to my attention that the motion to refer back asks "that the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with a view to further amendment." There is no "further amendment," because there was no amendment to the bill as it stood. That of course alters the opinion I have already given. It cannot be further amended when it has not already been amended; therefore in that regard the motion is not in order.

Mr. MacINNIS: I refer again to paragraph 813, to which reference has already been made:

When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular.

And then it continues:

The motion for third reading is debatable under standing order 38. Or the bill may then be ordered to be reprinted or committed to a select committee. Bills may be re-committed a number of times with or without limitation; in the latter case, the whole bill is opened to reconsideration, but in the former case the committee can only consider the clause or amendments or instructions referred to them.

Then we turn to page 217, and refer to paragraph 755.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But that is not a rule.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is as follows:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill—

May I point out in passing that paragraph 814 states that what can be done on second reading can also be done on third reading. The paragraph continues:

—to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to the circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees. . . .

This amendment is for the purpose of seeking further information in committee; consequently I think it is strictly in accordance with Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has referred to the amendment, but he has not stated just what it says. When I gave my opinion in the first instance I was not aware of the fact that there had been no amendment in committee of the whole when this bill was being considered. Having had that brought to my attention, and since the amendment seeks to refer the bill back "with a view to further amendment," it would appear that there cannot be a further amendment of something that has not already been amended. Therefore, in my opinion the amendment is not in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker-

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid I shall have to call the attention of the house to the fact that my ruling is not debatable.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was not about to debate Your Honour's ruling. I am assuming the amendment has been ruled out of order and I rise for the purpose of proposing an amendment which may be in order in view of the statement which Your Honour has just made. I move:

That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with a view to amending it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling I should like to draw attention to standing order 77, which reads:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Paragraph 808 reads:

Upon the report stage of any bill no amendment may be proposed which could not have been proposed in committee without an instruction from the house.

My experience in parliament has been that where an amendment of this kind is moved on the third reading of a bill it must contain formal instructions to the committee of the whole that it should be amended in a certain way. It was not merely a motion to refer the bill back without saying why it was being sent back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, without desiring in any way to restrict debate by or action on the part of hon. gentlemen to my left, I must say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has interpreted the rule as I have understood it for many years, that on the motion for third reading of a bill an amendment to refer it back to the committee of the whole must contain instructions. I am not sure that the wording of the rule is a happy one. It states that it shall be "for the purpose of amending it in any particular," but perhaps a better wording would be "for the purpose of amending it in some particular," or "in a certain particular." I am inclined to the belief that your ruling, sir, in the first instance was wrong, but that your present ruling is correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: I direct the attention of hon. members to page 529 of Bourinot, which reads:

Bills may be recommitted a number of times to the committee of the whole or to a special committee. Bills may be recommitted with or without limitation; in the latter case the whole bill is open to reconsideration but in the former case the committee can only consider the clauses or amendments or instructions referred to them.

In my opinion the amendment as now put is in order.

Hon, C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, certain reasons have been given by my hon, friend (Mr. Coldwell) for reopening the case. He has stated that in his opinion there is evidence to show that the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company is within the orbit or under the influence of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated. While I am not certain, I think I stated in my previous argument that the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company has been a wholly-owned subsidiary of Montreal Light, Heat and Power since 1932. Therefore it seems to me that no new evidence can be produced in that regard.

My hon, friend also discussed prices of power. He said that in one instance power had been sold for $8 per horse-power while in another case a charge of $195 per horse-power was made. This shows the futility of laymen discussing the price of power; there are so many factors entering into the matter. Eight dollars per horse-power may be a reasonable charge for high tension power measured at a switch-board, while $195 per horse-power may be a reasonable price to charge for power sold at 110 volts in some remote area where the cost of transmission and providing a transformer system has a considerable bearing on the delivered cost.

The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario is a publicly owned institution which undertakes to sell power at cost. If anything, I think, they lean backward in order to charge the small user a lower price than that charged to the large user—I mean a lower price having in mind all the elements of cost. Many times as a consulting engineer in private practice I have had occasion to negotiate contracts with the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, and the analyses

I have made lead me to believe that this is the case. It may not be intentional but I think it is their usual feeling toward the small man as compared to the large user. I think almost as wide discrepancies in sales of power in dollars will be found in the rates of the Ontario hydro-electric commission. The fact that there may be a discussion of the cost of power is to me one reason why this bill should not be referred back to the committee. In the province of Quebec the amounts charged for power are under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. These charges are regulated by the Quebec provincial electricity board which is composed of technical experts.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do they set rates?

Mr. HOWE: They regulate rates. They function in the direction of regulation much the same as the Ontario hydro-electric commission functions in the generation and sale of power. Laymen could argue for a long time whether one rate was comparable with another, but if ever there was a technical problem, the question of rates for the sale of power is one which ought to be dealt with by people who know a great deal about the power industry.

It is true, as my hon. friend said, that a lease from the province of Quebec for an additional 30,000 cubic feet per second was granted in 1931. It is also true that it was not until 1940 that this government saw fit to ask parliament to grant this diversion of an additional quantity of water. As I have said, we have had before us for at least eighteen months an application from this company asking for this extra diversion. Up until a short time ago it was not apparent that there was a need for additional power in that area and that it would be in the public interest to grant the diversion. But to-day there is ample evidence that the prosecution of the war and the furnishing by Canada of munitions supplies will be greatly hampered unless additional power can be made available. My hon, friend in his remarks mentioned the munitions plant at Sorel as a factor in this situation. As a matter of fact that particular plant is not a factor in this situation because it happens to be supplied by the Shawinigan company and the Shawinigan problem is a separate problem from the Montreal Light, Heat and Power problem.

We are breaking ground at the present time for an explosives plant in the Montreal area which will depend for operation upon being able to contract for 12,000 horse-power. We are placing other contracts in the Montreal area, all having to do directly with the supply of munitions, which will also call for sizable blocks of power. An alloys plant served by Beauharnois which at the beginning of the war was using 10,000 horse-power, is now using 30,000 horse-power, and has applied for an extension of its contract up to 40,000 horse-power.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is there no other establishment in Canada equipped to produce the particular kind of munitions which it is proposed to manufacture as a result of the use of this power? Are there no other concerns in Canada able to produce such explosives, alloys and other things as are to be produced in Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: The situation in Montreal is the key to the situation throughout the industrial area of central Canada. I know of no plant to-day which could take on contracts in any quantity calling for 12,000 horse-power. The Ontario hydro-electric power commission I know is very short of power. We are selling them a block of power from the excess water on the Welland canal and they are pressing us to send over every drop of water that we can in that locality to prevent them from having to limit the amount of power in the area served by them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you mean to develop the power at Decew Falls?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it impossible to manufacture these munitions from another source of power? Is there no source of energy which can be used elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The production of explosives, particularly nitrocellulose, calls for hydro power. My hon friend is perhaps suggesting that we can generate power from coal or something of that sort.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or from natural gas.

Mr. HOWE: It was my understanding that power in mechanical form was required and it was my understanding that it would be required to convert the coal or the gas into electric energy to do this particular job. I am not a technical expert in the manufacture of explosives, but the power is required not for heat but for mechanical energy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In view of all these aspects is there not good reason to submit the bill to a committee to determine these matters upon which as individuals we are perhaps not qualified to judge?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I might illustrate the need for power by reading a letter—it is not marked confidential and I think it is therefore in order to read it—from the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, signed by the chairman, T. H. Hogg, to J. S. Norris, president of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, and dated November 18, 1939: Dear Mr. Norris:

The commission is making a very thorough canvass of power resources in southern Ontario available to meet any growth in load that may occur over a period of five or six years. Naturally the ordinary uncertainties in the growth of power demand are greatly aggravated by the much greater uncertainties attributable to possible wer activity and we are therefore possible war activity and we are therefore anxious to make the widest possible canvass of possibilities.

Among other sources of supply, I have naturally considered Beauharnois and although I understand that you have already contracted for the full output that can be developed from the water which were represented to the tull output that can be developed from the water which you are now permitted to use, I would be interested to have from you an expression of opinion as to the possibility of supplying the commission additional power. In answering, you might bear in mind that the commission is primarily concerned with the demands that may arise during the progress of the war.

To that Mr. Norris replied under date of November 24, 1939:

Dear Dr. Hogg:

Replying to your letter of November 18 instant, I regret to say that having regard to existing contracts with your commission and others and our available water supply, we have sold the complete productive capacity of our Beauharnois plant and, consequently, cannot supply any additional power to your commission from that or any other source unless and until we obtain federal approval of our pending application for the diversion of additional water.

If we obtain approval, as above, for the diversion of additional water within a reasonable time we would be in a position to furnish additional power to your commission, as asked, and will be very happy to negotiate with your commission to this end as, if and when the right of diversion of additional water is granted.

That is an indication that Beauharnois has no unsold power at present.

Mr. COLDWELL: What figures do they give to substantiate that statement?

Mr. HOWE: I have figures here of the present power resources of Montreal Light, Heat and Power and its subsidiary or controlled companies, together with the actual consumer demand:

Resources								H.P.
Roanharnois .								400,000
Chambly								0,000
Cedars								133,000

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they not divert enough water at Cedars to develop 225,000 horse-power?

Mr. HOWE: No: 133,000 is the only figure I have ever seen for consideration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have seen 225,000. [Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: I think their lease is for only about 130,000.

Resources	H.P.
Montreal Island Power Company Canadian Light & Power Purchased power (Shawinigan	30,000 15,000
Power)	161,000
Consumer Demand

Under contract—
Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario	150,000
Beauharnois and district	50,000
Montreal and district	383,700
Aluminum Company of America	116,800

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that exported?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I referred to that in my address on the previous day as power generated at Cedars and exported from there to the Aluminum Company of America at Masséna on a contract that has been outstanding, I believe, since before the last war.

So that there is generated by Montreal Light, Heat and Power and all its subsidiaries 745,000 horse-power; and at the time this information was collected, which was November 17, 1939, the total outstanding contracts called for 700,500, leaving a then surplus of 44,500 horse-power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About five per cent?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. And that was several months ago.

Mr. Speaker, I could have brought this application along at previous sessions, certainly at one previous session, but I was not then convinced that this power was actually needed for the benefit of the people of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. To-day I am satisfied that harm will be done if this readily available power is not made available. I am certain that it will seriously dislocate our present production plans for munitions required in our war effort. I believe that to-day there is no argument which would convince anyone who has taken the time to study the situation that this government is not proceeding wisely in asking this house to vote the third reading of the bill. For this reason I ask that the amendment for recommitting the bill to the committee be defeated.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not question for a moment the motives of hon. gentlemen in bringing forward this amendment, but in the circumstances I do not see that it is logical for me, giving the matter reasoned consideration, to vote for the amendment. If they will bring forward constructive views as to the manner in which this bill should be amended, we will give those views consideration on their merits; but as I understand the present amendment, it is a wide-open invitation to the house to amend the bill. Where it falls down, if I may say so, is that it does not make any concrete suggestion as to the manner in which the bill should be amended. That is one reason why I intend to vote against the amendment. The other reason is this. I have made some investigation into the question of the necessity of further power at this point, and I am convinced that, so far as the amount of power available from the Montreal Light, Heat and Power pool is concerned, they are within five per cent or less of their maximum.

The minister assures us that more power is required in two directions, namely for the Ontario hydro-electric and for the manufacture of munitions at or near the site of the development. I think we should accept this statement, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. After all, in one aspect, if not altogether, this is a quasi war measure.

I know that the company as presently controlled is quite a different proposition from what it was as promoted. I believe hon. members should distinguish between the situation to-day and what it was in 1931. I do not need to go back into that, but there is certainly a vast difference. This is a business undertaking. You may not like the auspices under which this company is operating. Personally I have no objection to power monopolies if they are properly regulated. I do not know that they are, in the province of Quebec; possibly they are not properly regulated anywhere; but certainly there is a governing body whose duty it is to regulate the question of rates, and the jurisdiction, as I tried to point out last week, is in that provincial body.

The objection, if such it might be termed, that I had to this bill was to the interference with navigation and with navigation rights, because I visualized this company coming back to parliament from time to time, as the demand upon it for power might grow, and asking for the entire diversion of the river St. Lawrence. I should think they would get it from this parliament, if it acts on principle, provided the interests of navigation are conserved.

With respect to the whole power proposition question, jurisdiction over power qua power is in the provincial government, whether we like it or not, and whether or not this power is developed as a result of a change in navigation possibilities.

Although this is a government measure, I do not think it is in any sense a political 95826-294 measure; therefore hon members who are supporting me are entitled to vote on the amendment as they please; but I must vote on some principle in relation to the matter. Until my hon friends to the left are able to show me in what constructive way they would amend the measure—and I am not introducing anything—I do not see how I can support the amendment.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to say only a very few words in connection with this amendment. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has just remarked that until we tell him how we want to amend the bill, he cannot see his way clear to vote for the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Vote for the amendment.

Mr. MacINNIS: Vote for the amendment— I thank the hon. gentleman for the correction. What we are trying to do by the amendment is to have the bill sent to a committee where we can get information in regard to its implications.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I tried to give them to you.

Mr. MacINNIS: The best reason for sending the bill to a special committee was stated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) a few minutes ago. He said that he could have introduced this bill several years ago but did not do so because he saw no necessity. He says that anyone who had given consideration to the matter would see the necessity for this authority at this time. But we have not the facts the minister may have which would enable us to give consideration to the matter. It is in order that we may know these facts, know what the consequences of our vote will be, that we ask that this bill be referred to the proper committee where an investigation can be had. Ordinarily a bill of this kind might be introduced by a private member. Whether introduced by a private member or by the government, I am sure that in normal times the bill would be referred to the committee to which we suggest that it be referred now. There is no member in the house apart from the Minister of Transport who has any knowledge or understanding of matters involved in this bill; we are asked to vote entirely in the dark. We ask that our amendment be put and carried and the bill referred to the committee.

The minister suggests that this would hold up an essential war service. But this parliament met over two weeks ago; we have waited two weeks to deal with this matter; we could send it to the committee and have it dealt with in less than two weeks. Surely that is not an unreasonable request, in order to safeguard the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I do not find myself at all impressed by the arguments against the amendment. I do not want in any way to slow up the activity of this country in connection with the war; it is slow enough now. It is a disgrace to the whole British empire that we are so slow. But at the same time we have to be watchful. I am not impressed by the implication which seems to be conveyed by the minister that if for any reason these great power plants in the province of Quebec should be destroyed or should fall into the hands of an enemy, Canada would be unable to produce necessary and vital explosives and so on. While I am not an authority on the different explosives and munitions that are necessary, I venture to suggest there are many places in Canada where these explosives and munitions can be manufactured. Consequently I cannot see that it is of tremendously urgent importance that this bill be rushed through with such haste. We are going to be here for six weeks or so I judge, and I do not think it will impair Canada's war efficiency if we take a little time to do a thing like this properly. A committee should not require a great deal of time, as the hon. member who spoke before me (Mr. MacInnis) pointed out.

I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that the confidence of the Canadian people is severely shaken in regard to everything with which the name Beauharnois is associated. Whether that name is deserving of the discredit attached to it I do not know, but I know that name was a very offensive word in my vocabulary long before I became a member of this parliament. That is another reason why it seems to me the utmost care should be exercised to allay as far as possible this lack of confidence in the public mind.

Furthermore the confidence of the Canadian people in this government is severely shaken. I have not caviled; I believe hon. members of the government will grant that, but I have received resolutions and letters from all parts of Canada indicating an extreme anxiety because of the feeling that this government is not getting on with the job since war was declared. Whether that suspicion is well founded or not, in view of its existence surely it would be a good thing to clear up this water diversion proposal so that everyone will be completely satisfied that all is on the square. I hasten to say to the minister who is piloting this bill through, that I have and have had ever since I came to parliament the highest regard for his integrity; I do not for a moment want him to think that there is any doubt of his sincerity in this matter; but I am talking in general terms and I say that by reason of the lack of confidence which has developed in the aggressiveness and energy of the government, it would be a good thing to avoid contributing to that anxiety by rushing this bill through.

There is another matter that is very important; the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has put on Hansard the names of the gentlemen who are prominent in the companies applying for water power. I do not happen to be acquainted with these gentlemen; I have no knowledge concerning them; but there certainly does not exist among the people with whom I have talked any great confidence in any of those men, probably because of their too close association with the Beauharnois scandal.

Then another matter is exercising the people. I speak purely from the point of view of the morale of this country. We are vitally concerned in having the people of Canada united, confident that the government of Canada is out to win this war and to put everything into our war effort, and that we are not going to be sold out, betrayed, or "sold down the river" as they say across the line. Inasmuch as there is a lack of confidence in a number of these men, I believe this bill ought to go to a committee.

Another matter about which many people are very suspicious is these dollar-a-year men.

An hon. MEMBER: They take the contracts home.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps all of these men are entirely above reproach, but it is a cause of anxiety all over the west that men who apparently, as far as the public knows, have up to the present time devoted their lives to the pursuit of dollars should suddenly become so magnanimous and unselfish that they offer their services to this country for a dollar a year and out-of-pocket expenses. "Out-of-pocket expenses, et cetera" are generalities into which people can read a great deal of cause for suspicion. This is another reason why in my judgment, we should manoeuvre to put this whole question before a committee that has power to get the facts. I would say that a committee would be the very best way to go about it to revive confidence. I learn that the object of those who move this amendment is simply to put the bill back into committee, from which it can be referred to a special committee of this house which will have power to call witnesses.

Mulock

One more thing I wish to say probably arises from my general ignorance concerning explosives and munitions. As far as I can judge from news from overseas, what we need above everything else is aeroplanes and bombers, a great many of them, and tanks and armoured cars. Our immediate need is for these. To produce them, this electric energy is not, it seems, to be used. Where is the urgency?

I have not had impressed upon me how great is the need for the particular kind of explosive to which reference is made. If the need is very great, I am impressed by the fact that during the last war we produced a tremendous amount of explosives—so far as I know more than we are producing now—and at that time we did not have this extra power. In consideration of these matters, therefore, I propose to vote for the amendment.

FARMERS' CREDITORS

AMENDMENT OF ARRANGEMENT ACT AS TO PROPOSALS FOR COMPOSITION, ETC., IN MANITOBA

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, this bill is of peculiar interest to Manitoba. While it is not my intention to offer any extended remarks at this time, I feel I should say something in regard to the measure. I want to commend the government for reenacting this legislation which places our province in the same position as it was prior to 1938. We shall now enjoy the same privileges as are enjoyed by our two sister provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The repeal of the act in so far as it affected Manitoba was by means of an amendment proposed by the senate and concurred in by the government. The legislation is not ideal; it has serious defects and limitations. I think the most serious drawback is that no provision is made for the unsecured creditor such as the small store-keeper, the butcher or other private persons who may have helped out a debtor and received no security. In my province at least, this type of creditor has been overlooked whereas those who had security have

This legislation was passed in order to keep our farmers on the land, but there are other measures which I think would prove more appropriate. I should like to refer to an act passed unanimously by the Manitoba legislature, known as the land court act. Representations have been made to me to endorse in this house the action of the Manitoba government, and this I promised to do. Answering a question submitted the other evening by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), I understood the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) to say that it was not the intention of the government to pass enabling legislation this year in support of the provincial act.

Last session this house passed the mortgage bank bill, and we had hopes that that legislation would provide a greater measure of relief than the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and be more equitable for all concerned. But that legislation never came into force. If we are going to keep many of our farmers on the land, it is essential that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act should apply to Manitoba. I should like to suggest to the government that they again press this measure and serve notice on the senate that we do not want any amendment which will nullify its provisions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon, member cannot make any reference to what may happen in the other place or refer to instructions to be given by the government.

Mr. LEADER: I do not wish to transgress the rules of the house. Perhaps I can refer to the senate as the other place, as other hon. members have done. It seems to me that if members of the House of Commons, the representatives of the people, cannot name a body, the members of which are not elected by the people but appointed by the government in power, and which has power to nullify any measure passed by this house, then I say that this is democracy at its worst.

Mr. THORSON: You can change the rules if you want to.

Mr. LEADER: I am abiding by the rules. I simply want to reiterate what I said in the first place, that the government deserves commendation for making the provisions of this measure available to the people of Manitoba. I want to say also that the demand to reenact this legislation is endorsed unanimously by the provincial legislature as well as by the federation of agriculture in Manitoba. Above all, it is endorsed by my constituents, and I am offering these remarks in their behalf.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask the minister if British Columbia is definitely out of this?

Mr. RALSTON: When the bill got into committee I intended to make clear just what provinces this legislation would affect. This matter came up before when we were discussing the resolution in committee. If my hon. friend wants just that one question answered, the act has expired so far as British Columbia is concerned but still applies to soldier settlers there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister see that British Columbia is reincluded in the act?

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to commend the minister (Mr. Ralston) for introducing this This is a tacit acknowledgment, long overdue, that the western farmer really does have a debt problem which to him under existing circumstances is insuperable. This debt problem has developed from a number of causes, among which might be named: (1) the variability of prices; (2) the increasing costs of the commodities which the western farmer buys, from agricultural implements all the way down the list of some 147 articles which, according to the Searle index report, have increased in price since 1914 from 100 to 134; (3) an adverse tariff incidence which bears particularly heavily on the three prairie provinces; and (4) increased taxes, federally, provincially and municipally.

The bill is further a tacit acknowledgment that interest rates in the Dominion of Canada are far too high. I fancy the day will come when our descendants will look back on our times in utter amazement that we were so stupid as to be unable to see this years ago. Five per cent is an exorbitant price for money to-day, and many of our farmers are paying far more than that, and our provinces too. Interest rates are far too high on mortgages, loans and bonds, and that is tacitly acknowledged by this bill.

There is a conclusion which must follow, and again it is tacitly admitted, I take it, that the three prairie provinces are as provinces faced with a debt situation which to them is completely insupportable, that they too are paying far too high interest rates, and that they too must be relieved. I shall look forward with increasing interest to the time when the minister, who is manifestly a man of vision, will show clearly that he recognizes that fact by taking measures to relieve the pressure existing on the provinces as well.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2-Compositions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Speaking the other evening, I favoured this bill with some reservations. They were exactly as put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). My question is with regard to the unsecured creditor. Is it a question simply for the judge who happens to be administering the act to decide, or does the act itself specifically point out that the unsecured creditor is not protected?

Mr. RALSTON: I understand my nonfriend to ask whether the act itself provides that the unsecured creditor must be protected, by which I presume he means given priority?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No; put on the same basis as the secured creditor. Does that power rest with the judge administering the act?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will understand that first a proposal is made by the debtor. Then, if the proposal is not approved and not agreed to by the creditors, the board of review formulates a proposal, and in that proposal it may make provision for unsecured creditor as well as for the secured creditor. I do not think there is in the act anything which gives definite priority to one class of creditors or any direction as to how the respective classes of creditors shall be treated. The important thing about the actand it is a matter which was the subject of a good deal of litigation-was the question whether we could affect title to land by an act of this kind, having regard to the fact that the secured creditors, where the English law applies, have a title to the land itself, and the question was whether our powers over bankruptcy would affect that security. It was decided by the privy council that the act was intra vires and that that security could be affected.

Mr. HANSELL: We had some little discussion the other day with regard to farmers who come under this act and whose hearings took place about 1935. Might I ask the finance minister if this act means that the farmer who had a hearing prior to, say, 1935 can have a rehearing now?

Mr. RALSTON: No; this does not provide for any additional hearing. What it does do is to remove the bar which exists in Manitoba by virtue of the legislation of two years ago, whereby no proposals were permitted to be submitted after June 30, 1939. This legislation permits proposals to be submitted in Manitoba similarly to proposals made under the provisions with regard to Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. HANSELL: The only conclusion we can reach then is that if a debtor has not been able to meet his payments since the hearing he had in those early days, there is no possibility of any settlement for him except through the courts.

Mr. RALSTON: There is the possibility of settlement by negotiation. But what my hon, friend is suggesting is really an appeal from a proposal which has already been submitted and from a decision which has already been laid down by a board of review. He will understand that if such a provision as that were made, it would have to apply on behalf of the creditor as well. That would mean that all the thousands of cases which have been heard would all be subject to reopening.

Mr. HANSELL: The debtor could then appeal from the previous decision.

Mr. HATFIELD: Can the soldier settler in any part of Canada make application under the act?

Mr. RALSTON: The provisions of the act are still open to soldier settlers in British Columbia, where the act is now cut off so far as other applicants are concerned; also in Alberta and Saskatchewan where the act is in full force with respect to all applicants including soldier settlers. The revival of the act in Manitoba would also, of course, reopen the act to soldier settlers there.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why single out British Columbia?

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend's question might be put the other way: Why should the soldier settler be cut off in the other provinces? The act was repealed in all the other provinces except those four, and reports were received from the soldier settlement board that all proposals had been dealt with.

I have before me a record of the cases in all the provinces. I believe that in the eastern provinces as of March 31, practically all the cases are cleared up, with the exception of something like 114 in New Brunswick, which have been considerably reduced in number since then, and which will probably be disposed of within two or three months. At that time there were in Quebec 359 cases, which will probably be cleared up by the end of July; in Ontario only fifteen cases are left; in Manitoba, unless this bill becomes law, 626 cases are left; in British Columbia only nineteen cases remain to be cleared up as of March 31.

Mr. BROOKS: I believe the minister misunderstood the question of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield). He asked if there could be any further applications from soldier settlers beyond those which have already been made, to which the minister has referred, and which are being cleared up. Can the soldier settlers in the provinces he has mentioned make any further applications?

Mr. RALSTON: In the eastern provinces?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Why are the eastern provinces dealt with differently from the others? This is a federal measure and should, I think, if it is to have application at all, be applicable to the whole of Canada. Is it at the special request of, say, Nova Scotia, or other eastern provinces that they are excluded?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe that it was on the reports of the boards in the various provinces that the act was finally repealed as to those provinces. My hon, friend will observe, if he looks at the debates, that there was considerable discussion about the act. Originally the act was to have been repealed as to all the provinces. Finally it was decided, upon certain representations with regard to particular hardships in the western provinces, that the cut-off date should be postponed in respect of them to a certain time, namely June 30, 1939. In respect of British Columbia the date was, I believe, a little later. But the repeal as to all the eastern provinces took place in 1938, upon the reports of the boards of review which were hearing the cases. My hon, friend may not have recalled that the act refers only to debts contracted before May 1, 1935.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I come from a purely farming district in British Columbia. We in that province have far more debts than have the farmers in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and we should have consideration in this matter. Farmers in my riding are writing to me every day in this connection. I do not see why British Columbia should be left out. The prices we receive for farm commodities are no better than those received on the prairies. We sympathize with the prairie farmers and we expect them to sympathize with us. I earnestly ask the minister to consider exempting British Columbia from the repeal provision. It should be within everyone's knowledge that in no part of Canada during the past ten years has the farmer been able to pay off past debts, clear off mortgages, or buy new equipment.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon, friend and I should have been here in 1938. That was the time when the matter was dealt with. May I point out that at the present time only nineteen cases are outstanding in British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The nineteen cases are those which are being heard, but probably there are in my own district 290 cases to which this treatment should have applied, and which have every right to it.

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say to my hon. friend is that the act was brought into force to meet a particularly difficult situation which was found to exist in 1934. It was an emergency measure; it was not intended to be a piece of permanent legislation; and that fact was recognized in 1938 when parliament repealed the act as to the various provinces mentioned. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) reminds me that the repeal with regard to British Columbia was effected in another place. I had forgotten this; I had it in mind that one of the other provinces was included in the bill brought down in 1938. Now it is not intended to revive this act and start this all over again in all the provinces; but special representations have come from Manitoba, having regard to the crop situation there in the last two or three years, and the fact that farmers have been so down on their luck that they have not been in a position even to make proposals, and on the other hand, that creditors have not been pressing them because they felt the farmers were not able to make proposals. As a consequence, proposals were not made within the time limit set by the act. This bill is for the purpose of putting Manitoba on the same basis as Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): While we are discussing the amendment to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, there is one other respect in which that measure should be adjusted; I refer to section 6A, chapter 47 of the Statutes of Canada, 1938, page 346. I would draw particularly to the attention of the minister subsection 1, which says in part:

In the event of the death of a farmer occurring on or after the third day of July, 1934. . . .

Under that section the board has not the power to deal with estates created before that date. I have before me a case which was taken up last year in Calgary. The husband died before July 3, 1934, and because of that fact the lady in question was unable to come under the jurisdiction of the board. May I read part of this communication which indicates clearly the ruling of the board in this particular case?

The said land creditor has objected to the jurisdiction of the board, alleging that the case does not come within section 10A of the act—

It really means "6A of the act."

—and contending that it is the duty of the applicant as executrix to sell the assets of the estate to satisfy creditors. As this application does not appear to be one authorized by section 10A of the act-

Again it should be corrected to read "6A." the board does not consider that it has jurisdiction to formulate a proposal.

The board accordingly declines to formulate a proposal herein.

Apparently this is a case where, after argument presented by the creditor's lawyer, the board does not even know whether it has the power under this act. In view of that fact, and because this lady is absolutely deprived of any redress through the board, and the case cannot come under the provincial debt adjustment board, the applicant is absolutely at the mercy of a creditor who lives outside Canada, in California. She applied in the proper manner to have the case brought under the jurisdiction of the board, and it is a fact that she has paid already more than the property was worth in the first place, and is merely asking the board to give her some satisfaction.

Mr. RALSTON: Did my hon. friend say that the applicant was living in California?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; the creditor.

Mr. RALSTON: The applicant is where? On a farm?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The applicant is in Alberta, a short distance from Calgary.

Mr. RALSTON: On a farm?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes; living on a farm. The board absolutely refused to give her a ruling on the case and has not stated definitely whether she can come under the act or not. If one looks at the section, it appears that it neither gives the debtor the right definitely nor takes it away. Therefore, since it is not definitely stated that the board could deal with this matter, they threw the whole case out, and the woman has no protection. If that section were struck out, it would, I think, definitely give the board power to deal with these cases. It seems unfair that because a man delayed so long in dying, his wife should not come under this act. I do not think that was the intention.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon, friend will send me a memorandum of the case, I shall be glad to get a definite opinion with regard to the applicability of the act. My hon. friend will realize that July 3, 1934, is the date the act came into force. The act does not apply when death occurred prior to the act coming into force.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But when other cases are allowed and this particular type of case is rejected, I do not think that is fair.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has not got my point. I think the cases allowed are those in which the death occurred after the act came into force and the deceased had qualified as a farmer. The situation which the hon. member is putting now is where the farmer had died prior to the coming into force of the act. I am speaking without the book and without any experience as to the practice before these boards, but I think if the widow could qualify as a farmer in her own right, she would be entitled to relief. If my hon, friend will give me a memorandum of the case, I shall be glad to take it up not only with the officer administering the act but with the board.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister will remember that the board of review in Saskatchewan was changed some time in December, 1936. Has the minister the number of cases dealt with by the first board, the board under Mr. Justice McLean I believe, that was in office in 1935 and 1936?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I have not those figures separately. I have only the total number of cases, by provinces.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the average reduction of accumulated debt of all cases handled in Saskatchewan?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, to March 31, 1939. In Saskatchewan the average reduction per case was $3,998.82, the average debt per case being $10,400.95. Those are cases dealt with by the board of review. In the cases dealt with by official receivers, the average reduction per case is $2,677.05, the average debt per case being $7,434.69.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the minister the percentage of the amount reduced to the total debt?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; on secured debt. dealt with by boards of review, the percentage is 37.96 per cent. For unsecured debts it is 43.87 per cent; or the total average, 38.45 per cent.

Of debts dealt with by official receivers, the reduction in case of secured debts was 34.78 per cent; unsecured, 46.37 per cent, or an average of 36.01 per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister has some valuable tables there. In other years I have put questions on the order paper in order to get that information. Would the minister care to table that information in order that members may have it without having to ask for it?

Mr. RALSTON: The total is the only other thing I have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister has a table for all the provinces in convenient form, it might be valuable.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not see any objection. As a matter of fact, I spoke to the officer who is administering the act, and he tells me that shortly the report for the year with regard to the operation of the boards of review will be filed and this information will be in it. But at the moment I see no reason why I should not table this statement, which is up to March 31, 1939. The Saskatchewan figures are as follows:

Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934

Statistical review of cases disposed of by boards of review and official receivers to March 31, 1939

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are some official receivers who encourage applications and others who more or less discourage them. Would the minister state the basis on which official receivers are paid? Is it a fee basis or a sum per month?

Mr. RALSTON: As I remember, it is a tariff of fees.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has that always been the basis since the inception of the act?

Mr. RALSTON: I happen to be looking at the schedule for Prince Edward Island, appointment January 1, 1936. In Saskatchewan the official receivers are without exception on a tariff of fees all the way through back to 1934.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Will the minister give information on that point with respect to Ontario? I understand that at first the receivers were paid on a monthly basis, and then some two or three years after the act became effective they changed it to a fee basis.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say is that in the schedule I have here I see appointments back as far as 1934, and running down to 1935 and 1936, and opposite the names of every one of the official receivers is the statement "tariff of fees." There may be a question in that the tariff of fees may be in effect to-day but may not have been when they were appointed.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): In one county I know definitely that it was a monthly basis.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

Atter Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Section 2 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Before the title carries, I should like to take just a minute or two to touch again upon the matter I brought to the attention of the minister the other evening, when this bill was in the resolution stage. I am not going to weary the committee with a reiteration of the arguments I presented at that time, except to say this. The main argument advanced against granting rehearing to those who came before the first board of review, which operated in Saskatchewan from some time in 1934 until December 1, 1936, is that it would mean going over thousands upon thousands of cases. I have been looking up the figures, and from an answer given me by the Minister of Finance in 1937, I find that in Saskatchewan it would affect only 1,401 cases even if all those concerned were to ask to have their cases reconsidered and adjusted.

I should like to point out to the committee that when this legislation was first brought down, it was, as the minister said, emergency legislation drawn up with a view to meeting a drastic situation. The farmers immediately flocked to avail themselves of the benefits of this legislation. Those who came under it first are the people who have been penalized. According to the statistics given me by the Department of Finance, which I find coincide with what was said by the minister just before the dinner recess, the first board of review operating in Saskatchewan effected an average reduction of about 27 per cent in accumulated debt. The board of review set up when this government came into power brought about an average reduction of somewhere round 44.38 per cent, an increase of about 17 per cent. This means that the farmers who availed themselves of the benefits of this legislation in the latter months of 1934, 1935 and 1936, received proposals which were not as favourable as those received by farmers who have come under the benefits of this act since then.

It is easy to understand why this should be so. Here were men acting as members of a board appointed to reduce debts. They had no measure to go by. They did not know what the average farmer could stand. They did not know how much he could produce. They did not know how much of this debt he could meet, and for the first two or three years they were really carrying on a process of experimentation. As the years have gone by, they have pretty well found a balance; and, as I said the other night, in the last year or two they have done an excellent job. But it seems hardly fair to penalize those people who came under the first board, who had to accept reductions that really were not adequate. Not only were the reductions made in the first two and a half years not adequate; but since that time conditions have grown much worse. I have before me appendix No. 4 of the report of the dominionprovincial commission, entitled "National Income." On page 87 I find that in Saskatchewan receipts from the sale of grain, seed and hay, which constitute our main commodity, have been as follows:

1934								 70,180,000
1935								 81,420,000
1937								 43,760,000

In other words, in that ten year period the agricultural income of the farmers engaged primarily in wheat production had dropped to almost one-sixth of the figure for 1926, while the income for 1937 was only about sixty per cent of the 1934 income. I do not think I need labour the point. To begin with, these people did not receive as great a reduction. In the second place, on account of low prices and climatic conditions, in the period that followed they could not begin to meet the proposals that were formulated, to which they and their creditors had agreed. So I want to ask the minister seriously to give consideration to granting a rehearing to those farmers who came under this board of review prior to December 1, 1936. I do not believe a single member from west of the great lakes who knows the conditions on the prairies will oppose that suggestion.

This afternoon the hon, member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) referred to the action taken by the legislature of Manitoba. I have before me a resolution passed by the legislature of Saskatchewan, as follows:

That the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, while deeply sensible of the great assistance rendered to our people by the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the solution of their financial difficulties occasioned by the present depression, aggravated by unprecedented drought in our most productive areas, are of the opinion that experience of the working of the said act in our province renders desirable amendments thereto whereby it may be provided—

Then follow several suggestions, among them being:

(2) That the board of review be given power to rehear and amend proposals formulated prior to the 1st of December, 1936.

Because I can think of no good and sufficient reason why this request should not be granted; because it would involve not thousands of cases but only some 1,401 cases in Saskatchewan, and because I feel that a real injustice has been done a group of people who were actually pioneers in this field of legislation, I ask the minister to take into serious consideration this amendment. I move:

That section twelve of the said act, as amended by sections four, five, six and seven of chapter twenty of the statutes of 1935, and by this act, is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection, as subsection 7A:

"7A. The board or boards shall have power to rehear and amend proposals formulated prior to the 1st day of December, 1936."

This, if it were accepted, would constitute section 3 of the bill.

Mr. RALSTON: Like someone else who spoke this afternoon, I do not profess to be an authority on procedure, but I suggest that this amendment involves an expenditure of money and therefore cannot properly be made by my hon. friend.

My hon, friend will remember that the resolution on which this bill is founded had to be introduced by a declaration to the effect that his excellency, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of the resolution, recommended it to the favourable consideration of the house. That was done because the measure involved an expenditure of money. To give the boards power to rehear all the proposals made prior to December 1, 1936, would certainly involve a very heavy expenditure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As I understand the rule, the amendment would be out of order if it involved an expenditure of money on the part of the government, but I cannot see how this amendment calls for any such expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is a potential commitment.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I believe the minister is making a rather fine distinction. While it is true that the amendment might involve extra work or extra hearings, yet any amendment moved by a private member would involve the sending of a letter or the buying of a stamp.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not the point.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But these boards are already set up, and I am merely asking that in certain particulars their work be extended.

Mr. RALSTON: That is exactly the circumstance with regard to Manitoba. The board is already set up in Manitoba; but in order that I might introduce the bill I had to found it on a resolution, because it involved an expenditure of money in the hearing of cases which could not have been heard under the bill as it stood. I have no intention of making a fine distinction, but I urge that my point is a substantive one, and I take it because in my view our proceedings should be regular. Of course the hon, member has a perfect right to appeal to me as a member of the government to take the point he has mentioned into consideration. I have expressed my doubt, however, as to whether it is in order for him to move the amendment which now stands in his name.

THE CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that the amendment entails a substantial commitment, and that no amendment entailing a financial commitment can be presented, unless it be by a member of the privy council, a member of the cabinet, with the approval of his excellency in council. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. GERSHAW: Facts concerning a case have reached my desk to-day. The case in question has particular reference to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and I draw it to the attention of the minister. The man in question bought a farm some years ago for $8,000, on which he has paid $7,096. He still owes a large sum of money, which the board is willing to write down to some $4,000.

Two factors have entered into the situation, one being the drought conditions in the particular district in question, and the other being the low price he is able to obtain for his farm products. His proposition is that he could pay $2,000, but he sees no hope of making a living for his family if he has to pay $4,000, plus interest. His question is this: What will happen to him if he moves away and leaves the place? Will he be held personally responsible, or will he be free of debt? This farmer feels that he cannot in any way meet the requirements of the board of review.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand my hon. friend, a proposal had been made?

Mr. GERSHAW: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I can only make the same offer as I made to another hon, member before recess, namely that I shall be glad, if he will submit the case to me, to procure the opinion of the law officers of the department in regard to the matter. I am afraid that offhand I cannot offer a legal opinion which would be worth very much.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a bill in which I am sure every member from Saskatchewan will take a great deal of interest. Most of us have grown up in eastern Canada, and I can quite understand the reason why the eastern provinces have not favoured the application of this particular statute. I want to assure hon. members, however, that at least in Saskatchewan—and I think the same is true in the neighbouring provinces of Alberta and Manitoba—this measure has been a good thing, for both creditor and debtor classes.

The position in Saskatchewan is this, that a decided surgical operation had to be performed if agriculture were to survive. I find myself in the position of suggesting to the minister that we ought to go even farther than has been suggested by the hon, member for Weyburn. In the light of the experience which has been gained since the beginning of the operation of the act, the boards, which have had to discharge a very difficult task, have improved the handling of the cases.

Incidentally may I say to the minister that one of the most important factors in connection with the operation of this act in Manitoba will be the choice of the chairman of the board. His capacity to deal fairly with both creditor and debtor classes, and to take a sympathetic and appreciative attitude in the administration of the affairs of his board, is of the utmost importance. His task is a very difficult one, and one requiring a particularly high type of judicial mind.

In the light of decisions of our own courts with regard to the interpretation of some of the sections of the act, I would hope that the minister would see fit to refer the consideration of the whole act to the committee on agriculture, so that a careful study might be made. We private members from the west have considerable knowledge of conditions out there, and I think we could be of assistance to the government and to all the people in Canada if we could make the act do the task it was meant to do.

I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Weyburn when he says that many points were discovered in applications which came later, and that those who happened to make application earlier suffered not only because of the smallness of the percentage of reduction of debt, but also in making provision for future years of possible drought. Proposals now emanating from boards of review make the very proper provision that the terms of the proposal are not operative in a year in which a drought or crop failure occurs. The board of review directs that the sheriff of the judicial district in which the land is situated shall be designated as the person authorized to declare that in that particular district and in that particular year a crop failure has existed. That provision in the proposal has been attacked in our Saskatchewan courts. I am not certain that our higher courts have dealt with it, that is beyond the court of king's bench. I feel certain that even those members who live in eastern Canada will realize the necessity of performing that operation in order that some hundreds of thousands of farmers may be saved to Canada, as is set out in the preamble to the act. We private members, particularly those from western Canada, may possibly be able to assist the government by occupying some of our time in studying, in the light of the experience of the last six years, what may be brought in by way of sensible amendments. I do not propose to embarrass the minister and his cabinet any further, except to suggest that he take this matter under consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) gave some figures, and I should just like to understand them correctly. Was he stating the income of Saskatchewan for the years 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was stating the agricultural income.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not suppose my hon. friend could give me an estimate for 1939?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was quoting from the Sirois report, and the last figures given are for 1937.

Mr. RALSTON: I understood my hon. friend to give figures for 1938.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I gave the figure for 1926, which was $257,630,000. Then I gave the figure for 1934, the year the act came into operation, which was $70,180,000. The total income for 1935 was $81,420,000; for 1936, $86,870,000, and for 1937, $43,760,000.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon, member cannot give me the figures for 1938 and 1939?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, I cannot. I could have stopped at 1936. I was simply pointing out the decline in agricultural income in the three years during which the first board of review operated in Saskatchewan. As I understand, it was appointed in 1934 and ceased to function on December 1, 1936. I was pointing out that during that period there had been a decline in agricultural income.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot see where there is a decline as between 1934 and 1935 and 1936. In 1934 the income was $70,180,000; in 1935, it was $81,420,000, and in 1936, $86,870,000.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not in the three-year period. I understood my hon. friend to say there was a decline in the first three years the act was in force; but the income for the first year was $70,180,000; for the next, $81,420,000, and for the next, $86,870,000. The figures for 1938 and 1939 would be useful. May I say to my hon. friend and to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham), that I think it is drawing a rather violent assumption simply to say that because the percentage of reductions happened to be less in a certain year in a certain period, therefore the proposals were not fair to the applicants. It is quite possible that the reductions may not be quite as large because applicants may have been in a better position to pay. I see no real sequence between the two sets of facts. I believe that is the argument upon which my hon, friend's contention and suggestion are based.

The hon. member for Swift Current suggests, as I understand him, that there should be a review in a drought year. This would mean that we would never get to the end of the matter. It is provided in section 10A that proceedings cannot be taken in bankruptcy against an applicant who has made a proposal if his failure to carry out the extension or scheme was on account of causes beyond his control. I would assume that drought would come within that category. It seems to me that that situation is provided for.

My hon. friend suggests that there are only 1,400 cases. He is referring to Saskatchewan alone and only up to December 1, 1936. If it went only to December 1, 1936, and I had made a proposal on December 22, 1936, I would not understand why I should not be included. The same would apply to a man who had made a proposal in 1937. Why the cut-off date? Obviously the suggestion of my hon. friend is that the amendment to cover Saskatchewan would operate in every province. In view of its present form and the ameliorating clause in section 10A, I submit that the situation is fairly well covered.

I indicated before recess that in connection with an amendment of this kind consideration would have to be given. It is obvious that there would have to be some provision for review at the instance of the creditor. The list of cases number 3,653 for Saskatchewan; 2,077 for Manitoba and 3,276 for Alberta. Therefore in those three provinces there are 9,000 cases which would have to be reviewed. If this ameliorating clause is to apply to Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, there should be some remedy for the farmer who has made a proposal and who lives in a province where the act is no longer in effect. What the government is trying to do here is to meet a special situation which has been presented in the case of Manitoba. I ask hon. members not to attempt, at this late date in the year of grace 1940, after this act has been in force for six years and when the number of cases is getting smaller rather than greater, to reopen the act and have all cases reviewed, which would mean that the act would be perpetuated indefinitely.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said about there being fewer cases under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is certainly not true in Saskatchewan. As the minister knows, we now have two boards of review which, as I understand, are barely able to keep abreast of the work. If we are going to leave this act as the only definite system to adjust the debts of Saskatchewan farmers, then I agree with the hon, member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) when he says that it would be only fair and proper to correct any deficiencies which may have been discovered in the act. For example, proposals made by the first board of review in Saskatchewan provided a rate of interest on first mortgages of seven per cent per annum. When the new board was brought into existence, all proposals then provided for a rate of six per cent per annum on first mortgages. It should not be very difficult to make an amendment to this or some other appropriate act to provide that all proposals under the act should be considered as not having provided for an interest rate of more than six per cent per annum. In that way some measure of justice would be granted to those who made applications under the first board of review and who are to-day paying seven per cent interest.

The minister pointed out that a farmer could not be placed in bankruptcy if the proposals made in Saskatchewan by the first board of review were such that a farmer could not possibly carry on. He stated also that the fact that the rate of reduction in the case of the first board of review was not nearly as great as in the case of the boards of review that have been appointed since, did not necessarily mean that the applicants were being treated differently. I have had an opportunity of appearing before these boards of review in connection with many cases, and I know that they were. One needs only to compare the rate of interest as applied by the first board of review with that applied by the second board of review to see that a different attitude was taken.

Further I assure the minister that an entirely different attitude was taken to the whole matter by the second board as compared with the first board. For example, on the question of crop failure, orders were made by the first board that certain moneys should be paid but no provision was made for the case of crop failure. The second board of review in Saskatchewan provided that in the event of crop failure certified by the sheriff of the district in which the farmer resided all payments due that year should be postponed for one year after the time when the payments otherwise would have been completed. Owing to repeated crop failures, under the proposals made by the first board of review many of the farmers are in default and their farms can be foreclosed under the act, and 'i' it were not for the debt adjustment board in Saskatchewan I am afraid that a great many of these farms would have been foreclosed by this time.

There is a tendency for the argument to be made that, a man having taken his case before the board of review, the provincial debt adjustment board should not intervene when he is in default, and so foreclosures have been permitted. I submit that if we are going to have this act-and we have to have it or some other act to take its place providing, for instance, a land court, as has been suggested by the province of Manitoba, for we must have some debt adjustment machinery for western Canada. If we are going to have this act as the only machinery we are to have, I do not see why in the world there should be any objection to accepting the suggestion of the hon, member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) to refer this matter to a committee for study and to recommend improvements in the act.

There is one other matter I bring to the attention of the minister to indicate the anomalies arising under this act. If a man died in 1933 and left his family to carry on his farm; if his family are unable to pay their debts, they cannot apply under this act; but if the man happened to die a year later, his family could apply under this act. Surely the family needs just as much help when the breadwinner happened to die in 1933 as when he died in 1934. Why any definite cut-off date? The thing is preposterous to my mind. If a man who incurred debts from 1920 on can in his lifetime apply and get the benefit of the act, why cannot his widow apply and get the benefit of the act in order to stay on the land and help support her family? To make any distinction between 1933 and 1934, whichever might happen to be the year in which the man died, is an anomaly in the act which I submit should not be there. There is no reason for it, Mr. Chairman. I do not think the private members of this house are so busy that they would not be glad to give their time to correcting some of the anomalies under this act.

It has been decided by one of our courts that the very heart of the proposals that are now being made by our present boards of review in Saskatchewan, namely, that in the event of crop failure certified by the sheriff of the district, payments shall be postponed, is beyond the jurisdiction of the board of review.

If that decision is upheld in the higher courts, hen all these orders made by boards of review subsequent to those made by the first board are not valid, and practically every single farmer under these boards is now in default for two or three years, depending on the number of crop failures in the particular case. Surely we are sufficiently interested in the farmers of western Canada and in their plight, at least to make sure by an amendment to the act that the board of review has the power to delegate the right to the sheriff of the district to certify to a crop failure so that there may be a postponement of the payments due that year. If the decision I have mentioned is upheld in the higher courts and we do not act in this parliament and explicitly give the power to the board and make that power retroactive, I venture to say that every farmer who has got an order from the second and third boards of review in Saskatchewan will be found in default.

As a matter of fact, what has already happened is this. It is the very case where the ruling to which I have referred was made. There was a crop failure and the farmer got his certificate that there was a crop failure. Then there was an attempt to foreclose. The farmer showed that under the proposal of the board of review he was not in arrears because he had the necessary certificate which postponed the payments due that year. The court held that the sheriff had no right to give that certificate and that the board of review had no right to delegate its powers to the sheriff to give a certificate of crop failure. They held that therefore the farmer was in arrears and made an order accordingly, and the man is being foreclosed to-day on his That is something in which we in western Canada are bound to be interested. When a man gets an order from a duly authorized board of review and has met his payments under that order, we should stand behind the order of the board of review and see that that man is not thrown off his farm.

I realize that the minister is very busy and wants to get this bill through so that he may proceed with other work, but we are all not as busy as the minister and I contend that this whole problem might very well be submitted to a committee. If the east is not interested in this question, at least we in the west are interested in it. When it was definitely provided that the act should expire except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, it was realized in this parliament that we had a problem that had to be met, and when we from those western provinces ask for the act to be so amended as to fit our needs, parliament, I submit, should be good enough to agree to that request and to deal with the problem we have.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister, in reply to the suggestion that has come from several members from the west, said that at this late date we should not be trying to alter the act. May I point out that the suggestions I made to-night I made in 1937 and again in 1938, asking for this very thing. So it is not something new that we are asking, nor are we asking for it at the tail end of the session, but we have asked for it year after year in western Canada because we realize the injustice that has been done to a certain group of our people.

The minister referred to the figures I gave regarding Saskatchewan income and attempted to wave them aside, saying it would be interesting to have the figures for 1938 and 1939. The Sirois report covers up to and including 1937 only. But I have a statement from the dominion bureau of statistics giving the index figures for all farm products, not just for Saskatchewan but for all western Canada, showing the decline there has been in prices, and the decline would be more accentuated in the case of Saskatchewan. I find that in 1936 there was a drop in the index commodity figure price to 69.4; in 1937, 87·1; in 1938, 73·6; in 1939, 64·3; in 1940, 70.0. In other words, from 1937 to 1940 there was a drop of 18.1 in the index commodity figure for agricultural products. So the situation has not bettered but has grown worse. When I quoted these figures to the minister I was quoting them in relation to the base year, 1926, when farm income was $257,630,000. to show the tremendous drop there has been in the income of those who are called upon to meet the terms of proposals made under this act.

We are not dealing now merely with a matter of statistics, although statistics show a difference of 17 per cent in the reductions. But we are dealing, as someone has already said, with personalities; the personnel of the board appointed in December, 1936, was of a totally different type from the personnel of the previous board, and the second board tackled the question with either a better knowledge of conditions or a much more courageous approach. The fact of the matter is that the people who came under the first board were treated differently from, and did not get as good a proposal as, the people who have subsequently come under the benefits of this legislation.

I am not going to labour the matter, except to say this as I sit down. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others have been stressing the fact that in no small part Canada's contribution towards the successful prosecution of this war will be agricultural products. Agricultural commodities cannot be produced if large sections of people on the land are burdened down with debts which they cannot possibly hope to meet. Unless these people can see some way out, we are going to have thousands of men flocking to the cities and into industry-just the problem Great Britain is facing at this moment. If we are going to keep the young men on the farms in western Canada, we must deal with this debt situation; and I entirely agree with the hon. member for Swift Current that the western members at least would be glad to give their time in the mornings in committee to see if we cannot work out, irrespective of our differing political views, something which will solve the problem of the debt-ridden prairie

I agree with the minister when he says that this suggestion that a board shall rehear cases which came before the first board will not cancel the whole difficulty. Of course I had not that idea in mind. I suggested that it would deal merely with one little group. If we open up the question before a committee of this house, we shall have to go to the very root of the matter; and the root of the matter is this, that in each one of these contracts should be inserted a crop failure clause providing that if in any year the amount received by the farmer was not in excess of a certain number of bushels or dollars per acre, in that year there would be no interest payable, and interest would not accrue during the years when there were crop failures.

If the farmer, as this bill contemplates, is to be kept on the land as an efficient producer, the House of Commons either now or later must face this problem. I hope the minister, even though he cannot give consideration to further amendments at this time, will at least take cognizance of the representations which may have been made to him from various parts of this chamber, and he might make a reference to the committee on agriculture or to a special committee of this house to study the whole question of the prairie farmer in relation to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I rise to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham). The situation in Saskatchewan has been placed before this committee by several hon. members from that province who have spoken. At no time has it been more necessary than at the present to mobilize agriculture. That fact has been stressed over and over again by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Agriculture cannot be mobilized in Saskatchewan—and I think that statement applies generally to western Canada—until in the first place a fair and reasonable price is given to the western farmer. The western farmer has no objection to the various interests—munitions manufacturers and other manufacturers—receiving a fair profit. To-day, however, the price of agricultural products all over western Canada is such that the farmers are in a condition scarcely better than they were in a few years ago. The only method whereby they can secure a measure of justice and be kept upon the land is through the proper operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has mentioned that to-day different considerations govern the board of review in our province from those followed by the first board of review. When the first board was set up, in 1934, it had to enunciate certain principles upon which it would proceed. It had no precedents upon which to go. Apparently there was no real desire as between the creditors and the debtors to cooperate. But in process of time, by December 1, 1936, some precedents had been formulated. Then a new board of review was set up, and from that day onward—and the same principles are being followed by the board recently appointed —the whole principle behind the administration has been the necessity of so adjusting debts as to enable the farmer to remain upon the land.

I appreciate the argument that there must be a finality to all things. There were dealt with in Saskatchewan prior to December 1, 1936, 1,401 cases; and I venture the opinion that, of the debtors concerned, not more than 100 are to-day in a position where they can carry on. Under the principles which guided the first board of review the write-off was small. It was believed to be emergency legislation. There was no guiding plan to follow. I can see no reason why, if the minister should be unable to see his way clear to amend the act as suggested by the hon, member for Weyburn, the whole matter of agricultural debt should not be referred to a committee on agriculture. As pointed out by the hon, member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), there are to-day, in the operation of that act, anomalies which, if continued, will nullify the act itself. One of the courts in Saskatchewan has decided that any proposal made which permits of an extension upon the certificate of a sheriff is inoperative. If that judgment is upheld by the court of appeal, it will mean this, that whenever a farmer in Saskatchewan, through crop failure, gets into default under the proposal which has been made, he places himself in a position where he may be foreclosed.

The farmer is not responsible for drought conditions and for low prices. The necessity of mobilizing agriculture was never more important than it is to-day. Under the act anomalies exist which have been pointed out; and my suggestion is this, that the whole matter be referred to a committee on agriculture, to the end that western agriculture will have an opportunity to present a collective viewpoint before a committee of the house, and those anomalies which exist in the act to-day may be removed, in order that the western farmer will be able to contribute something to the empire and at the same time assure for himself a reasonable living and a chance to enjoy some of the better things of life.

Mr. PERLEY: The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) to give consideration to reopening and rehearing the proposals made by the first board of review in Saskatchewan has provoked a discussion which has been worth while; the time has not been wasted. There is considerable merit in the suggestion made by the hon, member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham); and with his experience in appearing before a committee of this house, he no doubt could bring to a committee information that would be worth while. I would remind the committee that at the last regular session of parliament in 1939 a special committee of this house was set up to consider the mortgage bank bill. They sat for some considerable time; representations were made before them by practically every interest in Canada; the whole debt problem of Canada was pretty well threshed out before that committee, and finally the Central Mortgage Bank Act was passed by parliament. I would suggest that if the machinery provided in that act were put in operation, it would take care of debt adjustments not only in western Canada but all over Canada. I think the minister might make a statement to the committee at the present time with respect. to that act. Has any consideration been given to putting that act into operation, because I think it would bring about a general readjustment of the debts, in particular the mortgage debts of western Canada. would be worth while; it would put many thousands of farmers on their feet and give them heart to go ahead. The machinery is there. Has the minister considered putting the Central Mortgage Bank Act into operation?

Mr. WRIGHT: I should like to point out to the minister, who stated that this act was only temporary, that as long as the price which the farmer in the west receives for his product bears no just relationship to the price of the commodities he has to buy, this act is going to be necessary. It is not a temporary thing at all. We should do something about the matter at this time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister replies, I should like to say a word. I had no intention of participating in this debate, but something said by one of the hon, members for Saskatchewan prompted me to speak. He intimated that the east is not interested in this legislation. I should like to tell him that when this legislation was introduced in 1934 by the then Minister of Finance, it was because there was an appreciation on the part of eastern members of the problems not only of their own farmers but of western farmers. I was myself one of those who was consulted by the then Minister of Finance with respect to some such measure as this. In view of the fact that this is bankruptcy legislation-and the basis of jurisdiction in this matter is bankruptcy under section 91 of the British North America Actin view of the fact that we already had on the statute books of this country legislation authorizing the manufacturers, merchants and traders of Canada to go to court with a scheme of arrangement, and that these facilities were denied by that bankruptcy legislation to the farmers of Canada; and in view of the plight in which the farmers of Canada found themselves as a result of the depression, I felt that it was only fair and just, and so recommended to the minister at that time, that the farmers of Canada should have an equal opportunity with the merchants, manufacturers and traders of Canada to make an arrangement of their liabilities.

No one ever considered for a moment that this was anything but interim legislation, if I may use that term. No one ever believed that the conditions then obtaining would continue for such a long period. If we had thought that, we might have taken a longer view. But they have continued. I am not going to express any opinion with respect to the merits of the proposals made here to-night by hon. members from the great province of Saskatchewan; but I have this feeling and have had it for a long time, and it may surprise some of our western Canadian friends as coming from an easterner; I have felt that a country which could produce one billion dollars of new wealth in a normal year was a country that was worth attempting to save. I still hold that view. I have never yet opposed in principle anything that would go [Mr. Perley.]

to ameliorate the condition of the people in western Canada. I had an opportunity to see for myself the heart-breaking sight of what happened in the west as a result of drought. I urge the minister to give consideration to the representations that have been made by these hon. gentlemen to-night. I am not in a position to express an intelligent opinion as to what he should do, but I ask him to give the matter consideration.

I must, however, remind him that there is another point of view with respect to the farmer, one that I must say had not presented itself to me at the time that the legislation was introduced. It has been found in my own province—and I speak of that province because I know the conditions there—that the effect of the legislation has been to dry up credit to our farmers.

Mr. CRERAR: The same is true in the west.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I live in a country town; it is a small city, but it is in the midst of a beautiful agricultural country. We are the only town of any consequence within a radius of thirty miles or so. It is the centre of a large community of 60,000 to 70,000 people. Naturally the condition of the farmers there is known to the members of the legal profession. From the day I started to practise in Fredericton down to the present time, the bulk of our business has been with the farmers, and it was largely a business of lending money; not institutional lending, but lending by private individuals on mortgages. To-day you could not get a private individual to lend a dollar to a farmer in the whole of that county of York unless the person who had money to lend was actuated by something other than purely financial reasons. For that reason, weighing in the balance one consideration against the other, I am of opinion that our farmers in eastern Canada at all events, are suffering because of this legislation. In 1934 I think it was a good thing for them; to-day I think it is a bad thing. and I want to get rid of it as quickly as possible in the interest of the farmers themselves.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wish to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) and recommend to the committee a careful study of appendix No. 4 to the dominion-provincial relations report. On page 86 there is a picture of the reduction in farm income in Saskatchewan. During the four years commencing in 1926 the figures are as follows:

1927.									197,300,000
1928.		٠.							220,200,000
1929.									150,000,000

Then for the last four years, the figures are as follows:

1934	 	 		10.7	$23,000,000
1935					31,900,000
1936					55,800,000
1937	 	 	 	 	19,200,000

In order that we may understand just what this means, let hon. members try to think of their own income being $197 a month in 1926 and then reduced to $23 a month in 1934.

During the same period we find that the farmer's cost of operating has remained fairly constant. On page 88 there appears an extensive table listing the farmer's cash operating expenses, itemized under various headings such as taxes, interest on mortgages and other debts, tractor fuel, repairs, and so on. We find that taxes, for example, have remained fairly stable, with a slight decrease in later years. Interest on mortgages and other debts has been as follows:

1927					22,510,000
1928			 		24.120.000
1929					25,910,000

From 1934 on, however, the figures are as follows:

1934									$26,540,000
1935									26,360,000
1937									19,730,000

As other hon, members have indicated, creditors as well as debtors realize the necessity of making drastic reductions. According to the table on page 86, the sums paid in the form of interest on bonds and dividends to individuals in Saskatchewan have remained fairly constant during the entire twelve-year period surveyed by the commission. The figures are as follows:

1926									$2,200,000
1927									2,400,000
1928									2,500,000
1929									2,600,000

The average for the remaining four years is well over $2,000,000 annually. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) would be performing a valuable national service by referring the question of the whole debt structure of western Canada to a special committee of this house, in order that the debt-ridden people of the west might have some security.

Mr. QUELCH: I find myself thoroughly in accord with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and the proposal of the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) that the whole question of the agricultural debts of western Canada be referred to a special committee. As the minister is well aware, the government of Alberta has passed many measures in the last few years to deal with the question of debt, because I think it is well recognized that this act does not deal adequately with the debt problem. I must add that as long as the farmers of western Canada are compelled to produce for less than the cost of production, as they have been in the past, and until such time as we have an adequate form of crop insurance, just so long will the farmers of the west go deeper and deeper into debt. As some hon, members have said, this cannot be looked upon as temporary legislation, because as long as these conditions exist, legislation will have to be kept in operation to deal with the situation. If the federal government will not pass that legislation, then we shall find the western provinces doing it, which will further complicate the situation. So I seriously ask the minister to consider referring this matter to a special committee of the house.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the committee is entitled to a word from me. I do not want it to appear, as may have been indicated by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), that because the minister happens to be busy, he is not disposed to take full account and full cognizance of all that has been said.

I think I realize as fully as anyone in this house—and that is saying quite a bit, having regard to the humble position I happen to occupy in Canada at the present time-just how vital the interests of the farming community of this country are to the economic life of the nation. I also realize to some extent what one would almost think, after hearing my hon. friends to-night, had not been recognized at all; that is, that the governments of Canada-and here I am speaking not of this government particularly but of successive governments-have been by no means indifferent to the representations which have been made with respect to the importance of the agricultural community and the agricultural industry of this country. I have been in this house before, and sometimes I think it would be only fair to all of us as Canadians if hon. members, while painting one side of the picture, would at least endeavour to give some indication that they realize the other side of the picture as well; and that these general statements which have been made, which would almost indicate that the agricultural industry has been totally neglected by the governments of this country, are perhaps hardly founded in fact.

There has not been very much said tonight to indicate that any attention whatever has been paid the farming community by any government of this country. From what my hon, friends have said, one would almost feel that there has been total indifference exhibited to that great industry. That has not been so, as hon. members know; and the fact that we do not accept amendments to certain sections of the particular legislation before the committee to-night does not by any stretch of the imagination mean that this government is not fully alive to the importance of the industry and to the necessity for its maintenance if we are to have any sort of balanced economy in the Dominion of Canada.

I presume hon, members realize that this debate has gone far beyond the confines of the bill and that the particular section we are discussing at this moment provides that the words "the said" shall be struck out and the word "this" inserted instead. However, this has provided an opportunity, which I am sure has been welcomed by hon, members as I can assure you it has been welcomed by the government, for an expression of opinion with regard to the vital problems and vital interests of the agricultural industry.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) asked me to say something with regard to the central mortgage bank. I do not think anything can be added to the statement made shortly after war broke out. When I assumed the portfolio I now hold, this whole matter of the mortgage bank came up for consideration. After giving it the fullest thought and study, the government felt in the first place that in view of the fact that the Central Mortgage Bank Act was founded on a long term valuation of practically all the lands in all the municipalities of our provinces, particularly our western provinces, and that conditions in war time were not those under which a sound and stable valuation could be made, it was impossible from the point of view of either the debtor or the creditor to fix a valuation which would be fair without the criteria generally present in comparatively normal times. That was the first thing.

The second was that Canada, as hon. members know, undertook under that legislation a very heavy load in the way of the issue of debentures, and it was felt that in view of the commitments which this country faced it was not a good or feasible time for it to undertake the tremendous obligations which would be involved in the issue of debentures under that act. The act is not dead; it is suspended. A certain amount of work has been done in connection with it, and the studies are being pursued. I cannot give the committee any definite indication as to when the act may come into full operation; I can only give the reasons for the act not being put into effect so far. I think the committee can understand and appreciate, about as well as I can, when conditions may arise which will enable us to go forward with that act.

I am not sure that any other matter was referred to. The only other thing I did want to say was this, that hon. members will realize that a bill similar to the one we are now considering, has had, shall I say, a rather stormy passage on previous occasions.

I come back to the purpose of the act, which is to extend its benefits, whatever they may be, to Manitoba, having regard to the special conditions which exist. I would ask hon. members to unite with the government in endeavouring to see that this particular piece of legislation is put through for the purpose for which it is proposed. I assure them again that on behalf of the government I have taken full cognizance of what has been said in connection with agriculture generally, and that they can be absolutely sure that those representations, and others which we have in mind, will not be forgotten.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, and read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Ralston moves that the said bill be passed and that the title be as on the order paper. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, there is one point I should like to have on record, and I believe I may make the statement on the motion you have just put.

Some hon, members before recess asked me to put on record certain tables from which I have quoted. I find that both tables are in the printed report in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which I presented the first day of this session. The tables to which I refer are Nos. 7 and 7A. If hon, members will accept the tables appearing in the report, a certain amount of printing in the debates will have been saved.

Motion agreed to and bill passed.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION
ORDER IN COUNCIL OF AUGUST 11, 1939, TO HAVE FORCE AND EFFECT OF STATUTE

Hon, J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the order in council respecting civil service superannuation dated 11th August, 1939, shall have the same force and effect as if sanctioned by act of parliament on the said date.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has this order in council been tabled?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to see it. Would the minister make an explanation?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the last session of the last parliament the house appointed a committee to consider amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act. That committee made a report which, if I remember correctly, contained twenty-eight recommendations, and was adopted by the House of Commons. The government explained at that time that it would not be possible at the session then in progress—that was about a year ago—to introduce legislation carrying out the terms of the report. It was intimated, however, by the government that it might be possible to put some of the recommendations into effect by order in council. Accordingly on August 11, 1939, an order in council was passed carrying out a few of the recommendations contained in the report. The law officers advise that the order in council should be ratified by legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On that theory would it not appear that the order in council was illegal, and that there was no statutory authority for it? I was not here at the time, but I am interested in the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not gone very deeply into that question, because in so far as the order in council was beneficial to contributors, it was an act of the government which, I imagine, was not illegal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why the necessity for legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it contravened the provisions of the act. But in so far as the order in council was not beneficial to the contributors and in so far as it imposed heavier burdens upon them than otherwise would have been imposed by the act, that difficulty was met by taking an agreement from the contributors. A paragraph in the order in council refers to the agreement, and when the bill is introduced it will be seen by hon. members that from now on, contributors will not be asked or expected to sign an agreement to make contributions in excess of those provided for by the act itself.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the sections in the order in council be identical with those of the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is proposed to have a very short section in the bill stating that the order in council shall have the same force and effect as if it had been sanctioned by act of parliament at the date on which it was approved. There is just one section in the bill. There is a subsection which deletes the paragraph of the order in council providing for the taking of agreements from contributors, because hereafter that will not be necessary, because it will be covered by the act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the order in council lengthy? Would it be possible to put it in Hansard?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be possible, but there will be a much quicker way for members to gain access to it. It is an appendix to the bill; and as soon as the bill receives first reading, every hon. member will be able to see the order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that we accept the resolution, have first reading of the bill and then let it stand so that hon. members may read the order in council. I received the bill only a moment ago, through the courtesy of the minister.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1940.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1940.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, this resolution precedes the introduction of a bill to provide for the extension for another year of an agreement between the Minister of Public Works and the city of Ottawa for the payment of $100,000. For a number of years past the federal government has been contributing certain sums of money to the city of Ottawa for certain purposes. These contributions started as far back as 1889. Since that time contributions have been made each year by the federal treasury to a commission which was organized to look after certain things in Ottawa, such as maintenance of streets, maintenance of bridges and so on. In 1919 it was decided that the federal government would contribute $75,000 to the corporation of the city of Ottawa. The idea was to make a settlement of a claim which had been made upon the Department of Public Works based upon certain representations by the city of Ottawa that the federal government should reimburse the city for the opening up of certain streets, loss of taxes, protecting certain public buildings against fire, supplying water, sprinkling services and so on. In that year it was decided that in consideration of this sum of $75,000 a year the city of Ottawa would abandon all claims against the federal government. I cannot remember at the moment the total of the claim, but it was considerable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They preferred to take cash.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. If my memory serves me aright, in 1925 this amount was raised from $75,000 to $100,000. The agreement has been renewed each year since that time, and the purpose of the bill which will be based upon this resolution is to authorize the Minister of Public Works to renew the agreement for another year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This resolution is a hardy annual. I do not think there is any objection to extending this agreement from year to year, but I hope the minister will regard the settlement as more or less final and conclusive. I am aware that the Ottawa newspapers and the Ottawa citizens make allegations from time to time that it is not enough. I never could understand the basis upon which this amount of $100,000 was arrived at. The agreement has never been itemized, but I understand that it covers the expense of keeping up certain approaches to these buildings, the supplying of certain water -not all the water used by the government by any means-and other items. The government also pays considerable amounts for taxes and water rates on buildings belonging to foreign legations and other buildings of that kind. I would not have it go out that this is the only amount that the government contributes to Ottawa. The bill to be founded on this resolution does not cover the vote to the commission which has jurisdiction over the driveways.

Mr. CARDIN: No; that is $150,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we can well renew this agreement for this year, but I do trust that the extravagant demands which are made from time to time will not be repeated. Different governments, having regard to their financial ability, have contributed to the beautification of this capital [Mr. Cardin.]

city. That is quite proper, but at the same time I wish the government would give consideration to the beautifying of its property in other capital cities of this dominion. I have in mind my own beautiful little city where the government owns a whole block right in the heart of the business section between the river and the main business street. In that block is located the customs house, the post office, what used to be called the officers' quarters and a public square used in connection therewith. These grounds are not adequately lighted and are not always kept up; in fact, they are much neglected. I hope the minister will give consideration to spending just a little money on these grounds in the city of Fredericton.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could the minister give us some idea of how much money the government spends each year in Ottawa? There is this $100,000, and then the minister referred to another $150,000 for the federal district commission. I have in mind the expenditures for tearing up the sidewalks and laying the pavement around parliament hill which were borne by the government.

Mr. CARDIN: Apart from this $100,000 which is paid to the city of Ottawa under this agreement, the federal government pays to the federal district commission, which is under the Department of Finance, the sum of $150,000 for maintenance of parks and other beautification projects in the city. Then we pay for the water used in our buildings at the rate of 13 cents per 1,000 gallons up to 200,000 gallons, after which the rate is 10 cents per 1,000 gallons. Under this agreement it is the responsibility of the government to maintain Connaught bridge between the parliament buildings and the Chateau Laurier. We maintain also Laurier avenue bridge over the railroad tracks and a bridge crossing the river to Hull from the western section of Ottawa. We also maintain the pavement and sidewalks on Wellington street from Connaught place to the old Perley property. These are the annual expenditures that the government makes in Ottawa.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said, this was not a settlement of a detailed account. The Minister of Public Works of the time discussed with representatives of Ottawa their famous claim for compensation for loss of taxes because the government had taken over properties which formerly had been paying taxes to the city. The amount of $75,000, now $100,000, was settled upon as a sort of compromise; and in that compromise the Minister of Public Works and the government of the day accepted responsibility for looking after the services I have indicated, the maintenance and repair of pavements and certain sidewalks. So this sum of $100,000 is really the result of a compromise between the government and the city. As to the suggestion of the hon leader of the opposition, I will do the best I can to throw a little light into that dark corner which he has indicated exists in his city.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the federal government pay taxes on its buildings in other cities?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And no compromise has been arrived at with other cities?

Mr. CARDIN: No such rule applies elsewhere than in Ottawa. The government of the day and all succeeding governments, I suppose have felt that they should be a little more generous to Ottawa as it was the capital of the country. Besides, if the argument that is made holds good, it is much stronger in Ottawa than anywhere else because in this city the federal government has taken over large areas of land and thus deprived the city of loss of revenue from taxation which they were previously collecting. The city of Ottawa thought, and still think they are justified in claiming compensation from the government, particularly on the ground of loss of revenue through the taking over of property by the federal government. Although we have very important property in other cities, it is not comparable at all with the property that has been taken over by the federal government in Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe the minister has correctly stated the principle on which this demand is made, and I think we ought to be fairly generous with the city of Ottawa having regard to our other commitments. The only question I have to ask the minister is whether there has been any enlargement or extension of the arrangement with the city, or is this identically the same agreement as in other years?

Mr. CARDIN: It is identically the same, and has been so ever since 1920.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I appreciate the reasons which the minister has given for this agreement and the fact that the city of Ottawa is losing taxes on property taken over by the government. At the same time we must not lose sight of the fact that were it not for these large federal public buildings and other governmental expenditures here, the city of Ottawa would not have its present taxing power on individual citizens. I have always thought that this $100,000, as well as the $140,000, paying for the water, fire service, inspection and a few things like that, was a substantial sum of money to give to Ottawa. Not only that, but all governments have kept in view the beautifying of the city, and over the years have spent millions of dollars in beautifying Ottawa. It just strikes me that at a time when money is going to be so necessary for war purposes this might be one place where we might save a few dollars for the purposes of the war. It is very necessary that we should keep our dollars for the prosecution of the war, and I think every effort should be made by the government to cut down on expenditures which are not immediately necessary so that more money may be available for the war I would also point out that there are many public buildings in Toronto, Montreal and other cities which receive no compensation whatever from the government, nor do these cities have any federal moneys spent on them for their beautification. So this I think is one place where we might cut down on our expenditure and save a few dollars for war pur-

WHEAT COOPERATIVE MARKETING

CALCULATION OF INITIAL PAYMENTS TO SELLING AGENCIES—AUTHORITY FOR PAYMENT OF LIABILITIES AND ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 20, to amend the Wheat Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1-Short title.

Mr. PERLEY: I propose, Mr. Chairman, at this stage to make a few general remarks on the bill. I stated on the resolution that I did not think there was any real demand for such a measure last year, nor do I think that Mr. Justice Turgeon's report recommends any such legislation. In fact, quite the contrary. He stated that the wheat board act was sufficient, especially in case of an emergency. There is nothing in this bill to encourage the cooperatives to keep prices up.

If this bill were confined to producers' organizations only, I would have no particular objection. The bill of last year did not help the individual producer. We have other acts, the wheat board act in particular, which provide every facility for the marketing of grain, and our western pools are well organized.

I stated also on a former occasion that the act discriminates to a certain extent against independent private dealers, track buyers and so on. The amendment provides the minister with certain means of, so to speak, winding up the affairs of the cooperatives; and it defines certain terms, such as "producer" and "selling agent". But I would remind the minister that last year when the bill was before the committee, he stated definitely that it would provide a system of marketing grain which would be different from what we already had, and he remarked that it was more by way of an experiment. It seems to me, considering the statement he made on the resolution the other evening, that the experiment has not proved to be of much value. It has not been a success. We might also take into consideration the comments made on the measure last year by the western committee when they were here. I believe they met the minister and discussed another of the measures which he placed on the statute books. I hold in my hand a submission termed the "second submission" of the western committee to the government and to the minister. In dealing with what was then known as Bill No. 82, it states, at page 14:

With reference to this bill, the committee wishes to say that it is its unanimous opinion that under existing conditions the method proposed is impracticable and no organization could undertake to cooperate successfully under such a selling agency as contemplated in the face of present marketing uncertainties.

We have the same uncertainties this year, and I regard the comments made by the western committee on the bill last year as proof that there was no real demand for it, certainly not from such organizations as the committee represented.

I am not going to labour the point. I have no particular objections to this amendment; it merely helps the minister to wind up the affairs of the cooperative or to arrive at some system of adjusting losses. But at the proper time, after these other amendments have been disposed of, I purpose moving an amendment to add a further section to the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Last year the producers of western Canada sent down a committee to interview the government regarding the wheat legislation which was then under discussion, including the bill, then known as No. 82, which it is now proposed to amend. It is [Mr. Perley.]

perhaps worth while quoting what that committee had to say to the government at that time.

Mr. GARDINER: It has just been read into the record.

Mr. COLDWELL: Was it read? I could not hear it. If it has just been read, there is no need to read it again. But I was going to add that I have heard during the past year, or at any rate during the past six or eight months, arguments vindicating the position taken by the western committee at that time, and I believe the very fact that a greater amount of grain has not been marketed under this plan than was indicated by the minister confirms the correctness of the statement made last year.

One thing I should like to ask the minister is this. In the explanatory note he quotes paragraph (g). Last year it read:

(g) "primary producer" means a person engaged in growing spring wheat in any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia.

I notice that the limitation has been left out. I assume, therefore, that this amendment will not be limited as in the other bill, but will apply to all parts of Canada where spring wheat is grown. I see no objection to that, but I should like to see the whole of our wheat marketing under a board representative of the producers themselves and with a guaranteed minimum price which would provide an adequate return. As I said the other day, producers of grain and other farm commodities in the other countries at war are all more or less protected in that manner. The nations at war realize that under these conditions agriculture is a basic industry as far as food production and the winning of the war are concerned. Only yesterday in Great Britain-where the circumstances are of course somewhat different from those in this country-the government, I notice, has provided an increase in the money standards of those engaged in agriculture. The money wage of farm labourers was increased by twelve shillings a week, to forty-eight shillings a week. That is a recognition that the people who work on the land are entitled to a better standard of living than they have been receiving all through the years. I remember that when I was a boy in the old land the man engaged on the farm was the lowest paid worker in the country. I can recall quite well a time when the farm labourer in Great Britain was paid twelve shillings a week, and out of that he kept himself and his family. It seems to me that in this country we have not yet arrived at the stage where we realize that the man on the land is entitled to a proper, reasonable and decent standard of living.

I should like to see the whole marketing scheme for agricultural products placed under the appropriate boards. As far as marketing western wheat is concerned, particularly at this time, speculative marketing should cease and the grain exchange should be closed. I was disappointed at the announcement in the press that the exchange is to remain open until Aug. 15. I understood a week or ten days ago it was likely to be closed in the course of a few days; however, unfortunately, the government has decided otherwise.

If we are to have a cooperative plan of marketing, let it be cooperative. This particular plan is not in reality a cooperative plan. We in this country have got into the habit of calling all sorts of privately-owned concerns "cooperative organizations"—which in my opinion is a wrong use of the term "cooperative."

I should very much like to see the government reconsider this whole marketing system, particularly in view of the war situation, and place the entire marketing of, we will say "wheat" in this particular, under a board representative of the wheat producers themselves and satisfactory to the people who produce the product.

I repeat that I do not believe this act meets at all the needs of the western situation, and the experience of the past year thoroughly vindicates the opinion expressed by the so-called Bracken committee when it was here just over a year ago.

The CHAIRMAN: May I draw to the attention of the committee that the rules of the house provide that in committee we should confine the discussion to the subject matter of each clause? We are now on the short title. I did not want to interrupt hon. members who were speaking, but it will make for more orderly debate if we adhere to the rules. Hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity of speaking to the next clauses. I think clause I should carry unless some hon. member finds fault with the title.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was speaking to the title.

The CHAIRMAN: The short title is not the title of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Primary producer.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In connection with paragraph (g), I notice that in the 1939 act "primary producer" is defined as a person engaged in growing spring wheat. Now "primary producer" has a much wider interpretation. Would the minister explain why the interpretation last year was so restricted?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year's act defines wheat as:

(j) "Wheat" means spring wheat grown in any of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia.

It was not necessary to insert that a second time. The bill means the same as last year's act; only this definition of wheat was repeated in paragraph (g) last year. There is an amendment to this section which I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move:

That section 2 subsection (g) be amended by striking out the word "mortgagor" in line thirteen and substituting therefor the word "mortgagee".

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STIRLING: I take this new wording to mean that it is to be applied to all provinces in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: No; I explained a moment ago that in the original act, section 2, paragraph (j) defines wheat as meaning spring wheat grown in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia. In this bill "wheat" means spring wheat grown in those provinces.

Mr. STIRLING: If the names of the provinces are not mentioned in this new section—

Mr. GARDINER: Wherever the word "wheat" occurs, that definition applies.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In the act of 1939 "primary producer" was restricted to the person actually engaged in growing wheat. In this bill apparently it is extended to the landlord, vendor or mortgagee.

Mr. GARDINER: Paragraph (j) of the original act defines "wheat" as I have just stated. So that it means the same now as before.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But in the original act there was no provision for the landlord, vendor or mortgagee. Why is provision being made this year that was not made a year ago?

Mr. GARDINER: After this legislation was passed last year, the definition of "primary producer" in the wheat board act was changed to include persons who held grain under, say, the one-third crop agreement. One man delivers two-thirds of the crop because he grew it; another man obtains one-third under his rental agreement. This wording simply provides that both the renter and the person who rents can deliver their grain, as well as others who are in similar relationship.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the two of them are restricted to a total of 5,000 bushels.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the meaning of the words in line twelve, "shall be deemed to include any person entitled, whether as landlord, vendor, mortgagee or otherwise or by contract or operation of law, to wheat grown by a producer or to any share therein"? What do the words "by contract or operation of law" contemplate?

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose any agreement entered into between two persons whereby one becomes possessor of grain.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By purchase?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure whether it would cover purchase. It might be a share crop agreement. I think that is mostly what is covered.

Mr. PERLEY: How about a non-resident landlord?

Mr. GARDINER: Non-residence would make no difference if he is entitled to a share of the crop.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is meant by section 10, "coming into force"?

Mr. GARDINER: Section 7 of the original act, just as it was. That should not be dropped.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to propose an amendment, moved by myself, seconded by Mr. Ross (Souris):

That another section be added to the bill, numbered 6, to this effect:

"6. This act shall not be operative after the 1st day of August, 1940, other than for the purpose of winding up transactions on agreements entered into as between the minister and the cooperatives for the crop year 1939-40."

Mr. GARDINER: Speaking to the suggestion, I should like to reply to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) a few minutes ago. A statement which has been read to the committee as having been presented to the government by the Bracken committee last year is, of course, a correct statement of that submission at that time. But if hon. members will examine Hansard I think they will find that when this legislation was placed on the statute books last year, I stated to the house that members of that committee, first, those representative of the pool organizations and, following that, those representative of other elevator companies, came to me; and I think in fact I had placed on Hansard last year written statements from them suggesting that if this legislation were put on the statute books they would make use of it if circumstances so warranted. The legislation as then drafted, was placed on the statute books, the only difference now being the difference we have made by changing the different sections that have been changed by the committee tonight, and the last section of the bill as indicated here was a section to the effect that this legislation would come into effect only on proclamation. The only reason why it has been in effect during this last year is that every one of the pool organizations asked to have it brought into effect. The government did not bring it into effect of its own volition.

Mr. PERLEY: That is last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The grain year we are now in. Every one of the pool organizations and every one of the thirty-seven elevator companies organized under it asked to have it brought into effect. On the request of those organizations it was brought into effect, and they have made use of it. It would not be going too far to say that a considerable amount of wheat has been marketed under it this year, when one takes into consideration all the circumstances. Of the wheat that was delivered between the time the farmers started to thresh last fall and, say, December 1, I would say 95 per cent was delivered when the price was below 70 cents a bushel; and during that period of time any farmer who delivered wheat to an elevator could get 70 cents a bushel from the government for up to 5,000 bushels. Therefore there was no particular reason for him to deliver any of his wheat to an organization where he could get an advance of only 60 cents a bushel. So during all the time wheat was under 70 cents, naturally deliveries were made to the wheat board; but during the part of the season when wheat was above 70 cents, a few farmers may have decided that they would like to try out a cooperative organization which they themselves controlled rather than simply market through a board set up by the government.

So I say there is nothing strange about the fact that not very much wheat was delivered under this legislation this year. Perhaps the fact that any wheat was delivered is more a matter that should be explained than the fact that there was so little of it. Some other year, if farmers knew they could always market their wheat at, let us say, 80 cents a bushel or more, and there was one piece of legislation under which the advance would be 60 cents if the farmers set up their own organization while there was other legislation under which the government would take the wheat and pay in advance of 70 cents, then there might be a choice made as between the two if the farmers believed that in all probability all the wheat would be sold at about the same price and they wanted to find out which system would be the better under which to market their grain.

Someone has said that this is not a cooperative measure. In reply I would say that with the exception of this there is no system of handling grain in Canada to-day that does provide for cooperation. We have wheat pools, it is true, but they are all operating elevator companies which are just like any other elevator companies.

Mr. COLDWELL: They are owned by the farmers, though.

Mr. GARDINER: They do not take the wheat, except under this bill, on a cooperative plan. They are receiving wheat like anyone else, for delivery to the wheat board. In other words, they are operating the handling facilities in order to take wheat from the farmer and deliver it to the wheat board, just as any other elevator company does. So there is no other legislation under which anyone is operating a cooperative. This legislation says to any farmer, "You can drive into any elevator that has organized itself, or along with others, to set up a central selling agency; and when you drive into the elevator you can say that you are going to take a 60 cent advance and put your wheat in with the wheat of all the other farmers who do the same thing. That wheat will go to the central selling agency which you select," and the farmers who send their wheat to that central selling agency are cooperating with one another in taking an advance of 60 cents and allowing their wheat to be sold by that agency. Each one is benefiting by the fact that they have cooperated in so marketing their grain and may obtain an interim payment, which is provided by the bill, with a final payment later on.

In other words, this legislation sets up a system entirely different from any other system under any other piece of legislation, and it provides a means of testing out three different methods, if our legislation and our controls remain as they are to-day. First there is the wheat board system; then there is the cooperative system under this legislation, and finally there is the open market system as it is operated through the grain exchange. These three systems have been in operation during this last year; and I repeat that with the price below 70 cents during the greater part of this year, nothing could have been expected but that most of the wheat would have been delivered to the wheat board. The farmers saw no advantage in doing anything else this year, except in regard to a small part of the wheat.

I suggest that this amendment should not pass at this time and that this statute should be allowed to remain in operation. If no one wants to use it; if as my hon, friend suggests, the wheat pools do not want to use it; if none of the elevator companies want to use it and none of the farmers want to use it, the solution is very simple. They do not need to deliver wheat under it; then it will not be used. They do not need to form central selling agencies under it; then these agencies will not be set up. The agreements are for only one year; and if none of these organizations want to take advantage of this legislation, they need not make the agreement next year. But I do not know why the hon. member for Qu'Appelle suggests that we should deprive these people of the right to use it if they so desire. Simply to read a statement made to the government before this legislation was drafted, to the effect that someone did not want it then, is not at all an argument, since most of the grain handling organizations in western Canada have used the legislation this year. Apparently they did want it; it was not used until after they had asked the government to bring it into operation, and they have been using it from that time up to the present.

Mr. FAIR: Would this act be used if the limitation of 5,000 bushels had not been placed in the wheat board act?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know that I am in a position to answer that question. It was used, and the 5,000 bushel provision was in the act. I understand that some wheat was delivered under this legislation even apart from the 5,000 bushels.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am inclined to think the minister cannot make a virtue out of the fact that some of the wheat handling organizations in western Canada have made use of this statute. There are two very simple reasons for that. The first, of course, is that if their competitors were going to use it, they had to use it as well. Take the pools as an illustration. If the line elevator companies were going to come under this legislation the pools had to be prepared so that if one of their customers came in—

Mr. GARDINER: The first to ask to come in were the pools.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Quite so, because the pools knew perfectly well that many of the line elevator companies would come under this legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: No; it was not in operation at all. The act had to come into force by proclamation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But they knew it had been passed.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not in operation, and they asked to have it proclaimed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the pools knew it had been passed.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend is putting up an argument to the effect that the pools had to come in because they knew the elevator companies were going to come in. The elevator companies did not suggest coming in until the pools came along and asked to have this act proclaimed, and they formed their organizations later.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister knows perfectly well, as most of us do, that the pools were in this position. This legislation had been passed by the house, and they knew that the line elevator companies would most certainly avail themselves of it. The pools had to be able to give their customers the benefits of this legislation, if those customers thought there were benefits under it.

The second reason why some wheat was sold under this legislation is that there was a 5,000 bushel limitation clause in the Canadian Wheat Board Act. When representations were first made by the so-called Bracken committee, it will be remembered that the first draft of Bill No. 63, as it was then called, had no 5,000 bushel limitation clause in it. But when later a new draft was brought in and the initial price raised to 70 cents, there was a 5,000 bushel limitation clause, which meant that the farmers in the heavy wheat areas had some wheat which could not be marketed through the wheat board, and must be marketed elsewhere. They had the choice then of either the open market, or this legislation, and I imagine most of them chose this legislation. That explains why probably the pool and some other organiza-

Mr. GARDINER: Not "most of them"—only three million bushels.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister has just said he is surprised that under the circumstances as much wheat was sold under this legislation as has been sold. I suggest [Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

that if the 5,000 bushel limitation clause had not been in the Canadian Wheat Board Act last year, there would have been even less wheat sold under this legislation than actually was sold. I do not think there is any doubt about that. And if the government were prepared during this session to take that 5,000 bushel limitation clause out, and put the initial price somewhere closer to the cost of production, the chances are that this legislation would not be used at all. As a matter of fact, it would have very little value.

Mr. GARDINER: Just by way of correction, I have checked the records showing the order in which these central selling agencies were formed. The first organization to form a central selling agency was the United Grain Growers Limited, a farmers' company which operates out of Winnipeg; the second one was the Saskatchewan Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited of Regina and the third was the Alberta Wheat Pool, of Calgary, Alberta.

The first purely private elevator organization that was set up under the legislation was set up one month, all but one day, after the Saskatchewan pool came in. I make this statement so as to clear up the suggestion that this was a matter of the elevator companies being likely to come in, and then other people asking to come in. The farmers' companies came in first, and one of them was in a month or six weeks before the line elevators came in. Another one was in a month before, and a third one about three weeks before.

So that the position is reversed, in so far as the order in which they came in or the order in which they desired to come in is concerned. When they asked permission to come in under the act, the act was proclaimed, and these different organizations set up and operated under the legislation. It is true that probably one of the reasons for that was the fact that certain people were not able to market under the wheat board a certain part of their wheat, i.e. that part which is over 5,000 bushels. Some of that was delivered to the organizations set up in this manner. That may have been one of the chief reasons for wheat being brought in this year, but it is not a reason for saying that this legislation has now had a fair trial before the people of western Canada.

There was no opportunity during the last year to have used this legislation at all, except for the purpose outlined a moment ago. And having been proclaimed for that purpose, there was probably some other grain put in during that period of time. In order to give it a proper trial, it would have to be operative when the price of wheat throughout a whole year was higher than the advance either under this legislation or under the wheat board act. Then farmers would know that they were going to get more than 70 cents, no matter what happened, and they could then make the choice as to whether they would take 60 cents in advance, under their own organization set up in their own way, or whether they would take 70 cents advance under a government organization. There must be some test as to which of these pieces of legislation they desire most. There was no test during this last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am partly in agreement with the minister in respect of what he said during the latter part of his observation. But I point out to him that a mere recital of the chronological order in which these different organizations came in under the scheme does not destroy the validity of my argument. The minister is not suggesting for a moment that line elevator companies ever came in merely because pools had suggested their intention of coming under this legislation.

Mr. GARDINER: You were suggesting the reverse, and I am straightening you out.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, I was not. I am suggesting that first of all these pooling organizations already had their own pools or associations. It was no value to them to come in under this legislation. They already had such organizations. But they knew that an act had been passed, and they knew that many of their customers with an excess over the 5,000 bushel limitation, would want somewhere to market it, and that many of them would desire this cooperative form of marketing. As long as the 5,000 bushel limitation clause remains, there will be a field of operation for this act.

Mr. GARDINER: For that reason this amendment should not be passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But I do urge the minister to take into consideration the acceptance of delivery of all wheat by the wheat board at a guaranteed price. As suggested the other day, there are three ways of marketing wheat: There is the open market, the cooperative way and the wheat board. In a time of war, and in view of the fact that Great Britain is taking steps to buy wheat through one agency, in company with France, and the fact that Australia has nationalized the handling of wheat, this would look like a good time for the Canadian government to take steps to buy all wheat through one board, to market through that board and to dispose of these other facilities.

Mr. GARDINER: In respect of that I suggest that this legislation does not in any way interfere with any decision the government may wish to make with regard to the placing of all the wheat under the wheat board. I believe it was yesterday the state-ment appeared in the press, and I think it was announced to-day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), that the Winnipeg grain exchange would not be closed until the end of this crop year, namely, until August 15. But no announcement has been made as to anything that will happen beyond that date. In other words, the method of handling the n w crop has not been announced by anyone. The matter is still under consideration as to what will be done. However this legislation in no way interferes with the decision one way or the other in that connection. The legislation as we are suggesting it now simply means the present crop year and makes it possible for us to make a payment if there happens to be a loss. Last session we neglected to put that section into the bill. The only reason why we have got it down this session is to make it possible to make a payment if there happens to be a loss on the wheat handled this year. If action is taken, it is suggested this legislation will not operate -or any other legislation—as long as we are taking full delivery of the wheat.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw attention of hon. members to the fact that we are discussing the amendment, which states that the act shall not be operative after August 1, 1940

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have been discussing whether the act should be terminated, and whether it has fulfilled any useful function.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment. Mr. Perley has moved that another section, to be known as section 6, be added to the bill, and that that section shall state:

This act shall not be operative after the first day of August, 1940, other than for the purpose of winding up transactions on agreements entered into as between the minister and cooperatives for the crop year 1939-40.

Therefore the question before the committee is whether this act should be operative after the first day of August, 1940.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Exactly.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of the amendment and all that has been said, I feel quite satisfied that these cooperatives are simply cluttering up our wheat marketing system. I am convinced that the present wheat board has not functioned as it was anticipated it would. As has been pointed out by previous speakers, we have three systems of marketing our wheat; and I think the sooner we eliminate the cooperatives, close up our grain exchange and have the wheat board functioning as most people in the west anticipated it would, that is, have our wheat handled at a price which will compensate the producer for his labour and investment, the better off we shall be as a nation. We want a price set which will compensate the producer for his work, a price considerably higher than has been discussed this evening. We should like to see these other departments eliminated as soon as possible and have the wheat board handling our wheat as it should be handled.

Mr. PERLEY: I do not think it is necessary to labour this question any further. The statement which the minister has made proves conclusively that no useful purpose will be served by this legislation. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and others have presented arguments which substantiate the stand I am taking and the amendment I propose. I should like to have had more information from the minister, but possibly he would be out of order if he answered all my questions. I should like to know the number of bushels handled by each one of the cooperatives, the Saskatchewan pool, the Alberta pool, the United Grain Growers' and others. According to the statement he gave the other day, the Saskatchewan pool handled most of the 3,000,000 bushels, and this would seem to prove that they came in purely for the purpose of accommodating many of their customers who were not members of their pool but who came in with 5,000 bushel lots. We should have had more information with respect to the standing at the present time of the cooperatives and the extent of their holdings. It may be that they will secure such profits that there will be no need for this bill to provide payments for losses. I think it quite possible that the minister knows how much wheat these cooperatives hold at the present time, and a statement with respect to that would be quite interesting. Surely he has this information, especially when he is putting through legislation such as he proposes. I am prepared to allow the matter to go to a vote or whatever else the minister proposes to do.

Mr. WRIGHT: All this bill does is to authorize the setting up of a number of small pools. This is an entirely wrong principle, and I do not think the farmers of the west are in favour of it.

Amendment (Mr. Perley) negatived on division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed. [Mr. J. A. Ross.]

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair,

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

213. Customs and excise divisions—Customs excise chemical laboratory, $42,145.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is this laboratory, what is its purpose and is it the only one in Canada?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): I simply wanted to call a non-contentious item for the purpose of getting into supply. This laboratory is on Queen street in Ottawa and is the only laboratory of the Department of National Revenue. It discharges a varied number of functions. These chemists analyse a number of different substances, notably sugar and liquids alleged to contain alcohol.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): As the minister knows, similar work is carried on by the chemical laboratory of the Department of Pensions and National Health, under the authority of the drugs act. There is a lack of expeditious conclusion in connection with the analyses which the minister's department makes. This tends to hold in bond shipments of goods which must be analysed before release. When a shipment of goods arrives in Canada, it remains in bond until instructions are received from the laboratory that it meets the requirements of the act. As an example I would refer to shipments of gelatine which have come in from Australia. These are in bond and will not be released until such time as the departmental chemists say that they are in line with the restrictions laid down by the act. The net result is that the importers cannot fill their orders even though the goods are actually in the country.

I bring particularly to the attention of the minister the delay, amounting sometimes to as long as five or six weeks, in getting a simple analysis made of the nitrogen content of products of that kind, and I would ask him to give the committee some detail as to the personnel employed in the Queen street branch, the degree of cooperation which they have with the Department of National Health and what cooperation they have with the chemists in the national research council. I think it is high time that the work of the chemical laboratories in the different departments in the city of Ottawa was consolidated. As the situation is now, each department seems to have a laboratory of its own answerable to its minister, and in turn the laboratories in the other departments are answerable to their ministers, the result being a great duplication.

of work and of ideas. There should be some consolidation of the work which is being done by the various chemical laboratories in the city of Ottawa.

I plead particularly that during these difficult times, when it is by no means easy to get bottoms to bring to this country products which we do not manufacture in Canada, they should be cleared as quickly as possible, and not be held up for weeks awaiting simple laboratory tests by the department.

I have no objection to this particular increase because I know the work which the department is doing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure that I can remember all the questions which the hon. gentleman asked me. He spoke of gelatine. The analysis of gelatine is made by the chemists of the Department of Pensions and National Health, under pure food legislation, and not by the chemists of the Department of National Revenue. I am aware, however, that in saying that I am giving some support possibly to his own argument that there should be more unity in organization for chemical analyses by the different government services.

I am not aware of all the reasons that were given to parliament in 1928 or 1929 when the national research council was set up, but I believe it was thought at that time that the national research council could be so organized that these different laboratories could be brought within it. But that has not been done, and when attempts have been made to get all the laboratories under one roof, very strong reasons have always been presented against it by the departments.

Mr. STIRLING: By each department.

Mr. ILSLEY: By each department concerned. So far as our own laboratory on Queen street is concerned, I have no reason to think that they are not doing efficient work, or that the government is not getting good value for the money expended there.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the procedure followed in prohibiting the admission of patent medicines into this country. I imagine that would come under this department. I know of cases of people who probably were getting some benefit from certain medicines they had been importing and they felt that their prohibition was a deprivation. On the other hand, I know from personal experience of alleged patent medicines coming in for which large prices were charged and the people who were taking them were more or less victimized. These patent medicines were brought in from the United States. I am thinking of one which the department prohibited of which I had some personal knowledge. I was wondering how these decisions were arrived at, and if this is the particular department which deals with that matter. To what extent is prohibition invoked to protect the Canadian public from being victimized, and also what measures are taken to ensure a supply of medicines which people are in the habit of feeling that they need.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not familiar with all the acts, such as the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act and others which are administered by the Department of Pensions and National Health, but if under that act or under the regulations made under the act by the Department of Pensions and National Health a particular medicine is prohibited, we act as policemen and see that it is not delivered to the importer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the minister's department do the laboratory work?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the minister would give me an answer to the question I raised concerning what seems to be a new restriction laid down by the department. Previously reputable firms could clear their goods, a sample only being retained by the department for subsequent analysis. If later it was found not to be in accordance with certain standards, the goods were put in the category where they belonged and extra duties levied. Reputable firms then had an opportunity of arguing their case, checking the analysis, and if they felt they were at fault they paid the extra charges. But in the last year, under some new regulation or restriction, no goods can be cleared until the analysis has been completed. Would the minister give us some information on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon, gentleman will give me some instance he has in mind, I will check up and see whether that is the case. I am not able at the moment to say whether that is the general practice or not, or whether it is done just in some particular instances. If the hon, gentleman will give me a case he has in mind, I will find out whether there is anything wrong with the rule or practice.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I would not say that there is anything wrong with the rule or practice, but a departmental rule or regulation has been laid down with which the minister may not be familiar. The case I bring forward is this. Gelatine was coming from Australia to Canada, and delivery was promised to the customer at such and such a time when it was known that the gelatine was in the bottom and on the way over here. When it gets here, it is held up under some departmental regulation or restriction for five or six weeks, a condition which did not obtain previously, with the result that the importing company find themselves in a very difficult position, having said that the goods would arrive at such and such a time. Then when the goods arrive, they are unable to clear them. In these difficult times particularly, when it is difficult to get shipment of goods of a class or kind not produced in Canada, I think the department should be a little lenient in the case of reputable firms which are supplying us, say, from Australia at the present time.

What are the extra chemist and the extra clerk doing in the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: These two officers are not really additional. They are temporary officers who have been made permanent, so that the list comprises fifteen instead of thirteen permanents.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): There is extra money required to pay a salary of $1,800. Was this man on the staff last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an additional junior chemist who was previously employed as laboratory assistant. The increase in permanent salaries of $3,210 is on account of this additional junior chemist being employed at $1,800 per annum because of the increase of work; a temporary clerk at $720 being made permanent; and statutory increases, $690. The chemist is engaged in the ordinary or general work of a chemist at the laboratory.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I wish to make one general observation with regard to the employing of extra personnel in government departments. We are now at a very difficult time; we have established a new ministry of munitions and supply; we shall probably have to establish other ministries before we go much further. I have in mind also that before long there will probably be a ministry of home defence. All these new ministries and departments will surround themselves with different classifications of assistants and help of one kind and another; with the net result that, when this difficult conflict we are now engaged in is over, we shall find our civil service expanded to a very great degree. I would say to the Minister of National Revenue, whose department is more or less constant and perhaps not so much concerned with the prosecution of the war as is, for instance, the ministry of defence for air and the ministry of munitions and supply, that such departments as his should be careful to the extreme to see to it that they do not add too many permanent employees to their personnel, so that when, after this conflict is over, we start to break down the very heavy civil service we shall then have, he will, rather than have his department loaded 100 per cent with permanent employees, be able to leave room for some of those who will be coming out of other departments which have been temporarily established.

We find throughout the estimates that personnel has been added in practically every department. Some departments, for example public works, have declared a holiday as regards expenditures. That department is not concerned in this item, but I use it as an illustration. Yet the civil service personnel in that department still carries on at the same old place. On general principles I object to the increase in the Department of National Revenue of even one chemist and one clerk, having in mind the day when we shall probably have to dissolve other ministries which are now being set up. It seems to be a habit in Ottawa that, once an appointment is made, that appointee surrounds himself with a messenger, a stenographer and a clerk, as well as office space, and is there seemingly for all time. That state of affairs obtains in this particular phase of the work; the minister in his statement admitted it.

We have chemical laboratories in all departments, although the same kind of determinations is being made and the same apparatus employed for making those determinations. We find one on Elgin street, another at the other end of the city, yet another on Queen street. If you go into these laboratories you will find the same chemical equipment in each. Yet that equipment is probably not in use for more than five per cent of the time, and the actual space where the determination is being made is probably not occupied for more than five per cent of the time. That condition obtains in the Department of Agriculture, in the forest products laboratory, in three or four branches of the national research council, in the department of national health, and I do not know how many other places. It constitutes a waste of space, a waste of equipment, and to a degree, undoubtedly, through lack of coordination and consolidation of services, a waste of the time and talent of the highly-paid employees who are doing this technical work. In other words, of the men equipped with knowledge to make the determinations to which I have referred, some are out at the experimental farm determining the nitrogen content of No. 1 hard wheat; others having the same knowledge are to be found in the forest products laboratory on Elgin street determining the values of nitrogen and ammonia in the breaking down of the products analysed in that institution. They are highly trained and expensive men, using costly equipment, but not all used in an efficient manner.

I realize that this is a very small item to complain about. I know that the minister's department is doing good work. He is furnished, I had almost said "blessed", with an efficient staff, particularly his senior officers. They are able men, but they should have an eye to business and to present conditions, and the minister should pursue the idea which was brought to his attention some years ago, and see if he cannot effect some consolidation, not only to cut out the waste, but so that when the time comes to demobilize extra departments, there will be places and opportunities for those who are surplus elsewhere to find vocations in the civil service.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service-

1. Departmental administration, $120,005.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister explain the additions which have been made during the past year to this staff, particularly in view of the address to which we have just listened from the hon. member who is seated beside me?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): All the additions are shown on page 59 of the main estimates. The first one is a clerk—seven clerks instead of six. There is a reduction in stenographers, noted just above that item, from three to two. The next is an increase in stenographers from one to three. The next is an increase in clerks from two to three. This makes four more now than last year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are these extra employees being taken out of departments which are more or less defunct at the present time or doing very little. Two or three days ago I read in an article that the government contemplated taking clerks, stenographers and other employees from departments in which at the present time they are doing little or nothing, and putting them into other departments where there is an increase of work. For instance, were any of these taken from other departments?

Mr. GARDINER: Two of them were transfers from other departments, and two temporaries made permanent.

Mr. STIRLING: How is the minister able to say that telegrams, telephone and postage, and travelling expenses, will be successfully 95826—31 cut by $5,500, which apparently is just the amount by which he has raised salaries, from the deputy minister to the stenographer?

Mr. GARDINER: The cut in cost is largely on account of the use of air mail instead of telegrams.

Mr. STIRLING: Travelling by airmail?

Mr. MARSHALL: In 1938-39 the same grant was given of $120,000, and only $99,000 expended. Is the minister in a position to tell us the amount of the grant that was not used in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940?

Mr. GARDINER: In the departmental administration statutory increases account for $1,800, assistant deputy minister, $4,800. That is not an actual increase; a new person has been appointed at $4,800, but the assistant deputy who was superannuated was getting $5,400. Stenographers, grade 2, $1,080; positions transferred, $2,205; positions made permanent, $1,800, and adjustment of statutory increase, $15, make a total of $11,700. Then there is to be deducted from that, adjustment of vacant positions, clerk grade 4, to minimum of class, $120; position dropped, stenographer, $1,380, assistant deputy minister, $5,400, making total deduction of $6,900, which leaves a total increase of $4,800. That is the explanation of the first item. I can give the details of all right through if it is desired, but they are all made up in just that way, small increases and decreases.

Mr. MARSHALL: It is not my desire to get those figures, but the report of the auditor general for the year ended March 31, 1939, shows that the sum of $20,000 was not used. Of this amount of $120,005 for the year 1939-40, how much was not used? In other words, could we not have a saving of about $20,000 in these departmental expenses for the coming year?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed that the statement of the amount not expended out of last year's vote is not available until July 15.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Regarding the item of $16,140 for temporary assistance, what is the number of persons employed?

Mr. GARDINER: That is just continuing from where I was reading before:

Temporary salary statutory increa
to office boys		$ 330
Secretary to executive
New positions	٠.	3,720
Less:		$5,790
Positions made permanent		4,200
Balance		$1,590

Mr. NICHOLSON: The information I should like to have is the number of temporary assistants the minister had last year and the number he proposes to have this year?

Mr. GARDINER: In my own office the number last year was three, and it is three this year. In the general administration the number last year was twelve; this year, fifteen.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister did not answer my question as to how he is able to estimate a reduction of 35 per cent in travelling expenses.

Mr. GARDINER: We intend to have the travelling expenses this year cut to the very minimum because of the fact that it was necessary to cut $5,000,000 off our total expenditure this year out of $18,000,000, and in doing so we are cutting travelling expenses along with everything else.

Mr. STIRLING: Was the amount voted in 1939 all expended?

Mr. GARDINER: Not totally, but there was a much larger amount expended last year than will be permitted this year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am wondering what happened to that $20,000 mentioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). Does that come back to the money available to the department to be expended, or does it go into the consolidated revenue fund? Would the department have that surplus which it might use for some other purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there is nothing which was not spent last year that we can spend this year without having it revoted.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would rather this did not carry to-night because I want to ask about a number of matters. I should like to know whether the salaries of the officials under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act are included in this item.

Mr. GARDINER: No; there is a special vote for the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. This is only for the general administration of the department. There are other administrative votes as well.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

On the order for government notices of motion:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when the notice of motion to set up a committee to study orders in council passed by virtue of the defence of Canada regulations will be taken up? I have had inquiries from hon. members desiring to speak upon it. I understand the committee is ready to be struck, and I had hoped that the motion might have been considered long ere this.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to have a word with my hon. friend about the motion. I hope to give him a definite reply to-morrow.

EUROPEAN WAR

THE BATTLE OF FLANDERS—STATEMENT AS TO COOPERATION BETWEEN CANADIAN AND ALLIED GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): During recent weeks, the world has witnessed lightning war in all its fury and frightfulness. It is difficult to believe it was only twenty-five days ago that Holland and Belgium were invaded. We vividly recall the immediate heroic resistance of those two nations to the terrific onslaught of the Germans. We know how magnificently Britain and France responded to their appeal for aid. We have seen the German forces employing the full might of concentrated warfare, and, with incredible losses to their own man-power and equipment, crush Holland and Belgium and invade a portion of France.

The unexpected rapidity with which nazi Germany wrought her work of destruction was due to the most carefully prepared plans for invasion, to sudden action at an hour of her own choosing, and to the volume and power of her armaments. It was due as well to inability to coordinate in advance adequate plans of defence with the neutral countries, because of the over-scrupulous and excessive care with which they sought to safeguard their neutrality.

We would perhaps do well to keep in mind that in addition to all this the quick success of the invasion was due less to the unforeseen suddenness of the attack itself than to wholly unexpected incidents in meeting the situation.

The all but incredible means whereby the enemy effected a breach in the allied lines was announced to the world by Premier Reynaud, of France, on May 21st. Its consequences were being met by the most determined resistance when, on May 28, to the consternation of the forces in the field, and equally to the people of Belgium themselves, the king of the Belgians capitulated, and obliged his troops to lay down their arms. The already vulnerable position of the allied armies was thereby rendered even more perilous.

Seldom, if ever, and certainly never in modern times, has a military force been so beset by its enemies. Open to long sustained mass attack from three sides, and from above, with the enemy employing in fiendish fashion the most powerful weapons of modern mechanized warfare, the situation for a day or two appeared more desperate than any with which either Britain or France had, at any time, been faced.

The restoration of the morale of forces thus threatened with annihilation, and the evacuation of the armies thus entrapped and surrounded, has been the outstanding feature of the past week. We now have before us a full account of how these results have been achieved. The story is one of the great epics of history. If there was cause for grave alarm in the rapidity and rapacity with which the nazi forces made the headway they did, there is, in what has been subsequently witnessed of the combined actions of the allied armies, navies and air forces, even greater cause for belief in the ultimate victory of the allied arms. If there is one thing above another which the battle of Flanders has demonstrated, it is that in what the allied powers have displayed of effective cooperation, of initiative and resource, valour and tenacity, in these most critical of all days, we have grounds for believing that, as time goes on, they will be found more than equal to any set of circumstances and conditions that may hereinafter

During the period of time to which I have been referring, it is obvious that for military reasons it was not possible for the government to make any statement with respect to the disposition of Canadian military, naval and air forces brought about as a means of affording more effective cooperation with those of the allied forces overseas. I am now in position to make a statement, which of necessity must be general in its terms, but which will, I am sure, be welcomed by this house and by our country as evidencing the carefully planned cooperation there has been, at every stage, between the Canadian and allied governments.

First of all a word with regard to the Canadian troops overseas. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) has already given to parliament a statement with respect to the use it was intended to make of the Canadian troops in Norway, of their being in readiness for embarkation from Scotland, and of the circumstances which occasioned a change in the original plan. One reason for the change of plans has since become apparent in what has taken place on the continent.

Since the invasion of Holland and Belgium, our Canadian troops on more than one occasion have been at embarkation ports, under orders to join the British expeditionary force and the French armies in their desperate struggle in northern France and Belgium. On the most recent occasion, General McNaughton, accompanied by selected officers of his staff, carried out a personal reconnaissance of the battle area, and on his return rendered a most valuable report to the chief of the imperial general staff and to the war cabinet. That the Canadians were not dispatched was due entirely to the conclusion reached by the chiefs of staff.

As the possibility of the invasion of the United Kingdom itself has become more apparent, Canadian military forces in England are being employed in the way in which it is believed will best serve in the defence of England's shores, or in the reconstitution of a fresh field force in France.

The invasion of Holland, Belgium and France and the possible invasion of the United Kingdom has necessitated other means and methods for cooperation between our own and the British military forces. To mention only one, by way of example: We were asked by the British government if we could arrange to have some of our troops sent to the West Indies area, in order to free for service elsewhere some of the British regular forces stationed in that area. The request was immediately met. A contingent of Canadian troops was sent to the West Indies, convoyed part of the way by the Royal Canadian Navy. This Canadian contingent is now on active service there. Of other dispositions requested and being met, I am not free to speak at present.

The house has already been informed of the assistance given in the present emergency by the Royal Canadian Air Force to the Royal Air Force in Britain, through the dispatch and safe arrival of the advance party of a second army cooperation squadron. In order to speed up the supply of air personnel for active service, arrangements are in hand to dispatch overseas a fighter squadron, equipped with aircraft. A number of pilots recently graduated from Camp Borden, who were intended as instructors for the training plan, are also proceeding overseas.

To help meet the urgent requirement of planes, the government made available to the Royal Air Force part of the equipment which was in use, or on order, for our own air force, or in connection with the British commonwealth air training plan. This equipment included fighter planes now being used for home defence. Further fighters being manufactured in Canada for the Canadian government were diverted to the use of the United Kingdom government, also certain engines immediately available for dispatch overseas, and, as well, some Blenheim bombers which were in England ready to be shipped to Canada, and additional bombers which were on the sea en route to Canada, and which were sent back to the United Kingdom.

As the house is well aware, the filling of orders for aircraft of the types mentioned takes a long time. Some of the orders which are being filled at the present moment were placed a year or more ago. They have served to increase the number available in the United Kingdom in the present emergency. I have in my hand a communication recently received from the secretary of state for dominion affairs in which he makes mention of the fact that a number of aircraft—I shall not specify the particular craft or the number—due for delivery in Canada were en route at the time—I quote:

craft was made known to the Canadian government. We learn that the Canadian authorities have turned around the ship containing these aircraft, and I wish to express the thanks of the United Kingdom government for this very helpful action. May we assume the Canadian government will be prepared also to forego for the time being the delivery. . . .

Of a certain number of aircraft.

Such decision would be gratefully appreciated.

I may say to the house that the government ordered the ship containing the aircraft to be turned back without waiting for a request from the British government, and the communication which I have just read is one expressing the warm appreciation of the British government of that voluntary action on our part.

I come now to the special assistance which the Royal Canadian Navy has been able to give and is giving at the moment, not off the coasts of Canada, but in British waters. As a result of cooperation with the Royal Navy a rearrangement of forces has been put into effect whereby certain Canadian destroyers are now serving with the Royal Navy in United Kingdom waters. Their place has been taken by certain units of the Royal Navy assigned to service protecting our Atlantic seaboard. This rearrangement will, it is believed, have the advantage of making certain operations more effective. The house will readily understand the reasons why no further particulars can be disclosed at the present time.

I should like to read to the house the message which I sent to the senior officer commanding the Canadian destroyers shortly after they had left our shores:

In this hour when the skill, the strength, and the will-power of the combined allied forces are so greatly needed to cope with the diabolical warfare of a wholly unscrupulous and brutal foe, Canada will be proud indeed when she learns that, as the enemy pursues his endeavours to invade the British isles, destroyers of the Royal Canadian Navy have crossed the Atlantic to be in immediate association with the Royal Navy in the United Kingdom waters.

I send to you and to the men under your command the proud assurance that the government has every confidence that, in your resolute hands, the honour of the Royal Canadian Navy, the traditions which it has inherited, and which it has created, are safe and sure. This confidence will be shared with equal pride by all of Canada once the Canadian people become aware of the presence of Canadian destroyers in British waters.

You will be supported in your noble mission by the continued and utmost cooperation of all branches of the defence forces of Canada and by the single purpose of the Canadian people in this war. Whenever duty may call you, our thoughts and prayers will be with you all.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

In conclusion, may I say that what I have to-day set forth does not represent the extent of commitments which, during the present emergency, Canada has sought to meet in compliance with special requests from the British government. With respect to all three defence services there are other commitments concerning which it is not yet possible to make announcement, but which have been, or are, in process of being carried out.

May I say just a word with regard to the report that the Vimy memorial has been destroyed. I have been in communication with our high commissioner in London and the word I have received from him is that neither the war office nor the air ministry have any information regarding the Vimy memorial. The air ministry are investigating the matter. Up to the present time no word has been received which would confirm the report that the memorial had been destroyed.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we shall all be encouraged by the narration of events given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon and the announcement he has made with respect to Canada's participation. He was good enough on one or two occasions recently to inform me personally of what had taken place, and I hope he will continue that practice.

I have very little, perhaps nothing, to add to what the right hon. gentleman has said with respect to Canada's participation. But I should like to read to the house a short extract from the speech which the Right Hon. Mr. Churchill made in London to-day. This is in part what he said:

We shall never surrender and even if, which I do not for a moment believe, this island or even part of it, is subjugated and starving, then our empire across the seas, armed and guarded by the British fleet, will carry on the struggle until, in God's good time, the new world in all its strength and might sets forth to the rescue and liberation of the old.

In my humble opinion those ringing words constitute a challenge to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I add this word of information which I asked for just before I came into the house. The particular aircraft that were returned in the manner I have described when they were on their way to Canada were ordered by the Department of National Defence in April, 1939. It was not until the last week or two that it has been possible to get that order filled and, as I say, it was turned back to assist the British in the immediate crisis.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS—OPPORTUNITY TO CONSIDER ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Before asking my question it will be necessary for me to make, with your honour's permission, a brief statement.

An order passed by the house on May 21 provides that government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motion for the production of papers. It will be impossible under this order to consider private bills after their first reading. I quite understand that government measures dealing with the war must be given right of way during this session, but I trust that parliament is not going to refuse to give consideration to such an important private bill as the proposed act to incorporate the Alberta Provincial bank. The sponsors of that bill are the ministers of the province of Alberta. May I ask the Prime Minister if he will allow a day for the second reading and committal of that bill?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no desire on the part of the government to do other than to seek to accommodate other governments where that is possible, and certainly it will be a pleasure to me to confer with my hon. friend and see if it is not possible to make some arrangement for the particular measure he has referred to being considered at an appropriate time during the course of the present session.

WHEAT BOARD

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT AS TO GRAIN EXCHANGE REMAINING OPEN AND SALE OF WHEAT TO BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon, JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my hon. friend the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) referred to an article which appeared in one of the local newspapers to the effect that the Winnipeg grain exchange would remain open until the end of the present crop year, namely, July 31—I think my hon. friend used July 1 as the date, quoting from a newspaper—and also that 50,000,000 bushels of wheat had been sold by the Canadian wheat board to a buying agency of the British government. He asked whether I was prepared to make a statement on the matter and indicated certain points on which further details were desired.

The statement which I issued to the press on Saturday, and on which this article is based, was as follows:

The Canadian wheat board sold yesterday to the buying agency of the British government 50,000,000 bushels of wheat at a price considerably above the present market. The government has decided not to close the Winnipeg market at least for the balance of this crop year.

In answering further, I wish to state that the parties to this sale were the Canadian wheat board and the cereals import committee of the United Kingdom. There was no intermediary between the wheat board and the cereals import committee. The sale was made direct. It is considered that it would not be in the public interest to disclose the price.

With respect to the continued operation of the Winnipeg grain exchange, neither the British government nor the cereals import committee has made representations to have the exchange closed.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

REQUESTS FOR TABLING OF CONTRACTS AWARDED SUBSEQUENT TO APRIL 30

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth); Mr. Speaker, the press of June 3 recorded the contracts awarded up until April 30, and the total moneys were given. I would ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) when these contracts will be available to members of the house.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that I tabled a list of the contracts let up to the first of April, and those I think have been distributed. It is usual to publish the lists every two months, but if my hon. friend will signify that he wishes the distribution to be made monthly for a time, I shall endeavour to do it. It will mean a great deal of work, but I think we could do it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The information has been given to the press; surely we can have it.

Mr. HOWE: It has been the custom to issue weekly statements to the press and a summary of totals. However, there is some discrepancy between the summary of totals and the actual orders, because the totals refer only to contracts that have been duly authorized, whereas the statement covers orders placed.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

ACCEPTANCE OF AFFIDAVITS IN LIEU OF ORAL EVIDENCE IN CERTAIN PROCEEDINGS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Not necessary to prove official character.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is a very simple bill. It is to make clearer the disposition of an amendment which was made in 1938 by chapter 4 of the statutes of that year. Section 2 of that chapter provides:

Where by any statute of Canada or regulation thereunder provision is made for sending by mail any request for information, notice or demand by a department or other branch of the public service, an affidavit of an officer of the department or other branch of the public service sworn before any commissioner or other person authorized to take affidavits setting out that he has charge of the appropriate records, that he has a knowledge of the facts in the particular case, that such a request, notice or demand was sent by registered letter . . .

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Then the certificate of the post office that such letter has been registered is prima facie evidence that the request, notice or demand has been made.

This amendment has been requested more particularly by the statistics branch, which is frequently sending out notices or requests for information. If a prosecution follows because the parties have not acted as the law requires, it involves a great deal of expense to have officers of the department travel about the country to appear as witnesses. This was corrected by the statute of 1938. It was found advisable to add the present amendment, so that the official character of the person who makes the affidavit, let us say the head of the statistics branch, if it is stated in the affidavit that he is the head of the statistics branch, will be sufficient as prima facie evidence. The statute of 1938 would be valueless if it were necessary to bring that officer to prove in person that he was the head of the statistics branch. It is clear that this amendment is merely for the purpose of completing the amendment of 1938.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course this amendment carries one step further the departure from the common law principle permitting evidence to be given by affidavit. If it is merely for the purpose of omitting proof of the official character of the person making the affidavit it can do no great harm. On general principles I am rather wary of legislation of this kind, but if it is limited to the specific purpose to which the minister has made reference, I cannot see any great objection to it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is just to avoid costs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Does it apply only to certain officials, or has it a general application?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A general application to all the public service of Canada; because it may be that other departments, apart from the statistics branch, will send notices of this kind and have to prove them before a court of law. The amendment is intended not only to avoid travelling by the officers in question in order to appear anywhere in Canada, but to save costs to the person who is prosecuted, because in the long run the accused or the convicted person will have to pay those costs.

Mr. GREEN: What will be the effect on the criminal code ?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It does not affect the criminal code at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does this amendment arise in virtue of some difficulty which has come up in any case before a court?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, we were advised, without having had a judgment on the point, that some doubts had been expressed in the courts.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Not necessary to prove official character.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the same thing, and it is to amend another section of the same statute applying to banks. I think I had better read the section as it is:

(b) Where a cheque has been drawn on any bank or branch thereof by any person, an affidavit of the manager or accountant of such bank or branch, sworn before any commissioner or other person authorized to take affidavits, setting out that he is such manager or accountant, that he has made a careful examination and search of the books and records for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not such person has an account with the bank or branch, and that he has been unable to find such an account, shall be received as prima facie evidence that such person has no account in such bank or branch.

This amendment was enacted in 1938 at the request of the Canadian Bankers' Association and other people connected with banks, because they had to appear in hundreds of cases of prosecution for no-funds cheques. Under the law the branch manager of a bank on which the cheque had been drawn had to go personally and give his evidence. This amendment is for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of the attendance of the witness, in the same way as in the matter of public documents. Again, if the officer had to come to court to prove his official character this amendment of 1938 would be worthless. The present amendment provides that an affidavit given by the bank manager in which it is stated that he is a banker and the manager of that branch, will be prima facie evidence that he is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister will admit that the two amendments are not in the same category. The first has nothing to do with criminal prosecutions, but this is probably confined to such cases, and the amendment seems to me to be a substantial departure from the common law principle that where evidence is being given the witness should appear and be subject to crossexamination. There might be a mistake in the affidavit and it could not possibly be corrected if the affidavit were to be received on the basis of the amendment of 1938 and the present amendment. Such things might happen and so jeopardize the liberty of the subject. I hope the department gave careful consideration to this clause before they assented to the principle asked for by the bankers' association. I have seen it happen that these men have had to come forward personally to prove their official position; I think the rule was a good rule and should have been adhered to. However, this only carries the principle one step further.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there has been an error it was made in 1938.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Exactly. Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

REMOVAL OF CONVICTS FROM YUKON AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES TO GAOLS OR PENITEN-TIARIES IN THE PROVINCES

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Penitentiary Act and The Penitentiary Act, 1939, to provide for the removal of convicts from the Yukon and Northwest Territories to gaols or penitentiaries in the provinces, and for the payment by way of compensation to the provinces for the confinement of such convicts therein.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, this is merely to add the provincial gaols to the penitentiaries. As the law now is, when persons in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon are convicted and sentenced to penitentiaries they go, of course, to the federal penitentiaries. But when the sentence is only a gaol sentence they have to stay there and the lock-ups are congested at times, thus interfering with the healthful employment of persons undergoing imprisonment. This is to authorize the negotiations with the provinces so that convicts under gaol sentences in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon may be sent to a provincial gaol. We will pay the province the expenses connected therewith.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are no penitentiaries in the Yukon or in the Northwest Territories, but there must be a goal or gaols in one or both.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): These gaols seem to be rather primitive.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Penitentiary Act and the Penitentiary Act 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

EXTENSION FOR ONE YEAR OF INITIAL PERIOD DESCRIBED IN ACT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 23, to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1-Initial period extended.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister explain this?

Mr. HOWE: This is a very simple bill. Its sole object, as I explained when I spoke on the resolution, is to make the initial period beyond which rates for the carrying of mail are fixed automatically apply to the calendar year 1940 instead of the calendar year 1939. The reason is that the calendar year was not a typical year. The mail service for revenue commenced only on the first of March of that year whereas the passenger service for revenue commenced on the first of April of that year, so that for two months we operated without a mail revenue and for three months without a passenger revenue.

Hon. members who are familiar with the act will remember that it provides that passenger and express rates shall be competitive with similar services on this continent and that the mail rate shall be based on the cost of carrying mail in the previous calendar year. Were we to take 1939 as a year from which to fix the rate for the carriage of mail for 1940 it would be necessary to increase the rate per mile from its present level of sixty cents to a level of slightly over seventy cents. It is well known to Trans-Canada operators and to the Post Office Department that there is nothing to justify such an increase in rates. We are certain that at the end of 1940, instead of increasing rates we shall be able to lower the rate very materially below the level of sixty cents. We therefore ask that we be allowed to continue the present rate of sixty cents per mile for the carriage of mail and that the automatic feature of the act be allowed to apply after the end of the current calendar year.

Mr. GREEN: What was the deficit in 1939? I understand that Trans-Canada Air Lines had a deficit last year.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. HOWE: I have not the exact figures before me-it is usually the function of the committee on government-owned enterprises to make that examination-but we budgeted for a deficit of about $470,000, and actually the deficit was about $400,000. We had a slightly better year than the budget figures anticipated. This year we budgeted for an estimated profit of something over $300,000 and we are now running well over $125,000 ahead of our budget, so that it is expected that this year will return a very substantial profit from the operation of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The operating expenses include depreciation on equipment at the rate of 25 per cent, depreciation on all buildings and property at liberal rates, interest on capital invested, and all insurance charges, so that when we predict an operating profit, we mean a profit after all these charges have been paid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the effect of this bill be to extend further subsidies to Trans-Canada Air Lines for the initial period? The initial period is being extended for a year and the effect is to give them more money from the public treasury to carry them over that initial stage. If that is not the effect of the bill, I do not understand it.

Mr. HOWE: No-quite the reverse. The initial period provides that any deficit will be made up from the public purse. Last year, we estimated that the enterprise would be behind to the extent of some $470,000. We appropriated the money at that session of parliament but we did not actually use the whole sum appropriated because the deficit was less than we had expected. This year we are expecting a profit of $300,000, and the operating results are running considerably better than the estimate contemplated. In other words, our passenger service is much better than our estimate provides for. There will be no call on the treasury this year on behalf of Trans-Canada Air Lines, so that we shall have a profit on this year's operation basis, on the sixty cents per mile rate. Actually the position as stated by the leader of the opposition is the reverse of the fact. If we followed the act as it stands we should receive a higher rate for carrying the mail than under present circumstances. The actual cost of carrying mail spread over the entire year last year was slightly over seventy cents, and unless parliament changes the bill the post office would be obliged to pay us that rate for that current year 1940, which instead of giving us an operating profit of the size I have suggested would give us a still larger operating profit. It is simply that 1939 was not a normal year of operation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not a full year.

Mr. HOWE: Not a full year.

Mr. BROOKS: Is trans-Canada air mail being picked up by the feeder lines in Charlottetown, Halifax or Saint John, or does the mail have to go to a certain centre, Moncton or Montreal, before being taken up by air mail?

Mr. HOWE: If a letter or parcel bears an air mail stamp it goes to its destination by air mail by the most expeditious route. For example a letter addressed to Charlottetown would go to Moncton by Trans-Canada Air Lines, and by Canadian Airways from Moncton to Charlottetown. Similarly a letter from here to Victoria goes by Trans-Canada to Vancouver and thence by Canadian Airways to Victoria. A letter to Prince Albert would go by Trans-Canada to Regina and by Prairie Airways to Prince Albert.

Mr. BROOKS: Is air mail going west picked up by planes at Charlottetown, Halifax or Saint John? I can understand that mail going east through Moncton would probably go by air lines to these places, but is mail picked up by air lines in these places to go out to other centres?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The Post Office Department in each stopping place of any feeder line delivers the mail to the feeder line, which also has a contract with the post office for the carriage of mail, and the feeder line in turn delivers it to Trans-Canada at the nearest junction point.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is that rate sixty cents per hundred pounds per mile?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is a rate based on sixty cents per mile flown. There is some restriction on the total amount of mail carried per average plane—I think it is one ton per plane; but anything up to that is carried at the rate of sixty cents per mile travelled.

Mr. ROWE: How many planes are in operation by Trans-Canada now?

Mr. HOWE: Fifteen, all of the same type—Lockheed Zephyrs.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the rate sixty cents per ton per mile, or sixty cents no matter how much goes?

Mr. HOWE: It is sixty cents per mile. The post office is privileged to put on all mail up to a maximum limit which I believe is one ton per plane.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): To what percentage of passenger capacity is Trans-Canada now operating?

Mr. HOWE: The passenger ratio fluctuates in different parts of the system, but the average at the moment I believe is about sixty-five per cent. That means every seat full for sixty-five per cent of the mileage. In the United States it is considered that seventy per cent is the highest ratio that can be expected from planes that take care of shorthaul traffic. For example, a plane picking up a passenger at Regina may have travelled from Vancouver to Regina with an empty seat in order to accommodate that passenger. But I believe we established an all-time record in the month of August last when our rate of occupancy ran over eighty-two per cent.

Mr. ROWE: In view of the present emergency has the government given any consideration to the possibility or feasibility of utilizing these planes for military purposes?

Mr. HOWE: The government has considered that very carefully. These planes are of a type that is not useful for military purposes. They have a high landing speed and while the smaller Electras can be used for training purposes, this particular plane has not been approved by the air force for that purpose. But I can say that if there comes a time when fifteen planes are more important for the defence of Canada than for the movement of passengers and mail, they will be diverted immediately to that purpose.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that Trans-Canada Air Lines operate a pilot training school at Winnipeg. Would it not be possible to expand that school and use it for the training of pilots for military service as well?

Mr. HOWE: The training of an air line pilot is very different from the training of a military pilot. Both go through an intensive course; indeed I think if anything the Trans-Canada course is stiffer and longer than the military course. But the military authorities assure me that they could not accept Trans-Canada pilots without considerable additional training in military work, and I can say that Trans-Canada will not accept military pilots without considerable training in the technique of airway operation. So that the school at Winnipeg could scarcely be used for both purposes. Another school is being established nearby for military work, and I think no purpose would be served by trying to combine the two.

Mr. GREEN: What I had in mind was having the Trans-Canada school expanded to take on the training of war pilots as well as civilian pilots.

Mr. HOWE: The two courses of training are quite different. There are schools for each purpose at or near Winnipeg, and there seems to be no purpose in trying to combine the two. An instructor in the Trans-Canada Air Lines school would not be qualified to instruct in the military school, and vice versa.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the basis of the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, if there is a deficit the post office increases the rate for mail the following year; in other words the postal rates are on a compensatory basis. Last year the question was raised whether the rates for flying air mail in the bush country of the north should be on the same basis. At that time I think the minister explained that the government were looking into the possibility of providing a fair rate for northern air mail rather than continuing the competitive rates which have been in force since the inauguration of air mail in the north. What is the present situation in regard to this northern flying?

Mr. HOWE: This of course is a matter for he Post Office Department; it is one in which the Department of Transport is not concerned. There is a bargain between the post office and the operators of those services. In general the rates in the bush country are on a different basis entirely—a basis of so much per pound. For services supplementary to Trans-Canada, which are also a matter of bargain, there is no great discrepancy in the rate. The difference between Trans-Canada and feeder line rates usually represents a difference in the cost of operating the equipment. Equipment which is smaller and cheaper to operate is generally used on the feeder services, and the rate reflects that to some extent. As far as northern flying is concerned the rate is the rate fixed by the operators themselves. There is a great difference in rates; I think some pay very well and others are in my opinion too low. Nevertheless they are a matter of contract made under the Post Office Act, and so far no steps have been taken to abrogate those contracts, although in one or two instances examinations have been made.

Mr. GREEN: The suggestion was that a fair rate should be set by the board of transport commissioners. Has anything been done along that line?

Mr. HOWE: Study has been made but nothing has been done. The whole situation affecting northern flying is in a very unsatisfactory state, owing to the slowing down of exploration and the provision of better surface transportation. There has been a dropping off of traffic in the north, and some radical step must be taken to adjust the service. We have been trying it out by agreement among the operators themselves. Failing that, however, some further steps must be taken.

Mr. POTTIER: What was the approximate mileage covered by Trans-Canada trunk lines in the last year?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the report of the Trans-Canada Air Lines with me, but it was tabled a few days ago. From memory I would say that about two million miles had been flown.

Mr. POTTIER: Have there been any fatal accidents during that time?

Mr. HOWE: No. In that time Trans-Canada Air Lines has never injured a passenger in any way, nor has it seriously damaged any of its equipment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It had been expected that the eastern or Atlantic terminus of the Trans-Canada Air Lines would be at Halifax. I understand however that any further action in that connection has been postponed until the air field at Halifax has been perfected. Meantime a feeder line is operating between Halifax and Moncton. When is it expected that the Trans-Canada Air Lines will use Halifax as an eastern terminus?

Mr. HOWE: As no doubt my hon, friend is aware, at the moment Nova Scotia is a restricted zone for civil flying; with the exception of mail planes, no flying of civil aircraft is permitted in that province. The restriction applies to the use of the Dartmouth airport. It had been fully intended that that airport, which is adequate for all types of planes and for instrument landings, would be used by the Trans-Canada service. The field is not available at the moment, for obvious reasons. A large number of military planes are stationed at that point, and it is not considered wise to permit the ordinary traveller to gain admittance to the field. Therefore the service is using the old municipal airport, which is not capable of development to any higher standard than it has now attained. We believe the type of aircraft flying to that point is the best that could make use of that airport, and we see no possibility of using more adequate facilities until military needs are less pressing than they are at the present time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is, the feeder line plane does not operate out of Dartmouth; it operates out of Halifax city?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But it is the expectation of the minister that the eastern terminus of the Trans-Canada Air Lines will eventually be at Halifax?

Mr. HOWE: We expect to fly Trans-Canada Air Lines into Halifax at some time. Unfortunately, if I were to go farther than that I might indicate that we might have three or four termini down there. I am sure I would be asked similar questions in respect of Saint John and Charlottetown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Meantime we are doing very well at Moncton.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the policing and guarding of airports under the Department of Transport?

Mr. HOWE: The policing of airports, except in respect of military establishments which would be under the Minister of National Defence, is under the administration of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was at Malton airport a short time ago, and it seemed to me that anyone could walk in or out. I may be wrong, but it did seem to me that there was not sufficient protection around so vital a spot. I imagine the airport at Toronto island is being policed by the city of Toronto, although I am not sure about that. Even there the premises did not appear to be sufficiently guarded. For instance, as one enters the Toronto island airport he is confronted with a sign stating, "No cameras allowed," yet many people inside the gates were carrying cameras. People were coming in by boat, from all sides, and these were the people with the cameras. Certainly the guarding at Malton and Toronto island airports does not satisfy

Mr. HOWE: So far as I am aware, the airport at Toronto island is not used for military purposes, and I doubt if there would be any guards at that point. On the other hand the Malton airport is adequately guarded. My hon. friend, with his open and honest countenance, probably would not be troubled; had he a more suspicious appearance I am sure he would have been made aware of the presence of guards.

Mr. GREEN: Two years ago the minister took power to invest in a transatlantic company which was to be under the joint operation of Great Britain, Ireland and Canada. What has happened to that plan?

Mr. HOWE: Canada was a junior partner in that enterprise. It was arranged that after the service had been shown to be satisfactory and had been fully established, Canada would acquire a twenty-four and a half per cent interest in the enterprise. All the preliminary operations were to be carried out by Imperial Airways, at the expense of the government of the United Kingdom. During the summers of 1938 and 1939 Imperial Airways conducted regular operational flights, and it was the intention to provide suitable equipment and to begin regular operation in 1940. Unfortunately the requirements of warplane construction have made it impossible for Imperial Airways to make available the planes which would be necessary for that route in the current year. Unless some new arrangement is made I presume that the flying of the north Atlantic by Great Britain will not be undertaken until the end of the war.

Mr. GREEN: How much to date have we invested in the plan?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing. Our investment was to have been made after the regular services had been established. So far the service has not been established.

Mr. GREEN: Are there any plans under consideration for a transpacific service?

Mr. HOWE: I think any civil aviation enterprise within the British empire is being held over for the duration of the war. Every plant in the empire capable of turning out suitable craft is engaged in war production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These points on which the minister has been good enough to go into detail are new to me because I was not here when some of the service was established. May I ask what is the total investment of Canada in Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the extent of its personnel?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry my hon. friend did not ask that question yesterday, because at that time I tabled the information he now seeks. My recollection is however that the total investment in Trans-Canada Air Lines is something under $4,000,000. Trans-Canada Air Lines does not own landing fields; it rents them—that is, it pays for landing rights on fields owned either by municipalities or by the federal government. It owns its own planes, hangars and telephone equipment. The radio beam is furnished by the federal government. The personnel stands at about four hundred.

Mr. ADAMSON: On flight 5 of last Saturday from Ottawa to Toronto the plane, flying on the beam, flew over Malton airport. However it found a considerable amount of fog on both runways and had to return to Ottawa and remain here during the night. The airport at Toronto was free from fog at the time, but the captain of the aeroplane said that he had not permission to land his ship at the island airport. I think a question of lights was involved, and there may have been certain regulations to be considered. Could the island airport be made a dual airport so that when one airport at Toronto is under fog the other could be used?

Mr. HOWE: The Trans-Canada pilots have conducted most exhaustive tests of the Toronto airport. It would be of tremendous benefit to the passenger traffic in and out of Toronto if that airport could be used. As I understand it, the runways are only 3,000 feet long and they commence and end at water. A pilot would have to be sure he could place his plane fairly close to the end of the runway when landing and brake before reaching the other end; otherwise a plane full of passengers might some day be landed in lake Ontario. Our pilots have decided that these runways are not safe for Trans-Canada planes, and we have had to accept their decision.

The CHAIRMAN: I would direct the attention of the committee to standing order 58. section 2. The remarks I made last night apply to the present debate. In committee hon. members should direct their attention to the subject matter of the particular clause under discussion. I have not wanted to interfere so far, but I believe that much of this discussion has been out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we do not ask these questions now we will not be able to get the information here. It may be given in the committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government, but only a few of us have the privilege of attending the sittings of that committee and taking part in the discussions.

The CHAIRMAN: There will be ample opportunity to obtain all the necessary information from the minister when the estimates for the civil aviation branch of the Department of Transport are under discussion.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps special latitude should be allowed in view of the fact that we are in the happy position of being a profit-making organization and do not ask parliament for any supply. I shall be pleased to have the information asked for placed before the committee. I have no desire to curtail discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: There would be at least the minister's salary to discuss.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the statement just made by the Minister of Transport, and further in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice is in his seat, may I suggest that there may be something more to the guarding of Malton airport than has been brought out in this discussion thus far. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Transport to make sure that the guarding facilities at Malton airport are sufficient for all purposes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall do it with pleasure.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The airport is guarded to a certain extent by the corps of commissionaires, but I would feel more confident if this corps had sub-machine guns instead of being armed only with revolvers. This airport covers a considerable area and is a vital spot in our communication system. The Minister of Transport has been good enough to say that I have an open face, but perhaps he is thinking of me with my hat off; I had my hat on when I was up there. I suggest that this matter be gone into a little more thoroughly.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have noted the remarks of my hon. friend, and the matter will certainly be investigated.

Mr. ESLING: In view of the profitable nature of this service will the minister not give some thought to providing an auxiliary service from the interior of British Columbia? I ask him to consider the importance of the tremendous industry located there, an industry which perhaps has a larger foreign mail than any other in Canada. It takes longer to reach an airport from the interior of British Columbia than it does to come from that airport to Toronto or Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: The prosperity of Trans-Canada is a temporary affair indeed. If we have a prosperous year this year, next year we have to reduce the rate to the post office and get back to bare bones again. Each year we try to improve our position in order to come out with some profit. The post office arranges for the services between Trans-Canada stops. If my hon, friend can convince the post office that there is an adequate volume of mail and a necessity for aeroplane service to this point, it may be possible that they will consider providing a feeder service.

Mr. ESLING: Would it be possible to convince the minister that there is a sufficient volume of transportation business? Would that not warrant the providing of an auxiliary service regardless of the mail?

Mr. HOWE: I doubt if a service could be arranged on the basis of passenger traffic alone. While a good many people might be travelling back and forth, I doubt if there would be the necessary regularity of travel to fill a plane each day. It has not been the custom to establish feeder lines for other services than that of mail.

Mr. McIVOR: Before I ask my question, may I say that we have been surprised at the head of the lakes at the speed with which the minister gets things done. I should like to know if the extensive use of our air fields for military purposes will make any difference in the opening up of new feeder lines. I am thinking of the large central air field at the head of the lakes.

Mr. HOWE: The original plans of Trans-Canada contemplated a feeder line to the metropolis at the lakehead. While it has not been possible as yet to establish it, it is still under consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is that Fort William or Port Arthur?

Mr. HOWE: Unfortunately the airport is at Fort William.

Mr. McIVOR: They are both one.

Mr. GREEN: What lines are in operation from Canada to the United States, and are there any new lines under contemplation at the moment?

Mr. HOWE: At present Trans-Canada operates from Vancouver to Seattle. Northwest Airlines operate from Winnipeg to the South. Canadian Colonial Airways operate from Montreal to New York and Boston-Maine Airways operate from Montreal to Boston. Trans-Canada Air Lines has made application for permission to operate a service from Toronto to New York. The hearing has been held in Washington, but no decision has been rendered. The Boston-Maine Airways have an application pending in Washington for permission to extend their service north from Boston to Moncton, New Brunswick.

Mr. GREEN: Are any extensions in Canada under contemplation?

Mr. HOWE: At present we are organizing a service from Toronto to London and Windsor, Ontario, and something has been done in connection with the service from Wagaming to Fort William.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon, member for Vancouver South has anticipated me somewhat. Would it be correct to say that with the completion of the airport at Windsor, this service will follow immediately, or are there any other airports to be completed on that route?

Mr. HOWE: That is the intention. The radio beam has been installed from Toronto to Windsor, the fields at London and Windsor are now being completed, and it is hoped that the service from Windsor to Toronto will commence about July 1.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On the service between Toronto and Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, and perhaps Toronto and Winnipeg, has the minister considered getting planes such as the Douglas plane which takes off and lands at a much lower speed and in a shorter distance? With such a plane the island airport in Toronto would be very useful.

Mr. HOWE: The officials of the company have very carefully examined the equipment situation, and while it is admitted that planes of the Douglas type would be useful for short runs from Toronto eastward, it is felt that the expense and difficulties of having duplicate overhaul plants and duplicate spares for two types of planes would offset any operating advantage that would accrue from having these planes at the eastern end. We could not maintain our present operating schedules in the west with the type of equipment my hon. friend suggests.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPEAL OF PROVISION FOR THE MAKING OF CERTAIN APPOINTMENTS BY ORDER IN COUNCIL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Department of National Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment and transfer of certain officers.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why are the long-term temporaries, as we call them, in all the other departments not put under the civil service commission? It seems to me to be a great injustice to what are called long-term temporary employees in the other departments that they should not have the advantage which this bill seeks to give to the employees in the Department of National Revenue. I am thoroughly in accord with the principle of the bill, but I do not see why the other departments should not take a similar step to that now being taken by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that nearly all units in all other departments are being treated as it is proposed by this bill to treat all employees of the customs and excise divisions. All the bill does is to remove what I would call an anomaly in the customs and excise divisions. There we have some officers who were appointed by the governor in council working side by side with many other officers who were appointed by the civil service commission, and inconveniences arise when questions of promotion have to be considered. The civil service commission does not recognize for promotional purposes those officers who were appointed by the governor in council under the Department of National Revenue Act. As I explained the other day, the practice of the appointment of officers in those divisions under the Department of National Revenue Act by the governor in council on recommendation of the minister has fallen into disuse. No such appointments have been made since 1934. I myself have not recommended the appointment of any officers under the powers contained in the Department of National Revenue Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is to be congratulated upon having taken this stand. I only wish the attention of other ministers and of the house could be directed to other long-term temporary employees throughout the service. I take advantage of this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the house, believing it should be given consideration by hon. members particularly with respect to the staff of the House of Commons, where many stenographers have been engaged for twenty years and are still on the temporary staff.

The minister says that the bill provides that in future all appointments in the Department of National Revenue shall be made by the civil service commission. That is splendid. But how are promotions made in the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: By the civil service commission. Promotional competitions are held by the commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Prior to 1928 I understand that these officers were appointed by the civil service commission.

M. H.SLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hon. gentlemen will remember that we had a customs investigation by a committee of this house in 1925 or 1926, and following the report of that committee the government of the day set up a royal commission to investigate certain [Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

branches of the public service. The commission, which consisted of Mr. Justice Brown, of Saskatchewan, and two other gentlemen, Mr. W. H. Wright and Mr. Ernest Roy, reported to parliament, and in its report it dealt with this very question of the appointment of customs appraisers, preventive officers, and investigators of values and drawbacksall, I believe, technical officers. The commission, as I recall it, made some severe criticisms of the manner in which these men had been appointed theretofore. I do not recall specifically what recommendations or strictures, if any, were made by the house committee, but if hon. gentlemen will turn to page 8 of the report of the royal commission, which I shall call the Brown commission, they will find that it stated:

It has been recognized and must be admitted that a proper system of appraisal lies at the very base of the customs administration.

On the basis of that premise the commission made certain recommendations, among which was the following:

Our inquiry has shown that the present system of appointing appraisers or other officers requiring expert or technical knowledge is unsatisfactory.

I pause here to say that the system therein referred to was appointment by the civil service commission. I have not had any opportunity of looking into the proceedings of that royal commission to see whether that statement is well founded or not, but certainly it was a stricture on the then method of appointing these technical officers. The report goes on to say:

We are convinced that where expert and technical knowledge is required, the examination of the applicants for positions should be conducted by those who are specially qualified to act in the premises.

Of course that is a stricture on the civil service commission itself. Maybe it was not justified. Personally I have always been a strong supporter of the civil service commission, and the principle of merit. I am not going to depart from that position to-day. The minister will therefore find that in principle I am in agreement with what he has to say. But that is not the whole story. The report continues:

We are of opinion that all appointments to the office of appraiser at the different ports of the dominion should be made by the minister after examination of the applicants by the board of appraisers.

That is, if I appreciate that language, by a board set up in the department itself. The report proceeds:

We quite recognize that this method of appointment would conflict with the system now in vogue under the Civil Service Act; but notwithstanding this we are of opinion that this method should be adopted.

As a result, and I believe as a direct result, of that report, the government of the day in 1928 introduced the legislation which the minister now seeks to repeal. If hon members are interested and will look at the explanatory note on the page opposite page 1 of this bill, they will find set out in small type the exact provisions of the statute as then enacted as a direct result of the report of this royal commission. Subsection 4, which was added to section 1 of the Department of National Revenue Act by the amending statute of 1928, empowers the minister to nominate for appointment by the civil service commission the following classes:

 (a) Customs appraisers of all classes whether serving at the various ports and places of entry or as dominion appraisers;

(b) All officers in the customs-excise preventive service.

The minister pointed out that this power is now obsolete because this work has been taken over by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and probably is being done as effectively as, if not more effectively than under the old system of customs-excise preventive officers.

(c) All officers assigned to duty as investigators of values and claims for drawback.

Classes (a) and (b) are certainly technical officers; and the theory on which this statute was based was that these men should be appointed by the minister after an examination by a board in the department that would know exactly what class of men was required, what type of men was needed, and what qualifications applicants possessed for these important offices. A large part of, I shall not say the scandal, but the ineffectiveness of the customs department in the days between 1921 and 1926 was because the men who were in the preventive service were really not carrying on their duties. I do not wish to say that all the customs appraisers or all the investigators of values and claims for drawback were not qualified to carry on their duties, but at all events that was the considered opinion of the royal commission, and of the government of the day. The minister stated, if I heard him correctly, that since 1934 no appointments have been made under this enabling provision to any of these particular offices and that none at all has been made with respect to the customs-excise preventive service, which has been taken over by the other department.

Mr. ILSLEY: Pardon me; no one from outside the service has been appointed since 1934. One appointment to our staff was made from within the civil service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe I am aware of that particular case. It was the case of a private secretary, was it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the minister himself has stated, I believe, that since he came into the office in 1935 he has not made any nomination or appointment. Now the question to be considered here, I think, is whether the fact that, with the one exception which has been referred to and which, of course, stands upon its own basis, successive ministers from 1934 on have adopted this policy is a good and sufficient reason to overrule the recommendations of a royal commission. In days gone by, the present government has appointed a good many royal commissions, and it has been said that it did so in order to escape responsibility. I do not believe that is the case here. But evidently the government of the day in 1928, having regard to the circumstances which had arisen in the previous year, was impressed with the desirability of making an improvement in the nominations to these offices; and I am just wondering if the reason which the minister gave this afternoon is really the sole reason why these powers should be given up. I am not attributing any motives at all to the minister. He was good enough to disclose, what was new to me, that the civil service commission do not recognize for promotional purposes officers appointed by ministers. Do the civil service commission do that in defiance of the law, or is it their right to do that, or just why should they take that attitude? While they do not appoint these officers, these officers become officials of the department; they are entitled to fair treatment at the hands of the civil service commission; and the failure to recognize them for promotional purposes would seem to me, at first blush at all events, without further explanation, to be a discrimination against these men. Although I am not as familiar with the officials of the minister's department as I was prior to 1935, when I had a great deal of business down there, I understand that some of the best men in that department are men who were appointed under the 1928 act, men whom he would not want to part with to-day. Is the sole reason for this bill the fact that there has arisen-I shall not say friction, which is perhaps too harsh a word-lack of cooperation from the civil service commission with respect to promotion of these particular officers, who cannot, I suppose, be very numerous; or is there another reason why the minister proposes to give up this power?

I believe in the principle of merit with regard to the civil service, but I can quite understand, because of the great territorial expanse of Canada, the ramifications of the public service, and the fact that there are thousands upon thousands of employees scattered from Sydney, Cape Breton, to Van-couver island and into the Yukon, that the civil service commission cannot function one hundred per cent perfectly. Unless, however, very strong pressure were brought to bear upon me with good and sufficient reasons, I would never restrict the rights of the civil service commission, and if my attention had been called to this in 1928 I should certainly have objected in principle to the recommendations of the royal commission. But this course having been recommended by the royal commission in strong terms and for reasons which evidently seemed good to it, and which must have been convincing to the government of the day, the legislation which the minister is now seeking to repeal was enacted, and now, after the space of twelve years, it has been allowed to fall into decay. Is the fact that there is friction with the civil service commission the sole reason for this bill? Is that the sole, controlling factor in asking for the repeal of the act, or what is the real reason? That is the only reason suggested by the minister for the introduction of the present legislation. I should be glad if he would elaborate that phase of the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not the sole reason. It would not be an important enough reason because the governor in council can promote in cases where the civil service commission declines, and as a matter of fact some of the appointees under the national revenue act have been promoted by order in council. The leader of the opposition has referred to the royal commission of 1928. It is true that that commission recommended this change in 1928.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the government acted upon the recommendation of the commission.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But the officers of the department inform me that there has certainly not been any improvement in the quality of the men who have been appointed by the governor in council over the quality of those who were previously appointed by the civil service commission. I agree with the leader of the opposition that there have been some excellent appointments under the powers contained in the national revenue act, and there have been some excellent appointments by the civil service commission during the same period.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would assume that,

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to say that the proportion of excellent appointments under one system is any higher than the proportion under the other. That would involve the forming of an opinion which would not meet with agreement on the part of a number of persons to whom it might be expressed. I am certainly not convinced that the calibre of appointees by the civil service commission is any lower than the calibre of appointees by the governor in council. If the civil service commission discharges its duties efficiently, it is at least as likely to make good appointments as the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister. It is free from certain influences which occasionally operate in appointments by the governor in council on the recommendation of ministers. I am not saying that these influences operated in the Department of National Revenue. Apart from preventive officers, there were between twenty and thirty appointed prior to 1930 and between twenty and thirty appointed subsequently to 1930. Of course, there were a great many more appointed to the preventive service, but that phase of the situation is out of the picture now. The experience of the department, as well as the opinion of the permanent officials of the department, was that there was no reason for making this exception in the customs and excise divisions of the Department of National Revenue.

The leader of the opposition asks me whether the sole motive was to get rid of this difference—friction would perhaps be too strong a word—between the department and the civil service commission over the question of promotions. No. That is a very minor factor in the situation. It is a factor; and as the hon. gentleman will note, it is cleared up by section 2 of the bill, which provides that these appointees are to be recognized by the civil service commission for all purposes from now on. It may be said that we should just pass that section, and that would be the whole act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be the whole act if it were the only point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That would be the whole act if it were the only point, because we could bring the civil service commission to time in that way if we wished to do so. But I believe there is no reason, at least no conclusive one, for perpetuating an exception in the customs and excise divisions of the department. The fact that appointees must possess technical qualifications is no reason for taking the matter out of the hands of the civil service commission. The commission appoints experts right along in all the departments on the recommendation of qualified boards, and we perpetuate an anomalous exception such as this in one department of government, if it is an admission that the civil service commission is not qualified to appoint experts.

I do not feel very strongly about this matter. There are other branches of government in which the employees are all appointed otherwise than by the civil service commission and which we are leaving alone. We are not changing them, because there is no particular reason for a change; but in this case perhaps I have been influenced to some extent by the opinion of the commissioners of customs and excise, who agree that there is no reason for the perpetuation of this anomaly. I am sure the committee is not over-impressed with the fact that a royal commission has made a particular recommendation. Some royal commissions make good recommendations, and some make many recommendations regardless of whether they are good or not. There is a tendency-perhaps I should not say this-on the part of a royal commission to feel that they must make quite a number of recommendations-

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To justify their existence.

Mr. ILSLEY: -to justify their appointment, and while I would not say that was the case here, the fact is that they found that appraisers in the Department of National Revenue in some of the ports were not particularly expert. What more natural than that they should recommend a change in the system of appointing appraisers, suggesting, "Let us appoint appraisers and investigators of value in a different way." Well, we tried it, and it did not have the result contemplated. The government is in a much better position now; the minister is in a much better position than the royal commission was in 1928 to say whether appraisers, investigators of value and drawback officers should be appointed by the civil service commission. because we have had experience with both systems, whereas they investigated only one system.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the last statement the minister has made. If the department is properly run, the department and the minister are in a much better position to decide the question than three men brought in from outside, one of them an illustrious judge—two of them I know nothing about. The recommendation of the commission, however, arose out of the class of men appointed in previous years. I believe that is where the difficulty arose—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): -and that has been eliminated. It is the policy of the department, supported by the united opinion of the commissioners of customs and of excise, that we should revert to the old system on principle, and I think they are right. But I am only discharging my duty by giving the committee my information as to why this change was made; it was done on the advice of a royal commission appointed by the government of the day, led as now by the right hon. Prime Minister, and enacted into legislation after the considered judgment of that commission had been obtained. The method has not been found to work out well. If the minister wants to put this bill through. I am not opposing it; I merely want to ascertain the real reason. He assured me that the question of promotion from within the civil service is not the real reason, although it is a factor, but that the principle which was in vogue before is, in his judgment, and in the judgment of his officers, the correct principle upon which these appointments should be made.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. MARTIN: I would not want anything that I intend to say to be construed as opposing the endowment of full power to the civil service commission in the appointment of officials in the Department of National Revenue. But I should like to make an observation about the method used by the Department of National Revenue in the appointment of collectors. Latterly the practice has been, I believe, to regard the post of collector as one of sufficient importance to justify bringing into a community as collector some person who, prior to that time, had not resided there. I can understand the motives which would prompt this course. But I suggest to the minister that there is a strong argument against this method. I can understand in the case of appraisers, where special technical knowledge is desirable, that possibly there have been times when suitable men were not available in the particular community. But I suggest that the practice of appointing a collector, particularly in the larger ports, from outside the community, one not knowing the port or its traditions, is a great mistake. Every man who joins the customs service, let us say in my own city, where there are two large ports, no matter how humble his capacity, should be able to feel that, with proper application and given the ability, he may aspire to the highest post open in that particular port. If that feeling were developed, it would tend to improve the morale.

Mr. HOMUTH: He can now.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, but the practice latterly has been, particularly in the larger ports, to appoint as collector someone living in another community.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the exception, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN: I am trying to make my argument as to why I think that should not be the practice. I do not know anything about the ports, other than that this is one of the matters in which I have interested myself during the past five years in my own Without going into particulars constituency. of any local situation—the minister probably has in mind better than anyone else what I have particularly in view-I say that when a man goes into the customs service he should be able to feel that with proper application he may reasonably expect some day to become collector in that community. I am not suggesting that the appointment should be made by the minister; I say that it should be made by the civil service commission, but that the civil service commission should be confined in its choice to individuals living in that particular community.

What I am saying has reference only to the collectors, not to the appraisers, in whose case I understand there are special considerations. The post of collector, I suggest-the minister will know whether or not I am correct—is very largely one of public relations. He is the man who has to meet the public. True, he makes certain decisions, but more often than not the decisions are made by appraisers and technical people. Is it not likely that a man who knows the community, who has come up in the service there, is better qualified to serve and meet the public than a man who, for instance, comes to Windsor-I refer to Windsor only for purposes of example—say from Nova Scotia? I have no doubt that the intermingling would be desirable, but I do not know that there is beyond this, any particular advantage. I strongly urge the minister, because of a certain situation he has in mind, that the collector should be a local individual where possible, preferably one who has been in the service in the particular community. I understand that when there are some special reasons or disabilities, there may be an exception to what I suggest, but if my point of view were accepted, I think it would do much good.

I suggest to the minister that there are several ports in this province—and I am not [Mr. Martin.]

speaking of Windsor particularly, nor am I excluding Windsor-where the morale among the men is bad, very bad; and one of the reasons for this fact is the feeling that those living in the community are looked upon with a measure of suspicion, I am not saying always unnaturally, by Ottawa. There is the feeling that Ottawa does not trust them, that Ottawa has not a high regard for the competence of the collectors or of the men under them. That does not tend to the kind of organization we all want, and I would strongly urge the minister to consider the reasons that I have given, and more particularly the motive, which I am sure he will understand, that prompted me to make these remarks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have carefully listened to what my hon. friend has said; I am aware of and appreciate the circumstances in the city of Windsor, and particularly in the port of Windsor, that prompted him to make those remarks. Let me say that in my opinion the sole consideration should be the qualification of the man for the position. It may be that, other things being equal as between two applicants for the position of collector, the local man should have the appointment; I do not know, I am not prepared at the moment to subscribe to that. It is true that in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Vancouver, and I think Niagara Falls, appointments during the past few years have been from the inspection staff at Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For the good of the service.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think everybody admits that all those appointments were good ones. I believe this is admitted even by the persons who at the time were most strongly urging the same considerations that have been urged by my hon, friend here to-day. The greatest care was taken by the civil service commission and by the rating officers to see that men of the very highest quality available were chosen for the very difficult position of collector in these important ports. I am inclined to think that my hon. friend has over-stressed the importance of the collector being a public-contact man. There are other qualities which in my opinion are more important in a collector than giving the public a pleasant feeling when they deal with the port. After a few years a minister of national revenue comes to understand pretty well the qualities of his permanent officials in various ports of the country. It is of course important for one who comes in contact with the public to make those who deal with him have a friendly feeling towards the department and the government, but he must also see that his officials discharge their duties.

I do not know whether I should say it here to-day, but some of the officers at the port of Windsor have not been discharging their duties during the last few years. There is a situation there which will have to be dealt with, and dealt with somewhat firmly. If the civil service commission select from the present personnel there the right type of man, all well and good; I have not the slightest objection; but if he is not in sight there, then somebody with strength of character and executive ability will have to be put in charge of that port.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it has been thought from time to time that the customs and excise service should be handled somewhat after the manner of the branch banks system in Canada. I think it would be for the good of the service if that principle were applied more freely than it is to-day. I do not know anything about the circumstances which have arisen at the port of Windsor, but the minister evidently knows all about it or he would not have made as important a statement as he did with regard to the personnel at that point.

My own view is that in connection with a great service such as the customs and excise it would be well if the minister and the government of the day would from time to time adapt themselves to the principle followed by the chartered banks. A man who enters as a junior in a chartered bank in Ottawa knows that if he renders good and effective services, he will some day rise to the top, and may even become general manager. But he does not go into the bank with the idea of becoming branch manager at the point at which he makes his entrance. That system works out admirably; it is a good one. The misfits are weeded out in time, and those who are ambitious go out on their own account. In the result the bank service reaches a high point of efficiency.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to another matter. The minister is wedded to the system of civil service appointments for the customs and excise branch. What does he have to say about the other branch coming under his jurisdiction, namely the income tax branch? As I understand it, none of the appointments to that branch come under the civil service commission. I think I understand the reason why that condition obtained at the very outset, when the new department was set up in 1917 under a responsible commission. I think the personnel of the income tax branch has been good, all the way through. But certainly there has been a number of misfits from time to time in various parts of that branch. I commend to the minister the extension to the income tax branch of the principle he has enunciated. I do not see any good reason why it should not be extended to a branch which has now been operating for more than twenty years.

A solicitor may be required in the income tax branch. There are very few income tax experts among the solicitors of Canada, and there is no reason in the world why an appointment to such a position in the income tax branch should not be made by the civil service commission.

I know that in making these observations I may give offence to my good friend the commissioner of income tax, with whom my relations over a period of years have been friendly. In my judgment he is a first class officer. He protects the public revenue and in my opinion metes out even-handed justice as between the crown and the taxpayer—at least, that has been my happy experience with him.

But I do not know why patronage for the appointment of officials should be vested in the commissioner of income tax and his advisers, and not in the officials of the customs and excise divisions. I do not think a case can be made out for a continuance of the present system as I have described it in one branch, and for the adherence to the other system in other branches.

I commend these observations to the consideration of the minister, because the present set-up seems inconsistent in principle.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not wish to pursue the matter I brought up much farther, except to say that the observations of the minister should be separated; and I say, with great respect to him, that he has not done so. His statement may possibly leave the impression that what I had to say had reference to a particular situation which requires cleaning up, and I may assure him that he will have the full support of the whole community in that objective.

But what I had to say had no reference to any particular person. It may possibly have been thus provoked, in that the matter has been brought to a head; but only in that respect, because there can be no question, I take it, of the character of the present collector at that important port. May I simply say this to the minister? I agree with him that the first consideration should be that of merit, the obtaining of someone who, in the estimation of the commission, can do that job better than anybody else. With that principle I agree. But should the first attempt not be to try to find someone in that particular locality? If that is impossible, then it might be permissible to proceed to pick men from Vancouver or Halifax and move them, let us say to Hamilton. But surely it is possible in any of our larger communities to find men with sufficient integrity, character and ability to permit them to carry on. If that is so, then the minister will have satisfied the other circumstances which I have mentioned.

I am not going to drop the matter—and this without any criticism of the men who have been appointed latterly at various points throughout the province and the country—that a good number of those men have come from within the department itself. I am not going to suggest any particular instance, but I believe the minister should be made aware of the fact that it is quite possible for a man who has spent most of his life in the service at Ottawa to have a closer approach to the appointing bodies than would some individual working in the service outside, who perhaps has never been in Ottawa.

I make that generalization, not only in the form of a generalization, but because I wish it to apply to a particular circumstance. I hope the minister will regard anything I have said as having been said, not with the idea of taking the matter out of the hands of the civil service commission—because I want it to stay there. I would go as far as the leader of the opposition, when he made certain representations in respect of the income tax branch. But the principle of appointment by the civil service commission is not inconsistent with the principle of selecting, where available material exists, from a particular community.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think this discussion ought to bring an expression of opinion from other quarters of the house. In my view the public service of Canada is a Dominion of Canada service, and I do not think appointments should be confined to the localities of Windsor, Niagara Falls, Toronto or anywhere else. I think any Canadian citizen who has fulfilled the qualifications, who can pass the necessary examinations, who can obtain the confidence of the civil service commission and get the appointment, is entitled to that appointment, no matter where in Canada he may reside.

I think promotions from within the service are sound, but I do not think the government or the minister would be wise in setting up community compacts. We once had a Family Compact. I am quite sure we should endeavour to regard these services as being open to every citizen of Canada who can qualify.

[Mr. Martin.]

I should like to see all appointments made by the civil service commission and on merit alone. Promotions should also be based on merit alone. I come from a part of Canada where there is no large collection point, and I agree with the attitude taken by the minister. It is only right that a young man entering the service at any point should be able to look forward to promotion to a larger port, provided his qualifications warrant the promotion.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The object of the amendment is to provide that in future all appointments shall be made by the civil service commission. If these appointments are to be made according to the provisions of the Civil Service Act, then all the sections of the act must apply. Section 21, subsection 3 reads:

Except as to appointments to positions in the headquarters of the several departments and other portions of the civil service at Ottawa, the appointments to any local positions in any province shall, so far as practicable, be made from bona fide residents of such locality.

If this amendment is to be applied according to the Civil Service Act, any appointments made by the minister must be from persons living in the particular locality. The main difficulty is that the Civil Service Act contains no definition of territory or locality.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not follow the wording of the section, but I am sure that no difficulty arises from the act. The commission fixes the area from which applications may be received. Sometimes it is a town, sometimes a constituency, sometimes an inspection district, sometimes a province and sometimes the dominion.

Mr. HOMUTH: Has the minister given any consideration to reducing the number of ports in Canada? I happen to be chairman of the tariff and legislative committee of a rather large organization. On several occasions I have had to approach the department and direct attention to the fact that certain importations were being made which seriously affected local industries. Material was being brought in under a certain name and the local customs official knew nothing about it. He could not appraise it properly because he had no knowledge of the material. As long as we have laws, we shall have people who try to violate them if a profit can be gained. Material is being brought into the country through various ports under false entries. In the cases brought to the attention of the department immediate action was taken, the proper duty was collected and a penalty imposed. As long as we have so many ports and out-ports, it will be impossible to staff them with expert employees. No matter how many explanatory letters are written by the department, many of these people will not be able, nor can we expect them to be able to understand to what uses any particular material may be put. Perhaps we should have a different system and reduce the number of ports of entry. In passing, I want to state my opposition to the attitude of the hon, member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). He said he had reference only to the heads in the local ports.

Mr. MARTIN: Collectors.

Mr. HOMUTH: If the collector is a local man, I am afraid he will be influenced largely in favour of local people when filling vacancies in his staff. I know something of the men and women in the service; I have had a great deal to do with the customs service, and I do not know of any department of government where you will find a finer type of man employed. I do not think we pay enough compliments to the men in the service. Time and time again the hon, member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) rises up in his place and attacks the civil service. I have had a great deal to do with the people, not only in this service but in the Ontario service, and in practically every case I have found that they are the type of people who feel they have a responsibility to do the best they can for the department, the province or the dominion as the case may be. I think we should frown upon this continual bickering about the civil service. I have always found civil servants to be men and women above reproach, always willing to help regardless of whether one sits with the opposition or on the government side. I think it would be a good idea if we objected more strenuously to some of the statements made by certain hon, members, particularly to the hon, member for Témiscouata.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am in favour of the civil service commission and the merit system when applied. I do not know that it is applied in all cases. In this particular instance I understand that up to the present appointments have been made by the department after examination by departmental officials who are supposed to be expert in these matters.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not since 1934.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Appointments are made after examination by a board composed of representatives of the department and the civil service commission?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Has the commission men who are expert in these matters? If so, why should officials of the department be called in to sit on the board? If we adopt the principle of sending men from Ottawa to fill positions in various points of the country, we shall be discouraging local people from entering the service, and the service will be harmed. The provisions of section 21, subsection 3, should be applied. Then local employees would be encouraged to study and become expert in their line. That is the whole point. I am not against the amendment, but I do not like to see positions in different parts of the country given to men from Ottawa in preference to local men.

Mr. ILSLEY: The officers in Ottawa got here through transfer from other cities.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Some of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps they are not always returned to the same city, but eligibility for transfer works to the benefit of persons in those cities as well as to their prejudice. Unfortunately they think only of the prejudice. I want to make just two observations. First I want to assure the hon, member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that, in any competition which may be held in the near future, there will be no discrimination against officers at the port of Windsor by reason of the fact that they are at the port of Windsor. I want to say also that in what I said before I did not mean any wholesale condemnation of our force of officers at Windsor.

Mr. MARTIN: Thank you.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be unjust for me to say anything of the kind because we have a great many very fine officers there.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the minister go so far as to say that the officers in Windsor were finer than the officers in any other community in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have gone as far as I can about Windsor, I am afraid.

With regard to what the hon member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) said about the closing of ports, it has been the policy of the department for years to reduce gradually, sometimes rapidly, the number of ports, the reason being that there is not the necessity for so many ports as there was years ago. Now, with hard-surfaced roads, automobiles and so on, it is no hardship for an importer to go some distance in order to enter imported goods. I agree very largely with what the hon member says about the appraisal probably being better if you reduce the number of ports, because it will be more uniform, more standardized.

The setting-up of a check branch at Ottawa has had a beneficial effect upon appraisals. Mistakes in appraisal, mistakes in classification and in valuation, although perhaps not so much in valuation, are caught by the check branch at Ottawa. Between 1935 and 1940 there were about ninety out-ports and postal collecting stations closed, and not more than two or three ports or out-ports at the most were opened. It is not the easiest thing in the world to close a port.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is like closing a railway station.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have seen petitions which called upon members to resign in protest against the closing of a port where there were not more than two hundred entries a year, or less than one a day, and boards of trade, prominent citizens, members and so forth make the strongest representations against any reduction in the number of ports.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Some are not very successful.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon, friend says, not always successfully. I think I can say that during the three or four years following 1935 the closing of ports kept me in more hot water with members, boards of trade and others than anything else with which I had anything to do. Nevertheless I want to warn the members that I expect to be closing quite a number in the near future.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the bill passes, might I ask the minister to express his opinion with respect to the recommendation I made to him to bring the third branch of his department, the income tax branch, under the Civil Service Act? I am not going to labour that matter further.

The minister says that he has closed ninety out-ports.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a rule I think it is a very proper thing to close out-ports, where it can conveniently be done. I know that all ministers have struggled with that situation, and they have met with all the local resistance that the Canadian National or Canadian Pacific railways meet with in closing a station or in tearing up a branch line of railway—and then some. But there is this to be said in that regard. The public convenience, especially of people living along our coast-line, should be given consideration before an out-port is closed. Conditions of travel, the accessibility of other ports to which they must go, and the expense to which they are put because of the closing of an out-port, are all factors that must not be lost sight of when one is considering closing a port.

There is one other point. What has the minister done to reduce the personnel at certain ports in this country? I have in mind a customs house—I am not going to tell him publicly where it is but I will tell him privately if he wants the information—which is just overrun with officials who have not enough to do to keep them busy three hours a day.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to know where it is.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): In the old days the customs house was a port of refuge for people who wanted jobs in the public service and who probably could not support themselves in active competition with their fellows, but that day I hope has passed and gone. I think the minister will find, if he makes a careful review of the situation at certain ports in Canada, that he is wonderfully overstaffed at some ports. I do not mean the port of Fredericton, because they have had to increase their staff by reason of one factor, namely, the importations of the New Brunswick liquor commission.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are understaffed, I suppose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not say that. I think they have a sufficient number of officers to do the work. If the minister looked into the matter, he might even find that they are overstaffed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know anything about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do know this, that the volume of revenue at that port has greatly increased, and it is due entirely to the importations for the province of New Brunswick, which now enter at that port, and not through the port of Saint John or elsewhere.

What I have particularly in mind is that this is war time, and we have in Canada, I suppose, 80,000 civil servants. Is that an understatement or an overstatement?

Mr. ILSLEY: An overstatement. The number would be about 60,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Sixty thousand to seventy thousand? I think the minister will find it is nearer to eighty thousand than seventy thousand. In a country as small as Canada, far-flung as it may be, that is an enormous number of federal civil servants to be living directly on the country; and when to that number are provincial and municipal public servants, one can realize what a great army of people the taxpayers of this dominion are supporting-people who are just living on the country. They are not to be condemned, of course, because the public service has to be carried on, but I suggest to the minister that this is one place where the government might save in war time. I do not mean that this should be done by wholesale dismissals or even retail dismissals of unnecessary civil servants, because that might create hardship; but when positions become vacant by reason of death or superannuation-and this applies to the inside service just as much as to the outside service-the government should give serious consideration to whether the position actually needs to be filled or not. I believe that we could save an enormous amount of money to the treasury of Canada in this time of war by not filling needless positions.

I have in mind that during the economic war in this country from 1930 to 1935, when we left office in 1935 we left literally thousands of positions unfilled and we saved to this country some millions of dollars-I have forgotten the exact number-by not filling those positions. I commend that policy to the minister and to the government, that they should see to it that in war time, when people are called upon to make great personal sacrifices and to pay heavy taxation-and I am sure it will be heavier before it is lighter-there is no needless expenditure in filling positions in the civil service, both the inside and the outside, which are not required. I venture to suggest that in a period of five years we could save annually to the treasury of this country at least five millions of dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wholly agree with the leader of the opposition in what he has said about the importance of cutting down staffs by not filling vacancies, wherever that is possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the only method.

Mr. ILSLEY: A great deal of attention has been paid in recent weeks and months to that very problem. If he will give me the name of the port which he thinks is overstaffed, I shall have that port investigated. Let me add that if other hon. members know of any overstaffing of customs houses, I should like to know of them myself. The commissioner of customs is as anxious as I am to see to it that there are not unnecessarily large numbers of men engaged in the customs service.

On the point about the income tax division, theoretically the hon. gentleman is perfectly right; perhaps, too, he is practically right. But in the administration of a department one has to be as practical as possible, and there does not seem to be much practical reason for interfering with the very successful working, I mean from an efficiency point of view, of the system of appointments to the income tax division. From time to time I have given consideration to the question of bringing in a bill to effect a change such as the hon, gentleman has mentioned, but if I were to be asked whether it would improve the quality of the appointments in that division, I certainly would not be satisfied that it would.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister would not assert the reverse?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not assert the reverse. I would just say that great care is taken in the selection of personnel for the income tax division, and I believe that from a practical point of view the system of appointments is reasonably satisfactory at the present time.

Mr. ROWE: I suggest that the government might well consider some general plan which would serve all departments as well as the two which have been mentioned. It seems to be an absurd practice that some men and women who have been employed and have given efficient service in various avenues of the civil service for ten, fifteen, or perhaps twenty years, are not yet on the permanent staff. One example, which has been mentioned to-day, will be found in our house staff. Many of the guards of the house have been on duty for from fifteen to twenty years, some perhaps even longer; they have given efficient service, displaying through the years a vigilance which we all admire; perhaps they are passing the time when they might take some other positions; yet they are not in the permanent civil service. I cite their case only by way of suggestion. I believe that both the government of the day and the government which preceded them might have given thought to establishing more uniformity in this connection. If a person has been employed in any department of the civil service for a number of years and has given thoroughly good service, there should be some general rule which would enable him to be assured of appointment to the permanent staff or of retaining his position as a life appointment.

ORDER IN COUNCIL OF AUGUST 11, 1939, TO HAVE FORCE AND EFFECT OF STATUTE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

Motion agreed to; bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Order in council to have force and effect as from the 11th of August, 1939.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have not received copies of the bill. How can we discuss the contents without a copy? I wish to protest against taking up a bill without a copy of it being on hand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest to the minister that if he would allow this bill to stand for a few hours, or until to-morrow, hon. members would be more competent to discuss it. They have not seen the bill; they have not been able to read it; and I have had some memoranda sent to me about this matter which I should like to look into a little further.

Mr. ILSLEY: It can stand until to-morrow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister, before he gives effect to the suggestion, whether this bill arises in any way out of the report of the civil service committee of last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It is the Civil Service Superannuation Act committee. There were two committees; there was a committee on the Civil Service Act and one on the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This arises out of the report of the committee on the Civil Service Superannuation Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; but it does not incorporate all the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have seen that report to-day for the first time, and I understand that it contains twenty-eight different recommendations. Is it possible that the government intends to give effect to only one recommendation out of the whole twenty-eight? Is it intended to let the rest stand? Or what is the position?

Mr. ILSLEY: The present intention is not to go any further during war time, or at least [Mr. Rowe.]

within the near future, with the recommendations of that committee than we went by order in council in August last.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that definitely referred to this one subject which is the subject matter of this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The bill merely ratifies the order in council. It was considered feasible to go to this extent by order in council, but later the opinion was given that we could not even do that without reference to parliament. The order in council is in operation now and we wish to give it validity, but the question whether we are to go back and introduce a long bill here, carrying out between twenty and twenty-five other recommendations, some involving very large expenditures of money, is one which perhaps we cannot be said to have finally decided. There is, however, no present intention of doing that in view of the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of government policy and I am not quarrelling with it. Will the minister allow this bill to stand?

Mr. ILSLEY: Very well.

Section stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICULT-URAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Friday, May 31, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Vien in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of memployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It might be well for the minister to make a general explanation, and it could then be decided, by consent I hope, whether there should be a full discussion on the resolution or on the bill in committee of the whole. We should not rush this important matter too fast.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): There is no inclination whatever on my part to rush this resolution through. It is altogether in the hands of hon, members whether they wish to debate the matter on the resolution or on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or on both.

Mr. McLARTY: Or on both. I do not know that I can add much to the statement which I made on Friday night. This is of course the resolution on which is predicated the passing of the act that has been put through annually since 1936. In the previous three years it has been passed, I believe, without amendment. Apart from the amendments necessitated by dates in the bill, there are only three amendments that are included. In the preamble there is a reference to our war endeavour with the idea that our effort under this measure will be directed not only towards relieving unemployment but towards regulating employment so as to increase our war endeavour.

In section 3 of the former act it was provided that the dominion should of its own motion undertake works projects. It was thought, in view of the extensive war expenditures which the dominion is at present making, it might be well if, instead of carrying out these projects under the act, should they become necessary, vital and essential, they could be made under a special estimate which this house could pass upon.

The third amendment deals with the question of loans to the provinces to enable them to carry on their proportion of the expenditure under the act. That amendment merely provides that whereas in the act, as it was reenacted last year, such loans could be made by the Minister of Finance and the government when necessary, it is essential that they should be in the national interest in view of the extensive expenditures we are making.

I do not know that I can add anything to that explanation of the amendments which will be included in the bill when it is introduced. In view of the fact that the report was tabled yesterday, I would prefer to leave a statement as to the general operation of the act during the past year until I have had the advantage of hearing the discussion in committee on the resolution.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister should give us some report as to the plans he has in view.

Mr. McLARTY: As I explained the other night, I had hoped that possibly we might debate this matter on the second reading. However, I am completely in the hands of hon. members in that regard. I do not suggest it, but I had not intended giving any statement until I had heard the debate in committee on this resolution.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In January, 1938, a report was presented by the national employment commission, and practically none of the recommendations of that 1938 report have been carried out by the government. One of the great recommendations submitted by that commission was the establishment of a federal employment commission as opposed to provincial employment commissions. The minister ought to say something about this report. There were various interim reports. There was one in August, 1937, containing some important suggestions, and there was an interim report in September, 1937, in which certain recommendations were made.

We find ourselves in a difficult position to-day in Canada owing to the winding up of this commission, which should have been kept in existence all this time. Here we are faced with a shortage of skilled labour. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) told us some little time ago that it would not be long before there would be a great scarcity of skilled labour. What are we doing about skilled labour? Are we taking stock of the labour of the country? Are we seeing to it that some of these people who can be brought back to work are being brought back? Is there going to be any provision in this legislation for the rehabilitation of some of these men? We have a great opportunity at this time to get these men back to work. The minister should give us more information so that we can form some idea of what is proposed under this measure. This legislation requires a great deal of discussion before the bill is introduced, and the minister should be able to get from hon. members through this discussion a quantity of valuable information. I said not long ago that what we should have in Canada to-day is a national registration. When the national employment commission started on its job, it said, Why was this done? That is this registration. There were many reasons. They are set out on page 79 of the report, as

Because the commission found very little accurate detailed information about relief recipients in existence; because any aggressive attack on unemployment to be real and constructive must be based on known facts; and finally because the commission had as one of its statutory functions to advise the government in respect to the expenditure of millions of dollars. . . .

That is why we need a national registration at this time, and that is why this commission should be working at the present moment.

That is why we should still be gathering these statistics as to what these people are capable of doing. How can we expect to bring out the full war effort of this country unless we know what men we have available? The information must be obtained.

Mr. McLARTY: I take it the hon, member is reading from the report of the national employment commission in relation to the registration of those on welfare. If he is reading that, we have, and have had for two or three years, that registration. He may be referring to a broader registration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister has the registration made by the national employment commission.

Mr. McLARTY: Which is being continued.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Which is being continued at the present time. He has a registration of unemployed people and what they can do.

Mr. McLARTY: We have the registration as recommended by the royal commission.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He has a registration of the unemployed.

Mr. McLARTY: Not the unemployed; those on welfare.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is only in relation to relief.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was going to say the commission could not get anywhere without a national registration. Their problem at that time was the question of expenditure of money in getting people back to work. Our present problem is just the same—to get these people back to work; and I do not see how we can do it unless we have a full registration all over this country so that we may know what people are available and what they can do. Moreover, we must have some kind of federal agencies, as opposed to the various local and provincial ones. I know that in Toronto, for instance, the employment agencies run pretty well, but there is need for a federal agency of some kind at such a time as this to coordinate our efforts.

There are in this report many more recommendations which might well be put in force at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we should have from the minister a general survey on the resolution. I hold in my hand volume two of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. THORSON: Have you read it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Part of it. In the very first chapter, beginning at page 15, it deals with the social services. From there on, it contains sweeping recommendations with respect to this vexed question of unemployment relief. According to the brief summary which the minister gave the other night and again to-day, it is apparently his purpose to introduce the same old bill with little if any substantial modification, and to continue to follow the system which has been so unfavorably commented upon by this royal commission. The government may have very good and substantial reasons for continuing the old system and its procedure, but I suggest that at this point the committee is entitled to hear from the minister a precise statement of why the government are following the old system, and certainly a statement at some stage-and I think now is a good time-of the government's policy with respect to the changes proposed by the commission. I intend to deal with these proposals of the commission during the course of the discussion either now or at a later stage, but I think now is the proper time to have this discussion. I invite the minister to give us a statement as to the government's policy, as to why they are following the old practice, and to give this house and the country a statement of their policy with respect, first, to the sweeping condemnation of the old system by the royal commission, and, second, to the very important recommendations made by the commission with respect to this vexed question. If the minister has not read the report, I should like to direct his attention to volume two, pages 18 to 31.

Mr. McLARTY: I assure my hon, friend I have read it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assumed the minister had. I invite him to make this statement to the committee after the dinner recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the committee took recess, I was inviting the minister as gently as possible to give a review of the operations of this legislation for 1939. I wonder if he would be good enough to do so now.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock, I believe the suggestion had been made by the leader of the opposition that we might be well advised to consider the effect of the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations upon the bill to be based on the resolution now before us. I appreciate most kindly his observations in referring me to those particular pages in the report of the commission in which they deal with the matters of unemployment and social welfare. Perhaps the best statement I could possibly make to-night would be one based upon his observations as to the bearing of the report upon unemployment and agricultural assistance legislation. I am prepared to do so.

The report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations is a most excellent one. With that statement I believe all hon. members will agree. As a result of representations by various provinces, communities and organizations, we have before us to-day—a day which perhaps is not as fortunate as it might be—the report of the work of that commission. I say this is not as fortunate a time as it might be because of those occurrences which have given us very little time either to sleep or to think.

This report contains excellent recommendations. In so far as it relates to legislation such as that now before us, it recommends, in the first place, that in the matter of unemployment aid the dominion government should assume the responsibility for all financial contributions required in connection with that particular undertaking. In respect of unemployment it recommends, as you know, sir, that those who are unemployable shall be a definite charge on and the wards of the provincial and municipal authorities which may be affected.

I believe I might go more deeply into that phase of the matter. Generally speaking, those who are on unemployment aid represent not more than 90 per cent of those who are employable. I might suggest that the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations is a matter which might not properly be debated in the committee at this particular time.

Mr. MacNICOL: It should not be.

Mr. McLARTY: I say that definitely to the leader of the opposition, and for this reason: There are implications which do not involve the dominion government alone. My hon, friends opposite know that. Those implications involve provincial governments and municipalities. And if we assume the right to deal with the matter, as apparently the leader of the opposition believes we ought, we are dealing with obligations which are not peculiarly our own but rather are related to the provinces and municipalities throughout Canada.

Is there any question of that? Is there any doubt about that? In addition, when it is suggested on a resolution on which a bill is to be founded that I should deal with the whole matter involved in the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations, might I suggest that the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might well be borne in mind.

On one occasion the Prime Minister stated:

As previously indicated the report of the commission will be submitted to parliament and to all provincial governments. After an opportunity for careful study of the report has been afforded it is the purpose of the government to invite all the provinces to take part in a dominion-provincial conference and consider the most effective means of dealing with the problems which occasioned the appointment of this commission.

Then, in Hansard for January 16, 1939, the Prime Minister is reported as follows at page 63:

What would be the effect on the provinces, with the constitution remaining as it is to-day, if that theory were admitted for one moment?

The theory, Mr. Chairman, will be enlarged as the opportunity presents itself. The Prime Minister continues:

What authority has to do with the control of the whole question of employer and employee, of master and servant? What authority has to do with the regulation of hours and conditions of employment in mines? What authority has to do with workshops, with factories? What authority alone has any power with respect to wages and hours of labour? Only the provincial authorities. And as long as the provincial authorities have the control of these matters which are all-important in dealing with the question of employment, they must necessarily have some responsibility for the solution of unemployment. Imagine the situation in certain of our provinces to-morrow if a government were in power here which had come to power on the declaration that it was going to assume all the burden of dealing with unemployment and had assumed that obligation as its own? Imagine what some of our provinces would do with respect to many matters that were causing them trouble or embarrassment.

May I refer again to page 64, where the Prime Minister states:

It has been said repeatedly back and forth throughout this country that the purpose of the commission was to say what is to be done and that we are leaving it to a commission to settle the whole matter. That is not the purpose of the commission at all. The commission has the authority to make recommendations, but this parliament alone can bring about any amendment of the British North America Act, and it will require with respect to some matters the consent of at least some of the provinces, in regard to some, possibly all. If we are to get the act amended it would seem we must bring about some kind of conference between representative men in the provinces and representative men in this parliament. I believe such a conference can be brought about and that it can be both successful and helpful, because I think the experience of the last couple of years has made it plain to all citizens of this country that there must be a getting together of representative men from all parts of Canada and, as a result of conferences between them, agreement reached on some very necessary amendments to the British North America Act which will meet with the acceptance of the provinces and the dominion.

That is what is meant in the reference in the speech from the throne to a national conference. It is not a national conference to tell the government what it ought to do or should not do. It is a conference to give this country the fruits of discussion, between representative men, based upon information that is absolutely essential and reliable, and which would enable those interested to work out intelligently the amendments to the British North America Act which sooner or later must be worked out if we are to have a solution of more than one of our present day problems.

The leader of the opposition suggested this afternoon that it might be well if I made a statement to this committee to the effect that because the dominion-provincial commission had brought down its report, certain amendments should be made to the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act. I wonder if my hon. friend realizes exactly what that involves? This house met on May 16. Shortly after that, the report of the dominion-provincial commission was laid upon the table of the house. On the other hand, the report of the commissioner under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act was laid upon the table of the house only yesterday. Is it fair to suggest that because of recommendations brought in by a commission, which was not a unilateral commission, that the dominion should do certain things on the one hand, and the provinces should do certain other things on the other, that this government should deal with them without their being considered by the provinces?

Let me suggest this. My hon, friend knows that so far as employables are concerned, the recommendation of the national employment commission, to which the hon, member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) has referred, was that this should be controlled by the dominion government. But there were other recommendations. It was recommended that unemployables should be the responsibility of the provinces. In other words, this is not a unilateral matter concerning the dominion government only. It is a bilateral or a trilateral duty which affects the provinces and the municipalities as well.

I do not know that I need say much more. I feel that I would be stepping entirely outside the scope of my authority were I to deal with a recommendation of the dominion-provincial commission. I would be committing this government to a policy which is something I have no power to do. I do not wish to evade my responsibility in any way, but I feel that the recommendations of the dominionprovincial commission should receive wider consideration than can be given in a period of two hours before any definite move can be made in connection therewith. There may be certain questions with which I might well deal. There may be certain matters of unemployment with which I might deal and thus add to the debate on this matter. know that many hon. members will speak upon this resolution, and there is no objection to that so far as I can see. I shall endeavour to the best of my ability to contribute to this debate. I do not think, however, that this is the proper time to add to the measure of debate that will inevitably ensue.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I suppose I should feel properly rebuked after that speech, but I must confess that the remarks of the minister leave me cold. I thought possibly that by drawing his attention to the report of the royal commission, he would take us into his confidence at this time with respect to the recommendations which were made therein. I think the minister has made a fair statement from the point of view of himself and the government as to why that should not be done at this time. With that point of view I am not in disagreement. I quite realize, as must hon. members who have been in this house for any length of time, that the question of jurisdiction is involved.

I recall the debates which took place in this house as long ago as 1924 and 1925 when unemployment in Canada first received consideration at the hands of this House of Commons and parliament. I remember the principle being laid down that unemployment relief was, under the provisions of our constitution, a matter solely for the municipalities involved. I believe that still remains a constitutional principle. But having regard to the magnitude of the question, as it has developed since 1929, we all know that in stern reality this question of unemployment relief is one which, because of the necessities of the situation, cannot be left to the municipalities to solve. When it becomes a matter of considerable magnitude, it devolves upon the provinces because the municipalities are, after all, but the creatures of the provinces. That is, I think, the correct position with respect to the question of unemployment relief, unless and until the whole problem becomes a national problem beyond the financial resources of the provinces and municipalities to deal with. Then, when it has become a national problem, as it has been for the space of ten years, it must be dealt with, in the very nature of the case, and by the very force of circumstances, by the federal parliament itself because it has become a national problem. With that I think we are all in agreement.

My references to the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations were simply to call attention at this time to the position which the commission took towards this great problem because of its national character. I have no great objection, since the minister refuses in any way to be drawn, to the matter being left open for future consideration. I know as well as he does that the provinces have to be consulted, but I had hoped that after ten long years of dealing with this national problem, the government might at this time offer something in the way of a practical solution in dealing with this as a national problem.

What has been the attitude of various governments? I well remember the first bill dealing with unemployment relief which was brought down in the house in the session of 1930. There was not a man in this chamber then, and I doubt if there was a thinking man in Canada, who ever had the idea that this problem would not only be with us for ten long years but grow to the magnitude it has reached. If we had conceived at that time that it would become a problem of national magnitude, we might have-I do not say we would have-dealt with the problem ab initio from a different point of view; but there was not a man among us on either side of the house who had any conception of the extent and character of the problem that was confronting us or that it would be with us for these ten long years.

Having failed in my very humble way to get the minister to give us even a review of last year's operations, I shall not at this time make any extended remarks. I would hope, however, that as the resolution passes through the house and the bill is introduced, the minister will give members of the committee of the whole the widest possible latitude in discussion, and that you, Mr Chairman, in the judicial discretion which you exercise, will be good enough to give hon, members your best consideration and the widest possible latitude in discussing all the various aspects of this problem.

I have had the privilege of reading last year's report and the report which was laid on the table yesterday, and have had an opportunity of giving some little study to the whole problem, and I must say before I take my seat that I am a little disappointed that the government are not attempting to deal with this problem in any new way or to extend in any manner the underlying principles of the legislation which has been put on the statute books year after year now for ten years. All we are doing is simply bringing down a repetition of the grants in aid to the provinces. We have not a word to say about how the money shall be expended; we have nothing to do with administration, and I am afraid that a great deal of abuse has occurred and a great deal of federal money has been wasted through these grants in air. I well remember hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on more than one occasion say in this house that it was wrong in principle for the taxing authority in one jurisdiction to collect money from the people of this country and hand it over to another jurisdiction to spend, and that I believe was a sound stand to take. Nevertheless that is the very principle which we have followed in large degree since the inception of unemployment relief legislation. The amount of money that has been expended in this way in Canada is huge. I have drawn a few figures from the reports that I have read, and I find that the total dominion disbursements under relief legislation from the commencement of such legislation in 1930 to March 31, 1940, reached the huge sum of $377,946,890.57.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but it is $965,000,000 up to 1937.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the dominion?

Mr. McLARTY: By all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am taking my figure from appendix "E", recapitulation of dominion disbursements under relief legislation to the end of the fiscal year 1939-1940, which will be found appended to the commissioner's report, and if I read the figures aright, $377,946,890.57 is exactly the amount of dominion disbursements. The figure my hon. friend has in mind, if he will allow me, is the total disbursements of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities from 1930 to December 31, 1939, which amount to $937,000,000.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt that by the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1940, they have reached the larger figure which the minister mentioned. I point out that these statistics refer solely to expenditures under relief legislation. But in addition there are expenditures of public money under such headings as the National Housing Act, the home improvement plan, which of course is supposed to be more or less self-liquidating and I hope may be fully self-liquidating; the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act; direct public works on behalf of the dominion which were made for alleviation of the unemployment problem, and similar measures. I understand that the expenditures under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act from 1935 to date amount to approximately $9,600,000, and I have no doubt that the total expenditures for relief in all categories cannot be far short of $1,500,000,000. That is a huge, a staggering sum of money for a small country like Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: I think it fair to remind my hon. friend that his figure is largely overdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will admit at once that I have not been able to build a figure up to that sum. But I recall that we start with nearly a billion dollars, and direct expenditures by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities constitute two-thirds of the total amount. I have not before me, although no doubt the minister has, the total of the money expended by this dominion under the National Housing Actwhich may, of course, and we all hope will, come back to the treasury. The home improvement plan, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and expenditures by the dominion on public works, having in view relief, must have been very substantial, at least $250,000,-000. While I do not know the amount, it has been very large, having regard to all the relief which we have advanced to the railways and other authorities for that purpose, some of which money, of course, should come back.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps my hon, friend will pardon me if I suggest that, while it may be difficult to determine the amounts advanced under the housing act and the home improvement act, it would be unfortunate to assume that these advances are lost.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never suggested that they were lost. I said, I think explicitly, that these undertakings were supposed to be self-liquidating—

Mr. McLARTY: Quite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):—and that they were undertaken, in a degree at all events, as I apprehend it, to assist.

Mr. McLARTY: With no loss.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, I have no doubt, was the intent and desire of parliament when it passed those acts. We hope that losses will not result, but I believe there will be loss in connection with some of those loans, and the dominion government will have to bear a share of any such loss.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

An interesting item appears in the Labour Gazette of May, 1940, page 411, with respect to the number of persons in receipt of direct relief during the month of March. The figures are startling, having regard to the fact that we have had better crops recently and that the war has absorbed, in a measure at least, some of the employables among the younger men. It is stated that the grand total of all classes of persons on urban and agricultural direct relief across Canada in March, 1940, was 768,500. These figures, as I understand it, were released by the minister himself and are the preliminary results of a registration of all direct relief cases carried out for the department by the provinces and municipalities in the month of March. It is true-and I am glad to see it-that the total for March, 1940, compared with the same month in 1939, shows a decrease of 25 per cent, according to the report in the Labour Gazette; while in comparison with March, 1938, the dominion figure was down by 261 per cent, and both urban and agricultural relief show decreases as contrasted with the situation a year ago. But the problem is still a large one.

Mr. McLARTY: Has my hon, friend the figures for March, 1933?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I have not, but I know they were very large.

Mr. ROWE: What has that to do with the situation?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That, of course, has nothing to do with the situation which is immediately under review. The Labour Gazette further gives this information, that unemployed but fully employable persons on relief in March of this year numbered 172,000. That, of course, is a marked decrease from the peak year, but still it is a lot of people. I admit that so far as my part of the country is concerned, March is an inbetween month; winter work in the lumber camps is pretty well over and summer operations have not begun, so my province may have contributed a little to any increase shown in that month. I learn from this report that there is an increase of one per cent in that month over the previous month, but that the figure for March of this year shows a decrease of $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent compared with the figure for March a year ago and a decrease of 11 per cent from the figure for March, 1938. I would remind the minister that in the interim war has been declared and approximately 100,000 men have enlisted. I do not want to impugn the motives of any man who has enlisted, but many of these younger men-not all-enlisted because they could not find employment and because the rates of pay established by the government were attractive. They were. Boys have come into my office and figured out what it would mean to them in dollars and cents. I have tried in every case to remind them that this is not a matter of dollars and cents but of a duty to their country.

According to the same authority, a total of 646,000 persons were receiving non-agricultural relief in the month of March. This was a slight increase over the previous month, and that month shows a slightly larger increase over February, 1939. This category includes all totally unemployable, partly employable and fully employable persons, together with all dependants of family heads.

I am not going into the question of the dominion total of agricultural relief which is touched on in this article in the Labour Gazette. I give these figures to the committee merely to emphasize the magnitude of the problem which is still with us; and if the minister, in his wisdom and his undoubted discretion, does not wish to go into this whole question of unemployment relief, the manner in which it has been carried on in years gone by and the manner in which he proposes to carry it on for the coming year, I cannot quarrel with him, because after all he is charged with the responsibility of conducting this measure through the house, and I believe that any minister has the right, when he is conducting a case, to carry on in his own way. So I shall not quarrel with the minister if at this stage of the resolution he does not desire to go fully into these matters, but I should like to have him say that he will be good enough to reserve to the members of this committee full right of discussion on all the important questions which may arise when the bill to be founded on this resolution is in committee of the whole.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest reluctance to give that undertaking: I do not wish now or hereafter to curtail debate upon this measure. If I have not taken the opportunity to give an address as to the general policy and scope of the legislation, I know my hon. friend will be kind enough to assume that the opportunity will come when every hon. member can say all he wishes to say in connection with this particular measure.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): The resolution moved by the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) asks for an appropriation of moneys for the purpose of alleviating unemployment; and as I have the honour to represent in this parliament a constituency that is badly affected by unemployment and potential unemployment, I would ask the indulgence of the committee for a sufficient time to draw the minister's attention to conditions as they exist in Nova Scotia, particularly in the mining industry. In listening to hon. members for the past several days discussing the unfortunate situation in Europe, there were times when I felt they were describing conditions in some sections of Nova Scotia that I have the difficult task of representing in this parliament.

This being my first time to view the machinery of government at close range, I hope that my present impressions are due to strained world conditions. As a worker, I look on parliament as the place where my problems and the problems of my fellow workers should be solved and not as a place where political advantage is the main interest to the destruction of Canada and the confusion of our people—with the dominant factor uppermost, that power overrides justice. I trust my impressions are wrong.

I am going to be as brief and explicit as possible in what I have to say, because I realize that the members of the government are charged with the responsibility of planning and carrying out the details in the operation of the machinery necessary to the proper prosecution of the war. The only comment I intend to offer at this time on the question of the prosecution of the war is that I should like to draw the hon. minister's attention to the condition of industry, particularly coal and steel, from the worker's point of view.

During the past few weeks I listened with a great deal of interest to the government's planned war effort, and every phase of the necessities for an organized effort was gone into, except, in my opinion, the most important one, which was never mentioned. I refer to the workers in industry, who will, in the final analysis, have to produce the sinews of war, and what is their position to-day? In the mining and steel industry from Ontario to Cape Breton Island in Nova Scotia, there is not a section of the workers but are at war with the operators at the present time, trying to put into operation the laws of the country as laid down by the federal government—the right to organize and bargain collectively with their employers. Coal and steel are two industries that are absolutely necessary to a proper prosecution of the war. In the steel industry the operators take the position that they will not recognize a union regardless of the efforts made by the workers to bring them together through the departments of government, both federal and provincial.

In the mining industry in Nova Scotia where they have established collective bargaining for the past thirty years, the operators, taking advantage of the war and the War Measures Act, have refused and retarded negotiations for the past eighteen months, and to-day in Nova Scotia there is not a section in the mining industry that is under contract with the operators. This also applies to the steel industry of Nova Scotia. I see in this situation, with all the planning of government to speed up industry, work twenty-four hours a day and so forth, the possibility of the workers in these industries being placed in a false position, because I think the time is coming, regardless of the war, when they are going to demand from the operators the treatment to which they are entitled, namely, the right to exercise their citizenship. I think it is the prerogative of the Department of Labour, because that department is, in my opinion, a department of labour, to function one hundred per cent for the purpose of ironing out the problems of labour as they arise.

I am calling this to the minister's attention, because I think one phase of our war effort that is absolutely necessary at the present time is that labour should be given the right to organize and bargain collectively and that employers should be forced to sign contracts setting out wages and conditions, and in this way the worker's mind will be set to rest. He can go to work, budget on what income he has, and pay the necessary attention to cooperating with the government in prosecuting the war. On the other hand, if he is not treated as a human being and accorded full citizenship rights, the only thing for him to do is to fight back, and we do not want to be forced in the present situation into a position in which we may have to wage an industrial war in order to establish industrial democracy in Canada. I trust that the Department of Labour will immediately take into consideration the enforcement of that legislation which gives the right to organize and bargain collectively and to strengthen that legislation by compelling operators to sign collective agreements, because where there are no collective agreements, there is not collective bargaining.

I should like, for the benefit of the Department of Labour, to give over briefly the set-up as it exists in Nova Scotia, particularly in the mining industry.

I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Labour to a war that is being waged in Nova Scotia, between the operators of the mining industry and the people who are the owners, but who were dispossessed of their birthright by act of government, when the coal leases were placed in private hands to be exploited for profit. There are approximately 10,000 miners in Nova Scotia all employed, in my opinion, by the one company, the Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal Company linked up by a merger approved in the nineteen-twenties. The Acadia Coal Company, the Dominion Coal Company and the Cumberland railway were tied into what was then known as the British Empire Steel Company. This later was changed to Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal Company. That merger, on paper at least, has been broken and the Scotia and Acadia companies went through the process of liquidation. But the Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal Company still directs them. This corporation alone employs approximately one-quarter of Nova Scotia's working population. The coal company also operates a railway from Glace Bay to Louisburg. That road comes under the Maritimes Freight Rates Act and receives all the concessions enjoyed by the Canadian National Railways. It also operates a machine shop at Glace Bay. The men employed are paid by the coal company. There are two departments of this shop that perform railroad work only. The wages paid to the men engaged on this work are nineteen cents an hour below the railway rates paid by the other railways including the Sydney and Louisburg railway.

The federal government subsidizes this railway to a considerable extent, and in qualifying under the Maritime Freight Rates Act the railway, I understand, is supposed to maintain a first-class carrier service. The function this road performs at the present time, and has performed for a considerable time, is to transport the company's coal back and forth between Glace Bay and the piers in Louisburg, and it maintains practically no carrier service. In that area there are approximately 60,000 people who are without any decent train facilities whatever. In the past twelve years the federal government has subsidized this short road to carry on the work of the Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal Company, to the extent of $2,608,000, and at the same time the workers employed in the auxiliary shops doing railway work one hundred per cent are paid very much lower than the regular railway rates. That is a matter which should be checked up.

My conception of the subsidy is that it is paid for the purpose of maintaining the railway, keeping the rolling stock in repair and assisting in paying the wages of the employees, and so far as I can see, that company is not carrying out that part of the arrangement. There has been considerable friction in connection with that end of the company's operations. A conciliation board has been applied for by the men to whom I have referred particularly, but so far it has not materialized. We hope that something will come out of it when it does function. These two departments of the railway employees have made application through the United Mine Workers of America for a board of conciliation to determine their status, but to date no reply has been received from the Department of Labour as to whether such a board would be granted or not.

The coal situation is briefly this: In Nova Scotia in the past ten years several mines have been closed, affecting about 1,000 men. The solution has been to transfer the men displaced to operating collieries which were already overcrowded. As shown by a recent statement by Doctor F. H. Sexton, president of the Nova Scotia technical college, there were 15,000 unemployed youth in Nova Scotia who never had a job. In transferring these men they only aggravated the conditions in the other collieries, the result being that a large number of men reported for work and then returned home again. At present we have the assurance that there are two more mines scheduled to close-one at Reserve being partly closed now, with the other in the Glace Bay area being gradually closed. The closing of these two mines will affect some 1,500 men and their families. The coal company has been promising the opening of a new mine, but to date this has not happened.

That was the situation until I left for Ottawa. They are working slack time on account of the fact that a large number of the boats used to transport coal to the Quebec market were transferred to carrying war material overseas, necessitating the moving of coal to Montreal by rail, and this, being a very slow process, results in the curtailment of operations in the mines. The miners of Nova Scotia feel that they have been robbed of their birthright because coal being a natural resource belongs to the people, and when it is placed in private hands the tendency is to take the cream and leave the skim milk to the people. This is exemplified in Inverness county, where, in our opinion, the coal field was worked as long as it could be profitably, and when profits could no longer be made, it was left to the people, who for the past number of years have been eking out an existence on a relief basis with the local government carrying on the operation. miners feel that the federal government has an equity in the Nova Scotia coal industry and that the time has arrived when an investigation should be made, because slowly but surely the province is becoming a place of ghost towns and demoralized people.

In addition we have about forty thousand fishermen in the maritimes who are in an even worse position than the miners, their average income being between $200 and $300 a year. These people are not asking for relief or charity but are demanding that the responsible authorities see that the industries are so organized and planned that the workers have an opportunity to live as decent, respectable citizens. The miners appreciate the assistance given the industry by way of subventions, but we feel that the government should make sure that this assistance is used for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, to assist in providing a better standard of living for the purple who produce.

The people of Nova Scotia are making a wonderful effort to solve their own economic problems by cooperative efforts. They have already established 180 credit unions, 43 stores, 17 lobster factories, 7 fish plants, 8 community industries and some 10 other cooperatives. The total number of cooperative organizations in the maritimes is 422. The volume of business done by them runs into Other cooperative the millions of dollars. organizations are hospitalization schemes and housing groups. I should like to make this clear, that the efforts of the people themselves to solve their own economic problems give proof positive that they are not looking for relief or charity, but they are in that position, and kept there, by a system which obliges them to accept relief. I have just described the cooperative set-up whereby the workers themselves are working out their own problems in trying to take over the services of the organizations that have been exploiting them for generations, but they are in this position that, regardless of how well organized that movement is or how successful it is in taking over retail and wholesale business, by reason of the fact that the British Empire Steel Corporation controls the pay envelope of a great majority of the people engaged in that endeavour, the movement is in jeopardy because the company, controlling that envelope, makes the position such that if there is a shut-down of a month or two, these undertakings are crippled, the purchasing power of the people who operate these movements is taken away, and the movement can be wiped out of existence. The people who are working along cooperative lines in Nova Scotia believe that it should be the obligation of the federal government to see that they are given a chance to develop that movement.

I have heard many statements and have read editorials in the press, characterizing this Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group as Sunday school socialists, camouflaged communists, and everything of that kind, and saying that they largely draw on their imagination for many of the statements they make with respect to the problems of the people they represent. In order that I may not be charged with making statements without good authority, I should like to read something for the information of the minister. I draw this to his attention because he is the Minister of Labour, and I represent in this parliament chiefly labour. I look upon the Department of Labour as the department of government to which I should appeal for redress of many of the problems to find the solution of which I have been sent here. This is a telegram I received from the machine shop workers organization in Glace Bay. There was a fire there which threw approximately 200 men out of employment. That occurred since I came here. The telegram, which is from the president of the Mechanics Local, United Mine Workers of America, reads:

Entire machine shop in ruins, disastrous fire swept large building Sunday, approximately two hundred men thrown out of work, we are waiting decisions of locals re levy to relieve distress twenty men at work others idle.

Gordon Livingston, President Mechanics Local United Mine Workers.

The mechanics local of the mine workers did not appeal first to the government for relief; they appealed to the members of their own organization. It has been the practice in the past as far as the mine workers are concerned that as an organization they have carried thousands of dollars of their own relief in the way of distress money, and as I said, they are not looking for charity or relief.

I call attention to another item from the town of Glace Bay, dated May 8, relating to relief. The town of Glace Bay has a population of about 26,000, and approximately 7,000 of the 12,000 miners of Nova Scotia are centred in and around that town. This is the section in which two mines are threatened with closure. It affects not only the miners directly but also the business people and the institutions that have been built up in that community in the past thirty years. This dispatch, dated Glace Bay, May 8, reads:

Decision of the town council in session to-night was that the case of miners being unable night was that the case of miners being unable to get work was a responsibility of the provincial government, as the town of Glace Bay could not provide for the men who are unable to get further employment at collieries where they have been employed in the past.

Two of these mines are being gradually closed; men are being added to the ranks of the unemployed; the mines that are operating are overcrowded, and so many men report for work, go into the mines, stand in the bottom two or three hours and then wend their way home, spending probably four or five hours, and earning absolutely nothing. The situation in that area with respect to coal mining is becoming very serious. Just before I left for Ottawa I was called from section to section of that constituency, and the people themselves, without any solicitation from any political organization or union, met as citizens and prepared briefs to be presented to the different governments.

I should like to read something I have before me which sets out the situation in the area in question. The document I have before me is from Morien, in Cape Breton. It is dated May 5, 1940, is drawn up by a citizens' committee, and reads:

At your request your committee has compiled a brief resume of the adverse conditions under which the people of Morien and Birch Grove have been labouring for the past ten years and some suggestions as to how they may be remedied.

When the colliery at Birch Grove closed down in 1929, all those employed there were compelled to seek employment elsewhere, the most of whom obtained employment in the collieries in Glace Bay.

A workmen's train leaves Morien daily at 5 a.m. and returns at 5 p.m. conveying the men back and forth to their work, this means that they are twelve hours away from home, have to spend long hours on the train leaving no time for him by the train leaving or time. for leisure or to take any interest in the affairs of the community.

Since the colliery closed at Birch Grove ten years ago, very few of the young men that became of age during this period were able to obtain jobs of any kind, the result is that there are now over 200 young men in these two communities between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six years who have never had any steady employment of any kind.

Morien at one time was a thriving, prosperous mining town with a population of three thousand people who earned their living in the mines that were in operation here. The population has now decreased to about one thousand people who are mostly dependent for a living on what work they can obtain in the Glace Bay collieries.

The town as a whole is slowly decaying. The workers are all in the "low income group" and do not obtain enough in wages to maintain their homes properly, and are not able to contribute very much for the support of the school, churches or any civic improvements.

The solution to our problems is to have a coal mine opened in this district and place all the men from Morien and Birch Grove who work in collieries Nos. 2, 4, 11 and 24 at work in the new mine. All the unemployed young men could be placed at work as the mine was developed and our community would take on a new lease of life.

All the coal areas within this district are owned or controlled by the Dominion Coal Company, a large section being held under the ninety-nine year or blanket lease.

In 1923 a geologist in the employ of the Canadian geological survey made a thorough examination of this district and his report is published in "memoir No. 133" of the federal department of mines. This report deals in great detail with the coal seams in the Morien beginning that there are four basin and sets forth plainly that there are four workable seams of coal in the Morien areas, containing millions of tons that can be easily mined, and readily sold in the markets of the world, for in the days when the Blockhouse and Gowrie seams were being mined by Belloni and Archibald, these coals established a reputa-tion that was second to none.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. GILLIS: I thought I made that clear. I am quoting from a brief drawn up by a meeting of citizens in the town of Morien, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia. The brief was drawn up for the purpose of having it presented to the local government, and I was instructed to bring it here and, if possible, draw it to the attention of the Minister of Labour, through the medium of the House of Commons.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the date of it?

Mr. GILLIS: May 5, 1940.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: It continues:

Some years ago a delegation of citizens in this town accompanied by members of parliament for this constituency and by the U.M.W. executive interviewed Mr. H. J. Kelly the general manager of the Dominion Steel-Coal Corporation in regard to future mining operations in this district and at that time Mr. Kelly stated that there was no question of the quality or the quantity of the coal in the Morien areas and that their corporation intended to open a colliery in Morien just as soon as the market for coal had increased enough to warrant it.

The time has now arrived when we believe we are justified in asking Mr. Kelly what they are going to do. With the war on the demand for coal has increased considerably and with two large collieries closing down within a short time, conditions should now warrant opening a new colliery in Morien.

The Dominion Steel-Coal Corporation receives large sums of money from the federal govern-ment in the form of bonuses for the coke they manufacture from coal and also receive assistance in the form of railway subventions to enable them to market more of their coal in western Ontario. This money is paid direct from the federal treasury and is raised by taxing all the people of Canada to which we contribute our per capita share and we take this opportunity to suggest to our representative in the federal parliament to put forth every effort he can to have these bonuses increased and the subventions extended so that there will be a larger market for coal from Nova Scotia.

In a very short time Dom. No. 11 colliery will be closed down and as there are about one hundred men from this district employed there, some provision will have to be made soon to find them employment or the local government and the municipality will be called on to provide them with relief them with relief.

If the Dominion Steel-Coal Corporation could be induced to start mining operations in this district in the near future, there would be no demand for relief and as an inducement to the corporation to make a start we would suggest that the government of Nova Scotia offer them exemption from the payment of royalties on all the coal produced in Morien for the next four years.

As a further inducement we suggest that the municipality set their assessment at about 50 per cent of their valuation for taxation purposes for the next four years on any new colliery they may start in this district.

From time to time we have heard that the corporation has plans to sink a shaft to the Gowrie seam near the shore, so as to mine the submarine areas of the Gowrie seam and also to win the Blockhouse seam by a cross-measures tunnel. There has been a proposal to sink a deep shaft to the Tracy seam in the Beaver dam section and also one to open a Slope mine on the north outcrop of the Gowrie seam. If any one of these proposals were to be carried out, it would meet with our entire approval and the company would receive the wholehearted cooperation of all those who reside in Morien.

The coal areas of this province are the property of all the people and should be worked for their benefit and the dead hand of a monopolistic corporation should not be allowed to cast a blighting shadow over this town of ours.

If we believe the democratic principle that human rights come before property right we then have every justification in appealing to our representatives in parliament and our leader in the united mine workers to put forth every effort to have a new mine opened in this district.

This is signed by a citizens' committee. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister another brief presented in the town of Glace Bay, where this No. 11 mine is threatened with closing. At the present time it is being gradually closed.

Mr. McLARTY: I should not like to interrupt my hon. friend, and I am trying to gather the suggestions he makes. I am wondering however if, rather than read the whole of the brief, he might not give us a digest. I make the suggestion in the most kindly fashion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go ahead and put it on the record.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I would draw standing order 58 to the attention of the hon. member, where it is stated that speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. I do not believe the reading of a brief would be permissible, under a strict interpretation of the rule.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not suggest that what the hon. member is reading is not relevant, but I am suggesting that he might give us a digest rather than the full text.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go ahead and read your brief.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would draw to the attention of the chair the fact that we are discussing a resolution preceding a bill. We are not discussing any particular section or subsection. The whole question of unemployment, and the application of unemployment and agriculture relief legislation, is open for discussion. I think the hon member who, for the first time is presenting the case of the working classes in the maritime provinces, ought to be given an opportunity to place his case before the House of Commons.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, my conception of the resolution before the committee, and particularly the first part of it, was that it dealt with unemployment. It would appear that the Department of Labour is asking for an appropriation of money for the alleviation of unemployment, and in order that the minister may fully understand the requirements of the situation I suggest that one of the first things he should know is the unemployment situation as it exists in the field.

I have read many reports on unemployment as it affects my own constituency, but in those reports I did not recognize the situation as I knew it. I did not recognize the situation from the report which had been drawn up by someone else. What I am endeavouring to do is to tell the Minister of Labour the story of labour when considered from the viewpoint of potential unemployment. Mines are being closed and the situation is growing worse. I should like to tell my story as I see it myself.

I want to draw this brief to the attention of the Department of Labour. For the past seven or eight years different ministers of the provincial government have done everything humanly possible to cure this situation. I do not say this with any political malice, but I believe absolutely that at the present time the Nova Scotia government is the British Empire Steel Corporation, especially as far as coal is concerned. That has been our experience. Not so long ago a mine in Thorburn, Nova Scotia, was to be closed. This meant that many men would be thrown on to the scrap-heap. The general manager of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, Mr. H. J. Kelly, sat in with a delegation of citizens from that town. The head of the citizens' delegation asked Mr. Kelly if there was anything the provincial government could do to develop a mine in that area. I based my previous statement that as far as coal is concerned this company directs the provincial government upon what Mr. Kelly said to that committee. His answer was that as far as the government was concerned they had done everything they could, but the company had said there would be no new mine opened in that area.

The particular brief which I have before me emanates from a citizens' committee which was formed in Glace Bay. This was not drawn up by members of a union or by workers alone. This committee was headed by Reverend Father McKinnon, a Roman Catholic priest. The Reverend Mr. Crew, an Anglican clergyman, was also a member. The Reverend W. T. Mercer, another clergyman, was a member. This committee represented a more or less united front as far as religion is concerned. There are approximately 900 men employed in this particular mine, and they have learned from their union that the mine will be totally closed down within eighteen months. There are many schools and churches in this locality, and the working people have a considerable investment in their community. Should this mine be closed down, it will be nothing less than a financial bombshell as far as the town of Glace Bay is concerned, because that town receives considerable revenue by way of taxation. The provincial minister of mines and his deputy came to Glace Bay and met the members of this committee. I was present at the sitting of the committee, and we went over the plans of the coal company and considered what prospects and possibilities there were to continue the operations of this particular colliery. We could receive no assurance that operations would be continued. I was then asked to bring up the matter before this house and draw it to the attention of the Minister of Labour. This brief is headed "Introductory brief" and reads:

This committee which is gathered here was selected at a large and representative citizens' meeting held in the legion hall, Passchendaele, Glace Bay, on the evening of April 8, 1940. The meeting was held as a result of the existing conditions in No. 11 colliery as affecting that community for the purpose of endeavouring to find some method to alleviate those conditions.

In the report of the royal commission respecting the coal mines of Nova Scotia which was made in 1932 (commonly called the Duncan report) certain definite proposals are recommended for the reallocation of coal areas and concentrations of the output of coal mines. As a result of the recommendations contained in the Duncan report and apparently with the approval of the government of Nova Scotia a situation has arisen in the No. 11 colliery which has become very acute. Present indications are that this mine will be totally abandoned in approximately eighteen months. A large percentage of the men employed in this colliery are so affected at the present time that no work is available for them and transfers to other collieries are a common occurrence.

We submit that the practice of transferring these men to other collieries operated by the Dominion Coal Company will not provide a practical solution to this problem. Twenty-two men who were previously employed in No. 11 colliery have been transferred to No. 4 colliery. No. 4 colliery is completely filled up at the present time, and there are no places available for any more men. There is no development work being carried on in this mine but future operations will consist only of pillar work.

By way of explanation I would say that pillar work is done only when a mine is gradually folding up. This work is done only when it is considered a mine will eventually close. The brief continues:

Several men have also been transferred to No. 24 colliery. On April 10th, 13 pairs of men were without places in No. 24 colliery and another section in this mine is due to close in about two weeks which will displace another 10 pairs of men. In No. 2 colliery there are at the present time approximately 40 pairs of men without places and eighty per cent of the work in No. 2 colliery is pillar work. No. 1-B colliery is overerowded at the present time due to the fact that a large number of men formerly employed in the reserve collieries have become transferred to this mine. There are now 40 pairs of men employed on each shift in No. 20 colliery and the company does not propose to employ any more men in that mine for the present. As No. 20 colliery is developed it will be used to take care of men who are displaced in No. 2 colliery.

displaced in No. 2 colliery.

Taking into consideration the conditions which exist in all these mines in the Glace Bay district, it can be clearly seen that the problem of providing employment for miners who are displaced in No. 11 colliery will not be solved by transferring these men to other collieries. There are at the present time approximately 800 men employed in No. 11 colliery, the great majority of whom live in the Passchendaele district. These men, together with their families and other residents of the district, make a total of approximately 3,000 persons who depend directly for their livelihood on the continued operation of No. 11 colliery. There are also many houses, halls, churches, schools and business establishments in this district which would in time be rendered useless if this mine were allowed to close without any adjustment being made. In addition to this the town of Glace Bay has in recent years carried on new development work in this district by providing the comunity with new sewer and water facilities.

The additional burden which would be placed upon the town of Glace Bay through unemployment caused by the gradual closing of No. 11 colliery would be one which the town is in no position to bear, and it would be impossible for the town to adequately cope with such a problem. We feel that such a situation should not be allowed to arise without a thorough investigation being made by those with the authority to make such an investigation into the possibilities of a continuation in operation of No. 11 colliery and also the possibility of the opening of a new coal mine in the same district.

We, therefore, respectively ask that an engineer with governmental authority conduct a thorough investigation into the conditions which exist in No. 11 colliery for the purpose of finding out what amount of coal is available for extraction in accordance with the terms of the leases granted to the Dominion Coal Company. If, as a result of this inquiry, it is discovered that the colliery will be worked out in a short time and closed down, we ask that every avenue possible be explored with the view to the opening of a new mine in the Passchendaele district.

The provincial minister of mines and his deputy are cooperating with the miners one hundred per cent in an effort to find a solution to this problem. The leases held by the coal company are such that by the carrying on of certain operations these leases remain in force even though a mine may not be working. Therefore the company is in a position to hold the leases. The provincial government does not seem to have sufficient authority, or at least has not had up to date, to bring about a solution of this problem. Coal will probably be required in Europe. Press dispatches report that France is in a bad way as far as coal is concerned. Something should be done to develop those coal areas in Nova Scotia which are not being operated by the coal company at the present time

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken for forty minutes. He has, of course, the right to speak again on the resolution.

Mr. HOMUTH: A great deal of leeway, Mr. Chairman, has been allowed to all the members ever since the house opened, and I think it is only right that the hon. member should be permitted to continue.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Certainly, if it is the wish of the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not my intention to occupy very much more time, Mr. Chairman. But I did want to tell that story, and I think it is the first time it has been told in that way in this house. We feel that it is the obligation of the government to see that the people who are trying to do something for themselves are protected, and with respect to the creation of monopolies we feel it is the obligation of the government to see that no special groups be given easy and fat franchises out of which to amass untold wealth at the expense of the people, whether these franchises have to do with the monopoly of money, minerals, waterfalls-or other forms of power. There are certain things that we must not pass over to individuals, and we feel that a national resource such as coal is one of those things. We believe it is the function of the government to see that every other business is properly conducted by charter from the government, and that it obeys the rules of the game and is not permitted to assume a monopoly of power as so many have already done. We remember the revelations of the price spreads committee, whose report showed that many things were wrong in Canada, rotten in fact; yet the findings of that committee have travelled to the silence and dust of the upper shelves and nothing has been done about them. We believe that it is the business of government in this country to equip the people with the instruments of freedom and then see to it that they have the full power to enjoy that freedom. We believe that it is the business of government in this country to make it possible for all to get enlightenment, without which no people can live in a free democracy, as is well exemplified by Germany at the present time. We want it clearly understood that it is not the possession of wealth and riches that we are objecting to so much, but rather that wealth should enjoy freedom to control the economic processes of the country and stand in the way of the creation of other wealth by the people. They are the bottle neck through which new wealth must pass before it gets to the people.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are looking to the governments of Canada as at present constituted to see to it that the development of the cooperative as it exists in the maritimes, where it is well away on the road to success, is protected against such monopolies as the coal company which I have attempted to describe here to-night. We believe it is the government's duty to see that the company is not in a position to cripple that movement by virtue of the fact that it holds economic power over the lives of the people in that particular section.

Mr. A. HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Chairman, may I first of all present to the committee a resolution sponsored by the United Farmers of Canada, Alberta section, signed by 2,049 members of that organization. The following is the text of the resolution:

Whereas there appears to be no provision in the present wheat board act to allow the board to make a further payment on wheat delivered to it from the 1939 crop;

And whereas conditions have changed considerably since the passing of the act and this country now faces the exigencies of war;

And whereas it appears to be an imperative necessity to maintain an adequate supply of agricultural products;

agricultural products;

Therefore be it resolved that we the undersigned United Farmers of Canada, Alberta section, respectfully urge the dominion government. under the powers conferred upon it by the War Measures Act, to authorize the wheat board to make an additional payment on all wheat delivered to it from the 1939 crop, in time to enable the wheat producers to finance their seeding operations this spring and to carry on production efficiently during the duration of this war.

This resolution was passed some time ago, but the whole matter is as important as it ever was.

I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate on this resolution, but I think the [Mr. Gillis.]

minister should give this committee some idea of the attitude which the farmers of western Canada may expect from the government with regard to this question.

There has often been used on the floor of this house a word which has struck me, namely, the word "assistance". Neither our farmers in western Canada nor, it seems to me, the employees in this country, are asking for assistance. We are simply asking for what is due to us, and we believe that our farmers in western Canada are entitled to more than they are getting. With the gravity of war now much accentuated, we believe that unless the interests of the farmer are taken care of and protected in every way, unless agriculture which we all know to be our basic industry in this country is assisted, if you like, the morale of our people, as the hon. leader of our group has said, may not be strong enough or of just the type to carry us through the war.

It has seemed to me that a number of members on the government side have frequently referred to the state of war as if to excuse themselves from carrying out their obligations towards the farmers and the workers. But I want to emphasize the point, that the government at this time should not in any way use war as an excuse for not granting to our farmers in western Canada what is due to them.

In closing, I simply wish to add that unless our farmers are looked after better than they have been for the past ten years, I do not know that their morale will be high enough to carry us through this strenuous time.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod) Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). In his presentation of the situation in the coal mining area in his riding, there is reflected the situation that exists in almost every coal mining area in this country. I congratulate the hon, member upon his speech, and I am quite certain that the House of Commons will find him a valuable member in championing the cause of the workers of this country, particularly the coal miners. I should like to say a great deal about the coal miners and the coal mining industry of Canada, but I shall reserve my remarks until the estimates dealing with coal subventions are before the committee of supply. I am convinced that the coal miners' problem cannot be solved until we are able to sell the coal. An hon, member has stated that there is a great deal of coal available, and yet the mines are, as he termed it, folding up. At the same time we know that in Canada people and industry need coal. That is the peculiar anomaly of the whole situation.

This resolution is the kind of resolution which is presented, apparently, every year. It takes in a good deal of territory. It proposes a measure "to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress." It is also for the purpose of "supplementing the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need." Further, it is for "establishing unemployed persons in employment." I am not sure that I know what that means, but I am under the impression that it means the setting up of employment bureaux. That is a good thing, provided the employment is available.

Then the resolution continues, "and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations." I believe that is what is generally termed the youth training scheme. We are all happy to have in these days a scheme of that kind, but I sometimes wonder whether it is extensive enough. Many of our young men are taking this youth training, but it seems to me that they are trained in more or less elementary types of work in the various trades. For instance, a young chap interested in mechanics goes to the youth training quarters and there learns how to tear down the engine of a motor car and put it back again; he then tries to find a job in a garage. I suggest to the minister that he may discover in Canada a great need for technical and expert men. As regards pattern-makers, for instance, I was told the other day that the men who were trained in years gone by in this vocation are growing old, some of them passing out of the picture; yet, because we have been going through ten years of depression and distress, there are few men now qualified to take their places. I understand that the same circumstances apply to the tool-making trade. I suggest that it might be well for the minister to spend some time and thought on the provision of more extensive training of our young men than they now obtain under the youth training scheme.

After all, one wonders just how these young men fare after they have taken the youth training which is offered to them. I wonder if the experience of the rest of the country confirms such facts as I know of in my own constituency. Young men take the youth training scheme, remaining for three or four months during the winter, or whatever the length of the course is, and then go home, and, apart from knowing a little bit more about the subjects which they have been studying, they are but little better off and are unable to find jobs. Therefore I suggest that the basic need is something more than youth training. We in this corner of the house believe that the basic need is a proper adjustment of the present financial and economic arrangement of the country.

I do not think I will say anything more on this matter, except to ask the minister two questions. They are entirely distinct, and perhaps the minister can more readily answer them if I ask them one at a time.

Would the minister place on Hansard the amounts which have been granted under this act to the several provinces over the past five years?

Mr. McLARTY: I should be glad to place upon the table a statement of the advances made during the past five years. I believe that the act came into operation in 1936. At any rate, I shall be glad to place on the table a statement of advances from that time.

Mr. HANSELL: Would the minister care to place it on Hansard?

Mr. McLARTY: I am willing to place it either on Hansard or on the table of the house.

Mr. HANSELL: If it is placed on Hansard, people throughout the country will learn a little more about it.

My next question may seem to be a peculiar one, but I have thought quite a little about it. Is any record kept of the number of youths who have taken training under the youth training scheme and who have now enlisted in his majesty's forces?

Mr. McLARTY: The details in connection with the youth training movement are fairly complete. I would appreciate it if my hon. friend would allow me to reserve an answer to that question until I can get the information definitely, but I believe, subject to correction, that there are such figures.

Mr. HANSELL: If it would assist the minister, I could place the question on the order paper.

Mrs. D. W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I was pleased this evening to hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) say that he did not intend to cut short the debate upon this resolution. In my opinion the resolution is one of the most important which as yet has come before this house. All of us are aware that the people of Canada are watching carefully the deliberations which are going on here. I feel sure that they have watched and listened with great interest to what this government intends to do with regard to the prosecution of the war. But I should like to draw attention to this fact, that whatever happens in Europe, whatever happens with regard to our deliberations in this chamber, throughout the length and breadth of Canada every single day, three times a day, thousands of people are faced with this one great question, "When do we eat, and how?"

In the past, with regard to its domestic policy in looking after the people of this country who through no fault of their own find themselves destitute and without employment, the government has not an enviable record. Whenever it was suggested that money should be provided to assist those who were unemployed or to alleviate farm distress in the west, this government has replied "Where is the money to come from? There is no money." Well, I would point out that, when a war crisis appears, $700,000,000 can be immediately found.

To many people in Canada the domestic crisis is one that looms as important in their minds as the war crisis. It affects the people of this country. It is vital to them, because the future of this country depends upon the welfare of its people. It is not so very long ago that we went through a great economic crisis. We found that the economic problem, the problem of unemployment, was not solved by this government. We had some of our best boys wandering from the east to the west, boys called vagrants. They were given very little assistance. We had farmers in the west facing a situation which was beyond them, and they were absolutely unable to cope with it. The province of Saskatchewan particularly was brought to bankruptcy and the people of Saskatchewan looked to the federal government for assistance. They were faced with the same question: Where is the money to come from? In the opinion of Doctor Weir, Minister of Health of British Columbia, the evidence available shows that at least a third, or more likely a half, of all our Canadian people are existing on incomes of less than $1,000 a year. When so many of our people are living on such an income, the question of health is going to be something which will be brought up before governments of the future as being a responsibility left over from these days. We are not attempting to do anything towards the solution of this problem.

The health of a nation depends upon two things. It depends upon the standard of living of its people and it depends upon adequate health services. This federal government has done nothing, as a federal matter, with regard to health services throughout the length and breadth of the country. The question of the standard of living of our people has also been sadly neglected. I believe that during the last war, during those four years of war, we Canadians lost 60,000 men. We have built a great memorial to them. They were soldiers who gave their lives in the great cause. Do hon. members realize that because of our lower standards of living, because of our lack of good health services, in the four years that followed 1931 we lost 70,000 more soldiers-little fellows this time, under a year old, struggling in the greatest battle of life? They lost out because this country did not equip them. These matters are a government responsibility. If we take into consideration also the mothers who gave their lives, we have in those four years a loss of 103,000 persons. Their names are not known. They are Canadian heroes who are "unwept, unhonoured and unsung"; and if this govern-ment does not accept its responsibility towards the people, I am afraid that in generations to come it is going to be held responsible for this serious situation.

Whatever else the common people lack, they have one great asset: The common people have common sense. And, thank goodness, they are beginning to use it. We know that, owing to this government's policy during these last few days, in the months to come the living conditions of the Canadian people are going to grow steadily worse. I have no hesitation whatever about saying that. I am sure that time will prove my statement correct. During these last few weeks we have appropriated $700,000,000 for the prosecution of the war, $750,000,000 for the payment of loans, and so on. This government, following the policy of the past, is raising this money by taxation and by borrowing. When the common people think of taxation, they think of what has been taxed in the past, and they realize that if this government taxes as it has always taxed, it will be the food, the clothing and the small pleasures of the common people which will be taxed, not the great wealth that lies in the hands of a few within this dominion. Therefore the living conditions of the people of Canada during the next few months are going to deteriorate.

We know also that, for the purpose of borrowing, this government will shackle generations yet unborn with a burden of debt which will be carried on to the future, and children not yet born will bear the debt of this war as we to-day are bearing the debt of the last war. The common people realize these things. It was interesting to me the other evening to see that a bill was brought forward for the appropriation of $100,000 to provide for the parks and open spaces of this city. Yesterday I received a letter from the northern part of Saskatchewan. It is also quite interesting. I should like to read it to the committee. It was sent to a man who is living away up in the northern bush. It reads:

Dear Sir:

Due to the fact that the government is unable to obtain sufficient funds to finance the present cost of relief, I have received instructions that only the most needy cases are to receive assistance. You are therefore advised that no further relief will be given you and that from now on no assistance will be given you under any circumstances.

W. Schmidt,

District Inspector.

The man who received this letter writes to me as follows:

Enclosed find a letter which most of us on relief received this month in place of our order. Despite the fact that just now there is hardly any of us who have funds, we have been cut off. You know how it is up here. My case is soon explained. Last fall I threshed 290 bushels of wheat and 490 bushels of oats. I got 31 cents a bushel for my wheat. I had to pay $36 threshing bill, $14 for breaking, $13 for taxes and for some other expenses such as cutting twine and so on. For three months I received no relief. During last winter I had $5 a month relief for a family of five, three little children, three years, two years and one three months old. It looks as if that is the kind of payment we are getting for not voting liberal up here.

That is only one instance.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member be kind enough to let me have a copy of that letter?

Mrs. NIELSEN: I shall be most pleased to do so.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall see that the matter is investigated at once.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Thank you. The question which northern Saskatchewan is facing at the present time is perhaps one of the most serious it has had to consider for some years. As some hon. members know, it was the southern part of Saskatchewan that suffered from the drought at one time, a situation which was acute; but during the last few years it has become noticeable that the drought belt has been moving northwards. I received another letter which I might read:

We are facing another terribly dry year. We have not had a rain to wet the roof of the house since the snow went, as you likely know. There was enough moisture in the summer fallows from the snow to start the wheat, but it cannot live much longer if we don't get rain. The grass is burning fast and the gardens not starting at all. The same old story.

This was written on May 26. Hon. members can picture the plight of these people, cut off relief and facing a crop failure, as far as they can judge at the present time. What are their reactions to the deliberations of this house? They are expecting that this government will at least continue with relief as it has done in the past and provide some better sustenance for the people. I have recently received from Saskatchewan a letter which will give the committee as nearly as possible the relief situation:

The relief inspectors have during the month of May informed the councils that the municipalities will have to take care of the indigents who are residents of the municipality without any further assistance from the government. In the case of one of the municipalities, this has meant that whereas up until the end of May they received $570 per month as a direct relief grant, they will not receive any further grants after the first of June, and that of course means that the resident ratepayers will have to be taxed to meet the additional costs imposed upon them. With farm commodity prices at their present levels and with the burden of debt from which the farmers already suffer, the additional taxation will create a very difficult situation.

I suggest that this government make a serious and detailed study of the amount of assistance which is going to be needed by the farmers of the west during the coming years. I suggest that this government find the money for the people of this country who are in need of it, as they have found the money for the war crisis; for the domestic crisis in this country is of equal importance and perhaps of more far-reaching importance.

Mr. McLARTY: I understand that there are other matters which require consideration. Obviously we are by no means finished with this debate. Therefore I should like to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

DISPOSITION OF MINES AND MINERALS ACQUIRED WITH OR UNDERLYING LANDS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce an amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act to authorize the director of soldier settlement, with the approval of the minister, to grant to the original soldier settler the mines and minerals acquired with the lands, and also to authorize the director to dispose of mines and minerals underlying land not under purchase contract by an original soldier settler.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. CRERAR: A few words of explanation of this resolution will be in order. There is a curious anomaly in the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919 respecting the disposition of minerals that may be found in or under the land; I think that is the descriptive phrase which is usually employed. This applies chiefly to the three prairie provinces. These areas were under federal control entirely until the western provinces were set up. In the early days, when land was alienated from the crown, the first alienations paid no regard to the minerals. Later on, the precious metals were reserved by the crown; that is, the title to precious metals in or under the ground did not pass to the purchaser. Later still, that reservation was extended to all minerals. When the Soldier Settlement Act came into operation, lands for soldier settlers acquired not only from crown granted lands but from lands held by private owners. In some instances the land purchased from private owners carried with it title to the minerals. In other instances the minerals were not transferred, being reserved by the private owner. The amendment proposed here seeks to make clear that where title to minerals was received through the acquisition of land for soldier settlers, it can be passed on to him now.

The question may reasonably be asked why it is necessary some twenty odd years after the passing of the original act to bring in a measure now to clear up this point. It is due mainly to the fact that in certain parts of Alberta oil has been discovered, and it is expected that, in the future, oil may be discovered in other areas where soldier settlers have acquired lands.

At the time of the passing of the original act, land or lands were defined as follows:

(i) "Land" or "lands" includes granted or ungranted, dominion, provincial or private lands, and real or immovable property—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It covered the whole field.

Mr. CRERAR:

—messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments of any tenure, and real rights, easements and servitudes, streams, water courses, waters, roads and ways, and all rights or interests in, or over, or arising out of, and all charges upon, land or lands as herein defined.

From a reading of this, I think it will be clear—I am so advised—that if a soldier settler came into possession of land from a private owner who under his title owned the minerals and was willing to pass that title on to the soldier settler, he was entitled to receive it. That is made clearer still, I think, if an examination is made of the discussion in parliament at the time the act was passed. It was not intended, and it never happened, where the soldier settler acquired land direct from the crown, that the minerals passed with it, because the general reservation that was put into effect years before, governed such alienation.

Curiously enough, section 57 of the Sc'dier Settlement Act, which section is now being repealed, reads:

From all sales and grants of land made by the board, all mines and minerals shall be and shall be deemed to have been reserved, whether or not the instrument of sale or grant so specifies, and as respects any contract or agreement made by it with respect to land it shall not be deemed to have thereby impliedly covenanted or agreed to grant, sell or convey any mines or minerals whatever.

The definition of lands I read a moment ago indicates the intention that the soldier settlement board should pass on to the soldier settler what it received from the purchaser from whom it bought the land. The section I have just read throws doubt upon the power of the board to do this, and it is to clear up that doubt that we ask the repeal of the section.

There is one other point to which I should like to draw the attention of the committee for a moment. The resolution states, in part:
. . . and also to authorize the director to dispose of mines and minerals underlying land not under purchase contract by an original soldier settler.

A good many instances have arisen where the soldier settler has passed out of the picture. That is, the land has come back to the director of soldier settlement. We are making it clear that in such case where the land reverted to the director of soldier settlement, and is again resold to a civilian, the mineral rights do not pass. In other words, the mineral rights pass only to the bona fide soldier settler who acquired them through the board by purchase from some private party at the time he made his selection. I hope I have made clear to the committee the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure that the minister has made himself clear to me, but that might be my fault and not that of the minister. In the older provinces I think the general rule has been that the mines and minerals in and under the earth have never passed with the original grants and the crown has always reserved those mines and minerals.

As I understand it, the minister is dealing with lands in the three prairie provinces which, at least in one category, were lands that were the property of the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada. And in the case of soldiers who took up those lands the minerals lying in or under the lands were expressly reserved to the crown. I understand those are not being affected by this proposed legislation.

Mr. CRERAR: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The crown still retains the mineral wealth under the land, including oil. I suppose oil comes under that category. But in the case of lands purchased by the soldier settlement board from individuals who had already received grants from the crown in the right of the dominion, do I understand the minister to say that in such cases there were occasions where the mineral rights had passed to the person who sold to the board, and that those subsequently were reserved when they passed to the soldier settler? It is in respect of those cases the minister now wants to vest the mineral wealth in the original soldier settler. That is the way I understand the minister's explanation respecting the first part of the resolution. Am I correct?

Mr. CRERAR: I think that is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are two categories with which I have dealt. All these lands were originally crown lands vested in his majesty in the right of the dominion. Was there ever a time in the history of the issue of these grants of land to the prairie provinces when the original grants did not reserve to the crown the mineral wealth?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then that would explain the difficulty which has been in my mind.

Mr. CRERAR: I have my notes before me, and they seem to make that point clear. Until 1883 all mineral rights were granted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That explains it, of course.

Mr. CRERAR: Those who are familiar with the early railway history associated with the building of the Canadian Pacific railway will recall that there were considerable grants of land to that railway to assist it in the building of its transcontinental line.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the mineral wealth passed with those grants?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; the mineral wealth passed with the grants prior to 1883. In the time between 1885 and 1887 only the precious minerals were reserved; in other words, coal and oil were not reserved. During that period, of course, lands passed to companies and to individuals who resold, and in those resales there were occasions when the owner reserved the mineral rights, while in other cases the mineral rights passed.

That brings us back to the amendment we propose here; where they did pass, and went along with the land, and such land was later acquired by the soldier settlement board for a soldier, we are attempting to make it clear beyond doubt that we can pass on to him all that we received when the land was purchased.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has given rise to this legislation? I suppose the minister will answer that the discovery of oil has been responsible.

Mr. CRERAR: That is one reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that would be a perfectly legitimate answer. But is there not something more than that? Have the soldiers applied for this change? How many applications are there? What is the value of what we are giving them? I would not want to deny a soldier anything; I want to be generous with the soldiers, but I should like to understand what we are doing.

Mr. CRERAR: As I recall, several instances have arisen where soldier settlers desired to dispose of mineral rights. They had thought they had the right to dispose of those rights. Certainly as I read the definition of the term "lands" in the Soldier Settlement Act—and I believe I am supported in this by the law officers of the crown—it was evidently intended that the mineral rights in such case should pass to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think it would depend on the terms of the conveyance.

Mr. CRERAR: Possibly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would think absolutely.

Mr. CRERAR: There is, however, a doubt in section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act, where it is expressly stated that "from all sales and grants of land made by the board, all mines and minerals shall be and shall be deemed to have been reserved." According to opinions which have been given to me, there is a conflict between the two sections in the act, and it is now our intention to clear up that difficulty.

Mr. WRIGHT: What would happen to the mineral rights of an original soldier settler who sold his land to another soldier settler, through the operations of the board? Would those mineral rights revert to the crown, or would they go to the soldier settler in person? Where would the rights be?

Mr. CRERAR: If the soldier settler in the first instance acquired the mineral rights, then they would pass on to the next soldier settler. That is the point we desire to make clear in the legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT: But in this instance they were crown lands, or school lands, in the original contract.

Mr. CRERAR: No, if the first soldier settler to whom the hon. member refers acquired his land direct from the crown, then the mineral rights were not conveyed with it and, of course, do not pass on to anyone else.

Mr. WRIGHT: They would still remain with the province?

Mr. CRERAR: Still remain in the crown.

Mr. COCKERAM: From what the minister has said, there are soldiers owning lands who think they also own the mineral rights. I take it that the government has been approached to purchase these mineral rights.

Mr. CRERAR: Does the hon, member mean "approached by the soldier settler?"

Mr. COCKERAM: No.

Mr. CRERAR: We want to make it clear that we can pass them on to the soldier settler.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many parcels of land will be affected by this legislation?

Mr. CRERAR: It is estimated that mineral rights were acquired with the land in about 1,200 cases where soldier settlers have repaid their loans. In all likelihood, in many instances there will be no minerals involved. For instance, a soldier settler in the Yorkton district of Saskatchewan would probably have no minerals in connection with his land. I cannot inform the committee the number of cases where mineral rights are known to exist.

Mr. SHAW: What percentage of those residing upon soldier settler lands are the original soldier settlers?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot give that information now. As a matter of fact, it does not arise in connection with a discussion of this resolution. When the estimates of the soldier settlement board are being considered that information will be available to the hon. member.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that there will be certain cases where the soldier settlement board will own the mineral rights, while the soldier settler or a civilian who may have bought out a soldier settler will own the land?

Mr. CRERAR: I should say offhand that if a soldier settler acquired mineral rights, paid for his land and then later sold 'he land to a civilian after having acquired title, he could reserve the mineral rights if he wished to do so. That would be a matter of contract between the two individuals.

Mr. GREEN: It hardly seems fair that the soldier settlement board should have title to the minerals, that they should not be passed on to the soldier settler or to whomever he may have sold his land.

Mr. CRERAR: The only case where mineral rights would be reserved would be where a soldier settler had acquired land with the mineral rights, later abandoned it and the land had come back into the hands of the board and then was resold to a civilian. In such a case the mineral rights would not go to the civilian.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would the original soldier settler have a right to the minerals on that land?

Mr. COLDWELL: If he had paid for the land.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not get that question.

Mr. ADAMSON: A case might arise in Cadillac township in Quebec where men might be settled after this war is over. They would receive the right to the minerals on the land from the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not in Quebec.

Mr. CRERAR: If the land was acquired from some individual or company having mineral rights in the land, and they passed with the land, then we are providing that that shall pass to the soldier. This is assuming that he has paid for the land. If the land is purchased for him and he fails to pay for it; if he abandons it or it is sold to a civilian, we are providing that the mineral rights shall not pass to the civilian purchaser, but shall be reserved by the board.

Mr. GREEN: In the case of an original soldier settler who dies, will the mineral rights go to his heirs?

Mr. CRERAR: I assume the hon, member has in mind a case where a soldier settler had made all payments on his land and acquired title. I should think in that case the mineral rights would go to his estate.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is the minister sure on that? It is an important matter. If a soldier had obtained land by meeting his obligations, is the minister sure that these rights would go to his heirs in the event of his death?

Mr. CRERAR: I think they would as a matter of common law.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. GREEN: This resolution states that you are taking power to grant to the original settler the mines and minerals acquired with the land. I want to know if you will also have power to grant those rights to his heirs if he has died in the meantime?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not unless it is in the statutes. I suggest to the minister that he look into that point.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall get some information upon that before we are in committee on the second reading.

Mr. COLDWELL: Suppose an original soldier settler sells his land; it passes to someone else, and he has no further interest in it; is the title to the minerals vested in the original soldier settler?

Mr. CRERAR: I would say that as a matter of common sense if a soldier settler acquired land that carried mineral rights, if he paid for his land and got title to it and then resold his land, he could either reserve the minerals or convey them to the purchaser.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not quite the question.

Mr. COLDWELL: An original soldier settler meets all his obligations and obtains title to his land. He sells it to another party. Are the minerals conveyed to the original settler?

Mr. CRERAR: That is the answer I gave.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said he could either reserve or convey. Supposing there is no arrangement between the two parties; who will hold the mineral rights as time goes on?

Mr. CRERAR: He has acquired title to the mineral rights with the land. That is his property and he can make any disposition of it he wishes. If he wants to sell it to my hon. friend, he can say the minerals go with the land, or he can say the minerals do not go with the land. I would say that this would be a matter of choice for the soldier settler.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is intended to grant to the original soldier settler the mines and minerals acquired with the land. Is this intended to cover a case where he did not receive the mineral rights in the original grant? Is the soldier settler to be granted the mineral rights acquired with that land? I must confess it is beyond me.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Crerar thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 31, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

377. Departmental administration, $106,080.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this item to provide under the act for aid to Canadian coal for the manufacture of iron and steel?

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The next item deals with that. The item before the committee is for departmental administration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the item it says:

An act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron or steel on a basis of equality with imported coal.

That is part of the next item, is it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I would say that that paragraph is misplaced in these estimates. Would the minister explain the item before the committee, which shows a salary increase?

Mr. MARSHALL: There are two sets of figures I should like to get from the minister, the amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939, and the amount spent, and the same figures for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940.

Mr. CHURCH: What has the minister done with the findings of the Tory commission on coal? I should also like to know what the government is doing about a national coal supply for Canada. The report of the Tory commission never mentioned the consumer of coal at all.

Mr. CRERAR: This item, No. 377, deals only with departmental administration. My hon. friend's remarks would come under the next item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has evidently fallen into the same error that I did. We must blame it on the printer because certainly the reference to coal should be placed under item 378.

I observe from the details on page 194 of the main estimates that the amount asked for this year for departmental administration is slightly less than last year's vote, and the number of employees is one more. Perhaps the minister would give the necessary explanation for the difference in each case. I should like to say to him that in my experience I found this a very well run department. He has a fine staff. I am sure they will be loyal to the present minister, and he will be well advised to be guided to a great degree by the heads of the different branches, because from my experience I am sure they will not lead him astray. During the term I presided over this department I saw in it less of political interference and that sort of thing than in any other department with which I had anything to do, although I never administered any other department. The Department of Trade and Commerce was remarkably free from partisanship, and I want to give that certificate of character to the officers in that department.

Before the minister explains the slight differences from last year's vote, might I suggest to him what I suggested to his colleagues this afternoon, that having regard to conditions in Europe and the consequent restriction of our commercial intelligence service, when vacancies occur they be not filled for the duration of the war unless they are for absolutely key men who must be taken on. Let us in that way save a dollar and earn our own salaries.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I was glad to hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) make such complimentary remarks about the officials of the department over which I have the honour to preside at the moment. In my own very short experience I have found the officials living up to the reputation which the hon. gentleman has given them.

To come to the item itself, the salaries for departmental administration last year amounted to $67,170, and this year, $68,520.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one additional stenographer. Does that account for the increase?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, there has been an increase of one in the number of stenographers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Should not the staff be more or less reduced in view of the fact that we cannot deal at all now with many countries where we formerly had trade commissioners? Work in the main office would be greatly reduced too, so instead of the staff being increased, I imagine it should be reduced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the policy of the department with respect to salaries of trade commissioners who have enlisted? I have in mind a gentleman who was in Glasgow, attached to the trade commissioner's office there as junior trade commissioner. He was home on furlough, and immediately war broke out he offered his services, and is now commanding a battery. Either he has proceeded overseas or he is about to proceed overseas. How is that young man being treated in the matter of salary? What is the policy as to paying salaries of civil servants who have enlisted and have gone or are going overseas in the Canadian active service force?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not discussed that matter either in council or with the officials of the department. At the present time the situation confronting our trade commissioners is grave. Many of them were in countries of northern Europe which have recently been overrun. Their work has ceased because they have had to leave the cities and the countries where they were located. The whole matter is under consideration by the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course they ought to be withdrawn, brought home and given some useful work in some other sphere of activity in the government service. This question of the treatment of civil servants who have enlisted and become a part of the Canadian active service force is an important These men must be treated fairly; they have shown great loyalty, and I for one would be prepared to be generous. I hope the minister feels the same way about the matter. I think we should have some definite statement of policy on the part of the government, because I have no doubt that many such cases will arise. Of course a policy should have been established long ago. I am just a little astonished that the minister has not met this question before. All the big companies in this country have had to deal with this question, and they have laid down policies which, with respect to permanent men, if I may so term them, have been generous. Men who are temporary employees fall of course into another category; but these officials were appointed by the civil service commission after a rigid examination; they needed a high standing before they could make the grade to become trade commissioners, and all of them have family responsibilities. I hope the minister will treat them generously, and that, when his estimates come up again for consideration, he will be able to tell us just what is being done in cases of this kind.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I should be glad to do that. It might be dealt with under the item relating to trade commissioners.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is understood that we can then discuss this matter?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes. Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister care to give any statement with respect to the policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce? Markets have been lost in several countries of Europe, and we shall have to work pretty hard to make up for those losses. It is important that we maintain our trade balance. It might be interesting under this item to have some statement of policy, because I do not know when we shall have an opportunity of again discussing the subject.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think there will be ample opportunity under later items for the hon. member for St. Paul's to speak particularly on that matter.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This relates to administration, and it seems to me that the question of policy in the department could quite properly be dealt with by the minister under this item. It would perhaps facilitate the discussion of other items if we had some idea of what the policy was to be along the lines which I have just mentioned. I do not think that is too much to ask. I know that all hon members are interested.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): At the present time it will obviously and necessarily be the duty of the department to seek in every place new avenues of trade. Nobody knows better than the hon. member for St. Paul's the state of the world at present and the fact that our markets in many countries are contracted and contracting very sharply. I am quite aware that this condition necessitates as far as possible finding new markets on this continent and elsewhere. The matter has been discussed in the department, and every effort will be made to increase our trade so as to compensate us for what has been lost.

Mr. PERLEY: I believe it has usually been the custom on this first item for the minister to state under what item we shall have an opportunity of discussing the question of marketing generally, and particularly pertaining to grain. According to the wording of the item I do not find that there is any item under which that question can properly be taken up. I believe in previous years it was the custom of the minister to state, upon the item we are now discussing, under what item we should have an opportunity of a general discussion on marketing.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I anticipated that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and other hon. members would have an opportunity for discussing this matter under the item relating to the board of grain commissioners, or dealing with the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are other matters besides grain to be discussed. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) smiles: probably fish will enter into the discussion.

There is a matter of importance which concerns not only rural Ontario but the urban population as well. The minister knows that a prohibition has been put upon the export of canned tomatoes to Great Britain. That is going to affect a great many people. Certain other items are also affected. What are the possibilities of marketing, not only canned tomatoes, but peaches? It seems to me that it is only right that the growers of these various articles should know something about their position. I have no doubt that the canners are advising the growers at the present time with respect to tomatoes. I know that has been done in some directions; but I think it should be generally known, or before long we shall have a big crop of tomatoes from Ontario and no place to sell them. There are other problems, for instance the export of apples. We should have some general idea of the possibilities of marketing and what action the government are taking, what real efforts they are putting forward to replace the markets which we have lost and other markets which probably we shall lose.

I do not criticize the amount of these estimates. I know the department is efficient, and possibly it might be important under conditions prevailing to-day to have a larger appropriation so that a real effort could be made to establish other markets for the things of which I have spoken. I suggest it would be well for the minister to give the committee a general idea of the policy which the government have formulated with respect to these matters at the present time.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): At the present moment the department is dealing not with a theory but with an actual fact, the fact of disappearing markets. Restrictions are being raised against imports from Canada in nearly all our sister dominions and in other parts of the world, and all I can say is that the department is fully aware of the situation and is taking every step possible in the meantime to urge that the restrictions be relaxed. We are doing this through our trade commissioners in the sister dominions and through the high commissioner in London as well as in other ways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is new to the department and I appreciate the circumstances under which he is labouring. The withdrawal of these markets must be a staggering blow to the department, and a great embarrassment. Perhaps this discussion will serve as a notice to the minister that at a later date we shall expect from him a statement of policy as to what is going to be done to replace the disappearing markets.

May I advert to a matter that is nearly five years old. Prior to leaving the department I had it in mind that in the then succeeding estimates there would be an appropriation looking to the extension of markets for potatoes from the martime provinces in South America and in Central America. Unfortunately we were defeated and the then government went out of office. In New Brunswick the provincial minister of agriculture is a trained agriculturist; there is no one who is more familiar with the necessity of extending our markets for the one big agricultural product of New Brunswick, namely, potatoes. I told him, in a conference which he was good enough to hold with me, exactly what I had in mind, namely, that I would ask parliament to grant the sum of $25,000 for the extension of markets for these products of the maritimes, fish and potatoes, in the southern countries, and that I felt certain that if they would make the necessary representations to the incoming minister, who was well known to me, he would cooperate with the provincial government in that regard. I even went to the trouble of dictating and signing a letter to the minister's immediate predecessor, which he was to take to Ottawa and which he could use. I assume that he used it. I never heard anything more about it afterwards, because I went away for the winter. The letter asked the government to cooperate with the provincial department with a view to extending markets for New Brunswick potatoes and fish. If I remember rightly, the minister told me subsequently that he had an interview with the then Minister of Trade and Commerce but that there was no result. That was a great pity. It was not for the benefit of New Brunswick alone; it was for the three maritime provinces; and the intention was that the government of Canada should assist the government of New Brunswick and the governments of the other maritime provinces, if they came into the scheme, in extending markets for these two staple products of the maritimes.

The government of New Brunswick went on with the scheme in a limited way. They have had a man, whom we had in the provincial government prior to 1935, visiting South America annually, and he has been a good salesman, having been instrumental in getting very substantial orders. But the whole situation has not been thoroughly surveyed, and I would ask the minister to be good enough to look into it again. Perhaps in the supplementary estimates he can do something. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) knows what I am talking about, and I am astonished that he has not done anything in the five years that he has been in office. I am not finding fault with him, because he has not done much about anything.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon, member must have been sleeping in the last five years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No: I have been watching. I know he has been drawing salary, but that is about all. I am suggesting to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce that he look sympathetically into this question of extending markets for the two primary products of the maritime provinces, and that he give warm and sympathetic cooperation to the departments of agriculture in the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, with a view to extending our markets, particularly for seed potatoes, in the southern republics of Central America and in the West Indies-and I particularly commend the market in Cuba. I understand that the Canada-West Indies trade treaty is presently up for consideration and review. I appreciate the difficulties the minister may run into in trying to extend the market for our potatoes in Cuba, having regard to the obligations which we have incurred under the treaty in question with respect to the preference for sugar in our markets. The matter is a difficult one, but I suggest to the minister that the Cuban market for potatoes in any normal time is better than all the rest of those markets put together. I hope he will give consideration to the plea I now make for cooperation between his department and the province of New Brunswick with respect to this outlet for these two staple commodities. New Brunswick has not the money available to make any lavish expenditures in extending markets, and I think this government ought to do something about the matter. They will be entitled to all the commendation, all the laurels coming to them, if they can accomplish something in this direction.

Mr. CRERAR: We are anxious to get another department in to-night; therefore, I should like this item to stand.

Item stands.

These two issues were secured by the lines of railway specified in question No. 1.

The bonds and debenture stock are held uncancelled to the order of the Canadian National Railway Company.

WAR VETERANS BATTALION

Mr. CHURCH:

- 1. Will the Minister of National Defence give consideration to the formation of a battalion for the second or third division to be manned and officered entirely by veterans of the great war from coast to coast, to include, where available, veterans from every city, town, village and township in Canada?
- 2. Would the minister kindly request a survey on this, and later give the house information?

Mr. ROGERS: The approved government policy is that so long as N.P.A.M. units are available these are to be used as the basis for the formation of C.A.S.F. units.

Veterans will now have the following opportunities for service, which in my opinion will absorb the bulk of those who are suitable for military service: (a) With mobilized and unmobilized units, depots, and training centres, provided they can comply with the physical and age requirements. (b) With veterans' home guard companies. (c) Various appointments for officers and other ranks at national defence headquarters and headquarters of districts as a result of the general expansion of our war effort.

In the circumstances, it is felt that a unit such as is suggested should not be authorized at this time.

*CANADA-WEST INDIES TREATY

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. When does the government intend making a revision of the Canada-West Indies treaty?

2. If so, when, and will the government take into consideration the loss of our market for fish and potatoes in Cuba, and endeavour to have these markets available to producers of these products in the maritime provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An answer to this question would involve a statement of government policy. The government's policy with respect to the matter referred to will be made known in due course and not in answer to a question.

UNSOLD PORTIONS OF 1938 AND 1939 WHEAT CROPS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many bushels of wheat crops for each of the years 1938 and 1939 remained unsold?

2. How many bushels of the crops of each of the said years are to-day (a) in storage in Canada, (b) in storage in the United States of America?

3. What amounts have been paid or are payable for wheat stored in the United States of America for each of the months from August, 1939, to May, 1940, inclusive?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. It is not possible to give the percentage of the 1939 wheat crop that has been sold partly because it is merged with the carryover of old crop wheat at July 31, 1939, and also because the regularly published statistics relate to export shipments rather than to sales. The carryover of Canadian wheat in Canada and the United States at July 31, 1939, was 102,161,568 bushels and the 1939 crop was 489,623,000 bushels, making total supplies of 591,784,568 bushels. From this figure must be deducted the estimated domestic requirements for the 1939-40 crop year of 128,000,000 bushels, leaving 463,784,568 bushels for export during the crop year or carryover at July 31, 1940. The export shipments of wheat and wheat flour from August 1, 1939, to May 25, 1940, were 164,545,988 bushels, leaving a balance of 299,238,580 bushels for export or carryover on May 25, 1940.

[Mr. Rogers.]

- 2. (a) Canadian wheat in store in Canada on May 24, 1940, 261,663,967 bushels (b) Canadian wheat in store in the United States on May 24, 1940, 20,577,807 bushels. Amounts of 1938 and 1939 crops in store are not compiled separately.
- 3. No wheat owned by the Canadian wheat board is stored in the United States.

- 2. If so, is there a discrepancy in date, and for what reason?
- 3. Are these plans still on file in the Department of Munitions and Supply?
- 4. If they do not refer to the same plans, why has no action been taken to manufacture tanks in accordance with the specifications, File No. K-3756?

1. Are trucks and cars sometimes rented by the dominion government for the training of soldiers?

2. If so, what is the price paid for the use of such cars and trucks?

3. Is the privilege of supplying such cars and trucks awarded as a result of tenders received?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. The regulations provided that the following rates must not be exceeded: Motor cycles, solo, $3 per day; motor cycles, with side cars, $5 per day, motor trucks, $10 per day; motor cars carrying up to three persons, $8 per day; motor cars carrying four or more persons, $10 per day.

3. In some cases, tenders have been called by the Department of Munitions and Supply for the hiring of transport in the districts requiring the same. However, district officers commanding have been authorized by national defence headquarters to hire transport as and when required in cases of emergency, and the calling of tenders is left to their discretion, dependent upon the urgency of the situation.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RELEASES FROM INTERNMENT CAMPS—REFERENCE TO MOTION OF MR. CASTLEDEN FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS ON JUNE 3

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this order of business is passed might I call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to a motion of the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden):

For a return showing a list of all persons released in 1939-40 from internment camps in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Ontario, together with the dates of release and reasons therefor.

The motion appears at page 438 of Hansard of June 3, 1940. The minister on that occasion, after some interchange between him and myself, undertook that this motion should stand with the amendment I suggested. I find that it does not appear in the orders of the day for June 4, having been dropped from the order paper; neither does it appear among the motions for production of papers on to-day's order paper. It does seem to me that some explanation is due from the minister. The motion should be restored to its proper place.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): My attention was drawn to this matter by the hon. member for Yorkton. I have no objection to the motion being reinserted, but I must say I would have objection to its being carried. Perhaps it would be better to wait until the motion comes up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the amendment suggested.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): with the amendment. I discussed this matter with the officers who have charge of this matter and we have come to the conclusion that it is not fair to the individuals who may have been interned on mere suspicion and subsequently released after investigation that their names should be published all over Canada and they become branded in their own community as suspicious characters. Some people were interned purely as a precautionary measure merely on a report from somebody, and the police themselves did not insist on these people being kept in custody if there was nothing against them. We believe that it is not fair to give out the names of these people. However, I am willing to consider the matter again.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT RESPECTING MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

On the order for government notices of motion:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon, friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me yesterday just when the government would take up the motion that appears in my name respecting the defence of Canada regulations. If it would suit the convenience of hon. members I would introduce the motion on Monday next.

May I say that the word I wished to have with my hon. friend about the motion was this. The motion is for the appointment of a committee to consider the defence of Canada regulations. At and prior to the time the motion was drafted the government was being criticized for having gone too far in its regulations. Since however the motion was placed on the order paper most of the criticism has been the other way, namely, that the regulations do not go far enough. In the circumstances I should like to amend the resolution before presenting it to the house so that it will cover the broad question of whether the regulations go too far or not far enough. With that in mind I will have the resolution appear in revised form on the order paper for Monday. The debate will take place on the motion as thus revised on Monday next.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): The regulations are printed and available, are they not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, they were printed at the time they were passed.

Mr. STIRLING: Have they been distributed in one volume, or have we received them from time to time over the months?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My recollection is that they were distributed at the last session of the last parliament in the form of a red book, and further copies have been distributed since.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the committee also deal with the motion I have made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. What my hon, friend wished to have investigated will come within the scope of the revised motion.

AMENDMENT OF DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULA-TIONS DECLARING CERTAIN ORGANIZATIONS ILLEGAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house copy of order in council amending the defence of Canada regulations by adding a section which I consider very important. It declares illegal certain associations, societies, groups or organizations in Canada. Perhaps I might read the list:

The Auslands Organization of the National Sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei.

The Deutsche Arbeitsfront.

The Canadian Society for German Culture (Deutscher Bund fur Kanada).

The National Unity Party. Canadian Union of Fascists.

The Communist Party of Canada.

The Young Communist League of Canada. The Canadian Labour Defence League. The League for Peace and Democracy. The Ukrainian Labour Farmer Temple Association.

The Finnish Organization of Canada.

The Russian Workers and Farmers Club. The Croatian Cultural Association. The Hungarian Workers Club.

The Polish People's Association. The Canadian Ukrainian Youth Federation.

This order will be published in the Canada Gazette and from the date of its publication any person who is a member of any of these organizations will be guilty of an offence.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY IN NIAGARA PENIN-SULA-FACILITIES FOR ENLISTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I gave previous notice of these questions to the government, or to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) as he was primarily concerned. I assume I may be permitted just to explain that these questions arise as a consequence of letters and telegrams which I am receiving continually.

- 1. Will the present military guard, only recently established at the hydro power plant at Queenston, be maintained on all power plants in the Niagara peninsula?
- 2. Will authority be given the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to increase substantially the present guard on the Welland ship canal?
- 3. What steps are being taken to concentrate and control the distribution of large quantities of explosives being shipped into the Niagara peninsula?

- 4. What precautionary measures have been taken to check all persons and cars, entering the Niagara peninsula from the United States, at the four or more entry points in that area?
- 5. Are main line railway and other important bridges being guarded in the Niagara peninsula?
- 6. To what extent are, or will, qualified war veterans be utilized or permitted to implement the protective units in the Niagara peninsula?
- 7. What facilities are being provided in the Niagara peninsula for enlistment and when will these facilities be provided?

I would appreciate having this information so that I can reply to numerous inquiries.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): As some of these questions refer to measures which may be taken by the Department of National Defence, may I suggest to my hon. friend that he place his questions on the order paper? I have certainly not received from him any such questions as all of these which he has presented this afternoon. My hon. friend did discuss the protection of the Niagara peninsula and the Welland canal, and, as he is aware, I took measures at once to deal with that situation and have it studied. As a matter of fact the district officer commanding that district is making the necessary recommendations in that regard.

As far as the other questions are concerned, they affect a number of departments, and I suggest they should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I be permitted to supplement what I have said? In answer to the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon, member would be out of order. He has asked his questions and the minister has replied.

Mr. LOCKHART: Thank you very much.

WAR REFUGEES

INQUIRY RESPECTING APPEAL OF RED CROSS FOR BLANKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) or to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers). A few days ago a nation-wide call went out through the whole country for blankets. It was generally presumed that they were for the Red Cross. I have had some correspondence and some calls with regard to this appeal which indicate that the blankets are not for the Red Cross but for refugees, soldiers and hospital patients. A great many patriotic people and organizations got busy and went out and purchased a lot of blankets and paid the retail price for them. If the facts are as I understand them, it is the government's responsibility to supply these blankets. The people are really paying too much for them. I would ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of National Defence to clear this matter up.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I happen to have some knowledge of the matter, quite by accident, because my wife is associated with Red Cross work. An appeal was sent out by the Red Cross for blankets for refugees either in France or elsewhere on the continent, and neither the war supply board nor the Department of National Defence nor any department of government had any part in the matter at all.

CANADIANS IN ENGLAND

QUESTION AS TO STATUS WITH RESPECT TO ENLISTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) a question, based upon a cable dispatch in the Canadian press of yesterday. Can Canadians who were domiciled in England at the outbreak of war enlist over there in the Canadian forces as they did in the great war? The same question was raised in the British house yesterday morning. Will the minister look into the matter and give a reply at his convenience? In the last war it was very easy for Canadians living over there to sign up.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I shall be very glad to take notice of the question. I may say at the moment that authority has been given for the limited enlistment of Canadians overseas for special purposes.

Mr. CHURCH: Have they to return to Canada to enlist?

Mr. ROGERS: No. But the authority is limited at the present time.

Mr. CHURCH: A little too much "status."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister enlarge a little on the question of the limited authority for special purposes?—because apparently that, after all, is very much limited.

Mr. ROGERS: I will take notice of the questions and answer them later.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BRUCE

STATEMENT AS TO FACILITIES FOR MANUFACTURE OF TANKS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

My attention has been called to a statement made in the house on May 28th by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in replying to a reference made by me earlier in the day to a Canadian factory's ability to make tanks. The minister stated, as reported in Hansard on page 309:

So when a man stands up and makes reckless statements about two firms in Hamilton that can build tanks—

And so on. I wish to tell the minister that I am not in the habit of making reckless statements.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. THORSON: The hon, member should state his point of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege. He must state his point.

Mr. BRUCE: I will explain it all in a moment.

An hon. MEMBER: State it now.

Mr. BRUCE: My whole training and habit of life have been to observe scientific accuracy, and I resent the minister's accusation.

Some hon, MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: If the minister will refer to page 302—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon, member may state his question of privilege and invite an answer, but he must not make any statement other than an expression of opinion or statement of fact in asking the privilege of the house to deny or affirm a statement which has been made. I will ask the hon, member to be as brief as possible in making his statement.

Mr. BRUCE: I will make this as brief as possible, Mr. Speaker. If the minister will refer to page 302, he will see that I based my remarks upon a statement made in another place by an hon. member of high standing, to the effect that there were "two factories in Hamilton, one of which could produce two hundred and fifty tanks a month." I did not then qualify that statement, but surely the minister would understand this to mean that this factory could produce the tanks specified only after receiving the order and when it has got into production. When, in answer to the question, the Minister of Munitions and Supply made the statement in the house on May 28—

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I protest. I did not mention the hon. gentleman's name in connection with that remark. There is no question of privilege.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister might possess himself in patience for a few minutes.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But he is right.

Mr. HOWE: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon, member might state his question of privilege, and make his denial. I think that can be done very briefly.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary for me to say a few words in order to show that I was not making a reckless statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not think it is sufficient simply for me to deny having made a reckless statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to give the hon. member every consideration. He is asking on a question of privilege to make a denial of statements having been made, or of motives which have been attributed to him. If he will state what has been said and make his denial, he is then exercising his right of privilege. The hon. member might accept my suggestion that, on a question of privilege, he is entitled if he wishes to defer the matter and have the question of privilege stated to-morrow. I suggest that he do that.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I will accept your decision.

VETERANS HOME GUARD

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF UNIT IN MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 2

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): On June 3 the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) was kind enough to say that he would answer a question I then asked as to when the veterans home guard for military district No. 2 would be established and who would be the senior officer in charge. Will the minister now give that information?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I can give my hon. friend the greater part of the information.

Instructions were issued to Brigadier R. O. Alexander, D.S.O., District Officer Commanding, Military District No. 2, for the organization of two companies of the veterans home guard in his military district, and the organization is now proceeding under the auspices of the district officer commanding. Major Charles Bethune Lindsay, D.S.O., has been appointed to command No. 2A company. Information is not yet available as to the command of No. 2B company.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

QUESTION AS TO ADVISABILITY OF IMMEDIATE ACTION IN VIEW OF WAR CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the steadily increasing crisis inside as well as outside this country, will the government state whether they will give consideration to the advisability of an immediate national registration of every man and woman in Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That question is one which will be duly considered.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

ORDER IN COUNCIL OF AUGUST 11, 1939, TO HAVE FORCE AND EFFECT OF STATUTE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 28, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Order in council to have force and effect as from the 11th of August, 1939.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): understand it, this bill arises out of one of the recommendations of the house committee on superannuation, of which there were twentyeight, and is one which would not involve large expenditures of money, to paraphrase what the minister said on a previous occasion. I am wondering whether the method of approving an order in council by legislation, one which I have not seen adopted before, is the proper mode of procedure. Should it not be in the form of an ordinary bill to amend the Superannuation Act and containing the various provisions set out in the order in council? I throw that out as the first suggestion. Such a bill could be expressed as being retroactive to August 11, 1939, the date on which the order in council became effective. It is merely a matter of procedure. It is not a matter of great consequence but it is a thought that has occurred to me and I pass it on to the minister for what it is worth. I would assume that the minister and the officers of his department, or whoever has charge of the operations of the Superannuation Act, must have given consideration to the method.

The second point which I desire to direct to the attention of the minister has perhaps a little more meat in it. Is there any statutory authority enabling the governor in council to approve the provisions contained in the order in council of August 11, 1939, P.C. 2261? In the brief time at my disposal I have endeavoured to go through the Civil Service Act and amendments and I must say that I have not been able to find any such authority upon which such an order in council could be based, and I am inclined to think that there is none; otherwise this confirmatory legislation would not now be before the house.

The third point is this. The order in council purports only to give effect to such recommendations of the House of Commons committee on civil service superannuation—which committee, I understand, sat through two years—as could be approved by order in council, but the recommendations given effect to by order in council and approved by this bill are:

- (a) An increase in contribution, for salaries exceeding \$1,200 but not exceeding \$1,500, from 5 per cent to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That, I believe, is in accordance with the recommendation. Salaries in excess of \$1,500 are to pay 6 per cent. I need not labour that.
- (b) Only that service for which contribution has been made shall be counted as service for superannuation purposes. In other words, no more free service is to be counted. That is the intent, I think.
- (c) Active service overseas during the great war shall be counted, with certain restrictions, as service for superannuation purposes.
- (d) Contributors appointed other than by the civil service commission shall be required to furnish a certificate of health before being permitted to come under the act.

Of course, there were a great many other recommendations in the report of the house committee. These recommendations were unanimously approved by the house, I am informed, on May 24, 1939 and no action has been taken to give effect to them, for the reasons suggested by the minister. I think the reasons given are good ones, having regard to the situation in which we find ourselves—that is to say, that a good many of the recommendations would involve the payment of large sums of money which the treasury could not sustain at the present time.

But some of these recommendations would not entail any substantial contributions from the treasury. For instance, there is a recommendation that provision be made to enable temporary employees occupying positions of continuing indeterminate duration to come under the act. This provision appears to have been made by order in council P.C. 2262. Why is this order in council not approved by this bill? What statutory authority exists therefor?

Mr. ILSLEY: What recommendation is that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That provision be made to enable temporary employees occupying positions of indeterminate duration to come under the act. Provision is made for that under P.C. 2262. Order in council P.C. 2261 is the one attached as an appendix to this bill; I am referring now to P.C. 2262, which was passed in pursuance of the recommendations of the house committee with respect to provision being made to enable temporary employees occupying positions of continuing indeterminate duration to come under the act. Why is this order in council, P.C. 2262, not approved by legislation? What is the existing statutory authority for passing that order in council? It may be that it is quite in order, I do not know; I am simply asking for information.

I am not going through all the list of the twenty-eight recommendations that were made. There is, I think, ample reason why the government should not have taken action at this time, notwithstanding the unanimous approval given by the house a year or so ago. I should like the minister to answer the two questions: What is the statutory authority for passing P.C. No. 2261; and if statutory authority was required for the passing of that order in council, why is P.C. No. 2262 regarding temporaries not approved by this legislation, or is there statutory authority in the latter case and not in the former?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall take the last question first. There were two committees; one dealing with the Civil Service Act, and the other dealing with the Civil Service Superannuation Act. There were two orders in council. One order in council is that now being ratified, which appears as an appendix to this bill. The report of the law officers now is that the government had not the authority to do some of the things that the governor in council last August attempted to do under this order in council, and that is the reason for this legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that would be quite apparent; that is why the minister brought down this bill. Prior to the enactment of P.C. No. 2261, did the government have a legal opinion as to the legality of the procedure in that order in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The officers of the treasury board had the officers of the Department of Justice draw up the order in council. The officers of the treasury board felt that it was within the powers of the governor in council to pass it, and they were not corrected on that point by the officers of the Department of Justice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question of legality did not arise at that time?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not squarely faced at that time; no opinion was sought. There seemed to be an assumption that this could be done. The matter was perhaps not considered with great care because of the fact that agreements were taken from contributors by which they undertook to accept these provisions, whether they were authorized by statute or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) That is, there was protection by reason of taking these agreements?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now that is the first one.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon, gentleman wants me to continue about the other. No question has arisen as to the other order in council or any part of it being beyond the powers of the governor in council. I must say I have not examined its provisions with care from the legal point of view, but the other order in council, I am informed, is passed under powers conferred on the governor in council by the Civil Service Act. It is not an order in council purporting to deal with matters arising under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and no one has ever questioned the legality of its provisions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am wary about giving legal opinions in parliament; in fact I am not going to do that; I am not paid to do it. But I wish the minister would give consideration to that aspect of the matter. I do not want to hold up this bill; I have no such intention. I quite realize that in the first case attention has been drawn to the doubt that does exist under present statutory authority as to the power to pass the order in council that the minister is now having ratified. I wish that before third reading the minister would consider the question whether there is statutory authority for the passing of the other order in council to which I refer. If there is statutory authority, of course that settles the matter; but the query arises because of the doubt that must have arisen, with which I find myself in agreement, as to the authority of the governor in council to pass the order in council which we are now ratifying. I am not questioning the principle of the bill. The minister will consider the question to which I have referred, and let us know before the third reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I call attention to what I assume is a typographical error on page 2 of the schedule, in the table of contributions. Evidently the amount of salary in the first line of that table should be $1,200 instead of $200.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Then on the same page it says that contributors will be required to furnish a certificate of health before coming under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Does that mean such a certificate of health as would be required by a person applying for life insurance? I take it that it means a reasonable expectation of life at the person's age. This act will apply almost entirely to more or less elderly people, people over fifty, or between forty and fifty. No man at that age is as thoroughly sound as one at twenty, and probably could not pass an examination for life insurance. I take it the spirit of the legislation is to require only such a certificate of health as shows likelihood of continuance of the civil servant in his occupation for a reasonable number of years, according to his age, not that he must be thoroughly sound in every way.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Civil Service Act provides that civil servants before they become permanent, certainly at one stage, must, as a condition precedent to that, pass a medical examination. That applies to all civil servants appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I do not know whether the standard of physical fitness is as high as would be required of persons applying for life insurance, but whatever the standard is, it is applied to persons who by virtue of this order in council are admitted to the benefits of the superannuation fund, or come under that fund. It is not limited to elderly civil servants or to a class of civil servants of whom the great majority are elderly. It extends, for instance, to all the employees of the income tax division, none of whom was appointed by the civil service commission. After this order in council was passed, all those employees who were permanent or who were seeking to become permanent were obliged to pass a physical examination before they were admitted to the benefits of the superannuation fund. The reason is apparent. It would not be fair to the fund to place upon it persons whose expectancy of life is short.

Mr. NEILL: The answer to that naturally is that those who come in now as elderly people are those who have survived; the weaklings have been weeded out by sickness or death. To these men the minister's argument would apply under ordinary conditions. But the minister must remember that these men who come in now must pay for the whole of their past period of service. The fund will be benefited by the fact that these men coming in now will have to pay some twenty or thirty years' arrears at six per cent-not five per cent—and the fund certainly will not suffer in that regard. Those on whom the fund would lose through their falling out at an early age have been eliminated. What the minister says about the income tax branch of the civil service is true, yet this bill is in great part retroactive. It provides a method of coming under the superannuation fund for people who have not enjoyed that privilege in the past, and there is no doubt that the great majority of these people will have to make contributions covering a considerable period of time. If they are going to be held down to a strict medical certificate of health, just as though they were entering the service at the age of twenty-five or thirty-five, I am afraid very few will qualify. The inspection can be as strict as is desired when men first enter the service; but when we are doing what we consider to be a retroactive act of justice for these people, I do not think it should be so narrowed down that they must qualify in absolutely every way by passing a strict medical examination. If it is, a great many people whom the legislation is intended to benefit will miss out.

While I am on my feet there is another matter I should like to mention. I see provision is made that these people will be allowed to count their war service, but only until November 11, 1918; and they have to pay their back premiums for that period, as is quite proper. But I know cases have arisen of men who, after November 11, 1918, were sent into Germany and to other points, and continued in active military service. They were not asked if they wanted to go; they were sent, and some of them did not get back to this country for perhaps a year or eighteen months after November 11, 1918. Under this provision these men will have to pay six per cent on the average salary during their first three years of service in the department when possibly they were getting only $1.10 a day overseas. In such cases I think it is hardly fair that they should have to pay six per cent on perhaps $150 a month for a period of twelve or eighteen months when they were kept in the army and drawing very much less pay than that. I should like the minister's reaction to that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that all these matters were gone into fully by the parliamentary committee which dealt with the question. I am not prepared to argue the case for accepting the rates of pay during the first three years of service as the basis, but in many cases it would operate to the benefit of the contributor rather than against him.

Mr. NEILL: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. I am quite satisfied with that basis, but my point was that they should not be required to pay six per cent on that average for the period of time they were still in the army, receiving perhaps $1.10 a day. I suggest they should be taxed six per cent of their average salary during the first three years of service but not for the period when they were actively at war, either before or following November 11, 1918.

I should like to mention one other matter. I am not making very much headway, but I consider it my duty to bring up these points. The minister said that these matters were carefully considered by the committee. That is so, but we have often seen this house and the government, in their good judgment, make substantial changes in policies laid down or suggested by committees. We have only to look at this very recommendation now under consideration, which is only one of twentyeight. The government saw fit, and perhaps quite properly, to pay no attention to the other twenty-seven recommendations. So it does not follow that it is the law of the Medes and Persians just because a committee recommended it. I would suggest that all our legislation should be dealt with on its merits rather than in view of the fact that some committee recommended this, that or something else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or a royal commission.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; the same thing applies to royal commissions; we do not always carry out what they recommend.

I should like to mention one other matter to the minister, if I could get him in a generous humour. It affects very few men, perhaps not more than a dozen, who were working on boats of the Department of Fisheries which were taken over by the navy. Some of these men were compelled, because they were members of the reserve to go with the boats while others volunteered to serve their country, and surely they should get all credit for doing that. According to the departmental interpretation, from letters I have before me, these men will not be eligible to come under this superannuation provision, because at the present moment they are not servants of the fisheries department but servants of the navy, and of course for the time being the navy is making provision in case of death on account of war service. The point is that the year within which they must decide lapses next Auguşt, and after that they will not be able to take advantage of this provision.

I certainly think something should be done so that when these men are released from the navy they may have the privilege of coming under the superannuation act. It seems to me that would be only following a basic principle of justice. Even to-day the navy will not take care of them if they contract some disease which is not attributable to war service, and in the meantime they are out of luck. I have before me correspondence which in effect says, "We do not regard you as being our employees any longer, and we accept no responsibility." I also have a copy of a letter from the Vancouver office stating that these men are on leave of absence, loaned to the navy, presumably for the duration of the war. That being so, they are still employees of the Department of Fisheries; and, being employees of that department, either now or when the war is over they should be allowed to obtain the benefits of this act. Instead of that, we have a section here which states that unless they make their choice within one year from last August, they will not be able to apply at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman spoke to me about those employees of the Department of Fisheries who are now members of the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, if that is the branch to which they belong—

Mr. NEILL: Not all of them; some volunteered.

Mr. ILSLEY: I made inquiries in that regard, and the information I receive is that the question of giving these employees permanent status is now under consideration by the fisheries department, which is prepared or disposed to consider—I would not presume to make too definite a statement—that these employees will be regarded as on leave from that department without pay, while on active service. If the department can do that legally, and does it, I think it meets the hon. gentleman completely.

Mr. NEILL: Then they would be eligible when they returned to the service?

Mr. ILSLEY: If these men are regarded as fisheries employees on leave without pay while on active service, then they come within the terms of another order in council which provides that they can continue under the superannuation act, and their period of war service will count. There was an order in council passed on September 7, 1939, covering all permanent civil servants on leave without pay.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister let me have a copy of that order in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But what is the position with regard to the other question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, respecting those who were on active service in a theatre of war after November 11, 1918? It may be that there are none, but I assume there are a few. Some were serving in Siberia; some went to Murmansk. The hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) I believe was sent up there. Some consideration might be given to these men. I have not been asked to speak about the matter, but I hope they will be treated fairly.

Mr. LOCKHART: Many of these men were not discharged until many months after the armistice, and I do not think a set date was considered. It seems to me there is discrepancy here.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is certainly open to argument that it should be the date of discharge rather than November 11, 1918. But it is not so stated in the order in council, and I should not like to change the order in council now. We consider it rather important not to open up this superannuation question.

Mr. LOCKHART: There may be cases of discrimination.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is not much discrimination. Will the hon member consider what is being done? Men who were not working at their ordinary duties in the civil service, but who were overseas, are being allowed to count that time as though they were in the service. There have always been two quite strong opinions as to whether that should be done at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is generous treatment; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that this cut-off date of November 11, 1918, was decided on because of the knowledge that there were two opinions about the matter. It may be that for that reason this date was selected instead of the date of discharge.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the date of discharge would have been a better date.

Mr. ILSLEY: A more logical date.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are penitentiary guards eligible to benefits under this act?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are some penitentiary guards who have a permanent status, and they would come under the act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are they subject to removal by the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The officers and guards in the penitentiaries were taken away from the civil service commission some years ago when Mr. Guthrie was Minister of Justice. At that time I agreed with him because I felt that qualified men could not be appointed to positions in the penitentiaries by means of competitive examinations or boards of the civil service commission. The work in the penitentiaries is to some extent, similar to military operations. Surely you would not have a soldier appointed by the civil service commission. This work is not at all similar to that done by clerks, stenographers and other members of the service.

Mr. ILSLEY: They may be eligible for the benefits of the fund just the same. The appointment is not the important thing. They may be permanent and therefore entitled to the benefits of the act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They still receive benefits?

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are permanent.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the civil service commission is not qualified to appoint warders, who is qualified to make the recommendation?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The superintendent of penitentiaries, the inspectors who know the deputy wardens and the superior officers in the various penitentiaries, and the Minister of Justice, who of course consults these officials.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This may not be germane to the discussion, but I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if the man best qualified to appoint a guard is not the warden under whom he is to serve?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Other things being equal, I think his recommendation ought to govern.

Mr. THORSON: Sometimes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps not always. I know the man down in the maritime provinces and there has been no trouble there.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is a good man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There have been no riots in his institution. I would be prepared to take his recommendation in the selection of a guard. I do not think there would be any political significance in that. I hope the minister does not intervene too much.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not intervened at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said that in the final analysis it came back to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with most of what my hon. friend has said. The warden in a penitentiary is better qualified than anyone to make a choice of a man or decide who is to be promoted. There may be exceptions to all rules, but generally speaking my hon. friend is quite right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Upon whose recommendation are dismissals and demotions made in the penitentiary service?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The wardens and the inspectors who visit the penitentiaries and who may make reports concerning certain officers. Any action taken by the minister is based upon the recommendation of the superintendent.

Mr. McCANN: There has been some discussion of this revision in the method of counting active overseas service for superannuation purposes. I was the seconder of the motion that the final report of the special committee be concurred in. The recommendations of this committee appear in Hansard of May 24, 1939, and I should like to quote from page 4455 as follows:

Recommendation No. 4 asks that provision be made for counting active service overseas during the great war, which cannot now be counted, subject of course to certain restrictions. Certain men who left the civil service of Canada on leave at the beginning of the war were given credit for their service overseas. At a later date that terminated and many men who had been in the civil service before the war are not now eligible to count their time overseas for benefits. New employees who joined the service after the war have not been able to receive credit for time overseas. All organizations of returned men have made representations for many years urging that such service be allowed as a matter of fair play and justice, the principle of which is established in connection with the mounted police and, I believe, one other branch of the service; and your committee has decided to recommend that a change be made.

The different service organizations who made representations before the committee were of opinion that the most equitable date was the date of armistice, November 11, 1918. Some men were discharged prior to that date, while others were discharged a considerable time afterward.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a compromise.

Mr. McCANN: It was entirely a matter of compromise. In making this recommendation I feel that we met the wishes of the different service organizations who appeared before the committee. I offer this in explanation to the hon. leader of the opposition who raised the point.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is meant by "free service," referred to in paragraph (b) of the schedule?

Mr. ILSLEY: After a civil servant became permanent following service as a temporary for some years, half his period of temporary service was allowed to count, without contribution, towards superannuation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do employees who have been in the civil service for some time as temporaries and have been made permanent now contribute in respect of their whole time as temporaries in order to get superannuation covering the period of temporary service?

Mr. ILSLEY: They pay for the whole period of their temporary service.

Mr. FAIR: Has the government taken steps to suspend promotions in the civil service for the duration of the war, or do promotions still go on as in the past?

Mr. ILSLEY: I hesitate to open up this broad field, but if it is not going to precipitate a long debate, which would be quite out of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FAIR: A yes or no answer is all I want. I had heard a rumour to that effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole matter has been very carefully covered by order in council. Generally speaking I might tell the house that the service is divided into war staffs and those concerned with peace-time activities. The war staffs are eligible for reclassification but they are not eligible for permanent service, and they are warned when they enter the service that they are temporary and can never be anything but temporary during the period of the war. That is to prevent them from acquiring a vested right to a continuance of office after their services may no longer be required. A deduction of five per cent is made from their salaries and will be repaid to them with interest when their services are no longer required.

With regard to staffs other than war staffs, they are being asked to make some sacrifice in that their positions are not to be reclassified during the war. On the other hand, they will be eligible for promotion within the rules laid down by the governor in council regulating promotions. Promotions are different from reclassifications. Promotions can take place, but I would not like members to make any mistake about what promotions are. Promotions are advancement to vacant positions. They do not increase the total establishment or the total expense to the treasury. Reclassifications do. Reclassifications are a revaluation, usually upward, of existing positions, and after an extensive reclassification takes place the cost to the government is considerably greater than it was before. Reclassifications are to cease during the period of the war so far as the peace-time staffs are concerned.

Mr. HOMUTH: As time goes on if the war continues there is going to be a considerable increase in the cost of living, rents and so forth. Has the government decided upon a policy in that regard? Naturally the civil service will expect increased remuneration because of the increased cost of living. Will that be done by increasing the salaries or by a bonus system? I suggest that it be done by a bonus system, which is the practice a great many industries are following. The employees understand that the bonus will be taken off when the war is over and things get back to normal.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter for consideration, but not under this bill.

Mr. REID: Have steps been taken regarding superannuation for civil servants who enlist?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is covered by the order in council to which I referred and of which I promised to give my hon, friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) a copy. I shall be glad to give my hon, friend a copy.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT
AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1940.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if my hon, friend would allow me a few moments to place on Hansard certain information I was asked for yesterday. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), in the course of the debate last evening, asked me two questions which I promised to answer. He referred to the words in the resolution, "training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations". I would point out to him that this resolution does not deal with youth training, but only with the training or retraining of older persons. He also asks to have placed on Hansard the amount of the dominion contributions under this act to the various provinces over the period of five years. The statement is a somewhat lengthy one. I wonder if I could obtain the permission of this committee, rather than read all the figures which it would be difficult to follow, to place the statement on Hansard without reading it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McLARTY: The statement is as follows:

The youth training programme during the years 1937-38 and 1938-39 was carried out under the relief legislation then in effect, namely, the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1937, and the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1938. Since April 1, 1939, the youth training programme has been carried out under the Youth Training Act, enacted at the 1939 session of parliament. The expenditures for youth training under the 1937 and 1938 relief legislation which are included in the foregoing statement are shown below together with expenditures under the Youth Training Act, 1939.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not propose to consume a great deal of the time of the committee this afternoon in a discussion of the points which come to my mind with regard to this resolution. I had rather hoped last evening that the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) would take the splendid opportunity which he had to deal at the opening of this debate with some general principles of policy that would govern his actions in connection with the work contemplated under this resolution. I feel the committee was entitled to some general enunciation of policy, the details being reserved to be given upon the second reading of the bill to be founded on the

As all hon, members know, the resolution deals not only with the question of unemployment in Canada, but also with the question of the alleviation of agricultural distress. For a good many years I have from time to time listened to debates in this house in connection with agriculture. As I come from an agricultural riding, those debates naturally aroused a good deal of interest in my mind, and sometimes not a little concern, because there seems to be an idea abroad in the dominion, perhaps also in the minds of some hon. members, that the distress among agriculturists generally does not extend to Ontario and to other eastern Canadian areas. May I therefore point out to the Minister of Labour, although perhaps it is a matter more directly within the purview of the Department of Agriculture, that distress among farmers is not confined to any one part of the dominion.

Speaking of Ontario, because I know more about that province than I do about other parts of the dominion, let me say that the Ontario farmer has felt for many years that he is the forgotten man in Canadian agriculture. I am not going to discuss this afternoon whether that is a proper view for him to take. But it seems to me, as it must appear to every hon. member who comes in contact with agriculture in Ontario, that the farmers of that province are experiencing a degree of distress which I believe hon, members will readily agree is not in the best interests of the industry as a whole.

One of the things I want to point out in this connection to the minister is a seemingly entire lack of plan on the part of the government to regulate agricultural production and supply. Most of the people on farms in Ontario find difficulty in recognizing any sort of plan proceeding from the government. They are allowed from time to time to raise different kinds of produce, but without any real scheme to prevent overproduction and accompanying collapse of prices. This criticism applies even more particularly in time of war than in time of peace. The lack of plan so far as governmental action in connection with eastern Canadian agriculture is concerned, is altogether too well known.

May I say to the Minister of Labour, although, as this is a matter of opinion, I do not express any personal view regarding it, that evidently he is one of the dozen or so men whom the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) regards as the best brains in Canada. If that is the case—and I am not contradicting it at the moment, because after all it is a matter of opinion-

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member is not charging him with it either.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member from Dufferin-Simcoe says I am not charging him with it. Absolutely, I am not charging him with it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the Prime Minister say that?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, the Prime Minister said that, and my regret is that he did not include the hon. member for Davenport.

With all we have in the way of government in Canada, surely it is not too much to ask that they have at least some plan for the benefit of Canadian agriculture. It is all very proper for us to deal from time to time with the question of marketing on a domestic basis. But allow me to point out that while we are considering the problem from a domestic point of view, we are permitting imports from the United States of farm products in competition with our own, of a magnitude which almost appals one when one looks at the figures.

I intend only to mention one case; I realize that this is a matter which can come up later in debate. On the question of fruits and vegetables, in which many people in my riding are intensely interested, during 1939 nearly $10,000,000 worth of fresh fruits and vegetables, of a class or kind which we in this country produce in our orchards and gardens, were imported from the United States of America. That figure is entirely exclusive of all citrus fruits, such as oranges, lemons and grapefruit, which, no matter what argument may be put up, must be regarded as displacing to at least some extent the products which we grow in our own farms and gardens.

The agriculturists of this country are ready to do their part in this war, but they want some real leadership and guidance from the government. We have heard time and again of the lack of leadership on the part of this government in respect of military matters, also of economic matters. But I charge the government this afternoon with an entire lack of plan, to an extent even worse than in other directions, as regards eastern Canadian agriculture and agriculture in general. It must be apparent to everybody whether they come from the farm or the city, that until the Canadian farmer gets a larger share of the national revenue there will never be a real economic balance in this country either during

So much for agriculture. I want to deal for just a moment with the other phase of this momentous resolution, namely, unemployment. I wonder whether the government and hon. members realize that there is a war on. Persons who knew very little about legislation might well wonder why a bill was being brought in to deal with unemployment in Canada. It is taken for granted that we have many unemployables, but may I say that scores of thousands of men in that category could give and would willingly render really important service during this war-time period. As regards those who are able to work, there seems to be little excuse why they should not be working to-day. The question is being asked all over the dominion, at every street corner and wherever men congregate, why, if we are taking this national war effort seriously, are so many people out of work? Why are so many single men coming to members of parliament trying to find out where they can get in the army, whether they can enlist in the air force, whether they can find a job in some kind of plant, or any sort of job at all? More people have called on me in the last six months looking for employment of some kind-whether they thought that I was in a position to give them jobs or not, I am sure I do not know—than have ever come to see me for the same purpose in any comparable period during the whole of the five years I have been a member of parliament. There are transients here and there, young men, and men in many walks of life looking for employment. It is inconceivable— I say this sincerely, and I am sure the Minister of Labour himself recognizes it—that such a condition should exist in Canada when we are supposed to be putting our best foot forward in an effort to win the war. That is the great question mark that will stand out in connection with our war effort until unemployment is cured once for all. The question is, why?

Last night I was looking into the totals given through the national registration of direct relief recipients. The figures will be found in the blue book known as the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act of 1939. We have not the figures for April and May but I will give those that are available. I suggest that perhaps there is an answer to this, but it does not seem to be very good on the surface. Here is the situation. In the month when war was declared by Canada, in September 1939, there were, according to this report of the commissioner, 539,000 people drawing direct relief in Canada. I will leave out the odd numbers. In October—and remember, we were still at war-that figure had crept up to 543,000 and in November it had gone right up to 585,000.

Mr. McLARTY: I did not catch what the hon. member said. Did he say that was the number of the unemployed or of those receiving relief?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am quoting directly from the pamphlet issued by the commissioner giving the total number of direct relief recipients in Canada. Coming to December—and we are still at war—we find that the number has crept up to 629,000 and in January of this year it was 714,000. That was the number on direct relief in January of the present year, and in February that number had gone still higher to 753,000. In the last month for which figures are available, March 1940, when the war situation was approaching a crisis, we find the staggering total of 768,000 people on direct relief. Every month since the war began the figures have mounted instead of coming down. I leave these figures with the minister for one particular reason. I believe that, coupled with the fact that we are at war, they are a challenge to democracy and to Canadian parliamentary institutions generally, and I make that statement with every bit of emphasis and with all the seriousness at my command this afternoon.

If we cannot reduce the number of direct relief recipients in Canada during a time of world-wide conflagration in which we are supposed to be giving our best in an effort to win the war, then I ask, what sort of future shall we have in time of peace? The very foundation, the rock-bottom of democracy is our ability to keep our people at work and to maintain some semblance of national prosperity in the dominion, and I conclude these brief remarks with this observation to the Minister of Labour. It is not too late for him to see to it that we shall be preparing in Canada, not for unemployment but for work for everybody, for every man and woman, because we are going to need the labour of every last man and woman before this war ends in victory for Canada and the empire.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I find myself in agreement to a large extent with the hon. member (Mr. Graydon). It has been something of a surprise to many members that the government at this stage has not seen fit to come before parliament with some constructive policy and some proposals to meet the unemployment conditions and the condition of agriculture with which this resolution deals. For ten years now, as the records show, we have been dealing with resolutions of this description, and so far no solution has been found to these problems apart from the amelioration of the condition by means of direct relief. In the past, in peace time, we have had no public works programmes of the sort that would give work to the unemployed on any large scale, and we have been content year after year to follow a relief policy. We have failed very largely because parliament has not yet recognized that unemployment and poverty are a part of the normal working of the present economic system. It is obvious that recent legislation in Great Britain and in New Zealand foreshadows conclusively the end of the unplanned, undirected economic system which has brought us to this pass in times of peace and fails to solve it even now when we are at war. The sooner we recognize that the system we have known, which was obviously breaking down before the war, has collapsed and that the conditions which we shall face in the future will be different from those that we have faced in the past, so much the sooner shall we arrive at a solution of the problems that confront us.

Many of us are realizing for the first time to-day that the secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact that they have consciously planned their economic structure. True, they have planned with diabolical intent, but they have planned with an end in view. We have failed to make any plans or to give any direction to our economic system for the worthy purposes for which we ought to have been planning in the past. I think that much of the discontent that we find here and there throughout the country to-day is due to the fact that people who are alleged to be subversive are not really subversive at all—I mean the common people; the people who are agitating among them may be consciously subversive. But subversive activities would be easily met were it not for the distressed condition of many of our people across Canada. I regret that the government at this time apparently have no constructive policy to offer the house and the country. Last autumn when the war broke out we took a definite attitude in regard to the aid that Canada might give. We believed then and believe now that Canada's principal function in the war ought to be the provision of economic aid to the allies without profit to ourselves or to any persons in Canada. I thought that to some extent that was going to be done. I anticipated, and I remember saying so in my own constituency last autumn when I conducted a series of meetings there, that by the middle of this summer if we carried out the programme that most of us thought was then in view there would not be an unemployed person in the Dominion of Canada. Indeed I thought that by about this time skilled artisans would be coming into Canada to find work in the war industries that would be necessitated by the effort which many of us thought was going to be made.

Mr. ROWE: We were told that by the government.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, that was what we were led to believe. Instead of that, as was shown by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, in spite of the large number who have joined the army, there are tens of thousands of men unemployed, and there are tens of thousands of men, women and children on relief in this dominion.

I submit that Canada can solve her problem to-day. Not by doing as we are doing in this house at the present time, largely rehashing the very arguments that to my knowledge we have discussed for the last five years, and as the records show largely for the last ten years. There is the need, and we have the means, if we will organize, to end to a very large extent the unemployment which now confronts us. I read this morning, as many other hon. members undoubtedly did, the courageous speech made in the British House of Commons yesterday by Mr. Churchill. I should like to quote one paragraph. He said:

Against this loss of over 30,000 men we may set a far heavier loss certainly inflicted on the enemy, but our losses in material are enormous. We have perhaps lost one-third of the men we lost on the opening days of the battle of the 21st of March, 1918, but we have lost nearly as many guns—nearly 1,000 guns—and all our transport and all the armoured vehicles that were with the army in the north. These losses will impose a further delay on the expansion of our military strength. That expansion has not been proceeding as fast as we had hoped. The best of all we have to give had gone to the B.E.F. and they were a finely equipped army. Here is this further delay. How long it will last depends on the exertions we make in this island.

I contend that Canada to-day can aid the people there in providing the equipment that is needed with which they may combat the enemy.

What do the allies lack? When the war broke out many thought that large numbers of men would be required by the army. We took the view then and take it now that material aid is of greater importance as far as we are concerned. We should not have any unemployed in the Dominion of Canada to-day had we organized our economic resources as we ought to have organized them. The lack to-day is of mechanized equipment of every sort, of ships and of food. True, the transportation of food and material is a difficulty which has to be faced. But Canada has shipyards, Canada has men who can build ships, as was shown in the last war and has been shown throughout the years in the maritime provinces. We have the materials, we have the men, and we ought to be organizing the entire economic resources of this country immediately in order that we may render the maximum aid possible.

Mr. POTTIER: Is it the suggestion of the hon, member that in the last war the government went into the shipbuilding business?

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I did not suggest that. I stated that during the last war Canada built ships. I would say in reply to my hon. friend that under the conditions that exist to-day the government of Canada should introduce legislation of the sort that has been introduced in Great Britain and New Zealand, and take over the entire economic resources of the country and organize them under public enterprise; without profit or profiteering we might give material aid and also end the present unemployment. There are in Great Britain to-day unequipped soldiers by the thousands. The need, let me repeat, is for equipment. We constantly hear it suggested that we ought to be recruiting more men for our armed forces. I believe we shall have to give some attention to the defence of our own shores before many days have passed, but the present need is the mobilization of our man power to assist in the production of the material goods that are so urgently required.

This afternoon the hon member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) asked the Prime Minister whether a registration of man-power in Canada had been considered. I would say that a far more important thing is the mobilization of our industrial strength, our economic power, in order to give the aid that is so badly needed overseas at this time.

The unemployment problem that we face to-day is a blot upon this House of Commons, this government and the Dominion of Canada. We should have been preparing these many months to organize and mobilize our economic resources in order to be ready to meet this challenge. Now that the challenge is right upon us, no matter what we may have thought in days gone by, in this house we are a unit in desiring to give the maximum aid that we can render. We have the man power, much of it idle. We have the factories, some of them idle.

Mr. MacNICOL: A good many of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have the material. What we lack is initiative, the plan and the driving power to put that plan across. I say that now, while it is not too late, we should repair our mistakes-and let us all admit that we have made mistakes: I am not accusing the government of having made all of them. I suppose there is scarcely a man who believed that what we have seen happen during the past three weeks was possible. No one thought that Germany would have the driving power that she has shown, and be able to reduce nations as rapidly as they have been reduced. But let us revise our judgment; let us face the facts now. Instead of wrangling over past errors and over this particular problem; instead of talking about unemployment, let us try to end it at least for the duration of the war. In doing so never mind the contracts; never mind private interests. Let us take over every power plant, every mine, every factory, every shipyard that we need, not all at once but as we need them; let us organize our labour force to give the material aid our allies need. I venture to say that if we mobilize our economic and industrial strength, the labourer in the factory and the farmer on the land will be glad to cooperate, provided they see that the economic strength of this country is being exerted to the maximum, without a profit being made by any private concern out of the necessities of war or out of their labour.

I submit that this is the way to end unemployment at this time; this is the way to end profiteering and, what is equally important, this is the way to help win the war. In this planning of our productive effort, in this planning to end unemployment, let us keep in mind that in order not to encourage subversive activities that may confront us when the war ends we must see to it that we maintain our standards of living and that the conditions under which labourers work and farmers produce are conditions worth fighting and making sacrifices for. That will involve, of course, guaranteeing the producers a fair return for their products, labour fair rewards, and the consumers fair prices for the things they buy.

These things can be done if we have the courage to do them, and in doing these things we can meet the very problem, both on the farm and in the industrial centre, that we are discussing this afternoon. I scarcely dare think of the alternative. It is the delay of victory, in any event, perhaps even the risk of defeat, and the continuance of distress which provides a fertile field for fifth column activities. This afternoon the Minister of Justice declared a number of organizations subversive. No doubt he has the evidence which caused him to make that declaration on behalf of the government. I am not criticizing that action, but I am going to point out once more that subversive organizations and activities arise largely out of discontent. If there is no poverty, no misery, no want and no discontent, then subversive organizations cannot thrive in the community.

So I say we can end unemployment and farm distress and at the same time serve a good cause. I think we should consider this problem in terms of the dire need of this nation and of our allies. As a matter of fact I believe that the situation which confronts us is a challenge to the representatives of the people and to the democratic institution of parliament itself. If we cannot solve this problem; if we cannot meet the demands that are made upon this institution, then there will arise in our midst, even as there have arisen in other countries, organizations which will endeavour to supersede this parliament. I am one of those who believe that in spite of all its defects, in spite of its sometimes slow movement, no institution can give democracy a better representation than the age-old British institution of parliament. But this is our challenge. We have the power now, if we will use it, to bring about a restoration of the respect of parliament in the eyes of the people of this country from one end of it to the other.

In conclusion I want to say that as a first step the government should mobilize immediately all the factories and industries that are capable of producing war materials. Never mind the difficulties about taking them over; compensation and all the rest of it can wait until the war is ended. I am reminded that even now the Minister of Munitions and Supply has certain powers which would enable him to do that very thing. All food resources and war materials should be taken over. Those who produce them should be given an adequate return, that they might live decently and not be the prey of subversive organiza-tions in our midst. In this way I believe the very problem we are discussing this afternoon could be met. So far as we in this corner of the house are concerned, as we said at the very outset we are prepared to facilitate government business and to give the government the right of way in every particular. We have tried to cooperate in every sense of the word. We are prepared to continue that cooperation in order that we may meet this domestic problem of unemployment and agricultural distress and assist in the organization of our country to meet the shock of war and the post-war conditions that will follow.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak to this resolution I propose to be direct and brief. As a new member of this house it was my intention to remain silent and learn. Probably I should have remained silent if this question of relief had not come up. Considered at its very best, relief is degrading, demoralizing and soul-destroying, and I should feel that I were shirking my responsibilities to my constituents if I remained in my seat at this time and failed to express their feelings.

The resolution states that it has been deemed expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. If it were universally agreed that unemployment and agricultural distress were impossible of solu-tion I should be able to look upon this resolution in a much happier state of mind. But since it is not universally believed or agreed that these problems are impossible of solution I cannot look upon this resolution happily at all. How much better it would have been if it had been deemed expedient to bring in a measure to cure unemployment and agricultural distress. For a moment I should like to refer to a statement made yesterday by the leader of the official opposition, as reported at page 509 of Hansard:

I well remember the first bill dealing with unemployment relief which was brought down in the house in the session of 1930. There was not a man in this chamber then, and I doubt if there was a thinking man in Canada, who ever had the idea that this problem would not only be with us for ten long years but grow to the magnitude it has reached.

He goes on:

If we had conceived at that time that it would become a problem of national magnitude, we might have—I do not say we would have—dealt with the problem ab initio from a different point of view; but there was not a [M*. Coldwell.]

man among us on either side of the house who had any conception of the extent and character of the problem that was confronting us or that it would be with us for these ten long years.

I must say that I cannot agree with that statement of the hon. leader of the official opposition. I contend that ten years ago the people were sufficiently enlightened as to the rapid developments which were taking place in our scientific and industrial fields to know that the machine age was rapidly creeping upon us. Furthermore, many of us knew even at that time that, labouring as we were under an orthodox system of finance which was slowly but surely crushing us, it was quite possible that no solution to this problem would be found under orthodoxy and that we should have the condition which is upon us to-day.

I do not know whether the hon, gentleman made his statement in order to cover up the actions of the Conservative party between 1930 and 1935 with respect to unemployment. I should like to reminisce for a moment. In 1930 unemployment in Canada had reached a figure in excess of half a million. The committee will pardon me for using algebraic terms but I would say that a figure of half a million plus x would probably be nearer right, because we have at all times a great number of unemployed who for some reason or another do not register.

Just before the election of 1930 the Conservatives were in hysterics. They said that there was absolutely no reason for the unemployment that existed. They contended that in a rich country like this fair Canada of ours with its potential resources and small population there was no reason for the condition that existed at that time. They told us that if they were elected they would solve the unemployment problem, that they would provide jobs for the unemployed. The people were a little gullible. Apparently they believed that statement; for they returned that party to power. We must give them credit for having kept the wolf from the door, but the wolf was dangerously close. If I may characterize it as such, their policy consisted of prayers and palliatives. Like our friend Micawber they seemed to be waiting for something to turn up.

From the election in 1930 until 1935 the unemployment problem became steadily worse.

The Conservative government of that time, labouring under an orthodox system of finance, found themselves in a position where they could not possibly handle the unemployment problem. When 1935 came along the Liberals had a new slogan. This will be quite familiar to our hon. friends on the other side of the house. They said: If elected we will take control of currency and credit and issue it in terms of the public need. That sounded fine to the unemployed because they realized, as our group realizes to-day, that if that policy were carried out there would be an immediate end to the unemployment problem.

The people elected that Liberal government. As has been shown already by the speaker who preceded me, since 1935 the unemployment problem has become steadily worse. The Conservative government tried for approximately five years to correct the evil, but working under the orthodox system of finance they found they could not do it. Personally I have no faith in the alternatives announced by the present Conservative opposition, because they are still just as orthodox as the government. Since 1935 the Liberal government has tried to solve the unemployment problem. I think it must be admitted, even by hon. friends opposite, that they have not been entirely successful. But we must give them credit for having done their best to solve this problem under orthodox finance.

Unemployment cannot be permanently cured as long as we work under the existing orthodox financial set-up. I do not care how you try to do it, it cannot be done. Therefore we must seek some method of reform. We suggest the adoption of the method advocated by our group. This must be done in order to clear up, if I may use that term, a most unsatisfactory condition. A previous speaker stated, in effect, that the Canadian people believed that when Canada became an active participant in the terrible European conflict the question of unemployment would shortly cease to be a national problem. After approximately nine years of warfare—

An hon. MEMBER: Months.

Mr. SHAW: It seems like nine years. After approximately nine months of warfare we are forced to the conclusion that war does not provide a solution to the unemployment problem. In our unemployed we have a vast reservoir of man-power which is seeking to serve without success. We are faced with the tremendous cost of keeping these unemployed. we are spending vast sums of money which under better circumstances could be used to fight our war abroad. Please do not misunderstand me; I am not advocating that we should cut off the relief allowances to the unemployed. What I am trying to convey is that even under the orthodox system of finance there is no reason why our people could not be absorbed into industry, provided industry is speeded up to the proper point, without its being necessary to take anything out of general revenue and set it apart for their keep.

Under the present set-up the government depends upon income from taxation and upon borrowings from the bank, which is simply a more vicious type of taxation. But we find that the taxes imposed come out of the pockets of the millions of people who to-day are themselves on the very borderline of unemployment; and if we increase our taxation in order to raise money to meet the unemployment situation and our other problems, we shall be defeating our very purpose because as fast as we secure money for relief or rehabilitation of the unemployed, we shall be forcing the borderline taxpayers into relief. It is high time, therefore, that we realized that we are living in a different age from a decade ago, and it is vital that we get a clearcut view of the situation as it now exists. I say to the government—and perhaps this is because I have not been a member of this house before—that if they were prepared to take control of currency and credit and issue it in terms of public need as they said they would do before the election of 1935, let them tell us definitely why they have not done it and why they do not intend doing it. The actions of the government in trying to meet present-day problems by orthodox methods of finance remind me very much of the actions of a witch doctor, and needless to say the results accomplished are about the same in both instances.

In conclusion, may I say that there is no reason in this world for members of the old orthodox school of finance to sneer at reformers just because they advocate monetary reforms which we know are bound to come and which hon. gentlemen opposite know are bound to come in spite of them.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Chairman, in discussing the resolution before the committee, I should like to confine my remarks to that portion providing for assistance in the alleviation of agricultural distress. I hope the members of the committee will not consider me provincial in my outlook if I confine my remarks to the province of Saskatchewan and the constituency which I represent.

I hope that the minister (Mr. McLarty) will not be a party to any changes which will force upon people on relief and the unemployed the acceptance of a lower standard of living. I have just received a dispatch from Canora, Saskatchewan. An article appeared in the press of May 23 to the effect that the relief committee consisting of Councillors Lawson, Shore and Wicwicki, had resigned as a committee at the regular meeting of the town council that week, on account of the fact that government assistance had been cut off and the committee had no funds with which to carry on.

Hon members, realizing that food for hungry people is involved, should think carefully before being a party to any action which in this land of plenty will result in people going hungry.

I have here some snapshots which I took myself in my constituency a number of years ago. They were sent to a friend of mine in the city many years ago because I told him of the poverty which existed in northern Saskatchewan. My deskmate (Mr. Gillis), on seeing these pictures yesterday, said that nowhere in the coalfields of Nova Scotia can you find poverty such as these pictures portray. I have never had the pleasure of meeting the hon. Minister of Labour, but I judge him to be a man who, if he knew about the matter, would not want to see a single person in Canada go hungry.

I hold in my hand a picture of a returned soldier who, with his wife and eight children, went to my constituency under what was known as the $300 scheme. The provincial government, the federal government and the city of Regina each contributed $100, and with this amount the family was supposed to become self-supporting. They were allowed $50 with which to build a house, $100 to purchase farm stock and implements, and an allowance of $10 a month for foodstuffs. This picture was taken when snow was on the ground. It shows five children without any footwear. These people did not dress for the picture. Like most of us they wished to appear in their best, and in the picture they are shown in their very best clothing, and without any footwear. I would be pleased if the minister would try to imagine himself in the environment of this returned soldier. Under the northern settlers reestablishment plan, the standard of living has been improved considerably, and the homes that are being built are superior to the one occupied by this man.

I have in my hand another picture showing a family in similar circumstances. I recall a conversation that took place after I took the picture. The father came out. He was rather philosophical in his outlook. He said to me, "No doubt you are saying to yourself, 'There is no excuse for people being dirty. We have read a great many stories about such and such a family being very, very poor but very, very clean.' You can take it from me," he said, "that poverty and cleanliness do not go hand in hand." He asked, "Have you ever tried washing without soap?" I had to admit that I had not. He said, "Well, this morning I thought I would have a wash for a change, and I said, 'Mary, where is the soap?' She said, 'We haven't had any soap in the house for ten days'." This man said to me. "I do not use tobacco; I do not use liquor. When I get my relief allowance, if there is a five cent piece that has not been spent, I tell the storekeeper to put in another cake of soap or another spool of thread." I wonder if hon, members can appreciate what it means to have a large family and no soap, to have ragged children and no thread in the house to mend their clothes. Hon, gentlemen across the way smile, but I should like them to try living under conditions which prevail in northern Saskatchewan. Think of this man who gave his best between 1914 and 1918, living with his children in poverty, with five children in the winter time without shoes or stockings. It is no laughing matter.

This is a letter I received from one of my constituents on April 14:

We are in need of clothes very badly. We have only had one clothing order for $18 since we moved to the Block, and as you know that will not buy very much clothing. My husband is wearing his felts and rubbers, which are rather warm just now, and we are in need of lots of other clothing. We need a clothing order of $20.

I replied, advising her to consult the relief inspector for the area, and this is the reply I received after she had done so:

I have made my application for clothing, and he says we cannot get clothing orders at all. So it looks as if we are to go nude out here. They also cut down our grocery order because we lost our little boy. We have no milk or potatoes, or hens to give us eggs.

I have another letter from one of my constituents dated April 27. This has to do with mothers' allowances. I know that does not come under the direct administration of the federal government, but hon, gentlemen have heard me read two letters describing conditions in northern Saskatchewan and they will understand how closely the problem of mothers' allowance is tied up with the problem of relief which we are discussing. This man writes as follows:

I have been disabled from work for the last ten years. Not able to do my work on the farm, my wife is getting a mother's allowance of $36 per month. We have to buy clothing for a family of fifteen (father, mother and thirteen children) out of it, and buy books for the children out of it, and it is very hard to make a living, so I wish you could help us to get my wife's allowance increased a little.

So, Mr. Chairman, I wrote to the superintendent of the bureau of child protection for Saskatchewan. This is his reply:

Dear Sir,

I have your letter of May 21 before me. In veply must say that the $36.00 Mrs.—

I shall not give the name.

—receives is the maximum allowance paid in Saskatchewan for eight children under sixteen years of age. Mrs. has ten children under sixteen years of age, but as the last two were born after the allowance was first granted on account of the physical incapacity of Mr. they cannot now receive a mother's allowance.

Mrs. must look to the rural municipality for such additional aid as is absolutely necessary.

The allowance of $36 a month is for a father, mother and thirteen children. What will happen if they appeal to the relief officer, or the rural municipality as the case may be? They will be told that $36 a month for fifteen people is a good deal more than they would be allowed if they were on relief, and I venture to say that no increase will be granted even if they accept the advice of a man who signs himself "Superintendent, Bureau of Child Protection." An hon. gentleman asks, what is his salary? I am certain it will not be $36 a month.

This is another letter which I have recently received from a returned soldier. I will read a part of it:

It seems to me as though the time has arrived when everything that can be done by everyone should be done, and regardless of

I have written to find out this man's age; as I recall it, he is over fifty.

-I should be able to fill the post of recruiting officer or some such similar post, which must surely be needed.

Listen to his first letter to me:

The provincial government have reluctantly condescended to allow us a relief ticket for $12.00, same having been received for the past two months to feed eight of a family, with a terse command that they may discontinue even that at any time. . . It has been impossible for me to procure any local work to improve conditions, and owing to my family being young I cannot go far afield to look for work on account of home requirements . . . and well for us that I was about, for one day last week the shack caught fire and would have burned the shack caught fire and would have burned down had the woman been alone with the small children. Even as it was I had difficulty in saving what I did.

A few minutes of rapid calculation will reveal that this returned soldier, his wife and children are having the extravagant allowance of 1.66 cents per meal; this at a time when Canada faces a national crisis and a father who risked his life during the last war is offering his services again in any capacity.

I have reports from some ten families in my constituency. I am not going to discuss these cases in detail; I will simply say that these ten families report that their total grocery bill for 1939 was $1,575, or $23.16 per person per year, slightly less than $2 per person per month, or 6.34 cents per day, or a little over 2 cents per meal.

As I said before, I believe that if the Minister of Labour really knew that human beings are living under the conditions which I have described, he would be bringing to this committee a report which would offer some hope, a report which would do away with unemployment and with the need for agricultural relief.

Before I leave the question of food, I should like to draw attention to the fact that in appendix 6 of the report presented by the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, attention is drawn to the fact that there is a wide variation in the amounts allowed in various parts of Canada for food. On page 23 of this report the commission say:

Great hardship is caused by a tendency in some places to cut groups of unemployed persons off relief on technical grounds without making any other provision for them.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he knows that the allowance which is made in each case is determined not by this government but by the provincial government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Quite so, but I want to point out that it is important that the dominion government place the funds at the disposal of the provincial governments. I imagine that these reported cases of hardship from Saskatchewan have come as a direct result of an intimation from this government that the necessary financial assistance will not be forthcoming.

Mr. McLARTY: No such intimation has been given.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask the minister if there is likely to be any reduction in the appropriation for relief for Saskatchewan for the current year?

Mr. McLARTY: I cannot answer that question offhand. There are general reductions under this act. I do not know whether there is any reduction in respect of Saskatchewan, but I might say that all these figures are agreed to between the federal government and the provincial governments concerned; they are not superimposed by this government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask the minister if any reductions have been made for, say, the month of May, as compared with the month of May a year ago, in respect to Saskatchewan?

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to let the hon. member have an answer to his question. I do not think there is any reduction.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My information, which comes from Saskatchewan papers, is to the effect that the allowance had been cut approximately in half. Certainly a dispatch such as the one I read from the town of Canora indicates that the money is not available in Regina; and if the money is not available in Regina, it is because the grants from the federal government have not been forthcoming in sufficient amounts. If the minister will supply definite information, I shall be glad to have it from him.

May I refer now to the problem of education. As everyone knows, education falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, but the amount of money made available for relief in a province has a definite relation to teachers' salaries and to educational needs in the province. I have before me some pictures of educational interest. I hold in my hand a photograph of one of the many new schools in my constituency. It was built with a $200 cash grant, no more. Someone has suggested that we should float bonds or sell debentures. There is not a financial institution in Canada which would consider accepting debentures on these schools. This is a school on which $200 has been spent, which sum had to provide for all the windows, the doors, the brick, the hardware, the desks and equipment. Think of it, Mr. Chairmanthe educational needs of a great country being met in such a manner.

I have before me a memorandum here in connection with one of the schools in my constituency, where the department, in a very generous moment, granted $300. But there were two schools to be built in this district. This is a district in which the people are being reestablished under what is described as an ideal plan. Those from the drought area and from our cities are being reestablished under the northern settlers' reestablishment plan, and the sum of $300 has been provided for the building of two schools.

An hon. MEMBER: Is it suggested that the dominion government should grant $300?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No. Education falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but the appropriation made available by the federal government for relief assistance has a direct effect on the educational needs of that particular area. Here is a school district where $300 was appropriated for two buildings. The people who have been living in this district since 1937 are being reestablished. The minister laughs.

Mr. McLARTY: Was the hon. member referring to me? I was not laughing at anything he was saying.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is no laughing matter.

Mr. McLARTY: I was not laughing.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. MARTIN: It is no laughing matter for anyone in this house. Do not take that attitude.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am making serious suggestions and I would appreciate it if the minister would listen.

Mr. McLARTY: I have been listening most attentively.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In this school district seventy-six children are denied the right to go to school. The matter was taken up with the Department of Education in February, and I have a letter from the department dated May 31 to the effect that the report from the superintendent would indicate that both schoolhouses were then nearing completion and would be in operation at an early date. On May 31 the schools were not in operation.

I have two or three letters from school teachers in my constituency. They give a picture of the problems of the rural school teacher in northern Saskatchewan. One teacher writes that a new floor is needed, that there are no blinds in the school and that books are needed badly, and she cannot get them herself because she cannot get any money. She says that there is no well by the school, nor are there are any proper water tanks. She says:

The teacherage is very draughty. There is no fire extinguisher in school or house. The chimney in the teacherage is falling to pieces. The four municipalities together owe this school one thousand dollars but the board is unable to collect it.

Here is another letter.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish to remind the hon. member of the rule governing debates in committee. I am not trying to limit discussion, but maintenance of schools is primarily a question of provincial jurisdiction; nothing contained in the resolution can be applied to remedying the condition complained of. Therefore any reference to the condition of schools or to hardships of the kind depicted, whether well founded or not, must be ruled out of order as not being germane to the subject matter under consideration.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have already twice explained that these matters are not under the direct supervision of this house—

The CHAIRMAN: And therefore the hon, member is out of order in reading a communication from a teacher complaining of the condition of a school building or its equipment. The resolution is directly concerned with unemployment relief.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN: The hon, member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) has the floor at the moment, and I am pointing out to him the scope of the resolution.

Mr. MacINNIS: But you are limiting the discussion unduly, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not limiting the discussion; I have not called the hon. member to order. It is, however, my duty as chairman of the committee to confine the discussion as far as possible to the subject matter before the committee. The rule is clear. I have been as lenient as possible and I am willing to allow a great deal of latitude, but when an hon. member reads a letter from a school teacher complaining about the equipment of a school, I must rule that the reading of such a letter is clearly out of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: But there is a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling; the hon, member is out of order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have pointed out that the amount of money voted by the government for relief in Saskatchewan has a direct bearing on the educational needs of the people whom I represent.

The CHAIRMAN: It is too far-fetched to be in order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I submit that it is an indication of distress, and we are discussing distress in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: It is distress that we cannot deal with.

The CHAIRMAN: I am quite willing to allow considerable latitude, but I must exercise some discretion and keep the debate within reasonable bounds.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In my opening remarks I said that I wished to speak to the resolution providing assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress, and my remarks have been entirely with a view to informing this committee of the problems arising from agricultural distress in my constituency. I submit that if my people cannot receive sufficient relief, their educational needs are greatly affected. I was reading a communication from an area where the people on relief are not able to give their children and the teachers the benefits they should receive, and I thought the minister would like to know about the matter. I understand I am not permitted to read these communications.

The CHAIRMAN: No; except in so far as they relate to the measures proposed for unemployment; relief that is, the subject matter of the resolution before the committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will not read any further, but I will refer to the living conditions. Let me refer to one home where the people are on relief and where the teacher boards. This lady says:

I have had to put up with various insects, the worst being bedbugs and fleas. I've only wooden boxes to furnish my room and a stool. Have had to wrap myself up in the evenings while reading or doing any other work to keep from freezing.

Before concluding, I should like to discuss another matter that has a direct bearing on the question of agricultural distress. I refer to medical services. I have before me a communication from the deputy minister of public health of Saskatchewan with respect to provision for medical services. He says:

Arrangements will be made with the physicians residing in these areas to provide the necessary medical care to persons requiring the same. However, the people will be expected to pay what they can towards these services, whether it be the whole amount or only a part.

I might mention that this communication has been sent out by the deputy minister to call attention to the fact that necessary assistance with respect to medical services will not be continued in future. The opening paragraph says:

It has been decided that after May 1, 1940, the department will not provide medical services to all relief northern settlers and residents of the local improvement districts in the northern area as has been during the past few years.

He points out in connection with hospital services that they are cutting down in connection with drugs.

Mr. McLARTY: What department is that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Department of Public Health.

Mr. McLARTY: Of the provincial government?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Of Saskatchewan, yes. The concluding paragraph points out that:

It is not the intention of this department to have any person suffer unnecessarily for the lack of medical and hospital care, and this policy is not intended to work a hardship upon the people in any sense whatsoever.

I am sure some hon, members who are members of the medical profession will be interested in knowing what provision is planned for these northern doctors.

The CHAIRMAN: Again I point out that the hon, member is complaining of certain regulations made by a provincial department of public health with respect to medical or hospital care. This is strictly within provincial jurisdiction, and it does not come within the scope of the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a point of order, I would say the hon. member has a right to place before the committee—

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling has been given. The only remedy is to appeal from it to the Speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I am going to challenge that ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not debatable.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am challenging that ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member wants to challenge my ruling, he should do so in writing; otherwise the hon. gentleman has the floor.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I submit that in addition to the northern settlers requiring food and shelter they require medical service, and if this government do not make available to the provincial government the money necessary to provide those services they are failing in their duty. The question of medical services for my people is a very serious matter to me. I was going to mention the provision that is being planned for the medical doctors in my area. They are being provided with a subsidy of $25 a month.

The CHAIRMAN: By whom?

Mr. NICHOLSON: By the Department of Public Health of Saskatchewan, out of moneys part of which are supplied by this government.

The CHAIRMAN: Again I say this matter does not fall within the scope of the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask the Minister of Labour whether any money provided by this government is used in Saskatchewan to provide medical services for northern settlers?

Mr. McLARTY: Not so far as I know.

The CHAIRMAN: I point out that the resolution says specifically that it is for the purpose of supplementing measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need. Therefore if any complaint is to be made with respect to the measures taken by the province the complaint should be addressed to the province, and does not come within the scope of this resolution.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask you, sir, to interpret the expression "in need"? I submit that providing medical service is a matter which does concern this committee.

[The Chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN: If the action complained of, namely the curtailment of relief by the province, is the matter that the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss, as I assume from his remarks it is, then it is outside the scope of the resolution. This parliament can do nothing to compel any provincial department to adopt any measure. Therefore the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: All I am concerned about is having money available in order that medical service can be provided for northern settlers. According to this dispatch from the Department of Public Health in Regina, money is not being made available. If the provincial government is not going to provide it, I want to see that the money is provided, and I submit that on that allowance of $25 a month to be expected to give medical service to people in widely scattered districts is an insult to any doctor. One doctor said: "As far as I am concerned I can pull up stakes; I can go elsewhere." We have only a handful of doctors serving my constituency, with over fifty thousand residents. That condition is a direct result of the people living there not having the financial resources to enable them to support a doctor. And I submit that if the provincial government has not the funds available, this government should see that funds are supplied immediately.

Hon, members heard the hon, member for North Battleford speak here the other night. She said:

I have known cases where a father or mother, with a desperately sick child at home, has had to travel twenty miles or more in sub-zero weather, not to fetch a doctor but like a whipped dog to beg of a relief officer in an endeavour to obtain a permit to get a doctor to look after that child.

I say it is a disgrace to have a statement like that placed on Hansard without anyone rising and saying it is untrue. No hon member has risen in his place to challenge the accuracy of that statement. If it is true, hon members should lose no time in seeing that such conditions are rectified.

Mr. TRIPP: The hon, member has challenged other members of this house to get up and deny certain statements. I want to deny some of the statements he has made here to-day. I was a member of the legislature in Saskatchewan for eight years, four of them being from 1934 to 1938, and I can say all the statements he has made to-day are not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the hon. member proud of the mess in Saskatchewan to-day as the result of the actions of some of his associates?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: No hon. gentleman has a right to say "sit down" to a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. When the chairman is standing hon. members must sit down.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have I not the floor?

The CHAIRMAN: No. What has just developed proves the wisdom of following the rules of debate. The hon, gentleman (Mr. Nicholson) who is a new member, has been given much latitude since he began his speech. I interrupted him once or twice because I thought he had exceeded all reasonable bounds. He then challenged other hon. members of the committee. That is out of order. An hon, member when making a speech may state facts or submit argument, but cannot challenge other hon. members. When he does, the result is just what has taken place-other hon, members take up the challenge. I am saying this only for the purpose of calling attention to the wisdom of following the rules of debate. I have been rather lenient to new members in this and other debates in order to assist them and enable them properly to develop their argument. But hon, gentlemen should read the rules of the house and try to adhere to them as closely as possible, because they are based on a great deal of wisdom and experience.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Tripp) said just now that the statements of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) were not true. The hon. member for Mackenzie is now bringing forward evidence to prove the truth of his statements; and since he has made them on his responsibility as a member of parliament, I would suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia be asked to withdraw his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee, but I suggest to hon. members that we should consider the incident closed. A challenge was made, which was out of order. A few remarks have been made from here and there, which might also be considered out of order, but which were prompted by the challenge. Therefore I think it would be the better part of wisdom to consider the incident closed.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not pleased at the prospect of having in Hansard a statement to the effect that what I said was untrue.

The CHAIRMAN: This is a contradiction as to facts.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Exactly, and I am prepared to support my statement.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a direct statement that the hon. gentleman, speaking from his place in this house, said something untrue deliberately to mislead the committee. That would be out of order. But if what is believed to be a fact is stated to the house and its accuracy is challenged by another hon. member, that is a different matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if you are speaking for yourself or for the hon. member for Assiniboia? That hon. gentleman did not say whether he called into question the veracity of the statement or the veracity of the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: The incident is closed. The hon, member for Mackenzie has the floor.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like the hon. member for Assiniboia to have an opportunity either to repeat or to withdraw his statement.

Mr. TRIPP: I suggest that the hon. member was out of order in issuing his challenge. If he will withdraw the challenge, I will withdraw my remarks as well.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Very good; then I withdraw the challenge.

Progress reported.

EUROPEAN WAR

PETITION URGING UTMOST EFFORT BY CANADA IN AID OF EMPIRE

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present a petition to the honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled, signed by members of organizations called to a general meeting consisting of the aldermen of the city of Toronto, the local members of the legislature, public school trustees, separate school trustees, the Liberal association, the Conservative association, Beaches Lion's club, East Toronto Lion's club, Beaches Business Men's association, Danforth Business Men's association. Gerrard Business Men's association, Kingston Road Business Men's association, ward 8 central council, ward 8 ratepayers, ward 8 community and ratepayers, East Danforth ratepayers, the Orange association and the Masonic order, Salvation Army, Oddfellows, Knights of Columbus, Beaches Presbyterian church, Glenmount United, Hope United, St. Aidan's Anglican Church, St. John's church, Norway church, and Beaches Olympic club.

The petition reads as follows:

To the honourable the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled.

Your petitioners, the undersigned members of the Auxiliary Defence Unit No. 1 (Toronto),— Humbly Sheweth:

Whereas the present world conflict has developed on a stupendous and unprecedented scale into a life and death struggle between Christianity and paganism, which can only end in a victory for the British empire and her beloved ally, France, or else result in the collapse of our civilization and the putting out of the light of freedom as we, of the British empire, have known it since the days of Runnymede, and

Whereas this vast multitude of loyal citizens of the city of Toronto, publicly assembled for the purpose, are of one mind that Canada has not exerted her full strength in man power or material resources, in a supreme effort to meet the challenge of the nazi totalitarian state:

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house urge the government to put forth every possible effort, even to the utmost of Canada's man power and the resources of this vast dominion, to come to the aid of our beloved empire in this titanic struggle for the preservation of Christian democracy:

And further, before it is too late, to require the registration of all aliens in Canada, and to intern for the duration of the war, all enemy aliens or persons known to hold subversive opinions respecting the welfare of Canada, and also that the federal government take steps immediately to register the man power of Canada and to correlate the material resources of this dominion along the general plan as adopted and now in force in the British Isles.

And, as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

At this meeting there were present upwards of eleven thousand persons, who by standing vote endorsed the petition.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not like to interrupt my hon. friend when he was speaking, but as there are a number of new members of the house I think perhaps I ought to draw their attention to the fact that the method which my hon. friend has taken to present this petition is not the correct one. Any petition is usually presented to the clerk first, and then later it is read to the house by the clerk. I mention it because I think it is advisable that we should keep as strictly as we can within the rules of procedure.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

YOUTH TRAINING PROJECT-MEDICINE HAT

Mr. BLACKMORE:

- 1. In the dominion-provincial youth training school at Medicine Hat, in the year 1939-40, how many male students from outside Medicine Hat were in attendance?
- 2. For which of these was a return fare paid at the end of the school term?

RADIO BROADCASTING

NEWS SERVICES-CANCELLATION OF PERMITS TO BRITISH UNITED PRESS AND TRANS-RADIO NEWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) inform the house why Trans-Radio news broadcasts are to be prohibited over Canadian stations? Does the minister consider that the cancellation of contracts with this friendly news service will encourage confidence in the official Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news bulletins?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): My hon, friend was good enough to give me notice of this question, which notice reached me only a minute or two ago. It is not my understanding that Trans-Radio news has been prohibited. The matter is one that was dealt with by the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at their meeting last Saturday, and the information that has reached me is that both the British United Press and Trans-Radio news service have had their permits cancelled as of July 1 with the understanding that if they can show before that time that their news source is accurate, new permits will be issued. There are three sources of news in Canada, the two organizations I have mentioned and the Canadian Press. There has been some trouble over news being put out in an unduly alarming form and many complaints have been received from radio listeners in this connection. There has also been difficulty in ascertaining the exact ownership of Trans-Radio news. The owners are believed to be two gentlemen in the United States. This organization puts out bulletins with a London date line, but we have not been able to find its London offices or London sources of news. All these matters are to be examined into and if these organizations can show their bona fides, permits will be restored.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): These news bulletins have to pass the censor here, do they not? Does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation constitute itself a censor of British news, through whatever channel it may come?

Mr. HOWE: As a matter of fact the news is not censored before it is issued. Trans-Radio news comes in over the radio to the different distributing points. I am not suggesting that it would not be possible to censor this news, but as a matter of fact the machinery does not operate in that way. The particular station is held responsible for the news it broadcasts, and is responsible to the censor if alarming or untrue statements are put out. The censor does not attempt to censor news coming from legitimate sources in London and elsewhere. This would not be done in any case unless we had reason to believe that messages were being put out under a London date line which did not originate in London.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): another thing.

CANADIANS IN ENGLAND

QUESTION AS TO STATUS WITH RESPECT TO ENLISTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) put the following question to me:

Can Canadians, who were domiciled in England at the outbreak of war, enlist over there in the Canadian forces as they did in the

I may say that the policy with respect to enlistments in England has been based upon the following considerations:

- (a) There are many non-permanent active militia units who have not yet been represented in the Canadian active service force.
- (b) Training centres are localized in Canada.
- (c) Voluntary enlistment in Canada exceeds. the vacancies available.

Canadians who are permanent residents of Great Britain have not yet been made eligible for enlistment in England with the Canadian forces. There have been exceptions to this in the case of a number of individuals possessing special qualifications for a particular appointment where alternative suitable appointees were not readily available. The question of wider enlistments is receiving the attention of the department.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT RECRUITING STATIONS—PRELIMINARY TRAINING IN PLACE OF ENLISTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I suggested the other day to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) that efforts should be made to open recruiting offices in the northeast portion of New Brunswick. I understand that that suggestion is already in effect. I have received word from Campbellton to the effect that there are a substantial number of recruits there. It is requested that they be permitted to do some preliminary training in the town of Campbellton, instead of being rushed off to some other part of the province or possibly to Aldershot, Nova Scotia. Could the minister tell me upon what principle this thing is handled? Are orders given by the district officer commanding, or is he directed from Ottawa?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): Instructions go out from the adjutant general to the district officers commanding. I have no information on the particular matter raised by my hon. friend. I appreciate the importance of having early training done in the localities in which men are enlisted, and I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

VETERANS HOME GUARD—USE OF ARMOURIES FOR ORGANIZATION AND TRAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) which is somewhat similar to the one just asked. I have received resolutions from local branches of the Canadian Legion, particularly the ones in Moosomin and Indian Head in Saskatchewan, asking that as far as possible armouries in the province which are now closed should be opened and used in organizing and training the veterans home guard. They ask also that these units should be properly equipped for emergency. Is the minister giving any instructions along these lines?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to take note of this question. My hon. friend will realize that the armouries that might be opened would probably be in places where units of the veterans home guard would be localized. I shall be glad indeed to see if this suggestion can be carried out.

ALLEGED REFUSAL TO REEMPLOY MEN SEEKING ENLISTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) if he has been notified that the management of the Drummond mine at Westville, Nova Scotia, is refusing work to employees who lost time endeavouring to enlist? As a result the mine is idle. What immediate action does he propose to take to enable these men to resume their proper employment?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) was kind enough to give me notice of this question. I may state also that shortly before noon I received word from the secretary of the Canadian congress of labour along similar lines. Since that time we have been endeavouring to get in touch with the management of the mine at Westville, but without success because of an electrical storm which is now on in that district. We have been told that contact can be made in a short time. I can assure my hon, friend that every step possible will be taken to deal with the situation when the facts are definitely known.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

ORDER IN COUNCIL OF AUGUST 11, 1939, TO HAVE FORCE AND EFFECT OF STATUTE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, 1924.

He said: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me to get certain information and give it to the house on the third reading. He wanted to know whether the governor in council had power to pass order in council P.C. 2262, which carried out some of the recommendations of the committee that dealt with amendments to the act. I am in receipt of a memorandum from the deputy minister of justice in which he gives the opinion—begs to advise—that by virtue of section 11, subsection 3 of the Civil Service Act, the governor in council had power to enact the provisions of order in council P.C. 2262 of August 11, 1939.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 5, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Vien in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last year I spoke in this house with reference to the transient unemployed in Toronto, more particularly in connection with what is known as John Frank's house, and I referred to what had been done there. There were about one hundred homeless transients who were looked after by John Frank's house and by public spirited citizens in Toronto. After they had been rehabilitated they made certain proposals to the government with respect to what might be done to continue the work of rehabilitation, but they were turned down by this government on the ground that no exception could be made. In consequence, in Toronto this year, we have again been faced with the problem of these transient young men, who might almost be called men without a country; nobody owns them, and they were forced to live in Toronto under conditions under which no one would want to have an animal live. They are certainly a fine body of young men, but they were treated terribly. This must not happen again. Some method must be devised to take care of these transients.

The same thing is true of homeless unemployed men. They do not seem to get to first base. When war was declared a good many of these transient young men came to Toronto in the hope of getting into the army. A great many of them did not even have money to get back. They had lost their jobs and for various reasons they could not get into the army. Something must be done about them; some method must be found of taking care of them. Even if the provinces will not come to their aid the government of the dominion must. I presume the same bill that we have had in the past will emerge from this resolution. There will be practically no changes. The government, under this legislation, is trying to take care of the relief situation and of agricultural distress by the back-door method; or rather, one might say, the government is trying to work from the bottom up instead of from the top down. There is no coordination in the situation.

The report of the national employment commission was brought down in 1938, but the most important of that commission's recommendations has not been touched. It will be found at page 43 of the report. The commission declare that they have finished their work, which has been in an advisory capacity, and they report that the only possible way of taking care of the unemployment situation in Canada is, in their opinion, to establish an administrative body to work in conjunction with certain local organizations and with those citizens in the various parts of the country who are community minded. That is the most important part of the report, but nothing has been done to carry it out.

How in the world can we expect to handle the unemployment situation unless we have some dominion body who will look after it? Unemployment is not merely a problem of the individual living in some particular province. He is an unemployed Canadian and he may be employed somewhere else. There is one thing further that I would touch upon here. A few figures were given with regard to the seasonal increase in the number of people on relief. I have taken a few of these figures from the report made under the act of 1939. In September, 1937, there were 100,000 heads of families on relief and in March, 1938, there were 144,696, an increase of 44,696. In September, 1939, there were 107,696 heads of families on relief and in March, 1940, there were 138,455, an increase of 30,759. Comparing 1939-40 with 1937-38, that means a diminution of only 14,000 in the seasonal increase; yet we have had a war on since September of last year, and we still have that seasonal increase of 30,000. Then as far as individuals are concerned, we have a seasonal increase of 13,000 on relief to the end of March this year. These are urban recipients. We have a total seasonal increase of 157,000 individuals on relief in the urban centres. And we have a war on!

Day after day there come to my office in Toronto literally hundreds of people who want to know where they can get work. They ask: "Why can't I get something to do? Is there any place in Canada where I can get a job? I will go anywhere, and do any kind of work." But still they cannot get to first base. They go to the employment office, and they are put on the list. Skilled workers who have had jobs are in demand, but skilled workers who have been out of work for three to six years just cannot get anything. We are going to need more workers, and the task that confronts the government at the present time is to get these men trained so that they can do the work. This cannot be done unless there is coordination, and the administration body to which I have referred should be set up to do this job. It is just the same old story all over again: year after year we come here, and great promises are made; the unemployment commission was practically going to cure relief, and the government were going to cure it as well, but it is just as it always was. There is no method; there is no driving force behind the handling of this relief situa-tion; money is just spent in any old way, so far as I can gather. It is just a makeshift. This is surprising to me when it is considered that the Prime Minister has told us, as one hon, member mentioned before, that we have in the cabinet the best brains in Canada; yet that "best brains" outfit have not brains enough to overcome a few difficulties.

One difficulty, the government say, is that this commission recommended by the Purvis report cannot function. Have we not an interdepartmental committee as well, formed under the Purvis report? It cannot function, we are told, because the provinces will not let it function. And the best brains of Canada at the present time are trying to handle this situation from the bottom to the top. This unemployment situation has to be cleaned up. We have got to get away from the relief business; it is destroying the morale of the people. We are letting the people These men and women who are so anxious to do something for Canada have no leadership whatever. The government cannot tell me, with all the things we require in this country, that if this administrative body were set up there would not be coordination between it and the heads of industry and labour. I have great faith in the enterprise of our Canadian industrialists, and in our workmen as well, but they cannot get to first base unless they have leadership. That is what is required. Something must be done, and I say to the minister that as the first step he should set up that body.

We are in a war now. There may be certain constitutional difficulties, as they call them, concerning dominion-provincial relations, but war materials have to be made; we have to see to it that these men who have been idle are trained so that they can get back to their jobs. We must remember also that the people who are going to have to make these things are people in the higher age classes. I am all in favour of youth training; it is a splendid idea, but thousands of these younger people who have enlisted and will enlist more and more as time goes on will have to be replaced by older people; and where are we going to get the skilled labour required when already we almost have a shortage of it? These men have to be trained. Before the bill to be based on this resolution is brought down we should have a clear statement of government policy with respect to this whole situation. I am afraid that the real reason we cannot get any statement of policy from the government is that they have no policy in regard to the matter. That is the answer.

Mr. ALAN CHAMBERS (Nanaimo): I have listened to what some hon, members have said with regard to non-compliance by this government with the recommendations of the national employment commission, headed by Mr. Purvis of Montreal. Hon members have before them a copy of the report made in January, 1938. Hon. members will remember that at the first session of the new parliament elected in October, 1935, in pursuance of a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) there was set up by this house through the National Employment Commission Bill a national employment commission which was intended to consist of representatives of labour, capital, youth, women's organizations, economic experts and so forth. The commission functioned and made reports from time to time. Several hon. members have stated categorically that none of the recommendations of this commission have been carried out. I propose to show that this statement is not quite in consonance with the facts.

The first work of the national employment commission was to find out what was the problem of unemployment in Canada, what it amounted to, how it was distributed geographically, and what form it took in the various sections of Canada. The first thing that was done, therefore—and I was glad to hear one hon. member refer to it a day or two ago—was to take a complete registration of persons on relief throughout Canada. That registration has been maintained from the time the commission ceased its work up to the present. The government, therefore, have been in a position to know continuously since this first registration, what the unemployment situation has been, especially in regard to relief, in the various sections of Canada. Consequently it has been possible for the government and the Minister of Labour to formulate policies from time to time along the lines recommended by the commission to meet the varying conditions in the different parts of Canada.

Hon. members might like to have some comparison between the situation when the first registration was made and the situation at the present time. When the attack of the government on unemployment began February, 1937, when the first registration was taken, some 260,000 fully employable persons of both sexes were receiving public assistance in Canada. In February, 1939—prior of course to the outbreak of the war, and two years after the government had begun their attack—this figure, by the application of the principles recommended by the national employment commission, had been reduced by some twenty-five per cent. The latest figure, that of January, 1940, shows a further reduction since the war began of about fifteen per cent for all Canada. These figures are from the director of unemployment relief, Department of Labour. This is in spite of a fifty per cent increase in registered unemployed persons on relief in the province of Quebec. I think you will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that that makes a very big difference in the total figure for Canada.

In the report of the commission dated January 26, 1938, a national registration was recommended. I have dealt with that. They also recommended a nationally coordinated, directed and operated employment service. It is true that this recommendation has not been carried out; and I doubt very much if the employment commission expected it to be carried out when they made it, for this reason. I refer to the second section of the letter of transmission which accompanied the report, directed to the then minister of labour, the present Minister of National Defence:

As requested by you, the commission has given consideration to the fact that the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations is investigating certain questions which have also come within the purview of the national employment commission. For this reason the commission has indicated in its report where certain action would, in its view, be contingent upon such financial adjustments as may emerge from the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

It is unnecessary to remind hon, members that the report on dominion-provincial relations was tabled only at the opening of this session. I am not endeavouring in any sense to beg the question. The remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) are much to the point as to the necessity for a national employment service, but he and other hon. members of this committee will recognize immediately that such a matter is an integral part of a national unemployment insurance measure, and that to have introduced it while the Sirois or Rowell commission was sitting would not have furthered any real planned attack upon unemployment.

The next recommendation of the employment commission was the setting up of a national advisory committee, and that recommendation was carried out. I know it was carried out, because I was a member of that committee. In addition to the general committee there were two committees set up to further advise the employment commission, and since the national employment commission resigned the minister has kept the members of those two committees in touch with the plans for the reconditioning and rehabilitation of both younger and older workers. They have done this work in a purely honorary capacity, not by visits to Ottawa or anything like that.

The next recommendation is one of the greatest importance, dealing with the question of the administration of assistance in connection with the reconditioning, reemployment or employment of homeless adults. These are the transients to whom the hon. member for St. Paul's referred a few moments ago. Let us see what the government have done since 1937-38 to carry out that recommendation. First of all they recommended to the provinces a farm employment plan. It was felt that if men who had worked on farms or who knew something of that work could be shown how to obtain farm employment and assisted into that employment, at least by being on the farm they would have an opportunity to take stock of their situation. I agree that it was a temporary measure, but action was taken and the recommendation of the employment commission was carried out. The recommendation was adopted by the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. In 1936-37, forty-eight thousand men were placed on farms in those provinces, of whom 22,000 remained on the farms after the period of government assistance expired. In 1937-38 some 43,000 men were placed on the farms, of whom about 15,000 remained. In 1938-39 some 32,000 were placed. of whom about 10,000 stayed on the farms. Just here I should like to interpolate that the situation described by the hon, member for St. Paul's would not exist if the government of the premier of Ontario had cooperated with this national government in its endeavour to take care of the transient problem in Ontario. And I should like to go further and say that if the plan for the relief of homeless, transient men in Ontario, as put forward by the Minister of Labour to the premier of Ontario, had been accepted by that province, the western provinces would not have found many hundreds of young Ontario men drifting out there, as was the case between 1936 and 1938.

In addition to the main farm employment plan there were other, supplementary plans for the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia, under which in 1936 some 7,000 men were placed; in 1937 some 4,500 men and approximately the same number in 1938. These supplementary plans were also open to the other provinces if they desired to take advantage of them. In addition the youth training section of the work of the Department of Labour has been open to homeless transients though they had no domicile and therefore technically were unable to take advantage of that plan. I quote from the Youth Training Act, of which paragraph (ii) of the interpretation clause states:

So much, then, for action along the lines of meeting the problem of homeless transient men. I would not want members of this committee to think for a moment that I consider the action taken to be completely adequate; but if I may I should like to set forth more or less exhaustively what the record indicates as having been done.

The next recommendation of the employment commission deals with the question of housing. Those who have perused the report will realize that when the employment commission began their work they found a heavy carry-over of unemployed persons from the depression and were faced with an annual increment of about 300,000 unemployed young people coming out of our places of education. On the other hand they found that with trade figures going up, employment was expanding. But they found one section of Canadian economic life in which that expansion was not taking place; that was in the construction industry. Therefore, naturally, they made several recommendations to give the building and construction industry a shot in the arm, if I may use that expression, knowing as they did and as we all know that as long as an industry of that magnitude lagged behind, a great deal of unemployment slack would remain not taken up. The government accepted that recommendation and implemented it by extending the operation of the act placed upon the statute book by the administration of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I am able to give the house some of the figures with regard to the implementation of that recommendation of the employment commission.

Up to May 31 of this year, 16,550 family housing units have been financed under the national housing measure, the amount of the loans being $56,000,000 and the estimated amount of construction financed about $70,000,000. The estimated expenditure for direct labour in this connection, which of course is most important since this is an unemployment relief measure, is some $27,000,000. I submit to members of the committee that this is a definite achievement.

Again, on the question of housing, I believe it was the present Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) who made the original suggestion at the session of 1936 that a plan such as was later introduced, namely the home improvement plan, should be instituted and put into operation. Under that plan the credit of the Dominion of Canada would be placed behind any citizen who could meet the specified regulations, and under it that citizen would be able to carry out repairs or necessary alterations to his home or to the buildings adjacent thereunto which on account of the depression he had been prevented from making.

The minister at the time accepted the recommendation and proceeded to carry out what came to be known as the home improvement plan. Up to May 31, 1940—and I am attempting to bring my figures as nearly as possible up to date—some $42,000,000 has been guaranteed on loans. The estimated direct labour cost of work done under this scheme, the assistance to tradesmen who had been either employed or unemployed, as the case may have been, amounted to $18,000,000, and the estimated man-hours of work stands at about 27,000,000.

I do not think any hon. member will disagree with me when I say that the government has implemented the recommendations of the national employment commission so far as housing is concerned. In addition to that the National Housing Act was amended by the present administration in 1938 by the addition of a section permitting municipalities to set up schemes whereby block or mass housing, commonly known as low-rental housing, might be undertaken. I agree with hon. members who say that full advantage of this opportunity has not been taken, but I believe we should continue to give credit to the government for having provided the necessary statutory authority, and I sincerely hope that hon. members may be in a position to give such advice to the government as will enable this section of the statute to become more operative so as to provide better housing conditions in the slum sections of our Canadian cities.

The sixth recommendation of the national employment commission had to do with training and reconditioning. From the outset that was intended to operate in the field of youth. It was felt that among the 450,000 young unemployed men and women the depression had left as a legacy to the government which assumed office in 1935 there were many who were in need of reconditioning, whose weakened moral fibre and desire to struggle to obtain employment and whose lack of experience were tremendous factors in preventing them from gaining employment in what was then a rising or expanding employment market.

The government therefore accepted the recommendations of the national employment commission to proceed to carry out training and reconditioning. I should like to place before the committee some facts in this connection. Hon, members are no doubt aware that in the first instance training and reconditioning were carried out by virtue of the vearly legislation, similar to that which will be founded on the resolution we are now discussing. In 1939 owing to the success of those plans, a measure, upon which the Youth Training Act was founded, was introduced. May I tell hon, members that from 1937, when the first work of this kind was undertaken, until March 31, 1940, a total of 165,000 young men and women of Canada who had been unemployed received reconditioning training and rehabilitation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of these youths got jobs, outside of those who went into the army?

Mr. CHAMBERS: I shall be delighted to deal immediately with the question asked by the leader of the opposition. The 165,000 young men and women received training of various kinds. It has taken the form of occupational training, physical training, learnership and apprenticeship training, and so on. Forestry training also formed a part of the programme. Of the 48,000 who took training designed to provide immediate employment, 15,500 have been placed in permanent employment. I believe that answers sufficiently the question I have been asked. Under the scheme 3,400,000 days training have been given.

Mr. WRIGHT: Do those who were placed in permanent employment include men who took the short agricultural courses in the west, men who had come from farms and then returned to their farms? Mr. CHAMBERS: No. The hon. member is referring to what is described as occupational training; those persons would not come within the figures I have just given. They are included, of course, in the total figure of 165,000, but not in the 48,000.

I am glad the hon. member asked that question, because it gives me the opportunity to tell the committee that in addition to the forms of training I have described we have also had agricultural short-course training, and agricultural training in local centres, particularly in the western provinces. All this has been done under the youth training programme. So much for recommendation No. 6.

Recommendation No. 7 dealt with public works. The recommendation of the commission was that public works programmes should be contracted. It was felt by the national employment commission, if my interpretation is correct, that to go ahead and spend large sums of money did not direct or focus the intention of the government sufficiently upon the unemployed themselves. In other words it was established by the economic advisers of the commission that of $100 spent on ordinary publics works programmes only $31 would find its way into the pockets of labouring men, and that the balance was paid for administration and, more particularly, for supplies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Material would be the largest item.

Mr. CHAMBERS: Yes; I did refer to supplies. In other words one might say there was a wastage of nearly 70 per cent of the $100 to be spent on public works. The national employment commission therefore recommended contraction in the expenditures on public works. The report contains the recommendation that public works when undertaken by joint agreement between the provinces and the dominion, through the expenditure of moneys supplied by the Department of Labour, should wherever possible help particularly those in need, and that the highest possible labour content per dollar of expenditure should be arranged.

I have the pleasure of telling hon. members that this policy adopted by the Minister of Labour and by the provinces in connection with the expenditure of these funds has raised the labour content of each dollar expended from 31 cents on the dollar to over 80 cents on the dollar, and that in pursuance of the carrying out of this recommendation many miles of tourist roads have been built in various sections of Canada, and many new mining areas have been opened for further development, at a crucial time in Canada's history. This has resulted from the carrying

tions of the report.

The eighth recommendation of the commission had to do with agricultural relief. It was felt by the commissioners that the relief situation and the methods of handling relief in provinces preponderantly agricultural were not what they should be. The report states that the recommendation has not been implemented. We must remember that the report was made in 1938, and may I say at this time that in so far as the government has been able to implement the report, it has been implemented. The successful operation of a scheme of that kind must depend upon two parties, namely, the provincial government in question and the dominion government. Naturally the provincial government had ideas of their own on the subject. Nevertheless a great deal of assistance has been given to the three provincial governments of preponderantly agricultural provinces by virtue of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, both of which have been utilized to carry out the recommendations of the national employment commission. I could give the committee figures on that, but I do not want to be too dry.

The ninth point of the commission's recommendations concerns auditing. It was felt that the old system of post auditing of relief accounts did not allow the heads of provincial governments or of municipalities to arrive at an understanding of what their policy should be, because they did not know their financial position as they should know it when called upon to make a new agreement with the dominion at the beginning of the fiscal year. The recommendation of the commission that a current audit should be set up in place of a post audit has been carried out.

Recommendation No. 10, for the organization and coordination of aid, has also been carried out in so far as it has been practicable and acceptable to the provincial governments, which, as I say, must agree to the changes suggested by the dominion government.

In addition there were several general recommendations which are not contained specifically in the schedule of recommendations but which are of importance, and upon those I should like to dwell for a few moments.

There was the question of rehabilitation through land settlement. It is mainly in the province of Quebec that anything has been done along these lines, and there some 4,000 families have been settled.

The recommendation as to the establishment in the Labour department of a women's bureau has been implemented by the appointment of Miss Alexander, of Winnipeg, as assistant to the supervisor of the youth training plan in the department, to carry out the training and reconditioning of youth.

The rehabilitation of older workers has also been carried out. In the last two and a half years some 9,000 of these older workers have received training and reconditioning.

A further recommendation dealt with the establishment of a division in the Department of Labour for extending the learner-ships and apprenticeships plan. That also has been carried out by the appointment of a supervisor of the youth training plan.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a brief summary of the carrying out of the plans recommended by the national employment commission. The question has also been raised, what is the situation now that war has broken out? What is the position with regard to the mobilization of man-power? What can be done and what should be done? With regard to training persons who are unemployed to meet the demands for labour, I am sure that the hon. member for St. Paul's does not consider that he can make a skilled workman in a very short time. I also noted that he said he had great faith in the manufacturing industries of Canada. I have too, but I should like to tell the members of this committee that the national advisory committee to which I have referred, and of which I was a member, sent out a questionnaire to the organization of manufacturers of Canada, pointing out to them that with an expanding trade market it must be recognized that sooner or later there would be a big demand for skilled workers, and pointing out too that there was a great number of younger men who were then unemployed-and after all you should be able to train them better than the older men—and they were asked how about preparing for this demand before it actually came. We sent them a simple questionnaire consisting of three questions, and I should like to tell the committee what the result of that was, without any prejudice. The first question was-and do not forget that the questionnaire was sent to almost every manufacturing business right across Canada: Do you find that in your business you are facing a shortage of skilled labour? We made a composite answer of the replies received, and the composite answer was yes. They did not say that they had a shortage at that time, but rather that they were facing a possible shortage of skilled labour.

The second question was: Do you not think that something should be done in the form of training to prepare for the inevitable demand for skilled workers, which by your own admission you anticipate? The composite answer to that was yes, we do.

[Mr. Chambers.]

The third question was: Do you think that the training should be done by you in your own business, and are you prepared to do it, or do you think it should be done by the government? The composite answer of the manufacturers to whom the hon, member for St. Paul's has referred was: No, we should not do it ourselves, and no, it certainly should not be done by the government. That is a matter of record.

Although it is of little use to refer to these things, when one considers that the labour problem in the manufacture throughout Canada of equipment necessary to the war effort is largely going to be a matter of quickly adapting more or less skilled labour to mass production, I do not think the question is entirely irrelevant.

The hon. member for Peel asked why it was that in view of the large amount of war orders that have been placed in Canada there should be at the end of April a large number of persons still receiving public assistance. May I run very briefly over the unemployment situation in each province since the war broke out.

At the present time in Nova Scotia the relief figures reflect an improvement in employment. The total numbers of employable persons on relief have been reduced by between 60 and 70 per cent of the number in the previous year. In Prince Edward Island the relief totals since January have been higher than those of a year ago, owing to a change in the loan policy which has officially added 950 fishermen to the relief rolls because assistance was given in the form of loans. That is not necessarily relief. In the province from which the hon, leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) comes, I know that it will be a source of great pride to him to know that there have been no registered persons on relief for some time past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member allow me to tell him why? There is no relief administered by the government of the province—not that there is no necessity for relief, but they just cut them off. The cities are giving relief because they are obliged to do so.

Mr. CHAMBERS: I think the leader of the opposition will bear with me when I say that so far as reports made by leaders of the government of New Brunswick to the Minister of Labour here are concerned, there is no reference to persons on relief.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no registration. They just cut them off and let them shift for themselves.

Mr. McLARTY: My hon, friend will agree that is not the fault of this government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree, but I am not suggesting that.

Mr. CHAMBERS: In the province of Quebec the situation is very different. The outstanding feature of business in the province of Quebec has been the rapid expansion in manufacturing since last fall. In March of this year there were more workers employed in the province of Quebec than at any time previously in the history of the province, although this month is not usually a busy month. Textiles, pulp, paper and mining are all showing an increase in the number of workers engaged.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If that statement is correct, would the hon. member explain why the number of people receiving relief in the province of Quebec has increased?

Mr. CHAMBERS: I do not mind being interrupted by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I think hon. members will agree that I have rounded out every statement I have made so far. If the hon. member will let me complete a statement once I have started to make it, he will get his answer before he asks his question.

Textiles, pulp and paper and mining are considerably busier, but since the beginning of the war construction has fallen off quite badly. The province of Quebec relief totals are about fifty per cent higher than they were last year. This is due chiefly to the fact that large numbers who were employed on relief works became unemployed and were added to the direct relief rolls. This will probably answer the question asked by the hon. member. May I say also that more than half of the employable persons on relief in Quebec are general labourers and construction workers who would not be affected by improved employment conditions in the manufacturing industries. The situation in the city of Montreal has remained static. The fifty per cent rise in the province is not repeated in the case of Montreal, but there has been a transfer of relief workers.

In Ontario manufacturing during the first quarter of 1940 has improved considerably, averaging thirteen per cent higher than the same period last year. The sharpest increase in employment has been shown by the heavy industries, textiles and so on. There has been a reduction of about thirty per cent in relief costs as compared with a year ago. Business generally in the prairie provinces has been somewhat better, although employment has not been stimulated to the same extent by war time activity as it has been in the industrial provinces. There has been a six per cent improvement in industrial employment in the prairie provinces and a seventeen and a half per cent reduction in the number of those receiving public assistance.

In Saskatchewan there was a large reduction in agricultural relief following the distribution of the 1939 crop. I do not want the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) to feel that I do not appreciate her point of view in this connection. I know exactly what this means. However, conditions are easier with regard to public assistance, the official improvement being in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent. Alberta relief totals have shown an improvement, the betterment being between thirty and forty per cent. The amount of relief which will be necessary in the prairie provinces during the coming fall and winter will depend largely upon the prices received for the 1940 crop.

In British Columbia, the province from which I have the honour to come, economic conditions improved considerably last fall and this improvement has been maintained to some extent. Mining and shipbuilding have been quite active and employment generally in many industries during the first quarter of this year has been more active than at any time in their history. However, we fear that a lack of shipping facilities on the Pacific coast may affect employment conditions. Fishing and agriculture are not particularly active in British Columbia during March, and there is no reasonable basis for comparison. Taking the province as a whole, there has been a twelve per cent decrease in relief during March as compared with the previous period.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to deal with this resolution at great length, but I feel I must say a few words before it is put through. The resolution reads in part:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need.

In this critical time in the history not only of Canada but of the British empire, it is almost an insult to our intelligence that there should be a resolution on the order paper to provide assistance to one of the greatest industries in Canada, an industry which is most essential to the proper prosecution of the war. The resolution proves that the people of this country are in need of financial assistance and are in dire distress. We must do everything possible to carry this war through to a successful conclusion. Everything must be done with that one object in view.

When we consider the agricultural question we should keep in mind the fact that it is necessary to assist this industry in a way that will help to win this war all the sooner. In my opinion we cannot win a war when the greatest industry in the country is in distress. You must have a united people to win a war.

At the beginning of the war it was said by some members that we were not fighting the German people, that we were fighting a dictator. I said that I did not agree with that statement; I said that we were fighting the German people. It has been my conviction from the first that we were fighting the German people. The German people are fighting for an ideal. In our estimation that ideal is entirely wrong. We contend that it is a heathen nation which is fighting a Christian nation. But they have organization; they do not have discontent in their ranks. In order to meet them we must face this fact squarely, that we cannot have a proper military organization with a dissatisfied agricultural industry. Why have we a discontented agricultural industry? The people in this industry are dissatisfied because they are faced with economic insecurity.

You cannot have people fighting for a country who have dissatisfaction in their minds. You cannot expect an army to be successful when it is made up of volunteers who have been forced into it because of economic conditions. You cannot force people to fight; they just will not do it. But if you can set an ideal before them and show them that they are fighting for something worth while, then you will have men who cannot be beaten. Our army is made up possibly to the extent of seventy-five per cent of men who have been forced into it because of economic conditions. As was pointed out not so long ago by a speaker in this house, with the exception of the war industries, industry generally in Canada is shutting down. This forces men into the army. They are not volunteers in any sense of the word; they have been forced in because of economic conditions. We cannot hope to wage a successful war under the conditions that prevail. We must see to it that there is neither unemployment nor agricultural distress and that it is not necessary for us to supplement measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need. That is what this resolution proposes, and the very resolution tells us that the whole economic system is wrong.

I am surprised to hear Conservative members telling the government that they should do something about unemployment and agrigultural distress. What did they do in the five years they were in power? Not a bit more than the Liberal government has done in the same length of time, and possibly not as much-and I am not saying that the Liberal government has done much either. I know that it has not tackled the problem in the way in which it should be tackled; otherwise there would be no need of this resolution on the order paper. The only thing I can remember the Conservatives doing was advising the people to tighten their belts, and the Liberal government is doing the same thing when it extends a little bit of measly relief to the needy. That sort of thing creates dissatisfaction. It creates unrest in the minds of the people, the very people we want to fight for us to-day. It creates a want of confidence in the government. These people might well ask themselves, as I have too often heard: "Why should I fight for Canada when the country does not even give me a decent standard of living, when my wife and children are not properly fed?" You cannot expect it. I say definitely that you cannot build up an army on that kind of material. There must be satisfaction among the people, among those men who are willing to volunteer to fight for the country; they must feel that the country will properly and adequately provide for their wives and children not only now but afterwards. You must create that spirit of patriotism, because you cannot force it.

I was impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) the other day. In my opinion he produced evidence that could not be disputed. He had actual photographs—and the camera does not lie. The hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) also gave a perfect picture of the conditions that exist in her province. I know that the conditions are exactly as they have been described, because I had an opportunity to visit the country around Swift Current in the last election in that province and I saw what things were like then. I saw the distress and poverty that existed in that province; and despite the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Tripp), as reported at page 554 of Hansard, I declare that the conditions that have been reported are not at all exaggerated. The hon. member said:

I was a member of the legislature in Saskatchewan for eight years, four of them being from 1934 to 1938, and I can say all the statements he has made to-day are not true.

I hope the people of Saskatchewan will read those words in Hansard. I challenge any man from Alberta to make any such statement, because we know that the conditions are there.

Mr. DONNELLY: In Alberta or Saskatchewan?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In Saskatchewan too.

Mr. DONNELLY: You are wrong.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hope you will go back and explain it to them.

Mr. DONNELLY: I will.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Challenges are out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was not challenging any hon, member.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon, member should address himself to the chair.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have no wish to offend the chair; I wish to abide by the rules of the house. I say in all sincerity, however, that if we are to win this war the government must rectify those conditions. When any hon, member stands in his place here and says that there is no poverty or distress, the resolution itself contradicts him. Either the government is wrong or the member who says that there is no distress or poverty is wrong. But one has only to visit these places to see with one's own eyes the very conditions that have been described in this house.

I have been considering the condition of those people who are in great need, as this resolution indicates, those who have been living on our farms, the unemployed who are walking the streets-and you need not go to the west to find such people, because you can find them in plenty on the streets of Ottawa. You will find the unemployed at the offices here seeking employment which they cannot get, while their wives and families are in dire distress, and yet we in this house vote $100,000 for the beautification of this city. I am not complaining about having a few flowers in the parks and perhaps decorating a little the memorial down here, though we had better pray that there are not more dates upon it soon. But does that type of legislation lead to satisfaction and unity among the people? There are people who are starving to death though we can spend $100,000 in war time for a few flowers in a few parks. I have no objection to your spending money on these flowers and these parks, but when we cannot find money for the very essential assistance to relieve agricultural distress, then I say it is a shame that we should ever be spending $100,000 for the beautification of any place, memorial or anything else until this problem is settled.

Why is it that the people of Canada engaged in that great industry, the backbone of this country, are in distress? Possibly our Conservative friends can tell us. They were in power for five years and the distress continued throughout that time, and because that distress continued the Conservatives were cleaned out in the election. But I do not think the Liberals should pat themselves on the back simply because they were returned to power. They were returned to power under different conditions, which we need not go into in detail now. Why is this industry dissatisfied? Because farmers have not a sufficient return from the things they produce to enable them to maintain a decent standard of living. When a man gets up at five o'clock in the morning and works until ten or twelve at night, three hundred and sixty-five days a year, and cannot make enough to buy decent clothing and food for his wife and his children, has he any incentive to fight for the country? Can you build up an army with such people? And seventy-five per cent of those in the army are men of this description. You simply cannot maintain the morale.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon, member say they are not loyal?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, but I say, let us give them something to be loyal for. You cannot force patriotism. You must show a man that he has something worth fighting for. Would any hon. member say that when these people have been in such dire distress and poverty and want they have anything to fight for? They do not get sufficient return for the things they produce, yet the things they must have in order to be able to produce are ever increasing in pricemachinery, oil, gasoline; everything they have to buy is increasing in price. This year we even put a little further tax on them; if they want decent seed they have to pay cash to have it tested. Everything we do tends to increase rather than decrease their costs, and nothing is being done to help them.

It must be a source of satisfaction to the people referred to in the resolution, suffering as they are from unemployment and agricultural distress, and they must swell with patriotism, when they see in the papers that this year the profits of Canadian Wineries are higher, and that the net more than covers the dividend paid of forty cents a share. Let me quote from the Financial Post of May 11, 1940:

Sales of Canadian Wineries were higher in the year ended April 30, 1940, than in the 1938-39 year, A. G. Sampson, president, informs the Financial Post. As a result the company expects to report net profits higher than the forty cents a share earned a year ago.

Then there is another industrial company such as an hon. member was speaking of a moment ago, and in which he has such pride —and compare them with the greatest industry of all, the agricultural industry. This is from the Financial Post of the same date:

International Paper profit soars. Net earnings for first quarter rise to nearly $3,000,000. Preliminary figures indicate that operations of International Paper and Power Company for the first quarter of 1940—

And we are right in the middle of a war.

—resulted in net earnings of about $2.9 millions against $12,428 for the corresponding period of 1939, according to a statement made by R. J. Cullen, president, at the annual meeting of stockholders.

In the Financial Post of June 1, 1940, I see that Agnew Surpass has made better profits in the fiscal year ended May 31, and the factory is working at a higher rate. Harding Carpets' profits for the six months' period are up from the same period of 1939. Why is it that the profits of these industrialists continue to rise to such heights in time of war while agriculture is down in the mire? It just doesn't make sense. Yet there were to be no profits or blood money in this war! I agree there is going to be no profit—

Mr. HOMUTH: That may not be on war work.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, I can speak of the war industries, and I intend to do so before the session closes. How do they make their profits? I hope to have the pleasure of going into that more in detail on the estimates. Hon, members say it is not war work. I happened to visit not long ago some of the industries that produce war materials and I learned that the government, when they agree with the manufacturers on a price, have an understanding that if the company can cut the cost of the article they get a bonus on it as high as fifty per cent. Why should they be given an extra profit of fifty per cent? The farmer is not given any bonus. Why not? Why are these other industries which are not producing war materials shut down and the people thrown out of work? Where are they to seek employment? Yet we bonus the war industries fifty per cent if they can chisel the cost down a little. We shall have more to say about that when the These are the things proper time comes. that create a clear class distinction between industrial organizations and the agricultural industry. We should be giving a great deal of attention in an endeavour to correct this wrong. I read in the Ottawa Journal of June 3:

Big programme to supply Britain food. Government will force farm workers to stay on land.

England wants food and wants more food; yet our people here in Canada have not even enough money to put in the seed to raise wheat. Is that a maximum war effort? We have been in this war nine months; the very existence of the British empire is at stake, yet we have a resolution here to dole out relief instead of putting that industry on a solid working foundation. We in this country should be producing everything that we can. Why don't we? No doubt some hon members are saying: "Where are you going to get the money?" I do not care where you get the money from, but get it.

An hon. MEMBER: How?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, Mr. Chairman, here we are, an intelligent House of Commons—I hope—assembled here for the purpose of carrying on this war and other business. We have the material in this country, we have the men anxious to work, yet some hon. member asks, how are you going to get the money? Well, let us issue money through the Bank of Canada in terms of public need. If you turn a herd of hungry hogs loose in a wheat field—I used this illustration in my campaign—when they have the desire and the food is there, they will at least know enough to eat it. I wonder sometimes whether the people of Canada have as much intelligence.

Mr. HANSELL: The hogs do not have any parliament to legislate for them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There may be something in that, and they do not have to follow rules and regulations; the material is there, the desire is there, and so they eat. We have the material, we have the men, and Great Britain is pleading for the products, yet we say, where are you going to get the money?

Mrs. NIELSEN: What about taxing these big corporations that are making the big profits?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): An hon. member says, why not tax the big profits that are being made in this war. I have always taken the stand that there should be absolutely no profits made in war, and for the life of me I cannot understand why any man in this country-and this includes members of parliament—should get more than the soldier gets in the field. He gets $1.30 a day, with an allowance for his family. What is he doing for it? He is going to the battlefields of Europe where he may get his head blown off, his arm or leg shot off. Is there any hon. member who will say that any industrialist or member of parliament or anyone else should be paid more than the soldier gets? He is not offering as much. Yet we have the manufacturers of this country saying they would not work for five per cent profit, so that that provision was rescinded by order in council. We know what would happen at the front if when the order came to go over the top the soldier getting $1.30 a day said: I will not do it until I get $1.35. We will ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers), what would happen to that man? Then I say the same treatment should be given the Canadian manufacturer who says he will not work for a profit of five per cent in time of war, and I do not hesitate to make that statement. They should be all on the same footing. Surely if our soldiers have enough patriotism to go over and fight for $1.30 a day, there should be a little more patriotism among our manufacturers and those of us who stay at home, who are being protected by the men who go overseas.

I certainly hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) will see to it that something is done immediately so that we shall not have to dole out relief to the unemployed who are in dire need and to those suffering agricultural distress. The times are too serious for that. Our very existence as an empire and a nation is at stake. I do not think we should be dilly-dallying around; we should be doing everything in our power to carry on this war and bring it to a successful conclusion. When anyone refuses to do that, I would treat him as a person should be treated when he refuses to work for his country in time of need. There should be no distinction. There should be no class distinction. There should be no industrial class distinction. Everyone should be treated alike. There should be no favourites. If what I suggest is carried out, we shall have a contented and happy people; we shall not need to force them to patriotism; they will have something worth while to fight for.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): The problem of relief is, to a large extent, the problem of unemployment. If every able-bodied person in this country were gainfully employed, there would be no problem of relief. Yesterday the hon, member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) quoted from the report of the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief and gave figures showing the appalling, steady increase in unemployment since the beginning of the war. These figures were convincing evidence in support of the charge of complacency and neglect in mobilizing, even partly, Canada's industries for the war effort. I assume, if I am able to show that Canadian industry is capable of building tanks and other instruments of war in a large way, it will be conceded that this will quickly absorb all our unemployed and take them off relief. Incidentally it will also relieve the country of much of the expenditure proposed in the resolution we are considering to-day.

When in answer to questions the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated in this house on May 28 that as yet no tanks had been made in Canada, the country was shocked. The minister made two excuses: first, the difficulty in obtaining the latest British design and, second, that the armour plating for modern tanks, 41 inches in thickness, could be obtained only from two or three sources within the empire. I have checked the minister's statement with men thoroughly conversant with every phase of steel production and fabrication, and they were very much annoyed at this reflection on Canadian industry. I am informed that the Dominion Foundries and Steel Limited of Hamilton have on hand machinery and plant to roll at least 3,000 tons of prime grade steel armour plate monthly. This armour plate can be produced in a wide range of sizes and in thicknesses from one-eighth of an inch to six inches, with alloys suitable for the manufacture of various types of tanks. These plates can be made in all ordinary sizes up to a maximum weight of 7,500 pounds per plate, which is ample for all practical purposes since most plates used on tanks weigh much less.

I would point out that steel armour plate two inches thick by $5\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide and fifteen feet long would weigh 7,500 pounds. After being rolled, the armour plate is subjected to additional processes, including hardening, flattening and cutting to size. This company now has considerable facilities for performing these operations. Whether or not its present finishing machinery could keep pace with a programme of great magnitude would depend upon the design and specifications of the tanks undertaken to be built. Furthermore, the management are prepared to install promptly sufficient equipment to double their present capacity for rolling armour plate should orders for a large number of tanks be forthcoming from the Canadian ordnance. This plant is the only one in Canada equipped to roll heavy steel plates. The same company has a capacity for producing 2,000 tons of alloy steel castings monthly, suitable for the manufacture of tanks. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company of Montreal also have considerable facilities for the production of steel castings, and at the present time they have idle sufficient capacity for over 1,000 tons a month. Other plants also are prepared to deliver at once castings suitable for tanks.

The International Harvester company of Hamilton have plant and machinery fully [Mr. Bruce.]

equipped for the manufacture of heavy truck engines. They have no orders for the production of tank engines, but if such orders were forthcoming they could, with very little trouble, rapidly change over their production lines accordingly. It is a reasonable probability that the International Harvester company could provide motors for tanks as quickly as the bodies of the tanks could be built and assembled. However, the selection of a Canadian plant to manufacture engines for tanks will depend upon the type of engine specified. The Oshawa plant of General Motors, and other Canadian companies, are already manufacturing heavy gasoline engines in this country. The plant of the Dominion Engineering Company at Montreal is making diesel engines up to 600 horse-power. Ample diesel and gasoline heavy truck engines are also available from United States manufacturers. There is no scarcity of these engines corresponding to the current scarcity of aeroplane engines. It is not advisable to attempt to duplicate the English engine absolutely but rather we should adopt some similar engine from among those quickly available here.

Treads are made from steel castings or forgings, joined by alloy steel bars. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company of Montreal and several other foundries have ample idle plant capacity to produce the necessary castings. Atlas Steels Limited of Welland and other mills are able to produce the necessary alloy steel bars. Boring and finishing of the steel castings and general assembly of the treads could be undertaken by the Peterborough plant of the Canadian General Electric Company. The Caterpillar Tractor Company in the United States holds patents on the caterpillar tread, but arrangements could undoubtedly be made by the Canadian government to get authorization for the use of these patents.

Other operations in the manufacture of tanks, including assembly, could be performed in any one of several available factories depending upon the weight and specification of tanks chosen. The plants of the Dominion Bridge and associated companies at Toronto should be readily adaptable for this purpose.

There is also available for assembly the large and modern structural steel plant of the Hamilton Bridge Company at Hamilton. This plant is not busy at the present time and it has all facilities for the assembly, riveting and finishing of heavy and light tanks.

Also located in Hamilton is the complete modern plant of the Canadian Westinghouse company This company is suitably equipped for the manufacture of metres, gauges, instruments, electrical systems, et cetera, and other fine assemblies necessarily incorporated in tanks.

In the interests of rapid and economical manufacture it is recommended that a modified Canadian design be evolved instead of an attempt being made to duplicate exactly any British tank. Many of the British specifications have been worked out to suit existing machinery and materials available in Great Britain; identical conditions cannot easily be duplicated here.

I am sorry the Minister of Munitions and Supply was not in his place when I commenced to speak on the subject of tanks.

If we take, for example the analysis of steel, it can be readily seen that an analysis may be specified to enable easy production from the iron ores and coals mined in England. Obviously, with different types of materials available here, there might be much difficulty in reproducing the identical English analysis. In view of the urgent need for speed, therefore, it should be the government's policy to adapt, in the Canadian design, such materials as are currently available here. Although the parts of our tanks will not be interchangeable with the parts of corresponding British tanks of the same weight; yet our tanks will be equally serviceable and valuable, and the time saved in initial production will be very great.

Using British designs as a basis, a competent group of qualified Canadian engineers should be able to work out a complete Canadian design within thirty days. The first tank should roll off production lines after an additional three or four months. Within one year production should be up to a rate of 250 tanks a month. Such a programme would require close cooperation from the Canadian government.

In a broadcast on Sunday last, Mr. Anthony Eden said:

The vital weapon of any country is its spirit. Brave hearts alone cannot stand up against steel. We need more aeroplanes, more tanks, more guns. The people of the country must work as they have never worked before.

And yet Canada has idle factories and idle men.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply proclaimed himself as a salesman for Canadian industry. May I ask him if, acting as a salesman of Canadian products, he went at any time to England himself, to inform the British government of the industrial facilities available in Canada?

If he did not go, perhaps the reason can be found in the report of the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract, at page 17, in the letter of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), of September 12, 1936, replying to a letter from Mr. Plaxton. In this letter the Prime Minister said:

I have delayed in acknowledging your communication of August the 24th until I had opportunity to discuss its representations confidentially with my colleagues in council. I may say, in reply, that we see no reason why a Canadian firm established for the manufacture of munitions should be precluded from obtaining orders from the British government. It would be necessary, of course, to see that it was distinctly understood that such orders as were obtained, were at the instance of the firm itself and not either directly or indirectly, at the instance of the government of Canada. Any company doing business will of course be subject to any regulations or control which the government may decide to exercise at any time

In view of the Prime Minister's letter, the claim of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, to be a salesman for Canadian industry, would seem to be rather far-fetched.

Assuming that Britain has not made use of Canadian industrial production, why did Canada not show some initiative and give a practical demonstration of her independence by supplying her own forces with guns, tanks and full motorized equipment, as part of Canada's war effort, instead of placing the whole burden upon Great Britain, whose factories were already overworked in equipping her rapidly increasing army?

After the Prime Minister, on Tuesday last, had informed the house of the return to England of aeroplanes on their way to Canada, he added that these aeroplanes were ordered in April, 1939. May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he will inform the committee if at that time any orders were placed with our Canadian plants for aeroplanes?

To anyone who read an account of what happened in the Polish campaign as well as during the last three weeks, it will be perfectly clear that we must have armoured troops and tanks to protect and precede our divisions of infantry or rifle units into battle. Without tanks, masses of troops are a liability rather than an asset; they have to be fed, clothed and transported and cannot be used for any purpose except digging trenches or other work behind the line, or for occupying heavily fortified positions such as the Maginot line.

Apart from armour plate which can be obtained in Hamilton, there is no technical difficulty about the production of tanks that cannot be quickly overcome by Canadian manufacturers. Owing to the present serious situation, it is not likely that we can get British army tanks or the necessary tools to make them. It would, therefore, seem expedient to provide for our immediate requirements by purchase from United States manufacturers or to get released from the American army a United States army tank or tanks so that the Canadian army may standardize on these rather than wait for eight or nine months for British tools, plans, et cetera. It is absurd to say that all our equipment must be British, standardized equipment—it was not so in the last war. For the first year and a half of the last war, Canadian troops were supplied with American Colt machine guns, because the British could not supply us with Vickers. It is simple enough to arrange for a supply of spare parts et cetera, in the same way as the Royal Air Force is able to supply parts for a great variety of aeroplanes, including those purchased in the United States.

I think it will be clear from what I have said that Canadian industry can make tanks. If given the opportunity, it can make anything that can be made anywhere in the world.

Canadian industry at the present time is prepared to make guns and, I am informed, is already producing guns at the Marine Industries plant, on orders from the French government.

Since the last war, our industry has grown in technical experience and skill. It has grown in size enormously, has highly skilled technicians and is making many products which, even for a number of years after the last war, were not made here. Canada is now making, in competition with the entire world, such things as motor cars, rolling stock for railways, et cetera.

It must be obvious to anyone in this house that his many duties as Minister of Transport, which include railways, canals, trans-Canada air service, meteorological services, marine and radio, and the national harbours board with which the minister is now weighted down, make it humanly impossible for him to discharge his increasingly important duties as Minister of Munitions and Supply—duties which are so vital at this time.

On May 20 the Prime Minister expressed his recognition of the difficulty. May we soon hope to learn that action has been taken and that the Minister of Transport, who recently had superimposed upon him the work of the munitions and supply board, be now relieved of that work, and that a separate ministry of munitions and supply be created. The government should be able to secure from outside this house the services of an able executive, a man with an intimate knowledge of Canadian industries and with driving force to get things done quickly—such qualities as are possessed by more than one of our industrialists.

Mr. Bevin, a Labour leader, now Minister of Labour in Mr. Churchill's cabinet, speaking in England to-day made the significant statement that since labour had been fully recognized in the reorganized British government, production had been in some instances stepped up by 100 per cent. Is this not a lesson from which Canada may very well profit?

Having regard to the imperative necessity of securing the sympathetic support and full cooperation of labour in our war effort, would it not be good common sense for the government to appoint as Minister of Labour a man who is himself identified with labour and recognized as a representative of labour.

Mr. POULIOT: Who? What man, please?

Mr. BRUCE: May I express my appreciation of the courteous way in which the Speaker drew my attention to the rules yesterday, and if it had not been for the hubbub made on the other side of the house I would have heard what the Minister of Munitions and Supply said to me, as well as the Speaker's own remarks. May I say that so far as I am concerned these personal attacks were not unexpected. During the months of February and March when I was a candidate in Parkdale I was bombarded with threatening letters from a former member of this house who for a time sat in one of the earlier cabinets of the present Prime Minister, and who by all accounts still stands high in the counsels of the Liberal party. In these letters, abuse was heaped upon my character and I was warned that, if perchance I should be elected, I would not be spared the full force of partisan anger when I reached the house. The letters seemingly were prophetic.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if the hon. member is speaking to the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly he is.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to repeat so that members may hear me that in these letters I was warned that, if elected, I would not be spared the full force of partisan anger when I reached the house. The letters seemingly were prophetic.

Mr. GRAHAM: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Perhaps the argument of the hon. gentleman is somewhat far-fetched, but I believe he will bring it round to the resolution.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just one word to say to the hon. gentleman. He was speaking of points of order that were little trips to nowhere, but he was so busy reading his speech that unfortunately he did not have time to read the five o'clock papers. Here is the news.

Mr. BRUCE: I was speaking before the five o'clock papers were available.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, but it is never too late. This is what the five o'clock paper says:

"Quagmire" trap halts tanks—hundreds and hundreds are smashed—main forces hold after tanks meet destruction—units that fought through advance French lines cut off from their support.

So at last the German tanks are not meeting with success and hundreds and hundreds of them have been trapped. That is for the information of the hon. member. Furthermore, I would ask the hon. member where he got his technical information on the making of munitions.

Mr. HOWE: Just a word, Mr. Chairman, to clear up the misconception that I was being intentionally rude to my hon. friend the other day. I suggest that if he feels a persecution complex, it is quite unnecessary because since he came to this house he has dismissed the leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister, and he has just now dismissed myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he thinks you are overworked.

Mr. HOWE: I do not wish to be controversial, but after all when we have a large and expert organization working very hard to do the things which people glibly say can be done without much difficulty we are apt to become a little heated sometimes.

The situation as regards tanks is this. Canada can undoubtedly make a tank, and tanks are made in the United States. However, we have in Europe a battle of tanks which is developing some new facts about tanks as weapons of warfare. For every tank that is invented, a gun is shortly afterwards invented to deal with that particular type of tank, and the effectiveness of tanks in the field depends upon their being proof against the latest type of anti-tank gun that has been developed. The British government have had experience in the field and it has led them to change their ideas about the effective tank for warfare of this day. Their ideas of a tank differ very widely from those of the military authorities of the United States. The remarks I have made from time to time about tanks refer to the problem that we have had in hand, the building of a tank which will meet the demands of the type of warfare that is being carried on at the present moment in the field.

The academic question whether tanks can or cannot be made in Canada depends for its answer upon the type of tank one has in mind, and I assume that a great many of the differences which have arisen in the discussions here have arisen because some people have one idea of a tank and I have in mind another idea of a tank. We can produce in this country alloy steel up to a maximum thickness of two inches. The type of tank that I have in mind has armoured steel of more than twice that thickness.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the 80-ton tank?

Mr. HOWE: No; forty tons. We produce in this country gasoline engines that would propel some kind of tank. The tank I have in mind is propelled by a diesel engine much larger than anything we have produced in Canada. It is folly to say that we cannot produce diesel engines in Canada. Canadian industry can do anything provided it is given sufficient time and development expenses. It can be done, but it may not be of much help at the moment. There have occurred within the last two or three days certain developments which have changed the situation as far as the production of tanks in Canada is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good. Let us have more action.

Mr. HOWE: It is expected that a delegation from this country will leave for England by the next boat to settle this question once for all. I would ask hon members not to be dogmatic about plants in Hamilton being able to build tanks. Even after all information is obtained and all possible help has been secured outside Canada, it will still be an exceedingly complex job for Canadian industry to build tanks. No one firm will be called upon to do the entire job. It will mean the collaboration of the heavy industries of this country.

Mr. BRUCE: I obtained my information from a mechanical engineer who is familiar with the structural steel works throughout Canada. I should like to say just a word in answer to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He was not in the chamber earlier in the day when I commenced my remarks, and I suggest that he read Hansard to see what I said. I think I gave a good deal of information which may be of value to him. The minister has said that this matter depends upon the type of tank to be manufactured. I do not care what type of tank is to be manufactured; it can be made in Canada.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): What has a structural steel engineer to do with tanks?

Mr. BRUCE: The armour covering of the tank is structural steel made of a certain alloy, as I explained thoroughly this afternoon.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend's steel expert is the same steel expert that I use, except that I hired him first. Mr. C. W. Sherman was a member of the war supply board and is now the director of steel for the Department of Munitions and Supply. He has done a tremendous amount of work to help meet this problem. We hope he will be able to continue his work and produce the type of armour plate that will be required.

Mr. BRUCE: In fairness to Mr. Sherman I think I should say that he was not my informant. I do not happen to know Mr. Sherman, but I congratulate the minister upon having such an excellent adviser.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understand the steel plant at Sydney is capable of rolling 4-inch plate at short notice and of handling ingots up to thirty tons. Could that plant not be utilized to produce the armour plate required for these tanks?

Mr. HOWE: My understanding is that the total capacity of the Dominion Iron and Steel company at Sydney is being used for shipments to the United Kingdom. I do not want to be dogmatic, but I question whether that plant could roll 4-inch plate.

Mr. BRUCE: Would the minister inquire of Mr. Sherman and inform us to-morrow?

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I suggest that the Minister of Munitions and Supply engage the hon. member for Parkdale as a tank expert. Then we might get somewhere.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, I should like to consider this resolution from the agricultural viewpoint. It reads in part:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress.

The discussion I have just heard has been puite interesting, but it is hardly relevant to the situation which exists in agriculture at the present time. I cannot see where it has anything to do with the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress. I represent an agricultural constituency. I farmed in the east for a number of years before the war, and I have farmed in the west for twenty-one years since the war.

We have been told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) that our export markets are contracting, that many of the countries which previously absorbed our agricultural products are to-day in the hands of the enemy. It is expected that this year we shall have large surpluses of many commodities, such as apples, bacon, canned goods, peas, fresh fruit, and so on. Is it to be the policy of this government to let the prices of these products go so low that it will be economically impossible for the farmer to harvest his crops? Are these crops to be left in the fields to rot?

There is a potential market for many of these products here at home if the purchasing power of those on relief and of those in the lower income brackets were raised. For instance, Doctor W. C. Hopper, principal agricultural economist in the Department of Agriculture, stated in a paper presented at the meeting of the Canadian Agricultural Economic Society in Saskatoon, in June, 1937:

If the people in Canada who had an income of less than $4,000 per year were to use the same amount of dairy products as those with an income of over that amount, we would need 200,000 more dairy cattle in Canada producing an average of 5,000 pounds of milk per year.

Similar but more extensive surveys have been made in the United States and Great Britain. All these surveys show that more agricultural products can be used in the home markets provided the people have the power to purchase. This home market is right at our doors and it should be developed. We seem to be doing our best to discourage this market by charging our people more for products than they are selling for in foreign markets. Before the war I saw an advertise-ment in an English paper offering Quaker rolled oats for sale at sixteen cents, whereas the same package cost twenty-five cents here in Canada. Flour, bacon, cheese and farm machinery, all produced in Canada, sell for less on the foreign markets than the cost to the consumer here in Canada.

Our home market could absorb more of these products if the people as a whole were able to afford a higher standard of living. This is simply another example of the hold which monopoly has on this country. The farmer knows that the benefit of the higher prices received for his products in Canada does not go to him. On the home market, as in foreign markets, he is forced to sell his product at a price which is often below his cost of production and is certainly below what he needs to provide himself with a decent living. The benefit goes to the middleman and particularly the processing and distributing monopolies. These corporations have a monopoly at both ends, the buying end and the selling end, and they are therefore in a position to pay the farmer as little as they can and to charge the consumer as much as they can. This is represented quite well in the tobacco industry and in the packing plants of western Canada.

The three constituencies in Saskatchewan in which the greatest amount of reestablishment is taking place are those represented by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and myself, so that we can speak with a little authority on what is taking place under the scheme. Last summer I spent some time in the districts in my constituency where many of the settlers who are being moved from the drought areas are being reestablished. On many occasions I became mired in the mud. On one occasion I spent twenty-four hours getting my car out and finally I got a start with a team of oxen and was thus enabled to get out. There are 209,892 miles of dirt road in Saskatchewan out of a total of 445,000 miles in the entire dominion. It is said by a writer on very good authority that 94.7 per cent of all western farms are located on dirt roads, and that does not mean gravel roads.

On the occasion to which I refer I happened to stay with one of the settlers for the night. We had for supper that night and for breakfast and dinner the next day, potatoes, bread, lard, tea and sugar. That was everything they had in the house. They had been on relief receiving $5 a month for the last two years, and this had been cut off in June of that year so that the man would be forced to go out and get a job during harvest time. The lady of the house did not look very well and I inquired about her health. They told me that she had returned three weeks before from a sanatorium in Prince Albert with instructions to live on a balanced diet including considerable milk and fresh eggs, and there she was living on potatoes, bread and tea. In addition to these two people, the only two living things on that farm were two hens, one of which laid every second day. These are the conditions in Canada in 1939. The lady was crocheting some fine needlework; and since there was only a rough board table in the shack, I knew that the needlework could not be for herself. I asked her how she disposed of it. She told me that she had been doing this work in the Prince Albert sanatorium in order to make some spending money, and she was trying to get a dozen doilies finished so as to raise money to enable her to go back to the clinic in Melfort in three months' time to see whether her cure was permanent or not. Such conditions are a disgrace to the country.

Last summer in my constituency a man collapsed in front of one of the post offices. He was picked up and taken thirty miles to a hospital. He fainted again while being taken into the hospital. The doctors examined him and found nothing organically wrong. They said that all he lacked was something to eat. They kept him a week in the hospital and then returned him to his home to starve. These frightful conditions of the people on relief are aggravated by unjust relief scales. In certain places a family of five receives $30 a month for food, while in the reestablishment blocks in northern Saskatchewan a similar family receives approximately $12 a month for food. May I quote from one of the studies made for the Sirois commission, printed as an appendix to the report:

A basic problem of welfare in the present organization of relief is the fact that no standards have been set up. Municipalities differ in their rules regarding eligibility for relief. Great hardship is caused by a tendency in some places to cut groups of unemployed persons off relief on technical grounds without making any other provision for them. Many smaller municipalities either give no relief whatever or very inadequate relief. Municipalities generally show wide variations in the amount of food, clothing, fuel, shelter and medical care allowed. In some places no provision at all is made for clothing and medical care. Careful studies by the Canadian welfare council on the actual schedules of relief and assistance given in municipalities throughout Canada give ample statistical proof of this variation in standards.

There is a potential market in our country for a very large proportion if not all of our surplus agricultural products, and I ask the government to consider this for the welfare of the people of Canada. I have before me a report of the municipal doctor for Weldon municipality, one of the best municipalities in one of the best farming districts in Saskatchewan. I quote from what he says in the report given to the council on March 5, 1937:

Having had the privilege of serving the rural municipality of Weldon for two years, I am more than ever convinced that undernourishment is a large factor in the cause of illness and disease. There are quite a large number of people living in certain districts in the municipality who have not an adequate food supply the year round, to maintain proper nutrition and supply nature's bulwark against sickness. If some scheme were devised whereby these people could have ample supply of staple foods the general health of the municipality should improve materially.

That is not in a reestablishment block but in one of the best municipalities in one of the best farming districts in Saskatchewan. Surely the government should give some consideration to this matter either by raising relief rates or by making necessary supplies available under some scheme such as they have worked out in the United States. A large majority of the people on relief in Saskatchewan do not want relief; they hate the very idea of relief. They want work and wages and a chance to become decent selfsupporting citizens of the country. Under this reestablishment scheme, at least in the west and I believe in Ontario as well, the government have been placing many families from the city on the farm, placing them in an industry that is already producing more than can be disposed of at the present time, and spending thousands of dollars to put them in active competition with men already established in the industry. Why should the farming industry be picked out for this unfair competition? Why not let the government subsidize them to establish cooperative factories, to make shoes, clothing, farm machinery and other necessary commodities or some of the things which to-day in Saskatchewan are classed as luxuries, some of the amenities of life enjoyed in towns and cities.

A study of housing conditions in Saskatchewan as described in the brief submitted by the government of Saskatchewan to the Rowell commission, states:

Farm houses of the prairies are much smaller than those found in other parts of Canada . . . the room space per person is less in the Saskatchewan wheat belt than anywhere else in the dominion.

That will be found at page 293. The brief also states on page 297 that of all farms in Saskatchewan, only 2.8 per cent have gas or electric light, only 1.4 per cent have running water in the kitchen, only 1.2 per cent have running water in the bathroom. I should like to take some hon. members on a trip through some of these reestablishment blocks. Families of six, eight, ten, twelve people live in little two-room shacks built of logs and mud, many of them not even shingled, with sod or rough board and tar paper roofs, rough board floors. Future citizens of this country are being brought up under conditions like that, children never knowing or coming in contact with any of the amenities of life. There are some districts without schools, others in which a year ago last winter several teachers were placed on relief because ninety per cent. of the people themselves were on relief and could not pay their taxes.

up to the fact that in permitting this sort of thing we are developing a cancerous growth which is sapping the life of our nation. No nation which permits within its boundaries such extremes of wealth and poverty as we have in Canada to-day is deserving of being called a nation. No nation is stronger than its weakest link. Governments continually harp on foreign markets, subject to conditions over which they have no control. Let them take off their coats, figuratively speaking, and correct conditions that can and should be corrected in this country and many if not most of our difficulties would disappear.

Surely it is time we in this dominion woke

It is the considered opinion of this group and many others that the best remedy for our present situation is to place purchasing power in the hands of the people who are in need of the goods and can use them. This can be done only by having a definitely planned economy. Surely in this country there was no need to have 768,592 people on direct relief in March, 1940, six months after war was declared. I would reiterate what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said yesterday, that our great need at the present time is for a planned and concerted war effort. The financial system, agriculture and industry should be organized in such a way that their maximum efforts can be used. Right across Canada we find thousands of people asking what they can do to help in the war effort. Something is lacking when such a condition exists. Only when every man and woman are employed to fullest capacity are we making our maximum war effort. I would ask the government to make a national survey, or to organize the information which they now have, to accomplish this end. In Great Britain and New Zealand they have nationalized their war effort, and the time has come when this should be done in Canada.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Comparatively few minutes will suffice for what I want to say. Perhaps some of my remarks might be directed to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), but on the other hand their connection with the problem of unemployment is very real. I do not propose to spend any time in dealing with what has or has not happened in the past, the causes of present conditions, or what might have been. But at the present time throughout the length and breadth of Canada, so we believe, an effort is being made to utilize all the facilities we possess, including labour, to the greatest advantage for production.

One evening about a week ago the Minister of Munitions and Supply spoke to the people of Canada over the air appealing for a general speeding up of industry and manufacture, asking for sacrifice on the part of those who are employed, and assistance from employers and from the public generally. In my mail a day or two later I got a letter consisting chiefly of one sentence, which read, "When is Manitoba going to be included as part of Canada?" I may be pardoned if I replied with a little bitterness, "When the budget comes down."

At the present time when factories of various kinds are expanding their capacity steadily and training inexperienced persons as new workers, it seems to us, particularly those in the city of Winnipeg, from which I come, that there is something wrong with the situation; for we have workers skilled in the various industries concerned with war who are still idle and on relief, and others who are working only part time. There will come a time after we have won this war when we shall again have a period of reorganization, and if we are not to be plunged into the difficulties which came after the last war we should give some consideration not only to quantity and speed of production but also to the organization of it, keeping in mind always the fact that the war will not last forever.

We are not giving our people an opportunity for equality of contribution to the war effort by concentrating activity in certain areas and neglecting others; that is laying up trouble for the days to come. Consequently I could not let this resolution pass without drawing again to the attention of the ministers concerned and of this committee the desirability of utilizing all the factories, particularly those presently constituted, which have skilled workers right in their own vicinity. Until such time as these have reached their maximum production, it seems a mistake to expand industries in other more fortunately situated areas. That I can say without detracting anything from my whole-hearted enthusiasm to push our war effort to the greatest possible pitch. I can say it because I do not think it possible to get the maximum returns from our people in the way of taxation or of united effort or of actual production without wholehearted consideration being given to every section. I admit that in the time since this parliament assembled, the situation has improved very much over what it was a month or two ago. But I urge again that it be not overlooked that we should diversify production as much as possible, paying particular attention to the utilization of all the skilled labour which is already present in this dominion.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): It is not my intention to make any extended remarks on this resolution, but there are some matters I should like to discuss for a few moments. During the past five years in which I have been in the house I have had more or less sympathy with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and his department. I felt that he had an exceedingly difficult task, one of the most difficult portfolios in the government. But in these times, with a war on, it seems strange to me that this condition should persist. Frankly I would think that the Minister of Labour would have now one of the easiest jobs of any member of the government. I believe that if this country had been properly organized for its war effort, if during the past ten months proper organization had been carried on, there should not be in this country to-day one idle man, we should not be debating such a resolution as this but rather the worry of this country and this government should be how to obtain men to carry on the work required.

It seems to me that at a time like this we should not be having a discussion of the question of relief and unemployment. We all remember that during the last war there was hardly an idle man or woman in this country. We remember the effort and energy put forward by the government at that time and particularly how the then Minister of Militia, Sir Sam Hughes, searched out not only men for enlistment but factories from the Atlantic to the Pacific to produce something for the carrying on of the war. We know that old and young men and women all over Canada were working in our munitions factories; but now, ten months after the beginning of this war, with a crying need for equipment and more equipment, for aeroplanes and more aeroplanes, for tanks and more tanks, we have one of the worst unemployment problems that we have had to face since the beginning of the depression. And this is the case while thousands of men are walking the streets looking for work, and other thousands of men are dying in France because of lack of proper equipment. I find it anomalous that money needed to equip our forces should be spent to keep men in idleness when, with proper organization, there would be work for all and men would be earning money with which to look after their families.

As I said a few moments ago, this is a serious indictment of the organizing ability and short-sighted policy of our government. Take our enemy, Germany, as an illustration. I doubt if there is an idle man in Germany to-day. Every man not in the army, and every woman, are producing supplies and equipment for the army, and this has been going on for the last three years. Not only are the men and women of Germany producing these supplies; the men and women of the countries Germany has conquered are also producing equipment and supplies. This indicates the strenuous effort that must be made in this and every other country opposing Germany. I do not say that we should have followed the example of Germany; but I do say that we cannot offer the excuse that we did not have a lead from other countries; and I say that, in view of what has been going on in Germany for the past six or seven years, there is no excuse for Canada being as unprepared as she is to-day. The handwriting has been on the wall; men who studied the situation should have known what was going on and what it was necessary for us to do. I remember hearing our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) state in this house only last September that for the past three years he had been conscious that war was inevitable and that this country might be involved in a great struggle.

It is not my intention this afternoon to deal with this unemployment situation from a general point of view. Perhaps I may be excused from doing so since many other hon. members have already particularized. I should like, however, to deal with the situation as it affects the maritime provinces in general May I and my own province in particular. preface my remarks by stating that I doubt if there is a more patriotic portion of this dominion than the province of New Brunswick. If enlistments in different parts of the dominion since the beginning of the war, particularly enlistments in the first division, are examined, it will be found that, in proportion to population, New Brunswick has done as well as any other part of Canada and better than most, with the possible exception of Ontario.

But we in New Brunswick do not desire only to do our share as far as enlistments are concerned. We are anxious also that the industry of our province should have its share of work to do. I do not think patriotism should demand of any one section of the country that it send its young men to war but that it be not given an opportunity to provide employment for those who remain at home. Industry in New Brunswick stands ready to do its part. We have hydro plants which can provide cheap power. We have facilities in the city of Saint John for shipbuilding and for the manufacture of munitions of various kinds. We have factories in other parts of the province, and we have skilled men and women who, I am sure, can carry on the work efficiently.

This afternoon the hon, member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers) referred to relief in New Brunswick. If the hon, member knows no more about conditions in other parts of Canada than he appears to know about conditions in New Brunswick; if the other statements he made this afternoon are no more accurate than those he made about New Brunswick, I am afraid little reliance can be placed upon his remarks. The hon, gentleman mentioned the fact that in the Hereford report it is stated that there are no registrations in New Brunswick. That is correct. If hon. members will look at appendix "C" of that report, they will see that statement made. This may seem rather peculiar to people in other parts of the dominion, and may give them the impression that we in New Brunswick have no relief problem. I should like to direct the attention of the committee to page 5 of the Hereford report, from which I quote:

At the request of the province of New Brunswick, which has adopted a policy of not granting material aid generally but rather to require those in need of assistance to perform some form of work, an agreement was entered into with that province by which the dominion agreed to contribute fifty per cent of expenditures incurred by the province during the period April 1, 1939, to March 31, 1940, inclusive, in carrying on certain provincial undertakings.

The provincial government of New Brunswick has made the statement time and again, until it has become practically a boast, that we have had no direct relief in that province. I should like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that they make this statement when conditions in New Brunswick, as far as relief is concerned are as bad if not worse than in any other province of this dominion. Many hon. members who were here during the last session remember the observations of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. They will remember that from the city of Saint John information was sent to him, to the Prime Minister and to the leader of the opposition concerning conditions in that city, conditions such as almost to beggar description, Still, as I have pointed out, we have in New Brunswick a government which time and again has repeated that there is no necessity for direct relief for that province.

There are other sections in the province where conditions have been just as deplorable, but I shall not enlarge upon them at this time. The hon, member for Northumberland, N.B., (Mr. O'Brien) knows what conditions have been in his constituency; the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and other hon, members from fishing constituencies of New Brunswick must know about the poverty and destitution of the fishermen along our coast. The same is true of hon, members from Nova Scotia; they must know of the conditions under which fishermen in that province are living.

A few days ago hon, members listened to the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), when he spoke of the deplorable situation in the mining areas of his province. Large sums of money have been advanced by the federal government for the relief of conditions in New Brunswick. Hon. members representing New Brunswick have asked for assistance, and have suggested some forms of provincial undertakings. I am satisfied the federal government and the people of New Brunswick thought that the moneys made available would be fairly and equitably distributed among the people of our province who were in need. I am sorry to state this afternoon that such was not the case. I do not blame the former Minister of Labour. I know he was too busy to attend to the distribution of money throughout the province, and I am satisfied that had he been in a position to do so, it would have been fairly spent and all would have been treated fairly and justly.

The Hereford report contains the following observation respecting agreements made at that time:

Provision was also made in these agreements, and in fact in all agreements entered into under the act, that no person other than a resident of Canada should be eligible for assistance and that no person should, in relation to his or her eligibility for said assistance be discriminated against nor favoured by reason of his or her race, religious views or political affiliations.

I believe I may state truthfully that so far as race and religion were concerned there was no discrimination, but I must say that in respect of political affiliation there has been the grossest kind of discrimination in New Brunswick for the past five years.

Most of the money allotted to New Brunswick was used in connection with work upon our highways. In order to obtain work on these projects it was necessary for men to be of the political stripe of the provincial government of New Brunswick. In order to ensure the carrying out of this understanding, a man was required to obtain a slip of paper from what was known as a contact man; and failing that, he had to obtain a slip from his member in the local legislature. No Conservative or anyone opposed to the local government could obtain even a pick-and-shovel job, no matter what his circumstances might be. What was true of work on the roads and other public works was true in respect of other employment schemes.

I turn now to the statistical section of the Hereford report, and direct the attention of 95826-37½

hon. members particularly to appendix "C" respecting statistics of training and enrolment of trainees for the national forestry programme. In New Brunswick 309 trainees enrolled. Of this number 117 quit or were discharged and 80 found employment. The method by which these young men were selected—and I know this to be true, because I have recommended young men for enrolment under the scheme, who were refused—was this: The young men who were selected had to obtain from the local member in the county slips of paper authorizing their appearance on the roll.

I would add, further, that the young men selected were not always those in need. Some of them were farmers' sons who could have had work on farms. Others were young men coming out of school who, in many instances, were not in circumstances which warranted their being placed on an enrolment of this kind. But because they enjoyed political favour they were given the preference.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $120,005.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries, I think it would not be out of place if the minister were to give us some general idea of the present plans of the government with regard to the great agricultural industry of Canada in relation to our war effort.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to burden the committee with an address as lengthy as would be necessary to cover all the activities of the department in relation to Canada's war effort. Agriculture is perhaps as directly affected by the fact that the country is at war as any industry in Canada. It is indeed the first industry to be affected by preparations for war. The fact is as old as history itself that whenever, in any country, its leaders have made up their minds that they are going to make war, their first preparation is their food supplies. So far as the totalitarian states which have been responsible for bringing this war upon the world are concerned, there are no leaders of any other form of government who have taken more care to prepare their food supplies. In the totalitarian states they started many years ago, one government at least fifteen years ago and another some twelve years ago, to prepare their food supplies from within their own boundaries.

Eventually other countries against whom the totalitarian states became a threat were compelled to act similarly in order to protect themselves from the ravages of war when war came. The general result always is that a country like Canada, which by the very nature of things is a producer of surplus food products, is the very type of country first to feel the effect of the preparations that are being made elsewhere for what eventually becomes a world war. For that reason we in Canada, particularly the agriculturists, felt our whole economic system, which depends so much upon the production of agricultural products, affected by the fact that other countries were preparing for war. The fact that they were preparing has not been lost upon the government of Canada, either this government since it came into office or the previous government when it was in power. There were those associated with the agricultural activities of departments of government, and perhaps others in many of our agricultural educational institutions throughout the country, who realized six or seven years ago, and in some instances seven or eight years ago, that Canada was being affected by these preparations which were being made elsewhere, and attempts have been made to meet the situation. The government which held office in Canada during the four years prior to the last election followed the lead of all others in that direction, and perhaps emphasized that some preparation ought to be made against the threat of which the world was even then feeling the effects.

Members of the committee will recall that three or four years ago we made some preparations in the direction of reorganizing the Department of Agriculture. Five or six years ago, and for years preceding that, estimates of this department when they came before the house were in the form of appropriations for a dozen or more branches of the Department of Agriculture having to do with the various activities upon the farm.

We had our dairy branch, our live stock branch, our fruits and vegetables branch, and branches dealing with animal diseases, plant diseases, and so on.

We still carry on all these activities, but we felt that special preparations ought to be made for a difficulty which might arise, and that even if it did not eventuate, preparations should be made to meet the situation created by at least the preparations for war. So we organized the activities of the whole department into four divisions, and from within the department we took three of our most capable men and placed them in charge of three divisions, and we took one man from outside and placed him in charge of what was to all intents and purposes a new branch, the marketing branch. Before war was declared, these men were making a study of the means by which we could get rid of agricultural surpluses in a world where it is very difficult to dispose of the surpluses of our agricultural industry; and in order that they might learn the facts, we established an organization in Britain itself to inquire into the agricultural activities not only of the British isles but on the continent as well. We sent an agent of the department to visit all the European countries and, as was suggested the other evening in discussing the estimates of another department, we sent an agent to all the South American countries to inquire into the possibilities of marketing some of our farm surpluses there. Trade agreements were also entered into which affected the marketing of our farm products, and our marketing activities were also enlarged.

The result was-not altogether because of what these men did or because of what the department itself did-that before the war came, we had at least as healthy a condition so far as production was concerned as we have ever had in Canada, and efforts had been made to market our surplus farm products in other countries wherever that could be done. More particularly we had been making a study of the requirements of the British market and the extent to which we could dispose of our surplus products there. When war came, we appointed the four directors and the assistant deputy minister as an agricultural supplies board to handle war supplies. When war came, as I emphasized a week or so ago when placing the records on Hansard, we had in Canada very considerable surpluses of most of our farm products. As far as wheat was concerned, we had one of the largest surpluses we had ever had. Even at the present time the wheat in storage is the greatest amount we have ever had at any time in the history of the country. We have had large surpluses of pork products, and have large surpluses at the present time. We have had considerable surpluses of dairy products. Where there are not considerable surpluses, as in the case of cheese, there is a larger production of the product at the present time than there has been for some considerable time in the past.

In so far as our farmers' activities are concerned, they have been directing their attention, first, toward the production of those things which are needed in Canada and, second, toward the production of those things needed in other parts of the empire and in those countries presently engaged in war. Since the beginning of the war we have been compelled to ask ourselves what policy we ought to follow in view of the fact that we are at war. Countries that may perhaps go to war have a tendency to store food supplies. The result is that when war does occur, those agricultural countries which are able to produce surpluses sometimes find themselves, during at least the first year of war, with surpluses they are unable to market.

The question is how these surpluses are to be disposed of. Anyone who has made a study of the last war, or of any similar war which has occurred at any time in history, will realize that during the first year prices of farm products were not usually higher than they were in the years immediately preceding the war. This war has been no exception. Those who have made a study of the situation in Europe, where our products were previously sold and where they must be sold if we are to dispose of them, tell us that even before the present movement of troops occurred across the northern part of France and through Belgium and Holland, agricultural production, particularly in northern France, had tended to be much lower. Estimates were made that even though the troops did not move any more than was necessary in their preparation of trenches and so on, larger quantities of products would be be required next summer than would have been required had there been no movement of troops. The movement of men away from the farms in order to join the armed forces was estimated to have an effect upon the possible market of next year. The result will be that next year there will be a greater demand for farm products.

Because of reports that have been made and information that has been received, this question now arises: What should the farmer produce? We have been constantly saying, and we think it is the proper thing to say, that the farmers of Canada can best serve the interests of Canada and the interests of the allies by continuing to produce those staple products which they were producing before the war started. That is, in so far as they were producing wheat, they should continue to produce wheat. In so far as they were producing different types of live stock, they should continue to do so. In so far as they were producing dairy products, they should continue to produce dairy products.

There may be some difficulty in marketing some of our less staple products, such as fruit, even during the later years of this struggle in which we are engaged. There certainly will be considerable difficulty during the early years. We feel that those who have been engaged in the production of staple products should continue to produce them. Those are the products which are going to be most needed throughout the war period. After the war is over, the farmer will probably find it more profitable to produce the same kind of crop as he was producing before the war started. We have not been inclined to say to people, "Stop growing this and start growing something else," or "Stop raising this kind of live stock and start raising another kind." We have been inclined to tell them to go on doing what they were doing before the war started. If possible, they should try to do it to better effect; they should try to produce a better product and a little more of that product if they can. But they should not attempt to switch rapidly from the production of one thing to the production of another.

In connection with apples, we have been saying to those people in the Annapolis valley, along certain sections of the St. Lawrence and out in the valleys of British Columbia, who have been raising apples, some of them for the past fifty years or more, that they should still be prepared to produce in the same volume. We have gone to greater lengths to assist these growers since the war started than we have to assist any other agriculturist. We are not in a position at the moment to see an outlet for their product, that is an outlet sufficient to take care of their natural production. Therefore we have been following a policy of more or less guaranteeing some kind of market for that part of the crop which in previous years had been shipped to the British market.

During recent years we have been sending fifty per cent of our apples to the British market. The one part of Canada from which the greatest proportion of the apple crop was shipped to the British market was the Annapolis valley. If I remember the figures correctly, about eighty per cent of the Annapolis valley apple crop has been going to the British market. Only a small percentage of the Ontario and Quebec crops has been going overseas, but about fifty per cent of the British Columbia crop was exported to the British market. Our export to the British market averages about fifty per cent of the total crop of Canada. Immediately war was declared, Great Britain said that she was not prepared to take her usual importation of our apples. After some negotiation we were able to arrange that she should take about fifty per cent of her former importation.

The problem then was: What could we do with the other fifty per cent? About half of what the Annapolis valley people had been shipping to the old country was put up in cans or dehydrated. At the present time we are giving a considerable part of that crop to the Red Cross to be shipped to any place to which they think it should be shipped. This is done after negotiations with government officials in order to feed persons who would not otherwise be in a position to buy apples in any form. It is intended that many of these apples be shipped to countries where refugees are being kept in order to help to feed them. A certain arranged price was paid to the producer. We want to move these apples out of the way before the next crop comes on, and we are now offering a further quantity of them to organizations like the Red Cross in order that the apples may be shipped out of the country. We think this method of disposal is preferable to the less expensive method of simply taking the apples and destroying them.

Some one might suggest that there are people in Canada who could eat them, and we are making some provision to give them away where they are needed. Last fall we gave away $87,000 worth largely in Saskatchewan, some in Alberta and Manitoba, and in the previous year we gave away $300,000 worth of food. This year we are making provisions for the same thing in connection with processed apples. Generally speaking, that is the policy we are following in relation to the war effort. We are keeping track of what is being done in every part of Canada and of the requirements in other parts of the world. We hope to be able to give direction, if at any time it will help in the prosecution of the war or in the conduct of agriculture, advising the farmers to branch out from some line they are now pursuing into something else if it will serve the interests of the allies.

Mr. TUSTIN: As regards the canned apples that are now being marketed, is the government paying a subsidy to the producers?

Mr. GARDINER: Last year we took all the apples that could not be marketed locally or on the British market, gave the producer a price for them and paid for their processing. They were largely Nova Scotia apples. On May 15 of this year we took over from the processors all the apples they had been unable to sell. We are attempting to market them in Canada and elsewhere, and to the extent that we are unable to do so we intend to give them away by the method I have described. To the extent that we have a loss, I assume it might be said we paid a subsidy.

Mr. TUSTIN: I understand that a good many of these apples are being marketed in Canada at a price much less than that at which the Ontario processor is offering his stock. Is the government selling at a lower price, or is it subsidizing the processor?

Mr. GARDINER: To date no apples have actually been placed on the Ontario market or on any other market by the government. We took over apples as late as May 15. Any apples sold on the market to date were put on the market by those who owned them up to that time—the processors. We have not put any apples on the market. The matter which has brought the question to the hon. member's mind is, no doubt, this. Two or three weeks ago we were discussing with the chain store people and the retailers generally the possibility of putting on the market, at a lower price, the canned apples which we have, but after discussions we came to the conclusion that there were some difficulties in the way, and nothing has been done along that line.

Mr. HATFIELD: Who was sent to South and Central America to make the survey?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. H. S. Arkell, who has made a report which any member may read if he so desires. It is in printed form.

Mr. STIRLING: I had intended under the marketing item, to offer certain observations with regard to the whole question of marketing; but since the minister, in his interesting account of the general problem, has referred to the matter, perhaps I may discuss it here. The difficulty which confronts the fruit grower in Canada to-day is the one to which the minister has referred, that of taking care of what in the past had been sent to export markets, not solely but principally the British market. The assistance which the government has given has been appreciated by the producers, particularly in the recent convention which was held, when fruit growers from all the producing provinces of Canada met the minister and discussed their problems with him. Their efforts have, I believe, met with considerable success. Would the minister be disposed to describe rather more closely the arrangement which the government came to with the growers of Nova Scotia and any other provinces. The government made an arrangement with the growers in the Annapolis valley and also with the growers in the valleys of British Columbia. Perhaps there was an arrangement with those in Ontario and Quebec. That I do not know. If he would be good enough to outline the basis of the arrangement that was entered into, this would give the committee some valuable information.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon, member speaking of last year?

Mr. STIRLING: Last year, unless an arrangement has already been entered into with regard to 1940. Of that I am not quite sure.

Mr. GARDINER: An arrangement was entered into last year along the line I was discussing a moment ago; but, as has been suggested, I did not go into the arrangement in detail. Last year war was declared on September 3. That, as every member of the committee knows, is just about the time the apple grower is getting ready to harvest his crop, and on the very first day of the war a statement was made to the effect that Britain desired to take as little of our apple crop as we could afford to have her take, and preferred to take none at all. Immediately that statement became known to the people who had been growing apples, they were of course very much concerned, and naturally those most concerned were the producers in Nova Scotia, who marketed approximately 80 per cent of their crop in Britain. They were the first to come to the government. The growers of British Columbia, who market about 50 per cent of their apple crop in Britain, had been marketing it under somewhat different arrangements from those made by the apple growers of Nova Scotia and were not quite so much concerned, because their apples could find a market, to a larger extent than Nova Scotia apples, under the system they had been following.

Mr. STIRLING: Great Britain was ready to permit those apples already sold to find shipment to the United Kingdom market?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. The Nova Scotia crop had not been contracted for to the same extent. Our first negotiations were with those in the greatest trouble, the growers in the Annapolis valley, and the result of those negotiations was this, in general terms. We provided that a certain quantity of the usual apple crop be marketed in the old land. We cut the supply down as much as we could by eliminating the varieties not quite so acceptable as others, taking the better grades and varieties and classifying them as apples that ought to be taken care of. Then we negotiated with the British government and found that we could market approximately 50 per cent of what we had been previously marketing in Britain. Britain was prepared to take them, not because she needed or wanted them but because she thought that, in view of the fact that we were in the war with her, she should to that extent assist us in keeping up the morale of our people.

Then, having had some idea that that might be done, we undertook to process half the apples of those qualities which had usually gone to the British market. Those were put through the processing plants as stated. Having done that, we started negotiations with the British Columbia people. We also had negotiations with those who produce apples in the central part of Canada. We zoned the dominion, letting the Nova Scotia people sell their fresh apples as far west as Montreal, the people in the central part of Canada sell their apples from Montreal west to Winnipeg, and the British Columbia people sell their apples exclusively in the area from the Pacific coast to Winnipeg, including Winnipeg. In the agreement we reserved the right to indicate some later date at which apples from British Columbia might come into Ontario, or apples from the maritimes might come into the Ontario section.

The Ontario people had been exporting only a very small part of their production to the British market, and we therefore had very little difficulty in taking care of the part of their apple crop which was usually exported. As a matter of fact, in the final analysis we did not have to take care of any of them. The Nova Scotia apples were taken care of under the plan I have mentioned, with the result that we had about half of their usual shipments to the old country canned or dehydrated, and a considerable part of that section of the crop we still have. We took somewhere in the neighbourhood of one hundred thousand boxes of British Columbia apples and distributed them free to people on the prairies who were not in a position to buy apples. We were responsible for approximately another four hundred thousand boxes at the beginning of the season; but, as the season went along, British Columbia found it possible, partly because Nova Scotia was not able to market all the apples she hoped to be able to market under the system that prevailed of shipping from the eastern ports, to market practically all her surplus crop in the old land, so that we are not going to be required to take care of any considerable proportion of British Columbia apples over and above the $100,000 worth that we disposed of last fall by giving them away in the central part of Canada. We guaranteed a price to British Columbia on certain shipments, and as the season went on, we varied the agreement in order to meet the new conditions that developed.

Mr. STIRLING: But you did not have to spend any money on that?

Mr. GARDINER: We expect there will be a small obligation in connection with it, but it will be very small. We put on an advertising campaign in Canada relating to apples in every form, and greatly increased the sale of apple juice through the efforts of apple producers and processors and the activity of the government. The consumption of apples in certain sections of Canada was also greatly increased. I was told no later than to-day by one man who produces apples, but not as part of what he considers his paying crop, that, because of this advertising campaign he was able to dispose of apples to better advantage this last year than before the war started. He is a man who was producing tobacco chiefly, and said he had no hope of disposing of apples this year until action was taken by the government.

Mr. STIRLING: That is in Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: In Ontario. Having had those experiences, we have fairly well come to this conclusion, that while the zoning of Canada into different districts was helpful last year, we do not think it would be a wise policy to follow in relation to the apple crop or any other crop over a period of years. In plans for this year we think we should try to keep away from the zoning plan as far as possible. We have had some discussions as to possible agreements with the people in the Annapolis valley. We have said to them that this year we will guarantee eighty per cent of the average price of the last three years for eighty per cent of the apples that the Annapolis valley exported to Great Britain during the last three years. In other words, we are saying to the Annapolis valley people: We will be responsible this year up to a certain price for eighty per cent of your crop.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

An hon. MEMBER: What is that price?

Mr. GARDINER: The agreement is not entered into yet; therefore we have not worked out the figure, and I would not wish to say what it will be until it is worked out. We have taken care, as far as the farmers' worries are concerned, of eighty per cent of the average price of eighty per cent of his total crop.

Mr. TUSTIN: That is the average price?

Mr. GARDINER: Eighty per cent of the average price for the three preceding years for the highest grades.

Mr. HATFIELD: When these negotiations were going on with Great Britain in September, and Nova Scotia shipments were held up, how many apples were exported from the United States to Great Britain during that period?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not those figures at the moment, but the order of Great Britain was that she would not take any apples from the United States other than those that had been contracted for. She gave the same order, as I remember, in relation to United States apples as in relation to ours, except that she did not undertake to make any further agreement with regard to taking United States apples. I have not before me at the moment the final outcome of those shipments. But I am dealing at present with the crop which is now growing. When we had negotiated the matter up to that point, the Ontario people, having had a meeting, sent a representative to meet us, stating that they would want to negotiate at a later date. British Columbia sent a delegation which met us last week, and we said to them that we would be prepared to meet them in July or early in August when we know the crop condition and the probable marketing conditions, in order to discuss further any necessity for assisting them in dealing with any surplus they may have this year. We indicated that they would be dealt with on a basis which would compare favourably with the manner in which we have dealt with apple producers elsewhere.

Mr. STIRLING: The marketing of the eighty per cent of eighty per cent will remain in the hands of the Annapolis shipping firms? The arrangement does not remove their difficulty in disposing of them? They may choose to destroy them.

Mr. GARDINER: The present intention is that they remain in the hands of the apple board. The apple board which handled the arrangements last year will be continued, I understand, and they will probably determine, upon consultation with the government, what will be done with any surplus crop.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sure many hon. members have had made to them in connection with the marketing of our apple crop suggestions that the government might have gone further in regard to providing the defence forces of Canada with apples from time to time. One naval man said to me a couple of months ago that while in the streets of Halifax there were numerous signs advertising apples, the navy of Canada in their ordinary rationing were granted only one apple per person every Saturday. Perhaps the minister would enlarge on the government policy with regard to that.

Mr. GARDINER: When the war began, apples were not among the rations provided the soldiers either in camp in Canada or elsewhere, but the Department of Agriculture negotiated with the Department of National Defence and apples were placed among the rations. I can understand why it may be difficult to have many apples on any diet that may be provided at this time of the year. As a matter of fact, some of us were astonished to find that when we got into the late spring, very few good apples could be found in Canada. When I visited the maritimes in April of this year, just before the arrangements were made for this year's crop, we found that a very considerable part of the apples being sold in Halifax had been shipped all the way from British Columbia. We also found that in certain sections of Ontario. where throughout the winter it had been possible to get the very best grades of apples, it was somewhat difficult to get good apples, and that applied even here in Ottawa.

Mr. GRAYDON: About what time of year would that be?

Mr. GARDINER: Along about the beginning of May. We have an idea that possibly, by providing a proper type of storage, we may be able to keep Canadian apples in a condition which would make them acceptable to the general public for a longer period of time than has been found possible in the past. We may be wrong in that; some producers tell us it is almost impossible to keep apples in any form of storage beyond May 1 and be able to sell them, because they lose their flavour, they will not stand up and so on.

At the present time we are experimenting with the dehydration of apples. There was a concern, which will be remembered by some hon, members who come from the maritime provinces, which about two and a half years ago developed a process for dehydrating apples. They were not able to make a financial success of it at that time, but some of those dehydrated apples are still in existence, and within the last month I had the privilege of testing a package of those apples. I would say that those apples, processed two and a half years ago from fruit grown three years ago, when placed on the table are better than apples carried through in the fresh form from last fall. There are possibilities in that method of preserving part of the apple crop of Canada, to be used not only in Canada but by our armies as well. There is just the possibility that it would be very difficult, as I think it would be, to provide fresh apples to an army anywhere outside the area where they are grown; but there should be no difficulty in providing apples in this form which, when soaked in water and prepared for consumption, have the same flavour and appearance as when originally produced. This particular concern was able to produce a dehydrated apple which three years later was just as good as when it was processed, dried down to twelve per cent moisture, which is approximately the same as good hard wheat. In other words, they will keep for a very long period of time.

In addition, we have air-tight cans of these dehydrated apples going out for the use of the navy. That product is not quite as good as the other; it is less expensive to put up, but it serves a certain purpose, and we are attempting to put as much as possible of the apple crop in that form, for the use of the navy and elsewhere.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I speak just now as a consumer of apples from a part of Canada where we do not grow any apples. I believe that the consumption of apples, particularly in this part of the dominion, could be greatly increased. I have often heard arguments as to where the best apples in Canada are grown. I am not going to enter into that argument, except to say that when we on the prairies buy a box of apples from British Columbia we buy them by the grade and we know exactly what we are getting. If we are getting a household apple we get a good, sound apple at a reasonable price. If we are getting a fancy apple for the table we get a good, sound apple of attractive appearance. I have been around Ottawa for the last couple of years, and I have found it very difficult indeed to get an Ontario apple that is well packed and attractive. Speaking from my own personal experience, on the prairies we always buy apples by the box, but in Ottawa we buy them by the gallon. We buy the smallest quantity that we can use immediately because in many instances they look as if they are bruised and might rot in a little while. I believe the result is that many people buy fewer apples because of the bad packing that one sees in this part of the country.

I know that is a criticism of the Ontario apple industry, but as one who has bought apples in both parts of Canada, that is my opinion. They tell me the British Columbia apple is not as good as the Ontario apple, but it is much more attractive and much more reliable; and it seems to me that if we are going to popularize the use of the eastern apple, the department should do something to encourage better packing and grading of that apple. I believe apple consumption could be increased among our own people, even in this part of Canada, if the apples we find in the stores, grown in this part of the country, were better graded and more attractively put up.

Mr. SENN: Coming from Ontario, I rather regret to hear remarks such as those just made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I have been told by many people that the Ontario apple was the best flavoured apple grown in the dominion. It may be true that our methods of packing are not quite as good as those followed in the maritimes or in British Columbia; but if that is the case, perhaps it is the job of the department to see that something is done to make our methods of packing better than they are at the present time.

I was surprised to hear the minister state that no Ontario apples had been processed under these agreements. Last fall I was in an apple growing section of this province, and I was told that our grades had been stepped up and that a large part of our apples had gone into domestic grades, which were supposed to have been processed under government auspices and aid. The minister has told us that apples have been processed, both by way of canning and by dehydration, in the maritime provinces. I wonder if he would tell the committee exactly the agreement that was made with the processing or canning companies, because I have been told that the canning companies themselves were delighted with the contracts that were made, and that they have reaped substantial profits under them, which I suppose is perfectly all right. I should like the minister to state as well whether there were any Ontario apples canned or dehydrated under the agreements made with the canning companies.

Mr. GARDINER: The agreement is rather technical; it gives all the prices for the different processes through which the apples are put, the costs of picking and of packing, and all that sort of thing. Either last night or to-day there passed through my office a return which was requested by a member of the opposition, concerning those agreements. return should be laid on the table of the house within the next day or so, and I think it might serve the purpose as well if the discussion on that point were to wait until we get into the marketing section of these estimates, which probably will be some time later than to-night. Then those agreements will be in the hands of members of the committee, and they may discuss them more intelligently than they could by listening to anything I might have to say to-night with regard to them. I might say that none of the Ontario apples were processed under those agreements, the chief reason being that it pays both the producer and the government much better to have the apples sold as fresh apples. And Ontario was able to market its fresh apples under the arrangement made this year to possibly as good advantage as it would have been able to market them had there been no war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Domestics?

Mr. GARDINER: Ontario apples all the way through, with the exception of very low grades.

One other point is that most of the Ontario crop is sold in Ontario, and the dominion government can have no control over the grading or marketing of apples grown and sold in that province. The Ontario government does cooperate with us to the fullest possible extent in trying to do what is thought best in the interests of all parties, both consumers and producers. The Ontario growers were able to get a better price than they could have got if the apples had been processed, and for that reason they were not processed by anyone except in limited quantities.

Mr. RICKARD: As an hon, member who grows apples I should like to say on behalf of myself and growers in Ontario generally that we certainly appreciate what the Minister of Agriculture and the government have done for the apple growers in the past year.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): What have they done for Ontario?

Mr. RICKARD: The process of zoning in Canada was a vital factor so far as the growers in Canada were concerned. Had Canadian apples been shipped to any point, the Montreal market would have been entirely lost so far as the Ontario growers were concerned.

The raising of grade standards was beneficial as well. I do not think for one moment that we put up as good a pack as we could put up, and yet we certainly are ahead of what we were doing a few years ago. I am convinced, however, that we require better inspection with regard to apples that are shipped. Of course there are inspectors appointed by the government to act here and there throughout the country, but it is impossible for them to watch every apple shipped by truck or by car. To-day truckers are driving to the orchards and buying apples from the growers, and it is almost impossible for our inspectors at all times to look into the grades that are sold. I think they are doing a good job, as far as it goes, but if we had more inspectors and more rigid inspection, we would gain a better market for our apples.

I am certainly in favour of advertising. The advertising that has been done by this government has been a great boon to the apple growers. It has been said that the advertising has brought about the consumption of a third more apples. In my view, others might act in conjunction with the government in respect to advertising. I have always advocated to our fruit growers' associations that they should help in connection with advertising. The fact remains that we shall certainly have to put before the people the kind of product we grow and that we want them to use.

So far as our pack is concerned, my view is that we should get away from the old barrel pack and develop a smaller package, one containing a bushel, a half-bushel, or possibly eleven or twelve quarts. That is the package which the ordinary person wants to buy and can buy to-day.

It seems to me there is something further can be done by the government for the apple grower. I do not know that what I am about to say would come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture. I have in mind the time limit on the duty on oranges and citrus fruits coming into this country. I contend that that time limit should be from not earlier than March 1, instead of January 1. When the duty is taken off oranges on January 1, they can be bought very cheaply. Some hon. members will recall that when I spoke last year on this subject, I pointed out that oranges were being sold at twelve cents a dozen, or at one cent each. The apple growers to-day cannot compete with oranges at twelve cents a dozen, and that is a point which the government should consider.

The minister has said that the government will assume the responsibility for eighty per cent of eighty per cent of eighty per cent of eighty per cent of the Nova Scotia crop. It seems to me that this would be more apples than we would grow in Ontario. If the growers in Ontario have not already requested the government to continue as it did last year the zoning, advertising and grading operations, with all possible improvements, then I think that request should now be made. The apple growers appreciate what has been done by the government, and trust that it will continue to give them assistance equal to that which has been given in the past year.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot endorse in their entirety the glowing tributes which the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard) has extended to the government, but I should like to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that in my opinion the advertising campaign in connection with the sale of apple juice has had a most beneficial effect upon the sale of that commodity.

I always hesitate taking credit to myself, especially when the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser) faces me. I realize he is apt to object to what I may say. When on a former occasion this matter was discussed, I believe he was one of those who took me to task. I refer to the occasion when I asked the government to make an appropriation in peace time for this very thing. Now, during this war time period, perhaps I may be pardoned if I claim some small measure of pride in having suggested to the government on an earlier occasion that we should have done something by way of advertising our apple juice and other vegetable products.

While I realize that at this time the establishment of a domestic market is a matter of great importance, yet I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture ought not to lose sight of another one of the facts in connection with the sale of these products. Those who know the fruit and vegetable industry better than I do are convinced—and I say this guardedly—that our importations which have arisen as a result of trade agreements with the republic to the south in 1935 and 1938 have, to say the least, not had a beneficial or advantageous effect upon the fruit and vegetable industry in Canada as a whole.

While through the front door we are trying to find a market for our products, and while we are advertising in order to place our fruit and vegetable products before our people, I would urge upon the minister that he ought not to permit, through the back door, any destruction of advantages so gained by permitting too great importations of fruit and vegetables to enter Canada so as to replace sales of our own apples and other fruits and vegetables.

Only to-day information came to my hand in connection with the competition of oranges from Japan, and that is a further form of competition which must be met by our apple growers. I was amazed to learn that they were faced with that kind of competition. Too few people in Canada realize the tremendous competitive power offered by oranges and other citrus fruits from the United States when in competition with our apple crop. It is all very well to say that they are not of a class or kind produced by our orchard men, but there seems to be no argument against the claim that they do displace apples and other Canadian fruits in our local markets.

I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Durham when he suggests that in some way or another we should curtail importations of oranges and other citrus fruits from the United States so that we may have a greater opportunity to sell our home-grown products in the domestic market. I do not make the suggestion with any idea of attempting to curtail the benefits which ordinarily accrue to the consumer, but rather my desire is to assist Canada and particularly her fruit and vegetable industry as a whole. I would ask the minister seriously to consider the matter of United States importations of fruits and vegetables. That is a factor which has an important bearing upon many of our problems.

Mr. McGREGOR: What were the imports of all apples last year?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that information with me, but I will get it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister mentioned that fairly large quantities of apples were being distributed. Was he referring to the 1939 or the 1940 crop?

Mr. GARDINER: The 1939 crop, of which something under $100,000 worth was distributed. It was considerably more in the previous year and much greater still in the year preceding.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are there still quantities of apples on hand for distribution?

Mr. GARDINER: We have dried apples, that is dehydrated apples, and canned apples.
[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. McIVOR: I suppose the minister would agree that one of the good results that have come to us through the failure of the British market is that we now consume wholesome apple juice.

Mr. BROOKS: Applesauce.

Mr. McIVOR: Speaking of publicity, I am sure that when it is well known that restaurants and other places serve the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and myself with apple juice, it will be a great advertisement for it.

Mr. MARSHALL: The discussion so far has centred round the distribution of surplus agricultural products. The Department of Agriculture in the United States is experimenting with a plan known as the Stamp plan to get rid of their surplus agricultural products, and I should like to read a short extract describing the plan, taken from the Christian Science Monitor, dated January 11, 1940:

Briefly, it's a system by which surplus foods are distributed to relief families free of charge, making use of regular grocery store channels for distribution. First, reliefers buy one dollar's worth of orange stamps from the Surplus Commodities Corporation. That's good for all food purchases. Then, in addition, they are given, free of charge, 50 cents' worth of blue stamps. Now these they use for the purchase of foods in grocery stores which the government has designated "surplus commodities." The grocer, in turn, takes all his stamps to the government or some clearing bank, and gets them redeemed at full face value.

In this way farm surpluses experience a heavy demand at the grocery stores—and in turn relief recipients get the extra foods free, instead of their being "plowed under" or exported abroad in some form of dumping arrangement.

The article goes on to discuss the plan and the success it is meeting with in the United States. It says:

The federal Surplus Commodities Corporation chose Rochester for trying out its food stamp plan.

Why?
Well, in the first place relief recipients there were paid by check rather than by food vouchers. Thus a test of the stamps at Rochester would show to what extent families in need would accept them. Then, too, though most Americans think of Rochester as a rich, flourishing city, it nevertheless has its relief problem. One out of five of Rochester's 330,000 people was dependent on relief in May, 1939.

Furthermore, Rochester had made a good record for the competent administration of its relief. So the FSCC'S special staff could follow and check accurately on the results, unhampered by politics or shiftless management. Finally, Rochester, with its diversified industries set in the midst of fertile farmlands, is considered a fairly typical city.

Did Rochester relief recipients take to the stamps?

They did. During the first three days of the test, 3,900 out of the 8,600 relief clients who received checks, had purchased stamps. They spent $29,026 for the orange stamps, and received $14,513 in blue stamps as a present from Uncle Sam.

The chart below shows how the plan's popularity grew:

	Families participating Relief type	May 16-31	July 1-15
WPA	703	2,037
City home relief	3,832	4,319
Veterans' relief	487	594
Old age help	269	710
Aid to children Increase in stamps—	33	297
Orange stamps		$78,606 39,303

I would commend this experiment to the minister and suggest that he study it and give us his reactions when item 30 dealing with the marketing of agricultural products is before the committee.

Mr. HAZEN: Has any arrangement been made with the apple growers of New Brunswick for the present season?

Mr. GARDINER: No; they were not included in the agreement last year, and no representations so far as I know have been made this year that they desire to be included. I think the reason is that most of their apple crop is marketed locally.

Mr. BROOKS: I was just going to ask the question that the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) has asked. While I am not a producer, I have in my constituency the apple growers of the St. John river valley, and I think the minister will agree that until one has eaten a St. John river McIntosh Red he has never tasted a real apple. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) say that the people of Ontario were deluded to the extent that they thought the best apples were produced in that province. We can set that down, I suppose, to an Ontario complex. The minister has answered the question I intended to ask. There has been no agreement with the government of New Brunswick for the marketing of our apples. We produce about 40,000 barrels in the province, and I understand that the quality is so good that the apples really sell themselves.

Mr. KINLEY: There seems to be a considerable difference of opinion in the committee as to which part of Canada produces the best apples. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) said Ontario, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) said New Brunswick, while someone else spoke up for British Columbia. I am reminded of the fact that the minister said that eighty per cent of the Nova Scotia apples went to the British market. They are sold in competition with the world, and that is the test. The hon, member for Durham (Mr. Rickard) stated that in order to secure the Montreal market for central Canada growers, it was necessary to zone the sale of apples and thus keep Nova Scotia apples out of that market. I do not think there is any doubt as to where the best apples come from. The moisture, cool air and sunshine of the provinces by the sea give the apples a flavour that one cannot find in any other part of the world. By zoning the sale of apples the department created a condition which was to the disadvantage of the Nova Scotia apple grower. It means that to that extent in Canada we have not free trade within our own country.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I should like to make a brief reference to the statement of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) in reference to apples grown in New Brunswick. If I heard him correctly, the hon member stated that New Brunswick produced approximately 40,000 barrels. In order to convince my hon. friend that I speak with some authority in connection with apples, may I say in all modesty that the hon, member beside me and I produce that many apples in our two orchards. I have listened attentively to the statements made by other members from the maritime provinces. I do not think anyone will question the quality of the apples produced in Nova Scotia. However, in a discussion of this matter there are one or two fundamentals that should be kept in mind.

In order that it may be a matter of record, I should like to say that the apple growers from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, including Quebec and Ontario, have a most efficient organization. Each and every province is represented, through the fruit growers' association of the province, upon what is known as the apple advisory board. Last year the gentlemen making up this board made certain advances and suggestions to the Minister of Agriculture. These suggestions were considered in the light of the condition which had resulted from the war and in the practical elimination of the export market for apples from Nova Scotia.

I want to endorse heartily the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard). The Canadian Horticultural Council, under the secretaryship and efficient management of Major Burrows, in cooperation with Doctor Barton and his officials, arrived at an agreement whereby a certain quantity of apples in Nova Scotia were taken over and processed under the auspices of and after having been paid for by the federal government. As a result of that, the apple growers of Ontario and Quebec were assured of the domestic market in those provinces. As a result of those arrangements, and the additional arrangement made with the growers of British Columbia, the 1939 apple crop was handled to the complete satisfaction of the fruit growers in every province. I believe I can speak with authority for the growers of Ontario.

It was my privilege three weeks ago to act as a representative to the Ontario Fruit Growers' association which met in the city of Toronto. Since that meeting, three or four other meetings have been held in Ottawa at which there has been representation from Nova Scotia, Quebec, British Columbia and Ontario. Speaking as I believe I do with some authority, I contend that the arrangements made with the Department of Agriculture for 1939 were most satisfactory. Perhaps I can give a slight word of warning to the Minister of Agriculture. If the apple growers of Ontario and Quebec, working in conjunction with those in British Columbia and Nova Scotia, can arrive at an arrangement which will provide the same results for the 1940 apple crop, then I think all growers in the country will be entirely satisfied.

I should like to make one or two references to the statement made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), for whom I have the greatest admiration. I am very sorry if he misunderstood anything I said last year. Apparently he took my remarks as criticism of his suggested advertising scheme. That scheme was adopted by the government and I believe the suggestions made by the hon. member were most beneficial. I believe that scheme was carried out in a most efficient and successful manner. The product under discussion last year was tomato juice.

The officials of the fruit branch of the Department of Agriculture have carried on extensive work in the production of apple juice, and they should be given credit for the present state of perfection of this product. I want to endorse most emphatically the statements of the hon. member for Durham and the hon, member for Peel. Consideration should be given by the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Agriculture to banning the importation of citrus fruits, at least for the duration of the war. I have before me a brief which contains a submission made to the deputy minister of finance in confirmation of a presentation made, I believe, last year. Many details are set out in this brief, and I believe it contains all that is necessary for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to arrive at some conclusion as to what should be done about a curtailment of the increasing importation of citrus fruits, particularly from the United States.

I have had an opportunity of saying a word about this to the Minister of Agriculture, and perhaps the Department of Finance might also take notice. Each and every hon member realizes that it is not only a question of the importation of citrus fruits; there is the more essential question of foreign exchange. The Minister of Agriculture, working in conjunction with the other two departments I have mentioned, can render a service, not only to the fruit and vegetable producers of Canada, but also to Canada's war effort by providing some method of curtailing these importations.

I should like to take this opportunity as a rather large fruit grower in Ontario to thank the minister for what he has done. I want him to know that I was satisfied with the arrangements made last year, but I expect him to do as well this year for the fruit growers of Ontario.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The hon. member referred to foreign exchange and I should like to ask: Are you in favour of the pegged rate of exchange?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): The hon. member has addressed his question to me, yet he took serious objection the other night to the manner in which I asked a question. In reply I say to my hon. friend that I am afraid I am not sufficiently conversant with high international finance to answer his question.

Mr. SENN: I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser). He is one of the men best qualified to speak on the question of apples from the point of view of both marketing and production. I think, however, he was rather served notice by the minister that the very thing that had so much to do with getting a reasonable price for apples in Ontario and Quebec last year for the last crop will perhaps not be followed out this year. I refer to zoning. His idea in making the remarks he did was to give the minister notice that he would like to have that zoning continued for another year, and I am inclined to agree with him in that respect. I heartily agree with him and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rickard) in their desire to see the importation of citrus fruits and other fruits of different kinds now imported from the United States curtailed as far as possible. It seems an anomaly that in this country, where we have excellent fruits like apples and other varieties as well, they should be replaced by fruits from another country especially when they come in at a high rate of exchange and with very little interruption. I have never been entirely satisfied with the system of seasonal tariffs now in effect, and I am fully in agreement with the hon. member and with the hon. member for Durham in their suggestion to the minister that something should be done to curtail these importations.

Mr. FAIR: Will the minister tell us whether the apple growers received from the government a price equal to the cost of production for the portion of the crop sold to it?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: A question has been asked.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not intended to be answered; it was only a statement.

Mr. FAIR: May I have an answer to the question?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think an answer is expected to a question put in that way.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), we, the apple growers' organizations in Ontario, believe that in the last few years we have made considerable strides in our endeavour to understand the marketing problems and the psychology of purchasing or consuming. The hon, member referred to prices received for the Ontario and Quebec apple crop last year. Those prices were not exorbitant, but they were satisfactory. Not only was it the intention and the policy, but it was ultimately as a result of the policy that was followed that we were enabled to keep in alignment a reasonable price for our crop on the consuming markets of Ontario and Quebec throughout the marketing season of last year. We have found in the apple business as in any other business that if the price for apples increases to the consumer over a certain point for certain varieties and qualities, the consumption immediately begins to decline as a result of the purchase of oranges or some other commodity.

Last year, through an arrangement with the apple advisory board and the apple marketing board, of which Doctor Shaw is the chairman, we agreed, notwithstanding zoning, that the importation of Nova Scotia and British Columbia apples into Ontario and Quebec should be permitted for certain periods in order to maintain the price level at which the consumer could purchase in volume. The hon. member for Haldimand made reference to zoning and he interpreted my meaning correctly in the remarks I addressed to the minister. That matter is being carefully worked out at the present time through different contacts—the fruit growers association, the apple advisory council, the apple marketing board in conjunction with the Canadian Horticultural Council, Doctor Barton and the officials of the departmentand we hope to have a practical plan evolved, perhaps under a different name, which can be accepted by the minister as workable some time during the month of July. Zoning may be an objectionable term in some quarters, and whether under war conditions we should simply use the word control, I do not know; but my hon, friend can rest assured that the industry in Ontario and Quebec and in other provinces, under the auspices of those agencies that I have mentioned, will handle the 1940 crop successfully in cooperation with the minister.

Mr. FAIR: As the minister did not like the form in which I put the question, I will put it in different words, because I should like to get an answer. How does the price paid by the government for last year's crop compare with the average price paid last year for the same grade of apples?

Mr. GARDINER: The prices were reasonably comparable all the way through. Most of the apples we took were apples of processing grades. The apples sold by organizations of producers or by those who purchased from the producers were usually a higher grade sold as fresh apples.

Mr. PERLEY: The discussion to-night has revolved around apples. I do not like to let an opportunity pass of commending the minister; and while he and I come from a part of Saskatchewan where a great percentage of the people in the last three or four years have not been thinking very much about apples—quite a number of them have not been able to buy any apples—the minister last fall did do something, for which he should be commended, in distributing a free gift of apples to that part of the province. His action was certainly appreciated. He distributed in the south central part of the province apples in carload lots, and my constituency was particularly well favoured in that respect. In each of the towns along the main line east of Regina, about two carloads of apples were distributed free. In some towns the apples arrived before the municipality or the town council knew about the matter, but it did not take them long to organize and have the apples distributed, so many pounds to each family. It was a liberal distribution. The apples went to some places where they were not really needed, but on the whole the gift was appreciated. May I ask the minister now what system was adopted in arriving at a decision as to how many apples would be required in each town?

I have only one grievance to utter. I am not going to charge the minister with any ulterior motive, but it so happened that the towns both east and west of me got two carloads while my town got only half a carload. Would the minister let us know how many carloads were distributed under that plan, and how many carloads in the constituencies of Qu'Appelle, Assiniboia and Melville? We have acquired a taste for apples now, and if we ever get in a position to be able to buy them, there will be a good market.

Mr. GARDINER: About one hundred thousand boxes were given away, and they were given in areas where the crop averaged from eight bushels to the acre down. More apples would go to a town where more of the townships surrounding it had an average crop of eight bushels or less per acre than to a town where the crop in the area around it was higher. As a matter of fact, I think the hon. member's town is directly south of the town I go to, and I do not think any went to the town I go to.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Apple sauce seems to be the subject at the present time. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) raised a question which caused me considerable grief last fall. I live in what was the original drought area of southwestern Manitoba, and when my people began to learn of the distribution of these apples they certainly had me on the spot as to why I had not some apples in my municipality. I made inquiry through our municipal union and other organizations as to how the distribution was being made and how to go about procuring some of these apples. Would the minister explain what procedure should have been followed and what organization was responsible for the distribution?

Mr. GARDINER: The organization for the distribution was set up three years ago following the crop failure of 1937. An office was opened with two men in charge and a staff of stenographers and clerks who gathered the information and took charge of the distribution. The distribution was made through the municipal councils. The apples were forwarded to the secretary treasurer, who was instructed beforehand. I gather from what the hon, member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said that in some instances the secretary treasurer did not know about the matter before the apples arrived, but in most instances the secretary treasurer knew when they were to come; and if a carload was shipped to a certain area in the province and one municipality was to take out one-quarter or onehalf, the secretary treasurers were so instructed. We have in the office, as a result of the distributions previously made, a complete list of the number of families approximately in those municipalities. The distribution is made on the basis of a family of five; I think the first distribution was two boxes to a family, and I am not certain whether last fall's distribution was on the same basis or a little higher. As far as determining the municipalities to which boxes would go, that was based, as I say, on the average crop yield in the area. Apples went only to townships that had on an average less than eight bushels to the acre, based upon the information we had at that time. There might have been an occasional mistake one way or the other, but on the information then available, that was the basis of distribution.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Who was in charge of that distribution office this year?

Mr. GARDINER: The same man has been in charge all three years, Mr. Mackie. Distribution was from the prairie farm assistance office last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What about Doctor Stapleford?

Mr. GARDINER: Doctor Stapleford has not been assisting during the last two years.

Mr. HATFIELD: Has anything been done to stop the importation of United States, grade 1, size B potatoes into Canada? I know that under the treaty the importation of grade No. 1 potatoes cannot be stopped, but I believe grade 1, size B was stopped in the past. California started to send these potatoes in early in April when we had a large supply of good old potatoes in Canada, and they have been coming in ever since. We cannot ship grade 1, size B within Canada in interprovincial trade; why should we allow a grade to enter Canada that we cannot sell ourselves within Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: We have been wandering rather far afield in dealing with this item. Following the direction given by the opposition side of the house, I undertook to give an outline of the general policy in connection with the department, and considerable latitude has since been allowed. So far as the question just asked is concerned, I might point out that it could be more properly dealt with under a later item. I would say at the moment that the real reason for the condition existing is the fact that our season for marketing new potatoes starts later than the season of some of our United States friends. They are able to ship into Canada potatoes that are of a certain size and therefore can be marketed much earlier than our potatoes of the same size, and they also have certain areas from which they can obtain what is known as a new potato just as long as we can. For that reason the period over which they come in from the United States is much longer than ours, and they send in more than would otherwise come.

If the committee would pass this item, I should like to ask that we report progress and ask leave to sit again, leaving this question for discussion when we come to the proper item.

Mr. HATFIELD: According to regulations, grade 1 new potatoes, size B may not be sold in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: We can discuss that further when we come to that item.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have been waiting for someone, preferably on the other side of the house, to take up, from the point of view of the consumer, the matter of the prohibition of the importation of citrus fruits, or the shortening of the period during which they may be imported free. Suggestions have been made to-night by some supporters of the government with regard to prohibition or shortening of the period of free importation of citrus fruits. Speaking on behalf of the people in the part of Canada from which I come, the prairies, I say that our children there, particularly during the past few years, have not been able to get a sufficient amount of fruit; some of them have not had any fruit at all, and in my opinion the interests of the children particularly should be considered. The citrus fruit which now comes into Canada cannot, we believe, be replaced by apples; and looking across at the government which has always professed a policy of admitting free of duty articles of food, I was waiting for at least one of their supporters to rise and make the suggestion I am now making, that not only should the interests of the apple growers be canvassed but the interests of the consumers should have some consideration. To the consumers in the part of Canada from which I come the present regulation is much more satisfactory than the old one.

Mr. TUCKER: Is provision made in this year's estimates for a similar distribution of apples in crop failure districts as was done last year?

Mr. GARDINER: The distribution last year was not done under the estimates; it was done under the War Measures Act. If there is any need for it this year, it would have to be done in that way again.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the minister has suggested that this item might pass now or be allowed to stand. I would also draw the attention of the committee to the fact that although a great deal of latitude is allowed on the item covering the administration of the department, yet when there are specific items in the estimates, such as items 28, 29 and 30 in this instance, covering marketing of fruits, vegetables and other products, I believe it is not in order, under standing order 58, subsection 2, to discuss these questions as widely as we have been doing to-night. Since it appeared to be the general consensus of the committee that a general discussion should take place, I have not interfered, but now the question arises whether the committee desires to let this item pass and to continue the discussion under items 28, 29 and 30, which particularly and specifically cover marketing.

Mr. SENN: I have no desire to hold up this item in any way, but the whole question of Canada's preparation for war agricultural production was raised and discussed by the minister himself when this item was called.

Mr. GARDINER: Raised by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

Mr. SENN: It might have been raised by some other person, but certainly it was discussed by the minister. I have always understood that under the administration item almost anything taking place within the department could be discussed. However, so far as I am concerned, as long as we have an opportunity—

The CHAIRMAN: That cannot be under standing order 58, as I read it, which states:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

While what the hon, member has just said is probably quite correct with respect to a question of policy, I do not believe it applies when there is in the estimates a specific item covering a particular matter under discussion. For instance, we have been discussing fruit, and the marketing of fruit. If we look at page 5 of the estimates we find these items:

- 28. Fruit, vegetable and maple products, and honey, including grants of $5,000 to the Canadian Horticultural Council and $500 to the advisory export council.
 - 29. Live stock and live stock products.

30. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $30,000.

Therefore I suggest that if we want to avoid a tedious repetition of the same arguments, we should adhere to the rule a little more closely, although as I have said, with apparently the unanimous consent of the committee the general discussion to-night was allowed.

Mr. SENN: May I suggest to you, sir, that I am not trying to uphold or justify the arguments and discussion that have taken place in connection with the marketing of fruits, or anything like that; but I do think, following your own suggestion, that matters of policy can be taken up under an item such as this. We were discussing the policy of the department in regard to the organization of agriculture for war production; but if that can be taken up on some other item, as I have no doubt it can, as far as I am concerned I am willing to meet the wishes of the minister and will offer no further objection to this item passing.

Mr. GARDINER: I think it would be quite proper to discuss all matters having to do with science service administration under item 6, and production service administration under item 15. The same thing is true of marketing; so I suggest that if we carry this item now, we can discuss all these matters later when the proper items are before us.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman-

Mr. GARDINER: If there are going to be any more questions, I would suggest that this item stand to-night, and we can discuss it later.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry? Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH Health Branch.

237. Health branch administration, $43,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is the head of the drugs and narcotics branch?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): There is a special vote covering drugs and narcotics which will come up later on.

Mr. GREEN: Have there been any particular developments in the health department during the past year?

[The Chairman.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There have been special and additional activities consequent upon the duties and responsibilities cast on the department since the inception of the war. Possibly it would bring the situation home to my hon, friend if I summarized these briefly. In the first place we have placed the pension services of the department at the disposal of the new active service force. Then we have placed hospital services at the disposal of the Department of National Defence, with a continuous average number of patients of about one thousand. Then we have assisted local authorities in four of the provinces in regard to air raid precautions. Our medical inspection and quarantine services have been reorganized to cope with problems which have been aggravated at certain of our Canadian ports. Then our scientific staffs and public health engineering division have been making surveys of camp sites in connection with the new camps which have been required. Health services have been undertaken in various industrial plants throughout Canada. We have placed at the disposal of the Canadian army medical corps the results of an intensive study of health conditions among pensioners, which was carried on, as my hon. friend knows, over the last two or three years by one of the branches of the department. As one result of these investigations the rations of the active service force have been varied and in some respects increased. As a further result of these studies some of the tests on examination of recruits that were used twenty-five years ago have been modified and I think perhaps made more severe. We also have assisted in testing the qualities and properties of the foods included in army supplies.

I think from the health angle that summarises the main activities of the department. We have also, of course, applied the pensions administration to cases that have arisen, and we have assisted in the investigation services of the dependants' allowance board. We have received the commendation of the Department of National Defence for the work carried out by the officials of the department and by the staff of the veterans' allowance board.

Mr. GREEN: I think it would be of interest to the committee if the minister could give us some idea of the results of the examination of recruits. The general opinion is that a great number of potential recruits have been rejected, and if that is so, I suggest that perhaps some action could be taken by the government to remedy the ill health disclosed as a result of those examinations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That of course would rest with the Department of National Defence. We have simply placed at the disposal of that department results of certain observations and investigations made respecting some of the pensioners of the great war, so that the results of those investigations might be available and of assistance in connection with the new duties of the Canadian army medical corps in examining troops.

Mr. GREEN: Surely it should be the function of the department of health to take note of any findings made by the army in connection with the ill health of recruits. There should be many ways in which the health of the Canadian people could be improved, as a result of the findings of the army doctors. Is the health branch not taking any steps to secure that information, or to remedy any defects which have been shown?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Any information obtained as a result of the examination of recruits which may be accumulated and codified by the Department of National Defense will of course be of great value.

Mr. GREEN: It does not do much good to accumulate or to codify unless action is taken; unless the health branch takes some steps in Canada to improve the health of the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Of course that is the primary function of the whole department, namely, to do what my hon. friend mentions. But surely it is premature to take definite action in connection with examinations which at the moment really rest with another department of government.

Mr. GREEN: The war has been on now for ten months, and thousands of these recruits have been rejected. I suggest to the minister it is high time the department started to do something about the general health situation disclosed by the findings of medical officers examining recruits.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, that branch cannot do anything about health. According to the detailed information at page 154 of the estimates, there is a director of public health services, receiving a salary of $5,940. Then there are nine clerks, one senior messenger, four stenographers and one typist—making a total of fifteen. Other than the so-called director of public health services, there is not another doctor. There are only clerks, messengers, stenographers and typists, and I do not know what those people could do to improve the health of the soldiers. This is another instance of red tape. I do not blame the minister for that, because he inherited the legacy from the former heads of the department. That branch is absolutely useless. It is just a branch of red tape. I have been blamed for saying that some civil servants were useless, but I do say now that three-quarters of the Department of Pensions and National Health could be cut out-and with good advantage to the country. I do not see why an unemployed man, or a man who works with pick and shovel and receives only a small amount per day, does not deserve more from the country than do those people who sit with their feet up on their desks doing nothing. Of course I do not blame the minister for that, but he should not have accepted the legacy without first having taken an inventory.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister care to give the committee any information respecting new developments in connection with cancer research in the dominion?

Mr. POULIOT: I object to that, Mr. Chairman. You have been very strict, sir, on this item, and I point out that in connection with it there is nothing about the study of cancer. Certainly a study of cancer is not made by the director of public health, or by the clerks, or by the senior messengers, or by the stenographers, or by the typists, grade one. The hon, member from the flowery constituency in Ontario should wait for another item on which to discuss that matter, because it is certainly not relevant to this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I answer briefly by stating that I believe the Ontario government appointed a royal commission to investigate certain alleged cures for cancer. I believe, too, that the Canadian Medical Association have been active in the same direction and in the same connection. At the moment I do not know of any other provincial government directing operations along those lines.

Mr. QUELCH: Three clinics are being established in Alberta for the treatment of cancer. Is that not under the direction of the federal government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): For treatment, are they not?

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the dominion government made any contribution towards such cancer research, or have they been asked by the government of Ontario to help in that connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. HANSELL: Partly as a result of what has been said by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I should like to ask the minister under what item we may discuss cancer. I have looked through the items, and I believe the hon. member is quite correct when he says that they do not touch upon cancer at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is correct. I believe this is the only item in the estimates upon which he would be quite free to discuss a question as important as cancer.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, but, if my hon. friend would permit me to ask, I wonder who among the fifteen people mentioned as working in that branch makes a study of cancer. Sir, the minister may say someone does, but I insist that you be strict in the interpretation of the rules. I insist upon speaking only on the proper item, and if there is no item which deals with cancer, then I do not know how it can be relevant, on this item, to speak concerning cancer.

The CHAIRMAN: As I said a moment ago, when we come to an item respecting administration it is generally understood that the policy of a department may be discussed, unless such policy is particularly directed to a specific item provided otherwise in the estimates. In this instance we find at page 29 of the estimates item 237, dealing with health branch administration. There is no specific item covering the study or the prevention of cancer, and therefore I believe it is in order for any hon. member to ask questions of the minister respecting the prevention or cure of cancer.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going to make a speech, but rise merely to ask one or two questions. I believe the government of Alberta has appropriated about $50,000 in the present year for the initial treatment of cancer, and in that connection they have established three clinics throughout the province.

An hon. MEMBER: Provincial.

Mr. HANSELL: I know. The health of the country is in the hands of the provinces, and in that respect it is in the same category as education, as was stated the other day. I would not be certain, but I am reasonably sure that the Alberta government did appropriate something for cancer research. I agree with the hon. member for Témiscouata when he states that we have a health branch, and yet I would point out that the provincial governments have health branches.

Mr. POULIOT: They have radium, too. (Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. HANSELL: Is any grant given to the provinces for the administration of health? I have particularly in mind the disease of cancer, but I would ask the general question as to whether any grants are given by the federal government to the provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe there is an amount of $50,000 for venereal diseases, but other than that there is none.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not quite satisfied with the information given to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) as to the health of the men applying for military service. While it is true that with a staff of fifteen one cannot expect to have a great deal of information compiled, the committee is appropriating $43,000, and I think by this time we should have a little more definite information regarding the health condition of the young men who have volunteered for military service in Canada since the war started.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The department will endeavour to obtain that information, but it must be obtained from the department that is collecting it at the present time.

Mr. POULIOT: I would suggest that the $150,000 in the estimates for the League of Nations should be used to buy radium for cancer.

Mr. GREEN: When may we get the information as to the findings of the medical officers who have examined recruits? This is of vital importance. I do not think there is any doubt that thousands and thousands of young Canadians have been rejected on medical grounds, and I think the committee should have a summary of the reasons for which they have been rejected in order that action may be taken to remedy the causes of these defects.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must consult the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) upon that question.

Mr. GREEN: Can we get the information the next time the estimates of this department are before the committee of supply?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would have to come from the other department.

Mr. GREEN: Shall we be able to get the information from the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to tell my colleague right away.

Mr. HOWDEN: With regard to the information asked for by the hon, member for Vancouver South, I may say that to the best of my knowledge-and I am supposed to be a doctor-recent events have not disclosed any particular new form of illness to be brought to the attention of the science of medicine through the examination of recruits. Such examinations undoubtedly have disclosed incipient cases and old cases of venereal disease, tuberculosis and what-not, and such examinations as have been made of the recruits could not be expected to disclose any other forms of disease than those I have mentioned. No doubt constitutional diseases such as disease of the kidneys, the heart, and what-not have been found, but the science of medicine has known all these forms of disease for many long years, so I cannot see how the results of these examinations would be of any material benefit to the science of medicine as suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: I am worrying not about the science of medicine but about the health of the Canadian people.

Mr. HOWDEN: The two are the same thing.

Mr. GREEN: Not necessarily.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think this information would be of great value to the community because, after all, there must be causes for these diseases, and in order to find the causes we must know the facts. If people have been suffering from malnutrition, this committee should know it, but I rose particularly to ask about the nutritional survey which the department has been making, I understand, during the last few years. Is there a likelihood of a report on that survey being made in the near future?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Reports will be published on these surveys, but I understand they are not completed yet.

Mr. MacINNIS: They will be shortly?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacDIARMID: Speaking as a newcomer, I think many rejections were caused by defective eyesight, defective hearing and deformities, and these I understand are not a matter for the federal health department. These defects have caused a great many rejections here.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is the director of public health services, and why is he getting an increase of $720 in these troublous times?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The officer is Doctor J. J. Heagerty, and the actual increase is $240. I might explain that when the 1939-40 estimates were compiled, namely in November, 1938, this position, classified by the civil service commission, was described as "Chief Executive, Medical and General Assistant", and had as the maximum salary $5,220, which amount the incumbent of the position was then receiving.

The position was reclassified by the civil service commission and the title changed to "Director of Public Health Services", with a salary range of $4,800 to $5,100, to $5,400, to $5,700, to $5,940. The order in council, P.C. 46/751, was dated March 29, 1939, which date it will be noted was subsequent to the printing and tabling of the 1939-40 estimates. Under the terms of the order in council the reclassification was effective retroactively to April 1, 1938.

Since, as stated, the incumbent was at the time receiving $5,220, he was immediately entitled to an increase to $5,400, and on April 1, 1939, to a further increase to $5,700. From April 1, 1940, a year later, he is eligible for an increase to $5,940, which is the amount provided for in the estimates. The increase in salary to be paid to this employee during 1940-41, over that paid in 1939-40, is $240, and not $720, as the estimates would indicate.

Mr. LOCKHART: When the minister is obtaining the information asked for by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), would he be good enough also to bring down information as to the health of the troops generally. I am informed that a number of men have been returned from overseas as medically unfit. I fail to find in the estimates of the Department of National Defence any item on which we could ask questions about the health of the troops, so I think we might reasonably be allowed to pursue our inquiries now or be definitely assured that we shall be given an opportunity on some other item.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):
My recollection is that there is a vote in the national defence estimates for medical services, and I think that would be the proper item. If I had the information, I would gladly give it. It comes under another department, but I shall consult my colleague immediately in regard to it.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I ask the minister, then, to follow up my question with respect to the health of the men who have been returned from overseas after being there for some time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand that the departments of health in the various provinces look after tuberculosis, cancer and other diseases. I am not clear as to the exact duties of this department, and I should like the minister to state the functions which this department performs and why we are being asked to vote $43,000 at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend would be good enough to study the evolution of public health policy in the Dominion of Canada, he would find that before confederation there was a certain degree of attention paid to public health in the four provinces then existing. The dominion had regulations in regard to public health as far back as 1667, with respect to the quality of bread and foodstuffs. In 1707 regulations were instituted for the inspection of meat, and in 1721 regulations in regard to quarantine. At confederation we had a system of public health established in all the provinces, and the respective jurisdictions of the provinces and the federal authorities were defined in the British North America Act.

Since then, the provincial governments have been responsible for hospitals, asylums and charitable institutions. The federal government was given charge mainly over quarantine and marine hospitals. Prior to 1919, when the health act was enacted, various additions were made from time to time to the public health functions of the dominion government. But it was not until that time that we had anything like a coordinated health policy in the Dominion of Canada. Under the 1919 act the services that were created or transferred to the national department of health were as follows:

Quarantine services, including leper stations. Immigration medical services.

Administration of the Food and Drugs Act. Administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

Administration of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act.

Marine hospital services. Venereal disease control.

Child welfare. Statistics.

Housing.

Medical examination of civil servants.

By amendments to the present act, other functions and responsibilities have been added to the national health department, such as the laboratory of hygiene, public health engineering, the child and maternal hygiene division, the division for the study and control of epidemics, the division of industrial hygiene and the division of publicity and health education. In 1928, as my hon. friend is aware, there was an amalgamation of the old soldiers' civil reestablishment department and the old health department to form the present Department of Pensions and National Health.

The federal activities, about which my hon. friend inquires, are and have always been primarily concerned with the protection from infection and disease from abroad. As I said, this department deals with questions of quarantine, inspection of immigrants, impure foods, the control of habit-forming drugs and patent medicines, and in some cases importations of fruits, vegetables and live stock which are inspected to safeguard the consumer. The department has also instituted laboratories for carrying on research work and conducting necessary tests. I think this explains the varying jurisdiction as between the provinces and the federal authority with reference to health matters.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have followed the remarks of the minister quite closely, but I find in the estimates that there are generous amounts provided for the different services to which he has referred. I notice an item for food and drugs, another for opium and narcotic drugs, another for proprietary or patent medicines, and so on. I still have not been advised as to the exact functions which would be carried on under this item covering health branch administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The divisions to which my hon, friend has referred all have separate heads, but for the purposes of administration, and as requested by the Department of Finance, they all come under the health branch.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I am quite in order in discussing opium and narcotic drugs under this item because the chief of this branch is the super-chief of all these little branches. I can now see the relationship which exists. I did not know that before. I saw that this chief of branch was receiving a few hundred dollars more in salary than the dominion analyst, but I did not know his function in the department. Would I be in order to ask questions about other branches?

The CHAIRMAN: As I have mentioned a couple of times already, it is permissible to discuss questions of general administration under this general item of health branch administration, but there are other specific items. For instance, item 239 deals with opium and narcotic drugs. When we reach that item, these questions could be more properly dealt with.

Mr. COCKERAM: After the declaration of war there was some reference to the Department of Pensions and National Health taking over the Royal Canadian army medical corps. Has that question been dropped?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No such question was raised.

Mr. GREEN: In his opening statement the minister said that the department had been conducting health surveys of industrial plants. Could we have further details of those surveys?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That would come under the item dealing with industrial hygiene.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say that his department was in charge of air raid precaution work in Canada. Could we have further information on that score?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to give my hon. friend further information later on. Generally speaking, I may say that two years before war broke out, an interdepartmental committee was set up which dealt with the various committees and organizations which had been formed. One of these committees was under the chairmanship of the deputy minister of national health, and it had to do with questions of air raid precautions. This is being handled here the same as in England, where the matter is not under the defence department.

Certain recommendations were made by that committee, and certain officers of the department were sent to interview the governments of the four provinces most vitally concerned. In the first place, the vulnerable areas were defined by the officers of the Department of National Defence. The matter was referred by that department to the Department of Pensions and National Health. The governments of the provinces in which these potential vulnerable areas were located were asked for cooperation, which was given. Supplies were forwarded from the Department of Pensions and National Health. I believe there is a provincial air raid precaution officer in each of these four provinces. If my memory serves me correctly, last year a grant of $5,000 was made to each of the four provinces for the purpose of carrying on air raid precaution work. This work is entirely under provincial control, except that expert advice is available from this department to the municipalities or provinces directly concerned.

Mr. GREEN: Is there coordination between the men in charge in the four provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. The officer in charge here has made several visits to each of the provinces to consult with the provincial officer.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be better to have one man in charge of operations for the whole of Canada so that the precautions could be standardized.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are standardized. Objection was taken to that by the first committee—not the departmental committee—on the ground that this should be a civilian project. I believe in some instances it is called a civilian defence committee instead of an air raid precaution committee. The supplies sent out are identical, and pamphlets which were obtained from England have been distributed. The information given to all provinces is uniform and, generally speaking, the measures taken are uniform.

Mr. GREEN: Which are the four provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the department following the plan which was adopted in Great Britain where meetings were held in city halls or other public buildings?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: These are public meetings, and the officials of the department explain what should be done in the event of air raids. I attended a number of those meetings on my last trip to the old country and I found them quite educating. I did not realize that the public could be instructed to protect themselves against air raids to the extent that was outlined at those meetings. Are similar meetings being held in the provinces to which the minister has referred?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Speaking for my own province, I attended one of the meetings and heard the demonstration given. They have gone beyond that stage in most provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: And all sorts of literature is being given out?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And supplies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The information in connection with the rejection of recruits is being collected, I understand, by the Department of National Defence. I have been informed that a great many rejections, certainly in the earlier stages, were the result of malnutrition. It seems to me that this information should be available as soon as possible for the use of the various provincial departments. From what I could gather, a good many men were rejected because of malnutrition, although of course there were other reasons as well. Would it not be advisable to have that information put into the hands of the various provincial departments without delay? The Health League of Canada have been putting on what is known as a nutrition movement. The minister knows about it and it is an excellent idea. I urge that the information be given to the provincial departments as soon as possible so that they may begin to study the matter. Within a year, if that were done, the evil might be remedied. Certainly the information should not be allowed to accumulate in one place instead of being disseminated.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Although the information is not available here at the moment, there is complete cooperation between the Department of National Defence, the Department of Pensions and National Health, and the various provincial departments.

Mr. COLDWELL: The question that has been put to the minister, and the series of questions initiated by the hon, member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), are as important as any question which we shall have to consider in connection with this matter, because, after all, our greatest natural resource now and in the future consists of our men and women. The information asked for should be brought down. I happen to have with me the Canadian Welfare magazine for April and May issued by the Canadian Welfare Council at Ottawa, and I should like to read an extract that throws light on this question. I am going to quote from an article by Miss Charlotte Whitton. It is the report of an address which she gave before the Rotary club of Toronto.

Mr. POULIOT: She is more a propagandist than a technician.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nevertheless she occupies a position which enables her to speak with some knowledge of conditions, and at any rate the data she gives is worth considering. I quote:

Many of these youths, many of these non-established men, frustrated and aimless, had become bitter with the years; many of them broken with their experience of idleness and need, but they have come forward in thousands to offer themselves for active defence of this country, and of the principles and ways of life, it cherishes. Yet, in different areas, different varying ratios of rejections are reported.

Public relief departments report large groups of their clients, obviously ineligible because of age or condition, and heavy rejections of others, less obviously unfit; and of still others, because they have more than two children. The volunties tary agencies, whose clientele are composed more largely of low income than of wholly dependent groups, report similar conditions, but with considerable enlistments from boys in their families, and of heads of families in the younger age groups.

This is the sentence to which I would call attention.

But one of the largest of the voluntary agencies in the dominion reports only 245 men out of 1,505 likely to be at all eligible for active service; another reports that in a test group of 140 families, only 52 could have been considered eligible for enlistment—of these, 13 enlisted; 4 only were conscientious objectors; 35 others were employed and fearful of the uncertainty of ever getting work again, if they gave up; 88 were quite ineligible.

Many of these groups are reported unfit for heavy pressure in speeded-up industrial or agricultural production. The inadequate functionings of democracy have rendered many of its would-be defenders partially incapable of its defence without vigorous measures for their care and conditioning.

These examples of the slow undermining of the ways and vigour of our life, through the growth of insecurity and need in the margin land show what a long extended battle line must be held on the home front.

I recollect reading last autumn a letter written by the mayor of this very city to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointing out the large number of rejections in the month of September and suggesting that there might be opened in Canada here and there reconditioning depots where these young men might be fed and cared for and their health looked after in order to bring them up to the standard required for enlistment. It struck me as a most serious indictment of the economic and social system, that we should allow these young men to deteriorate, to fall into decay in times of peace when we have no use for them, and then all of a sudden wish to recondition them to defend our institutions. It was a tremendous indictment. I suggest that the department now before us and the various departments concerned should place before the house at the earliest possible moment figures that will enable us to find out exactly what the condition is so that we may face the facts. In my opinion the large number of rejections is due not to any functional defect at birth but largely to the kind of life which many of these young lads have had to live during the past few years. They have suffered from malnutrition-

Mr. MacNICOL: Not enough to eat.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not enough to eat. I am urging that we get that information. True, we are not responsible for the provincial health departments; but, after all, we are responsible for the defence of this country. We are responsible for the social and economic conditions of the country to a greater degree than any province, and because the provinces cannot deal with the situation we must do so. I believe that we shall have to change many things in our present social and economic order to bring about this better condition of physical health among the great masses of our people.

Mr. POULIOT: The United States of America offer us in this connection an example that should be followed by this country. They have a programme to furnish hot luncheons to five million undernourished children in the schools. In the city of New York alone last year over 23,000,000 hot lunches were served, an average of about 120,000 a day. They understand there that it is important that children at school shall be well fed. My old friend Doctor Maloney of Australia sent me a copy of a speech that he made in Canberra advocating the distribution of free milk to school children, something that might well be done in this country, not only to help nourish the children but also to take care of the surplus production of milk. We may be told that this is not the business of this government; on the other hand often there are items in the estimates for grants that are not provided for in the British North America Act, but they are made just the same. I wonder if this government could not grant a special subsidy for that purpose to each province according to the school children population. It would be easy to vote a certain sum of money to be distributed to each province on the understanding that milk is supplied to children in schools, particularly in the poor districts, frontier settlements, mining districts and all the poorer communities.

Now sir, this being said, I could ask a minimum of ten thousand questions of the minister on this item, but I shall ask only two. Who writes the advertising and publicity for an amount of $10,000? Is it all done by the director of public health services, or by any of the nine clerks, the senior messenger, the four stenographers or the typist?

My second question is, who is being transported by the travelling expenses of $2,500? Is it the director of public health services, or one of the typists, messengers and clerks? And now I think of another question: If the director of public health services travels to the extent of $2,500, who takes charge of the clerks, senior messenger, stenographers and typist while he is away, and who does the health work of the department, because he is the only technician in that branch, the only doctor? Does he do it by wireless?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to publicity, the director of publicity does write the publications referred to by the hon, member.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is he?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Rowse.

Mr. POULIOT: Is he a doctor?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. POULIOT: Ah!

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to travelling expenses, if my hon. friend will look at section 11 of the Pensions and National Health Act there is reference there to the Dominion Council of Health. That item is for the convening in Ottawa—the custom has been twice a year—of the Dominion Council of Health, which consists of the deputy ministers or senior health officers of the various provinces of Canada to consult and confer with the health officers of the department in order to have as far as possible a coordinated health policy for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister, and this last item is the only one that deserves our support and commendation in this whole vote of $43,000. They have a man who is not a doctor writing on health; you might just as well ask a bootblack to describe the moon. I have been savagely attacked by some Ottawa papers for my stand on the civil service. I admit there are good men in the service; but here we see red tape, and that I strongly denounce. And if any hon. member or any man of the Tory party, including the hon, member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) dares to attack me on this matter, I will take every item of the estimates and show the red tape that exists. It will be perfectly relevant to each item.

Let me tell hon, members more than that. I have a chart for each department, and I know how many people are there, doing absolutely nothing, when we cannot get a vote for our constituencies. I do not see why these people can fatten themselves at the expense of the state. Yet we hear some kindly souls saying, "Well, the poor civil servants, they are doing their duty." They are doing nothing! There is Mr. Heagerty; he says, "Hello, hello." I wonder if he gives medical care to his staff; he has enough for that. Apart from that, I do not see his utility. Imagine the publicity that he puts out being written by a layman! What do the doctors in this house think of that? What can be the use of that? Just to light the fire with; that is all. I hope the minister will give consideration to that. I am strongly against all the Tories in the Department of Pensions and National Health; they have been a public nuisance; they are kept there because—"oh, well, they are Tories; we must not be hard on them; we must not show political partisanship." It is not partisanship, but we must have a policy of retrenchment; let us retrench them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): One observation I think should be made in regard to the remarks of the hon, member. First, I have not been in the department very long—

Mr. POULIOT: I do not blame the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not entitled to either blame or commendation, but I have had the privilege of reading "Health in Canada" written by Doctor Heagerty, and in my judgment as a layman, he is one of the finest writers on public health anywhere. In regard to Mr. Rowse, his publication has received great commendation from the press of Canada—and there is no credit to me concerning it; it was organized before I went there. I believe he has done excellent work under the supervision of one of the ablest health officers in Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister says he does not care for blame or praise. He might regret that; for if he does not care for praise, he might get blame.

Mr. BRUCE: In the air raid precaution work has the department the cooperation of the St. John Ambulance Association?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Very definitely; they have done excellent work in cooperation with the department along these lines.

Mr. BRUCE: That is very valuable. The hour is late; I shall speak only a moment; I should like to commend very much the statement made to-night by the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). There is no question about the fact that a great many young people who have no work to do suffer from ill health; and if they are on relief they may suffer from undernourishment. Perhaps it is not the business of the department of health, but I suggest that possibly a report from this department to the proper authorities might assist in the establishment of camps or some places where these young men could be kept at work and regain their physical fitness, not only improving their physical health but their moral health as well.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. McCANN: The hon, member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) may be in a position to criticize some of the legal fraternity, but I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee that he is in no position to give a detailed criticism of the officers of the public health department. The gentleman who occupies the position of director of public health services is known to the medical profession of Canada as one of the outstanding men in his particular line. He needs no second man to write his publicity; as an author and lecturer he has demonstrated to the people of Canada who know anything about public health matters that he is an ace in his specialty.

None of us appreciates health until we have lost it. Health is the greatest asset of any people. The Montreal Star carries in each issue, in large letters, the words, "A nation's health is a nation's wealth." That is very true. It takes a war to bring to the attention of a people the question of their physical fitness. Just as the last war demonstrated to all those countries engaged in it that large numbers of people were physically unfit, so has the present war demonstrated that a great many of our young men who have volunteered their services are physically unfit. It is all very well for the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to speak about reconditioning men, but you cannot recondition men as you can recondition automobiles. He will have to go back to some of the grandparents of these men; that is where some of the reconditioning should have started. I am not so much afraid at the present time that our people are going to suffer as a result of nutritional deficiencies, but I say that is a matter which should be given attention, because generations yet unborn will probably suffer by reason of some of these deficiencies.

The discussion to-night has run the gamut of many matters having to do with public health. I shall not attempt to answer all the questions which have been asked; that is not my province, but perhaps my knowledge of some of them may enable me to offer intelligent answers. Mention was made of the statistics or information regarding men who have been rejected for military service. That is not something which can be secured in a day or two. The results of the examinations which are being made of men offering to enlist will have to be correlated, coordinated and studied before any definite information that will be of any use can be given to the public. Last year before war was declared, and at the September session, many medical men in this house, including the then leader of the opposition, made the suggestion that all men who enlisted should undergo complete physical examinations, including X-ray examination. We all fell in line with that suggestion, and that has been a splendid procedure. We all know the enormous amounts of money that have been and are being spent for pensions, practically $50,000,000 annually, and in all something like a billion dollars of the money of the people of this country for pensions since the last war. A large part of that huge amount-I will not say a major part-has gone for disabilities that might have been noticed before the men enlisted but which became acute only during active service. Particularly is this true with reference to tuberculosis; and the very fact that these men are now receiving a thorough examination, with X-ray plates taken of their chests, in the end is going to save this country an enormous amount of money.

I submit that this has been splendid work on behalf of the government and that they should be commended for the particular attention they are giving this matter. When that information does come from the Department of National Defence, it will be passed on to the proper health authorities; and indeed, even at this moment, when a man tries to enlist and it is found upon examination that he has tuberculosis, that fact is immediately communicated to the provincial authorities and the medical health officer of the community from which he comes. I do not know whether this policy obtains over the whole of Canada. I do know it obtains in Ontario; and if it does not obtain in other provinces, it is because of some lack of regulation in the health departments of those provinces:

It is not the duty of the director of public health services merely to sit in an executive capacity. He coordinates the information received from different branches of the public health service throughout the entire department. Let me say in commendation of the public health department that they have made remarkable progress in the last four years. I remember that when I first came into this house in 1936, in one of my first speeches I was somewhat critical of the public health department. I made the suggestion at that time that we should have a national research department in connection with the health service. My suggestion fell upon deaf ears, apparently, but we have had research in nutrition and along certain other lines. Several departments which were dormant have been reestablished, such as the maternal and child hygiene branch and the division of epidemiology. Certain services were carried on by voluntary agencies, with the assistance of grants from this government; these departments are being reestablished, and are doing splendid work. Their work has outgrown the services which were being rendered by the other agencies at that time.

One does not see any great publicity with regard to the activities of the public health department, for the very reason that we do not sufficiently appreciate either our individual health or the health of our people until we get some epidemic or scourge and begin to lose that greatest of all assets. I submit that the department of health is doing good work; that its influence is spreading; that it is coordinating the work of the health departments of the provinces. Perhaps many hon. members do not appreciate the fact that in each province of this dominion there is an active department of public health. Some of those provincial departments are subsidized by this government in certain directions. For instance, last year Ontario received $50,000 from the federal government to aid in carrying on its campaign of education and treatment with regard to venereal diseases. Of course I readily understand-

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you mean in addition to the vote?

Mr. McCANN: I have not noticed just yet.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That was $50,000 for arsenicals, was it not?

Mr. McCANN: For treatment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For all the provinces.

Mr. McCANN: It is all for the same disease, anyway. We could well afford to have that particular appropriation increased. I would say, too, that voluntary agencies in Canada doing public health work should get increased rather than decreased grants.

For instance, let us consider the Health League of Canada. I see in the appropriation this year that there is a cut from $10,000 to $5,000. I can hardly see the justification for that, but perhaps I am not sufficiently well informed at the moment to pass judgment upon it. I do know, however, that the Health League of Canada is carrying on a campaign of publicity and education that is worth to Canada many times the appropriation made by the federal government. At present they are putting on a campaign in Toronto, and are depending upon the voluntary subscriptions of public-spirited people in that city in order that their work of education may be carried on. The results they have obtained over the years stand out as a beacon light in the public health services of Canada. What they have done in connection with venereal diseases, what they have done in educating the people with respect to the administration of toxoid for diphtheria cannot be measured in dollars and cents. When you have public-spirited men of the type of Doctor Bates and other prominent men in Toronto who wish to continue the great work they are doing, then I say they should have an increased appropriation from this government and should receive continued—

Mr. POULIOT: Support.

Mr. McCANN: —support from the people of the whole country.

Another matter brought up to-night had to do with whether this government has been doing anything in connection with the investigation of cancer. Of itself, I do not think that it is; but probably hon. members will not forget that the King George cancer fund is still in operation, and that money from that fund is given to the Banting Institute in Ontario, and to clinics from one end of the country to the other, so that research may be carried on and treatment continued in clinics in different cities. I do not remember at the moment just how that fund originated, but I believe it was a jubilee fund, and has grown from public subscription.

Let us for a moment consider the publicity branch of the federal health department. That branch is not costing very much money, but it is doing an enormous amount of work. I doubt very much if persons outside the members of the medical profession and men particularly interested in public health work in Canada ever read the articles or information given out by the publicity branch of the federal health department. So I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that as a medical man and one who has been interested in public health for a quarter of a century, I am satisfied with the progress of the federal health branch, and I wish them continued success, and that they may have an ever-broadening sphere of influence.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, my good friend the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) should be thankful to the hon. member for Témiscouata for having accorded him an opportunity to make such a nice little speech. I fully agree with what he has said about Doctor Bates, but Doctor Bates does not receive a cent from this vote, with the exception of what he receives for travelling expenses. On the other hand, as a layman—and my hon. friend speaks as a medical man—I would ask him if the school children, the parents of the school children and the farmers around Renfrew will not agree with the suggestion previously made by the hon, member for Témiscouata respecting the free distribution of milk in schools. If they agree with that suggestion made by a layman, I ask the hon, member for Renfrew South why as a medical man he has not made that suggestion before.

Mr. McCANN: In answer to the hon. member for Témiscouata let me say that I agree one hundred per cent with the suggestion he has made, but I would point out to him that this is a matter which rests entirely with the provincial department of health and the health branches in the various municipalities. So far as Renfrew is concerned, I would tell the hon. member that throughout the county of Renfrew and in the town of Renfrew we have as fine a health service as exists anywhere in the whole of this dominion. The children there are under the supervision of a public health nurse, and those children, along with the hon. member for Témiscouata, any time at eleven o'clock in the morning can get a pint of milk, free, from the municipality of Renfrew.

Mr. GREEN: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), may I strongly urge upon the government that steps be taken at once to set up works battalions in Canada in which those young men who have tried to enlist for overseas service but who have been rejected may enlist to do work at home.

There are many kinds of work which can be done in connection with the preparation of the defence forces of this country, and that work could be done by battalions of this type. The present situation is that many of these young men are unfit because in depression years they had to ride back and forth across the country on freight trains. They have gone to the recruiting offices, have been turned down and have received blue slips. In fact, I understand they are now known as the blue-slip brigade. I think nothing would do more to build up the bodies of those young men, nothing would do more to improve their morale than to give them an opportunity to enlist in works battalions or in some such units which could do work of the kind I have mentioned. I am asking the minister to let us know to-night what he thinks about a proposal for a scheme of that type.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have carefully noted the remarks just made by my hon. friend.

Item stands.

INDUSTRY AND THE WAR

REFERENCE TO PROPOSED ADVISORY COMMITTEE-CONFERENCE OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS WITH CABINET

On the orders of the day:

Hon, R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the 23rd of February last the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his third broadcast in the election campaign, is reported to have made this statement:

With the war and its problems growing in intensity and magnitude, I shall seek, if we are returned to power, to bring to the aid of the ministry, in an advisory capacity, a still larger number of men of outstanding ability and experience whose services in one way or another might be made available to the state, and add strength to the administration of our policies. How best their services might be consolidated and used, whether in an immediate association with the war cabinet, or with a member of the cabinet, intimately associated with its war activities, is something that I would like to consider with my colleagues before the next parliament reassembles.

This was an important statement. It will be noted that these men of outstanding ability and experience were to be brought in to the aid of the ministry in an advisory capacity, and are to be distinguished from those already or afterwards brought in as administrators or executives. Nothing happened, and more than three months passed, when, on the 31st day of May last, at Winnipeg, the Canadian Manufacturers association issued a statement expressing "a deep-rooted conviction"-

. . that there exist some definite causes that are responsible for Canadian plants receiving orders for only a small percentage of their capacity, and respectfully urges the Canadian government to send governmental ministerial representatives to England to clear away misunderstandings presently existing, in order that Canadian industry may be speeded up immediately and take its full share in the defence of our empire and country. our empire and country.

That statement gave expression to two or more important ideas:

- (a) That Canadian industrial plants were not being utilized except in a small degree;
- (b) That immediate action as indicated should be taken to speed up production in Canadian industry in order that it might take its full share in the defence of the empire and country.

From a press report it would appear that yesterday, June 6, thirty members of the Canadian Manufacturers association had a two-hour discussion with the cabinet on this important matter, but no word was given out beyond this, that the conference had been mutually helpful-which sounds like the Prime Minister, and does not mean much in the way of concrete information to the public as to what is being done—so that Canadian industry may do its full part in contributing to empire and Canadian defence. In this morning's papers is an announcement, however, that "plans looking to a more complete mobilization and control of Canadian industry for war effort are being worked out by the government."

May I ask the Prime Minister to take the house and the country into his confidence and tell us

- 1. If it is the intention of the government to set up an advisory committee composed of men of outstanding ability and experience whose services might be made available to the state and thus add strength to the administration of our policies.
- 2. Is this advisory committee not to propose new policies?
- 3. What, if any, arrangements have been made with the committee of the Canadian Manufacturers association to further the objects of that association in speeding up and taking their full share in industrial activity for the defence of the empire and Canada?

And finally:

4. While parliament is in session should not all such important announcements of policy and administration be made by the Prime Minister or by the appropriate member of the cabinet in the house?

I do respectfully protest that public announcement of policy in respect of matters of vital importance should be made here. Otherwise we shall be reduced to the status of rubber stamps.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have a fairly good memory but I doubt very much whether I can claim to be able to remember all that my hon. friend has read from the document he has before him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I should have sent it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend has just mentioned, he did not favour me with notice in advance that he intended to bring up the matter to-day. However, may I say to him at once that I agree with his point of view regarding important announcements of public policy being made in the house, and that is one reason why I thought it well to give the press the abbreviated statement I did yesterday with respect to the interview that took place between members of the manufacturers association and the government. It leaves me free to make a statement now to the house for the first time as to what took place at the conference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what we want to hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I took occasion to ask the large representation of manufacturers who were present if they would like to have the press called in to the conference. It was intimated in reply that it would be preferable that the conference should be held within the confines of my office in the manner in which it was being conducted, and that the press be not invited to be present.

The conference was devoted to the consideration of a resolution passed at a recent meeting in Winnipeg of the manufacturers The conference was between association. members of the government and this large representative delegation. It was arranged at the earliest possible moment after the request for the conference had been made; and it was I think agreed by all at the conclusion of the meeting that it had been mutually helpful and eminently satisfactory. One of the subjects brought up was the question of sending to the old country some member of the ministry and, possibly, delegates from the manufacturers association who might while there endeavour to clear up any misunderstandings—I believe that was the word—which might exist with respect to the desire of the government of Canada to have as much manufacturing done in this country as possible as a result of orders which might be placed here from Great Britain. The members of the association were given information by different members of the government as to the steps that had all along been taken fully to advise the British government of Canada's industrial capacity and of the desire both of the government and of the manufacturers to cooperate in every way in taking the fullest advantage of that capacity to fill orders for the British government; of the many representations that had been made by ministers of the crown in telegrams and in other ways to the British government with respect to possible orders that might be placed here; etcetera, etcetera. At the end of the discussion of that point it was suggested that perhaps a better way of effecting what was desired would be to have Mr. Massey, the High Commissioner in London, immediately bring to the attention of the British government the fact that representatives of the manufacturers association and members of the government had met together, had discussed the question of orders that might be placed in Canada, and that he should press upon the British government, particularly the departments of that government which would have to do with matters of the kind, the earnest desire, both of the government of Canada and of the manufacturers, to have such business placed as quickly as possible and, to as large an extent as possible. I believe it was felt that that method of making the presentation would be better than sending over another minister of the crown, to be accompanied by representatives of the manufacturers association.

The members of the delegation were surprised, I think, to learn of the many representations that had been made by different members of the government, and by others authorized by the government to make them, to the British government regarding our desire to obtain such orders as might be placed here, and our ability to fill them.

The other question discussed at some length was that of having some outstanding industrialist placed in a position where he could help to supervise production being carried on in Canada, particularly the class of supplies that come under the direction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I doubt whether, at the time the representations were made, the gentlemen who were making them had any idea of the extent to which leading industrialists and businessmen in Canada had already been drafted into the service of the government in connection with the production of munitions and supplies. The representatives were told of what had been done in that regard, and the offer was made immediately by my friend and colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, that if the members of the delegation had any one to suggest in whom they would have more confidence than those already engaged in that capacity, and would submit his name, the minister would immediately see that he was taken on to assist in the supervision of the production of munitions and supplies in his department.

With regard to what I said in the course of the recent campaign, my hon, friend has quoted me correctly. I did say, with respect to what might be best in the connection mentioned, that I would wish to confer with my colleagues in the government and take the steps that seemed advisable. We have been most successful not only in bringing, in an advisory capacity, many of the leading industrialists and business men in Canada into the departments concerned with the speeding up of Canada's war effort, but we have been doubly fortunate in securing the services, in a good many instances without remuneration, of some of those gentlemen to assist from day to day in the work of actual administration of the departments concerned. I need not mention individual names though I might perhaps mention one as an illustration. In the Department of National Defence for Air, as my hon. friend knows, we were successful in obtaining the services of Mr. James Duncan, an exceptionally able business executive, who is giving his services to the country without remuneration, not only giving the benefit of his advice on many matters on which we have had occasion to consult him but also giving his entire time to the work of the air ministry as acting deputy minister. In the Department of Munitions and Supply the minister has been fortunate in drafting into that department some dozen, I think I am right in saying—

Mr. HOWE: Some eighteen or twenty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —eighteen or twenty, as my hon. friend tells me, leading industrialists or business men who are giving the benefit of their counsel and advice to him, and through him to the government, and not only that but are actively participating in the work of the direction of production of supplies with which that department is engaged. I might mention other cases in other departments, but I hope I have illustrated in a general way the method by which the government have been seeking to implement, if not in whole, in part at least, the undertaking which I gave during the recent general election campaign.

There are times and seasons for all things. The government is by no means relaxing its efforts to secure the right persons to assist in war work. Whether or not, or just when, it may be best to have the ministry itself enlarged, is a matter still under consideration. But I can assure my hon. friend that it is one to which I am giving, in collaboration with my colleagues, the most careful consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister overlooked the first part of my inquiry, in regard to the setting up of an advisory committee. Perhaps he will give further consideration to that.

STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH LABOUR ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): In view of the statement of the Prime Minister in regard to consultations with leading industrialists, will he inform the house whether the heads of the central labour organizations have been invited in for similar consultations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to be able to tell my hon. friend that immediately after yesterday's conference I gave instructions to arrange a similar conference next week with representative labour organizations. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) some time ago had this in mind and has been seeing representative heads of the different organizations for purposes of consultation.

UNITED STATES VISA LAW

EXECUTIVE ORDER REQUIRING PASSPORTS FROM CANADIANS CROSSING BOUNDARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a press report from Washington under yesterday's date, to which no doubt his attention has been directed as Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the state department of the United States government has announced that after July 1 passports and visas will be required from Canadians and others desiring to visit the United States.

I do not for a moment question the validity of such action, but in view of it I would ask whether the government of Canada have taken or propose to take similar action requiring passports from citizens and residents of the United States and citizens of other countries on this hemisphere wishing to visit Canada? I make this request because I am aware that there are in the United States many persons, members of the so-called German bund, who may come to Canada for purposes beyond those of mere tourists, and whose presence in Canada at this time would be wholly undesirable.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I anticipated that some hon, member might ask a question on this matter, and I am glad the hon. leader of the opposition has asked the question. The laws and regulations of the United States, as I think my hon, friend is fully aware, require that persons entering the United States from most countries must have a passport, bearing a visa signed by a consul, before they are permitted to enter the United States. There have been exceptions to that requirement in the case of Canada and central American countries, also I think in the case of the West Indies and Bermuda. However, under this latest regulation the exemption is now removed and all persons going into the United States after July 1 will be obliged to have a passport and visa.

The executive order which has now been issued is in part general in its terms. It provides that aliens desiring to come to the United States temporarily must establish a legitimate purpose or reasonable need for their presence in the United States, and must establish also that they will depart from the United States at the conclusion of their stay. They must also present conclusive evidence that they will be admitted to the country of their nationality or some other foreign country to which they intend to return or proceed after departing from the United States.

The executive order also provides for the suspension on and after July 1, 1940, of the exemption from passport and visa requirements which was previously extended to citizens of Canada, Newfoundland, St. Pierre-Miquelon, Mexico, Cuba, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Panama, Bermuda and the British, French and Netherlands West Indies. It has further been announced that different regulations will be established with respect to persons who have entered the United States for permanent residence on immigration visas and who may be returning from a temporary absence abroad. No additional documentation will be required from United States citizens proceeding to or returning from the territories mentioned.

Our government has already made representations to the government of the United States on this matter, and we shall continue to take up within the next day or two the different questions that are likely to arise out of this new order. I cannot at the moment indicate just what is in the mind of the government with respect to passports as between Canada and the United States, but I would say to my hon, friend that he need not be surprised if, following a tradition which is well known, at least to the party on this side of the house, something in the nature of reciprocity should it serve Canadian interests, might be considered in relation to passport requirements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the Prime Minister will do so in this case, because it is a matter which especially affects those of us who live in western New Brunswick, as in order to get to Ottawa we have to travel through the United States, or else spend a whole day of further travel to go by the all-Canadian route. I have lived alongside the United States border all my life, I have been accustomed to go back and forth as and when I pleased. If the Canadian government can make any arrangement with the United States government for the passage of through passengers between Montreal and New Brunswick I personally shall be greatly obliged.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is questions of just that kind that will be carefully considered between the legations. As far as my hon. friend is concerned I can promise him that we will do the best we can to get him a pass.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CANADIAN ACTIVE SERVICE FORCE

RECRUITING OF FORESTRY AND RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): On Monday last in answer to a question I stated that the Canadian government had indicated its readiness to provide both railway and forestry troops to the United Kingdom. I may say now that, pending information which the army council through the war office is sending us regarding the types of such units which would be most useful at this time, authority has been given to enlist a number of specialists for service with the British forces and to recruit four forestry companies and four railway construction companies for service overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good; we are getting action at last.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

QUESTIONNAIRE SENT TO MANUFACTURERS BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister table forthwith the record and form of questionnaire referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers) when he stated yesterday, as reported on page 564 of Hansard, that the advisory committee of which he was a member sent out questionnaires to almost every manufacturer in business right across Canada asking, in effect, if they anticipated a shortage of skilled labour, and if something should be done about it, and their replies; asking in effect whether the training should be done by the manufacturers or by the government of Canada, and their replies. It was stated by the hon, member that this is a matter of record. If so, will the minister table forthwith this record and report?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): My impression is that the information which the hon. member has requested is contained in an appendix to the report of the national employment commission. However, I shall be glad to look into it, and if it is not there I shall be glad to table a copy of any such questionnaire.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Nanaimo said it had not been tabled.

Mr. McLARTY: I think the appendix to the report of the national employment commission, contains the questionnaire and the results of the questionnaire, though I have not checked it up. If that is not so I shall be glad indeed to table a copy of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We want to know where to find it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yesterday when the hon, member referred to the replies he said they were composite replies to these questionnaires. I should like to have something more than simply what the composite replies were, if we could have that information tabled.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

PAYMENTS AGREEMENT BETWEEN FRANCE AND CANADA TO EFFECT STABILIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Following the practice my hon. friend has correctly emphasized, of making important announcements in the first instance in the House of Commons, I should like to make a brief statement as to an agreement respecting payments between Canada and France which was effected yesterday by an exchange of notes with the new French minister, M. Ristelhueber. An immediate effect of the agreement, which is in force from the date of signature, is the stabilization of the rate of exchange between Canada and France, with a view to promoting trade between the two countries under war conditions. The agreement provides, within certain limits, for accumulation of French francs by Canada, and for orderly repatriation of Canadian securities now held in France. Both these measures will provide France with the means of making additional war purchases in Canada. The agreement is for an indefinite period but may be terminated by either country on three months' notice. The provisions affecting private individuals or firms in Canada are summarized as follows:

- (1) Payments by a resident of Canada to a resident of France or the French empire may be made only in Canadian dollars or French francs.
- (2) Where payments are made in French francs, these francs must be obtained through the Foreign Exchange Control Board. In other words they cannot be acquired in a third country.
- (3) The Foreign Exchange Control Board will fix an official rate for French francs.

The foreign exchange control board may be expected to acquire French francs as a result of payments by residents of France or the French empire to residents of Canada. The agreement provides that these francs cannot be sold in, or used for payments to, a third country. Any net accumulation of French francs by the foreign exchange control board under the agreement will be guaranteed against depreciation of that currency and a similar guarantee is given to France against depreciation of the Canadian dollar. The agreement also provides that the foreign exchange control board will, within certain defined limits, authorize the orderly liquidation in Canada of Canadian securities now owned by residents of France.

REPATRIATION OF CANADIAN SECURITIES HELD IN FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the government any estimate as to the extent of the securities now held in France which may be repatriated in Canada? I think that is rather an important matter upon which the house should receive some information.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of Finance): I think probably the house would be more interested in the amount which is to be repatriated, but at the moment I think I can only say that, as has been indicated, it is to be an orderly repatriation of so much within a certain period. I should prefer not to give the amount. As a matter of fact we have a very general estimate of the amount of Canadian securities held in France. My hon. friend can understand that under present conditions it is difficult to get anything that is at all accurate.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to say that in my opinion the minister is absolutely right and that the amount should not be divulged. It is private business.

MARKETING OF WHEAT

CEREALS IMPORT COMMITTEE—WHEAT BOARD
ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Mac-Kinnon) inform the house who is acting in Canada for the cereals import committee of the United Kingdom? Would he also tell the house whether James R. Murray of Winnipeg has been acting in any advisory capacity to the wheat board or to the government? While he is on his feet he might also tell the house whether he proposes to appoint the advisory committee to the wheat board which was definitely promised during the campaign by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and by the minister's predecessor, Hon. Mr. Euler.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think I could answer the various questions just asked by the hon. member, but perhaps it would be better to give a prepared answer. Therefore I shall take this as a notice of question and reply at a later date.

VOLUNTEER CIVIL GUARDS

QUESTION AS TO SUPERVISION OR CONTROL BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): During the last week or ten days Toronto newspapers have been reporting the formation in various Ontario municipalities of units known as volunteer civil guards. Will the minister inform the house whether he has knowledge of such an organization and, if so, whether his department has any connection with it or supervision or control over it?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of National Defence): The only guards for which the Department of National Defence has assumed responsibility at the present time are the units of the veterans home guard, as announced in this house some time ago. In addition, there will be reserve companies of veterans which will be attached to the nonpermanent active militia units for training purposes, but I think it is a well-established principle that the Department of National Defence can assume responsibility only for such units as are under military discipline and administration. The other organizations to which my hon. friend refers are entirely voluntary. The question as to whether they can be utilized for purposes of home defence is a matter that is receiving consideration at the present time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Thursday, June 6, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Fournier (Hull), in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupation, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. BROOKS: Last night when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing this resolution, and had referred particularly to appendix "C" of the Hereford report, respecting statistics of training and enrolment of trainees for the national forestry programme. I had pointed out that of the total of 309 trainees enrolled in New Brunswick, eighty had found employment. I was going on to say that the cost of training in that province had totalled $38,525, which, to me, seemed out of all proportion to the benefits which had been derived. I had also pointed out the unfair methods of selection for enrolment in this, and I believe in every other scheme which had been carried out by the New Brunswick government.

I do not wish to dwell at greater length on this matter, but I would recommend to the Minister of Labour that if any further relief is necessary, or if money is voted for relief projects in New Brunswick, the federal government, and particularly the department over which the minister presides, should exercise more care in respect to any expenditures which may be made in that province. I would recommend that he see to it that moneys are more equitably distributed among those who are in need. In my opinion this could be done through the federal government, or possibly through the municipalities. From what I have seen of the Minister of Labour since he took office, and in fact during the whole of the last five years, I have great faith in his fairness in the administration of his department. I believe the people of New Brunswick would have more faith in the distribution of these moneys by the federal department of labour than in any distribution which might be made by local governments.

Last night I spoke respecting contracts which have been let throughout Canada. I am sorry the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not in his seat at the moment, but in his absence may I commend his department, or whoever has been responsible for the release, through the office of the director of public information, of the document I have in my hand. It indicates to me, as it must to people throughout Canada, that there is now action in the Department of Munitions and Supply.

But there is one thing absent from the report, and that is any indication of great activity in the province from which I come. The release is thirty pages in length, and looking through those thirty pages, although I find details respecting the expenditure of many millions of dollars-in one week the amount was something like $15,000,000, and it is indicated in the press that something over $1,250,000 is being spent daily—the only amount over $5,000 I can find as having been spent in New Brunswick is an item of $8,577.21 in connection with a shipbuilding contract given to the St. John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company of St. John. The other day when I mentioned this matter the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated that he was interested in getting results and getting them quickly. With that attitude I heartily agree. But it does occur to me, as I am sure it must to many other persons, that possibly because the city of Ottawa is in Ontario and closely adjoins Quebec, and because the industrial centres of Toronto and Montreal have easy access to departments at Ottawa, some preference may be given to those larger centres, with the result that outlying districts are overlooked.

I do not wish the Minister of Munitions and Supply in any way to impair his war activities, but I would ask him to consider carefully the possibility of giving equal opportunities to all sections of the country in the providing of munitions of war and necessary equipment: As I said yesterday, all parts of Canada are given equal opportunity to provide soldiers, and we should all be given equal opportunity to provide munitions and equipment. I believe action along that line would tend to bring about in greater degree that unity in Canada of which we have heard so much in the last few years.

With regard to unity, I would say that in listening to the debates which have taken place in the house during the last four or five years it has occurred to me not once, but time and again, that this so-called unity of Canada has been stressed to the detriment of that greater unity—the unity of the British empire. The results of the last election have been held up to us as proof that Canada is a united country. I am not so sure of that, nor do I believe that the people of Canada are so sure of it to-day. Unity in a country is not judged by the froth of an election. Public opinion can be changed, and does change very quickly, not only in Canada but in every other country. Governments come and go. But there is something deeper than all this: it is the unity which springs from the mutual suffering and sacrifice of a people, a sacrifice borne equally by all men and women, no matter in what part of the country they may live, no matter what their political affiliations, no matter what their race or creed. The only real test of unity in this country is that every citizen of Canada, every man and every woman from the Atlantic or the Pacific, should bear his or her full share of the burden in the terrible stress under which Canada is now labouring.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): When in the light of this resolution one considers the untold misery and suffering which a large proportion of the people of Canada have gone through in the last ten years he contemplates a situation sufficiently grave to cause him to weep. For ten long years the people of this great and potentially wealthy country have been crying out for bread, and here, in this resolution, they have another stone.

If we lived as long as Methuselah there might be some justification for our exercising a little patience in waiting for the vanishing of poverty from our country. But since our life span is placed at a mere threescore years and ten it behooves us to make the most of every minute that we live. Those who have administered the affairs of this country for the last ten years are supposed to be of the same flesh and blood as the suffering multitudes of Canada, but when I look at the resolution before us I have a hard time convincing myself that such is the fact.

In view of the conditions obtaining in Canada to-day the resolution now before us is child's play. We are merely playing house when we endeavour to deal with a condition of unemployment and agricultural distress in the manner provided in the resolution. We ought to act as grown-up men and do really big things, rather than play and dillydally with this very urgent question. Poverty should have been banished from this country long ago. I wonder how long the devotees of orthodoxy intend to go on without changing their policy? Are we going to wait until infuriated and indignant people storm the doors of this parliament? How long are the common people to wait for poverty to be banished from this country?

I should like to advance this afternoon as briefly as I can two reasons for my belief that an orthodox government, be it Liberal or Conservative or what have you, can never deal effectively with the unemployment This resolution implies that situation. unemployment is not a permanent condition. I submit that there is every evidence that the condition of unemployment, the condition of being freed from nature forced labour is here to stay. The man hours required to produce any article are steadily decreasing. Those who support orthodox governments are attempting the mathematically impossible in trying to solve this problem. This is my first reason for believing that any orthodox government will never be able to deal effectively with this condition of unemployment. The rules, regulations and laws which have been enacted permit an individual, a company or a corporation to set up machines which take the place and do the work of anywhere from 100 to 1,000 men.

On the one hand orthodoxy is saying to the people: we shall put you out of work, we shall put in a machine which will do away with the necessity of human effort. On the other hand, orthodoxy is saying: you must work, we shall put you to work. It is an impossible task to put people to work when you are putting them out of work at a much faster rate. The substitution of machines for man-power, our technological advancement, is one phase of our unemployment problem which is not given sufficient attention. It is the most important factor which must be taken into consideration when dealing with unemployment.

I should like to place a few statistics on the record to indicate to those who say that we must put our people to work the extent of the task with which they are confronted. Anyone who has made the slightest investigation of technological advancement in industry will realize that the number of man hours used in industry is gradually on the decline. The number of man hours required to produce a unit of production is constantly decreasing; thus we have increasing hours of unemployment. I have a few figures to indicate the extent to which this has taken place in industry. No doubt this change will continue to take place to an even greater extent in the future.

The figures I have refer to United States industry. Unfortunately we have little in the way of statistics in connection with Canadian industry and must rely upon United States statistics. But the conditions in the two countries are parallel; what is true of United States industry is equally true of Canadian industry. The war is consuming tremendous amounts of iron and steel, so that statistics in connection with that industry will be in order. For those who contend that there are plenty of jobs available this information should be interesting. Most of the figures I am about to give are taken from a publication entitled "Technological Trends and National Policy," published by the national resources committee of the United States in June, 1937.

We are told that a hundred years ago one man could produce only twenty-five tons of pig iron in a year. To-day, with increased efficiency and a greater use of machinery, one man is able to produce 100,000 tons in a year. How are we going to find jobs for people in the iron and steel industry? We are informed also that to-day the iron and steel industry uses one ton of coal to carry on the operations that required three tons of coal only a few years ago. This means that more coal miners are being put out of work because of this advancement in production methods. A bolt making machine operated by one man and one boy can now do the work which previously required 6,000 men. This means a saving in wages of $85,000 per week. What are the putters-to-work going to do in the face of a situation like that?

In the automobile industry it took 250 men in 1930 to finish 100 automobile blocks; in 1935, nineteen men could do the same work in the same time-in a period of five years the number of men required for this operation decreased from 250 to 19. We are informed that the production in the Chevrolet foundry in Saginaw increased 290 per cent in ten years, while 13,872 men were eliminated. These figures indicate that required hours of labour are definitely on the decrease while the rate of production is steadily on the increase. One man with an acetylene torch for cutting steel can do work in one half hour which previously took thirty hours. A welding machine employing three men does the work which previously required 18. Examples such as these in the iron industry can be multiplied ad infinitum. I am putting on record just a few to indicate the principle involved.

Here are some figures in connection with coal production. How are we to put our miners to work when we are confronted with such a situation as this? A century ago twelve man hours were required to produce a ton of coal; to-day the same quantity can be produced in 1·33 man hours. Surface mining requires only a half man hour per ton. Under these circumstances where are we to find opportunities of work for our miners?

In these days we hear a good deal about the Red Cross. The women folk knit socks and other garments for the boys at the front. It is a worthy occupation and a patriotic one. But we are informed that to-day one knitting machine can make three million loops in the same time that the human hand can make three hundred. If our objective is to obtain socks and sweaters and whatever else is required in the way of knitted goods with the least possible effort and in the shortest possible time, the use of machines for this purpose would be far more economical.

As regards the electrical industry, we learn that in the past it required 710 men to make 40,000 electric light bulbs in one hour: to-day one man with a machine can produce the same number in the same time.

Figures in connection with agriculture are just as startling. I have not very many here. An outstanding example is the mechanical cotton picker. We in Canada are not directly concerned with cotton-picking, but I mention this machine to indicate what is going on in the agricultural world. The Rust Brothers' mechanical cotton picker does the work of 300 men, and we are informed that it is possible to manufacture one complete machine in nine minutes. That means that if these machines were produced continuously, 300 cotton pickers would be deprived of jobs every nine minutes.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I wish to lodge an objection to any discouragement of the women of Canada knitting socks for the boys at the front. It is common knowledge that the socks knitted by the women of Canada are retained by these boys, and washed, and washed again, because of the greater comfort in wearing them as contrasted with machine-made socks.

Mr. KUHL: I am sure the hon. member knows right well that there was no imputation or suggestion on my part that the women folk should be discouraged from doing this work. The hon. gentlemen is merely trying to make political capital. All I am endeavouring to indicate is what those who support orthodox policies, including the hon. member who has just spoken, are confronted with when they try to put people to work.

Just a few miscellaneous references to some small machines which, nevertheless, produce things which we use every day of our lives, and which have supplanted much of the human effort required in times past to produce these articles. One man with one bottle-making machine replaces 54 men; two men with one coal conveyor displace 50 men; one man with a glass-making machine replaces 20 men; one man with a cigarette-making machine replaces 100 men; one excavating machine does the work of 15,000 men. In 1901 one man could print a thousand letterheads in an hour; to-day one man can print 20,000 in the same time.

The principle of decreasing man hours per unit of production applies not only in the substitution of machines for physical effort, but in respect of work which requires mental effort. A bank clerk operating an automatic reckoner deals in an hour with 60,000 entries and displaces sixty other employees. One could multiply examples of this nature.

I have spoken of some of the devices which are in use at the present time. What would be the condition if industry were using those other inventions which have been acquired by monopolies and shelved because to utilize them would reduce profits? How many man hours would really be required to-day under those circumstances to produce our standard of living or a much higher standard? I venture to suggest that we should be very much astonished at the limited number of man hours which would be sufficient to provide us with the highest possible standard of living.

Figures in connection with power production are startling. Electrical power is one of the biggest agencies displacing human effort. A single turbine working twenty-four hours a day produces the equivalent of 9,000,000 manpower. Here are some figures of production in 1929:

	Horse-power (millions)
Great Britain	 175	1,750
U.S.A	 704	7,040
Germany	 175	1,750
France	 70	700
Total	 1,124	11,240

To divide that man power, produced in electrical energy, equally among the two thousand millions of people in the world would provide approximately five mechanical power slaves for each man, woman and child. If we limit it to the countries named, it provides approximately forty mechanical slaves for every British citizen and approximately fifty for every United States citizen. Why all this talk about being obliged to keep our noses to the grindstone, seeing that we have approximately fifty mechanical slaves at our beck and call if we wish to employ And this applies only to existing production. How many more mechanical slaves would be available for the population of Canada as well as for every other country if advantage were taken of all the water power and the electrical energy that could be created?

To indicate the sum-total effect on our national economy I wish to put on record a table showing exactly what has happened in the major industries in the matter of employment—the number of man hours required for the output, and the output per man power. These statistics have reference to American industry, but the conditions that prevail there are largely those that prevail in Canada, so that our situation here is pretty well reflected in the tabulation. This is a comparison of two years, 1919 and 1936, and the index figure for the year 1929 is taken as 100. First I will give the figures of the percentage of [Mr. Kuhl.]

employment for the two years 1919 and 1936. The figures are as follows for the industries named:

Industry	1919	1936
Agriculture	178	78
Boots and shoes	104	97
Sugar refining	130	93
Chemicals	110	113
Cotton goods		93
Fertilizers	128	78
Iron and steel	100	103
Leather manufacturing	145	103
Pulp and paper	90 136	10,1 115
Cigarettes	130	119

Next we have a comparison of the number of man hours required in the total production in each of these industries in the years 1919 and 1936. The number of man hours is considerably less in 1936 than it was in 1919:

Industry	1919	1936
Agriculture		62
Boots and shoes		80
Sugar refining		60
Chemicals		90 73
Cotton goods		62
Fertilizers		78
Iron and steel Leather manufacturing		87
Pulp and paper		88
Cigarettes		95

The most important part of this table is the output per man power, and again the comparison is between 1919 and 1936.

T 1 1	1919	1936
Industry
Agriculture	58	119
Boots and shoes	83	139
Sugar refining	65	140
Chemicals	45	138
Cotton goods	86	131
Fertilizers	70	123
Iron and steel	50	113
Leather manufacturing	71	128
Pulp and paper		121
Cigarettes	31	135
Cigarettes	9.1	100

Another interesting comparison gives four figures in connection with the total number of man hours required to produce the total output of the United States. The total man hours required for total output in that country were, for the years indicated:

Years					man hours
1919	 	 	 	28.17	billions
1929	 	 	 	22.74	**
1935				14.78	66
1938 (11.00	66

It will be seen that there was a drop from 28·17 billion in 1919 to less than 11 billion in 1938. That is a decrease of 68 per cent in total man hours required for the total production of the United States. At the same time as the man hours were being reduced the rate of production was increasing. Taking 1919 as 100, it was 160 per cent in 1929, though it went down to 121 per cent in 1935.

Figures of this kind can be multiplied indefinitely to show that it is mathematically impossible to put people to work under such conditions. I stated at the beginning of my remarks that I would advance two reasons for the belief that those who support orthodox methods will never be able to deal effectively with the unemployment situation. As the second reason for the statement that orthodoxy is unable to deal effectively with the condition I suggest that the orthodox economists base all their proposals on a false premise, namely, that the economic system exists to provide jobs. I submit that the economic system does not exist to provide jobs. What orthodoxy is trying to do, as I have already pointed out, is to put people out of work on the one hand and on the other to put others to work at the same time. In my opinion they can be justifiably accused of very gross inconsistency. If the object of the system is to provide jobs, let us do away with the machines which are doing the work. But orthodoxy says no. Well, you cannot have the machine and the jobs at the same time. You cannot eat your cake and have it as well. If we are to have the machine we must submit to unemployment and if we want jobs we must do away with the machinery and put everyone to work by the pick and shovel method.

The only commonsense objective of an economic system is to provide the maximum amount of goods and services with the minimum amount of work and trouble. Work as we ordinarily describe it is not an object but merely a means to an end, and that end is to produce an abundance. Man was created with intelligence and he has been using his intelligence to free himself from drudgery and to provide himself with more leisure. To suggest that man's activities should be summed up in the words "sleep, eat and work" is to suggest that he should live according to the standards of the animal kingdom. Man is worthy of a far nobler objective than merely to eat, sleep and work. Unemployment should not be looked upon as an evil, it should be a welcome thing. It is misnamed; it should be described as leisure. Leisure is not a loafer's paradise; it is something which everyone strives for at some time in his life. Why do men in their youth and in their prime exert themselves to set aside all the purchasing power they can for their later years? Simply that they may have leisure-not a time in which they will loaf and bask in the sunshine but a time in which they can resort to voluntary activity, to cultural pursuits, music, art, literature, science, physical culture, all those phases of cultural activity in which people engage because they love to. All our citizens are entitled to leisure, but to be leisure it must be accompanied by security. What we need to-day is a more equitable division of the hours of labour and the hours of leisure, so that those who are obliged to render service are not exhausted at the end of the day's work, and those who have nothing but leisure are not demoralized.

The real problem that faces us is not one of finding jobs. I am quite prepared to concede that in time of war we must do everything possible to provide all the human energy necessary. But it is becoming apparent that, even with to-day's demand for man power, all the man power available is not required by Canada to carry on her part in in this war. We have observed that it is a mechanical war to a much greater degree than any war in the past. The real problem which the government has on its hands is not one of finding jobs, but one of seeing that the hours of labour and the hours of leisure are more equitably distributed so that we all have to do some of the necessary work, and also all have some of the leisure which the modern machine has provided. We ought to plan our system so that the highest possible standard of living shall be attained.

The second problem is that of devising a system of distributing the products of the machine—the abolition of poverty; that is the first job which the government should undertake. In season and out of season we have urged from our part of the house that this cannot be done through industry conducted in the present fashion. By that I mean that industry is not self-liquidating. The product of the machine cannot be distributed through the income which is received by those who take part in industrial activity. To-day there is far more generated in the way of prices than there is in income, and the difference can be met only by subsidizing the consumer to the extent of the difference between total income and total prices.

I observe that in the estimates the appropriation for public works for the coming year is reduced by around $17,000,000. If Canada's participation in the war requires the labour of people who would otherwise be working on public works and other public enterprises, then by all means we must see that their services are directed into Canada's war effort. But if their services are not required in that effort then I see no reason why we cannot carry on a public works programme as well as fight this war effectively. The only limit that there should be to doing anything in this country is the man hours and the materials available. The same idea applies to work in the parks, parks beautification, reforestation and other national projects; there is no reason why these activities should be contracted in time of war if we have the materials and the man power available to carry them on. So far as these are required for carrying on the war let the other activities be discontinued, but otherwise why allow our people to perish for the want of something to do?

to perish for the want of something to do? The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) sarcastically suggested that we are advocating utopia. I find that the dictionary defines "utopia" as a state of perfection. We are not advocating a state of perfection; we simply say that whatever is physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible; that if the people of this country can furnish the man hours and the materials to provide a high standard of living, they should have it, and no man and no government should stand in their way.

One concluding word in regard to dealing with agricultural distress.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. I regret to have to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. KUHL: If the committee will bear with me for just two minutes I will conclude.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. KUHL: With regard to agricultural distress, I feel—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): The hon. gentleman may not proceed unless he has the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think we had better let the hon. member conclude; otherwise he can sit down and then start all over again.

Mr. KUHL: Thank you. I will conclude quickly. I feel that there is a tendency on the part of some hon. members at least to look upon the aid which is given to agriculture as not being deserved by the agriculturists, as a handout, and to look upon agriculturists as objects of charity. That is not a right attitude. Any assistance given to agriculture is justly deserved. I consider it a primary duty of a government to do for its people what they cannot do for themselves. When any section of society cannot solve its problems for itself it is the duty of government on every occasion to step in and assist them in solving their problems. Otherwise what is the object of a government? I see no other purpose in having a government. That is what governments are for.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the government as well as my Conservative friends abandon their orthodox ideas in [Mr. Kuhl.] endeavouring to solve our national problems and subscribe instead to policies which will really bring about the desired results. It is high time that the devotees of orthodoxy shelve their ideas in the museum of natural history, where they should have been placed a long time ago. Systems were made for men, not men for systems. Let us admit, as surely conditions have forced us to admit, that the old system can no longer deal effectively with our problems. Let us be frank about it, and let us change our system so that man may be permitted to live instead of merely exist.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): In dealing with this resolution concerning unemployment relief, it is not my intention to thresh old straw or to discuss whether or not previous bills founded on similar resolutions were sucessful. We have been told by various hon, members that the results achieved under previous bills were largely if not wholly unsatisfactory, but that is water which has passed through the mill. In my judgment we should be looking forward now and realizing the conditions that this country and the empire are facing. It is my intention to endeavour to suggest something that may be of help to the minister either in framing the bill, if it is not already framed, or in amending the bill at a later time. I think that is my duty. What is past is gone; and I am thoroughly convinced that if Canada and the empire lose this war, it will not make a bit of difference what we say or do here, as far as the future of this country is concerned; it will be a blackout for Canada and for the empire. I have no thought that such will be the case, but we should get on with the business covered by this resolution. There is yet time; the situation is not yet lost, and if we rise to the occasion we can materially assist in doing what in my judgment is the most important thing to be done to-day; that is, to rally this country to the fullest possible extent to assist in winning

In my opinion four things are required to win the war. Of these the first is food, the discussion of which I shall leave to those better acquainted with the production of food. The other three are men, money and munitions, and it is the last item with which I propose to deal, particularly the part of the resolution which reads:

. . . establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations . . .

I have in mind what the Prime Minister of Great Britain said a few days ago in his masterly, epic speech in regard to the retreat from Flanders, perhaps the greatest and most glorious retreat in the history of the world. Before concluding his remarks, Mr. Churchill said that the British empire and France would not be defeated; that though Great Britain had to fight the battle alone, and even though Great Britain herself were overrun, the battle would be carried on from the parts of the British empire outside the old country itself, until victory was achieved. That is the bulldog spirit and, as a Britisher from the soles of my feet to the crown of my head, I am convinced that this empire and France will win. As a Canadian I want to do all I can to help win the war, and I want to try to help the minister.

A great deal has been said about Canadian plants and factories. A large part of my life, perhaps twenty-five years of it, was spent in factories. I know, or I should know, something about factories; I have served in them all the way through, from the bottom to the top. To-day Canadian industry can do a great deal more than it is doing. If Canadian industry were operating to capacity, which it is not, it could do infinitely more. But if attempted to reach Canadian industry capacity, I do not believe we would have enough trained men in the country to take care of the plants and equipment. Even with Canadian industry up to its capacity, this would not be sufficient; we must go a great deal further. We must have a great deal more industrial activity if we are to do what is expected of us; that is, rally all our resources to help win this war.

Three years ago I made a fairly thorough survey of industry in Great Britain. At that time, as hon. members will remember, Great Britain had commenced to rearm; but, in common with Canada and the United States, they had been through a severe depression that lasted for several years. Many men who had been expert mechanics at fifty-five years of age reached sixty-five before they again had an opportunity to resume their labours. In the interim they lost a great deal of their finesse and expertness in production. Youth, for the same reason, had not had an opportunity of learning trades for a number of years. The same situation existed in Canada and the United States; but when Great Britain came face to face with the necessity for getting busy and producing for her own defence, what did she do? During that time I surveyed many great factories and many industrial areas in the old land, and what did I find? I found that every available expert mechanic in England was employed. I found great efforts being made to rehabilitate mechanics expert in some of the hundred and one lines of trade that go into the production of war equipment. I found that they had established vestibule schools adjacent to their plants for the rehabilitation of those men who had lost their finesse.

Mr. McLARTY: I find my hon. friend's remarks extremely helpful, and I should like to ask a question. Were those schools established by the industries themselves, or were they under government supervision?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am just coming to that. I stated that a number of industries had established, adjacent to their plants, vestibule or rehabilitation schools in which former mechanics were retrained and youths given an opportunity to learn. My recollection is that the government of the old country assisted financially, to a considerable extent, in the setting up and operation of those schools. I well remember reading the Manchester Guardian one day while I was surveying, I believe, the great John Brown steel works in Sheffield. That newspaper had six pages, of six or eight columns each, closely printed, of want ads. Each one pertained to mechanics of one kind or another. Those papers came to Canada and the United States, and to the best of the information I could obtain in England, subsequently, after I returned home, in Canada, and on a later trip to Washington, some 25,000 expert mechanics left America to work in British industrial plants. Many of those mechanics were former Englishmen, Scotchmen or Irishmen, who probably welcomed the opportunity to return home.

The British government then passed a measure to speed up the training of youth. The age of employment went down to fourteen years. I am not going to discuss whether it should or should not have gone down to that point; that is not a question with which I am faced. They were confronted with a great problem and they set out to accomplish what had to be done, and to win what they had in view.

If my memory is correct, they paid one-half the cost of training youth. I believe that, during the past two or three years, to a great extent Great Britain has overcome the lack of trained mechanics in that country, and is to-day producing beyond the greatest possible hopes of the government or the producers in England, three years ago.

Mr. McLARTY: Was the other half paid by industry?

Mr. MacNICOL: The British government paid half the cost of training.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; I understand that. I am asking if the other half was paid by industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. The British government looked upon their contribution—and in this I stand subject to correction, because what I am relating goes back to a time three years ago—as one which otherwise they would have had to give to the unemployed in relief payments.

On returning to Canada I made a thorough survey of industry in which I believe I covered some two hundred plants reaching all the way from the maritimes to Winnipeg. I did not go west of that city. I found that Canadian industry had not yet been seized of the necessity to do what was being done in England. In the United States, however, I found a determination to place themselves in a position to withstand any attack which might be made upon them. Finding themselves in much the same position as that in which England had been some three years ago, what measures were taken by people in the United States?

These measures I am now going to try to present to the minister as clearly as I can in the hope that if there is anything concrete in my suggestions, they may be used in the great task he has in hand. Three or more years ago—up to three years ago it had been developed fairly well—Civilian Conservation Corps camps were in operation in the United States. Their development was not so much for the purpose of rehabilitating industry as it was an effort to save their youth. The youth among the unemployed constituted a great number of those who were affected.

It was my good fortune to visit many of the CCC camps. I shall not detail what I found, more than to give some idea of the basis upon which the camps were organized. Who were taken into those camps? Something was said last night by an hon. member sitting to my left about the retraining of youth, the moral development of youth and matters of that kind. All that was considered in the CCC camps.

I have before me a booklet which deals particularly with the subject of eligibility for enrolment, and which I obtained on my last trip to Washington. It states:

Eligibility for enrolment in the corps for junior enrollees was confined to unmarried male citizens of the United States between the ages of seventeen and twenty-three, both inclusive, who are unemployed and in need of employment, and who are willing to allot $22 per month of their $30 cash allowance to dependants. Single unattached young men without dependants are eligible under the new law to be selected and enrolled in the corps. This group is given permission to deposit, subject to later repayment, $22 per month in lieu of allotment to dependants.

Some of course had lost parents; their parents were either dead or not capable of [Mr. McLarty.]

being located, and to those was allowed the privilege of saving $22 per month. Slightly more than three per cent of enrolments in a year were in that category.

In 1938 there were 270,000 young men in camps situated throughout the forty-nine states of the union. Those young men were trained. I spent many hours in their camps, both in the daytime and during the night. At night they attended camp schools, where they obtained excellent training and education.

Another short paragraph in the book I have before me would, I believe, be worth reading. It refers to the functions of personnel and teaching staff, and is in these words:

1. To plan, supervise, and direct the work of enrollees on work projects.

2. To teach enrollees desirable work practices, living habits, citizenship and to minimize educational deficiencies through planned general instruction and vocational instruction.

3. To assure a vigorous, healthful and helpful life for enrollees while they are in the Civilian Conservation Corps and to provide a physical, mental, and moral background of life in the corps which will aid the enrollee when he leaves.

Someone to my left last night mentioned something along these lines. That is excellent training for youth. Then, in addition to what I have already stated, in their night schools they are taught anything that might be valuable and worthwhile in life. There is education along many lines, and those educational activities are interspersed with amusements of one kind or another.

So effective and efficient has been the training in the CCC camps that a great demand has arisen throughout industry in the United States to engage those who have graduated from the camps. That demand has grown to the extent that, in 1938, 50,000 of the 270,000 graduated from CCC camps into industry. They were sought after, because they had received a good training.

That is what many young people want. They require discipline and order, and with that they can be taught something worth while. From the beginning which had been made in England, the authorities in the United States broadened out. I visited a number of schools connected with factories and schools set up under legislation passed in Washington. The reason for development along these lines is given in the following words, contained in a pamphlet issued by the United States Department of Labour:

Our modern high-powered machinery demands highly skilled craftsman as well as semi-skilled or unskilled machine tenders. Our modern houses need skilled plumbers, steamfitters, carpenters, and other building tradesmen; the manufacture of our automobiles calls for high-grade precision work. There must be skilled craftsmen in many trades—craftsmen who have learned what they can about the trade in school and who have learned the practical end of the trade by working for years in the shop as an apprentice, side by side with a journeyman or a master craftsman. They must possess more skill than did the workers of earlier times; they must understand the new processes and new materials as well as the technical phases of their trades. The trades to-day are keenly aware of the need for craftsmen who have learned the trade by way of a long and thorough apprenticeship.

A few weeks ago I received from the Department of Labour at Washington a letter in reply to a question I had asked as to whether I could go to see some of the later or more modern schools in operation. They directed me to go to the minister's neighbouring city, the great city of Detroit. I visited a number of schools there, one of which was called the "building trades school." A total of 541 young men were being trained there, although not all at the same time. They are sent to the school by their employers to perfect themselves in their trades.

Mr. McLARTY: I presume that is similar to the mechanics class in Galt?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am coming to that; if I have time, I shall cover that quite thoroughly. I visited this "building trades school" and was delighted with the work being done. Each young man attends the school for four hours a week at his employer's expense. They are thus able to learn many things which they could not learn on the job. I understand the cost of the school was financed by the state of Michigan to the extent of 25 per cent and by the department of labour at Washington to the extent of 75 per cent. It may have been fifty-fifty between the two governments; I have just forgotten. The city of Detroit pays the salary of the chief instructor. The young men were greatly pleased with the training they were receiving in this school. They found they enjoyed their work much more because of the extra technical learning they obtained. They were able to earn better wages at their jobs because of their increased training in theory.

There are a number of fine technical schools in Detroit. We have some good ones here in Canada, and I shall refer to them in a moment. One or two methods of instruction which were being carried on in the schools in Detroit I have not seen in operation in Canada. I think the minister should consider the speeding up of the training of young men who, we hope, will be demanded by industry before very long to help produce those things which will be necessary to win the war. Our whole duty now is the winning of the war. We should put ourselves in a better position to provide the equipment and machines for which England and France are calling. I know Canadians can produce these if they have an opportunity to do so. Unfortunately a number of our Canadians will have to be trained.

How are they doing this on the other side of our boundary? A number of companies in Detroit train two young men to work on the same machine. While one young man is actually at work in the plant, the other is attending a technical school, such as the Wilbur Wright school. These young men are paid only for the time they work in the shop. They are actually on half-time, but otherwise they probably would be unemployed. They work two weeks in the plant and then spend two weeks in the school. I was greatly interested in what the young men were learning under this system. For instance, a man would be working in a plant on the manufacture of gears. It might be aeroplane gears, automobile gears, gun gears or any other kind of gear. In the plant he would be working on the actual machine, but when he went to school he would be making drawings and figuring designs. In the school he was obtaining technical background; in the plant he was increasing his practical knowledge.

I have spent twenty-five years in industry, and I believe that type of training would be a splendid thing to start here in Canada. This work could be carried on under the provisions of this resolution. These men are learning auto-mechanics, which is closely related to aeroplane mechanics. This type of training should be speeded up in this country so that we may be able to send sufficient aeroplanes to blot out the sun over Germany. In any event, we should be sending enough to defeat her. Canadians have proved themselves to be the best fliers in the world. We have wonderful shops and plenty of young men capable of being trained.

I visited another school where young men were being taught everything about the repairing of automobile engines. They were learning everything about the electrical system, carburetors and so on. This work is closely allied to aeroplane engine work. Any one may drive his car into this school and have it repaired free of charge, if he is willing to take a chance on the repair work. The instructor told me that no car has ever come back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: They never came back because they were so well repaired. This instructor inspects every car to see that it is properly repaired. This is the best kind of practical training. The point I am trying to make is that on the other side of the line they are really trying to do something to train their young men to fill these necessary positions. When I am on my way south I often visit Williamsport, a beautiful city on the banks of the Susquehanna. In 1931 a Doctor Parkes decided to devote his life to the training of young men in that city. At first he had only two small basement rooms and one or two machines in which to train young men in mechanics. But he has done a marvellous work. They tell me that during the last nine years some 4,100 young men have been trained in his school, which has grown considerably. I do not know just how it is financed, but the city of Williamsport certainly has benefited from this work.

The minister comes from a great city, one of the greatest industrial cities in Canada. Windsor is perhaps the greatest auto and truck manufacturing city in the dominion. I believe the minister is acquainted with the presidents of many of these companies. I know most of them myself. I doubt if there are better plants anywhere. For years these plants have been engaged in the manufacture of cars and trucks which are sent all over the world. I feel sure that if some time when he was home, the minister called these men together in his office and said, "Gentlemen, I am not speaking for the government"—he could speak for the government if he were asked to-"but I want you to tell me what you can do about building aeroplanes," ' he would get results. I have no doubt that aeroplanes could be produced in that city.

Of course money would be required, but it would be the salvation of this country if whatever amount is needed were voted promptly to erect factories in this country for the production of aircraft. If we lose the war, nothing will matter; we shall be ruled by another nation, and the boundless resources of Canada will be exploited by others. would not be concerned about how much the costs may be in the initial stages, because we necessarily expect to spend money freely at the beginning to induce men to erect plants adjacent to their present factories. We should build a thousand aeroplanes by this time next year. The cost is a secondary consideration; let the government tell the manufacturers, "Go ahead; we will send in our costing clerks to see what it costs to do this work; we will treat you fairly; we will give you consideration and conform to a reasonable profit; but above all we want this empire and France saved." These are the two nations which stand for the things which God would have the world ruled by, and these are the nations which we must help and help quickly. I am convinced that in the minister's own home city and in my home city they could build aeroplane factories and produce the planes required by this country. I know that there are other cities equally capable of such production, but I mention the one from which the minister comes because I know there are large factories there. The young men being trained in one way or another would be ready to take their places in Canada's effort some six months hence.

Another suggestion relates to our technical schools. In Windsor, where the minister comes from; in London, Hamilton and so on, there are fine technical schools, as there are in Toronto, Montreal and other great cities in Canada. I offer the suggestion to the minister that part of the money to be voted under this bill be used to associate the technical schools with our war effort, because the prosecution of the war must come ahead of everything else. Let us concentrate our efforts upon using the technical schools for this object, commencing this summer. teachers are fine competent people. Very likely they would volunteer their services; I do not know that I would ask them to do so, but for some reasonable consideration I am sure that teachers throughout the country would be willing to devote time this summer to the technical training of our young men. Nor would I ask the young men to work for nothing. We should offer them some consideration if they will go to those schools and learn, and many of them will spend two or three months this summer in training, and perhaps graduate into the plants which, I hope, by that time will be crying out for partly trained employees. I believe that something could be done in that regard.

There is much more about which one could speak, so many things which one could suggest. I have in mind our great coal problem, but I am not going to elaborate upon that. I have already pleaded for a national coal policy for this country, which would, I am sure, give employment to thousands of men.

Somebody spoke to-day about iron. I was formerly associated for many years with the iron and steel business. I know there is plenty of iron in Canada. I am told that deposits lately discovered in northern Ontario are equal to anything produced in the Mesaba range, Iron river and other centres in Minnesota and Wisconsin. Time will not permit me to enlarge on these matters, but I may do so later.

If I may address myself to the minister, I would say that he has experience. He has been associated one way and another with all the big plants around Windsor of which I have been speaking. He has probably had a good deal to do with their legal affairs. He is in contact with them; he knows what they can do. I suggest that in connection with this legislation he give serious consideration to the erection as quickly as possible of aeroplane plants and the building of aeroplanes in this country, first, because it will help to win the war; second, because it will provide wonderful training for numbers of our young men.

Finally, I would urge that we do something about the production of tanks. The other day I was talking to a big steel man-I know most of them-and I said, "You can build tanks?" He said, "You know I can build tanks. Give me the orders and I will build them." Except perhaps some of the best equipment now being produced in Europe, there is nothing pertaining to the production of tanks which cannot be done in Canada. Let us get started. They had to start over there. After all, it will be some time before enemy tanks could attack us in this dominion, and perhaps by that time we shall have perfected the manufacture of these weapons. The necessary steel could be rolled here. Years ago we used to manufacture numbers of tractors. The underequipment can be made in the minister's own city as well as at Oshawa, Toronto, and other places where trucks and motorcar equipment is being made. The same thing applies to guns and to shells.

I have been told that no better shell lathes are manufactured anywhere than are being made not far from where I live. Two or three years ago I was in England on a trip with the producer of some of these shellmaking machines. He is a marvellous man. Somebody said something yesterday about conscripting industry. Well, you cannot conscript all brains. This man who turned out these great lathes would lie awake at nights for weeks and weeks figuring out the relationship of one part to another part of the machine. In the morning he would put down his conclusions on paper. Finally he produced a wonderful shell-making lathe, which, I am told, turns shells out as fast as any lathe in the world. He has already supplied the British government with a large number of these lathes for use in making shells in Great Britain; some have gone to South Africa, some to Australia. But he paid a heavy price for all that hard thinking night after night. His health broke down. After a long siege of ill health he recovered, thank God. He would be too valuable a man for this country to lose, particularly at this juncture when men able to turn out equipment of this kind are so urgently needed.

With regard to returns to the manufacturer, the government can regulate what profits any company shall make. I do not think that is the big question just now. The main consideration at this time is to turn out the stuff which will help us to win the war, because if we lose the war we lose everything-your home, my home, everybody's home and everything which has been handed down to us through the work of generation after generation. We must win the war. The minister has under this measure a golden opportunity to rehabilitate the youth of this country, who, I hope and believe, can be utilized before long in the directions I have suggested-in tank plants, aeroplane plants, gun plants, plants manufacturing the classes of material for which our heroes over there are crying cut to-day. What did they plead for most strongly when they returned to England? "Give us shells, give us planes, and we will trim them to a frazzle." But they cannot win with their bare hands; they cannot go up to the front line without weapons against steel and iron. They must have the equipment, and Canada, thank God, can make it.

If I have said a thing which will help, I shall feel that I have done my duty. I have no criticism to offer. This is not a time for criticism; this is the time to act, if we are going to win, and that should be our objective.

RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I do not intend to follow my hon. friend (Mr. MacNicol) along the various lines of his address, which I think every one will agree was a most informative one. I say that for two or three reasons, the first being that only a few days ago I suggested that speeches should be brief. I am going to try to follow my own advice. I am rather in the position of a man out on a limb of a tree, who has to be careful, in sawing off a part of the limb, not to saw himself off. In the hon, gentleman's speech there was one remark to which I should like to refer. He told of the work that students were doing in garages; they were put to work on any car. The idea is not an entirely new one; indeed it has been tried out in Ottawa. I am sure there is in this city a garage where this is being done. I left my car there about ten days ago and I began to drive it again last night. The students had been working on it. The same plan has been followed in certain barber shops where students are allowed to work on customers. A small fee is charged; there is an advertisement offering a cent or two cents for every time a customer is cut, and it is a common thing for people to come out of these places with the shop owing them Some of these ideas are doubleedged in their application.

With regard to the resolution before us, I do not think anyone can hide from himself the astounding unemployment figures that confront us, and the almost disheartening story they tell. I do not propose to go over the figures in detail because that has been done, but the problem may be stated briefly. There were 540,000 persons in September and 768,500 in March not gainfully employed and needing assistance in one way or another. Of course, March is perhaps the worst time of the year. In my city the nadir with regard to employment is reached in February, but the lowest spot throughout Canada is usually in the month of March. These figures are roughly divisible into urban and rural relief, and, strictly speaking, the unemployment problem is urban. Then we have heads of families with those dependent upon them, and there are also the individual cases, single men and women, not a very large number. The unfortunate thing is that in every one of these classes the increase in unemployment seems to be about the same over a period of time. Perhaps the unemployment problem as such is to be noted by the number of heads of families and, if I may put it in that way, the urban heads of families unemployed. These figures are not nearly so great as the ones I first mentioned. They run from 107,500 to 138,500 in September and March respectively. These are the main body of the unemployment problem, because upon them are dependent something like half a million or two-thirds of a million people.

Some one has said that this is all the more serious in view of the fact that over this period of time about 100,000 persons have been enlisting, going out of gainful employment or, at any rate, leaving the list of the unemployed. There is something to be said against that. If we examine the trade figures for the same period, we have had an upsetting experience in connection with trade and industry as a whole. There was a tendency for employment to increase owing to the war, but there has been a counter tendency for employment to decrease owing to the dislocation of trade and the paralyzing of some industries. Every one is agreed, however, that the situation is most serious.

It is incongruous, it seems to me, that over this same period the employment figures have steadily gone up. The minister will declare that to be so. I do not know whether we are at the absolute peak of persons employed, but the employment figure is and has been very high over this whole period. It seems to make the problem all the more baffling.

My only reason for rising now was to make this suggestion. I have in my pocket no cure for the situation, but I do regret that it is [Mr. Maybank.] to be treated according to precedent. I should like to see constantly some striving for a change in the handling of the problem. It does not seem to me that unemployment relief can be satisfactorily dealt with year after year by the same method of simply supplying fodder. We must strive to find some new method of handling the problem, some new means of combating the evil that we have in this country.

One idea that has occurred to me for some time-and I have been close to the unemployment problem—might be expressed in this way. I think it would be well if this government and, indeed, all governments in the dominion were to adopt the policy of nothing for nothing. I do not believe in this method we have been following of handing out a dole. I do not believe in giving something for nothing. In an emergency it may be necessary, but as a regular policy neither this nor any municipal or provincial government should ever simply hand out something day after day, month after month, year after year, to keep people alive. It is really a ruinous procedure. I do not believe that the government can promptly put every one to work. I am not suggesting that; it is utterly impossible. I believe, however, that if we were to adopt a policy along the line I have suggested, we would be making an advance, and in following the system of requiring something in return for that which is given, we would be putting ourselves in a position where we would learn what might be done. We would get some benefit from such a policy and might direct our efforts along different channels. We should give an opportunity to work for what is received, and should require work in return. Of course I know the government cannot put everyone to work at ordinary rates of wages for forty-four hours a week or anything like that.

May I illustrate the sort of thing I have in mind? A certain municipality wanted to build a sewer which would cost $100,000. There were four hundred men on relief, the average relief being $40 a month, in kind of course. The relief bill, therefore, was $16,000 a month. I am adding these figures as I go; they may not be completely accurate; I am telling an actual story although not sticking strictly to the figures, because round figures are easier to handle. As I say, the monthly relief bill for these four hundred men is $16,000. They go to work on the sewer. The total relief saving as a result of that is $60,000, and there is thus $40,000 extra spent. These men who were getting $40 a month on relief are allowed to earn $45 a month, or $5 a month over and above what they were getting on relief. They are paid partly in kind, partly in cash. When the sewer is completed, the result is that the men have worked for what they got and been paid for their work; we have spent more than $100,-000, but we have spent only $40,000 more than the amount we would have had to pay while getting nothing at all in return. I give that illustration as showing in a sketchy and incomplete way the sort of idea I have in mind when I say that the government should adopt a policy of giving nothing for nothing but always requiring something for something. I believe we would be much further ahead if a policy somewhat of that sort were adopted. We could not always carry it out, but if that were our aim we should advance in that direction, because everyone knows that in all matters of life to have an aim is itself a great help towards success.

I do not agree entirely with the sort of proposal I have been making; for example, I do not believe in payment in kind; that is peonage. When men are required to labour at that sort of work, the incentive should be something more than five dollars added to forty dollars; there must be some incentive. But when a plan of that sort is followed, you have at the conclusion, first of all, something for what you have spent rather than being in the position of having wastefully poured money down the drain. In the second place your people have had the benefit of the dignity of labour.

There are many advantages in following some such plan. The first is that which I have already mentioned; you have as a result of the expenditure, something useful. The second advantage is this: I do not believe that a large proportion of persons on relief are shiftless, and expert in the business of getting something for nothing. But there is a considerable number of such persons on relief, and anyone looking at the proposition for a moment will agree that whenever anybody undertakes to give something for nothing, every unworthy person in the community will be first on the job to get it. You also find that this type of person will be the last out of the way. So on relief rolls there is bound to be a considerable number of unworthy people. Those persons are not entitled to any consideration. They ought to be required to work. The decent people of this country have a perfect right to be tough with them; as the saying is, they should work for what they get or they should get off.

The great majority of people upon relief are fine, decent people, just as much so as anyone in this chamber. But they are being forced day after day to live in idleness, having their fodder handed out to them. Nothing can be more degrading. I do not propose to speak any further about damage to morale resulting from relief; there has been much oratory on that and I am sure we all agree with it. Some such plan as I have been suggesting will save men and women from despair, and that is the most important thing that this or any government can do.

The number of minutes that I had intended to speak has probably been used up. I close with repeating that we should proceed on the basis of not giving away something for nothing but should try to work our relief system on the basis that people shall work under decent arrangements for what they get.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): My first words in this debate fall very closely in line with part of the words just spoken by the hon. member who pre-ceded me (Mr. Maybank). I want to stress two points. I may say many things, but I should like the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) and the committee to take note of two points in particular in connection with this question of unemployment relief, and the other half of the question, agricultural assistance. Having now had ten years of experience in dealing with unemployment without achieving any definite or useful results, I urge that it is time to try to plan for putting an end to relief as such. I am satisfied that we can never deal with this matter satisfactorily until we work out a plan. The next point is that the plan must be based on social justice. Unless we approach the question from the viewpoint of social justice, justice to those who are submerged by the economic competition which this system demands, we cannot solve the problem in a satisfactory manner.

I am not going over the figures of unemployment; after all, they are dead and cold things. Figures in the blue book may tell you the number of unemployed, the number on relief, but they do not tell the misery and despair in the homes of the unemployed, and consequently are not of any great value.

Since 1930 Canada has spent, I believe, more than a billion dollars on various forms of relief. In April, 1933, at the peak of unemployment, in the depths of the depression, it was said that some 13½ per cent of the population of Canada was dependent on government assistance in one way or another. In the years that followed, 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937, there was a gradual improvement, but at the end of 1937 we still had 7½ per cent of the total population dependent upon relief for their subsistence. This winter the figures for those on urban and rural relief amounted to some 700,000. This is an enormous number of people to have to live in the misery, want and degradation in which the unemployed of this country must live. I think I am fortunate in coming from perhaps the most socially minded province of Canada; taken as a whole, I think perhaps the unemployed in British Columbia are treated as well as in any other province, if not better; yet from actual experience with conditions that prevail in that province, I know that the lot of the unemployed is appalling.

Since the day this parliament opened, the minds of all have been taken up with the life and death struggle going on across the Atlantic. That is only natural, for we all feel that we will be affected by the outcome of that struggle. This afternoon the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said that if we lose, other people will take over this dominion with its great natural resources. I realize that that may be the case, but I must say that for the great majority of the people of Canada the natural resources are now owned by other people, who put a fence round them so that only on their terms may the people who produce the wealth of the country obtain access to those resources. The hon, member said he was anxious to win the war in order to prevent that happening. The winning of the war may prevent it, but I am anxious that we should win the war in order that social justice may prevail in Canada and throughout the world. It is because social justice did not prevail that we are in our present difficulties. There is, then, a real danger that because of this preoccupation with the war, unemployment and the conditions which cause it, as well as the various conditions arising from it, may not receive at this session the consideration that the whole question merits.

From statements made by the Minister of Labour when moving the resolution, and from changes which he said would appear in the bill this year as compared with other years, it would seem that the government are continuing their old policy of doing nothing and hoping that something will turn up. In former years they placed their hope in reviving world trade. That hope now having gone, they are looking to the war to solve the problem of unemployment. Speaking to the resolution last Friday night, the minister said that owing to the industrial activity expected as a result of the war it would not be necessary to make provision in the bill for public works. In the same connection he said that if public works became a vital necessity they could be initiated by means of an estimate which would be presented to parliament. I should like to remind the minister and the committee that if a bill is brought down and passed without making provision for such assistance as was provided by section 3 of the 1939 bill, and by previous bills, it is utter nonsense to say that we can bring down an estimate in this house to provide for such a contingency. Within a few weeks at the most, parliament will have prorogued; this session of parliament will be no more, and it then will be too late to bring down an estimate to meet any emergency that may arise. The time to provide for the needs of the unemployed is now, while we have this legislation before us and while parliament is in session.

This is merely an opinion, but it seems to me that during its years in office this government has shown an appalling lack of understanding of Canada's social problems. But it is peculiarly and particularly blind in its approach to the social problem of unemployment. To a large extent that is equally true of all other governments in Canada; but the other governments, provincial and municipal, have some excuse for their attitude. They have not the means of effectively providing for or dealing with unemployment. The whole question of the unemployed has always been considered as though the unemployed were the only people concerned. The social implications to Canada of unemployment have never been really considered. Unemployment relief has always been based on the least amount that will keep the unemployed from starving or from causing a disturbance. If hon, members think I am going too far in making a statement of that kind, I will support it from the findings of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. At page 21 of book II I find this:

One serious defect has been the complete lack of uniform relief standards. Municipalities generally have set their own standards in the amount of food, shelter, clothing, and medical care that should be allowed, and unless these appeared to be too high, the province has rarely intervened. Many smaller municipalities refused to pay relief at all even when there was real need. Such standards as have gradually developed have emphasized immediate economy rather than adequacy, with complete disregard of long-range costs, such as the probable increase of deficiency diseases (e.g. tuberculosis), or the breakdown of the morale of the able-bodied unemployed. Standards have tended to be those of poor relief, rather than for the maintenance of the efficiency of employables.

Then again, on page 172, book I, we find this:

It is clear from the above review that there was no coordinated or carefully planned relief policy in Canada during the depression. It was a policy of expediency which failed either to promote maximum welfare under the circumstances or to safeguard the financial position of the various governments. The dominion, from whom alone leadership could have come, was mainly concerned with steering a day-to-day course between insisting on the constitutional responsibility of the provinces and the necessity of preventing wide-spread starvation.

That is the unanimous opinion of the four men who wrote that report, and it is nothing new to this government because at least the group with which I am associated have been saying just that, and saying it for years.

There is nothing surer than that we can never deal effectively with unemployment until we have worked out a plan. This planless way which has been followed, this dealing with the question on the bases of expediency will never end unemployment. But before we can make any progress either in peace time or war time, we must get away from the attitude I mentioned a moment ago, namely that of looking upon the unemployed as a social nuisance. We must realize that the unemployed are unemployed largely through no fault of their own. We must get it clearly into our minds that under the present economic system unemployment automatically develops out of every mechanical improvement. As the means of production become more complex and more under the control of a few, the tendency to monopoly increases. A larger share of the total wealth goes to fewer people and the many are forced to lower and lower standards of living to semi-starvation.

We have to plan if we are going to get away from that sort of thing. I would ask members of the committee to put themselves in the place of the unemployed for a little while. Let them try to see things through the eyes of the unemployed. If we would do that, I think this is the way things would appear to us. We would see ourselves and our families suffering all the miseries of the damned; when we asked the government to spend money to provide employment, we would be told that the country could not stand such heavy expenditure. In a word, we would be told the government could not find the money.

But in a time of war we would see that the government could find unlimited amounts of money. What would we say in such circumstances? I know what the unemployed are saying. I have talked with many of them, and I know what they are saying. They are saying, "Why should we be concerned about the war? The government can find money for destruction, but none for construction. We have been ready, nay anxious, to go to work to produce wealth, but we were not allowed to do so. We were left rotting in idleness and despair."

That has been the portion of the unemployed for ten long years, in this dominion with its great natural resources and the great wealth to which reference is so often made. We must consider unemployment as a canker eating into the very vitals of society. If we continue to neglect it as we have done in the past, we shall pay a terrible price, and that in the not distant future.

Even if there is a war, I say there is no better time than the present to begin to prepare for the future and to begin working out a plan to deal with our social problems. Whether we win the war or whether we lose it, there is one thing of which we may be certain: world economy will be shattered for many years to come, and international trade, the sheet anchor of this government's hope for solving all our social and economical ills, can be given up for a long, long time.

There are a number of things which the government could do, and which it could begin doing at once. As I have said, the first is to begin to treat the unemployed as if they were human beings with rights to be respected. This has never been done before. Whenever the urge for economy overtakes any of our governments—municipal, provincial or federal—the first thing to come under review is the relief pittance received by the unemployed. This attitude should be changed without delay.

The unemployed must have more than just adequate food, clothing and shelter. "Man cannot live by bread alone." He can live only as he takes part in the social, economic and cultural activities of the community in which he lives. Sometimes after the house adjourns at night, I take the opportunity of doing a little reading. I wish to quote a short paragraph from an essay by W. H. Auden who, I am told, is one of the young poets in Great Britain who are gaining some prominence. Referring to the problem of social readjustment and how to build a better society, and having in mind the unemployed, he makes this statement:

People cannot grow unless they are happy and, even when their material needs have been satisfied, they still need many other things. They want to be liked and to like other people; to feel valuable, both in their own eyes and in the eyes of others; to feel free and to feel responsible; above all, not to feel lonely and isolated.

As I said, I have met the unemployed; I have talked with them. I have tried to help them solve their problems. I have gone their bail when they have been put into gaol as vagrants. I have gone to the gaols to see them. I have gone to the police stations to try to defend them. I know what they think, and I know that one of the worst features is the feeling that they are outside the rest of the community.

We should take advantage of war work to improve the morale of many of our people who for years have been unemployed. Quite a number of our unemployed are going into employment for the first time for many years. Certain practices are being carried on in our industries which I think should be frowned on by the government. These practices may be necessary later on, but at the present time I think they should be discontinued. Mr. Howard B. Chase, a director of the war purchasing board, is reported in a Vancouver paper as saying:

There is a tendency among our employing classes to lengthen hours of production rather than to take on more men. These people are falling down on their job. It is the duty of every employer, particularly those in war production, to take on as many men as possible and train them.

That is a perfectly logical point of view, and I think the government should see that it is enforced. Should the tempo of industry in the dominion increase so that there is a huge demand for men which cannot be filled, then there might be some argument for overtime. But there is no social argument for overtime as long as other men are unemployed. It is being done in order that the people who have contracts, the industrialists, may increase their profits.

There is another matter which I would draw to the attention of the minister. The government should refuse contracts or orders to concerns which do not recognize or consult with the accredited representatives of labour organizations. Since the outbreak of the war, every committee set up by the British government has contained representatives from the various trade union organizations. This has been the case whether such committees had to do with industrial work or not. But our industrial barons even refuse to negotiate or have anything to do with their organized employees. I am quite aware that a fair wage clause is inserted in all contracts given by the government, but these fair wage clauses do not mean very much unless there is an employees' organization on the job to see that they are enforced. I have been a worker in industry, and I know what one can get without an organization and what one can get with an organization.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I should like to direct attention to an advertisement which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 29, inserted by Canadian Celanese Limited. I do not know whether the dominion government, the Department of National Defence or any other department has any contracts with this company.

Mr. McLARTY: I inquired into that and I may say that they have not.

Mr. MacINNIS: I hope this company do not get any. The advertisement showed that the workers in this plant had gone on strike and that a meeting had been arranged between Mr. Rochette, the provincial minister of labour; Mr. Tremlay, the deputy minister of labour; Mr. Hamel, minister without portfolio; Mr. Miron, the chief conciliator for the department; Mr. Rajotte, the mayor of Drummondville and Messrs. Cameron, Thomson and Palmer, who represented the company. There were morning and afternoon sessions of this meeting at which arrangements for reopening the plant were discussed. The result of the discussion was communicated to Mr. Albert Lemay, an employee who was present at the afternoon session. I am not going to take the time to read all the conditions laid down by the company under which employees would be permitted to come back to work, but the fourth condition was this:

The company refused to recognize the union as the representative of its employees.

I am told that the union is an affiliate of the Catholic federation of labour. The last paragraph in the advertisement reads:

Following this meeting, company representatives met a temporary committee of employees which did not, however, contain representatives from all departments of the plant. The temporary committee discussed none of the foregoing arrangements for reopening the plant.

The company just put the conditions before them and said: "This is what you get; accept it or you get nothing." As long as conditions like these exist in Canada, there is good reason why many people should not be greatly concerned with winning the war in order that companies like these may still continue to control the natural resources and industries of this country. Before the winning of the war will have any meaning to these people, it must be translated into terms of social justice. Social justice means, in the first instance, that the workers in industry shall have some say in deciding the conditions under which they will work and the price they shall receive for their labour.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH Health branch.

237. Health branch administration, $43,000.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Certain questions were raised the other evening, particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), with a view to obtaining data on health conditions affecting recruits in the Canadian active service force and reasons for the rejections. I stated then that the data required were not available in this department, and that I would consult with my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers). I have done so, and I will give all possible available data to the committee, either when the minister's estimates come up, or before then if possible.

Mr. LOCKHART: Last evening when the committee rose, I was directing the minister's attention to matters of general health affecting the troops, not only those in Canada but others whom it may be found necessary to return from overseas. I wish to ask the minister particularly about a development which occurred at the time of the outbreak of war. We do not want to rehash past events unnecessarily, but I believe that the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) was at that time Minister of National Defence. The first enlistments which took place in my part of the country arose from the mobilization of the Lincoln and Welland regiment, which was used for canal guard duty in that area. I am told by a number of these men, as well as by dentists and others, that the applicants were physically fit in every respect except as to the condition of their teeth. I know men who at personal sacrifice had their teeth repaired upon the assurance that they would be accepted for active service if certain corrections were The condition frequently was the made. result of lack of work, unemployment or part time employment. A great many of these men are anxious to enlist, but contend that this is the one impediment to their enlistment. As the minister presumably knew the situation at the time of the outbreak of the war, and as he is now Minister of Pensions and National Health, perhaps he could suggest some relief for men in this position. I know several of them. One man had his teeth removed, but he was financially unable to have them replaced, and is still going along without teeth. Can men who are handicapped in this way be assured of some assistance?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe that this development took place after the early days, after we called the forces out under the provisions of sections 63 and 64. Anyone who would have been turned down on account of defective teeth could be accepted if the required adjustments could be made by filling teeth or furnishing dentifrices. That is the information I have received.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is, the correction would be made at the cost of the man who was seeking to enlist? Is that it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no; by the department, and after enlistment.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is the minister sure that all these adjustments were made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am reasonably sure of it, but I am subject to correction.

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall have to bring down the information I have.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to discuss any question with my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister, along the line just mentioned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), if the department has on its files anything with reference to the researches which have been made by Doctor Harold K. Box, D.D.S., who is research professor of peridontology at Toronto university, and about whose great work in dentistry the newspapers have been publishing so much lately.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that the department does not have that on its files, but, upon the suggestion of my hon. friend, we will certainly look it up right away.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): As to the minister's statement concerning the rejection of recruits on account of bad teeth, I might say that complaints came to me in Nova Scotia that applicants who had been found medically fit and acceptable in every other respect were rejected by reason of faulty teeth, and the request was made that their teeth be put in proper condition so that they would be accepted. But some of these applicants did not have the necessary means; they were on relief or in such poor circumstances that they were unable to have this work done, and therefore could not get into active service. This information came to me during the past weekend.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no doubt that is a correct statement of conditions in the early stages of the enlistments, but I am informed that conditions in this respect have been reasonably well adjusted. As a matter of fact, all this discussion refers to another department, although I would be glad to give any information at my disposal regarding the questions which have been asked. Difficulties arose in the earlier stages of the enlistments, but I believe that at the present time, if the recruit is reasonably healthy, corrections will be effected after he has enlisted.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): At the expense of the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, after he has enlisted.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand that we are now discussing specifically the health branch. Last evening, before adjournment, the minister made a statement to the effect that the air raid precaution committees being set up in at least four provinces across Canada came under this particular department. The average citizen's conception of an air raid precaution committee is that it is a voluntary organization of citizens who carry out that work without any remuneration or thought of remuneration. I should like to know what portion of the appropriation for the health branch is to be expended on the work of these committees, and if to date there has been any expenditure by the branch for that kind of work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The moneys expended upon this work of air raid precautions do not come from the regular funds of the Department of Pensions and National Health but come from the special war appropriations. In the first war appropriation of some months ago there was voted for this purpose $150,000. I am informed that, of this amount, the sum of $55,000 was expended in the four provinces which were undertaking that work; and the $5,000 to each province which I mentioned last night was part of the $55,000, which was the entire amount spent in the four provinces. The cost of supplies and literature came out of that total vote.

Mr. GILLIS: What I was interested in finding out was, were any salaries paid to any of the officials of that organization?

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By the department, to only one officer, who is at the head of it, Colonel Minns, who I believe has performed other duties in addition to this one. He was in England on other duties, I believe, since this work was commenced. In the provinces any salaries which would be paid would be defrayed by the provincial governments, who are really carrying on the work in cooperation with the federal authority.

Mr. GREEN: How much is to be set aside during the present fiscal year for air raid precautions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe the amount is $100,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any item in the estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. The reason is that items for this work are included in the appropriation which passed through the house a few days ago, and the first vote for this work was included in the appropriation which went through some months ago, before the present parliament met.

Mr. GREEN: The minister explained to the committee last night that this plan had been put into effect in only the four provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and British Columbia. Might I suggest to him that if nazi bombers come to Canada they will not stop at the Ottawa river; they will very likely bomb Ottawa before they attack any other place, and then proceed to Toronto and other industrial centres in Ontario. It seems to me that this plan should be put on a nation-wide basis and that the dominion government should accept some direct responsibility for the control and management of the plan. Our great mistake in Canada and possibly in the other democracies has been to wait, in all these things, until it is too late. I suggest that we should bring our air raid precautions up to date on a nationwide scale without any further delay, and this government is the proper authority to do that work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would point out two things. In the first place, the staff officers of the Department of National Defence were those who defined what they considered, rightly or wrongly, the vulnerable areas of Canada, and the proposal was proceeded with on that basis. In the second place, in England the air raid precautions were staged under what might be termed civilian control. In Canada there is of necessity consultation and cooperation with the civilian authority, and that is why this is not under the Department of National Defence but under the Department of Pensions and National Health. I took steps myself to ascertain from the other authorities whether they would like to have an extension of this in their provinces, and only four provinces were vitally interested in the problem.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not really part of the defence of Canada? Taking the necessary steps to protect the lives of people in the event of air raids comes under the direction of this government, and we should not have to wait until the provinces ask for help along that line. After all, those who might be killed in these provinces would be Canadians, just like those in the four provinces that have the plan. I do not see why the dominion should hang back and wait upon the provinces in such an emergency.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The whole scheme was commended by the federal government. It was the result of recommendations brought forward by an able committee of civil servants. It depends on provincial statutes and certain municipal ordinances for many of the facilities to be carried out. We have followed as best we can the practice adopted in England.

Mr. GREEN: That may not be the right practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That may be true, but it was the only real precedent we had to go on. I can assure my hon. friend that we shall be only too willing to extend the projects in any direction considered necessary and afford the best protection we can to the civilian population.

Mr. GREEN: Are the government willing to take over complete direction of air raid precautions if the provinces agree?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The advice the government received was that it would not be possible for such a scheme to function properly, and the government accepted that advice.

Mr. MacGARRY: I do not rise to ask for a cut in the estimates for public health because I am of opinion that these estimates, whether in time of peace or in time of war, are not sufficient adequately to deal with this important matter of public health. Being a new member in this house I am not disposed to interrupt or delay the progress of the committee. I feel, however, that on this important subject I should make a few remarks which I trust that you, Mr. Chairman, will regard as relevant.

Every hon. member will agree with me, I believe, when I say that the preservation of the health and the lives of our citizens is the paramount concern of individuals and the state. Members of the profession of which I happen to be a humble member have long since set aside the erroneous idea that their function was to cure the sick. They have laid that aside because they have come to the realization that there is another phase of the profession that is far more important, namely, the matter of public health. The efforts put forth by public health bodies would be absolutely useless if they had not the cooperation of the public. The question is asked: How are we to get that cooperation most effectively? We shall have to take this lurking lack of knowledge, the indifference and the greed that we find so obvious, and combat it with some proper knowledge and some practical methods of dealing with the science of healthy life. These are the means that we should take in order to get the cooperation of the laity.

The endeavour of public health authorities, as I understand it, is to combat, to prevent and to eliminate if possible all agents that are responsible for bringing into the light and distributing all the sources of disease; and in addition to that, there is another duty of public health officials, namely, to strengthen the individual resistance. Here we see that the question of nutrition is shown to be most effective in this public health programme. Many diseases if taken in time can be dealt with successfully by moderate treatments. We speak of a man, woman or child as being healthy if the bodily organs are free from disease and are functioning properly. The discovery, through laboratory research, that disease is started and distributed by minute parasitic germs is one of the things that have given impetus to a much wider field of public health work. We find that the government has taken a strong hand in this matter, passed many measures of public health and also made provision for their administration.

In the short time at my disposal I shall not attempt to trace the successful campaigns that have been carried on not only to prevent but, in some instances, actually to get under complete control some communicable diseases. I might mention diphtheria, smallpox and malaria. These three diseases were almost fatal some years ago. To-day, by successful scientific efforts, they are practically under control. Tuberculosis might be considered to-day as a curable disease. Cancer might be put in the same category, with possibly a little more limitation.

Tuberculosis we say is a curable disease. That is only partly true. If the symptoms are recognized early and scientific treatment applied, we might say that tuberculosis is scientifically curable. But it is not curable if we speak from the point of view of finance, because so many of the people who are afflicted with that disease are unable to procure the scientific treatment. It is all very well to say complacently that the death rate from tuberculosis is falling; that of course is good news. But that does not reveal the intense suffering which prevails in the homes of many men and women afflicted with this dread disease. Therefore no sacrifice should be considered too great in order to bring about if possible a scientific cure for every man, woman and child in this dominion who is afflicted with the white plague.

As I said, we must remember that this public health programme is a cooperative movement. The units in the partnership are the government, the profession and the public. All these agencies must work together; all must know the means to use in this crusade, and must apply them cooperatively in order that they may be effective. The government must spend more money; the profession must bring into action every scintilla of science that they know, and the public will have to be educated to a realization of the great duty they themselves have to perform in that crusade. It was their own vigilance that caused the suppression of these other diseases, and the same price will have to be paid in order to bring into subjection these other pathological aggressors who are not so well identified by the profession, and for that reason cannot be so effectively dealt with.

The government has been sympathetic and benevolent up to the limit of the resources available, but there is not yet behind this public health movement sufficient support of public opinion to give the government courage to venture on a larger expenditure than in the past. If a united front is formed; if the public assure the government that they are behind this; if the profession put into action every scintilla of knowledge that they possess, I believe that we can carry on a successful war of defence against these pathological enemies that are invading and destroying our human tissue and leaving in their trail disastrous ravages not only on our domestic but on our social, industrial and economic institutions.

Mr. McIVOR: For the last three sessions the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) and I have sponsored a resolution calling for some form of nationalization of medicine, urging that the dominion government, the provincial governments, the medical associations and the social workers should cooperate to provide some means to take care of those who at present are not being taken care of. In the session of 1939 the then Minister of Pensions and National Health gave us a great deal of valuable information as to the cost as well as the need of such provision, but asked us to withdraw that resolution, which we thought it wise to do. This year we cannot bring forward that resolution, for reasons which are quite evident.

I noticed that one distinguished doctor at the dominion medical association meeting stated that he thought such legislation was coming and the doctors should prepare themselves for it. We felt that this was encouraging. We know the need; some of us perhaps feel it very keenly. The people who are on relief have some form of medical attention; those who are rich or even fairly well off get good medical attention, but there is a vast class of citizens who cannot get the health examination and treatment that they require. I would ask the minister to keep this matter in mind; doubtless he knows as well as I do that when there is a war on, fewer people talk about their ills; they think of the ills of others that far outweigh their own disabilities. I know a man who told me last summer that some form of contributory health insurance was absolutely necessary. His wife passed on this year, and he himself who needed examination and some form of treatment passed on just a few months ago. I am sure that the minister, with his big heart and clear mind, will keep this in view, as we certainly shall, when opportunity comes to present that resolution to the house again.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask the minister a further question in connection with air raid precautions. I have what I might describe as a personal interest in the matter. Soon after the war broke out I received an urgent summons to attend a meeting of the legion in Saint John. I attended, and as a result found that I was a constable. A few days later I received a band to put round my arm with the word "police" on it, and some instructions about air raid precautions. Later I was presented with a whistle and a badge on which were the letters "ARP" surmounted by a crown. Last night the minister informed us that certain grants had been made to some of the provinces in this connection. I would ask him, was a grant of $5,000 made to New Brunswick last year in connection with air raid precautions? If such a grant was made, to whom was it made, and was any accounting received by this government as to how the money was spent? If such an accounting was received, will the minister be so good as to let us have particulars of the account?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The answer to the first question is yes. The sum of $5,000 was paid to the provincial treasury of New Brunswick, in accordance with paragraph 3 of the order in council, which reads:

That the provincial treasurers of the several provinces aforementioned shall furnish such reports and accounts relating to the expenditure of the said sums of money so advanced as the Minister of Pensions and National Health may from time to time require.

This was passed on January 25, 1940. I am informed that the accounting of this grant has not come to hand as yet, but of course it will be examined and will have to satisfy the financial authorities here in Ottawa.

Mr. HAZEN: Who was the officer in New Brunswick in charge of these air raid precautions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that it was a gentleman by the name of Ryan, who was working with the hydro electric company.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How is the $100,000 which is being spent this year broken up? What amounts are granted the various provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As yet that has not been determined. It will be a matter of consultation between the chief officer here and those responsible in the various provinces, with perhaps an extension of the same work to other provinces not yet taking advantage of the scheme, or possibly a further intensification of the work already done in those provinces which are considered to be most vulnerable. There is really no break-down of the $100,000. I could give my hon. friend a rough estimate of how the grant of last year was expended. The equipment purchased last year amounted to $26,304.67. The grants to the four provinces totalled $20,000. There was a grant of $5,000 to the St. John Ambulance Association, which has done wonderful work in connection with this whole scheme. The travelling expenses, probably those of headquarters officers going to cooperate with the various provincial authorities, amounted to $2,581.69. For literature, mostly pamphlets obtained in England, we spent $570.17. For sample equipment, based upon the equipment used in other places, the cost was $102.67. Other expenditures were: printing, $944.21 and freight, $192.60, making, a total of $55,696.01. That is how the grant of last year was expended. There will be a similar accounting, of course, for the grants of this year, whether or not the entire $100,000 is expended.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Have plans been made to have this sample equipment manufactured in Canada if necessary?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was so done.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For several years now I have tried to get a little information with respect to the responsibility for the pollution of waters in international watersheds. The city of Toronto, from which I come, in common with many other cities in the upper part of the St. Lawrence watershed, is obliged by somebody to see to it that the waters of the great lakes and of that watershed are not polluted. I have always thought that the protection of those waters from pollution was not the sole responsibility of the municipality or the province; I have considered that some responsibility rests on the dominion government, since the benefits which result from the prevention of such pollution are not derived by only one province.

At the present time the city of Toronto is faced with a very large expenditure for a disposal plant. They have decided that they must do something about the matter, but it involves the expenditure of a large sum of money. I realize that the disposal of sewage is a matter which benefits the city of Toronto and the surrounding country, but it also benefits the people further down the lake and river. So it seems to me unfair that the city of Toronto should have to bear alone the tremendous cost of taking care of that sewage disposal. The government of the United States appreciates this fact and has come to the aid of certain cities in that country in connection with disposal works.

My question, which I think deserves a pretty full answer from the minister, is this: Whose responsibility is it if the city of Toronto does not protect its water and allows it to be polluted? What jurisdiction has the dominion? Can the dominion make the city do this work or can they not? I should like to know a little about the matter, if the minister would be so kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This question really should be discussed under another item, but I am quite prepared to discuss it as well as I can at the moment. If my hon. friend will look at the vote for public health engineering, he will see an appropriation for the enforcement of regulations which have been approved by orders in council, the first passed in June, 1923, the next in February, 1930; the next in March, 1937, and the last in September, 1937. These are regulations concerning ice and water intended to be used for drinking and culinary purposes on vessels navigating on the great lakes and inland waters of Canada, on common carriers engaged in interprovincial and international traffic, as well as on common carriers engaged in trade on the coast of Canada, in addition to regulations and requirements for the supervision of shucking, handling and shipping scallop meat, and the taking, handling, packing and shucking of shellfish.

These regulations provide for the administration of the Public Works Health Act and the enforcement of the regulations thereunder for the preservation of health and the mitigation of disease among persons employed on the construction of public works.

Now I approach to some extent the point raised by my hon. friend. The regulations also provide for the supervision of sanitation on common carriers engaged in interprovincial and international traffic as well as in mining settlements and trading post areas in the northwest territories; also in national parks and summer camps situated on dominion lands, and for purposes of cooperation with the provincial departments of health, the United States public health service and other federal government agencies in matters of sanitation, pollution of boundary waters and the like.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I thank the minister. Does not a broad question come up there, in regard to the pollution of international boundary waters, bearing in mind the great waterways treaty made between Canada and the United States? I have said this two or three times, and I do not want to labour the point, but really I should like to make myself clear. These cities on the United States side have received aid and assistance from the federal government whereas we have been forced to construct extensive works for sewage disposal. I have always felt that this was very unfair, and that it was not properly the responsibility of the municipality to bear the whole cost of such works. Is there not a responsibility on the dominion government under the great waterways treaty to see to it that our boundary waters are not polluted? I understand what the minister referred to, in connection with common carriers, and so on, but this is a far greater question. I have always been told that it was up to the municipality to look after its own sewage disposal, but there are many factors entering into the question. For instance, if the city of Toronto or the city of Hamilton pollutes the water, that water goes right down the river, probably to the shellfish bed, and so on, since water does not purify itself but must be purified. I think this is something to which the government should give careful consideration. Last year I dealt with this matter in the house, when we in Toronto learned that we had to construct this plant. In Toronto we face an expenditure of $15,000,000 for a new sewage disposal plant. I suggested last year that we might obtain that money under a self-liquidating programme, but my suggestion was not sympathetically received. I am saying to-night that some aid ought to be given the city to take care of that situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not attempting to speak with any finality upon this difficult point, but if a complaint were made by one government to another government, that is, if the federal government received a complaint from the government of the United States, the international waterways commission would have to act. That brings me to a consideration of section 9 of the Department of Pensions and National Health Act, paragraph (f) of which states:

The duties and powers of the minister under this part shall extend to . . .

(f) The enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission, promulgated pursuant to the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty relating to boundary waters and questions arising between the United States of America and Canada, so far as the same relate to public health.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I explain that-

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just a minute. I understand the powers held by the minister. In other words, if we receive a complaint from the United States respecting the pollution of our water—and they could do that quite justly at any time—we would do what the minister suggests. Right now they might be in a position to complain respecting the sewage going into the lake at Toronto. If the minister receives that complaint, does he go to the province of Ontario or to the municipality of the city of Toronto? I understand he has the right to insist that either the municipality of Toronto or the province of Ontario will take care of that situation.

So far as Toronto is concerned, let me point out that we could obtain our drinking water through a process of filtration. Our bathing beaches would not be much good unless they were properly attended to. However the people who are farther down the lake would be adversely affected by the pollution of lake water, and it would be to their benefit and to the benefit of any others who might be affected, that some proper action be taken.

I believe there is some responsibility on the government at Ottawa. It has the power to rorce the city of Toronto to take care of its sewage. If the federal government has that power, it seems to me it should also have the power to give assistance to Toronto or to Hamilton or to any other city requesting it, to make the provisions necessary for the proper disposal of sewage. I cannot remember the names of the cities in the United States which have been helped by the federal government in that country, but there are plenty of them. I believe the same condition ought to obtain here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I still say that I am correct in my statement that the Minister of Pensions and National Health can intervene only when the question is an international one, and the request comes in under the regulations mentioned in paragraph (f) of section 9, requiring the minister to take action. It must be realized that the Department of Pensions and National Health Act does not give the department jurisdiction in respect of public health matters which are exclusively provincial or municipal. We cannot trespass on the jurisdiction of provincial and municipal governments, except when we are given special authority as a result of international powers, or powers affecting us from outside. That is a principle which has been fundamental in federal government jurisdiction since the time of confederation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am glad to have the answer from the minister. I do not wish to bother him unduly, but I should like to make this point. It would seem that our recourse is this, that all we have to do is to go to the government of the United States, point out to them that we are polluting the waters adjacent to the city of Toronto, and ask them to come to the dominion government and see that we do not do it any more. If we do that, then I understand the minister will have to approach the province of Ontario and the city of Toronto and say to them, "You cannot do that any more." So long as I know the correct procedure I am satisfied, because when the proper occasion presents itself I shall raise the question of responsibility. The minister has nothing to do with providing money to take care of this situation, but I want to make my point, because I think it is not a bad one.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I did not clearly understand the explanation given with respect to air raid shelters. To be frank about the matter, I was rather surprised to hear the minister mention four provinces. I would predict that if Canada were invaded by the enemy against which it is now waging war, it would not be through any of the four provinces mentioned, but rather through Churchill, the Manitoba port. Few people may realize that Winnipeg is a very large industrial centre and is considered to be the gateway to the west. It would be my prediction that in the event of invasion the base for air operations would probably be set up at Churchill. That is not beyond possibility at all. My question is this: How do those four provinces come under the grant? Are they jointly concerned, or is the grant entirely under the administration of the federal government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I tried to make myself clear before, but evidently I failed. The four provinces which were given consideration under the vote were the areas recommended by the best staff officers of the Department of National Defence as being vulnerable areas in Canada. There may be a good deal of merit in the suggestion made by the hon. member. For instance, Prince Edward Island may be considered a vulnerable area; yet it is not receiving consideration, and has not asked for it under the grant. The city of Toronto might be considered a vulnerable area; yet nothing has been done in Ontario under the grant. In deciding which provinces should receive the advantage of the grant, the department has had to take the advice from those who are supposed to be best qualified to give it, when it comes to a consideration of areas which should receive the necessary benefits.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Department of National Defence makes the sole decision; it does not negotiate with the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is entirely up to the Department of National Defence, on their own?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is the point I wanted to have clear.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last night the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) referred to the grant to the Health League of Canada. I mention the matter at this time so that before we come to a more detailed consideration of that organization, and while we are still discussing administration, the minister might very well ask his colleagues to reconsider the grant to the health league, with a view to increasing it.

I am familiar with the wonderful work that organization is doing to-day, and the difficulties it has to face. If we can afford to give $100,000 to the city of Ottawa, as has been done in years past; if we are not going to ask the city of Ottawa to economize a little bit, and if we are doing that at the expense of the Health League of Canada, then all I can say is that I am sorry I was not more vocal in my observations about the $100,000 grant given to Ottawa. I would ask the minister kindly to reconsider the vote when the supplementary estimates are presented.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe up until last year the health league received only $5,000, but last year the second $5,000 was added. I agree entirely with everything the hon. member has said in connection with the valuable work carried on by the organization in question, and I should be very glad indeed to try to meet the request, if I can.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was pleased to hear many hon. members sitting on the government side of the house speaking in favour of national health. It seems to me that makes it just about unanimous. Let us do something about the matter.

With regard to this matter of tuberculosis, I should like to draw attention to the splendid work being done in this field by Doctor Ferguson, head of the anti-tuberculosis league in Saskatchewan. That league has done splendid preventive tuberculosis work. I understand this work is so well advanced now that they can almost predict the stamping out of the disease within a fairly reasonable time in Saskatchewan.

In the dental field we are facing considerable difficulty. If a man has bad teeth, and that is all that is wrong with him, he finds trouble in having them attended to. But if he happens to have tuberculosis, then he can go to a sanatorium and have his teeth treated. They circulate a story out in our part of the country about a poor man who had been unemployed for some time. He was unfortunate enough to contract appendicitis. When he went to a hospital they told him it was impossible to operate because he had no money. Not feeling in a kindly frame of mind toward society in general, he went down the street and threw a stone through the nearest plateglass window. He was arrested and sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment. When he was taken to gaol they found he had appendicitis, so he was sent to the hospital and attended to. He got out in thirty days, a free man and with his appendix out.

I should like to ask two or three questions. What proportion of this amount is being spent on educational work throughout the dominion? It seems to me that educational work is the foundation of the whole scheme. Someone made the remark the other day that the proper way to treat these matters of health was to get after the grandmothers. I would point out that the women living to-day will be the grandmothers of to-morrow, so how about getting after their health now? What cooperation is there between the provinces and the dominion? What is the attitude of the medical association with regard to the nationalization or socialization of health? How do the various provinces rate in health standards? Is there a connection between the standards of education and the standards of health?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is nothing in this particular vote for education work; that is provided for in other votes which will come up later. As far as health standards are concerned, I think there is no doubt that Saskatchewan leads the rest of Canada in the work it has done. The question of health insurance was discussed at considerable length last year. Several hon. members who are again in the house will remember the resolution moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I believe he has a similar resolution on the order paper this year. At that time the former minister went most thoroughly and exhaustively into the question of health insurance, not only as it might apply in the Dominion of Canada but with reference to other countries of the world. Hon. gentlemen will find on page 1573 of Hansard of last year, the report of a most valuable discussion of the whole question of health insurance. That debate was excellent in every way, and since that time we have received the report of the Sirois commission. I am sure most hon. members present have read their conclusions in regard to national health insurance. Their conclusions are that national unemployment insurance is and should be a federal responsibility, but they state most definitely that health insurance must be considered a provincial responsibility, with of course all possible cooperation by the federal authorities. The report of the commission states this at page 34:

This brief survey of the health activities of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion indicates that despite the chaotic situation as regards jurisdiction, each level of government is performing functions consistent with its proper role in the government of the nation. Jurisdiction may overlap, but there nation. Jurisdiction may overlap, but there is in fact little overlapping of functional activities. Indeed, we were impressed by the inadequacy of health services, considering the need, rather than by the existence of dupli-

And again they say this:

Finally, there are pronounced regional differences in Canada in social philosophy which are bound to affect public health legislation. Centralization of jurisdiction might not, therefore, conduce to progressive action in public health, or to national unity in general.

And again:

We think, therefore, that the present juris-dictional situation should not be disturbed, and that the public must rely on the good sense of public health officials and of political authorities concerned to effect cooperation and to work out an efficient and economical division of functions between the dominion and the provinces.

And further:

Whereas it is considered practicable in the case of unemployment insurance to adopt a uniform scheme that will apply to all provinces, it is not considered practicable in the case of health insurance, as the problems to be met are different.

A scheme of health insurance applicable to the large industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec would not be applicable in provinces which are chiefly agricultural.

In contemplating a system of health insurance, consideration must be given to:

The topography,

The distribution of population,

The various age groups,

Distribution of members of the medical and nursing professions,

The location of hospitals, Transportation facilities,

Number and class of industries, and a variety of factors that have a direct bearing on the type of health insurance that is practicable.

Doctor Weir, provincial health minister of British Columbia, appeared before a meeting of the dominion health council. That province has a national insurance act on its statute books, as has Alberta, but they are not in operation. He had this to say:

It would be a grave error for the dominion government, by amendment to the British North America Act to relieve the province of the major responsibility in health matters. The true role of the federal government in the health field, it seems to me, is to supply leadership, to assist in the promotion of significant health movements, to correlate—but not to legislate in health matters now falling within provincial jurisdiction.

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, had this to say in 1935, as reported on page 1156 of

A national health policy involves consideration of several factors, among them being, first, the position of the individual himself—not the question of the municipalities or the provinces, but the position of the individual himself and herself.

Later in the same debate, he said:

We cannot, with one stroke of the legislative pen, wipe out of existence all the provisions made by the municipalities and the provinces to deal with this problem—their hospitals, medical service, taxation to maintain them in cities, towns and villages.

You cannot to-night, with all the power in the world, scrap the provincial services and impose upon them a federal service without the loss of millions of dollars.

That is as clear as anything can be. The difference between a national and a provincial scheme is quite simple, and I think the hon. member realizes that. The provinces have gone ahead and exercised their jurisdiction with respect to health matters, hospitalization and so on. Commenting upon Mr. Bennett's remarks, Doctor Weir had this to say:

In a word, I quite agree with the position of the present Prime Minister that the dominion government now has all machinery necessary to enable it to participate effectively with the provinces in the promotion of public health.

Those who have most strongly advocated health insurance in Canada have directed their representations to the provincial authorities. Just a few minutes ago the hon, member asked about the attitude of the Canadian medical association. The committee of economics of that association, on page 32 of its report on health insurance, expresses the following opinion:

The Canadian situation is such that social insurance legislation, of which health insurance is a part, must be initiated by the provinces. The dominion is free to make grants of money to the provinces adopting such legislation. This has been done in the matter of old age pensions.

The dominion could exercise considerable influence, if making such a grant, to secure the inclusion of the same desirable principles in all provincial legislation. The dominion, if contributing, would give supervision through the department of national health. Practically department of national health. Practically, health insurance in Canada will be provincial in legislation, organization and administration.

Several labour organizations made representations to their respective provincial governments. The British Columbia executive committee of the Trades and Labour Congress said this on November 2, 1937:

The government was strongly urged to give immediate effect to the health insurance act of 1936. The committee also recorded its favour for an act covering all persons irrespective of salary or other limitations.

The recommendation of the Saskatchewan executive committee of the Trades and Labour Congress, under date of November 30, 1937, is as follows:

The enactment of health insurance legislation was requested by the committee, the delegation endorsing the objectives of the state medicine league in this connection.

From the Manitoba executive committee of the Trades and Labour Congress and railway transportation brotherhoods, on January 4, 1938, I quote:

The committee expressed its view that the time was opportune "to recommend action looking to the establishment of a system of health insurance," and urged the government to "immediately take the necessary steps to formulate and adopt legislation to this end."

The Alberta federation of labour, on January 25, 1938, stated as follows:

In dealing with subjects of health, the federation's memorandum requested the bringing into operation of the section of the health insurance act providing for medical aid and hospitalization.

The Ontario executive of the Trades and Labour Congress recommended on February 8, 1938:

Enactment of legislation "to ensure full benefits of curative and preventive medicine to all citizens of the province irrespective of their ability to pay."

On February 8, 1938, the Ontario joint legislative committee of railway transportation brotherhoods, asked:

. . . favourable consideration to a health insurance measure.

It is evident from the foregoing that in the provinces these organizations realize that any scheme of national health insurance in Canada must be based upon provincial jurisdiction, and the most effective contribution which should and will be made by the federal government is by financial grants to the provinces who must be responsible under our constitution for health insurance in Canada.

All that is exactly what is happening to-day in the United States in the scheme of social security which President Roosevelt has commenced in that republic, the essential jurisdiction of the states being recognized, and federal grants being conditioned upon the actual needs existing in the various states.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the minister about another branch of activity of the department. Several years ago, I believe, the child and maternal welfare branch was reestablished. Could the minister give us some idea as to what is being done in the department to reduce infant mortality and the death rate among mothers in childbirth?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend wait until we come to that special vote, because I can then give him all that information.

Mr. COLDWELL: Very well. I will ask the minister at that time.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister has just quoted some remarks made by Mr. R. B. Bennett. I remember that, of course as a Knight of the venerable Order of the Hospital of Saint John of Jerusalem he thought fit, every time the estimates of the department of health came up, to make a speech. I recall dear old Doctor MacLaren, whose hands were shaking and trembling as he had his book before him, while Mr. Bennett was speaking fluently on the matter of health and of medicine. Mr. Bennett made a great speech on these estimates, either in 1935 or 1934, a speech which struck me as showing very clearly how superficial the man was. He made a lengthy address, speaking for forty minutes or an hour, as was the privilege of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. He did not forget Florence Nightin-He related the history of medicine throughout the world, but he forgot two names, those of the most eminent figures in the history of medicine in the modern world-Pasteur and Lord Lister. Mr. Bennett knew Florence Nightingale, but he ignored Pasteur and he ignored Lord Lister. I do not see what weight can properly be attached to any quotation from any speech of Mr. R. B. Bennett on matters of health and medicine.

I have just one question to ask of the minister. Would he be good enough to tell me who are the two gentlemen who are in front of him at the present time on the floor of the house?

An hon. MEMBER: Quite right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is customary to answer such questions. They are eminent and distinguished public servants of this country.

Mr. POULIOT: Eminent as they are, I want to know who are these strangers. I do not know them. I should like to know who they are. I ask with politeness and with all deference, but I wish to know who they are. They are not members of parliament. I should like to know who is coming here on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I want to know that. I do not wish to be disagreeable to the minister, but I want to know who are these two goodlooking gentlemen.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is not carried; and if I do not get that information, I am sorry, but I shall have to ask more questions. They must be officials of the Department of Pensions and National Health; otherwise they would not be here, but I should like to know who they are. I do not know them. I should like to know them, and I ask the minister kindly to tell me that.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The request is, I think, unusual. But the gentlemen are the deputy minister, Doctor Wodehouse, and the secretary of the department, Mr. Dixon.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is one matter which was discussed by the minister last night. It is reported on page 594 of Hansard. I was out of the chamber at the moment. It was in connection with the rationing of the active service forces in Canada. This is a matter in which I personally am very much interested, because during last fall and last winter in the armouries at Brampton, the Lorne Scots, many of whom are now on active service with the first infantry base depot at Aldershot, conducted for a time what is known as a cooking school for the soldiers. They had out there a number of prominent dietitians from Toronto, on loan from the board of education there, and according to newspaper and other reports which were prevalent at the time, and from my own observation, a good deal of progress seems to have been made towards a better type of rationing for the troops. I believe that a good deal of work was done by way of research and otherwise, and I was wondering if the minister could tell me whether the department had taken any cognizance of it, so that the valuable progress made in army dietetics at the time could be applied to the rationing of the active service forces at present.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, there were discussions. As my hon. friend is aware, this matter, again, pertains to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): As regards the question of rations. I mentioned just incidentally yesterday that some of the studies and surveys which were carried out in this department by some of the officers had been very useful from the point of view of analyses of the contents of rations used in the great war. As a result of the experience, certain recommendations were made. The Canadian council on nutrition and the national research council were consulted, and an officer, who I believe is Doctor Tisdale, has been appointed as adviser on nutritional matters to the Department of National Defence. As a result of these discussions the rations were varied and increased, and in some respects fairly materially altered. Broadly speaking, that is what happened.

Mr. GREEN: Are bully beef and hardtack still staples?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sorry, but I cannot tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why was the grant of $5,000 to New Brunswick sent to the provincial secretary? Why was it not sent to the officer commanding military district No. 7, the military district for that province? No one knows of any money having been paid out for air raid precautions in New Brunswick.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The reason was that the order in council was so worded. The provincial treasurer was the agent to whom in each case the grant was sent, for the reason that in every case we were dealing with civilian authority and not with military authority. That is the basis of this grant in every province in Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: A little while ago a discussion centred on state medicine. While I donot wish to prolong this discussion, there was something said concerning the work of provincial governments in connection with tuberculosis. Are any of the provincial governments giving free treatment for tuberculosis cases? I understand that the Alberta government have spent nearly $400,000 in the last four years on tuberculosis. I cannot say how much of that has been devoted to free treatment, but I do understand that a considerable amount has been spent for that purpose. I believe that Manitoba also has some health services in the way of free treatment for tuberculosis. Are any other provinces giving free treatment? As has been said, people have no money to pay for treatment, and sometimes we find some man breaking a glass window and going to gaol and obtaining some medical treatment in that way. It seems to me to be an admirable thing if the provinces can give free treatment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that half the population of Canada is entitled to free institutional treatment at the present time, the provinces being British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario; and I believe there are some services in Manitoba.

Mr. HANSELL: I believe mental hygiene is an important subject for us to talk a little about. Throughout the last few years insanity has increased a good deal in Canada. If what we read can be believed, it seems that the mental institutions of the country are overcrowded. I do not see in the items, from beginning to end, anything on that subject. Could the minister tell us what relationship his department has to the provinces with regard to mental cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The question has always been a provincial one, but there is in the estimates a grant of $10,000 for the mental hygiene council, and the only direct responsibility of the federal government is in regard to such of our ex-service men as are looked after in the hospitals.

Mr. HOWDEN: A good deal has been said about national health or state medicine, and since it was my privilege to introduce this subject back in 1931 and for several subsequent sessions, perhaps I should not let this occasion go by without saying a word or two in this regard. I would have spoken sooner, but I felt that in the days of the depression bread and butter were even more necessary to the people of Canada than free medicine; and now that we are faced with a cataclysmic war, I feel that our war effort supersedes all other questions in the interests of the Canadian people.

There is no doubt that state medicine is a desirable institution if it can possibly be brought into existence. There are many reasons to be advanced in its support, and reasons have been given pro and con by many members of the house, so that I do not think it is justifiable to-night to delay the committee by rehearsing them. I would, however, offer this suggestion alone, that if it is to the advantage of the nation to supply the growing generation with free education, then surely the health not only of children but of the men and women who compose the nation comes before schooling. There has been free schooling for a very long time. Why should not public health, which is of greater importance, receive consideration prior to education?

I do not think I shall labour the matter further to-night, but when my good friend and old time chum the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) rose to put the matter before the committee again, I wished to associate myself with him in his endeavour. But this is not the time to consider state medicine; and since the Sirois commission have brought down their recommendation, my own ideas do to a large extent coincide with the suggestion they have put forward, namely, that medicine should remain in the hands of the provinces. I believe, however, that, as in the case of old age pensions, if the federal authority see fit to advance sums of money to the provinces for distribution in this way, they might very readily perform a similar service in the matter of public health and stipulate that uniform provision shall be made for the people of Canada in all the provinces.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On page 159 of the report of the Department of Pensions and National Health I find a reference to the service carried on by the Canadian Council on Nutrition. I wonder if the minister has any information to give the committee in regard to the findings of the council in this connection. I quote from the report:

During the year the Canadian Council on Nutrition adopted and has since revised a Canadian dietary standard. This standard outlines the requirements necessary to supply the needs of the body in regard to various constituents of food. Some of the revisions were made on the basis of experience derived from dietary surveys being carried out by the council.

Can the minister give us any information in this regard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Last night I gave information to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The reports to which my hon, friend refers will be ready in two or three months' time. Four universities are cooperating with regard to reports to be published.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe there are some iron lungs in Canada and the department has something to do with their distribution. Can the minister give us any information?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Lord Nuffield bequeathed one to every public hospital in the dominion, and all were delivered.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Several hundred, I believe.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have been listening with some interest to the remarks which have been made with regard to air raid precautions in some of the provinces. Does the minister not think it advisable that cities like Toronto and Hamilton should have some opportunity of getting to know something about these precautions? In my own city the people know nothing whatever about them. They have not the faintest idea. Would it not be well for the department to take steps to deal with the situation? These people may be going to other parts of the country; they may not be staying in their own cities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Initial steps by way of recommendation with regard to vulnerable areas should come from qualified military officers. In the second place, the essential element would be cooperation of the provinces with the department in connection with air raid precautions.

Mr. POULIOT: Here is a place where the pick-and-shovel men are better than the clerks of the branch.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would a request have to come from the province to have this done?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The procedure has been as follows: Where certain areas were defined by the officers of the Department of National Defence as being vulnerable, they were brought to our attention. We immediately wrote to the premier of the province asking for their cooperation, and committees were formed to carry out the necessary work.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I still think it might be a very good idea; it might bring to the attention of certain sections of Canada that we have a war on; it would educate them. Would the minister not consider having some steps taken along these lines?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that as a result of the recommendation of the Sirois commission, the health of a good many Canadians will depend too largely on the economic condition of their province. I should like to have more information on the way in which the grants are going to be apportioned. I know that in the west, particularly where the crops are light, the health of the people is going to suffer very severely, and is suffering now.

Health branch.

238. Food and drugs, $174,565.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is for the administration of the Food and Drugs Act, which is for the protection of the purchasing consumer by preventing or prohibiting adulteration or misrepresentation in the sale of food and drugs. Food or drugs are misbranded within the meaning of the act if the specific requirements regarding labeling are not observed, or if false claims are made for the article on labels or otherwise. A special section in the act provides for the licensing and control of the manufacture of serums, vaccines and other medicinals of a biological nature. The statute, while it provides for the seizure of adulterated or misbranded stocks and the prosecution of those who merchandize them, is not entirely punitive. Much of the control is exercised by preventive action in which the industry and the trade cooperate. It is only in this way that the enormous volume of these numerous and important commodities can be dealt with.

The services of inspectors and analysts are essential, with laboratory services planned on district lines. The dominion analysts number twenty-three; the inspectors, twenty-seven; laboratories are located in Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, with inspectors at these and other points. This organization follows a definite policy planned to make the best possible use of all available facilities. The four main considerations are: first, to ascertain to what extent there is adulteration or misbranding in foods and drugs of the greatest importance; second, to arrange for correction at the source when adulteration or misbranding is found to exist; third, unless there is a menace to health, the officials of the department are not inclined to make seizures and institute legal proceedings until other methods of persuasion fail; and fourth, to avoid making the small retailer the victim when entering prosecution, unless we find the manufacturer or other party responsible for adulteration operates in such a way that we cannot obtain samples of adulterated stock on his premises. Before entering prosecution in any case, it is made certain that the offender has had previous warning. That is generally speaking the scope of the act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any regulation which requires manufacturers of food and drugs to submit samples to the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It seems to me that the work which has to be done under this vote is tremendous. Is the onus not put on the manufacturer of these goods to submit samples so that they may be examined; or do the inspectors have to go round from place to place and pick up samples, or do they wait until someone makes a complaint? Also, are such places as the Connaught laboratories in Toronto under inspection? There is no need for inspection there, but does inspection take place?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Surely that is not necessary. After all, the Connaught laboratories are under the observation of the government of Ontario and the university of Toronto. Are there any other places like that where we have unnecessary duplication of supervision? I think we should know a little more about this vote along these lines.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no provincial responsibility in regard to these particular functions; they are entirely a federal function.

In answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, the inspectors purchase their supplies on the open market. Of course there is a responsibility on the manufacturer and on the vendor; and if complaints are made action is taken, but generally speaking action is taken as a result of inspection and examination by the inspectors purchasing their own supplies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do these inspections relate mostly to food or drugs?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To both equally.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I certainly do not think there is any need for having an inspector at the Connaught laboratories in Toronto. I do not think any inspector we could put there would be able to pass on the products turned out by that laboratory as well as the people who are there. Whoever you have there as inspector might very well be transferred to some other job. I wonder whether there are other cases of the same kind. The Connaught laboratory is practically a government-owned institution, and I am certain that they can do all the inspecting that is necessary without having duplication by this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What my hon, friend says may be quite true. But there is responsibility on the federal authority to carry out these inspections. It casts no reflection on the Connaught laboratories. The inspectors go to any place where it is necessary.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the Connaught laboratory requested inspection?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that that has happened too.

Mr. GREEN: Have there been any cases of false labeling of goods imported from other countries?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that false labeling has been very substantial, about ten per cent at the points of entry.

Mr. GREEN: From time to time there has been considerable trouble with Japanese importations. Is that trouble continuing?

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is disappearing, I am informed.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many cases have been threatened with action during the past year for contravention of the pure food provisions of the act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not that information under my hand, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. McCANN: A year ago the Food and Drugs Act was amended so as to broaden its scope by the expansion of certain existing sections and the addition of certain new definitions and sections. The report says: When the amendment is proclaimed and provision made for its enforcement, cosmetics will come within the scope of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations for their control will be prepared.

Has the amendment been proclaimed and what are the regulations for the control of cosmetics?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that the legislation in regard to cosmetics has not been proclaimed. There was a second section in the bill, I believe, in regard to surgical sutures, and that has been proclaimed.

In reply to the question asked by the honmember for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) I think I have some of the information at hand. I believe my hon, friend also was about to ask for an explanation of the set-up of the vote in regard to temporary assistance, and perhaps I can give the answers to these questions together. As will be seen by looking at the details of item 238, there is a reduction in several items, as follows:

Telephones, telegrams and postage	$ 200
Equipment
Sundries	5,250
Materials and supplies
	97 750

This decrease, however, is offset by additional salary requirements of $15,285, due to statutory increases and the employment of four additional chemists whose services are necessary for the analysis of a greater number of foods and drugs on the market and the additional work occasioned by the amendment to the Food and Drugs Act of last year. Last year 28,050 samples of food and drugs were examined in the six laboratories of this department, as compared with 23,849 in the previous year and 23,408 in 1937-38. The services of four additional analysts were required to take care of this additional work. In addition, 50,573 shipments of foods and drugs were inspected at customs ports of entry. That partly answers the question of my hon. friend.

Then something was said about prosecutions, the answer to which will be found on page 108 of the report of the Department of Pensions and National Health, as follows:

During the year eighty-three prosecutions were instituted. Seventy-two of these cases arose from contravention of the regulations pertaining to meat, meat products and meat by-products. The remaining eleven prosecutions constituted infringements of the statute and the regulations made thereunder, dealing with drugs, jam, pepper, pickles and beverages. Voluntary payment of the minimum penalty and costs as provided by section 26 was accepted in seventy cases, and convictions were registered in thirteen

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a relatively small number of cases out of the many examinations that were made. Were those all the contraventions of the act that were discovered? If so, I think we are to be complimented.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the results are obtained more by persuasion than by prosecution.

Mr. COLDWELL: But there were more contraventions of the act than those indicated by the prosecutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think so. Probably they would be given the benefit of a warning in the first instance.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At page 99 of the report it states that there were 3,794 cases of adulteration or misbranding or both. It would seem that eighty-three prosecutions was a very small percentage of that number.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They were probably warned for the first offence. If there should be a repetition, there would be nothing else for it but prosecution.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to ask a question in connection with the importation of canned food products coming from countries where pure food laws are not in existence. I mentioned this point a year ago. Is any effort being made to keep out canned foods of different kinds, possibly canned meats, that are put up under conditions which do not comply with our regulations in this country? I know of things that have been found; I know of the conditions under which some foods are canned, conditions which are almost inconceivable, yet those food products reach our markets. I am wondering whether any restraint is placed upon the entry of foods put up in warm climates and shipped here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that they cannot be marketed 95826—414 under our legislation unless they conform to the provisions of this act. Of course there are some provisions in the Meat and Canned Foods Act which also govern the situation.

Mr. LOCKHART: If I might pursue that just a little further, in the warmer climates canned fruits are not put up under anything like the conditions that exist here. For one thing, the employees are not dressed in keeping with our standards. I do not want to labour the point, but I assure the minister that I have seen something of the conditions which exist, yet I saw those products sold in this city last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Possibly that comes under the other legislation I mentioned, but I shall be glad to look into the situation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just following the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), how could the inspectors here know that the imported foods were put up in conformity with our legislation? Does any inspection take place at the point of production in the country of export; and if not, how would we know?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon, friend mean within this country?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, outside this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no control there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then, when those foods reach the point of importation, how can we tell whether they were put up in a clean, sanitary manner or otherwise?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The only remedy we would have would be, first, the inspection and analysis of samples at the point of entry, and, second, a certain knowledge that does exist in regard to the standards of other countries. Of course these may not be lived up to, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What is the procedure in dealing with extravagant claims made for many patent medicines?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That comes under the next item.

Mr. HOMUTH: We have been talking about inspection. I do not know whether the minister can answer this question, but has the Department of Agriculture a special inspection branch which would check, for instance, the contents of certain patented foods such as hog foods and chicken foods, or would that come under this department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not certain, but my information is that they have such a branch.

Mr. HOMUTH: It does come under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: I was just wondering if we had some duplication of services, and whether, under this department, we might have an inspection service handling all these matters for the Department of Agriculture and other departments of the government. There is the possibility and the danger of overlapping, as was found to be the case in connection with motion pictures, and so on. I wonder if we have that here to a certain extent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, we have, to a certain extent. This is my note on that point: With the understanding that our own work under the provisions of this act is to receive first attention, analyses are made for other departments of the government as a matter of cooperation, especially where such departments have no laboratory in the district concerned. In the past, work has been done for the departments of national defence, post office, national revenue, agriculture and mines and resources.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) asked a question with regard to drugs, and he was told that it would come more properly under the next item. Could the minister explain why we should have three separate divisions: first, food and drugs; then, opium and narcotic drugs, and, finally, proprietary or patent medicines, which also contain drugs. What is the distinction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Because they are each governed by separate and distinct statutes.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is according to statute?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

Mr. HOMUTH: In connection with canned goods which perhaps normally would come under the Department of Agriculture, would the checking of weights, for instance, come under this department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; it comes under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSELL: We have been talking with respect to the Food and Drugs Act, and have considered foods put into cans and [Mr. Homuth.]

bottles, and foods otherwise packed. I have a question I should like to ask which may sound a little foolish. Perhaps I should know more about the Food and Drugs Act, but I am wondering if that act has any relationship whatever with the cooking of foods in restaurants. I assure the committee that this is not a foolish question, because I happened to find a cockroach in my soup not long ago. Surely there is something wrong when we talk in terms of pure foods, and at the same time find cockroaches in our soup.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps it was a pure cockroach.

Mr. HANSELL: There are many medical doctors in the house who perhaps would say that there is some nutriment in cockroaches; I do not know.

Mr. HOWDEN: There might be, if you had enough of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The tragic situation to which my hon. friend has referred is the responsibility of the provincial and municipal authorities.

Item agreed to.

Health branch.

239. Opium and narcotic drugs, $46,005.

Mr. POULIOT: I would be thankful to the minister if he would tell me at what page of the report of his department this branch is mentioned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Page 109 of the annual report for the year ended March 31, 1939.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. What are the qualifications of the chief of that branch?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The qualifications which would be expected in any officer of that kind: a knowledge of the statute, absolute fearlessness in carrying out the regulations based on the statute, a knowledge of the international conventions existing in relation to the narcotic traffic and similar qualifications.

Mr. POULIOT: Those are the qualifications of a policeman and a commercial traveller. They are not the qualifications of a chemist. Is Colonel Sharman the chief of the branch?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Not "charmant," but "Sharman." I want to know if he has any knowledge of chemistry, and if a knowledge of chemistry is necessary to discover narcotics in powders which may be sent to the department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With regard to chemistry I would say that our laboratories are used entirely for that purpose. In regard to the gentleman who heads the branch, I would point out that he has extensive ability in connection with conferring with the authorities responsible for law enforcement under the statute, and to my own knowledge he is highly regarded in all the provinces in Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: This is no answer. I ask the minister in the first instance if Colonel Sharman knows anything about chemistry, and if it is necessary for the head of that branch to know something about chemistry. Those are two questions, and I want answers to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no information as to whether or not he is a chemist. My opinion is, however, that he is not. In the second place, I think adequate precautions are taken to see that chemical requirements are met in other directions.

Mr. HOWDEN: If I know anything about the matter, this department helps to run down the distribution of illicit narcotics. That is what this expenditure is for. It is a branch set up for the purpose of intercepting opium, cocaine, heroin, and drugs of that kind, which are brought into the country illegally. The work of the department is really that of a super-policeman. It carries on detective work. Colonel Sharman is an old policeman, by training; he is an efficient officer, and I am happy to say these words in his defence.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, that is all right. The hon, member for St. Boniface may have met Colonel Sharman socially. But I was chairman of the civil service committee when I told him to appear before us, and as the minister is reluctant to tell the story I shall tell it to the committee. In the first place the name of Doctor Sharman was mentioned regarding some—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is not a doctor.

Mr. POULIOT: That is of very little importance. But I am going to show who he is and what he is. As the minister will not say it, I will say it. I want to inform the committee, because I seem to know more than the department, and I seem to know more than the hon. member for St. Boniface, for whom I have the highest regard. In the first place I asked Colonel Sharman if it was necessary to have a certain knowledge of chemistry to be the head of the opium and narcotic drugs branch, and he said, "Yes." I said, "Do you have any knowledge of chemistry?" and he said, "No." Then I said to him, "Did you ever have any experience with narcotics?" and he said "Yes." I said, "What narcotics?" and he said, "Nitric acid." Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Then I asked him—and I say all this for the information of the minister and for the information of the two good-looking gentlemen who are sitting in front of him, one of whom is blushing-

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not look this way, too.

Mr. POULIOT: And for the information of the hon. member for Davenport. Now, sir, the hon. member for St. Boniface mentioned that it was important to have a policeman at the head of the branch. The duty of a policeman is to make seizures. I asked Colonel Sharman if he had made any seizures while he was head of the branch, and he said "No." I said, "Who makes the seizures?" and he said, "It is the R.C.M.P."—the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I said, "Then, you are taking advantage of the work that is being done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to justify your position?" He was embarrassed; he did not answer.

I asked him, "In fact, what do you do?" He said, "We did something very important. When drugs were imported from China, it was important to decipher them. We got in touch with an expert in Washington, and we saw that that expert was sent to Vancouver to decipher the telegrams respecting narcotics which were there." That was the only thing done by the branch.

Sir, this is the most ridiculous thing. What is being done by that branch? Are they doing something towards seizing narcotics? No. Are they preventing one drug fiend from using narcotics?

Mr. HOWDEN: Yes, they are.

Mr. POULIOT: That branch?

Mr. HOWDEN: Yes, all the time.

Mr. POULIOT: Then how is it they do not make seizures? All they do is take advantage of the work done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, according to the evidence given by that same Colonel Sharman, when he was before the committee. Is there any chemist in the branch? I would ask the minister that question?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

Mr. POULIOT: Who is he?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is a travelling auditor and druggist.

Mr. POULIOT: How is it that he is not mentioned as chemist in the branch?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Among his qualifications is that of being a druggist.

Mr. POULIOT: What is his description in the details of the expenditures in connection with the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Travelling auditor.

Mr. POULIOT: Travelling auditor?—commercial traveller! And not only that; I would ask the minister a question about the tremendous amounts of money which have been paid to that Sharman to go to the League of Nations to sign papers or treaties about narcotics. I should like to know how many times he has been sent to Geneva to attend the meetings of the League of Nations. I should like to know how many times this policeman, who is head of the narcotics branch, has been sent to Geneva and what was the cost of his trips?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He has not been sent once to Geneva by this department. I am informed that several times he was sent by the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: Then he is an ambassador. He has ceased to be a policeman. First he was a policeman; then he was a commercial traveller, and now he is an ambassador. Was he on loan from the Department of Pensions and National Health? If so, how many times?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not that information before me.

Mr. POULIOT: Now here is a man who is a bombast, who has the qualifications of a policeman and yet is head of a branch at the ridiculous salary of $4,500. Just look at what is paid to the members of this branch which deals with opium and narcotic drugs. The list is quite long and I shall have to put on my glasses. First there is the chief of division, Colonel Sharman, who receives $4,500. Next there is an assistant chief of division. Is he a chemist? What is his occupation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is the assistant.

Mr. POULIOT: I know he is the assistant to the policeman, but I want to know his qualifications.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He was a former member of the mounted police.

Mr. POULIOT: Another mountie. Does he possess any qualifications in chemistry? The minister nods negatively. Then there is a travelling auditor. Is he a chemist? There was a scandal in connection with his appointment. You will remember that, Mr. Chairman, because you were a member of the civil service committee. It was a clear case of favouritism, as everybody knows. All this is on the official record. Next there is a principal clerk. Is he a chemist? Does he know anything about opium and narcotics? The minister nods his head. Then there are two clerks, grade four. Then there is one clerk, grade three, and one clerk, grade two. Then there is one stenographer, grade three; four, grade two; two, grade one, and one typist, grade two. I should like to know if any one of these people has any knowledge of chemistry. Can any one of them tell the difference between cocaine and Five Roses flour? When we complain about these people being appointed, we are insulted by the press. I protest strongly about this.

There is no reason for this branch because all the work is done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. All the qualifications that this man needs is the ability to sign his name on papers for the League of Nations. When I first complained about Colonel Sharman, the minister was not in charge of the department. I am surprised that the Department of Pensions and National Health did not take note of the time that this man was away from the department. This proves that his presence in the department was not necessary. I ask the minister if it is the custom of his deputy to allow employees to run around the world for other departments. If that is so, this deputy should be fired and replaced by a man like Doctor Yates. He has been endorsed by my hon. friend from Toronto, and I concur with him in that endorsement. It is time to get rid of a nonentity like the deputy minister here. I should like to see him replaced by Doctor Yates who is an able man. I do not see how the deputy minister gets away with it. He is paid $4,500 a year and he can leave his office to go away on trips. Note has not been taken of the time he was absent from his office. The Department of Pensions and National Health is in complete disorder and it is time the deputy minister was changed. We should get rid of the ruling class that is in that department, this class that takes advantage of the great word "health" in order to get fat on doing nothing.

Mr. HOWDEN: I certainly have no animus toward the hon. member for Témiscouata—

Mr. POULIOT: I have no animus, but I find it scandalous.

Mr. HOWDEN: -but I do not believe it is quite fair that he should attack a valuable official in this way in the House of Commons. I have known something of Colonel Sharman for a good many years. He is head of the narcotic drugs branch of the Department of Pensions and National Health. This is an investigating branch having to do with the illicit sale and use of drugs. During the last ten or fifteen years the illicit use of narcotics in Canada has practically disappeared. It is the work of Colonel Sharman to deal with the unfortunate victims of narcotic drugs and I think he has made a pretty fair success of his work. I do not know why this man should be attacked. I do not know him very well personally, but I know he is an old mounted policeman. He got splendid training in the force and was a senior officer before he was appointed head of this branch. He has given good service in the branch and I would not like this committee to be under any misapprehension as to the quality of his services.

Mr. POULIOT: I have every respect and consideration for the hon. member for St. Boniface, but I protest strongly against his use of the word "attack." I am not attacking a civil servant; I am judging him. I had an opportunity of judging Colonel Sharman when he appeared before the committee of which I was the chairman. I am telling this committee exactly what is there on the official record. There has been no attack on a civil servant any more than there has been an attack on or criticism of a butler or a bootblack. I think we have a right to criticize those who receive the money which we vote here. We can say what we think of them. I protest strongly against the use of the word "attack" being applied to the remarks of members of parliament in connection with the actions of civil servants. I warn the minister to be very careful because he cannot rely on all the civil servants that are in the department. I tell him that most sincerely and honestly. I say it as a friend to a friend, and I would say the same thing to any minister who happened to be in charge of that department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As a new member I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon, member for Témiscouata, who sits on the government side of the house. As yet the minister of this department has not risen to defend the chief of this branch. I for one will find it difficult to support an appropriation of $4,500 for a chief of a branch who so far has not been upheld by the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend is incorrect. I did that at the outset, at the first mention of this gentleman.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon, member has pointed out that this man is not a chemist.

Mr. POULIOT: He is not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: And also that the assistant chief is not a chemist.

Mr. POULIOT: He is not.

Mr. HOWDEN: His duties are not those of a chemist at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon, member for Témiscouata has placed before this committee certain information which to me as a new member appears to be quite relevant. Unless the minister can rise and say something in defence of this particular branch I shall have difficulty in voting for this item.

Mr. McCANN: I desire to associate myself with the hon. member for St. Boniface in his defence of the head of this department and of the administrative officers of the national health branch of the department. The tirade of abuse from the hon. member for Témiscouata is absolutely indefensible and unwarranted. If he is going to vent his personal spleen—

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, I rise to a point of privilege, and I would like the hon. member for Renfrew South, the would-be minister of national health, to sit down. He has no reason to impute motives to any hon, member. What I said was not of rancour, was not of anger; I just said what I thought I should say, in conscience, for the public good. I want the hon. member for Renfrew South to withdraw what he said, that I have been acting on personal motives of anger or hatred against any official of the Department of Pensions and National Health. He has no right to say that. I strongly protest against it and I want him to withdraw those words. He has no right to impute anything like that to any of his colleagues.

Mr. McCANN: The hon. gentleman in his last statement is imputing to me motives which were not intended. He cannot put words in my mouth. If he will listen until I have made my statement, perhaps he will then have some reason to talk. I say again that his tirade of abuse—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I ask you to decide the question of privilege.

Mr. McCANN: My language was absolutely parliamentary.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. member for Renfrew South kindly to sit down and listen to the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I ask the hon, member for Témiscouata to wait until the hon, member for Renfrew South has finished his sentence, when I shall be in a better position to decide the question.

Mr. McCANN: I say that the hon. member's tirade of abuse is indefensible, and if he is going to vent his spleen on public officials then it is too bad for the public service of this country. I submit to this committee that I would be in just as good a position to criticize the legal advisers of the Minister of Justice as he is to criticize the advisers of the national health branch. The gentleman who has control of this division is not a chemist. If a chemist were needed, one would be employed. He is an officer.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise, sir, to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has stated his point on the question of privilege and is now continuing his speech before you make your decision on that point. I should like to know if the hon. member has the right to impute personal motives to the member for Témiscouata. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Renfrew South is imputing motives, he is out of order. Although I did not follow the whole argument, I did not find any word he said there which was unparliamentary.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Chairman, I say that the gentleman who has control of the division of narcotics is considered by those who are in the best position to know, namely, the people with whom he is dealing throughout the country, to be a competent officer, and the results of the administration of his department bear out that contention. There is nothing more demoralizing, both physically and morally, than drug addiction, and if we in this country can get officers of sufficient courage and knowledge of the drug traffic to cut down that particular trade we are going to prevent a great deal of future trouble.

An hon. member asks if so-and-so is a chemist. When these seizures are made, when drug stores throughout the country are visited and samples are taken of what is purported to be sold as a drug one hundred per cent pure, for instance, codeine and heroin and other such drugs, and analyses have been made on the spot, those samples are sent in to the laboratory which is part of the equipment of the department. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the money spent in this division is well spent, and that the protective and preventive work which is being done by the narcotics division is work which should and does receive the commendation of people who are in the drug trade and of men who are in a position to pass judgment upon the work of that division.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I do not see how the hon. member for Renfrew South can state that a layman cannot express any view about this branch. It is all composed of laymen, and therefore we are all on a common ground.

On the other hand, sir, now that you have had time to check by the book of rules, I would ask you please to make your decision on the imputation of personal motives to the member for Témiscouata by the hon, member for Renfrew South. Has an hon, member the right to impute personal motives to any other member?

Before I take my seat, allow me to say that I am wholly in favour of the fight against narcotics; but it is not carried on by that branch, it is done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, where they have chemists who can do their own job and do not have to transfer the whole thing to another department.

Mr. McCANN: May I ask a question?

Mr. POULIOT: Ask any question.

Mr. McCANN: Who would the hon. member suggest should carry on this work?

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. gentleman to sit down, and I will rise. I suggest that things go on as they are now, for everything is done by a department of the mounted police. According to the evidence of Colonel Sharman, all the analyses are made there. The analyses are not even made in the national health branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is incorrect.

Mr. POULIOT: Then there has been a change. I will tell my hon, friend that if he is right, Colonel Sharman is wrong, because when he appeared before me, Colonel Sharman told me that all the analyses were made by the mounted police. Things may have been changed and he may now have all the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed that the hon. member's information is entirely incorrect.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. POULIOT: Well, all right, but I was badly informed by Colonel Sharman when he made that statement to me in the committee. I want to tell the hon. member for Renfrew South that there are three things involved in the opium and narcotics service: first, the inspection; second, the seizure; third, the analysis, and afterwards there are reports, prosecutions and so on. But in this case it is my personal knowledge, as having had first hand information under oath from the chief of the branch himself in one of the special committees of this house, that the branch were making no seizures; and I would ask the minister if they are making any seizures.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The police make the seizures.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. The minister is confirming what I say. The branch do not make any analyses. If an analysis is made by the department, it is made by the laboratories branch, which is an altogether different branch. Therefore, what is the use of the opium and narcotic drugs branch, which is the fifth wheel of the coach? That is the point. Moreover, half of the time the chief is not there; he is travelling to Geneva, signing papers he does not understand.

For all these reasons I do not see why we should vote such an enormous amount of money for nothing. I do not have to stand for abuse by any hon, member, because I am carrying on the fight of the common people. I should like to discuss the same matter before the electors in Renfrew South or anywhere else, and I should get the cheers of the crowd.

Mr. KINLEY: I have had considerable experience in the wholesale and retail drug business. I have been handling narcotics for many years, and I wish to say that the action of the national health branch in the protection of the public against the improper use of narcotics has been most stringent, and, I believe, most effective. With regard to this protective work, there is a man whose name, as I recall it, is Nairn, a graduate of the Ontario pharmaceutical college. I know that he visits Nova Scotia, and he calls on the wholesale trade and makes tours of inspection all over the country. In all our stores the mounted police come once a month and check up on the narcotic books. Your books must be kept in proper order and must be balanced. Once in a while we may hear of some drug addict and usually it is someone who has the privilege of using the drug in some way or another, but the detective work of the department is scientific and most efficient. In my opinion the National Health branch is doing splendid work, and the use of narcotics in Canada, as I know it, is almost entirely legitimate.

With regard to what has been said about the deputy minister, I feel as a personal friend that I should say a word. For eight years I have been president of the St. John Ambulance Association of Nova Scotia, and the deputy minister of health I have known as one of the leading officers of that organization in Canada. In all my communications and dealings with him I have found him a publicspirited man highly thought of by the order of Saint John in Canada and by members of the association to which he has given most valuable service. It seems to me that there should be some chivalry in referring to public servants. We should refrain from attacking a man who cannot defend himself, an officer who comes here to assist his minister. I believe there should be criticism where necessary, and while no doubt the hon, member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has done a great service to the country as an iconoclast who has torn down shams, at the same time, as one coming from the eastern coast of Nova Scotia, I think it is my duty to convey a word to this official, from Ontario, who is now attacked, and tell the committee that in the dealings of the Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, of which I am a past-president, and of the Dominion Pharmaceutical Society, of which I am an honorary president, we regard him as eminently fitted for the position he holds.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon, member for Témiscouata has on two occasions made statements with regard to the chief of this particular division and the minister has remained silent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. That statement is absolutely incorrect. If the hon, member will look at Hansard to-morrow, he will see that the first words I uttered were those of the highest commendation for this particular officer, Colonel Sharman, and I wish to endorse all that has been said by hon. members who have come to his defence. I have not known him long in this department, but I have known him as an individual for years. I have known him as a gallant officer who distinguished himself in the great war and who has won a national reputation for himself and an international reputation for the wonderful work which he accomplished for this country at Geneva.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Thank you. This statement should have been made earlier by the minister. The hon, member for Témiscouata also referred to a certain scandal in connection with another chief in the department, but that has not been mentioned by the minister. The hon, member referred to a scandal in connection with the appointment of one of the chiefs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. MARSHALL: A number of questions asked on the floor of the house could be answered by a perusal of the report published by the department from year to year. The report which has been tabled during the session deals with the work of the department for the year ended March 31, 1939, about fourteen months ago. Is it the intention of the minister to table during the present session the report for the year ended March 31, 1940?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. This session of parliament came so soon after the end of the fiscal year that it was a physical impossibility to have the report printed in time to comply with the fifteenday rule. However, I have every hope of having it tabled during the present session.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much of the $50,780 which was voted last year under this item was actually spent during the year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The sum of $50,239.33 was spent last year.

Mr. MARSHALL: Practically 100 per cent of the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HON. NORMAN ROGERS

DEATH OF THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE IN AEROPLANE ACCIDENT—TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, about seven o'clock last night I received a telephone message from my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Rogers) asking me if I had received news that seemed more threatening at that moment than any which had been received before. He was referring to the possibility of Italy coming into the war [Mr. Nicholson.]

to-day. He mentioned, as his reason for asking me this question, that he had made an engagement to address the Empire and Canadian clubs at Toronto to-day, but was considering, in the light of the menacing situation abroad, the possibility of cancelling that particular meeting. He asked me my opinion about his doing so. I replied that I considered it important that all of us should realize the seriousness of the situation as it was at the moment, but said I was afraid that, if he were to cancel his trip to Toronto at this time, some undue alarm might be occasioned from the fact that the Minister of National Defence had not been able to carry out an important engagement which he had made. He said to me that he would like to be in the house to-day, and would arrange to fly to Toronto and return by aeroplane after the meeting.

I received this afternoon the intimation that my colleague and very dear friend had left this morning about eleven o'clock to go to Toronto to keep his engagement. He had been working on departmental work until the moment he left. At twenty minutes to three this afternoon word came that the plane in which the Minister of National Defence and others were flying to Toronto had crashed somewhere near Newcastle. It is my very sad duty to have to inform hon, members of the house that among others who were killed in that accident was my friend the Minister of National Defence.

I should say to the house that when we had concluded our conversation, the last words Mr. Rogers addressed to me were, "Very well, I will carry on"—carry on with the engagement that he had made. I feel that these are the words that he would like me to give to my colleagues, to all hon. members of this house and to the people of the country at this time. Come what may, a solemn obligation rests upon the shoulders of all of us, and that obligation is to carry on, no matter what the circumstances may be.

This house and the country will appreciate to the full, I believe, how great is the loss Canada has sustained in the death of the Minister of National Defence. I have known many noble characters in my life, but I believe I speak not only my own feelings but the feelings of my colleagues and of many others of those around me when I say that I have never known a more faithful public servant. I do not know that I have ever known a better administrator of public affairs. I have never known a more disinterested servant of the state, nor have I ever known a more beautiful nature or a nobler soul than that of Norman Rogers.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure we are all profoundly shocked at the sad intelligence which came to us just a few minutes ago. It was not my privilege to know Mr. Rogers intimately. In fact I cannot recall having seen him until I reentered this house a few weeks ago. But I have long known of his fine intellectual qualities and activities, and I have foreseen for him a great future in the public service of this country. He came from a province which has contributed perhaps more than any other, having regard to its numbers, to the intellectual and public life of Canada. He came of fine old Welsh stock. I am satisfied that had Norman Rogers lived he would have occupied an even higher place in the councils of this nation. I cannot say more at this moment except that from the heart and mind of everyone here there will go forth to his loved ones the utmost sympathy of which we are capable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before concluding, I had intended to mention to my hon. friend that it has been my sad duty just before the house met to impart to Mrs. Rogers the news of her loss. I was going to ask, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has already done, that you, Mr. Speaker, convey to Mrs. Rogers and her two sons, and I might also add to Mr. Rogers' father and mother, the very deep sympathy of all hon. members of this House of Commons.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On behalf of the group with which I am associated I wish to extend our heartfelt sympathy to the government, to the friends of the late Mr. Rogers in this House of Commons, and to his widow, children and other relatives who have suffered such a sad loss. May I say simply and in a few words that we in this group have had a very high regard for the late Minister of National Defence. We have admired his integrity; we have appreciated his singleness of purpose. We sympathized with him in his arduous duties as Minister of Labour, and we feel that the government and this house have lost a valuable colleague and our country the services of a worthy son.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the French-Canadian people have lost in Mr. Rogers one of their best friends. His presence at the head of the Ministry of National Defence was for us, I would say, a guarantee and a hope. He had a noble soul and a heart of gold. I deem it my duty to add to the tribute which is being rendered to him to-day the deep sympathy of the people of the province of Quebec for his family, for the Prime Minister, for the members of this house and for the Canadian nation.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I believe all will agree that the late minister was one whom all men instinctively trusted; I know of nothing greater that could be said of any man. My group sympathizes deeply with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), both personally and as the chief executive of this dominion, in this hour of great trial. We trust that the hand of providence will so manage matters that the loss will not be irreparable. To those who have been bereaved we extend sympathy which lies altogether too deep for words.

EUROPEAN WAR

RESOLUTION OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT APPROVING ENTRY OF CANADA INTO STATE OF WAR WITH ITALY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances of our great loss, ordinarily I would move that the house should now adjourn. But just a few moments ago, I received a cable from London, dated June 10 and signed by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, worded as follows:

Signor Mussolini is reported to have stated at 6 p.m. to-day that declaration of war had already been handed to the ambassadors of Great Britain and France.

We may assume I think that this statement indicates sufficient authority for this house to declare at as early a moment as possible where it stands in reference to the situation created by Premier Mussolini's action, which was not unexpected. In anticipation that at any moment this step might be taken, I had prepared a few words which I believed to be appropriate. I have added to them somewhat since the announcement of Italy's entry into this war was received. I should like to place them on Hansard, and when completed, move a resolution, a copy of which has been sent to my hon, friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and which he has been kind enough to say he would be prepared to second.

I have just this instant been handed a note from the under secretary of state for external affairs, which reads:

National Defence says Admiralty signal received saying hostilities will commence against Italy midnight, seven p.m. Ottawa time.

After many months of preparation, provocation in act and word and threat of open hostility, Italy has thrown her resources into the war at the side of nazi Germany.

The motives that have inspired the government of Italy, and the methods which Italy has pursued are well known. With a callousness and treachery second only to that of Hitler, the German dictator, Mussolini, the dictator who holds the Italian people in thrall has chosen what he believes to be the psychological moment to strike at Britain and France in the Mediterranean and Africa in order to satiate his lust for conquest and territorial aggrandizement, and for such glory as calculated duplicity and treachery can bring.

Barely eighty years ago, the peoples of Italy passed from serfdom and disunion to liberty and unity. In the struggles which are imperishably associated with the names of Mazzini, Cavour and Garibaldi, the English speaking peoples gave to the Italian people a moral and material support that contributed in no small measure to the establishment and preservation of the Italian nation. At a time when the rest of Europe looked with eyes of apathy, and even of hostility, upon the rebirth of Italy, the government of the United Kingdom in a memorable dispatch advised the Italian people that they turned their sympathetic eyes to the gratifying prospect of a people building up the edifice of their liberties, and consolidating the work of their independence. The shouts of welcome of the British people to Garibaldi still ring through the years. As his great English biographer said:

Garibaldi will live as the incarnate symbol of two passions not likely soon to die out of the world, of love of country and the love of freedom kept pure by the one thing that can tame and yet not weaken them, the tenderest humanity for all mankind.

Italy grew in power and influence amidst many evidences of goodwill from those who had hailed her rise to nationhood. Her citizens were welcomed in all the lands of the British commonwealth beyond the seas, and not least in Canada. In the last great war, she shared with us the burden of the day. She was rewarded with some of the fruits of victory. Through many generations Britain and France and their sons and daughters have turned to the art and literature of Italy for solace and inspiration. To countless millions her capital city has been one of the holy places of the world. From Rome the spiritual power and comfort of an ancient and undying faith have gone into the lands of all the earth.

All members of the house will join me, I know, in paying a tribute to the noble example set by the present occupant of the Holy See in his unceasing work for the preservation of peace and the exaltation of humanity itself, amidst the discord and clamour of the world which is falling in ruins around us. All these ancient traditions of freedom and good-will, of true religion, of literature and of art, have been trampled upon and cast by wicked men into the darkness and dust.

It would be a great mistake to underestimate the seriousness of the new situation which has been created. Italy is a nation of forty millions. Under the domination of her dictator, she has been preparing for war longer than any other nation in Europe. A whole generation has been educated to glorify force. It is useless further at this time to regret the degradation of a free and peaceful people, to seek the causes for the change, or to condemn the evil doctrines which have poisoned the hearts and minds of Italian youth. The very names of Ethiopia and Albania are reminders of the use of overwhelming force to subdue the weak.

While at the moment the allied world breathes harder, it may truly be said that it breathes more easily. The suspense of the Italian threat which, since the outbreak of war in Europe, has hung like the sword of Damocles over the heads of the British and French peoples, has now been removed. They are no longer faced with endless duplicity. The addition of Italian strength to the enemy will need redoubled energy and increased determination on the part of us all. Knowing where Italy stands has, nevertheless, cleared the atmosphere and freed the hands of Britain and France for immediate and vigorous action.

The spread of ruthless warfare into other seas, and on other shores, may well have an incalculable effect upon the opinion and attitude of those who still call themselves neutral. While Italy has it in her power to occasion much damage, and to divert the allied effort from the main task of defeating her senior partner, she is herself particularly vulnerable both on the military and economic fronts, and cannot for long hope to stand the strain of war.

History, I believe, will record no action more ignoble than that of Mussolini. During these tragic months he has sat like a carrion bird of prey waiting for brave men to die.

To-day, he has declared war on those who were the traditional friends of his countrymen.

Callously and cynically, he has chosen what he believes is the fateful hour for the swoop and the treacherous blow.

Peaceful overtures, proferred concessions, bonds of ancient friendship sealed by the memory of common sacrifices in the cause of freedom—all these he has bartered for the vision of conquest and the phantom of power.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

No one can foretell the horrors that the spread of warfare may bring to the world. But one thing is sure. Retribution will overtake all tyrants, and the dictator of Italy amongst them. It is too early to predict the final effect of this treachery upon those who cannot sit idly by and watch the whole world engulfed in the seas of battle. We may rest assured however that the forces of liberty will rally in a supreme effort of victory.

As for Canada, this new peril to the allied cause will only increase our country's determination to stand resolutely at the side of Britain and France until the powers of evil which threaten the freedom of mankind are vanquished once and for all.

May I add for the information of honmembers in the house that appropriate steps have already been taken to ensure within Canada itself against any threat to internal security arising out of the action of the Italian dictator and his fascist forces.

I should like now to move, seconded by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson):

Whereas Italy has declared her intention to enter the war on the side of Germany and against the allied powers; and,

Whereas a state of war now exists between the United Kingdom and France on the one hand and Italy, on the other; and

Whereas at the outbreak of war the parliament of Canada decided to stand at the side of the United Kingdom and France in their determined effort to resist aggression and to preserve freedom;

It is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the entry of Canada into a state of war with Italy, and that this house does approve the same.

May I say that when this resolution is passed, its adoption by both houses will be followed by a submission to His Majesty from his Privy Council for Canada, with a view to the authorization by him of a proclamation declaring the existence of a state of war between Canada and Italy.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was good enough to communicate to me notice of the intention of the government to introduce this resolution in the event of Italy declaring war on the side of Germany and against the allied powers.

This afternoon he sent me a copy of the resolution, and I rise for the purpose of seconding and supporting the resolution and the action of the government in the premises. To do anything less would be evidence of a lack of solidarity on the part of this nation.

The fascist dictator has proven true to the predictions of the peoples of the civilized democracies. Like the vulture, he viewed the progress of events from afar, and now, thinking this hour the hour of extremity of our gallant ally France, he swoops, like the vulture he is, in order that if possible he may profit by the situation.

While I have no authority to speak on behalf of the allies, yet I do feel it incumbent upon me to voice the feeling that, while the entry of Italy into the war is adding to the great burden which the allies are carrying, it will be met with dauntless courage on the part of the allied nations. The move has been long expected. I feel the utmost confidence that this adverse situation, having long been foreseen, will have been discounted and that the armed forces of the allies, chief among them the French and British fleets, will be prepared to meet this added emergency.

As to Canada's attitude, there can be no doubt. Remote as we are from Italy, yet when she declares war on Britain she declares war on Canada. Notwithstanding the question of unpreparedness, Canada will do her part. We shall make some contribution against this new enemy.

This new situation constitutes a new challenge to Canada as an integral part of the empire. Let us meet it with high hope and courage, with the high purpose that, come what may, the British empire and Canada with it shall not yield until might yields to right and until Christian ideas and philosophies once more triumph in this distracted world.

I hope—I know—that this resolution will be unanimously passed. I know it will meet with the unanimous approval of the Canadian people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, last September parliament decided that Canada would participate in the war against Germany. To-day Italy has declared war against the allied nations. This war is none of our seeking; it is thrust upon us. And we have no option, it seems to me, but to accept the challenge and to go forward to ultimate victory.

There is no use entering into recriminations, but the long series of events marked by the names of Ethiopia, Spain and Albania afforded us perhaps opportunities in the past of preventing the disaster that has now come upon us. However, that is in the past; we live in the present. We shall cooperate with others in the house and in the country to endeavour to meet the challenge to our democratic institutions and to stop the spirit of aggression which now threatens the whole world.

May I take this opportunity of suggesting again that the time has arrived when the government should consider the mobilization of Canadian industry and resources in order that we may conduct the war efficiently and assist our allies to the best of our ability.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when, last fall, hostilities broke out, even before Canada declared war, the movement which my group represents in this house announced from Edmonton a firm determination to stand by the side of Great Britain with everything we had until victory was assured. To-day we are equally sternly resolved to do so. We feel that Canada thus far has not concentrated with singleness of purpose or completeness of effort upon the winning of this war. We believe that there are measures which must be taken before we can with full national unity and utmost endeavour prosecute this war with the best possible chance of winning it. We urge at this time upon the government that such measures be taken as will enable this country to go forward with assurance, with confidence, with perfect morale, with maximum effectiveness toward the goal of ultimate victory for Christianity, democracy, and righteous ideals.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to challenge the doctrine of the motion upon the same grounds which I expressed when we declared war against Germany, namely, that I am opposed to any such separatist motion because when Britain is at war Canada is at war; also because it is not Canada that will decide what shall be done—the enemy, a belligerent, will decide that Canada is at war. Ever since 1921 I have opposed in this house the policy of separatism. We see to-day the results of that policy. This house in the Ethiopian war passed a resolution for sanctions against Italy; then, when the Prime Minister was down south, they revoked sanctions against Italy. In the result, Italy, one of our oldest allies, was driven into the German orbit. On Good Friday of last year she was shoved into Albania by Germany, and she became in my opinion nothing but a vassal state of the German reich. Another of our loyal allies, Japan, by the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance in 1921, in order to appease the United States, was driven out of her alliance with the British empire.

Let it be remembered that for four and a half years in the last war Germany fought the whole civilized world when the allies had Italy, Japan and ultimately the United States of America on our side. The reaction to the collapse of Dunkirk, the Vimy Ridge disaster, and the entrance of Italy into the war should be to place the onus upon the government and not let the government shelter itself behind the appointment of committees or commissions. The onus is upon the government to tell the people of Canada our position in this crisis, and their policy, on the question of national service; it is for them. Are we safe? We know we are not safe. We know that, so far as the issue of this war is concerned, the fate of Canada will not be decided at Quebec or Vancouver or Montreal. It will be decided for this dominion on the English channel and on the soil of France, and in England, and by the air force over England.

I have opposed all along this policy of separatism. I believe that the policy which we adopted and which had the almost unanimous support of the group to my immediate left, the policy of the pacifist, the subordination of the empire to the league, has brought on this war and the disastrous defection of Italy and Japan, two of our best and oldest allies. I am opposed to any such declaration as is here proposed, because we are part of the British empire, and when Britain is at war so are we. In a radio address the other evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to England as our "ally". England is not our ally. We are part and parcel of the British empire in peace and war alike. It is such separatist policies and declarations which led our enemies in Germany and Italy to believe that the dominions would not respond to the call of the mother country.

For these reasons I repeat my protest against this resolution as unnecessary. I desire to challenge again in this house the doctrine upon which it is based, as I challenged it when the motion was passed declaring war upon Germany.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

EUROPEAN WAR

PROCLAMATION DECLARING A STATE OF WAR BETWEEN CANADA AND ITALY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the house will proceed in a moment to government notices of motions in order to take up the motion standing in my name respecting the defence of Canada regulations, I might perhaps be permitted to give hon. members one or two communications and statements which I believe they would wish to have immediately and which otherwise might not be reached in the course of the afternoon.

The first communication is one received this morning from the High Commissioner for Canada in Great Britain stating that His Majesty the King had given his approval at Buckingham palace at 10.55 a.m. British summer time to-day to the proclamation declaring that a state of war exists between Canada and Italy as and from the 10th day of June. The proclamation has since been published in the Canada Gazette, and I would ask the permission of the house to allow it to be printed in Hansard:

Proclamation

George the Sixth, by the Grace of God of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India;

Greeting:

Whereas by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada We have signified Our Approval of the issue of a Proclamation in the Canada Gazette declaring that a State of War with Italy exists and has existed in Our Dominion of Canada as and from the tenth day of June, 1940.

Now, therefore, We do hereby declare and proclaim that a State of War with Italy exists and has existed in Our Dominion of Canada as and from the tenth day of June, 1940.

Of all which Our Loving Subjects and all others whom these Presents may concern are hereby required to take notice and to govern themselves accordingly.

In testimony whereof We have caused these Our Letters to be made Patent and the Great Seal of Canada to be hereunto affixed. By Command, W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada. THE LATE HON. NORMAN ROGERS .

MESSAGES OF SYMPATHY FROM HIS MAJESTY
THE KING AND MAJOR-GENERAL MCNAUGHTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house, I am sure, would wish to know that I received this morning the following telegram from His Majesty the King:

Buckingham Palace, London, June 11, 1940.

Prime Minister, Ottawa.

I am grieved to hear of the untimely death of Mr. Norman Rogers and sincerely sympathize with you and the members of the government of Canada in the loss of a colleague whose services were so valuable at the present juncture both to the administration and to Canada.

George R.I.

Hon. members, I believe, would also wish to hear the following communication which was dispatched yesterday to myself and received this morning from Major-General Andrew McNaughton, the officer commanding the first division of the Canadian overseas active service force:

We have just heard of the fatal accident to the Honourable Norman McL. Rogers, Minister of National Defence, and all ranks of Canada's forces overseas join in expressing our deepest sympathy to you and to your colleagues in the government of Canada in the great loss you have sustained, and we ask that our heartfelt sympathy be conveyed to Mrs. Rogers and her family in their great loss. By a single-minded purpose, his tact and his understanding Mr. Rogers had endeared himself to all with whom he came in contact. For myself, I shall always be very grateful for his patience and for the consideration which he showed to me in the difficulties inseparable from mobilization and for the support which he continued to give.

GREENLAND

PROBLEMS ARISING OUT OF SEIZURE OF DENMARK BY GERMANY—APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have a statement which I should like to make to the house with respect to Greenland:

Members of the house are aware that the seizure of Denmark by the Germans created a problem for Canada as the nearest neighbour of the Danish possession of Greenland. The situation was given immediate attention.

The local authorities in Greenland are continuing to administer its affairs. The German-controlled government in Copenhagen is exercising no authority.

In view of the fact that the people of Greenland normally obtain most of their supplies from Denmark and intercourse has now been suspended, the Canadian government considered it should assist in maintaining the economic life of the island. The steamship Nascopie, which is regularly used in the Canadian eastern Arctic patrol, was dispatched on a special voyage with supplies to Greenland. It arrived last week and will shortly bring back a return cargo.

We have thought it desirable that our government should be continuously informed of the situation in Greenland and be in a position to discuss with the local authorities there any questions that might arise. Steps have accordingly been taken to appoint a consul and vice consul to Greenland. Mr. Kenneth P. Kirkwood, until recently first secretary at the Canadian legation at the Hague, has been appointed consul to Greenland and has already taken up his post there. Mr. Kirkwood, who was born at Brampton, Ontario, and is a graduate of the university of Toronto, after serving in the last war, first in the infantry and later in the air force, and working in the Far East, entered the External Affairs service in 1928. He was stationed at Washington and Tokyo before being appointed to the Hague. Mr. A. E. Porsild, who was born in Greenland and is a member of the staff of the Department of Mines and Resources, has been appointed vice consul. The United States has also appointed consular representatives in Greenland.

I may add that subsequently to Mr. Kirkwood's appointment, steps were taken to have Mr. E. D. McGreer at the Canadian legation in Japan, and M. Pierre Dupuy of the Canadian legation staff in France given the position and duties of consuls in addition to their existing work.

INDUSTRY AND THE WAR

CONFERENCE OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS WITH CABINET-SUGGESTIONS COMMUNICATED TO LONDON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A day or two ago my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke of the conference which a few days before had taken place between representatives of the manufacturers' association and the government. I intimated to him at the time that the government and the manufacturers had agreed that the best method of proceeding in the matter in which they were mutually concerned was to have a message sent to our high commissioner in London which would set forth the views both of the manufacturers and of the government with regard to Canada's capacity for producing munitions and other essential war materials, and the desire of both to have this capacity made use of to the greatest possible extent. I should like to read to the house, in order that it may be of record on Hansard the communication which has since been sent by the government to our high commissioner. It, better than anything else, will make perfectly clear the position of both parties with respect to the matter referred to. The communication was sent by myself on June 8 and was as follows:

On Thursday, June the 6th, our government received a large delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to discuss the situa-tion with respect to the manufacture in Canada of munitions and supplies for the United Kingdom and allied governments.

The delegation expressed great concern that

The delegation expressed great concern that Canadian manufacturing capacity continued to be used to such a small degree in the supply of essential war materials for the allied governments, despite the willingness of Canadian manufacturers to utilize to the full the resources of their plants for this purpose.

As you know, the government, both prior to and since the outbreak of war, have on many occasions both directly and through yourself, drawn the attention of the United Kingdom government to the availability of Canadian industrial resources, and recently in a telegram to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom I drew Mr. Churchill's personal attention to Canadian resources in this respect.

At my suggestion that they prepare a memorandum as to what points they felt should be randum as to what points they felt should be emphasized in representations to the United Kingdom government, the delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have sent me on June 6th the following communication:

The communication is then quoted in full as follows:

Dear Mr. King:

On behalf of the members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, I beg to thank you and your colleagues for receiving their delegation to-day.

We realize fully the burdens which members of the cabinet are bearing and the many demands on their time and only the vital importance of war production would have caused us to seek an interview with you at this critical time. We are very grateful to you and your colleagues for the patient hearing which was given to us and also for the extremely inter-esting and valuable information that we esting received.

You were kind enough to offer to cable immediately to the Hon. Vincent Massey, High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom, to ask him to take up with the British government the matters we discussed with you. You suggested that we prepare some notes which might be of some assistance in the drafting of your cable and we are glad to take advantage your cable and we are glad to take advantage of the opportunity which you have kindly given us, and beg to set forth the following sugges-

The suggestions are in quotations as follows:

"At the annual meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Winnipeg, May 29, 30 and 31, manufacturers from all parts of Canada expressed themselves very strongly in favour of mobilizing immediately the intelligence, skill, equipment and capacity of Canadian industry. They offered every possible cooperation to the Canadian, British and French governments in this terrible emergency. They expressed surprise and disappointment that, following the visit of their mission to England last summer and the presentation of Canadian industrial capacity, which was so well received in England, and the prompt appointment of a British mission to Canada, Canadian industry is being used so little up to date.

"To-day, a representative group of leading Canadian manufacturers met the Prime Minister and eleven other members of the cabinet in Ottawa and had a very helpful conference.

"Will you kindly discuss with the British government the following points which were made by the representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to-day:

- 1. Canadian manufacturers made war supplies to the value of $1,200,000,000 for the Imperial Munitions Board during the last war. This fact proves the capacity of Canadian industry. Canadian industrial expansion since then has made possible vastly increased manufacturing facilities, and a wider range of products, involving greatly improved technique. Full particulars were presented to the service departments of the British government by the association's mission to England last summer. This is in your possession.
- 2. Canadian industry again extends every possible cooperation to the British, French and Canadian governments.
- 3. There is available in Canada a great amount of industrial capacity, especially in the engineering, machinery and metal working trades with highly skilled technical staffs. Over a year ago, a survey of one hundred plants showed that these had available 3,000,000 square feet of floor space. Very little of this is in use now.
- 4. There is a great deal of machinery, equipment and tools used in peace time manufacturing, that can be adapted quickly to war manufacturing with good results in a general mobilization of industrial resources.
- 5. The time for placing small experimental orders is past. The British and French governments should advise immediately what they want in large quantities, and give Canadian manufacturers an opportunity to learn what is expected of them. On receipt of this information Canadian manufacturers will make their plans accordingly so as to use their plants to the best advantage."

That is the end of the suggestions which appear in quotations. The letter continues:

Permit me to assure you that the members of the delegation who met you to-day keenly appreciate your kind offer to cable Mr. Massey asking him to take up our suggestions with the British government.

Thanking you on their behalf, I remain,

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) Harold Crabtree,

President, Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Then my telegram to Mr. Massey continues as follows:

The government continue to be of the opinion that Canadian plants might be utilized to a far greater extent as a source of supply for the allied governments, relatively free from the danger of hostile action, and you are accordingly directed to bring this matter once more to the attention of the appropriate authorities in the United Kingdom, setting out in particular the representations of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association as quoted in paragraph five of this telegram. I shall be obliged if in so doing you will inform the government of the United Kingdom and the heads of the departments concerned that our government concur in the views expressed by the association and repeat the assurance of our willingness and readiness to do everything possible to assist in the development of increased production in this country to meet essential war needs.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF TWO MUNITIONS
PLANTS IN CANADA BY CANADIAN, FRENCH AND BRITISH GOVERNMENTS

On the order for motions:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) permit a question arising out of the statement he made a few moments ago? Last evening it was announced in London that the Canadian, French and British governments were cooperating to construct two plants in Canada for the manufacture of munitions, the cost to be some £4,000,000. Would the Prime Minister inform the house whether or not that is correct?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I was going to ask my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply to reply to that question. As a matter of fact I think he has already made a statement in the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he did.

Mr. HOWE: The statement is correct. I think that is true; I did make a statement upon it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPLICATION OF DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULA-TIONS TO PERSONS OF GERMAN OR ITALIAN RACIAL ORIGIN

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to lay on the table of the house an order in council approved yesterday which applies the dispositions of the defence of Canada regulations concerning the registration of alien enemies and the prohibition against the possession or use of firearms to all persons of German or Italian racial origin who have become naturalized British subjects since September 1, 1929; that is, within the last ten years prior to the outbreak of the war.

These will have to register and are forbidden to use firearms. In the same order in council authority is taken to photograph and fingerprint all persons who are detained under section 21 of the regulations or who are in lawful custody charged with or convicted of any offence against the regulations.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

the War Measures Act, Whereas, under the War Measures Act, chapter 206 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, it is provided that the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things and may make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may, by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion, or insurrection, deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

And whereas, in view of the existence of a state of apprehended war, a proclamation, under the said War Measures Act was issued on September 1, 1939, and measures for the defence of Canada have been taken thereunder;

And whereas, on September 3, 1939, P.C. 2483 was passed under authority of the said War Measures Act, being the Defence of Canada Regulations, numbered 1 to 64 inclusive;

And whereas, since that date several orders in council have been passed, amending, altering or adding to the said regulations;

And whereas, the sole reason for the authorizing of such regulations and amending regulations was that the public interest and the security of the nation required the making of regulations with respect to such matters as internal security and the prevention of sabotage, the treatment of aliens, the control of means of communications, the safeguarding of information likely to be useful to the enemy, the control of trade, shipping, civil aviation, transport and other activities; of the country in time of war;

Therefore be it resolved, That a select com-Therefore be it resolved, That a select committee of this house consisting of the following members: Messieurs Bertrand (Laurier), Brooks, Claxton, Coldwell, Diefenbaker, Dupuis, Factor, Green, Ilsley, Marshall, Maybank, McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), Ross (Calgary East), Slaght, and Turgeon be appointed to consider and review the aforementioned recurto consider and review the aforementioned regulations; with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses under oath and to report their opinions and observations from time to time to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house are already aware of the purpose of this motion, namely that of establishing a select committee of the house to review various enactments in the nature of defence of Canada regulations which have been made.

May I at the outset say a word respecting the regulations themselves. At the beginning of the special session of parliament held in September of last year the government tabled in the form of a red book the Defence of Canada Regulations which had been enacted prior to the reassembling of parliament. That volume contains a very full statement as to how the regulations came to be enacted. May I at this time say a word to bring to mind the essential features and circumstances in connection therewith?

First of all I would draw to the attention of the house the fact that the committee which had to do with the drafting of the regulations was established under order in council of March 14, 1938; that was as long ago as two years and three months. The committee was established some months prior to the conference which took place at Munich. It was a standing interdepartmental committee on emergency legislation, and was appointed under the authority of a minute of council dated March 14, 1938. I believe that fact of itself will show that quite some time ago the government had very much in mind a possible emergency which might arise, and was taking early action to anticipate one of the first matters which in that event would require consideration, namely internal security and related subjects, so that regulations essential to these ends could be put into force immediately, should the emergency arise.

The committee was composed of leading members of different departments of the public service. It was under the chairmanship of Mr. C. P. Plaxton, K.C. of the Department of Justice. Mr. J. F. MacNeill, K.C. of the same department was its secretary.

The terms of reference were:

To inquire into and report upon the whole question of legislation required in the event of war, or emergency real or apprehended.

The terms were expressly set out in the following general instruction set forth at the outset of the above-mentioned minute of council, namely:

That it is expedient in the public interest to institute standing interdepartmental committees to inquire into and report upon the practical problems concerning Canada which might arise in time of war or emergency, real or apprehended, and the measures to be taken in the event of a decision being duly reached at the time that war or emergency measures be taken on behalf of Canada.

As hon, members are aware, the War Measures Act was already on the statutes, and when the war began action was immediately taken under that act to have the various regulations for the defence of Canada duly enforced. The regulations themselves are set out in full in the report.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

I wish to quote only this one further passage from the report itself, namely the recommendation of the committee to the government made in July, 1939, just two months before the war. It is as follows:

To facilitate reference we submit a summary of our recommendations as follows:

(a) that the government be invited to approve in principle the draft Defence of Canada Regulations submitted herewith.

(b) that the government approve that the said regulations be immediately printed and distributed to such officers in the government service as will be required to administer them in case of need.

The foregoing recommendations were immediately approved by the cabinet.

Following this summary there is printed in the book containing the Defence of Canada Regulations a copy of the order in council under which the various regulations were put in force. That order in council is dated September 3, 1939.

Hon. members will have noticed that in the motion as I placed it originally on the order paper there appeared the following:

And whereas, further, a certain measure of criticism has been directed towards some of the aforementioned regulations as alleged to constitute undue and unnecessary interference with the liberty of the subject;

And whereas it is deemed advisable that parliament consider the matter; therefore be it resolved, that a select committee of this house—

And so on. The point to which I wish to draw attention is that up to the day of the meeting of parliament the criticism which had been directed against the government respecting the regulations was that they were too severe, that they went too far, and that they tended to deprive citizens of liberties in directions beyond which it was thought the government should deprive them. It was for that reason, knowing the situation as the government knew it, that we felt it would be advisable to have these regulations referred to a committee of the house, so that the members of the committee, after careful examination of the regulations, and after learning of conditions, as they would learn of them in committee, might see for themselves whether or not the regulations went too far.

The house had been in session only a short time when criticism began to be directed at us from an entirely opposite direction, not only from outside the house but also from some hon. members in the house. The government was being criticized on the score that the regulations did not go far enough. It was urged that they should be made more severe and to apply more widely, and that more action should be taken under them.

In view of that change in the criticism offered, I altered the motion as originally presented to the house, with the result that in part it now reads as follows:

And whereas, it is deemed advisable that a committee of the house consider the said regulations as amended to ascertain whether such regulations reasonably meet the requirements of the country in time of war.

In other words, I have broadened the motion so that the committee will have power to examine its subject matter from all sides, make its observations thereon and from time to time express its opinions respecting the same as it may wish, in regard both to the aspect of the rigidity and severity of the regulations and the other aspect of the necessity in some particulars to make them more rigid and extensive than they already are.

May I point out that the criticism of the government taking place in Canada, from these two points of view, is paralleled almost identically by what took place in the United Kingdom itself. In the United Kingdom, when the war broke out, it was necessary to provide regulations for the defence of the realm, just as it has been here for the defence of Canada. The criticism that was made of the government in Great Britain shortly after the regulations had been put in force was that they went much too far. If hon. members are interested in reading the nature of the criticism, they will find in the parliamentary debates of the British House of Commons, the official report for Tuesday, October 31, 1939. that the government had been very severely criticized for the rigidity of the regulations, and was obliged to agree to the regulations being referred to a committee for careful study and report. However, with the change in feeling that the treachery and other activities of the fifth column in the different countries aroused when Denmark was overrun and Norway was attacked, and later when Belgium and Holland were attacked, the whole tone and trend of public criticism were completely altered, and the government from that time on began, indeed, was compelled, to enact measures infinitely more drastic than anything that had been contemplated by the original defence of the realm regulations.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this illustrates something that we would do well to keep in mind at all times. As I said the other day, there are times and seasons for all things. Some things can be done at one time which cannot with propriety or wisdom be done at another, some things, if done at one particular time, which if done at another might serve a useful purpose, may create a situation worse than the situation which they are intended to remedy. The government has always been careful to watch public opinion in that respect in order to see, not that it may satisfy one extreme or the other, but that as nearly as possible its course may be a sane and reasonable one and one likely to appeal to the country generally.

I may say with respect to the scope and the rigidity or severity of the regulations as enacted at the outset, that so far as the government is concerned we fully anticipated that the minute war started it would take a much more violent form than it did. In other words, our view was, so far as we had been able to formulate it from sources across the sea, that in all probability there would be an immediate attempt to attack the British isles in particular by air, that there would be a beginning of such violence that much would be occasioned in the way of concern for internal security as well as for external defence. The situation turned out to be quite different. As a matter of fact, the condition, so far from being of the active intensity anticipated, was what might be described as almost static for many months. Most of the actual fighting was outside the British isles, being largely at sea or in the air over the sea rather than over the land. Because of that particular strategy on the part of the enemy the necessity for the regulations that had been passed for purposes of internal security did not make itself as manifest as would otherwise have been the case. There grew up as a consequence this criticism against the severity of the regulations.

In Canada criticism was expressed pretty generally in different parts of the dominion. While our recent political campaign was in progress, communications were addressed to leaders of the different parties and groups in the house asking what their respective attitudes would be toward these regulations if they were returned to power. I should like in this connection to read a communication which was sent to me by the Civil Liberties association of Toronto, as well as my reply. The Civil Liberties association is a responsible organization. Its president is Mr. B. K. Sandwell. Its membership comprises persons in positions of authority in different parts of Ontario. The association has since published the communications they sent to the leaders of the political parties, also the views of its members on democracy in war time, and particularly on the defence of Canada and censorship regulations. These have been put together in the form of a printed memorandum which I understand has been sent to all members of the house. The introduction to this memorandum is signed by Mr. B. K. Sandwell, president, and reads:

A few weeks before the general election a group of Toronto citizens addressed a letter to the leaders of the political parties in Canada, asking for some public assurance that they would undertake to have the defence of Canada and consensing regulations submitted to a and censorship regulations submitted to a systematic revision by a parliamentary committee as soon as possible.

The citizens group was greatly encouraged by the response of the party leaders and particularly by the warm assurance of the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, that it was his intention to submit the regulations to such a committee as seen the regulations to such a committee as soon as a new parliament was summoned.

as a new parliament was summoned.

The Civil Liberties Association was formed by the group; a further study of the regulations was made, and specific objections to particular sections of the regulations were noted in the hope that, when the parliamentary committee proposed by the Prime Minister was formed, it might find such a specific record helpful in its work of revision. The news of the calling of parliament prompts the Civil Liberties Association to offer this record now.

Signed for the council,

B. K. Sandwell

President.

As I have indicated, that memorandum was prepared in the month of May. The letter sent to me during the general elections was dated February 5. It read as follows:

The Right Honourable W. L. M. King, Prime Minister of Canada, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Prime Minister:-

In war, the duty of government is to be vigilant to suppress sabotage and other forms of assistance to the enemy.

For this purpose emergency powers are necessary and regulations are passed which must incidentally interfere with the traditional liberties of democracy.

But this interference should not be more than is needed for the efficient prosecution of the war. Thus regulations should not, by vagueness of expression and unwise application, become a means to the unnecessary curtailment of democratic rights.

This has been most clearly recognized in Great Britain, where freedom of expression has been substantially retained. When emergency been substantially retained. When emergency regulations came before the British parliament, they were criticized from all sides of the house and were submitted by the government for revision to a committee of all parties. As reenacted, they carefully define the powers and offences involved so as to safeguard personal freedom and freedom of expression.

We believe that Canada should follow the British example.

Defence of Canada and censorship regula-tions have been passed in Canada under the War Measures Act but have not been submitted for parliamentary revision.

The regulations, if applied without modera-tion and good sense, will cause bitterness and divisions which would impair the prosecution of the war and reconstruction thereafter.

Furthermore, the good will of the United States and its citizens towards the British empire as a whole may be prejudiced if it appears that the totalitarianism we are com-appears that the totalitarianism we are combating in Europe is making inroads in Canada. We therefore respectfully urge that you, as the leader of one of Canada's political parties, should publicly undertake that, upon election, you will take steps to have all defence of Canada and censorship regulations submitted for systematic revision to a committee of parliament as soon as possible.

Respectfully submitted on helpful a ground

Respectfully submitted on behalf of a group of Toronto citizens, a list of whose names I have the honour to enclose.

William C. Grant, Secretary.

To this communication I replied on February 8, 1940, as follows:

Dear Mr. Grant:-

I wish to acknowledge your letter of February the 5th, with which you enclose a letter of the same date, addressed to me, over your own signature, on behalf of a group of Toronto citizens, regarding the defence

Canada and censorship regulations.

May I say at once that my colleagues and I fully appreciate the great importance of safeguarding the traditional liberties of democracy under war time conditions. I wish to assure you, and the members of the group associated with you, that so long as this administration held. tration holds office, every precaution will be taken to ensure that the greatest degree of freedom, consonant with our belligerent status, will be preserved.

With reference to your suggestion that the defence of Canada and censorship regulations be submitted to a committee of parliament, I may say that it has always been the intention of the government that these regulations, indeed all legislation enacted under the War Measures Act, should be subject to study and consideration by a committee of parliament, and I may assure you that if our administration is returned to office it is our intention that this procedure be followed, when a new parliament is summoned.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

It was in compliance with the undertaking given at that time that the motion which appeared on the order paper the first day of this session was placed there. It might be well if when this committee, which no doubt will be appointed by the house, meets, I should be permitted to refer this memorandum to it in its entirety so that the committee may have before it all that the memorandum sets forth. I thought once of suggesting that the whole of the memorandum might be placed on Hansard, but it is rather lengthy and if the committee have the memorandum before them that would probably serve the purpose equally well. I might, however, place on Hansard the names of the members of the Civil Liberties association of Toronto so that hon. members may see the representative character of this particular body.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the Prime Minister leaves that part of his statement, would he say whether consideration has been given to laying before the committee, if, as and when it is appointed, the representations that have been made on this subject by other bodies in Canada, equally responsible, equally reputable, together with the names of the gentlemen sponsoring those representations? I have in mind some that I myself have received, and no doubt the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has been flooded with them. It does seem to me that if one association is to be singled out for the submission of its representations to the committee, it ought to be possible and would be proper that the representations of all responsible bodies should be submitted to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I entirely agree with what my hon. friend has just suggested. In fact, I was going to suggest that very course myself. I was reading this particular memorandum because it was one that I thought was more representative in the character of its personnel than perhaps any other I had received excepting a memorandum which came from a number of gentlemen in the city of Winnipeg, and which I was also going to place with this one.

I have in my hand at the moment no end communications which have come from different indivduals and different bodies with respect to the defence of Canada regulations. I shall be happy to see that all communications that have been received by me on this subject are turned over to the committee regardless of the particular views they may be advocating. I think the committee would wish to have them, and certainly the government would wish the committee to have these communications before them.

I desired to submit the two in particular which I have referred to because the one contains the letters which were sent to the leaders of all political parties during the campaign and was largely referred to throughout the campaign. The other is a memorandum on "Canadian Freedom in War-time" which has been submitted by Professor W. J. Waines of Winnipeg and is a carefully reasoned statement of the whole situation. It contains the names of so many persons whose standing will be immediately recognized both in their own community and in the country that I thought it desirable to refer to it particularly in speaking to the house on the subject.

On the opposite side, the submissions are to the effect that the government has not gone far enough. These, as I have said, are almost entirely communications which have come in since the early part of May, when the war took a different turn. They also will be submitted to the committee. Since receiving a number of communications of that character the swing is now beginning to return in the old direction. My office is beginning to get a large number of letters to the effect that the writers believe, if not our government, at least some other governments or authorities are in danger of going much too far again. For example, I received on the 5th of this month the following communication from the National Council of the Young Women's Christian Association of the Dominion of Canada, signed by Mrs. Harvey Agnew, president. It is as follows:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,

Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

At the 16th National Convention of the Y.W.C.A. held at McMaster University, Hamilton, May 27th-June 1st, the following resolution was passed, and on the authorization of the convention I am forwarding it to you:

"Whereas we deplore the growing tendency of some groups and organizations throughout the country to become self-appointed authorities to protect the people against espionage and sabotage; and

Whereas such action destroys the very basis of liberty and democracy, becomes a substitute for lawful government, creates panic and sus-picion and opens the way to dangerous action motivated by private prejudice;
Through the National Council

Y.W.C.A., we do urge the government to curtail such activity and reserve to itself the sole right to protect the people."

I imagine it would not be possible to give to the house reasons which would more amply substantiate what is proposed by the resolution, namely, the desirability of appointing a committee of this house to consider the whole question impartially, than the communications which I have just read, and which disclose the different trends of opinion as they swing back and forth with the changes of fortune in

There have also been publications of which the house is no doubt aware put forth by the Canadian Association for Adult Education, dealing with this question. I have in mind the first issue, "This Freedom-A Guide to Good Citizenship in Time of War," by R. S. Lambert, published by the Canadian Association for Adult Education. I mention it because I think it is another publication that ought to go before the committee which may be investigating this subject.

May I say just this one word in conclusion. It is the purpose which the government had in its regulations at the outset, and is the purpose which the committee, if appointed, should, I think, have in mind in connection with its inquiry. Regulations must be broad enough and stringent enough to ensure internal order and to maintain efficiency of the war effort; they must not impose any unnecessary restrictions on personal opinion and freedom of opinion. Freedom must be restricted whereever restriction is essential to winning the war; but we must remember that we are fighting to preserve freedom, not to suppress it.

I have no doubt that the committee will view its duties from the point of view which I have just presented.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this notice of motion is one of very considerable importance. It involves among other things the question of the safety of the state in war time, and as such should in my view be approached in a judicial manner and not otherwise.

With respect to the subject matter itself, may I say that during the last war Canada put into effect under the War Measures Act regulations which had the force and effect of law. These regulations were in operation during the period of the war, and automatically died, I understand, within a limited period after its conclusion. The regulations which have been adopted under the authority of that measure prepared by the departmental committee, to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has referred, are of course absolutely necessary under the conditions which have existed since the outbreak of the war.

There will always be a difference of opinion on this question of the liberty of the subject. We did not gain very easily or very lightly our liberty under the British constitutional system. A great price was paid, and of course in ordinary times that liberty is a priceless treasure to each citizen. But ever since I became a student of law I have been amazed at, shall I say, the extent to which legislatures from time to time have encroached on the liberty of the subject. More particularly has this been true of provincial legislatures which under our constitution are charged with jurisdiction over property and civil rights. They, if I may use the term, have been the greatest sinners. But this parliament has not been free from blame. Those of you who lived in communities which adopted the Canada Temperance Act, a statute which was enacted before I was born, and which was adopted, by the municipality in which I lived, more than fifty years ago and remained in force until comparatively recently, will recall that, either at the time of its enactment or shortly afterwards, this parliament made a long step towards encroaching upon the liberty of the subject when it took away from the courts of our country the right to the writ of certiorari to review convictions under that statute. This was an important step to take in peace time, but it seemed to be necessary having regard to the construction put upon the statute by courts of appeal and otherwise in our provincial courts. The effect was, of course, that a conviction for a violation of that statute could not be reviewed. Such was the intention of parliament; and if a prosecution took place before a prejudiced police magistrate the effect in many cases was that great injustice was done to the subject. Our courts in New Brunswick got round that provision of the statute by asserting that if a question of jurisdiction was involved they would look into the case, and do justice accordingly; and as a result a large measure of the injustice which would accrue to the individual subject under that statute was taken away.

This example has been followed on many occasions, particularly by our provincial legislatures. I have no intention of following up its history, but anyone interested in research of the kind who will observe what various provincial legislatures did in days gone by with respect to the prohibitory laws of this country, will be shocked at the extent to which the liberty of the subject has been interfered with by our law-makers.

These things happened in time of peace. If those interferences with the liberty of the subject were justified in peace time, how much more are we justified in war time in preserving the safety of the state. I have purposely not referred to the padlock law which was once passed by the neighbouring province of Quebec, because I understand that that is a matter of great controversy. At the moment I am simply interested in knowing whether that law is still in effect.

Coming to the particular question of the defence of Canada regulations, the principle under which, I apprehend, these regulations are passed is the safety of the state in war time. No more important question could occupy our attention at this moment than these very regulations. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen are aware of the extent of the danger to which we in Canada may be subject because of the presence in our midst of persons of German and Italian origin and nationality. I do not intend here to-day to create any strife with respect to assertions against the loyalty and good faith of many of these people who have settled in our midst. Fortunately or unfortunately we in eastern Canada have not many people of German origin living in our communities. But heretofore those who have lived among us have been peaceful and law-abiding citizens. I am bound in truth to say that. I am not so sure that that is the case in other parts of Canada. I wish to lay before the house a few figures which I have gleaned in the last day or two with respect to the magnitude of the problem, having regard to the number of people of these two nationalities who are now living in Canada.

If you will refer to the reports of the bureau of statistics you will find that, according to the census of 1921, there were 294,635 persons of German origin in Canada; that in 1931 this number had increased to 473,544, an addition of 178,909, or over sixty per cent in ten years. Of this number, 174,000-odd were in the province of Ontario, and over 241,000, that is more than fifty per cent of the whole number in Canada, were residents of the three prairie provinces. Now, we have not had a national census for nine years, but according to the laws of this country a census of the three prairie provinces is taken every five years, and the last census of those provinces was made in 1936. In that year on June 1, according to the Canada Year Book for 1938, the total population of those three provinces was 2,415,000, and of this total, persons of German origin constituted 12.8 per cent. This means that in June, 1936, there were in the three prairie provinces 309,000 persons of German origin, an increase of 67,000 in five years. The figures for the four years ended June 1, 1940, are not available; but on the same basis of growth as is shown from 1921 to 1931, there are now in Canada approximately 728,000 persons of German origin. That figure may be excessive, but it is founded upon a calculation of the number who are now here, based on the figures of 1921, 1931 and 1936, and of the percentage of growth, and I believe it is accurate. In the three western provinces there would appear to be an approximate total of 475,000 persons of German origin.

With regard to the number of persons of Italian origin in Canada, according to the census of 1921 there were 66,769; in 1931 there were 98,173, a growth of over 31,000, or approximately forty-seven per cent. On the same basis of increase there would be in Canada to-day nearly 140,000 persons of Italian origin. When you add that to the total of persons of German origin you can readily understand that the number of persons of these two national origins approximate one million souls. I mention these figures to give the house and the country some idea of the magnitude of the problem.

I would point out in the second place that the immigration figures of the last few years show that more Germans have been admitted as immigrants to Canada than Scottish, Irish and Welsh settlers put together, and this has taken place while Germany has been intensifying its grip in central Europe. I must confess that this whole situation has caused me personally sufficient alarm to cause me to accentuate it before the house and the country when nazi policy and nazi tactics are being considered.

Just how many of those Germans who came to Canada in the last six or seven years formed part of Hitler's campaign of peaceful penetration, to strike "for the fatherland" when the hour should come, may be a matter of conjecture, but Herr Hitler is on record in regard to this whole movement overseas. One Hermann Rauschning, a former president of the senate of Danzig, in his sensational book, "Hitler Speaks," recently published, tells of an address delivered by Hitler to a conference of nazi leaders from overseas countries as long ago as 1934 in which he is reported to have made the statement I am about to quote. I am going to take the liberty of reading this statement to the house because it contains, I believe, the heart and meat of the nazi policy with respect to penetration overseas for the good "of the fatherland." This is what Hitler is reported to have stated on that occa-

As the front line of our German fighting

"The front line of their fighting movement."

—you will make it possible for us to complete the occupation of our positions and open fire. You are the army's outposts. You will have to prepare definite enterprises for an advance of the front. You will have to mask our own preparations for attack. To-day you are perhaps the most important section of the German nation.

That is impressive language; and as to the principle which these overseas nazi agents were to adopt Hitler offered the following:

It is a good idea to have at least two German societies in every country. One of them can always call attention to its loyalty to the country in question and will have the function of fostering social and economic action. The other one will be radical and revolutionary. It will have to be prepared to be frequently repudiated by myself and other German authorities.

That is nazi technique.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I want to make it clear, too, that I make no distinction between German nationals and Germans by birth who are citizens of a foreign country.

That is a very important element in this technique.

Superficially we shall have to make allowances for such citizenship, but it will be our special task to train all Germans without distinction unconditionally to place their loyalty to Germandom before their loyalty to the foreign state.

That of course is an assertion that we in Canada will absolutely repudiate.

Only in this way will you be able to fulfil the difficult tasks I shall give you. I must leave to your discretion the means by which you train your fellow Germans to this new discipline. It will not always be possible without friction. For me success is the only criterion. It will depend on you gentlemen whether we reach our goal with comparative ease and without bloodshed. You must prepare the ground.

That is the basis of German penetration overseas under Herr Hitler, and I have made these statements and read this excerpt from the book in question as a report of Hitler's statement on the occasion to which I have referred, so that the Canadian people and the membership of this house may understand just what this German penetration means.

I come now to a consideration of the regulations themselves. The Prime Minister has correctly stated that a departmental committee was set up as long ago as March, 1938, and among the names are some of our best civil servants. The report was made in July, 1939. I do not recall that the Prime Minister read part of the report on page 6, but I do desire to call the attention of the house and of the country to the fact that the committee, in making their recommendations, had in mind that there must be of necessity under changing conditions modifications of the regulations from time to time. That is to be expected. The evolution in public opinion, to which the Prime Minister has referred, is just another expression of the changing times and the changing conditions. I know that there has been some hysteria in the country and I know that there also has been a good deal of complacency with regard to this important matter. But because public opinion is in a state of flux is all the more reason why we who are charged with the responsibility of carrying on in this court of highest jurisdiction in Canada should at least keep our feet on the ground and see clearly and speak properly.

The committee made this recommendation with respect to modification of the regulations, and they invited attention to two general considerations:

(a) The defence of Canada regulations cannot be regarded as final.

With that statement we shall all be in agreement.

The defence plans of the departments are necessarily subject to modifications in the light of changing circumstances, and although the draft represents the present views of all the departments concerned, it is certain that as the situation changes it will become necessary from time to time to add new regulations and to modify the terms of some of those already included in the attached draft.

(b) It is, of course, possible that not all of these regulations would be required in the opening stages of a war. The aim of the committee has been to produce a comprehensive set of regulations from which, in an emergency, the government of the day could select those required to meet the situation existing at that time. Other regulations could be introduced later as the situation developed.

That, I think, is a plain statement of fact with which we shall all more or less agree.

The thirteenth recommendation is with regard to the restriction and detention orders. I appreciate at once that all the controversy that has existed and that may exist centres around this regulation. The report states:

The committee unanimously recommend all regulations except No. 21.

That, of course, is the important regulation with respect to the restriction and detention orders. The sentence indicates that even in a departmental committee there will be differences of opinion; and if among these gentlemen who have studied the regulations, who are responsible for them and who no doubt have adopted many of the regulations passed from time to time in the United Kingdom, there is any difference of opinion, how much more would there be a difference of opinion among the public, and especially the uninformed public, of Canada?

I do not think the regulations from No. 1 to No. 21 call for any comment, but certainly No. 21 and the following regulations are of substantial importance. No. 21 is as follows:

21. (1) The Minister of Justice, if satisfied that with a view to preventing any particular person from acting in any manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state—

Those are the words upon which I predicate any statement I have to make—the safety of the state.

—it is necessary so to do, may, notwithstanding anything in these regulations, make an order:—

(a) prohibiting or restricting the possession or use by that person of any specified articles;

That would mean and include arms.

(b) imposing upon him such restrictions as may be specified in the order in respect of his employment or business. . . .

Then comes the next paragraph.

(c) directing that he be detained in such place, and under such conditions, as the Minister of Justice may from time to time determine:

and any person shall, while detained by virtue of an order made under this paragraph, be deemed to be in legal custody.

This is a plain statement which has great implications. It means the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus; and who is there among us to-day who will say that at this time the state should not have that right? That is my view. I am willing that the power of detention shall be vested in the competent authority represented to-day by this government, no matter what I may think of the government itself. Of necessity we must have power and authority which will take cognizance of what is occurring in this country and afford the necessary protection for the safety of the state. I do not think any of us should controvert or deny that statement to-day. As to the exercise of that power and authority there may of course be some controversy, but I am not one of those who would ask the Minister of Justice or this government to repeal section 21. I think that for the safety of the state in war-time such power must be vested in someone.

I know there has been a great deal of criticism with respect to the manner in which this power has been utilized in the past. We were told in answer to a question that there were some 16,000 alien enemies registered under these reglations but that there were less than 300 internments. There is a substantial disparity between the two figures. From the reports received by the minister from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there may be good and sufficient reasons why there have not been more internments of enemy aliens in Canada; I do not know very much about the situation, having lived all my life remote and apart from places where people of German origin are located. But having regard to the influx of people into this country since the beginning of the nazi regime; having regard to the nazi theories with regard to the penetration of foreign countries; above everything else having regard to what we have witnessed on the continent of Europe, in Norway, in Denmark, in the Netherlands and even in Belgium itself, I am astonished that not more than 261 Germans are interned in Canada at this date.

The only observation I have to make in that regard is this. The government is charged with the responsibility of administering these regulations and in the final analysis of determining who shall be detained and who shall be released. Some observations have been made in the country and in the public press, and I believe on May 27 last by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) himself, with respect to attempted political interference. Well, I should like to say that as far as I am concerned my hands are clean. I have made no representations one way or the other. The only thing I have ever done since war broke out is something which I think is the duty of every member of this house and every law-abiding citizen in Canada. If he hears of any person of German origin talking he should report the matter to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and let the police make an investigation and sift out the facts. When we do that I think we have done our full duty. I do not conceive that I am a detective, or that any member of this house is a detective. I do not conceive it to be my duty to persecute innocent persons or to carry on investigations of that kind. It is a task which must devolve upon the duly constituted guardians of the law.

I hesitate to express an opinion with respect to representations which may have been made to the Minister of Justice for the release of enemy aliens. I know the pressure that is brought from time to time on members of parliament to do things and to make representations to officers and members of the government which, if left absolutely to themselves, they would not do at all. Such is democracy at its worst. Sitting in this house in days gone by, in peace time, when measures were brought down or advocated on one side or the other, perhaps measures of vital importance, the thought has arisen in my mind, as I am sure it has in the minds of the best of us and the worst of us: How is this going to affect me in terms of votes? Well, this is far removed from that consideration, but one of the weaknesses of democracy is that we do measure things in terms of votes. In connection with this enterprise, at all events, let us rise above that consideration. Surely in respect to ourselves and to our nation we should rise above any thought of how a measure may affect us personally.

Therefore I say to the Minister of Justice that I would not repeal section 21. I would retain it. But I would also hope that in the exercise of these powers, he and his officers will bring to bear the very wisest thought they can command in the discharge of their duties. I know there are certain types of intelligentsia -we call them "pinks", on the street-who object to these regulations. In my own city there is a small university. I am not going to make any attack on the professors of our universities, but I have often thought that if they had a little more to do perhaps they would not give so much consideration to these abstract and academic questions, about which we continually hear from them. I am making no attack upon them; they represent a fine type of citizenship, but respecting some matters they have very advanced ideas, and that is true, I believe, of all university professors in Canada. I would say to them this afternoon: Be a little more practical; mix with the common people, and perhaps the pink colouring will shade into a more orthodox white. That is the message I would convey to our university friends in Canada.

Since this resolution has appeared on the order paper I have had representations from a gentleman connected with the university in my home town—the son of another professor, a very dear friend of mine. He has sent me a long thesis on "The Vigilantes and Democracy". I read with a good deal of interest what he has written, and I told him that if I were to advocate what he has laid down in black and white in his thesis I would lose my job as leader of the opposition. I am going to ask the committee to send for that young gentleman. He is educated, and he is entitled to be heard. He is a Rhodes scholar.

An hon. MEMBER: He is hopeless, then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, he is not hopeless, but his views may be radical. I should hope that if he came up here, were heard by the committee and subjected to the rough and tumble of cross-examination-to which I hope he may be subjected when opportunity arises—perhaps he would have some of the radical ideas knocked out of him and become a practical man with a keener appreciation of conditions which exist in time of war. I confess that when I read some of the theses advanced by the so-called intelligentsia of our country I become very impatient —and that is the least objectionable term I could apply. Most of these gentlemen have never been up against the rough and tumble of practical life as Canadian citizens.

I suppose what I have just said with respect to college professors—or some college professors; I should make that limitation—applies with equal force to some of the preachers in this country. I am an adherent of the United Church in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: Maybe some of the law-yers, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have sometimes thought that if I could get the ear of the moderator of the general assembly I should like to tell him something. I may have that opportunity.

Mr. REID: But he might be just as bad.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably he is not. If he is a man big enough to hold the responsible position of moderator of the United church in Canada I should hope he would be big enough to sense the responsibility of his position in relation to Canada and to Canadians at this critical juncture in our history.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Doctor Woodside certainly would.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would suggest to him that in his position he should, in my view, exercise such powers of discipline and moral suasion as he may possess with such of the ministers coming under his jurisdiction as have expressed opinions antagonistic to the spirit of the regulations in order that they might moderate their views, or at any rate have it made clear that such antagonistic expressions as have fallen from the lips of a small minority may not be considered the views of either the moderator or the great majority of the clergymen coming under his jurisdiction.

From what I know of the moderator and of the great mass of the clergy of the United Church, I am certain that they are among the most loyal of our citizens.

Section 22 of the regulations provides for the setting up of one or more advisory committees consisting of persons named by the Minister of Justice, the chairman of any such committee to be a person who holds or has held high judicial office. I am asking the Minister of Justice for some information on that point, if he speaks in the debate—and I presume he will.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That has been repealed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had not that information before me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was repealed some time ago. Instead of having an advisory committee composed of two civil servants and an outsider it will consist only of a judge who sits now on the bench or a former judge who has occupied or is occupying a high judicial position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words there is an advisory committee consisting of a high court judge?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has an appointment been made to that position?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not yet. Has it not been considered necessary to appoint such an advisory committee consisting of one person of high judicial standing? Has not an occasion arisen?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Since the making of the modification no single case has been submitted for review. Those who are there are staying there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words the Minister of Justice under the regulations is the final arbiter, and none of the provisions respecting appeal or anything of the kind have been brought into play?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Since some time. But the provision exists, of course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then there is not much to be said respecting section 22.

I have nothing to say as to section 23, but I have some observations to make with regard to section 24. I shall discuss some of the sections because I am not a member of the committee and shall not have an opportunity to appear before them; with that in mind I now place my views on record.

Section 24 deals with the arrest, detention and internment of enemy aliens in Canada. It starts out with this declaration:

All enemy aliens in Canada, so long as they peacefully pursue their ordinary avocations, shall be allowed to continue to enjoy the protection of the law and shall be accorded the respect and consideration due to peaceful and law abiding citizens, and they shall not be arrested, detained or interfered with, provided they comply with the requirements in respect of registration prescribed in the next following regulation, unless there is reasonable ground to believe that they are engaged in espionage, or are engaging or attempting to engage in acts of a hostile nature, or are giving or attempting to give information to the enemy, or unless they otherwise contravene any law, order in council or proclamation.

This brings me to a consideration of the question of subversive elements.

Mr. SLAGHT: I wonder if the hon, member would permit me to indicate to him that subsection 1 of section 24, which he has just read, has also been rescinded and a new regulation substituted therefor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be so; I did not know. I thought the regulations I have in my hand were up to date, but if the hon. member says the one I have read has been repealed and a new one substituted, I shall accept his word. I assume however that the principle of the regulation is the same; it may have been strengthened. I should like to give some consideration to the matter of subversive elements in this country. It is something which is causing a good deal of concern, and properly so, in certain parts of Canada.

In a speech which he delivered in Toronto on May 15 the attorney general of Ontario referred to this matter. He gave a definition of an enemy alien and dealt with the question of the disposition of enemy aliens by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My opinion is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be greatly strengthened and be given practically the whole say, perhaps with certain reservations to which I shall allude later, as to who should or should not be interned. I do not see how it is possible for the Minister of Justice to sit here in Ottawa as final arbiter and act on the basis of written reports. The head of the mounted police in the province would have had before him the person in question. He would have subjected him to cross-examination and observed his demeanour. He would thus be familiar with the history of the man and all the other ramifications of the case. I earnestly suggest to the minister that he over-rule the recommendation of the police only in cases of extreme injustice. As a Canadian citizen I am quite willing to leave this matter in the hands of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They should not be interfered with in the discharge of their duty.

I leave the matter there with respect to enemy aliens, but with respect to subversive elements, I should like to say a word. These elements were referred to by the attorney general of Ontario in his speech. Where an enemy alien is arrested under the defence of Canada regulations, that is the end of the matter. If he is interned, he is there; he is in legal custody and there is no trial. This is in legal custody and there is no trial. may be considered an extreme provision, one which we would not tolerate in peace time; it means the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and other processes. But it is for the safety of the state in war-time, and as lawabiding citizens we must be ready to submit to this sort of thing. This power of course should be exercised judicially. In the few brief words I uttered on this subject on May 20 I referred to what had existed in the United States during the war between the states. All any hon, member needs to do to follow up this matter is to read the history of the United States during that period. The whole nation was seething with treason and sedition against the north. The government was forced to take the most extraordinary steps. Persons were incarcerated in military fortresses in defiance of the writ of habeas corpus, all for the safety of the state and the union. It was one of the strangest incidents in the history of that struggle that a member of the cabinet who recommended that course of action, subsequently, upon being appointed chief justice of the United States, delivered a judgment to the effect that that action of the government was ultra vires. I cannot understand why he should have delivered judgment in a case to which he had been a party; but it is a matter of history.

These subversive elements create a situation which is most difficult to deal with. Under the defence of Canada regulations a man may be incarcerated without trial, but an entirely different situation prevails in respect of persons other than alien enemies who have to be dealt with. The enforcement of the law is left entirely to the provinces, which endeavour to enforce the regulations against subversive elements. These people have all the safeguards of any other accused person. They may be tried under summary conviction or on indictment. All of us who have had to do with practice in the courts know how difficult it is to obtain a conviction, say on a charge of conspiracy. If hon, members want any better evidence perhaps my hon, friends in the far corner from Alberta will tell them what has happened in that province in connection with charges of conspiracy in the tobacco business. In most cases it is almost impossible to get direct evidence of express statements and action on the part of an accused person. These things have to be spelled out of the evidence. I take it from the speech of the attorney general of Ontario that that province has had the greatest difficulty in obtaining convictions. Yet we all know that these things exist.

If I were to make a recommendation I would ask the minister to look into this angle of the case and if possible strengthen the law in order that we may deal effectively with this most difficult situation. There are subversive elements in this country just as there are rumour-mongers and alarmists who do considerable damage. Our people get alarmed, perhaps unduly, but quite often there is basis for their alarm. The responsibility rests upon those who are charged with the government of the country. The observation which I would make to the minister at this time is that he should give consideration to strengthening the provisions of the regulations which deal with this aspect of what is admittedly a difficult situation, with a view to making it easier to obtain convictions where convictions ought to be obtained.

For some considerable time I have not had much to do with the administration of criminal law. In my practice in connection with capital cases in years gone by I had what is perhaps a unique experience. I never lost the defence of a capital case, and I never was able to secure a conviction in any capital case in which I was the prosecutor. I have had connection with quite a number. I have no doubt that in most cases justice was done, but it has been my personal experience that except in an absolutely open-and-shut case it is almost impossible to obtain a conviction in this country. I have great respect for our jury system, but it slips at times. On one occasion when I was defending a man one of the members of the jury did not have the manhood to state in advance that he did not believe in capital punishment. Certainly he would not vote to convict a man, and this is an illustration of what I mean. I hope the minister will give consideration to this particularly difficult phase of the matter.

Section 26 provides for a tribunal and an appeal. I would ask the minister if there has been any exercise of the appeal functions under this section. I understand that Mr. Justice Hyndman has been appointed to head the tribunal. That, I think, was a good appointment; he is an experienced jurist and a judge of high standing.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I tell my hon, friend at once that this sort of appeal on the part of an enemy alien incarcerated was taken away by an amendment that was made some time ago. I found out that in no other belligerent country was any similar right to appeal given to an interned enemy, that Canada was more broadminded in that regard than any other country. An amendment was made and there is now no longer the right of appeal on the part of an alien enemy who has been incarcerated upon reports by the police and other officers. Of course the Minister of Justice always has his discretion; he could release any man who had been interned unfairly. But that is not an appeal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. I am going to deal with that a little later. I am glad the minister has made it clear that appeals have been abolished, because I know that in England appeals are not allowed. The provisions of the regulations in England have been drastically enforced. I hold in my hand a copy of the London Spectator of May 17, 1940, a well-informed journal which I have read for a good many years. Its editorial, which I shall quote, contains a statement which I have not been able to verify through official channels but which I accept as correct. Under the heading "Enemy Aliens in Britain" it says:

In view of the treachery from within which has played so sinister a part in all of the German invasions the safety of the country demands that no half-measures should be taken to guard against it here—

That is in England.

—even if hardship is imposed on many innocent persons. The Home Secretary has ordered the internment of all male enemy aliens between the ages of sixteen and sixty in the eastern counties of England and Scotland (excluding London) and the channel counties to the east of Dorset. Male aliens of whatever nationality—

Male aliens of "whatever" nationality:

—in the same areas must live under severe restrictions. This drastic treatment of foreigners the majority of whom are perfectly loyal to the allies is regrettable, but there is no alternative. It is promised that the measures will be mitigated when circumstances permit. Amongst these aliens it may be taken as certain that there are some who are in the employment of the nazis, awaiting the moment when a blow will be dealt and their prearranged services in the rear will be counted upon. This is a case when the innocent must suffer for the guilty, as they would, no doubt, themselves recognize. No chances can be taken when so much is at stake.

I do not suggest that that situation has a parallel here. However, it is only a difference of degree, and if I were to make any criticism of the minister's administration, judging merely by the question of numbers, I would say that he has been too lenient. There was a question on the order paper asking for the names and numbers of those released, and the reasons for release. I appreciate the fact that the reasons should not be divulged. The minister in speaking of the matter referred to the parallel of the release of convicted prisoners on parole. The parallel was a good one, but I do think we ought to know something more about the number who have been released. If there is any criticism of the minister, it would be that he has been altogether too lenient in this matter.

Section 26 (7) of the defence of Canada regulations—I understand that it has been repealed and an amended section substituted—provided:

Nothing in this and the two preceding regulations shall prevent the Minister of Justice from ordering the release of any enemy alien from arrest, detention or internment, or from ordering the arrest, detention or internment of any enemy alien.

There must of course be authority in some body to carry on under these provisions, but I submit with great respect that this is altogether too much power to place in the hands of any one man, no matter how eminent or fairminded he may be. I would hope that in the exercise of that power the minister gathers about him a body of judicially minded men to advise him, and I have no doubt that that is exactly what he does do. But the language of the section, speaking baldly, puts too much power in the hands of any one man, and I suggest, not that the section be repealed, but that it be strengthened so that the minister will share with some advisory board of men of high judicial capacity the function of ordering arrest, detention or release, as the case may be, so that there can be no question at all of the exercise of a judicial discretion as distinguished from a ministerial discretion. I hope the minister will appreciate the distinction I am endeavouring to make.

Section 63(2) provides that where no specific penalty is provided every person convicted shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment; but any such person may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada or of the province, be prosecuted upon indictment. The punishment then, of course, is very much more severe. The point I wish to make is this: The regulations provide for election only on the part of the prosecution. These regulations are severe enough in most cases; why should persons other than those interned who are charged under these regulations and who have no right of recourse to the law, not be given the right of electing to be tried upon indictment? I think there is a tendency in the 'rial of criminal cases to take away from the accused the absolute right of election for trial by a jury—a right from which we should not lightly depart. I am putting the point to the minister as a query. There may be good reason why it should be this way, but I confess it is not clear to me why the attorney general, representing the prosecution, has the right of election to prosecute either by summary conviction or upon indictment, while the accused has no right of election. It seems to me to be a denial of a substantial right of

I have no objection to the reference of this matter to a committee as proposed by the motion. I hope that a good committee has been set up, before whom the gentlemen who have made representations pro and con will have ample opportunity to appear and to justify the opinions which they hold. But in the final analysis the responsibility is the government's; it is for the safety of the state, and it must not be shirked.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): It is not my intention to discuss the resolution, the importance of which is apparent to the whole house. But the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in the course of his remarks made reference to the number of Germans admitted to Canada during the past few years and, if I understood him aright, compared it quite unfavourably with the immigration from the United Kingdom.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not say the United Kingdom. I said, Scottish, Irish and Welsh. I did not include English. I was careful not to, because the figures are the other way.

Mr. CRERAR: Several days ago an hon. member on the other side of the house put on the order paper a question the answer to which, if questions had been reached yesterday, would have appeared in Hansard. I wish to make a brief statement lest the remarks of my hon. friend in that regard might leave a wholly wrong impression in the country.

During the last three fiscal years the numbers of Germans born in Germany admitted to Canada were 1,240. Of these, 566 were of Jewish race who had in one manner or another escaped from Germany. I cannot at the moment give an analysis of the remainder, but it is within my own knowledge that a considerable percentage consists of non-Jewish Germans who had escaped from Germany to get away from nazi oppression.

Mr. THORSON: How many were Mennonites?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say how many were Mennonites, but I know that a substantial number are of other than the Jewish race and came here to escape nazi oppression. Among these I might mention Sudeten Germans, many of whom were born in Germany but were in the Sudeten area when Germany took it from Czechoslovakia, and who, to save their lives, fled without carrying anything with them. I do not believe there is any Canadian who would say that under such circumstances we should not have admitted them.

So far as immigration from other sources is concerned, I might repeat a few figures which I have jotted down. From England during the last three fiscal years we received 5,909 persons, as against 1,240 immigrants of German birth. From Scotland we received 2,014. I have not the figures for Ireland. From the United States we received 12,881.

While I am sure that my hon. friend had no such intention, it occurred to me that a wrong construction might be placed upon his remarks touching this matter. For that reason I have taken the opportunity, as my slight contribution to this debate, of placing upon Hansard these particular figures relating to immigration during the last three fiscal years.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the regulations one by one. As I understand it, the purpose of the motion before the house is to refer the regulations to a committee where they may be revised if necessary and where representations can be made either for or against them.

I would say at the outset, however, that I think a great deal of the criticism of the defence of Canada regulations has arisen from the method of their proclamation. They were proclaimed about the time that parliament was in session, but owing to the situation which then arose few members of parliament had an opportunity of examining them and they were not discussed in this chamber. The method of introducing the regulations upon the outbreak of war gave rise, I believe, to a good deal of criticism.

We had no session of parliament from early in September until the present house met, except, of course the very short session on January 25, and consequently we did not have an opportunity such as was afforded to the British parliament, of going into the regulations, of criticizing them, of establishing the committee and of making modifications similar to those which were made in Great Britain, and which in many particulars, in spite of a recent tightening-up process, still remain.

We of this group criticized the government in pre-war days because it did not deal with certain activities which we regarded as being against the interests of the state. We do not deny, indeed we readily admit, that the government in war time must have ample and adequate power to prevent sabotage, espionage and any subversive activity, provided always that a person so accused shall have an apportunity to have his case reviewed in the proper manner.

I said a few minutes ago that before war broke out, we criticized the government for not having taken action in the case of certain subversive activities. I have before me, for example, Hansard of June 29, 1938. On that occasion Mr. Grant MacNeil, who was then a member of this group and of this parliament, made this statement:

Some time ago the minister indicated that it was the intention to investigate the complaints of espionage activities in Canada under the cloak of fascist organization. I have seen photostat copies of letters placed in the hands of agents of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police showing that operatives are active within Canadian horders and to some extent linked Canadian borders and to some extent linked up with espionage activities recently exposed in the United States. There has been con-siderable evidence to show that an attempt has been made to smuggle small arms into Canada, and all this has been done under the cloak of fascist organization. Can the minister make a short statement?

Then Mr. Bennett intimated that he had received similar information. The Minister of Justice replied-I think I had better read the whole paragraph:

Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): In answer, first to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), I may say the communications he has received have also been received by me has received have also been received by me and by the department, and inquiries have been made. This allegation that people in Montreal who call themselves fascists were drilling and having arms arose, first, through statements in the press from boastings on the part of so-called leaders, seekers after publicity more than anything else, that they had 25,000, 30,000 and, some were cheerful enough to say, 75,000 adherents. The number is much less than that. Well-intentioned people, even eminent gentlemen, by believing that sort of thing and giving expression to fear about it, are rather playing into the hands of those so-called fascist leaders who seek publicity. It is the same with the communists; they want publicity; if they do not get it they disappear. They live on it. We found that there was nothing as far as those allegations as to arms are concerned. Some those allegations as to arms are concerned. Some of these people congregate in large numbers with all the paraphernalia, shirts—I do not know whether black or brown; it is foolish anyway—and make gestures and that sort of thing. They do, fifteen or twenty or twenty-five of them, what they call military exercises, just stand at attention and walk. There is nothing very dangerous about it, except that they make inflammatory speeches, denouncing many public men, particularly your humble servant. One of them said at a meeting that when they take office the first Jew that will when they take office the first Jew that will be expelled from Canada will be Ernest Lapointe. But this does not prevent me from sleeping at night.

I have no doubt that the minister slept quite well.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec-East): Apparently they are still saying that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. MacNeil then went

I am not attempting to exaggerate the importance of the fascist organization; but the situation took a different turn when a number of individuals were indicted during the number of individuals were indicted during the grand jury sessions in the United States recently where, as I am informed, it was definitely shown that there was a relationship between those activities in the United States and similar activities in and around our important airports in Canada. I am asking the minister to exercise some restraint on organizations professing fascism, but which actually are commonly used as a cloak for actually are commonly used as a cloak for espionage activities on the part of agents of foreign governments. May I ask if there has been some cooperation between the departments of Canada and the United States in this regard?

Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNeil: So that these individuals may not cross the border and embarrass us with their activities?

The answer was in the affirmative.

The reason why I have called attention to this is that to-day we are becoming quite worried over these fifth column activities, but I would point out that fascist organizations in Canada have been active in the past few years and have not been interfered with to the extent that they ought to have been. Indeed, as I have shown, there was a disposition to minimize the danger. Let us always remember in discussing these matters that nazi and fascist organizations have been encouraged and have in many instances been financed by powerful economic and social groups in practically all the democratic countries. We must not allow the persecution of innocent people merely because they are discontented and poor. There is a very real danger that this may happen if we allow the law to be taken in hand by private organizations in our midst. Norway was betraved by Quisling, and among the first arrested in Britain were a Tory member of parliament. a baronet, and the wife of a lieutenant-commander in the royal navy. It has been said and written that even powerful industrial and financial groups with Canadian connections contributed financially to Hitler's rise in Germany. Perhaps I might mention one, Sir Henri Deterding, of the Shell Oil company, which has connections all through North America.

Mr. MARTIN: Is he a Canadian?

Mr. COLDWEIL: No; he was a naturalized British subject, but he has large industrial connections in Canada. I mention only an established fact, not rumours concerning other organizations that have even closer Canadian connection. I say therefore that we should keep these facts in mind as the situation develops. Should what we regard as the impossible happen and the Germans succeed in inflicting a grave reverse upon the allied arms, I am convinced that there would be found in all these countries powerful interests who would not be averse to setting up some form of dictatorship even in such democratic countries if they could get away with it.

The duty of this parliament in referring these regulations to a committee is to see that they are carefully defined so as to safeguard against any arbitrary or capricious action. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke particularly of section 21. I am not going to discuss this section except to say that there was a division of opinion on the part of the capable officials who drafted the regulations, and the analogous British regulation, No. 18, is not nearly so severe nor does it give such sweeping powers as the regulation to which I have just referred. When I heard the leader of the opposition suggest that greater power might be placed in the hands of police superintendents, I could not help thinking that such a policy was wrong, because in that event we should be building up in our own country something similar to the police systems which we despise, the systems that operate in certain European dictatorial countries. To my mind, power under these regulations ought to be exercised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and by the department, and I would go so far as to say that they ought to be more directly under the minister's control than under that of any of the nine different attorneys general acting perhaps in nine different ways in the provinces. Such regulations as we approve ought to be impartially enforced. I am not going to accuse the minister of having been partial in the enforcement of the regulations. No one knowing the present Minister of Justice would believe that he had wittingly done anything of the sort. But there is an uneasy feeling, and there are rumours across the country to the effect that here and there political influence has been exercised. I do not know how it has been exercised or through what channels, but there is that uneasy feeling, and I think someone in this house ought to bring the matter up in order that the department may have an opportunity of clearing up the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon. member mention a specific case?

Mr. COLDWELL: I will come to that in a moment if I may. The Montreal Gazette of Friday, May 31, in a report with reference to the Canadian Legion, makes the following statement:

"We possess information which cannot have come to Mr. Lapointe's attention," President Alex Walker of the Canadian Legion said in a statement yesterday concerning Justice Minister Ernest Lapointe's repudiation of charges of political interference with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, reported to have been made at the legion convention here.

"We propose to seek an early opportunity to discuss the whole question with him," Mr. Walker stated, "and we are confident that he will understand the sincerity of our motives and our desire to be of service, and that under no circumstances would the legion be a party to any reflection whatsoever upon his personal or political integrity."

There we have a large and powerful organization, through one of its officers, stating that it has knowledge of interference of the type which is causing some uneasiness across the country. A few moments ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked me if I had knowledge of a case. I have not the definite facts concerning the case, but a question was placed upon the order paper by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), arising out of a well defined rumour which has been repeated many times in Saskatchewan; and since the Prime Minister asks me, I feel that I should mention this case in order that it might be looked into. I refer to the case of a man called Alois N. Schneider, of St. Walburg, Saskatchewan. Mr. Schneider is said by those who know him to be a pronounced and active nazi and a political supporter of the Liberal party. The allegation is made that almost immediately prior to the general election he was released and that he worked during the election, having thus been given an opportunity to do so. I say those are the statements that are being made; and since the Prime Minister asked me if I knew of any such statements, I am placing this matter before the government in order that it might be cleared up. Unfortunately, as I quite understand, the minister may not be able to give the full reasons for the arrest or release of many of these people. When the minister is bound to state in the house that it is not in the public interest to give this information, it lends additional colour to stories of the sort I have just mentioned. As I once said before, there are matters connected with the war which would warrant this house meeting some day in a closed session in order that a great deal of the criticism, and perhaps some of the information which is not brought forward because it may not be wise to do so, might be discussed openly and freely with the government. That was why some little time ago I suggested that we might find it advisable to hold a closed session.

We are fighting a war against those who would destroy democracy; and during this period it seems to me we should endeavour to preserve in our own country the widest possible measure of democracy consistent with our public safety. The war must not be used as an excuse to take away any of the hardwon rights of the common people. Sections 27 and 62 of the present regulations as they now stand could be used to prevent a legitimate labour dispute or for the outlawing of an association of workers and producers. a matter of fact, the British regulations have no section analogous to section 62. Such sections, if they are necessary, should be clarified and our fundamental rights should be safeguarded. That is one reason why I think it wise to refer these regulations to a committee rather than debate them paragraph by paragraph in this chamber. We submit that no person ought to be incarcerated without the right to know the offence with which he is charged and without being given an opportunity to plead his cause. That is a right deeply embedded in the Magna Charta and the Petition of Rights, and it is one that we should not allow to be set aside without a thorough parliamentary investigation. After all, we in this parliament are responsible for the preservation of these fundamental rights. I say the fundamental rights of British citizenship should not be taken away or modified without the consent of parliament; no executive should be empowered to take away any of these rights. In a war against fascist and nazi aggression we must beware lest these rights and liberties for which our fathers fought are taken away from us.

Now I should like to say a word with regard to protection against sabotage, espionage and so on. I suggest that if our forces are not at the present time sufficient to cope with these matters, the government should enlarge them by the appointment of special police or by some form of home-guard organization. If necessary, suitable returned men, or men unfit for any other service, could be enrolled in this corps. I do not like to see vigilante committees set up here and there, free of government control, who may take the law into their own hands. I have the greatest respect for those who want to prevent espionage and sabotage. Let us respect them properly by giving them the necessary authority and enrolling them under the direct auspices of this government, instead of allowing the private enforcement of order to be commenced in Canada. We never know how leadership may change. We have had some experience of people uniting with the very best intentions and ultimately being led into activities not in the public interest. So for this reason also I am glad to see these regulations referred to a committee, where they can be properly looked into.

In closing I should like to refer to one or two comments made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). He said he thought it would do some of our university professors good to mix with the common people. As I listened to his remarks I thought it might do some of our politicians good to mix with some university people. Practical men like the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Mr. Chamberlain and others have been in control of the British commonwealth for the last ten years, and see where we are to-day. Practical men, controlling practical affairs, have led the commonwealth and the world into the mess in which we find ourselves to-day. Now that we are in this mess, what do we find? We find the pinks, if you like to call them that, the radicals, the idealists, the intelligentsia, the men with vision, if you will, such as Clement Attlee, Arthur Greenwood-

Mr. REID: What about Ramsay Mac-Donald?

Mr. COLDWELL: Men like Herbert Morrison, Sir Stafford Cripps and others are called in to clean up the mess which these so-called practical-minded men created. An hon. member asks what about Ramsay MacDonald. Well, Ramsay MacDonald has been dead personally for a number of years, but politically and ideally he has been dead much longer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, oh!

Mr. COLDWELL: Some one says, "Oh," but I want to say that the men to whom the British commonwealth has turned in its hour of need are the men who refused to follow Ramsay MacDonald into the National government which afflicted us until recent days. I should like to say also that we may be thankful that ministers of the United church, other ministers of the gospel, university professors and other people who are thinking for themselves are still allowed to think aloud in Canada. If we are fighting for anything at all, we are fighting for the right to think freely and to speak freely, and those who would deny that right to the ministers of the United church or any other church, to our university professors and others, are simply advocating the very form of dictatorship which I thought we had organized to fight.

So I say I am glad to see these regulations being referred to a committee. As I said at the outset, we are anxious that sabotage be prevented. We are anxious that espionage be prevented. We are anxious that sedition of every sort be prevented during this time of war; but if we are to go forward and win a real victory, that real victory will be measured not only by the defeat of Germany and of Italy but by the extent to which we in our own land can preserve for future generations the democratic rights and liberties for which our fathers bled and died.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) explained to the house this afternoon, this motion involved originally only the harshness of the defence of Canada regulations. Hon. members of the house will realize the truth of that statement if they read what I believe to be the key paragraph of the original notice of motion, which was in these words:

And whereas, further, a certain measure of criticism has been directed towards some of the afore-mentioned regulations as alleged to constitute undue and unnecessary interference with the liberty of the subject;

And whereas it is deemed advisable that parliament consider the matter. . . .

I could see no objection to that motion as it stood originally, namely, a motion referring the question of harshness or otherwise of regulations, to a committee made up of private members of the House of Commons, although the deliberations of such a committee would necessarily result in considerable delay in dealing with the questions involved. But now—now, under the amended notice of motion, the committee must cover a much wider field, as indicated by one paragraph of the motion as it now stands, reading as follows:

And whereas it is deemed advisable that a committee of the house consider the said regulations as amended to ascertain whether such regulations reasonably meet the requirements of the country in time of war.

Mr. Speaker, let there be no mistake about it: This means that the committee will have the duty of recommending to the house what has to be done about the enemies in our midst, what has to be done about making Canada safe from the enemies within our gates. In other words, it is no longer a matter of the mere wording of the defence of Canada regulations; rather it is a matter of how we are to deal with our enemies on the home front. Clearly, may I say to the house, that is a question of government policy, and not one to be decided by a committee of private members.

The government have all the information; certainly they have far more information than a committee would have. Action should not be delayed by the government by referring the matter to a committee of the house. That involves weeks of deliberation; it means that the committee must act with only half the information on the subject; it means that the report of the committee will probably be hastily considered by parliament; it means that no government policy will be announced until after prorogation; it means that there will be no discussion in parliament after the government's policy has been decided upon; it means that there will be no direct way for public opinion in Canada to be brought to bear on the government.

I fear the committee will prove to be merely a stop-gap, and the subject is far too serious for such treatment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does not my hon. friend know that the government's policy is in the regulations, and from time to time it is altered? Even to-day I announced amendments which have been made. Others will be made. The purpose of the committee is simply to hear those who complain about the government's policy. But the policy is there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true enough, but—

Mr. GREEN: The government's policy may be there; the government may have a policy; but they have been very, very slow in acting in this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course that is another matter.

Mr. GREEN: That is my complaint, and I repeat that this is not a matter to be referred to a committee. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) brought down an order in council this afternoon. I say that the action taken in that order in council should have been taken weeks ago, not at this late date. And before I have finished my observations I think I shall have shown hon. members that what I say is correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Do I understand my hon. friend to say he does not want a committee? It would be very easy to meet him.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. GREEN: I think if the Minister of Justice had been following me when I commenced my remarks, he would have noticed my statement that as the motion originally stood it was quite in order to have a committee consider the harshness of the defence of Canada regulations. Now I say, let the minister have a committee, if he wishes, and there is no doubt the government will force the matter to a committee anyway.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, no. Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, just leave out the heckling, for a minute. But I say this, that the government should act in respect of this matter of making Canada safe within its own borders.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is exactly what it has done.

Mr. GREEN: The Canadian people are far ahead of the government in their appreciation of the gravity of the activities of the fifth column, and the dangers from enemies in our midst. The Canadian people know, and they know only too well, what has happened in Poland, in Denmark, in Norway, in Holland, in Belgium and in France. Only a few days ago they read in the press the inspiring speech of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain. Part of that press report I now read:

Mentioning measures against fifth columnists, the Prime Minister said these powers will be used without "the slightest hesitation" and that he was sorry for those "passionate enemies of nazi Germany" who are affected by orders against aliens.

Fifth columnists will be dealt with "until rifth columnists will be dealt with until we are satisfied that this malignancy in our midst" has been "effectively stamped out."

After viewing Germany's "originality of malice and ingenuity of aggression" he said Britons can "certainly prepare ourselves for every kind of novel strategem and every kind of hyutal and treacherous manogeneous of of brutal and treacherous manoeuvres."

The Canadian people have read that press report, and they know that Canada can prepare herself for just that same type of nazi manoeuvring. They know that the same menace has been found in South America and in North America, particularly in the United States, as has been stated time and again by the great president of that nation. The Canadian people know that there is a menace here in Canada. They know that "it can happen in Canada" despite the dreams of certain people in authority. I should like to quote from paragraph 2 of an order in council which was brought down by our own Canadian government on June 4, 1940, which shows that there is danger here. This order states:

the Minister of Justice reports that he is advised that there are within Canada numer-ous organizations of a subversive character which are intended or are likely to be-

I stress the following words: prejudicial to the safety of the state or the efficient prosecution of the war.

The Canadian people know these things. They realize what nazism stands for. know that Canadians and all other British peoples face extermination or slavery if we are defeated in this war. Let there be no mistake about that. They realize that fifth column activities really constitute a branch of the fighting forces preparing the way for troops; it is no longer just a case of espionage and reporting back to the motherland, but the fifth column is really part of the fighting forces. I point out to the Minister of Justice that the Canadian people realize that nazi sympathizers in Canada have nazi beliefs and will be ready to use nazi methods. Should the time come, we may expect that these people will use the same methods here that have been used overseas.

Our people are engaged in a life and death struggle. Our young men are being sent overseas, not as conscripts but as volunteers. Our people are straining every nerve to send more young men overseas, to produce supplies and to manufacture equipment. They are making great sacrifices, and clearly they will have to make greater sacrifices. They should not be bothered by having to watch traitors at home. They should be spared that. The Canadian people will never be able to put their hearts into the war effort until they are satisfied that adequate precautions are being taken on the home front. They can expect very little from having this question referred to a committee.

And what have the government done? The Minister of Justice had this to say on May 23, 1940, as reported on page 143 of Hansard:

It was known to the police prior to the outbreak of war that some enemy aliens were engaging in activities which in the event of war would be prejudicial to the interests or safety Some persons who were actively of the state. engaged in furthering the nazi cause in Canada were persons who had become, during the course of their residence in Canada, naturalized British subjects.

That statement shows the danger that these men and women constituted for Canada. The government interned 265 enemy aliens and 60 naturalized Germans. If my figures are wrong, I ask the Minister of Justice to correct me. Eventually there have been a total of 406 people interned, of whom 145, or more than one-third, have since been released, not by the courts, not by a judge, but by the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know that the minister is personally responsible; but the fact remains, and I do not think the minister will question it, that the government have released 145 people who were considered at the outbreak of the war to be dangerous to the very life of this nation.

I cannot find the press clipping at the moment, but the Canadian press carried a report, I think it was on May 25, that a man by the name of John Ketterer had been fined $25 in Vernon, British Columbia, for possessing firearms. The report went on to state that this man had been released from Kananaskis internment camp. It is this sort of thing that is shaking the confidence of the Canadian people. It is this sort of thing that is worrying the Canadian people. Apparently this man was not sent back to the internment camp; he was only fined. According to the minister's statement, there are 261 persons now interned, of whom only one is a woman.

Also this government provided for the registration of enemy aliens, and I understood the minister to say the other day that some 16,643 had been registered and were reporting. I believe the present plan is to have these people report monthly, but complaints are being received that many are reporting not to the police, but to the postmaster in their particular community. I suggest that this should be looked into and these people made to report to proper police officials.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The registrar to whom they must report is appointed by the registrar general who is the commissioner of the mounted police.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that they should report to police officers. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) will correct me if I am wrong, but I calculate from his report that 78,514 people have entered Canada from Germany between March 31, 1919, and March 31, 1939.

Mr. CRERAR: That is in the last twenty years.

Mr. GREEN: Since the great war.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say as to the accuracy of that figure.

Mr. GREEN: Then the Minister of Justice said the other day that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were to be increased by 500, their present strength being 2,450. According to the report of the mounted police, dated March 31, 1939, the strength then was 2,603, so an increase of 500 at this time will not increase the total force that much above the peace-time strength. The mounted police carry on police duties, I believe in six provinces, and they have numerous other [Mr. Green.]

duties. Many of the members of this force are serving overseas in the provost force and other units.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That explains the reduction in the strength.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that he consider taking on special constables to help handle the enemies in our midst.

Again we have been told that the government are watching these things. There has been too much watching and too little action during the last five years. The government have been watching many things. They have been watching this problem, and apparently that is their main policy in dealing with the enemies in our midst. The minister said the other night that enemy aliens who had been registered, but who were not interned, were being watched, as were naturalized Germans. I take it also that the subversive elements are being watched. You cannot watch so many people effectively. It is impracticable. I have proof of this statement in what happened recently in Vancouver. The Daily Province of June 5 quotes a letter written by the city prosecutor of Vancouver to the mayor and council, in which he reports:

On Friday last officers had occasion to search a house where it was suspected a war offence was being committed. No evidence was found, but the rather astounding fact came to light that the householder was German born, a warrant officer in the last war, registered as an alien during the present war, and was naturalized under a good Anglo-Saxon name April 30, 1940, at Vancouver.

That is the type of thing that happens and will happen so long as this government carries on a policy of watching and waiting on this very, very dangerous question.

I have certain other recommendations which I should like to make to the minister. I would recommend first, of course, that he smother this fifth column activity at once. Do not wait for a committee's report. If its report is like the report of most other committees that I have seen in this house, there will be very little action taken on it anyway when it does come in.

In the second place, Canadians are entitled to know who is for the nation and who is for the enemy. It is the duty of this government to find that out. It is the duty of the government to detain—to detain, I repeat—every man or woman who is for the enemy or who aims to wreck our institutions. Once they are detained they are no menace. Leave them loose and you need all the way from ten to a hundred men to watch each one effectively. Prosecution and fining are not enough in these cases; there should also be confinement. Further, the people who are interned should be put to work. There are many, many things that could be done in Canada by these aliens who are interned, instead of just letting them sit in the internment camps.

Then I urge this government not to place so much importance on naturalization. was pleased to hear the Minister of Justice announce to-day a new order in council which gives him further power over certain groups of naturalized Germans and Italians. I think the key to the whole situation is that the sravest danger to Canada has been from certain of these naturalized people. Naturalization is no obstacle to a follower of Hitler. It is an excellent cloak to hide his activities. We have always been too careless about naturalization. We never seem to stress the need in Canada for a change of allegiance in mind. We allow these people who, with the best intentions, are anxious to become citizens to become naturalized, and then nobody pays any attention to them. It is all done in such an offhand way. No attempt is made to take them into our citizenship as comrades; no attempt is made to stress the importance of the step they are taking. We never try to make the applicant proud of acquiring our citizenship. And if we place so little value upon naturalization, how can we expect the man or woman who applies for citizenship to place a higher value upon it? The question of naturalization is one that could very well be considered by a committee of this house. With regard to the naturalized, I would refer the Minister of Justice to a resolution passed at the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion just two weeks ago. That resolution reads:

That the regulations for the defence of Canada should be so amended as to require registration of all citizens of enemy origin who have acquired British citizenship by naturalization—

In my opinion that goes too far. I would have suggested, "who have acquired citizenship since the great war." I notice that the Minister of Justice in the order in council fixed the date at September 1, 1929.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Ten years ago.

Mr. GREEN: The resolution goes on:

--and to give to constituted authority the power to deal with such citizens in the same manner as unnaturalized aliens are dealt with if there is reason to believe that they are connected with enemy activities or sympathetic to the enemy regime, and particularly those who are known to have been actively associated with organizations recognized and developed by German consular officers.

Then I suggest to the government that they see that there are removed from key positions in this country, governmental or otherwise, all persons who are not definitely with us in this struggle. The nazi policy, the communist policy, has been to get their men into key positions, no matter how they get there. They are to occupy key positions where they can do the most damage, and I think the government should focus attention on that aspect of the problem.

The government should also check at once the situation with regard to firearms. I understand that rifles, shotguns and arms of that type do not have to be registered except those in the possession of enemy aliens. I suggest that the government look into the whole question of firearms, establish some sort of check on their sale, and possibly provide for registration of all firearms in Canada. The legion also had a recommendation on that point which I think is well worthy of consideration:

That in order to facilitate the control of arms, provision be made that all persons shall register all firearms and explosives of any description in their possession with power to the police to seize all unregistered arms and also registered arms and explosives when in the opinion of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the arms in the possession of an individual are likely to be dangerous to the state.

I also suggest that the government might do something to help those of our foreign-born citizens who are known to be with us, help them in some way to show their loyalty. The nazis have been bullying them, threatening them that if they did not join the nazi movement their relatives in the old land would be abused, and so on. I suggest that the government do something to help the foreign-born who are with us. As a sample of what might be done I quote from the Nelson Daily News of June 4, which describes what was done at Trail, British Columbia. There are several hundred Italians employed at the Consolidated smelter in Trail. manager of that smelter, Mr. Blaylock, who by the way is one of the great Canadians of this generation, called these Italians together and put the onus on them. He said in effect: "I put it to you to see that there is no sabotage by anybody in the Italian community in this city. If you will take that responsibility I will see that you are not interfered with." These Italians reacted as one would expect them to react. They assumed that responsibility, and they went further-I quote now from the newspaper:

These Italians decided voluntarily to give up their firearms and immediately launched a drive throughout the community to collect such arms, completing it Saturday and turning them over to the Consolidated for safekeeping.

They went on to authorize the company to deduct $1 a month from the salary of each employee to be used for Red Cross purposes. I suggest that something along that line might be undertaken by the government in different parts of this country where there are large bodies of our foreign-born citizens.

My final suggestion is that the government should guard all vital points. Day after day in the house, when the war effort was under debate, we heard stories of this point and that point not being adequately guarded. I suggest that the government should be on the safe side and, if necessary, guard too many points. We have many, many veterans in Canada capable of doing this work and anxious to do it, and I suggest that the government allow them to guard all the vital points in this dominion.

In conclusion, may I say again that the Canadian people have the right to insist on adequate protection from enemies in their midst. The Canadian volunteers overseas have the right to insist that their loved ones and their homeland shall be free from treachery. Let the government abandon its watching policy on this question; let it take determined action at once to meet this danger. This whole war crisis is a grand opportunity for Canada to become a strong nation, but what Canada needs more than all else at this moment is strong leadership. We can grow strong only by facing these difficult problems when they arise. I repeat that the government policy of referring this question to a committee, and then sitting back and waiting until the report comes in, is not good enough and is not giving the Canadian people the leadership to which they are entitled.

On motion of Mr. Slaght the debate was adjourned.

THE LATE HON. NORMAN ROGERS

STATEMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER WITH RESPECT TO FUNERAL ARRANGEMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Instead of continuing the debate this evening, I trust it will be agreeable to hon. members to take up instead the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) which has already been under consideration, and continue to-morrow afternoon the debate on the present motion.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has intimated to me that some hon. members would like to have particulars of the services in connection with the funeral of the late Minister of National Defence. The remains of the late minister are being brought to the city this afternoon. It is expected the train will arrive shortly after six o'clock. The remains will be taken immediately to the family residence. To-morrow a service which will be entirely private, will be held at the late minister's residence at which only members of the family will be present.

The government have thought that, having regard to the circumstances which occasioned the death of the late minister, and which I believe will relate themselves in the minds of all to his part in Canada's war effort, also having regard to the fact that the minister was at this time of war, the Minister of National Defence, it would be appropriate and, indeed, that it would be desired by hon. members that some service should be held which would have its association with the houses of parliament. Accordingly we have decided to have the remains brought to parliament hill some time to-morrow afternoonthe exact hour will be notified to the press a little later on-and a very brief service will be held in the hall of the parliament buildings. At the conclusion of the service, the cortege, under military escort, will proceed to the union station. That is all I am able to say at the moment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Friday, June 7, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupation, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): In the course of the debate on June 6, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers) stated that a questionnaire had been sent to various manufacturers when the national employment commission was functioning, and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) requested that information be furnished relative to this questionnaire and the results that followed from it. At the time I said I understood it was contained in an appendix to the report of that commission, but I find that this was incorrect. The questionnaire was sent by the Canadian Manufacturers' association pursuant to the request of the youth employment committee of the national employment commission. I would ask the unanimous consent of the committee to have the questionnaire placed on Hansard together with a tabulation of the composite reply, as follows:

The following are the facts concerning the questionnaire referred to by Mr. Chambers in Hansard of June 6.

At the request of the youth employment committee of the national employment commission, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association sent out the following questionnaire to their members in the early fall of 1936:

- (1) Have you already experienced, or do you anticipate in the near future, any shortage of skilled workers?
- (2) Have you any plan or policy for training young workers? If so, is it still operating?
- (3) Do you consider it feasible, and if so, desirable, to organize some apprenticeship or other training system for your industry?
- (4) If the answer to (3) is in the affirmative, do you think such a system should be operated entirely on a voluntary basis, or is legislation necessary?

The tabulated answers are as follows:

Question (1) Yes, 80—No, 161.
Question (2) Yes, 136—No, 86.
Question (3) Yes, 61—No. 124.
Question (4) Voluntary, 88.
Legislation needed, 13.

This questionnaire is embodied in the appendix of the report of the youth employment committee of the national employment commission.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Representing an industrial riding, I have had some experience of the kindness and courtesy of the present minister in dealing with his department and complaints on relief matters, but I must point out that there are two wars in Canada to-day. One of these is the greatest war which civilization has ever witnessed and in which we are participating, together with the mother country and other parts of the empire; the second war is an internal one. Previously in this house I said:

We have a war in Canada to-day, a war between millions of our fellow men and poverty and starvation, a war between youth and poverty. The enemy is just as dangerous as a foreign foe in war time. Against a foreign foe we unite; against our internal foe we are disunited and do nothing to check or repel it. When the invader is at our gates the country mobilizes its entire resources, its man power, its transportation system, its capital, but in time of depression and unemployment driving people to the wall the industrial workers are left without any protection at all; they bear the brunt and we do nothing but sit around and appoint commissions. Nothing is said in this bill as to the relation between the industrial worker and agriculture.

Ontario seems to be the forgotten province of confederation. I do not believe in any policy which has for its object a form of protection for youth alone and the alleviation of the problems of youth. I am for protection for all the people all the time, no matter of what age they are. Of course I am altogether in favour of any policy that will help the youth, but we must not overlook the forgotten man in industry. That forgotten man is about forty-five years of age to-day. He belongs to that class of returned soldiers who have families to support, and some industries will not give them jobs at that age. There seems to be a standard rule that militates against these men. I do not say it is the fault of the business men of the country or of the manufacturers. I do not suggest that at all, but the fact is that these men cannot get work and they have children dependent upon them. I wish to support the government in any progressive measures it may propose to aid those on relief, but it seems to me that nothing is being done for this class of our citizens. Some of these forgotten men cannot get relief. They cannot get a job. Men of forty-three and forty-five, unable to find work, unable to get any relief, are also ineligible for the army. They will not take them in. Our dear, departed friend, the late Minister of National Defence, Mr. Rogers, discussed this matter a couple of years ago when I proposed to have a national policy of work for our Canadian working men on the apprenticeship basis, but the government has made no provision for them.

There is something radically wrong with our education in this country, as the present war shows. Our young people are getting too much mere book learning, and not enough attention is being paid to such things as service to one's country, duty, sacrifice and sacrifice for one's fellows and so on. When I saw this war coming in 1937 and 1938 I proposed in this house a policy fashioned after that which was adopted in England in connection with young people out of work there. Four years ago the Minister of Labour over there the Right Hon. Ernest Brown, accompanied by the then Secretary of State for War, made an address to some two thousand young people in the market place in York city, and in that address he stated that the government proposed to provide an apprenticeship course for young men whereby they could learn any one of nine or ten trades in different industries; this was linked up with national service for one's country. These young men would get pocket money, lodging, food, clothing and deferred pay, and at the end of their period of training and apprenticeship they would be qualified to serve as pilots or mechanics in the air force, or they could go into any of the industries for which they had received training.

Three years ago I proposed in this house such a policy adapted to Canada's special circumstances, and I venture to say that if it had been carried out we would have men trained to-day for the air force The minister's predecessor admitted to me that what I had said was correct, namely, that the governments of Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, had spent about one billion dollars in taking care of the unemployment problem and in relief and relief works. And with what result? There is nothing much to show for it. The problem to-day is quite acute. Walking down from this building to the Chateau Laurier one encounters a good many panhandlers. I am sorry for these young men. They cannot get employment and there is no room for them anywhere. They com-plain they cannot get into the army. They have no relief and no food or lodging. Surely this is a federal problem. I have frequently urged this point of a national apprenticeship system with national service upon the government and this house, but the government has so far not adopted it or a register.

The unemployment problem is here to stay, and so far the municipalities appear to have been bearing the brunt of it. So far as Ontario is concerned, the municipal assistance act does not apply to that province, because Ontario will not accept it. Theoretically Ontario may come under that act, but the province will not accept it. Many municipalities wish to come under the act, but they do not qualify. Two years ago I urged as strongly as I possibly could that Canada should get busy and secure for industry some of the Chamberlain government's rearmament orders to help trade and industry here, especially unused plants, and in the manufacture of war implements and aeroplanes. A number of key men who were in the great war came from United States universities to Toronto in 1917 for their training in Canada, and after the war went home to their own country and began the manufacture in the United States of aeroplanes. Our own government—and I am not speaking of any one government only-did nothing to utilize the services of these men, who were Canadians in Canada, for similar purposes. Some of the young people who were over here after the last war went to San Francisco, where they commenced industries, and they have made millions of dollars at the Pacific coast out of British rearmament orders, when all that work should have been done in Canada. One of the great pilots of the last war, the late Colonel Barker, V.C., D.S.O., M.C., tried to educate Canadians to take up the aviation industry and develop it for civilian and military work, and train pilots. Had his policy been followed, we would have been ready for war and have obtained huge orders, instead of one per cent of Britain's orders to the start of the war.

As far as these commissions are concerned, we may as well forget all about them. We have the Sirois report. Well, no doubt it will be committed to the archives; "earth to earth, ashes to ashes and dust to dust." This is the last we will hear of that report, which cost a great deal of money-over $400,000. I have a return showing exactly what it cost, but I have not had time to look it up. Royal commissions have been a favourite method whereby the federal government have postponed action when action was urgently needed. They have achieved nothing; that is why they were appointed. They are only advisory, and as soon as the advice is given it is discarded. That is what was done with this report; all their decisions were based on facts which were already known to everyone. The country has had enough of these Pickwickian commissions which seem to do nothing and to which no one pays any attention. It depends on the instructions they are given; and then when the report is received nothing is done about it.

In conclusion, I should like to say a word about real estate and the municipalities, because real estate cannot stand anything more in the way of taxation. If all these federal and provincial relief burdens are placed on it, it is by no fault of the well conducted municipalities. An investigation was held by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board of Washington, and on February 25 of this year they made a report. This is what they say with regard to loading this debt on real estate:

The past few years have been marked by important reductions in the cost of home ownership and home purchase, such as greatly reduced mortgage interest rates, easy monthly repayment plans on mortgage loans, and the abolition of special fees and excessive charges.

We did the same thing here; we reduced charges along these lines.

The prospective home owner or home buyer now has access to the lowest rates and the best terms in the history of our country. These things the private lending institutions and the government agencies have cooperated in bringing about. But other carrying costs of the property are most important to keep down if home ownership is not to be jeopardized. Outstanding is the real estate tax which literally swamps home owners in many states to such an extent that it provides a grave danger for the future.

That is the very thing that is happening in Canada. The taxes on the property of the average member of this house amount practically to a rent in itself, because the cost of these federal and provincial relief and other debts has been loaded on real estate.

Not only do these taxes have a serious effect on individual home ownership but they hurt the entire real estate market. People and institutions both hesitate to place investment money in real estate when taxes are so high. This means that new construction is retarded and the vast amount of institutionally-held real estate is not being reduced fast enough. This "overhang" of acquired real estate in the hands of lending institutions is in itself a menace to the return of an orderly market. It is most unfortuate that high taxes are keeping prospective buyers away from these properties which should be returning to private hands once more. Undoubtedly the present rate of expansion in home construction could be greatly accelerated if the public could be assured of equitable taxes. More people could be put to work on new construction and a better economic atmosphere would prevail.

Real estate has reached the point where it can stand no more in the way of a burden. Not only have we loaded this federal burden on the municipalities; we have taken away their income tax and other revenues as well. Until 1918 the entire field of income tax was exclusive to the municipalities. In that year the dominion invaded that field, presumably just for a year or two, but they have occupied it ever since. Not only that, the provinces also have imposed an income tax, and as a result the revenues of the municipalities have been depleted so that they receive only pin-money as compared with what they would have received if they had been able to retain for themselves their own exclusive fields of taxation of all kinds which they used to have.

We in this country have been slow to notice how people have had their property taken from them. In the early days of confederation, the days of Macdonald, Cartier and Laurier, everyone was a property owner. Every man owned a cow, a mill, a small farm, a market garden or something of the kind, but that is no longer the case. Our people have become proletarians to such an extent as to threaten the economic, social and industrial future and structure of this dominion. I do not suppose much can be done at the present time to relieve this situation, because of the war, but I should like the government to give some attention to the recommendations which have been made by the mayors of the country. Many members of this house, including some of those who have come here for the first time this session, have come up from municipal councils. The hon, member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who unfortunately is not in the house at the moment, was instructed by the federation of Canadian mayors to visit several cities in the United States and make a report on these matters. I have no doubt the minister has a copy of that report, which deals with the whole question of real estate, taxes, relief, food, rents and so on. It is a valuable report. The hon, member visited and saw the mayors and city officials of Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston and New York in order to study conditions in those cities, and I think he did an excellent piece of work. We can certainly take a lesson from the United States; for when the depression came, they were ready with a report on relief and unemployment in 1927 by Senator Couzens of Detroit and his senate committee, and nearly two-thirds of the Purvis report is copied from the Couzens report.

I hope the minister will give heed to the municipalities, because no more revenue can be obtained by taxation on real estate. would suggest that the dominion government give back to the municipalities a portion of the revenue obtained through the income tax, as the province of Ontario has done, since this was once the exclusive field of the municipalities. Give the municipalities something with which to take care of these people, or take over relief and hospitalization altogether. These unfortunate people are the victims of a cruel industrial system and some of them are unemployable. municipalities are compelled to spend huge sums of money in connection with sanitation, relief, hospitalization, unemployment and many other matters, and it has reached the point where no one wants to own a foot of real estate. If I could only get rid of the real estate I own now, I would never own any more, because the whole structure of taxation in this country has been destroyed through the dominion and the provinces invading the exclusive fields of the municipalities and imposing on them impossible burdens never contemplated. This problem is largely a federal matter. We make the tariff; we make the financial laws, the immigration laws and all that sort of thing; yet we load these burdens on the municipalities.

I hope something may be done to help them. I realize the burden of debt the dominion must carry as a result of the last war, and the prospective debts resulting from this war, but I do hope something may be done so that any money given by this government to the provinces will be earmarked for distribution to the municipalities or go direct to them.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation that I have sought your recognition to-night, to address for the first time my fellow members of this historic assembly. I suppose all new members approach such an occasion with a certain diffidence, particularly if they realize the advantages which he who listens has over him who speaks. In making an address for the first time to a parliamentary assembly such as this, one is always conscious of the newness of the circumstances, of the unfamiliarity of the occasion, and of other conditions. Above all, one who is here for the first time or, rather, is on his feet for the first time in this assembly, would not have it thought that he assumes the role of a teacher to those who have possibly been in the house for many years longer than he.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, I am impelled to overcome this natural diffidence on my part because of the importance of the subject matter of the resolution under discussion this evening. Although that would be sufficient excuse for anyone, yet added to that is the interest which I have so long taken in matters of humanitarian importance such as the one involved in or arising out of the subject matter at present before us.

I could, I suppose, fancy a greater disaster; but certainly the disaster would be great indeed if it were anything like what would happen in my constituency and in many other constituencies in Canada should this resolution fail of passage. I do not suppose there is any chance of that occurring, and yet perhaps that is the test which one might apply to a measure. What would be the result were the measure not to pass?

This is a war parliament. I know that the minds of hon. members, as well as the minds of people throughout the country at large, are filled with the exceeding gravity of the world situation. I know that any question touching upon Canada's participation in the war and her effective contribution to it must take first place in our deliberations. In the very first instance, if we can, we must save the world for freedom and democracy, and we must protect our own shores from invasion, which is actually threatened at the present time. These matters come first.

And yet, second to the world problems before us are those problems of local concern associated with the welfare of our own people. After all, is it not one problem? The welfare of our own working people is really wrapped up in the problem of our foreign defence and of the preservation of the world at large for democracy and freedom. There is not very much difference between the soldier in the factory and the soldier serving in the front line trenches. Each is equally essential to the success of our arms abroad. I do not believe that one could draw any distinction between them from the point of view of importance; one would not draw a distinction between the man who makes and fills a shell and the man who must fire it. Each of them is equally important to the final success of our arms in the field.

For this reason I suggest to the committee that this resolution is next in importance to those which have to do with the carrying on of the war itself. I know in court work it is necessary thoroughly to understand what it is one is discussing, and for that reason I place before hon members that part of the resolution of greatest importance, eliminating some of the features of lesser importance. I read:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament.

I am appalled by the very thought of what necessarily would happen in communities throughout Canada, and particularly in the community from which I come, were that resolution to fail to carry. I am not as familiar with the agricultural situation in Canada as I am with conditions in industrial and urban centres. But I shrink from a contemplation of the scenes which would occur in thousands of houses in the constituency from which I come and in the city which in part I represent—yes, and in many other industrial centres of Canada—were we in some way to withdraw from what we have been doing in the past, or if by some voluntary action on our part we even reduced the amount of the meagre assistance we have been giving in the past.

In the house and certainly in the country at large there has been a great deal of discussion on the question as to whether reliefees are undernourished; that is to say, whether our relief rates are so meagre or our relief so insufficient that those receiving it are actually undernourished. I do not purpose taking part in the debate, but I recollect a remark made by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) the other night to the effect that the grandchildren of the refugees of today may pay the price of present-day food deficiencies. That was his opinion, and I accept it as the opinion of a medical authority of considerable standing in the community.

It is not necessary for us to decide the question, but I think every hon. member should agree with me when I say that whether relief is sufficient or insufficient, it would be highly undesirable were we by some voluntary act on our part to make conditions worse than they are to-day. A shortage of actual food—if there is a shortage—is not the only evil that comes from relief; and I have said that I would not debate that point. A shortage of foods is not perhaps the worst of the evils which come to the reliefee. In my judgment enforced idleness is a greater curse than a half-filled stomach. The old biblical injunction, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread" was not a curse at all. It was a blessing, rather than a curse. It was a promise that labour and enjoyment should be united. And I am rather of opinion that they cannot be separated—not permanently, at all events; and if at all, only at times. War is a great disaster to fall upon any people. The war of 1914-1918 can be described as nothing less than a monster, major disaster. I am of opinion, and with some thought behind it, that the moral and physical degradation which resulted from the mass unemployment during the post-war period was a greater disaster to the manhood and womanhood of Canada than was the war itself.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) stated in the house the other day that a nation's chief asset is its people. That is not a new sentiment by any means. He did not invent that statement, in fact I think he quoted it. But whether new or not, I should like to join with him in that expression. I should like to pay what I think is perhaps a deserved tribute to the members of the third parties that sit to the left of the Speaker. These hon, gentlemen have seen a vision, a vision of a better social state. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has had a glimpse of the city beautiful that is built upon a hill, and I honour him for it. I cannot always tread the path that they are following, but they are travelling what they are convinced is the upward climb to the city that is built upon a hill. I give these gentlemen credit for the humanitarian attitude they have adopted since I have been listening to them here and as I knew them by reputation before I became a member of this house. There are not many in the house who are ready to give them credit.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is not in his place. He knows something about the poor of our cities. He was the chairman of a housing commission which with considerable labour and not small expense investigated living conditions in Toronto. His report was made in 1934, and in it I find the statement that 2,000 houses in that city are unfit for habitation. After making an investigation of that kind and with the knowledge that he must possess as a result of that experience and that expenditure of public money, it seems to me unfortunate that the hon. member should be wasting the time of this house and his own time in making partisan attacks upon his political opponents. He would be better engaged in joining with some of the rest of us in endeavouring to improve the condition of our fellow citizens. The hon, gentleman knows considerably more about the tanks that are to be found under waistcoats, and that walk around on two legs and frequently require to be filled than he does about the tanks which are in service at the front.

I invite him to join with some of the rest of us in attempting to find remedies for at least some of the unfavourable conditions to which I have referred. This might be possible with a display of sufficient good-will among men of good-will; it will not be found in partisan recriminations. As I say, the hon. member is not in the chamber, but I suppose he will read my remarks later. I ask him to join with me in protesting against the kind of housing which so many of our fellow citizens are condemned to use. I invite him to join with me in protesting against the cold brutality with which one province at least has kicked out the homeless, transient. single unemployed.

Mr. HOMUTH: Which province?

Mr. ROEBUCK: My hon. friend knows the province; it is the one from which he and I come, the province of Ontario. I do not say that Ontario is the only province which has been guilty of brutality toward the single unemployed, but it is one of the guilty provinces. It is not so much my purpose to make charges against provinces or against those who administer the provinces as it is to call attention to the unfortunate condition of these young men. Not so long ago someone in this house described them as walking the streets and highways, sleeping in parks at night and riding the rods from place to place vainly looking for something to do. These are only illustrations, but they strike at the very vitals of this resolution.

What is involved in this resolution? I hold in my hand a report published by the Department of Labour in connection with activities carried on under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, 1939. At page 40 of this report I find published the amounts of money which the Dominion of Canada has granted from time to time under the advice of the Minister of Labour for the alleviation of distress in our provinces. From 1930 to the end of the fiscal year 1939-40 we have expended—perhaps this is the best money we have spent—a total of $377,000,000. In the fiscal year which has just closed, that of 1939-40, we shall have expended something like $30,000,000 in assisting the various provinces to minister to poverty in our midst. During that period there was spent in Ontario a total of $111,000,000. We have actually expended over $99,000,000 upon enterprises in which the provinces and dominion joined as partners.

I think every hon, member would agree that we should continue that expenditure notwithstanding the other difficulties which now confront us. This resolution should be passed unanimously. In this connection perhaps it will not be amiss-I do not know that I violate any rule of etiquette of this house-if I pay a tribute to the minister under whom these expenditures are now made and to the good work which I know personally he has performed in his department. Recently I sat on two boards appointed under the Industrial Disputes Investigation and Conciliation and Labour Acts, and I had a good deal to do with bringing about the appointment of another board just shortly before this house assembled. I have seen the minister in action, and I can report to his fellow members the vigour, intelligence, enterprise and, may I add, the success with which he has carried on his work.

In addition, another reason why we should pass this resolution is that the figures issued by his department are fairly satisfactory. Of course nothing could be absolutely satisfactory in the alleviation of distress; probably we should not have any distress; but putting all that aside, they are fairly satisfactory as figures go. I notice this, that the grand total of direct relief recipients has decreased since March of last year, 1939, from 1,027,000 to 768,000 persons. That is a considerable reduction and one which could be reported, I think, with a great deal of pleasure. It means that as many as 259,000 people have gone off the relief rolls of the Dominion of Canada in one month as compared with the other. Only two provinces in the whole dominion do not show improvement in this regard, namely, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. It is difficult, of course, to give explanations of matters of this sort, but I think one could explain it to the province of Quebec by saying that highway construction is not nearly as active in that province this year as it was last year in view of the recent provincial elections. They had an estimated 10,000 men working on the roads of the province of Quebec last year, but there are a great many fewer working there to-day. These people who were working on the roads will number, with their dependants, some 40,000 or 50,000, and that explains, I think, why it is that the decrease in the numbers of those on relief to be found in all the other provinces is not observed equally in the province of Quebec. So far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, the relief rolls there have been kept up, I understand, by the difficult conditions through which the fishing industry is passing.

Mr. HANSELL: What about New Brunswick?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I believe New Brunswick has reduced its numbers on relief; that is what the report says.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no registration of direct welfare. The towns and cities are having to assume the whole responsibility. This government gives the province a grant and the province does not pass any of it on. We have to handle the relief work ourselves.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Perhaps some of the reductions may be explained by the remark made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) two or three days ago when he referred to the Bourbons who had struck these poor people off relief. I hope that does not very generally apply, but I honour him for the plain speaking with which he described their actions.

Not only have the relief rolls decreased during this last year, but more encouraging still perhaps is the decrease in the unemployed wage-earners, the unemployed employables as reported by the bureau of statistics. Hon. gentlemen, whether they sat in this house at the time or not, will no doubt have a vivid recollection of the conditions which prevailed in this dominion in 1933, when as many as 730,000 employable men and women walked the streets looking for jobs when no jobs were to be found. That was a terrible condition to afflict any nation, and I observe with some little satisfaction that these figures have been decreasing, not nearly as rapidly as I should like or as hon. members would prefer, but nevertheless decreasing from time to time in the years that have intervened. In 1933 the number of unemployed employables was 703,000; in 1934, 598,000; in 1935, 589,000; in 1936, 568,000; in 1937, 519,000; in 1938, 456,000; in 1939, a slight increase and the only increase, to 494,000; and this year which has just closed, 1940, 391,000. So that there has been a good deal of decrease in the years since 1933.

I observe also that not only has the number of unemployed employables decreased, but those on relief have greatly decreased in numbers. In 1937, the first year for which the figures of this classification are available, the number was 245,000; in 1938, 168,000; in 1939, 186,000; and in 1940, 172,000. I suppose that everybody will join with me in an expression of hope that these numbers will go on decreasing at greater speed in the future than in the past.

But here is a question which we should ask ourselves, and which probably the country would like us to answer. With a war in progress, with 100,000 men, roughly speaking, taken out of the labour market and put into battle dress, and with thousands of dollars being spent in our munitions plants, with war contracts being given out, I noticed to-day, at the rate of two and a half contracts to the minute of every hour of the working day, why is it that we have any men at all left on relief? I am not going into the philosophy of why we have unemployment, speaking generally, because I am dealing with this matter only superficially perhaps at the moment, but there are some reasons, in my judgment, which explain why we had 391,000 unemployed employables in April, 1940. To begin with, there are no actual figures available of the enlistments of those upon relief. Figures are not available showing how many of those who enlisted came off relief, but I am under the impression-and I am assured by those who seem to know something about the matter—that the numbers are not large. There are many reasons why men enlist, but it seems to me that the outstanding motive, the motive which actuates nearly all of them, is a desire to take part in the service of one's country. I suggest that it is most unfair to insinuate that our men who enlisted did so because they were on starvation wages or starvation allowances. I heard that suggestion made in this chamber not so very long ago. I regard it as a libel on our men. I do not believe that it accounts for the enlistment of any appreciable proportion of them. I repeat, as a reason why these relief rolls have not decreased, the fact-I believe it is a fact-that very few among those who enlisted were on relief. There are reasons for that. A sojourn on a narrow margin of relief is not designed to fit a man for the intense physical examination through which a recruit must pass when he comes to a recruiting office. He does not stand very much chance in a competition of this kind against men whose diet during the previous months has been better than his. Nor is the class on relief particularly suitable as a source of recruits. Most of them are labourers or men engaged in construction. In the nature of things there will not be found as large a proportion of skilled men forced to draw relief as will be found among the labouring, unskilled classes. In consequence, of course, these latter are not nearly so acceptable to the recruiting officers.

Another thought which crosses my mind is this. During several months before recruiting commenced, many factories all over Canada were working half time; but as war orders have increased and as factories have speeded up, while they have taken on some additional men, the number so taken on are by no means proportioned to the increased activity of the factories. In too many instances, instead of increasing their staffs, they are working overtime with the same staff greatly speeded up. So there is very much more additional employment than there are additional employees. This is unfortunate, but it is a fact.

Let us not forget the other side of this ledger. On the one hand is a certain amount of activitiy brought about by war orders, but on the other hand a certain amount of industry has been destroyed because of the war. A consideration of one column only will not give one a correct picture. For instance -and perhaps this is an outstanding pointlet us consider the dislocation of our foreign trade as a result of the declaration of war. I have before me a statement compiled by the external trade branch, dominion bureau of statistics, for the four months ended April, 1939, and the corresponding period of 1940, and I observe that in the four months ended April, 1939, we sold to Germany alone $2,987,000 worth of merchandise. It is unnecessary for me to give the figures of 1940. That trade was completely destroyed as a result of the declaration of war. I note here also the trade figures with regard to Poland and Danzig. In the same four months of 1939 they absorbed $735,000 worth of our merchandise. Not one dollar's worth has been sold to them this year. These are but illustrations of the dislocation of trade brought about by the war.

But there are other conditions to be considered. For instance, there is the position of the building and construction industry. It is true that the expenditure of public money upon war orders has increased the activity of our building trades; buildings have been erected for war purposes and for those purposes only. But while there has been an acceleration in that direction, one must realize that a good deal of normal building activity has disappeared as a result of the war. Not all building, it is true; but one can fancy a person contemplating building himself a house and holding his hand under the doubtful conditions which now confront the communities of this country. So when one looks at the figures one finds the building industry is running along this year at just about the same pace as it did the year before. That is to say, the increase in the number of buildings on account of war orders has been offset by the absence of other types of building in consequence of war conditions. The same thing applies to public works. There are public works which have been brought about by war conditions, but on the other hand various public works have been stopped for the same reason.

All this offers some explanation, at least, why, with these large expenditures of money upon war efforts, there are yet some people on relief. I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this phenomenon is not peculiar to Canada. I listened a short time ago to the present Prime Minister of Great Britain speaking over the radio, and I heard him deplore the fact that there were at that time in England 1,300,00 people out of work, one-half of whom were employable. Can one imagine a nation at war and fighting for its life, as Great Britain, along with the rest of the empire, is doing, realizing that wars are won in factories quite as much as on the field of battle, yet having one-half of 1,300,000 unemployed men in enforced idleness! We democracies have still a good deal to learn in the arts of self-government and with regard to those tendencies which bring about stagnation on the one hand and industrial activity on the other. But may we not hope that in the coming months, with the increased expenditures, with the activity which war always produces, and with changes in economic conditions which I do not propose to describe, we may find the entire employable population of our country absorbed either into the army or into the factories of our dominion? I hope so.

May I close with another thought. So far, I have been talking about the past. I should like to say something about the future. I notice in the Sirois report some criticism of the federal jurisdiction for its supposed lack of leadership in the post-war period. This is not politics. The report was referring to all parties and it explained the growth in the importance and the dominance of provincial jurisdictions. There may be some truth in that statement, the lack of leadership in the federal jurisdiction during this post-war period. But while that may be so, I submit that it does not apply to the Department of Labour, because in that department there has been perhaps a more progressive, forward-looking administration than in any other department in the twenty years following the war. My hon, friend opposite says something. Evidently he does not agree. Well, the Department of Labour has been sufficiently progressive. I do not think any fault can be found with that word because I look for progress. That was what I was leading up to.

I should like to see this resolution carried unanimously because I wish to strengthen the hand of the Minister of Labour in those plans which I hope he has in mind and which would make for social betterment in our country during the coming years. I have in mind for instance the subject of unemployment insurance; I have in mind the idea of minimum wages and maximum hours within the dominion, matters full of difficulty it is true, but matters with which this house should wrestle in order to establish, as President Roosevelt has said, a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours.

No one can be as familiar as I am with industrial conditions in this country and not regret the pitiably low wages which in many instances disgrace our civilization. I hope that the future years, if not the future months, will see something done in this regard. Someone passes me word that my time is up. I wonder if I may have one more minute to finish two or three sentences.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. ROEBUCK: This parliament passed an act giving the right to organize. It was in the form of an amendment to the criminal code and was passed at the session before last. It has not been adopted by the province of Ontario, and I hope that the ministry of labour will find some method of making that law applicable to Ontario irrespective of those who now oppose it. There is great work ahead of the ministry of labour and I should like to see this resolution passed unanimously in order to strengthen the hand of the minister in carrying on social work which is in his charge and perhaps in meeting some of the obstructions that are in his path from other jurisdictions.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I will try to be brief because I believe that in this house men are not listened to merely because they say much. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Roebuck) has given us something well worth listening to and reading and I congratulate him. He made some reference to relief recipients who did not enlist. I know there is some heart-burning in the town of Trenton because some of our young men who left Fort William were twitted for having signed up because they were on relief. Let me say that these young men are equal to the cream of any country in the world, and I know them well. Those young men who have given up fine positions and good salaries and have left their homes find that their rents have been increased beyond any conception, and I think the department should look into increases in rent being charged young soldiers in that town. However, that is not what I intended to say when I rose.

I know that our hearts are very tender. As the hon, member said, this is a war parliament, and we all know that some splendid memorials have been demolished. When we think of our loved ones who have gone on, we all feel that we would like to do something to honour their memory, to make their names live for the good of this land of our birth or of our adoption. When I think of the times I interviewed the late minister on the question of youth training, and the courtesy and patience he showed on every occasion, always willing to listen and to take suggestions, I am convinced that we should erect a war memorial and call it the youth training movement of Canada. I am convinced that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) will never lose sight of that youth training. It is the most constructive thing I have seen in my forty-four years in this great country. Some of the youth have said to us, "Do not let it die." And by God's help it will never die. I am convinced that the present minister will make that memorial to his predecessor in such a way that youth training will be taken up with greater determination and Christian charity than it has ever been taken up before. When men have laid down their tasks others must take them up, and we will not depend upon one man to do the work of others. We will do our best, hoping that we shall be spared a long time and keep our youth training alive so that we shall see that this youth training programme is made a splendid success.

I am convinced that if the youth training movement dies, it will be a curse to Canada. Personally I am prepared to join with anyone in making it live; for if it had not been for unemployment and relief, and relief camps I would never have bowed my head to the finest constituency in this great part of our dominion, but being here I will do my best to see that every last employable person in Canada shall have an opportunity of sweating up to his job and keeping a cosy corner for his little wife and family.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): When the committee was discussing this resolution last Friday I was speaking at six o'clock and did not have time to finish what I wanted to say. Before coming to the points I wish to discuss to-night, I should like to thank the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) for the kind reference he made to the members of this group. I presume the group to my left will thank him also because I think they were included. His remarks reminded me of a statement made by another great Liberal who has passed to his reward these many years. Shortly before his death Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone made this statement:

I painfully reflect that in almost every political conflict of the last fifty years the leisured classes, the educated classes, the wealthy classes have been in the wrong. The common people—the toilers, the men of uncommon sense—these have been responsible for nearly all the social reform measures which the world accepts to-day.

I agree that we have been and still are ploughing an unpopular furrow, if that is not mixing my metaphors too much. The policies we have been and are advocating are not greatly to the liking of many. The logic of events, however, will compel people to adopt them, as was the case during the fifty year period of which Mr. Gladstone spoke. I would suggest to the hon. member, however, that he be not too friendly, because he might get himself disliked; but possibly he is accustomed to getting himself disliked.

When I was speaking last Friday I referred to the refusal of many Canadian industries to recognize and negotiate with the accredited organizations or trade unions of their employees. I made particular reference to Canadian Celanese Limited, who not only refused to recognize the organization of their employees but evidently were proud of the fact, because they advertised their eighteenth century concept of social behaviour in the public press. I also mentioned that while sometimes we have reason to complain-as I shall to-night-of conditions in my own province, the attitude of the government and of some industrialists has progressed beyond the attitude to which I referred. Indeed. attempts are being made to get employers to recognize their responsibility for industrial peace and social progress. I have before me a copy of an address delivered before the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Manufacturers association by the provincial minister of labour, Hon. George S. Pearson, in which I find this paragraph:

The policy which has prevailed for such a long time, that the workmen must accept the conditions laid down by the individual employer or get out, must change. Industry is as dependent upon labour as it is upon capital and management. Industry cannot operate without labour. This being the case, labour is entitled to be considered as an integral part of the industrial operation, and as such should be placed in the position by all employers of having right to sit around the table with its employers and discuss its problems.

I for one appreciate that attitude on the part of the minister of labour of British Columbia. I hope he will do everything in his power and that in this he will have the assistance of the federal Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), as I believe he will, to have that principle accepted in all industries, because I am satisfied that it is the first step to industrial peace and social progress.

I wish now to refer to a situation in my own province which I think is of particular importance at this time. When war broke out, I was of opinion, as I still am, that this country should organize production on the highest scale possible, and in that way make our greatest contribution to the struggle that is at present going on in Europe. And when I speak of production I do not refer only to aeroplanes, tanks and other war supplies; I refer to food and clothing as well. Under present conditions there is no danger that we shall have too much food in Canada. We should produce food in abundance, to supply the needs of our own people and our allies. There should be no reason why the unemployed in this country or the people of the allied countries should have to go on short rations. In war time, food rationing by the warring nations is understandable; but for the last ten years in Canada hundreds of thousands of our unemployed and low paid workers have been on very short rations indeed, and to me that is not understandable.

I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a letter I received a few days ago from the secretary of the Pacific Coast Fishermen's Union of British Columbia. I believe other hon, members from British Columbia have received copies of this letter as well. I wish to draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour in this way in order that he may use whatever means he considers expedient to help bring about a solution of the problem. The letter reads:

Dear Sir:

We are addressing this letter to you and some of your colleagues, feeling sure that you will give us your support. Knowling full well, the importance of food production in war time, we are asking you to aid us in avolding anything that will curtail production at this critical time.

The salmon fishing season on this coast is just about to commence and except for one category of salmon, the cannery operators have refused to make known to the fishermen any of the prices they intend to pay. For this reason the negotiations are at a standstill.

For bluebacks, the one fish on which they have named a price, they offered 25 per cent less than last year. When the 30 per cent increase in the cost of gear and the rise in cost of living is taken into account, the impossibility of operating a fish boat is evident. blueback season commences on June 1st, and by the time you receive this some time may have already been lost unless the offer is raised.

If this 25 per cent cut indicates what we may expect for other fish then the situation is bad indeed, and we ask your aid to bring about a settlement before the main season starts.

Mr. McLARTY: I have been trying to follow my hon, friend, and I wonder if there is a basis of relationship as employer and employee that would give the Minister of Labour any jurisdiction whatever? I ask that because frankly I am naturally interested in it. I do not see exactly what I can do as Minister of Labour unless that relationship exists.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have just about finished reading this letter, and then I shall read briefly from another one which will give the situation in that regard. I continue reading:

We feel that if the fishermen are willing to fish for last year's prices despite the rise in the cost of gear, and so on, canners should be willing to forego something, especially at a time like this, when labour hours are so essential to the successful prosecution of the war. canners do not look with favour on our suggestions of arbitration, or government control of industry, but we think that if industry must close because private effort cannot cope with war conditions, then our government should intervene to make operation possible.

That is signed by the secretary, A. V. Hill, and is dated May 31. Since that date I have received another letter which I shall not read, but the contents of which I shall summarize briefly. At first the provincial minister of fisheries told the members of the union that legislation providing for arbitration was available when they desired it. But since that time he has informed them that the arbitration law now on the statute books applies only to fish caught with nets. I understand that these are troller fishermen, and that the arbitration legislation does not apply to them.

I may be told that this matter comes under provincial jurisdiction, and that there is nothing that this government can do. But in a great many matters to-day, in these abnormal times, Canada is being governed not by the normal dominion-provincial relations. In many respects the War Measures Act has displaced the British North America Act as the constitution of Canada. Here then is a condition where an important industry in British Columbia, an industry producing one of our most important foods, is being held up. I would suggest that anything the government can do, any pressure it can bring to bear, should be applied. I believe it has some influence, even if it be only moral suasion, that it could use to get these people working, so that the people of the province and of the Dominion of Canada and our allies may benefit.

It seems intolerable that in these times either employers or workers should hold up essential production by refusing to arbitrate their differences, even if there is no legislation providing for arbitration. As a matter of fact, arbitration does not depend upon legislation; it depends upon the willingness of the people concerned to come together and to agree to arbitrate any differences they may have.

On many occasions in this house, and again to-night by the hon, member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), mention has been made of the inadequacy of relief standards. There are available very few figures or statistics on the amount required by an average family to maintain health and self-respect. On a number of occasions attempts have been made to obtain such figures, but they have not been worked out on a scale large enough to be of great value. Quite recently the welfare council of Toronto worked out a cost of living basis of the kind I have in mind. After considerable investigation, their conclusion was that it required $28.35 a week to cover the bare essentials for the maintenance of health and self-respect of a family of five, consisting of two adults and three children with an age range between six and twelve years. In the charts furnished we find complete figures for the various articles and services concerned, and I would suggest that any hon, member interested in the matter would find it worth while to study the figures.

I have been unable to find in the whole range one instance that I would consider not only not too high, but really high enough. The committee which prepared the figures stated that the food would have to be planned, purchased and cooked with the greatest possible care. Amounts set aside for cultural advancement and recreation are very small indeed. No allowance is made for what has now become general among men and women, namely tobacco, nor is there any provision for the purchase of alcoholic beverages. No allowance is made for telephones.

I do not know of any province which has a relief scale approaching the figure of $28.35 a week. Not only is our relief scale far below that amount, but in many instances wages in Canada fall below it. The Canada Year Book for 1939 shows for the year 1936, the latest year for which complete figures are available, that the average annual income of workers throughout manufacturing industries in Canada amounted to $896. I would suggest that an effort be made to work out a budget that would give a decent living, and that as nearly as possible we should provide relief recipients with payments approximating the sum arrived at.

Beginning my observations on the resolution last Friday, I said I was going to stress two points, namely, the need for economic planning and the necessity for social justice in dealing with the problem of unemployment. Again I stress those two points. In doing so, I think I can not do better than read a brief paragraph from an article by Major Clement Attlee, former leader of the British Labour party and now a member of Mr. Winston Churchill's government. This excerpt is from an article written by Mr. Attlee shortly after the outbreak of war. He said:

The labour party, then, in taking its stand against Hitlerism, is defending civilization against barbarism. It is seeking to preserve the heritage of the past and the hopes of the future. For many centuries the treasures of thought and art, and the beautiful things in the earth, have been mainly the preserve of the few. Now, when the rise of labour has seen the doors opening to the workers, we will not allow them to be closed by the domination of barbarism. We are resolved to defend our freedom and democracy against all attacks, whether from without or within. We value the political, religious, and personal liberty which our forefathers won for us. They can only be maintained by basing them on social justice. Without social justice there can be no real peace. It is the denial of social justice in the countries of Europe which has been one of the chief causes of the present condition of things.

I agree with Mr. Attlee. We won the last war, but it availed us nothing because we did not use the military victory to promote social justice. The peace was used for entirely different things; it was used to preserve class interest and class privilege. Under the circumstances the results are natural. The same thing will happen after this war if we do not use the military victory, which I hope will be ours, for just ends. A military victory is not an end in itself. At the most it can be only a means to an end. That end must be social justice. Only a system based on social justice will end unemployment and bring security and freedom to all. We should not wait until the end of the war before we begin to build social justice in Canada.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Chairman, the last few days have made everything not directly connected with our immediate task fade into insignificance, and yet I feel that hon. members would wish me to use this first opportunity of addressing this committee to make one acknowledgment. I want to say how deeply I appreciate the honour of representing the Montreal constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George. The responsibility is a heavy one. It will be recalled that this division has been represented by such men as Sir George Etienne Cartier, D'Arcy McGee, Senator Ballantyne, the late Sir Herbert Marler and the Hon. Mr. Cahan. I feel that hon. members on this side of the house will unite with me when I endeavour to pay tribute on behalf of my constituency, of this house and of the country to the services rendered to his country by Mr. Cahan. Those services extended over the almost unparalleled number of fifty years. Now he is enjoying a rest from immediate public service, one which has been as well earned as it was unsought.

At this time I do not feel that I should take up the time of the committee in discussing many of the matters which might be discussed under this resolution. I am sure we all feel that we should devote our time and strength to the one cause we have at heart, the getting on with the war. In the few minutes which I propose to take, I intend to deal with one aspect of the unemployment question. Yesterday I had an opportunity of discussing with some men in Montreal a situation which might arise if it became necessary for our industrial plants to work at full capacity. They told me that in a short space of time there might well be a shortage of skilled and semi-skilled labour. At the same time there is in Montreal any number of unemployed single young men between the ages of sixteen and thirty. I join with hon, members who have spoken already, particularly the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), in drawing to the attention of the minister a matter which no doubt he has under consideration.

Everything possible should be done at this time to train young unemployed men in the use of machines, the reading of blue-prints and other work which would be necessary to fit themselves to take their places in our factories. I am told that a three months' course is all that is necessary. Our factories want young men from the technical schools. The industrialists of Montreal are well satisfied with the work which the technical school in that city is doing, and I am sure the same thing applies to other schools throughout the country. Upon inquiry it was found that the technical school in Montreal is filled to capacity. This year it will be able to qualify only some hundred men to take their places in industry, whereas the needs of Montreal might well run into the thousands.

There must be some new means of training the unemployed youth of the country. We [Mr. Claxton.]

are all familiar with the splendid work that has been done under the youth training plan, but the results in Montreal were not substantial. Some 9,000 young people between the ages of sixteen and thirty were eligible in 1938, but only 853 seemed to show any interest in the plan. In 1939 there was a registration of 6,654 young people, but because of lack of cooperation on the part of the provincial government nothing was done that year. To-day there are undoubtedly some five or six thousand young people in Montreal who would be eligible for training under this plan.

There are four ways in which this training could be given. The first is through the technical schools. While the Montreal technical school is filled to capacity at the present time, it might be that ways and means could be provided for keeping this school open during the summer months in order to prepare young men more speedily. The second method is industry itself. The hon, member for Davenport and others have referred to the possibilities of cooperation between industry and the government. The third means has not been referred to as yet. Why could not the universities of Canada be made available for this purpose? They have fully equipped shops and draughting rooms. I believe without exception they have placed their resources at the services of the country, and it seems to me that the minister and the universities could easily work out a plan whereby these young people could be given the training required to fit them for active work in the factories. The fourth means of providing this training, one which will no doubt receive the consideration of the government, is the development of special training schools in which people could be brought to the required degree of skill and knowledge necessary to take their places in industry. At this time, Mr. Chairman, everyone in this country is prepared to play his full part. So far there has been no slacking. There is no shortage of recruits, no shortage of labour. But from now on we may have to use every possible means to utilize the great fund of good-will, the earnest desire to be of service, in every possible direction, and I suggest that there is available in these young people, through training, a great source of help for our industries and ultimately for our war effort.

We hear a good deal about victory being the whole thing, that nothing else matters but victory, but I suggest to this committee that everything matters to-day in order to bring about victory. The work that each one of us does in every possible direction added together will make the great effort of the nation and bring about the result we all desire. We cannot all fight again on the front line, but there are front lines in Canada to be fought on, lines in the mines, the factories, the workshops and every branch of our activities throughout the country, and I suggest that the men and women of Canada are as willing to fight at home as our soldiers are to fight abroad.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak only briefly on this resolution. I regret that the Minister of Labour (Mr McLarty) has not yet outlined in any detail the principles underlying or the manner in which he will carry out the spending of the moneys to be appropriated under this resolution or indicated the works to be carried out by his department to provide employment. During the debate on this resolution last week, several hon, members from the western provinces gave to the house details of the distress in agricultural districts in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, details which must have shocked many hon. members; but I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that these conditions are not peculiar to western Canada but apply also to certain areas in Ontario. The hon, member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) in his speech to-night made mention of the distress that prevailed in his riding in Toronto. I should like to urge the Minister of Labour, in considering the plans of his department for the spending of moneys under this resolution, not to overlook the distress that prevails in many of the rural sections of Ontario.

The riding which I have the honour to represent, Hastings-Peterborough, consists of twenty-seven rural townships. Of these twenty-seven townships nineteen are unsuited for farming or agricultural pursuits except in small isolated areas. This is due to the large number of ranges of hills, large rock formations and poor type of soil. These townships, like all the rest of Ontario, were once covered with very fine forests. These have practically disappeared, and at the present time there is very little timber left for the settlers. The settlers in these townships are practically 100 per cent of British descent. They are not the type of citizen that wants relief. All they ask for is work. They desire the development of the natural resources within the counties of Hastings and Peterborough, and if these resources are developed they will create work for everyone. There are large mining areas to be developed. A great reforestation scheme could be undertaken, and if the tourist industry is developed it will provide work for many people. The conditions that apply to these two counties of Hastings and Peterborough apply to many other rural sections of Ontario, but I shall deal with these two counties in particular because I am more familiar with their conditions.

In discussing roads I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the building of roads in Ontario comes within the jurisdiction of the province and of the individual counties. But I think it will also be realized that in many of these rural areas the building of roads is one way in which money can be spent to provide employment and relief. In the county of Hastings, for example, which is one of the largest counties in Ontario, there are some 282 miles of county roads, administered and kept up by the county. During the present year the county will spend on these roads the sum of $75,000, being the amount approved by the provincial department of highways. To show you, Mr. Chairman, the large amount of money that is spent by a county for road maintenance, the road from Madoc to Belleville, a distance of twenty-five miles, is paved throughout except for some ten miles, and the yearly maintenance of this unpaved ten miles of road is $7,000, which does not take into account the cost of snow removal. Naturally the counties are anxious to pave their roads, but in the county of Hastings we are able to pave only one and a half miles of road a year. On the paved portion of the road there is no annual maintenance charge except for the cutting of weeds.

I would urge upon the Minister of Labour that when his department considers the spending of moneys granted under this resolution, he keep in mind the counties of Ontario, and in particular the counties of Hastings and Peterborough, with their hundreds of miles of roads which cannot be properly developed at the present time because of lack of funds. I suggest to the minister that the road conditions in these two counties will serve as an example of the great advantage to be derived from a plan being worked out between the federal Department of Labour, the province of Ontario and the different county councils for the development of main county roads. Such a plan would create much employment, open new mining areas, and do much to aid the tourist traffic, which in turn would benefit hundreds of settlers in these two counties.

The municipal councils of these townships are unable to pay out much in the way of relief. When one considers that some townships have a total assessment of less than $60,000, one can readily understand why some municipal councils can do little in the way of relief. Taxes in all these municipalities are very high, and within the last few years several writs have been issued by the county against certain townships for arrears of county rates. Indigent accounts for the county of Hastings amount to between $20,000 and $30,000 a year, and each year there are thousands of dollars of unpaid taxes and many properties are sold for tax arrears.

Certainly there is very little, if any, opportunity for the young man or woman, and little prospect for the future. These nineteen townships in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough constitute a solid block which present a wonderful opportunity for a reforestation scheme, yet to date no such plan has been announced. The land is ideal for the planting of trees, because there is plenty of moisture, but to-day we find that the top-soil is being rapidly carried away. During the last three weeks there were very heavy rains throughout this district, and the lakes, creeks and rivers were at flood stage; in fact the water was higher than after a spring break-up. The reason for this is that the forests have been removed and the greater part of the rainfall is not absorbed into the

These two counties of Hastings and Peterborough, with their hundreds of lakes and rivers, present endless possibilities for the development of the tourist trade. But to attract these tourists we need development of the roads, because the tourist of to-day demands a road to his camping place. Running through the county of Hastings is the only through road east of the city of Toronto leading from the No. 2 highway to Algonquin park or to Callander. This road is the shortest route to the park or Callander for all tourists entering Canada by Ivy Lea bridge. Here is a great opportunity to open up this section to United States tourists, because there is in this county some of the finest scenery in the world. It is a county where every kind of fish is found in large quantities and where game is abundant. The opening of proper roads for tourists would do much to relieve the distress of hundreds of settlers; it would do much to increase the provincial revenues, and it would bring great benefits to the many people engaged in trade in these two counties. At the present time this main road is partly provincial highway, partly a county road, and partly a township road. Until the road is completed and is shown on the tourist maps marked in red as a highway, few tourists can be expected to be attracted to this area.

In the southern part of these two counties will be found one of the finest agricultural districts in Ontario. To-day the farmer in this district is at a loss to know what the government wishes him to produce. The farmer has no plan to guide him in production. Many of the farmers in these two counties have recently increased the number of hogs being raised, only to find that the price is lower than in normal times. Surely in a time of war it is one of the duties of the government to show some leadership in such a vital industry as agriculture.

The farmer, like every other citizen, is ready and willing to do his part in producing the required foodstuffs required in time of war, but he needs some plan or guidance as to the nature of the foodstuffs required. What encouragement to-day is it to the farmer to increase his production of hogs only to find that the government is permitting the entry of millions of pounds of pork from the United States? It is hardly necessary to repeat in this chamber that agriculture is the back-bone of the country and that until this industry is put on a proper basis, there will be distress and unemployment among the agricultural workers.

Enlistments to date in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough have been very large, and there are many more eager and willing to enlist if they are given an opportunity. But even these enlistments have by no means taken care of the hundreds of unemployed. If this government would at once have a national registration of every man and woman in the Dominion of Canada, it could then have a plan or basis whereby every man and woman would be given an opportunity of performing the war work best suited to his or her qualifications. To-day, when the allies need in unlimited quantities every kind of munitions and other supplies, there are roaming about the country looking for work hundreds of men qualified to work in munition factories and other trades which could make war supplies. I ask the government, why not put these men to work in producing supplies? If this is done, a large part of the unemployed problem will be solved. Why continue spending huge sums each year to alleviate unemployment and provide relief when there is a great need of speeding up the manufacture of war supplies; for I think we are all agreed that the combined efforts of every man and woman in Canada will be needed in our undertaking to carry through our part in this world struggle?

Since it is necessary to make provision for unemployment and agricultural distress, I should like to make a few suggestions to the committee and to the Minister of Labour:

First, that the government undertake at once a national registration of every man and woman in the Dominion of Canada.

Second, that the Minister of Labour give serious consideration to a plan of flood control and a reforestation scheme in this area of nineteen townships in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough.

Third, that the Minister of Labour consider the great possibilities offered by the counties of Hastings and Peterborough for the development of tourist traffic from the United States by opening up roads, and in particular, by the completion of the road through Hastings county leading to Algonquin park.

Fourth, that the Minister of Labour consider the question of special grants for improving and opening roads to mining properties now being developed in these two counties.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I rise particularly to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) a question, which I believe is extremely fundamental, in respect to the resolution we have before us relating to unemployment and relief. I desire to comment a little for the purpose of elucidating that question.

In days gone by, we heard many speeches in this chamber on unemployment and relief. Even during this session of parliament there have been many speeches on the same subject. The other night I attempted to give one hon, member a bit of a dressing down because he endeavoured to criticize severely the group with which I am associated. This evening, however, I should like to compliment and to thank another hon. member-I refer to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck)-for the kind remarks he made concerning the progressive groups which sit in this quarter of the house. I can assure him that such comments are not often heard here, and, coming as they do, they are particularly refreshing. I believe that if there existed in this chamber a more kindly disposition towards the progressive groups in this corner, we might make further headway with our discussions; we might get a little closer together.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to several of the speeches on this resolution. Hon members have risen to call for an enunciation of the policy of the government on the problem of unemployment. The government has been charged with a lack of plan, and some speakers have passionately demanded that it should do something. Well, we have been urging the government for a good many years to do something, and such a resolution as we are debating at this time comes up for discussion every session; it would seem to be the best that the government has to offer the country. I have been wondering why such a motion should have to be debated in this chamber at this particular time. There might have been some reason for such a resolution, say five years ago, after the government had been elected in 1935. They were feeling their feet and perhaps contemplating some type of action, and such a resolution would have served in those days. But after five years, nearly six years, of administration, it does seem to me that the government should have something a little better than this to offer the people of Canada.

I remember that in the election compaign of 1935, nearly six years ago, I referred to an article written by the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and published in Maclean's magazine of September 15, 1935. Of course, even in those days, we had this serious unemployment problem. The Liberals who were stumping in those days were going to deal with this unemployment problem; the whole country desired to know how they were going to deal with it, and I am going to read from this article. It was not a speech but an article written after a good deal of contemplation, meditation and thought, and it appeared over the pen of the present Prime Minister. It was entitled "The Issues as I See Them." I am inclined to think that Maclean's magazine publishes a similar article with the same title prior to every election; at any rate this is the one that appeared prior to the 1935 election. This is what the leader of the Liberal party said at that time:

The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

This employment commission was created and it did its work, but its work fell far short of what that statement purported it was going to do. As far as I am concerned the employment commission was little more than a committee for the tabulating of statistics throughout the country on matters of relief and unemployment. It did not deal with the situation; and if there was any merit in any of the recommendations the commission made, certainly we have not seen very good results from those recommendations.

I said I was wondering why such a resolution was on the order paper at this particular time. That the government has this resolution on the order paper is significant of the fact that the government expects unemployment to continue. Moreover, I suggest that the fact that the resolution appears every year shows that the government is not dealing with the matter in any adequate way. Such a resolution is self-evident of the fact that something is radically wrong in Canada. If a doctor has a sick patient on his hands, he never attempts to prescribe without first diagnosing the case.

An hon. MEMBER: That is, a good doctor.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, a good doctor. I think it behooves us to ask, if we diagnose the case, just why it is that this problem exists. I would ask the Minister of Labour that question. A year or two ago the government might have answered, "Well, there is a depression on in the country and unemployment is a result of business conditions." I do not think we can very well say that to-day. Surely the government would not say at the present time, when the British empire has its back against the wall, that there is a business depression on. That could not be the reason why unemployment exists to-day. It could not be that parliament has not passed proper legislation. I am reminded of the impression that we were given some time ago, that under the War Measures Act the government had the power to pass pretty well whatever legislation it desired; and that being the case, after eight months of war, it does seem to me that we should not have any unemployment or relief problem.

Speaking of legislation and the power of the government under the War Measures Act, I wonder if I might read a short paragraph from this renowned document in these red covers. There appears at the top the statement, "This document is the property of His Majesty's government in Canada," and it is known as the Defence of Canada Regulations. This is, of course, as we all know, a report given by a sort of interdepartmental committee whose terms of reference required them to look into some phases of legislation and to come back to the government with a report as to just what measures should be enacted should a very serious condition arise in the country. Let me read from page 3, parargaph 4, War Measures Act:

Pursuant to our terms of reference we have surveyed the position as regards the legislation which would be required in the event of grave emergency and we have reached conclusion that little in the way of special legislation in parliament will be required. Under the provisions of the War Measures Act, chapter 206, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, the governor in council "may do and authorize such acts and things and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may, by reason of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada." It is clear, therefore, that this statute confers upon the executive ample authority to take pretty well whatever action might be found to be necessary to meet the exigencies of war or other emergency. There is, however, one specific exception to this general rule, namely, finance.

I should like to point out to hon, members that apparently the government could do about whatever it wanted under the War Measures Act, except that it must keep its hands off finance; no, it must not touch that.

Why does there exist in Canada to-day a condition that requires a resolution of this kind? I said a moment ago that it could not be because there is a business depression. I have just referred to this paragraph which would indicate that it cannot be because the government is unable to act. I am wondering if it could be because we have no raw materials in Canada. I hardly think that could be given as a reason for unemployment. I am wondering if perhaps the reason might be that we have no factories in Canada. I do not think that is a good reason; I believe we have ample factories to meet the needs of unemployment in these days. Can it be that we have no genius or engineering skill in Canada? I do not think that could be given as a reason. Perhaps it is because we have no money. Of course we in this corner of the house have a certain money philosophy. I am not going to refer to that to-night, but it has been said over and over again of late that since the war began we have plenty of money. This parliament is going to be asked to vote in the neighbourhood of one and a half billion dollars. Therefore even under orthodox finance I do not think the reason for unemployment could be that we have no money.

So what to-day is the fundamental reason for so much unemployment in Canada? That is my question to the Minister of Labour. It seems to me that to diagnose the case properly he should be able to give to the house and to the people of Canada the reason why unemployment exists in this country today. I am not going to tell the minister how to answer the question; I believe he is quite capable of putting into words whatever may be in his mind on the subject. But I would ask him not to answer by saving that there is unemployment in Canada because people cannot get any work. That does not answer the question. We want to know the fundamental, root cause of unemployment in Canada to-day. If we know the cause, perhaps we can remove it. If the minister wishes to take a little time to think over the matter, that is all right with me; but I hope that before this debate concludes, the minister will give an honest answer to this question: Just what is the cause of unemployment in Canada to-day?

Mr. H. H. HATFIELD (Victoria-Carleton): I do not desire to oppose the resolution, but rather I wish to speak of the way in which relief is carried on in New Brunswick. At page 5 of the report of the commissioner of unemployment relief I find this statement:

At the request of the province of New Brunswick, which has adopted a policy of not granting material aid generally but rather to require those in need of assistance to perform some form of work, an agreement was entered into with that province by which the dominion agreed to contribute fifty per cent of expenditures incurred by the province during the period April 1, 1939, to March 31, 1940, inclusive, in carrying on certain provincial undertakings.

This request might have been made in good faith, but it was not so carried out. Instead of requiring those in need of work to perform some service, it was quite impossible for those in need of work to secure jobs on certain road contracts for which this money was used. Almost twenty per cent of the labour used on the roads was brought in from outside the province by road contractors from Montreal and other cities. I know of a great many people in my constituency who were urgently in need of work in order to earn enough money to feed their families but who were refused the opportunity.

According to this report it would seem that there was no unemployment and that there were no people on relief in New Brunswick. From what I have seen of the other provinces, however, and what I know of New Brunswick, I consider that my province has problems in respect to relief more serious than those of any other province in Canada. A great many of the municipalities have become bankrupt through carrying this tremendous load of relief. They have not been able to collect taxes from the agricultural counties because agricultural products have been selling for less than the cost of production. According to this report the government of New Brunswick received $549,960.10 from the federal government in lieu of relief for the year ended March 31, 1940. Very little of this money came into my constituency, and our municipal council had to carry the burden of relief, social services and hospitalization through direct taxation on our people.

The same arrangement was made in 1938 with the provincial government of New Brunswick, but of the money contributed by the federal government practically all that came into my constituency was paid to a bank under a guarantee in connection with a lumbering operation. This lumber firm went a good many thousand dollars in the hole, and money was taken out of the relief fund to make up that amount to the bank. But the people working on this particular lumbering operation did not receive their wages; neither did the farmers who supplied hay, oats, beef, pork and other products to this lumbering operation receive their pay. That is a sample of how relief has been carried on in New Brunswick. The bank got the relief. In 1939 stumpage was paid the New Brunswick department of lands and mines from relief money provided by this government, amounting to $20,770.20. The bank of Nova Scotia was paid a certain amount towards the cost of unloading from cars pulpwood en route to Germany. New Brunswick telephone company was paid a certain sum towards the cost of removing telephone poles from the highways. A discount on debentures issued by the provincial government, totalling $28,638, was paid out of this fund, together with expenses in connection with debentures to the amount of $2,136.

It is not relief legislation that is needed at the present time to help agriculture and unemployment. Rather it is a measure to employ every employable man in our factories in the manufacture of tanks, planes, motorized equipment and ammunition for our allied armies. We want to put our workers in a position where they can purchase food, clothing and farm produce. In that way we would give our farmers a chance to exist, and they would be in a position to spend money in Canada.

In a time of war every person should be at work. We have a great opportunity to reestablish our farmers on the land and to give them a profit over their costs of production. For the past ten years our farmers have been feeding the people at less than cost of production. They are the largest employers of labour, when they are given something more than the cost of production. But we know that in the last few years they have only existed on the land and have not been in a position to employ outside help. Some of them have had to keep their children out of school to help on the farms. They have not been able to give employment to the unemployed, and to the people on relief in their own communities.

I say: Give the farmers a chance and there will be no more unemployment relief in Canada. I am absolutely opposed to turning over moneys voted by parliament to any provincial government to use in their own political ways. I consider the municipal councils in Canada the only public bodies which would distribute fairly to all concerned any available relief moneys. Municipal councils are the only independent legislative bodies in our dominion to-day.

Before closing, I should like to submit to the committee a suggestion which I believe would be highly beneficial to agriculture. One reason why the farmers are in such unfortunate circumstances to-day is that many of them have lost their credit, and cannot secure further credit from the banks or other financial institutions. I do not believe in extending long-term credits to the farmer, but I do believe in seasonable loans. And when I say that, I mean the farmer should be financed to buy his seed, fertilizer and other necessities, and should be financed during the crop year at a low rate of interest, such loans being repayable after the disposal of the crop.

I suggest two classes of short-term loans. One would be a cooperative farm loan such as is being used in the United States. There are joint recipients. The members of a farm organization are liable as joint guarantors for an amount equal to their own borrowings. This led to a careful selection of members. A farmer was accepted as a borrower only if, in the opinion of the society officers, he was a man of integrity and a good farmer.

Members were required to take stock in proportion to their borrowings. Profits and losses were accordingly shared. Each borrower was financially interested in every loan. This plan could become operative among a better class of cooperative farmers who might find themselves unable to borrow from the banks, even for seasonable crops.

Then, there is another class of farmer who has grown farm produce at less than cost of production, and to-day he finds his credit completely ruined. These are known as relief farmers. I do not believe a farmer should be kept on relief; he should be placed in a position whereby he can carry on without it. I am suggesting the setting up of another form of loan for this class of farmer. In the United States such loans are under the supervision of their emergency farm loan board. Applications are made to the board for small loans to amounts not in excess of $300, and these moneys are used in connection with the handling of smaller crops during the crop The board is permitted to make further loans to buy machinery and live stock which in the opinion of the board is necessary, and for such services a chattel mortgage is taken.

If these two farm credit organizations are set up, I would consider that the legislation now before the committee would be unnecessary. The two measures I have suggested would relieve agriculture, and the factories engaged in the manufacturing of war supplies would take care of the balance of the unemployed. I would impress upon the government that every effort should be made to have all possible war materials manufactured in Canada so that our money may be kept at home. Otherwise it will be impossible to secure by taxation the large sums of money required to carry on our war effort.

Before taking my seat I would call to the attention of the committee the document issued by the farm loan board to any farmer wishing to borrow money. In my opinion this indenture which the farmer must sign is a vicious document. If a farmer is behind on his payments he becomes a tenant and brings himself within the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act. Any goods on his property can be seized and sold, without notice. He also waives all right of exemption afforded him under the provincial statutes. One paragraph reads as follows:

And the mortgagor hereby waives the benefit of all statutes relating to exemptions from seizure and distress, now or hereafter in force in the said province.

This form of mortgage on both real estate and personal property has ruined the credit of the borrower. He cannot get credit to-day. Under those circumstances how can we expect him to carry on, meet his payments and repay the principal sum?

Clauses of that kind should be removed from the farm loan mortgage. The Canadian farm loan board was set up to help keep the farmer on the farm, not to ruin his credit. I repeat the suggestion to those in authority that clauses such as the one I have read should be taken out of farm loan agreements.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman-

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if the hon. member would excuse me. I think the committee will agree we have made excellent progress to-night, and as I understand there are two departments to go into supply I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the motion is put, Mr. Chairman, I raise this point of order: May I draw attention to the fact that since eight o'clock the discussion has been out of order. This afternoon the house was in committee debating a resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister. He reported progress, and made a statement when his honour was in the chair. At eight o'clock we jumped the order of "orders of the day" appearing at page 5 of the order paper, and in some way or another we have found ourselves proceeding with order No. 6, the resolution dealing with the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress. It appears to me that if the debate this evening is to be regularized, some definite action to put it right will have to be taken.

Mr. CRERAR: I was not in the house at eight o'clock.

Mr. McLARTY: My hon. friend will remember that the Prime Minister announced that we would go on with this order to-night.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): But the orders of the day were not called.

Mr. STIRLING: Neither the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour nor I can change the order of the orders of the day. The orders of the day were not called. Therefore, strictly speaking, the discussion since eight o'clock has been out of order.

Mr. CRERAR: I was about to observe that I was not in the house at eight o'clock. I did not arrive until a few minutes after that time. I was not aware that the orders of the day had not been called until my hon. friend drew attention to the fact. I do not think there is any question about the point of order, and it is well that my hon. friend has raised it. In my mind there is no doubt as to the propriety or the legality, if I may use a lawyer's term, of our proceeding in the manner suggested. I take it that there will be no objection to that procedure. My hon. friend has certainly done the right thing to draw the attention of the committee to this because we should certainly proceed properly and in order.

Mr. STIRLING: Then do I understand that when Mr. Speaker is again in the chair, the orders of the day will be called?

Mr. CRERAR: That could be done.

The CHAIRMAN: I was not here at eight o'clock, but I am told that at that time the Speaker was in the chair and called order No. 6. He then left the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole. In my opinion that procedure was regular. At six o'clock progress had been reported from the committee of the whole and there was then a motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. STIRLING: I defer to your expressed opinion, but I would point out that when progress was reported on the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister we then reached a certain point on the order paper. If we were to follow the order paper, the next order would have been the next resolution, which stands in the name of the Prime Minister. Then there is a resolution standing in the name of the Postmaster General and another one in the name of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. We would then have arrived in the ordinary course at the orders of the day.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point raised by the hon. member is well taken. Does he insist on his point of order for the time being? It has been moved that the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. In my opinion the point of order should have been raised before the motion to report progress had been made. In any event I think the point is a technical one, and perhaps the hon. member will not insist on it after he has brought it to the attention of the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the raising of the point of order at the present time is in itself out of order.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: The point raised by my hon, friend should have been raised when the Speaker was in the chair and not when the house is in committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: Do we understand that if progress is reported, orders of the day will be called?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, we can call the orders of the day.

Progress reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: Following the point raised by the hon. gentleman and in order to regularize the proceedings, with the unanimous consent of the house, the house will now revert to orders of the day.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF TWO MUNITION
PLANTS IN CANADA BY CANADIAN, FRENCH AND BRITISH GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and perhaps he can treat this as a notice and answer it to-morrow. Will the government amplify the statement issued yesterday by the director of public information regarding the erection of two munition plants in Canada by agreement with the British and French governments? As this seems to be an important and desirable change in policy, will the government inform this parliament regarding it at the first opportunity?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): If my hon, friend will consent to allowing his question to stand as a notice, a reply can be given to-morrow.

MARKETING OF WHEAT

CEREALS IMPORT COMMITTEE—WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Several days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) stated in answer to a question asked by myself that in due course he would make a general statement as to the government's wheat policy, dealing particularly with the sale of 50,000,000 bushels to the United Kingdom and the closing of the Winnipeg grain exchange. Could he state now when that statement will be made?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, some days ago in reply to a question put to me by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), I stated that the wheat futures market, the Winnipeg grain exchange, would remain open until the end of the crop year. Some time between now and that time the government will have to come to a conclusion as to what machinery will be set up to deal with the 1940 crop. When that decision is arrived at, a statement will be made to this house.

On Friday last the hon. member for Qu'Appelle directed a number of questions to me and I should like to make answer at this time. He asked me to inform the house who was acting in Canada for the cereals import committee of the United Kingdom. The cereals control board of the United Kingdom has no representative in Canada; they deal direct by cable. Mr. James Rank is the chairman of this board with headquarters at Godstone, Surrey, England. I cannot say definitely whether he is the chairman of the board or merely the man who deals with wheat.

The hon. member also asked whether James R. Murray of Winnipeg had been acting in any advisory capacity to the wheat board or to the government. Mr. James R. Murray was employed by the dominion government as chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board from December 3, 1935, until July 20, 1937. He has not been employed by the government since that date. Since that time Mr. Murray has acted in no official capacity, advisory or otherwise, to either the government or the wheat board. There have been occasions when the personal views of Mr. Murray and others have been obtained on wheat matters.

The hon, member asked also whether it was proposed to appoint an advisory committee to the wheat board. On June 1, I made a statement that the wheat board had sold 50,000,000 bushels of wheat to the British government, and that the Canadian government had decided not to close the Winnipeg market, at least for the balance of the crop year. This naturally implies that there will be further discussions before the end of the crop year. It is our intention to discuss the appointment of an advisory board in the meantime.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister propose to bring in an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act this year to provide for interim payments on participation certificates? Has he had any such recommendation from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for such legislation?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This question has been raised in the house before, and if I remember correctly, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that representations had been made to me as Minister of Trade and Commerce. I may say that that is correct and that the matter is receiving consideration.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

265. Department administration, including amounts required to pay allowances to typists, grade I, employed cutting stencils, in accordance with regulations approved by order in council, $438,000.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Chairman, this item provides for the offices of the Postmaster General, the deputy and assistant deputy postmaster general, and the departmental branches designated—administrative services, public relations, equipment and supplies. The vote shows a decrease of $119,220, representing more than a 20 per cent cut from the previous year.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the minister give us some idea of how the cut was arrived at at a time when postal services are busier than ever, with the possibility of increased expenses, increased salaries, and so forth?

The CHAIRMAN: The details appear on page 160 of the estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: But the details do not explain how this department has succeeded so notably in reducing the expenditure for temporary assistance.

Mr. ILSLEY: The temporary assistance is mainly required at headquarters, and there is a very large cut in the vote for that service. All I can say by way of explanation is that all departments were warned by the Minister of Finance that they must cut down to the greatest possible extent this year, and the Post Office Department will try to get along on this small vote for temporary assistance this year. Some of the services of the department which have been extended in other years will not be extended this year; I am thinking particularly of the rural mail service. That will have some effect upon the requirements at head office. It may be necessary for those employed here to work longer hours and perhaps some overtime, but at any rate an attempt will be made to get through the year with this smaller vote for temporary assistance.

Mr. MacNICOL: That only accounts for a cut of about $21,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is all.

Mr. POULIOT: Is that for the inside or the outside service?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just the inside.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a very large cut in the item for mail bags. Could the minister explain why we need only slightly more than half what we needed last year for mail bags?

Mr. ILSLEY: A careful survey has been made of the mail bag situation, and it is considered that the number of bags on hand will enable the department to carry on the service without purchasing any considerable amount of new equipment. In these circumstances it was possible to effect a reduction of $70,000 in the item for mail bags.

Mr. HOMUTH: Are the mail bags made in the penitentiaries of Canada, or where are they made?

Mr. ILSLEY: The stock is purchased in the open market and the bags themselves are made in the penitentiaries.

Mr. PERLEY: I presume that rural mail comes under item 269.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister state what is the general policy or practice which the government is following with respect to the renewal of rural mail contracts? Is it a matter of patronage? Does the department take the recommendation of members? A great many of these rural mail contracts in my riding are at so low a rate that—

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon, gentleman will permit me, this is not the item dealing with rural mail, and I suppose that if one rural mail matter is allowed to be brought up under this item, a hundred others will be.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is a reduction of $119,220 in the whole vote for departmental administration, a reduction of $70,000 in the item for mail bags, and a reduction of $21,000 odd for temporary assistance. Where is the balance of the reduction? It seems odd to me that we should have a reduction in the item when we have, for example, many more post offices, much more space in the city of Toronto than we had before. Do we really need that building in Toronto now that we are cutting down? I should like a little fuller explanation of the reduction. I realize that we want to cut expenditures as much as possible in war time, but really this whole thing does not make sense to me. Take the reduction of $70,000 in the item for mail bags. Do we buy all our mail bag requirements in one year? Is there not some policy followed by the government in buying mail bags, or do we buy a large quantity just before an election comes on?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Toronto post office would come under another item. The largest item in the reduction of $119,220 is the $70,000 decrease in the item for mail bags. The department has been buying enough mail bags year by year to maintain a comfortable margin on hand, and it is felt that it would be safe enough this year to budget for a smaller amount than last year. It is felt that the department can carry on this service with the surplus it has on hand, together with this vote of $80,000 for mail bags.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will a post office that was definitely promised about the first of March to be kept open, be kept open throughout the year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Would my hon. friend ask me that question under item 266, dealing with post offices? While I have no objection to trying to answer that question under this item, I am afraid that if we started discussing post offices generally we should never finish the item we are considering.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does this item of publicity and advertising refer to advertising in connection with post office savings banks? I notice that the appropriation, which was $11,600 last year, is reduced to $7,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This item does not cover that advertising or publicity. That is provided for under another item.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Under the other item it has been cut out entirely this year. I notice on page 167 of the estimates the item "publicity" in connection with this particular department does not carry any appropriation this year. My reason for raising the matter is that it seems to me that the form of publicity I have mentioned was a valuable service. I find in travelling through the country that the majority of people are not familiar with the splendid service which is being given in this connection, and I wondered if it could be advertised a little more extensively. There seems to be no provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true. The appropriation is cut out entirely this year.

Mr. MacNICOL: What was embraced in the item "Magdalen islands news service" on page 161? It is now cut out.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was a press release, but its place has been taken by radio. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) desires to propose one item before we adjourn to-night, and I therefore ask that this item stand.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

134. Departmental administration, $160,045.

Mr. PERLEY: Does that mean that we are going to have fewer inspectors and surveyors this year?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Oh, no. My hon. friend is not at all on the right track in making that remark.

Mr. PERLEY: Possibly on some other item we will get on the right track.

Mr. CRERAR: The reduction of some $18,000 is due to the fact that there are some seven positions which will not be filled. In other words we are getting—

Mr. PERLEY: Pretty near the right track.

Mr. CRERAR: —on with seven less of a staff. There are some reductions in other items, including travelling expenses and sundries. This vote covers what might be described as the head office of the Department of Mines and Resources. Hon. members, at any rate those who sat in the preceding parliament, are no doubt aware that the work of this department is divided into five different sections, and in addition there is the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act. In 'he administrative services, under this vote, are those attached to the minister's office and the deputy minister's office; also those who have charge of the personnel section, the legal section, the editorial section; also the mail distribution for the department comes under this vote. Members of the committee, or at any rate some of them, know that the Department of Mines and Resources is housed in quite a number of buildings in various parts of the city. That involves a distribution of mail from the main office.

Briefly, that covers the activities of the department carried on under this vote. I am glad to be able to report that we have succeeded this year in making a substantial reduction in the administrative costs.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister is doing without a chief editor.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I realize and appreciate that what we are trying to do in war time is reduce expenses, but perhaps this economy hardly coincides with the request of the department that every effort should be put forth to increase production, for instance in our mines. I have been wondering whether this is a penny-wise reduction, remembering that since we need gold and other minerals, every effort must be put forth to get maximum production.

Mr. CRERAR: This vote has nothing to do with making mines produce or not produce. This is the general administration vote. The point which my hon. friend is making could more appropriately be discussed under some of the items immediately following which deal with the mines and geology branch, and I shall be glad to deal at that point with the question raised by my hon. friend. I believe it will be found upon examination, however, that we are making a very brave effort to keep up the basic work associated with our mineral production.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the fact that mail distribution in the department is difficult account for the item, postmaster, mines and resources, $2,200?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. All the mail addressed to the Department of Mines and Resources covering its quite varied activities is brought into one office. We call that a sort of post office for the branch, and from that office it is distributed to the various buildings throughout the city which house the staffs to which it should go.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

BREN GUN CARRIERS

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Have orders been placed for Bren gun carriers?

2. If so, when, and on what terms?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No, but contracts have been placed for a quantity of a Universal carrier, which is a development of the Bren gun carrier.

WAR CHARITIES-SPECIAL APPEALS FOR FUNDS

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many special appeals for funds have been made since September 1, 1939, in Canada, apart from the government, by such organizations as the Red Cross, Y.M.C.A., Canadian Legion, etc.?

2. What are the official names of such organizations, and what is the address of each?

3. Are such appeals made under government supervision, and by what method is such supervision carried on?

4. Does the government receive an official auditor's financial report of such organizations?

5. If so, are such auditors' financial reports available to members of the House of Commons?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. There have been many appeals of various kinds made by organizations with funds registered under the War Charities Act since the 13th day of September, 1939, being the day upon which the said act received the royal assent. If by "special appeals" is meant dominion-wide organized campaigns for money, then the answer is that each of the organizations named in the answer to question No. 2 has made one such appeal.

2. The Canadian Red Cross Society Fund, 621 Jarvis St., Toronto 5, Ontario; Canadian Legion War Services Fund, 158 Sparks St., Ottawa; Knights of Columbus Canadian Army Huts Fund, 161 Holmwood Ave., Ottawa; The Salvation Army Red Shield War Services Fund, 306 Drummond Bldg., Montreal, P.Q.; Canadian Y.M.C.A.'s War Services Fund, 215 St. James Street West, Montreal, P.Q.

3. Such appeals are made under the provisions of the War Charities Act and regulations made pursuant to section 8 thereof, and subject to such supervision as is provided for in the said Act and regulations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): For the reasons I gave the other day, on the recommendation of my advisers I have to object to the adoption of this motion, as being contrary to the public interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is debatable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I have not anything more to say.

Mr. POULIOT: I taught that to Mr. Bennett some years ago, that it was not debatable.

MANUFACTURE OF TANKS IN CANADA

Mr. STIRLING:

For a copy of all correspondence, cables, telegrams, memoranda, notes of telephone conversations, and any other papers or documents passing between this government and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and/or any agent or authorized representative of either government, and between this government and persons or corporations, relating to the manufacture of tanks in Canada since January 1, 1938.

Mr. POWER: I would ask that this be allowed to stand until I examine it.

Mr. HOWE: I have made inquiries, and I find there are no such documents which are not definitely of a privileged character.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister if there is not correspondence between this government and certain persons or corporations in Canada or elsewhere? I appreciate that as between governments there may be confidential communications, but this is an extremely inclusive inquiry, and I am sure that if there is anything on file which would come within the category to which I have referred, it should be produced.

Mr. HOWE: My information is that while conversations took place, there is no correspondence of the class indicated.

ACREAGE BONUS—APPLICATIONS IN TOWNSHIP 13-16-w 2ND

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, affidavits and other documents dated from August 1, 1939, to March 31, 1940, in the possession of the government, regarding the application for the acreage bonus in township 13-16-W 2nd.

PORT GREVILLE, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a return showing engineers' and inspectors' reports, payrolls, engineers' and foremen's salaries, accounts for materials and all other expenses in connection with work on the wharf breakwater at Port Greville, Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1939 and 1940.

Mr. CARDIN: There is no such structure as a wharf breakwater at Port Greville. There are different structures there. There is a wharf, and a breakwater which is separate from the wharf. There has been a certain amount of protection work there, and also what is called shearwater, if I remember correctly. During the fiscal years mentioned in the motion, work has been done on the wharf and on the shearwater. I understand my hon. friend desires information as to the work being done by the government in the last two fiscal years. I have no objection to bringing down that information, but there is no expenditure on the breakwater.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, a rose by any other name—

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

MONTREAL INDIAN RESERVE, SASK., TEACHER AND MATRON

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents dated from January 1, 1937, to June 1, 1940, dealing with the appointment and retirement of Mr. J. N. Stenhouse and Mrs. Agnes B. Stenhouse, as teacher and matron respectively, on the Montreal Indian reserve, Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is not in his seat. I spoke to him respecting this notice of motion the other day. It involves a considerable amount of work, such as that of copying documents. At that time I inquired of him if he would be content to view the files, which would be placed at his disposal either in the Department of Indian Affairs or in my own office upstairs. My hon. friend said that would be satisfactory, and he indicated to me that when the notice of motion was called he would ask that it be dropped. Since he is not in his seat, I mention the conversation which took place between us.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT—OPERATIONS IN ALBERTA

Mr. HANSELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents during the years 1939 and 1940 to date, exchanged between the dominion government, or any official thereof, and the government of Alberta, or any official thereof, with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

SASKATCHEWAN CANTEEN FUND

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the government of Saskatchewan, relating to the setting up of the canteen fund by the province of Saskatchewan; the appointment of trustees and auditors, and also all the correspondence, etc., regarding the said fund, between July 1, 1939, and the present time.

SALES OF FRUIT AND DAIRY PRODUCTS IN UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. ROWE:

For a copy of all reports, recommendations and other correspondence passing between Mr. William Allen, Canadian agricultural commissioner to England, and any department of the Canadian government, during the past year, relating to the sale of pork products, dairy products, fruit and canned goods in the British Isles.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY AND EXTEND POWERS OF MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Department of Munitions and Supply Act to clarify the powers of the minister and in some respects extend his powers of acquisition, by purchase or otherwise, of munitions and supplies, and to empower him to construct and carry out defence projects, engage services, et cetera.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE-Mr. HANSELL

STANDING OF SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group I should like to raise a question of privilege. The "Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire," copies of which were in our mail boxes to-day, records the results of the last election and states that the present standing in the house of the Social Credit party is eight. This should be ten. It records also that the standing of this party at the dissolution of the last parliament was seventeen. This should be fifteen.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Neither this house nor this parliament nor this government has any responsibility for the journal to which my hon. friend has just referred.

Mr. HANSELL: I quite understand that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING NAZI AND FASCIST SYM-PATHIZERS IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon, R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government to a press report of this morning in which the premier of Ontario is alleged to have declared at St. Thomas last evening that the Ontario provincial police have received information that nazi and fascist sympathizers in the United States are organized and waiting only for orders from across the Atlantic to attack Ontario. Has the government any information which would justify this allegation? If not, will the government take immediate steps either to confirm or to clarify the position? If the government has information that such declaration is correct, what steps, if any, does the government propose to take to meet the situation?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which is the proper body to look after matters of this kind, has been for some time in direct communication with the secret service and police authorities of the United States. The mounted police know as far as it is possible to know what is going on and they are taking all necessary steps to meet whatever situation may arise. I may say that making this matter the subject of a press report is merely spreading rumours in a way that is not conducive to the public good or to the proper prosecution of the war. It is a sample of the kind of cooperation we are receiving in certain quarters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not the slightest objection to the observation which the right hon. gentleman has just made, but I want to know if the allegation to which I have referred is true. Have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police been in communication with the provincial police of Ontario in connection with this important matter?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the provincial police of Ontario had received such report, their duty was to communicate it to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the federal authorities and not make it the subject of a report in the press.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a committee to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss briefly the resolution now in debate. I find that I am to be a member of the committee which this resolution proposes should be set up, and it is my view that I should refrain, which I propose to do, from discussing at this stage any of the regulations with which we shall deal in committee. That discussion can come later. Hon. gentlemen who are members of this committee may find that as a result of what takes place there, the views that they entertain to-day may be radically changed after full information is received. I listened with interest to the remarks made yesterday by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). He is not to be a member of this committee, but I think we are all indebted to him for the constructive and helpful suggestions which he made in connection with this important matter.

I am strongly in favour of drastic regulations. In my judgment the safety of the nation in war time must override those excellent safeguards of the subject which are in force and in vogue and of which we are so proud as Britishers. I listened also to the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I am much in accord with what those two hon. members and the leader of the opposition said, but I differ with them in some respects. In my view this is not the time or the place to debate such difference of opinion. I mention this so that I may be enabled in committee to give my view.

Both the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Vancouver South are to be members of this committee, and I believe they will render most valuable assistance. Let me say to the hon. member for Vancouver South that in my view there is nothing in his suggestion that the appointment of this committee will relieve the government of responsibility in connection with defence regulations and internment. The government have not shirked their responsibilities in this regard one iota. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made it perfectly clear yesterday that the policy of the government is set out in the present regulations.

According to the wording of the resolution we are discussing, this committee is to be given power to report its opinions and observations to the house from time to time. The hon, member for Vancouver South complained that a reference of this matter to a committee would involve weeks of deliberation, that it was merely a stop-gap, but let me suggest to him that this committee can see to it that nothing like that happens in connection with this important subject. If the members of the committee are ready to treat their job as an urgent war-time job, we can sit at eight o'clock in the morning until one o'clock in the afternoon, and then from 11.15 o'clock at night until one o'clock the next morning. There would thus be no interference with our duties in the house. With that sort of diligence we could thresh out these regulations in a week's time and make at least an interim report, as we are invited to do by the language of the resolution. Farmers get up at five o'clock in the morning to milk their cows.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They go to bed at nine o'clock.

Mr. SLAGHT: There seems to be a good deal of experience in that regard. I would suggest to this and other committees of the house that the work should be speeded up instead of being allowed to drift along in a leisurely way. Instead of starting at eleven o'clock in the morning, we should be ready to start at eight o'clock or at nine o'clock at the latest and be prepared to put the business of this country on a war-time basis. We are asking industry to work twenty-four hours a day, and in my view we should at this time set a real example of industry among the private members of this house. I am not directing any criticism at the government.

I believe that the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet are working sixteen to eighteen hours a day, seven days a week. I believe that the deputy ministers and the key officials in the various departments of government are unselfishly working long hours such as I have mentioned, and to all of them we owe a deep debt of gratitude for what they are doing in that regard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not forget the leader of the opposition too.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am sure that the leader of the opposition rises with the cows and burns the midnight oil. In my view, Mr. Speaker, the ordinary member of this house is chiefly useful for the work he does in committees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: I want to urge upon the various committees of the house in the most serious way that during this session they work both early and late and get the job done. A good illustration of what can be done when all members put their shoulders to the work was the special war session of last September. I looked over Hansard to-day and I found that the house met on Thursday, the 7th of September, and prorogued on Tuesday, the 12th of September, working four days and nights, in which time a momentous decision to enter the war was made; a defensive policy for Canada was laid down; $100,000,000 was voted forthwith: authority was granted for a large loan; laws were enacted to incorporate the patriotic fund, to amend the customs tariff, to amend the Excise Act, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Excess Profits Tax Act, and an act was also passed granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security. All that was done in four days, and my hon. friend suggests that if the committee of which he and I are members is set up, we shall need to sit for several weeks and become a stop-gap.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Now tell us about the January session.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon, friend refers to the January session, which was shorter still. My point, and I am serious in it, is that we private members—I speak of them particularly—have to set an example to the rest of Canada in industry and in getting on with the job in this parliament. It was refreshing to me yesterday to note the little tilt between the hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the left group, and the hon, leader of the opposition. The difference seemed to be as to who were pinks and who were not. I want to suggest with all kindliness to these hon, gentlemen that there are good and bad ministers of the gospel—there are no bad ministers, of course, in the House of Commons—there are good and bad lawyers, and good and bad school teachers and professors, and I venture also to suggest that we shall not gain much at this time by discussing in this house the relative merits of those who are following various occupations in life.

While all hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate have been ready to affirm the utmost confidence in our Minister of Justice (Mr Lapointe), which I share to the full, and which I share, I believe, with every hon. member of this house, he was subjected to some friendly criticism yesterday and I want a word on that subject. We are fortunate, in my view, to have in this country at this time a Minister of Justice with the qualities of the present incumbent. The burden placed upon him under these very defence regulations has been enormous, and he has discharged it one hundred per cent as a great Canadian. No charges, of course, were made, but I resent the slightest suggestion that the faintest breath of political influence has motivated a single act of the Minister of Justice from the moment the war broke out down to this moment of to-day. That is a statement which I think needs to be made in this house in view of some observations that were made vesterday.

I want to pay a tribute, Mr. Speaker, to another public servant intimately connected with the administration of these regulations, and that is Brigadier Stuart T. Wood, Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and thereby charged with terrific responsibilities under these regulations. He is thereby also the head of the secret service of Canada. I had the personal privilege of being thrown into contact with him in the last few months and know something of the character of his work. He is a graduate of Scotland Yard, and under his guidance and that of his illustrious predecessor in office, now gone, our Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been brought up to a standard than which there is none higher in the world to-day. The requirements of their training and education for the important work they do are terrific in their severity. I wish the members of the house would take the trouble to look up those requirements. I say to this house with all assurance that our secret service and our mounted police force is as efficient and effective a force as either Scotland Yard itself or the famous federal bureau of investigation at Washington headed by Edgar Hoover and his G men.

The subject of sabotage and the enemy within is one to which I have given special study in the last two years. For the benefit of the eighty-two new members of this house and of any other members who may be interested in refreshing their minds as to sabotage during the last war, I may say that on May 13, 1939, thirteen months ago, beginning at page 1043 of Hansard, I dealt in detail with that subject, and any member may find there a recital of the specific evidence against Count von Bernstorff, Franz von Papen, Captain Boy-Ed and Doctor Albert, who received from Berlin and spent one hundred and fifty million American dollars, in conducting sabotage activities against Canada and the United States from their headquarters at Washington, while at the same time breaking bread and drinking wine at the hospitable table of the President of the United States. There hon, members will find details of one hundred and five specific cases of sabotage and destruction by dynamiting planned and carried out in Canada and the United States.

These activities in the last war really began to manifest themselves some five months after that war began. We have had nine months of war now, and owing largely to the magnificent preparations of the mounted police force and local police authorities in every province we have not had a single serious act of sabotage in Canada. That is not luck. the past twenty-four hours hundreds of enemy aliens have been picked up and interned, and more will follow. The selection and arrest of these men have not been due to any haphazard policy or to luck. The secret service of Canada have been at work for the past three years upon these very problems, and to the record up to date the Minister of Justice and the people of Canada are entitled to point with pride. Let me hasten to say, notwithstanding that, that I view with alarm what may happen in the future. In my judgment we must give this splendid force all the reinforcements, all the recruits, all the temporary and partial assistance which they may seek and ask for, and we must not stop to count the cost.

I should like to make to the Minister of Justice a suggestion of which a few moments ago I advised him and which I believe should meet with the full approval of the house. It is, that he amend his resolution by permitting the committee to report also upon the question of appropriate punishment for war offences. To do a thorough job, that follows upon the other task already set. Should the minister approve our doing so, and should the house support him-and I would hope they woulda simple amendment can be made by adding, in the third but last line of the resolution, after the words "to consider and review the aforementioned regulations," the following language:

and the question of appropriate punishment for war offences. . . .

These regulations deal mainly, be it remembered, with drastic powers of arrest, detention and internment, the basis of which need not be an overt act of any kind which in ordinary peace time would bring a man into the police court or the criminal courts. These regulations contain some mild provisions as to punishment for contravening or failing to comply with any of the regulations; but it is the criminal code itself which deals with punishment of those who are caught and charged with actual overt acts of sabotage, espionage and treason. In my view the sections of the code should be tightened up as regards offences of this kind and particularly as to the punishment therefor. I shall not trouble the house with details.

Part II of the code is headed, "Offences against public authority, internal and external", and deals in part with these matters. Section 74 defines "treason" in detail. Sections 85 and 86, under the general heading, "Information illegally obtained or communicated", deal with espionage, spying and giving information to the enemy. Section 510, under the innocent-sounding heading of "Mischief", deals with the wilful destruction of property, and imprisonment for different periods of time is provided for different types of offence. In this regard I have a drastic proposal to make. I should like to be able to make it to the committee and then let it come back here. It is that we should make it possible to inflict the death penalty upon every person, whether an alien enemy, a naturalized alien, or a Canadian-born British subject-of whom I hope there would be never one-who is caught and convicted of any such offence against his king and country.

We in Canada now have the death penalty for treason, for murder, and for rape, although the death penalty is seldom inflicted for the last-mentioned offence. Sabotage, espionage and fifth column activities reek with treachery and are in my view the vilest form of crime which can be committed by mortal man to-day. Let the parliament of Canada issue solemn warning by creating this death penalty against any of those hidden, subversive elements that are within our bosom to-day, and let us put the fear of God into them, in so far as one can hope to put the fear of God into cowardly, treacherous, criminal saboteurs. In other words, let us get tough, and let us make it known to criminally-minded people in Canada that they can expect no mercy.

[Mr. Slaght.]

The press to-day, as was intimated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), carries an article that warnings have been received of a possible, expected influx of criminal saboteurs from across the border. Whether this report is authentic I have no knowledge. In any event let it go forth from the floor of this house to such people, if any there be, that they could not at this moment undertake a more hazardous or unhealthy task. I have been told by some of those in high places in the United States who are charged with the responsibility of law enforcement and the administration of criminal justice, that the underworld of the United States in peace time give Canada a wide berth so far as operating here is concerned. Sometimes members of that underworld run across the border into Canada to hide after crimes committed in the United States; but they do not come to Canada to operate, and the reason is that they are afraid of the rope in Canada; they are also afraid of the swift, sure, non-political administration of criminal justice in this country of which we have a just right to be If any evil-minded enemy aliens contemplate trips to Canada, let me warn them that we in this country shall use our best efforts-and those efforts, as I have indicated, are not inconsiderable—to see that their adventure shall end at the end of a rope.

I should like to have our committee accorded the right to consider such drastic measures of punishment and, at least, promptly offer their report to this house thereon. I am looking at the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who will, I am sure, cooperate in this matter. The house may or may not adopt the recommendation.

I offer these observations in support of the suggestion that, if the house approves, the few words of which I have advised the minister should be added to the resolution.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In May of last year, upon the estimates of the Department of Justice relating to the mounted police, I raised in the committee this question of adverse propaganda, because at that time there was a great deal of dissatisfaction over the circulation in Canada of certain United States papers. At that time I asked that the powers of the mounted police should be extended and coordinated with the police systems of the provinces, and especially of the municipalities, and that the federal power should pay, in part, for the enforcement of federal law. However, nothing whatever was done at that time about this matter. The dominion has said that the enforcement of all federal law is a matter for the provinces, and therefore the burden of enforcing the federal statutes and rules and regulations is largely on the municipalities who have to pay for i. This objectionable fifth-column propaganda had been going on for a long time, and for that reason I asked on that occasion that the minister should look into the matter and that he should coordinate the federal police system with the police systems of the provinces and of the municipalities.

It is extraordinary that the defence of Canada regulations were not brought up for consideration during the parliamentary session known as the war session. Nothing was done nor was there any discussion on the schedule of rates to be paid the dependents of those serving in the army, navy and air force of this country. On the patriotic fund bin the minister simply said that it was desirable to provide an organization for such purpose and asked to put on Hansard the schedule-$1.30 a day for the army-without debate. We saw what became of that piece of legislation, through passing it without debate or question, and the suffering which followed. The same thing happened to the defence of Canada regulations during that war session-not a word was said about it. It is astonishing to note that the first thing heard of this War Measures Act revival was the minute of the privy council on March 14, 1938, No. 531. The government had done nothing down to the day this order in council was passed, largely upon the urgings of the opposition with regard to defence that year. I make no apology for criticizing the minister or the government, because criticism is a tonic in time of war which stimulates government to action. Britain and France have realized that during the past three months. Constructive and helpful criticism saves a government from falling into a pit of errors and blunders which are fatal in time of war, more so than in peace. If the criticism is honest and founded on fact and not inspired by political motives there can be no objection to it; it is most desirable and proper.

I pointed out that during the war session nothing was said about these matters. The interdepartmental committee on emergency legislation was appointed shortly after Germany started on the march. An order in council was passed on March 14, 1938, setting up this interdepartmental committee, but it never held a meeting from March up to the end of September, although the fate of the world was being decided in that memorable meeting at Munich in 1938. Even then the committee merely met, got organized, and elected a chairman. This inaction continued until January 19 of last year. Although the Germans had invaded three or four countries, the committee never held a single meeting from September, 1938, to January 19, 1939, and none from their appointment until after Munich on September 28, 1938. At that time they had before them order No. 531 of the privy council, dated March 14, 1938, and after that they did nothing until the war broke out.

I assert that the responsibility for these regulations is not on this house, but on the government, just as is the responsibility for the discussion of dependants' allowances, yet at the war session both matters were passed over with hardly anything at all being said about them. I can say of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that since I came here in 1921 he has been most polite to hon. members in connection with the legislation of his department, and he must not interpret my remarks as any personal criticism of himselffar from it. Everybody wishes to support him in this battle of nerves. Speaking as a past chairman of the police commission of Toronto I can say that on the whole we had the utmost cooperation from the justice department and in general from the govern-My action in raising this matter during the minister's estimates last year must be regarded as a criticism not of himself but of the way in which the government are administering the trust of protecting the people in this grave crisis.

The only question in this debate, as I see it, for the house to consider is, are these regulations necessary for the safety of Canada and her allies? If the government tell the people that they are, no matter how drastic those regulations may be, I believe the government will receive the unanimous support of all right thinking people in this country. All we need to know is that they are absolutely necessary to protect us from the ravages of the notorious fifth column and from the sabotage which has wrecked so many small nations in Europe.

On January 25, 1940, I had a motion on the order paper asking that a committee be appointed to investigate the anti-ally propaganda in Canada, also the Anglo-French phobia and the attacks made on the allies by cheap United States papers and foreign radio. One had only to go through the streets of the larger cities throughout Canada to see the amount of this trash being sold, the product of the cheap pro-German gutter press, containing attacks on our brave allies in these critical times. During last session and the session before I called the attention of the government in this house to this matter and asked that some of these papers be banned and refused the use of the Canadian mails. I brought this matter up during the very week of the visit of their majesties. The attacks which these pro-German United States papers made upon the sovereign, our institutions and the British connection, were disgraceful. Yet nothing was done to shut them out of Canada.

About two years ago a committee, known as the Dies committee of the senate, was appointed at Washington to investigate anti-American propaganda. They held a number of important sessions for this purpose, and so much evidence was obtained of German propaganda in the United States that the senate was called upon to act. Senator Nye, co-author of the neutrality act, said that nothing the kaiser did in the great war would compare with the sending by Britain and Canada of lecturers and professors and others to the United States to drag America into the present war, and there was some discussion as to what type of regulation should be adopted to deal with activities there of this kind. The subject was raised in the British parliament, and there were many newspapers which discussed the question from one point of view or the other. When it came before the Dies committee at Washington after the outbreak of the war, the chairman was asked to tell the committee who were these people who had come from Canada and Great Britain as Senator Nye said, but he could not name a single individual who had been sent by the British government. The names of some professors and others from Canada were mentioned as upholding the pacifist side; a few of them were connected with the universities of this country. I believe it would be better if the government were to trust the daily press of Canada and let them have a free hand, as they did in 1917, when little or no trouble was caused. So far, as in the great war, the daily and weekly papers of Canada have risen splendidly to the situation.

Some of the articles of certain United States columnists republished by chains in Canada are open to criticism, as containing only half truths. Some of them are none too friendly to the cause of the allies, and attack the British cabinet. Howard Ickes, Hon. secretary of the interior at Washington, has referred to them as "calumnyists". Some of these articles should be the subject of our amended regulations. They would not be tolerated in the last war.

Has the situation not changed since last January? I say it has. Although I had a motion on January 25 and also on May 16 along the lines of appointing a committee to investigate anti-ally propaganda in Canada, I believe the situation has entirely changed since then, through the attacks made on Britain and France, the campaign in Finland, the campaign against Norway, the invasion of Holland and Belgium, and the disgraceful vulture attacks of Italy. The time has now come for the government to take the responsibility for anything which is to be done. We pass this resolution, and what is going to happen? No criticism will be allowed in our press. The special committee will meet, and they will not present a report until the end of the session; that will be the end of it-the house will be reduced to a cipher. Minister of Justice and his predecessor have told the house on many occasions that the enforcement of all federal laws is upon the municipalities, and the provinces, through the provincial attorneys general. If that is so, is this propaganda to go on? Yesterday there were riots in Toronto and the windows of sixteen Italian stores were broken. Is the police commission of Toronto expected to act? Yes, but they await advice from Ottawa. Is the government going to enforce these war-measure regulations or not?—because there has been a failure since the war thoroughly to enforce them. Consider for instance the attacks on recruiting made by a certain section of the clergy of the United Church of Canada in the Witness in what is called "The Witness against War". These men should have been proceeded against the same as any other poor citizen without influence; yet Ontario referred it to Ottawa and they were allowed to do as they please—with a war on to engulf civilization.

I believe there should be one law for all these people, as I said during the debate on the address. I believe that if we wait for the provinces to enforce these regulations, there will be no uniform enforcement at all. Ottawa in war should enforce its own laws. We have 4,000 miles of border between the United States and Canada. A writer on the editorial page of the Manchester Guardian gave some interesting figures. He said that before the war Chicago was the third largest German city in the world, and it has been found that there are more Scotch people in the United States than there are in the city of Glasgow; more Irish than there are in Dublin; more Mexicans than there are in Mexico City; more Japanese than there are in Tokyo and more Jews than there are in Palestine, and that New York was the Jewish capital of the world. This writer goes on to say that we must watch out when Italy enters the war, because of the number of foreigners in the United States, and the German-Italian-Russian spy propaganda. He also says that there are more coloured people in that country than there are in all Africa, and urges that some organization in the dominions should cope with these questions before it is too late.

This matter of the enforcement of regulations such as these came up in the British house, and the British government saw fit to assume the responsibility. Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made an excellent speech, as he always does, and he referred to these regulations, and the necessity of not referring this matter to a committee. When I read the last two lines of this resolution it seems to me that these regulations will be completely suspended in all Canada and the fifth column, while this committee is meeting, can do as it pleases. The resolution states:

And whereas, it is deemed advisable that a committee of the house consider the said regulations as amended to ascertain whether such regulations reasonably meet the requirements of the country in time of war.

What are the police departments going to do? If they bring these people to court, the lawyers will stand up and say there are no regulations, that a committee is revising them, so nothing will be done to save our country from the nazi-fascist plague. The police commissions of the country want to know what these regulations are now and who are going to enforce them before it is too late. As I have said before, I think the government should forward copies of all these orders in council and rules to the leading cities of the dominion and to the police chiefs so that they may know what is the law and should cooperate with them. These alien enemies and members of fifth columns never rest. They carry on an incessant warfare against the people of this country. On January 25 last, as in other years, I stated that the cost of soldier guards for home defence and the protection of public property, federal, provincial and municipal, should be borne by this government under the authority of the British North America Act, section 91, subsection 7, as was done during the last war. Why is it not done now regardless of cost? If you are going to do anything to protect your Canadian-United States borders, you will have to enforce these regulations and, as a result of Italy's action, call out the militia of Canada and order a compulsory register and national service for man-power. In addition, I believe section 98 should be put back in the criminal code as the government of Ontario has requested. That should be our answer to Italy's entry into this bandit war. We may have to face attacks on all our public utilities from Germans and Italians on the United States border; that is why I think our militia should, as in the last war, guard chese properties. In addition I think we should have national service and an immediate national registration, and compel each man, woman and child to do their part to repel the invader at the gate. No time should be

All these things were demanded last Sunday at a meeting of the Canadian Corps Association in my constituency, attended by some 50,000 people, at which some of the same resolutions which I have brought before this house were endorsed. I have called, during the last three years in this house, for a national registration of man-power, economic and industrial power, food production, for a survey of all industries in this country, large and small, to see if we could not get part of the orders resulting from England's rearmament scheme. As I mentioned the other night, we were able to obtain only about one per cent of those orders, as a result of being too late even as to tanks, aeroplanes and other war equipment, and no industry was asked to tender.

I have lost a great deal of interest and confidence in the committee system. We have a committee to look after the Canadian National Railways; we have an election committee, an agricultural committee and others; we had a Bren gun committee. When the reports of these committees are presented what happens? The reports are brought in towards the end of the session, and the chairman, after an hour's debate, moves that the debate be adjourned. That happened in connection with four committees last year, and all discussion was shut off. No one knows what will be the fate of this country; no one knows to whom it will belong at the end of the year if Great Britain and France should lose the war. Canada is the next objective in this fight to a finish. So long as this war lasts, Canada must do something all along the line.

The issue in this resolution, as I see it, is whether the regulations are fair and reasonable. If so, the country will support the government who must take the responsibility for them. Yesterday the Minister of Justice said these regulations expressed government policy; that is the policy in the red book of regulations. If that is the case, why does the government not now take responsibility for them without a committee and amend them? Under the French and British systems the responsibility for government rests on the governments, not on the opposition, not on committees or commissions. As long as they are the government of the day they are responsible, and they should take the responsibility. The government should decide what these regulations are to be, having in view Italy's entry into the war. Then the regulations should be proclaimed and federally enforced by Ottawa itself. Other matters can be taken up later on, but as matters stand at present the people do not know what are the regulations. In the past the government has been too late, and I am urging that in this instance it should do its plain duty. There is not a moment to be lost, now that Italy has come in. During the Spanish trouble, Italian submarines found shelter on the southeast coast of that country, and Italy has modern submarines that can cross the Atlantic ocean and return without refueling, and go round the cape without refueling. Yet we sit here appointing a committee to revise these regulations, in the face of the gravest danger that Canada and the empire have ever faced. Every day is bringing this war closer to our shores, while we have been too late in Canada in everything. In the metre of an old evangelist hymn, we might say:

Too late, too late will be the cry, Hitler of Germany passeth by, Too late, too late will be the cry, Mussolini the vulture passeth by.

This is not the time to appoint committees. Action is wanted at once. Why, even the police commission of the city of Toronto cannot get copies of orders in council to learn what the regulations are so as to enforce them against alien enemies. In the Toronto Telegram of yesterday re Italian riots, I see these headlines:

Angry Toronto citizens smash Italian shop windows

Beer bottles and bricks wreck glass in eleven stores

Police make one arrest Window smashing goes on from early evening till after midnight

Many people of Italian origin should not be punished in this way, especially those who were in this country before the last war, unless it can be shown they are hostile. Many are intelligent citizens who have raised families in this country for thirty or forty years and who contributed freely to patriotic funds during the last war, and are in no way responsible for this madman in Italy. But there are many others who have been brought into Canada after 1927 and recently who should be brought under these regulations. If we are fighting the German and Italian peoples overseas, I believe war ought to be brought home overseas to those peoples. There is no use in saying that it is not the Italian people or the German people we are fighting. I am glad to see that at last the hour of truth has arrived and that now the allies have reached a showdown with Hitler. Until a month or so ago nearly all fighting had been on the sea, with the exception of the invasion of Norway and

[Mr. Church.]

Finland. Now Hitler has extended the war by bringing in Italy. It is unfortunate that this conflict of nazism and fascism should have been brought about by the union of paganism and mechanization and that we should be living in days of barbarism, when freedom and liberty are in jeopardy from savage dictators. The question is whether or not the allies and the British empire shall return to the dark ages. If we do not win this war we are doomed, together with all we hold sacred. Even life itself will not be worth living.

I want to remind hon. members that under the constitution the ministry is responsible to parliament, and parliament cannot hand over this task to any other body, even to a committee. It is never right or desirable for us to criticize allied governments, as was done yesterday. I only desire to direct attention to where the responsibility lies for these regulations and for the conduct of the war. It will not do to try to hand over that responsibility to the civil service, the deputy ministers, the best minds in the country, the Canadian corps or newspapers or anybody else. The real power of the people lies with the ministers and not with parliament. They should not hand their powers to others. Since the session has opened they have become more amenable to public opinion. If the government has made mistakes in connection with side-stepping compulsory registration of man power and national service it should not be afraid to tell the people of Canada that it has made mistakes. I say to my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King): Don't be afraid to tell the people you have made mistakes, as the people of Canada do not expect their ministers to be gods. They do not expect that their ministers will not make any mistakes. They know that all governments are human and make mistakes, and the government should not be afraid to say we will go forward and remedy the mistakes. If there is any criticism, then matters should be corrected. If the ministers will tell the people of Canada about these new regulations, the difficulties under which they are working, those people will rise to the occasion and give the government the necessary support, so far as they can, no matter how drastic these war regulations are, to save Canada from the dictators and their fifth column.

It has been very hard for the man on the street to find out what has been going on, so far, and to get the facts on defence and foreign affairs. Canada wants action from the government. It wants action by this government on land, sea and in the air. We want real activity, and no more inaction, doubt, fear and delay, and we do not want any more evidence of an inability to act against the enemy from within and from without Canada, or any more indecision as to what should be done.

Nothing is "as usual" in France and Britain, but it is in Canada, because people have not taken the question of defence seriously, and never have since Munich, because they could not get the facts. Instead of Canada being at real war last winter it was conducting a limited liability secret war- recruiting on-again-off-again. There was more life in a kind of sporting war, and was bringing in professional wrestlers from all countries, even from our enemies. Nothing is as usual over in France and Britain. They want to save liberty and freedom. Hitler and Mussolini are not going to be vanquished by passing motions, or by our voting for the enforcement of Defence of Canada Regulations. They are not going to be vanquished by parliamentary repartee or by blue books, pacifism, peace pacts or protocols. The issue calls for broad national service and sacrifice by all the people of Canada, and no victory can be won without it. The government's plans should be keyed up, measures adopted and defence and war regulations passed to insure such a victory and tightened against sabotage. Canada had lots of warning before and after Munich. She had a further warning on Good Friday of 1939 when Germany shoved Italy into Albania, and when Italy had just deserted the allies in connection with the trouble in Spain and had become a vassal state of Germany. No longer should the ministry listen to the babble of pacifists in Canada. They had their day and led Canada to rely on Washington peace pacts and shams like the league and collective security.

In war the moral issue is of vast importance. Britain and France have now all peoples representing liberty, decency, religion, mercy, truth and justice ranged on their side against the dictators and the powers of darkness and paganism. All those things hated by us are found in the nazi regime, and have been borrowed from Moscow. I refer to terrorism, fear, concentration camps, forced labour, secret police, spies, the hostage system, suppression of the press and of free speech, and persecution of religion. All these things in the nazi system were copied and patterned from Russia and Italy is copying them also. Yes-men and nodders in Germany, Italy and Russia caused this war by their surrender to usurpers.

Great Britain, France and the United States and the world allowed Germany, Russia and Italy to rearm and get away with rapine and murder, and the mutilation of the smaller states. All this was done through the advance of loans from the allies and from this continent. Russian brutalities surpass only those of Germany, with its wholesale massacres, bestialities and hell on earth let loose.

Had it not been for Great Britain and France Hitler would have been here long ago, and this continent would have suffered the fate of the small countries in Europe. As it is we do not know who will own Canada by the end of the year. Hitler united Canada after the Munich pact. All of us realize the grave change which has taken place. Following Munich we refused to recognize the warning which had been given, and Canada did not take it seriously, but it will wake up if the dictators come here.

We were led to believe there would be no war after Munich, and Canada continued to sleep. The government should immediately mobilize, in view of the change of opinion that has taken place. We should watch our United States border and our northern border. We should watch all borders and beware of the nazi-fascists fifth column under the guise of tourists. I say that 600,000 men should be mobilized, and those men could be enlisted under a voluntary system. They could be drilled and equipped for national service now if action had been taken. Canada would welcome any measures, no matter how drastic they may be, for national defence and to win the war, if the country was once convinced that those measures are an absolute necessity. The then grave danger and grim realities of our absolute lack of defence on land, sea and in the air, as I have urged before, should have been told the people. But they were not given the facts. They are now equally dependent upon Great Britain and France for protection, as in 1812, for all the defence and freedom we enjoy.

The real picture should have been told in parliament last September, and the government should have invited into its confidence immediately all parties, all industrial and financial leaders and leaders of labour especially, and those people should have been told of the absolute necessity for national service. For the duration of the war and for some time after we should have some modified form of state control to help increase industrial effort, and industrial and agricultural planning.

If the people of Canada could only read the exact text of this motion, something they have been denied for some time, there would be some heart searching in Canada as to whether or not enough is being done. The only question is this: Are the regulations necessary, and are they adequate and sufficient for the defence of Canada? Will they protect our people? Will they guard our borders, will they protect our municipalities, our cities and towns, which are absolutely unprotected? During the Ethiopian campaign I called the attention of the house in 1937 to what had happened there, and pointed out, further, that the same could happen from air raids on civilian cities here, in Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton or other places in Canada. I pointed out that air raids had been directed against innocent people. I urged upon the government that a survey should be made all over Canada, but nothing was done. As was stated yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver South, something will have to be done to-day, because the people of Canada are ready to make any sacrifice, and I believe the municipalities and provinces are equally willing, if the government gives direction. That is the only question for us to decide.

The winning of the war concerns every man, woman and child not only in Canada but in the mother country and in the whole of the British empire, no less than in glorious France, Finland, Poland, Bohemia, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Roumania and Turkey, and all other people who know that their fate is bound up with the maintenance of Christianity, liberty and civilization. We should confine our talk to our own efforts and not attack our own allies, or criticize the great work of the mother country and her public men. I have been sorry to see the way criticism has been directed against the British government, and I was grieved to note the vile attacks in the United States press, or a section of it, on the late Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain. We should view with the utmost respect what was done over there by our allies who have saved us from invasion while we did nothing.

At the outbreak of the war Britain immediately took command of the seas. She immediately mobilized her army, her air force and navy, and only about one per cent listed themselves as conscientious objectors under conscription. Questions connected with food conservation and control, evacuation and home defence were handled by the government in Great Britain, notwithstanding the efforts of international socialists who did Hitler's work, some of whom were mentioned yesterday in this house. Who are these people? They were mentioned here yesterday, and Hitler has said that his best friends are those international socialists, pacifists and peace societies. They led Britain to scrap the finest army, navy and air force the world had ever seen, with the result that the pacifists must bear the responsibility for bringing on the war. Britain and France did not want war, but the dictator nations were permitted to rearm, while the international socialists did nothing but aid Russia and the dictators. Further, those same pacifist people in England and Canada persuaded Britain to reduce her capital ships from seventy to fifty, with the result that to-day we have no Atlantic squadron, and have no squadron in the Pacific. I say that those twenty ships were necessary for the defence and protection of England today and to save the world from slavery.

We must not blame Mr. Chamberlain for that. Rather, we can blame the pacifists in England and in Canada, and our dependence on the League of Nations, pan-Americanism and the Monroe Doctrine. We must know the truth in Canada that all we have of liberty, freedom and civilization we owe to the mother country.

In conclusion may I point out that the defence of Canada will not be decided at Quebec, Montreal or Vancouver. That issue will be decided for Canada on the soil of France, in the English channel and in the air and on the French-Italian and German border. If the empire is disintegrated, the whole world will go into chaos and the gifts which are taken for granted, liberty and the right to live one's life in one's own way, will disappear. This is true and every Canadian knows it.

I fail to see what action this committee can take. We had an example of what can happen here in Canada during the last war. Ribbentrop came to Ottawa, was received in the best homes, took copious notes, worked on our public works and in the Molson's bank in Montreal, and suddenly left for home. I understand he worked in Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec before going back to Germany. His brother was interned on Montreal island during the war. Canada does not seem to know Germany and her methods and refuses to awake. A terrible danger is at our very door; it calls for the enforcement of these regulations, for adequate soldier home guards and increased militia.

We have seen enough of the actions of pacifists, peace societies, professors of anti-British propaganda, and the American-German press, all of whom are attacking British statesmen. Hitler himself said that these peace societies and these international pacifists were his best friends. He should know. The lessons gained in the last war seem to have been forgotten. The present generation do not remember the great war. Some hon. members will remember what occurred in Washington at that time. Count Bernstorff was the German ambassador and he and Von Papen engaged in an anti-allies campaign. A series of events occurred in the United States during that time, and unless precautions are taken they will be repeated during this war. Von Papen, now in Germany, is still working for his country against the allies. A British white paper which was tabled in 1916 gives details of the activities of Count Bernstorff and Von Papen in the United States. Certain documents which were found on a journalist at Fairmouth in August, 1915, are detailed in this British white paper. They show the dangerous machinations of the Austrian-Hungarian group. It was finally necessary to recall the Austrian Doctor Dumbra from Washington. Finally German embassy at Washington was implicated in acts of sabotage which had been carried out in the United States. Von Papen, the military attaché, and Bernstorff, had been in charge of these operations there. They used their diplomatic positions as a shield for the work they were carrying on-purchasing ammunition and other war supplies for Germany; organizing outrages against the United States and explosions in many cities, and general sabotage.

The same thing is quite likely to happen to-day. According to the Cleveland Plain Dealer, of the issue of May 6, the German ambassador is reported to have said in Cleveland that Britain has no right to Canada, that she should give up Gibraltar and other possessions. The government of the United States knew what was happening in the last war, but because of the German vote and the nearness of a presidential election in 1916, nothing was done. However, Bernstorff and Von Papen and Captain Boy-Ed went to such lengths that the United States government were finally forced to ask the recall of Bernstorff and others. Great Britain and France did not want to grant safe passage, but they were finally permitted to return to Germany. But they took with them many of the secrets of the United States government, to hurt the allies.

We should tighten up the regulations now, and the government should take responsibility. We should place more restrictions upon free entry into Canada under the guise of tourist traffic. We should not forget what happened during the great war. Thousands of people were permitted to enter the country at Niagara Falls and other border points, and hardly any effort was made to check them. If necessary, the United States and German radios and pro-nazi propaganda should be cut off. The morale of the people should be kept up and the nazi gutter press of the United States and the pacifist student bodies should be regulated. The element of time has a greater value in time of war than in time of peace. Every delay in time of war is deadly. This is what Napoleon said. It is now a fight to a finish. Either Germany is beaten or the British and French empires will end and crumble. The civilization and liberty for which our ancestors fought will be at an end. The history of Canada for the past five years has been one of wasted opportunity. We have neglected to carry on the necessary preparations and have been too late in everything. We have done nothing to help check Germany as that country smashed her way during the past three years from one grab to another. She went on with bluff, bluster and buncombe until to-day she challenges the very life and existence of Great Britain and France; she did it all on loans from the allies—and now vulture Mussolini helps. All along Canada has refused to face the fact that our very existence is in danger.

On June 5 I asked the government:

What was the tonnage and value of pig iron, scrap iron and copper exported by Canada to Germany, Russia, Japan and Italy for each of the years 1935 to 1939?

How many tons of coal of all kinds were imported into Canada from Germany and Russia respectively, annually from 1934 to the end of 1939?

These questions were answered by an order for return, and I have the return before me. It shows how these exports helped Germany and Russia to re-arm; they used it to kill our men. It would be an alarming thing for the people of Canada to see what we have been doing in sending scrap to our enemies.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman's time has elapsed.

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the questions brought to the fore by the study of the defence of Canada regulations, proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the motion now before the house, are not light ones. They are sufficiently important to deserve thorough survey and investigation by anyone who has at heart the freedom and liberty of our institutions and the successful conclusion of our war activities. This is one of the reasons that prompt me to express to this house a few of the thoughts which have come to my mind when considering the issues involved in these Canada is a free country, chiefly inhabited by the sons of two great liberty-loving nations which have contributed more than any other nations to the cause of freedom and individual liberty. They stand now as the two great democracies of Europe, risking all their wealth, human and material, to defend their ideals of civilization against the barbarous assaults of the totalitarian states. Canada, a free nation, has joined the two countries that contributed to its birth in their crusade against the threat of slavery and the menace of despotism which overshadowed Europe at the time of the invasion of Poland. Canada is at war.

At a time like this we have to determine which of our liberties we will sacrifice temporarily in order to bring about the success of our cause. We must decide how we are to proceed to ensure the internal safety of our country, at the same time depriving our citizens of as few of their rights as possible. There is no doubt as to the necessity in time of war of suspending certain of our cherished privileges in order to combat new methods of warfare. If we are to benefit from the lessons given to us by the present conflict, it is time that we showed it. The sooner a committee of this house is set up to discuss the question and conscientiously examine the details of the defence of Canada regulations, the better. As the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) have already pointed out to us, representations have been made from two directions, some alleging that the regulations were too drastic, and others that they did not permit sufficiently energetic action to ensure internal safety. A fair study of the question by a committee and its subsequent report should help to clarify the situation and contribute to a better understanding of these necessary steps which were taken by the government on the eve of the war.

I am one of those who believe, Mr. Speaker, that at no time has the government acted so expeditiously to meet an urgent situation as when the present government caused to be drafted and passed the order in council of September 3, 1939, which embodies the special regulations for the defence of Canada, derived from the authority of the War Measures Act. I will go further. I think that any unbiased person who carefully reads the regulations and the amendments subsequently made will be forced to admit that the government has acted not only swiftly but wisely as well, and that it has thereby provided the country with the necessary means, under the War Measures Act, to cope with most of the situations arising out of the war, whether concerning the economic life of the country or its security against internal troubles and sabotage. Few people in the country yet appreciate the full scope of these measures, but had it not been for the far-sighted action of the government in passing them, many citizens would long ago have been experiencing griefs caused by the innumerable abuses that would have taken place chiefly in the economic sphere but which have been avoided by the regulations.

As to the control over trade, we have so far heard very little complaint, and rightly so. By the steps which the government took under the War Measures Act it has been able to stabilize prices, avoid profiteering and panicky reactions in the handling and merchandising of certain commodities. The very slight increase in the cost of living in Canada since the war started as compared with the increase that has taken place in other countries of the world is eloquent testimony to the wisdom of the action of the government in establishing these measures.

Strangely enough, this side of the question has not been the subject of many comments; is it that the freedom of trade has less appeal to the imagination than freedom of speech or freedom of the press? Or is it that the benefit of these regulations concerning the control of trade are so evident as to render any criticism impossible?

The main points with which we are faced to-day in the consideration of these regulations seem to concern, on the one hand, the internal security of the country—that is, the preventing of sabotage, the treatment of aliens and the control of information—and, on the other hand, the limitations imposed on certain liberties which we have been used to consider in our democratic country as the essential right of every individual, namely, freedom of the press, the freedom of speech and the liberty of association. To these latter questions may be added the much discussed issue of the outlawing of certain associations and so-called political parties.

Let us first consider the internal security of the country. Some people in many sections of Canada have been driven to the verge of hysteria by the alarming pronouncements of certain men who should have known better than to treat injudiciously a question which they had not well investigated. If I may be permitted a personal reference I may say that when the proclamation under the Measures Act which was issued on September 1, 1939, was being considered and when the order in council embodying the defence of Canada regulations was being drafted, I had the honour to serve under the Minister of Justice as his private secretary, and I can say that at no time have I seen such painstaking efforts as were made by the officials of the Department of Justice and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to embody in this document all the items necessary to enable the government to cope in the event of war with any emergency affecting the internal security of the state. I might add that after a close association over many years with the heads of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I can safely say that they had at all times the situation well in hand. I know positively, Mr. Speaker, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have to direct them, in the person of Brigadier Wood, a man of valour who knows the force better than any other man, and one who can get from it more service and greater devotion than any other commissioner ever did.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. PICARD: He is a man whose coolness in any situation, coupled with an admirable clearness of mind and sincerity of purpose, is a guarantee of his fitness for the job in a period such as that through which we are passing. I do know also that he is assisted in the direction of the force by men who have had a splendid training and possess an enviable record of public service, and that they have under them a body of men of whom Canada may well be proud. The internal security of the country, the preventing of sabotage and the treatment of aliens have been entrusted to these men by the Minister of Justice, under whose direction they supervise and administer the defence of Canada regulations which have to do with the aforementioned questions. Therefore the country need not be alarmed; it has, under the authority of the Minister of Justice and the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the most capable and efficient body of men in Canada standing guard to protect and safeguard its security from within.

Another school of thought, Mr. Speaker, seems to be very much perturbed over the idea that certain of these regulations may infringe upon the rights and liberties of the citizens. Some go so far as to say that the main principle underlying the present conflict being the safeguarding of human liberties, we should in a truly democratic country make a point never to interfere with these sacred liberties. As I stated earlier in my remarks, we have to consider now what portion of our liberties we must temporarily sacrifice in order to render more effective our cooperative effort towards the victory of our ideals.

The present war is more than a war of nations; it is a war of cultures; it is a war between two moral doctrines, between "two systems of social, political and economic organization".

Our enemies have crushed all liberties and have subdued all individuals to the service of the state. They have thereby created a homogeneous entity deriving its strength from its unity of purpose and from the abandonment of the rights of the citizens. If we want to avoid the spreading of such a system to our hemisphere, is it not worth while for us to make voluntary sacrifices which are small indeed compared with those exacted from the peoples under German domination? I think the time is ill chosen by some people to complain about the very few restrictions which the war has made it necessary to impose on our liberties, when we consider what might happen to our allies and to ourselves should our enemies win the war.

As to the banning of the nazi, fascist and communist organizations in Canada, I do not think many in this house will question the advisability of the recent governmental decree. I for one rejoice over it. Those who still proclaim that this action is a blow to political liberties should think deeper. The nazi and fascist doctrines are rejected by all Canada, except possibly by a few erratic-minded persons, by some German and Italian nationals and by some naturalized Germans and Italians.

The doctrine of Aryan or German racial superiority, which is the basis of nazism, cannot appeal, I imagine, to any intelligent person outside Germany. The doctrine of the totalitarian states can appeal only to those who imagine that they could play in a regime of force a role they were never able to achieve in a free country. No sympathy that I know of has been directed therefore to the outlawed nazi and fascist organizations.

As to the banning of the communist party, nearly all the population have approved it, but it appears that in certain sections efforts are made to have it considered as a first step endangering political liberties and freedom of thought. Some people argue that communism is an economic and social theory and therefore cannot be stopped. This is far from being true. Communism is a total doctrine offering its own specific solutions to all the great problems of man and life. It is a materialistic doctrine which is opposed to all that the western civilization has cherished since the advent of Christ. It has become more than that when put into practice; it has become a monstrous impersonation of the state over individuals and it has gone nearly as far as the nazi doctrine in destroying the minds of its subjects the better to enslave them. Some of the economic and social ideals of communism might have appealed in the past to a number of young minds in quest of a different economic system. It is true that our present system has allowed many faults and abuses to permeate it. It is true that humanity will ever strive towards an ideal of general welfare and always tend to reach the stage when the largest percentage of the population will have the minimum elementary comforts which the present system has not yet found a way to grant to such a large number of human beings. It may be that the world will evolve many systems before it finds the right one, if it ever does; but I personally am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that communism, as practised actually in certain parts of the world, is not the panacea for all ills its advocates want us to believe. It has become repugnant to most of us not so much because of the nature of its ideals as because of the methods it has used. No real Liberal at heart can approve the crushing of liberty that has taken place in the name of communism. No real Liberal can accept the negation of the liberty of creed, nay, the negation of all creeds which the communist state has made a part of its programme. If communism had been only a social and economic theory, it might have been permitted to have a certain amount of speculative thought, but if we consider its entire aspects and if we analyse its method of operation in Russia we only too well realize the danger of its doctrines. Liberty of the masses has become oppression of the masses; liberty of thought has become compulsion of thought.

Communism has been the absolute negation of liberalism. While liberalism fights for the liberty of creed, communism has denied the right to believe and has persecuted all creeds. While liberalism stands, in normal times, for the liberty of speech, of press and of thought, communism means compulsion and negation. All true liberals, all true Canadians, will approve the action of the government in outlawing the communist party.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it is the duty of all Canadians to help the government enforce the defence of Canada regulations. The committee which is the object of this motion will report to us if it deems advisable to alter them. We shall have the opportunity of expressing our views before doing so. Until then let us trust the government to carry on the task of using these regulations to safeguard the internal security of the country.

Canada will not let its internal enemies use free speech to deprive its people of it.

Canada will not let them use the right of assembly to organize semi-military associations.

Canada will not allow the freedom of the press to cover up traitorous propaganda.

Canada will not let the fifth columnists run down its form of government to help the enemy.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, the statement which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) gave to the house on Monday of last week, while helpful in some respects, does not deal with an important aspect of the situation. The scolding which he administered to those of us who are seriously concerned about possible fifth column activities will not help to relieve our anxieties.

It is foolish for the dominion leaders to deny that they have been lax in the matter of rounding up the agitators. For many months now, action has been awaited, but the government has apparently been waiting for the various groups to start something and then it will be too late.

The Minister of Justice stated on Monday of last week that no active sabotage had yet taken place. Surely he does not intend the police force to continue to stand idly by watching aliens, and do nothing until they have committed sabotage. The world has had many illustrations of the serious consequences of fifth column activities. There is no doubt now that the break through of the powerful German mechanized army into neutral countries was made possible by fifth column traitors in those countries. We have, in addition, the great betrayal by a king, which jeopardized the safety of the British and French forces in Belgium, while they were responding to his urgent call for help, but thank God the day was saved almost by a miracle—the glorious, almost impossible achievement of the British army, navy and air force, ably assisted by her illustrious ally, France. When even a king was capable of being a traitor to his own people and to his allies, why should there be any qualms about interning, until the war is won, all suspected aliens of German birth? Now that Mussolini has taken his appointed place among our treacherous enemies, enemies also of mankind, will the Minister of Justice give an assurance to the house that he will immediately make use of the powers vested in him by regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations?

The Minister of Justice told us that the police were keeping careful watch on these people now increased in number by the entry of Italy into the war, but I ask him how this is possible when the whole Royal Canadian Mounted Police, even with the additional five hundred which he promises, will enable us to have only one member of this force per mile across Canada from east to west and none at all from north to south? Even if supplemented by the local police, and by the small home guard of three thousand, spread over our vast country they are powerless to prevent sabotage. The fact that as yet none has taken place in no way allays our fears. The fifth column working underground was so successful in Oslo that fifteen hundred Germans succeeded in capturing a town of 300,000 inhabitants without a shot being fired.

A number of members of this house have already drawn the attention of the government to the exposed position of some of our great public utilities.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the house yesterday stated that at the beginning the government was criticized on the ground that the regulations were too severe, and is criticized now on the ground that they are not severe enough. My criticism is simply that the Minister of Justice has failed to use the power vested in him by regulation 21, and as a consequence there are thousands of potential quislings entirely free to roam about our country, to prepare plans in advance and to strike and perhaps cripple us at vital points at the moment when it suits their employers to have them do so.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the hon. member permit a question now, or would he have me wait?

Mr. BRUCE: I would rather finish, if the hon. member does not mind.

May I refer to a speech dealing in part with this grave question of subversive activities delivered on Friday last, June 7, by a prominent Liberal, Hon. Gordon D. Conant, attorney general of Ontario. He was speaking at a banquet of the University college Alumni association in Hart house, Toronto, and specifically dealt with the following statement recently made in this house by the Minister of Justice:

It is a great disservice to Canada and the allied cause to spread stories that Canada is filled with enemy agents and enemy sympathizers.

The attorney general said that if in this statement the minister meant that exaggerated and alarmist stories are a disservice, he entirely agreed. But he could not agree that it is a disservice to discuss and to make known conditions which on reasonable and proper grounds are believed to exist. The danger, he held, is much more likely to be overcome by realizing and facing the facts than by closing our eyes to them. Nor could he, from his daily experience with subversive activities, and reliable information in his possession, share the confidence of the Minister of Justice that the so-called fifth column is being adequately met by the police and the authorized military guards. Mr. Conant agreed that the police were aware of most, if not all, the enemies within our gates, but could not agree that at present these subversives were being dealt with adequately. No man is in a better position to speak with authority on the problem than the attorney general of a province, charged as he is with the responsibility of administering the law; and Mr. Conant pointed out that the remedy is in the minister's own hands, readily available and not difficult to apply. The minister has the power to intern all suspects subject to their right of appeal. That, says Mr. Conant, is the only proper and effective way to meet the present very serious emergency. The minister has already taken such action in certain cases, and it is simply a matter of extending the exercise of his powers. Mr. Conant made it clear that he did not suggest interning everybody concerning whom there is rumour or gossip. So far as Ontario is concerned, there is ample evidence on file in various police departments regarding persons engaged in subversive activities and he would gladly furnish the Department of Justice with the relevant facts.

He commended and congratulated the minister on having advised the government to declare illegal a number of subversive organizations, but appeals to him to go a step further. As matters now stand it would be very difficult to prove that an individual was a member of an unlawful organization on or after June 6, when the proscription came into effect. Persons bold enough to commit overt acts can be easily detected; but there remain the secret meetings and the insidious propaganda which must be dealt with in another way. The minister, he said, had power to deal with the matter by interning all persons, who, after proper investigation and on reasonable grounds, are believed to be members of subversive organizations; subject always to the right of appeal.

The province of Ontario is making an effort to provide protection against fifth column activities by the organization of volunteer civil guards, and it is hoped that it will help to meet the situation. But it would be far better if this were undertaken by the federal government, which, under the constitution, is vested with control of all matters having to do with militia and defence. It is contrary to our scheme of confederation that an army should be developed in any province at the command or under the jurisdiction of any official of that province. I think this house will agree with the attorney general of Ontario that it would be more in keeping with the continuance of our national structure if the organization of civil guards, aimed at protection against subversive activities, were taken over by the federal government.

For the purpose of clarity may I say that subversive elements may be divided broadly into two classes-namely, first, enemy aliens, and second, all others. "All others" include British subjects and nationals of any country with which we are not at present at war. Under the defence of Canada regulations, the Minister of Justice deals with all enemy aliens by interning them, or by leaving them at large on terms that they report, et cetera. Up to the present, and subject to the exception arising out of the arrests in Toronto on or about May 28, when two persons were taken into custody and interned under regulation 21 without any court procedure or trial, or anything else, it has been left for the attorney general of a province to deal with all subversive elements other than enemy aliens, although the Minister of Justice has ample power to deal with these people under regulation 21, by interning them the same as enemy aliens. Leaving it for the attorney general of a province to deal with these subversive elements-other than enemy aliens-has the following result:

(a) The attorney general can only act after an overt act has been committed, that is, when the person has actually done or said something that constitutes a violation of the regulations.

On the other hand, under regulation 21, the Minister of Justice could intern on reasonable grounds and before an overt act has been committed.

(b) The attorney general can only proceed in the regular course of law, subject to all the procedure and rules of evidence.

This involves strict proof "beyond a reasonable doubt". The general principle of law applies in the defence of Canada regulations, namely, that the crown must prove its case beyond a "reasonable doubt".

In the order in council dated June 6, 1940, regulation 39(c) was added to the defence of Canada regulations, declaring certain organizations to be illegal organizations. Under regulation 39(c), subsection 3, if a person is charged with continuing to be a member of an illegal organization, as evidenced by attendance, public advocacy and distribution of literature, it shall be presumed in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he is a member of such illegal organization. This, in fact, throws the onus on the accused person to prove that he is not a member of such illegal organization. In this sense, the expression "proof beyond reasonable doubt" is qualified; but when one remembers that proof must still be obtained of "attending at, publicly advocating, or distributing literature", there is a heavy onus of proof still remaining. Evidence will be difficult because these people will always try to lie themselves out of any charge. On the contrary, the Minister of Justice can act on any evidence as he sees fit. For example, if the attorney general of a province reports to the Minister of Justice that his police had fully investigated, say, "John Smith", and that in his opinion he should be interned, that might be regarded as sufficient to justify the internment of the man. It would amount to nothing, however, in a court of law.

Procedure by the attorney general of a province in the ordinary courts of law makes it impossible to deal with most of these subversive people because of the rules of evidence, the burden of proof and so on, and also because witnesses are reluctant to appear in court because of fear that some retribution may be visited upon them. On the contrary, a witness could give his evidence to the Minister of Justice by way of affidavit or otherwise. No person would ever know that he had given such evidence, and he would be under no fear of dire consequences.

Procedure in the courts of law involves delay and, of course, expense. The procedure may involve first, a preliminary hearing before a magistrate; then, if he is committed, a trial before a judge or before a judge and jury. While the attorney general has the right to require them to be tried before a magistrate, he is always on the horns of a dilemma in such cases, because the punishment when tried before a magistrate is much lighter than when tried on indictment, so that in serious cases an attorney general, to do his full duty, must direct trial on indictment before a judge or before a judge and jury; and this, of course, involves further delay, particularly if it is before a judge and jury which must wait for an assize or the sessions. After the trial is all over, in whatever tribunal he may be tried, the person has the right to appeal, which may involve a further delay of perhaps as much as two months.

The Minister of Justice has made reference in the house to the order made by Mr. Justice Chevrier, rather suggesting that with this further instrument communists could be suppressed. In the first place, the order of Mr. Justice Chevrier was based on the conviction of the Binders and Saunders. All three of these defendants have appealed. If the Minister of Justice had not declared the communist party to be an illegal organization, by order in council dated June 6, the illegality upon the success or failure of the Binder appeal. Even if the order is confirmed by reason of the convictions being confirmed, the scope is very narrow and limited. Regulation 39(c)3, order of June 6, should define "meeting" to include concerts or social gatherings of any kind, or any gathering or concert held under the auspices of any of the organizations named in the June 6 order, or meetings held under any other organization, group or individual, where speeches of a communistic character are made or where a communist takes an active part in the meetings. Such an eventuality should be covered by the order in council. There is always difficulty in getting evidence because of the secretive nature of these organizations. Drive them under cover by banning public meetings, and they will still be able to hold small meetings in private houses.

It would not be sufficient to prove that a person was a communist or that he held communistic views, and so on. The crown would have to prove that he was a member of the communist party of Canada since the Chevrier order dated May 15, 1940. It would not be sufficient to prove that he was a member of the communist party of Canada a week, a month or a year before. Under these circumstances it can be assumed that the number of cases in which the crown could succeed on these very strict and narrow grounds would be extremely small. The evidence in the hands of the police that the individual was a member of a communist organization between September 3, 1939, and June 6, 1940, cannot be used unless the order in council is made retroactive to September 3,

I understand that the province of Ontario has prosecuted and convicted more persons under the defence of Canada regulations than all the other provinces combined, but in spite of this they have only scratched the surface. I understand that the police of the province of Ontario and the Toronto city police have in their files scores of cases which should be seriously considered for internment, and that most of those concerned should be interned.

One of the most disturbing factors in the present war has been the effective use made by the Germans of the secret agent. These secret agents have gathered information concerning the location of troops and of military objectives. Is there any wonder that our citizens are alarmed lest we suffer as have Norway, Denmark, Holland and Belgium? Has the minister received a communication from the police association of Ontario stating that they have information respecting persons regarding whom complaints have been received as to their nazi or fascist activities, as well as persons known to have been active in communistic organizations of this province? Has the minister received from this association a list of names of persons who should immediately be placed in internment camps, because of the danger of obstructing directly or indirectly Canada's war effort?

In all of these cases, however, the police are not able to adduce evidence to bring them into court, either because they have committed no overt act or because witnesses cannot be induced to appear in court to give evidence to convict them. If the Minister of Justice would exercise the power vested in him under regulation 21, the procedure would be very simple and about as follows: Upon receipt of representations that any person should be interned—which representations might be made by any chief of police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Ontario provincial police or the attorney general—he would refer the matter to an organization within his department, headed perhaps by the deputy minister of justice and including other legal and police officials. That organization would sift the evidence and recommend to the Minister of Justice what should be done. He would then either act on the recommendation or ask for further evidence as he might see fit. It must be remembered that anybody interned by the Minister of Justice has the right to appeal to a tribunal which it is the minister's duty to set up. This tribunal under the regulations is presided over by a judge of a superior court. It will be clear, therefore, that no great hardship would be done if a person were improperly interned; no doubt the tribunal would straighten it out in short order. It is conceivable that if the minister exercises his powers under regulation 21 some few persons might be improperly interned. It becomes a question, therefore, as to whether the inconvenience of these few persons should weigh against the safety or perhaps the survival of the state.

I have been in contact with police authorities and find them seriously alarmed about the freedom allowed to enemy aliens and the subversive elements in this country. They cannot understand the complacency with which this dangerous situation is being met. Internment is not a fitting punishment for some of these people. Should not the Minister of Justice profit by the example of Great Britain and France and take capital power, and when necessary enforce it? I am not arguing for this method of dealing with crime in peace time, but it is essential in time of war. If Canadian lives are lost as a consequence of not using the power given under regulation 21, a heavy responsibility will rest on the shoulders of the Minister of Justice.

[Mr. Bruce.]

In order not to delay the house I will hand in a list of organizations and publications which have not yet been outlawed by the government, but which should be banned forthwith. All these have been actively associated with the spreading of subversion. Some may be inactive at the present time, but there is a danger that they may again become active in order to take the place of organizations which have been outlawed. With the consent of the house may I place the list on Hansard without reading it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BRUCE: Shall I read it?

Mr. ROWE: Read it, then.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it all.

Mr. DUPUIS: You are getting plenty of practice; read it.

Mr. BRUCE: I shall now read into the record the names of organizations and publications which as yet have not been outlawed or banned by the government. All have been actively associated with the spreading of subversion. Some may be inactive at the present time, but there is a danger that they may again become active, in order to take the place of organizations which have been outlawed.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend making the statement, himself, that all these organizations have been guilty of subversion, or is it made on information received? On what is so wide and general a statement made?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the hon. member should be crossexamined.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not cross-examining, but I want to know whether the hon. member makes the statement himself, or whether it is made on information received.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has made the statement.

Mr. ROWE: The government has been asking for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Read the list.

Mr. BRUCE: The list of organizations is-

Mr. RALSTON: Does the hon. member object to my interruption?

Mr. BRUCE: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I have asked whether the statement that these different organizations are all guilty of subversion is made on my hon. friend's personal knowledge, or on information which he has received?

Mr. BRUCE: I have no objection to answering the question.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend had not heard it.

Mr. BRUCE: It is from information received from police authorities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RALSTON: Where?

Mr. BRUCE: I think I shall let it go at that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: You don't answer everything that is not in the public interest, either.

Mr. DUPUIS: But that is in the public interest.

Mr. ROWE: You were asking for this only the other day.

Mr. BRUCE: The following is the list of organizations:

Canadian Youth Congress. Czecho-Slovakian Workers Club.

Freiheit Choir. German Workers and Farmers Association

(Communist). Housewives Association (Communist).

Independent Mutual Benefit Society.

International League for Peace and Freedom.

International Left Opposition of Canada

(Trotskyites). Jehovah's Witnesses.

Jugo-Slav Educational Bureau. Labour League Mutual Benefit Society.

Macedonian-Bulgarian Society. National Children's Council.

Progressive Arts Club.
Theatre of Action.
Women's Labour League.
Workers' Educational Carpathian Association.
Workers' Sports Association.

Workers' International Relief.

The Housewives Association is well recognized as a communist organization.

The first publication I have listed is known as Always Ready. The next is The Beacon which, I believe, is the official organ of the Young Communist League. Next is the Canadian Tribune, which I am informed has practically taken the place of the Clarion. Then comes Clos Pracy, a Polish Communist publication, and then follow: Munkas, New Advance, People's Gazette, The Road, Slobodna Misao, Vapaus.

Now, Mr. Speaker-

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the hon. member has not completed his observations, I would suggest that he adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Bruce the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 5.15 p.m.

Thursday, June 13, 1940

The house met at three o'clock.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

RESOLUTION EXTENDING TO HIS MAJESTY LOYAL AND AFFECTIONATE GREETINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members of the house are aware, to-day, June 13, both in the United Kingdom and in Canada, has been set apart by statute for purposes of official observance of his majesty's birthday. Hon. members will recall that last year his majesty's birthday was officially celebrated on May 20, and that at the time their majesties were in this the capital city of the dominion. The members of both houses of parliament had the signal honour of entertaining the king and queen at dinner on the evening of the king's official birthday.

A year ago to-day, June 13, 1939, their majesties were concluding the tour they had made throughout Canada. They had just completed their memorable visit to the United States and, if I am not mistaken, on that day were in the province of my hon, friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). That was the day prior to their arrival in Prince Edward Island and subsequently in Nova Scotia, and their departure from Halifax for the old land.

I am sure it will accord much with the wishes of hon, members and of the people of Canada whose representatives we are that a message should be sent from this House of Commons to the king letting his majesty know that the memories, of which I have just made mention and which will ever constitute one of the most cherished pages in the story of our national life, have been vividly revived by to-day's associations, and extending to our gracious sovereign an expression of our most loyal greetings on this the occasion of the observance of his majesty's official birthday.

I have accordingly prepared a resolution which I believe expresses sentiments that will be warmly welcomed by all. I have shown the resolution to my hon, friend the leader of the opposition. He has said he would be pleased to second it.

With the permission of the house, therefore, to waive the rule requiring notice, I would move, seconded by Mr. Hanson:

That, on this, the occasion of the official observance in Canada of the birthday of His Majesty King George VI, a humble address be sent to his majesty in the following words:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, desire respectfully to extend our loyal and affectionate greetings to Your Majesty on this day set apart for the official observance in Canada of your Majesty's birthday.

Just one year ago Your Majesty and Her Gracious Majesty the Queen were receiving the united acclaim of the Canadian people as your memorable tour of the Dominion was drawing to its close. To-day, our feelings of loyalty and affection for your majesty and our regard for the freedom of British institutions symbolized in the crown are stronger and deeper than ever.

We have witnessed with all the pride of devoted fealty how your majesty has discharged your high and solemn duty with undaunted courage, wisdom and understanding.

In this dark hour when the ruthless ambitions of wicked men have shattered the hopes of the civilized world, the people of Canada vividly recall how faithfully you laboured to prevent the calamity that threatens the world's freedom.

Your peoples stand resolute in the defence of the liberties of mankind. Steadfast in the noblest of causes, united in purpose, we are heartened by the inspiration of your example.

We pray that divine Providence may continue to guide and guard your majesty in the discharge of your high responsibilities and that you may be vouchsafed continued strength and many years in the maintenance of the glories of your ancient throne."

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have never risen in this house with greater pleasure or with a heart and mind more full of loyalty and fealty to His Most Excellent Majesty the King than I do on this occasion. And with all our hearts we, His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, reecho the sentiments of loyalty and devotion which are contained in this resolution as well as those which have fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

As stated in the resolution, just a year ago their majesties were receiving the united acclaim of all the Canadian people, irrespective of race, class or creed. To-day, having regard to all the rapid changes from peace to war, the people of Canada are more devoted, more loyal if possible, and more attached to the persons and fortunes of our gracious and illustrious sovereign and his gracious queen than ever before. We admire his high courage and resolute purpose which have been an inspiration and guide to all his people. Their high courage and calmness at this most critical period in the history of the nation is to us, his majesty's Canadian subjects, an example which we may well follow.

May I say humbly and with the greatest sincerity that because of what has happened and is happening over there I have had no great heart for party conflict or party warfare. There is a time and place for everything. Party strife and party warfare have a place in normal times, but in days such as these I feel that such matters fall into insignificance. Let us get on with the work of this house; let us get on with Canada's war effort, each putting forth our best so that we may present a common front along with our mother country and her gallant allies to the common foe. Let us all reverently, yea, with affection, say in unison, "God save the King".

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on this, the official birthday of His Majesty the King, it is fitting that a resolution such as this should be passed by the House of Commons to demonstrate anew our unity in the great struggle in which the British people and our French allies are engaged. We support the motion most heartily.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, of all the movements which are extant in the British empire, there is none more devotedly and enthusiastically loyal to the king and queen of Britain than the social credit movement. We will rejoice in supporting unanimously this resolution.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the King.

HOG CHOLERA

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many hogs died from cholera in Canada in each of the years 1936 to 1939 both inclusive, and in each month up to and including the month of May in the year 1940?

2. What is the total amount of compensation paid by the government to hog owners during each of the aforesaid periods?

Mr. GARDINER: No record is available of the number of hogs that died from cholera in Canada.

The following statement shows the number that were slaughtered in the control of this disease during the periods indicated and the total amount of compensation awarded to the hog owners:

Pe	eriod		Number of hogs slaughtered	Amount of compensation awarded

The figures shown above for the period, May, 1940, are totals as recorded in the Ottawa office of the health of animals division up to June 12, 1940. All reports for that [Mr. Graydon.]

period have not yet been received from the various districts in which outbreaks of hog cholera are being dealt with.

1. Was one Moser, of Regina, Saskatchewan, interned shortly after the outbreak of war?

2. If so, has he been released since; when and on what circumstances?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Yes.

2. Yes. Order for release dated April 1, 1940. The circumstances connected with the internment and release of enemy aliens and persons apprehended under the provisions of Regulation 21 of the defence of Canada regulations cannot be disclosed to the public. Such disclosures would involve the publication of secret sources of information which it would not be in the public interest to disclose.

THE JEW"

Mr. HATFIELD:

Will the government take the necessary action to prevent the circulation through His Majesty's mails or otherwise of a pamphlet, copies of which were sent to all members of the House of Commons, entitled "Why We Should Oppose the Jew," by Dr. P. E. Lalanne?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

VETERANS HOME GUARD

ORGANIZATION OF INFANTRY COMPANIES, C.A.S.F., AND INFANTRY RESERVE COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement with respect to the use of services of veterans of the great war.

On May 23 the late Hon. Norman Rogers said in the house:

I wish to advise the house that it has been decided to establish immediately a force to be known as the "veterans home guard" for the more adequate protection of military property or for any other purposes that may be found necessary in Canada. The force at the outset shall consist of twelve companies. . . Each company shall be in command of an officer of the rank of major and shall consist of 250 all ranks. They shall receive pay and allowances according to the rates at present in force for the Canadian active service force.

The district officer commanding shall in each case be responsible for the organization of any of such companies within his district.

On June 7, Mr. Rogers, referring to the veterans home guard, said in addition there will be reserve companies of veterans which will be attached to the non-permanent active militia units for training purposes.

Pursuant to these statements of Mr. Rogers, order in council P.C. 2545 establishes what is known as the veterans home guard, which includes both of the forces above mentioned in Mr. Rogers' two statements.

In the order in council the two forces are jointly described as the veterans home guard and are divided into, first, infantry companies of the Canadian active service force (the veterans home guard referred to in Mr. Rogers' statement of May 23) and, secondly, infantry reserve companies (the reserve companies of veterans referred to in Mr. Rogers' statement of June 7).

The infantry companies, C.A.S.F., are already being recruited and members of this unit, apart from the fact that they are recruited for home service only are, as Mr. Rogers stated, on the same basis in respect of pay and allowances as the Canadian active service force.

The infantry reserve companies will not be on a full time basis as is the case with the infantry companies, C.A.S.F., but will be trained at regular specified intervals and are to be on call for emergency service. They are to be attached to infantry units of the non-permanent active militia. They are to be officered by veteran, militia and reserve officers. They are to be permitted to wear a distinctive armband and will be sworn in and taken on the militia strength for home guard duty only and not for duty outside of Canada. They will be given militia rates of pay for time spent in training and will not be placed on Canadian active service force pay and allowances.

An opportunity for several thousand veterans to serve in this capacity will be afforded, and instructions are being issued at once to district officers commanding to commence recruiting as soon as administrative arrangements can be completed.

The enabling order in council was prepared and signed last week by the late Hon. Norman Rogers for submission to council. This normally would have been considered on Monday last. It was approved by privy council yesterday.

VOLUNTEER CIVIL GUARDS

ARMS AND AMMUNITION FOR INTERNAL SECURITY TO BE SUPPLIED BY DEPARTMENT OF
NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have two telegrams which with the indulgence of the house I should like to read. They deal with the civil volunteer question. Though this is a telegram addressed by a provincial authority to the Minister of National Defence, in view of the widespread interest in such matters I believe both the request and the reply should be communicated to the house. I quote:

Hon. C. G. Power, Minister of National Defence, Ottawa, Ont.

By letter dated June fifth I asked the late Hon. Mr. Rogers to what extent arms and ammunition might be available to this government for the purpose of arming volunteer civil guards. No reply to that letter received probably on account of untimely and most regrettable decease of Mr. Rogers. The matter is now of great urgency because of repeated and insistent requests for arms to arm guards throughout the province. Please advise as soon as possible.

G. D. Conant, Attorney General.

To which I replied in a telegram addressed to the Hon. G. D. Conant, attorney general, Toronto:

Reply your telegram June thirteenth. Every available rifle and all available ammunition that can be spared have been placed at the disposal of the mother country at their urgent request in the present real and immediate emergency at the gates of Paris. As you must know, compliance at once with this request has been of the most vital importance. Arms under our control required for purposes of internal security will be issued only by the federal government through the Department of National Defence when considered necessary.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING

ENUMERATION OF UNDERTAKINGS—PROCEDURE IN SELECTION AND DEVELOPMENT OF SITES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. G. POWER (Acting Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement in connection with the empire air training plan.

As has already been intimated in the house and country, the empire training plan involves the expenditure of large sums of money in aerodrome development and construction. From time to time specific projects have been announced in the press as having received approval but up to the present it has been impossible to produce a composite and broadly informative statement of the works programme in hand, under way or to be begun within the next few weeks.

The enumeration of the undertakings which I propose to place on Hansard is not fully comprehensive of all the work which will be carried on this summer. It includes the most urgent projects. These we intend to complete by September next.

Before proceeding with this enumeration, perhaps the house will bear with me if I give in some detail an explanation of methods pursued by the departments concerned in arriving at the selection of aerodrome sites.

In view of the strong and energetic representations made by municipalities and public bodies across the country that schools, depots and units of the plan should be placed within their respective localities, it is, I think, advisable to inform the house of the procedure followed in arriving at a final decision for the selection of aerodrome sites.

There were five categories of airports or aerodromes in Canada before the plan was put forward at all.

- 1. Aerodromes owned by the crown and controlled by the Department of National Defence for Air (Royal Canadian Air Force). These aerodromes were in existence prior to the outbreak of war.
- 2. Aerodromes owned by the crown and operated by the Department of Transport for the benefit of civil aviation in Canada including Trans-Canada Air Lines.
- 3. Municipal aerodromes owned by municipalities and developed in many cases with federal funds and technical assistance. Most of the flying clubs operate from these aerodromes.
- 4. Intermediate landing grounds owned by the crown, located at one hundred mile intervals across Canada, operated by the Department of Transport for the benefit of civil aviation. Some of these aerodromes were started as unemployment relief projects.

5. Emergency landing grounds on the Trans-Canada airway owned by the crown, controlled by the Department of Transport, developed as unemployment relief projects, mostly to an extent usable for emergency purposes only.

Naturally there was a general impression that advantage should be taken of these existing facilities. However, most of them were found unsuitable for the training plan because of, inter alia:

(a) Location in rough or mountainous country unsuitable for flying training.

(b) Impracticability of economical development to the size and clearance necessary for a flying training school.

(c) Location remote from centres of population.

(d) Location in areas of heavy snowfall.

The procedure followed in the selection and development is as follows:

When it became apparent that a large number of aerodromes would be required for the British commonwealth plan, the services of the airways branch of the Department of Transport were requisitioned. Its organization had just completed the development of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and experienced personnel was available to conduct a preliminary survey of the country for the purpose of selecting sites suitable for the economical development of the various types of schools.

In the preliminary survey the officers of the Department of Transport flew over all potential areas and picked out likely locations. These were then visited by them on the ground and a preliminary survey report prepared for each site. A representative of the Royal Canadian Air Force also visited each site and confirmed the suitability or otherwise, of the site for flying training.

From a study of the preliminary survey reports by representatives of the Department of Transport and of the Royal Canadian Air Force, sites were tentatively selected for specific types of schools, distributed geographically throughout Canada as evenly as possible considering reasonable economical development and flying requirements.

The potential sites for bombing and gunnery schools were restricted by the requirements of the bombing and gunnery range—eighteen miles by four miles, which has to be reserved for air firing and bombing practice.

After sites had been tentatively allocated to schools, the Department of Transport undertook a detailed survey. This involved preparation of a contour plan of the aerodrome and the surrounding country to ascertain all details regarding the nature of soil, buildings in the locality and any factors which might affect its suitability as an air station. From this report, engineers of the Department of Transport prepared a development plan for each site and estimated the cost of such development.

This development plan with estimated cost was sent to the Royal Canadian Air Force where it was considered by the aerodrome development committee, which consists of senior and responsible officers and officials of the departments of air and transport.

The responsibilities of the Department of Transport in respect of the selection and development of aerodromes for the British commonwealth air training plan were approved by the governor in council in P.C. 3710, on the 17th day of November, 1939.

When approved by the committee, the transport department award the contract for clearing, levelling and preparing the site.

The Department of National Defence for Air plans, makes specifications for and supervises all construction of buildings, the contracts for which are arranged by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Up to the present, the Department of National Defence for Air has allotted to the Department of Transport for its work on development, certain sums of money, in each case mentioned in the list hereunder. The work is either actually begun or will be commenced within the next three weeks.

I have here a long list adding up to over $12,000,000, and I would ask the permission of the house to place it on Hansard. There are several similar lists:

In addition, under the jurisdiction of the Department of Munitions and Supply, construction is being undertaken for the purpose of production, repair and overhaul of aeroplanes, and for this an amount of $5,000,000 was recently transferred from the Department of National Defence for air war appropriation.

Over and above the works connected with the joint empire training plan, it is proposed to spend for construction requirements of the home war establishment of the Royal Canadian Air Force approximately $7,600,000 as follows:

The programme, as approved to date, involves an estimated expenditure of $52,000,000. It should be completed this summer. Speed is important. Under the present circumstances it is a vital necessity. To achieve the highest success it should have—indeed it must have—the general support of the house and the country. In order that there may be no future misunderstanding I do stress this aspect.

Technical officers of the department have given every consideration to the preparation of these plans. In the light of their knowledge and experience and having regard to all the factors entering into a final decision, they are satisfied that these plans represent the best that can be evolved. On that principle they are being proceeded with; on that principle they must not be impeded.

I fully realize that it is not only possible but very highly probable that certain localities will not receive the favourable consideration they may have desired and expected. But having regard to the decisions of the technical officers and the reasons on which they are based, I beg that the public generally-boards of trade, municipal councils, all interested persons-will refrain from making further representations. These representations should not have and, may I say with all respect, will not have the effect of changing the decisions arrived at by the technical officers. In this respect I appeal as well to my colleagues in the house. I say, with full responsibility for my statement, to the public generally and to my colleagues, that overenergetic representations made in the interest of particular localities can serve only to retard progress and to divert from their duties officers already completely engrossed in work of primary and essential importance.

Every effort humanly possible must be—I have every confidence it will be—exerted towards the acceleration of this programme.

Our partners in the plan, our allies, realize the significance and urgency which lie behind the purpose of this programme.

In full sympathy with that purpose the Canadian people call for action and results. So do we. In the words of Herbert Morrison in England, "Let us go to it."

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) on the comprehensive statement which he has made. I am glad he has done it in this way and has put all the information on Hansard so that hongentlemen may have an opportunity of studying it without having to seek it here and there and everywhere. Without any desire to interject a note of discord into the harmony of this occasion, with respect to this announcement, which I think will be welcomed by the Canadian people, and which I respectfully suggest is a bit late, may I point out that the minister has not told us upon what basis the contract work is to be done. Perhaps he will make a supplementary statement.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): In reply to my hon. friend's question, as to how the contracts are being awarded, I may inform him that the first, perhaps, thirty or forty contracts were awarded by competitive tender on a unit basis. It was then found that the entire programme would require all the equipment of the industry. The equipment available was tabulated, and an allocation was made on the basis of the equipment available in the hands of contractors. In other words, a contractor having a certain number of Letourneau graders is given an appropriate number of yards of grading. The work was also allocated on unit price, the position being that unit prices had been established in every section of the country, and our technical officers are of the opinion that they can allocate contracts fairly without tender, on the basis of those unit prices which had been established by tender in the same locality. I think we can say to-day that every contracting firm that has suitable equipment capable of completing an airport job is booked with work to capacity. As for the buildings, there again the difficulty was to obtain plans as quickly as the situation required. It was humanly impossible to get the drafting and blueprinting organized to enable plans to be broadcast to all parts of Canada for each training scheme. The purpose therefore is to obtain prices from contractors in the locality and to place the business having regard to the fact that here again unit prices have been established in each section of the country by wide competitive tenders, and that the government can be amply protected as to price.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

INQUIRY AS TO EXPEDITING NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): With reference to the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a few moments ago regarding the question of passports, may I suggest the advisability of expediting this matter? I have had representations, as no doubt the Prime Minister has had as Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the matter is very urgent in view of the tourist business. If finality could be reached and accommodation made—I will not use the word reciprocity—between the two governments, it would be of great consequence to this important business and to the country generally.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Replying a moment ago to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) I mentioned that this subject was at present one of communication and consideration between the two governments through officials of the United States legation at Ottawa and of our own legation at Washington. I agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable to have finality reached as soon as possible in these discussions, and that is the aim of both governments at the moment.

THE MINISTRY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF HON. J. L. RALSTON AS MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am pleased to be able to announce this afternoon that, in response to my representations that he could render his highest service to the state by accepting the portfolio of national defence, my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) has agreed to take over the administration of the affairs of that department very shortly. In agreeing to my request, Colonel Ralston has been actuated by that high sense of public duty which has governed his motives and actions throughout the whole of his public life. In my conversation on the matter with my colleague he did not hesitate to mention how heavy the responsibilities of that particular position were at the present time and were likely to become, and he spoke of the degree of confidence which would be required in anyone accepting the post. I told him that I thought all hon. members would realize what the additional burden would be to him in taking on this work at this particular time, but I felt quite sure there was no name which could be suggested that would inspire more confidence in the government's war effort than his own in the position of Minister of National Defence.

In finally agreeing to accept the post, my hon. friend said to me that one of the reasons which would cause him not to hesitate in taking on additional burdens at this time, if to my judgment that seemed what he should do was the example of our late colleague and what doing so on his part might mean in the way of a slight tribute to his memory.

As the Minister of Finance has just announced, he had expected to deliver the budget in the course of the next week. Hon. members will appreciate what is involved in the preparation of a budget. The Minister of Finance has been engaged on that work for some time past. I have felt that, inasmuch as he hopes to be able to deliver the budget next week, it would be advisable for Colonel Ralston to continue in the position of Minister of Finance until after the budget has been delivered, unless in the interval something quite unforeseen should happen which would necessitate his taking over the portfolio of National Defence before that time.

As hon. members are aware, the bill passed in this house a short time ago establishing the Ministry of National Defence for Air provided that, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, his duties would be performed by the Minister of National Defence for Air. I am sure that both hon. members here and the people of Canada generally will be quick to appreciate that in leaving the affairs of the Department of National Defence for the time being in the hands of the Minister of National Defence for Air the country could not possibly be better served.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

ESTABLISHMENT OF MUNITIONS PLANTS IN CANADA BY CANADIAN, FRENCH AND BRITISH GOVERNMENTS—SHELL CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On Tuesday I directed a question to the Minister of Munitions (Mr. Howe) regarding the reported construction of two munitions plants in Canada by the Canadian, French and British governments. Could the minister make a statement amplifying the statement made outside this house regarding the basis upon which the plants are to be built? Are they to be built under public ownership and control by the three governments?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I hope the house will not press me to be too specific as to the exact location of these plants, for obvious reasons. However, we have under construction for the British government, for the manufacture of explosives, a plant costing some $12,000,000. It is being built for British account by the Canadian government and will be operated by the Canadian government for their account. In another location we are undertaking to build—in fact I think construction work is now actually under way—a plant of about the same size, but for the manufacture of a different type of explosives, for the Anglo-French purchasing board, partly for account of the French government, and partly for the British government. Here again Canada is building the plant and will operate it for their account.

There is a third large undertaking for the joint account of the Canadian and British governments, a shell-filling plant costing a very large sum of money. Here again the Canadian government is building the plant and will operate it for joint account. These are only the three largest of undertakings which have been under way for some time or are now being proceeded with; but they are all to be operated in the same way.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Having regard to the important announcement the minister has just made, has he any statement to make with respect to shell contracts, for the account either of the Canadian government or of the British and French governments, with plants in different places in Canada? The question is one which is occupying the thought and attention of many people in Canada. In my town many shells were made in the last war, and there are men willing to go ahead and do the same to-day. I am told that in New Glasgow in the last war they made 25,000,000 shells, and that plant is more or less idle to-day. I hope consideration will be given to spreading these contracts among the smaller communities rather than concentrating all the work in one or two very large plants in the centre of the country.

Mr. HOWE: The position of shell orders is such that in a very short time I think it will be possible to do the very thing my hon. friend suggests.

MALTON AIRPORT

REQUEST THAT DOMINION ASSUME MAINTENANCE OF ROAD CONNECTING WITH PROVINCIAL HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). At yesterday's session of the Peel county council I understand that a resolution was passed asking the dominion government to assume responsibility for the maintenance of the road running west from Richview on the provincial highway to the Malton airport. In view of the greatly increased traffic over this road to the aeroplane plant, the Trans-Canada depot and the commonwealth air training plan unit, will the government give immediate consideration to the proposal?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. The building of highways is of course the responsibility of the city, municipality, county, or province. Under the British North America Act the dominion government is not involved in the building of highways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They went into it pretty deeply in years gone by.

Mr. HOWE: The county in question is not above collecting a large sum in taxes from the industries at the Malton airport, and this seems to be particularly a time when anyone charged with a responsibility should undertake to assume it. Perhaps I might add that as a member of the federal government greatly concerned about that particular highway I shall be delighted if those responsible for the highway will assume their responsibility quickly.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROTECTION OF POWER PLANTS—QUESTION OF UTILIZING LINCOLN AND WELLAND REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): In the light of the increasing necessity for power and the protection of power plants and other transportation facilities, would the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) be good enough to take into consideration the question of utilizing the recently disbanded Lincoln and Welland regiment for guard purposes instead of bringing more permanent units into the peninsula for that purpose?

Hon, C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Yes.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a committee to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations passed under the War Measures Act.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I commend my hon, friend the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) whose reputation as a great criminal lawyer did not suffer yesterday, for the views he so vigorously and ably expressed in his speech in this debate. With all of those views I am in hearty accord. He referred to the excellent work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I give place to no one in my admiration of that splendid and efficient body of men. I do not happen to know Commissioner Wood, but his reputation inspires in me every confidence that he is faithfully carrying out the methods and traditions of his high office as developed by the capable, fearless men who preceded him. I did know intimately his immediate predecessor, Sir James MacBrien, one of Canada's greatest soldiers and ablest administrators. I feel sure that the able and efficient work which he did in the years of his commissioner-ship will not be lost.

I want to say a word or two about one of the organizations to which I referred yesterday, the fifth Canadian youth congress. A notice has appeared in many papers of a meeting to be held in Montreal on July 5-6-7 of the fifth Canadian youth congress in what they call the "parliament of youth". In the appeal which they make they state: Young Canada opposes the War Measures Act. It is evidently time that this organization was suppressed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon, member permit a question now, or would he prefer that I wait until he finishes?

Mr. BRUCE: I should prefer that the hon. member wait until I am through.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot answer.

Mr. BRUCE: A couple of weeks ago the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) asked whether a raid had taken place on the offices of the Montreal youth council. I wonder whether the hon, member is aware of the fact that this youth council is affiliated with the Canadian youth congress, that the latter is dominated by the young communist league, and that in the background is the communist party of Canada, which the Minister of Justice has declared illegal. The publication called the New Advance is the official organ of the young communist league. In its last issue the statement is made that they have sent out five hundred thousand copies of a questionnaire in which they oppose the War Measures Act, all of which is evidently done for the purpose of sabotaging Canada's war effort among the youth of the country. May I suggest that some action be taken against the active officers of the young communist league, and especially the editorial and advisory board of the New Advance. May I suggest, too, that the government take immediate steps to notify those in authority that the proposed meeting of the Canadian youth congress in Montreal shall not be

May I conclude by quoting an article written by Walter Lippmann a couple of days ago:

The allies are where they are because they would not take seriously the danger which threatened them, and because they underestimated what needed to be done, and because they shrank until it was too late from the hard but indispensable measures that were obviously necessary. There is no hysteria but only elementary common sense in saying that a policy of too much and too soon, if that is any longer conceivable, is infinitely preferable to a policy of too late and too little.

Mr. SLAGHT: Before the hon. member takes his seat will he permit me to submit to him a question which I deferred yesterday at his request? In fact there are three short questions, and I have sent him copies so that there may be no confusion in his mind.

The first is this: In view of the hon. member's suggested knowledge has the hon. member personally, since the war began, filed with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), or with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who are the proper authorities to receive it, the name of any person suspected of subversive activities?

The second question: Is the hon. member prepared to state on his responsibility in this house as the member for the constituency of Parkdale, that any case of suspected subversive activities—

Mr. MacNICOL: The house is not in committee.

Mr. SLAGHT: —reported by him either to the Minister of Justice or to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or by any responsible person, has not been properly investigated?

The third question: Is the hon. member aware that public criticism, unsupported by facts, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force, regarding the performance of their duties, is a definite attempt to destroy the confidence of the people of Canada—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a speech.

Mr. SLAGHT: —in an important branch of his majesty's service and tends to bring aid and comfort to the enemies of Canada:

Mr. McGREGOR: Free speech.

Mr. THORSON: And is a form of sabotage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This will be a second speech.

Mr. BRUCE: I think I might claim the right to reply on another day to the various questions which have been submitted by the hon, member.

Mr. POULIOT: Six months' hoist.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say at the outset that I am pleased to have the defence of Canada regulations submitted to a committee of the house, not, as was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), in order to devise a policy, but perhaps to revise policies, to examine the regulations and to consider in what way it might be desirable to modify them, if the committee believes they should be modified.

This is in no sense a waiting performance. Not only have the policies been defined, applied and carried out; as the circumstances require, and that frequently, they are modified. It is in the very nature of things that it should be so. Regulations for the defence of a country are necessarily subject to changes in the light of new conditions which may arise during a war. Our regulations have been altered because of new conditions, and they may well be changed again because of further new conditions which may present themselves.

In England the regulations were criticized on the ground that they were too strict and too arbitrary. Changes were made so as to make them more lenient. Conditions at the time permitted the government of Great Britain to do this. But since those modifications took place conditions have changed again, as hon. members well know, and the government of Great Britain have had to modify anew their regulations so as to make them stricter than they were in the first instance. All this has happened because of changing circumstances; and this is necessarily so in war time.

Here in Canada we were told that our regulations imposed greater restrictions on the liberty of the subject than the British regulations did; this was the criticism which during a long period we had to meet. Now, however, because of changed conditions in Great Britain, the regulations in Great Britain have become stricter; many of the activities in the way of internment and otherwise have taken place only recently. Certain projects now being negotiated between the government of Great Britain and the government of Canada go to show that conditions in Canada and Great Britain are far from identical.

I make these observations to indicate that there cannot be any rigid make-up of regulations in war-time. My own view, one which I have expressed on many occasions in answer to those who have protested that we were taking away the liberties of the Canadian people while defending the liberties of peoples in Europe, is that in order to defend their liberties people must agree to the imposition of restraint and restriction to which in ordinary times they would not willingly submit. Men who enlist for active service agree to subject themselves to much greater restriction than civilians have to endure. Surely those who are not taking an active part in the war should be willing to accept such restrictions as are necessary for the safety of the state.

I want to congratulate hon, members who have taken part in this debate upon the moderation of their remarks. One feature of the debate with which I am more particularly pleased is the expression of utter confidence by all sides of the house in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Canada has reason to be proud of its Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This force has a reputation throughout the world. It has been the endeavour at all times of those who have had to do with the force to keep its standards at the highest. That has been true in the past and it is true to-day. Canada would be in a most difficult position in many respects if we had not the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at this time.

The criticism has been offered that the suggested increase of 500 men in the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is much too small. I may say to hon, members that it is the belief of the police authorities that it would be impossible at this time to recruit more than 500 men in view of the difficulty of obtaining the necessary instructors. hon, members know, the police are quite busy at all points in Canada. We have not the necessary accommodation to train more than 500 recruits. A Royal Canadian Mounted Police constable cannot be improvised; he must have the necessary education and receive the training which is necessary in order that the standard of the force and its usefulness to Canada may be maintained.

There are about 2,500 regular members of the force. With this additional 500 men we will have a strength of 3,000. There are also 1,500 special constables. These men are veterans and are under the direct control of the police authorities. Their work consists of guarding public property like the Montreal harbour and other works of the kind. In all there are about 4,000 men on the police payroll. These men work; let there be no mistake about that. Yesterday an hon. member asked what the Minister of Justice was going to do about the Italian population of Canada now that Italy had declared war. Let me tell him what the Minister of Justice did. The very minute that news was received that Italy had declared war on Great Britain and France he signed an order for the internment of many hundreds of men whose names were on the list of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as suspects. I cannot give the house the number; I have been asked by the head of the mounted police not to do this because it might hamper his work.

These names and the reasons why the persons should be interned were all classified and submitted to a committee composed of three men. Since the outbreak of war the members of this committee have worked many hours apart from their duties. I refer to Mr. MacNeill, a prominent law officer of the Department of Justice; Mr. Robertson, a counsel in the Department of External Affairs, and Mr. Bavin, a member of the intelligence branch of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The committee passed on all these names. The order which was given to me for signature was prepared from information which had been received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in all parts of Canada. These men do not talk; they act.

I resented the suggestion that party politics had been played in connection with the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Certain statements were made at the recent convention of the legion in Montreal, but when some of those gentlemen came to see me, in company with the commissioner of the police, it was demonstrated that there had been a misunderstanding.

Mr. SLAGHT: They put it in the press first, though.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am proud to say that there never will be politics in connection with the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have there ever been?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so either.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is why the police have the reputation they have in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One of the reasons.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We want to keep that reputation. It has been hinted that in the exercise of discretion by the Minister of Justice in connection with the release of interned persons, politics might have played a part. I deny that just as strongly as I denied the suggestion that politics have anything to do with the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Only two cases have been mentioned, and questions with regard to them have also been put upon the order paper. In one case, which was in Saskatchewan, the man was released under special circumstances in December. I was told by my good friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that this man took part in the election which followed. Well, if he did, it did not serve him very well, because I have since ordered his reinternment and he is still in the camp. I have no qualms of conscience as to that case at all. I cannot give to the house the circumstances, but at least one condition of his release was not lived up to, and this circumstance permitted me to order his reinternment.

The other case, which has also been referred to, was in Manitoba.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister deals with that, can he tell us what was the condition which was not lived up to, by reason of which the minister ordered the man's reinternment?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would rather tell my hon. friend privately, or it might make a precedent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good enough.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I can say that it was something to do with foreign exchange regulations, the changing of money.

As to the other case in Manitoba, there has not been a shadow of politics in it. There again I ordered the man's reinternment.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend cheers. He is happier than I am with regard to this man. I hesitated because I had really nothing upon which to base my order for his reinternment; far from it. The man had the best recommendations possible. But there is public opinion, and I thought we must satisfy public opinion. Even if a man has to suffer perhaps a little unfairly, this is war, and perhaps it is better for him for his own sake to be interned than to be subjected to the attacks, difficulties and troubles which were flooding down upon him. I say this to show to hon, gentlemen that there has not been the slightest political motive in dealing with these two cases. Both men have been reinterned. I do not know that there has been criticism of any other case anywhere in this country.

I wish to make a little more clear something I said some time ago which led to certain comments. I had said that there had been members of parliament who had made representations, and I have seen in the press comments rather unfavourable to any member of parliament on either side of the house making such representations. But I do not think there is anything very wrong on the part of a member of parliament who writes that he knows personally somebody who is being treated unfairly, provided of course that the considerations suggested by the member of parliament are not for the purpose of influencing the Minister of Justice and are not in fact influencing him. If the members of a certain community whom a member of parliament knows well and in whom he has confidence represent to him that there has been an injustice done in a certain case, I do not see how that member of parliament could very well refuse to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But what is necessary is that there should not be any influence because of the position which the member of parliament holds which might bear on the decision that is taken in any case.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who has made a helpful address on this subject, said that one or two of the regulations might be giving too great power to the Minister of Justice, and he cited regulation 26 paragraph 7, which gives the Minister of Justice power to use his discretion in any case to intern or release an alien enemy. He referred to another regulation which gives to the crown only the right of election whether to proceed to prosecute a person under the defence of Canada regulations by summary conviction or by indictment. So far as the last question is concerned, of course, if the accused had the right of election, all those who are prosecuted for a very serious offence would elect to proceed by summary conviction because the penalty under that procedure is much less. But these regulations are for the purpose of making a difference between a serious offence and some petty infringement of the regulations such as occurs almost daily. Some joyous friend may imbibe a little too much liquor in a tavern and think it smart, for instance, to say that the Germans are better soldiers than the British, or something like that. Such a man should not be treated as a real enemy who is plotting against the state. There the summary conviction applies. But when a case is serious, the prosecution should be by way of indictment, and I believe that the choice should be left to the Minister of Justice or the attorney general.

As to the other section, I agree with my hon. friend that this is a huge power to entrust to the discretion of one man, the Minister of Justice, but I think it has to be left in that way because there may be circumstances where speed is required and where it would not serve the ends of justice to follow the ordinary course of warrants or submission to a committee. I would rather not have so great a power. But in time of war, if the Minister of Justice or any minister who is in charge of carrying out these regulations is not to be trusted, he ought to be changed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister allow me?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate what he is saying. Not having had time to read the British regulations, I should like to ask him whether identical powers are vested in the Home Secretary, who is the analogous official over there? Would the minister tell me what the practice is in Great Britain?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, there have been changes, of course, quite recently. There was a committee, as there is here, to advise the Home Secretary. Perhaps our own regulations gave less authority to the Minister of Justice, because upon our committee there had to be a judge, while in England there was no necessity of a judge. But there the Home Secretary has the discretion, as the Minister of Justice has here. He is not bound to accept even the recommendation of the committee. It is supposed that the man upon whom the discretion is conferred deserves to be trusted, and if he does not possess the necessary spirit of justice and fairness, somebody else should take his place.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask the minister a question on this point? Is he going to deal with the doing away of the appeal board to which he referred the other day?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not under section 21. Everybody interned under the authority of section 21 will have the right to have his case heard by a tribunal. We are changing the tribunal; it will be a judge of the superior court or a retired judge; it will be a committee of one who will report to the Minister of Justice. As regards the interned alien enemy, there is no more appeal. His case may be reconsidered by the police and the men in the Department of Justice and submitted to the department—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the light of new evidence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —in the light of new evidence. As I said the other day, in no other country have prisoners of war—and the status of interned enemies might be assimilated to that of prisoners of war—the right of appeal. They are there to be kept so long as the authorities think they should be detained.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

The hon, member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has suggested an amendment to the resolution, that the following words should be added after the word "regulations" in the third but last line:

. . . and the question of appropriate punishment for war offences. . . .

I have discussed that with him and he agrees to the following change:

. . . the question of appropriate punishment for infringements thereof— $\,$

That is, the defence of Canada regulations.—and for any other offences against the safety of the state. . . .

With this amendment, my hon. friend will be able to raise the question which he discussed yesterday in his address.

I do not think I should say more, except that I shall be pleased if the committee make any recommendation which they believe will improve the regulations.

I again take opportunity to ask the people of Canada everywhere to remain calm, steady, not to get unduly perturbed by rumours of all kinds which are being circulated. As a matter of fact, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police tell me that they are—swamped with a flood of complaints regarding alleged subversive activities. Old incidents—

I am reading their very words.

—second-hand gossip, a German-sounding name, a Teutonic haircut, almost anything now assumes a sinister aspect and immediate and drastic action is demanded of the police.

They tell me that:

Reports received from police posts throughout the country indicate that peace officers are facing the situation with good common sense. Nevertheless, much valuable time is being wasted. Consideration is being given to enlisting the cooperation of the press in an effort to abate the nuisance.

In this connection may I read an extract from a letter from the attorney general of British Columbia in which, after submitting certain suggestions with regard to the general problem, he writes:

Our police, of course, are vigilant in cases of activities which are offences against the code or the defence regulations, and are cooperating to the fullest extent with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but it is very difficult indeed to secure actual evidence against any one. The rumours that are spreading from time to time are generally without any evidential foundation.

are generally without any evidential foundation. I noted with interest your remarks in the House of Commons in connection with the spreading of rumour, and your advice that any information any citizen had in his possession should be told to the police, and not to his neighbours. It occurs to me that the country would be saved a considerable amount of unrest if it were made an offence to spread rumours. I do not know what the temper of the people is in the rest of Canada, but here, by the spreading of rumours, generally without foundation, the civilian population has been worked up to the pitch where it is possible that considerable trouble may be encountered. It seems to me that where we have police available throughout the province for the purpose of receiving and investigating charges against aliens and others, that there is no occasion for the spreading of these rumours at meetings and otherwise, and that it would be good policy if a measure were passed in the regulations prohibiting the spread of such rumours.

Certain statements which I have read in the press as having been made even at meetings come under the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations because they create dissatisfaction and disaffection to his majesty and are against the security of the state. The other day I read in the press words delivered by a gentleman in a great city in Canada almost advising an armed march to Ottawa. That is against the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is he interned?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, but he deserves to be interned a good deal more than the men he wants to have interned. I believe that this work should be left to the police. They know better; they are trained. Sometimes people complain; they may have given the name of somebody. That somebody has been investigated by the men who are able to make the investigation and who work not merely on rumours.

My last advice is this. We are all working for the same cause, for the same purpose, and we ought to trust one another. Sowing distrust of those who have the responsibility and the burden is not a good thing in this country at the present time. I am not complaining. I am receiving my share of abuse. There are gentlemen and newspapers, in Montreal and Toronto, that a few months ago were having me surrounded with bouquets and flowers. I was a very big man in Canada. They have changed. I have not changed; I am exactly the same man. Either I did not deserve the flowers at the time, or I still deserve them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will say it was the former.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I say again, let us try to trust one another and not to think there are any sinister designs in the actions of those in authority. We are doing our best. I am doing my best. Let me tell my friends and colleagues here that if I am where I am at this time, it is from a sense of duty. I do my duty, in war as well as in peace, according to the light that providence has given me, and I only ask for some indulgence on the part of those who really do not think I am as bad as some have described me.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): As a new member, rising to speak here for the first time in debate, I cannot but admit how impressed I was by the concluding words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). He pointed out that in this house, as throughout the country, forbearance should be shown, that we should recognize the fact that each of us is individually trying to contribute something irrespective of any divisions that there may be among us. I think that was a proper stand to take and with it I entirely agree, as do all other members of this house. Each of us is trying to contribute something; and from this side of the house, in what we have to say or in the criticisms we have to make, I ask the government to recognize the fact that we too are trying to do what we can to further and not, as was suggested this afternoon, to sabotage the war effort. Our attitude in this time of national danger is the attitude that was exemplified this afternoon when all the members of this house stood up in one of the most inspiring scenes that I have ever witnessed, showing the solidarity of this country.

I would not have risen on this occasion were it not for the fact that I have been placed upon the committee of the house which is charged with the consideration of the defence of Canada regulations. Since the outbreak of war various orders in council have been passed dealing with such matters as the treatment of aliens, the safeguarding of information and the prevention of sabotage. As I understand it, the committee will be charged with two duties. It will consider whether or not the regulations require to be amended, and what alterations must be made by reason of changing conditions; and with that will be coupled a consideration of the question whether or not those regulations which are to-day in effect have been properly enforced.

I realize that, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said the other day, there has been a considerable change in public opinion since the outbreak of war, particularly in relation to the defence of Canada regulations. At the beginning there were some, and there are some to-day, who challenge these regulations on the ground that they abrogate the rights of free men. In particular there is the criticism that they take away the almost inalienable rights of British subjects, rights of habeas corpus and certiorari, and are thus the negation of democracy. answer to that is that national safety is of paramount importance over private rights. These rights have not been lost; they are held in abeyance until victory is attained. Their abrogation is required in the interest of the safety of the state. These rights will return to the people of this dominion when victory is won. To those who criticize the defence of Canada regulations as taking away the liberty of the subject, I say, better have the rights remain in abeyance than lose them altogether if Hitler should win.

To-day public opinion is aroused, and as the Minister of Justice has said, reasons are urged why certain people should be proceeded against. We can understand why public opinion is aroused. In recent days Canada has been invaded, as directly as though the enemy were on our own shores, by the capture of that portion of France upon which rests the Vimy memorial, soil which was deeded to the Dominion of Canada. We know what defeat would mean. In the ledger of nazism there is no credit side; there is nothing but debits, pagan brutality, the destruction of those things that are nearest and dearest to us, our liberties entirely taken from us. For that reason people are aroused.

The experience of other countries has shown the result of the subversive activities of nazi sympathizers; in Austria, Norway, in Holland and Belgium, the same course is pursuedconquest following a ghastly programme of the honeycombing of the national fabric by treasonable propaganda from within. To-day the general feeling is that subversive activities in this dominion, whether they be nazi or communist or fascist, must be curbed if not altogether extirpated. The people of Canada feel that the trade of treachery and of traitors, the undermining of the country from within, must be made dangerous for those who engage in it. Yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) made the suggestion that in certain cases the death penalty should be enforced, in particular in the matter of subversive activities leading to sabotage. In Great Britain they have had to adopt such a penalty. For certain classes of people it becomes necessary in order to deter them from acts of sabotage. To-day we realize that eternal vigilance is the price of public safety. The administration of such an act as the defence of Canada regulations, as was so eloquently pointed out by the Minister of Justice, must be characterized by sound judgment and understanding. There must be prosecution; there shall not be persecution, the minister said. To-day in the shadow of the passing of a great Canadian, the late Hon. Norman Rogers, the message that his sealed lips never delivered is one which in my opinion epitomizes in true measure the principle for the enforcement of war-time measures. These words are from the report of the speech he was to have delivered:

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

"It has been suggested the present emergency requires the internment of all naturalized Canadians of enemy alien origin." "We shall never, I believe, subscribe to that policy of total proscription.". . .

He said action had already been taken against certain Canadians, fortunately few in number, who would set themselves up as leaders of fascist or communist groups and would cast aside forever all the essentials of democratic freedom.

"So far as it lies within us they (who come to these shores) should receive what they expected to secure. But they must not cross the line that divides loyalty from treason in this country. If they do they forfeit the rights they have acquired and will be dealt with accordingly."

Some reference was made the other day to the fact that the 1931 census showed that there were in Canada 473,544 people of German origin. In that connection it is interesting to note that according to the census of sixty years ago there were 202,000. But the census does not tell the whole story. The manner in which the census in Canada is taken prevents the creation of an unhyphenated Canadian nation. There is no question of the loyalty of those of German stock who were United Empire Loyalists, of those who came over in the forties, fifties, sixties. There is no question as to the loyalty of others, except the few who are to-day disturbing our unity and whose activities must be curbed. Other than those, the people recorded in the census as German are loyal to this country and intend to contribute to it of their best. My criticism of the census is that, regardless of the number of generations that have elapsed or the admixtures of nationality that have taken place during forty, fifty, seventyfive or one hundred and twenty-five years, so long as persons must register under the nationality of their paternal ancestor, there will never be that Canadianism which we wish to establish.

Who was not inspired the other day by the address of Mayor LaGuardia of New York? When he spoke he did not speak as an Italo-American, he spoke as a great American. One of the greatest proponents to-day of the allied cause in North America is the former commander of the United States troops in the last war, General Pershing, who is of German origin; but is no German-American, he is an American. It is said that the census regulations are based on ethnological grounds. Let us register our Canadians as Canadians, and have another paragraph dealing with racial origin, and let us build up in this country an unhyphenated Canadianism that is dominant, proud and strong. There are those who are disloyal; and in the interests of the majority of loyal citizens of various national strains, those who are treasonable must be shown their place, so that those who are loyal and patriotic shall not be denied the fruits of their loyalty.

Some say: "What are you going to do with the naturalized? Are they to be proceeded against?" They are in a position different from that of those who were born here as Canadians. Sir, naturalization was never intended to be a badge of immunity from treason. A naturalization certificate is an admission that the state recognizes that the person who has been accepted for membership in that proud heritage of British citizenship is a citizen whose loyalty is unquestionable. Naturalization is predicated upon the assumption and the acceptance, at face value, of the loyalty of the person affected, as pledged in his oath of allegiance. If those who are naturalized prove recreant to the loyalty to which they swore, then naturalization or a certificate of that kind should be no badge of immunity. Naturalization is a privilege, not a protection against sedition.

What about the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba? The Minister of Justice has said that there has been considerable criticism. While I am not going to place them on Hansard, I have before me a number of press clippings from Saskatchewan and Manitoba calling upon the government to do something in respect of the peculiar circumstances there prevailing. As a matter of fact. so difficult has the situation become in some parts of Saskatchewan that recently representatives of the veterans met with the provincial government and decided to form what is known as the Saskatchewan veterans civil security corps. It is to be composed of from 8,000 to 10,000 veterans, as security against anti-British and subversive activities Saskatchewan.

The Minister of Justice has said that at no time has there been political interference in respect of orders which allow release from internment. I believe him when he makes that statement, because I cannot conceive of any occupant of the position he at present holds, permitting in any way in a time of national need political considerations to take precedence over national safety. But I shall set out one or two reasons why in Saskatchewan the suggestion has arisen that there has been political influence.

First, fifty per cent of those released from internment camps in Saskatchewan were released between January 25 and March 26, 1940. Second, there can be no suggestion, and there is no suggestion, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would in any way brook political interference. The Minister of Justice has stated that they investigate with care, that they compile the information so obtained, and that in the last few days as a result of the acquisition of information over a long period of time they have been able to move forward with dispatch and place in custody various persons of Italian birth or ancestry. He has pointed out that they have the information and that they work; they do not talk.

That being so the Royal Canadian Mounted Police must have had some reason when it acted as it did in September last in taking into custody throughout western Canada numbers of men who were known to be nazi sympathizers or workers. There was no oppression in their attitude, because only three hundred out of sixteen thousand alien enemies in Canada were taken into custody. The minister has pointed out that Schneider, who was released some time ago, has been reinterned. That is all to the good.

The suggestion I humbly offer to the minister is that so long as section 26, subsection 7, permits the Minister of Justice to order the release of any enemy alien from arrest, detention or internment, there will always be statements to the effect that there has been political interference, if the political allegiance of the man released is known, regardless of the fact that the suggestions are foundationless.

The suggestion has been made that instead of the minister accepting this power, or having it placed upon his shoulders, a tribunal should be set up in the constituency or judicial district where an internment takes place, and that such tribunal should be responsible. Such tribunal might consist of a district or county court judge, as the case may be. In such circumstances judicial wisdom would be brought to bear upon the decision as to whether or not a person or persons should be released, and the evidence taken be complemented by the knowledge of local conditions of the judge resident within the local judicial district.

The Minister of Justice has said that the cases he mentioned were the only ones regarding which there has been criticism. I am not going to refer to other cases this afternoon. I would point out, however, that we have gained much benefit from the information given by the minister this afternoon. The public want to know. They want to know why those men are released. The minister has given the assurance that they were released under circumstances which could not be considered political.

There is always the suggestion of partisanship. However that may all be removed by the means I have suggested, or by the appointment of a superior court judge, as the case may be. In this way we would bring to the people a feeling of security which until recently they have not possessed. There are those who may say that at a time like this, representing as I do a constituency in Saskatchewan, the stand I take is an unpopular one. As a representative from that province I feel at this time that party political expediency must pale into insignificance before public safety.

This speech I have to make in order to point out that in Saskatchewan there is an ever rising body of opinion to the effect that there are men who would undermine our institutions but who are free. It is felt the result will be that unless authorization is given for the creation of a home defence corps—and some suggestion was made to-day by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) that such a corps was being formed—there will arise in various parts of Saskatchewan and throughout western Canada generally committees or, if you will, vigilantes who will take the law into their own hands.

I have a few suggestions to make in addition to the one that the minister should be relieved of his responsibility under section 26 of the regulations. I believe there should be a national registration. This would give the government an opportunity of finding those who are willing to serve at this time. The women gave the lead last September and October when they had a national registration, but so far their services have not been utilized. There are men all over the dominion who want to serve. All they need is the opportunity, but that opportunity can come only from leadership. Leadership can be given only when the government is fully aware of those who are prepared to serve. Moreover, such a registration, if properly carried out, would bring to light the names of many who are to-day in Canada without having complied with the immigration regulations and who are in position to carry on subversive activities.

The necessity for establishing local defence corps throughout the dominion has been pointed out already. In this connection I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 6. That paper deals with this problem in these words:

Why is Ottawa showing such reluctance in authorizing the formation of the volunteer defence unit here? The public wants it.

And further down:

Presumably the dominion government believes that the potential internal dangers to the state are being adequately looked after by the presence in Canada of our active armed forces, by the militia regiments, by the newly formed home guard and by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It may be recalled to Mr. King and his colleagues, however, that they have just been found guilty by public opinion of having been up to now far too complacent about their war plans. The scope of their effort, in the light of present emergencies, has been inadequate. They are therefore hardly in a position to announce that they are right, and the public wrong, about the formation of this additional auxiliary force. The public quite properly can reply: "You were wrong in the other matter. How do we know you are right about this?"

The editorial then goes on to point out the necessity of the government authorizing the formation of such corps. The acting Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) said to-day that it was impossible to allow these corps to be organized outside government supervision. He stated that in any event it would not be possible to supply them with arms and ammunition. To-day in Saskatchewan General Ross is organizing such a corps. Although such an organization is not authorized by the government, the need therefor is felt in Saskatchewan because there is in some sections a strong current of anti-British feeling.

How can we expect not to have anti-British feeling when we permit periodicals to enter Canada which attempt to destroy the morale of our people? Why should such anti-British publications as the Saturday Evening Post and the Chicago Tribune be allowed to enter the country? What is the use of having a department of information to furnish dependable information to the people if such information is neutralized, if not completely destroyed, by malicious articles appearing in these particular papers? If I understand the defence of Canada regulations, the only provision for prosecution in such a case is that provided by section 15. Under this section prosecution can be carried out only when a newspaper or periodical is published in Canada.

Parliament to-day realizes as never before that we have but one duty-to provide the maximum war effort to win this war. This war is being waged on two fronts-the battle front and the home front. The defence of Canada regulations were designed to ensure the solidarity of the Canadian people and to prevent malicious disaffection from destroying the continuity of our war effort or interfering with the production and transportation of munitions, materials, and food for our armies here and overseas. The safeguarding of our interests overseas as a nation, of our homes, of our right to live, is in the hands of our gallant boys. They will not fail us. The safeguarding of our nation from destructive and subversive influences that would nullify their sacrifices is in the hands of this parliament. We must not fail them.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate. However, some remarks that have been made during the course of the debate prompt me to rise for just a few moments in order to make one or two observations. The hon, member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) outlined quite adequately the stand of this group with reference to this motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I should like to touch upon four points and emphasize them quite briefly. First, we realize that under present circumstances there is a need to give the government extraordinary powers. We are engaged in a war carried on by a new technique. This is not only a war of nations; it is a war of ideologies. The people who believe in these ideologies have no particular mark upon their foreheads. They have carried on a programme of peaceful penetration in many nations of the world. They have undermined the states that they sought to conquer. In order to meet this threat the democracies have had to speed up and alter their method of dealing with it. With that in mind, we realize, as must all people who believe in democracy, the need of giving to the executive extraordinary powers.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has claimed that there are two points of view in connection with these regulations. The one is that the regulations were too severe; the other, that they were not severe enough. I doubt if that is a fair appraisal of the situation. I think the real position is that there is one group of people who feel that the regulations are not lacking in severity so much as that they have not been enforced with sufficient aggression. I cannot say whether that is well founded, but the fact remains that there is that feeling. It is quite understandable. For instance, in western Canada we have had for a number of years an organization known as the deutscher bund. Many of the men who joined this organization did so out of bravado, while others were attracted by the cultural associa-Many had no knowledge of the unscrupulous intent of the organization and they left when they became aware of its real purpose. The fact remains that in western Canada this organization was in existence in many German-Canadian communities and has aroused considerable concern. As the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has suggested, this is quite understandable.

The people are perturbed. They feel, not that these regulations should be made more severe, but that they should be enforced and that proper precautions should be taken. We were all glad to have the statement of the Minister of Justice. I agree with the statement of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) that any veterans corps which are organized should be under the federal government. That is as it should be. Nothing would do more to disrupt the unity of this country than to allow private armies to be set up. We would have the wars of the roses or something else of that sort before very long. What people in certain parts of Canada are asking is not that wider powers should be given to the minister or that the regulations should be made more severe, but rather that our people shall be given an increasing feeling of confidence that the regulations are being administered impartially and yet at the same time aggressively.

The third thing which this group have sought to press upon the government is the need for having a direct relationship between parliament and the executive which is responsible for the administration of these regulations. I understand that in Great Britain regulations passed by order in council become invalid unless they are referred to parliament within a specific period of time. Certainly something of that sort ought to be done here. The fact that at this late date we are discussing regulations which came into effect nine months ago is to my mind a considerable reflection upon our democratic form of society. There ought to be some direct control as between the representatives of the people in this house and the executive body charged with the responsibility of administering these regulations.

The fourth thing—and this is what I mainly rose to say—is that those of us who have been criticizing these regulations have done so, not because they are too severe—that is not the proper term—but because in many instances they are not specific enough. They need clarification. Many of them are in such general terms as to permit of abuse. I need not go into details of the regulations because they have already been enumerated by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We are asking not for a lessening of severity so much as for a clarification of the regulations so that no innocent person may suffer, so that the regulations cannot be used by some reactionary individual or group of individuals to persecute other sections of the Canadian people. When I say that I intend no reflections of course on the minister; but ministers change and governments change, while these regulations become part and parcel of the law of Canada for the duration of the war.

There is always in war time the danger of hysteria; people lose much of the sanity [Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

which they have at other times. Newspapers within the last day or two have carried reports of people in libraries burning German books. I do not know why we should blame Immanuel Kant for Hitler, or Beethoven or Mozart for Goering and Goebbels, or Johann Strauss for Rosenberg. But people do that. There is always a tendency in war time for people, anxious as they are to do something, to give vent to their passions by engaging in witchcraft hunting.

What we are asking is that these regulations should be so clear and so specific that they cannot lend themselves to the persecution of any individuals or any groups of people in Canada. There are all over Canada to-day Canadians of German descent, some of them the finest Canadians in this country. Some of them hate Hitler much more bitterly than anyone in this house does, because they have relatives and friends who have suffered under the persecution of the Gestapo. Some of them have loved ones in the concentration camps. In my own constituency some of the first men to flock to the colours were young Canadians whose fathers and mothers came from Germany. We must not permit our passions at a time like this to run away with our judgment. The suggestion has been made in the course of this debate that we ought to give to the police the power of deciding whether or not a man should be interned. In doing that, we would set up here the very Gestapo, Ogpu or some other type of police system that would bring the star chamber system to Canada. We do not want that. We do not want these regulations to be used so that any group of people we do not like can be punished, hurt or persecuted.

I can think of no better illustration of what I mean than the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). The hon, member for Parkdale came to this house with a long and distinguished career in public life, and I want nothing that I say this afternoon to be interpreted as indicating any lack of respect for his years or for his service to this country. But to come into this house and give a list of organizations and label them publicly as being subversive, without submitting one jot or tittle of evidence, is to do a rank injustice to thousands of good Canadian citizens who are not in a position to defend themselves in this house. I looked over this list. With many of these organizations I am not familiar, not even with their names. But first on the list I notice the Canadian Youth Congress. There may be many things about the Canadian Youth Congress of which I know nothing, but I do know something of the youth groups which are associated with the youth congress. In the year 1936 three members of this house, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) and I were selected by the League of Nations Society of Canada to accompany a delegation chosen by the Canadian Youth Congress to attend the World Youth Congress in Geneva, Switzerland. It may be that there are or have been young communists connected with the Canadian Youth Congress. What I do say is that there are thousands of young people associated with the Y.M.C.A., associated with different church groups or with different political bodies who are and have been affiliated with the Canadian Youth Con-

I see another organization in the list—the International League for Peace and Freedom. Again I do not speak with any wide knowledge of its ramifications across Canada, but the branches of that organization with which I am familiar comprise fine, cultured Canadian women who have given time and thought to the study of international affairs; and for anyone without evidence, without submitting any proof whatsoever, merely to label these people as being subversive, is not only to be unfair to them but to do a considerable disservice to Canada itself.

What we are asking is that in our attempt to see that no elements of our country undermine our war effort, we should not allow any person or group of persons to use this power which is given to the government in trust to suppress labour bodies, producers' organizations, or to persecute groups of people whose opinions differ from theirs. We in this group have no apology to offer for making that plea, because in this house we recognized the danger of nazism and of Hitler in days past when it was not very popular to talk about it. As far back as 1936 we of this group impressed upon the government of the day the need of taking steps to stop the encroachments of fascist organizations in this country. We knew, as did every group of people associated with the labour and socialist movements around the world, what fascism and Hitlerism would mean to us. We have opposed them from the beginning; we shall continue to oppose them; but in opposing them we do not wish to see the desire to destroy Hitlerism used as a pretext to destroy other things in our society which are worth while.

What is said about fascism can be said equally about communism. Three of the hon. members who now sit with this group were opposed at the last election by communist candidates, and I believe that in the previous election four or five were opposed by communist candidates. That is quite understandable. The communist party knows perfectly well that social democracy, which requires the bringing about of social change by constitutional means, is the greatest enemy they have, and that is why they seek to destroy it. We have never held any brief for fascism or for communism, but we do make the plea that at this time these regulations should be clarified and should be so specific that there shall be no possibility of persecution in this country. In short, Mr. Speaker, we ask that while this country devotes all its energy towards the task of destroying Hitler abroad, we shall not hatch out a swarm of little Hitlers at home.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, my stand on this whole subject was set forth on May 20 and is to be found on page 58 of Hansard. On that occasion I spoke against extremes. There are certain of the defence of Canada regulations which in their present form are difficult to justify; for example, No. 39, which may I read?

No person shall by word of mouth:-

(a) spread reports or make statements, false or otherwise, intended or likely to cause disaffection to his majesty or to interfere with the success of his majesty's forces or of the forces of any allied or associated powers or to prejudice his majesty's relations with foreign powers, or

(b) spread reports or make statements, false or otherwise, intended or likely to prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline, or administration of any of his majesty's forces.

The intent of that regulation is quite clear, and so long as it is administered by people who are careful, judicious and just and who are not under the influence of some species of hysteria, there will be no difficulty. But I contend that anything effective which could be said or printed could be classed as a violation of section 39. Anything against unemployment, for example, or poverty in the midst of plenty, or the low allowances to veterans or to veterans' widows, or the limited payments to soldiers' dependants, or any reference to our ineffective war effort, might be construed as an offence under this regulation. I could give examples of stories which, if they were to go abroad, would undoubtedly militate against recruiting; but surely the people of Canada are entitled to know about these things, or how in the world are we to remedy these ills as they develop among us?

It is true that there are modifying expressions in these regulations, such as are to be found on page 13, which I crave the indulgence of the house while I read:

1. The ordinary avocations of life and the enjoyment of property will be interfered with as little as may be permitted by the exigencies of the measures which may be required to be taken for securing the public safety and the defence of Canada.

The departments of the government, officers thereof, and other persons executing the following regulations, shall observe this general principle.

But even such tempering influences do not sufficiently safeguard the rights of free speech which are indispensable to a developing public opinion. We want full protection against all real or genuinely potential subversive elements, but we do not want to leave the way open for some overzealous advocate to inflict tyranny, oppression or calculated repression upon thoroughly patriotic people earnestly seeking to increase Canada's effectiveness against Germany. It is customary to make laws rather severe with the idea that discretion be exercised in the administration of the law. Let us not be over-severe in the wording, lest a sort of panic bring undue pressure upon local authorities.

Up to the present time I have had no evidence of abuse resulting from the stern wording of these regulations. Because of that, I believe that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the government as a whole are deserving of the highest form of commendation, and I wish to express my appreciation of the attitude of the minister, as evidenced in his speech this afternoon as well as in his administration up to the present time. I thought, while he was delivering that speech, surely here was a man to whom the word "noble" can be applied with complete moderation.

That we have had thus far no regrettable misconduct in Canada and no unbecoming precautionary treatment of people is, I think, a high tribute to the government, to the Minister of Justice, and to the mounted police throughout the land who are charged with the difficult task of administering this set of regulations not too leniently and not too severely, and of endeavouring to hold restless people in check while they do it.

Democracy requires a strong sense of public duty in the hearts of all concerned: on the one hand the people, on the other hand the executive, and on a third hand, if that is not too much of an incongruity—may I say?—members of parliament and newspapers and others whose words may be listened to. Time and again during the last few weeks I have been mortified while sitting in this house because of the way in which matters which, in my judgment, never should have been brought up and dragged around in the light of day were forced out, whether the disclosure was calculated to do good or harm.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Since the war broke out, it has been my privilege to take up with the officials and the ministers of this government a good many matters such as have been referred to in this chamber by a number of hon, members. believe that, if some important power line is undefended, the last thing in the world it is my duty to do is to advertise the fact from one end of Canada to the other and, indeed, all over the world. When such things have come to my attention I have considered it to be at least my duty to tell someone responsible, and tell him in a quiet way. For us who are members of parliament it is the easiest thing to get on the telephone and talk with a man in a position of responsibility, or write him a letter. I have found all of the officials, every one in every department with whom I have had any contact with respect to any of these matters pertaining to the war, to be most ready to listen and to investigate everything that has been brought to their attention. Why not tell these men? Why rise here and noise it abroad from this house? Tell them, so that if measures were under way looking towards the remedying of the ills complained of, they might not be thwarted as a result of injudicious publicity. I say that if there are unprotected power lines and munition factories, if there is danger to bridges, if there are nazi threats and subversive organizations, the proper procedure for a member of parliament is to bring such matters to the attention of the people whose duty it is to look into them. It is important that members of parliament and other responsible persons, newspaper men and others whose privilege it is to be in a position where they are likely to be listened to, should use discretion and wisdom and be guided by a sense of public

The people must not be over-confident, lacking in humility, lacking in exertion or the will to exertion. They must not become defeatist, they must not be hysterical. They must discourage emotional rumours tending to engender suspicion. I have known communities to be thrown into a state of semipanic for months because of persistent rumours on the part of imaginative creatures that there were night-prowlers in the district. We are in a similar position in Canada. It is the easiest thing for some one, some emotional, imaginative person, to whisper in agitated and perturbed tones about this, that and the other thing, telling people about night-prowlers, so to speak, in our dominion community. It becomes necessary for the people as a whole to be on guard against this attitude, to be circumspect and reserved.

I think the Minister of Justice dealt with the matter well, and I was pleased that the former Minister of Labour, in the last speech that we shall ever have from him on earth, counselled the same thing. Our executives and officers should be careful, dignified, vigilant and relentless, but just.

Our group would urge upon the government, first, that they greatly increase the mounted police force. That has been advocated before, but none the less we feel it is so important a matter that it can stand repetition. We believe also that the mounted police might, as a result of a great increase in numbers, patrol more particularly all areas where nazi or fascist feeling is likely to be fomented. Finally, we urge the government to make the wording of the regulations more specific.

The minister well pointed out this afternoon that there is a genuine difficulty in finding trainers suitable to instruct young prospective mounted policemen. May I deviate to some extent from the general subject we are discussing to point out that there are many things in which the mounted policeman needs to be trained, which it does not require a master teacher to teach him. I see no reason why a good many youths could not be going through such elementary training at the hands of people who perhaps are not fully qualified to give them the last touches in the final education of the policeman and the responsibility attaching to his office. I feel the same with respect to a good many other things in the country to-day.

We hear the cry that we have not young men who are trained in building aeroplanes and tanks, but I feel like complaining that there is not sufficient effort being put forth to take the youth and begin training them. I feel like complaining to the government concerning a similar lack of elementary training for youths who before long will be called to the colours to defend the country. Surely they can at least be put through courses of physical training and many other varieties of The same applies to the conditioning. mounted police. Before we finish this long and fateful struggle, we may find our need for mounted policemen greatly increased. It will then do us no good to say that we have no teachers. We shall have to have the policemen; why not look to the future and take precautions and make provision, so that we can at least be paving the way for future policemen?

This is all I have to say for our group. I wish to congratulate the minister once more, and I wish sincerely to congratulate the government in this matter of the defence regulations. It is fitting that the Prime Minister is the one who has put on the order paper the motion calling for a committee to investigate this whole question. I congratulate him and his government. We are all of us interested in bringing about in Canada a set of conditions under which the country may the better gird herself for the terrible struggle which lies ahead, no one knows for how long.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, as one member of parliament who has already run foul of these regulations, I should like to be permitted to add a few suggestions to the house and to the committee who will have this matter under revision. Let me say at the outset that I am entirely in favour of these regulations, even regulation 39 (a), under which, along with others, I was subjected to what I considered then, and am still of the opinion, was unwise and stupid censorship of radio broadcasts during the election campaign. It is not the regulations with which I take issue but with their application. Possibly the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), who has such an elegant taste for rope, will say that the interpretation has been altered. However, I speak only from actual experience.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of rope?

Mr. ADAMSON: Not yet.

During the campaign I as well as many others had scripts of their radio addresses censored by authorities set up at various places throughout Canada by the government. This censorship was of a mandatory nature; it had nothing voluntary about it. The radio stations in my case were CFRB and CKCL. They informed me that I must submit my script to the censor, that they could not and would not accept responsibility for allowing it on the air, because they were not sure of the application of these regulations. I took my script in each case to Mr. A. A. Fraser who is, I believe, law clerk of this house, and in every instance he found material that he considered inadmissible under the regulations. During the course of the campaign we got to know each other fairly well, and in fact became quite friendly, notwithstanding the fact that I entirely disagreed with his rulings in each case. I contended then, as I still contend, that discussing certain military shortcomings as a criticism of the government, which were well known to many of the general public, was not and is not an act intended or likely to cause disaffection to his majesty, or to interfere with the success of his majesty's forces. The information I had concerned the armament of the first Canadian division. It was subsequently given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) in a speech at Kingston almost in identical phrases and words that I had intended to use. If the house will allow me, I should like to read a part of the contents of my script which the censor found inadmissible. This was in a radio speech of February 23, 1940. I will start with a paragraph which gives the context:

Germany now has three courses of action open to her. She can continue the status quo, hoping to break the British blockade, while her air force harries the civilian population of the allies, hoping to break down their morale. She may attempt a mass assault on the French fortified line, hoping for a break-through similar to that of March 21, 1918, or she may try to "blitzkrieg" some neutral country either east or west with her strong mobile mechanized army, in the hope of obtaining necessary raw materials and food.

This, ladies and gentlemen, is the situation which confronts us now and has confronted us for the past five months. The issue in this election is between what we could have done about it and what we did and are doing about it.

The censor deleted a statement of conditions on that date, which was February 23 of this year. My script said:

I will briefly look at the conditions as they exist to-day. In the infantry there are under a dozen Bren guns in military district No. 2, the largest district in Canada. There should be fifty for a battalion. There are no new Vickers machine guns. There is a dearth of instruction pamphlets for the seven units trying to run schools and train men.

This was censored from my radio script. Also the following:

In the artillery there is not one single modern gun or howitzer. The new twenty-five-pounder combination gun-howitzer has not been seen. There are, I believe, two modern two-inch trench mortars. There should be over a dozen to a battalion. There is, I believe, only one anti-tank rifle. There should be ten to fifteen of these per battalion.

With regard to tanks I intended to say this, which was censored by the censor:

The four other tank battalions of the C.A.S.F. have no tanks with which to train, and practically no training equipment. The British government have intimated that they can do no more than supply their own units. No tanks are being made in Canada.

That, Mr. Speaker, was a statement of facts generally well known in Canada. It was censored, the mandatory word "delete" being placed opposite it. Then I said:

I have not heard of the formation of a railway corps, tunnelling and mining companies, or a forestry corps, and I believe I would have heard had they been established.

It gives me no pleasure to disclose the short-comings in Canada, and as a soldier I regard it as a sad and repugnant duty. That it is a duty nevertheless I am sure, because if these facts are not brought out the public might be led to believe that all was well in this the most perfect of all Liberal worlds. Unless the public is aroused to the truly scandalous state of our armed forces, nothing will be done and our troops will continue to be inadequately armed and equipped.

The statement beginning "unless the public is aroused," was mandatorily censored.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that to censor a statement made over a radio station and allow that same statement to be made on the public platform and printed in the daily press, verges on the sublimely ridiculous.

Now I contend that we should follow the British practice.

As it is now six o'clock, I shall defer the rest of what I have to say until after the dinner recess.

THE LATE HON. NORMAN ROGERS

MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY FROM UNITED KINGDOM BRANCH OF EMPIRE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. SPEAKER: The following cable, dated June 13, has been received by Doctor Beauchesne:

Empire Parliamentary Association, House of Commons, Ottawa.

Members executive committee United Kingdom branch Empire Parliamentary Association at meeting to-day resolved convey your Prime Minister and cabinet and other members your branch their deep sympathy in the great loss sustained by tragic death of Hon. Norman Rogers and their profound regret at removal from Canadian public life of one whom they had the pleasure of receiving at the houses of parliament quite recently and who impressed all with the conviction that he was playing a most valuable part in the present great emergency and was destined to play an even greater part in the future of Canada.

L. S. Amery, Chairman of meeting.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Adamson.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a committee to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations passed under the War Measures Act.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker this afternoon I was able to point out to the house the methods of censorship employed by the government of Canada during the past campaign. I should like to contrast these with the methods employed by the government in Great Britain, and point particularly to the latitude allowed in England in respect of the criticism of the government of the day not only in the house but out of it. In this connection I shall quote the words of Mr. Herbert Morrison, who was subsequently taken into the British cabinet. This is the criticism he made in the House on May 8, 1940, in respect of the British expeditionary force which had been sent to Norway, and the subsequent withdrawal thereof:

I come now to a series of questions which I should like to put to the ministers concerned, and most of which I think can properly be put to the first lord of the admiralty.

Was there a plan in operation for unity of command between the various forces in Norway, at any rate as soon as it was practicable to engage in operations? Is it the case that antiaircraft guns were sent without predictors, and that they were sent a week late? Is it the case that other guns were sent without ammunition? Is it the case that machine guns were sent without spare barrels? Was there any proper liaison between the port occupied by us at Namsos and the port occupied by us at Andalsnes; were there proper communications between those two points? Is it a fact that the military force was not supplied with snowshoes, the consequence being that the troops were stuck on the road and were bombed there?

The result of that criticism was a severe shake-up in the British cabinet, and Mr. Morrison was given a portfolio. When we criticize in this House of Commons we are accused of being saboteurs. I point that out to indicate that this was an expedition sent over apparently ill-equipped—subsequent information has found that to be so—and improperly supplied, without the essential requirements of war.

I believe it is the duty of the government and of hon. members to point out deficiencies, where we see them. It is our duty in my opinion to inform the people of Canada on the actual state of our military effort. I do not believe we can gain anything by false optimism and by hiding facts, no matter how unpleasant they may be. While I realize there is no good crying over spilled milk, yet I think that had we been fully alarmed and fully prepared earlier in the war we would not find ourselves in the predicament in which we are to-day. I have thought, with all due humility, that it was my duty to do everything I could to bring our lack of preparation to the attention of the Canadian people, in order that they may become alarmed, and force a more vigorous action upon the government.

I do not consider any action of mine either in or out of the house has in any way hindered our war effort. I mention these points now because I believe the committee to be set up may well take them under advisement. I shall not attempt to show in what kind of fools' paradise we have been living, but may I point out some circumstances surrounding the proposed showing of a German motion picture. While this matter may not properly concern the federal government, yet indirectly it must concern it. A German motion picture had been produced, showing the entire mechanized force of the German army. It showed twenty-five miles of tanks, and dive bombers diving on their targets. It gave a perfect example of what is now known as the blitzkrieg. That picture was suppressed by the motion picture censors in Ontario, and for this amazing reason: It was said that the showing of the picture might frighten the Canadian people. I hate to think that I belong to a country so easily frightened as that.

In conclusion, may I congratulate the Minister of Justice, (Mr. Lapointe) upon the lack of alarm, generally, and the lack of any untoward incidents having taken place so far in Canada. Coming from an industrial constituency, one in which we have a large number of foreigners, I realize the tremendous difficulties the Minister of Justice has on his hands. The fact that there have not been any serious acts of sabotage is one worthy of commendation, and reflects credit upon the efforts of the minister and his peace officers.

Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly support the resolution. It is necessary for the good of the whole in time of war that certain liberties of the citizen should be taken away. I am prepared, and I think most other hon. members will be also, to be subjected to considerable restraint in order that our effort may go on unimpeded and that victory when it comes shall find us a truly united nation.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention this afternoon to the speech of my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I was never so proud of him. He is probably the greatest Minister of Justice we have had in Canada since the Hon. Senator Aylesworth occupied this high office in the cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. His task will be made more difficult under these regulations, but I know he will not hesitate a single moment to make decisions which he considers fair and just. He referred to the difficulty he had in arriving at decisions in certain cases, taking into consideration the interest of the individual and the interest of the state. We are all prepared to submit to regulations of this kind during war, and of course this legislation is to be enforced only during war time. I am sure my right hon, friend has appreciated the tributes that have been paid to him, all of which are well deserved.

A short time ago I considered it my duty to get in touch with the able commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and give him certain information with respect to the spreading of communistic propaganda among the lumberjacks in my constituency. Means have since been taken to stop this propaganda. One of the most important seizures of communistic propaganda ever made in a large city of Canada was made on information forwarded by the member for Témiscouata to the mounted police. I am not boasting; I consider I was simply doing my duty. In this connection I had the assistance of certain parish priests who were ready to look after the welfare of their people in a highly patriotic manner.

At times certain hon, members of the opposition appear to be grouchy with the government. It is their right to act in that way, but when they do so they should not speak of cooperation. The kind of cooperation they are offering is cooperation with a big stick, something amounting to blackmail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Should the hon. member say that?

Mr. POULIOT: I am simply saying what the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has said. He stated that Herbert Morrison had held the big stick over the British government until he was finally invited to join it.

Mr. ADAMSON: I did not say that.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member did not mention the big stick, but his words had the same meaning.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. ADAMSON: I was referring to the just criticism which Herbert Morrison made of the scandalous course of action of the government. I say it is our right to offer just criticism. I did not say we were holding the big stick over the government. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is entirely wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: I admit that the hon. member did not mention the big stick, but that is how I understood his speech. Moreover the hon. gentleman said that whatever he said, whether in this house or outside, could not cause any trouble to the government. The hon. gentleman is apparently quite modest. He is admitting that his actions, for the better or for the worst, are equivalent to nothing.

Since I became a member of this house I have asked many questions of the government, but none were so much to the point as were the three asked this afternoon by the hon, member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). The hon, member was making certain inquiries of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). The latter hon, member has much in common with the former great leader of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald. I cannot say that he has the experience of Sir John, because he is a newcomer to politics. I cannot say that he has the sagacity of Sir John, because he advocated sterilization in Ontario and did not apply it to his own tongue. The hon, member for Parkdale is at the dawn of his political career, while Sir John was at the dusk of his career. The hon, member for Parkdale would not answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound. He said, "Later." Apparently the only thing he has in common with Sir John is his nickname, "Old To-morrow."

Every citizen of this country, as well as every member of this house, will be bound by these regulations. Therefore, they shall be construed in a spirit of justice and equity, and they shall be applied in the spirit in which they are made. I think it is only right that the whole matter shall be submitted to a committee of this house composed of members of all the political parties. Those members can then express their views and make the best of it. Many members of the legal profession will be on this committee and they will have to put into legal phraseology the suggestions of their fellow members. Sir, I am all for these regulations, and I am all for enforcing them. On the other hand I am all for freedom of speech in this house, freedom to the utmost, and I leave it to you, sir, to decide whether discussion on any matter shall be public or not. If in your judgment any discussion that is being carried on in this house is not in the public interest for all to hear, you have the right to clear the galleries and to prevent any outsider from listening to our discussions. That is how I understand the freedom of discussion in this house.

We have regulations of our own in this House of Commons, the rules of the house, and provided that a member keeps within those rules in expressing his views, there is no reason for calling him to order or for shouts of "order" to be coming from the powerful breasts of some members of the opposition. We are here to fulfil a duty, and to do that we have to inform the government of the facts; we have our suggestions to make in all sincerity, and each of us can make his humble contribution to the public life of this country. But when a member is speaking sincerely and I give credit to all members of this house for sincerity—and says what he has to say upon any matter whatsoever, it is pretty hard for him to be interrupted without reason. Sometimes a certain noise will come from the other side of the house, and members on either side may rise to protest against certain things that might be said. Of course a member always has the right to bring to the attention of the chair that some statement which has been made is irrelevant; and if any member is attacked unduly, he has the right to rise to a question of privilege and insist on any unparliamentary language being withdrawn. But I do not see why on certain occasions some members who have not read the rules of the house, or who, if they have done so, have never understood them, should rise just to create trouble and try to prevent a member from making his argument.

At the present time we and our allies are fighting for the liberties of the world, and if there is a place where the liberties of Canada should be maintained, it is in this House of Commons. Sir, as a man of learning you know that the speakership owes its origin precisely to the desire of the commoners to have their rights clearly defined and fully vindicated before the throne. That was the very beginning of the institution of the speakership. The Speaker had to defend the rights of the commoners. That is why at the opening and prorogation of every parliament you, sir, appear before the bar of the Senate in your capacity as Speaker of the House of Commons, to show that the Commons are still vindicating their freedom and liberties. That is also the reason why at the very beginning of every session, before even the speech from the throne is read, the Prime Minister introduces a bill just to show that the rights of the people and of the commoners are being maintained in this country. That is a mar-vellous tradition which we have taken from the mother of parliaments, and it is in such matters that we follow the true traditions of British parliamentary life.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am all for regulations. War-time regulations—I am all for them. The rules of the house-I am all for them. But as I have already stated, no member has the right to stop another member from making any statement so long as he is acting in accordance with the law of the land, whether this law has been passed by parliament in virtue of the War Measures Act or by the Commons in the form of the rules and standing orders of the house. Therefore I warn every member against undue sentimentality. If criticisms are made at times, they are not made just for fun; they are not made in anger; they are not vindictive. They are made because the one who makes them thinks it his duty to make them. Therefore, sir, we are all in your hands, and I am glad that we are. I have great confidence that you will maintain those high traditions of our parliamentary life and with regard to offenders, those who rise without knowing the rules of the house, just on the spur of the moment or at the call of a colleague, without knowing perhaps one word of the discussion that is being carried on, and interrupt just to create trouble, I trust, sir, that you will bring them to their senses, call them to order and teach them to respect the rules of the house, and before that, to read them; and if they do not understand them, that you will have them explained by the clerk. That, sir, I think, is a service that I render to each member of this house by reminding him of the rights that he has in his capacity as a free Canadian and as a member of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon making such an admirable presentation to the house of the situation that has arisen in Canada because of the war, necessitating the framing and enforcing of the defence of Canada regulations, I recalled many other occasions in past sessions when I heard the same Minister of Justice present to the house in an admirable manner cases which perhaps were not as strong as the case he had this afternoon, but nevertheless all were admirably presented.

I regretted to hear the Minister of Justice say this afternoon—and I do not wish him or any other hon. member to misunderstand me—that in one case where an alien enemy had been interned and later released, the minister had, in response to public opinion, although with regret, ordered the man's reinternment. I sincerely hope that in that case public opinion was correct. But in cases wherein proper investigation has been made by authority, and pursuant to that investigation internment has been ordered, no outcry of public opinion should be allowed to influence the minister to order a release. He should make sure that "the quality of mercy is not strained," that political opinion is not confused with public opinion, more particularly as to reasons advanced for the release of persons interned after a proper investigation.

As to whether, in the words of the resolution, the "regulations reasonably meet the requirements of the country in time of war," speaking for myself, and not for the party to which I have the honour to belong, or for any other party in this house, I am of opinion that these regulations as they are reasonably meet the requirements of the country in time of war. But I do say that the administration of the regulations requires the exercise of wisdom, justice and common sense. Failure to apply common sense to regulations was strikingly demonstrated this afternoon by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) in telling the house of his experiences with the censor. The official in that case, in my humble opinion, lacked common sense.

From a personal experience extending over a period of over forty years in association with members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and in observing the splendid manner in which they discharge their duty, I feel amply warranted in expressing the same admiration of that force as I was delighted to hear the Minister of Justice express this afternoon.

I do not intend to take up the time of the house in making a speech on this resolution, or on the proposed amendment to it, which any hon. member could easily take up forty minutes or more in discussing. But with all due respect to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who moved the resolution, I just say this, that the defence of Canada regulations were prepared by an able committee well-qualified for the work. Their names are set out in the book of regulations. The personnel of that committee was wellselected and is one to inspire confidence. It includes officials of the Department of Justice and officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The recommendations which it drew up and recommended were adopted by the government. From time to time they have been amended to suit conditions, and will continue to be amended as circumstances require. I have confidence in the course which has been and will continue to be taken by the Minister of Justice, advised by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I say that the enforcement of these regulations, as well as the drafting and wording of them, is a government responsibility, a responsibility not to be shifted to a committee of the House of Commons. In my opinion, with all respect to the hon. members who have been suggested as members, to refer the question to a committee will be a waste of time; it will be unnecessary. In the words the Minister of Justice used this afternoon, I think this is a case where we should trust one another. For my part I am quite content to trust in this matter the Minister of Justice and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the resolution with regard to the defence of Canada regulations is an important one. Much more important, however, than the regulations themselves is the enforcement of them. I am satisfied that, under the general authority of the minister, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have done a good job. My only concern at the present time is as to the willingness of the minister courageously to go after those men who are more dangerous than the German-born and Italian-born who have already been rounded up. I have no desire to minimize the danger of sabotage by enemy agents, but the minister has reported that there has been no such case as yet and that the police are ready to meet any such attempt.

There has been, however, repeated sabotage by men in high places, for instance, Premier Hepburn of Ontario. No man in Canada has done more to destroy unity in this country, to create suspicion, to foment dissension and to discourage recruiting than this man has. His high place has given him no sense of responsibility. It should therefore give him no special privilege. Everyone knows that any ordinary citizen of this country who said one-tenth of what Hepburn has said would long since have been charged under the regulations. It is because of the position Mr. Hepburn occupies, because of the publicity he receives, that he is more dangerous, and he should be stopped. I say this in all seriousness. It is not only by word that he has hampered our war effort. It is quite evident from recent events that he has forced the federal government to assume new burdens in guarding Ontario hydro plants; and this step was taken at a time when the situation overseas was most critical and called for the greatest amount of help on the part of all citizens to the federal treasury and to the already overburdened officials, rather than an added strain. Hepburn is blinded by hate. He has lost all sense of decency, and has never desisted from hampering this government.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is a good Liberal, though.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not even the plight of France, the plight of England or the present crisis of the civilized world restrains him. I am not prepared to say, and I even hesitate to think, that he is deliberately trying to aid the enemy—

Some hon, MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr ROSS (Moose Jaw): —but he could not be a better servant of Hitler and Mussolini—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, he is a Liberal.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): —if he were a paid agent.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He belongs to the Liberal party though.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Associated with Hepburn in the wrecking of our war effort are a craven crew who, while loudly shouting loyalty, are so concerned over their own hides and their own possessions that they are willing to destroy our effective cooperation overseas. What have we heard from another place but criticism of sending our aeroplanes overseas to help to defend the mother country at this time, demands for more and more home guards, for bringing McNaughton-all designed to destroy the work we are doing so that they may feel more secure. But it has always been thus. Those who were the loudest at the outset are the quickest to run for cover when the going gets tough.

It is time the people of Canada know where their real danger lies. It is in continuing to countenance men of the stamp of Hepburn and that anonymous crowd who are plastering Ontario with advertisements, with car-stickers which can serve no useful purpose in the common cause and are not intended to serve any cause broader than the narrow interests of a group who have more money than marrow, more prejudice than patriotism, more ineffectual meddling than intestinal fortitude. It is time that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and his officers took action against such people as these, who are the real enemies of Canada and of the empire to-day.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Coming from a district in which there are many people whom we have welcomed to our land from distant shores, I want to say a few words on this resolution. Because so much has been said, and because there seems to be unanimity on all sides of the house, my remarks will be extremely brief.

I have had communications from many parts of the district whence I come, and I can assure this house that loyalty is the predominant sentiment in that district and that the people are anxious to have our contribution to the cause of the empire and of the allies whole-hearted, continuous and complete. Even in the rural homes and in the very humble settlements people on every hand are looking beyond their personal and local troubles and are anxious to know what they can do to contribute to the common cause.

I am convinced that there is no organized, dangerous subversive activity going on. Here and there an individual will express thoughts that should not be in the mind of any Canadian. Words may be said belittling our Canadian institutions or indicating a preference for institutions of some other country. Here and there some individual may take pleasure and even glory in the apparent successes of Hitler. These things rouse our blood and I say that they should be, as in fact they are being, sternly dealt with. They should be dealt with by government-controlled organizations. Local organizations may get together with the very best intentions in the world and yet, under certain circumstances, they may be induced to do something that is not in harmony with British justice.

Gibbon, in the book entitled "Canadian Mosaic", says that of the German-speaking people in Canada only ten per cent have come from Germany. Most of these people are Russian Germans. They came in the nineties from Russia, where they had been settled since the days of Catherine the Great, who encouraged them to go there because she desired to have artisans. The chief organizations among them are their churches, and these Canadians of German origin came from families who left Europe to escape oppression resulting from war and to find sanctuary in Canada. Canada at the moment, however, may not be a sanctuary because we have a war at our very gates. Nearly all of these people have been and still are good citizens, and while they remain so, we should be careful not to be unfair in our suspicions of them or to be overzealous in suspecting them.

This country at the present time should be guided by humanitarian considerations. We need the help of all. Indeed, in every problem, social, economic or in connection with our war effort, these humanitarian considerations must prevail if we would have the universal urge to rally unitedly and unreservedly to the cause of our country.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): It was not my intention to take any part in this debate, but in the course of the discussion some figures were given as to the number of people of German racial origin in Canada. If those figures were intended to prove anything, they were intended to suggest that because there are several hundred thousand people of German racial origin in this country, that fact in itself constitutes some menace to our present situation.

Representing as I do a constituency in which there is probably a greater proportion of people of German origin than in any other constituency in western Canada, I felt I could not possibly let this debate pass without making a few remarks in view of the statements that have been made.

I considered that the last election was an admirable chance for these constituents of mine of German origin to show whether they were loyal to Canada and our empire or not. Opposing me was a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, who asked for support on the ground that he was absolutely against taking any part in the war. He said that he endorsed the stand of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) and that a vote for him was a vote to withdraw any troops that had gone overseas and to take no part whatever in the war. He told these people that the Liberal candidate was a returned soldier supporting the attitude of the Liberal government to the limit, which attitude was that upon the outcome of this war depended the future of civilization and of Canada and that we should do everything we could, consistently with declared policy, to ensure the success of our efforts to win the war. That was the stand I took. These people had a chance to mark a secret ballot, and if they had wanted to vote against participation in the war they could have voted for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate and voted against me. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be fair to these people if I did not tell you on the floor of the house to-night that in the German speaking and Mennonite polls in the constituency of Rosthern I received a majority of over a thousand votes over my Cooperative Commonwealth Federation opponent. That does not look as if the very fact that a person is of German origin shows that he is not heart and soul with Canada and the empire in this time of crisis.

Two days ago I received a letter from a very good Mennonite friend of mine. He ended that letter with these words: "God save our empire." I think I know the people of non-English-speaking origin perhaps as well as does anyone in this house. It is quite true that there may be a few individuals here and there who have been seduced by the nazi propaganda which has been poured into this country. But I am absolutely satisfied that the overwhelming majority of our people of non-English-speaking origin in western Canada are absolutely with Canada heart and soul just the same as are their fellow Canadians.

The vast majority of the population of the district of Rosthern is made up of people of non-English-speaking origin, Mennonites. Ukrainians, Poles, Hungarians and people of German origin, and a definite appeal was made to all of them that here was their chance to vote against a man who was supporting the government that brought Canada into this war and was resolved that she should do all she could to help win it and defeat Hitler. And as I say, the fact that that constituency returned me and defeated my opponent shows where they stand. With the secret ballot they could have had it otherwise if they wished. It is too bad that just because a few people here and there see fit to talk against their country, people should jump to the conclusion that vast groups of good Canadian citizens are not absolutely loyal.

Being a returned man myself I feel I can speak to fellow returned soldiers. I would say to the returned soldiers throughout this country, and particularly some members of the Canadian Legion: You are not serving the best interests of Canada by calling in question the loyalty of large groups of non-English-speaking origin just because one or two here and there have said things that they should not say. I would say to them that by questioning the loyalty and good faith of people who are loyal to Canada to their very heart's core, they are hurting those people almost intolerably, and they are destroying the very thing we, all of us, want to build up in this country, that is Canadian unity, the thought that we are all Canadians regardless of the country of our origin. I cannot think of anything that would more discourage a man, say of German origin who is absolutely loyal to this country, who has turned his back firmly upon the appeal of blood and fatherland, and is ready to stand by Canada to the last, than to find that he and all his friends are branded as untrustworthy. I cannot imagine any way to play more into the hands of Hitler.

We know, or at least some of us know who have had a chance to read his nazi propaganda, that what he endeavours to teach the people of German origin is that "no matter if you try to creep into camp, you will never be accepted as one hundred per cent Canadian or British citizens; they may pretend that they accept you; but let a crisis come and they will show that they do not trust you, will turn against you and try to put you out of jobs, will malign you and do everything to hurt you. Therefore the thing for you to do is to support Hitler and Germany's striving for world supremacy. Then when Germany gets control of the country you will be a one hundred per cent To my friends here and there throughout Canada who from the best of intentions but without reason attack these people just because they may have a German name, who question their loyalty, and endeavour to drive them out of positions, I say: You are playing right into the hands of the supporters of Hitler who put out that very propaganda. They throughout the length and breath of my constituency are saying, "Look, what did we tell you? told you that you would never be accepted as a British subject. Look at the resolution of this branch of the Canadian Legion; look how this boy of yours who had a good job and was accepted as a Canadian is now maligned and how attempts are made to deprive him of his job; does it not prove what we told you? The thing for you to do is to line up with us and help us out."

I say that the proper attitude of all Canadians is, look to the present and future unity of our country, so that it can put forth the effort of a united people, and let us trust our fellow Canadians no matter of they have German or non-English sounding names, accept them as good Canadian citizens unless it is proved that the contrary is the case.

The Minister of Justice and this government, by refusing to be stampeded by cries for persecution against good Canadians, by saying that the man who is a German agent we will put in a concentration camp and keep him there, but we are not going to condemn a whole community because one or two people have been seduced from their allegiance, by handling this difficult problem in this most statesmanlike way have done the best job that could possibly have been done for the present and future unity of Canada. I want to pay this heartfelt tribute on the floor of this house to-night to the work they have done. In view of the fears which have been generated by the thought that we have in our midst perhaps half a million potential enemies. I should not be doing my duty to my fellow citizens of non-English-speaking origin, many of whom are to-day in the armed forces of our sovereign-in the first division there were proportionately more boys of Ukrainian origin than their proportion of the population of Canada—if I did not tell my fellow members that from an intimate knowledge of thousands of people of non-English-speaking origin I know that they are just as loyal to Canada and our empire as the members of this House of Commons. It is our duty to let them know that we trust them, and together we will then go forward as a united people regardless of racial origin and place the name of Canada high on the roll of the nations of the world where tolerance is preached and practised.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): As the hon, member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said this afternoon, we in this groupand I might say, those who agree with our views all over the British empire- anchor ourselves to the British crown and to the sovereignty of the nations comprising the British empire. I mention this because I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to a movement which has for its aim the surrender of the sovereign rights not only of Canada but of the other nations composing the empire. I refer to a movement which has for its object what is known as a federal union. It is proposed that in order to achieve federal union the countries of the empire shall surrender their sovereign rights to an international control. In the London Times of November 3, and also in different papers in Canada, including the Winnipeg Free Press, this idea has been strongly supported, and it is suggested or proposed that we surrender our sovereign rights over finance, armaments, fiscal policy and the judiciary. I ask this question: If we surrender those rights, what rights are left? This parliament would be reduced to the status of a parish council, and if we surrender our sovereignty surely we would be surrendering the sovereign, himself. I cannot see how we could have a sovereign without sovereign powers.

In last week's edition of Saturday Night there is an interesting article by Dorothy Thompson, in which she sets forth the aims of Hitler, if and when he wins the war. Those aims and proposals are precisely the same as federal union. It is the same old horse with a different rider. The author claims that she was informed by a number of the highest placed nazis that the control of finance would reside in Berlin; all countries would be disarmed; there would be complete free trade in Europe.

As I stated before, that is precisely the aim of federal union. But instead of control being in Berlin under Hitler, under federal union the control would be under an international control at Geneva, Basel, or Jerusalem. Why is it that communists, who have precisely the same aims and, so far as I know, have been no more violent in their activities than have the people who are actively preaching federal union, have been interned or have had their movements suppressed, while the ideas of federal union receive the encouragement and, in fact, the active encouragement of people in high places.

Amendment, Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) agreed to.

Motion, (Mr. Mackenzie King) as amended agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

ALLEVIATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT AND AGRICUL-TURAL DISTRESS—UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL INTEREST AND FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Vien in the chair:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide assistance in the alleviation of unemployment and agricultural distress out of moneys appropriated by parliament, and for such purpose to supplement the measures taken by the provinces towards providing assistance to those in need, establishing unemployed persons in employment and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations, and also to provide financial assistance to the provinces by way of loan, advance or guarantees out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, and for the appointment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw one or two facts to the attention of the committee. On page 16 of appendix 6 of the Sirois report it is shown that up to the end of the fiscal year 1937 the amount spent on relief totalled $813,000,000. Keeping that figure in mind we must realize that at this date the moneys spent on relief in Canada must aggregate well over a billion dollars. That is a serious state of affairs. It is a sign that something is vitally wrong in our whole set-up and in the organization of the industrial and economic life of our country. The social implications of this condition will go far beyond anything that any of us understand at the present time.

When it comes to a consideration of agricultural distress, most hon. members may feel that they may look upon it in this way, "Well, all we have to do is pass a few more hundreds of millions of dollars; it is just a matter of agricultural distress." May I say to hon. members that to the farmers of western Canada who are to-day in many parts again facing the same barren fields, the passing of these moneys for agricultural distress means their very life. I should like hon. members who are interested, to read again the last sentence of a letter which is to be found on page 521 of Hansard of June 4. They will then realize the importance of the situation which exists in western Canada and which causes everyone the deepest concern.

We must remember that agriculture provides a livelihood for at least 4,000,000 of the people of Canada. I should like to quote some figures to be found in appendix 4 of the Sirois report dealing with national income. Table I-C to be found on page 59 gives the agricultural income of Canada in millions of dollars. The net agricultural income for 1926 was 728.2. By 1932 this had dropped to 144.5. and by 1937 it had recovered to 439.4. Table VIII-C, to be found on page 86, gives the agricultural income of Saskatchewan in millions of dollars. In 1926 the net income was 203.8; in 1932 it was -7.4, and in 1937 it had recovered to 22.7. The farm income for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta for 1928, in millions of dollars, was 435.8; in 1932 this had decreased to 14.8, and in 1937 it had increased to 155.1. Taking the figures for 1928 as 100 per cent, the income for 1932 had dropped to 3.4 per cent and had risen to 35 per cent in 1937.

The situation in Saskatchewan is much worse. In 1928 the farm income was in millions of dollars, 228.4; in 1932 it was -7.4 and in 1937, 22.7. Taking the 1928 figure as 100 per cent, by 1932 the income had dropped to -3 per cent, and by 1937 it had not recovered to 10 per cent of what it was in 1928. I should like hon, members to consider these figures. They will then see that the drop in income was so tremendous that it was absolutely impossible for the farmers in that part of the country to meet their production obligations. The payment of interest on mortgages became impossible and their very existence depended upon relief made possible largely by federal grants. The figures show that about 750,000 families in Canada have to exist on farm income.

In contrast with this situation I should like to refer to Table I-B, to be found on page 58 of the same appendix 4. This gives the investment income received by Canadian individuals. In 1926 this income, in millions of dollars, amounted to 490·3. In 1932 there was scarcely any drop at all, the income being 435·8. By 1936 it had dropped only to 429·0. As nearly as I can find out, the number of families enjoying this type of income is probably not much in excess of 50,000. It will be noted that the investment income of Canada in 1926 was two-thirds of the agricultural income, and in 1937 it was just about equal. If we consider the income to foreign investors, these figures are still larger.

It is this lack of equality against which we wish to protest. Farmers all across Canada are in a serious financial condition. In the west they have had to face falling prices, drought, and certain rigid costs such as interest, taxes, prices of farm machinery, et cetera. It must be remembered that both capital and labour are required for agricultural production. There is no justice in a condition where capital can extract its toll and labour be left to lose everything. The result has been that in Saskatchewan and throughout the west the agricultural debt has risen to such a degree that to-day the mortgage debt on our wheat lands is almost $15 an acre. The other day an hon, member said that a farmer gets up at five o'clock in the morning to milk his cows. The hon, member for Wey-burn (Mr. Douglas) said to me under his breath that many lawyers get up at tenthirty in the morning to milk the farmers, and they make a better living out of it.

The debt situation in the west cannot be ignored by this parliament. The other morning I was in receipt of information from a reeve of a municipality in Yorkton constituency to the effect that "sixty-one foreclosures had taken place this spring against people ranging from sixty to seventy years of age. These people had been left without homes or money after having worked, in some instances, for forty-five years on the land." In the face of the suffering and privation which these people have had to endure in building up a great country, it is unthinkable that want, destitution and dispossession should be their reward in their old age.

The failure of our governments to attack this problem properly is one of the things for which Canadians must hang their heads in shame. The toll which capital is taking from western Canada is wringing everything out of these people. They are gradually sinking down to a point where they have to depend upon relief for their very existence. But these people do not want relief. They abhor and hate it. What they want is an opportunity to make a decent living. What they want is something in the way of social This problem will never be solved by merely providing a few more hundreds of millions to pay relief. These people want an opportunity to live. That is their demand. They should have assurance that assistance will be forthcoming should they face distress this year. I am hoping that the minister will indicate that everything in the agreements between the provinces will be carried out to the full, that there will be no discrimination and that money will be made available to those who need it.

Professor Hope of the university of Saskatchewan has pointed out that the average cost of producing a bushel of wheat on the average farm in Saskatchewan is in the neighbourhood of 95 cents. Yet when the farmer is faced with conditions such as obtained in 1932, he must pay for everything that he uses, he must go into debt for the commodities that he needs. He may be owing money; and after he has put everything into his farm during the season, in the fall if he gets nothing in return, why should not capital also take its loss that year? There should be no interest in those years when there is no production from the farm. Capital should be compelled to take its loss when the labour invested in the farm brings no return, and the farmer should not be penalized by having interest charges piled upon his old debt until finally it becomes insurmountable.

The destruction of homes in that area is a serious social problem. If hon, members will look at the Saskatchewan statistics they will find that the young people have not an opportunity to make homes for themselves. The marriage rate in Saskatchewan is 25 per cent lower than for the rest of the dominion taken together. It is equalled only, I believe, by Prince Edward Island. It is a serious situation. The farmers in Saskatchewan are faced with an almost impossible task, and that they are carrying on at all shows the stuff they are made of. It is a sign that these men, many of whom went overseas and fought in the last war and had the spirit to pioneer out in the west, are not going to give up. They are going to fight through in spite of everything which seems to throw discouragement in their way. These people are not going to be driven into a state of pauperized peasantry because I know they will not be driven down. They have a just appeal to make, and they are going to continue to make it. They are not going to be driven down to the point where they will crawl on their hands and knees for a crust of bread. The young people in that land leave our high schools where they have learned that Canada is the northern half of the great north American continent, that Canada is a great country of immense wealth from Cape Breton to Nootka sound. We have vast resources in fish, forests, lumber production, minerals and the high ability of the Canadian people to produce generally. Yet they find when they leave school that they are denied the right to a decent living. Thousands of children on those prairies seldom see apples. They have learned that apples are allowed to rot under the trees in the orchards in the east and the west. When these things can happen, something is evidently wrong with the organization of affairs in Canada. Something prevents people from earning a living, prevents them from even obtaining the necessities of life—food, clothing and shelter, and as somebody said the other day, the opportunity to work. Work is what they want; they do not wish to go on relief.

Speaking for this group, we believe that health and homes are far more important than the reward for capital. We believe that the foundation of any nation is the home. Where there are good homes and the people have an opportunity to work, make a living and get some reward for their labour, there is the foundation for a decent nation.

When that foundation is destroyed, the nation is going to rot. Food, clothing and shelter exist in abundance in Canada. We are a country of only eleven millions of people, and our people are entitled to food, clothing, shelter and the opportunity to work. That is their heritage, and when it is denied them something is wrong. I should like to see the standard by which any Canadian government will be judged become the standard of the homes in Canada.

One of the things which must cause real Canadians to hang their heads in shame is the fact that their unemployed single men and unemployed single women are not properly provided for under this legislation. It seems to me that there is too much difficulty in the matter of administration as between the federal and provincial governments. The federal government makes grants, but then says: "We cannot do anything about the spending of this money because its administration is not in our hands." When you want the minimum standard of education raised in Canada, you find that this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. When you want a minimum standard of health across Canada, there again you find that there must be no interference with provincial jurisdiction. If there is this diffi-culty over respective jurisdictions it is the duty of parliament to overcome the difficulty and to see to it that minimum standards are set for all the people of Canada with regard to their health, their homes and their education. We need such standards so that administrations could be properly judged by them. That would mean a great step forward.

I should like to give the committee a few figures which I obtained from Financial Post surveys of corporate securities and of mines for 1939-1940. They show:

[Mr. Castleden.]

Combined profits (available for dividends) of: Consolidated Mining and Smelting; Granby Consolidated Mining and Smelting; International Nickel; Noranda.

1929. $35,163,939 1937. 74,180,903 1939. 58,095,480

1937 as percentage of 1929: about 212 per cent. 1939 as percentage of 1929: about 166 per cent.

Then this same group, plus Falconbridge Nickel and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, shows combined profits as follows:

The two latter companies were not operating in 1929. The combined profits of the two groups above, including Falconbridge and Hudson Bay, were:

 1929......

 1937.....
 87,896,095

 1939, probably about.

That is, the profits of the leading base metal companies in Canada in 1929 were about $39,000,000; in 1937, about $88,000,000, or about two and a quarter times as large as in 1929; and in 1939, about $67,500,00, or about one and three quarter times as large as in 1929.

The main point I want to bring out is the inequality which exists. Contrast these profits with the fact that the farmers of western Canada cannot get any return for their capital invested, can scarcely get their cost of production. In 1932, for instance the total agricultural income in Saskatchewan did not cover the cost of operating, let alone interest; but in these other natural resources of Canada, we find Consolidated Mining and Smelting showing a return on shareholders' investment (capital and surplus) of over 21 per cent, and other companies as follows:

Falconbridge Nickel, 1937, over 14 per cent; 1939 profit was about 37 per cent higher.

Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting, 1937, over 20 per cent; 1939 profit was about 30 per cent lower.

International Nickel, 1939, almost 17 per cent. Noranda, 1937, over 37 per cent; 1939 profit was about 20 per cent higher.

Take other industries, Canadian Industries Limited, for example. The return on shareholders' investment was as follows:

Here they are with profits of 16 per cent on the shareholders' investment! It is this inequality to which we object. We in this group maintain that the natural resources of this country belong to the Canadian people, and that neither this parliament nor any other group has the right to pass them over to the control of those whose only interest is to make profits for themselves, while thousands of our people are in need and we have to spend a billion dollars in maintenance relief. The worst feature of the whole business is that we are condemning youth to a helpless and hopeless future.

A problem which must be evident to everyone who thinks about conditions in Canada is the effect of the technological advances which are being made in industrial production, for instance, as we heard the other night, in the mining industry. The way things are going, increasing numbers of labouring people on the whole north American continent find themselves no longer required. At this time a statesmanlike administration would take steps to deal with this situation, which if it continues, can lead only to deterioration and chaos. It is now time to lay our plans. We have in Canada everything necessary to a great nation. We have the resources, the machinery of production, the people willing to work, the educational institutions necessary to train them; on the other hand great masses of people are going without adequate food, clothing and shelter. The issue is one which each of us will have to meet; for every hon, member is responsible in some degree for the way in which he faces this problem. We need a plan, and we need it now. Why can we not get together? Why cannot these unemployed people, shareholders in the natural resources of Canada, be put to work on the development of those resources? A proper attack on this problem would be one of the most effective means of restoring the morale of our people. I cannot understand why, nine months after the declaration of war, there are so many unemployed in this country. By tackling this problem properly, we should obtain the goods and services which we need so much at the present time, and open the way to a state of social security afterwards, of which every Canadian could be justly proud.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Before this resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) is finally disposed of, I wish to say a few words about it. During the years I have represented the constituency of Humboldt in parliament I have endeavoured at all times to take an impartial stand. I have not been one of those who follow their party whether it is right or whether it is wrong. I have tried to look in an impartial way at the questions which have arisen from time to time. No one can accuse me of having been in any way partisan during the years that I have been here; I have always reserved the right of criticism and have voted as my conscience has directed me.

This is a war parliament. Some of the issues before us to-day seem trifling by contrast with the tremendous issues and problems which have to be faced and solved if western civilization is to be saved. When we see in a short period of time nation after nation crushed and bleeding at the feet of the Teuton conqueror, one finds it difficult to debate at any length this matter of relief. The last few months have brought us all, business man, professional man and farmer, to a realization of the fact that we have public, private and international responsibilities. I am sure that there are few hon. members who have not given serious thought to this problem of unemployment.

The resolution which is now under discussion has been termed in this chamber-it is a trite expression—the hardy perennial of parliament. Relief is taken too much for granted; the relief vote is regarded as a hand-out, a donation by the federal government to the provincial government and by the provincial government to the various municipalities, for distribution to the unemployed. Even the war has not cured unemployment. At a time when every ounce of our energy should be harnessed to the purpose of winning the war, we find much poverty, distress and misery, men begging on the streets, men begging at our doors. A few days before I left my home in Saskatchewan a young man came to me in desperation, looking for some kind of employment. In discussing his case I asked him if he had tried to enlist. He said, yes, he had walked the streets of Regina for days, begging for food, while he waited to see some officer to find out if he could get into the armed forces of this country. Finally he was forced to come back, and he thought he would come and discuss his case with me, his representative in parliament, and ask me if I would try to find some way whereby he could get into the fighting forces. I was forced to tell him that if I, as a member of parliament, did even so much as write a letter recommending him for acceptance in the army, immediately he would be discriminated against. It seems to me that we are here confronted with one of the crying shames of the day. Nothing destroys the morale of our people so much as to go on relief; and when a young man is told that he is not fit to die for his country, he cannot be blamed for being disillusioned, dispirited and desperate.

Once people get on relief it is difficult to get most of them off. In some instances I cannot blame them. The man who takes a job which returns him a little above the relief issue or allowance finds it very difficult to get back again on the relief rolls. For many of those on relief the only recourse is to loaf around in idleness. What our people wantand I speak for the constituency of Humboldt, and, I am sure, the whole province of Saskatchewan—is work, not hand-outs from any government. There should be some incentive for people to get off relief. After a period of almost ten years we should have worked out some system which would make men anxious to get off relief, for relief does not solve our unemployment problem. Some otherwise intelligent industrialists and politicians regard relief, I believe, as the cheapest way of maintaining the social system without revolution and civil war; that is about all that it has prevented. Nothing can cost us more in the long run than the debilitation of our people. So the present arrangement is not cheap, no matter which way one looks at it. I am afraid we have simply taken the easiest way out.

What is wrong? I know that there are one thousand and one people with a thousand and one ideas. But is it not time that some honest attempt was made to find out? I often ask myself the question, is the system antiquated? Would planned economy, as our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends preach, solve the problem? Would a new monetary system, such as the New Democracy group propound, solve it? Would shorter hours of labour solve it, as is sometimes suggested? It is objected that the result would be to reduce the general wage scale. But if there were a minimum wage and a universal shortening of hours, the increase in the cost to the employer would simply be added, if there were an increase in cost, to the price of goods. At least we should do something to stop this alarmingly increasing process, whereby the rich get richer and the poor get poorer and there are more of them.

I have no faith in panaceas, but our present relief policy is just the same as giving aspirin to some person suffering from toothache or giving morphine to cure cancer. Someone may say that even if we could solve unemployment for the employables, we would always have the unemployables. When I see the halt, the maimed and the blind, men born without arms, men who have lost their legs, finding useful things to do with the faculties left them; when I have seen right in this house the late Hon. Charles Murphy, whose voice graced these halls of parliament so often, himself a cripple, rising to a very high position—when I have seen all this I have wondered whether there is such a thing as an unemployable. I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are certain persons who are definitely incapacitated for work, but there is more than one remedy for that. We have appointed commissions; we have made surveys; we have talked a good deal about this question; but the simple truth of the matter is that we have made no sincere or honest attempt to find a solution.

We fought the last war to make the world safe for democracy, but we forgot afterwards that the natural adjunct of political democracy was at least a semblance of economic democracy. Now that is neither socialism nor communism; it is indeed at the very opposite pole, for it presupposes more and more people with ownership. If the people own 75 per cent of the land or the wealth of the country, the real power will remain in the hands of the people; but now we have political power in the hands of the majority and economic or real power—and how powerful it is—in the hands of from 2 to 5 per cent.

The Right Reverend Monsignor John Ryan made a summary of the findings of the great councils of the Catholic, Jewish and Protestant denominations on the question of property. In the book, The Christian Doctrine of Property, he says:

In a political democracy it is not at all certain that an industrial autocracy can or ought to survive permanently. The best interest of the wage earning classes and of society generally seems to demands that wage-earners should be something more than wage-earners. They ought to have some share in, and responsibility for, the operation and the ownership of industry. Only in such a social organization can the more extreme dangers of class conflict be removed, and the working classes obtain opportunity for the full development of all their faculties. Hence we find the social reconstruction programmes of the Catholic bishops and of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America advocating labour participation in industrial management. The first of these documents goes further and declares that the majority of workers should become owners, at least in part, of the instruments of production through cooperative enterprise and copartnership arrangements. Other church programmes call for workers sharing in the surplus profits of industry.

So far in the war period the government has taken certain commendable steps such as restriction of profiteering and the excess profits tax, seeking to prevent abnormal increases in the cost of living, and measures for the rehabilitation period. Yet in the light of what the institutions of religion have said, I wonder if we have really started a programme of economic adjustment.

What applies to the wage-earner applies equally to the primary producer. Agriculture is probably at its lowest ebb in Canada. During peace time we spent large sums of money to overcome drought and rust, grasshopper and soil drifting, and many other agrarian problems. Now we have had a good crop and a war economy, and the people are in a worse plight than ever. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), with a seat from the province of Saskatchewan, with all his ability has endeavoured to do his best, but along with other departments his estimates have been cut to the bone. A great many people do not seem to realize that the things which the Minister of Agriculture was trying to do were based on a long range policy. I do not believe that the Department of Agriculture in this period of the war should have had its estimates cut. If the manufacturer does not make a profit he stops producing, but if the farmer stops producing he starves. England spends tremendous sums to protect her youth from air raids. But what have we seen in Saskatchewan? We have heard it discussed here. I know of many children in certain parts of my constituency who have not had shoes and so have been unable to go to school. Yet our government has done nothing about the matter. In Nova Scotia farmers have been encouraged to produce more through the university of St. Francis Xavier. Great Britain has launched a great farm programme. In western Canada many of our farmers do not know where their next meal will come from. With all the devastation in Europe, undoubtedly the time will come when there will be a shortage of food, when wheat will be in demand. The government should sustain the wheat farmer until that time arrives. Wheat is just as much an essential instrument of war as munitions. Let us protect that great wheat industry of western Canada.

In my opinion the government should take over the entire wheat industry. Why should the elevators, the storage people, be getting huge profits for storing wheat at a time like this? Sometimes I think everybody connected with wheat gets a profit out of it except the farmer, the man who grows it. It is time for us to wake up and to speed up agriculture generally. If the farmer is to produce now to ensure us against the lean years ahead, he must have some assurance that the years of his production will not be lean. If the government were to take over the wheat industry, with the growers on a subsidized basis similar to the wheat board arrangement as the only private ownership, then I think they would find an answer to the inequality in the price of farm implements, gasoline and finished goods to the price the primary producer gets for his products.

Somewhere, somehow, an answer to the problem must be found. We cannot expect people to lift up their eyes to the hills when they are down in the mouth. The last war meant an entirely new economic and social epoch. The same thing is certainly going to be true of this war. The average man is beginning to see that he has a right to participate in the economic benefits which were made possible, not by one man or one age, but are due to cooperative progress through the centuries. Present-day industry could not move if primitive man had not invented the wheel. The average man is more and more coming to demand that right, and we as a government have the responsibility of seeing that his demand is satisfied.

As the representative of the constituency of Humboldt I speak for the needs of my constituents. As a representative of western Canada I cry out against the years of intolerable hardship, which are inexcusable when we take the broad view of our fertility and resources. As a member of this house I deplore that our only answer to one of the most perplexing problems that this house has to solve is the dole. In the election recently held, the people did not vote for the government because they were satisfied with its fiscal policy or its wheat policy or its relief policy. They voted for the present administration because it included two men who they believed could save this country from disaster, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

I do not pretend to know all the answers to this question of poverty amidst plenty, or idle resources and idle men when we so badly need to be using both. But I do know that if we are intelligent men, or leaders of men, we should be trying to find a workable method.

The nazis are putting to work in the international sphere what seems to have been the principle too long followed in the economic field, namely, the will to more and more power. Nietzsche, the German philosopher, says in "Beyond the Good and Evil":

Life itself is essentially appropriation, injury, conquest of the strange and weak, suppression, severity, obtrusion of its own form, incorporation, and at the least, putting it mildest, exploitation.

Against him I quote Edmund Burke, the English statesman:

When bad men combine, the good must associate else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice, in a contemptible struggle.

Let us work so unitedly at the task of winning this war, and be so convinced of the justice of our cause, that the thought of losing will never enter our minds. Let us eradicate the words, "complacency" and "defeatism" from our vocabulary. The seriousness of the present situation demands people who can make quick decisions, and calls for all our organizational ability. It demands the very life-blood of our nation, flowing in a steady stream towards the single purpose of victory. But at the same time let us never forget that if we look to the welfare of our people, we have taken the longest step towards reaching the welfare of the state. Domestically and internationally there is one great struggle between the ruthless philosophy of men like Nietzsche, which the nazis personify, and the Christian golden rule. While we fight for Christian principles abroad, we must be careful to preserve them at home.

In this sense I cannot let this motion go by without saying that we as members of this House of Commons should not pass this as a hardy perennial, but should try to work out some method that will get our people off the dole.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) intends to continue with the youth training programme. I am very much in favour of this programme, but I honestly believe that if he intends to carry it on for another year, there should be some changes in it. In the report under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act of 1939, table 2, showing the work done under the national forestry programme, it mentions roads built; trails cut; telephone lines built; pulpwood, pit props, fuel wood and telephone poles cut; and then at the bottom it says, "tree planting, fifty-three acres." Now fifty-three acres for the whole of Canada seems a very small amount. In fact fifty-three thousand acres would still be a small amount. At the bottom of the same page it mentions game conservation and fish hatcheries. If we are cutting the trees like that and planting so few, we are not going to have game or fish, because the game need woodlands for homes and the fish in our rivers and lakes have to have forests because the young fish when hatched are fed from what comes off the soil throughout the year and without it they will die. If the forests are being cut as they are-and from that I take it that those men are trained not to save trees but to slash them-that should be changed. If trees are being cut like that, there will be none left for our children and our grandchildren. I notice the appropriation for the tourist bureau is increased to $500,000. If we are cutting trees and not replacing them, we are not going to have the tourists; they will go elsewhere.

I hope the Minister of Labour will increase the planting of trees, and I should like him to start it in the county I represent. We have sections there which are not fit for farming; there are men on them trying to make a living but they cannot. Those areas should be planted out to trees; this would also give work to the unemployed.

The subject of conservation and preservation of forests was talked of when the French pioneers were here over two hundred years ago, but nothing has really been done. Some of the provinces are doing a little, but not enough. We need young men skilled in forestry work. The Canadian Forestry association published a statement early this year, and there is one little part I should like to read. Referring to forest research, it says:

. . . It is complained that official efforts in this direction are at present entirely inadequate and that sufficient provision is not made for the training of specialists and furnishing them with improved facilities for carrying on their useful functions. The importance of schools of forestry and "ranger schools" for the benefit of skilled assistants is stressed.

Other countries have compulsory replanting of trees; in Denmark, Germany, Norway, if you cut one tree down you have to replace it with two or three. Canada must wake up.

On page 21 of the report to which I previously referred, it says:

Those eligible to participate were unemployed young men, aged eighteen to twenty-five, with preference given to those in necessitous circumstances. As in the youth training agreements, they were selected without discrimination or favour on account of race, religion or politics.

In the province in which I live, all road work is done by men who belong to the right party, or the right side of politics. I am not on that side at present. Conservatives and members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have not a chance.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are on the right side of politics.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, but I could not get a road job there; that is sure. One has to have a ticket to get a job.

Last week hon. members to my left and again to-night the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) mentioned that there were children without enough clothes and shoes, and it was said that the government was not doing anything about the matter. When last year Their Majesties the King and Queen came to Canada, I was informed that there were three children in one section who did not have any shoes and, in fact, had gone practically all winter without them. We had to supply them with shoes so that they could travel the 150 miles to Toronto to see the king and queen.

There are families not far from me living five, seven or eight in one house—I call it a house, but that is not the proper name for it. They are living in these eight by ten houses, and their supplies consist of a stove, a table, and straw on the floor to serve as beds. Those people do not live; they just exist. I believe that condition exists because Canada ships most of its raw materials to other countries to be made into finished products, so that those finished products may in turn be sent back here to be sold back to us. In that way we do our men and women out of jobs which rightfully belong to them. The people I mentioned before, namely those without proper clothing, depend on the gifts they receive during the summer months from the tourists. They receive gifts of clothing and shoes which have to do them throughout the winter, and what they receive from the tourists is practically all they have during the whole year, except on those rare occasions when the husband may get a job cutting wood, receiving wages that are unbelievably low. Those people cannot call doctors because they would be charged $25 or $45 for the visit. Red Cross nurses have to do the work; in fact, those same nurses in most instances have to prepare the dead for burial, and I say they deserve a great deal more credit than they receive.

In this matter of relief may I say I honestly believe the government is working backwards. In my opinion the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) should get in touch with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), so that the two of them could work together. So far as the farmers are concerned, we ought to realize that our trade agreements are causing a great deal of hardship. Strawberries are coming into Canada to-day practically duty free; in fact, I believe at this time the duty has been altogether removed. Potatoes are entering Canada duty free, and will continue to do so until June 15. That is the condition which exists at a time when our farmers have potatoes they cannot sell because of the duty free potatoes entering our markets. Our farmers are left holding the bag. Tomatoes being shipped into Canada are ruining our hothouse tomato business. Those tomatoes received from Mexico are in many instances affected with worms.

Assistance is being given the farmers after the government has taken away the market which those farmers used to have, and should have to-day. The Minister of Labour should work hand-in-glove with the Minister of Agriculture, and if that were done, this farmers' assistance measure would not be quite so necessary. In the county I represent more than 80 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, and I doubt if any of the farmers will be able to pay their interest, let alone pay back any of the principal sums. Present conditions are a burden the farmers will never overcome. If the government were alive to present-day conditions, and made trade agreements favourable to the working men and the farmers in Canada, we would not need an Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act at all.

To-day motor cars which used to be made in Canada are made in the United States and shipped to Canada for sale. Canadian workmen, Canadian women and Canadian farmers are on relief in the midst of plenty. Importation of motor cars built in the United States is putting many thousands of men out of work. Then, magazines are entering Canada duty free and, as has been mentioned before in the house, many of them should not come in at all. Not only do they enter duty free, but the Post Office Department is being deprived of a great deal of revenue.

I should like to have it understood that I am very much in favour of this measure, in view of conditions to-day. We must have it this year; but I feel the Minister of Labour should prepare for the post-war period. In fact all the ministers in the government should pull together for the good of the Canadian people. They should absolutely forget politics because, if we are to succeed, we must do that. Boost Canada; put Canada over the top. We have the raw materials; we have the men and women. We are going to win the war, anyhow; that is quite sure. We have to win it, if we are to live. But we have to work right here, in our own country.

As has been said by hon, members to my left, men on relief do not want to be on relief. They want to do an honest day's work and receive an honest day's pay. The farmer is in the same position. He wants a decent price for his goods and a market in which to sell them. He has not that market to-day.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak to the resolution of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), I welcome the privilege of making certain suggestions for the consideration of the committee. Coming from a riding in the city of Toronto, where no less than 10,000 people out of a total of 62,000 are forced even at this time to accept relief, I realize that the problem of assistance is a vital one. The need for establishing unemployed persons in employment, and training and fitting suitable persons for productive occupations is one the acuteness of which is forced upon me, as it is upon every hon. member of this committee.

Many of the people in the constituency of Rosedale who are seeking employment are members of the building trades—bricklayers, plumbers, plasterers, carpenters, decorators, et cetera. For what little help this government has given in stimulating the building industry we are duly thankful. Mere financial assistance in the building or remodeling of homes, however, is not of itself sufficient. Before a solution to the problem is found, it is necessary once again to make home owning profitable. The burden of municipal taxation on real estate is oppressive beyond all measure. That great back-bone of a stable society, the home-owning citizen, is disappearing from our midst in increasing numbers. What necessary and exclusive connection there is between the burden of education, relief and health, and home-owning is something which no one has as yet explained. On the contrary, all agree that the costs of these social services should not be assessed against real estate alone, but should be more fairly apportioned by distributing the burden over other forms of wealth. Other tax-gathering bodies besides the municipalities should bear a larger share of the burden, and it is hoped that the implementation of the provisions of the dominion-provincial relations report will soon remove some of the crushing burden under which real estate is now staggering.

It must be obvious to all hon, members that the value of any form of property can be taxed out of existence. The situation in connection with real estate in Toronto is simply that of a man who attempts to carry a hundred pound burden in one hand, whereas if he distributed it between both hands he would find the going much easier. The greatest stimulus to employment in Toronto would result from a relief from some of the burdens of taxation to which home-owning is now subject.

The second greatest need is for some active form of youth training and work. There are hundreds of young men and women between sixteen and twenty-five years of age in Rosedale riding who have never had a steady job in their lives. How long can a young man or young woman be expected to try day after day and meet with the never changing answer, "no help needed to-day." And the morrow and each succeeding day becomes "to-day" and still no work.

I wish I had the privilege of taking members of the government into some of the homes I have visited where families are putting up a brave fight against privation and frustration, foes which seem relentless and never-ending and about which surely more can be done. For what the government has done in the way of a youth training plan we are again appreciative. But in the treatment of the youth problem the government is only trifling or, at the best, experimenting. To appropriate after several years of trial the sum of $1,500,000 a year for three years is like asking for a loaf and being handed a stone. Compare it with the appropriation during the same year of some $12,000,000 to further the work on a railroad station on which some $18,000,000 has already been spent. I trust that this does not indicate the relative importance which this government attaches to national youth training as compared with a railroad station.

At another time I hope to say more on the subject of youth training, but at this time the one subject which is of vital concern to every member in this house is the war. As a humble member of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition there is, in offering criticism or suggestion to the government, no thought in my mind other than that of helping the war effort. The problem of unemployment and youth should, in the dire circumstances in which this country now finds itself, for the time being largely disappear. The crying need for the production of war supplies and equipment causes to arise now, or will cause to arise shortly, a new problem in connection with our people. The translation of our potential war strength into actual war strength is the task of this country. We are so far behind the enemy in this regard that we must redouble our effort if we are to preserve all that every Canadian holds sacred and worth

According to the estimates of the Foreign Policy Association of the United States, Germany spent even in 1938 a total of $4,400,000,000 upon armaments. We are spending some $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 this year while we are actually at war. Between 1935 and 1939 the total industrial production in Germany gained 50 per cent. We must work night and day if we are to save ourselves. Let any thought of winning the war on a budget be forgotten. We must submit to taxation unheard of before. The great majority of the population-and I except only those whose standard is already too low-must be willing to experience a lower standard of living for the sake of keeping our country free from foreign domination. We may be thankful that in some commodities we already produce far more than we require.

Industry is already finding a scarcity of skilled workers. As time goes on—we can only pray that the time will be allowed to us—there will be an increasing shortage of semi-skilled and unskilled labour. In Great Britain, despite the thirty odd years in which their labour exchanges have been gathering records, a census of labour in war industries has been ordered. The present haphazard search for skilled workers by individual firms on war work reveals the need for machinery to find and place the men and women needed. We are virtually without records in Canada.

I know of no way in which we can approach the problem intelligently except through national registration. To wait for a census would be much too long. Furthermore, a census, both by law and by function, is a statistical device and not suitable for the present purpose. In the first place national registration would afford a check on those likely to be suspected of subversive activities. For the present I am more concerned with the second object of national registration, namely, that of finding out where and what degree of skill is available to our industries in putting forth their utmost war effort. We must find out who and where are our fully trained industrial workers, who are semi-skilled, who have had some factory experience and who can usefully be brought into factories from the outside. In Great Britain there is what is called a list of reserved occupations, the workers in which are held to be of more use in war production than in serving with the forces. Already there have been many instances of highly skilled toolmakers and machinists enlisting who might better serve their country minding their lathes if only their country would tell them so. Already there has been a certain amount of "stealing" of skilled workers from competitors in the shipbuilding industry by offering higher wages. While beneficial to the individual's pocketbook, frequent changing is detrimental to the war effort. The wastage due to misplacement of labour and intermittent unemployment is as crucial in war as it is lamentable in peace.

Plans should be immediately formulated to extend the application of the youth training plan, as well as adult training plans, so that our war effort will not find itself delayed in another month. The improvement and the greater complexity of machines to-day alter, to some extent, the position that even we found ourselves in, industrially, in the last Definite courses of instruction and learning periods cannot be dispensed with. In Germany, according to the London Economist, four weeks' training is given to all unskilled recruits to the metal trades, almost wholly in actual work and on machines being used in production. Their slogan is, "We must abolish the unskilled worker", and it should not be hard for Canadian industry to follow suit on an extensive scale. It needs only government leadership and assistance.

It is possible to provide deliberate shortperiod training for a great force of machine operators. It is one thing to turn out a semi-skilled craftsman and another to turn out a semi-skilled machine operator. The latter can be accomplished in a relatively short period.

In the United States, in connection with their national defence effort, they have formulated plans for training present workers for better jobs, pushing each grade up, filling in at the bottom with semi-skilled trained recruits. Industry is cooperating in this scheme. Part of their plan consists in the training of men over forty who have had skilled training but have been working in other occupations or have been on relief. The government is aiding in finding out where these men are, and the cooperation and aid of the labour associations are being enlisted.

The first thing in order to put forth our full war effort industrially and make of Canada, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated last September, the "arsenal of the empire", is training for our workers and multiplication of the lower grades of workers by intensive mass instruction, and to bring in a regiment of women and other workers from non-essential trades. The second thing in the planning of this much needed task is a proper distribution of the workers in the proper industries.

May I assure the hon. minister that he will be killing two birds with one stone if he will develop the plans for unemployment assistance and youth training by harnessing or coordinating them with the industrial war effort now going forward. By so doing he will not only help keep Canada for Canadians, but will at the same time make Canada a better place in which to live.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Chairman, I have already had an opportunity of speaking for a few moments to this resolution, but a little while ago I sent to several people in my constituency an appeal asking them if they would give me a comprehensive word picture of their own particular district so that I might give this house a clear indication of the need for federal aid in northern Saskatchewan. Among those to whom I wrote were one or two school teachers, because a school teacher is often able to give a comprehensive viewpoint of the whole school district, and in that way the whole of the district may be fairly judged. One or two of the school teachers have already sent in reports to me. I have one here from a teacher whom I have known for several years. He is a man whom I have every reason to believe would be very conservative in his estimates and for whom I have the greatest respect. I believe that he would give us the best picture he could of his own school district.

This is not an isolated instance, and I want to give it to the committee this evening because it is a picture of one school district in northern Saskatchewan which I believe some of the other members from northern Saskatchewan will be able to say is really one which might be found all over that northern district, particularly where we have people living on the reestablishment scheme. I will read it exactly as it came to me:

A Northern Saskatchewan School District The district.

The soil is poor, the land uneven. Most of the farms are very stony. This is the picture after the trees have been grubbed out and roots picked. The total assessment is less than $40,000 and it is very possible that $15,000 in cash would buy all the land together with the improvements which are not assessed. There are approximately 500 acres under cultivation in the whole district.

The school.

Built of logs, with walls smoothed with thick coating of mud. A gasoline drum for a stove. Several home-made desks. No desk work for the children; a library of half a dozen books, a blackboard of beaverboard painted over; a bell; a small hand globe completed the equip-

Log. Rough board floors. Insufficient dishes, cooking utensils and bed coverings.

They owe for the doors, the windows, the shingles, the purchased desks. They owe two previous teachers, and the present teacher, in eleven months, has received in cash at the rate of $17 per month. of $17 per month.

The parents.

Of the 22 parents in the 11 families of children attending school, 16 are reported as needing medical attention. Such statements as "Father is sick all the time but has to keep on working" or "Mother is often sick in bed and the rest of the time does not feel very well" were common. When they near death's doer they will be cont to be will have they door they will be sent to hospital, where they will either die or recover to some extent and be sent home, where they will find they are seriously behind with their work. One woman complained of headaches and was sent to have her eyes examined by the relief officer. The report was to the effect that she needed glasses. The government paid for the examination but the relief officer decided that they must pay the relief officer decided that they must pay their way to another eye specialist some one hundred miles away in order to make sure that glasses were needed. The woman has not gone, partly because these people are poor and also because there is no assurance that the report of the second examination will be acted She has suffered for nearly two years since the first examination.

The families

Seven of these families are under reestablishment, which means they do not own their land, live stock or meagre equipment. The seven families have altogether 19 horses, 4 colts, 34 cows, 32 other cattle including spring calves, 7 sows and a few young pigs and 191 poultry.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

The other four families are not under reestablishment. They have altogether 15 horses, 5 colts, 18 cows, 16 calves and young cattle, 3 sows and a few young pigs and 130 poultry.

These eleven families consist of 92 persons and this year they will have a total acreage, in and this year they will have a total acreage, in crop, of approximately 240 acres. A very large portion of this, probably about 50 per cent, will have to be reserved, if crops are average, for oats for horses and feed for milch cows, pigs and chickens. We have, therefore, 92 persons attempting to make their living from 125 to 150 acres, with grain prices what they are! All these families have been on relief although some have gone on as recently as last winter. Last winter relief averaged about $8 per family. For the month of May this amount was cut in two—

An hon. MEMBER: Is that per month?

Mrs. NIELSEN: That means they will get $4 per family per month. It goes on:

-and indications are that they may not get any more relief.

The children.

(a) Their health. Not being a medical man I can only give an estimate that very possibly all of the children need medical attention to some extent, and several look as though their future health will be sadly impaired unless they get this attention in the near future. When I took over the school, breakings out of the skin were so common that it seemed unfair to keep the children at home. The school has been in operation for six years. No government been in operation for six years. No government school nurse has ever called. The only medical care the children receive is when fear of immicare the children receive is when fear of imminent death makes an emergency case for hospital. Twenty per cent of the children are out of school and on the sick list to-day. One boy of seven years stayed out of school because he was kicked in the stomach by a calf. He does not want to eat and was even a bit delirious one night. We all think that it is "nothing" and expect he will be all right. If he gets much worse he will be one of those emergency cases. Another how out of school emergency cases. Another boy, out of school, accidently hurt his nose. His face started to swell. Pus condition developed. The boy became delirious and in very severe pain. The relief officer and the councillor could not or would not do anything. Finally the father in desperation sold his seed wheat and took the boy to hospital. The diagnosis was a broken nose. The child later developed pneumonia. These two cases are still living to-day.

(b) School lunches. Five families seem to have as a general rule a lunch of some plain and scanty variety. Six families have very poor lunches as the general rule. It is all a matter of degree. To-day three families—ten children—have plain bread and butter.

And of course, as hon, members know, some of these country children walk two or three miles to school and then home again.

Sometimes, especially in winter, it is bread and cheap jam. Occasionally it may be bread and lard or even dry bread and onions. The children of one family took some little pride in the fact that they had never had straight dry bread.

(c) Clothing. In this matter we must realize that all the children get either new or fairly good secondhand clothes. There is one family whose clothes are very poor and patched, but all seemed to take pride in the fact that they had a Sunday shirt at home. I have a girl, fifteen years old, at school to-day, wearing men's winter rubbers about two sizes too large; her sisters have patched running shoes. The boy, twelve years old, who is very intelligent, wears last winter's moccasin rubbers, with no socks, patched overall pants, with an honest but aged belt. . . All these children need clothing and better food at once. What it will be during the coming winter, I do not know. They need help on account of the small acreages, regardless of whether there are good prices or poor prices, regardless of whether they have good crops or poor crops.

That, I think, Mr. Chairman, is a just and very conservative summary of the situation in the majority of the school districts in northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. GOLDING: I would ask the hon. member to give us the name of the writer of that article. I believe that, under the rule, that has to be done.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I should be most pleased to do that, Mr. Chairman, but for one reason.

Mr. GOLDING: Oh, no.

Mrs. NIELSEN: In Saskatchewan, if a teacher does not always do as the school board in his district wishes him to do regarding certain matters, he risks the loss of his job. Discrimination in Saskatchewan school districts against school teachers who have to rely entirely on the local school boards for their jobs is a matter which should have some investigation. For that reason I feel that this teacher needs protection. I see no reason whatever for giving his name. I myself will accept responsibility for that statement; I think it is perfectly true.

The CHAIRMAN: What document is the hon. member reading from?

Mrs. NIELSEN: It is a private letter to me.

The CHAIRMAN: And the hon, member takes responsibility for it?

Mrs. NIELSEN: For the veracity of that statement, surely.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is in order.

Mrs. NIELSEN: On May 31 last, as recorded in Hansard, page 421, the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), when he was speaking about the bill which he intends to introduce, said this:

There is an amendment by the elimination of what was section 3 of the act of 1939. Broadly, that section provided that the dominion itself would undertake works and projects in connection with the relief of unemployment and the promotion of employment. It was felt that owing to the wide activity that is taking place as a result of the unfortunate circumstances in which we find ourselves to-day, it would be unnecessary for this government to take measures under that particular section. But if works become of vital necessity and it is apparent that they are so, they can still be initiated by means of an estimate which would require presentation to this house.

It seems to me that, after the amount of evidence which has been given in this chamber of the need for continuation of relief, particularly in northern Saskatchewan, I may justifiably ask the Minister of Labour to consider, not bringing in an amendment of the act as it stands, but rather allowing a definite sum to be set aside for a continuation of relief in northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon, member, but I know she appreciates the fact that that portion of the act respecting material aid to which the hon, member refers under the dominion-provincial agreement will be included and continued.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Thank you. These people who are living in that northern area and whose acreage to-day is not sufficient to give them a living, would be very willing to work. The building of roads and a railway through that northern area is greatly needed, but the province of Saskatchewan is unable to finance these schemes. Were the federal government to allow that province the money, the people of that northern area would be only too willing to work on the roads to supplement their scanty income and so improve this relief situation. These families are self-respecting people and, as has been stated many times, they despise and dislike the idea of having to go on relief. They would work through the summer months if only a work-and-wages programme were provided with the help of the federal government. If that could be done, it would have splendid results. But if this government will not or cannot see its way clear to help in such a project where work and wages can be given to these people, then, as the hon, member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) says, they must have more aspirin; in other words, they must have better relief, because they are suffering more than any decent, honest people in this country should be allowed to suffer in this day and age. They must have some consideration from this government. After all, the welfare of the people is the primary concern of this house. If we neglect them, we have no reason to pride ourselves upon being a representative body looking after the welfare of our people.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): I do not intend to discuss the resolution in its general aspects. I have, however, a concrete suggestion which I should like to lay before the committee and particularly to draw to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty).

We have noticed, in connection with the war contracts that, by the very nature of the economic set-up of Canada, the great majority are being let in the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Of course, if circumstances permit and wise management recommends, I should like those contracts to be carried out in all of the provinces, but I think we shall agree that, because of the situation in those two central provinces, the industries being well-established and the plants suitably equipped for the speedy carrying out of these war contracts, those provinces will reap most of the advantages, including increase of employment, resulting from our war effort.

The reverse is unfortunately true with regard to the outlying provinces, and particularly, perhaps, Saskatchewan, the one from which I come, because there is little industrial development in that province. All the people of Canada must properly bear their share of the cost of this war effort, and I am sure that, no matter where we come from, we shall agree in wishing to spread out the advantages, if such they can be called, which result from the huge expenditures of money by this federal authority. Not only will the western provinces not reap any monetary advantages from the spending of the money; but on the contrary it will be noticed that most of the estimates for agriculture, including the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and some of the other projects, are being cut down in the interests of economy, as suggested by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston).

If the government is not prepared to make a registration of the industrial workers of Canada, I think it would be fair and proper, through its own labour agencies and through the employment agencies scattered throughout the whole of Canada, for the government to find out all the information it can in regard to trained skilled workers or semi-skilled workers in the western provinces. As we all know, the western plains were settled by men of many trades and occupations, and agricultural conditions have been so bad in the western provinces that these men carrying on these trades have not been able to find employment. They would meet with considerable difficulty in getting from Saskatchewan to the central provinces in order to secure employment. I would suggest that the government, and particularly the Minister of Labour, consider opening up registration offices throughout Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan, to give those men who could be of use, who are skilled or semiskilled workers, an opportunity of registering and indicating their abilities and qualifications for employment. If their training recommended them, they could be brought to the central provinces and thus taken off the relief rolls and given a new chance in life besides an opportunity to serve their country.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) put on Hansard a comparison of the appropriations made to the different provinces under this legislation this year and last year? As I understood the minister the other evening, when the hon, member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was speaking, I gathered that the grant to the provinces had not been reduced. That is in direct contradiction to what is being told the people on the prairies. I am in receipt of letters almost daily, as I am sure most members from Saskatchewan are, stating that people in receipt of relief are being told by municipal councils and by relief officers, first of all, that their relief is being cut because the federal grants have been cut. In the month of May the relief grants were cut 20 to 33 per cent. In some districts no relief has been paid at all for June, and people on relief have been told that it cannot be issued until word comes from Regina; that reductions are being made by the federal government in the grant, and that until the exact nature and extent of the reductions are available the relief orders will be late.

There must be some mistake somewhere. If there is no reduction in the relief grants to the provinces, then the people in receipt of relief should be getting the same relief orders as they were getting before. But they are not. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether there has been a reduction in the relief grants and how the amount that will be voted under this bill when it comes down will compare with the amount voted last year under the same legislation.

Mr. McLARTY: The Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act expired on March 31, and until this house passes the new act it is impossible for us to make specific allocation as between the various provinces. In other words, in the machinery of the thing, the provinces themselves prepare their estimates of the amount which they will require by way of material aid under the act and those estimates are gone over by the Department of Labour with the various provinces. Consequently I could not place on Hansard the amount of the allocation for this year, nor shall I be able to do so until the act is passed. I might be able to give the hon. member some estimate, but that would be a matter which I should have to go into.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would press the question asked by the hon, member for Weyburn. I attended a meeting of the municipal council at Biggar about the end of April and the relief inspector was present.

Mr. McLARTY: The provincial inspector?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. They were told that owing to the reduction in the federal grant, fifty-three municipalities in the north and east of the province of Saskatchewan were to get no assistance for the month of May and the months following, and the reason given in my hearing was that the federal grant had been cut and the province had been compelled to make that reduction. That, incidentally, was the reason why I was invited to attend the meeting of the municipal council. I happened to be there and was invited to be present because the relief inspector was there, and I was asked to say what I knew about the reduction in the federal grant.

Mr. McLARTY: I am afraid I cannot assume responsibility for statements made by employees of provincial governments. I know of no basis on which such a statement can properly be founded, but I shall endeavour to obtain information and supply it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does the minister mean that there has been no reduction in the amount allocated to the province of Saskatchewan for relief in the past three or four months?

Mr. McLARTY: No. I said we can not make a specific allocation for Saskatchewan until this act is passed. At present no act is in force, the act having expired on March 31. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that I shall go into the matter and see if we have received estimates yet from the province of Saskatchewan to see whether any action has been taken, which I doubt, because I do not see how it could be taken.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Some money must have been voted, some grant in aid, since the end of the fiscal year, for April and May.

Mr. McLARTY: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The federal government must be giving some money.

Mr. McLARTY: As always happens, the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act, I am safe in saying, has not in the last four years been passed before the previous act has expired, and in the normal course the practice is to carry it on. I notified the provinces, anticipating that we would be reenacting this act, as we have to, that we proposed to distribute on the same basis, namely, 40-40-20 as was done in the previous year. I believe that no specific amount has been agreed on between the commissioner under the Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act and the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister give us the amount, or tell us whether it is the same as for January?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think I can answer any more definitely than I have. However, I shall be glad to see if any specific amount has been agreed on with Saskatchewan, although I think it has not. As far as I know there has been no reduction in the amount, because the matter has not been dealt with at all, on account of the non-existence of the act.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member could find all the data for the last fiscal year ended March 31 in the report of the commissioner of unemployment or relief, Mr. Hereford. It was tabled not long ago.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is not what I was asking.

Mr. POULIOT: There is a tabulation there; my friend can get some figures for the current year. The tabulation is complete; I saw it not long ago. It is at the back of the report.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not for April and May.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, my hon. friend knows about it.

I want, sir, to direct the attention of the minister to a very good report made by his department four years ago under instructions of the then minister. Two men from his department visited each one of 1,200 homes in the provincial county of Témiscouata. getting data on the spot from the relief recipients themselves and from people who could confirm what they said. Of course the only conclusion on this report was to continue relief to those settlers, on account of the fact that most of them were starving on their lots. A surprising fact is that there was an agreement signed between the federal government and the government of Quebec province in virtue of which it was decided that relief was not granted to settlers simply because they were poor, but was granted only to settlers who were unemployable and in whose family there was no one who could earn money. To illustrate, there is the head of one family quoted as an example-I could give the name to the minister-who is unable to work. He has a large family; he is sick, but he cannot receive any relief because he has a son of eighteen who is unemployed—he also is unable to work. On account of that neither the father nor the family can get any relief.

There were worse cases in previous years. At times I was corresponding with the provincial department of health. When a man was sick and had to undergo an operation, I brought the matter to the attention of the provincial department of health, asking if they would take charge of the cost of the operation, hospital expenses et cetera, and they answered, yes. But the man could not go because he had to work for his relief although he was sick. Although he had to go to the hospital to be operated on for appendicitis, rupture, anything, he could not take advantage of what was decided by the provincial department of health because both the federal Department of Labour and the provincial department of colonization were in a straitjacket; "that was the agreement," and the man, although he was sick, had to continue to work in order that his family should not starve. Those are very painful cases. If the minister gets in touch with the commissioner of relief of his department or the assistant commissioner, he will find that no member of this house has sent so much data to the Department of Labour as has the member for Témiscouata. I am in daily contact with these people and I want something done for them, something done in the name of humanity. I did not appeal in vain to the Minister of Labour when he was Postmaster General to redress some wrong; now I speak to him through the chair as man to man.

Sir, may I tell you what has been done in New York? In that city at the end of 1937 there were 210,000 unemployables on relief. Then the federal Surplus Commodities Corporation was established to supply food to the poor. They set up a marvelous system to look after the health of these people. After a year and a half the number of unemployables in that city had decreased by 55,000 just because the people were better fed and had some medical attention, and, thanks to the social and medical services, from unemployables they became employables.

It seems to me that those on relief should not be considered as units for whom a certain sum of money must be expended for their subsistence; they must be considered as human beings, as citizens of a great country and as members of our Canadian family. This must be done if only to improve their health. And it is not only for the old people that it should be done; it should be done for the children too. I have seen beautiful girls in the settlements, but girls who looked like the stem of the flower. They were underfed. I saw children who did not have milk but were fed on the juice of beans. That is not creditable. Of course they have some social services; thanks to the Rockefeller Institute there is in my constituency a health unit which looks after the settlers. But the colonization policy of the Quebec provincial government some years ago was all wrong; those people were put on rocks; just because no elevations were shown on the map they were put on the sides of mountains. There they are, and they need relief to enable them to live until they are transferred to better land. But I would ask the minister, with his sense of justice and his Christian charity, to discuss the matter from a human point of view with the other officials, and I am sure they will be only too glad to cooperate with him. At the present time what have we for the money spent on relief? Nothing. Nothing has been done.

Mr. JAQUES: Does the hon. member call life nothing?

Mr. POULIOT: But there should be something to make it pleasant, not just subsistence. I admit that relief is necessary, but that is not all. I would ask my friend to be silent and let me finish; he will have ample opportunity to speak afterwards. When he spoke to-day, I did not interrupt him.

Progess reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EUROPEAN WAR

TRIBUTE OF BRITISH GOVERNMENT TO VALOUR OF FRENCH ARMIES—MESSAGE TO PREMIER OF FRANCE PLEDGING CANADA'S UNWAVERING SUPPORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have read in the press of this morning the communication sent last night by Prime Minister Churchill to Premier Reynaud of France. No pledge of like import to mankind has, I believe, ever been made in the name of one people to another. Given as it is in our name as well as in the name of the other nations of the British Commonwealth, I should like to have this pledge at the earliest moment possible upon the permanent records of the Canadian parliament, with the assurance that its every word expresses the feelings, the convictions and the intentions of the Canadian people. This is the message:

In this solemn hour for the British and French nations and the cause of freedom and democracy to which they have vowed themselves, His Majesty's government desires to pay to the government of the French republic the tribute which is due to the heroic fortitude and constancy of the French armies in battle against enormous odds.

Their efforts are worthy of the most glorious traditions of France and have inflicted deep and long lasting injury upon the enemy.

Great Britain will continue to give the utmost aid in her power. We take this opportunity of proclaiming the indissoluble union of our two peoples and our two empires.

We cannot measure the various forms of tribulation which will fall upon our peoples in the near future. We are sure that the ordeal by fire will only fuse them together into one unconquerable whole.

We renew to the French republic our pledge and resolve to continue the struggle at all costs in France, in this island, upon the ocean and in the air, wherever it may lead us, using all our resources to the utmost limits and sharing together the burden of repairing the ravages of war.

We shall never turn from the conflict until France stands safe and erect in all her grandeur, until the wrong and the wronged and enslaved states and peoples have been liberated and until civilization is free from the nightmare of nazism.

That this day will dawn we are more sure than ever. It may dawn sooner than we now have the right to expect.

The prophetic vision of the complete fusion of the British and French peoples as the outcome of the ordeal of fire through which, at this time, both are passing, has already found eloquent expression in our Canadian House of Commons. At the outset of its proceedings, in the first speech made in this new parliament, the mover of the address, the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Lapointe), used the following words:

The union between the two countries has been not only material, but also intellectual and spiritual. What the outcome of this union will be after the war, it is hard to tell. Some observers have gone so far as to prophesy the union of France and England into one nation.

Whatever changes are being made, it seems certain that from the war will emerge a new relationship between France and England which will surely have its effects in future history, and which will serve as a symbol of bonne entente for the other nations of the world. If so, I feel that we Canadians should rejoice at such an outcome and feel a legitimate pride in that we have already realized such a union.

Hon, members will recall how warmly these sentiments were received in all parts of this house. Canada's determination to stand, to the very end, at the side of France, no less than at the side of Britain, has since the war commenced been voiced in the name of the Canadian people by his majesty's representative in Canada in speeches delivered from the throne in three successive sessions of parliament.

Many tributes to the heroic fortitude and constancy of the French arms have been paid in all parts of the United States as well as throughout Canada. Through her president, the United States has already pledged the material resources of that nation to the opponents of force.

If I know the heart of the American people as I believe I do, and as I am certain I know the heart of the Canadian people, I believe I can say to Premier Reynaud, in this hour of the agony of France, that the resources of the whole of the north American continent will be thrown into the struggle for liberty at the side of the European democracies ere this continent will see democracy itself trodden under the iron heel of nazism.

In this belief which I am sure is shared by all hon. members of both houses, after reading Mr. Churchill's communication to M. Reynaud, I sent to-day to the Premier of France the following message, which I would now like to renew in the name of parliament:

June 14, 1940.

Monsieur Paul Reynaud, President of the Council of the French Republic,

The Canadian people have heard with deep emotion your brave words as you have spoken from day to day. We have watched with the pride of kinsmen the gallant deeds of your unconquerable soldiers. Every word in the tribute paid yesterday in the message by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of the French republic eloquently expresses also the passion and faith in the hearts of our people. Canada pledges to France as she has to Britain her unwavering support to the utmost limit of her power and resources.

I have read your appeal to the United States. You may be sure that the peoples of North America see with clear eyes, the realistic needs of the hour. It is my faith that all the material and economic strength of this continent will be marshalled without delay to help the French republic in the great cause for which she fights. As never before, free men the world over are inspired by the sacrifice and the devotion of France.

W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PETITION FOR LEGISLATION ENLARGING PENSION AND MAKING THE PENSIONABLE AGE SIXTY-FIVE

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition to the house under standing order 68. It is in order and has the correct superscription-"To the honourable the House of Commons in parliament assembled." It then follows the usual formula-"The petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth;" the subject matter is set forth in paragraphs, and so on, and it concludes with the prayer and the formal words, "And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray."

I see by the rule that I must confine myself to a statement of the parties from whom it comes, to the number of signatures attached to the petition, to the material allegations contained in it and to the reading of the prayer of such petition. I shall therefore do so.

The parties from whom it comes are citizens of Canada from the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and a portion of Ontario. Their names and addresses are all given. I am told that the petition was got up in a very few weeks and of course it would be impossible to have so many signatures on one petition. Consequently I have a number of them here containing the same heading. I produce one as a sample. Apparently they had the idea that as many names as possible should be on one sheet. This one is forty-eight feet long and contains 1,112 signatures. The others are all much the

The number of signatures attached is said by those who are sponsoring the petition to be 57,409. I have not counted them myself, but if anyone wishes to check their accuracy I shall be glad to afford him the opportunity

The material allegations contained in the petition are briefly as follows:

That the cost of shelter for a single individual is at least $10 and that a further sum of $10 per month is inadequate to provide the necessities of living, including food, clothing, medical care, et cetera.

That thousands of persons in Canada over sixty-five years of age have no means of support and are unable to compete in the labour market.

That to maintain a very modest standard of living would cost $1 a day; this is shown by the experience of governments in the maintenance of patients and soldiers in institutions maintained by the state.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That the age of sixty-five is recognized in the dominion civil service, and also in several of the provinces, as being the age at which retirement is desirable.

That the age of sixty-five is the one adopted for old age pension eligibility in Australia, New Zealand, the United States and other countries having similar conditions to Canada, and that that age has been endorsed by the legislatures of British Columbia and Alberta and by many public bodies.

That the spirit of the Old Age Pensions Act is in some instances defeated by technical regulations which create unnecessary difficulties.

These are the main allegations in the petition.

The prayer is as follows-and in case it should be suggested by someone that the petition is out of order in calling for an expenditure of public money, I would point out that it is drawn up to comply with paragraph 714 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which says that the house would refuse to receive a petition asking directly for a grant of money but that the house does receive petitions which ask simply "for legislation or for such measures as the house may think expedient to take." I now read the prayer of the petition:

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable house may be pleased to enact such measures as the house may think expedient to take to improve conditions above described.

In addition to the signatures on the petition I have received a number of individual letters, numbering about 150, which I am not presenting because technically they are out of order, but they all endorse the petition and describe their own conditions in rather pitiful terms.

The parties who sponsor this petition are a responsible body in Vancouver. In their covering letter they express the hope that the house will give the petition sympathetic consideration, and I would add my own hope that when the financial resources of the country permit it, action will be taken accordingly.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

MR. SPEAKER DIRECTS ATTENTION TO STANDING ORDER 41 PROHIBITING THE READING OF SPEECHES

On the order for motions:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to draw the attention of all hon. members to a practice in debate which seems to be growing, and is contrary to the rules of the house. I refer to the reading of speeches.

Standing order No. 41 makes provision for decorum in debate. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 95, paragraph 293, which states:

Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not: . . .

(o) read from a written, previously prepared speech.

This rule was adopted in 1927, but as long ago as April 19, 1886, a resolution was adopted by the house which I should like to read. It was as follows:

That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official report of the debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of parliament.

I realize from my own experience how comforting it is that the written word should be before a speaker while he is speaking in the house, and especially when one is a new member. There are quite a number of new members in the house, and therefore some latitude has been given in the debates which have already taken place, but I thought it proper to call the attention of hon. members of the house to the practice, which has not been confined to one side of the house; in fact, I think it has been almost universal in its application. I believe that a reference to the rule in this formal and general manner will forestall any objections from the house or from the chair in future debates.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the rule will not be construed as applying to important statements made by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government. At a time like the present, every precaution is necessary with respect to utterances of international significance and concern. Statements on all such should I think be read rather than expressed extemporaneously. I believe that that is understood; in fact, in England, it is the practice for such statements to be read.

Mr. SPEAKER: Such has been the custom and it has been accepted by the house. As suggested to-day, statements from ministers have been read in this chamber, and the custom and practice of the house has been to permit the reading of such communications where government policy is involved. I think the general sense of the house will be that all such statements should be read, in order that governmental statements may be meticulously and correctly given to the house.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

INQUIRY AS TO IMMEDIATE CONSIDERATION BY THE GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In view of the noble words which he has addressed to the Prime Minister of France, and in order that these noble words may be followed up by deeds and action, will he say that the government will give immediate consideration to the question of a national registration in Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I were sure that to comply with the wish of my hon. friend would carry out what he has in mind, I would be the first to give him an answer in the affirmative. Until I have reached that view I am afraid I shall have to say that the matter he has referred to has been, is, and will continue to be under consideration.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABILITY OF AMENDMENT
DURING PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether we may expect legislation at the present session to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The matter is still under consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT AS TO THREATENED INVASION OF ONTARIO FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. GORDON ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to know from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether he has received authentic information from any reliable sources in regard to a threatened invasion of Ontario from the United States?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): No. Immediately after my attention was called by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to the statement made by the premier of Ontario the heads of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police communicated with the head of the provincial police of Ontario. As a matter of fact, I believe, Superintendent Kemp, who is in charge of the Ontario division of the force, got in touch with Commissioner Stringer of the Ontario police, who told him that he could not give him any answer without first consulting the premier of Ontario. That was two days ago, and to this very minute neither we nor the police have received any information. May I say also that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is in constant communication with the police authorities, both federal and state, of the United States. They are in constant communication with the law enforcement agencies in the state of Michigan and the state of New York, which are more directly concerned with our boundary in Ontario. Every precaution is being taken. Nothing unusual has happened, and the consensus of all those in authority is to the effect that there is great exaggeration in the statements which have been made.

INTERNMENT OF PRESIDENT OF COMPANY HOLDING WAR CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct an inquiry to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) of which I gave him some notice? In view of the fact that a company owned and controlled by a person who is in fact now detained as an enemy alien has a huge contract with the government for the manufacture of minesweepers, will the Minister of Munitions and Supply say (a) that the contract is to be continued; or (b) is to be cancelled; or (c) that the government will take over the plant and finish the contract? Or, (d) has the government the power in such a case to confiscate the plant as enemy alien property? Generally, what is the policy of the department and the government in such a situation?

Hon, C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the contract referred to is a contract by the Dufferin Shipbuilding company for the construction of four minesweepers. The reports of our inspectors indicate that the material is being delivered and that the work is proceeding on schedule. I have no knowledge at the moment of the interest of the president of the company, who has been detained with a view to internment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am informed that he is interned.

Mr. HOWE: Well, he is interned, I assume, subject to the usual appeal. Whether this can be treated as enemy alien property is a matter for the law officers of the crown to decide. But it is important to the department of munitions that the work on these four minesweepers shall proceed, and any steps which will be taken will protect the completion on schedule of the minesweepers. We are examining the situation with the law officers of the crown and will determine the policy in the light of the facts as we discover them.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I believe that the same concern, or one controlled by the gentleman to whom reference has been made, has contracts for the construction or finishing of airports in certain localities, some of them being in my own riding. Will the minister say whether the same statement would apply in this particular instance?

Mr. HOWE: The company is another company, I think. Certainly the president is the same person, and my remarks apply equally to other contracts.

INFORMATION GIVEN IN PRESS RELEASES WITH RESPECT TO CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In the press releases that are sent to hon. members every so often, giving information as to contracts, we are given the number, the name of the company and the price, but could there be another column to show the article ordered?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I shall be glad to take that up with the publicity branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply and ask that that be done.

AMENDMENT TO CLARIFY AND EXTEND POWERS OF MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Department of Munitions and Supply Act to clarify the powers of the minister and in some respects extend his powers of acquisition, by purchase or otherwise, of munitions and supplies, and to empower him to construct and carry out defence projects, engage services, et cetera.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister make a statement now?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Munitions and Supply Act was passed at the session of parliament held in the week between September 6 and 13, 1939. The act was actually proclaimed on April 9, 1940. In the meantime the work which is now carried on by the department was carried on by the war supply board. The regulations of the war supply board were somewhat similar to the original Department of Munitions and Supply Act. As the work of the department developed, certain wider authority than given by the act was given to the war supply board. Also certain changes in practice developed through experience, which were not the practices set out in the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. When the act was proclaimed it was of course necessary to continue all the undertakings of the war supply board and to continue the procedure very much as it had been carried on by the war supply board.

The purpose of these amendments is, first, to bring the Department of Munitions and Supply Act into conformity with the amendments to the act which were made by order in council under the War Measures Act to enable the department to function and to take over from the war supply board without interrupting the procedure. A second purpose is further to enlarge the powers of the department under the act and to revise the procedure, primarily for the purpose of permitting a considerable degree of decentralization of the work carried on by the department. It has been found utterly impossible to assemble in Ottawa a sufficient staff to handle all the multiplicity of undertakings that the department has in hand at the present time. The act provides that certain government owned and controlled companies shall be established and headed by business men chosen by the government who will be able to carry on certain operations as companies rather than as part of a departmental staff.

That I think covers the general purpose of the amendments to the act. It is exceedingly difficult to discuss any of them in detail until the bill itself is distributed, but of course I shall be glad to answer, as far as I can, any questions that may occur to hon. members in the meantime.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The act, as the minister stated, which was passed on September 12, 1939, created a new ministry, the Department of Munitions and Supply. It was proclaimed on April 9 last under The Prime Minister (Mr. P.C. 1435. Mackenzie King), in moving the second reading of the bill in September, explained that his purpose was to create a department which would have power to mobilize and control to the fullest extent Canadian industry for war purposes. He said that the bill was modelled on the department which the British government set up under Mr. Lloyd George during the great war. It was further explained that it was not the intention of the government to set up the department immediately, which is borne out by the fact that the act was not proclaimed until April 9 last, the work being carried on meanwhile by the old war supply board.

On April 9, 1940, when the act was proclaimed, substantial additions to the powers and provisions of the act were made by order in council under the War Measures Act, chapter 206 of the revised statutes of Canada. The scope and authority of the powers of the department were very considerably extended. I am assuming of course that that was absolutely necessary by reason of the increase of business arising out of the war. I do not know whether these orders in council have been laid on the table. I refer particularly to P.C. 1437 and P.C. 1438, which I have obtained from the proper authority; also P.C. 2189, which was previously laid on the table, passed on May 24 last, and which provided for the setting up of these government-owned corporations, if I apprehend it correctly, and the authorization of guarantees, et cetera, to a maximum not exceeding $2,000,000 to be given by the Minister of Finance. I do not wish to refer to that item, because I think I understand why that was done and why it is desirable that undue publicity should not be given to the underlying reasons; I shall respect the confidence that was reposed in me on that occasion and not go further into that aspect of the matter.

If I understand the minister's explanation of the resolution, the first object to be attained by the proposed bill is to regularize the orders in council and make them part of the statute which has already been passed. That, I think, is good practice, and there is no objection to it. But with respect to the second and third objects, when we come to the committee stage of the bill I will ask the minister to be good enough to tell us in some detail-not necessarily full detail-what he has in mind with respect to decentralization of operations. I can quite understand that in a country as far-flung as Canada, geographical considerations being what they are, decentralization may be good business. As a lawyer connected with commercial operations all my life I can quite appreciate that.

I do not know how far the minister can take us into his confidence with respect to these government-owned companies. course he will admit that in peace time that policy would be considered a very great departure. I give the minister credit as a business man for understanding that this particular power which he is investing in others as trustees on behalf of the government could be exercised only in time of war, and under conditions designed to protect the public treasury. Doubtless that is one of the vital things which the minister has in mind. I invite him now to be good enough, when we come to the committee stage of the bill, to give us as much information as it is in the public interest to give on these points. I am not going to press him beyond that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it the minister's intention to proceed with the bill now?

Mr. HOWE: The bill is ready for distribution. It depends on whether hon members would prefer to have time to study it first. My intention to-day was to move first reading and let the bill be distributed, and then continue on another day.

Mr. COLDWELL: We welcome the suggestion made by the minister that we be given an opportunity to look over the bill before much debate takes place. The minister spoke of setting up government corporations, as it were. Will they be in the same relationship to this parliament as, for example, the Canadian National Railways? I have it in mind that we are not able to obtain information from subsidiary corporations of the type of the national railways or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Will the corporations set up be of that type, or will they be more directly under this parliament so that we may get more information about their activities than we are now able to get about the national railway system?

Mr. HOWE: I think the extent to which parliament can be given information about these companies depends on the purpose of the company. Take, for example, a company whose duty it is to protect the production of war supplies against a shortage of raw materials that come from countries which may from time to time be cut off as a source of supply. To some extent it would defeat the purpose of the company to give an account of its transactions while they are current, because some of this material is perishable and must not only be bought but sold. There is another company whose purpose would be defeated if full details of its work were given in the house. On the other hand we have a third company which is coordinating the management of governmental enterprises. Several enterprises separate in themselves, with separate management and necessarily separate operation, must be coordinated in order to produce the finished article. Concerning that I shall be delighted to give the fullest possible information to the house at any time. It is a business transaction, carried out by a company simply as a matter of convenience, making possible the assembling of a separate group of men and the providing of office space outside of the capital, where office space is almost impossible to obtain. I think my hon. friend will see the position. I feel that anything we do as a department of munitions and supply should be made public to the fullest possible extent consistent with the public interest, and so far as these companies are concerned that is the view I will take.

Mr. COLDWELL: In explanation I might say that I have never held the view that corporations of this type should be directed by this House of Commons. I do not think that is feasible. But there is a danger of some of these public corporations getting too far away from the control of the house. On occasions we have asked, for example, for information as to the salaries paid by the Canadian National Railway system, and have been told that these things are "matters of internal management." We have to try to strike a middle course. I do not take the view that parliament could run industry; I do not think it could. If the time comes, and I believe it will come and ought to come, probably during this war, when the government will have to take over the control of essential industries, we shall have to work out some method, probably that adopted in Great Britain, under which we can establish publicly-owned corporations free from political interference by parliament. I raised the question in order that when the discussion comes up the minister may be in a position to give some information.

Mr. HOWE: The reason we do not give information about matters of internal management of the Canadian National Railways is that the railway is in a highly competitive position, and to present information on matters of internal management just as it is asked in the house might be harmful to the competitive position and therefore against the public interest. These companies to which this bill will relate are of course not competitive, and I know no present reason why any question such as my hon. friend suggested could not be answered. Taking, for instance, the matter of salaries, I think there would be no difficulty.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain the situation with regard to the construction of merchant shipping in Canada at the present time? I believe there is great lack of available shipping space. I know we have had that difficulty in British Columbia in connection with our exports of lumber, and I presume the same situation exists in other parts of the country. The present would seem to be a good time for Canada to inaugurate a steel ship building programme. We shall probably have great difficulty in getting ships from Great Britain. I understand the shipyards there are all working to the limit. Then again if there should be such a thing as the bombing of these British shipyards, that would make it practically impossible for us to get ships from the old country.

I would ask the minister if it would not be possible for Canada now to enter upon a programme for the construction of ships up to, let us say, 10,000 tons. We built a great many ships during the last war; and while it might cost a little more to build them in Canada than to buy them in Great Britain I suggest that under existing conditions the only way to obtain sufficient shipping to handle our exports may be by building the ships ourselves. As we all know, Canada lives on her exports. If we do not export we will have a very bad time of it.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that, as the war has developed, the shipping situation, instead of growing more acute, has eased off. There was a time, at the beginning of the war, when there was a great shortage of shipping to carry Canadian products to their markets. That shortage has steadily become less acute, until to-day I doubt if it can be claimed that there is any shortage of shipping for that purpose. The reason, of course, is that neutral fleets have been diverted more and more to the trade between Canada and Great Britain. Canada is becoming more and more the principal supplier of Great Britain, and consequently British ships and the ships of neutral countries are being directed more and more to that service.

So far as the lumber business is concerned, direct shipments by water from the west coast present some difficulties. There is a shortage of shipping there, war or no war; but there again I am told that the situation has eased greatly, and that by rail shipment to the Atlantic coast and water shipment from there, together with direct shipment by water from the west coast, that situation is being taken care of quite comfortably.

Whether at a time like this we should divert the productive capacity of Canada to the peace-time operation of building merchant ships is, I think, questionable. I would not undertake to say that shipyards could not be created to build merchant ships with reasonable dispatch, but certainly those yards would have to compete with the established yards, now fully occupied with the construction of ships of war, for skilled mechanics and for such materials as are manufactured in this country. The additional demand on our steel industry would be entirely beyond the capacity of that industry to produce, and the imports of raw materials would constitute an extraordinary strain upon our supply of United States exchange. My own opinion would be that a programme of the kind suggested by my hon. friend is quite impracticable at this time.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister certain that the shipyards of Canada are fully occupied at the present time with the construction of vessels of war? My information, from very good sources, is that they are not; that at least some of the yards even now have the capacity for the construction of merchant ships in addition to such warships as they may be constructing. The minister said we might have to create such yards. I did not mean that; I had in mind that the present shipyards could be used. The minister said also that building ships was a peace-time operation. I hope he is right in that, but things are happening very rapidly these days, and the construction of merchant ships may be a very important war-time operation for Canada before many weeks have gone by. I would suggest to the minister that this question of shipbuilding should not be just put on the shelf but that it should be looked into further. It is possible that we may need those ships very badly in a very short time.

Mr. HOWE: Just to clear up one point, it is my understanding that the shipyards of Canada are fully occupied with Canada's naval programme, having regard to the fact that in certain yards some capacity must be reserved to take care of repairs. Repair work on both coasts, and particularly on the Atlantic, is extremely heavy, due to the great increase in merchant shipping. But I can say that we have contracts for ships that have not been placed at the moment. We should be glad to place contracts for a few more naval vessels, and if my hon. friend can promise me prompt delivery and a reasonable price, I shall be very glad to consider the matter.

Mr. GREEN: I did not promise any prompt delivery, but different members from British Columbia have received a brief on these matters, in which it is stated there is space available for the construction of merchant ships. I would ask the minister to look into the situation and see if that is the case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said, as I believe to be the case, that the shipping situation has eased up, and he mentioned the fact that neutral fleets had been absorbed into the Canadian traffic. Is there not another reason, that we have lost a substantial portion of our markets and that therefore bottoms are not in as much demand as they were? Is it not a fact that traffic has become very much restricted; and is that not an additional reason why the shipping situation has eased up? That is my understanding of the case.

Mr. HOWE: I think that is true in part, though I believe the supplies and munitions going overseas put as much of a tax on shipping from Canada as has been the case in the past. I think our port figures show that we are exporting from Canada at this time as much as we have exported at any time in the last several years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am wondering if the government is using the port of Saint John to the extent that it might be used, or if it was used to that extent last winter. Perhaps I am treading upon sectional ground; that is not exactly my home port, but it is an important Atlantic port. Last winter I saw trainloads of freight, supplies for overseas, being transported to Saint John, through Saint John and out of Saint John on to Halifax for transhipment, and I just wondered why that was being done. No one has asked me to say this; I am doing it on my own initiative. I have no desire to open old sores down there, but in the last war the facilities of the port of Saint John were utilized to the full, and in days gone by I had something to do with seeing that the port was properly equipped. I am glad to see the minister has carried forward the plans we instituted in that connection, but I regret that he did not rebuild the Petingill wharf, as I understood the former member for that city promised would be done. I assume that there may have been excellent reasons why that was not carried out. I know we did not do it in 1935 because we just could not find the money, but that is an important plan. Those two wharves on the east side ought to be rebuilt. At the present time the sheds are old wooden structures, quite inadequate to handle the traffic. At my suggestion a modern scheme was drawn up under which two or three splendid docks were to be built, established and operated on the east side of the harbour, with a view to having a twelve-month shipping period at that port if possible. I was wondering if the minister would have anything to say with respect to these matters. If he prefers not to say anything now, I shall not press it.

Mr. HOWE: The routing of shipping is under the control of the British shipping controller. No one in Canada has anything to say as to what port a ship will use. I have always thought that the representative of the British shipping controller in Canada is rather friendly to the port of Saint John, and I am inclined to think he will see that Saint John is not dealt with unfairly in that regard. It is the duty of the railroad to transport goods to the port to which they are billed. Saint John has had an excellent year, according to the figures, perhaps the best in its history.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury: Since the last war.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HOWE: That may be so. We had planned to provide for the rebuilding of McLeod-Petingill wharf in the work of the current year, but two reasons made us drop the plan. The first and compelling reason was that no public works money was available in any part of Canada. The second was that even though we had the money, it would not have been wise to undertake work which would mean that the capacity of the wharf would be out of service for a considerable time. In order to rebuild the dock it is necessary that at least half of it be out of service. While this dock may not be modern in all respects, it is quite serviceable and it is doubtful if we would be justified in curtailing its capacity at a time when so many demands are being made upon the port.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the government brought to the attention of the British shipping board the fact that facilities are available at Churchill? A number of people in northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan have directed my attention to the fact that large supplies of pulpwood, timber and various mineral products are available in this part of the country and could be shipped economically through the port of Churchill.

Mr. HOWE: The British shipping board is no doubt aware of the facilities at Churchill and its position as an export port. The difficulty is that all shipping must be brought into one port so that a convoy may be made up. So far that port has been Halifax. The distance from Churchill to Halifax, as I remember it, is slightly greater than the distance from Churchill to Liverpool. To bring a boat from Churchill to Halifax and then send it across would just about double the length of the voyage. I simply mention this as one reason why the British shipping board may not decide to use Churchill this year, although we have had nothing as yet to indicate what action they will take. There are supplies of wheat at that port and whether or not the board sends for them is something that we can hardly control.

Mr. GREEN: A few moments ago I mentioned having had information about available space on the Pacific coast for building these ships. I now have copies of three letters which deal with this matter. The first is from the Burrard Dry Dock Company, Limited, of North Vancouver, and is addressed to Mr. Hugh Dalton, of the British Columbia division, Canadian Manufacturers' association. This is a substantial shipbuilding firm which is actually engaged at the moment in the construction of war vessels for the government. This letter reads in part:

In reply to your recent inquiry as to the facilities available at our plant in North Vancouver for the construction of cargo tonnage, we have to advise you that we have available on our own property room for two new building berths, immediately adjacent to our existing yard, each with a capacity for ships up to 10,000 tons. These berths, already cleared and graded to receive foundation piling, could be completely equipped and ready for occupancy within six weeks, which would be before steel deliveries could be expected.

Having in the past constructed vessels up to 8,350 tons deadweight, any ordinary sized vessel could be built. Detailed drawings of the following sizes of ships, equipped with steam reciprocating machinery, are available:

1. 400' x 56' x 31'—8,350 tons deadweight. 2. 331' x 46' 6" x 25' 6"—5,100 tons deadweight. 3. 320' x 44' x 25'—4,300 tons deadweight.

The smaller vessels could probably be turned out more quickly than the largest, but the capacity of the latter would make this vessel a very desirable type.

A considerable part of the material for these vessels would have to be procured in the United Kingdom or the United States. The imported material would include plates and shapes, also possibly crankshaft and line shaft forgings. Boiler plates would have to be imported from the United States. Steam engines for these vessels could be built in our own plant. If diesel driven vessels were required, engines could be readily procured in the United States.

Delivery of the larger vessels could be made in the following periods after receipt of orders:

1st ship—15 months. 2nd ship—17 months. 3rd ship—21 months. 4th ship—23 months.

The smaller vessels could be turned out in from a month to six weeks less time each.

They then go on to give the price and so on. I have also a copy of a letter addressed by the Victoria Machinery Depot Company, Limited, of Victoria, to Mr. Dalton. This is another reliable shipbuilding firm, and their letter dated May 20, 1940, reads in part:

Confirming our conversation regarding building of 8,000 to 9,000 ton merchant vessels, we would like to make our position clear on this matter as follows:

We have available at this time the site on which we built 8,800-ton vessels for the Canadian government merchant marine in 1919-20. There are two berths and launching ways which are still in good condition. We have the plant and equipment capable of building these vessels and have no doubt about obtaining sufficient skilled labour to carry through the construction of two such vessels at once.

We would not like to state just at this moment that we are prepared to take contracts for such construction, but are prepared to entertain such a proposition and would give it our serious consideration.

The next is a letter from North Van Ship Repairs, Limited, North Vancouver, under date of May 21, 1940, addressed to Mr. Dalton. It reads:

In answer to your inquiry re steel merchant marine vessels, we are fully equipped to handle merchant vessels, and would be very pleased to figure on them.

There are at least three firms which are prepared to go ahead.

Mr. HOWE: As I said, I am quite aware that new capacity can be created. All these people have are sites.

Mr. GREEN: They have the machinery and so on. The minister should not say that. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. HOWE: That is what the letters say.

Mr. GREEN: They go a great deal further than that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the set-up of these companies to be? Will there be a president, directors and all that sort of thing? Could the minister give us some idea of how they will be formed? What relationship will there be between these companies and the dominion civil service?

Mr. HOWE: These will be companies incorporated with presidents and boards of directors. There will be no relationship between the companies and the civil service. The companies will be free to employ such help as they need. So far as that goes, I do not think they will require large staffs.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will the board of directors be made up of government officials?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What representation will the government have?

Mr. HOWE: The government is simply the body that owns the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Without divulging any information that might be inimical to the safety of the state, which is the highest ground upon which I can place it, could the minister state just why it is intended to have these commercial companies? If he will say frankly that he does not want to state this at this time, I shall not press the question. But it is such an unusual departure from the ordinary method of doing government business and spending government money that perhaps some little justification is necessary.

Mr. HOWE: In one or two particular cases there is a reason which I think my hon. friend will appreciate from what I have already said. There are operations which cannot be conducted in the white light of publicity if they are to be conducted successfully.

But in the larger sense it is simply a question of a way to get work done, of bringing into the service of the government people who are capable of doing highly specialized work but without making them in a sense civil servants. We can find business men who have demonstrated over the years that they are well able to operate a company successfully but who are perhaps not in a position to give up their ordinary business and move their place of residence to Ottawa and work here. They perhaps could not—I doubt if they could—carry on the functions I have in mind under a departmental set-up, working through a deputy minister and a minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not like the red tape. That is about it.

Mr. HOWE: It makes things unworkable if there is too much of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: There is only a certain amount of business which you can put through that sort of channel. This will allow us to decentralize and to do work outside which can very well be handled by a company. It will enable us to put certain work into the hands of responsible business men who, after all, are always subject to the owners of the company and to government audit. We can get work done in that way which it would be difficult to get done as well by other means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One more question. Will these government-owned corporations come into competition with privately-conducted business institutions? If they will, I suggest to the minister that he should with-hold his hand, because even in war-time I do not think the government ought to set up-competition to established private industry.

Mr. HOWE: There is no suggestion of that so far as any corporation contemplated to date is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not think so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it not a fact that these special companies have been set up for the purpose of assisting private industry?

Mr. HOWE: Quite so; that is the purpose.

Mr. STIRLING: This resolution asks parliament to extend the powers of what was at first a board, now a department, which has been in operation only for a matter of weeks. Last year we passed from the ordinary departmental purchase of munitions to a defence purchasing board, then to a munitions board; and in September parliament passed this act, but the department came into operation only in April. It deals with large matters, and the public of necessity is ignorant as to how it is working out. We are gradually obtaining information. A great deal of business is passing through the department, and undoubtedly there must of necessity be criticism, based in part on lack of information. That information we shall receive if we are able to consider and discuss the bill amending the act which incorporates the department; in the light of that information we can give the bill more intelligent discussion.

There are matters such as the rapidity with which contracts are issued. The minister may be able to give the house a very good reason for the time which it now takes to get a contract finally through. There are also matters connected with getting information to firms or individuals who desire to do business with the department. Canada is a large country and of necessity difficulties must be involved in getting information into the hands of individuals at the far ends of Canada that such and such materials are required. The suggestion has been made in my hearing more than once that it might be possible to follow the custom used in the last war in another country, of issuing from time to time the definite items which will be required in contracts shortly to be let. By spreading that information throughout the country the opportunity would be given to comparatively small firms and individuals to offer their services. These are matters which it seems to me we can discuss far more intelligently if the main explanation and discussion of this measure comes on the second reading, after we have had an opportunity of seeing the bill.

Mr. HOWE: It is not my intention to go beyond the resolution and first reading to-day. On the second reading of the bill I shall be glad to have the officers here to help me give the fullest information.

Mr. HOMUTH: When will the bill be considered? Will it be on Monday, or Tuesday?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not before Tuesday.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, there are a few remarks I should like to make on the resolution. I understand that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is charged with the responsibility of letting contracts necessary to our war effort. While we believe that the minister is carrying out his duties as head of that department to the best of his ability and in the best interests of the country, there are times when we are sceptical whether he is receiving the cooperation necessary to a proper war effort from people who are benefiting and making profits from these contracts.

In view of the fact that the resolution concerns possible amendments to the act to clarify and extend the powers of the minister, I wish to take this opportunity to draw to the attention of parliament and the government the aspirations of labour in connection with the matter now before the committee. Again and again in this house members of the group with which I am associated have called upon the government to conduct our war effort in such a way as, first, to protect the interests of the common people of this country, and, second, to preserve and strengthen democracy at home at the same time that we are fighting for its preservation on the battlefields of Europe.

As I pointed out in my first speech to this house, two fundamental bulwarks of democracy are trade union organization and the cooperative movement. To-day I am concerned with the first. I believe I express the hopes of all organized labour, whether national or international, A.F. of L. or C.I.O., when I appeal to the government to introduce into the act a provision which will safeguard labour's right to organize.

Discrimination against workers on the ground of trade union activity is wrong at all times and in all industries. This government recognized that fact when it accepted and adopted an amendment to the criminal code which was first introduced in this house in 1936 by the national leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Such discrimination it seems to me is even more inexcusable in war time when government war contracts are being awarded.

I make this appeal not only on the basis of general principles but on the basis also of confidential information which has come to my notice as to discrimination against employees in plants producing war materials for the government. One such particular case I wish to draw in some detail to the attention of the government, because it will illustrate the point I am trying to make. This case concerns an employee of the John Inglis company of Toronto, by the name of Walter Camm.

We understand that the Bren gun contracts of the John Inglis company form the major portion of the firm's business and are largely controlled by the Canadian government from the department of defence. Certain labour organizations in the summer of 1939 were informed that the application form for employment in the John Inglis company was so worded as to indicate that the company was opposed to organized labour.

Photostatic copies of this application form were secured and when the question dealing with union affiliation was pointed out to representatives of the federal Department of Labour in the city of Toronto and an inquiry made as to why this clause should appear in an application form, the departmental representatives took the matter up with the management of the John Inglis company. The answer given through the department to the labour organization was that this clause had been put in the application form in order to guard against "subversive elements".

I wish to stop for a moment at this point to protest and warn against the application of the term "subversive elements" to legitimate trade union activities. Spokesmen for my group have already stated clearly that we recognize the need for dealing with those who would interfere to the benefit of our enemy with this country's war effort at the present time. But if the democracy we are fighting for is to retain any reality the organization of trade unions must remain and be recognized as a legitimate and legally protected activity of the workers.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order. The Speaker of the house called attention to-day to a rule which should be followed in debate, that an hon. member should not read his speech. I am informed that the hon. member is reading his speech.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to make this clear. I am attempting to place before the committee a matter of considerable importance to the Minister of Munitions and Supply which has been drawn to my attention within the last few days. I do not want to overstate the case. I want to be absolutely sure of the details I am giving to the committee and, particularly, to the minister. For that purpose I have taken notes on the matter; I wish to be sure that I am stating the facts clearly and not taking chances on my memory.

This specific case proves conclusively that the company is practising discrimination against organized labour. I stressed in the first attempt I made to address this house that one of the most essential considerations so far as the government and the country as a whole are concerned is the recognition of the rights of labour. You can mobilize industry as effectively as you like, but if the people employed in that industry for the purposes of production are not treated as citizens of this country should be and are unable to exercise the rights of that democracy we say we are fighting for, the result will be greatly to retard Canada's war effort. I repeat that my only object is to bring forward [Mr. Gillis.]

this particular matter without misstating the facts. It was drawn to my attention by responsible trades union authorities in Ontario, and I want to be sure that the details are given to hon. members as they were given to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I make a remark to my hon. friend? He is doing very well without reading. I suggest that he might use his notes for purposes of reference, without actually reading them.

Mr. GILLIS: I was attempting to state the circumstances of this specific case of discrimination. It is one which I think should be closely checked. In the present situation, when a contract is awarded to a firm or an organization of any kind, we recognize the seriousness of the crisis and we admit that equipment is at this time the most necessary part of our war effort. These contracts are awarded in order to secure that necessary equipment, and when incidents arise such as the specific case which I have attempted to set out, it is evident that we are not receiving the cooperation of the people who are obtaining, on the basis of profits, the benefit of these contracts.

The term "subversive elements" can be seriously abused and, in my opinion, is being abused in Ontario at the present time. Members of the legitimate trades union movement are so classified because they attempt to set up organizations under the laws of the country. Employers of labour who are neither patriotic nor interested in this country, other than to exploit it, use the term "subversive elements" with the object of keeping labour beaten down to a point where they can exploit them and make two hundred per cent profit on the operation of a contract which the government gives them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon, gentleman suggest that there are any employers in this country who are making two hundred per cent profit by exploiting labour? If there are, I should like to know who they are, and this parliament, I believe, without regard to class or party or anything else, will get right after them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Has the leader of the opposition read the John Inglis contract?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I know something about it. I do not think it amounts to two hundred per cent. It is bad enough.

Mr. GILLIS: I say that if the democracy we are fighting for is to retain any reality, the organization of trades unions must remain and be recognized as a legitimate and legally protected activity of the workers. Those who would interfere with such legitimate trades union organization are the elements which are creating disharmony and resentment at a time when harmony is needed.

Subsequent to the incident of the application form a number of requests for union organization were received by union officials. Substantial progress had been made, when an employee of the company who had taken a prominent part in negotiations at the request of his fellow employees was dismissed by the management. When the employee inquired as to the cause of dismissal he was told that he was unsatisfactory.

Further inquiry as to whether his work was satisfactory or whether the dismissal was for other reasons was answered by the company official with the same statement, "You are not satisfactory to the company." Subsequent to the dismissal the matter was drawn to the attention of the Department of Labour, who made inquiries on behalf of the discharged employee, and they were informed that the man's work was satisfactory, that he had not been dismissed for union activities, but engaged, as the company were, in the production of munitions, it was necessary that they should have confidence in all their employees.

What was their reason for not having confidence in this man? It would seem that the mere fact that this man took a prominent part in the attempt to organize the employees of the company was sufficient for the management of the company to lose confidence in him.

I should like to make it clear that to-day this man is under a cloud. He has a wife and family. The company let him out because they "have not confidence" in him. The conception the average man would get is that this employee is one of the "subversive elements", that he is a fifth columnist. At the same time, according to my information, the company refuses to divulge to the Department of Labour why he was dismissed. He cannot obtain employment, and he is roaming around Ontario under a cloud. It seems to me that the least that this company should do is to divulge to the appropriate department of the government why he was dismissed. If he is a fifth columnist and dangerous to this country in the present situation he should not be at large. If, on the other hand, there is nothing against him except the exercise of his right as a citizen to bargain collectively in accordance with the laws of this country, he should be reemployed. And in this particular case I do not view Major Hahn or the John Inglis company as the employer. because the government subsidizes this operation and paid for all the equipment, as I understand it, which makes the operation possible. For that reason I consider the government is in the position of employer, and Mr. Hahn or the John Inglis company is merely an agent of the government in this connection. I regard it as a prerogative of the government to do justice in this matter; particularly is it the affair of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, as he is charged with the responsibility of seeing that we are supplied with the equipment which this company is turning out.

Further representations to the Department of Labour were made. Department officials agreed that the answers given to their inquiries by Major Hahn were not satisfactory and that further inquiries would be made. Considerable correspondence took place on this matter and the case was dragged out for a period of more than two months. In the meantime the employee in question was unemployed and suffered greatly as a result of his discharge. The Minister of Labour in replying to a final inquiry stated that so far as the government was concerned they had no inquisitorial power and therefore could not inquire further. In view of the seriousness of the action of the John Inglis company in this matter, as it has been represented to me, I believe that either the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of Labour should give this house a full explanation of this case.

As I stated earlier in my remarks, I cited this case to illustrate the need for a provision in the act which will place the minister under an obligation to guarantee the workers the right to organize in plants producing war equipment for the government and which will also give him the power to enforce such a guarantee. It is my opinion that the case which I have just brought to the attention of this committee is a scandal. As we all know, public money was poured into the setting up of the plant of the John Inglis company as well as the production of the Bren gun. If the original terms of the contract are being carried out the company is receiving a very fair profit indeed on this contract. In such circumstances it seems to me clear that it was the duty of this government, of the Department of Munitions and Supply and of the Department of Labour to ensure that the workers employed by that company are given the full right to organize in trade unions of their choice if they so desire. Such a general obligation and power should be included in the act now under consideration.

Several times since the outbreak of war all the bodies of organized labour in Canada have publicly offered their full cooperation to the government in its war effort. I know they intend to implement that promise in practice. But organized labour has the right to expect in return that its rights will be safeguarded and that the employers of labour will cooperate, at least to the same extent.

I understand the Minister of Munitions and Supply, through this resolution, is asking for a clarification and extension of his powers, and I think the case cited here to-day is an absolute and specific instance. I am satisfied that his powers should be extended and clarified and that he should have the right, when contracts are placed, to see that the workers in the industry concerned are able to exercise their rights as far as trade unionism is concerned, and he should be given the power to see that this provision is enforced.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon, friend speak for organized labour as a whole when he says that he would like to see the Minister of Munitions given jurisdiction over labour?

Mr. GILLIS: I did not say that. Speaking for myself, I said that in my opinion his powers should be extended and clarified, and if he is permitted by the government to pass upon and to award contracts in certain operations in the country he should also be allowed to extend his power so as to see that workers' rights are protected in the particular operation, to the extent of carrying out the laws of the country in regard to collective bargaining. And he should be given the authority to see that the operators comply with the regulations in this regard. He should have the right to enforce his authority to see that the rights of workers are recognized in the matter of bargaining collectively and signing collective agreements in any particular operation.

Mr. HOWE: I have heard other labour leaders express very different views in the matter. The consensus is that everything having to do with labour should be retained in the Department of Labour.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister has not met the point made by the hon. member. The hon. gentleman is not suggesting that the Minister of Munitions and Supply should take over the powers now vested in the Department of Labour. The government could work out the technical details, but the minister should have the power in letting contracts to deal with the particular question now under consideration. There are certain minimum wage clauses at present in contracts; certain rights are recognized. Those rights can be extended. The government can also insert in the contract the provision that the men employed shall have the right to organize in the union of their choice and that the men in any particular trade should be allowed to bargain collectively with the employer, and those who get the benefit of the contract should not be allowed to use the exigency of the war as an excuse for preventing their employees from bargaining collectively or from organizing a union in a particular shop or an industry. There is no reason why the Department of Labour could not insert such a provision in these contracts. I understand that the department has already put in a clause with reference to minimum wages. Why not insert one with reference to collective bargaining on the part of men employed in industry?

Mr. HOWE: The federal statutes already give labour that right, and labour is aware of it. It is made a criminal offence for an employer to interfere.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the amendment to the criminal code is weak in some particulars. Here you have a concrete case—and we know of others-where men who are active in trying to organize their fellow workers are dismissed ostensibly because they are not satisfactory to the company; and yet every one knows it is because the company refuses to have labour organized in the plant. We are anxious to see to it that the relationship that has been brought about in Great Britain, and which I heard the Right Hon. Ernest Bevin discussing from London over the short-wave radio last night, should be brought about here. During the war we should not be subjected to various labour disputes and strikes, and if we are to avoid that kind of thing, then companies like the John Inglis company, if they are doing this sort of thing, as I presume they are, ought to be disciplined by the government, particularly when they are handling government contracts. Unless employers of this type are brought to time we shall be faced with labour disputes which will seriously interfere with our war effort. The hon, member for Cape Breton South has brought this question to the attention of the house because he is anxious, as we all are, that these disputes shall not arise. If Major Hahn's policy is carried out, however, there will be labour disputes and internal difficulties and we do not wish to see such occurrences.

Mr. WARREN: While the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking I was wondering if he had ever met the type of workman who talks himself out of any job he has ever got. Most of us know that type of man. I do not know anything about the particular person the hon. member has been talking about, but I do know individuals who, although good enough workers, can never get a job with a private company or corporation without invariably talking themselves out of it just because they begin to make trouble among the other workers. There is no private employer of labour who will willingly tolerate that sort of thing if his men generally speaking are satisfactory, are doing their work willingly, are getting along well, and are happy and satisfied. When such a condition exists, then one man comes along and immediately starts to agitate and to make trouble, and it is no wonder that such a man eventually finds himself unable to get work with private employers of labour in his own neighbourhood. He is the type of fellow the government sometimes find clamouring for work on government jobs of one sort or another. He is the type of fellow that eventually finds himself wandering from place to place under a cloud, seeking employment and not finding it. In many instances the blame lies not at all with the employer of labour but with the individual himself. Who can blame employers of labour when they find their whole operation disorganized because some individual will persist in agitating and causing trouble, no matter where he may land a job?

Mr. MULOCK: Since the question of the Bren gun has come up this afternoon, I wish to refer to one matter the public is interested in more than anything else. I do so because when I was in Toronto last week-end responsible people mentioned to me that rumours were current throughout the city that there was some difficulty which was retarding production of the weapon. Instead of devoting our time to disputes of that sort, which surely could be ironed out by the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), at a time like this we ought to be getting down to business in order to expedite the delivery of supplies not only for the use of the dominion's troops but for our allies who have appealed to us, in the words of President Reynaud which we heard this afternoon. If the statements made to the effect that the Bren gun is not being turned out properly, that it is not operating efficiently, are not correct, those responsible for them should be interned and prosecuted, because they are undermining the morale not only of the Canadian people but of the Canadian soldiers who are going to use that weapon to fight for us. Will the minister make a statement as to the correctness or otherwise of the rumours which have been abroad during the last few gun or anything in connection with it. Whatever debate there was on that subject, it is over. We are trying to get on with the business of the country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Surely in this debate we will not discuss again the question of the Bren

Mr. MULOCK: It is a question of rumours that are going around along that line, and I think the hon. member will agree that if those rumours are not correct, the sooner the people know the fact the better.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have not heard those rumours this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no desire to intervene in this debate or to discuss the question from the angle brought forward by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock). He is twenty-four hours late. We were discussing yesterday the resolution of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) with regard to the defence of Canada regulations. The hon. member stayed at home too long over the week-end.

Mr. MULOCK: I was in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not see the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has raised an important principle. We are living now in the nineteen-forties. I think the hon, gentleman to my right who spoke a moment ago is still living in the nineteenth century. This country has recognized, as I think all sensible employers of labour have come to recognize, the principle of corporate or collective bargaining among the labouring men of the country. I have a confession to make. Years ago I opposed the organization of the employees of corporations with which I have been associated, first in a legal capacity and subsequently as a director, and I am bound to say that after a careful review of the whole situation, and without having any thought or idea of its importance to or bearing on my political fortunes, I have reversed my position. I am in favour of the theory of collective bargaining and have urged my clients and the corporations with which I have been associated to agree to the principle. I realize, in reading history, that the labouring men have never got anywhere in the endeavour to improve their position in Canada, and particularly in the old country, until they had some kind of organization to speak for them. Labour organizations are like other organizations; there are good ones and bad ones. In the United States they have gone too far. Labour over there has endeavoured to take governments by the throat, to dictate the election of presidents, and also to dictate national policies. That is beyond their purview.

But to come to the concrete question which the hon, member for Cape Breton South has raised, here is a company which was set up to build a war machine for this government and the British government and for nobody else, and it is public money that is going into itnobody else's money so far as I know. A proper relationship should be established since it is public money that is being spent. The government of Canada has recognized this principle for a long time. We passed legislation establishing the eight-hour day in dominion public works. I tried to help get through other legislation with respect to social services which would be of assistance in ameliorating social conditions among the workers of Canada, but that legislation was ruled ultra vires by the courts of the country. So far as unemployment insurance is concerned, Canada is at least five years too late in making a start. I do not say that such a scheme will cure unemployment, but it will certainly alleviate the conditions of unemployment. The opposition was challenged by hon. gentlenen across the way.

That is an old story now; but to come back to this very point which the hon. member for Cape Breton South has raised, if I apprenend what the complaint was, it was in effect that Major Hahn of the John Inglis company was carrying on a system of sabotage against organized labour in that industry, which has its being to-day by virtue of the expenditure of public money. I do not agree with that, and I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) to look into the matter in the interests of the country and-for the most part among the best citizens we have in Canada—the genuine trade unionists. There are others, but the genuine trade unionists in my town are among the best citizens we have there. I am for the principle of collective bargaining; I do not care who knows it. If I am unable to carry this party with me in it, well and good; but that is my view and I think the government ought to see to it that Major Hahn and the John Inglis company do not carry on a system of sabotage against their employees on the theory that they will drive unionism out of that institution. The complaint may not be well founded. The minister should not be asked to go very farcertainly not as far as some hon. gentlemen to my left are asking-in incorporating provisions in contracts already executed and under way, but he should look into the matter and see to it that this company at least is carrying out the laws of the land both federal and provincial.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. GILLIS: An hon. member asked me whether I had ever met the sort of man who talked himself out of a job and who would not work. I can answer in two ways. You will generally find the men who will not work, at the head of corporations. The second classification covers the man who talks himself out of a job. Yes, I have met such men too, the men who pioneered the way for trade unionism, many of them classified as agitators and driven from one end of the country to the other, the sort of men referred to this afternoon as those who talked themselves out of jobs. To men of that kind go the credit for every bit of progress in this and every other country in the world. I have talked myself out of several jobs, too, organizing the trade union movement, but to-day I see it established one hundred per cent in the province in which I lost those jobs. So I lost nothing in the end. I am proud of that activity, as every man who has taken that position is proud. These men understand the road they are travelling and are prepared for whatever repercussions there may be.

The man whose case I took up this afternoon-and I took it up on the authority of a person in whom I have all the confidence in the world-is not that kind of man at all. I understand he is a master mechanic, one of the best qualified men in Canada to carry on the work of the plant from which he was dismissed. All he did was ask that the laws of this country be recognized by those carrying on the operation of that plant. It has been stated in this house that men with these qualifications, specialists in industry and so on, are very badly needed, that there is a great shortage of them in Canada to-day. That has been admitted by the ministers of different departments. Here is a fully qualified man who is now on the road simply because he wants to exercise his rights as a citizen in this year of grace 1940.

I think the day is past when actions of this kind should be permitted in this country. I have every hope that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will do something about this matter now that it has been brought to his attention. In my opinion the Department of Labour has gone as far as it can go by way of legislation. I understand that it has had this matter under consideration for a couple of months, but apparently it is not able to do very much about it. So I wanted to bring the matter sharply to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, because he deals with these people directly in connection with their contracts, and, I believe, will be in a better position to force them to take some action.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon, gentleman (Mr. Gillis) who has just spoken has certainly not talked himself out of a job; apparently he has talked himself into a very nice job as a member of this house.

Mr. GILLIS: That is my reward for past activities.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not doubt that the hon. member deserves it. Although I am a manufacturer and an employer of labour, I am also in favour of unions. My plant is organized, and I have always encouraged my employees to organize. I ask only one thing: that those who are sincere in trying to promote the best interests of the men take an active interest in that organization. So I have no quarrel with my hon. friend. I am quite in agreement with him when he says he would like to see all our plants unionized.

I cannot agree, however, with the man who will deliberately state in this house that the manufacturers of Canada are looking for any 200 per cent profit at this time. Last week I attended the meetings of the Canadian Manufacturers' association in Winnipeg, and I venture to say there is not a plant in Canada of which this government could not take control to-morrow without giving any remuneration whatever. This morning I had the pleasure of offering, on behalf of some of the men of my province, their services, their money and their factories without asking one dollar in return. They are willing to take their money out of their pockets or out of their banks-what is left of it-and all they ask is the capital return. When my hon, friend says that the manufacturers are looking for a profit of 200 per cent, I say that is an indictment of our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) if he brings in a budget that does not make provision for the odd man who wants to graft on the country at this time. It is not a question of whether the Minister of Finance should take twenty per cent, thirty per cent, forty per cent or fifty per cent of the excess profits; he should take every dollar of them. No honest Canadian citizen should come out of this war one dollar better off than he was when it started.

I would say to my hon. friend, however, or to anyone else who rises and asks for his rights in Canada to-day, whether he be an employer or an employee: Will he get his rights if Hitler comes over here and takes charge? If that should happen, he will do exactly what he is told. If I were in the saddle to-day in this country, both labour and industry would do exactly what they were told, until the war was over.

Mr. GREEN: Are the government taking any responsibility for the training of skilled workmen for our war industries? One hears from time to time that there is, or is apt to be, a shortage of skilled labour. It would be interesting to know whether the government have anything in mind along the line of helping to train men for this special work.

Mr. HOWE: There has been a long debate in this house on the resolution brought in by the Minister of Labour which I thought pretty well dealt with that question. I may tell my hon. friend, however, that there are various training plans. I hardly think it comes under this resolution to deal with those plans in detail, but there are a good many of them, all having the same end in view.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister mean under the government, or private training plans?

Mr. HOWE: There is assistance given to private plans, and there are provincial plans assisted by federal grants.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Grants in aid from this government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.
