A Little Too Previous. Some of our contemporaries have already made up their minds that Sir John's hav ing accepted the honor of G. C. B. means that he is about to betray the interests of Canada to the English free traders. The Telegram is sure that when next he goes to Washington to make a new fishery treaty it will be England he will represent, rather than Canada; and the News says that he will of course feel compelled let Canada's national policy "slide" in order to please his English friends. It will be time enough to find fault with Sir John on this score when the charges indicated are sustained by some thing like proof. What he has done so far tells exactly the other way. About five years ago he met with perhaps the most influential deputation of English manufacturers that ever addressed any Canadian statesman. Their business was te protest against the Canadian tariff of patient. 1870 as hostile to their interests, and to ask that it be modified. In reply he went stra ght to the point, and told them in very plain English that this tariff of ours was framed to suit Canadian interests, and not those of any other country whatever-not even of the mother country herself. Such was Sir John's position in 1879, and it is most unlikely that in this important matter he has changed his views. Is is true enough that Canada's national trade policy, and her national railway policy, too, have aroused bitter hostility on the part of some very influential people

Artemus Ward was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations in order to save his country; and our kin beyond the seajare equally willing to sacrifice almost any Canadian interest in order to make their peace with our republican neighbors. This being Star dryly argues on their tendency on their part was especially behalf that some of the students are past to the students are past to the students are past to the Northwest recently, in company with Hon. They had committed the capital blunder of showing their sympathies to be in favor of the south and against the north, and they were eager to do penance in almost any form to atone for it. Had there been a boundary question pending then, half the dominion might have been given away by orders from London, in order to make up for the Alabama blun der. As things were in 1871, Sir John had simply to obey imperial orders, or do worse, Is any such pressure likely to be tried now? Candidly speaking, we think not. The year 1885 will find Canada standing a good deal firmer "on her pins" than she stood in 1871. In these fourteen years several things have happened. Of late Sir John has fought without flinching the battle for Canada's commercial independence and for Canada's national railway policy too. And it is entirely toe previous to charge now that he is about to betray us into the hands of the Philistines, in either London or Washington.

The Proper Future of the Telephone. The telephone ought to be an adjunct to the postoffice. It cannot supersede it, but much that is now done through the postal service will be done through the telephone. When we shall have a thoroughly efficient telephonic system connecting various towns; when, if not by a through wire, at all events by stages, as it were, we shall be able to converse audibly from, say Quebec to British Columbia, we can naturally expect that a large majority of the communications new transported postally will be conveyed telephonically.

So enormous and so intricate a system however, it will be impossible to carry on undertaking would a variety of conflicting interests be more injurious to the public

There is left one remedy, and that the best possible, viz : that the government should undertake the construction and carrying on of a thoroughly efficient system of telephony. It could be done profitably. The telephone is becoming daily of more general use, and the absence of private monopoly or antagonistic interests would Holy day. still more conduce to increasing its lucrativeness. Without doubt a government add an appreciable sum to the public reve-

The great contest through which the country has just passed established that there must be revenue reform. The present revenue exceed the wants of the government by eighty-five millions yearly. The question is, What is the position of the democratic party upon the subject of taxation ? I know of no standard of taxation except that taxes shall not exceed the needs of the government economically aiministered. He held the Chicago platform to mean that taxation shall only be for public purposes and only to the extent of the needs of the government. It shall be organized so as not to hurt labor not to harm capital. It shall press heavily en articles of luxury and lightest en articles of necessity.

There was a curious contradiction in him; he struck you as serious, and yet he could not be said to take things seriously. This is what made Kate Theory feel so sure that he had lost the object of his affections; and she said to herself that it must have been under circumstances of peculiar. transmitted to them by the man of business who looked after their little property in America, and the kindly functionary, taking advantage of the pretext (Capt. Capt. Benyon was not a cynic in any sense in which he might have shocked an innocent mind; he kept his cynicism to himself, and he was a very Theorys (singular name, wa'n't it) suffered—he was sure—from a lack of society; also that one of them was very sick, that they were real pleasant and extraordinarily refined, and that the sight of a compatriot, literally draped, as it were, in the national banner, would clever, courteous, attentive gentleman. The last time he called before the arabout Benyon's ship, which they could see from their windows in the distance at its anchorage. They were the only American ladies at Naples—the only rival of the expected brother he found Miss Theory alone, and sitting up, for a wonder, at her window. Kate had driven into Naples to give orders at the residents, at least, and the captain wouldn't be doing the polite thing unless he went to pay them his respects. Benyon felt afresh how little it hotel for the reception of the travelers, who required accommodations more spacious than the villa at Posilippo (where the two sisters had the best was in his line to call upon strange women; he was not in the habit of hunting up female acquaintance or of looking out for the soft emotions ooms) could offer them; and the sick girl had taken advantage of her absence and of the pretext offered by a day of lelicious warmth to transfer herself, for which the sex only can inspire. He had his reason for this abstention, and he seldom relaxed it; but the consul ap pealed to him on rather strong grounds the first time in six months, to an arm chair. She was practicing, as she said, pealed to him on rather strong grounds, and he suffered himself to be persuaded. He was far from regretting, during the first weeks at least, an act which was distinctly inconsistent with his great rule for the long carriage journey to the north, where, in a quiet corner they knew of, on the Lago Maggiore, her summer was to be spent. Raymond Benyon remarked to her that she had that of never exposing himself to the Benyon remarked to her that she had evidently turned the corner and was going to get well, and this gave her a chance to say various things that were on her mind. She had various things on her mind, poor Mildred Theory, so caged and restless, and yet so resigned and patient as she was; with a clear, quick spirit, in the most perfect health, ever reaching forward, to the end of its chance of seriously caring for an unmarried woman. He had been obliged to there, exhilarated by the success of her effort to get up, and by her comfortable opportunity, she took her friendly visitor into the confidence of most of her anxieties. She told him, very promptly and positively, that she was not going to get well at all, that she had probably not more than ten months yet to live, and that he would oblige her very much by not forcing her to waste any more of the ruminating old Consul; it made Captain Benyon forgive him his hat, his the not more than ten months yet to live, and that he would oblige her very much by not forcing her to waste any more breach to contradict him on that point.

Of course she couldn't talk much; therefore, she wished to say to him only things that he would not hear from any one else. Such, for instance, was her present secret—Kate's and hers—the secret of their fearing so much that they shouldn't Boston, but for the secret of like Percival's wife, who was some some source and branch—no pain whatever, and no inconvenience in using it. On either side the acquaintance had helped the time to pass, and the hours he spent at the little pension at Posilippo left a sweet-and by no means innutritive—taste behind. As the weeks went by his exception that the path of retreat was always open to him. Moreover, if he should fall in love with the younger girl there would be no great harm, for Kate Theory like Percival's wife, who was not from Boston, but from New York. Naturally, that by itself would be nothing, but from what they had heard of her set— this subject had been explored by their was in love with her sister, and it would matter very little to her whether he advanced or retreated. She was very attractive, or rather, she was very atcorrespondents—they were rather nervous, nervous to the point of not being in tracting. Small, pale, attentive, without rigidity, full of pretty curves and quick movements, she looked as if the the least reassured by the fact that the young lady would bring Percival a fortune. The fortune was a matter of habit of watching and serving had taken course, for that was just what they had heard about Agnes' circle—that the complete possession of her, and was literally a little sister of charity. Her thick black hair was pushed behind her ears, as if to help her to listen, and her clear brown eyes had the smile of a person too full of tact to carry a dull face heard about Agnes' circle—that the stamp of money was on all their thoughts and doings. They were very rich, and very new, and very splashing, and evidently had very little in common with the two Miss Theorys, who, moreover, if the truth must be told (and this was a great secret), did not care much for the letters their sister-in-law had hitherto addressed them. She had been at a French boarding-school in New York, and yet (this was the groatest secret of all) she wrote to them that she had performed a part of the journey through France in a diligence! Of course, they would see the next day; Miss Mildred was sure she would know in a moment whether Agnes would like them. She could never have told him all this if her rejector had been there and Cant. Benyon She spoke in an encouraging voice, and had soothing and unselfish habits. She was very pretty—producing a cheerful effect of contrasted black and white—and dressed herself daintily, so that Mildred might have something agreeable to look at. Benyon very soon perceived that there was a fund of good service in her. Her sister had it all now; but poor Miss Theory was fading fast, and then what would become of this precious little force? The answer to such could never have told him all this if her a question that seemed most to the point sister had been there, and Capt. Benyon must promise never to tell Kate how she had chattered. Kate thought always was that it was none of his business. He was not sick—at least not physically must promise never to tell Kate how she had chattered. Kate thought always that they must hide everything, and that even if Agnes should be a dreadful disappointment they must never let any one guess it. And yet Kate was just the one who would suffer in the coming years after she herself had gone. Their brother had heen everything to them. —and he was not looking out for a nurse. Such a companion might be a luxury, but was not, as yet, a necessity. The welcome of the two ladies, at first, had been simple, and he scarcely knew what to call it but sweet; a bright, gentle friendliness remained the tone of their greeting. They evidently liked him to rother had been everything to them but now it would all be different. Of come—they liked to see his big trans-atlantic ship hover about those gleam-ing coasts of exile. She didn't, in point of fact; he had none of the trouble of wondering why this poor, sick, worried ady was trying to push her sister down his throat. Their peculiar situation made everything natural, and the tone she took with him now seemed only what their pleasant relations for the last three months led up to. Moreover, he had an excellent reason for not being bored; the fact—namely: that, after all, with regard to her sister, Miss Mildred appeared to him to be keeping back more than she uttered. She didn't tell him the great thing—she had nothing to say as to what that charming girl thought of Raymond Benyou. The effect of their interview, indeed, was to make him shrink from knowing, and he felt that the right thing for him would be to get back into his boat, which was waiting at the garden steps, before Kate Theory should return from Naples. It came over him, as he sat there, that he was far too interested in knowing what this young lady thought of him. She might think what she pleased; it could make

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency of disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.
