Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have heard the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and I will give it due consideration. has stated that tenants are inserted on the assessment roll In the meantime I object altogether to the value of the freehold being an indication of what the tenant's right to vote should be. I am strongly of the opinion that if a tenant pays a rental he has such an interest in the country as entitles him to a vote, no matter what may be the value of the freehold if put in the market. The rental is, as a general rule, an indication of the value of the freehold to some extent. However, I will consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. FLEMING. If rental is to be the basis, the owner of a property may be disfranchised, while the tenant of property of similar value has a vote. I know of cases in my own town where the owner of a house worth $150 would not have a vote, while a tenant living on adjoining property and living in a similar house would have a vote, because he pays $2 a month rent. There is no reason why the same property qualification should not be necessary for the tenant as for the occupant or owner, and that is a basis which everybody could understand.

Mr. McMULLEN. I again draw the attention of the First Minister to a case which I cited in my own section, where the owner of a property worth $150 would be cut out of his vote, while the tenant paying $2 a month would have the right to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These gentlemen are getting very aristocratic. They are now favoring the bloated aristocrat, the landlord, while, for the last three weeks they were trying to take another line altogether. This provision is to give the poor man, the man who has a local habitation and a name, the man who pays this rental, the right to vote, and whether his landlord has sufficient to give him a vote or not, has nothing to do with the matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not a fair way of putting it. This is a proposition to refuse a vote to the poor man who by honest industry has accumulated $200 worth of real estate, while you give the vote to another poor man who has not accumulated property by his industry, but who only pays $2 a month rental.

Mr. BOWELL. With regard to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Wellington, while the property may be assessed for $150, it may be worth, as we know is often the case, double that amount. The rental would be primate facie evidence that it would be worth more, and, although it might be put on the roll for $150, it might be worth $200 or $300. The question is, would the owner who rents it at $2 a month take $150 for it, if it was put on the market.

Mr. McMULLEN. In this case the owner has sold it for $150, and the tenant has the privilege of renting it for $2 or paying that amount.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not think the view presented by the Minister of Customs affects the principle at all. We are talking about the franchise, and, no matter what the property may be valued at, if it is not valued at enough to give the owner a vote he has not a vote, but the tenant has a vote, even if the property is worth more.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman seems to misunderstand the point raised by the hon, member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He spoke about the assessed value of the property, and I say the assessed value does not indicate the real value.

Mr. SCRIVER. But the assessed value gives or withholds the franchise.

Mr. BOWELL. Not under this Bill. If you can show the revising officer that it is worth $150 in a county, you can insist on the vote.

Mr. SCRIVER. Not so far as the lists are concerned, which are the basis of the roll.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think there is any soundness or relevancy in the principle laid down by the First Minister.

He says, what have we to do with the relation between the landlord and tenant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nothing in the world.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask what has the rent paid by a tenant to do with his qualification to vote. If we are anxious to establish a fraudulent system, one which will enable a landlord by connivance with his tenant to multiply votes, to create faggot votes, this system is one just calculated to promote that object, but if our object is to ascertain whether a man is in such circumstances as to warrant him in voting, surely the value of the property is the safest test. Is the interest of the tenant who pays $2 a month rent for a property actually valued at $150 greater than the interest of the man who is the proprietor? It is absurd to speak of bloated aristocrats in connection with the owners of such properties. The hon gentleman proposes to give the vote to a man who pays $2 a month rent, who may never have paid that rent, who may not be called upon to pay it, and who may be given a receipt, because it is known what his political proclivities are, and he produces that receipt as prima facie evidence. Well, Sir, you have some protection against fraud when you say that the property shall be on the assessment roll at $200 or $300, and if the revising officer thinks that is an unfair valuation he can value it higher or lower. Supposing the occupant were to come and say, my property is worth more; though it is only assessed for $300 it is worth $30 a year to me. Why will you not take his value as to the use and profit he derives from the property which he occupies and does not own, and make that the basis of the right to the franchise in the case of the occupant as well as in the case of the tenant? But you do not apply it to the occupant. You say to the occupant, we will not look at the value of the use of the property but the value of the property itself. I say the same test should be applied in the case of the tenant as the occupant, as they stand in exactly the same relation if the occupant has paid nothing for the property.

Mr. AUGER. The hon, gentleman has based some of the clauses of this Bill on the Ontario law, and I ask him now to take a lesson from the Quebec law. There a man who pays rent is qualified to vote only if the owner of the property has a right to vote.

Mr. FISHER. It seems to me perfectly absurd that a tenant occupying property should have a vote when the owner of that property cannot have a vote upon it. Certainly the owner has a greater stake in the country than a tenant can possibly have, who is there only temporarily, perhaps a year and no more. The principle of the Bill seems to me contrary to equity and justice, certainly it is entirely contrary to the spirit of the franchise which has always existed in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if there is very much property in his part of the country worth only $200 that will rent for more than $20 a year. In my part of the country there is none.

Mr. FISHER. There is a great deal of that kind of property in my constituency.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is a poor country, then.

Mr. FISHER. Those hon. members from the Province of Ontario may think so, but there are other Provinces in this Dominion besides the Province of Ontario, and other interests to be considered besides those of Ontario. I am glad to see that the hon. First Minister assented to that view, and I am sorry the same spirit does not actuate the Tory members from Ontario. I know many instances of tenement houses, occupied by five or six tenants, paying $2 a month each, although the whole property would not be valued at more than $300 or $400.

Mr. McCALLUM. Are they Chinese?

Mr. FISHER. I believe they are laboring men living in a respectable manner, and are quite as good as the laboring men of Ontario. It happens on some occasions that men who are occupants, would, if occupancy were not to be considered, call themselves tenants and get the vote, whereas if if they called themselves occupants they would not be able to vote; and we know perfectly that a private arrangement between the owner and the tenant is frequently made by which a man gets a vote when he is really not entitled to it.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon, gentleman seems to be always ready to point out where a fraud might be committed. When he speaks of a tenement house which is occupied by a half a dozen tenants, does he mean to say that it is occupied by half a dozen men?

Mr. FISHER. Half a dozen people pay rent.

Mr. McCALLUM. How can the owner be disqualified if he receives $2 a month rent from five or six people? The thing is ridiculous in itself.

Mr. AUGER. That there are such cases in the Province of Quebec is shown by the fact that the Legislature has found it necessary to put in that proviso, and it was put there by a Conservative Government. We have poor men in the Province of Quebec, and there may be poor men also in the Province of Ontario. We do not legislate here for rich men only, but for all classes. I am sure I could also find such cases as the hon, member for Brome has mentioned in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It must be evident that hon, gentlemen opposite, who are so anxious to have an extension of the franchise, are now attempting to restrict it; but any one who is used to the renting of houses knows that very few, if any landlords, will be precluded under this clause from voting. If the argument of these hon, gentlemen means anything it means that they do not wish tenants to have a vote under the terms of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS. The observations of the hon, gentlemen are wholly unwarranted by anything that has been said on this side of the House. The proposition on this side of the House is intended to prevent fraud. We do not propose that a tenant in one part of a Province should have an opportunity of voting on a qualification that would be no qualification elsewhere. If you take the value of the property as the basis, you have a uniform principle which applies to all parties alike. A man might say to his dozen or half dozen tenants, I will let you have this property at $2 a month with the understanding that you will only pay $1, so that you may have a vote. How is this to be prevented, unless there is a scrutiny by way of appeal? Any number of frauds may be committed under this provision, and it is to prevent stuffed voters' lists as well as stuffed ballot boxes that it is objected to on this side of the House.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I understood that the right hon. First Minister proposes to postpone this clause, and I have therefore no disposition to detain the Committee. But the proposition of the hon, member for Brome was this: He gave the case of a tenement house occupied by five or six tenants, workingmen, in the Province of Quebec, who he says are as respectable as those in Ontario-which is quite true, as happily the respectability of workingmen does not depend on the Province they reside in; and he says that the effect of this clause will be to give each tenant that pays $2 a month a vote, whereas the whole property is not worth enough to give more than one man a vote. What does that mean? It means that those five tenants are to be deprived of their votes, although they are respectable workingmen, and yet the hon, gentleman says he does not want a restricted franchise. If his preposition was adopted the effect would be this: This property would not be of sufficient value, divided among the tenants, say five tenants, to give to each Mr. FISHER.

a vote, therefore the whole five tenants should be excluded. That is the position taken by hon gentlemen, and it is entirely inconsistent with the course they have advocated.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon, gentleman were sincere in his desire to extend the suffrage, he had an opportunity of evincing his sincerity where the motion for manhood suffrage was before the House, but he declined to avail himself of that opportunity. His desire is therefore not to extend the franchise but to limit it. The proposition of my hon friend from Brome (Mr. Fisher) is made with the object of preventing fraud. As he has shown in the sixth sub-section, you have adopted the value of property, as the basis upon which an occupant has the right to vote. Why adopt it in the occupant's case, and not in the other? If a workman occupies a property valued under $150, or an agreement to purchase it, paying in instalments with interest at 8 per cent., he is left out of the franchise, but if he occupies the same prooperty as a tenant at $2 a month he will have a vote. What is the object of excluding him in the one case and including him in the other? The object can only be to encourage fraud by the creation of faggot votes, and disfranchise the honest man, and it is with the object not of not preventing an honest man from voting but of preventing unprincipled politicians from creating faggot votes and thus disfranchising an honest man that this amendment is proposed. When the value of property is made the basis in the occupant clause, the same basis should be adopted with regard to tenancy.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon, member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) has declared that he proposed his amendment in view of cases which he knows to exist at this moment and which he has cited. Therefore he could not have proposed it with the object of preventing fraud, because in those cases there can have been no fraud. The cases he mentioned are in his own county, and they are cases of bond fide tenants who are paying regular rents to bond fide landlords, of respectable workingmen—the hon. gentleman emphasised the term respectable—yet now he says his anxiety to prevent them voting is because these respectable workingmen would enter into a fraudulent conspiracy with their landlords in order to obtain votes for which they were not entitled.

Mr. FISHER. I will explain to the hon. gentleman how the case stands. These people who occupy this property class themselves as occupants; under the Quebec provincial law, an occupant does not require to occupy property of assessed value, and consequently, by calling himself an occupant instead of a tenant, a man may manage to be placed on the voters' list who would not have that right as a tenant. I want to prevent this being done under this Bill by putting tenants and occupants in the same position, by making the value of the property the basis.

Mr. LANGELIER. I was in the Quebec Legislature when the Quebec law was passed. It was presented by a Conservative Government, and the gentleman who had charge of the Bill, Mr. Church, is a great friend of the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White). The objection now being made was made by him then. There is a clause in the Quebec law which says that in order that a tenant may vote on property, the property must have a real value of $300, and the rental must be $30 a year. What reason was given for combining the two? The reason given by Mr. Church was the same as that given by hon, gentlemen on this side, that otherwise the result in many cases would be that the proprietor would be disfranchised, while the tenant would be enfranchised, which would be something very extraordinary. In many cases, property is assessed for only $250 in cities, and yet the rental is very high compared with the value of the property. That property very often is rented for $3 a month, more than sufficient to qualify the tenant, so that the tenant would be qualified while the proprietor would not. It was in order to prevent that, and in order to prevent fraud, that the Quebec Legislature exacted the two values in the case of a tenant, that he should pay $30 rental, and that the property should be assessed at $300.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The gist of the whole thing is simply this, there are two properties identical in every respect, standing opposite each other, each worth less than $300. The occupants of both contribute to the revenue and perform all the duties of citizens, but in the one case the occupant who is a proprietor cannot vote, while in the other case the occupant who is a tenant can vote.

On sub-section 5,

Mr. FLEMING moved in amendment:

That after the word "occupant" in the 32nd line, there be inserted the words "or tenant" and after the word "wife" in the 45th line, there be added the following—Provided that in the case of such tenant, a change of tenancy during the year next before the said first of November, in any such year, shall not deprive the tenant of the right to vote in respect to such real property, if such change is without intermission of time, and the several tenancies are such as would entitle the tenant to vote, had such tenant been in possession under either of them, as such tenant for the year next before the said day of November in any such year. such year.

That will do away with the necessity of the 4th clause altogether.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That altogether restricts the number of tenants and cuts off a great number of workingmen. I am opposed to it altogether.

Mr. FLEMING. The proviso that is added is taken from the proviso in the previous sub-section. There can be no logical argument why tenants should occupy any position different than that occupied by owners or occupants. There is no reason why a person occupying the position of tenant, living in a tenement house, should occupy a different position. Anyone acquainted with the cities will know that these tenement houses are rented sometimes at a very heavy rent for the accommodation they afford. In the poorer parts of cities families in poor circumstances are sometimes obliged to occupy a single room. The improvident classes are driven to the occupation of these tenement houses, and it is with a view of giving these improvident people a better position than the industrious classes of the community that this Bill seems to be framed. I know in my own town of instances where properties, small houses or cottages, sell at $150, for which a rental is paid sufficient to qualify the tenant. I can recall an instance when I sold a small cottage, I had at one time, for $175, which had been rented before at $3 a month. The effect of this section will be that the moment the tenant of such a property purchased it, he would cease to have the right to vote, although he had that right when a tenant. There are numerous instances in towns, where properties are not assessed at sufficient value to entitle the owner to vote, but where the rents are sufficiently high to enable the tenant to vote. So soon as a man becomes a freeholder of a property less than $200 in value, he ceases to be a voter. As long as he pays $2 a month for the same property, he will have a vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he sold a property for $175 which he was received; $36 a year for. It seems to me that he must have put a monstrous screw on the poor tenant to make him pay $36 a year for a property which was worth only $175. That is a rather Jewish operation. In the next place, if he sold it for $175, there is no accounting for human eccentricity. For a man to sell for $175 a property which brings him in $36 a year, is a most extraordinary instance of eccentricity, and we cannot legislate for such an instance as that. If the hon. gentleman was getting $36 a year for that property, it was his bounden duty to see that it was assessed for more than But, after all, that is not the question. The question of the landlord or the owner is settled by the previous clause. This relates to the amount of annual interest which, as a tenant, should qualify a man to have a vote. The hon. gentleman wants to prevent a man paying rental from having a vote, unless his landlord also has a vote. There is no necessary connection between the two. The workingman pays his rent, and has a right to have a vote. But if you scratch a Liberal, you find an aristocrat. Now, we find that these hon, gentlemen are against giving the workingman, who pays a small rental, the right to vote.

Mr. GILLMOR. It strikes me that we are mixing up two classes of qualifications. There may be objections in regard to the qualification, but I do not see how we are going to better the matter by disqualifying the tenant because the real estate owner does not own property enough to qualify him. There are two classes of voters. We have fixed the qualification for property owners in cities at $300. No matter how many tenants one of them may have, if the property is not worth that, he cannot vote; but, because he cannot vote, I do not see how we are going to better the matter by disfranchising the tenants. It appears to me that we are mixing up the two cases. If the qualification of the owner is too high, make it lower, or, if it is too low, make it higher; but I am in favor of the extension of the franchise, and you are not going to remedy the matter by mixing two things together. If a man has property in a city worth $275 and gets rent for it, he cannot vote under this Bill, but I do not see how you are going to benefit him by preventing the tenant from voting who pays $2 a month rent. There may be frauds under this law as there may be under all laws. Men may qualify their tenants to vote by giving a receipt for rent which they have not received. That cannot be remedied unless it is detected, but I do not think we ought to restrict the franchise by cutting off the tenants because the landlord has not enough property to qualify him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The First Minister made some verbal amendments in this clause. I asked him then something in reference to them which he said he would subsequently explain. Probably he will give the explanation

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will read the 5th subsection as I proposed to have it amended:

"Or is the bona fide occupant of real property in any such city or part of a city of the actual value of $300, or within any such town or part of a town of $200"—

In order to make the occupancy agree with the ownership clause.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is actual residence a qualification for the vote of the occupant?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An occupant is a person who occupies or resides. There is a difference between possession and occupation. Occupant and resident mean the same thing.

Mr. LADERKIN. In the interpretation clause, is occupant given as a resident?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentlemen professes to be very anxious for the extension of the franchise. He is apprehensive lest some tenant might be disqualified under the amendment of my hon. friend behind me. We have had evidence of the earnest zeal of the hon, gentleman for the qualification of tenants by his votes on the various amendments which have been submitted. We have seen that earnest zeal displayed by his vote on the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland. The question now is whether a tenant shall be placed in a better position than the proprietor. We say that the occupant and the tenant $200, at all events, and then he could not lose his vote. stand in the same position. Take the case of the man who vote, but, if he agrees to pay $2 a month for the property he will have a vote. Upon what principle is the man who pays $2 a month to have the vote while the who agrees to purchase the same property, who man goes into possession, who occupies the same house, and cultivates the same ground is not to have a vote? There is neither reason nor sense in such a proposition. There can be no difficulty in understanding why we have such a proposition before us. The rule is simple and plain. Let us look at the question of convenience. If you take the value of the property, the value is upon the assessment roll. My hon. friend for Lambton (Mr. Fairbank) pointed out that in his constituency there were 1,700 tenants upon the voters' list, and 700, I think he said, upon the roll. Now these 700 were taken out and put on the voters' list because the property occupied by them was valued at a sufficient amount to enable them to go upon the voters' list. How are those parties who are tenants, to get on the voters' list that are paying $2 a month, or $20 a year? You cannot take them from the assessment, you have no means of knowing the amount of rent they pay. It is only necessary that the landlord or his tenants should go before the revising officer and state that they pay a certain rental and therefore have a right to have their names on the list; but if they do not do so, their names do not appear at all. The revising officer has no means of knowing what their rental is. It may be that the man ocupy-ing the property as a tenant may be a relative of the proprietor, and may be paying scarcely any rent at all; yet he occupies the land, or is assessed for it, he pays his taxes upon it, and has a large income derived from it. If he is an occupant, his income may be more than $20-may be $50 a year, yet he would not be entitled to vote if it was not assessed at a certain sum. But if he pays-not to the Crown, not to the Government, not to any purpose in which the State is interested—but if he pays to another party, or has agreed to pay to another party, a certain sum, he is not entitled to vote. That is the provision the hon. gentleman makes in his Bill and he undertakes to tell the committee that he does this for—what? Why, in order to extend the franchise. Sir, there is an obvious and an honest way of extending the franchise. The hon, gentleman can fix a lower qualification if he desires; he can say that it shall be $100. If he wishes to give the tenant an opportunity of voting to a greater extent than the tenant has now, let him fix a lower qualification. But here is a provision, not to help the tenant, but to enable frauds to be committed, to permit the manufacture of faggot votes, to do the very thing which every man, on both sides of the House who wishes to have an honest voters' list, seeks to prevent. How are you going to have an honest voters' list under a provision such as this? I say it cannot be had. If the hon gentleman wants to give us a fair voters' list, if he does not wish, when we get rid of a stuffed ballot box, to give us a stuffed voters' list, let us have a plain, simple and straightforward qualification, that is applicable to all parties who are entitled to vote. If the hon. gentleman wishes to extend the franchise to a larger number of tenants, let him lower his qualification, and he can accomplish his object in a straightforward way. He is not accomplishing that object, but he is facilitating the manufacture of votes by the proposition he has laid before us.

Sir JOHN A.MACDONALD. I think I can leave the speech the hon. gentleman has just delivered to the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) who has stated the case of the tenant quite clearly. With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), all I have got to say is that I not been in his place for nearly a week in this House. I desired, from his position, to treat all he said, and the arguments he used, with every respect, but it is a great First Minister, but they will not in the slightest degree deter Mr. MELLS.

has agreed to buy the property of another. He goes into strain for me to be able to do so. I have heard hon, gentle-possession. If the property is worth $275, he can have no men opposite with great attention when they direct their minds sincerely, bona fide, so far as I can judge, to improving the Bill. I have listened to them with great respect and I give them every consideration. But I put myself in the judgment of the committee whether every word the hon. gentleman from Bothwell has uttered is not directed for a different purpose, for the purpose of annoyance, for the purpose of obstruction.

Mr. MILLS. Oh. no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, but it is.

Mr. MILLS. But it is not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentlemen does not make it a bit stronger by saying it is not. Common sense is common sense. The hon, gentleman repeats again and again and again, over and over again, with what you may call a "damnable iteration" his criticism of the Bill. Now, Sir, we discussed the question of rental. I quite understand the argument that was used with respect to the objection the hon. gentleman takes to rental; I have heard it a dozen times. But the question now is on the 5th sub-section. The hon, gentleman from Peel (Mr. Fleming) has moved an amendment to add the rental to this clause of occupancy, and he has done so upon arguments that were used on a previous clause. There was no necessity to go over them again. We have had the discussion in advance upon this amendment, and I have taken the ground, and I dare say the majority of the committee will agree with me, that it is, in our opinion, a restriction of the right of voting of vast masses of tenantry on the small holdings of the country. Therefore I object to it altogether upon the very sensible ground of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Burpee). Now with respect to this clause about occupancy. It is simply an extension of the 3rd sub-section, and to let in a body of men who, without that clause, would not have a vote. The 3rd sub section deals with the owner of real property, the proprietor of any freehold estate, in a city worth $300, and in a town worth $200. But that only allows the actual proprietor, the freeholder having a legal title, or an equitable title amounting to a legal title, who has a title that may be held valid in a court of law, and it includes only these. But the 5th sub section goes further. It is to enable those parties who otherwise have not strictly a legal title, who are not freeholders, but who are in occupation of property, to exercise the franchise. It is to allow occupants who are assessed for a property under provincial legislation, who hold property to the same amount, that is to say, they are occupants under a license of occupation, or an agreement to purchase from the Crown, or from other persons, who hold their occupation in any other manner than as an owner or as a tenant, and they must be in possession for a year; a man who, in a town, is occupying property for a whole year of the value of $200, or, in cities, a value of $300. If he is not an occupant in the face of the world of that property, he must have such an interest in it as will equitably give him the franchise. The sub-section is simply an extension of the 3rd sub-section being limited to the proprietor and the freeholder, and the 5th sub-section extending it to the person who for a year has held property of that value before the world, and therefore is the ostensible owner, although, perhaps, he may not be the legal owner. It is for the purpose of extending the franchise.

Mr. MILLS. I have no doubt-

Mr. HESSON. We have had quite enough from you.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has had quite enough, and so much so that I think he has me from the performance of what I believe to be my duty here as a representative of my constituents in this House. The censures of the hon. gentleman have very little influence upon me. I care just as little for his censure as I do for his commendation. I believe one is quite as valuable as the other. The hon, gentleman told the committee that his proposal to base the franchise for the tenant upon rental was with the view to extend the franchise so far as regards tenants. The hon, gentleman gave no reason for his action, which must necessarily lead to faggot votes and to frauds in the voters' lists. The hon. gentleman has provided that the tenant's rent must be paid; so if a dispute arises between the landlord and tenant, the former can give the tenant the choice between exercising the franchise and paying the contested amount. I trust the committee has sufficient independence not to support the proposition submitted.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I beg to move in amendment that the word "two" be substituted for the word "three" in the 3rd line of sub-section 5, and "$200" for "$300" in the amendment just read. I believe this amendment is in the direction which the Minister has indicated as being what he wished. I am in favor of making the franchise as liberal as possible. While I wish to have the franchise as liberal as possible, and more liberal I believe than the proposition of the First Minister, yet I desire that fraud shall be prevented. It is a fact that in the United Provinces before Confederation the system now proposed was abandoned, because of the frauds that occurred under the annual valuations. Subject to the correction of the First Minister, I state that it was during the Administration of which he was the leader before Confederation that we abandoned the principle of annual valuation so far as giving the right to vote, and we adopted the system of actual valuation of property. It was the complaint as to fictitious rentals that proved to be one of the causes that led to the abandonment of the former system. It will be very simple to practice fraud under the clause as proposed. While we admit the possibility of fraud being committed by the adoption of the clause as it stands, we are asked at the same time to adopt a proposition under which a landlord can disfranchise a tenant if he is in arrears for rent. If hon. gentlemen opposite have that desire to protect the interest of the tenant which they have expressed, why do they allow such a proposition to exist in this Bill? It is placing too dangerous a power in the hands of the landlords. A dispute may arise, and the result of a difference of political opinion between landlord and tenant may be the disfranchisement of the tenant. The principle in this case ought to be simply one which would reduce itself to the question of what ought to be the value of the property on which a man should vote, and whatever the amount, it should be some value which would be easily understood and readily reached, and one which, if you will, should entrauchise as far as possible every male of mature years who is a citizen of this country. If you adopt the amendment of the hon. member for Peel to which mine is a rider you will reach something which is tangible and practicable, and something which will give an assurance that every man who has the right to vote will have a vote under this clause. But do not let us leave the Bill open to the introduction of faggot voting, which, if full advantage was taken of it, would render it impossible that the true expression of opinion could be had in any constituency, especially in the neighborhood of large cities. Faggot votes would be quite practicable under the tenancy and occupancy clause as it now stands. Another reason why we should avoid passing the clause in its present shape is that it would be differently construed by different revising officers. There is another detail in this connection to which I would draw the attention of the First Minister, and that is as to the what what he said. He said to take the value of the prodates at which the year, as defined by the Bill, perty as a basis of the tenancy qualification would be to shall begin and end. He inserted the date of the first of January, as I understood, for the reason that in cities the assessment rolls were made up at a time which made it more convenient for the revising officer to prepare his roll by the 1st of January rather than the 1st of November. If I understood him aright in that respect, it would appear to me that he was conveniencing only one city in Ontario, the city of Toronto, where the assessment roll is prepared at a different time of the year from the usual time in the other parts of the Province. In the towns and rural municipalities, and in fact everywhere outside of Toronto, the assessor is usually appointed at the first or the February meeting of the council in each year, and he goes to work immediately afterwards, finishing his work in the first three months of the year, and in the vast majority of instances the assessment is completed and the voters' list is published by the 15th of July. The fully revised assessment roll could thus be put in the hands of the revising officer by the 1st of October under ordinary circumstances, and in no instance need it be delayed so long as the 1st of November. Now, assuming that he delays dealing with the roll until the beginning of the next year, an election might take place in the latter part of December, and the result would be that they would have to take a roll two years old. I trust the First Minister will give his attention to this feature of the Bill.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. VAIL. If the right hon. First Minister could see his way to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) I think it would simplify the matter very much. It would cover nearly all the right hon. gentleman proposes to cover by these $2, $6, $12 and $20 rentals, and enable the reviser to go to the assessment roll for the names of the tenants or occupants. Otherwise it would be very difficult indeed for the reviser to know where to look for these men; he would have to go to one half of the houses in the city to learn who were entitled to vote, while if the amendment were adopted he could learn from the assessment roll who the occupants were, and in that way he could make up his list very easily. I hope the right hon. gentleman will see his way clear to accept this amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the discussion of the fourth paragraph, I heard that and several other arguments which struck me to some extent; therefore I asked the committee to allow the fourth paragraph to stand over, and stated that I would give it my best consideration, for I really want to get an Act which will as far as possible satisfy both sides of the House. Then, when we come to discuss that paragraph, the hon. gentleman can move his amendment. The hon, gentleman must know that I cannot consent to any alterations without due consideration, for they have to be fully considered by the responsible advisers of the Crown. In the meantime, if we confine ourselves to the simple question of occupancy, I think we can get through without much trouble, because this paragraph is merely an expansion of the third paragraph, and the whole question the hon. gentleman refers to will be left open, and can be discussed in a day or two when we come to the paragraph it relates to.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman had stated before what he now states, I do not think my hon, friend would have moved this amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has forgotten some-restrict the franchise, and he could not consent to that. If he says he does not intend to adhere to that, and admits that there is force in the view taken on this side, that would be a great reason for my hon friend not pressing the motion, although I think it would have been better to deal with the question in the way my hon friend proposes in this paragraph, and strike out the fourth paragraph altogether. Everything of course depends on whether the hon gentleman is disposed to consider seriously the proposition made on this side of the House. We think that if you make it impossible to take the valuation as prima facie evidence of qualification, so as to get the name of the tenant on the voters' list, you enormously increase the cost to every candidate of seeing that the list is properly revised; for, however honest the revising officer might be, he would have no means of knowing whether a tenant should go on the list without enquiry or evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must say I am not at all converted to the idea of making the vote of a tenant depend on the value of the property to the landlord. But there were some statements made about the difficulty of ascertaining who the tenants are, the amount of their rental not appearing on the assessment roll, and I think the hon. gentleman suggested that there might be room for fraud. It was in view of those two points principally that I asked the postponement of the paragraph for consideration.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Cameron, Middlesex) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I move

That sub-section five be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—Every male person entered as an occupant on the last revised assessment roll of the city or town in which he tenders his vote, who is residing at the time he tenders his vote in the said city or town, and is rated on the last revised assessment roll of such city or town at not less than $200, and who has resided there continuously for at least 12 months next preceding the election at which he votes.

This does away with the non-resident vote. It is, perhaps, the greatest bane to purity that can possibly exist with regard to an election. It is well known that, under this clause, the door will be opened to a great amount of wrongdoing in connection with elections. Any person who desires it, can be rated as an occupant without being a resident; a person in the occupation of property may exist miles away from the property. I understand the law is clear on that point; I understand such is the case, and it is in order to do away with that I propose this amendment. If the right hon, gentleman would consent to make residence a condition under this clause, I would not move this amendment, but, as the clause stands, a person may have himself rated as an occupant in very many districts, and hence create what are termed faggot votes. The interpretation clause does not state definitely that an elector should reside in the electoral district where he should vote, and I hold that this clause should be made so clear that there can be no possibility of any misunderstanding arising under it from a want of clearness in the interpretation clause. In the Ontario Act the qualification is $200 in cities and towns, while under this it is $300. I understand the First Minister has declared it will be reduced to $200 in towns, but it will remain at $300 in cities, so that in the latter many persons will be disfranchised by this Bill who have a vote under the Ontario Act. It is not desirable to take the franchise from those who already possess it under the provincial law, more especially as the First Minister has said his intention is to extend rather than to restrict the franchise. I hope this amendment will be adopted, because if not, the door will be opened by which an honest expression of the will of the people at the polls may be prevented.

Amendment negatived.
Mr. MILLS.

On sub-section 6,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that this subsection shall read as follows:

"Is a resident within such city of or town or part of a city or town, and derives an income from his earnings or from some trade, calling, office or profession, or from some investment in Canada—striking out the words 'or charge on real property'—of no less than $300 annually, and has so derived such income, and has been such resident for one year next before the first day of January, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, or any subsequent year."

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman would make it $250, it would be the same as the Ontario provision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can assure the hon. gentleman there is a good deal of difference of opinion about coming down to even $300 among my friends.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think that under the provision that the investment should be in Canada, there will be some difficulty on the part of the revising officer in ascertaining, should any protest be made with regard to an investment, whether it is genuine or not. If it were provided that the investment should be in the city or town where a man claims to vote, there would be no difficulty.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think there will be any difficulty under this clause. It is quite clear we are in favor of extending the franchise, and even if a man had no investment at all, provided he is a resident in the city or town, I should be in favor of giving him a vote; but if it be necessary to provide against any difficulty, we could apply a test by providing that he should be assessed on the property. A man will hardly allow himself to be assessed for the purpose of being allowed to vote as possessing an income, if he really did not enjoy it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It can be easily proved that a man has an investment in stock, say in the Bank of Montreal or Bank of Toronto.

On sub-section 7,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am going to move a clause in substitution of this sub-section. I propose to divide the sub-section into two parts so as to make it clear. The first part will read: "If his father is alive," etc., and the second: "If his father is dead," giving in the first place the right in connection with the father, and in the second in regard to the mother, after the father's death, in the same manner. I also propose to amend the proviso by substituting six months for four months' absence as disqualifying the son from the power to exercise the vote.

Mr. VAIL. Suppose the eldest son is away from home, would this Bill give the next eldest the vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. VAIL. I mean supposing there is only enough property to qualify two persons. I do not think it does. It applies only to the elder son, and, if he had left the Dominion altogether, the next son would not have the vote.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). If the elder son has undertaken the duties of housekeeping on his own account, I question very much whether the second son would have the right to vote, presuming there was only one other vote on the property than the father's. This clause seems to restrict it to the elder son. Perhaps the construction put on it by some revising officers might widen it, but the elause would be open to the more limited construction, which I do not think the First Minister intends or is advisable to adopt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there is any necessity for an alteration. It says: "The eldest son, or such of the elder sons."

Mr. VAIL. That is supposing the property could qualify more than one son.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the eldest son is away he cannot vote. When the farmers' sons franchise was first introduced it was upon the principle that it is generally supposed that the son of the farmer will be his heir and that he remains with his father and works on the farm without pay, because he works for his inheritance while the other sons are scattered. Afterwards it went further and, I suppose under the law of an equal division of property, it was considered that, if the property was able to bear it, each of the sons would inherit his share of that estate and that, therefore, if it was large enough to justify it, they should each have a vote, if resident on the farm with the father. Of course, if they go off the farm, they are like other persons, and must get their votes as occupants or tenants or upon their income or earnings, as the case may be. I think the clause is right enough.

Mr. MILLS. The point is whether, if the elder son is away from home, the next eldest would have a right to vote on the property.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think it is clear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It says: "The eldest or such of the elder sons."

Mr. MILLS. That is where the property is sufficient to qualify more than the eldest son, but, if it is not more than sufficient to give one a vote, and the eldest is away, can another be given the right?

Mr. EDGAR. What is the use of using the words "elder

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There may be five sons, and the property may be only enough to qualify two. It implies priority. I think a couple of words will meet the whole case; if we have the same language as in this Bill in line 20 "shall belong only to the father or to the mother, and such of the eldest sons being resident thereon "striking out the word "mother." Put it this way: "And such of the eldest sons being so resident as aforesaid."

Mr. EDGAR. I would ask the Right hon. gentleman to consider the claims of the sons-in-law and the grandsons. I suppose that under the word "son," in the 3rd line of this clause, step son is included.

Sir JOHN. A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. Would it not be well to extend the provision to sons-in-law and grandsons? The Right hon. gentleman has admitted that he is willing to take what is good out of the Ontario Law, and it is from that I get this suggestion. The illustration which the First Minister used a little while ago why farmers' sons were first given that franchise, seemed to me a very good one, namely, that the son was working with the father and earning the inheritance. Now I think the first instance that occurs to me of an inheritance being worked for and earned, was by a future son-in-law. When Jacob worked for Laban he worked as a future sonin-law. I think that is a very good reason why we should include sons-in-law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He will work for a mother-in-law next. When we were settling the interpretation clause I asked that the definition should stand over until we considered the question about the stepson and grandson. The hon, gentleman can bring up that subject when we go back to the interpretation clause.

Mr. EDGAR. I understood that it was farmers' sons that stood over.

wants me to go a step farther.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Put him out,

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to move an amendment to this clause, namely: "that the words "grandson, step-son or sons-in-law" be inserted after the word "son" in the first line of the 7th clause. I understand from the Premier and other hon. gentlemen opposite, that the intention of the present Act is not to restrict the franchise as it is at present enjoyed, but rather to widen it. So far as all the Provinces are concerned, it will give the franchise to some who would not otherwise be entitled to it, and as regards the Province of Ontario, I simply take the words of the Provincial Act. I think we should not deprive of the franchise any parties who now enjoy it under any of the provincial laws now in force, or that may hereafter come into force. This amendment will also prevent confusion in making up the voters' list, and with this view I move the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BURPEE. I beg to move an amendment relating exclusively to the city of St. John. That city has a franchise which gives a vote to every freeman having been assessed for one year in the sum of $100. The Act reads thus: "And the name of every freeman of the city therein assessed in the sum of $100, shall be added to and inserted in the list." The franchise in the city of St. John has been such, I think, ever since it had a charter. It is a peculiar one, but one which the people are very anxious to retain. I beg to move the amendment which I placed in your hands, to preserve this franchise to the freemen of the city of St.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How many freemen are there?

Mr. BURPEE. One hundred and fifty.

Mr. FOSTER. What constitutes them freemen?

Mr. BURPEE. I presume they have a license. The hon. gentleman, who lives in St. John most of the time, ought to

Mr. FOSTER. I beg your pardon; I do not live in the city of St. John.

Mr. BURPEE. They take out a license, I think, from the corporation, which constitutes them freemen in case they are assessed for $100 for the year previous.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean to say that any one who applies for and pays the license fee, becomes thereby a freeman of the city? Or is it a distinction of honor conferred by the city itself? If so, upon what class of persons is it conferred, and would not these persons have the suffrage on one of the other bases of the franchise?

Mr. MILLS. I do not think we are called upon to consider whether these gentlemen may or may not have the franchise upon some other grounds. We have the fact before us that a certain number of gentlemen, known as freemen of the city of St. John, are entitled to vote as freemen under the law, and have been ever since the city received a royal charter. One of the hon. members from the city of St. John informed me before leaving, that the terms on which those persons were made freemen were that they were to do business in the city and pay taxes on $100, and pay £6 6s into the city corporation for the purpose of the privilege of a freeman; or if they were sons of freemen, they were to do business in the city and pay £1 0s. 6d. There are about 150 freemen. Those parties will be disfranchised unless provision is made for the continuance of this provision of the charter of the city.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think we can Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend says he accept the amendment. No doubt most of those persons if they pay an annual sum of £6 6s. will be holders of property, or at all events will come under the income franchise. Again, if they pay $20 rent per year they will have a vote. Besides if we look back at English history we shall find that this class of votes was looked upon with great disfavor. The hon, member for Bothwell knows that the freemen were swept away by the Reform Bills as being one of the nuisances there, they being known under the name of potwalloppers.

Mr. BURPEE. I am sorry if the First Minister cannot accept this amendment. The freemen have enjoyed the privilege for a long time; some of them may be enfranchised in other ways, but a great many will not be. The sum of $20 paid for the privilege of being a freeman is only paid once, not annually.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon, member for Bothwell stated that they would all be disfranchised if the present freeman's qualification was not retained. Is the hon, member sure about that?

Mr. MILLS. I stated precisely what the hon. gentleman knows; that they will be disfranchised as freemen. Whether they will be qualified in any other way, I do not know. If so, it will be a mere accident.

Amendment negatived.

On section 4,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only alteration I propose is the substitution of 1st January, 1886, instead of 1st November, 1886.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I have already pointed out that the assessment in towns and townships and villages in Ontario is made between 1st February and 15th May in every year. Under exceptional circumstances towns and cities can adopt a different period of the year, all counties can by a special enactment postpone the assessment to 15th July. The assessment roll has been made the basis of the voters' lists under this Bill. If so, the assessment made in February of one year cannot be acted on by the revising officers until after 1st January in the following year. That leaves a long interval, while as a fact, the voters' list is now prepared or generally distributed by 1st July or at the very latest by 1st August and revised by 1st September or 15th September at the very latest.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman is quite wrong. Persons have a right to appeal until 1st of August. After that the clerk has to make up the voters' list and it is published during one month. It is utterly impossible to have all the appeals in by 1st August.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Most of the hon. members for Ontario will recollect the time at which they receive the voters' lists from the different municipal clerks. They generally reach us about 1st July, and by 1st August in the majority of instances. The voters' list is printed, and upon it, appeals are made. It is true it is not the final list at the time it comes into the possession of those who are entitled to copies.

Mr. MILLS. I think the Minister in charge will see that this is an extremely inconvenient time for making up the lists. How many days does the hon gentleman propose to give for the examination of the list? If he allows thirty days from the time the list is received it means that the time for examining into it and making changes would be just the time when Parliament would be in session, and how would the hon. gentleman himself, while attending to his duties as a Minister of the Crown, look after the revision of the lists in his own constituency? Every member in the rural constituencies in a large degree will have to look after that work in his own constituency. If the hon, gentleman would say the 1st of August or the 1st Sir John A. Macdonald.

could pair off. Mr. MILLS. But we do not happen to represent the same

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman and constituency.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon, member for Lincoln has forgotten the dates. According to the Act, every assessor must deliver over the roll before the 1st of May, the duties of the court of revision must be completed by the 1st of July, and the final revision by the judge must be determined before the 1st of August.

Mr. RYKERT. That is just what I said.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon, gentleman will therefore see that in Ontario, at least, the list will be ready for the revising officer soon after the 1st of August. I think the First Minister will see that it is postponing it unnecessarily to make the date the 1st of January.

Mr. WALLACE (York). That portion of the Ontario Act is objectionable, because it compels the revision of those lists just at a season of the year when farmers are unable to pay any attention to it, that is during July and August. think it is much better that the work should be done in the winter, when the people have more time.

Mr. EDGAR. But we cannot alter the Ontario law, and the revising officer bases his calculations on the assessment roll, which is completely finished by the 1st of August. That may be a good or a bad time, but it is the time by law, and the only question we have to consider is whether we shall wait five months before the work shall be gone on with by our own officer.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman is astray with reference to his law on this subject. It is true the list must be returned finally revised by the 1st of August, but after that time the voters' list has to be completed. It is provided that immediately after the final revision of the roll the clerk shall proceed to make copies of the voters' lists and publish them for thirty days. The hon, gentleman knows that the court of revision is generally held in the months of September or October-seldom before that time, so that by taking the 1st of January there is a certainty of having the voters' list finally revised by the county judge. Then, in cities the roll is not revised before the end of September, so that there will only be a month or so between the two lists, and the revising officer will have a complete list for the whole electoral district, instead of going on and taking the townships and villages at one time and the cities at another. It would be utterly impossible for him to get a finally completed list before the 1st of October.

Mr. VAIL. So far as my own Province is concerned, I think the right hon gentleman could not have chosen a more inconvenient time than January. If he had taken November then we could take the lists of the previous year. I do not know how the matter stands in Ontario, but there are other Provinces to be considered. By our law the assessors are not bound to supply a copy of the list until the 20th of January. The revision takes place in March, and the court is held in April. If the leader of the Government will consent to make his time the 1st of March or the 1st of May it would be much better for the lower Provinces. It would be impossible to revise the lists at this time, unless they took the lists of the previous year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nobody can tell when a general or particular election will take place, and I think the time is a matter of no consequence. In 1878 the election was in September; in 1882 it was in June; and it is a mere chance when it may take place. No matter what month the election may fall upon, it may give a long time or a short time, but after full consideration, and after discussing the matter with men who have had a good deal of of September it would be a much more convenient season. experience, I thought it would be fair all round to make it the 1st of January, and it is convenient, for the sake of symmetry, that the same date should apply both for cities and towns.

Mr. VAIL. The revising officer cannot make it by the 1st of January, for he cannot get the roll by that time.

Mr. MILLS. This shows the difficulty of fixing a uniform time. There is the difference of climate and the difference of local circumstances; and what is suitable for one Province is not suitable for another. My hon, friend tells me that the 1st March is as early a period as will suit the Province of Quebec. The hon, member for Lincoln seems to confound the voters' list and the assessment roll. The local voters' list is a matter of no consequence to us; we are not following it; we are not adopting the same qualification. What is of consequence to us is the assessment roll, from which the qualification of voters is to be ascertained. As soon as the assessment is carefully revised, we are prepared, in the Province of Ontario, to make up the voters' list. It would be easy to ascertain what would be the most convenient time in each Province, and to provide that the voters' list should be made up in the different Provinces at such times as would be most suitable. I do not see any object in adopting any particular time for all the Provinces when that time is not convenient. It is not desirable to make up the list on an assessment roll eight or ten months old. My observation—and I dare say that of every other hon, gentleman from Ontario coincides with it—is that when you compare the voters' list of one year with that of another year, you find a very large percentage of names on one list which are not on the other, owing to the migrations of our people. Some go to Manitoba and some to the western States, and if the assessment roll is not used until it is eight or ten months old, a considerable number will be left off the voters' list. I therefore think it is desirable that the list should be made up as soon as possible after the assessment roll is completed.

Mr. RYKERT. The assessment roll is not conclusive There are many names on the voters' list that are not on the assessment roll. The only persons whose names must be put on the voters' list, because they are on the assessment roll, are income voters.

Mr. MILLS. The voters' list which has been prepared under the local law is not a matter of the slightest consequence under this Bill. Under the local law the qualification is $200; and how is a judge or revising officer to know whether the party there named is on the assessment roll for $200 or $500? He cannot tell; and therefore the voters' list is no guide to him; but the assessment roll is, because he sees there the value of the property put there by the assessor, and he transfers the name of every person assessed for the amount required from the assessment roll to the voters' list. He cannot transfer a single name from the voters' list of the Province to the list under this Bill, because you have adopted a different qualification.

Mr. EDGAR. There is another point to which I would se to draw the attention of the committee. The hon. like to draw the attention of the committee. gentleman for Lincoln has spoken of the voters' list being made up after the closing of the assessment roll on the 1st of August; but if the object of the Frst Minister, in fixing the 1st of January, is to give the revising officer an opportunity to refer, after that date, to the lists in cities and towns, he has not fixed the right date; because, by the assessment Act, it is provided that cities and towns separated from the county may pass by-laws regulating the different periods of their assessment; that the assessment must be taken between the 1st of July and the 30th of Septembeber; that the roll must be returned to the clerk on or before the 1st of October, that the time of the closing before the 31st of December; so that there is no time given for making up the voters' list at all.

Mr. AUGER. There is another reason why November should be chosen instead of January. Those who will be most interested in watching the making up of the lists will be the representatives of the people, and if the list is to be made up in January, the members of Parliament will not be there to look after it. While, if November was chosen, the list might be made between that time and the time Parliament meets.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. First Minister might say why it is that in section 13 it is provided that the revising officer will not publish his list until the 1st of January, 1887, which is a year after the date at which the qualification is to exist. It is very difficult to see why a whole year is allowed to elapse.

Mr. BURPEE. The month of November is the time selected for making up our local lists in New Brunswick, and it is considered the most convenient time for that Province.

On sub-section 2, section 4,

Mr. EDGAR moved in amendment:

That after the word "naturalisation" the following words be added: And, if an Indian or person, with part Indian blood, has been duly enfranchised, and has had the same civil capacity conferred upon him as other persons who are entitled to vote under this Act.

He said: My object in moving this amendment is one of which the House has heard something before. It embraces a protest on the part of those who support it against giving a vote to unenfranchised Indians who are still under the wardship and tutelage of the Crown. Whatever other capacities other voters have, it is proposed by this amendment the Indians shall also have, before being entitled to exercise the franchise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I promised to make some exceptions with respect to the Indians in some of the Provinces, and I think the proper place to discuss this subject is on the clause which declares who shall not have a vote. This clause declares generally that persons duly qualified as British subjects shall have a vote, and then come the exceptions.

Mr. EDGAR. I was led to propose this amendment from the way the right hon, gentleman has framed the Bill. In the interpretation of the word "person," in the beginning of the Bill, he has considered it necessary to declare that it shall include the Indian. Following that, it seems to me that when we come to this clause, stating the kind of persons who, in counties and towns, shall have a vote, it is the proper place to lay down the rule I propose as regards the Indians. I think the hon, gentleman was right in introducing the interpretation clause at an early stage of the Bill, so as to show its scope, in order that nobody would be surprised. The Indian is one of the large classes that are to be affected by the interpretation of the word "person." You cannot place the Indian in the clause of exceptions, dealing with returning officers and others exempted from the right to vote, but must deal with him under the general clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says that because the Indian comes under the interpretation clause of the word "person," this is the proper place to introduce his amendment. Well, a judge is a person, so is a returning officer, so is a paid agent, and yet they are provided for in the next clause. The general principle is that all persons having this qualification shall vote; then, in the next clause, we say that certain persons, who are qualified of the court of revision shall be the 15th of November, and by the previous clause, shall, for special reasons, be that the final return to the county juge shall be on or excluded.

Mr. EDGAR. Such as Chinamen. Why did not the hon, gentleman keep Chinamen for the next clause? They are put in the interpretation clause along with the Indian.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It will be remembered that we had a long discussion on the Indian question, on the interpretation clause of the word "person;" and the First Minister, at the conclusion of that debate, which was somewhat lengthy, stated that we had taken the debate at the wrong clause. He was partly to blame for that, for he lead us into it, or, at any rate, warranted us in entering into it then, because we settled the exclusion of the Chinese on that very same interpretation paragraph on which we discussed the Indian. However, the First Minister has stated that it is his intention to make some alterations. not know what they will be or in what direction. I think it would be desirable, before the subject is fully gone into, that we should know what the First Minister intends to do. If he does not care to disclose his intention until he reaches the clause which he thinks is the proper one, I would ask him whether he will consent, should the alterations he will propose be not such as will meet the views of this side, to allow us to move the amendment which my hon. friend is proposing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You may as well discuss it now as at any other time.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon, gentleman propose to tell us what he is going to do?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will, when I come to the

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman objected to defining the Indian as he meant the word "Indian" to be understood in the Act, when we were discussing the interpretation clause, but he discovered that that was the right place to exclude Chinamen. I understand that definitions are introduced in an interpretation clause for the purpose of explaining and limiting the scope of the technical words that are used in the Act to which those definitions apply. The hon, gentleman said that an Indian meant a person, and that we were making a great ado because he had inserted in the interpretation clause the fact that an Indian is a person. That is a fact in natural history, and it was not of the slightest consequence to introduce it in this Act, except for the purpose of the Act. It does seem to me, and I believe that will be the opinion of every draughtsman, that the proper place to have limited the use of the word "Indian" was in the interpretation clause itself, just as the hon. gentleman uses the word "son" in a technical sense, and states what the meaning of that word is in the interpretation clause. He does not propose to say whether it means step-son, son-in-law or grandson, as well as the son defined in that particular clause. Why does he give those definitions, if not for the purpose of explaining the use of the word "son" in the different clauses of the Bill? Thus, in the use of the word "Indian" in the Bill, unless he intends to enfranchise every Indian in the Dominion who has a certain amount of property that might be credited to him, although held from the Crown as an occupant, the proper place to have defined and limited the use of the word was the interpretation clause. I am not going to argue that point further; it is so clear that it requires no further discussion. It is only necessary to point out that if he intended the word "Indian" to apply to enfranchised Indians and no others—those who have the civil capacity to make civil contracts, who have control over their own affairs, and in whom the possession of property would be the evidence of thrift and foresight, as it would be in any class of the community—the interpretation clause was the proper place to define those limitations. The hon. gentleman objected to that; he said he would not limit and define per place; but he admitted it was the proper place to of them pays one farthing of municipal taxes, or can be Sir John A. Macdonalp.

exclude Chinamen. Now, when we come to this clause, and my hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) proposes to limit the term "British subject by birth or naturalisation" by excepting Indians on their reservations, and who are the wards of the Government, the hon. gentleman says again this is not the proper place. Why is this not a proper place? Will it not accomplish the object which my hon. friend has in view? If the hon, the First Minister is prepared to meet the views of those on this side of the House, to meet the views of the country, of the great majority of those outside of Parliament who have put him where he is, and put his supporters where they are, if he is prepared to make a statement to that effect to the House, we on this side will leave the artistic question as to the particular part of the Bill in which that declaration is to be put in to him. But if he is not prepared to meet the wishes of the country he ought to be prepared to discuss this question here just as well as at a future stage of the Bill. I had, to-day, the honor of presenting to the House a petition signed by 113 electors residing in the 3rd division of the township of Sombra.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Seventeen cents' worth.

Mr. MILLS. No; there is not seventeen cents' worth, nor is there much sense in the observation, or good taste either. Hon gentlemen opposite insult those who petition Parliament. If there is one right which is more sacred than another to the free men living under British institutions, it is the right of petitioning, but hon. gentlemen seem to think it is a serious invasion of their rights that there should be a petition at all. Upon that petition there were the names of 113 out of less than 130 electors in that polling division, and a majority of those electors voted against me at the last election. More than three-fourths of all the electors, Tory or Reform, who reside in that polling sub-division, have signed that petition.

Mr. McCALLUM. No, no.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman had better not say no unless he knows. He does not know in this case, and I do. That polling sub-division lies on the banks of the River St. Clair. Half a mile across the Chenal Écarté is Walpole Island, where those people reside whom the hon, gentleman proposes to enfranchise. Those who best know them, those who support the hon, gentleman and who are my political opponents, or who have been so up to this time, have petitioned him not to do this violence to the constitution. I am willing to give the franchise to any Indian who owns his own land, who is responsible for his own debts, against whom a civil process may run, who is liable to perform the same civil duties as a white man. Further, I am willing to give to every Indian, whether he is qualified or not, who is ready to take the risk of that, the opportunity of making the trial, and when he does, and when he has the same qualification as is required of a white man, I am willing to accord to him the same rights. But the same reason which would prevent the House from giving the franchise to a child ten years of age will apply to an Indian. Why do you not give the franchise to every boy between ten and twenty-one years of age? You will not allow him to jeopardise the property he may inherit; you will not allow him to make a contract which will waste his estate; you say he has not the necessary judgment. You give him the opportunity for his judgment to mature; you exercise control over him in the interest of the State, and I admit that that is a right and proper control. But you go further, and say that he is not prepared to accept the absolute responsibilities of a free man, and therefore he cannot have the elective franchise. You do exactly the same thing with the Indian. What does the hon. gentleman propose? Here are 810 Indians on Walpole Island, according the use of the word "Indian" there; that that was not the pro- to the returns of the Department of the Interior. Not one called upon to serve as a juryman, or can be drafted into the militia, or can be made subject to a civil process, or has the liberty to make a contract for himself. But the hon gentleman says: I will take the value of Walpole Island; I will have my revising officer estimate how much the island is worth; and, if that island, divided amongst all those Indians resident there, is sufficient to give each one over twenty-one years of age a vote, he shall have a vote. It is rumored that the hon, gentleman proposes some change; that he proposes that the Indians shall have separate holdings. But the Indian may have a separate holding at any time by his will; he can give to any Indian that he can ascertain will support him a separate holding; there is nothing in his way; and that Indian is no more a propertyholder, upon any just principle, than is the man who resides in a foreign country. In most of the reservations they have allocations. I believe that every portion of the Moravian town reserve is allotted. Forty acres are allotted to each family; and, under this Bill, the hon. gentleman would give them votes. Yet he knows that, except some two or three, there is not one of them qualified to exercise the elective franchise. Apart from the question of intelligence, there is wanting that public spirit which is necessary to the proper exercise of the elective franchise, which is necessary in order that the franchise may elevate the Indian instead of the Indian degrading the electoral system. Under this provision the hon, gentleman would give to these Indians 200 votes. I believe that about one vote to four of the Indian population would be a fair representation of the number that would be entitled to vote under this law on the various reservations throughout Ontario. It is only necessary to take up the election returns for the last three parliamentary elections, and to take the number of Indians in the different electoral distrits of this country, to see what the effect of that system would be. In 1880 the hon, gentleman reported that he had sent out circulars to all the Indian agents throughout the older Provinces, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Indians were prepared for a simple municipal system. There was a proposition to establish municipal councils, to which Indians would be elected, and of which the Indian agent would be chairman. They had to deal with the boundary, fences, drains, and the construction of roads through the reservations, questions of the simplest character. And what report did the hon. gentleman receive from all his agents? He was informed that the Indians were not sufficiently intelligent to enable them to work out such a system as that; and yet the hon, gentleman proposes give to them the right to exercise the franchise, the highest privilege that belongs to a free people. I say a more monstruous proposition was never submitted to a Legislature. The proposition is so much at variance with all our conceptions of freedom, that I cannot for a moment suppose that the hon, gentleman had simply the elevation of the Indian in view when he made it. The way to improve the Indian population is not to begin with the most complex features of our political organisation, but to begin with the simplest; not to begin at the top, but at the bottom. Now, I see before me the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General knows that a more unpopular measure than this Indian provision, in his section of the country, and in the very city which he represents, could not be put upon the Statute Book.

Mr. CARLING. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman will discover it if he does not know it. I have seen myself several communications from that city, from gentlemen who have hitherto supported him, and who declare that this is a monstrous proposition. I have seen communications from parties who have never given a vote except to a supporter of the First Minister, and who declare that if this Bill becomes law neither he nor a supporter of his will ever receive a vote from them again.

An hon, MEMBER. A good thing for you is it not?

Mr. MILLS. Well, Sir, I do not propose to do evil that good may come. The damnation of such parties is just who hold that view, and the condemnation of hon. gentlemen would be a most righteous act, there is no doubt about that. We do not seek to do wrong in order that we may profit by it; we leave that to the hon, gentleman. Now, I would say more in regard to this measure if there were not Indians in my own constituency. So far as the constituency of Bothwell is concerned, it does not make the slightest difference to me whother the hon, gentleman enfranchises or disenfranchises these Indians. I am opposing the proposttion, not because I expect either to gain or lose by it—that, I think, is a very secondary consideration. I am not so anxious to sit here that I am ready to support a wrong proposition, or to oppose one right in itself, that I may remain in Parliament. But I say that I am not the least afraid of being injured by the proposition which the hon, gentleman has submitted to us. I am confident that the number of men who will be turned against the hon, gentleman in the constituency, on account of this proposition, will exceed the number of Indian voters he expects to secure by it. say that it is a degradation of Parliament to undertake to introduce into this Assembly representatives of men who place no value upon the electoral franchise, who know nothing about our free institutions, nothing about its history, nothing about the struggles or difficulties by which its freedom has been obtained; and it is because the hon. gentleman has proposed to inflict a serious injury upon the country in this particular that I have entered my protest against this Bill. It is because this Bill possesses so many mischievous features that I have opposed it so long.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That is not the Indian question.

Mr. MILLS. I am discussing the principles of the Indian question, and I cannot for one moment admit that you, Sir, or anyone else, can undertake to carve out for me my line of argument upon this question. The proposition before us is so vicious in its principles, so degrading to free institutions, so well calculated to destroy representative Government, that I feel myself called upon to state the consequences which are likely to flow from its adoption. I have stated the reasons why I do so, no matter what may be the political effect of this measure. In the essay which I read yesterday from Mr. Gladstone, there is a statement to which I did not refer, but which is pertinent to this point. That distinguished statesman observes that nothing can be more disagreeable to a party or to a public man, in undertaking to consider the advantages which are to be gained by a particular proposition, than to consider its effect upon the party before he considers whether it is right or proper in itself. And, Sir, it is not a question of party, it is not the advantage which this may give to hon. gentlemen opposite, or the disadvantage which it may inflict upon this side of the House, that is the chief thing for consideration. Our system of government is a system which requires forbearance on the part of parties, a system under which the majority are supposed to put restraints on themselves by the consideration of what is right and just, and not by considerations simply of what will be of particular advantage to the party at the moment. It is not possible to preserve that moral elevation which is necessary for the security of freedom under representative institutions when measures of this sort are thrust upon the attention of Parliament and supported by a whole party. We must remember that when we have a proposition so atrocious as I consider this to be, submitted to Parliament for its consideration, and sought to be forced upon Parliament, there is such what is to be the effect on the whole party of the adoption of a course such as this. The principle of allegiance to party and of devotion to party leaders we may admit. It springs from qualities in human nature that tend to elevate rather than degrade it, if it is controlled within proper bounds and by proper principles. We see the devotion of hon. gentlemen opposite to the First Minister, their selfsacrifice, the extent to which they subordinate personal convictions to support measures he may propose; but when you go behind that, instead of a party existing for the purpose of accomplishing some great end, it exists merely as an end in itself. When office is held, not for the purpose of accomplishing some general progress for the benefit of the State, but for the purpose of securing particular individuals in power, then you are degrading party; and when you do that, all the people supporting that party throughout the country are naturally induced, except when the question is such as to revolt their moral senses, to give in their adhension. They are called on to seek for grounds on which to defend what is indefensible; they are asked to adopt lines of defence which, under other circumstances, they would immediately reject, and they so bring a whole party down to the lower level occupied by those who lead it.

Mr. FOSTER. Question, question.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman has not sufficient mental capacity—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I am in order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon gentleman is not talking to the question.

Mr. MILLS. I am.

Mr. Mills.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. If the hon, gentleman continues to address the Chair in that way I shall name him. I give the hon, gentleman fair warning. He has spoken in a rough manner to the Chair before, and I allowed it to pass; but I will not allow it to pass again. The hon, gentleman is now discussing the subject of allegiance to party and not the subject before the committee; and if he continues to do so I shall call him to order.

Mr. MILLS. I must be guided by my own judgment in these matters.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. MILLS. I have respect for the Chair, but I should like to exhibit it without sacrificing those feeling of selfrespect which I feel due to myself and to those who sent me here. In the line of argument I have taken I have only said what I believe to be strictly pertinent. I am pointing out that this question of the Indian franchise is a most serious question. The proposal is one which I think is most vicious in principle; and I am pointing out that this evil is not merely confined to its effect upon members of the party on that side or on this side of the House, but the mischievous effects of this measure are of a kind calculated to degrade the moral sense of the entire country. You may think, Mr. Chairman, this is not a matter pertinent to this question, but I do. It is a matter most pertinent. If this proposal is such as is calculated to bring about the moral degradation of the people that is a most serious objection to the measure proposed. If I can succeed in pointing that out and in making this House believe it as strongly as I feel it, and make the country feel it also, I shall accomplish, in a great measure, the objects I have in view in addressing this House. I care very little in itself whether hon, gentlemen carry this proposition of Indian enfranchisement or not. That is to me a matter of very secondary consideration; but I say it is a matter of grave consequence to see that the country to since I have had a seat in this Parliament I have never allowed myself to be biased by any personal or mere party consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. MILLS. I do not care a straw what the views of hon. gentlemen opposite are with respect to myself. I know myself what I do and the motive which governs me in my action and conduct. If you, Mr. Chairman, say that the discussion of the effect of this question on the conduct of parties is not in order, I am ready to take my seat. I altogether refuse to admit that that proposition is a sound proposition. It is so unsound I would not be a party to admitting that I have been out of order in discussing the tendency and effect of this proposition upon the people. The First Minister, when he made this proposition, declared it was his intention to enfranchise all Indians who had the qualifications required in this Bill. That would embrace every Indian in Manitoba who resides on a reservation. The hon. gentleman knows it. It would embrace, as he said at the time it was his intention to embrace, all the Indians of the North-West, the moment they had representation on the floor of Parliament. It would embrace all male Indians over 21 years, who reside within the Province of Ontario. I do not know how it will be in Quebec or the Martime Provinces, for their reservations are of less value; but so far as Ontario is concerned, there is not a reservation existing south of the Lakes that has not sufficient intrinsic value to give a vote to every male Indian over 21 years. I have entered my protest against this proposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they choose to persist with this measure, have a sufficient majority in Parliament to place it upon the Statute Book. But the hon, gentleman should remember that the question of right and wrong is not determined by a majority; that in the progress of mankind, general morality, intelligence and independence of the world, there is a minority who may be right, and it is said by one of the first writers on representative government, M. Guizot, a distinguished French statesman, that the acts of a majority are always open to question, because sovereignty does not rest with numbers, nor with the supreme authority of the State, but rests with the principle of natural justice, which lies behind law, upon which law is founded, and by which the maintenance of law must be defended. You may, Sir, as has been observed by another French statesman, defend law by bayonets, but they are uncomfortable things to sit upon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. MILLS. I am not going to discuss this proposition further. I have stated my objection to it. I say that the Indians who are not enfranchised, the Indians who are not qualified to accept the responsibilities of free men, are not qualified to accept the highest privilege of free men, the right of the election of members to this House. I say that the young men of this country, to whom yesterday you refused the elective franchise, the school teachers of this country, the students in the various law offices, the laboring men and clerks in the stores and shops, the men who are, by their honest labor, supporting their own families, are infinitely better qualified to exercise the elective franchise than those who are dependents on the State, and who would be reduced to destitution if it were not for Government interference. You have denied to 125,000 of the young white men of Canada the elective franchise; you refused it yesterday by a large majority; and while you voted that they should not have the franchise you now propose to give it to men who do not know one letter from another, who have no property under their own control, and who are in no respect qualified to exercise that high privilege which you propose to confer upon them.

which I belong, of the people of which I am a humble Mr. DAWSON. I intend, a little later in the evening, to representative, should be placed in such a position; for move an amendment with respect to the Indians, as subsection 10 to section 4, to make the law in regard to the Indians as like as possible to the law as it now exists in Ontario. Hon, gentlemen on that side have spoken very strongly in favor of the law of Ontario in every possible respect. They have spoken in favor of the law in the United States. We had long and eloquent speeches last night in favor of manhood suffrage, and we were pointed to the United States, where they enfranchised 4,000,000 of negroes. Are we to take them as an example and refuse to enfranchise

Mr.DAVIES. The negro was a free man when he was given the franchise.

Mr. DAWSON. And the Indians are free. They are certainly British subjects; they are certainly of independent disposition, and through the whole history of all those Indian tribes it was never possible to make slaves of them. They were always a free, independent and high-spirited race. Take the example furnished by the North-West just now. We have heard some hon, gentlemen very eloquent and occasionally very facetious about Pic-a-pot, Strike-him-on-theback and Poundmaker. It is much to be regretted that these Indians are in rebellion, and we must give every credit to our gallant volunteers who have gone out to that country to subdue the rebellion. But what does General Middleton say of the Indians, or, in other words, of the half-breeds, and in this part of the country, all through Ontario and Quebec, we have only half-breeds-there is not a full-blooded Indian among them? He gave them credit for being possessed of great courage, and he could not do otherwise, when, out of a force of  $45\overline{0}$ , with all the best implements of modern warfare against them, in the hands of the best troops, before they yielded more than one-half of their whole number fell down dead or bleeding where they stood. People that can do that must surely be capable, with proper training, of higher and better things than rebellion. We have had examples which show that the Indians are quite capable of exercising the franchise. Take the half-breeds, the same class of people we have here; the franchise was allowed to them in Manitoba, and it did them a great deal of good. It kept them quiet, and they sent half breed representatives to the Local Legislature or that Province, some of whom occupied the best offices, one of them being President of the Council, and they certainly were not behind the white men. These people who have been so sweepingly denounced, we must admit, are British subjects; they have some rights, and the question is how far we shall extend to them the privilege of the franchise. I am as much against extending the franchise to those who are not deserving of it as any person could be; but no one has proposed, as has been said here, to give the franchise to the wild Indians of the forests or the plains. By this Act it is provided that they must be possessed of property, they must live like their white neighbors before they can vote. They pay as high taxes, in proportion as any other people in the community. They pay indirect taxes to the Dominion Government, and they tax themselves, where it is required, to make roads through their farms and reservations, and they perform the duties of good citizens all over the country.

Mr. DAVIES. What taxes do they pay?

Mr. DAWSON. I have seen a very elaborate statement of the taxes paid by the Indians, made by a member of the other House, and it showed very clearly that the average taxes paid by the Indians at the present time to the Dominion Treasury is $6 a head.

Mr. DAVIES. Upon what?

Mr. DAWSON. Upon the goods they use.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes; furnished by the Superintendent General.

Mr. DAWSON. A great deal has been said about the annuities paid to the Indians, but they are not gratuities, but simply payments for their lands. We have heard them spoken of here as if they were living on charity; but that is by no means the case. The hon. gentleman spoke very strongly, and he used a string of strong terms, such as "most monstrous," "outrageous," "vicious," "unjust," "degraded," "atrocious," "mischievous," "calculated to degrade the people of this country," and so on. All these terrible terms which have been flung about so eloquently are very strong, but they prove nothing. Saying that an Act is monstrous and atrocious does not make it monstrous or atrocious. I think the speech we have listened to from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) would not do discredit to the darkest period of the dark ages, when the people were kept in thraldom, and were not allowed to assert their rights as men. The old law of Ontario was:

"All Indians or persons with part Indian blood who have been duly enfranchised, and all Indians or persons with part Indian blood who do not reside among Indians, though they participate in the annuities, interest-moneys and rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, subject to the same qualifications in other respec's, and to the same provisions and restrictions, as other persons in the electoral district."

That was for a long time the law of Ontario, and it worked exceedingly well in the district I represent. There were very few Indians there who had votes or who asked for votes; but in my district the right to vote was given to them by the British North America Act, which provided a household suffrage for the district of Algoma, which certainly applied to Indians as well as to all other persons in the district. In 1883, it having been, I suppose, represented to the Government of Ontario that the Indians were voting in a certain direction, they amended the law as follows:—

"All Indians or persons with part Indian blood, who have been duly enfranchised, and all unenfranchised Indians or persons with part Indian blood, who do not participate in the annuities, interest-moneys or rents of tribe, band or body of Indians, and do not reside among the Indians."

The fact of receiving the annuity from the Government prevented the Indian from voting under that law; but there was a good deal of discussion about it in different parts of Ontario, and the Government seems to have been, in fact, ashamed of it, for in the last Act they repealed that provision, and went back in the direction of the former law by adopting this provision:

"Where there is a voters' list, all Indians or persons with part Indian blood, who have been duly enfranchised, and all Indians or persons with part Indian blood who do not reside among the Indians, though they participate in their annuities, etc., but the Indians or persons with part Indian blood who are entitled to vote where there is no voters' list, shall be only the following, namely:—All Indians or persons with part Indian blood, who have been duly enfranchised, and all unenfranchised

That is one of the things which the hon. gentleman calls monstrous, enacted by the Government of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read on.

Mr. DAWSON-

"or persons with part Indian blood, who do not participate in the annuities, interest-moneys or rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, and do not reside among Indians."

Now, the phrase, "do not reside among Indians," is rather ambiguous; it might be construed to mean a man residing with his own family; but I presume the meaning was the Indians of the forest, who are not civilised in any way. But what I propose now to move is:

That an Indian or a person with part Indian blood, who has been duly enfranchised, or is an unenfranchised Indian or a person with part Indian blood, who lives in a fixed habitation and follows some trade, calling or occupation, common to civilised life, though he participate in the annuities, interest-moneys and rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, subject to the same qualifixations in other respects, and to the same provisions and restrictions, as other persons in the electoral district shall have a right to vote.

Mr. LISTER. That includes them all.

Mr. DAWSON. It does not; it includes only Indians who live like white men.

An hon, MEMBER. It includes Indians on the reserves

Mr. DAWSON. This question about the reserves just amounts to this: There are some Indians living on reserves who are very far advanced in civilisation, and who do not live among other Indians. There is one reserve on the Island of Manitoulin, which is about forty miles long, and in some parts of which the Indians are exceedingly 'scattered. There are not many of them in a position to exercise the franchise, and I do not believe that this Bill will give the franchise to a single Indian more than those who now enjoy it. It will deprive a few of the votes they formerly had on household suffrage, and a few outside of the reserves who have not houses of $150 value; but I do not think, on the whole, that it will make any perceptible difference in the number of Indians entitled to vote, at least, in my district. With regard to Walpole Island, which the hon. gentleman who last spoke has mentioned, there seems to be some alarm. I do not know the condition of the Indians on that island. But I should suppose there was no great risk in giving them the franchise, because I have been told that some of them are very far advanced in civilisation. We speak of the moral elevation of the Indians. I think the moral elevation of the Indians can be best brought about by showing them that they have a voice in the government of the country in which they reside, which once belonged to their ancestors, and which they ceded to the white man; and I will give you a very good example of that. In the Province of Manitoba the half-breeds have been conceded a right to a voice in the government. They vote for members of the Local Legislature, and if you compare them with the half-breeds of Ontario and Quebec you will find that they are considerably in advance of them in general intelligence, because they have been treated as men having rights, and I think we ought to pursue a similar course with regard to the Indians in the older Provinces. I think it will be something to be proud of and to rejoice over by this Parliament, that we have enfranchised the Indian race and given them something to lift them up from the condition in which they have always been held. We have but a very small number of Indians, comparatively speaking, between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and I, for one, will support this measure of enfranchisement. I am in favor of treating them as other people are treated. This Bill goes no further than that; it simply says that the Indian shall be a person. I hope the First Minister will adopt my amendment, which defines more clearly what Indians should vote. I think it will be an improvement on this clause, because the question has been raised as to whether Indians are not minors, who receive pay from the Government. The amendment I propose will settle that question; it will give Indians, who are qualified as white men, the right to vote; it will enable them to exercise the franchise if they are in a position to deserve the franchise.

Mr. WATSON. I am surprised to hear the hon member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) make the statements he has just made. He says that Indians have the right to vote in the election of members for the Manitoba Legislature and that they have seats in that House,

Mr. DAWSON. Half-breeds.

Mr. WATSON. Half-breeds are not Indians; they are not recognised as Indians in any sense of the word; they do not receive any annuities, and the Manitoba Act clearly defines that any Indian or any person with Indian blood, who receives an annuity from the Crown shall not be considered enfranchised and shall not have a vote. I am surprised that the hon. member for Algoma should insist that the half-breeds in Manitoba are Indians.

Mr. DAWSON. So they are. Mr. DAWSON. Mr. WATSON. If the hon. gentleman should go out there and call those half-breeds Indians he would probably lose his scalp, if scalping knives were around.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They must be Indians, then; white men do not scalp.

Mr. WATSON. If they were Indian they would probably scalp. The half-breeds in Manitoba are as true and as good business men and as intelligent as any white men in the country. The Indians are not; they still persist in carrying on the barbarous practices of the wild Indians of the forest; they have their sun dances, and torture themselves for the purpose of showing that they are brave men. The hon, gentleman says they are brave; they show themselves very brave by torturing themselves. I do not think that is a class that should be enfranchised in this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman says that by the Manitoba Act no Indian is allowed to vote who receives an annuity. That is true, because there are no Indian reserves there, and therefore there can be no annuities; but the Manitoba Act allows the unenfranchised Indians to vote.

Mr. WATSON. The Indians in Manitoba who receive annuities from the Crown, who receive annual allowances, are disenfranchised; but as soon as an Indian becomes educated in that Province, as soon as an Indian becomes a person, as the First Minister describes him, as soon as he is able to make a living for himself and does not receive an annuity. he has as good a right to vote as any white man, and I think that is right. The amendment of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) is no better than the Bill itself, because it provides that the Indian who is in receipt of an annuity shall have a vote. Those Indians cannot give an independent vote at the Dominion elections; they are subject to the powers that be; they receive any favors they get from the powers that be, and they certainly would be instructed to vote by their agent for the powers that be. The First Minister has stated that he intends to exempt Manitoba and British Columbia from the action of the Indian franchise. I am glad to hear that, but I am still sorry to see that the Indians in any part of the Dominion who are not enfranchised shall have a vote in the Dominion elections.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). This question of giving a vote to the Indians has been discussed in this House for a long time, and a great deal has been said with regard to the Indians on reserves. I do not know what position those Indians hold in other sections of the Dominion of Canada, because I am not acquainted with their position in other sections, or with the course they pursue, or with the claims they have against the Government; but I know that, so far as the township of Tyendenaga is concerned, that we get a large amount of taxes from the white settlers living on the reserve in that township. To say that the Indians on that reserve are beggars or beholden to the Government is not saying what is true. The hon. gentleman who sits behind you, and who was born in that township, and ought to be on this side of the House, knows that what I state is true, when I say that the British Government gave to the Mohawks the township of Tyendenaga, that parts of the township was sold and the money was invested for the Indians with this Government and the Ontario Government, and that there is now $100,000 of money which was paid by the white people, as part of that agreement, which has not been credited to the Indians, and which they are claiming and entitled to to-day. The money they get from the Government is the interest on the money received for the sale of their lands and invested for them at 4 per cent.; and there is not an hon. member in this House who, if he got by treaty from the Government the whole township of Tyendenaga, and occupied it as a reserve or rented it, or to whose credit the money for which any portion of it was sold, if any were sold, was placed in the hands of the Government, the annual interest to be paid to him as annuity, who would not consider that he was under no obligation to the Government for receiving that amount, as it was only his just due. I hold, therefore, that any man who says the Indians are beggars or dependents because they receive this annuity says what is not true. The hon. gentleman says they pay no taxes, but I can tell him that the township gets annually $700 from the white tenants on the Indian reserve. When there is a road made on the reserve or a bridge built the township council pays part of the expense and the Indian council pays the other part. Is there anything wrong in that? I ask hon, gentlemen opposite why they sneer before they know the facts. I contend that is just what one township always does to another. adjoining townships: if there is a boundary bridge or road made between them, does not each pay its share of the expense? If, on the reserve in the township which the Indians own and is now sold to the whites, a bridge or a road is made, the township council pays its share and the Indian council pays its share also. What is there wrong in that? Are the Indians therefore to be called beggars, or dependent, and be told that they are under a compliment to the Government of the day? Not at all; and I say that from the reserve the township gets from the settlers the sum of $700 per annum. Let me Let me just say that, so far as the Indians of the township of Tyendenaga are concerned, they own their own allotments of land. They make their agreements with the white men, the Indian council carries out those agreements, the rents are collected and paid to them, and they do with their rents as they please. The Government do not lay out the money for them, but send a cheque on the Bank of Montreal, and they take that cheque and do as they please with it. any white man do anything different from that? Then, they work their own land, they sell their own grain, they buy their own cattle and reaping machines and buggies, and they go to their church, and you will see them just as well dressed and as well conducted as any gentleman in this House. I say it is contemptible and mean for any hon. gentleman to stand up here and throw slurs upon them. They are just as true, just as loyal, just as generous, just as sober and industrious, as many of the men who stand up here and utter such harsh, unkind words against them. They are just as loyal to the Government and just as true to one another as hon. gentlemen who stand up and use harsh, unkind and unbecoming words in their regard.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman has made use of the words "contemptible and mean," with reference to remarks of hon, gentlemen in this House. These words are not parliamentary.

Mr. WHITE. Perhaps I have spoken too strongly, but have we not heard strong language on the other side? just heard the member for Algoma read a list of those strong adjectives—yes, very strong. Did you call those gentlemen to order? If I have used a word that is harsh it is because I feel that an injustice is done to a race of people who ought to be assisted, elevated and placed in their proper position. I do not believe there are ten Conservatives in the whole county of Hastings who will object to the Mohawks on the reserve getting a vote, and there are hundreds and thousands of Reformers who will be anxious to have them They have said so to me repeatedly; they have said that they are entitled to enfranchisement. There are Mohawks in the township of Tyendenaga who could sit in this House with benefit to the House and the country, and if this Bill becomes law I believe some members of the Indian bands will be elected to this House, and they will be a credit to it. I wish to day, from the inmost thoughts of my heart, that there was a member of an Indian band to stand up here and defend his race, for in that case there would not be so many slurs thrown or such unbecoming language used in regard to the Indians. The time is coming when they will. You cannot accuse them of being disloyal to the British Crown. You accuse them of everything bad you possibly can, and in a way which I do not think is becoming to the representatives of the people. I do not know what other Indians in other parts of the country may do, or how they are situated, but I say that, in the township of Tyendenaga, the Indians are entitled to the franchise and I hope they will get it. They are not all Conservatives. A few have votes now, and they are divided. Who can tell how they will vote? I think the member for South Brant will agree with me in that.

Mr. PATERSON. We will try to get some of them.

Mr. WHITE. Of course you will; a few Indians have the vote now, and some vote Conservative and some vote Reform. We are not battling to get them enfranchised because we believe they are all Conservatives, but because we believe it is right and just, and I believe the majority of the House will carry out that right and that justice with scarcely a dissenting voice, so far as the Conservative members are concerned. It has been said that I am very anxious to get the Indians enfranchised. There are lots of hon. members in this House who were not here when I first had the privilege of being a member, though they may have been here occasionally since. I have been here continuously for sixteen Sessions, and I believe that I can carry East Hastings whether the Indians are enfranchised or not. I have worked for many of the electors there for $4 and $5 a month, thirty-three or thirty-four years ago, and I am representing what some call a Reform constituency, though every time, except once, when I was opposed by a Conservative, I have been opposed by a Reformer. The First Minister and his Government did all they could to keep me from being a member of this House—the hon. gentleman who ought to be the leader of the opposite party, but who was treated as they treat the Indians, kicked, cuffed, insulted and put out.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WHITE. Order! Is it an insult to tell a man he is not fit to lead a party, that he is not fit for the position? I believe in speaking plainly and truly, and I wish he was now the leader of the Opposition, as he ought to be. But he was in the Ontario Government and he brought his candidate, and I fought the then leader of that Government and the then leader of this Government, and I got elected, and whether the Indians are enfranchised or not I believe I can be elected. But I say that they are entitled to the franchise, and I am satisfied they should get it.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has taken occasion to deliver a very violent tirade against some hon. members on this side of the House. What he has spoken about is not the issue we are now discussing. It is not whether the Indians have sufficient intelligence to exercise the franchise properly and discreetly, but what the Opposition contend for is, that so long as they are wards of the Government and under the control of the Indian agent and the Superintendent General, who, I believe, is the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government, it would be the grossest impropriety on the part of this Government, or any other Government, to enfranchise those people. It requires no difficult stretch of the imagination to see that, under the peculair circumstances in which they are situated, influences of every description would be used against these men, guileless as they are, in reference to the political institutions of the country; and the result would inevitably be that their vote would be cast on the side of the Government party. I am delighted to hear from the hon. member for North Hastings or South Hastings, I forget which.

Mr. BOWELL. He is neither.

Mr. LISTER-that the Indians have in the past few years improved their social and intellectual position to such an extent toat they are fit to exercise the franchise properly; but only three years ago, less than five years ago, the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government reported, in a Blue Book which he sent to the House as the result of his enquiries throughout the country, that the Indians, and among them those my hon friend from East Hastings talks about, were not in a position to be granted the simplest sort of municipal government. Will he tell me that, in these five years, these people have advanced so much in intelligence and become so well acquainted with the system of government that they are now in a prime condition to be entrusted with the ballot and to cast their votes intelligently. I fear the hon, gentleman does not speak in an entirely disinterested manner on this question. I believe he has a lingering hope that, if the franchise is granted to the Indians on the Tyendenega reserve, most of them will be found voting for him. Why does he not come out manfully and admit that these are the motives which actuate him, instead of putting on the mask and representing that his motives are purely and simply for the best interests of the Indian race thought that the Indians are sufficiently advanced in intelligence to exercise the franchise, by all means give it to them. But when you give them the franchise I think you ought to sever the bonds that exist between them and the Government of the day, and cast upon them all the responsibilities and duties of citizens. Why, Sir, if this class of men were placed upon the electorate we would have different reserves throughout this country invaded by such men as invaded Algoma and Muskoka district during the recent elections. The Indians would be influenced by emissaries of the Government. Sir, if these men were not, five short years ago, able to undertake the simplest form of municipal government, is it reasonable to suppose that to-day they are in a position to receive from this Parliament the right to undertake the highest and most complete system of government? Is it not a miserable subterfuge to say that this measure will have any other effect, or is designed to have any other effect, than to destroy one or two Liberal members of Parliament, and to make the seats of a few Conservatives more safe? But is that any compensation for this grievous evil that will be done to the country, by throwing amongst the electorate a class of men totally uneducated and ignorant of the most fundamental principles of responsible government? is idle to argue anything else, and the men who argue that the Indian, in the condition of bondage in which he now is, should be entrusted with the franchise, I claim are not acting sincerely. I consider that it would be dangerous to the commonwealth to place that class of men smong the electorate. The member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) remarked that the United States had enfranchised the Southern negroes. I admit it; but not until they had severed and shaken off the shackles of bondage in which those negroes lived. If you want to enfranchise the Indians of this country, enfranchise them, but cut from their feet the shackles which now bind them to the Government of the country. If these men are sufficiently intelligent to manage their own affairs, why is it necessary that the Government should send an Indian agent amongst them? Why, Sir, it would be in violation of the law for the Indians to sell one stick of timber off the reservation without the consent of the agent. They cannot enter into a contract by which they are bound, in the eye of the law, any more than a minor of 15 years of age. They cannot make a will but that it is subject to be disallowed by the Superintendent General. In every condition in which you look upon them they are as helpless, and more helpless, than the child of 10 years of age in this country. Yet men have the face to stand up in this Parliament and say that these men should be granted the franchise. A more monstrous proposition I never heard from the Mr. LISTER.

mouth of any living man—to say that the Government of the day shall keep these Indians in a state of bondage, that they shall keep them in a state of tutelage, to say that they cannot make a will without the sanction of a Government agent, that they can do nothing but what a child could do, that they are to remain under the influence of the agents on the Indian reservations throughout this country—I repeat that a more monstrous proposition was never uttered by the mouth of man, and I say the man who seriously defends that proposition is not sincere.

Mr. WHITE. I am sincere.

Mr. LISTER. I say if the man is sincere who states that, he has some sinister or selfish motive in what he says. Give the Indian a vote if you like. I have 500 of them in my county. I care not whether they are enfranchised or not. They cannot defeat me, if every man voted against me. Enfranchise them if you like, but, with enfranchisement, cast upon them all the responsibilities of other electors of this country. The hon. gentleman from East Hastings (Mr. White) says that a large majority of the Conservatives of his county would support the Indian franchise. I do not know what they would do in that county, but I do know that in other counties that is not the sentiment of the people. I would take the liberty of reading an extract from a letter received only to-day from a prominent and and life-long supporter of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. I say this extract echoes and voices the feeling of large numbers of Conservatives throughout western Canada. He says:

"I have been carefully watching the action of the Government in pushing through Parliament the Franchise Bill, notwithstanding the opposition offered to it by the Opposition. Although a Conservative all my life, and having much sympathy with the party in the past, I am compelled, in justice to myself and to my country, to protest against this most iniquitous measure as it is proposed to pass it."

He says further:

"The extension of the franchise to the Indians, and the revising barrister clause, must be, to every independent mind, an indication of weakness."

He goes on further to say:

"And as for myself, this measure alone compels me to cast off allegiance to the Conservative party and ally myself to the Opposition, who are contending for right against might."

If hon, gentlemen think proper to dispute the correctness of that letter, I say that the man who wrote it is one of the most prominent men in the section of country in which he lives, and that is not in my own county. He has been, as he states, a life-long supporter of the right hon, gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name; give us the name.

Mr. LISTER. I will give you the name if you will promise not to House it. I will let you see the letter. It is a private letter to myself, and I would be committing a breach of privilege to make it public.

Mr. WOODWORTH. When a letter is read to the House, or a portion of a letter, the House is entitled to have that letter laid upon the Table.

Mr. LISTER. Perhaps you would like to have a newspaper article laid upon the Table.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I would like to see the letter.

Mr. LISTER. Well, you are not going to get the letter. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) has told us that the Indians pay taxes. I say the Indians pay taxes in the same way as the rest of the citizens of this country. They pay taxes, of course, if the——

Mr. WOODWORTH. I rise to a question of order. The Chairman has not decided the point I raised, and before the member goes on any farther I would like to have that question decided. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has read here a letter; he has animadverted on that letter, and stated that it was from a life-long Conservative, a thick-and-thin supporter of the right hon Premier, and then he went on quoting the letter, and he now refuses to give the name of the writer and to place this letter on the Table. He stated it was private, after giving what portions of it he liked. That is not according to the rule. The rule says, any member who chooses to read a letter or portions of a letter is obliged to place that letter or paper on the Table, so that members may see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read the rule.

Mr. DAVIES. Before you decide the point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that only last Session a letter was read by a Minister of the Crown—a most important letter, an official letter, a letter affecting the moneys of the public to the extent of $375,000—and that letter, after it was read, was deliberately withheld by the Minister, who refused to place it in the hands of the committee, and to this day the country has never been able to get its hands on that letter. The action of the Minister was endorsed and backed up by the hon. member who has raised this point of order to-night.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) merely stated that he was quoting from a letter. He informed the committee that he did not propose to lay the letter before it, because it was a private communication. There can be no doubt that he stated that all he proposed to do was to quote from it. He practically laid it before this House and the committee when he read those extracts, and all that could be asked would be that he should, with his own hands, copy those extracts and hand them in. The committee could not call an hon, member to violate private correspondence and to lay such a document before the House.

Mr. VAIL. I will refer to a particular case. I remember in 1876-77 a letter was read in this House, and a party somewhat connected with it asked that it be read at the Table, and the Speaker decided that the House could not call for the letter.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hall). In my opinion, the point of order is not well taken. The rule cited refers only to public documents and not to private documents.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I want to state what the rule is.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. There can be no discussion on the Chairman's ruling, unless there is an appeal to the House.

Mr. LISTER. No doubt, when this Bill was first introduced it was the intention of the First Minister to enfranchise the Indians throughout the length and breadth of the We have the hon. gentleman's own statement, recorded in Hansard, that such was his intention—that the Indians in the North-West and British Columbia should be enfranchised; and we have the satisfaction of knowing that since then he has considerably modified those views; and now, if we can judge from his expressions and the expressions of the hon, member for Algoma, the intention of the First Minister is that this Bill shall only apply to the older Provinces of the Dominion. I admit that upon many of the reservations there are Indians who are probably well able to exercise the electoral franchise. But if that is the case, those Indians, if they want to exercise the franchise, have a method provided by law, by which they can become enfranchised Indians and be entitled to assume the same status as white men. There has never been, from any body of Indians in this country, any petition asking Parliament to confer on them the franchise. Further, there has never been a peti-tion from white people asking this Parliament to confer the franchise upon Indians. The idea of conferring the franchise on Indians was, no doubt, given to the First Minister member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), who is greatly interested in their enfranchisement.

Mr. DAWSON. I am not specially interested in Algoma in that way. I have stated already that I do not think this Bill will increase the Indians enfranchised in Algoma, and I say so now.

Mr. LISTER. This Bill must inevitably increase the electors in Algoma. I do not wish to deny the hon. member's statement, that he believes this Bill will not increase the electorate of the district of Algoma, and I am bound to give the hon, member credit for sincerity; but I know something about the district as well as the hon, gentleman, and in my opinion the conferring of the right to vote on Indians will largely increase the vote in that district. This is a recent idea of the First Minister to give Indians the vote. We have the fact that for seventeen years the hon. gentleman has, Session after Session, introduced a Bill to regulate the franchise throughout the Dominion. The Bill now before the House is the first time the hon, gentleman has proposed to give the Indians votes. The First Minister had not such an idea in 1880, because in that year he reported to this House that the Indians were not sufficiently advanced to exercise intelligently the simplest form of municipal government. I believe that in no other country in the world would such a proposition be entertained or be made by the Executive. In the United States they have Indian reservations, the same as we have. In the State of New York there are a number of reservations; in the Western States there are reservations as well as in the Eastern States. The Indians there are under the control of the Government, as are the Indians in Canada. They receive gratuities, just as our Indians do; and in the State of New York, where a large number of them are to be found, they are equally intelligent with our Indians. The facilities for educating them are fully equal, if not superior, to those in this country, and in every respect they are equal, it not superior, to the Canadian Indians. And who ever heard of the United States-that country of manhood suffrage, that country which gives to every immigrant that comes into it the right to exercise the franchise and take a part in the affairs of that great nation-who ever heard suggested or whispered an intention on the part of the Government of that country to confer on the Indians the right to vote? Why, Sir, the proposition is too monstrous to have found a resting place in the minds of any statesmen on the other side of the line. It remained for Canada—that country of queer political doings—to invent the idea of giving the Indians votes. It is not to be wondered at that in Canada this idea should find a plce and find advocates, when we remember our peculiar political condition, when we cast our eyes back for a few brief years, and remember what has taken place in this country. I say it is not at all surprising that the First Minister should be found introducing a Bill such as the one now under consideration, a Bill which I have characterised before as a fit companion to the infamous Gerrymander Bill which was passed in 1882. I say we have no right, under any such state of circumstances, to give the Indians a vote. In the eye of the law the Indian is a minor; he has not one of the responsibilities of citizenship cast upon him. He is not able to enter into a contract which is binding upon him; he is unable to make disposition of his goods, by will or otherwise; he is unable to make any disposition of his land, or what pertains to his land; he is under the control of the Superintendent General, through his agents throughout this country. He has a right to expect that advantages might be withheld from him if he does not act in accord with the wishes of the Superintendent General and of the Government of which he is a member. These, Sir, are circumstances which would by an hon, gentleman in this House, probably by the hon. Influence the Indian, and would influence the white man, if he occupied the same position. The Indians are only human, like ourselves, and with such resistless means of influencing him, is it unreasonable to suppose he would cease to be a free man; that his ballot would be cast under pressure and his vote would be given in support of the Government? Is it a worthy act of the Government; does it redound to their credit; does it show courage on the part of the Government, that they should attempt to take this power into their hands? Surely they are strong enough in the country without doing that. We have heard, over and over again, the changes rung in this House that the party in power are as powerful as ever, and if they are, with two to one in the House, why are they afraid to go back to the country without this piece of legislation, giving the Indians a right to vote under the circumstances I have attempted to describe. Sir, the only reason which the hon, member for Algoma gave for conferring the franchise upon the Indians was that they pay taxes manhood suffrage in this country, in which case there would be some logic in the argument of the hon. gentleman; but, unfortunately for him, that is not a principle which actuates the First Minister in this legislation. The principle here is a different principle altogether. The hon, gentleman has thought proper to quote the law from the statutes of Ontario, but I believe the statute which he quoted is a statute relating to the district of Algoma, and not to the other portions of Ontario—a district which had exceptional legislalation, where certain people were allowed to vote, and where people who, perhaps, lived in a tent all night, called themselves householders. But, Sir, the legislation of the Province of Ontario is fair in every respect, because it permits the Indian to vote if he is enfranchised. If he is free from the influences which the Government can exercise over him, and if he is not residing amongst the tribal Indians, he has a vote, provided he has the same property qualifi-cation as a white man. In that respect the grounds on which the vote is given are perfectly clear and logical, because there can be no possible influence of the the Government if the Indian is not living on the reserve and ceases to be under the influence of the agent in charge under the Government. Then, I say the measure before the House, as well as the amendment, should be rejected by this House, from the statement made by the First Minister himself in 1880, when he proclaimed that the Indians were not fit to assume the rights and powers of municipal government. It should be rejected because the Indians are infants in the eye of the law, and are in a state of tutelage, under the control of the Government. Until that influence is removed I say it would be unjust and disgraceful for any party to enfranchise these people. If they are intelligent enough to exercise the franchise, give it to them. But give them their money or their property, to do with what they like. If you say they are not provident enough to take care of their property, that they will waste it, then you admit all we contend for; you admit that they should not exercise the right to vote. If you say it is the duty of the State to preserve their property, you admit their want of intelligence, their want of thrift, and all that we complain of as reasons for their not receiving the franchise. That being the case, it would be unwise, unstatesmanlike and disgraceful, on the part of any political party of this country, to confer the franchise on these people, under the circumstances I have stated.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to offer a word of explanation. The hon, gentleman who has just spoken was kind enough to attribute to me personal motives in the view I take of the Indian franchise. I do not think that was quite parliamentary; but I can assure the House that I have no per-sonal motives in the matter. As regards the district I and responsibilities conferred upon white men.

represesent, I think the Bill will leave the franchise much the same as it is at present, though eventually, as the Indians become civilised, the number enfranchised may be increased. We have not a large number of settled Indians in Algoma, although we have a great number of wild Indians in the forest; and until they begin to settle down, the Indian franchise in the district I represent will not be very large. Again, he says the only reason I gave why Indians should have votes was that they pay taxes. I did not give that as a reason why they should have votes, but why they should not be deprived of votes. If all the Indians in Algoma had votes to-morrow, I have no knowledge that they would vote for me, for a large proportion of the few who had votes voted against me at the last election.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) displayed a good deal of warmth in dealing with this question, and used a good many strong words and phrases in reference to other hon, gentlemen who have into the Dominion Treasury. Now, if that was the principle phrases in reference to other hon, gentlemen who have upon which the franchise was adopted, then we would have spoken on this subject—I thought, perhaps, more than he was justified in using, under the circumstances. He imputed improper motives to the hon member for East Hastings (Mr. White) because he supported the measure, and said that no hon, gentleman who spoke as that hon, gentleman did was sincere. He talked as if he was speaking from principle; but, after a little, he inadvertently let out what was the secret of his warmth on this question. He said there were several hundred Indians in his constituency, and then he went on to say, in a boasting way, that he did not care whether they were enfranchised or not. Any one listening to his argument must reasonably have come to the conclusion that with him there were personal considerations at stake; and if he can impute improper motives to the hon. member for East Hastings and the hon. member for Algoma, we can, with equal propriety, impute improper motives to him in the argument he advanced. He said it was the most monstrous proposition ever submitted to this House; that in no other country in the world would it be undertaken, and that we have no right to give the Indian the privilege of voting; yet his next proposition was that the legislation of Ontario was fair in every particular. If the hon, gentleman had been as fair as he professed to be, he would have admitted that the Province of Ontario has given the Indians the right to vote already, and that they have voted time and again. Yet he says the law which allows them to vote is fair in every particular, but it is not fair for this House to pass a law to give them a right to vote. I know something about how the Indians were dealt with. In the election before last, in the Muskoka district, the timber inspector there, who supported Mr. Mowat's candidate, went out among the Indians, and it was currently reported, and I believe correctly, that he bought up nearly all the Indians in the district, collected them in one place, and took them to the polls and got them to vote. After that he took the Indians away, took their dresses from them and put them on the squaws, and took them in, and got them to poll their votes. That was done under the law of Ontario and by the friends of the Ontario Government. But it was rumored that Mr. Mowat's timber inspectors did not retain that control over the Indians that they would wish, and he inserted in his Bill that nice little clause, that any unenfranchised Indian receiving any money from the Dominion Government should have no right to vote; but as long as he could get the votes of the Indians, he was perfectly willing to give them the right to vote. There is nothing done by this Bill but what has been done before; there is nothing unreasonable in it; and I believe, if there is one thing more than another that will tend to the moral elevation of the Indian to the level of the white man, it is to give him the right to vote, to confer upon him the same privileges, duties

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I had supposed, after the strongly expressed views of the representatives of the Province of British Columbia, who so firmly support the Government, that the hon. First Minister would have re-considered his Bill and allowed it to apply to the Indians in all the Provinces and to the North-West Territories alike. With reference to this Indian question, if we are to judge hon. members opposite by some of their observations and by the articles we see in the press, it is a question that is not thoroughly understood by them yet, and it is desirable that there should be sufficient discussion to enable us to ascertain what the position of the Indian really is, and what benefits we propose to confer upon him by the Act now before us. Hon. gentlemen opposite profess that they are championing the cause of the Indian, that they are desirous of lifting him up from the lower scale he occupies to a higher level; and they assume to themselves a certain amount of virtue in saying that they desire to do that, and, by necessity, would seek to fasten on members on this side of the House, who are not in favor of extending the vote to the Indians in the manner proposed in this Bill, the charge that they are actuated by a desire to keep some human beings, who are possessed with souls like other people in the community, in a lower sphere than the latter occupy. Do those hon, gentlemen not know that not only in this land, but in all lands where constitutional government prevails, it has been the Liberal party who have maintained the rights of the people, who have sought to elevate the masses, who have ever sought to confer privileges and blessings upon them, who have ever sought to aid those who are stuggling upward in the race for life; and if they have been opposed at all in this good war, they have been opposed by the party represented by hon gentlemen opposite. The very tradition, the history, the record of the Liberal party, ought itself to be enough to convince hon gentlemen opposite, without any statements or arguments on this side, that when they interpret the actions of hon, gentlemen on this side as a desire to keep down human beings in this country and not to give to them liberties and rights, they have misapprehended our position and fail to understand the queston. Who opposes the elevation of the Indians and the enfranchisement of the Indians? Is it any one on this side of the House? Is it not the desire of every one on this side, as I trust it is of hon. gentlemen on that side, that the Indian may become elevated, raised in the public scale, and have conferred upon him the rights and privileges to which he is entitled, as soon as he is able to assume the responsibilites of citizenship? But I reiterate what I have stated before, that the Bill in your hands, Sir, the proposition of the Government in this Bill, is not to elevate the Indian one iota, not to elevate him in the slighest degree in the social scale; it is to do nothing for the Indian mentally, physically, morally, or financially—it is simply a proposition to give a vote to the Indian unemancipated, under the management of the Government, and controlled by the Government. In fact, it is a proposition to place a certain number of votes at the control of the Government, for the purpose of strengthening themselves in the position they occupy. This is a question in which there need be no darkness at all. We have the official documents; we have the laws relating to Indians; we have the machinery that has been devised by Governments preceding this Government and continued by this Government, by which the Indian may be elevated, may be enfranchised; and the very resolution, the very amendment that is in your hands, Sir, offered by an hon. member on this side, shows you plainly that there is no desire on the part of hon, gentlemen on this side to keep the Indians unenfranchised. The resolution is that the vote shall be given to all duly enfranchised Indians. We propose to give it to the enfranchised Indian; we want to give it to every enfranchised Indian; we, on this side, desire that the Indians, as soon as because, as I said before, I do not think it should be our policy to force a measure on the Indians, but to give them the privilege and opportunity of becoming enfranchised, when they are prepared to avail themselves of this opportunity. If hon, gentlemen opposite vote down this proposition, they will vote down a proposition to give a vote to every enfranchised Indian, and they will place themselves in the position that their desire is to give the vote to the unemancipated, unenfranchised Indians. Let me point out to you the actual position of hon. gentlemen opposite, as shown by reference to the Indian Act. The hon. member for East Hastings spoke rather warmly, with reference to some expressions which fell from the hon. member for Manitoba (Mr. Watson) and some others with reference to some of the Indian bands. He appeared to resent them as warmly as though some of the descriptions were applicable to the particular band of Indians with which he is more acquainted. This fact must be borne in mind, that there is a difference in the progress which has been made by the Indians, not only in the different Provinces, but in the different bands in the Provinces. There is no doubt about that; the Indian law recognizes that fact, and therefore the proposition to give a vote to, or even to enfranchise the Indians, as a body, in any of the Provinces, is a proposition too general in its scope, for there are but few bands, that I know, of which would be fitted to everying it. There was a band in the country be fitted to exercise it. There was a band in the county of Essex, the Wyandotts, who became wholly enfranchised, who assumed the responsibilities of citizenship, and who have a vote, as they are entitled to have. Other advanced Indians in different bands who are in a sufficiently advanced position and desire to become enfranchised, have the means placed in their hands, in the machiney of the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act, to become enfranchised; and in that way alone can you enfranchise the Indians, in that way alone can you make the Indians citizens of this country, receiving its full rights and liberties and assuming its full responsibilities? It is idle to say that the Bill before us enfranchises the Indian, as that word is understood in the Indian Act. It cannot do it; the First Minister himself would tell you, if you asked him, that it cannot do it. In what position are the unemancipated and unenfranchised Indians? Read the opening clauses of the Indian Act alone:

"The expression 'Superintendent General' means the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; the expression 'Deputy Superintendent General' means the Deputy Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs; the expression 'agent' or 'Indian agent' means and includes the commissioner, saisstant commissioner, superintendent, agent, or other officer acting under the instructions of the Superintendent General; the expression 'person' means any other than an Indian; the expression 'band' means any tribe, band or body of Indians who are on, or are interested in, a reserve, or in Indian lands in common, of which the legal title is vested in the Crown—"

That is how the lands of these individuals are held. The title is vested in the Crown.

"who share alike in the distribution of any annuities or interest monies for which the Government of Canada is responsible."

Now, when we come to the Department of Indian Affairs, we see how completely the unemancipated, unenfranchised Indian is under the control of the Superintendent General of the Indians and his local agents residing on the reserves:

"The Minister of the Interior, or the head of any other Department appointed for that purpose by the Governor in Council, shall be the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and shall, as such, have the control and management of the lands and properties of the Indians in Canada."

is in your hands, Sir, offered by an hon. member on this side, shows you plainly that there is no desire on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side to keep the Indians unenfranchised. The resolution is that the vote shall be given to all duly enfranchised Indians. We propose to give it to the enfranchised Indian; we want to give it to every enfranchised Indian; we want to give it to every enfranchised Indian; we, on this side, desire that the Indians, as soon as they are ready to avail themselves of this right, should have it,

"There shall be a Department of the Civil Service of Canada which shall be called the Department of Indian Affairs, and which shall have the management, charge and direction of Indian affairs. The Governor in Council may appoint an officer who, shall be called the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and may also appoint such other officers, clerks and servants as are requisite for the proper conduct of the business of the Department. The Governor in Council may also, from time to time, appoint officers and agents to carry out this Act and Orders in Council made under it, which officers and agents shall be paid in such a manner and at such rates as the Governor in Council directs, out of any fund that is appropriated by law for that purpose."

I have read these sections in order to point out how absolutely under the control of the Superintendent General and his local officers and agents the unemancipated, unenfranchised Indians are. They have the sole control and management of the Indians' affairs. While retaining them in that position the hon. gentleman proposes to give them a vote. Without going through the whole Act, which is not necessary, I would point out where the hollowness, if I say not the hypocrisy, of this Bill is, when there is an attempt made to justify it on the ground that it is designed to do the Indian some good or to raise him in the social scale. There is a way by which that can be accomplished, but it is only by the machinery provided in the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act. In that way alone can an Indian be elevated, can he be made a free man, can he occupy the same plane occupied by the white citizens of this country. But is there a proposition from the Government to amend the Indian Act in the direction of giving greater facility to the Indian to become enfranchised, by making these clauses less strict, by shortening the term of probation, by making it easier for the Indian to avail himself of the Act, to do away with clauses of the Indian Act which have been revised and are kept in operation with a view of keeping the Indian as an Indian, of keeping him on the reserve, of retarding any desire that might be in him to burst the bonds and to get greater freedom. There are clauses in the Indian Act designed by the parties who put them there to prevent the Indian leaving the reserve and mingling with the white people, and endeavoring to work his way upward, as the other races in the country work their way up in the struggle, in the battle, and in the race of life. The Indian Act, as it will stand after these unemancipated Indians are given the right to vote, inflicts fines and penalties on the Indian who will leave his reserve and try to make a man of himself. Let me read you a section:

"Any Indian who, for five years continuously, has resided in a foreign country, without the consent, in writing, of the Superintendent General or his agent, shall cease to be a member of the band of which he or she was formerly a member, and shall not again become a member of that band, or any other band, unless the consent of such band, with the consent of the Superintendent General or his agent, is first obtained."

If an Indian would like to leave a reserve where his energies are crippled, and has public spirit enough to go to the Republic to the south of us, as many of our sons go, if he goes there and engages in some trade, or calling, or occupation, and works his way up, then the Indian Act imposes a penalty on him if he does not come back within five years. and settle on the reserve. Why not give him liberty to go, and wish him God-speed, as you do to your own boy? Why impose the penalty that, if he ventures to do that, his share of the land which he holds in common with the others shall be forfeited, as to the leases. Either the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) has been mistaken in the proposition he laid down as to the Indians in Tyendenaga leasing their holdings, or those Indians who have violated the provisions of the Act and are liable, and the men who have leased from them are liable. The Indian Act is framed to prevent an Indian leasing his land to a white man. I think t would have been a good thing to give the Indian the right, when he desired to do it, to lease his holding to a respectable white man. In that way, they would have intelligent, capable white farmers scattered throughout the reserve, whose example would be an incentive to the Indians ceeding. Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

engaged in agricultural pursuits to imitate them in their better modes of farming. But our Indian Act is framed on the principle: Do not let the whites get in there at all, or the Indians will become so advanced that they will not want to remain in the state in which they are; and if they do not want to remain in that state, the office, the employment, the services of the local agent will not be wanted. The tendency is to keep the Indiam where he is. It is not so very long ago that our Indian Act was framed in such a manner that this was the effect of it. It was changed, and I take a little credit in a humble way for having it changed; but, under the Act as it stood, if an Indian woman lived in a state of adultry with a white man and had five or six children, she and her children would draw their shares of the interest money of the band; but, if she turned round, and married that white man, and lived according to the laws of God and man, our Indian Act cut her and her children off from receiving their share of that fund. We got that wiped out, and now the Indian woman can marry a white man and get her share, but her children cannot participate in it. Whether we went far enough or not I will leave you to decide, but at any rate we made a step in the right direction. There is the field in which gentlemen opposite, who desire to advance the cause of the Indian, should work. Help the men who desire to see the Indian advanced. By this Bill you do not do anything in that direction, but you should, by amendments to the Indian Act, remove the disabilities under which you put a progressive Indian, you should make more simple the machinery by which the Indian seeking enfranchisement may obtain it. Then you may fairly claim to be the friend of the Indian and one who desires to help him forward in his course. I might go on, for almost every clause of the Indian Act shows the complete state of the tutelage and wardship in which the Indian is held. The first section I read shows that the control and management of his affairs are in the hands of the Government, and every section of the clause defines when, where and how the Government may come in and exercise that control. The clause relating to what I spoke of last, with reference to Indian an woman marrying a white man, stands now in the amended form this way in the Act. (The hon. gentleman read section 11 of the Indian Act, relating to intermarriages). So, any woman who marries a white man forfeits her rights to her share in the land which she has in common with all the other members of the band. I leave it to the committee to say whether that is right or not; but permitting her to share in the annuities, as we do here, is a great advance upon what the law was a few years ago, when, if she married a white man, that would have entailed upon her the further penalty of losing the interest of the money to which she is entitled.

Mr. HICKEY. She would have had a good protector when she married the white man, as much as any other woman.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes; but the hon, gentleman would hardly say that a white woman, when she marries a man, should therefore forfeit any property she had in her own right. The design of the Indian Act is to keep Indians from intermarrying with the whites, to keep them shut up on their reserves, and to remain in their present state.

Mr. BERGIN. Then you think it desirable that white men should marry Indian women.

Mr. PATERSON. I think if a white man and an Indian woman desire to be united in the bonds of matrimony, this Parliament of Canada ought not to impose any fines or penalties for doing so.

Mr. BERGIN. It does not.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, it does; I am pointing that out. Mr. BERGIN. You are trying to, but you are not succeeding.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I trust, Mr. Chairman, I have convinced you. I have pointed out that the Indian woman, if she married a man remaining on the reserves, has her share in common of the lands there, but if she marries a white man she forfeits her share of the land. And, in addition to forfeiting her share of the land, she at one time forfeited her share of the interest money. We have amended the Indian Act, as concerns the interest money, but the penalty of forfeiting her share in the lands is still upon the Statute Book. I have pointed this out, showing that the whole tendency of the Indian Department and the management of it, is in the direction of keeping the Indians as Indians, of repressing them, of keeping them down. There is a clause which says a man shall forfeit his right in the lands if he lives for five years in the United States, if he has enough courage, if he has enough public spirit, to go over there and work his way up, and does not come back inside five years and go on the reserves. Now, let us take one or two other clauses, just to see the position the Indian occupies. (The hon, gentleman read section 20, where the Indian may devise certain property by will.) Now, he may make his will, but if it is not approved by the Superintendent General that ends the matter.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The approval follows the approval by the band.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; and here again you see the lack of control on the part of the Indian. Even if the Super-intendent General was not there, they are controlled, in devising their own property, by the band. Does not that show the absence of self-control on the part of the individual? If he fails to have done that, then he is declared to have died intestate, and the will is of no force at all. They may make their will, but if it is not approved by the band, and also by the Superintendent General, that ends the matter, and the Indian Act declares he shall have died intestate. (The hon, gentleman read section 30, prohibiting the Indian selling their produce under certain fines and penalties)

Mr. BOWELL. Does this apply to all tribes?

Mr. PATERSON. It applies to the Indians of the Province of Manitoba, the District of Keewatin, and the North-West Territory.

Mr. BOWELL. It does not apply to the Indians of Ontario?

Mr. PATERSON. No. It applies to the Indians to whom this Bill proposes to give votes. These Indians are not able to dispose of their produce, except under certain restrictions. When this Act passes the Manitoba Indians will be in the position of voters.

Mr. WHITE. No, they will not be in that position.

Mr. PATERSON. We have had the member for East Hastings telling us so.

Mr. WHITE. No; you had the First Minister making the statement that the Indians of Manitoba and British Columbia were not to be included in this Bill.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. Minister has changed his mind, because he explicitly answered the hon. member for Bothwell that this Bill would include the Indians of the North-West Territory and British Columbia. The hon. gentleman changed his mind after the question had been debated—about a week afterwards.

Mr. WHITE. On the very same day the conversation occurred with the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. MILLS. By looking at Hansard, the hon. gentleman will see it was nearly a week afterwards.

Mr. PATERSON. One of the members for British Columbia last night assured us he wanted the Indians to vote.

So we have reason to believe that the First Minister has changed his mind again.

Mr. WHITE. It would not apply to them, either.

Mr. PATERSON. It was on 4th May that the Minister made that statement. It was drawn from him by members of the Opposition; and, recollecting this fact, it is rather too much to blame us for the original statement of the First Minister, that he proposed to give the franchise to Indians, who, under the Indian Act, were not at liberty to sell any of their own produce.

Mr. WHITE. Suppose we admit that the First Minister changed his mind. You are arguing now as if he had not changed his mind. Yet you say he has done so.

Mr. PATERSON. Now the hon, member for Cardwell admits—

Mr. WHITE. I admit nothing. I said: Assume he has changed his mind.

Mr. HICKEY. The First Minister asked that the discussion on clause 9 should stand over; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) will not wait for the explanation.

Mr. PATERSON. The First Minister was asked to give an explanation, but he said the discussion had better go on.

Mr. BERGIN. Not a discussion on the Indian Act, which is not before the House, but the discussion on the Franchise Bill.

Mr. PATERSON. What I gathered was, that perhaps the First Minister's mind was not fully made up. He says he consults his colleagues, and it may be that after further discussion he will go further than the announcement made on 4th May. He, himself, said that the discussion had better go on; and therefore, at the request of the First Minister, we are going on with the discussion, and it does not come with good grace from hon. gentlemen opposite, after we have been invited to go on, to say we should have taken another opportunity to do so. They must have forgotten that we are discussing this matter at the express wish of the Minister himself.

Mr. BOWELL. In all fairness, does the hon. gentleman think it is right to discuss the Indian Act and then to take the provisions of this Bill as applicable to the tribes in the North-West and in Manitoba, and make the declaration he has done, after the declaration of the First Minister, that he did not intend to enfranchise those Indians. I ask whether that is a fair argument?

Mr. PATERSON. No; I was not using it in that way. Hon. gentlemen have interrupted me so often—and I do not object—that I had not finished the reasons why I entered upon that line of argument. I was pointing out that the First Minister had declared, after discussion, that he would exempt those Indians; and I have just said that I do not know whether the First Minister has not again changed his mind on that matter, whether he does not mean to recede from the position taken on 4th May, and include the Indians of British Columbia and Manitoba, that idea being forced on my mind by the line of argument adopted by the members for British Columbia last night, and their statements that they desired to have Indians enfranchised.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I rise to a point of order. The hon member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) are repeatedly making the statement that the members for British Columbia have said so-and-so regarding the Indians. I beg to remind those hon. gentlemen that because one hon. member—and, as a rule, I have the greatest regard for what he says, and I pay him all legitimate deference to which he is entitled—still I do not allow him to speak for me, or for the whole of the members of British Columbia, whether as regards the enfranchisement of the Indians or any other subject. I also wish hon. members of the Opposition to understand that I am not to be coerced into speaking when I do not feel inclined, nor am I going to be retarded when I do feel inclined.

Mr. PATERSON. I am very sorry if I have done injury to the hon, member, as I did not mean to do so. I suppose I used the term "members for British Columbia," instead of saying "the junior member for Victoria (Mr. Shakespeare)." The senior member for Victoria (Mr. Baker) has not yet expressed himself publicly on this question.

Mr. BAKER. He may, ere long.

Mr. PATERSON. I was going to say that perhaps the First Minister may again change his mind. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I should judge from what they say, mean to exempt Manitoba from the operation of the Bill, in which case the section I read, prohibiting the Indian from selling his produce, or another person from buying it, would not be applicable, and therefore it may be left out of consideration. But every other provision I read as to the disabilities of the Indians applies to the most advanced bands of Indians in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and to the most advanced Indians in those bands. There are intelligent men, who have made a great deal of progress, so far as opportunity had been given them, on some of the reserves. I will give you an instance in point. One of the Indians from my own reservation came to see me the other day, and he had some business with the Department of Indian Affairs. He belonged originally to another reserve, and he had gone from that reserve to the Six Nation reserve, had married a Six Nation woman, and had lived on the Six Nation reserve for some time. He is acting as interpreter there, and is, besides, a kind of lay missionary. His appearance, his dress and his mode of conversation were as creditable and as gentlemanly as that of many gentlemen in the House at the present time. He was one of the most advanced Indians it was possible to find. I went with him to the Department of Indian Affairs. His mission there was to receive compensation for improvements made on his homestead, on the reserve where he had lived before going to the Six Nation reserve. He told the officer that he came for that purpose, and he was asked on what pay-roll he was entered. "The Six Nation," he said. "Then you are not on the other," said the officer. "No," he said, "and though I am on the pay-roll of the Six Nation, I have no land there." "No, I suppose not," said the officer, "because you have no right, but your wife has." "Yes," he said, "but I have not and I cannot get any." "No," was the reply, "because when you married you should have been sent back to your own reserve with the woman you married." That, Sir, to an educated, intelligent Indian, who acts as a lay missionary and interpreter. The official only did what the law required, but this will show you how absolutely even these intelligent Indians are under the control of the Government—just as absolutely as the most ignorant. Now, allow me to call your attention to section 38, which will show, either that the hon. member for East Hastings was mistaken in what he said, or, if he was correct in stating that the Indians were leasing their own lands, and drawing their own money on their own account, they were acting in violation of the Indian Act. (The hon. gentleman here quoted section 38 of the Act in question). Now, Sir, how shall we advance the Indians. It has been stated several times that in 1880 the Superintendent General sent out enquiries to the different agents throughout the Provinces, but more particularly, I believe, in the Province of Ontario, to ascertain what advancement the Indian tribes had made, with a view of determining whether they might not adopt something in the form of municipal government for the management of their own affairs. In his report the Superintendent General regrets to say that in them cast their votes for. But there is no disguising Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

the great majority of cases the answers were not favorable; that the Indians, even in the Province of Ontario, had not advanced sufficiently to adopt anything like a simple form of municipal government for the management of their own affairs. The matter lay in abeyance, and last year the House passed what is called the Indian Advancement Act, an Act which is designed to enable the more advanced bands of Indians to adopt a simple kind of municipal government, or, in other words, to enable them to substitute councillors to be elected by themselves to manage their own affairs, instead of there being managed by chiefs, as they have been in times past. That Act provides: (The hon. gentleman read several clauses of the Act in question). Last year this House passed this Act, by which the more advanced bodies of Indians, with the consent of the Superintendent General, might try the experiment of managing their municipal affairs by the election of councillors, instead of living them to be managed by their chiefs; and we had no more confidence in the ability of even the most advanced Indians to do that than to provide that, if after trying it, they had found it not to work satisfactorily, the Government could at any time, by Order in Council, compel them to abandon it and return to their former system. And yet it is proposed to give the right to vote for members of this House to Indians of whose ability to elect councillors to manage their municipal affairs we had great doubt. That Act further provides that the local agent of the Superintendent General shall preside at the meetings of those councillors and control and regulate all matters of procedure and form. If the Superintendent General were in his place, I would like to ask him whether any of the Indian tribes have taken advantage of this Advancement Act. I do not know whether any of his colleagues or any hon. gentlemen opposite can give me the information; but I do not myself know of any band having availed itself of the permission there provided. The Indians in my own county, I claim, are as advanced as any other Indians in the Dominion of Canada, and they met the other day to consider whether they should adopt it, and they decided that for the present they would not do so; and yet we propose, in this Bill, to confer upon them the highest duty of citizenship—to vote as to who shall make the laws of the land. The proposition is so indefensible that I do not wonder that hon, gentlemen opposite are so disgusted at hearing the absolute control the Department possesses over these Indians in all their affairs pointed out by hon, gentlemen on this side of the House. In that Advancement Act the Superintendent General retained pretty summary powers of dealing with the members of the council. If any member should be proved to be a habitual drunkard, to be guilty of taking a bribe, or of dishonesty or immorality, the Superintendent General could remove him from that position; and yet hon, gentlemen opposite will continue to argue that the Indians are entitled to the same rights and privileges as other citizens of this country while in their present position. The proposition is so ridiculous that we have not found hon gentlemen opposite rise up and discuss it on its merits. Nor has their press discussed it, nor can it be maintained, because it is a proposition not designed to benefit the Indians, but it is a proposition, the effect of which it is hoped will be that strength will be added to the Government in some constituencies, by the aid of the votes given to those Indians, who are so much under the Government's own control. But it has been denied that this provision will give an advantage to the Government. It has been said that the Indians will divide in their political views as they do in religious matters. That is true; I have no doubt that the Indians, individually, have their different views and sentiments; Indians differ, as do white people; and it is probable that very many of these Indians will cast their votes for those whom the Government would not care to have what is revealed in the laughing, shining face of White). the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. He sees safety for himself at the next general election in this Indian voting proposition of this Act. There can be no doubt about that. There has not been a happier man in the House since the Bill was before us, and I venture to say there is no way in which that gentleman's face could be lengthened more effectually than if the First Minister were to rise and say that he had arrived at the conclusion that while the Indian was not enfranchised this provision was premature, and that he would propose it should not come into operation for five or ten years. There is no proposition that would have the effect of elongating the hon. gentleman's countenance so much as that. The hon, gentleman boasted that, in an election gone bye, he carried his county against a nominee of the First Minister and against an hon, gentleman on this side; that he ran independently, as he has boasted time and again, and defeated both the Government and the Opposition; but I will tell him that if he thought now he would have the influence of the Government and the Superintendent General against him at the next election, his interest in giving a vote to the Indian would soon die out. I may have misinterpreted the hon. gentleman, but that is my opinion. There is a slightly concealed pleasure exhibited on the part of hon gentlemen opposite; there has been a good deal of quiet chuckling among them at the probability that perhaps the hon, gentleman who is now addressing you, and two or three others who have not, unfortunately, commended themselves to the good feeling of hon. gentlemen opposite, may, by the operation of these votes that are under the control of the Government, be deprived of a seat in this House. Well, they are welcome to all the satisfaction that thought will give them. It is not a high or a noble sentiment, and they are welcome to all the satisfaction they can take out of it; but I say if it is in the interest of the Indians and the community that they should be given the right to vote, while they remain in a state of tutelage and wardship, it matters not what member of the House may lose his seat or retain his seat. That is but a minor matter. The great principle of the welfare of the nation, and the welfare of those who constitute the nation, must be the paramount interest and the paramount idea in all legislation that is enacted hore; but having proved, as I think I have, that this proposition is not in the interest of the Indian, that it does nothing for the Indian, that it can do nothing for the Indian, the conviction is forced upon the mind, not only of hon. members on this side, but of hon. members opposite, that there is a design in giving the vote to the unemancipated, unenfranchised Indians, and that design is that certain members opposite may have their positions strengthened thereby, while the position of certain members on this side may be weakened thereby. The position of a member of Parliament is an honorable position, if it be won in an honorable manner. For my part, I do not wish to occupy a seat in this House if I cannot obtain that seat in an honorable, manly, straightforward manner. I would scorn to accept a seat in Parliament that would not be mine by the free opinion of the free electors of the county that I represent, even if I could get it by legislative enactment, either directly or indirectly, passed in this House, to secure it. There is sometimes too high a price paid for what men esteem an honor, and if a man is willing to sacrifice principles of manliness, of justice, of fair play, of what is right between man and man, in order to weaken or destroy a political opponent or to secure himself in his own position, let him have the honor, if he can enjoy it. He has paid for it a price that every honorable man should revolt against being compelled to pay. No, Sir; we will discuss this question apart from all effect it may have on ourselves. I suppose, if the people of the country think it necessary that certain members in this House shall have positions, even giving the vote to unemancipated Indians will not shut them out; but if it did, other men will be here; the Government of a free country will go on; there are as good men out of the House as in it; and therefore we can discuss this matter regardless of how it will affect individual members, but we cannot speak of it irrespective of the influence it will exercise on the country, and the influence it exercises upon those who, charged with deliberating upon public questions, shall, for the purpose of weakening an opponent or strengthening themselves, vote to do that which they would hesitate to defend in their place in the House, and which they have not defended in their press, but which they must defend and must answer for on the 211 hustings before which they will have to appear when the next general election comes round. Some hon, gentlemen have pointed out that the Indians may not be compelled to vote as the Government may direct. because some of them can read and write, and mark their ballot, and that therefore this proposition is right. I will read you a statement that the First Minister made, and it struck me as a statement not very complimentary to the workingmen and mechanics of this country. He said, on page 1630 of the Hansard:

"By the right of the ballot, the Indian is as fully protected and as fully independent as the workingmen of the factory. He is as independent in every way, and the Indian can not only make his mark, but he can write his name, in the older Provinces."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, the hon. member for Cardwell endorses that. Let me put him on record for endorsing it. The statement is there made by the First Minister and endorsed by the hon. member for Cardwell, that the unenfranchised and unemancipated Indian, the sole control and sole management of whose affairs is vested in the Superintendent General, who cannot make a will that will last after his death, if the Superintendent General does not desire he should do so, who cannot enter into contracts, who cannot be sued for debt, who cannot be called upon to serve as a juror, who cannot be ordered out for military service by the Government of the day, is as independent a man, is in every way as good a man, while in that position—

Mr. WHITE. No.

Mr. PATERSON—while in that position of bondage or tutelage, as the workingman in the factory.

Mr. WHITE. The hon, gentleman has put the case in a way not warranted by the quotation he made, and he has done so for the purpose of putting me on record. What the First Minister stated, and what I entirely endorse, is, that while in the act of voting with the ballot—and the whole point of the First Minister's statement is in those words "with the ballot"—the Indian is as independent as any man, whether a workingman in a factory or not.

Mr. PATERSON. It needs no limitation or provision at all. If the Indian is not as independent as the workingman in the factory he is not as well fitted to vote.

Mr. WHITE. That is not the point.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon gentleman has given away the case. He admits that the workingman of the factory is a man who is freer in some respects than the Indian. He claims that the Indian, having the ballot, may vote independently, because the Government need not know about it, but if the Government did know he would not be independent. In what position does the case stand? Does the hon gentleman propose in amendment that only the Indian who can read and write can have a vote? No. The Bill proposes to give a vote to the Indian who can neither read nor write, who cannot sign his name or tell what man he is voting for, unless the ballots be of different colors; and we are told this is right, because, under the ballot, those who can read may vote independently. I deny that; I deny that the man who cannot make a bargain, who is not called upon to serve on the jury, who cannot manage his own affairs, who is completely under the control of the Government, can vote as independently under the ballot as the workingman. I say he cannot, and the Indian himself knows it, and will acknowledge it—the Indian who has to get the permission of the Superintendent General before he can engage in any of those things. I do not wish to detain the committee further, but, before this Act is passed members opposite must make up their minds that this Indian question will be discussed to such an extent that the country outside will thoroughly know it. They know it now. Petitions, with hundreds and thousands of signatures, have already come into the House, stating that they do not approve of this measure, that they do not believe it is in the interests of the country or of the Indians to give them a vote, still leaving them in a state of tutelage. The only argument which has been attempted in favor of giving the Indian a vote was that which the hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) alleged to-night, that he contributes to the revenue and pays taxes.

Mr. DAWSON. One of the reasons.

Mr. PATERSON. I will venture to say that our sons over eighteen years of age contribute as much to the revenue in the way of Customs and Excise duties as the average Indian does. They are permitted to enter upon the path of life for themselves; we allow them to make their own arrangements; they secure employment or enter into a profession, and their parents, in the vast majority of cases, allow them to make their own bargains, to draw their salaries and to spend them, and in buying their clothes and their food, and other articles which they use, they are paying the taxes. Just before the amendment was moved by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), you declared carried by this committee a provision that a person to vote must be twenty-one years of age, no matter whether he paid takes or not. If the unemancipated Indian, under the absolute control of the Government, is to have a vote, why shall not the sons of Canada, between eighteen and twenty one years of age have it? They are serving in your volunteer ranks in the North-West now, they are shedding their blood——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. PATERSON. Gentlemen may jeer at the volunteers, but I say they are doing a grand work. The gentlemen who are sneering at them may be commended for it by those who approve of those sentiments, but I say they are there, not one or two, but by the score, defending their country and maintaining its rights, and yet you have declared that, though they are over eighteen and in the ranks, they shall not vote, and you propose now to vote down an amendment which says that an unenfranchised, unemanciped Indian, who is under the control of the Government far more than these young men are under the control of their fathers, shall not vote. The country will have something to say on it. The duty of the Government would have been to take the voice of the country upon this, because they are doing that which they cannot be sure they have the approval of the country for.

Mr. HICKEY. That involves expense.

Mr. PATERSON. It does not necessarily involve a great deal of expense. A general election costs $120,000, and if this Bill passes and the estimate of $500,000 a year for working it is correct, you could have four general elections and save on the amount in one year. The First Minister says the computation has been extravagant, but we do not know what the cost will be. He says he intends to have a simple machinery; but giving him credit for a desire to Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

simplify the machinery, if he gives the work to the judges and they do it in ten days, as the hon. member for West Toronto said, the expense will be lessened, but how on earth are you to have a complete list? You cannot have it done cheaply and correctly and justly and honestly; and above all things we must have it honest. I am sorry the First Minster was not present to hear the powerful reasons I have given and the line of argument I have adopted, because it may be necessary, before the discussion is over, unless he says he is prepared to accept the amendments we are moving in the interests of the country, for me to take advantage of his occasional presence to enforce some of the points which have a material bearing upon the question and which ought to be fully considered. I do not wonder at the hon. gentleman's going out of the House to-night, seeing that he was here very steadily during the afternoon. This is an important question, upon which I can speak without personal feeling. I have my opinions as to what is meant and designed, and I have heard from individuals who seemed rather pleased about it that would naturally stir up some resentment, but we get accustomed to that. Individual interests do not matter, but there are principles concerned; there is the difference between right and wrong, and there is a responsibility upon the Government and upon every member of the committee on this question. The effect will not be good upon the Indian and cannot be good upon the country. If the First Minister has a desire to benefit the Indian no one knows better how it is to be done. It cannot be done through any Franchise Bill, but only through amendments to the Indian Act. Let him introduce those amendments, which will enable the Indian to reach a higher standard, and he will receive the hearty support of members on this side of the House. Our position cannot, unless purposely, be misunderstood by hon. gentlemen on that side; they must not repeat and their press may not repeat, after what has been said, that we are opposed to the enfranchisement of the Indians, for our amendment proposes to give the vote to all enfranchised Indians. We are opposed to the unenfranchised Indian being given a vote while the Government fasten upon him, and keep fastened upon him, the shackles, the tutelage and the wardship in which they have held him, and held him in a degree that I consider has not been in the interest of the Indian nor in the interests of the country. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) gave a description of the Indians voting in Muskoka which the First Minister was not present to hear. He said the agent bought them up bodily, I understood him to say, the whole drove.

Mr. SPROULE. I said it was currently rumored that he bought them up, and I believed it was so.

Mr. PATERSON. I am glad the hon. gentleman has corrected me. He knows what he said. But it was reported, and he believed, that the agents of the Ontario Government had bought up all the Indians in the district.

Mr. SPROULE. Not all. 1 did not make use of any such expression.

Mr. PATERSON. The expression was that they had bought them up in vast numbers and got them all together, I think he said, in one place, and run them down on the railway, as I understood, and voted them.

Mr. SPROULE. I said nothing at all about the railway.
Mr. PATERSON. Well, run them to the polling booth, and there they voted. I want the First Minister to notice what his own supporter said of the Ontario Government having bought them up, the whole band, and their having voted for the Ontario Government candidate. They, took them back, and took the male attire of the Indians who had just voted and put it upon females, and marched them down and voted them also. Is that correct?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. PATERSON. These are Indians who have been exercising the franchise, and apparently under the Ontario These Indians are not under the control of the Dominion Government. Then he goes on to explain that the Dominion Government began to have its power felt a little, and when they began to make their power felt, the Ontario Government's power began to weaken, and when the Ontario Government felt their power weakening, owing to the exercise of power by the Dominion Government here, then the Ontario Government passed an Act disfranchising them.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman is making an entirely misleading statement. I said, when they began to find that the Indians were deserting them-I did not say by what power—then Mr. Mowat introduced a measure that would disfranchise them.

Mr. PATERSON. If the Indians were secured by purchasing they could be secured that way again, I suppose. Therefore, if they deserted, there must have been some cause for it. There is the picture drawn by the hon, gentleman's own supporter, his strong defender, the mouthpiece of the Government in this debate, the gentleman who has taken a more active part in it than any Minister of the Crown, and he must therefore be recognised as the exponent of the views of the Government. There is his description of the Indian vote, and how it can be handled. And, Sir, if it be a true picture, will he, in face of that, support a proposition to give to the unenfranchised, unemancipated Indians, wholly under the control of the Dominion Government, the power to cast their votes and be operated upon by the Government in this manner?

Mr. SPROULE. Are the Indians the only parties that can be bought up?

Mr. PATERSON. If the hon. gentleman wishes to intimate that other parties have been bought in the same way. I leave it to him to make the statement. If such is the case with the enfranchised Indians, what will it be with the unemancipated, unenfranchised Indians? Sir, we need not any further discuss this question as to the advisability of giving a vote to Indians who are unemancipated and under the control of the Government, who would not be, notwithstanding the utterance of the First Minister—certainly, not all of them—at liberty to cast their vote as they wished. My position is: Elevate the Indian, give him every opportunity, force it not upon him, but you can only give it to him through the machinery of the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act, aided and assisted by the Government; but this Bill proposes no relief for the Indian at all, leaves him just where he was, giving the vote to the unenfran-chised Indian, who will remain unemancipated and under the control of the Government after he has had the vote given to him; and the sense of hon, gentlemen opposite will tell them whether it is likely that persons in that position can give that free, independent vote, that ought ever to be cast in a free country, for the election of representatives to a free Parliament, to support free institutions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I wish to call attention to the unfairness of the line of argument pursued by the hon. gentleman during a portion of the four speeches which he has just addressed to us—because we have had four perorations from him, at any rate. The hon gentleman has read the Indian Act with a view of showing what was the condition of the Indians in the North-West Territory, Manitoba and Keewatin, but when I ventured to suggest to him that we already had the announcement from the First Minister that those Indians were not to be included in this Bill, he intimated there was no positive evidence that such was the It seems rather strange that the hon. gentle-because the quotation which he afterwards made, with reference to the independence of the Indians with the ballot, shows that the speech was before him-I think it was rather unfair of him to fall into that line of argument. I find that on the 4th of May, during the general debate upon the sub-ect of the word "Indian," and before any vote had been taken upon it, the First Minister used these words:

"When the word 'Indian' was put into the Act by myself, I must say that I had reference, in my own mind, to the Indians of the old Provinces, where they are educated and have been under a civilising process for years and years, where they have schools, where they can read and write—the greater portion of them. I take it that the Indians in the Province of Ontario, as a rule, can read as well as the white men. The majority of them were so far advanced in civilisation that the hon member for Brant himself, in his speech in 1880, wanted to have them enfranchised immediately."

And in another portion of the same speech, the First Minister

"I said, however, that w'en putting in the word 'Indian,' I had reference altogether to the Indians whom I believed had shown themselves qualified to act as electors and be elected; and when we come to the proper portion of the Bill, as the hon. gentleman called it, I had intended and do intend to move an amendment by which it shall be applied only to the older Provinces."

Again, at the conclusion of the speech, the First Minister

"In the newer Provinces, in the North-West and in Manitobs, perhaps in British Columbia, they are not yet ready for the franchise; and it is my intention, when we come to the right place, to move an amendment in that direction. But as regards the Indian, the educated Indian ment in that direction. But as regards the Indian, the educated Indian of the old Provinces, our brethren living in the same Province with us, under the same laws, and carrying out the same laws as efficiently as we do—they do not fill our prisons in as large a proportion to their number as the whites do. In fact, we seldom hear, comparatively speaking, of Indian crime. You find them steady, respectable, law-abiding and God-fearing people, and I do not see why they should not have the vote." the vote."

It does seem to me, with that speech, from which I have quoted passages, lying open before the hon: gentleman when he addressed you, Mr. Chairman, and this committee, it was not fair, to say the least of it, to argue as if it were intended that votes would be given to the Indians of the North-West, Manitoba and Keewatin.

Mr. PATERSON. Did I do that?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, you did.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman does not wish to do me an injustice.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly not.

Mr. PATERSON. When the Minister of Customs called my attention to the point, did I not expressly say so? But I went on to argue that it was a change of mind on the part of the First Minister, and that I did not know but that the members for British Columbia might change his mind back

Mr. WHITE. Exactly; and it was hardly fair to the First Minister, who, I think, is entitled, when he makes a statement to this committee, to be assumed to have made that statement truthfully, when he had said: "When we come to the proper portion of the Bill, as the hon, gentleman called it, I had intended and do intend to move an amendment, by which it shall be applied only to the older Provinces;" showing distinctly there was no question of change of mind. But if there had been a change of mind, the change of mind, at all events, had occurred. Even if there has been a change of mind, assuming it had been so, is it right to continue, in the presence of that announcement, to debate the question as if that announcement had never been made. One would imagine from the way hon, gentlemen have dealt with the measure all through, and with this clause particularly, it was an unheard-of thing that when a Bill has been introduced by the Government, passed through man, with the speech of the First Minister before him- the second reading and referred to the committee, that amendments should be made in it. What do we refer it to the committee for, but for a frank and free consideration and interchange of opinion in regard to the clauses of it. And that a Government should be charged with having changed its mind or been coerced into making changes, because changes have taken place in some of the clauses of a Bill of this importance and size, seems to be an unprecedented line of argument. But, as I was saying, it is rather remarkable how hon. gentlemen can find very different classes of arguments under different conditions. We find, in the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I think I may fairly say the Globe is the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps not of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), but certainly of most of the hon gentlemen opposite, certainly of the hon member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who, I believe, has some little interest in it, as a director of the company -I find there a remarkable statement, made only last week, with respect to the condition of the Indians of the North-West, those very Indians who are denounced here. The Globe says:

"Those who know any thing at all of Indian character know that Indians are, as a rule, extremely sensitive. They do not like to be scolded or ridiculed. The average pagan Indian, though he can neither read nor write, has more refinement of feeling, more intelligence, and is governed by an incomparably higher moral standard, than is the average North-West official appointed by Mr. Dewdney."

I do not suppose hon gentlemen opposite propose, for a single moment, to disfranchise the officials appointed by Mr. Dewdney. As a matter of fact, I am inclined to think that very few of the Indian agents of the North-West have been appointed by Mr. Dewdney. If I mistake not, the Indian agents in the North-West were, to a large extent, at all events, appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the same Indian agents are there to-day.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. WHITE. Does the hon, gentleman say none of Mr. MILLS. I did not say, none of them.

Mr. WHITE. Most of them?

Mr. MILLS. Most of them are not.

Mr. WHITE. I am inclined to think that if there were an analysis made it would be found that most of those agents were appointed by hon gentlemen opposite, and not one has been appointed by Mr. Dewdney. Even if they had been, hon. gentlemen opposite do not propose to disfranchise those agents—to provide that all persons who may be agents, even though appointed by Mr. Dewdney are to be disqualified. But beyond that: The hon. member speaks of the Indians of the older Provinces as if they were mere serfs and slaves of the Government, willing to do anything the Government asks them to do. Take an illustration. Chief Jacques, of Caughnawaga, is a tribal Indian and belongs to the tribe to-day; he receives his share of the annuities, money which belongs to him just as much as the interest of Dominion bonds belong to the bondholders.

Mr. MILLS. If he is so thoroughly competent to manage his own affairs, why is not his money put under his own control and at his own disposal?

Will the hon, gentleman allow me to finish my argument? That chief is said to be worth from $60,000 to $80,000; he is doing a large business for a place like Caughnawaga. He can transact business just as freely as any hon. member in this House, or outside of it. But because he chooses to retain his tribal relations, to be called one of his own people, because he prefers to remain with those among whom he has always lived, and among whom his ancestors lived, and upon whom he may exercise—and in that respect it may be a great advantage to the country-

incapable of and not permitted to manage his own affairs. As I understand it, and I may frankly say I have not given the Indian Act that careful study and attention which some hon, gentlemen opposite have given to it, and if I had closely followed the debate of three days, during which the Indian Act was read over about a dozen times by each speaker, I might have known more about it; but, as a matter of fact, let me point out this, that the only thing an Indian cannot trade with is in relation to the land of the reservation. He cannot dispose of that. If he holds property outside, he can carry on business as much as any one can, and it is only as regards property in the reservation which he cannot deal with, that property being practically held in common. Although it may be sub-divided, still he holds in common, as practically a trust, the property in connection with his tribe, but he carries on his business outside of it, just as much as anybody else. In the older Provinces he can farm and he can sell his grain. I am sure my hon. friend from Brant knows that in his own particular constituency there are well-to-do farmers among the Indians, who raise and sell their own grain, transact brsiness like anybody else, but who, nevertheless, retain their connection with the tribe. Is it to the advantage of the tribe or of the country that the influence of those more intelligent Indians should be retained in connection with it? Hon, gentlemen opposite say that they would not object to giving votes to the Indians, if they only become enfranchised, in the sense in which they use that word. Well, Sir, nobody thanks them for that, for if the Indian withdraw from their tribe and cease to be Indians under the law, they require no consideration from hon. gentlemen to give them the franchise. franchise comes to them as to every one who is a British subject, and when hon. gentlemen say that they are willing that they should have the privilege of voting under those circumstances, they simply say that they would give the Indian that which would belong to him by right, if he has the ordinary qualifications under the law. It seems to me that our true plan, in connection with this discussion, is to wait until we get to the clause which deals with the qualification of Indians, and if those qualifications are not such as to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, if they do not think they are a sufficient guarantee that the Indians exercising the franchise have such an interest in the property on which they become qualified as fairly to entitle them to vote, then we will have an opportunity of discussing that point. But, after the the statement of the First Minister, which I have quoted, to go on discussing the question, as if the intention was to give the Indian, as an Indian—the Indians of the North-West, Manitoba, and Keewatin—the franchise, is simply to do with this Bill what I venture to say hon. gentlemen opposite have done with no other Bill that has been introduced to Parliament. Let us discuss the several clauses on their merits, and in that case I think we will come to a much more reasonable conclusion, and a conclusion which those who have been watching the proceedings of Parliament, and the independent press-which hon. gentlemen have been disposed to regard so much in the past, in connection with this matter-will consider as comporting more with the dignity of Parliament and the duties of an Opposition in Parliament than the course they are now pursuing.

Mr. MILLS. We deal with the Bill as we have it, and as the First Minister construed it.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think the hon. gentleman was hardly candid in the way in which he put some of the views which he expressed with regard to this matter. He speaks of the possibility of some of the Indians becoming enfranchised, and he refers to some particular Indians, and to one in particular, a member of the tribe of Caughnawaga, as being important influence, by his greater intelligence, he is to be particular, a member of the tribe of Caughnawaga, as being treated, forsooth, as if he were a serf, a slave, a person in every way worthy of being enfranchised. Nobody knows better than the hon, gentleman that the difficulties which have existed, and which still exist, unless this Bill becomes law, in the way of the Indians becoming enfranchised, were placed there by the leader of the Government himself. I remember very well the discussion which took place on the measures which were introduced by the Government, one last year and one several years ago, in which certain provisions were made for enfranchising the Indians; and the hon. gentleman knows very well how great the difficulties were which were placed in the way of enfranchising the Indians. I remember very well some of the appeals which were made by the gentleman alongside of me (Mr. Paterson) to the leader of the Government, in favor of relaxing somewhat the stringency of those measures, and I remember, also, some of the remarks which were made by the hon, gentleman in reply to those appeals. I remember he spoke then, as he does not speak now, of the intelligence of the Indians, even of the older Provinces. He thought it only prudent and proper that we should be very careful in relaxing the difficulties which lay in the way of enfranchising the Indians. The hon, member for Cardwell chose to single out a certain individual.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There are many of them.

Mr. SCRIVER. The man to whom he refers is not the only one in that tribe who is perhaps worthy of enjoying the franchise. But no one knows better than he does, nor than I do, that the great majority of the Indians of that tribe are not worthy to enjoy the franchise. And what may be said of the tribe of Caughnawaga can be said with equal truth of a tribe of which I know more, a tribe in the county I represent. I have seen more or less of those Indians for many years past, and I have necessarily been brought into contact with them. I think I know their qualifications for exercising the franchise as well as any man could possibly know them. They have, no doubt, their good qualities, as the leader of the Government has said with reference to the Indians of the older Provinces generally. They are in some respects quiet and law-abiding citizens; but if I am any judge whatever, they are not such a class of people as I would think it safe, or proper, or prudent, or right, to confer such a trust upon as, if I understand the remark of the leader of the Government rightly, it is proposed to confer upon these men. They number, men, women and children, some ten or eleven hundred. I suppose if this Bill becomes law, and unless some changes which we do not know anything about now are introduced in the Bill, there will be between two and three hundred of them who will be voters in that constituency. Well, that is a pretty large number to add to a constituency in which there are 1,600 or 1,800 voters, and whatever may be said of the intelligence of those Indians, I appeal to the common sense of any member of this House if it is not reasonable to suppose that there men will vote as the Government wishes them to vote. We all know what the general feeling of those people is with regard to the Government, that the Government represents, to them, the Queen, and the Queen is the Great Mother. Anybody having their confidence and going to them and saying: Now is the time to vote for your Great Mother, they would go with, and go almost as one man. I have no kind of doubt with regard to that matter. For these and many other reasons I feel that this measure, at all events in the form in which it is presented now, is an exceedingly objectionable one, and for my part I am especially opposed to this clause with regard to the Indians.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before this amendment carries, I desire-

An hon. MEMBER. Too late.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, if it is too late, adjourn-I have no objection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; go on.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is time to adjourn; it is after one o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not care if it is after five

Mr. LANDERKIN. I cannot understand how it is proposed to give the Indians a vote when, the other day, it was denied to many classes of white people in this community. The hon, member for Northumberland proposed that every person in Canada who paid taxes-which virtually means manhood suffrage-should have a vote, and that proposition was voted down. Because a white man chances to be poor, because he lives by his own resources, because it is not his right to live on a reserve, is that any just reason why the Government should deny him a vote, if he is not assessed for $150 worth of property as an owner, or is not an occupant or a tenant? The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) thinks this is not the proper time to discuss this matter; he says we ought to wait till we get further into the details of the Bill; he tells us that the Indians are a very sensitive class; yet he supported the Government when they brought on the discussion of the woman franchise on the interpretation clause. As the clause relates to "A British subject by birth or naturalisation," I think this clause brings before us every person proposed to be enfranchised, and I think this is the proper time to discuss this question. There is no reason why the Indians, if they are enfranchised, if they possess civil rights, if they are free men in every sense of the term, should not vote; but to propose to enfranchise the wild Indians, who live in tribes, who have no civil rights, who are wards of the Government, depending on it in every conceivable way, and to object to enfranchise the white settlers of this country who have not a property qualification of $150, is something I cannot understand. Is it because it $150, is something I cannot understand. Is it because it has been found, in the district of Algoma, that the Indians were susceptible to the influences of liquor and could be bought? I admire the spirit of the Hon. Oliver Mowat, who, when he discovered that fact, struck them off the list. If you give the Indians the franchise, you give them power to change the law, to bring an influence over Parliament which would be dangerous; you set liquor before them free; they might exercise such power over their representatives, or might become representatives themselves, as to have this barrier removed. You would then have the spectacle of men taking Indians to the polls to vote, and taking the clothes off the Indians and putting them on the squaws, and bringing them up to vote as was stated by the hon. member for East Grey. I appreciate very highly the legislation of the Hon. Oliver Mowat, in depriving that class of people of the right to vote and giving it only to persons who are enfranchised and are citizens in every sense of the term. Now, I believe that measures which are introduced without a due regard to all interests in the country are bad. Measures introduced for the purpose of securing party objects should be beneath the contempt of all parties in the country. It was very different with the measure promoted by Mr. Gladstone; he had commissioners appointed, of all shades of politics, to consider and perfect his measure. Now, we shall find in the Indian Act very many things which go to show why this Act is proposed. (The hon, gentleman quoted a number of the sections of the Indian Act). Now, suppose the Superintendent General were to present himself for election in a constituency where there is a large tribe of Indians, and he reads this clause to the Indians, and tells them they will be dispossessed of their lands, and that all their rights will be taken away unless they support him, will they not feel compelled to yield to bidding. No Government should put it in the power of their supporters to use coercion of this kind. In section 18 you will find that the Superintendent General has the power to issue documents granting locations to the Indians. Is it right that the Government should, by giving votes to these Indians, enable the Superintendent General to use this large measure of authority for a partisan purpose? Such legislation is not creditable to any Government or to any party. Again, in clause 23, no Indian can settle, nor reside or hunt upon certain lots, unless he has the license of the Superintendent General. Here, again, we have certain privileges which, in the event of an election contest, the Government, through its agent, can withhold or grant to the Indians, according as the latter are propared to obey the rehests of the Administration. The Government will be enabled to use this influence in elections by the provision of this Bill, which gives the Indians the right to vote, which gives that right to a class of people who have no other of the rights and duties of citizens. The hon, member for Algoma, in supporting this provision, spoke of the courage of the half-breeds and the Indians of the North-West shooting down our volunteers. Is that a good and sufficient reason for giving them a vote?

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot allow myself to be misrepresented in what I said in this House. I called attention to the fact that General Middleton had acknowledged, while giving every credit to the volunteers, the courage of the foe they had conquered.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I understand quite well what the hon. gentleman said. He spoke of the courage of the halfbreeds. Does he deny that?

Mr. DAWSON. I spoke of the courage of the volunteers also. I shall not be misrepresented in this House by any hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I accept the statement of the honentleman, and will let him reconcile that with Hansard. But if the courage of those who fought with the volunteers was shown, how could it be shown otherwise than by shooting them, by resisting them, by resisting law and order. I will just leave that question now. In sub-section 2, of section 27, the Indian Act provides that nothing in the Act shall be construed to prevent the Superintendent General from issuing a license to any person to cut and remove trees, timber, and so forth.

Mr. BOWELL. What section of the Dominion does that apply to?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Sub-section 2, of clause 27?

Mr. BOWELL. It applies to the North-West and Manitoba?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. What has that to do with this, when you know the Indians there are not to be enfranchised.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Where does the Bill say so?

An hon. MEMBER. State the facts.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am stating the facts. The First Minister said it applied to the North-West and to the Indians in the North-West, that it applied to Poundmaker, Pie-a-pot, and Strike-him-on-the-back. He has not changed his Bill, so far as I am aware, though, of course, it will not apply to them until representation is given the Territories; but as soon as it is, it will apply.

Mr. BOWELL. It does not, unless they have the qualifications of white men.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If you can show me any clause where it is stated they are to have all the qualifications of white men, I will sit down and be content. Where are the other responsibilities given them that whites have? Where is the right to make those tribal Indians pay their the First Minister has shown some disposition to make debts?

Mr. LANDERKIN.

Mr. BOWELL There is nothing in this Bill to make a white man pay his debts. I wish there was.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is a Bill to compel a white man to pay his debts. I know that; a white man can be sued; I have been sued myself; everybody knows that.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not know it before.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You do not propose to put them on the same footing as white men? The Indian Act is not understood. I do not think the Minister of Customs under-

Mr. BOWELL. I am sure I will not go to you for information.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If you would study the statute, perhaps you would get the information.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, if an hon. gentleman breaks in on my remarks with his interruptions, I have a right to. reply to him.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It is out of order to address an hon. gentleman across the floor.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I say that, if an hon. gentleman chooses, he can get his information from the statute. Is that out of order?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. No; but that is not what you said.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Clause 76 of the Bill says the Indians shall be exempt from taxation, and yet they are to be given the franchise for the purpose of increasing the taxes of the people of this country. These Indians are not allowed to buy and sell in the same way as white people, and yet they are to have the vote. There would be a certain amount of fairness in it if they proposed to compel them to pay taxes it they exercised the franchise. The Indian vote would be a very dangerous vote. We have had a sample of it in Algoma, and have discovered that they can be bribed and are susceptible to the influences of liquor. The report of the First Minister indicates on every page that they are not qualified to vote. This is not the way to elevate the Indian. The rule should be, in this Parliament, justice to all and favors to none. Give the Indian justice by giving him a vote on the same terms you give it to the white man, and we will not object to it; but you refuse to give manhood suffrage to the white people and then give it to the Indians. The Act shows that the Indians have ceded their lands by treaty for certain considerations, and you are going to give them the franchise and reject the poor unfortunate whites, who, from poverty, are unable to qualify. If the Indians squander their property will they not squander their votes? This Bill will take away a great safeguard from the Indians themselves, because they will obtain concessions which will be to their disadvantage and against their future welfare. I protest against this measure, because I consider it unjust and unfair, and because I think it would be a dangerous thing to give a vote to the Indians until they conform to the terms proposed in the amendment. I was very much impressed with what the hon member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) stated just now. He has been brought into contact with the Indians, he knows their habits and modes of life, and he states, from personal knowledge, that it would be a dangerous thing to confer upon them the franchise before they had sufficient intelligence to appreciate it. I think this House should pause before adopting so dangerous a principle as is proposed in this measure.

Mr. EDGAR. I think, on an occasion of this kind, when reasonable concessions, this clause, in particular, is one on which the Government might make a concession which, I am sure, would meet with the general approval of the country. The country has gone on for a great many years without this Indian vote, and I do not see why we cannot continue to do without it. I hope that the First Minister, before the Bill is passed, will abandon his Indian clause, and thereby meet the views of a large body of electors, who have already expressed their opinion by the numerous petitions that have been presented here, and by a large number of public meetings; and, I will also venture to say, by the private views of Conservative electors, which have been communicated to hon, members on the other side of this House, because I am perfectly certain, from information I have received, that a large number of electors, supporters of hon, gentlemen opposite, have communicated to them their dissatisfaction with this extraordinary and novel feature of the Bill. I therefore hope that the hon. Minister will see his way possible to meet the views of this side of the House; otherwise, we will have to record our dissent of the measure now, and as long as an opportunity is offered to us, at future stages of this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman is good enough to say that he sees in me a disposition to meet the wishes of the House, so far as I can. I think I have shown that, but I do not exactly think that I have been met in a similar spirit by hon. gentlemen opposite. That I must leave to them. But I really do think, that for the sake of the country, for the sake of the credit of this House, and on account of expense, there can be no necessity in the world for going over the same thing again and again. There has not been a single argument used to-day that has not been repeated ad nauseum already on the discussion about the word "Indian," and therefore it seems to be a criminal waste of time. Hon. gentlemen had plenty of time for discussing this matter on concurrence and on the third reading. Hon. gentlemen must remember that I stated I was going to move in this matter, as I thought at the right time, when we came to the qualifica-tion, to say who should not vote, and I would have moved at that time an amendment, adding a paragraph declaring that Indians ought not to vote. I threw that out early, stating that such was my intention; but my suggestion was not accepted. I still, however, will not be prevented from doing as I said I would do. When we come to the right place I shall move with respect to what Indians should not have the vote, and if hon. gentlemen opposite think that is not as much restricted as it should be, they will have time to move that still further classes of Indians should not be permitted to have the electoral franchise. That is what I propose to do, but my proposal was not accepted, and I have rather a right to complain on that ground. However, all I can say is, that we have listened with a good deal of attention—some of us, for we cannot all stay here forever, but by dividing up we endeavor to gather all the ideas—to what has been said by hon. gentlemen. In the meantime, I hope we will take a division, and when we come to the other clause we can discuss it again fully.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the First Minister was hardly fair in one remark he made to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. So far as I am concerned, I went on with the discussion at the request of the First Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At my request?

Mr. PATERSON. I understood the First Minister to say, let the discussion go on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. PATERSON. I certainly understand so, and I proceeded. I asked the First Minister if he was prepared to state what change he would propose. He alluded to British Columbia, and I understood him to say: No, let the discussion go on. And I went on with it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The debate had gone on for some time. The hon, members for Bothwell and West Toronto had spoken, and the resolution was not withdrawn and the debate went on. There was no object in stopping the hon, members when other hon, members had spoken at length, and the discussion went on.

Mr. PATERSON. It was before we first got into discussion. I spoke briefly before I entered upon my speech.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I asked the hon. gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BOWELL. The First Minister is correct, and the hon. member for Brant is correct, to a certain extent. That hon. member evidently intended to stop the discussion, but the hon. members for Bothwell and Queen's at once said to the hon. gentleman: No, no; we will have it now; and they repeated the phrase three of four times. Then the hon. gentleman still continued to desire to act on the suggestion of the First Minister, but the hon. member for Bothwell made a long speech, and the right hon. gentleman said: If you must discuss it, go on. I think the hon. member for Brant acted in good faith, and intended not to go on with the discussion to-night, but it was forced on him by the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for Queen's.

Mr. PATERSON. As it comes to my mind now, I asked, after the hon. member for West Ontario had concluded, if the First Minister did not feel at liberty to make the statement now he should consent to the amendment being moved at a future time. Then I understood the First Minister to say they would take the discussion now.

Amendment (Mr. Edgar), p. 2003, negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the next clause will be allowed to pass, which fixes the qualification for real property in cities at $150.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not desire to detain the committee unnecessarily, but I know an hon. member desires to move an amendment to that clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will say, in regard to clause 4, that I have changed it, because I ascertained that as drawn it did not quite meet the case, because a man may be employed as a farm laborer and not pay any rent. I have inserted in the clause: An annual rental of $20, or that value in kind or in money's worth.

Mr. MULOCK. With respect to the qualification in rural districts, I shall move to reduce the amount from $150 to $100. Perhaps the hon, gentleman will consider the matter between now and the next sitting of the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid not.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 2.10 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 21st May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

On the order, reading and receiving petitions,

Mr. WOODWORTH. Before these petitions are received, wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that these petitions have been presented here by hon, members without apparently their having read them or without their understanding that these signatures in most cases are the signatures of one man or two men in most of the petitions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It is false. It is not so.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The rule is most clear; and hon, members who have presented them—some of them leading members of Parliament and old parliamentarians—cannot help having recognised it. The rule is laid down in May, page 610;

"The signatures must be written upon the petition itself, and not pasted upon, or otherwise transferred to it. It must have original signatures or marks, not copies from the original."

Again, on page 611:

"Any forgery or fraud in the preparation of petitions, or in the signatures attached, or the being privy to, or cognisant of, such forgery or fraud, will be punished as a breach of privilege. By a resolution of the House of Commons, 2nd June, 1774, it was declared, 'that it is highly unwarrantable, and a breach of the privilege of this House, for any person to set the name of any other person to be presented to this House.'"

Again, on page 616:

"In both Houses it is the duty of members to read petitions which are sent to them, before they are presented, lest any violation of the rules of the House should be apparent on the face of them; in which case it is their duty not to offer them to the House."

We have had bundles after bundles of these petitions presented. The right of petitioning is a sacred right, Her Majesty's subjects have a right to come here in a certain form and a certain way. All of these petitions have been headed in the same way. The same words are used, written by the same persons, concected by the same friends, executed by the same hands; and apparently, when they came to be signed, in numbers of cases the signatures were written by two or three individuals in each municipality.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I say yes. Let a committee be formed, and you will see whether I am right or whether the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Cameron), who takes up so little of the time of the House, is right. Here is a petition from the municipality of Bentinck, presented by the hon, member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). There are the signatures of William Hunter, Archy Hunter and John Hunter, in the same handwriting. That is plain on the face of the petition. I have taken some little trouble with these petitions, with regard to the signatures, and had the hon, member for South Grey taken the same trouble, he would not have presented the petitions he laid before the House. Then there are the names of Jocklin, Marshall Jocklin and Michael Finnerty, written by the same hand; one person has evidently written them all, and yet this petition is asked to be received.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) thinks that is all right. There are the signatures of James Puhl, Frederick Puhl, and John Purvis, and Edward Purvis, and Nicholas Schlezhauer, and W. T. Marvick, and James Marshall, written, both signatures in each case, by the one hand.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

Mr. WOODWORTH. Because I have looked over them, and have had an expert examine them, and the best authority that can be received in a court of justice in this matter, the authority of a competent expert, can be received before a committee of this House to show that these petitions were signed by the same persons, and that the signatures are in the same handwriting. There is also petition number 2, from Bentinck, South Grey, also presented by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). Nine signatures on it, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 12, 13, 26, 36 and 37, are illegible, and clearly the work of one man. Petition No. 4, from the municipality of Sullivan, in the County of Grey, containing thirty signatures, presented by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Allan) yesterday, and asked to be received to day, has also a large number of signatures in the same hand-writing. John Mannerow, August Mannerow, Fred. Schlumske, August Bluhm and Charles Bluhm; Geo. Smith and Geo. A. Smith; Thomas Duff and James Duff; Samuel Palmer and John Palmer; John Reid and Ernest Pike—are in each case in the same handwriting, and there are besides six names illegible. Then there is the municipality of St. Vincent, County of Grey, from which the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. McMullen) presented a petition. On that petition we find the names of James Oliver and J. N. Oliver; Thos. Harris and Alb. T. Harris; A. Thompson and William A. Ellis; James Sparling and Chas. Collier; J. M. Smythe and Chas. Parkin; Amero Tait and Alex. Sauter-all evidently written by the same hand in each case. No. 7 petition, from the municipality of Thamesville, County of Kent, presented by Mr. Miller, shows the same unvarying monotony in the handwriting of the signatures. S. B. Ripley and S. A. Tye; R. M. Logan and Robert Amola; James Rolinson and Sam Singer; Ben Higgins and J. Polewski-show the same writing in each case, and there are several signatures completely illegible. Not only that, but a soft pencil has been used in most of these cases, so that one can hardly decipher any name in a great number of cases. I have only referred to the signatures which it would be patent and clear to a boy ten years of age, are in the same handwriting. In most of the soft pencil signatures, the same man has put down signature after signature, and you cannot tell what the signatures are and what the names are. Not only the petitions I have drawn attention to, but nearly all the petitions against the franchise presented to this House, have the same indelible mark. When the proper time comes, I intend to call the attention of the House to the gross breach of privilege on the part of hon. members in asking that these petitions be received and read when they ought to have known, had they taken the trouble that parliamentary practice requires them to take, that the signatures to these petitions were in many cases in the same handwriting, and that therefore, the petitions should not have been laid on the Table of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. What is the point of order? If I am out of order I shall retract as quickly as possible; but I have yet to learn that I am out of order, when I say that hon members of this House have dared to ask the clerk of the House to receive petitions which have been concocted here and sent all over the country and are signed by the same hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I presented eighteen petitions and looked over them carefully, and am quite certain there is no irregularity in any of them. The hon, gentleman's lynx eyes may discover some irregularity but I tailed to discover any. I am sure they are as well signed as any petitions ever received here.

Mr. TROW. No wonder hon, gentlemen opposite feel somewhat restless in their seats, in the face of thousands of signatures against this Bill, probably one-third of them being those of their own supporters. The petitions I presented here I have examined very carefully, and I question very much whether any two signatures on them were written by the same hand. They are genuine signatures, and the hon, gentleman had no right to accuse hon, members on this side of misrepresentation.

that the signatures are in the same handwriting. There is also petition number 2, from Bentinck, South Grey, also presented by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). Nine signatures on it, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 12, 13, 26, that rule has no bearing; it does not sustain them in any particular. He has selected names from the petition I presented yesterday or the day before, from the village of allusions. Try to keep in order. Thamesville, and stated they were not genuine. Those signatures are genuine. They are the signatures of the parties themselves. The hon, gentleman may undertake to make a speech of that kind with a view of addressing the country, but the hon gentlemen who presented those petitions are ready to take the responsibility of them. I know, so far as the signatures to the petitions from my own constituency are concerned, that they are genuine. I do not believe there is a single name put there unless by the party himself, or at his request.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentlemen say "oh, oh," but I say that any party who wishes to petition this House has a right to ask another party to put his name to the petition, just as good a right to do that as he has to do any other act. We assume the responsibility of these petitions. Let the hon. gentleman name some party whose name is recorded on any one of these petitions, who says he did not sign it or authorise his name to be put there. Then there will be something to put before the House, but there is nothing now. The hon, gentleman has nothing except an attempt to cast reflections upon the good faith of those on this side who presented those petitions. I presented a petition to-day signed by 475 persons from the city of London. I cannot say that I know every one of those signatures, but I know the party from whom I received the petition. It was not sent at my instigation, and the hon, member who respresents that city will no doubt be able to identify many of those signatures. It is an extraordinary thing that the hon. member should attack the hon. gentleman who presented those petitions, when no complaint has come from any one whose name appears there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I caused a message to be sent to the hon, member for King's (Mr. Woodworth) asking him to send me the petitions, and he sent a message back by the page that he did not wish to send me his private papers; so he has been reading from his private papers, and I do not therefore wonder at the irregularity.

Mr. WOODWORTH. A page came to me and asked me for the petitions. I said I had not the petitions, that they were on the Table of the House, but that if Mr. Landerkin wanted to see my private papers, he should send me word. That is just like the ordinary misrepresentation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not got the petitions yet; the hon gentleman has not sent them. The names of the people he has mentioned are those of very respectable people, and I do not want him to sneer at them. He tries to sneer at the German people who live in my riding, who are very respectable people, and I think it ill becomes him to sneer at a very respectable class of people who have signed their names to these petitions. It is not to be wondered at that the signatures of people in the same family should resemble one another very much. The hon, gentleman says that a boy 10 years of age could discover the similarity. That is no doubt an evidence of the ability of the hon. gentleman, but these are the names of very respectable people.

Mr. WOODWORTH. No doubt of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If the hon, gentleman had the courage, or the manliness, or the courtesy-

Mr. WOOWORTH. Is that in order, Mr. Speaker, to accuse me of want of manliness?

Mr. LANDERKIN. If he had either of these attributes, he would have sent me the petition, so that I could have examined the names.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I ask if that is in order. 254

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not in order to make any personal

Mr. MACKENZIE. But the hon. gentleman used words which implied dishonorable conduct on the part of the hon, member. He accused him of forgery.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear any such statement from the hon, member for King's, charging any hon, member with forgery.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He said he had seen petitions that those presenting them must have known were forgeries.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not so understand him.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand that the speech made by the hon. member is the result of groping through all these petitions with two assistants, and with the aid of a very powerful microscope. These are the only results of his efforts. I do not know whether he knows, but he ought to know, that if a person authorises another man to put his name down, that is exactly the same as if he did it him-

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, is it?

Mr. EDGAR. By the law of England, and by the law of Ontario, if you authorise another man to put your name to your will, it is as good as if you did it yourself.

Mr. WOODWORTH. No.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman is a lawyer, and he knows it.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to accuse any member of this House of presenting petitions knowing that they were signed by one hand, but, in regard to two or three petitions presented from the township of Tyendenaga, in the constituency of my hon friend from East Hastings, I asked to look at them, and I called the attention of an hon. gentleman of the Opposition, who was passing at the time, to them. I said: Look at these petitions; you will see that they are largely signed by the same hand. This is an instance of the way in which petitions are signed. Out of fifty-one signatures, I counted about thirty which were written by the same pencil, and were all apparently in the same hand. I know most of those gentlemen, and I know that the names that they represent are respectable persons, but that is not the question raised by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Wood. worth). It was not that these persons do not exist, but that their names had been signed by the same hand; and that, in my opinion, is the fact in the case to which I refer. My hon friend from East Hastings (Mr. White) and an hon. gentleman of the Opposition and myself went through those petitions, and the hon, member from the other side, when I called his attention to them, said: "They appear to be all written by one hand." The three petitions were much in the same position. What the petition presented just now by the hon, member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is, I do not know, for I have not had the pleasure of seeing it yet, when I do I think I shall know who the signers are, whether the hon, gentlemen who presented those petitions knew it or not-and I do not say they did, I do not fancy they did—more than half of the signatures on one petition were signed with one pencil, of the same color, and in the same hand.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to what the hon. gentleman has said-

Some hon. MEMBER3. Order; spoke.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it a personal explanation?

Mr. EDGAR. It is a personal explanation. With reference to the petition which I presented from North Hastings, I can only say that I received it from a gentleman, with a letter from him, whose name heads that list.

Mr. BOWELL. Very likely. I said nothing at all in reference to that petition, because I had not seen it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not going to enter into the discussion of the particular series of which have been brought down just now, because there is a good deal of feeling about it, and it is better to avoid feeling when we can, but I must deny the particular line laid down by the hon member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), when he gives us a legal disquisition on quod fecit per alium fecit per se, when he states that one man can authorise another to sign any document, and that is the act of the principal. That may be the general rule, but, I think, that on looking back to the precedents, we find that there has always been a close scrutiny into petitions to see that no such unwholesome practice is allowed in regard to them. It destroys the real value of the petitions if anybody lifts up a petition and finds that the names were written in one hand. There is no security to the House, there is no security to the member who presents it. He may be bound to present it if he receives it from a respectable source, as the hon member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) says. He may be blamed if he does not present it, although it may have a suspicious appearance; but it must destroy the value of a petition if a series of names, from one to fifty, are written in the same hand. I have seen, on several occasions in my life, three or four hundred names all written by one hand, and they were afterwards found to have been fraudulent. It is quite evident to the House who receives a petition that twenty or thirty men cannot write the same hand, and it is therefore quite clear that those twenty or thirty individuals did not sign their names. Then there is no evidence whatever that those names were authorised by the owners of the names to be placed on the petition. If a man cannot write, he makes his mark, and the witness is supposed to certify that the man could not write, but if a man can write his name, he is utterly inexcusable in authorising another man to write it for him. I think it is quite clear that the practice ought to be discountenanced. I know it has been discountenanced; I am satisfied, from my general recollection, that it has been greatly discountenanced in England, as being destructive of the value of petitions; because Parliament cannot examine every name and ascertain whether it is a genuine signature, and they have no evidence, if it is not a genuine signature, that it was put on with his assent. It utterly destroys the whole value of parliamentary petitions, and, I think, that must clearly be understood by both sides of the House. I am speaking for the purpose of fencing around and protecting petitions in the future—certainly not with any desire to restrict the right of petition. I regret to hear the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) say: We hold ourselves responsible for all these petitions. He can only hold himself responsible, as a member of Parliament, for the petition he presents himself. But it leads one to suppose that in the hon, gentleman's mind, at all events, it was a party move, and therefore he is bound to take the responsibility. But he cannot know whether the petitions are honest petitions or dishonest-he has no means of knowing that. says: We assume—speaking for himself and the whole party-we assume the whole responsibility. I am quite sure his leader in this House would not assume any responsibility; I should be very sorry to take any responsibility except for a petition presented by myself, and which I

Mr. BLAKE. I did not understand my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to say that each member of Parliament on this side of the House assumed responsibility for all the petitions. He was speaking, of course, of the distributive responsibility of each hon, member who has Mr. Edgar.

presented a petition and holds himself responsible in the sense in which a member of Parliament is responsible with respect to that petition. Now, the right of petition is a sacred right, and it is extremely important that that right, as the hon. gentleman has said, should be fenced in from abuse; but it is extremely important, also, that it should not be unduly restricted; and it would be a very dangerous thing to mark such limits of responsibility as the hon. member for Queen's, Nova Scotia (Mr. Woodworth) has attempted to mark out for hon. gentlemen who present petitions. If a petition comes to an hon, member from a respectable quarter, and apparently fair upon the face of it -I do not mean as to the substance, but in the surroundings-he ought to present that petition to the House. He may not sympathise with it altogether, but he ought to give the petitioner an opportunity of laying his case before the House. He does not endorse it by doing so. I remember a famous case of that kind, a case in which a Mr. Wasson sent a petition against, I think it was, Lord Chelmsford, with a charge of grossly improper conduct, many years ago, when no less a constitutionalist, no less a venerable statesman than Earl Russell, presented that petition, decming it his bounden duty to present it, though he could not himself find that there was anything in the charge nor sympathise with it; yet he presented it to the House of Lords, making that statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a different thing.

Mr. BLAKE. I am pointing out how eminent constitutionalists have felt that it was necessary to guard the right of petition by throwing no obstruction in the way of any man approaching this House who desires to do so. Therefore, I say, it would be a very extraordinary petition, within the rules of Parliament—of course every member must consider whether it is in the rules of Parliamentwhich I should feel myself free to refuse to present, though it might have but little of my sympathy. Now, with reference to this question of signatures. The hon. gentleman has made an observation with which I, to some extent, agree; he said petitions would be more valuable if they were all signed in different hands; but he has said that they utterly lose their value when they are not so signed. I differ with him entirely there. Now, I have seen a good many petitions in the course of my parliamentary experience. I have seen very large numbers of signatures on petitions, the authenticity of which, and the respectability of which, were never questioned, although many of the signatures were, to my mind—I could not swear to it—in the same hand. The hon, gentleman himself says he knew a case in which there were three or four hundred signatures in the same hand, and it happened to be proved in that case that there was a fraud. Of course there may be a fraud in such a case, and there may be fraud when the signatures are different; because if you present a petition on which each signature differs from the other as chalk from cheese, that would not prove the genuineness of any one of the signatures. Now, we should understand what the rule of Parliament is. Is it the rule of Parliament-I do not say whether the practice is commendable or not—that the petition must be signed in every instance by the proper hand of the person whose name is there affixed? I say it has not been the practice, so far as I know, in this Parliament. There were a vast number of petitions presented in the early part of this Session by persons interested in the cause of temperance, and it has been stated that more than 100,000 signatures were appended to those petitions. Now, I would like to know whether all those signatures were by different hands; I would like to know whether there were not scores of persons who signed through the medium of the person who was handing the petition around. I believe that is the case; I believe that it has not been understood through the

it was an improper thing that a petition should be signed in some cases by other than the proper hand of the party. I believe it has been fairly assumed that if a petition came from respectable quarters, and bore other marks of genuineness, such signatures as might seem to be in the same hand, were duly authorised signatures. I do not know any reason why the right of petition should be more restricted than is the right of performing any other more solemn act. He can perform very sclemn acts through another. He can authorise a man to do many things in his name, and to sign his name to many instruments which will have most important effects. Nor does he need the written name of a party to powers of attorney or powers under seal. When a man gives his consent on the spot and sees his name signed, it is signed by his hand though it is not written in his proper hand. If we are to lay down this doctrine which is projected that the proper signatures of the party himself must, in all cases, be affixed, then let it be laid down after consideration and established as the general rule and practice of Parliament. But I maintain to east discredit upon the line of petitions presented during the last few days, because some of the signatures are alleged to be or appear to be in the same handwriting, is an attempt which would react in the way of easting discredit upon the great mass of petitions upon various subjects which have been presented to Parliament during the last few years. I believe it has been a common custom, and there hardly exists a case of a member who has presented, I do not say petitions with few signatures, or petitions for a private Bill, but petitions on some large topic of public importance, to which many signatures were attached—I doubt if there would be a single case found in which an hon, gentleman who had presented such petitions would not have rendered himself open to the censure of the hon, member for King's (Mr. Woodworth), if these censures are well founded.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to say-

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has lost his right to speak, except to make a personal explanation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I was speaking when the hon. gentleman raised the point of order. I then sat down and have not had an opportunity of speaking since, and I have not finished my speech. Is it fair that I should have been assailed in this House, and the petitions I have presented been assailed, and cannot put myself right?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon, gentleman has been assailed or any reflections cast on the hon, gentlemen who have presented petitions to this House merely because some of the names are signed by one person. That is no reflection on hon, gentlemen. It is the duty of the hon. members to present petitions they receive from respectable sources, if there is a sufficient number of signatures to the petition to justify its presentation. According to the English practice, it is improper for one person to sign the names of other persons except in case of their incapacity from sickness. In England the practice is to refer all petitions to a committee, and the committee reports, whenever it appears that several names are signed by the same person, and recommends that those names be struck from the number of the petitioners. That appears to be the only penalty which exists. I suppose that rule exists here; if several names are signed by the same person the number of such names is struck off from the number of the patitioners. It has not been the than one signature is in the same handwriting, and then it will be my duty to call the attention of the House to the subject, and the House can order that such names be struck off the number of petitioners. In England, apparently, there is no evidence required.

Mr. BLAKE. That would be a new practice here? Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. When a point of order is taken during a speech, and the point is finally decided, does that interruption prevent the hon. member resuming his speech?

Mr. SPEAKER. I decided the point of order, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) did not continue his speech; but the hon. member for West Ontario, the hon. member for Hastings, the hon. member for West Durham, all continued the debate on the subject, not on the point of order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not finished my speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I can get at it in some way. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course the hon, member who desires to speak cannot move the motion to adjourn. That must be moved by some other member.

Mr. LISTER. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, member has only a few words of personal explanation to offer, I am sure the House will hear him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have only a few words to say. I asked the hon, member for King's to send over the petitions, but he did not return them to me. I found he was not reading from the petitions at all. I find the names of Nicholas Schlozhauer and T. Nicholas Schlozhauer, which the hon. gentleman said were in the same handwriting. They are not in the same handwriting. Also the names of James McMahon and Michael Finnerty, which are said to be in the same handwriting. They are not in the same handwriting. To show in what good faith I acted in this matter, I wish to read two of the letters accompanying those petitions. The first is from John Proctor, as follows:-

" HANOVER, 13th May, 1885.

"Dear Doctor,—Yours of 6th to hand. Thanks for copy of Franchise Bill You ask what do I think of it. It is simply outrageous. It would appear that Sir John would like to drive the Opposition and their supporters to some overt Act. Oh, for a Cromwell! I think some of his friends are getting ashamed, and almost wish he would withdraw the Bill. We must just hope and work so that good may result out of the intended evil."

The next letter is from Dr. McLean, of Ayton, as follows:— " Arron, May 13th, 1885.

" Dr. LANDERKIN.

"Dear Sir,—I have just forwarded to Mr. James Trow a petition which has been signed during the last two days. If more time had been allowed the signatures would have been much larger, as everybody signed, both Grit and Tory, with the exception of two lonely Tories, who considered that anything is fair in politics. If you examine you will find that the majority of the names are those of rank Conservatives, but, I must say men who do not want a new Franchise Bill, or any other unfair advantage." unfair advantage.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I did not find fault with the member for Perth (Mr. Trow) presenting a petition from East Hastings. An hon member who receives a petition has a right to present it. I know, although I am very much in favor of the Franchise Bill, that if anyone sent me a petition from my own county, or any other county, I would present it. But the hon, gentleman said when he presented it practice, I admit, of this House to scrutinise the manner in which names have been signed. The Clerk and his officials have been charged with the duty which pertains to a committee in England, and, if that practice is to be adopted, it will be the duty of the Clerk and his officials to call my attention to cases where more "Well, you have signed the petition against the Franchise Bill. Have you read the Bill?" "In truth," he said, "I have neither seen the Bill nor the petition; if a man signed it in my name, he had no right to do so, and it was a for-' I know many signatures have been signed in the post office, and liberties have been taken with signatures. I will give the hon, gentleman who presented the petition the name of the party who said to me that he had neither seen the petition nor the Bill. I rose only to say that I believe the rule should be applied, and that no petition should be presented to the House unless signed by the parties themselves, or by the mark of a party who cannot sign his That would save a great deal of trouble, and we would have less petitions and less inconvenience. So far as my own section is concerned, I may say that there is very little excitement with regard to this Franchise Bill.

The petitions were then received.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be well if it were understood by hon. gentlemen, as well as in the country, that it is irregular for any person to sign the name of other people to petitions.

Mr. HESSON. I have a petition here presented by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), and while I do not deny that each name represents a settler, and each signature is a Grit signature, I venture to say that if you look at the petition yourself, Mr. Speaker, you will find that not more than two or three parties have written all the names. I find at least twenty names written in the one handwriting.

Mr. BLAKE. With reference, Sir, to the announcement which you have just made, I think if we are to change what has been our invariable practice for seventeen or eighteen years it would be well that the change were made by a more solemn act than simply an announcement from the Chair. I think a rule should be adopted, and that the people ought to know that it is the determination of the House that the signatures ought to be signed by those whose names purport to appear on the petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When a petition is presented. I think it is presumed that it is signed by the parties, and unless individuals particularly interested in looking at the petition ascertained to the contrary, it is supposed that the parties sign their own names, and whenever objection has been taken I think the rule has been adhered to. I know that before Confederation in the old Parliament of Canada, the moment it was ascertained that that rule was not complied with, in several cases the petitions were visited with condign punishment. I particularly refer to petitions which were presented when there was great political excitement, and when, therefore, they were carefully scrutinised, and when it was shown that they were false signatures, the rule was acted upon, as I have said. The rule is a common sense one, and it is very strictly observed in England. I hold in my hand a report made to the House of Commons, in 46 Victoria, by a select committee on public petitions, wherein it is stated:

"Your committee have felt it their duty to bring to the notice of the House, a petition in favor of the repeal of the contagious diseases Acts— Which was a matter which created great excitement in England .-

"which was presented by Mr. Cavendish Bentinck from Whitehaven on the 12th of March last, and which they find to contain serious irregu-on the 12th of March last, and which they had to contain serious integralarities.

"Your committee have observed that the petition, though purporting to be signed by 414 persons, is, in fact, signed by 293 only, the remaining 121 signatures being in the same handwriting. Your committee, therefore, having regard to the Orders of the House, have abstained from reckoning such names among the signatures."

I think it is a wholesome rule, and one which should be the genuineness of those petitions destroys, in a great measure, the effect which the petitioners want to have impressed on the House. It has that effect, and it would have the still greater effect of destroying the value of the petitions for or against any particular measure.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not discuss the question of the older practice, but I simply stated that as we had a settled practice of eighteen years, I thought it should not be altered by a simple announcement from the Chair, but should be altered by means of a rule of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am much disposed to agree with you, Sir, and also with the First Minister, that after due notice given it would be better to provide that all signatures to a petition should be made in people's own handwriting. Lagree with the First Minister that it is a security against doubt being thrown upon petitions. But what I call attention to is this, that not only do I believe you will find that this question has not been raised since Confederation, and that the practice has been, as my hon friend beside me stated, that these petitions were received without this particular objection being taken, but I think, though I am not quite sure, that the First Minister was concerned in a debate which took place prior to Confederation, in which this course was taken on one or two occasions. I think it was with reference to some petitions presented from the Province of Quebec against Confederation, and that notice was taken of the practice by an hon. member. The late Mr. Holton then called attention to what he said he knew, and what I myself know to be the case, that more particularly in the country districts it is a common practice for the parties who are asked to sign petitions to request the parties who bring them around to sign for them. I speak simply as to their custom, a custom which I have observed in one or two cases myself. Now, this practice having prevailed for such a length of time, if a change is to be made I think it should be made part of our orders. The First Minister and everybody else must see that it would be unfair and unreasonable to throw discredit now on a particular batch of petitions, which have been signed in a particular way which has grown into a custom. I do not say that the custom is right, or rather, that it is expedient, but I do say that the custom, within my own knowledge, has extensively prevailed in the past, and this is the first time within my recollection, except on the particular occasion I allude to, which took place before Confederation, that objection has been taken to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not refer particularly to these particular petitions, but I simply called attention to the advisability of having a strict rule, in order that petitions may have the weight which they ought to

Mr. MACKENZIE. In England there is a distinct Order of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There may or may not be, but it is the continual practice.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. So far as I can recollect, the practice which has been followed for a very long period, and especially with regard to petitions coming from the Province of Quebec, is this: A large number of people are unable to sign their names to these petitions, nevertheless, after a certain number of names have been signed regularly, other names are written, accompanied by a cross; and when ten or twenty or 100 names are so written, the parties signing the names for the others will then certify that the parties whose names appear on the petition have authorised them to sign their names, and this gives authorticity to the signatures. It would be a very hard thing if followed out. I would just say to the House as a whole, persons, because they are unable to sign their names, could that the fact that doubt has been thrown by this debate on not be in a position to petition Parliament and lay their grievances before it. Therefore, if the rule is to be changed, or if we are to have a new rule, I think it should be provided that although a person may not be able to sign his name, another may be authorised to do so for him; but in that case a certificate ought to be put on the petition.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the House will not think I am suggesting any change in the rule. I am simply pointing out that, according to the practice which has prevailed, this is irregular, and ought not to be pursued if possible; and if hon. members would inform petitioners throughout their constituencies that they ought not to sign for other people, I think that would be desirable. I am not objecting to the reception of these petitions, but the practice is irregular.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CORRESPOND-ENCE WITH GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Was there any correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government, subsequent to the 18th March, 1885, on the subject of the proposal for a change in the arrangements between the company and the Government? Was there any report from the chief engineer in connection with the matter? Was there any report from the Minister on the matter? Was there an Order in Council on the matter? Was any report from any officer of the company laid before the Government? Has the Government the balance sheets prepared by Mr. Miall, but not appended to his letter?

Mr. POPE. I do not think there has been any correspondence since the date mentioned. There was no report from the Minister; there was no Order in Council; there was no report from an officer of the Company, except that of Mr. Ogden, which has been brought down. Mr. Miall's balance sheet was laid on the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Miall's report states that he has prepared two balance sheets, from which he has formed a condensed balance sheet which has been laid on the Table. Those balance sheets are what I want.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Idid not understand that.

BRANDON POSTMASTER.

Mr. LISTER asked, What are the allowances made to the Postmaster at Brandon (1) for rent, (2) for salaries of assistants?

Mr. CARLING. The allowance for rent is $600 per annum. The postmaster's salary includes an allowance of $720 per annum for assistance, granted under exceptional circumstances, as a provisional allowance, and it will be discontinued on the 1st of October, 1885.

NORTH-WEST SURVEYS.

Mr. MILLS asked, Whether the Government propose to survey and set out for settlement any lands in the North-West Territory during the present summer? Whether any surveyors have yet been sent to make surveys? Whether the geological staff are yet in the field to carry forward their explorations for the current year? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The answer sent to me is this: The Government does not propose to survey and get out any very large quantity of land in the North-West during the present summer, because, as will be seen by the map herewith, this is not necessary. Several surveyors either are or are about to be sent into the field, to make surveys of trails, and detached settlement surveys. One party of the Geological Survey is already in the field; the others are making preparations, and will leave shortly.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EARNINGS AND WORKING EXPENSES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What were the earnings and the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the months of March and April respectively?

Mr. POPE. For March the earnings were $179,869, and the working expenses $175,544. For April the earnings were $240,295. I have not yet the working expenses for April.

LAVIS'S PATENT TENT POLE.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adapt to the tents used by the militia Lavis's patent pole?

Mr. CARON. The patent referred to has been submitted to the military branch of the Department for a report. Until that report has been laid before me I cannot say whether the patent will be adapted to the tents used by the militia force or not.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government has arranged, and if not, whether the Government will arrange, for the free transport of the bodies of the volunteers who have fallen in the North-West to the homes they left?

Mr. CARON. Up to the present time the applications made to the Department merely asked us to facilitate the transport of the bodies of volunteers who fell in battle, friends seeming to prefer to look after the matter themselves. If any applications be made hereafter for the free transport of the bodies of any volunteers who have fallen, The Government will take measures to arrange for the free transport of the bodies.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government intends to submit to Parliament a proposal for a mark of recognition in the shape of a land grant, land scrip, or otherwise, to the volunteers on active service in the North-West?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That question has already been asked, and I answer in the same way as I did before, that this question engages the serious attention of the Government.

DOMINION LANDS-GABRIEL DUMONTS' LOT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, When did Gabriel Dumont's occupation of the lot on the cast bank of the Saskatchewan, near Gabriel's Crossing and St. Laurent, begin, according to the Departmental papers? When was he admitted to homestead entry for that lot? When did he become entitled to his patent? When was his patent issued?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is nothing on the papers or records of the Department to show when Gabriel Dumont's occupation of the lands on the east side of the Saskatchewan River, for which he obtained entry as a homestead and pre-emption, began. He obtained homestead entry for the south-west quarter of section 20, township 42, range 1, west of the third principle meridian, on the 1st March, 1883, and pre-emption entry for the south-east quarter of the same section. There is nothing in the declaration made by Dumont, when he appeared before the land agent to make his entry, to indicate that he occupied, the land previous to that day; and he would not therefore, be entitled to apply for his patent under the homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act until three years after the date of perfecting his entry. The patent for this land has not yet issued, nor has any application been received at this Department for its issue.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY-GOVERNMENT ROUNDHOUSE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the land on which a Government roundhouse is erected, or any property on which Government buildings, occupied by Government or by the Canadian Pacific Railway, has been found to be covered by a patent irregularly issued to a private individual?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government in 1875 appears to have laid out a town site at Selkirk, which was then expected to be the point where the Canadian Pacific Railway would cross the Red River, and to have appropriated, for this purpose, lands occupied at the time of the transfer, and patent for which the occupant was entitled to obtain under the Manitoba Act. The Government appears to have been unaware of this occupation, or if aware, The survey was made under instructions from the Surveyor General, and the plan is on record in the Department of the Interior, but there is nothing on record in the Department to show where the Canadian Pacific Railway roundhouse is situated, or indeed to indicate that there is such a building. It has, however, recently come to the knowledge of the officers of the Department, that the roundhouse is upon a lot respecting which the proof of occupation at the time of the transfer required under the

SATURDAY SITTING AND QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that, when the House adjourns on Friday next, it will stand adjourned till Saturday following at 1.30 P.M., and Government measures will have precedence after routine business, and also that, when the House adjourns on Saturday, it will stand adjourned until Tuesday the 26th inst, at 1.30 P.M. Motion agreed to.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE. Before you proceed, Sir, to the other business of the House, I think it my duty to avail myself of my parliamentary right to make a substantive motion in order to raise an important question, as I consider it to be, a question both of gravity and of urgency, which the state of the public business, the order of the House and the procedure which has been pursued, preclude my raising in any other way. I refer to the duties of the Government and the rights and the obligations of this House with reference to information as to past events in the North-West leading up to the troubles which have recently taken place. I have not, since I entered this House, used, for any purpose, the motion which I am now about to use, always believing as I did and do believe, that the use of it should be a sparing use, that it should be reserved for questions and situations, such as the present situation and the present question. I believe that there subsists either a misconception or a misinterpretation of what the duties and obligations and rights of the Government and the House are with reference to this important question, and it is necessary that that subject should be cleared up, and that we should come to an understanling. if possible, as to what our relative position is in the matter. The most limited conception of the fundamental function of Government is the maintenance of security to the citizen against attack from abroad, and against internal discord, and this includes his right to the full erjoyment of justice in the land. Our own constitution acknowledges and rather magnifies that limited conception of the functions of Government, by declaring, as it expressly does, that this Parliament is authorised to make laws for the peace, order and good government of our country; and if it be that peace has been broken, that public order—

Sir John A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In order that we may know the regularity or the irregularity of the hon, gentleman's speech, I must ask that he will make the motion on which he is going to speak.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know that the hon, gentleman is entitled to have the motion placed in your hands, Sir, but I have no objection to state my motion. I am about to move that the House adjourn. It is the only motion I can move that will enable me to make this statement. It is the only regular motion, and that being so I thought that the hon. gentleman would have known it. If, as I was saying, the public peace has been broken, if the public order has been disturbed, if the authority of the Government has been violated, if insurrection has raised its head in Canada, I hold it to be the duty of the Government to give, and the duty of this House to demand, and its right to obtain, all the particulars, so that we may ascertain how these things have happened, so that we may deal with the whole subject, as it includes both the Government of the country, and those they rule, so that we may fix the responsibility upon the right shoulders, or share it, if it be a mixed responsibility, among the right shoulders; and I hold it to be the duty of the Government, and our right, that we should be occupation at the time of the transfer required under the Manitoba Act was furnished several years ago and patent the earliest possible moment. More than eight weeks issued.

SATURDAY SITTING AND OHEEN'S BIRTHDAY pressing for those pieces of information which might enable us to reach conclusions upon this subject. We all felt it to be our duty heartily to agree, heartily to assist in measures to restore the public authority, and we felt that that was a duty emergent and doubly incumbent upon us in the particular condition of the North-West country. We did so; whatever the Government proposed to us, they received without an instant's delay, and they received as well the moral support and countenance of every member of Parliament and of the people at large in taking the earliest, the most active, the most energetic, the most complete steps that they could devise in order to the restoration of public authority. But while we have been doing that we must not lose sight of this very important duty of ours, nor must we lose sight of this very important duty of ours, nor must we lose sight of this very important obligation of the Government. I say the obligation of the Government to bring down to Parliament the materials upon which Parliament may pronounce a judgment, is clear and plain. They have full power to govern, and it is difficult to presume that without some neglect, or delay, or wrong, such results as have taken place, could have taken place. But I quite admit it to be true that they may have taken place without neglect, without delay, without mistake, without misgovernment. That is indeed possible; but if there is to be a presumption, the presumption must, at the moment, be against those in authority. The Government of the day may rebut that presumption, but they are obliged to undertake the task, and the condition upon which alone they can accomplish such a rebuttal, is full information and full materials on which a judgment can be reached. We have the right of judgment, and we have the duty of judgment; we are to pass between our fellow citizens lately in arms and their rulers on the political question, and we are to pass on the questions between the Indians and their rulers. Besides having that right, we have a great responsibility, as the last court of appeal, in this matter. We are the people's representatives, the great inquest of the country, upon whom it devolves to enquire thoroughly into such large questions as these. I say the duty of the Government is obvious on general principles. It flows from their position and ours. It has been frequently admitted and acted upon in England. It has been admitted and acted upon here. It was acted upon here by the hon gentlemen themselves on the occasion of the former disturbance in 18:9-70. We had at that time as to who were responsible for it, and as to what course a disturbance, a serious disturbance, though much less serious than the present one, in connection with our acquisition of the North-West. When we met Parliament or he 15th February, 1870, Louis Riel was in possession of the Red River settlement, as the president of the Government which he had assumed to form in that country; negotiations were going on with the people of the country; an armed force was being organised, or was contemplated at any rate, for progress there in the spring. In that condition of things the Parliament met on the 15th February, 1870. On the 24th day of that month, the Government brought down by Meseage, not upon solicitation, not upon instance, not upon pressure, but voluntarily by Message from His Excellency, the documents connected with and throwing light upon the causes of that outbreak up to the latest date, and comprising a mass of papers which, when printed exceeded 150 pages of print. The Government did not think that they were justified in picking and choosing for themselves; they felt that the situation was one which entitled both sides of the House to know all that had transpired, and they therefore brought down all the papers. They proposed, on the day on which they brought them down, the formation of a select committee, struck from both sides of the House, on which were the late lamented Mr. Holton, my hon. friend the present member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) and myself, from the Opposition side of the House, to go over the papers which were brought down in the Message, in order that they might report to the House what papers it would be expedient to publish at that time. They felt that, in that peculiar condition, it was for the House to decide, through the medium of a committee struck by the House, and in which both sides had confidence, what papers should be withheld; and they, therefore, brought down all, and left to that committee the duty of deciding what, in the public interest at the moment, ought not to see the light. In a very few days—as I have said, this transaction took place on the 24th, nine days after the opening of the Session—within a very few days thereafter, that select committee reported, and recommended the publication of all the papers brought down, with the exception of one single despatch from the provisional Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. Mr. Macdougall, and the names of two or three persons occurring in two or three places in some of the correspondence, which names were replaced by asterisks. Almost immediately upon the opening of the Session, my hon. friend from East York moved for other papers-not knowing, of course, what the Government would bring down-other papers connected with some details as to the surveys and other points. That motion was granted, and those papers were brought down within a very brief period. What were these papers? What was the general character of these papers and of this information which the Government, upon the occasion to which I refer, with reference to the outbreak that had taken place in the North-West, to prevent our entry into and assumption of the government of that country, with reference to a condition of things in which there was a de facto government assumed to be established there, and which was assuming to act; while negotiation was going on for settlement; while an armed expedition was arranged to proceed in the spring —what was the general character of the papers then brought down? They professed to be everything that threw light on the cause of the trouble, that threw light on the conduct of the Government, that threw light on the conduct of the Hudson's Bay Company, that threw light on the conduct of the population, that threw light on the conduct of the officers of the Government; all the instructions, all the despatches, all the correspondence, all the papers from which this House and this country could form its judgment as to how that trouble had arisen, as to what it was due to, on the conduct of the Government, that threw light on the should be taken in regard to it, were voluntarily brought down by the Government of the day in discharge of what they felt to be their public duty, their bounden duty, their obvious obligation to the country and to Parliament. I shall trouble the House with a few references to the papers so brought down, in order that I may show by those references the kind of papers that were thought fit to be brought down, and at the same time incidentally throw some light upon the present situation. That situation differed very much from the present. We had bargained tor the transfer of the territory, but we were not in control of it, and, as I have always thought, due precautions had not been taken either by the Government of this country or by the Hudson's Bay Company in that respect. I believe that proper preliminary communications with the Hudson Bay Company's authorities and with the people at large, did not take place before those steps were taken, which resulted so unfortunately, the steps with reference to surveys, the steps with reference to the entry of the Governor. I believe that due information with reference to the intentions of the Government as to the constitution to be proposed, and the plan of government of the new Territo y, as to the rights of the people in their lands, was not communicated at the proper time. I believe that the surveys, the making of the surveys, the attempt to make the surveys without the extinguishment of the Indian title, and in the condition of feeling amongst certain classes of the population, was a very great mistake, as was the making of them, without full and authoritative and authentic communication to the settlers as to the intentions and object of the surveys, although such information was, to some extent, communicated by Colonel Dennis. As I have said, I believe the Hudson Bay Company's authorities were also to blame. They were to blame for not communicating to the Government of Canada, and, if necessary, to the Imperial Government, the facts which they knew, or ought to have known, as to the condition of feeling among the people, and for not advising the course it would have been proper to take under the circumstances. these papers, amongst others, contain proofs which seem to me to indicate, as I have said, two things. First, the kind of information which the Government felt it its duty to bring down in order that the House might judge whether it had been right or wrong in its procedure; and, secondly, some things which would help us to a judgment when the time arrives for judgment on the present difficulty, They comprise, amongst others, a letter from Col. Dennis, who had been charged with some duties in connection with the surveys, to Mr. Macdougall, in his capacity as Minister of Public Works at Ottawa, on the 21st August, 1869, a letter written from the Red River settlement, in which he

"I find that a considerable degree of irritation exists among the native population in view of surveys and settlements being made without the Indian title having first been extinguished. You will, no doubt, have become aware that the half-breeds lately, in a public meeting, called the company here to account in the matter of the money paid for the transfer to Canada.

"Whatever may have been the views of the Government as to the "Whatever may have been the views of the Government as to the character of the title to be conveyed by the deed of transfer, whether the expense may or may not be fairly chargeable to the company, I am satisfied that the Government will, in the first place, have to undertake the extinction of the Indian title.

"This question must be regarded as of the very greatest importance. In connection therewith I would reiterate to you my conviction, as expressed while at Ottawa that nothing should be lost. The necessity for promot action is more account to me now, then it seemed even they

French half-breeds who constitute about  $\frac{1}{2}$  or  $\frac{1}{2}$  (say 3,000 souls), of the settlement, are likely to prove a turbulent element. This class have gone so far as to threaten violence should surveys be attempted to be

Then, on the 20th of August following, the same gentleman writes to the same Minister a letter, from which I also read a brief extract:

"In the first place I had proposed, until fully advised as to the system of farm surveys which might be adopted by the Government, to employ the time in surveying the belt of lands granted by the company which embraces a strip of two miles in wid'h on each side and extending up the Red River for the distance of say, 40 miles from the month and also along the Assimbains in the same way for many miles. This I and also along the Assiniboine in the same way for many miles. This I have hesitated to go on with at the present time, in consequence of much of the land being under crop; going through which would involve more or less injury to individual settlers, a measure which, in the present temper of the half-breeds, is to be deprecated."

Again he says:

"I have again to remark an uneasy feeling which exists in the half-breeds and Indian element, with regard to what they conceive to be the premature action taken by the Government in proceeding to effect a survey of the lands without having first extinguished the Indian title, and I beg permission to reiterate the conviction expressed on a former occasion, that this must be the first question of importance to be dealt with by the Government. I have, of course, taken every opportunity to assure this element as to the intention of the Government to dealt becomes the angle of the matter in question and shell can a guidalt. to as ure this element as to the intention of the Government to deal honorably and fairly in the matter in question, and shall go on quietly with my work. Should, however, this feeling be likely to result in any opposition of a character likely to prejutice a settlement fraught with importance to the immediate future of this country, I shall at once cease operation and await your future orders."

On the 22nd of the September following, Mr. Macdougall as Minister of Public Works, sent a memorandum to the Council stating:

"Mr. Dennis, after consulting with the Crown Lands Departments, both in Canada and the United States, in accordance with the above instructions, has forwarded certain papers embracing a proposed system of surveys and sub-divisions of public lands in that part of the Dominion."

On the 11th October, 1869, Colonel Dennis sends a memorandum giving the circumstances connected with the active opposition of the French half-breeds in this settlement, to the prosecution of the Government surveys:

"This day, about 2 p. m., a messenger arrived, a former chainbearer of Mr. Webb's party, employed in surveying the base line or parallel of latitude between townships 5, 6 and 7, bringing the unwelcome information from Mr. Webb that his further progress with the survey had been stopped by a band of some 18 French half-breeds, headed by a man named Louis Riel."

I read then another extract:

"He was ordered by the leader of the party at once to desist from further running the line, and in fact notified that he must leave the country on the south side of the Assiniboine, which country the party claimed as the property of the French half-bree is, and which they would not allow to be surveyed by the Uanadian Government."

Well, Mr. Dennis goes on to say that he applied to Mr. Cowan, who was a magistrate, for magisterial assistance, and he adds:

"I remarked to Mr. Cowan at the same time, that I questioned whether, owing to the unsettled state of the land tenure as regards the half-breeds and Indians, and the peculiar irritation or sensitiveness that existed on the part of the French half-breeds in view of the transfer of the territory, and the assumption of the Government by Canada, it would be politic to take harsh measures towards the offenders in this

On the 12th October, 1869, Governor Macdougall wrote a letter to Mr. Smith, Secretary of the Hudson's Bay Company, from which this is an extract:

"I am also sorry to inform you that some of the people here have storped one of Colonel Dennis' surveying parties, and as usual, of course, the colonel came to us for redress. The men who have thus interfered say they know the survey could proceed without any injury to anyone; but stopping it is always a beginning, and they are desirous to let the Canadian Government know that it is not wanted by them; that they consider, if the Canadians wish to come here, the terms on which they were to enter should have been arranged with the Local Government here, as it is acknowledged by the people in the country."

Mr. Cowan, on the 15th October, 1869, replied to Colonel Dennia:

Mr. BLAKE.

"I very much regret to say that we have failed entirely in our endeavors to get over the opposition of the French Manitoba settlers to the survey."

On the 12th February, 1870, Colonel Dennis made a long report upon the whole subject to the Minister of Public Works at Ottawa, from which I read a short extract:

I should here state that I had previously explained the object of such survey to the people, that the survey was not to disturb boundaries or porsession, but to ascertain each man's actual occupation, and make a plan thereof, so that the Government would be in a position, at the earliest possible date, to carry out their intention to confirm Government deeds, and all bond fide occupants of land.

"The Engli-h speaking people appeared to understand and appreciate the necessity for the measure, and the boon it would be to have their titles perfected, and showed every facility to the surveyors employed at titles periected, and showed the work.

"I gave, strict orders, however, not to survey in that portion of the settlement occupied by the French half-breeds and although I had, as early as the day after my arrival from Canada, on the 21st August, called on the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, at the palace of St. Boniface, on which occasion I saw Père Tissot, Père Allard, and the same thing to them, and those gentlemen had also expressed themselves most favorably toward the measure, and nad also expressed themselves most tavorably toward the measure, and promised that they would explain the same to their people, and recommend them not to throw any difficulties in the way of these necessary surveys being effected; still, as the outbreak occurred a few weeks after, and I had every desire to avoid any further possible cause of offence to that party, I gave the orders above, and to my knowledge they were not departed f om by either of the gentlemen employed."

I hat finishes the extracts which I think it material to read, showing the degree of information supplied, and the condition of things upon the question of surveys, from August, 1869, onwards. On the 27th October, 1869, Mr. Dennis communicated to Mr. Macdougall, when outside the Territory, I think in the neighborhood of Pembina, a statement in which he declares:

"The attitude of the English speaking portion of the colony may, I think, be fairly stated as follows:—
"They say, we feel a disposition to extend a sincere welcome to the Hon. Mr. Macdougall, as the gentleman who has been selected for our future Governor.

"We regret sincerely that the good name of the colony should be prejudiced by any such action as we are told is contemplated by a portion of the French half-breeds."

Then another extract:

"We feel this way—we feel confidence in the future administration of the Government of this country under Canadian rule; at the same time, we have not been consulted in any way as a people, in entering into the Dominion.

"The character of the new government has been settled in Canada without our being consulted. We are prepared to accept it respectfully, to obey the laws, and to become good subjects; but when you present to us the issue of a conflict with the French party, with whom we have hitherto lived in friendship, backed up, as they would be, by the Roman Catholic Church, which appears probable by the course at present being taken by the priests, in which conflict it is almost certain the aid of the Indians would be invoked, and perhaps obtained, by that party, we feel disinclined to enter upon it, and think that the Dominion should assume the responsibility of establishing amongst us what it, and it alone, has determined upon,"

Next, Mr. Macdougall wrote to Mr. McTavish, who was the local head of the Hudson's Bay Company at Fort Garry, a letter in the month of November, in which he pointed out that he thought the duty of the Government was to pro-claim the fact that Canada was now the proprietor and the Government of the country. Governor McTavish, on 9th November, 1869, answered Mr. Macdougall, in a letter, from which I will read two extracts:

"The Act in question referred to the prospective trans er of the Territory, but up to this moment we have no official intimation from England or the Dominion of Canada, of the fact of the transfer, or of its conditions, or of the date at which they were to take practical effect upon the Government of this country. In such a state of matters, we think it is evident that any such act on the part of the Red River authorities as that to which we point, would necessarily have been marked by a great degree of vagueness and uncertainty; it was felt that it might affect injuriously the future, as well as the present Government; and we therefore deemed it advisable to await the receipt of official intelligence of the actual transfer of the country, and of all the details which it concerned us to know." cerned us to know."

Again:

"It is unquestionable that the preservation of the public peace is the paramount duty of every Government; but while in ordinary circumstance it might be reasonable enough to cast upon us the exclusive responsibility of preserving the public peace, it may perhaps at the same time admit of doubt whether some degree of responsibility did not also rest upon others in a case of so exceptional a character as this,a case in which not merely a whole country is transferred, but also, in a certain sense, a whole people, or where at least the political condition of the people undergo such a great change; and it may moreover be a question whether, on the part of the Government the preliminary arrangements for introducing that change have proceeded upon such a just and accurate appreciation of the condition of the country and the peculiar feelings and habits of its people, as on such an occasion was desirable, if not absolutely essential; and whether the complications by which we are now surrounded may not, to a great extent be owing to that circumstance."

Negotiations were then entered into by the Government at Ottawa with a view to sending out commissioners to deal with the people of the country, and amongst those was Very Reverend Grand Vicar Thibault, to whom, as a part of his instructions, on December 4th, 1869, the late Secretary of State addressed a letter, from which I will read some extracts:

"That the disturbances which have taken place at and around Winnipeg and Fort Garry have grown out of vague apprehensions of danger, incident to the transition state of things which the action of the Imperial Government and Parliament rendered inevitable, there is no reason to doubt; but it is quite apparent that, underlying what is natural and pardonable in this movement, there have been agencies at work which loyal subjects cannot countenance, and that artful attempts have been noyal subjects cannot confirmance, and that artist attempts have been made to mislead the people by the most flagrant and absurd misrepresentations. Had the Queen's Government or the Government of the Dominion imitated the rash and reckless conduct of some of those who have taken part in this disturbance, there would ere this have been bloodshed and civil war in Rupert's land with the prospect of the flame bloodsned and civil war in kupert's land with the prospect of the flame spreading along the frontier as the fire spreads over the prairie. Fortunately calmer counsels have prevailed both in England and at Ottawa. The proclamation of the Queen's representative, with copies of which you will be furnished in French and English, will convey to her people the solemn words of their Sovereign, who, possessed of ample power to enforce her authority, yet confides in their loyalty and affectionate ettachment to her throng " tionate attachment to her throne."

Another extract:

"All the Provinces of the British Empire which now enjoy representative institutions and responsible government have passed through a probationary period, till the growth of population and some political training prepared them for self government. In the United States the territories are ruled from Washington till the time arrives when they can prove their fitness to be included in the family of state and, in the halls of congress, challenge the full measure of power and free development which American citizenship includes. It is fair to assume that some such training as human society requires in all free countries. that some such training as human society requires in all free countries may be useful, if not indispensible, at Red River; but of this you may be assured, that the Governor General and his council will gladly welcome the period when the Queen can confer, with their entire approbation, the largest measure of self government on her subjects in that region, compatible with the preservation of British interests on this continent and the integrity of the Empire."

A proclamation dated December 6th, 1869, referred to in the dispatch from which I have read some extracts, contains these words:

"Her Majesty commands me to state to you that she will be always really through me as her representative to redress all well founded grivances, and that she has instructed me to hear and consider any complaints that may be made, or desires that may be expressed to me as Governor General. At the same time she has charged me to exercise all the powers and authority with which she has entrusted me in the support of order and the suppression of unlawful disturbances."

Then again:

"And I do lastly inform you, that in case of your immediate and peaceable obedience and dispersion, I shall order that no legal proceedings be taken against any parties implicated in these unfortunate

On the day following, namely, December 7th, 1869, the Secretary of State wrote to Mr. Macdougall a letter, from which I take two extracts:

"You will now be in a position in your communications with the residents of the North-West to assure them (1) that all their civil and religious liberties and privileges will be sacredly respected; (2) That residents of the North-west to assure them (1) that all their control religious liberties and privileges will be sacredly respected; (2) That all their properties, rights and equities of every kind, as enjoyed under the government of the Hudson's Bay Company, will be continued to them; (3) That in granting titles to land now occupied by the settlers, the most liberal policy will be pursued."

Again:

"(8) That the present Government is to be considered as merely provisional and temporary, and that the Government of Canada will be 255 prepared to submit a measure to Parliament, granting a liberal constitution as soon as you, as Governor, and your Council have had an opportunity of reporting fully on the wants and requirements of the territory."

A question arose at this time as to whether the Imperial Government should pay over to the Hudson's Bay Company the purchase money which had been placed at their disposition to be paid over upon the transfer by the Canadian Parliament, the sum of £300,000 sterling; and in considering that question and in response to the letter of the home authorities upon the subject, and a committee of the Privy Council on December 16th, 1869, made a report which was approved and transmitted to the Colonial Secretary, and which is signed by the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald). From it I will read some extracts:

"That there would be an armed resistance by the inhabitants to the transfer was, it is to be presumed, unexpected by all parties; it certainly was so by the Dominion Government. In this regard the company cannot be acquitted of all blame. They had an old and fully organised government in the country, to which the people appeared to render ready obedience. Their Fovernor was advised by the Council, in which some of the leading residents had seats. They had every means of information as to the state of feeling existing in the country. They knew, or ought to have known, the light in which the proposed negotiations were viewed by the people under their rule. If they were aware of the feeling of discontent, they ought frankly to have stated it to the Imperial and Canadian Governments. If they were ignorant of the discontent, the responsibility of such wilful blindness on the part of their officers must rest upon them. For more than a year these negotiations have been actively proceeded with, and it was the duty of the company to have prepared the people under its rule for the change—to have explained the precautions taken to protect the interest of the "That there would be an armed resistance by the inhabitants to the the company to have prepared the people under its rule for the change—to have explained the precautions taken to protect the interest of the inhabitants, and thus have removed any misapprehensions that may have existed amongst them. It appears that no steps of any kind in that direction were taken. The people have been led to suppose that they have been sold to Canada with an utter disregard of their rights and position. When Governor McTavish visited Canada in June last he was in communication with the Canadian Government, and he never intimated that he had even a suspicion of discontent existing, nor did he make any suggestions as to the best mode of effecting the proposed change with the assent of the inhabitants." proposed change with the assent of the inhabitants.'

Again:

"Any hasty attempt by the Canadian Government to force their rule upon the insurgents would probably result in armed resistance and bloodshed. Every other course should be tried before resort is had to force. If life were once lost in an encounter between a Canadian force and the inhabitants, the seeds of hostility to Canada and Canadian rule would be sown, and might create an ineradicable hatred to the union of the countries and thus more the fiture prosperity of British America. of the countries, and thus mar the future prosperity of British America. If anything like hostility should commence, the temptation to the wild Indian tribes and to the restless adventurers who abound in the United Indian tribes and to the restless adventurers who abound in the United States (many of them with military experience gained in the late civil war) to join the insurgents would be almost irresistible. Already it is said that the Fenian organisations look upon this rising as another means of exhibiting their hatred to England. No one can foresee the end of the complications that might thus be occasioned, not only as between Canada and the North-West, but between the United States and England. From a sincere conviction of the gravity of the situation and not from any desire to repudiate or postpone the performance of any of their engagements, the Canadian Government have urged a temporary delay of the transfer. This is not a question of money—it may be one of civil war. It is one in which the present and future prosperity of the British possessions in North America is involved, which prosperity hasty action might permanently prejudice."

"The Committee would also request your Excellency to assure Lord

"The Committee would also request your Excellency to assure Lord Granville that the Government have taken and are taking active measures to bring about a happier state of affairs.

"They have sent on a mission of peace to the French half-breeds now in arms, the Very Reverend Mr. Thibault, Vicar General (who has labored among them as a clergyman for thirty-nine years), accompanied by Colonel De Salaberry, a gentleman well acquainted with the country and with the manners and feeling of the inhabitants. These gentlemen are fully informed of the beneficent intentions of the Canadian Government, and can disabuse the minds of the people of the misrepresentations made by designing foreigners."

"(Signed) JOHN A. MACDONALD."

JOHN A. MACDONALD." " (Signed)

On the 17th of December the Government at Ottawa issued a commission to the Hon. Donald A. Smith, who was well known to and familiar with the country and its people, in his capacity as a resident of many years, and as occupying a responsible position in the Hudson's Bay Company. In that commission it was said:

"And whereas it is expedient that enquiry should be had into the causes and extent of such obstruction, opposition and discontentment aforesaid, * * and also to enquire into the causes and discontent and dissatisfaction alleged to exist in respect to the proposed union of the said North-West Territories with the Dominion of Canada; and further to explain to the inhabitants of the said country the principle on which the Government of Canada intends to administer the government of the country, according to such instructions as may be given to you by our Governor in Council in this behalf; and to take steps to remove any misapprehension which may exist in respect to the mode of government of the same, and to report to our Governor General the result of such enquiries, and on the best mode of quieting and removing such discontent and dissatisfaction; and also to report on the most proper and fitting mode for effecting the speedy transfer of the government and the country from the authority of the Hudson's Bay Company to the Government of Canada, with the assent of the inhabitants."

We passed the Manitoba Act during that Session, and that Act declares in its 31st clause:

"And whereas it is expedient towards the extinguishment of the Indian titles to the land in the Province, to appropriate a portion of such ungranted lands to the extent of 1,400,000 acres thereof, for the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents, it is hereby enacted that, under regulations to be from time to time made by the Governor General in Council, the Lieutenant Governor shall select such lots or tracts in such parts of the Province as he may deem expedient, to the extent aforesaid, and divide the same among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the said transfer to Canada, and the same shall be granted to the said children respectively, in such mode and on such conditions as to settlement and otherwise as the Governor General in Council may from time to time determine."

The 32nd section dealt with the settlers' titles. The Hudson Bay freehold grants were turned into freehold grants from the Crown; the Hudson Bay grants, less than freehold, were turned into freehold grants from the Crown; titles by occupancy with license of Hudson's Bay Company, when the Indian titles were extinguished, were turned into freehold grants from the Crown; those who were in peaceable possession of lands, in which the Indian title was not extinguished. were declared to have a preemptive right, at a price to be fixed by the Governor in Council; and the hay and common rights were to be recognised, and it was declared that they should be commuted by grants in fee simple. With the view of carrying out the arrangements of the Manitoba Act as to half-breed grants, on the 29th of July, 1870, the late Sir George E. Cartier recommended to Council the appointment of Lieutenant Governor Archibald as administrator of Manitoba Crown lands:

"And that he be required to report when called upon, on the regulalations to be made under the Manitoba Act for the selection and division of the grant among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in Manitoba at the time of the transfer to Canada, together with the mode and conditions as to settlement and otherwise which he may consider desirable to embody in such regulations."

There was an Order in Council made on the 2nd of August, 1870, based on that recommendation, and on the 4th of August the Secretary of State, pursuant to that order, wrote to Lieutenant Governor Archibald, communicating the Order and saying:

"I have to request that you will have the goodness at your earliest convenience to report the regulations, etc., etc., in terms of the above Order in Council."

Details were required, in order to the Lieutenant Governor's carrying out this provision, and on the 4th of August, 1870, a letter from the Secretary of State was sent to Lieutenant Governor Archibald, conveying him his instructions, also the 9th paragraph being as follows:—

"In order to enable you to select, under the provisions of the 31st section of the Act, and under the regulations to be, from time to time, made by the Governor General in Council, such lots or tracts from among the ungranted lands in such parts of the Province of Manitoba as you may deem expedient, to the extent mentioned in the said section, and divide the same among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the transfer of the same to Canada—you will cause an enumeration to be made of the half-breed heads of families residing in the said Province at the time of such transfer, and of their children respectively."

On the 1st of October, 1870, the Lieutenant Governor, pursuant to those instructions, divided the Province for Mr. Blake.

enumeration purposes, and appointed the enumerators; and in the same month issued the instructions and forms to the enumerators. Those instructions included the direction to count anyone whose dwelling house or place of residence was within the Province at the time of the transfer, though, at the time he might have been, or may now be temporarily absent, and the enumeration so far was proceeded with at a comparatively early date, although, of course, it turned out afterwards to be defective, by reason of certain persons not having been in the Province at the time, and evidence not having been brought forward by them at the time of the general enumeration. In the following Session there was brought down also a letter from Hon. Donald A. Smith, in the capacity of chief officer, I presume, of the Hudson's Bay Company, addressed to the Lieutenant Governor, as to the District of Saskatchewan. The letter was written at Fort Garry, and dated 9th September, 1870. In that letter

"For several years past outrages have been of frequent eccurrence there, with which the authorities have been powerless effectually to deal; and such are at present the latent elements of disorder that it is impossible to predict how long a general outburst may be delayed, similar possibly in many respects to that of recent occurrence in this place."

And he cites a number of instances. First, a murder on Christmas, 1866; second, liquor riots and orgies; third, encounters between Assiniboines, Crees and Blackfeet, annually becoming more perplexing to the Hudson's Bay Company's people; fourth, the existence of a settlement of French half-breeds at a place named St. Albert, a collision between the inhabitants of which and the Indians had already occurred, while a repetition of such events was much to be dreaded; fifth, the Hudson's Bay Company's people were not likely to be able to live long at peace with the Indians, and he mentions that in 1867, Fort Pitt was forcibly entered by 200 Blackfeet, who pillaged the fort and afterwards the trains of supplies of the fort hunters; sixth, shortly after a Blackfoot severely wounded a clerk at Carlton by a gun shot; seventh, in the spring of 1870 an encounter took place between the Blackfeet and the Crees involving serious danger to the Company's Factor Christie at Edmonton; eighth, in the spring of 1870 W. E. Traill, a clerk at Fort Pitt was savagely assaulted by a half-breed servant, and hit on the head with a hatchet; ninth, advances are a necessary of life to the half-breeds, whose improvidence obliges them to live during the winter on the prospective summer's profits; and the refusal to make these advances would expose the company's stores to certain pillage; tenth, a generally mutinous conduct throughout the settlement. He adds:

"The miners, the missionaries and others who have founded isolated settlements on the Saskatchewan live in the midst of personal daugers far more serious than those which menace the lives of the Company's servants at their posts."

And he requests a force of fifty men at once at Edmonton and a like force next spring at Carlton to meet the pressing difficulties of the case. Now, Sir, these papers, as I have said, sufficiently indicate the character of the information which the Government thought it its duty to bring down, and which was supplied to Parliament at that time; and thus, as I have indicated rather than related, in the end, after the spilling of some blood, though a drop only in comparison with that which has been lately shed; after the expenditure of much treasure, though a trifle only in comparison with that of which we have now to face the expenditure; after the running of great risks; after the creation of much ill-feeling; a small Province—because we must remember what was then done was to create only the original Province of Munitoba—was hastily formed, and a solution of the pressing difficulties was found, though the consequences of the errors then committed have extended far beyond the time of that solution. We bought, Sir, a very dear experience, and with that experience we began our course of governing the great territory of the North-West

Since that time 15 years have elapsed, and we must ask ourselves, how we have used the experience that was acquired, how we have fulfilled our mission, how we have exercised our power; and those questions are to be answered soon. I state them only to-day; I do not propose to attempt to answer them to day, because my contention is that it is the Government's duty to furnish us authentic means for answering. I state them to-day; but even their statement requires some exposition. As I have said, the actual terms of settlement embraced only the area of a small Province; but beyond that small Province there were vast regions, dotted over here and there with Indian tribes, and here and there, though in very few quarters, with small settlements, if one can call them so, of half-breeds or whites, with a mission, or a Hudson Bay post. As the great settlement of the North-West Territories in the east was on the Red and the Assiniboine rivers, so the great settlement, if you may call it so, in the western part of those Territories was on the mighty Saskatchewan river, and for the same cause. At several points on the Saskatchewan there were very early settlements. The land was very fertile, the river was the great artery of the internal trade of the country, limited though that trade was; and it was also for the people, during a large portion of the year, a chief means of communication. Many years before 1870 the churches had cocupied the field. The Church of England, the Roman defied, and that insurrection has raised its head in that Catholic church, and other churches, had established missions, country. We know that 5,000 Canadians have been put in some in the very neighborhood of the focus of the present disturbance, and there had been pioneers—some of mixed blood, but very few—there for many years. The settlement was then composed—besides Hudson Bay officials, where they had posts, besides the missionaries—of half-breeds—French, Scotch and English, whom you might call settlers, but who were largely freighters and hunters, and some of whom also farmed a little—and of some old Hudson Bay employes, and other pioneers from Ontario, Quebec and elsewhere. To that settlement had naturally extended under its circumstances system of occupying the river fronts which had obtained in the Province of Manitoba. It had not originated there; for Canadian purposes, at any rate, we may say, it had originated in the Province of Quebec, where that system obtained from the very early settlement of the country, and probably for obvious reasons-for the reason that protection from Indian attacks, society and good neighborhood, the facility of communication by the great river which was the chief means of communication, the facility of obtaining what they wanted and going where they wanted, were largely served, by the people living tolerably close together on the edge of the stream; and so you found a system of narrow frontages on the river, and the farms extending a long way back. Both from habit and custom, as well as from reason, those plans of action were adopted in the North-West; and there may be found another reason, for this system gave the advantage of river flats, with meadow lands belonging to them, and a variety to the farm which would be important to the comfort and prosperity of the settlers. Now, the solution which was reached for the Province of Manitoba itself, on any points in which the condition of things was similar in substance would, in equity and in the natural expectations of the people, apply to the territories beyond. If there were just the same class of persons similarly circumstanced as to race, as to claim, as to situation, and as to occupancy, outside of the bounds of Manitoba, as those within that Province, it was not unnatural to say that they should expect similar treatment; and it was not unnatural to suppose that what was just for the one would be just for the other. Under these circumstances, with reference to the extinguishment of the Indian title of the half-breeds, ence to the question of surveys-upon the jealousy and suspicion attending which I have already indicated the strong view of that class of the population in the early days-on all these questions, I say, we had had experience which should have been profitable to us, and we had established precedents which were calculated at once to raise expectations and to furnish a method of settling difficulties. Of this vast territory to which I have referred, we have for 15 years now had the control; there is no Hudson Bay Company government to blame now; we must bear our own burden, and the control we have had has been that of a paternal or autocratic Government working from Ottawa, and no doubt with large, I may almost say with unlimited powers; for whatever powers it felt in want of, it asked from this Parliament, and Whatever powers it asked from this Parliament, this Parliament unflinchingly, and at once, granted to it. This being so, Sir, having so entered into possession and control, and having for 15 years so ruled that country, how stands the case to-day? What has been and what is the condition of affairs? We know how the case has stood since the middle of the month of March. We know that the condition which I suggested hypothetically awhile ago has been the actual state of things; we know that the public peace has been broken, that the public order battle array by the Government, with the willing support of the Parliament and the people of the country; we know that bloody engagements have been fought; we know that the lives of some of the best and bravest of sons have been lost; we know that many hose best and bravest have been wounded; those we know that some have died, and that many more, in the natural course of events, will suffer permanently from the hardships incidental to war, those hardships which are its chief scourge, which furnish the chief loss in war, a loss far greater than that which is to be traced on the field of battle. We know that those hardships and those difficulties and those infirmities, so produced, have been borne uncomplainingly; and we must remember that though they do not give the honor of a wound, they strike as severely and as hard as any wound can strike. We know that the families and the friends of these volunteers have suffered, not only in feeling but in comfort; we know that the pittance they are paid in many cases does not support them, and that the public of various localities has been obliged to come forward in order to keep the wolf of hunger from the door of the wives and children of those who are fighting our battles in the North-West. Now, Sir, in the course of these transactions, our troops have done nobly. It is not, perhaps, now the time, we have not now the opportunity, the information, to enable us, if we were capable of doing so, to criticise the military conduct of the campaign; but we have quite sufficient information, from the unvarying testimony which reaches us from even quarter, to say so much. We know that in endurance, in the character and rapidity of their marches, in pluck, in dash, in steady courage, in military aptitude, those whom we have sent into the field have surpassed even our glowing expectations, and as they are the flower, from a military point of view, of the Canadian people, they are a flower of which, though it be tinged with a bloody hue we may not like, we have a right to be proud. And let us be just to their foes. They, too, wrong, deeply wrong, in what they did, misled, misguided, unhappy men—they, too, fought with skill, with bravery, and with determination. It would be doing less than justice to our own forces to say less than that, because the character of their deeds depends largely upon the determination, and the force, and the skill, with reference to the rights of occupancy and settlement, and the power of those with whom they had to contend. with reference to the river front question, and with refer- They fought desperately, and they, too, have bled and died in numbers. This is not all. Besides horrid war, there has been more horrid murder. The savage Indian has donned his war paint and opened up his career of slaughter, of rape and pillage; and age, nor sex, nor sacred office, nor faithful friendship has availed to prevent the outrages which he calls war. Horrors have occurred which make the blood run cold, and which the tongue almost refuses to portray; and against these, too, our people, both those who were called by their avocation to resist and those who stood forward at the moment as volunteers, have done nobly. The casualties in these combats, considering the number engaged, have been very great. The deaths, from wounds in battle or from assassination, seem, by the accounts I have seen in the papers, to be on the side of the loyal forces and the people, 66 or more, and the wounded on the same side number 119; and the deaths on the side of the insurgents, at and near Batouche, are said to be 68 or more, and the wounded to be 191, and other deaths there were on that side earlier. Besides this, it is stated that 105 Indians graves were counted after the attack upon the camp of Poundmaker. We have no information as to the numbers wounded on that side upon that occasion. Assuming that a proportion much less than the usual proportion of deaths to wounds occurred there, it seems the lamentable probability that there have on the whole been about 250 deaths and 400 wounded, representing, so far, this phase of the transactions in the North-West during the last two months. I have said that the casualties on the part of the loyal forces are extraordinary in proportion to the numbers. They exceed those recorded of some great historic combats. Instances will occur to every one, but one case came under my notice within a day or two with which I had not been before familiar; I refer to the great battle of Isly which was fought in Algiers, about forty years ago by Marshal Bugeaud, against the forces of the Moors, against the Empire of Morocco. The French troops in that fight, numbered 6,500 foot and 1,500 horse, while the Moors mustered about 50,000 horse and a small body of foot. An obstinate combat took place which lasted several hours. Repeated attacks were made upon the small bodies, sometimes more or less detached, of the French forces. The French forces ultimately obtained a decisive victory, remaining on the enemy's ground with a loss in all of 27 killed and 96 wounded, losses which compare most favorably with those which have occurred on the side of the troops of the people of Canada, who have been fighting the battle of Canada in the North-West. I have said that we rejoice over our soldiers' valor; it is perhaps the one fruit and gain from all this loss and woe. But still while we rejoice, we rejoice, I, at any rate, rejoice with chastened and sober feelings, when I reflect that these are conflicts fought on Canadian soil, that they are conflicts fought between Canadian citizens and subjects, in part with our fellow citizens, in part with our Indian wards, and that the blood shed on both sides is the blood of the commonwealth of Canada. Surely, in the state of circumstances I have depicted, there can be no question more urgent, no question more important than that which I have suggested as the duty of the Government to state and the duty of this House to consider and resolve, how can these things be in Canada? How can these things be in free, self-governing, peaceful, law-abiding Canada? But great as were the perils and toils of the soldier, and be in free, self-governing, peaceful, law-abiding Canada? But great as were the perils and toils of the soldier, and deep as is the sympathy of the people which flows out to has chosen, in the path allotted and undertaken duty. But the perils and the hardships have not been confined to the soldier; far from it. The perils and the hardships have extended to the peaceful settler who has gone forth with wife and children to make a home in the wilderness, to the pioneer who undertook long and wearisome journeys, who encountered isolation and privation, but who looked Mr. Blake. Mr. BLAKE.

for safety and security in every corner of our country He too and those near to him have suffered; he, too, and those near to him, so far as our information goes, have done well in the great emergencies to which they were exposed. The lives of some have been lost, and, generally, over a wide area, terror, desolation, destruction, privation have prevailed, and of course, over a very much wider area still, anxiety and suspense. Smiling homes have been destroyed, and the labor of years has been swept away in a week, and over a vast district, all the vaster because of the vagueness of information in that country, the ominous cloud of an Indian war has spread. Now let me read you from a local paper, the Battleford Herald of the 23rd of April, the account which it gives of the condition of things in its immediate locality:

"One short month ago, the fairest field in Canada was the Saskatchewan country; to-day it is the most desolate. And brightest and most prosperous in all her settlements was the Battle River Valley, whose sons hailed the opening of spring with joy and thankfulness, rejoicing in the prospects of the coming year, impatient to begin the labors that were to bring them their reward. But in one brief day their hopes were were to bring them their reward. But in one brief day their nopes were blasted; instead of being the masters of peaceful and happy homes, they were at one blow bereft of everything but manhood; reduced from a condition of plenty to one of absolute penury, houseless, homeless and penniless. Blood stains the soil, and the air is thick with the smoke of desolation. Nearly a score of our citizens have been slain without a moment's warning, by ingrates whose interests they guarded as carefully as they did their own, and whose hands were daily open in charity to the root they looked were as unfeaturate and to be pitied. In the town as they did their own, and whose hands were daily open in charity to the men they looked upon as unfortunate and to be pitied. In the town itself, or that part of it lying south of Battle River, there is only enough left to remind the sufferers of their once comfortable homes, and to recall the fact that many things of peculiar value are irretrievably lost and can never be replaced. Their crime was that they were whites; the penalty imposed was death. Of all the fair farms that covered the land, but few remain. Some of these lie under the guns of the fort, while others are held by men in alliance with the Indians; for on no other ground can their owners hope for exemption from the universal ruin. With the exception of these, there is not a home that has not been raided, scarcely a house that has not been burned. It has always been the boast of this district that, taking their numbers all through, their the boast of this district that, taking their numbers all through, their horses and cattle were better bred than in any other district on the Saskatchewan; the people were generally well-off, and made improved sakatchewan; the people were instantly wenton, and made improved stock a specialty in their system of tarming; but to-day they are not owners of a hoof. They are afoot and the maranders mounted; their dairies are bare, while their herds are being ruthlessly slaughtered by the thieves. The work of extermination has begun, evidently without a thought for the morrow."

Nor, while that is the condition of things with reference to the settler in the disturbed districts, or those districts which have been the centres of disturbance in three or four points in the North-West, are we to suppose that those who have risen against their countrymen had not, many of them too, a stake to lose, or sufferings for wife and children, hearth and home, to endure. Let us be just again. Let me read you the correspondence of the Mail newspaper of last month in regard to a scouting party after the battle of Fish Creek. The correspondent says:

"General Middleton, with Lord Melgund, Boulton's cavalry and Captain French's scouts, left at 9 o'clock sharp to-day, on a reconnoitering expedition down the river. The force was about 80 strong, all mounted There are two trails down the east bank of the Saskatchewan, one a mile or so distant from the river, which runs through a succession of bluffs and openings; the other nearer the River bank, which, until Gabriel's Crossing is reached, is almost entirely through open plains. We went down the first mentioned trail, returning by the other. The land is of excellent quality, dotted here and there with well built log houses of Metis, near which, in every instance, is land broken and almost ready for the seedlit will not receive this. and almost ready for the seed it will not receive this spring, averaging from two to twenty or thirty of forty acres. These homes, however, were lonely and deserted, and with what haste their occupants fled, the waggons in which the hegira had been made. All was still, lonely, deserted, but on every hand were to be seen signs of thrift and industry, and even of prosperity. There was an air of comfort and solidity about these places which compared more than favorably with the homes of their compatriots, or even of the average white settler, of Manitoba. Each place was snugly, warmly built; each farm had its byre, each its storehouse, while some had separate, mud-covered, tent-shaped ovens. Two or three had been enlarging the size of their houses, others had not wasted the winter, as the huge piles of fence-rails and sharpened pickets testified. To sum up their condition, I need only use the involuntary expression of one of the cavalry as we ride along: 'What fools not wasted the winter, as the huge piles of fence-rails and sharpened pickets testified. To sum up their condition, I need only use the involuntary expression of one of the cavalry as we ride along: 'What fools these people must be to leave such homes.' Of course, there was no elegant ease, but there was better: a good plain living without extraordinary exertion. We had not gone many miles when a lot of feathers, the contents of a home-made bed, were found; and near at hand the interior of a moss-bag, that useful contrivance in which the rising generation of the North-West spends its earlier days. Both had been torn to pieces to make bandages for those wounded in the Fish Creek affair. At noon, we reached Gabriel Dumont's Crossing, although he does not run it now, having sold out to a native Manitoban named Vandal, but it still retains his name. About a mile this side of the place, the soouts reported that five half-breeds had hastily left a house and, mounted on their fleet ponies, galloped away Batoche-ward. By the time the scattered little column was collected, the fleeing Metis were disappearing from view. They apparently had seen our slow approach before we noticed their hasty departure. The vacated house was visited, and we found that we had been ungentlemanly enough to disturb their mid-day meal. A fire was burning briskly in the stove, on which the kettle steamed. Some meat, which was at first thought to be horse-flesh, was being cooked; and on the table was a newly baked bannock. Outside the door were discarded strips of old linen clotted with blood, bandages to wrap the wounds of those engaged in the recent fight."

"At the crossing there are several buildings, a double one being used as the residence of the 'boss.' The facings of the windows and doors are painted a bright blue, the only attempt at ornamentation we have yet come across. On the left is an open storehouse, and immediately in front on the main entrance is a goodly sized store. In this latter, much to our surprise, is a billiard table, with cues, chalk, pool balls, and all the paraphernalia for rolling the ivories. Dumont's residence was also entered. It was plainly, but for this country nicely furnished. As in nearly all the other domiciles, a sewing machine occupied one corner, and the walls were decorated with cheap colored prints, amongst others vigneties of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise. In others vignettes of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise. In another house nearer the ferry were found some letters addressed to Gabriel Dumont, one being from Judith Bosin, Montana. There was also one from the Dominion Lands Office, Prince Albert, in reference to patents, and another from a Saskatchewan firm threatening to sue Gabriel if he did not at once pay a long overdue account. So this self sacrificing patriot is no better off than the rest of us, and even in his lonely life on the plains is as much subjected to duns as is the average Winnipeger."

Then again:

"The reconnoissance corroborated the previous impression we had formed that the rebels were overwhelmingly defeated at Fish Creek, and fied in utter demoralisation. All along the route there must have been hurried flitting; and removal of women and children to safer been hurried flitting, and removal of women and condition quarters.

"The warriors took care of their own safety. Whether they have gone to Batoche's or not, cannot, of course, be ascertained, but appearances indicate that they have, and that there they will give us battle if at all. In the meantime, as one passes through this desolate but fertile land, and sees the happy homes deserted, the fields untouched, the byres empty, he cannot escape experiencing a feeling of pain that these misguided Metis have taken the suicidal course that they have; of sorrow that co many circles should be rudely broken up; of regret that such well cultivated farms should lie idle and unproductive; of sympathising pity that these unfortunate men should be plunged into deep misery and poverty for the next year or two."

Now Sir all over the country, in the regions of the dis-

Now, Sir, all over the country, in the regions of the disturbance with the Indians, property has been taken; and if you look at the amount of property taken and destroyed, and count in the year's labor almost lost by these settlers by the want of opportunity to seed, you have a vast amount of present and of potential loss in this regard. Confidence, also, has been shaken. The charm of peace, the habit of submission on the part of the Indian has ended, and our relation to him now from this time forth assumes a new and more difficult phase. While the half-breed rising, as an organised rising is over, the Indian war is not yet over. How long it may last, we cannot state, and it may turn out in the end that hunger, cold, and the want of ammunition may prove our best allies. With us ourselves, as to some parts of the North-West, and still more with those abroad who do not know our magnificent distances, and who cannot realise the fact that there are vast unsettled areas in that country fit for cultivation and so far removed from the scenes of disturbances as to render it utterly impossible that they can be affected—I say with those abroad to whom we may be looking for settlement, and who find it difficult, in view of the smaller ranges of distance by which their vision has been bounded in the past, to realise that fact, our prospects for immigration have been impaired, a blow to immigration has been given which may have effects enduring for a considerable time, and may require us, to some extent, to revise our plans for securing the rapid development of the North-West. The North-West has thus been thrown back at a time most critical for that country, for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and for Canada at large. Millions of the public treasury have been expended or engaged, and as yet we are not in a position to criticise that expenditure. Millions more, in the nature of increased annual charge, are to be demanded for the North-West, and to repair in part so far as it is reparable, the damage done. And thus at the very moment when we are called on to abandon our golden dreams of early and large returns from Custom duties and from land sales, we find increased charge the order of the day, so that both sides of the national balance sheet will at the same instant be adversely affected. That is not all, Sir. Canada's good name among the nations, has suffered. The Government has boasted that we knew best of all how to deal with the settler; that we gave him superior advantages, and gave him great consideration, and had produced in him a feeling of content and satisfaction. The Government has boasted that we knew best of all people how to manage the Indian, and by justice, liberality, firmness, and wisdom, at once to satisfy, improve, tame and develop him. The Government has boasted that we treated the early explorer, the pioneer, the man of mixed blood, wisely, liberally, prudently and paternally; that he had no ground for discontent; that he, too, was happy. The Government has proclaimed that in the great North-West there were no grievances nothing but peace and prosperity, and what you would see all through that wide extended country, was that "content basking on the cheek of toil." Several Ministers and several high officers of the Government, made their progresses through that country a few months ago. All well! was the cry of these sentinels of Canada in the discharge of their duty there. The Minister of Public Works went up at the desire of his chief, the leader of the Government, to spy out the grievances, if even his microscopic eye could discover that any grievances were there. He called for the grievances, he sought for the grievances, he almost implored the grievances; and he summed up the results of those his arduous labors in a speech in which he said that he had met two men who were discontented, and, if I rightly remember, the ground of discontent which he gave was that there were not enough ladies in the North-West. Some of as thank God that there are no more there now. All well! said the Minister. Now, what is the contrast to those smooth speeches? What is the contrast to those flattering tales? I ask you, Sir, I ask the House, I ask the country, whether the contrast I showed you a moment ago, does not demand an early explanation. The task of the Government, Sir, was one of special responsibility, commensurate with the vast power which they had claimed and obtained. It has been well remarked by a publicist of considerable reputation, that while the parliamentary system is the best for those who are represented, it is the worst for those who are not represented. That is a truth which, it cannot be denied, added largely to the responsibility of the Government, because for a country having as its rule representative and parliamentary institutions, to attempt to govern a part of its home domain on paternal and autocratic principles, necessarily added to the charge and the responsibilities of those who undertook that task. And still more care is required the neighboring Province, in the country which governs, in the neighboring States, in the continent at largein this continent, which, indeed, seems hardly to tolerate any other form of rule. Still more, Sir, is that responsibility increased when you are attempting so to govern men who, besides finding the air of freedom blowing all around them with the vast sweep and force of the wide continent itself, have been accustomed, in their earlier lives, in the Provinces from which they came themselves, to drink full draughts of that vital air. And if you turn even to the pioneer and to the half-breed, the need for care and the consequent responsibility of the Government is not relaxed, because they, too, had lived under an easy rein, they had the power, if not the form, of freedom, they had order almost without law, and but little sense of governmental interference. They were a little like the hunter of the border Western States who came one day to his cabin and said to his wife: "Mary, we must move out; we are getting crowded."

"Why," said she, "how is that?" "Yes, we are getting crowded; I heard the crack of a rifle to day." And such is the intolerance of the crowded haunts of men and of nations, of what are deemed happiness and comfort in what we call civilised society, that those men living as they did on the vast plains had a peculiar freedom which we cannot well appreciate. Still further do we see the need for care in this special case when we remember that, disquieted by the events of 1869-70, and not all recognising the new order of things, many of these men receded before the eastern wave of civilisation and immigration, and departed to the plains to enjoy still the rude freedom to which they had been accustomed. But there was yet another element which added still turther to the responsibility of the Administration—the Indian question. The question of the Indian, the aboriginal inhabitant, the untamed savage, resentful of his lost sovereignty, of his appropriated lands, of his vanished subsistence, of his shackled liberties, of the constraints imposed upon him, of the dependence to which he is reduced-whose loyalty in the nature of things must be largely due to policy or fear; whose war is murder, whose tender mercies are cruel; the Indian unaccustomed to labor and not yet resigned to starve-to manage him demands care and vigilance, indeed, and adds to the responsibility of those who undertake the task. When to all this you add a policy of settlement widely extended, sparse, isolated, defenceless, bringing the Indian and the settler at once into close contact at many points, of course, the responsibility is still further increased. There is yet another element which added to the responsibilities of Ministers, and it was that the work of government was to be performed from a very great distance. It was to be performed from this point, by letters, by agents, by officers, and by clerks. And they had therefore, knowing what is likely to happen under such circumstances, to take precautions against, and by their own vigilance and energy to overcome, the evils of officialism, of red tape, of carelessness, of procrastination, of favoritism and of fraud, which all are apt to encrust a departmental and routine system. I say, then, that these conditions required, are imperatively demanded, from the Government a high degree of energy, of vigilance, of tact, of promptness in arriving at decisions and reaching conclusions, and seeing that these were acted upon with respect to the North-West Territories. However, the Government had some advantages, and considerable advantages. They had, as I have said, the dearly bought experience of 1869. They had learned from that something of the feelings of the people, something of the jealousies existing among them, something of their suspicions, something of their customs. They had the advantage of the settlement made in 1870 for the Province of Manitoba and its application to the North-West Territories. They had all the money they chose to ask, and all the officers they chose to name, and Mr. BLAKE.

when it is the case that free institutions exist all around—in the questions, even after they were raised, assumed the form of extreme urgency. They had also the advantage of utilising the link between the white men and the Indians—the half-breed. I know that in some cases there has been some jealousy between the half-breeds and the Indians, but those most experienced in the relations, the more recent relations of the half-breeds and the Indians in the North-West, have, from their places in this House, not infrequently stated that such is not the rule. I recollect the hon, member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), more than once stating in the strongest manner that there was an assistance which was of the utmost consequence, and of which he deeply regretted the Government did not sufficiently avail themselves, namely, the half-breeds in relation to the Government and in relation to the Indians through the Government; and I recollect his being answered by the First Minister assentingly; and of late years the course has been to some extent adopted by the Government of appointing half-breeds to such positions. I say they had that advantage. They had also the advantage of the missionaries with both; and I believe if there was one thing more than another which has helped us to keep the peace with the Indians and the half-breeds for so long a time, it is the good effect of the missions throughout the North-West from very early years. Those were great advantages they had. As I have said, they had time also; for at Prince Albert, the neighborhood of which was the focus of these disturbances, settlement increased at first but slowly. The incoming tide rose but gradually for some years after the transfer, and nothing was done early with the old settlers. However, in 1878, if I remember rightly, a special survey of a portion of the Prince Albert settlement was made. Meantime many of the half-breeds had moved from Manitoba to various points in the North-West Territory, and some to the neighborhood of Prince Albert. Meantime, also there had been the survey and location of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Yellow Head Pass, and that had stimulated for a season the immigration to the banks of the Saskatchewan. Many people came in hoping to be along the line of the projected railway, and the tide of immigration rose for a season. All that was changed in later years, and the change, of course, caused disappointment and difficulty. But a large number in the meantime had come in, had come many hundreds of miles in waggons, had come in to be the first, and as they hoped, to live in the most progressive part of the country in consequence of the great fertility of the lands and the great advantage it had in many ways if it was to be considered as a railway centre as well. Difficulties, as I have said, arose during those years. Many questions were raised which one after another, and many of them together, came for ward for solution, and those are the questions upon which it seems to me the Government is bound, as I have repeatedly stated this Session, to give to, and the House is bound to insist on receiving the fullest information as to what was represented, what was said, what was done during those years in regard to those questions, so that we may judge how it is, to whom it is due that those unhappy results which I have depicted have at length arisen. There came many questions. The claims of the half-breeds of the territories to scrip for lands, and thus to be placed in the same position as those of Manitoba in regard to the Indian title. The claims of the Manitoba half-breeds, who were omitted from the old enumeration and not provided for out of the 1,400,000 acres granted, of whom many moved to the North-West Territories and have been residing there off and on, some of them altogether and some temporarily since. The half breed question of surveys on river fronts. I admit that is not exclusively a half-breed question; but it is largely a half-breed question, at all events, in so far as the actual difficulties have arisen, because the first settlement they had plenty of time, years upon years of time, before involved, in the view of the Government of that day, a recognition of the same rule as had been applied in the Red River and the non-user of the general rectangular settle-ment and the special settlement survey along the river front. Then there are the half-breed settlements generally and the surveys of those settlements, and the adjustment of the claims of the half-breeds to the land by virtue of occupation and settlement. And there are the white settlers' claims of the same character. Then there are the claims with reference to colonisation companies. The hon. Minister, when, a while ago, I mentioned the question of colonisation companies, objected to my doing so. He said that showed the spirit in which I was speaking, and he asked what had that to do with the question of the Metis. I am sorry to say that what it showed was not the spirit in which I treated the question, in the sense of the hon. gentleman, but how little the hon. gentleman knew of what the essentials of the question were; because if he had regarded the memorials and representations which had been made on that subject he would have seen—I am not now judging of any of those claims—but he would have seen, as to the colonisation companies, that the claim was made years ago by the people of this very district, that there were grievances and injustice connected with them; and he would have known that, so far from its having nothing to do with the Metis, it was intimately connected, as it is intimately connected, with the difficulties of the half-breeds as well as the white settlers. Then, Sir, there was the question of the great, the enormous block of railway reserves made early at the instance of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, involving-I cannot remember the exact number of acres—but I think some 16,000,000 or 17,000,000 acres of odd sections in that northern district, which were reserved for them at an early day, in order that they might get a land grant out of it. Then, Sir, there were claims for assistance—for mail accommodation, claims for local improvements, claims for river improvements. Then there was the Indian question, complicated by the questions I have alluded to, complicated by settlement, complicated by the reservations, complicated by starvation; and as to which there is a memorial sent in November indicating the feeling of the people upon it. Then there were questions of police protection, of the home guard, and there was also the question of the militia and volunteer corps—all points necessarily engaging the attention of the Government, upon which they have taken action at different times, action which as I have pointed out more than once requires explanation, and in respect of which reports have been received, as we are informed by the departmental reports and otherwise. Then after all that, with reference to all these questions, an event occurred in the month of June last, which in a sense accentuated the whole situation, and added enormously to the responsibility of the Government from that time forth. I allude to the coming of Louis Riel into the settlement, and his remaining there from that time forth. It is not necessary, Sir, for me to use language of my own upon that subject, because we do not forget the statement of the First Minister of the feelings of those people towards Louis Riel, the influence he had over them, and the things he was doing in the North West during the summer and fall and winter of the year. I will not now trouble the House by repeating what is to be found in the reports of the Debates, by repeating the various pieces of information which I have suggested as certain, as probable, as due; the reports from officers, the orders to the Government officers, the reports from the North-West Council, the petitions and memorials of the people, the declarations and representations of important personages, official and unofficial—I say I will not now weary the House—though I have here a list of these papers, by right to the facts in order that we may judge how they have repeating that list in respect of which I desire to refer done their duty. Since the Government took power, 1878, to the Debates to the efforts we have made to elicit 1879, 1880, 1831, 1882, 1883 and 1884 have passed, and what this information from time to time. But I do say that has been done—that is the question? In the last of these the statement of facts which I have given indicates in my humble opinion, as a clear and inevitable conclusion, that there is much to explain, much to discuss, much which can be explained and discussed only on the production of the documents and papers which are, or ought to be, in the hands of the Government of the day. There was, Sir, an enormous responsibility upon them, and also upon their officers in that country, and it is due to those officers, as between themselves and the Government of the day, it is due to those important personages in the country, who hold unofficial positions, that we should have their reports and statements and communications, which would throw light on the condition of things amongst the people, on their state of feeling, and show the action recommended to the Government from time to time. I say it is due to these persons that we should see what they did say, in order that we may judge whether they did their duty or not. It is due also from the Government to us, in order that we may see whether those demands were made by the Government for information which the notorious facts rendered it their duty to obtain. Now, for these papers I have been pressing almost continuously for the last eight weeks. The hon, gentleman has brought down a few of the less material papers, but the bulk of those papers he has not brought down, and from day to day he has said that they are being copied, that they are being prepared, that they will be ready soon, that he will bring down those which are not confidential, and so forth and so forth. But I can-not compliment him on his having given me or the House a satisfactory answer, with reference to the papers he will bring down and the time when they would be brought down. The Session advances, and it is necessary that these papers should be in our hands in order that we may have the case of the Government, the case of their officers, the case of the people in that country, studied and examined with a view to pronouncing judgment in the great cause which comes before us as the grand inquest of the nation. I have said that the questions to which I have referred demanded care, demanded vigilance, demanded energy, tact, and liberality, from the Government. They demanded promptness too. In these great concerns of state we must not forget the rules which regulate ordinary affairs. Each man's individual concern is dealt with and looked at by him with reference to those rules, and it is proverbial that there should not be delay. He that giveth quickly giveth twice; justice delayed is justice denied; an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure; a stitch in time saves nine, are four homely proverbs; they excite the laughter of the hon gentleman, but they are the language of the people. They express the way the people look at their concerns, and the way in which they expect to be dealt with, whether by the Government or by their own neighbor or friend or opponent. Now, the white settlers as pioneers, and as disappointed we proneers by reason of the change of the route of railway, welcomes and The half-breeds as early colonisers and consideration. as disappointed men, remembering the events of 1870, and remembering also that link of connection to which I have referred, which was so potent for good or evil, the link between them and the Indian—they were also entitled to be dealt with on the principles to which I have referred. And, therefore, while I am not saying—whatever I may think, whatever information I have been able to accumulate from outside. whatever conclusion that information leads me to, while I am not to-day expressing it, while I am not saying to-day that the Government has not done its duty, I do say that their duty was such as I have described, and that we have a

years, as I have said, a very striking event—the invitation to Louis Riel and his appearance,—took place, and what has been done since that time? Surely that sounded a warning note. Surely it became then, even if it had not been before, the most pressing and paramount duty of the Government without delay, if there had been delay, to redress grievances if grievances there were, to remove misconceptions if misconceptions existed, to attend to precautionary measures. Once again, what are the facts? What was said; what was done? What was done in the way of redress, in the way of removing misconceptions, in the way of security? The Government have, as I have said, hosts of officers in that country; what did they say or do from the Lieutenant Governor down? It has a council there, what did it say or do? It has unofficial but important helps, the ministers of religion, the officials of the Hudson Bay Company, all deeply interested in seeing that a sound policy was pursued, and whose lives and property and dearest interests were concerned in the keeping of the peace. What did they say? What did they do? I have said I do not attempt to answer these questions from my own information; I have some information, which, perhaps, I may submit to the House on another day, upon some other motion; but just now I have been trying to show the House, as I hope I have succeeded, that there is a duty on the part of the Government to inform us, and to inform us fully and very soon, so that we may judge between the people and the Government, between the Government and its officers, and decide the momentous questions which these issues involve. I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This, then, is the result of the hon. gentleman's protracted incubation; this is the cause of his absence from this House—that he has prepared a carefully written essay, and has moved that this House adjourn. It is true he has clothed this very impor-tant question with a number of images; poetry, tant question with a number of images; poetry, although spoken in prose, has been invoked; the tragic has been exhibited; and, on the motion to adjourn, he appeals to the sympathies of this House, and of the country thereof the sympathics of the sympathies. and of the country through the press, by an elaborate essay on the horrors of war. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has taken a course which is an ignoble course. The Government are aware of their responsibilities; they are. of course, aware of the position in which they stand; they know that during their administration of the affairs of the North-West and of the rest of the country there has been a rebellious outbreak; they know that that must be a matter of discussion in Parliament, and they challenge enquiry, and are ready for enquiry. But that the hon. gentleman should, from his rifle pit, suddenly to-day fire this gun—it is an ignoble warfare; it is an Indian warfare; but it won't kill the Government. If I understand the motion of the hon gentleman, it is that he may make this speech. He says that whatever he may think, he does not now mean to make any charges against the Government; he says he will by and bye, on some other motion, do so. We will abide that motion; we will wait for the hon. gentle-man's speech, and we will answer it. But while the hon. gentleman hangs his words and the conclusion of his speech, merely on a desire to get information, I appeal to the common sense and to the judgment of this House if his whole speech was not meant to insinuate what he did not dare to assert—that the Government are to blame. He went back to the events of 1869 and 1870, and gave us a historical detail of what happened then; and he said the Government gave full information at that time. Sir, I was at the head of the Government at that time, and on my responsibility as the head of the Government, I thought my discretion, those papers were brought down, because I thought it was expedient to bring them down, so in the exercise of the same discretion we have withheld much of the information that the hon. gentleman asked for. The hon. gentleman has asked for much that he cannot get; he has asked for much that he will get; but Sir, the House knows and the country knows that if there has been some delay, the continued, the senseless-if I may use the expression without offence-at all events the useless encumbrance of every Department with motions for papers has much to do with the delay in those papers that the Government should bring down; and there are a great many of those papers that the Government refused to bring down upon the ground that it would not be in the interest of the country to do so. The hon gentleman says: Oh, here are the discontented half-breeds; the Government have not kept up the link—he does not say so, but he insinuates it betwen the Indian and the white man; he says the half-breed is the civilising influence between the Indian and the white man; the half-breed is the link to connect the two. Then he goes on to speak of the colonisation companies. He does not assert that they have done anything wrong, but that it is alleged that they have done something wrong; and he gives us a number of instances. He does not say that the mode of survey is wrong; he does not say that the halfbreeds or the Indians have been ill-used; but from the long detail that he gives, he leads, and he desires to lead this House—not so much to lead this House, because it will not be deceived; it knows his style—but in order to beguile the country to believe that the Government have been laggard in their duty, and have not performed their duty. Let the hon. gentleman bring forward his specific charges; let him bring charge after charge—I care not whether they are for want of judgment or for delay, we are ready to meet him. Do you think Mr. Gladstone would have sprung a motion on the other side in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has sprung his motion this morning? I heard this morning that a gentleman who fetches and carries for him—if that be not an offensive expression—went to the press and said: "Prepare; there is going to be a great speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition, and you must report whatever he is going to say." They did not want that we should know what was going to be said by him, what course was to be taken. I ask if an hon. gentleman on that side did not go to the press and make the statement I now say he did? The hon, gentleman claims that we ought to have brought down the reports of the missionaries and the agents and of all the various officers scattered over that country, and lay those reports before the House. Well, Riel has only been taken the other day. At this moment the hero of that rebellion, Gabriel Dumont, is free; Gabriel Dumont may have a large force behind him; at this moment there may be the lives of white men, women and children, at the mercy of the halfbreeds, who may not yet be subdued, although their coward leader has surrendered; the lives of white people may be yet at the mercy of Dumont and his half-breeds, and we are asked to bring down to this House all the statements of the clergy—we will bring them down by and bye—and the statements of the officers, whose lives might be the torfeit of the publication of these statements. The missionaries there have no families, but they have their lives, and the wives and the children of all the others there in authority, all the others there who have been reporting to the Government, are at the mercy of these yet unsubdued bands and the hon. gentleman says that although the half-breed rebellion may be considered to have been put down, there is a long Indian war before us. I hope that is not responsibility as the head of the Government, I thought true. Suppose we will have no more trouble with it right then to communicate to the House and the country that information. I thought it was safe for that information to be given; and just now as then, in the exercise of we know that the half-breeds have roused up the Indians to wage war. The Indians had no cause of complaint, no cause of warfare, they had no reason, no grievance in the world to make them rise in arms, but they were roused and induced to revolt by these half-breeds; and do you think that these men, crushed down, their leaders killed, some of them wounded, suffering now, and perhaps by and bye, from the hardships of a suppressed rebellion, do you think that they will not continue to be behind the Indians, to incite them to war, to arouse them, calling upon them to revenge the wrongs of those who are almost of the same blood? And until that Indian war is over, until that country is kept quiet, it would be madness, it would be cruelty, it would be folly for any Government to put intelligence into the hands of these men by publishing prematurely papers of the kind asked for. If I could believe that the hon, gentleman was acting with a sincere and honest desire to remedy the evils of administration, if I thought he was anxious to impress upon the country the necessity of a new system, I would say he was quite right. But I know, and the country knows, that is not the case; and all the motions that he has made, from the first day the House met, every return he has asked for in respect to the North-West troubles, bore evidence on their face that they were for the purpose of trying to obtain a miserable party triumph over the Government which he hopes to supplant. But if ever there was a man mistaken in that idea it is the hon, gentleman. If he had kept quiet, if he had allowed matters to go on as they have gone on, the country always looking, the people always looking to find some one to punish in the case of a great reverse, he might have a better prospect; but if we had been wrong, if we had been negligent, at all events, we tried to do our duty, we were loyal, we tried to suppress the outbreak—a causeless outbreak—we loyally attempted to put it down, and the hon. gentleman attempted to take advantage at a time when he ought to have rallied around the Government of the day, no matter by whom administered, of our position; and every motion, every question he put, was put with the idea, not of protecting the men, women and children, not of preventing the flow of blood about which he speaks so pathetically, but of bringing discredit upon those whom he hopes to supplant. I tell him the country knows that. As an old parliamentarian, as a man of great experience, and

"My experience doth attain
To something like prophetic strain,"

I tell him, never in the world did his prospects in the future stand so dark as they do now, when it is obvious to man, woman and child, when he who ruts may read, that the aim, the end, the object of every motion he has made, or every speech he has delivered, of every question he has asked, is the one thing, to attain a party triumph. I tell him he is mistaken. Great has been the sin the hon gentleman has committed and great will be the retribution. It has happened that there has been placed in my hands, as a chattel mortgage was placed in the hands of the hon. gentleman some time ago, while the hon. gentleman was reading the first part of the Saskatchewan Herald, a copy of the same paper. He read a pathetic account, cut out carefully, of all the miseries the people suffered in the valley of the Saskatchewan, after premising that the Government ought to be strong and active and that their responsibility was great. He saw fit to so quote that paper as to infer, because he said he did not state-oh, no, whatever he might think he would not state —that we were wrong; but after working up the House to the idea that it might be possible we were all wrong though he did not say so, he thought we were wrong, for we could draw no other inference from his language - he read a certain portion of the editorial of the Saskatchewan Herald, not knowing, perhaps, that I had the paper in my hand. Let me read what he left out. The part he did read was an account of the miseries and sufferings of the Saskatchewan people, but he left this out:

"And yet in the face of these awful facts—in spite of the ruin wrought upon an industrious people—men are to be found, and some of them in high positions, who characterise these crimes as 'mistakes,' and suggest that their perpetrators come in and acknowledge it, make new promises as to the future, and resume their old position as petted and nampered wards of the Crown. It is too late for any such suggestions. The Government and people have been deceived as to the civilisation of these wild tribes. They have shown themselves incapable of gratitude; their apparent tractability was cunning; their civilisation but a cloak to hide their hellish plans. They have thrown down the gauntlet, and now that it has been taken up, the issue must be pressed until the failest justice has been done. But while punishment must be meted out to the Indians, what shall we say to those white men and nominally civilised half-breeds who have instigated this rising? On them rests a fearful responsibility, and on them the penalty must lie. Those who, knowing better, incited to these murders and devastations, put themselves on a level with the savages in all save their animal courage, and, as their crime was greater, so must their punishment be exemplary. The work will not be done in a day, but it must be done thoroughly, and we have confidence that the people of Canada, who have so long ungrudgingly given the vast sum of money spent in feeding the Indians, while apparently settling down to a new mode of life, will, now that the feeding scheme has proved a failure, cheerfully give whatever men and money may be required to fight them, and re-establish peace and order on such foundations as shall not again be shaken."

Why did not the hon, gentleman read that part?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentlemen laugh, but they laugh with their hearts in their boots. I charge it as being a matter of disingenuousness on the part of the hon, gentleman to read so much of the article as to show the miseries of the people, and then try to lead up to a series of carefully prepared insinuations that the Government were responsible for all that, when the same paper says the Government were not responsible, that the Indians were primarily responsible and the half-breeds were more so. It is in the same spirit that the hon, gentleman, during the whole of this Session, has dealt with and treated this subject. Let me go a little further. The hon, gentleman spoke about the poor Indian, discontented, driven by hunger. and so on; and the half-breeds, also driven by hunger; and at the same time he reads an elaborate account of the luxurious furniture and household appurtenances of the great rebel, Gabriel Dumont.

Mr. McCALLUM. That was from the Mail.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONAL True, that was from the Mail. As to the charge that the Indians have been ill-treated, let me read what the same paper says:

"The petted Indians are the bad ones. The Stonies have been treated as being of a superior race, and are the first to shed the blood of their benefactors. Poundmaker has been petted and pampered, and stands in the front rank as a raider. Little Pine, bribed to come north and kept in comfort, hastens to the carnage. Big Bear, who has for years enjoyed the privilege of eating of the bread of idleness, shows his gratitude by killing his priests and his best friends in cold blood. Little Poplar, a non-treaty Indian, has been liberally supplied with provisions and other necessaries, and thus enabled to spend all his time in travelling up and down the land, plotting mischief and preparing for this season's carnival of ruin. The petted Indians have proved the bad ones, and this gives weight to the old adage, that the only good Indians are the dead ones."

Now, I say again that the hon. gentleman, in hanging on this motion of adjournment, in stating that he wished to press upon the Government the responsibility that they should bring down the papers, has taken an unworthy advantage. He has given no notice. He has not gone into the discussion. He says he has got the information. Well, let him produce his information. We will send down the papers, all that can be sent down with safety to the lives and property of the people of the North-West.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a sort of sneer over there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They say "hear, hear" to that. The hon, gentleman would like to get the papers. What cares he whether people are dead or alive in the North-West. What cares he whether the production of papers might affect that matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What cares he.

Mr. CASEY. Shame.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hear the hon. gentleman say "shame." It is a shame on those who cry it. The shame will rest upon them in the country, and I tell the hon, gentleman that, in the eyes of every dispassionate man, whether of our party or of their party, the speech of this day and the course of hon. gentlemen this day, will disgust the country, will disgust the people.

Mr. KIRK. We will see all about that.

Mr. HICKEY. We have seen two or three times before

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All I can say now is to repeat that any charge, or any number of charges, or any specified instances in which the Government are blameable. or are censurable, either for wilful or ignorant want of performance of their duty, we are ready and willing to answer. I court the enquiry. I believe that sufficient papers can be laid before the House to enable the hon. gentleman to form an accurate idea of what the true position of that country has been, of what the Government have done, and of what the Government has not done, the reasons why they have acted, and the reasons why they have omitted to act. I stand here, on the part of myself and my colleagues, on behalf of the Ministry of which I am, for the present, the leader we court enquiry. We challenge enquiry. We believe, with all the consciousness of being right, that the judgment of the country will be that we have acted well, that we have acted to the best of our abilities, and that, in this case, our abilities have not been wrongly directed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that, if there be one feeling common to both sides of this House on this occasion, it must be a feeling of profound disappointment, that a man who occupies the position of First Minister of Canada can find no better terms, no better answer to give the reasonable demands preferred by my hon, friend than is contained in the reply to which we have been listening for the past half hour. That hon, gentleman denounced my hon. friend, and for what? For, as he allleges, taking him by surprise. Why, it is known, it is notorious, and to none better than to the First Minister, that my hon, friend has again and again intimated to him that at the earliest moment that he believed consistent with his sense of public duty he would call attention to the shortcomings and to the misdoings of the First Minister and his colleagues.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No. no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, I say again and took the floor. What does my hon. friend demand? Again and again, for the last two months, he has asked for information which ought long ago to have been placed before us -long, long ago-which, as the First Minister well knows, he, on an equally critical occasion, when he, I will not say has done of late years, the rules and usages of constitutional not been time, probably, to cook and garble to his satisfacgovernment, saw fit to give to the House. I was present tion. Sir John A. MACDONALD.

on that occasion, along with my hon. friend beside me. and I recollect well that, at a time when a rebellion, which threatened to be quite as formidable as the present, was raging in the North-West, the First Minister, of his own proper motion, as my hon. friend stated, brought down a very voluminous correspondence, containing information far more minute and explicit than any which my hon, friend up to this time has asked for. That was the course of the First Minister then. But well the First Minister knows why it was that the hon, member for West Durham was not able to call the attention of the House to this business before. Why, Sir, what is the reason that we have been kept here, in season and out of season, for the last five or six weeks? The First Minister deliberately precipitated a measure on this House which he knew would meet with the most intense opposition, which he knew involved an almost interminable discussion, and he did that mainly for the reason that he desired, by the introduction of that measure, to deprive my hon, friends and the other gentlemen of this side, of the opportunity of calling him and his friends to account for that misgovernment which has set this country in a flame. Those are the circumstances under which my hon. friend has delayed making any allusion to this matter for eight or nine long weeks; those are the circumstances under which my hon, friend has waited from day to day. Sir, it is in the knowledge of this House with what gross discourtesy the First Minister, again and again, has replied to the most reasonable questions of my hon friend. In all my parliamentary experience—not as long as the First Minister's, but longer than that of most hon. members of this House—I have never heard the leader of a Government act so discourteously in refusing information on questions which this House and the country had a right to know. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that the course of the hon. member for West Durham is unpatriotic. Well, we know what unpatriotic means in the mouth of the First Minister; translate that accusuation into plain English, and when you hear him accuse an hon. member on this side of the House of want of patriotism, it means that the course he has taken is likely to be very inconvenient to the interests of the hon. gentleman. Did he not tell us just now that he would give us what information he, in his sovereign pleasure, chose to give? And that he would withhold what, in his sovereign pleasure, he chose to withhold? Is that the way in which the Minister of a nominally free country, of a nominally free Parliament, should respond to the requests for information on matters of the greatest public importance? Sir, Dr. Johnson was in the habit of saying, long ago, that patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel. may supplement that remark of his, and say that the last shift and excuse, for the purpose of refusing just information, to which the First Minister has invariably resorted, is the accusation that it is unpatriotic to ask for it; unpatriotic for the representatives of the people of Canada to inquire, in their places in Parliament, why it is that blood has been wasted, why it is that treasure has been wasted, why it is that the whole future of this country has been seriously imperilled. But it would be more convenient for the First Minister to wait until-when? Until this again. It has been a matter of notoriety. It has been alluded to by the hon. gentleman's press. It has been alluded to in the course of the late debate by scores of the hon. gentleman's supporters, on the occasions when they passed away; it would be convenient for him to wait until public attention had been diverted to other subjects; it would be convenient for him to wait until the memory of these things had faded out of men's minds; it would be most of all convenient to wait until time and opportunity had been given to get rid of disagreeable witnesses, to cook understood better, but when he practised far better than he and garble important pieces of evidence, which there has

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not quite in

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A good deal that the First Minister said was not in order, but we did not call him to order; and he must take the consequence of the example which he has set.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I always speak in order

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that is a large order for us to believe. Now, Sir, I say that the leader of the Opposition, on this occasion, was most perfectly in his right; I say more, that he was most perfectly in the line of his duty. What does the hon gentleman expect? Does he suppose that we, the members of the Opposition, are here to register his decrees? Does he suppose that we are here to express our perfect trust in the Government of this country, which has given, of late, such extraordinary proofs of how well they deserve our confidence, and the confidence of the people of the country? I ask again, has the hon, gentleman volunteered any information to us? Has not every fragment, every scrap, every atom of evidence, every paper that has been brought down here, been wrung from him by repeated protests, by repeated demands, by repeated requirements for this information? What information, I say, has the Government vouchsafed to us? Had they shown any desire to take us into their confidence; had they shown that they were willing, as far as the public interest permitted, to bring down this information, then they might have pleaded, with some degree of justice, that we were unreasonably impatient now. But the House knows perfectly well that it is the present desire of that hon. gentleman to do nothing except by the mode I have indicated, to choke off all discussion until the greater number of the members of this House have ceased their attendance on the floors of Parliament. I say we have arstained for a long period. I say that we are now, probably, in a short time, about to separate. We find that answers to the questions put by us, to the demands for information made by us, are refused and evaded in every possible way. What is the reason given, in this crisis, of dealing with these important matters in this way? The First Minister says he is not able to secure the services of two or three competent copying clerks. That is the excuse given. So great were the demands upon the resources of the copying staff of the Government that, in a matter of first rate importance, the gravest matter with which we have had to deal for many a year, the First Minister of Canada was not able to secure the services of copying clerks for a few hours. Why, Sir, I believe that all the vital parts of the information which my hon, friend demanded could have been secured by the services of two men, at most, for two or three days out of the sixty days that have elapsed since these requests were made. But then, as my hon. friend truly said, this is not an unusual case. Unhappily for us, under the Government of the First Minister, as he must admit, we have had a rebellion before, and then the necessary papers were brought down. Now, I desire to ask, if we have retrograded so much in the administration of our public affairs since 1870, that those concessions which were freely made to the Opposition-not, I think, numerically, much stronger than the Opposition to day, perhaps not so strong—that those which were freely made fifteen years ago are refused now? What is the reason? I do not doubt that there is a reason, and a very strong reason, for all this delay. Were these papers which my hon friend calls for, papers which were likely to give a fair, honest and satisfactory explanation of these most unhappy events, does any gentle-man doubt that these papers would have been laid on the Table of this House, and that they would have been printed and circulated from one end of the country to the other long ago? If there be delay, if there be suppression, if there be hesitation, ment from this side of the Chamber and by the public prints, about bringing these documents down and placing them on the Table of the House, all men who are aware of the past record of the Government, and more particularly of the First Minister, will say that I have the strongest possible presumptive evidence for believing that these papers are not brought down because the evidence which they would disclose would be excessively damaging, and would produce in the minds of the people of this country a very strong conviction that had common energy, common vigilance, common prudence, common honesty, ruled the councils of the Government of this country, no rebellion in the North-West, no distruction of human lives, no injury to property, no damage to the prospects of the people of this country, would have occurred, or need have occurred. The First Minister knew it right well; and when the hon. gentleman sat on this side of the House, no one was more urgent in pointing out to the people that if any disaster occurred, if any misfortune, if any unforeseen calamity occurred to this country, the Government of the day were to be held responsible for it. That was the doctrine preached by the hon. gentleman and preached by his colleages, and it was by false representations to the people that the Government which preceded him were responsible for results which arose from causes over which the Government had no control, that the First Minister succeeded in obtaining his present place. And, if that be true in ordinary cases, how much more true in a case like this? How much more true is it in a case where men, in the enjoyment of the advantages which my hon. friend depicted, find themselves so much the victims of misgovernment, that, however dangerous it might be for them to start the flame of war in that country, they yet found themselves compelled to take up arms? I am not going to justify those men at present or to excuse them, inasmuch as we have not the information before us to judge how far they were criminal, or how far they were really the agents of greater criminals, who may, perhaps, be beyond the power of justice for the present. Does the hon, gentleman not know that if a disaster happens to any officer in Her Majesty's service; if, for instance a naval captain loses his ship, although it is clear it was by overwhelming stress of weather, although he may have displayed, and everybody may know he has displayed the utmost energy and heroism in endeavoring to prevent the calamity, still such an officer must of necessity submit to a court martial. I say that the case of the Government of this country is precisely similar. The Government have proved themselves unable to discharge the most fundamental part of their duties; they have proved themselves unable to maintain peace and order in the country which was specially committed to their care, and specially committed to the care of the First Minister, in his capacity as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and, prior to that time, specially entrusted to him in his capacity as Minister of the Interior. Surely, under such circumstances, we have a right to enquire how these things came about. Surely the leader of the Opposition would be wanting in his manifest and plain duty if he allowed this House to separate without doing all that lay in his power to acquire information on which the country will be asked to form an opinion shortly. Hon. gentlemen opposite are condemned by their own acts. If there was no just cause, if there was no misgovernment, if there was no abuse of their power, why did the Government of Canada, while the rebels were still actually in the field, issue a commission for the purpose of investigating the grievances of the half-breeds. I say they stand self-condemned. If there were no grievances, hon gentlemen would not have issued that commission. If they admit there were grievances, then they stand condemned, because they did not take action before. Hon. gentlemen will that there was great dissatisfaction prevailing all over the the North-West for a period, not of a few months, but for a period which must be calculated by years. My hon, friend truly said that we could have no better testimony as to the wilful blindness of the Government than the fact that while two or three members of the Government visited the North-West within the past few months, they all came back proclaiming peace where there was no peace; they all came back to tell us that they had not found any grievances, that they were welcomed with loyal addresses throughout the Minister tells us he appeals to the House and his appeal will not fail. I suppose, technically speaking, he is right, that the majority of the House would sustain him though one rose from the dead to testify against him. The hon. gentleman is sorry for the persons exposed to inconveience. He tells us that the Indians are primarily responsible and that the half-breeds are indirectly responsible; and I may add that the members of the Government are most of all responsible for the results which have occurred. The hon, gentleman called attention to a fact which ought, above all other facts, to have caused the Government not to have acted in the way they have done. He called attention to the fact—and the House would hardly fail to comprehend its bearing—that long before the first uprising, which took place at Red River, the Government had obtained full and special warnings from persons in a position to give them useful information as to the result of their policy; and I think my hon. friend would have been perfectly justified in drawing the inference, if he had chosen to draw it, that, after that experience, the Government were bound not to disregard warnings given in the press and repeated on the floor of Parliament—all pointing, unhappily, to just such a result as has taken place—unless the grievances to which those warnings referred were promptly redressed.

An hon. MEMBER. What were the grievances?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The grievances were that that country, which ought to have been administered for the welfare of the whole people, was used by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of a vast bribery fund, through colonisation companies, leases of coal lands, timber lands, and by every possible mode in which that great heritage could be abused for the advantage of a few needy and unscrupulous partisans. The First Minister, as I have said, has not one word to say in explanation or in defence of him self. He knows, as well as I know, and as well as everyone who has paid any attention to the state of that country knows, how wide is the dissatisfaction, how widespread is the ruin, not merely to the people of the country, which is being ravaged by the half-breeds and Indians, but also to all those, and their numbers are tens of thousands outside of Manitoba, who have invested almost their all in attempting to develop and promote the welfare of that country. He knows how seriously the future of that country is imperilled; yet all we find him stating, in answer to my hon. friend, is simply to impute a few ignoble motives to him. The defence he makes, all he rests upon, is this: Prove what you please, urge what you please; I have got a majority at my back, bound to support me, once when I am right and twice when I am wrong. attention to this: The hon, gentleman had the insolence —there is no other parliamentary word to describe it—to charge members of the Opposition with desiring, for the sake of bringing themselves and their party back to power, to injure the future of this country; that they desired, because the hon. gentleman's words implied that, to foment that rebellion; that they desire to aid, assist and abet those men now defying our authority there. I should like to know Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

that there was great dissatisfaction prevailing all over the North-West for a period, not of a few months, but for a period which must be calculated by years. My hon, friend truly said that we could have no better testimony as to the wilful blindness of the Government than the fact that while two or three members of the Government visited the North-West within the past few months, they all came back proclaiming peace where there was no peace; they all came back to tell us that they had not found any grievances, that they were welcomed with loyal addresses throughout the length and breadth of the North-West; and one Minister, I think the Minister of Public Works, declared publicly he could not find a whisper of discontent with this best of all possible Governments. The hon. First Minister tells us he appeals to the House and his appeal will not fail. I suppose, technically speaking, he is right, that the majority of the House would sustain him though

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman is referring to a previous debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I will say I have heard that statement has been made, and I will not say it was made in a previous debate. Something like it was repeated to day; but whether that was stated or not, I will say this: That in my judgment, to-day, in Canada, representative government is very likely indeed to be on its trial, if we find that legitimate demands for information, preferred by members of this House, who have a perfect right to demand it, are ignored and refused, are made the ground for imputing to us want of patriotism, are made, when circumstances so amply warrant them, a justification for such language as the First Minister has not scrupled to indulge in towards my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Sir, this is not the way in which free government can be maintained in this country. It may be that, in the progress of events, if certain measures which are now being pressed in this House should become law, in the shape they were intended to pass by the First Minister, that the functions of an Opposition, and, for that matter, the true functions of Parliament, will cease to be of any use or value in this country. But until that takes place, so long as we are allowed by the grace of the First Minister to retain our seats in this House; so long as we can say, with some degree of truth, that Parliament is composed of the representatives of a free people—so long as that continues, we have a right to insist, and we will insist, on the right, when such circumstances as my hon. friend depicted have occurred, we will demand the right, whether the Government of this country like it or not, whether it be convenient for them that this demand should be granted or not, we will assert our right, in the interest of the people, whose representa-tives we are, on all fit and proper occasions, to ask for information respecting the affairs of this country; and we will not submit to be put down by charges of want of patriotism or because it is not pleasant for gentlemen now controlling this Parliament that we should ask for information about matters which they would rather conceal. We will continue to repeat those demands, and if the hon. gentleman, in the exercise of his discretion, chooses to refuse the information, we must appeal from the tribunal of the majority in this House to the tribunal of the people at large, and if that people are worthy of free intitutions, as I hope and believe they are, if that people understand what the duties of their representatives in Parliament are, it is the First Minister, and not the leader of the Opposition, who will find—and that before many days—that the people of Canada will insist on his recognising himself for what he is their servant and not their master—and will insist upon his obeying their behests, and giving us some account of the stewardship which, I fear, he will be found to have most grieviously abused.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down was asked the question: What are the grievances in the North-West? and though he has gone on for three-quarters of an hour, he never specified a single grievance. He stopped for an answer, and at last he said that the granting of timber limits——

An hon. MEMBER. And gravel pits.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Yes; and the hon. member for West Elgin was kind enough to suggest to him the expression he has just used—gravel pits. The hon member for West Huron gave a speech in the Opera House at Winnipeg last fall, when the Reform party of that city gave an ovation to the hon, member for East York, and presented him with an address, in which these so-called grievances of the North-West were alluded to. The hon, member for West Huron took up a large portion of his speech in dealing with those grievances, and I have here his speech as reported in the Free Press, the Reform paper of Winnipeg, from which I find that though he went over the same old and stale stories about the National Policy, the want of branch lines, the necessity for representation of the North-West Territories, yet he never touched one of the matters which have been referred to in this House to-day. He reiterated the same old questions which have been repeated ad nauseam in this Parliament—questions which have been decided by the people and decided in this House; but he did not venture to give utterance to a single statement which he has made in this Parliament to-day. He thought proper to throw an insult across the floor to me, but I tell that hon. gentleman that I have met his friends in court before now, and every time I have met them there, upon the slanders they have uttered against me, I have obtained verdicts against them. I never allowed one of their slanders to go unrebuked, that they had the courage to utter or write over their own names, in a form in which it might be brought into court. They have referred to this gravel pit in the House, and they insinuate that I received a gratuity from this Government. The fact is, that I was one of three who owned a piece of land in the North-West that the Govern ment entered upon; I asked for an arbitration, which they gave me, but the award was not satisfactory. I appealed to the Exchequer Court, and every dollar I got was got on a judgment of the Exchequer Court of this country. These hon, gentlemen know this perfectly well, and still they are willing to utter these slanders, either without knowing that they are foundationless, or if they do know it, they are guilty of reckless statements to that extent. What excuse has the hon. gentleman, when, in discussing in this House a grave matter like this, affecting the whole people of Canada, a matter which the civilised world are all talking about—the grievances in the North-West-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH—the rebellion in the North-West, and when the hon. gentleman is asked to state what the grievances in that country are which caused the rebellion, he stands on his feet, and in a voice as loud as passion can make it, he utters a vile slander against me, a slander which he dare not put over his own signature, or repeat in any way in which he could be made to stand an action at court for that slander. We ask him to state what are the grievances in the North-West, and I say they repeat a slander which they dare not state outside, in a way which the courts can take hold of, and that is the style of warfare which they adopt in this House, in discussing the question of whether the rebellion was caused by substantial grievances, or whether it has not been incited by Grit farmers unionists, or the reckless statements of Grit newspapers. The hon. member for West Durham tried to draw fire from the veteran Premier of the country; he laid his trap, but he did not fall into it; and the hon, gentleman from West

Durham went round and round the question like a wolverine circling round the bait, but he does not dare touch it. He sat down in his seat, making no charge or daring to make one. But his licutenant came to his aid, and with a larger voice and a greater spread, he contented himself with going round and round in the same manner as he did in the Opera House in Winnipeg, and sat down without saying anything. I got up to say this only because, a year ago, the hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) put a notice on the Paper, and when it came up ho dropped it; and yet he rises in his place to say what he dare not say outside of the House, where it would get into the courts.

Mr. CASEY. I rise simply to answer the bitter and unjustifiable attack which has been made upon myself. As to the cry of gravel pits, I do not say anything, because it comes to everybody's recollection. As to the statement that I put a notice on the Paper, and shirked that notice when it came up, I say it is simply untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that is not parliamentary.

Mr. CASEY. I say the statement is untrue; I do not say the hon. gentleman knows that it is untrue; I leave him to qualify that as he chooses. If he did not know it was untrue, he may have been laboring under a mistake, but the statement is perfectly untrue. I did not move the motion; it was moved by somebody else.

Mr. WOODWORTH. You were out of the House.

Mr. CASEY. I was out of the House, and a friend moved the motion for me in my absence. It is not a matter of much importance; the hon, gentleman need not think his private affairs are of so much consequence; it was one of the most trifling little things that ever occurred. We asked for information, and the information was brought down, and it appeared that there had been an investigation into the matter. As to the statement that I gave the notice and then shirked it, it is untrue, and I hope the hon, gentleman will retract it. I rose merely to make this personal explanation.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon, gentleman gave a notice, and when the notice came up he was not here. He put it on the Paper a second day, and he was not here when it was reached, and he got a friend to move it for him.

Mr. CASEY. I did not get a friend to do it. I was not here, and one of my hon. friends moved the motion for me.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not think my hon. friend from South Huron had anything to complain of in the speech made by the hon. First Minister; it did not take us by surprise at all; there was nothing extraordinary about it; it was in the usual lines which the First Minister adopts whenever there is any discussion in Parliament upon any great question proposed by the Opposition and in which he is interested. You will have observed, Sir, from your knowledge of his career in Parliament for the last ten or fifteen years, that when he cannot answer successfully any statement made in the House, the hon. gentleman somehow or other works himself up into a great state of excitement; he assumes a passion which, I have no doubt, he does not feel; he becomes abusive and insolent. And so, on this occasion, he could not answer my hon. friend from West Durham. There was no answer to be given; therefore, the First Minister assumed his usual role of becoming insolent and impertment.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the word insolent is parliamentary.

Mr. CAMERON. I have heard that word used several times.

Mr. CASEY. The First Minister himself used it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Well, I think he was wrong.

Mr. CAMERON. I have noticed that in the debate in the English Parliament on the Afghan question, Lord Randolph Churchill used much stronger language than that, which was allowed to go unchallenged.

Mr. SPEAKER. Well, I think it is unparliamentary. The hon, member for West Darham called my attention to the fact that the word impudent was used.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would suggest that you add the word ignoble to your vocabulary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think there are a great many words used that ought not to be used, and I appeal to the leaders on both sides to set an example to hon. members by not using this language.

Mr. CAMERON. The First Minister used the word ignoble unchallenged by you or by any hon. member in the

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CAMERON. I was pointing out, when you left the Chair, that the First Minister, when he had no satisfactory answer to a proposition submitted on this side of the House, resorted to his invariable style of working himself into a passion and abusing and denouncing hon. members on this side. He resorted to the old cry of disloyalty and want of patriotism. That form of argument has aided the hon. gentleman on many occasions; the hon. gentleman may adopt again that line of argument, but it will not go down with the people. It is not a satisfactory line; it does not answer the statements of the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). Now, the hon, gentleman says that he assumes all the responsibility of the condition of affairs in the North-West. Well, that is his duty; he and his Government are responsible. We do not say how far they are responsible, for we have not the evidence, but they are responsible for the condition of things, as the Administration of the day. The hon gentleman says: We assume the responsibility, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite. These are very bold words from the First Minister. He challenges u, and at the same time he retains carefully, he conceals in pigeon-holes, all the evidence, all the documents, all the papers that have the slightest bearing on the whole difficulty which has arisen in the North-West. He told us that in 1869 he submitted to Parliament all the information he considered expedient, and he tells us that he submitts to Parliament all the information now he considers expedient. We all know that in 1869 every particle of testimony, every document, every paper, every proceeding taken by the Government or by the officials of the Government, every communication between the officials of the Government and the Government were all submitted to Parliament, and underwent investigation at the hands of Parliament. But now the hon, gentleman declines to submit the documents bearing on this question to Parliament. Why? If it was the right and proper thing to do in 1869 it is equally the right and proper thing to do in 1885. The people and Parliament of this country are entitled to have all these papers and documents, whatever they are, of whatever nature they are, submitted to Parliament, in order that Parliament may be in a position to pronounce upon the responsibility for the events that have taken place in the North-West Territories. Some person is does not take place without some cause, and Parliament is entitled to have the facts, in order to ascertain who is responsible. The hon gentleman tells us he has given some information on this question; he tells us ho will give us some more information, but he candidly tells us there is some information he will not give. Why Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

will he not give it? It is his duty, as Minister, to submit to Parliament the papers and the documents relating to any complaint or grievance, if complaints and grievances have been presented to the Government. It is his duty to submit these papers to Parliament; and to tell Parliament that he will submit some, and that some he will not, is simply doing what the First Minister of any country has no right to do. In 1869 he submitted all the documents. True, in some of the communications some of the names were left out, not by the First Minister, but by the committee to whom the papers were submitted. Why were they left out? I suppose because the committee considered that the names of parties living in the country and concerned more or less in this correspondence should not be published to the world. Could he not do the same thing in this case? Could he not let those papers be brought down? And if there were any names which it would not be wise and judicious should be made known in the North-West, it would be a simple matter to omit them. Parliament does not care so much about the names; what it desires to know is the facts. It is not so anxious to know what names were submitted to the Government before the outbreak, with relation to the diffi-culties, if difficulties there were, that existed in the North-West Territories, as to ascertain the facts. The hon. gentleman challenges my hon, friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) to say that the surveys made there caused these outbreaks and that the Indians or half-breeds were wronged. We do not say so; we want to get the evidence, the papers; we want to see, if there is responsibility resting on the shoulders of anybody, where the responsibility rests. At present we are in the dark. The First Minister conceals those papers; they are in the pigeon-holes, and he says: Some I will bring down, some I will not. That is the way he treats Parliament and the country. He says it is not proper to bring them down. Why? It is true, he says, Riel has been caught, but Gabriel Dumont has not been caught; he is at large; he is still a rebel; he is still upon the plains, surrounded, possibly, by half-breeds and possibly by Indians, and the result of the publication of the documents might be the cause of serious injury to the missionaries and other residents. There is nothing in that statement. Why should they, how should they be prejudiced? I suppose, if any of these complaints mentioned the names of Riel or Dumont, there is no necessity for publishing that; but the communications themselves should be published. The First Minister should have considered that matter six months ago. He then knew well that, laboring among the half-breeds and Indians, were some Missionaries of the Cross, spending their lives among these people, with a view to christianising them and civilising them. He knew that the Indians and the half-breeds had the most implicit and unbounded faith in the missionaries. He knew, further, that the missionaries relied, to a large extent, on the assurances of the Government as to complaints made by the half-breeds, and that the half-breeds received those assurances from the missionaries; yet, during all these years, while these complaints have been existing, nothing has been done, so far as we know, so far as the documents submitted to Parliament, at all events, point out. The result is, these unfortunate missionaries have been slaughtered by the Indians; several reverend Fathers who labored among them for years have lost their lives; the result is, blood has been spilt. He now tells us these documents should not come down because life may be sacrificed. There is no necessity responsible, somebody must be responsible, for a rebellion | for life being sacrificed. I am sure the publication of these documents, published in a judicious and careful manner, as the documents of 1869 were published, would furnish no occasion for life being risked or lost. The hon, gentleman tells us the Indians have not and never had grievances; that they never made any complaints. I am not concerned at this moment to discuss the question how far the Indians had grievance and made complaints. I refer the First Minister to his own published reports for the last two years; there he will find something which will not tally exactly with that statement. If I were concerned to established that complaints were made or that grievances existed, I need only take up the hon. gentleman's own report and the reports of his own officials, to show you that for the last five years these Indians—I do not say rightly or on justifiable grounds—have been urging on the Government of this country that they were being systematically swindled and support. It is nonsense for the First Minister to tell us, who have read his reports and the reports of his officials, and who know something about them, that there were no grievances or complaints. People do not go into rebellion without grievances or complaint. I do not however, intend here to pronounce on that subject, except from what appears in the hon. gentleman's own report; I am not dealing with that now. What the country is entitled to get are the documents on which the First Minister based his report to Parliament, in order that we may form our opinion as to whether or not the half-breeds and the Indians have any real ground of complaint. The hon, gentleman read from a newspaper as to the conduct of the Indians up there. If my memory serves me right, the newspaper did not give them a good character, but treated them as vindictive, harsh, treacherous, dangerous; yet these are the very men the First Minister proposes to enfranchise. The First Minister challenges my hon. friend, and, in regard to every motion and every question he has submitted to Parliament this Session with respect to the North-West, he intimates that those motions were made and those questions were put for purely petty party purposes. I would challenge the First Minister, if he were in his place; I challenge the Government to lay their finger upon any motion or question of my hon, friend which was not put with the purest patriotic motives.

Mr. RYKERT. What rot.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. member for Lincoln says "what rot." That is the kind of argument I should expect from him; it is the kind of argument his intellect is capable of grasping; but I defy any member of the Government, I defy the hon. member with his scrap book, to lay his finger on any motion my hon friend has made which was not in the interest of the country and in regard to which Parliament was not entitled to get the fullest and fairest information. The hon, gentleman tells us he was loyal, and as a loyalist undertook to suppress the rebellion. The loyalty should have been shown before; loyalty to the country, loyalty to the people of Canada, loyalty to those who have gone there to make their homes, some of whom were born there—that is the loyalty which would be more desirable than the lip-loyalty which we hear so much of in this House. We are entitled to get this information. We are not concerned at this moment to discuss the whole question of the responsibility of hon. gentlemen opposite or the responsibility of any person in the Dominion as to the unfortunate outbreak in the North-West Territories; we want to get the evidence, we want to get the information; and now this Session has arrived at a period, and these difficulties have arrived at a condition that the people of this country and the Parliament of this country are fairly entitled to call upon the Government to submit to Parliament every document, every paper, every resolution passed in the North-West, every petition sent from the North-West, every complaint made from the North-West, and every grievance set forth from the North-West, if any such there are, that have been sent to this Government within the last seven years, respecting the condition of affairs in the North-West Territories. The people of this country are entitled now to the fullest and fairest information upon papers in his pigeon-holes all that time, he wilfully disre-question, and upon every question bearing upon the action of the Government and the action of the officials of the Government, from the Lieutenant-Governor downwards. But, when we ask for this information, how are we answered? I have given you some papers; I will give you some more papers, and some more I will not give you. We are not living in an autocratic country; we are not living in a country where there is a one-man power; at least, I hope we are not. I supposed that we were living in a free country, and that Parwronged out of the money voted by Parliament for their liament could insist upon the Government giving full and fair information; but we are told that we shall have such papers as it suits his high mightiness to give us and at the time it pleases him to give the papers, and not until then. That is not a satisfactory answer. It is not an answer that the people will be satisfied with. The First Minister admits that Parliament must be called upon very shortly to pronounce some opinion upon the whole question. How are we to pronounce an opinion? Are we to arrive at it by not getting the papers, or by getting only such as the First Minister in his wisdom sees fit to submit to Parliament? I say no. We will not be in a position to give an unbiased and independent judgment until we have all the papers in connection with the North-West submitted to Parliament. The policy of the Government may be challenged; their policy in their dealings with the whole of the North-West, the conduct of the Administration and the conduct of the officials of the Administration, may be called in question; the complaints and grievances of the people in that Territory may be all discussed; and it is impossible to discuss these things intelligently unless we have the papers. We have the right to ask the First Minister to bring them down, to submit them to Parliament. There are questions involved in this matter of the first possible consequence to this whole country, to the progress and to the prosperity of the North West, to the future of that great country upon which the Dominion of Canada rests with such confident hopes; and yet we are to be told, when we ask for the necessary information to enable us to form an opinion on this question, that we are to get the papers when the First Minister sees fit to bring them down; and, so far, he has brought nothing down that substantially bears upon the question which Parliament will be asked to discuss. The history of this matter goes back some years. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the hon, gentleman's dealings with the North-West for the last fifteen or twenty years. What we demand is, that Parliament shall be put in possession of the documents which are necessary in order that we may understand how far hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the unfortunate outbreak which has taken place, and which has culminated in the loss of life and the spilling of much blood. I desire to call attention for a moment or two to the course which the Opposition has taken on this matter, to the persistent efforts of the Opposition, and notably of the hon. member for West Durham, to obtain from the Government any satisfaction as to what has taken place. You were Speaker in Parliament in 1883, and you are aware, Sir, that in that Session the hon. member for West Durham called for papers in respect to the grievances in the Prince Albert and Edmonton districts; you are aware that, on that occasion, the matter was fully discussed; that it was discussed by the First Minister, by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), and by the hon. member for West Durham; and you are aware that the House ordered the First Minister to bring those papers down. Did he bring them down? Did he put Parliament in possession of the complaints and grievances of the half-breeds and the white settlers of the North West Territories—settlers in the very spot that has been lately the scene of devastation and death? No, he did not. He did not, up to this Sesgarded the resolution of Parliament and refused to submit them. It was only this Session, after persistent efforts, after insisting upon the Order of the House being obeyed by the First Minister, that he submitted to Parliament some of the papers. They did not cover even the Order of the House. The First Minister in this regard wilfully, persistently, disobeyed the Order of Parliament. He brought down a few of the papers, most of them of a date subsequent to the Order of the House. None of them, I think, bore date before the Order of the House. But the few he brought down did not afford any information to the members of this House or to the people of the country. On the 26th March the hon, member for West Durham again pressed upon the First Minister to submit these papers to Parliament. What was the answer then. I have given you some papers, I will give you some more, and some I will not give you? No, that was not the answer at that time; it was an assurance from the First Minister that these papers would be brought down shortly. There was no question then as to the interests of the people in the North-West being affected by the production of those papers; there was no question of its being improper and injudicious to submit those papers. He said: I will bring them down. Were they brought down? No, they were not. On the 27th March the member for West Durham again asked for them; on the 7th April he again asked for them; on the 16th April he again asked for the papers; on the 17th April he again asked for those papers; on the 20th April he again asked for them; on the 29th April again, and on the 6th May he again asked for them. It was not until recently that the First Minister took the ground that these papers should not be submitted to Parliament. He has promised over and over again to submit them, but whenever the question is pressed the First Minister declines to submit them to Parliament. On the 26th March the member for West Durham impressed upon the First Minister the necessity of having these papers, and moved a resolution, and in a powerful argument on the subject, pressed upon the attention of the Government the whole question. Again the Government did not refuse to bring those papers down, but they did not bring them down. What did the First Minister say, in reply to the speech of the hon, member for West Durham on the 26th March? He said that:

"In the meantime, not one of these half-breeds has been disturbed; more than that, they have been personally assured that their possession was just as good as if they had the deeds in their pockets; but, mind you, these men are quarrelling among themselves, just as white speculators do, when they try to jump each other's claims, and it is to settle the residuum of these claims this committee has been appointed."

There the First Minister admits that complaints were made, that the documents were in his possession, that these complaints were dealt with and their claims adjusted. We want to see these papers. We want to know what action the First Minister took with reference to them. We want to know upon what he based his judgment. Yet he tells us coolly that we are only to have such papers as he sees fit. He tells us they were notified. How were they notified? He has not brought down any papers that show these half-breeds were notified, that their claims were recognised. He goes further, and says they were personally notified. I do not know whether what the First Minister states is correct or not, and I want to know. I want to get these papers submitted to Parliament, in order that Parliament may be thoroughly conversant with this whole question. The First Minister has said that some of these complaints were years ago submitted to the Government. What disposition did the Government make of them? We do not know, and we want to know. The First Minister plumed himself, as he always does, upon the wonderful success of his Administration in preserving peace and order in the North-West Territories—the marvellous success that has Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

administration. He told us that the claims of the halfbreeds and aborigines were settled peacefully and quietly, and he challenged the hon, member for West Durham to deny that these half-breeds in Manitoba were properly treated. We want to know what they complained of. If they sent complaints to the Administration I want to know what disposition was made of those complaints. Yet the hon, gentleman coolly tells us that he will give just such information upon the subject as he sees fit. I say that is not the way to treat Parliament, because Parliament is entitled to the fullest information on all these questions. The hon. gentleman said the condition of the half-breeds of the Territories and the claims which have been preferred on their behalf were somewhat similar to those of the half-breeds of the Red River district, and had been receiving careful consideration, with a view to treating them fairly. Now, we want to know how these complaints were considered by the Government, and when they were considered. The First Minister says:

"In the Edmonton district the surveys of lands settled on have been completed, and when the report of the surveyor, to whom the duty was entrusted, has been examined and approved in the usual way, the claims of the actual settlers at that point will be considered and disposed of."

Now, this was some time ago. Is it a fact that complaints were made? Is is a fact that they were disposed of? If they were made and have been settled, I say Parliament is entitled to have the fullest information on these points. The hon, gentleman tells us that the claims of the halfbreeds in Manitoba were all peaceably and quietly adjusted. Is it not a fact, I ask hon, gentlemen opposite, that when the First Minister made this statement there were 500 claims undisposed of; and is it not a fact that, since the hon. gentleman made that statement, namely, on the 25th April nearly 500 of these Manitoba half-breed claims were then, for the first time, disposed of? Is it not the fact that these Manitoba half breeds were therefore making common cause with their brethren in the North-West Territories. resisting what they considered to be the unjust dealings of this Government? If there are facts of this kind we ought to know them; we ought to have the complaints of these Manitoba half-breeds before us, and we ought to know what disposition the Government has made of them. Yet we are answered by the First Minster, who arrogantly tells us that we will get just such information as he sees fit. Upon the 30th of March, the hon, member for West Durham again drew the attention of the First Minister to these papers, and I believe the assurance was then given that the papers would be brought down. But the First Minister himself, on that day, made use of the following language:-

"In accordance with the principle of the surveyors, the surveyors had commenced and had decided to carry out that principle of laying out all the lines under the normal practice of surveying that has been laid down in the Dominion Land Act; but while that was being done, it was not for the purpose of depriving any man, woman or child of land they had a title to, by possession or otherwise; it was not that they had the remotest idea of taking possession of it. Only, the regular piece of land would be so much in one quarter, so much in another, and so much in another. That was the original arrangement made by the Surveyor-General, and it naturally raised suspicion, as you can quite understand, among the half-breeds, that they were going to be forced out of their irragular tracts, of which they were in possession, and would be compelled to take square blocks. The moment that was brought to the notice of the Department it was altered; and the half-breeds were informed they would keep and get their lands according to their custom. They have got their lands."

The First Minister has said that some of these complaints were years ago submitted to the Government. What disposition did the Government make of them? We do not know, and we want to know. The First Minister plumed himself, as he always does, upon the wonderful success of his Administration in preserving peace and order in the North-West Territories—the marvellous success that has attended every movement of this wonderfully paternal we ought to have the documents before us. The hon, gentleman knew how sensitive the half-breeds were upon this question of survey, ever since the rebellion of 1869; he knew that the evidence was overwhelming, that one of the great grievances of the half-breeds in 1869 was the unwise and injudicious system of survey adopted by the Government. The hon. gentleman has only to turn for proof to the evidence given by Lieutenant-Governor McTavish, in 1874, who says:

"Some of the surveys which were made at that time were displeasing to the half-breeds, on whose lands the said surveys were made. The discontent of the half-breeds arose further from the fact that their land was being measured by the surveyors, without explanation being made as to the object, the lands being then cultivated by the half-breeds."

This evidence shows the grievances the half-breeds of Manitoba had in 1869. The hon, gentleman knows also that the Venerable Archbishop Taché, of St. Boniface, gave his testimony before the committee appointed to investigate the matter, when he stated the following:-

"The more remote cause was followed by me, which was more direct, and this may be said to have commenced with the arrival of the surveyors who came into the colony of Assiniboine."

You have the testimony of the Governor of the Hudson Bay Company, and also the testimony of the Archbishop, taken in 1874, both pointing out that the cause of complaint was the system of survey adopted by the Dominion Government. You will find, further, that the Minister of Public Works, who was a witness on that occasion, gave his testimony. Let us see what he stated on that occasion, with respect to the surveys, and how far they caused the difficulty that culminated in the rebellion of 1869. The hon, gentleman knows that the Minister of Public Works, his colleague, declared on oath that:

"Another cause, I believe, is the want of tact—and, in certain cases, the fanaticism of certain Government employes who, instead of showing the half-breeds that they were sent, not to disturb them in the possession of their land, went to work as if their idea had been to deprive those people of their possessions."

Here you have concurrent testimony, one of the witnesses being the Minister of Public Works, who is a Minister to day, declaring that one cause of the complaints of the half-breeds of Manitoba was the system of surveys, and they complained that the Government sent fanatical officials to assist in the government of that territory. Like causes produce like effects. The same causes, in 1869, culminated in an outbreak. Like causes existed in 1884. I will not say they culminated in an outbreak, for I will leave that for the House to decide when the papers are brought down. It is quite clear that documents of an important character are in the possession of the Government, and that Parliament should be seized of them. The First Minister went on to say:

"To-day, if there is anything Canada ought to be more proud of than another, it is the peace, the quiet and the order that have existed in the North-West ever since the successful result of the Red River expedition, under Lord Wolseley."

That is what the First Minister said on the 26th of March last. Was the hon gentleman so utterly ignorant of the real condition of affairs in the North-West as to venture, upon his responsibility as First Minister of the Dominion, to state that, if there was one thing more than another that the Government should be proud of, it was the fact that peace and prosperity and contentment existed in the North-West Territories. At that very moment the hon. gentleman must have known, or ought to have known, that the half-breeds had got behind their Winchesters in opposition to the Government of Canada. The hon. gentleman must half-breeds had got behind their Winchesters in opposition to the Government of Canada. The hon gentleman must have known, I will not say he did know, that that statement was wholly contrary to the facts. He ought to have known either of his own knowledge or from his officials, if they were not of such a fanatical character as was described by the Minister of Public Works, and unless they were utterly regardless of the best interests of the country, that at that very moment discontent existed in every portion of the North-West. He must have known, if he had examined into his own pigeon-holes at his Department, that complaints, petitions and resolutions, passed in the North-West, protesting against the Government's policy were in those pigeon-holes. He should have known that those claims were brought before the Administration, that charges of a most serious character were made, whether rightly or wrongly I do not now say; but that they were made is beyond a shadow of doubt. He did know that two years before a delegation of half-breeds came all the way down from the valley of the Saskatchewan, at their own expense, to interview the First Minister and insist on the recognition of existing claims throughout the North-West, not only with respect to the half-breeds but with respect to white settlers. The hon, gentleman must have known the condition of the North-West from the speech made by the hon. member for West Durham, and the speech made by the member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), describing the grievances under which the halfbreeds were suffering; yet the hon. gentleman told us that if there is one thing more than another of which the Government have reason to be proud, it was that peace, progress and prosperity continued to exist in the North-West. There was no peace. The hon. gentleman was crying peace when there was no peace and no contentment; and the First Minister was derelict in his duty to the people if he was ignorant of the fact that discontentment prevailed, and he was derelict to Parliament if he was at that time aware of the condition of affairs, and yet stated that peace, prosperity and contentment reigned in the whole North-West Territory. The hon, gentleman must have known something of the movements of the half-breeds subsequent to the interview he had with the half-breed delegates from the valley of the Saskatchewan. He must have seen, because I suppose he reads the public press, the address printed by those delegates, and the letter sent by them to Montana, calling on Louis Riel, their old leader, to return from his American home and once more settle among them in the North-West. The hon, gentleman must have seen, unless he were blind, wilfully blind, the reply made by Louis Riel to the delegation, on 4th June, 1884, which was couched in the following language: -

"To Messrs. James Isbister, Gabriel Dumont, Moise Ouillette and Michel Dumas :-

"Gentlemen,—You have travelled more than 700 miles, from the Saskatchewan country across the international line, to make me a visit. The communities in the midst of which you live have sent you as their delegates to ask my advice on various difficulties which have rendered the British North-West unhappy under the administration of the Ottawa Government. Moreover, you invite me to go and stay amongst you, your hope being that I, for one, could help to better, in some respects, your condition, and cordial and pressing is your invitation; you want me and my family to accompany you; I am at liberty to excuse myself and say no; yet you are waiting for me; so that I have only to get ready, and your leiters of delegation assure me that a friendly welcome awaits me in the midst of those who sent you.

"Gentlemen, your personal visit does me honor and causes great pleasure; but on account of its representative character, your coming to me has the appearance of a remarkable circumstance which I record as one of the gratifications of my life—an event which my family will remember, and I pray to God that my assistance will prove so successful remember, and I pray to God that my assistance will prove so successful to you as to render this event a blessing amongst the many blessings of this my fortieth year. To be frank is the shortest. I doubt whether my advice given to you on this soil concerning affairs in Canadian territories could cross the border and retain any influence. But here is another view of the matter. I am entitled, according to the 31st and 32nd clauses of the Manitoba treaty, to land, of which the Canadian Government have, directly or indirectly, deprived me, and my claim to which is valid, notwithstanding the fact that I have become an American citizen. Considering then, that my interests are identical with yours, I accept your very kind invitation, and will go and spend some months amongst you.

furtherance of their best interests; moreover, I have made friends and acquaintances amongst whom I like to live. I go with you, but I come back in September. I have the honor to be, gentlemen delegates, your humble servant.

Will the Government deny that they had this communica-Will the Government deny that they received petitions from the half-breeds; that resolutions passed by the half-breeds were received here before October, 1884. The evidence is clear. Another letter, bearing date 22nd July, 1884, signed by a half-breed named J. Isbister, has an important bearing on the notification given to the Government. That letter is as follows:-

"PRINCE ALBERT SETTLEMENT,
"ST. CATHARINE'S PARISH,
"July 22, 1884.

"To the Editor of the Sun:

"Sib.—A treaty was made in 1875 with the poor Indians out here. The promises were good, but they have never been fulfilled. When the half breeds, both French and English, went to speak to Governor Morris, they were asked not to interfere with the Indian, that there would be no delay, and that the half-breeds would be attended to immediately. Ever since, and up to the present moment, petition upon petition has been drawn up with the the people's grievance, and sent down to the Ottawa Government, but with no result How many are there in this settlement who can produce a free patent with regard to land taken before 1870, or even as to the lands taken before 1862? I was the first settler in this settlement. as to the lands taken before 1862? I was the first settler in this settlement. I lived alone with my wife and two small children in the wild times of the Indian tribes, and when leaving my home on a hunting excursion atter buffalo, with my little family, I found on my return that the house had been burst open, the boxes broken, and clothing and provisions taken. Afterwards, I had to dig large cellars in through the fir wood, between this and Uarleton, and cache my stuff, until I made a sufficient hunt for the winter. Then I carted all to the house, where I wintered, and went on with my improvements. To tell how I had to live in bringing the wild Indian to live in peace with the white man would take a great many sheets of paper. But to this day I am not afraid to say that I am respected by the Indians and by others besides. Yet, where is the free patent for my little portion of land, or who should hold the first patent? How has the screw been turned on the poor settlers of the North-West, that they have nothing to show their right to the land occupied? Yet the officials of the Canadian Government here insist on farmers paying timber dues for the fence required to build around a few farmers paying timber dues for the fence required to build around a few acres of land, and a little dry wood required to boil a round a few acres of land, and a little dry wood required to boil a teakettle. Yet I believe a man, the first year settled, can get from this same Government about sixty logs free, which is supposed to do for both himself and stock. Therefore, it is necessary that we should secure the same rights as the people of Manitoba; and we should get, not blame, but sympathy, from those who see how the people of the North-West are dealt with. Having no one in whom we could please confidence that it is a single property of the same in the same respective to the same re ing no one in whom we could place confidence to act in our interest, and seeing that our members are satisfied with promises only, we still waited patiently until the timber dues were cut to a fine point, the best surveyed patiently until the timber dues were cut to a nne point, the best surveyed lands were given to colonisation companies, and we were told by a Government official that no provision had been made for the half-breeds of the North-West, and only for those of Manitoba. The people, both linglish and French half-breeds, appointed a delegation to be sent to Mr. Riel, who could soon give proper satisfaction as to whether the North-West was included in the Manitoba treaty or not. This, to satisfy the people, he has already explained.

Sir, does this man tell an untruth? He says that petition after petition, remonstrance after remonstrance, protest after protest, was sent to the Government at Ottawa, but they paid no attention. Complaints made to their officials and to themselves practically passed unheeded; they fell on deaf ears; no attention was paid to them, and still we wonder why rebellion sprung up in the North-West. I do not now discuss the responsibility for that rebellion; it is no part of my argument; but these documents prove beyond doubt that the Administration have in their possession papers of vital importance in discussing this question, papers which the First Minister arrogantly tells us he will submit to Parliament or not, as he thinks best. The First Minister knows well that the settlers at Calgary, Prince Albert, Moose Jaw, Edmonton, and every other centre of Afterly, Moose Jaw, Edmonton, and every other centre of population in that country, for the past three or four years, have been sending petitions and remonstrances against the conduct of the hon. gentleman himself, against the irritating and unreasonable delays, against their whole conduct from beginning to end, not only of the Administration but of the officials of the Administration but of the officials of the Administration.

The hon, gentleman knows perfectly well that the holf. the Administration but of the officials of the Administration. beyond that fraud is not being practised upon the people."

The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the half. Is that true or false? Whether true or false, it is quite breeds and the white settlers have complained of these clear that the hon. gentleman admits that there are docu-Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

colonisation companies getting possession of these lands which have been settled on for years by those half-breeds and white settlers. They know perfectly well that protests have been presented against the irritating results which were likely to follow his policy of procrastination and delay. He knows perfectly well that not only did he get remonstrances from public meetings, but from private individuals—from his own friends. We know that these documents are in the possession of the Government, but still the hon. gentleman tells us they will be brought down or not, as he thinks fit. Here is what the hon. gentleman himself stated in 1883, with respect to the grievances of the settlers in that country. He said:

"The settlers are scattered along the North Saskatchewan for a great distance. Some of them have complained that they should have long narrow strips of land, running back three or four miles into the country, such as we were obliged to grant to the settlers along the Red River and Assinibolae River, for the purpose of settling all the disputes that existed in that country.'

On that occasion the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) said:

"I suppose you are aware that delegates have been sent here by a certain portion of the population of the North-West Territories, respecting the subject which is just now engaging the attention of this House, and is more especially under the notice of the Government. These delegates have laid their grievances—if grievances they are—before some of the hon. Ministers. Their object is to have the title to the lands of the hon. Ministers. Their object is to have the title to the lands occupied, owned and improved by some of these people for over twenty years, recognised and confirmed by the Government. Their claims are nothing but just. These lands belong mostly to half-breed people, and pioneers from Ontario, who went west from the Province of Manitoba some five, ten, or fifteen years ago. There is a very important group at Duck Lake, at Prince Albert; another at Edmonton; another at St. Albert, and so on. Last year surveyors went out to carry on the surveys of the Dominion in that part of the country. These surveyors had no instructions to stop whenever they would meet any of the old settlements; and their continuing the line aroused, of course, the suspicion of the old settlers, who held a meeting, and represented to the Government the justice of respecting their property in farms and improvements."

You see by the arguments which were advanced by the hon. member for Provencher that they had meetings there; that they had sent down complaints to the Government here; that they had even sent a delegation here; and yet a single word of those remonstrances or representations, or of what the Government did with them, is not submitted to Parliament; they refuse to submit them, and the hon. gentleman autocratically tells us that he will give them or retain them, as he thinks fit. The hon, gentleman says the Indians are satisfied and contended, but if he will turn to his own reports he will find that the Indians for years have been complaining of the misconduct, the mismanagement and the robbery committed on them by the officials. I do not say that these complaints are true; I do not know whether they are or not; I am not concerned in that; but I say that these complaints and remonstrances ought to be submitted to Parliament, in order that we may be able to judge as to whether these things are true or not. The First Minister says that all this fuss we are making about the claims of the half-breeds is a bagatelle; that it is not to be considered; that it is not a matter of the slightest importance to the people of this country. He says:

"Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the complaint of these people, as published and as alluded to by the hon. gentleman, has very little reference to this land question. This land question is a bagatelle compared with their other complaints. There are a very few things unsettled, and they will be easily settled. There are points which are not yet settled, but these men will not be dispossessed. When the boundaries are rettled and all their quarrels with their naisebarracement at the will set their falls.

ments in the possession of the Government in relation to these claims that he has not submitted to Parliament, that Parliament has called for, and that he ought to submit. Whether it is true or false, I am not concerned in establishing just now; only it is somewhat singular that over 200 of these claims have been recognised by the commission since it went up there two months ago. The hon gentleman says that every claim is settled. If that is the case, let us have the documents, the complaints of the half-breeds, the grounds on which they make their claims, and the adjudication of the Government. The hon. gentleman sent Mr. Pearce up last summer to settle these claims. I know Mr. Pearce; he is a respectable man; but the hon. gentleman tells us he is not capable of investigating these claims, because the half-breeds talk only Cree or French, and Mr. Pearce could not talk a word of either Cree or French Was it not absurd for the Government to send a man up to settle those grievances who could only speak English? This report was dated the 24th of October of last year, and I suppose that on the 24th of October of last year, and I suppose that on the 24th of October the hon. gentleman knew the difficulties existing in the North-West, and yet he does not see fit to inform Parliament what was done with regard to them. I am not concerned to consider whether these grievances were founded on a proper basis or not. But I have shown beyond all doubt that there are documents in the possession of the Government which they ought to submit to Parliament, and which they have not submitted to Parliament. I say Parliament ought to be seized of these documents; Parliament ought to be informed of every matter in connection with the whole transaction, from beginning to end. The hon. gentleman treats Parliament and the people of this country with supreme contempt; he does more than that; he treats his own followers with contempt. He tells us that no matter what the policy of the Government is, it will be supported by a majority of the representatives of the people in Parliament. The hon, gentleman is trespassing very greatly upon the forbearance and good nature of hon, gentlemen opposite. I presume that they will not decide questions of this kind without having the evidence before them, and that they will insist on the production of all the docu-ments bearing on this question. The hon. First Minister tells us that he will submit to Parliament such documents as he sees fit. The proper course for him, as for any Government, to pursue, is to take Parliament into his confidence, and to submit all those documents to the consideration of Parliament. Then we shall know whether these half-breeds, Indians, and white settlers in the Territories have any just ground of complaint; but it is treating Parliament with supreme contempt to tell us that we are not to have any documents, except such as he sees fit to submit; and instead of replying to my hon friend calmly and deliberately, to fall back on the old old story of want of patriotism and disloyalty. But the hon, gentle-man's misconduct and criminality in all the transactions connected with the whole North-West will be remembered by the people of this country long after hon. gentlemen's bones are as rotten as their loyalty.

Mr. BLAKE. Before my motion is put I desire to say just one or two words with reference to the reply made by the First Minister. The hon. gentleman, not for the first, or second, or third time this Session, has addressed to us language which is wholly unparliamentary, and which would be beneath the dignity of his position, even if he were the humblest member of this House, and which is still more beneath the dignity of his position as the leader of this House. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon. gentleman when he has adopted this style of argument; but I think the time has arrived, or nearly arrived, when forbearance ceases to be a virtue; and when an hon. gentleman, in his position, chooses persistently and continusure to find the tothe with the time that there was in document which might, if produced, have had that result. That is the precedent of the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now says he is going to meet without bringing down the documents. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now says he is going to meet without bringing down the documents. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now says he is going to meet without bringing down the documents. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now says he is going to meet without bringing down the documents. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now as yet of the hon. gentleman himself, to deal wit

ously to address such offensive language to an hon. member opposed to him, it is time that an understanding should be reached as to whether that method of conducting the business of Parliament is to be continued. The hon, gentleman said to-day: What care I whether there are people dead or alive in the North-West; and in several other parts of his address he imputed to me the basest, meanest and most unworthy motives for my course in this House. I shall only say to-night, as to my views of the hon. gentleman's conduct, that I believe the hon. gentleman, intoxicated by vanity and by the adulation of his followers, is forgetful of his own dignity, and of the decencies of debate; and I warn him that he will not be suffered unscathed to pursue an unparliamentary course. With reference to the hon. gentleman's statement as to the reasons why he had delayed to produce a portion of these papers, and the reasons why he was not about to produce another portion of them, I have just one or two observations to make. He says, of the delay in the production of the papers which he says will be brought down, that delay is excused in this matter, the most important which has come before the Parliament this Session, which has perhaps ever come before the Parliament of the country, on the ground that there is a deficiency in the copying powers of the Department. It is not necessary to do more than state that excuse to demonstrate its utter absurdity and flimsiness. Are we to be told by the First Minister, eight weeks after the demand is made, that it is because he cannot find men enough to copy the papers that we have not got them? As to the other class of papers, which he has not brought down and says he will not bring down, because he says they are papers, the production of which may imperil the lives and interests of persons in the North-West, I have two observations to make. The first is this; that no papers which should show that the writers of them believed that the half-breeds had grievances or in which they advised the Government to remedy those grievances—no papers which gave a fair and plain statement of the circumstances of the case—could by any possibility, if published, injure or impair the standing of those people in the community in which they live. It is perfectly clear that those papers could but strengthen them in the confidence of the people among whom they live, instead of impairing it. The second observation is this: that we found precisely the same difficulty in the year 1869-70, and the way in which the Government got over that difficulty on that occasion was not by taking upon itself not to produce these papers, but by bringing them down and striking a select committee, composed of members on both sides of the House, who should decide how much of those papers it would be in the interest of the public and of individuals to publish. At that moment Louis Riel, as I said, was the president of the de facto Government of the country; he was exercising a certain authority there, and we know how it was exercised, and under those circumstances the Government brought the papers down; but, they said, we will appoint a select committee, which shall go over the papers, and shall expunge such as, for the moment, cannot be published without detriment to the interest of individuals there; and there was an expurgation of certain names and an omission of a certain document which might, if produced, have had that result. That is the precedent of the hon. gentleman himself, set by himself, to deal with the very case he now says he is going to meet without bringing down the documents. In the third place, and it is the last observation I will make, the hon, gentleman, in order to make out any case at all for this argument of his, which I have proved to be no argument, affirmed that the half-breeds were still in insurrection, and that there was still danger, and that they were still and would be still inciting the Indian population to warfare. That must strike us all with a painful tion, I am sure, that the General in command had freed a large number of persons who came in, and told them to return to their homes. If it be the case, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that the half-breeds are still organising, I do not think that was a very prudent thing to do; but I do not think it is the case. I adhere to the statement with which I opened my remarks; I believe General Middleton pursued a prudent course; I believe there was no danger, and in that, as in other respects, the hon. gentleman's argument is wholly without foundation.

Motion negatived on a division.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On sub-section 3, section 4,

Mr. McMULLEN. I move in amendment:

That after the word "is," in the 42nd line, page 5, the following words be added:—rated on the revised assessment roll.

He said: I think this is necessary in order to prevent the manufacturing of votes. If a man is not rated at all, but simply tells the revising barrister that he is the owner of property in any municipality, a revising barrister may put him on the list, and there will be no means of ascertaining that he has been improperly put on, unless by taking the trouble to refer to the registry office. There will be no difficulty in the case of a man who is rated on the assessors' list, because it is not likely he would desire to be taxed unless he had some vested interest.

Mr. CASEY. I think this is a very important amendment. It will secure, at all events, that which we have been contending should be the rule in making the voters' list, namely, that the primary valuations should be made by the municipal authorities. A great deal has been said about the alleged unfairness of Grit assessors, and something might be said about the alleged unfairness of Tory assessors; but as between the revising officer and the assessor, whether Grit or Tory, the latter would be less likely to be mistaken or be guilty of wrong-doing, since his term of office is only for one year, and he is immediately amenable to the people and resides among them. The valuation by assessors is more likely to be, on the average, fair and non-partisan than the assessment by the revising officer, because every rural electoral division contains several municipalities, and the chances are equal that the number of Grit assessors will be balanced by the number of Tory assessors, or vice versa. It is true that politics is sometimes introduced into municipal affairs, but it is only spasmodically, and generally municipal councillors are elected for their services to the municipality, or in the hope that they will render good service to the municipality. In my own township, which is a strong Reform township, we have for years, at a time, elected a Conservative reeve, and sometimes we have had a majority of Conservatives in the council, and the same thing has happened in other townships, where the majority has been been even more strongly Reform. The chances are as great that the assessor will be of one party as of the other. In any case, you cannot expect to get a man free from political leanings, because every intelligent man has them, and our friends opposite do not propose to have the valuation made by a perfectly impartial person, but to place it in the hands of one who will be invariably a Conservative.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. Blake.

or the country to consider the position which they have taken logical or fair. They object to allowing assessors to value property because they may be partisans, and they propose to leave the valuation in every case in the hands of one who is sure to be a partisan. Another objection raised to the valuation by municipal assessors is that they are in the habit of valuing too low, and that in this way the franchise will be restricted; but, in regard to properties of small value, the assessors generally estimate them more nearly at their actual value than they do properties of larger value. Even if the assessor fails to do his duty in this respect, the judges, when they are appealed to, will always adopt the basis laid down in the law, and are in the habit of taking evidence as to the actual value, and so correcting any mistake which the assessors may have made. I contend, therefore, that there is much less liability to partiality on the part of the assessor than on the part of the revising officer, and that there is much less liability to actual error on the part of the former, because he is an actual resident and knows the land personally, and knows what land is worth in the particular neighborhood better than a revising officer could possibly do. In the third place, I contend it will be just as easy, in fact easier, to rectify any errors of judgment the assessor might make, or any breaches of trust of which he might be guilty, than it would be to correct the errors of the revising officer. In the case of the assessor, his mistakes, intentional or otherwise, would probably affect both sides equally in the constituency, and both sides would have to bear the cost of correction; but the mistakes of the revising officer, intentional or other otherwise, would probably be to the detriment of the Opposition party only, and the cost of correcting his blunders or wrong-doing would fall exclusively upon that party.

Mr. McMULLEN. My object in making this amendment was to guard against the manufacture of faggot votes. In England a law has been passed providing that a man must show that he has paid taxes in the year previous to the time when he requires to be put upon the list, that he has been put upon the assessment roll and pays taxes. I wish to provide some similar safeguard. For instance, supposing a man desires to be placed upon the list, he may get some person to convey to him, for the time being, a piece of property. It is not necessary that the deed shall be registered, and he produces it before the revising officer and claims to be put upon the list. The revising officer is not supposed to visit the registration office to see if the deed is bond fide or not. He accepts the document as prima facie evidence that the man owns the property. I have pointed out a loop whereby deeds might be manufactured and give parties a chance to get put upon the list when they had no right to it.

Mr. BAIN. I suppose it would be hardly fair to ask the First Minister to amend this clause, so as to make assessment rolls absolute with reference to the value of property; but I do think it might be fairly taken as the basis upon which these rolls are made up. I think it would not be equitable to make them final. There might be cases in which it would be only fair, if an appeal remained in the hands of a revising officer, or of the county judge. But I do think, speaking for my own Province, the assessment rolls in the various municipalities should be the basis of the voters' list. I presume there are eases in which the assessors are partisan, and might, perhaps, do scant justice to those opposed to them in politics. But it is to be remembered that they are under the control of the municipal council, and parties aggrieved with their assessment have an opportunity of appealing from him to the council. I think that, when the roll finally comes from the court of revision, it might be accepted as a fair and equitable valuation of property in the municipal-Mr. CASEY. Hon. gentlemen applaud that idea, and lities. With respect to the properties which are placed at the look pleased at it, but I do not think they can ask this House low assessment of $150, or $200, my own municipal experience leads me to the view that, as a rule, those properties are oftener valued to their full amount than any other properties that go upon the roll. There is a tendency on or he must authorise the revising officer to substitute the the part of parties who possess properties that are worth just about enough to qualify them to vote to feel aggrieved if they are placed a little below that amount.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman proposes to take the assessment roll as the guide, in the first instance, I do not see that he could have any objections to the amendment of my hon. friend. If he desires to make it more clearly the guide which the revising officer will have to follow, it will be of great advantage to adopt this rule. It will entitle parties whose names are upon the assessment roll to go upon the list as a matter of right, in the first instance, and then, if it is found, upon investigation, that there has been a change of proprietor before the roll is finally made up, it will be the duty of the party in whose hands the property remains to establish that right, but it will give to the party whose name is upon the assessment roll a prima facie right to go upon the voters' list, and to remain there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think we can alter this clause, because it would interfere with the other form of expression which we have already passed, with regard to cities and municipalities. The hon gentleman will remember that in the registration clause it is provided that the assessment roll shall be prima facie evidence of the value of such property.

Mr. BAIN. When the rolls are made up, will the revising officer's clerk place all those tenants on the voters' list which appear from the assessment roll to occupy property of sufficient value to qualify them to vote if they had been owners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, very likely; but I do not want to prejudice the matter.

Mr. CASEY. The fact that a different form has been adopted with respect to the preceding clause is no argument that the present proposition should not be discussed on its merits, and, if necessary, the preceding clause could be changed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The effect of the adoption of this motion would be to make the assessment roll absolute evidence of the right to vote, and no name could be struck off and no name added.

Mr. EDGAR. That is not so. According to the language of this amendment the assessment roll is prima facie evidence of value, but it is necessary that the voter's name shall appear on the assessment roll before it can be placed on the voters' list. But it does not give every man on the assessment roll the right to vote, because it is declared that the actual necessary value shall exist. If the qualification is $200, a man may be on the assessment roll for $250; but still it is always open before the judge revising the list to show that the property is only worth $150, and although the man's name is on the assessment roll it can be struck off the voters' list. In like manner, a name may be on the assessment roll for $150 and the qualification be $200; evidence can be brought to show that the property is worth $200 and the name be inserted on the voters' list.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose a party comes before a revising officer and says: I have obtained a transfer of property. It was assessed on 1st June, and on 1st July I purchased it. Does the hon. gentleman intend that the party who has become the proprietor of the property shall be entitled to have his name substituted for that of the owner at the time the assessment was made? Does he intend that the original proprietor shall stand on the list as the owner when the new proprietor's name appears on the next assessment roll?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

or he must authorise the revising officer to substitute the new for the old proprietor. Does he propose to do that at the time the list is made up, or must the party appear at the revision and establish his right?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I do not object to that, but it should be made absolutely certain that it is the duty of the officer to put the owner's name on as a matter of right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we have done

Mr. CASEY. Even under the hon. gentleman's understanding, I do not think that the amendment would do any injustice, because the assessment roll itself, before reaching the stage at which it becomes the basis of the voters' list, is subject to a process of revision and appeal, so that the voter would have every opportunity of having himself assessed at the right figure before the roll was finished.

Mr. MULOCK. I believe the First Minister is correct in his view of the effect of this amendment, but if it were inserted a little lower down I think it would meet the case, It would then read: "Is the owner of real property within any such electoral district, of the value of and rated on the assesment roll, etc."

Mr. BOWELL. Supposing it is not rated on the assessment roll?

Mr. MULOCK. The point of the amendment is, that if a man is not so assessed we assume he is not worth the amount.

Mr. BOWELL. That is making the law worse than the present law in our Province.

Mr. MULOCK. No; because there is an appeal.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman must see that if you put those words in you make it absolutely necessary for the person to be assessed on the roll before he can go on the

Mr. MULOCK. He can have the assessment corrected.

Mr. MILLS. By the interpretation clause, the hon. gentleman will see that the roll is only prima facie evidence of value, and not of ownership, so it does not touch the point raised by the amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The time to consider that, will be when we come to the clause with regard to the revising officers.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman admits that it shall be the duty of the officer to accept the value on the assessment roll as prima facie evidence, and the name is prima facie evidence of ownership.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there is any objection to that.

Mr. HACKETT. As we have no compulsory assessment rolls in Prince Edward Island, the effect of the amendment would be to disfranchise the whole of the people of some counties.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman must know that special provision must afterwards be made for cases in which there is no assessment roll.

Mr. BOWELL. Not at all.

Mr. HACKETT. Leave the Bill as it is at present, and it covers the whole case.

Amendment negatived, struck out of the third paragraph of section 4. The effect of that would be to make the qualification in rural districts

Mr. BURPEE. I hope that will be carried; otherwise, this clause will disfranchise more people in New Brunswick than any other clause in the Bill. In that Province $100 real estate has been the qualification for many years. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King) the other night made a statement as to the effect of the clause in his county. He said there were 2,000 voters in Queen's, of whom some 427 were qualified on property between $100 and $150 in value, and the personal qualification in this Bill will disfranchise some 90 more, making a difference in the electorate of some 20 per cent. I do not say that all of those will be disfranchised, because a few few of them may be enfranchised under other clauses of the Bill. But the larger portion will be left off the list altogether. The county of Sunbury adjoins Queen's, on the west, and I think the circumstances there would be about the same. I have written for a list to the secretary-treasurer of the county, and I believe the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) has also written to the secretary-treasurer of his county; but we have not yet received replies, which I regret, because I believe we shall be able to show that a very large number of people would be disfranchised in those counties. When we are taking real estate as the basis of the franchise. I think we should make the qualification as low as it is in the Province having the lowest franchise. In Ontario and New Brunswick I believe the franchise is $100, and other Provinces have manhood suffrage; so that I think it would only be fair to reduce this to $100, and I hope the Prime Minister will consent to the amendment. The local member for the county of York, which adjoins my county, writes to me that he has had the official list examined, and that of 3,000 or 3,500 electors outside of the city of Fredericton, this provision will disfranchise 804, who are qualified either on $400 personal property or on between $100 and $150 of real estate. The numbers in the different parishes who will be disqualified he gives as follows:— St. Mary's, 104; Stanley, 96; Southampton, 76; Queensbury, 32; Kingselear, 54; Manvers Sutton, 34; New Maryland, 19; North Lake, 57; Prince William, 50; Douglass, 30; Dumfries, 38; Canterbury, 153; and Bright, 59; and he adds, "few if any of the above will come in under other clauses of the Bill." As Sunbury is between the counties I have mentioned, I presume a great many electors would be disfranchised there, as well as in many other counties in the Province. In the district where I live you might scarcely find a man for miles around who would be disfranchised; but six or seven miles to the north, in the back district, you would find them by the score. They live on very small farms, which are assessed for $ 100. There is another class, who have small farms near coal mines, but who spend a large portion of the year in the mines. I think this Bill ought to take all these classes into consideration.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would prefer to see the qualification at $100; I do not want to see any man disfranchised, but there is one thing to be taken into consideration, and that is the taxable value. Every man in the country can put his property down in order to have it assessed low and taxed low, but when you come to the real value, which is the value to be taken in this Bill, I do not believe that the difference in qualification will amount to anything. I think that every man who has a vote now will have a vote then on that qualification. I do not think there will be any trouble about it, and I am not afraid to meet my constituents on that ground. I would rather have seen it at $100, but if the majority is in favor of $150, I do not see that the difference will really have any effect, and am therefore pre-Mr. Mals.

Mr. MULOCK moved that the words "and fifty" be the hon. member for Queen's N.B., (Mr. King) made the other night, I have not a word to say about it; his statement may be correct, but if so, his county is a great deal poorer than I understood it was, since this qualification will disfranchise 427 of his constituents out of a possible 2,000 votes. That seems to me a very poor representation for the hon, gentleman to make of his county. To make his case stronger, the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) and the hon, member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) also got up, although they knew nothing about the county, not half as much as I do. My view is that where there is so much protesting, the truth is generally lost. As regards the county of York, N.B., the hon. gentleman says there are about 4,500 votes in it; it just happens there is within a trifle of 5,000 votes; and taking the same ratio of disfranchisement as the hon. member for Queen's says this Bill will operate in his county, 1,000 votes would be the disfranchisement in my county. I do not believe that, even admitting the ability of the Attorney-General of New Brunswick. I know him of old; he is a firm Grit, and so I do not place much faith in him. Of course, he takes the assessment roll, which is based on taxable property; but take the Bill as it is, based on real property, and the real value will be just about the same as it is now. As regards the increased vote which the Bill will give, I think it is going to enfranchise at least 1,000 in my county, judging from what I have seen of the measure and the arguments I have heard on both sides. But admitting the other view, that taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Bill will disfranchise 1,000 people in my constituency, the people would never stand it. They would not send me back here next time. Every Conservative in the Province would be wiped out, and hon gentlemen opposite would have a free course. With reference to the extension of the franchise, I believe the Bill is right. That has been my view from the first, and I am ready to meet my constituents on that ground.

> Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman was a little incorrect in saying that hon, members on this side had tried to put an extreme value on the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King).

> Mr. TEMPLE. I did not say extreme; I only said you were trying to help him.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman required any help, for all that was necessary was what he gave, a bare statement of the facts, and these facts he obtained from the secretary-treasurer of his county. There was no party feeling, no attempt to exaggerate or to throw dust in peoples' eyes, and if the statements were incorrect the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Temple), could have sent a communication to Queen's county and found out whether the secretary had over stated the case or not. Unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to controvert the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King), by some evidence, he should not be so ready to contradict it. With respect to his own county, certain statements have been read, coming from the Attorney General, of facts taken from the lists. The hon, gentleman says he never looked at the list and never had communication with anybody, but that he does not place confidence in the statement of the Attorney General. Surely, when we are fixing the clauses of a Bill it is not a question as to which side of politics a man belongs, and when the Attorney General has stated that the Bill will disfranchise 800 or 900 of the hon, gentleman's constituents, the hon, gentleman, if he is sincere in his desire not to disfranchise anybody, is derelict in his duty in allowing the Bill to go through without taking the means to ascertain whether the statement was correct, and if it be correct, without using pared to accept the higher rate. As regards the statement his influence to prevent such distranchisement. It is no answer to a written statement to say that you do not believe it. Until it is controverted by some tangible testimony, I assume that the members of the committee, on both sides, will act upon the statement of the Attorney-General of the Province. The hon, gentleman opposite says he is in favor of reducing the amount of qualification from $150 to $100, but that, after all, as the assessed value is lower than the real value, it will not make much difference. The assessment roll, containing the assessed value, is the prima facie evidence for the revising barrister, and if a property is assessed at $100 the duty will be thrown on every one of these 800 men to bring evidence to show that the assessed value is not the real value. Does the hon, gentleman wish that that should be the result? Why does he not use his influence with the Government to induce them to adopt the amendment?

Mr. TEMPLE. I would rather see the amount $100 than $150, but I abide by the decision of the majority of the committee. I am only one here. I am not like the hon. gentleman there, who seems to control the whole House.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think I have attempted to control the whole House. I think I am just as modest in the expression of my views as the hon. gentleman is. I wish he would use his influence, or is he only throwing dust in the eyes of his constituents, and pretending that he is in favor of this, when he really is not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. DAVIES. There is no imputation in that. If there is to be a choice made between the two alternatives, I would not assume that the one which disparages the hon. gentleman is the correct one.

Mr. FOSTER. It is refreshing to see how eagerly, and at the same time good-naturedly, my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) always rushes into the breach after a member on that side from New Brunswick has spoken, as if he thought sufficient force had not been given to the propositions advanced. I am sure that the members from New Brunswick will appreciate his kind services. It looks as if he expected to lead that branch of the House from the Maritime Provinces, and I do not doubt that he is well fitted to do it. He will see that a mere statement taken from the assessment roll, as it now exists in one of our counties, is not a sufficient proof that under this Bill the number named will be disfranchised. When the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), stated that 427 would be disfranchised on that basis, the hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), made the mistake of taking that as absolute proof, but it is not.

Mr. DAVIES. It is prima facie, at all events.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is not even primá facie evidence. In my own county there is always a difference between the assessed and the actual value. The reason is plain. If a man can have his property assessed at a sufficient valuation to give him a vote he would rather not be assessed at a higher amount, because he wishes to save the taxes. In the back settlements of our counties, because the settlers are deprived of privileges of market and communication which the front settlers possess, there is a disposition, in order to make them some sort of compensation, to assess their property relatively lower than property of equal value in the front settlements. When the Attorney General of New Brunswick stated that 1,000 or so would be disqualified in York county alone, he did not know what would be the provisions of this Bill, because they have been considerably modified in the way of lowering the franchise since we went into committee, and he does not know what other modifications may be made until the committee passes upon them. of the list, in order to see how many of these men would be enfranchised under the other clauses of the Bill.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am always glad when a reference is made to New Brunswick, because it is like pouring oil upon the waters; the House is always quiet upon such an occasion. I was surprised at the statement of the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), but no one can doubt that, according to the list he has given, these people would be disfranchised, unless another valuation was put upon the property. When a statement came from the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) substantiating the statement of the hon. member for Queen's, it looked very alarming, as if it were going to disfranchise a great many electors. I have written to Charlotte, and I do not know whether an equal number would not be disqualified in that county. If so, it is a very serious consideration, and I am sure that if the First Minister believed he was going to disfranchise onefourth of that number he would remedy the matter, if he possibly could. With regard to this valuation for taxes, I am aware that it may not be, perhaps, the actual value, but it does not make any difference whether it is the actual value or a value put on for assessment; because, as long as the valuation of one man's property is relative to another, then it is equal. If you have a certain amount of money to raise, you have only to raise the percentage if it is lower, or to lessen it if it is higher. Therefore, you might make a new valuation, and raise a man's property which is valued at $100 up to $150. I am myself not aware of any properties, with a house and buildings upon them, that could possibly be valued at $100, but we find when we go to the list that there are a good many such. Now, I would like to ask the leader of the Government why he could not put it at $100. If he feels it is going to disfranchise some who ought to vote he might make the change. Now, we have voted on real estate for half a century, and a man who had any interest at all in real estate has always been allowed to vote. Really this clause alarms me, for there are a good many owning real estate that cannot come up to $150, and will be disqualified under this Bill. I do not think my hon. friends opposite want to do that, and if they have any influence with the First Minister they should induce him to reduce the qualification on real estate. I agree that it will not disqualify all this number, but I am afraid it will disqualify a very considerable number. Take it all in all, however, I do not hesitate to say that I do not think the number of voters will be reduced. In my own county, even if some who vote now upon a property qualification of $100 were thrown off, I cannot resist the impression, in fact, I am satisfied, that the increase in the number of those who will come in under the tenant vote will considerably add to the list. But that does not help the case, with regard to those who have voted upon personal property. Real property qualification for all is not the best qualification, but it has always been considered so, and my hon. friends do not want to reduce that. I hope the leader of the Government will yield to my arguments. But whether he is disposed to or not, I am disposed to try and get him to do so, without provoking him to refuse it. When I want to get anything, I want to deal generously, and I expect a generous response.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oil is better than vinegar.

Mr. GILLMOR. I always use it until vinegar is necessary, and when vinegar is necessary I can use it as well as any other man.

Brunswick stated that 1,000 or so would be disqualified in York county alone, he did not know what would be the provisions of this Bill, because they have been considerably modified in the way of lowering the franchise since we went into committee, and he does not know what other modifications may be made until the committee passes upon them. He stated also that he had not made a critical examination few years and value the whole county, to the best of their judgment. After that, every year the assessor makes up a list and revises it annually after the valuator, and I do not think the valuation will be much increased, even under a revising barrister. Now, I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that this clause will disfranchise a large number of people who live on the farm, who are the bone and sinew of the country, and whom we want to retain in the country, though I admit it will enfranchise a good many others. I refer to tenants. Tenants in houses who pay $2 a month will be enfranchised. But these are, comparatively speaking, a floating population, and do not live in the same house more than a year or two. Now, why enfranchise them while you disfranchise the honest yeoman of the country, who works the land and has buildings of his own? You may enfranchise a few Indians in New Brunswick-perhaps 40 or 50 in the county of York. In the county of Sunbury I do not know whether there will be half a dozen. It will enfranchise some householders, but I do not know of any other class, in the country districts.

Mr. FOSTER. In my own county I have in my mind's eye now those who live on real property, those who have farms so little that they can hardly call them farms, and which may not possibly be worth $100. It may be true that their farm and house are not worth more than $100, but it is equally true that no man can live and keep his family on a farm which, combined with the house, is not worth more than $100. I know there are persons of that description. They have a small house, in which their family lives, but they get their living from earnings in quite a different direction, and if their earnings do not come up to sufficient to meet the qualification required by this Bill, when finally passed, I shall be very much mistaken.

Mr. TROW. The system of valuation in New Brunswick seems to be preferable to that in Ontario-it being a system under which valuators go round and value property every three years. The assertion that hundreds of persons will be disfranchised under this clause is well worthy of the consideration of the Government. The qualification under the local Act of New Brunswick is $100, the same as in Ontario. I favor the reduction to $100.

Mr. MOFFAT. The hon. gentleman is in error in stating that valuators go round every three years. New Brunswick had legislation with respect to municipal corporations some nine years ago, and the law provides that a valuation should be made every five years, for the purpose of equalising the amount paid by each parish.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The changes made in this Bill have been secured through the Opposition standing up for the people and demanding their rights, and the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have realised the fact that they will have to answer for this Bill before their constituents, the qualification has been reduced from $400 to $300 in regard to income. I pointed out that, under the Bill as drawn, it would disfranchise hundreds in my own town. A great many of these will be enabled to vote on account of the change, but some will still be shut out. The people will recognise that they are indebted to the Opposition for having secured to them rights of which the Government and their supporters sought to deprive them. I do not know that the $150 qualification will apply with such force to Ontario as to some other Provinces; but this House has been informed that unless the amendment is adopted a large number of persons in New Brunswick will be dis-franchised. The Opposition maintain that the Government have no right to take away the right to vote from anyone. I support the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Oil and vinegar policy would do very well if people, seeking to preserve their rights and liberties. The I those gentlemen who come here and ask us to adopt pro-Mr. BURPER.

hon, member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) has called attention to the fact that he has obtained information from the local member that 804 persons at present qualified to vote will be disfranchised under this provision of the Bill. An hon. gentleman says he does not think that is the case. But no reason has been stated, and it is not asserted that he has taken the trouble to make enquiries as to the assessment between $100 and $150. And how many are entitled to vote on personal property who will be wholly disfranchised by this Bill? Has he taken the trouble to find whether the fact is really as represented by his colleague in the Local Legislature, that 804 free men, who are now entitled to exercise the electoral franchise, will be deprived of that privilege. Now, it is not a matter which we can regard with complacency. A man, if his house is on fire, does not sit down in the burning building to ascertain how the fire originated, or say that he does not know how it began, and he will not trouble himself about the matter. We owe a duty to our constituents. A serious responsibility rests upon us; we are put here as the guardians of the liberties of those who sent us here, and unless a man has committed an offence against the election law, or made himself liable to the penalties of the law, we have no right to disfranchise him without his consent. But here is a proposition to take from the people of the hon, gentleman's own county, and in all probability the people of other counties in his own Province, and in a large proportion over the entire Dominion, the right to vote, and the hon, gentleman proposes to treat the matter with perfect indifference. He says: I would like to see the franchise fixed at $100, but I am going to abide by the voice of the majority; I will stand by $150, which I do not like, because the majority are going to vote that way. The hon, gentleman's complacency reminds me of a story told in the annals of Pennsylvania, about a farmer's son who was lost in the winter time. The farmer was asked why he did not make an effort to find his son, and he replied that if his son found his way back to a neighbor's house he was all right; but if not, that the weather was so cold he was frozen to death, and he would not trouble himself about it. The hon. gentleman has taken the disfranchisement of this large number of the electors of his county with as much coolness as the Pennsylvania farmer did in that case. Then we had the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) appearing on the stage in a new character. The hon. gentleman comes forward and he says to the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I.: What business have you interfering in this domestic affair? This is a matter which concerns the Province of New Brunswick. In an early part of the discussion that hon, gentleman forgot that there were provincial lines at all; he wished them obliterated; this Dominion was a sort of political mosaic, the lines of which were too distinctly visible, and he wanted them erased, and this country made one grand unit. Now, he says: What business have you to interfere here in a provincial matter? We are not sitting here representing Canada as a unit, but we are here representing the different Provinces. I am here from the Province of New Brunswick, and why do you interfere with the affairs of that Province? The hon, gentleman's practice to-night, and his precept on a former evening, do not agree; his magniloquent views put forward a few evenings ago are altogether dissipated. He has made a new departure, or rather he has resiled back to the position he occupied when this Bill was introduced for discussion. One hon, gentleman said that he believed 1,000 names would be added to the roll in his county under this Bill. Great is the hon. gentleman's faith! It would, perhaps, be enough to save him at another election, if it were well founded. But what evidence has he given to show that it is well founded? Why, Sir, it is the duty of we were approaching some absolute monarch and asking hon. gentlemen on that side, if the law of compensation, so favors. But we are sitting here as representatives of the miscalled, applied in this case—it would be the duty of visions of this sort, to establish beyond controversy that that is the case. It was the duty of the First Minister, when he introduced this Bill, to have explained its precise effects, in the way of enfranchisement or disfranchisement in every Province. Has the committee any evidence of that sort? What evidence is there that the liberties of free men, of Englismen under an English system of parliamentary government, shall not be taken from them, when they have committed no offence, when they have exhibited public spirit, by exercising the franchise, and their ability likely to discharge their duty-I say upon what principle of law or morals are those people to be dis-franchised? Sir, these gentlemen ought not to come here with vague generalities in addressing the committee. They ought to be prepared with facts, as the hon. member for Sunbury has shown himself to be prepared with facts. What evidence have these gentlemen presented to show that the effects of this provision will not be what was stated by the hon. member for Sunbury. And if it is so, and hon, gentlemen could show that the effect of the law would be to put on a number equal to that taken off, so long as they could not show that it puts on precisely the same men they answer nothing. There may be good reasons for putting on some who are not on now, but what are the reasons for taking off those men who now have the franchise? We do not send our neighbors to the penitentiary who commit no crime; we do not deprive a man of his property without compensation, when it is needed for the purpose of the State, and upon what theory, then, do we, who are the servants of the people, to whom a great trust has been committed by those to whom the law has committed the question of deciding who shall represent the people of the whole country in Parliament—upon what ground do we exercise the right of taking from them a great privilege which they have not misused, an important trust which they have not violated? I say it is of the utmost consequence that these hon gentlemen should begin to understand that the right of voting is a most important right, something which ought to be valued, and that if we, representing the people of this country, do not show by our conduct that we place a high estimation on an elective franchise, how can we expect the people to do so? How can we suppose that they will loyally guard those free institutions which have been committed to us by the mother country? This is a serious matter; it is a matter we ought carefully to consider. It is not a question which involves the fate of the Opposition or the fate of the Government, merely; it is a question which involves the maintenance, on a broad and permanent basis, of representative government in the country; and that being so, every hon gentleman should throw aside his party inclinations for the time being, and should regard this as a matter of such consequence that he would no more think of taking from a man, who has not violated the law, the franchise he possesses, than he would of breaking into a neighbor's house and taking his property at midnight. Until we approach the question in this spirit we shall not be able properly to discharge our duty. The hon. First Minister, before he proposes to increase the qualification and disfranchise any class of the community, ought to show a sufficient cause, which he has not done. In Prince Edward Island and British Columbia there is no property qualification at all, and even with $100 he will disfranchise some; but in the Provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and New Brunswick, embracing 2,500,000 people, more than half the population of the whole Dominion, the qualification is now $100, and if he fixes it at $100, he will fix it as high as it is already for 2,500,000 people. Then, why disfranchise a considerable number of people? If the hon gentleman looks at the voters' lists in the Province of Ontario, he will find that a considerable number of persons who are entitled to vote at municipal elections are not entitled to vote for a large class of people who hold property valued at less than $150. Now, the burden of proof is on hon. gentlemen opposite, to show that these people are unfit to exercise the electoral franchise, or have abused it, before this right shall be taken away from them. The only justification for such a course is the paramount safety of the State—that the State itself is injured by the existing condition of affairs, which has not heretofore been shown.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not find fault with the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., for coming to the front, I congratulated him on doing so; but I was naturally jealous of the talent and ability of my hon. friends from New Brunswick. I hope my hon, friend will long live to represent his people and his party in the House, and if a time should come when he should not be able to get a seat in Prince Edward Island, I hope he will come to New Brunswick, and we shall do the best we can to get him a seat. The hon. member for Both-well is nothing if he is not certain. There is, in fact, no vague generality about him; everything is always per-fectly obvious and logically certain; he is not a man who would ever allow any subject to pass this House without giving his opinion upon it, and after he has given an opinion upon it, that is the last. But would my hon. friend, just for a moment, turn his eyes backward, and ask his friend behind him whether there was perfect certainty in the statement he made. The statement was that in the county of Queen's, N.B., 427 persons are on the present assessment roll for $100 or over, and less than $150. Will any hon, gentleman on that side rise and say that that is altogether out of the region of generality, and that it is an indisputable fact that that number will be disfranchised under this Bill? The Attorney-General of New Brunswick sent up-what statement? Did he send up the statement that 1,000 persons in the county of York would be disfranchised under this Bill, and will he stand sponsor for that?

Mr. BURPEE. 804 is the number I stated.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want any vague generalities, so I take the exact number, 804. Now, I say there is a vague generality on his own side of the House, when the hon. member for Charlotte, the hon. member for Sunbury and the hon. member for Queen's get up and make a statement as to how many would be disfranchised under this clause. I could spend more time in talking about my friend from Bothwell, but it is not worth while. He is the kind of a man, according to his own statement, that if his house was on fire he would not sit down and try to settle how it took fire. He has proved himself to be such a man as that, and, with such men, how can one argue?

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). When the country comes to consider whether hon gentlemen opposite have been dealing with vinegar or molasses, I think they will decide that it is molasses, or they would not have stuck to the subject so long. I have no doubt that the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., was sent to him, and made by him in good faith; yet, when you look at the figures, and at the county of Queen's, as it is, it appears to me to be perfectly irreconcilable with the facts. I am not prepared to deny absolutely the statement he has made, because I have not seen the list; but in that county there is an acreage of 625,517 of granted lands, which are owned by somebody. They cannot be owned by the female portion, and must be held by the male portion of that community. Now, we find by the census of 1882 that there were 2,373 houses, 263 warehouses and 3,516 barns and stables in that county, making 6,152 buildings for 2,000 voters, of whom he said about 500 would be disfranchised. Now let us take those figures to be correct: 2,000 electors in the county of Queen's, and an acreage of 625,000 acres in that county. We know that in Queen's there is no large city, where one man may members of the House of Commons, showing that there are lown a number of buildings, which he lets out; we know there is not even a town in the county, but that it is purely a country place, a farming community entirely. How, then, can that 625,000 acres held by farmers be divided among that number of electors without giving each holding a greater value than $150? And mind you, they must be all electors; because, unlike the law in Ontario, the law there allows non-residents to vote, so that they are on the electors' list. How is it possible that these farmers can have such small holdings, taking these figures as correct; that so many of the holdings would be worth only between $100 and $150. That is entirely incomprehensible. According to the census returns of 1882 there are 2,294 owners, and the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee), the neighboring county, will agree with me that the holdings are pretty well divided. No doubt some will hold more largely than others, but not to that great extent that he will find 400 odd proprietors out of 2,000 who will hold such small pieces of land that there holdings will be only worth $100. If it be true that there are 400 and some odd people on the assessment roll or voters' lists, assessed at between $100 and $150, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that they are there illegally, that the electoral law of New Brunswick does not authorise them to be there, and that they are put there simply for the purpose of having votes, against the law. That may be a wrong conclusion, but I cannot conceive that there are actually bond fide owners of real estate in that county to that extent, whose properties are now worth but that low amount.

Mr. DAVIES. Do you draw the same conclusion about York?

Mr. LANDRY. York is over twice as large, and I would draw the same conclusion there. I would draw the conclusion that in any county where there is such a large proportion of electors rated upon property valued between $100 and $150, they are not properly on the list. If they are not this Bill will do them no injury. I cannot deny the statement that has been made, because I have not seen the lists; but I mention these facts to show how highly incredible it is that 6,152 buildings, divided between 2,000 electors, an average of three buildings each taken in connection with the acreage, should in so many cases be so very small as not to be worth more than $150. In a large city, where one holder might have a large number of buildings, this possibly might apply; but in a farming community, where property is pretty evenly divided, this statement is altogether incredible.

Mr. BURPEE. The hon. gentleman has referred to me as knowing something about Queen's county. I do. I did business there for several years; I hold property myself in that county, farms to the amount of $8,000 or $10,000, and know as much about it, almost, as I do about the county of Sunbury, and I believe every word of the statement. I think it is reflecting unfairly on some of the officers in Queen's county to come to the conclusion the hon. gentleman has come to, in his generality of reasoning. I know the county treasurer very well, Mr. Davitt; he has represented that county in the Local Legislature; he is a gentleman who is perfectly reliable; he knows about as much of Queen's county as any man in it, and he has made the statement in good faith, and I believe it. From what knowledge I have of Queen's, I have no reason to dispute it.

Mr. TEMPLE. In answer to a question of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as to how I came to the conclusion that these men could not enjoy the franchise, I would say that there is not a farmer in the county of York whom I do not know, and I believe, if their property is put down at $100, it is rated at below its value. I have been sheriff for the county for nineteen years, and know something about the assessment roll. I have held a great many elections while I was sheriff, and the rolls all went through my Mr. Landey (Kent).

hands; and if the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knew as much about Ontario as I do about York, he would not talk so much in the House.

Mr. RYKERT. We can only speak of our counties, and I will give the House to understand exactly how this Bill affects the county I have the honor to represent. In Merriton village there are no persons assessed under $200; in the town of Niagara there are none under $200; in the village of Beamsville there are none under $200; in Port Dalhousie there are none under $200; in Niagara township there are only eight under $200; in Louth there are seven under $200; in Clenhie there are ten under $200; or, altogether, there are fifty in the county of Lincoln who are assessed under $200; and those, if assessed at the actual value, would be properly assessed at $200. All those persons live in houses, and it must be a God-forsaken house indeed, that is not worth $200, with the lot it is built or. This Bill, instead of doing injury to Ontario, will do a great deal of good, because it will enable persons already assessed for $100 on property to appear before the revising barrister and have their property assessed at $150. The best test to take is one's own county, and in the whole county of Lincoln, in which there are 7,000 voters, only fifty will be disfranchised.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) made the mistake of confusing certain conclusions he drew from facts he found in the census returns with the actual facts as they exist, and finding they differred, he says: So much the worse for the facts. The question may not be of importance to the hon. member for Lincoln, taking his figures as correct, but I would suggest this to the First Minister: The impression is sought to be conveyed by a number of hon. gentlemen on that side that there is no actual wish to disfranchise any portion of the community. If that is true, and if, as a matter of fact, this does disfranchise a certain portion of the voters in the Maritime Provinces, and as the question whether the qualification be $100 or $150 is purely arbitrary and does not involve any principle, why refuse to put it down to $100? It has been shown that possibly harm may be done by keeping the qualification at $150. But it is clear that no one will be disfranchised by reducing it to $100.

Mr. WATSON. I hope this will be changed to $100, for several reasons. One of the principal reasons is, that $100 is the qualification of an elector in Manitoba. If it is necessary to have a different franchise for the election of members to this House, still it should be made, as near as possible, the same as the local franchises, as otherwise it will create confusion in making out voters' lists. I have not heard any hon, gentleman opposite give any reason why the qualification should be raised to $150. The hon, member for King's, N.B., stated that the assessors in back districts valued the properties lower because they were removed from a market. I do not think that property which is situated ten or fifteen miles from a market is of equal value with that which is close to a market. In Manitoba, valuators go around every five years to equalise the assessments for judicial purposes, and I do not think any injustice would be done or any interference with the franchise would take place if it were left in their hands. As my hon, friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said, in most of the Provinces people have a vote on property worth $100 now, and no reason has been given for raising it to $150. In Manitoba it may disfranchise many electors, particularly in small villages. If the First Minister would reduce this to $100, I have no doubt his followers will be as willing to accept that as to accept $150. I do not think any hop. member should have such views as were expressed by the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple), who stated that, though he thought $100 was right, if the First Minister said

$150, he would agree to it. I think this change ought to be

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the arguments which have adduced are strongly in favor of the proposed reduction. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), showed that he expected that the voters who, it was said, would be disfranchised, would be looked after by the revising barrister. That is the very thing we want to avoid. In England every householder has a vote, and the man who owns property worth 40 shillings a year is also entitled to vote. Though some hon, gentlemen may object to adopting the provincial franchises, I think it would be well to come as near to them as possible in some Provinces. In Ontario, the largest Province in the Dominion, $100 is the qualification, and no harm would result from adopting the same amount here. A number of people will have the vote as tenants, who, if they were owners of the same property, would not have it. It is a grievance, that any man who is sent here, partly by the votes of these people, should support a proposition to disfranchise them. When once a man has been given the right to vote it is imprudent to deprive him of that right. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) said this Act would positively disfranchise fifty persons in his constitency now having votes, and he stated the other night that under the Mowat Act some 267 persons would be deprived of votes. I claim that under the Mowat Act no one will be deprived of the tranchise who now has it, although some may be prevented from duplicating their votes. But the hon. member for Lincoln frankly admits that there are fifty in his constituency who will be absolutely disfranchised by this Act, as being assessed below $200.

Mr. HESSON. My hon. friend from York has been censured by almost every speaker on the other side of the House to-night, because he chooses to follow his own views, and not be dictated to by hon. gentlemen opposite. He is responsible to his constituency, and not to hon. gentlemen opposite. One hon. gentleman opposite, while speaking to-night, referred eight or nine times to the Province of Ontario. Now, that hon, gentleman represents only one constituency in the Province of Ontario, and I think it is quite sufficient for him to speak for his own constituents, and not for the whole Province. Hon. gentlemen on this side have quietly listened to the remarks of Opposition speakers, to see if there was anything in their arguments to induce us to ask the First Minister to change that clause, but we have not seen any such arguments. The hon gentleman who has just taken his seat has challenged us to appear before the voters that we are disfranchising by our Act here. The gentle-men who have sent us to this House will pass upon our conduct in disfranchising any of the actual voters. Now, speaking for my own constituency, I have lived for forty-two years or upwards in the city situated in the county which I have the honor to represent, and I do not know a single individual—and I profess to know them all—who will be disfranchised by this Bill—not one. I speak of what I know, and I say, with the utmost confidence, that we will have a largely increased number of voters who have never voted before.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear." He himself had to admit that in the Province of Ontario he did not feel it was going to affect the representation to a very large extent, whether the qualification remained at $200 or $150.

Mr. MILLS. I never said so.

Mr. HESSON. I think my hon. friend is straightforward enough to admit, in his cooler moments, at all events, that that in my constituency these small holdings run from $200 and $275 upwards, $200 being the lowest value. Therefore, I think my hon. friend has no right to speak for the whole Province in the way he has done. I consider the Bill is a liberal one. The hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said that they would take the credit of having induced, or having compelled, the Government-not by pouring oil on the troubled waters, not by talking in a molasses style—but compel the Government to make these changes in obedience to their arguments. Now, I think hon. gentlemen in this House heard from the leader of the Government long ago that he proposed, when he reached certain clauses, especially those where the qualification was at issue—he would be prepared to make certain changes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When did he say that?

Mr. HESSON. Several days ago, before we reached this clause; the hon. gentleman knew it, but he will go to the country and claim his party are entitled to all the credit for having forced the Government to change their views upon this Bill.

Mr. PATERSON. I may be mistaken; I cannot speak positively; but I do not recollect that the First Minister, at any time during this debate, stated that he intended, when he reached this clause, to make a reduction in the figures. I think we never had any intimation of it. If the hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) thinks I am wrong, let him produce the statement from the Hansard.

Mr. MULOCK. I find that in most cases the qualification required throughout the whole Dominion is as follows: In two Provinces manhood suffrage prevails. Therefore, in two Provinces the qualification for this class of voters is less than $100. In two other Provinces the qualification required is over $100; and in three Provinces the qualification is $100. Therefore, by adopting the $100 proposition, we adopt a fair mean between existing qualifications. I think it may be assumed that the average public opinion of the whole Dominion is in favor of adopting $100 as the qualification for this class of voters. The hon, member for York (Mr. Temple) says he is in favor of the motion, and yet he is going to oppose it. The hon, gentleman declares in effect that his opinion is his own, but his vote belongs to someone else. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) objected to the style of criticism indulged in by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), stating that he was indulging in vague generalities. I should like to know if there is any hon. gentleman whose style of debate is more open to that criticism than that of the hon. member for King's. The hon. member for North Perth cut in and stated the case of his own county; and that hon, gentleman took the narrow line, that no member has a right to speak of any section of the Dominion except that which he specially represents.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting me. I did not make that statement. I said no hon. member had a right to speak for the whole Province of Ontario, though an hon, member might fairly speak of his own county.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad to have such a witness, and I will add nothing to his remarks. It is gratifying to find there are members who take a more liberal view of the question than do those members representing special interests. The hon, member for Prince has taken the same narrow view as his friend from York, and he also declares he is in favor of the motion, and yet will vote against it. He favors it because he knows his constituents would be in favor of it. Every member who represents a Province in he cannot, from memory, point to a single constituent of his own, on a house or lot worth $200, and which a family could possibly live in, who will be disfranchised. I know on the subject of the franchise. If any such member votes against this motion he votes against his own Province. No valid arguments have been presented against the motion, and there is, therefore, no reason why it should not be adopted, as it is a proper motion and one to lower the franchise. The hon, member for King's criticised the action of the hon, member for Queen's, whom he said he would be glad to welcome to public life in New Brunswick. I would advise the hon, member for King's to first consult his own constituents. The hon, gentleman must know that the effect of adopting the clause, as originally drawn, would be to disfranchise some of those voters who sent him here, and I give it as my opinion that we have no authority to vote away the franchise from any one. The hon. gentleman took the ground that because under this Bill the franchise would be given to some we had the right to take it away from others. But we have no right to rob Peter to pay Paul. It would be a most extraordinary thing if a majority should be found to support this clause, as drawn, without a single argument having been advanced in favor of it.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived.

Mr. BURPEE moved the following amendment:-

After the word "dollar," in the third line of the third sub-section, insert: Or personal property of the actual value of $400, or personal and real property, together, of the actual value of $400.

He said: I have taken the wording from the New Brunswick Act. If such an amendment is not adopted the Bill will disfranchise a large class of persons, principally unmarried men owning personal property. Some of them are the sons of small farmers, who sometimes work in the woods, sometimes in vessels, but many of them have personal property of one kind or other, amounting to $400.

Mr. GILLMOR. We have had a personal property qualification for many years in New Brunswick, and if this clause passes in its present shape it will disqualify many worthy citizens—energetic young men, who have invested in vessel property, or lumbering operations, who are now voting on a personal property qualification.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman has adopted a personal property qualification with regard to the fishermen, and I cannot see why the holder of personal property should not have a vote. The income franchise clause would only allow a vote for an income of $300, which, at 6 per cent., would represent $5,000 worth of personal property; whereas, you give a vote to the proprietor of real property amounting to $150, or a tenant at $2 a month. If personal property is to be taken as the evidence of thrift or intelligence, it seems to me that the ownership of a certain amount of personal property would be as good a test as any for the franchise. There are many men earning moderate wages, but who are not earning sufficient to entitle them to vote as wage-earners, but if they have saved sufficient from their earnings to have a deposit in the bank, or in their own possession, amounting to $400, they should have a vote. Young unmarried men of this class would not come in as householders, and you would be encouraging, in practice, the habit of economy by adopting this principle to a certain extent, which you do not do in any other way. Both in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick persons vote on this basis, and a large number who are now entitled to vote would be disfranchised if the hon. gentleman insists on excluding personal property. I hope he will see his way to the adoption of the amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I said yesterday, with every desire to meet the wishes of the House, I have ascertained beyond a doubt that even if I were in favor of it I could not carry this resolution in this House.

Amendment (Mr. Burpee) negatived.

On sub-section 4, section 4,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The language of this paragraph is nearly identical with that of the similar parameters what the rent will be. What are the facts? Yesterday the graph respecting tenants in cities and towns. After having heard the debate on the other resolution, I asked it to be postponed, that it might be considered. On full reflection, I find that I cannot materially alter it. I have altered it, however, in one respect, in order to allow wages to be included as rental, by inserting the words "or in money's worth." It has been pressed upon me, and I think it is a reasonable argument, that if a person is under a rental, say of $20 for a year, he ought to pay the whole of his rent to be qualified; otherwise, he would be merely under a promise to pay, which would leave room for all kinds of fraud. But, for instance, it has been said to me: A person leases a mill for $1,000 a year, and if he happens to be unable, in a bad year, to pay the whole of his rent, he would have no vote. So I provide, in this clause, that he must have at least paid $20 of his last year's rent, so as to put him on the same footing as a person whose whole rent is $20.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will perhaps tell us how he expects to meet the inconvenience that would arise from the fact that the revising officer will find the assessment roll no longer a guide for a very large percentage of the votes in each constituency. In almost every town and village a large proportion of those entitled to have their names on the voters' list are tenants. The assessment roll has always furnished an easy means of ascertaining who these people are, because the valuation of the property enables those making up the voters' list to transfer the names from the assessment roll to the voters' list. But under this clause it will be necessary to get the names from some other source. Therefore, I think it would be only fair to the committee, before we proceed further, that the hon. gentleman should explain in what way he intends to meet that inconvenience, because otherwise every tenant would be obliged to appear before the revising officer in order to have his name put on the list. It could not be, under this provision, on the voters' list, in the first instance, because the hon, gentleman's intention is that the revising officer shall make up the list from the assessment roll. Now, as the assessment rolls offers no information, so far as the tenants are concerned, and the tenants would necessarily be left off the voters' list in the first instance, it would be when the list was revised that the tenant would vote on it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The assessment roll, of course, will be the prima facie evidence, so far as it goes. If there are any parties who, under this Bill, have any claim as tenants and are not on the assessment roll, they will make application in the ordinary way, by letter, to the revising officer, to be put on the roll. In the Ontario assessment roll there are certain parties marked as tenants, who are assessed as tenants to a certain amount, and the revising officer will at once see that the value of the property gives them a right to be put on the list.

Mr. MILLS. The assessment roll cannot furnish primate facie evidence in the case of a tenant. Supposing a man is assessed for a house and lot valued at $300, how is the revising officer to know the amount of rent that is paid? There may be little or no rent charged.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The value of the property will show it.

Mr. MILLS. No; because if there is such relation between the rental of property and value, the hon. gentleman's argument in favor of taking the rental is gone altogether. He argued, yesterday, there was no such relation.

Mr. WILSON. There is a great deal of force in what the hon, member for Bothwell has said. In fact, the First Minister will find a great deal of difficulty getting this class of voters placed on the voters' list. He says the value of the property will enable the revising barrister to ascertain what the rent will be. What are the facts? Yesterday the

First Minister said that $2 a month rental was the proper rental on a valuation of $300, or about 8 per cent.; but in this clause we find the hon, gentleman has reduced the property valuation in the country to $150, or one half, and yet he keeps the rental the same as in the city. How can he claim, then, that the rental will be easily ascertained by the valuation? The First Minister will find he is disfranchising a large number of people. Why should he keep the tenancy clause at $2 a month or $20 a year in a township, when he reduces the property qualification one half. Is it not reasonable that he should equally reduce the rental qualification. He further provides that in the country the rental may be paid either in money or in kind, but in the villages he will not allow that option. Everyone knows that in mnny villages there are large gardeners, who rent certain quantities of land and return a certain portion of the produce to the owner as rent. Why should he not allow them to have a vote? Why should they be debarred because they pay rent in kind? The hon. gentleman thought yesterday it was an outrageous thing that a man should obtain 15 or 20 per cent. of the value of his holding as rent; yet here, according to his own arrangement, tenants in townships will be paying nearly 14 per cent., because while the value of the property qualification is reduced to $150 that of the rental is kept up to $2 a month. I would advise him to reconsider this clause thoroughly. I know of a large number who are occupying small houses for which they are paying $1.50 per month, which would be $18 a year. They will be deprived of the vote. It you carry the principle to the rural sections, and the value is only half what it is in towns, they should have the vote if they pay $1 a month, or $12 a year.

Mr. TAYLOR. So far as I know of the assessment law of Ontario, the tenant has to be placed on the assessment roll with the owner. The assessment roll is to be taken as the basis, and it is the duty of the assessor to couple the tenant's name with that of the owner. The name must, therefore, go on the assessment roll, and that is taken as the prima facue evidence. The revising officer sees at once the value of the property the tenant occupies. If it amounts to $150 he is placed on the roll; if not, he is not placed on the roll unless he shows to the returning officer that he is paying $2 a month.

Mr. CASEY. This clause does not say that a tenant shall have a vote where the property is worth $150, but that he shall vote if he pays a rental of $2 a month.

Mr. TAYLOR. It says that shall be prima facie evidence.

Mr. CASEY. There are cases in which it cannot be primá facie evidence, and that is one in which it will not be primá facie or secunda facie. We might find land assessed for $200 or $300 let out simply for the taxes or for keeping up the fences. I support the contention of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), that if there is to be some well-understood ratio between the value of the property and the rental required to qualify, the ratio should be uniform, in the country as well as in the cities and towns. My hon. friend who spoke last has pointed out that property worth less than $150 might be rented for enough to qualify the tenant. Thus the tenant would have the vote while the freeholder would be deprived of it.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). We were told that the qualification was to rest primarily on the assessment roll, but the rental is not shown on that roll. The hon, gentleman admitted the possibility of tenants being placed on the voters' list when the owner was not. Another part to which there is a strong objection is that allowing non-resident tenants the right to vote.

Mr. MULOCK. No; it says "possession."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it the intention of the First Minister that a tenant who leaves the electoral district shall have the vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He must be a tenant for at least one year and pay a certain rental. He can change within the muncipality, so that the occupation is continuous.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it the intention of the First Minister that the non-resident tenant should vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He can vote now if he is assessed. A man may be in possession of half a dozen places in the same town, working them all, and yet not in occupation of more than one.

Mr. MILLS. The assessment is not made every year. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The principle is the same. It is not necessaay to be an actual occupant at all.

Mr. MILLS. Under this, the tenant who, after the expiration of his tenancy, went to another municipality, would have the right to vote.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I think there is a wider view to be taken of this clause than has been shown yet. I see no other means than those provided in the requirement to have the rent paid, to prevent any amount of fraud being practised under this clause. It is possible for a man who is living adjacent to a number of constituencies to have himself fraudulently assessed in each one of them. It is quite true this clause requires that he shall have paid his rent; but if that is all the protection we have, it is possible for him to get a receipt which may be fraudulent.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not likely the fraud to which the hon, gentleman alludes will be perpetrated to the extent he anticipates, because the man must have paid a year's rent, at least, or a sum equal to $20 a year.

Mr. CAMERON. I am contemplating the possibility of collusion between himself and his landlord, in order to get his receipt; and we are really admitting, in the widest way, the possibility of a number of faggot votes being placed on the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The simple remedy is, that the party can be sworn whether he is paying rent or not.

Mr. CAMERON. That ought not to be our only resource. We know it is disagreeable for men to be sworn, and disagreeable for scrutineers to ask others to be sworn. I have no doubt the First Minister intends that the man in occupancy must be so in good faith, in order to have a right to vote, and if that be so, let it be so stated in the Act. Now, I have a preference for the absolute value of property as being that on which the right to vote as a tenant should be obtained. I beg to move, in amendment to the amendment, that the following be substituted for sub-section 4 of section 4:

Every male person entered as a tenant on the last revised assessment roll in any electoral district in Canada, other than cities and towns in which he tenders his vote, and who is residing at the time he tenders his vote within the municipality, and who is rated for real property on the last revised assessmet roll of said municipality, of the actual value of not less than $100, and has resided there continuously for at least twelve months next preceding the election at which he votes.

I believe this is a much simpler qualification than that which is required in the Bill, and this amendment will simplify the matter very much. The hon, member for Lincoln has stated that in his constituency there were only fifty names appearing on the roll as being assessed for less than $200, and over $100. I have been looking through the voters' list in the rural municipalities of the constituency I have the honor to represent, and I find there are seventy exactly, in five municipalities.

Mr. RYKERT. That is the assessed value, not the actual value.

Mr. CAMERON. Of course it is the assessed value, and we have made the assessed value prima facie evidence. It lies with the man who takes exception to that assessed value to appeal to the revising officer; consequently, the revising officer, unless there are other facts placed before him, has to accept that and treat it as the basis. Now, I recollect where a property is assessed for $100 only, yet I know the individual to be very well qualified to vote. He is a storekeeper, and keeps a post office at a cross road, and does a fair little business, but nothing pretentious. Now, I think that man certainly entitled to vote on the score of intelligence, but last year he was only assessed at $100. In another instance I found on the list the name of a gentleman of intelligence, and a strong supporter of the First Minister, who was assessed for $100, and he occupied almost a similar position, being in business at the cross

Mr. FLEMING. I desire to offer a practical suggestion. I suggest that this sub-section be amended so that a person holding a property of the value of $150 or a lease of the necessary rental shall be on the list. The object is that any person who is on the assessment roll as a tenant of a property worth $150 shall be placed on the voters' list, or if he is paying the necessary amount of rental. In that way the revising officer would he enabled to obtain from the assessment roll the name of the owner and the name of the tenant, bracketed, and the value of the property fixed at $150 or exceeding that amount. He would thus obtain such information as would enable him at once to know all tenants assessed for property of that value, and it would reduce very considerably the number of those who would have to make application. It is not desirable that persons coming under this class of voters should be put to the trouble and annoyance of going before the revising barristers. It is not right that a man's right to the franchise should be dependent upon the vigilance of the party organisers in the different electoral districts.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope it will not be considered that I am showing disrespect to the hon, gentleman in not answering at length his arguments, because the matter was discussed at great length yesterday, and the arguments, which were pressed with ability, were not sufficient to induce me to alter the clause in the direction suggested. I do not think there will be any trouble about the matter; names will be entered on the assessment roll, and the practical result will be that the revising officer will put on the list every man who is a tenant, and then it will be for the parties to object. One hon gentleman to night spoke against faggot voting, and the hon. member for Bothwell spoke against it last night. Well, it is a new thing for a Liberal party to object to faggot woting, for Bright and Cobden worked for years to establish faggot voting-that is, that one area of property should be sub-divided into smaller portions, so that thereby the people might fight the landed aristocracy. If the hon, gentleman will read "Morley's Life of Cobden" he will find that he labored earnestly all his life for that purpose, and now both parties at this moment are forming associations for the purpose of making faggot votes and breaking up properties into small portions, to give votes to the working classes. That is what they call fagget votes.

Mr. CASEY. What the hon, gentleman says shows distinctly the evils of this principle. Faggot votes are, to all intents and purposes, bogus votes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. Sometimes they sell these properties for a certain value, and they reduce the properties to such a size that the purchase money will cover a certain number of votes at a certain figure.

Mr. CASEY. Those are bona fide votes, which is not Mr. CAMBRON (Middlesex).

object to in this Bill is, that it offers facilities for creating suppositions tenancies, merely for the purpose of creating votes. If people buy land bond fide for the purpose of giving votes, that is all right, but to give the appearance of tenancy where there is none is a very different thing, and it should not be allowed on the grounds of public policy. The proposal which is now made is to make the tenancy of property worth $150 primá facie evidence of the rental, which is not provided in the Bill. Unless some such change is made the revising officer will not be justified in placing any tenant on the voters' list until he has outside evidence of the amount of the rent, as he has no right to place the people on the roll and then trust to appeals being made to put matters right, as neither the assessment roll nor the voters' list give them any information as to rental. If he chooses to go against the letter and spirit of the law. and put every tenant on the roll, he throws on outsiders his own duty of ascertaining and proving the matter, thereby causing expense, trouble and loss of time to those outsiders. All we ask is that the rolls should be some primá fiacie evidence of the tenancy. The possessor of a lot of waste land may sub-divide it into very small lots, qualify a number of people at a rental of $20 a year, give them a receipt, and the whole affair would be regulated without costing him a cent; and unless the attention of the opposite party has been called to the matter, the fraud will be put through without anybody being put to the proof. A man might qualify 200 voters on an acre of land in this way. It would be unparliamentary to say that the Bill was intended for such a purpose, but if that were the intention it could not be better arranged.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I would like to draw the attention of the First Minister to the position in which this clause would place tenants in some cases. I refer to the voters' list of the only village in my riding, a village in which there are about 200 voters. I find that out of these 200 there are 20 non-residents, 18 of whom are owners and 2 tenants. The balance are in the proportion of about two proprietors to one tenant, being 59 tenants to 130 proprietors, including the non-residents. The hon. First Minister says he assumes that the revising officer, in making up his list, will place all tenants on the voters' list who are on the assessment roll for the requisite qualification; but that is leaving a wide range of option to the revising officer. He may take a strict view of the working of the law, which will have the effect of excluding tenants altogether, because in villages a great many occupy houses the valuation of which will not be much above the qualification, if fixed by the assessed value, and I would suggest to the First Minister that he should consider whether it would not be desirable to make it an instruction to the revising officer to place on the first list all the tenants who are on the assessment roll for the requisite qualification as respects value. In my experience, unless there is the excitement of an election on hand, people are ordinarily careless in seeing that their names are on the voters' list; and if the large proportion of tenants have to trust to the revising officer to put them on, or see that they are put on, by giving previous notice, the practical result will be that unless the leading political friends of both sides pay attention to this matter a great many will be left off. I think it is undesirable to put difficulties in the way of a man having the right to vote, getting his name placed on the list without his having to exert himself to do so, simply because he is not a proprietor of property. I have not much sympathy with the statements made against the assessors' values, and the slight which has been cast upon their oaths. When you come to prove the right of people to be placed on the voters' list, in a great many cases I think you will have to take the oaths of men without any better social standing than the assessors, and what we generally understand by faggot votes. What I with quite as much inducement to bias. I speak freely, without regard to party, when I say that some of us who have gone through a lengthened municipal experience can call to mind, especially in times when there has been strong political feeling abroad, on the eve of an election, a good many enthusiastic supporters of both sides who were inclined to put a pretty high value on the property of their friends. I merely rose to state that in this one village in my own riding, by the present voters' list, actually one-third of all the voters are tenants; and I think it is worthy of the hon. gentleman's consideration, if he declines to accept the alternative proposition of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming), to provide that all those tenants shall go on the first making up of the voters' list who can show, by the assessment roll, that they occupy property which would qualify them if they were proprietors.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, member for East Lambton (Mr. Fairbank) yesterday stated that 20 per cent of his constituents are actually tenants. Of course, in towns and cities the tenant class would be very much larger. The hon. gentleman proposes to confer the elective franchise on those who have an income of a certain sum, who have not hitherto had their names on the assessment roll, and who will not, so far as I know, have their names on the assessment roll hereafter, except, perhaps, in the Province of Ontario. If you put the number of tenants as at one-fifth of the whole population, which I think would be a very low percentage, taking the town and city population along with the rural population, of the tenants whose names would be on the assessment roll as tenants, with reference to the value on the property, the revising officer would be unable to put nearly one third or one fourth of the population on the list, without some evidence in addition to what ho would be able to obtain from the assessment roll. I think the proposition made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) is better than that of the hon. gentleman. But I think the proposition of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Cameron) is better than either. There is no doubt that if the hon. gentleman adheres to the rule of rental he would get rid of the difficulty of proving all the tenants, by adopting the rule suggested by the hon. member for Peel, because the assessment roll would furnish a guide for putting on all those assessed above $150, leaving only the very small class who would be assessed under that amount. But it seems to me that it would have been more satisfactory, generally, to have adopted the rule of $100 assessed value, so as to make the assessment roll, as far as possible, conclusive in the preparation of the voters' list. No doubt the hon, gentleman has had far more experience than any of us with regard to parliamentary management, but I fancy that his attention to the preparation of voters' lists has not been as extensive as that of some hon, gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I am satisfied that if he knew the difficulties that will grow out of the proposition he has submitted, he would hardly be disposed to persistently adhere to it. One of the great difficulties we have is to induce voters to interest themselves sufficiently to see that their names are put on the list, unless when an election is at hand. In my own constituency, where an assessor had improperly put 40 or 50 names on the list and left out 50 or 60, there was no difficulty in getting struck off those who were improperly put on; but there was much difficulty in getting those who had been left out to appear before the judge and have their names inserted. If the revising officer has to take the assessment roll for the rental, he will say: Here is a property worth $1,000 that certainly will pay more than $20 a year. But there is no legal evidence to justify his putting the name of the tenant of such property on the voters' list. If the value of the property were made a test for the tenant there would be no difficulty. If we look at the intrinsic merits of the ques-should be taken instead of the value of the property, we will find it difficult to understand why the rental should be taken in the case of a tenant when the equivalent for rental, the amount for use and profit, is not taken in the case of an occupant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When we come to the clause as to the instructions to be given to the revising officer, we will see if we cannot make it so as to meet, to some extent the views of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). This clause, if persisted in, will eventually bring about the same corrupt practices that created such a scandal in the Midlothian elections, in which the Buccleugh estates were made of service by creating any number of faggot votes in the constituency. Now is the time to anticipate such tendency and avoid it. Years ago we had a qualification for electors similar to the present, but it was abolished in 1868, as the hon member for Lincoln knows.

Mr. ABBOTT. I understood my hon, friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to say that Ontario was the only Province in which the assessment roll made mention of the tenant.

Mr. MILLS. No; I did not say that. I referred to the wage-earners.

Mr. ABBOTT. Because, in the Province of Quebec there would be no necessity whatever for the revising officer to make any valuation in regard to the tenant, inasmuch as the tenants and the amount of rental they pay are mentioned in the valuation rolls.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to call the attention of the First Minister again to a matter of which I spoke when we were on the interpretation clause. In my constituency five men voted who lived in another riding. At the election three of them were sworn, and took the oaths and voted, and two were not sworn. It was known that they were made tenants only to give them a vote.

Mr. RYKERT. Why did you not get them struck off?

Mr. McMULLEN. We did not notice anything until just before the election, but the next year we got them struck off. There will be a great deal of fraud of that kind, and bogus votes, if the clause is left as it is now. The father may rent ten acres from the son, and the son may rent ten acres from the father, and each of them will be able to vote on the other's property. The First Minister also stated that he was going to provide that if a man whose rental was $1,000, had paid $20 of the amount, he should be entitled to vote. The landlord, however, might, for political reasons, refuse to receive anything less than the full rent, and in that case the tenant would be deprived of his vote. I would suggest that a tender of the amount should be sufficient. In regard to the bogus votes to which I have referred, some provision should be made. I feel sincerely honest in this matter, and hope something will be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That kind of fraud will be practised under any system. The hon, gentleman says that some improper names were put on the assessment roll, and the next year he got them struck off. That was not under this Bill. No one can provide against the infinity of ingenious modes of getting votes by improper means, but this clause does not offer any greater facility than the present law in Ontario.

Mr. McMULLEN. If a tenant were obliged to be an actual resident on the property it would prevent all that. A tenant may go to the revising officer and produce his lease and claim the right to be put on the list, and no doubt the revising officer will put him on.

property were made a test for the tenant there would be Mr. CASEY. The Ontario law provides a remedy against no difficulty. If we look at the intrinsic merits of the question, to which the hon. gentleman referred, that the rental In Ontario, when a lease is produced as evidence of a tenancy, the tenant and the lessor must be prepared to swear that it is a bond fide lease, and not one simply for the purpose of getting the lessee put on the voters' list. That has prevented many cases of fraud. I notice that in the next clause the hon gentleman has introduced the words "is a bond fide occupant." I propose, when these amendments are disposed of, to move that the same words shall be inserted in this clause, to provide that the person shall be a bond fide tenant. I think the requirement of occupancy would be a very fair one, too, in this clause, because a person does not bond fide rent a small piece of land like this, and pay $20 for it, for any other purpose except to live on it, as a rule. The right hon gentleman has spoken of the organised attempts to create faggot votes in the old country, as if it was a legitimate part of party practice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CASEY. He said both parties were organised for that purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But I neither expressed approbation or disapprobation.

Mr. CASEY. But he quoted it as a precedent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I expressed surprise that the Liberal gentlemen opposite should take such a different view of these matters from the Liberal party in England.

Mr. CASEY. He said that both English parties are now organised for this purpose. If we are going to have the manufacture of faggot votes in Canada, it is well we should know it at once. That is the suggestion contained by the hon. gentleman's remarks. Of course, it will not be illegal under this Act, if it is put in force. The clause seems meant to make faggot votes legal. I think the hon. gentleman ought to explain why it is that in the case of a tenant alone he takes no account of the value of the land, but merely of the rental. He says the requirement for the payment of rent is not a safeguard. We have known many elections where votes were considered cheap at a higher price than even $20, and $20 is all that is required in this case to qualify a voter. The hon. gentleman ought to explain this inconsistency.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I explained it, as fully as I could, last night.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see how this provision is going to be worked. The revising officer, the Premier says, takes the assessment list, and there he finds the names of the tenants, but there is nothing on that paper to show him how much rental the tenant pays, and unless the tenant pays a rental equal in amount to the lowest amount provided by this section, he has no vote. The Premier says the presumption may be drawn, from the assessment list and from the property that is so rented, that the tenant is paying enough to qualify him under this clause; but that is all a matter of guess work, and this is not a manner in which the revising officer should proceed. Under the present system the assessor is sworn to make up the list, setting forth, to the best of his knowledge, the names of the persons entitled to be on that list, the property they occupy, and its value. You then have got something that is of evidence. If the present clause furrishes the best practicable test it is a poor one, and it shows that the scheme itself is an impracticable one. The whole matter is going to be thrown into confusion. How is the question of the amount of rental to be settled? Who will be able to know what is the bargain between landlord and tenant? This provision appears to further strengthen the hands of the landlords, and that is unnecessary, as regards the Province of Ontario. It is to be regretted that this subject, which was postponed from yesterday, has not yet Mr. CASEY.

is going to open the door to all sorts of unsatisfactory results, and proves that it is an unworkable scheme that is offered.

Amendment (Mr. Cameron, Middlesex) negatived.

Mr. CASEY moved that the words "bond fide" be inserted before "tenant," on the first line of paragraph 4.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we cannot put that in, as every tenant is supposed to be bond fide, and we might as well put bond fide owner. If a man is not a bond fide tenant he is not a tenant. It is different with an occupant, as he may be a mere squatter.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the permission of the committee, I would ask to have the same amendment made with regard to cities that has been made in this clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LANGELIER. I wish to call the attention of the Premier to the fact that by this section a young man occupying a room in a city, and paying $3 a month for it, though he does not pay rent on real estate, but only for furniture, or perhaps for furniture and services combined, would have a vote.

Mr. CURRAN. You will get no room of the kind mentioned in any city in Canada for $3 a month.

Mr. LANGELIER. Suppose it is $5; the real estate may not be worth 25 cents.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask if it is the intention to amend the election law in order to carry out this law. In the case of a voter changing his residence it appears that under the Bill the revising officer's certificate does not altogether disclose the rights of the voter.

Mr. BOWELL. How is it done now? He takes the oath at present and he is qualified, and that would be the case under the Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. No; that does not meet this case, because he only swears that he is the person named on the list, that he was a tenant and still resides within the electoral district.

Mr. LANGELIER. In the Province of Quebec the proprietor is responsible for the taxes, and knowing that, very often leases his property so as to make the rent include the taxes. In that case, will the amount of the taxes be deducted from the rent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no; that is very common in Canada.

Mr. MILLS. It might be well, in that case, to provide that so much shall be free from taxes.

On sub-section 5, section 4,

Mr. MULOCK. There might be a tenant of a property worth $150, who does not pay sufficient rent to qualify him to vote as a tenant. Would there be any objection to providing for him in this section?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would not do.

Mr. CASEY. I would propose this amendment as an addition:

Provided always, that this section shall not apply to any employed or servant of the Government of Canada in occupation of real property belonging to the Crown.

This is intended to apply chiefly to the case of a caretaker in a drill shed or other Government building, who gets a residence in the building, and who would thereby be qualified under this clause as an occupant.

the Province of Ontario. It is to be regretted that this subject, which was postponed from yesterday, has not yet reached a proper solution. It is a provision of the Bill that wish to press, he allows him to remain as a caretaker, and he is considered as a servant who holds the property for his

Mr. CASEY. Would not a servant, then, occupying a house on a farm, and engaged by the year, be qualified under this

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; his house is part of his wages.

Mr. CASEY. He would not qualify under this clause, but under the income clause.

Amendment (Mr. Casey) negatived.

On sub-section 6, section 4,

Mr. CASEY. I wish to enter my protest here. I think the income qualification should be put lower than it is for the country; everything else is put lower for the country than for the towns. Wages are lower there also, and the agricultural laborer is as well qualified to vote as the town laborer. There are a great many town laborers getting $300 a year, but a farm laborer does not, on the average, get $300 a year, in Ontario. The average wages for agricultural laborers there is $264 a year, without board, and $170 with board. They are generally farmers' sons or the sons of small land-owners, who work for their neighbors and are just as well qualified to vote as town laborers. I hope the hon, gentleman will review the income franchise in this section for that reason.

Mr. AUGER. Suppose a man hired for a year for $150 and his board, would the board be part of his income?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. I move that the words "earnings in money, or money's worth," be added. Amendment agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2:20 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 22nd May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. EDGAR. I see in an extra published by one of the city newspapers it is stated that Poundmaker has sent in a flag of truce to Battleford, and released some prisoners. Has the Government received any information on this subject?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No other information than that which is published through the press, and which the hon. gentleman has received.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On sub-section 7, section 4,

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister stated, when we were at another part of the Bill, that he proposed to consider this clause and the one that immediately followed. When the suggestion proposed by my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. provision was made in the Ontario Act it was simply to enfranchise farmers' sons and not the sons of other property holders. Under this clause it is proposed to enfranchise little further, and take some means to prevent the making the sons of all property holders, and these two sub-sections of fictitious leases, merely for the purpose of manufacturing might properly be merged into one sub-section.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, when the Bill was first framed, some years ago, there was no question about giving the franchise to other sons than to farmers' sons. I think it will not be well that we should now commence to alter the Bill in regard to such particulars, and the two sub-sections may as well stand. There can be no objection to it in this way, and it will give information; and as we are told that this is merely the commencement of other and perhaps more liberal legislation, it will be the means of gathering in a comparatively large proportion of farmers' and mechanics' sons. It will give that information, which there can be no harm in giving, and I would rather not alter the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. It is a Bill for industrial statistics.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be valuable in that regard, and therefore we may as well leave it as it is. While I am up, I may say that in consequence of the discussion we had last night I have been thinking over the two clauses respecting tenants, as regards both cities and counties, which have been carried in committee. Now, I was struck by some of the remarks that were made, though they had occurred to me before; but in order to go a certain step and to remove the uncertainty that has been complained of by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and especially another hon. member, if it be understood, as a matter of arrangement, that no other amendment shall be proposed, I propose to take a step that will, to a certain extent, meet the views of hon. gentlemen, and it is this: That in case any assessment roll shows a party to be a tenant but does not show the rent he pays, I propose to add a proviso which, although it does not go as far as the hon. gentleman wishes, goes a considerable step towards it, and I propose to provide that the fact that the property in respect to which he pays a rent is assessed at $150 shall be accepted as prima facie evidence that the tenant has a right to be on the register. I understand that in the Province of Quebec the assessment roll shows the rental that is paid; in Ontario, and perhaps some of the other Provinces, the assessment roll merely marks that he is a tenant, without showing the rent he pays. I propose to go to that extent; I cannot go any farther. If that is accepted as an advance, I shall, in the course of the evening, move that a proviso to that effect be added to the clause, quoad cities, and quoad

Mr. MILLS. So that in cities the tenant will have onehalf the qualification of the owner?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall adapt it to different circumstances.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the First Minister mean that a man must pay a rent on property assessed for that value?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. It was argued last night, with a great deal of force, that in Ontario the assessment roll, for instance, says: John Jones, lot No. 1, value $150, as the assessed value. Then he is marked as tenant, but that does not show what rent he pays at all. But I would make a proviso that if that property is assessed at $150 which gives the franchise to the owner, that shall be prima facie evidence that the tenant has a right to be registered. If it is proved afterwards, on objection, that he does not pay $20 a year, the prima facie evidence is rebutted.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman has done well to accept Fleming) last night. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman, after agreeing to his proposal, if he cannot go a voters, and to require that the lease shall be bond fide.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that would come under some election law providing against fraud and corruption. The whole tenor of this Bill is to settle what the franchise shall be, not to provide against fraud and manufactured votes.

Mr. CASEY. In the next sub-section the right hon. gentleman has provided, and I think successfully, against fraudulent voting under the occupancy clause, and I think a provision of the same sort might be put into this clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When we were at the clause about mechanics' sons and property-owners' sons in cities, I took occasion to remind the committee the clause

Mr. EDGAR. A man may be a tenant of a very valuable piece of property, and pay a very light ground rent, and if he were assessed on the value of the property, he might have ten votes. Numerous cases occur, in cities like Toronto, where there is only a nominal ground rent. It occurs in other Provinces besides Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MILLS. I was told by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), before he left, that a considerable number of tenants in the city of St. John were paying wharf rent and were entitled to a renewal of their leases. The amount of rent is merely nominal, although the property is very valuable. There is in this city a very considerable number of tenants of the Crown who have leases of parts of the Bye estate, and they pay very small rentals. I am satisfied that, unless some radical changes have been made since I was in the Department of the Interior, some of the parties would be disfranchised, although the property they hold is worth many thousands of dollars.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not propose to go further than I have stated now; but the suggestion as to tenants of property under ground rent for improvements constitutes a special case, and I will consider it.

Mr. DAVIES. Then I understand some opportunity will be given for the consideration of this question of tenants in the island who pay ground rental?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. EDGAR. When the discussion on the interpretation clause was in progress, it was allowed to stand over. I then proposed to move an amendment respecting the word "farm," setting forth that it should mean 20 acres, and 10 acres in respect of market gardens. It struck me, however, that it was entirely immaterial, as these people would be land-owners, and they and their sons would have

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That interpretation clause stands over. When we go back to it we can discuss the question of 20 acres and the market gardens. In regard to the sons of farmers and property-owners, I think it will be an incidental advantage to keep the farmers' sons distinct, so that we can see the number that have respectively voted at elections.

Mr. MILLS. That object will not be accomplished, because the sons of manufacturers, fishermen and other classes are not particularised. How is the hon. gentleman to ascertain how many sons of merchants, of woollen manufacturers, of cotton manufacturers, or blacksmiths there will be? The hon, gentleman is not going to get the information which he declares it is desirable to obtain in this way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know whether the common sense of the committee will not see that, in counties especially, where the great mass of the population is agricultural, it will add this incidental advantage of showing what proportion are absolutely employed in that industrial classes. That is an incidental advantage which I think we might keep, especially as it makes no difference whatever, and is a matter of running two sentences into

Mr. DAVIES. Originally the right hon. gentleman intended to give the franchise only to farmers' sons, but afterwards, and I think properly, he extended it to the sons of owners of real estate generally. Now, why retain the two clauses when the effect is only to make trouble, to have an additional column in the reviser's list, and to cause a good deal of trouble and annoyance as to which class these people are to go in. Besides the clause is inartistic, and was originally framed when woman suffrage was in the there is no conceivable advantage which can result from it, unless the hon. gentleman has some ulterior object in seeing how many sons of the owners of real estate vote on more than twenty acres of land.

> Mr. CASEY. This will involve the necessity of the revising officer deciding under what heads he shall classify these voters, and if there is any dispute witnesses will have to be called and fees paid. Under this Bill more is now left to the individual than formerly, and it should be drawn so that it will not puzzle the non-legal voter, while the effect of these two clauses will be very puzzling to that class. The language of the Ontario Act, both in the interpretation and the enacting clauses, is very plain, and it covers the whole ground of securing the franchise to all holders of real property, whether farmers' sons or not. When the hon, gentleman decided to include the sons of other owners than farmers, he simply put on another clause, and it seems to me that his explanation is incidental rather than the advantage which he claims will be gained.

> Mr. LISTER. The form in which these provisions stand will involve a good deal of expense and trouble. The revising officer will naturally ask himself why it is that farmers' sons and the sons of other land-owners should be distinguished, and he may call upon people to appeal against the list as to whether they are farmers' sons or the sons of other land-holders. The hon, gentleman finding that Mr. Mowat intended to give the franchise to the sons of other owners than farmers, felt that he must be up with the legislation of Ontario, because it seems to be a run between him and Mr. Mowat, as to who shall have the most liberal Act. Why should it be left to the revising officer to say to the sons of farmers, or of other owners, you must come forward and give evidence that you belong to one class or the other. The revising officer will ask himself why this distinction was made. He will say that the Legislature in making it must have had some object in view; and persons seeking to be put on the list under these clauses, must satisfy him as to which class of electors they belong to. It seems to me that the reason given by the First Minister is no reason at all. The object of this Bill is not to procure statistics; its only intent is to provide a list of electors. If section 8 includes the sons of all land-owners, whether residing in a city, or in a village, or in the country, what is the necessity of encumbering the Bill with section 7? The greater includes the less. The distinction is inartistic; there is no reason whatever for it; and it will only lead to confusion, difficulty, and expense. I think the right hon. gentleman ought to consent to expunge that section altogether.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I think there is a very good reason why these two sections should be retained. We know that the assessment roll in Ontario and the voters' list has a column for farmer's sons.

Mr. LISTER. Not now; not after this Act comes in force.

Mr. WALLACE. By the law that is in force in Ontario during the year 1885, there is no provision made for any man's son except the farmer's son. Consequently, when industry, and what proportion are drawn from other the revising officer has to ascertain who are to be put on the list, he has the farmers' sons column of the assessment roll to aid him, but he has no aid from it with reference to the sons of landholders.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon, gentleman will notice that the sons of tenant farmers are not provided for in either of these clauses.

Mr. MILLS. The Ontario statute defines not a farmer's son but a land-holder's son.

Mr. WALLACE (York). That only commences next year; it does not apply to the first list.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman had made sub-section 7 of section 3 apply to this particular matter it would have covered the whole ground. He need not have changed one word to have made that section serve in the place of the two he now proposes. Under this section the son of a land-holder would have to prove the extent of his father's property—whether it was under or over 20 acres—before the revising officer could decide in what class to place his name on the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the answer of the hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace) is conclusive. The first voters' list made for Dominion purposes in Ontario will be made in the opening of the spring of 1886, in order to do that they must get the assessment roll of 1885. He will find there the names of the farmers' sons, and he can at once transfer them from the assessment roll of 1885 to his voters' list of 1886. But under the provincial Act which comes in force in 1886, the rolls showing who are land-holders' sons will not be revised except between August and October; and therefore the revising officer, in the spring of 1886, will have to enquire who the land-holders' sons are. Much of that work will be done in the counties especially, by the assessment roll of 1885, which will show who the farmers' sons are.

Mr. DAVIES. To hear the hon, member for West York, and to hear his reasons for retaining this clause endorsed by the Prime Minister, one would imagine that the whole of this Dominion consists of the Province of Ontario. This Bill is not framed only to suit Ontario. In Quebec, in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick, the franchise is not conferred specially on farmers' sons, and in those Provinces the difficulty pointed out from retaining these two clauses will exist the very moment this Act comes into operation.

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon, gentleman ought to yield to the proposal, if he had, we would have been through long ago. The hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace) assumes the names will be got from the voters' list in Ontario this year, that is true, but how is it with regard to the other Provinces, and how will it be with regard to Ontario after this year? The old list will not aid the hon, gentleman, because property is being constantly divided, and the hon, gentleman is simply enormously increasing the difficulties of those who prepare the lists without accomplishing the slightest advantage to any portion of the community.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). There ought not be anything like a 20 acre lot mentioned, either in the Ontario Act or the present Act. There are many farmers cultivating land outside of villages and towns, in lots of from 5 to 10 acres, which are of more value in many parts of the country than lots of 20 acres or 100 acres elsewhere, but I do not think that, as regards the farmers' sons, the mention of the number of acres will do any harm. The hon member for Queen's, P.E.I., asked if we thought there was no other place than Ontario. We do think there is; we reckon for the Dominion, but the great opposition to the Bill comes from Ontario, and were it not for the Act of the Ontario Local House, we would not have one-tenth of the opposition we have. This measure increases the franchise in every part of the Dominion except Prince Edward Island and British Columbia.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman's argument, that the number of acres should not be mentioned, is exactly what we have been arguing. What we want is but a simple provision that the sons of all land-holders whether farmers or not who have sufficient property, should be qualified.

Mr. KIRK. Because certain hon, gentlemen on this side object to certain portions of the Bill, is not an evidence that we are opposed to the Bill, but an evidence of our desire to insist in improving it and making it as perfect a law as possible. From the first, I have objected to this clause as it stands. Farmers' sons and fishermen are the only two classes mentioned with regard to real estate. In the 9th clause, fishermen are entitled to vote if they are owners of real property and boats and tackle, but are not allowed to qualify on any other personal property. In Nova Scotia this will have the effect of decreasing the number of votes in that class of the community. The fact that farmers' sons are mentioned will raise a doubt in the mind of the revising barrister that fishermen are not included, even though the father may have sufficient real estate to give him a vote. Fishermen's sons, as well as farmer's sons, ought to be entitled to vote in their father's own sufficient real estate. The hon, gentleman says the farmers are the largest class in the community, but in the Maritime Provinces the fishermen are also a very important class.

Mr. STAIRS. If the hon, gentleman has read the Bill, he must have seen that fishermen's sons, whose fathers have real estate, may have a vote.

Mr. KIRK. I do not deny that, but I say it is not clear. Mr. STAIRS. There is no doubt about it at all.

Mr. KIRK. There are large numbers of fishermen who own a considerable quantity of land, and are not called farmers, and their sons might not, under this Act, be entitled to vote. Where is the necessity for saying that farmers' sons shall be entitled to vote when you do not give the same right to the sons of fishermen?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Look at the 8th clause.

Mr. KIRK. They may come in under the 8th clause, but it will create confusion. Supposing the 7th clause was not there, and the words "other than farmers' sons" were struck out of the 8th clause, would not that admit farmers' sons?

Mr. EDGAR. There is a very large class of farmers who do not own the farms which they work, but have a large stake in the country, who own a lot of stock, and whose sons work for them in the same way as the sons of proprietors work for them. In many cases the owners are simply nominal owners, because they have large mortgages on their property, and have not really any more interest than the tenant farmers have. I propose, therefore, an amendment to the clause that the following words be added after the word "son" in the first line of sub-section 7 of section 4: "or tenant farmers' sons."

Mr. McMULLEN. There is no doubt that there are a large number of these tenant farmers whose sons should be entitled to vote as much as the sons of owners, and I therefore hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LANGELIER. In the Province of Quebec there are many of this class. I saw in a paper which is supposed to be more or less under the inspiration of the Minister of Public Works, the Monde of Montreal, a statement that members on this side of the House desired to prevent farmers' sons from voting. I have not heard any one on this side express an opinion to that effect, and now we are proposing to increase the number of farmers' sons who should have a vote.

Mr. WILSON. In the neighborhood of cities and towns, very often a large rental is paid for a farm, and the sons of the tenant farmer work for him in the same way as the sons of an owner. They are as intelligent and as much entitled to a vote as the sons of farmers who own their farms. A farmer may have a lease of eighteen or twenty years of his land, and his sons are as much entitled to a vote as those of the owner whose property may be heavily mortgaged. I know that in the section from which I come there are leases of this kind upon property, which run for twenty-one years. The tenants virtually own the land, yet they will all be prevented from voting unless they can get upon the assessment roll by some other means. We ought to try to prevent, as much as possible, the contention in the various courts of revision that usually takes place there. If the First Minister still persists in granting the tenant farmer a right to vote, I can see no reason why these two clauses should be retained. It will be the source of a great deal of annoyance to the revising barrister, and to parties desirous of getting upon the list.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish to remind the First Minister of the circumstances existing in Prince Edward Island. Those hon, gentlemen who support him in this House will bear me out in the statement that in that Province nearly all the lands were originally held or leased by tenant farmers. Since then the farms have been bought out by the Government, and bought out by the tenants, of whom a large proportion are now freeholders, and the large number who yet remain tenants are paying a rent. Heretofore, their sons have been accustomed to go with the father and vote on polling day. Whatever effect the Bill may have in other Provinces, it will disquality large numbers of these farmers' sons in Prince Edward Island, and here is an opportunity, by this amendment, of reinstating the sons of the tenant farmers throughout the Island in the position they held before this Bill was introduced. I suppose there will be hundreds of these men in each county disfranchised by this Bill. I have seen myself as many as three sons go up to the polls with the father and vote. If this amendment is accepted, these sons will be continued in their right, because the farm is of sufficient value to give both father and sons a vote. I am quite sure my hon. friends from the Island, irrespective of politics, will support the amendment so far as our Province is concerned. There can be no harm in it; it is in the direction of extending the franchise, and those gentlemen who expressed a desire, the other day, to extend the franchise in every reasonable direction, ought to be the first to accept this proposition. I would press upon the First Minister the desirability of allowing these farmers' sons to continue to exercise the franchise. They are a very intelligent class, well educated young men, who take a great interest in politics, and are among the most active in promoting the interests of their candidate. I hope my hon friends from the Island, who support the Government, will use their influence with the Premier to get this amendment accepted.

Mr. AUGER. In the Province of Quebec there is a very large class of tenant farmers who work the farms of large proprietors, while the proprietors are absent in the city or elsewhere. These tenants cannot work those large farms alone, and they keep their sons with them, who live on the farm. You are now giving a vote to a man who owns a farm worth $300, and you give his son a vote, but although the tenant farmer may work a farm worth ten times that amount, and has more at stake than the small proprietor, you propose to deprive his sons of the right to vote. I am afraid it will induce them to leave the farm and emigrate. I hope the First Minister will accept this amendment, because in my Province it will make a great difference with our young men.

Mr. LANGELIER,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt whether the attention of the First Minister has been called to the fact. that within the last ten or fifteen years there has been a great alteration in many parts of the country as regards the ownership of land. Notably in Ontario there is a large class of tenant farmers, men possessed of considerable capital, and apparently that class is on the increase. Now, I can quite understand how it may have been very objectionable at a former period to give the franchise to sons of very small tenant farmers, but I submit the position is entirely changed now. I submit that the sons of these tenant farmers, at present are, to say the least, quite as well deserving of the franchise as the small tenants in towns and cities, whom he proposes to enfranchise. If you are going to enfranchise the small tenants in cities, if you are going to enfranchise Indians, as the hon. gentleman proposes, it certainly appears very absurd, and very inconsequent, to refuse the franchise to the sons of tenant farmers of the class who are now becoming a very large proportion of the agricultural population. Then, there is another consideration. It is, as the First Minister knows, very desirable that we should do all we reasonably can to encourage those young men to stay in this country, and remain with their fathers on the farm, and I have no doubt that giving them the franchise would help to secure both these desirable objects.

Mr. MILLS. The new Ontario law on this subject, as the First Minister will observe, if he looks at it, includes, by the interpretation clause, tenants amongst those who are embraced within the definition of "landlord," and "landlord's sons," includes the sons of the owner and the tenant. I know that a great many of the farmers of Ontario are tenant farmers—in fact, 1 know some parties who were proprietors of land, sold their land, and invested their money, and rented other farms, still continuing the business of farming, and believing that a certain amount of capital invested otherwise than in land, would yield a larger interest than will real estate. They can rent a farm worth $10,000 for very much less than the interest on that sum, so they become tenant farmers. There is a large number of that particular class. The question is, what is best with respect to the safety of the state? Can these sons of tenant farmers be entrusted with the franchise, and are they likely to exercise it as intelligently as proprietors of the soil? They will, no doubt, exercise it quite as intelligently. The sons of tenant farmers are educated with farmers' sons, and are equal to them in ability and intelligence. As a matter of fact, they are members of the same class. It is most extraordinary that we should be legislating to give the wild Indian the franchise and withhold it from the tenant farmers' sons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the hon, gentleman has repeated again and again the purpose of giving farmers' sons votes was this; The farmer is the owner of the soil. As a general rule one of his sons remains at home and succeeds to the property at his tather's death. The other sons go to the towns on their own account. That was the original idea in Ontario. It was afterwards extended so as to include the sons of property owners.

Mr. MITCHELL. A kind of universal suffrage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, because in this Dominion there is no law of primogeniture. The estate is accordingly divided up. It has been under the usual argument: Why should you prevent an artisan's son or a merchant's son from having the vote, because on his father's death he will obtain the property, and the business stand? This has always been based upon the suggestion that the son had a real interest in the estate. That argument cannot apply to a tenant's son. He has no interest in the land which his father rents for a period of from one to ten years; and so it would be giving a vote without the party possessing any qualification. The father has a vote on his rental, but the son, as I have said, has no interest in the estate. If you adopt this proposition you must give the vote to sons of tenants in cities and towns who pay $2 a month rent. That is simply manhood suffrage. I am not prepared, and the House is not prepared, to adopt manhood suffrage, which has already been voted down, and I cannot therefore adopt the proposal because it would be in effect manhood suffrage.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the First Minister can have correctly stated the reasons why farmers' sons were given the vote; if he has, they are very flimsy reasons. In Prince Edward Island persons have leases for 99 years at small rentals, and are practically in the same position as owners of the fee. I would point out to the First Minister that the sons of farmers have no vested right in their tathers' estates. The father can leave it to whom he pleases. But in the case of leases for 999 years, you are going to create this extraordinary anomaly. Two farmers may live along side each other. One has a lease for 999 years for which he pays five pounds a year rent, and the other buys out the reversion. The sons of the latter will have a vote while the sons of the tenant for 999 years will have no vote. If the hon, gentleman cannot grant it to every tenant farmer, he should grant it at least to tenant farmers for long terms.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have already told the hon. gentleman—I promised him that the case of long grant leases would be considered if the Bill will declare that a building lease on a long lease is equivalent to an ownership, if it declares that such a lessee stands in substance as a proprietor, then his sons will have a vote, but until we settle the first point with regard to these quasi owners, we cannot deal with their sons.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman proposed to consider those cases where a party has a right to renew a lease on payment of a small rent, but there is another class of cases where the lease is for a specific time and no matter how long that time is he has a chattel interest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is what I have promised to consider.

Mr. MILLS. That is an additional case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I speak without prejudice of course, but I stated that those persons holding a 999 years lease would be equivalent to those having an estate for life—would be of equal value, I mean. We might fairly say that such a person should be considered as an owner. A person holding lease twenty-one years, renewable for ever——

Mr. MILLS. Or ten years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I think twenty-one years should be the least, for no person would take a ground rent for the purpose of building a house unless he has a twenty-one years lease renewable, or an increased rental to be settled by arbitration. That is another case to be fairly considered. If we decide that those persons have the same property substantially, though not technically, for life, I should have no objection that the sons of such parties should have a vote, but the major being settled the minor will follow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call the attention of the right hon. Premier to the fact that there is a class in my own county called lumberers, who have a great deal of money invested in their business, many of whom are not farmers. They may or may not be owners of real estate, but they generally have sons, and their sons work with them, and I would like to know if any provision can be made for them. Sometimes they have $10,000 or $12,000 worth of property, which they do not want to invest in real estate, because they require it in their own business. Then, with respect to this clause about fishermen—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have not come to that yet,

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, we have not come to it, but everybody has been talking about it. I want a little to say about it; I want my name in Hansard as well as other people.

Mr. BOWELL. That's honest any way.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the first time I have opened my mouth for two days, except to eat and drink, and I have been waiting for an hour to get a chance to say what I want to say; but what, with the distinguished orators on the other side, and the right hon. gentleman answering them, I have not had a chance to say a single word. Now, I propose to have a little say at this discussion, and what I shall say will be short, as I am always short—sometimes with my right hon. friend, and sometimes with hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You are five feet eightnot very short, rather tall.

Mr. MITCHELL. A little too tall for the right hon. gentleman sometimes. The point I wish to refer to is about the fishermen, and I know the right hon. gentleman will take it in good part. There are quite a number of people in my own county who are fishermen, and we know that the effect upon people who lead the life of fishermen is they generally have large families.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain, explain.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not see that the statement of a truism on that subject should provoke laughter on this occasion, but certainly it is a relief from the very dry speeches we have had for a very long time. It is quite a relief to know that there is a little music left in the House What I want to say to the right hon, gentleman is this: That he is getting very near manhood suffrage; he is going towards it step by step, and soon there will be nothing but the shadow of a shade left of his original franchises. I would like him to consider this question of the fisherman's sons, who perhaps may have real estate to the amount of $200 or $300, or may have personal property to the amount of $700 or $1,000. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if he could not put in some provision for fishermen who have two, three or four grown up sons, who have probably $500 or $600 worth of real estate, or $1,000 worth of personal property in his boats and fishing tackle, etc. Why should he not include these sons of fishermen, even as a matter of fair play if nothing else, as well as the sons of mechanics and farmers. I will not ask him to commit himself at this moment, but I would ask him to consider the matter before we reach the section. I have risen for these two purposes: First as to the merits of the two classes I have mentioned, and, secondly, to get my name in Hansard.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon, gentleman gives a correct account of the grounds upon which this franchise was first granted. The franchise was first commended on some such ground as that—that the farmer's son was supposed to have a real interest in the property. But we have got very far beyond that in this Bill. The hon, gentleman provides here an income franchise and a wage-earner's franchise, which gives a vote to a workingman who has no interest in any property or stake in the country beyond the fact that he has earned $300 a year. That franchise cannot certainly be defended on the ground of interest in land, and it is quite clear that the right hon, gentleman in this Bill, Conservative as he is, has got far away from the idea of the franchise having any connection with a living interest in a piece of land. The question is, then, whether the sons of tenant farmers should be qualified with their fathers or not; and it must not be decided on the issue whether they have any living interest in the soil or not. Let us compare this class with the classes whom the hon, gentleman does enfranchise. Take the laborer. The tenant farmer employs a laborer, and perhaps pays him $300 a year in wages, or in wages and board combined; and the laborer will be disqualified, while the tenant farmer's own son will not be qualified. Again, compare the tenant farmer's son with the man who rents a room in a city lodging house at $2 a month. There is no comparison; the mere lodger at $2 a month has no such interest in the country as the son of a tenant farmer; and the latter is as well qualified as the former on the ground of intelligence, social position or stake in the country. I do not believe there is any tenant farmer's son in Canada who does not earn as much in the course of the year as would qualify him under the wage-earners' franchise if he got it in money or in money and board combined. But he does not; he simply helps to produce the crop, the price which is shared between the farmer and his sons according to their necessities. He may get $50 in one year, $100 in another, and $25 in another in cash; but he gets no regular wages. He is practically working the farm on shares with his father.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is, practically, wages.

Mr. CASEY. But you are leaving his vote at the mercy of his father, and to some extent at the mercy of the landlord, because if the landlord chooses the farmer's sons can be put on as joint tenants; and where the landlord is of the same political stripe as the tenant, that is done; but in the one case the hon. gentleman leaves the vote of the tenant's sons at the mercy of the landlord, and in another case at the mercy of the father. That is not sound constitutional doctrine. The hon, gentleman has raised the difficulty that if you give the franchise to the sons of tenant farmers, you will be obliged to give it to the sons of all other tenants. I do not think there is any connection between the cases of the farmer-tenant and the lodgertenant. I think you might naturally be called upon to give the franchise to the sons of other landholders renting a property of the value that would qualify the tenant farmer and his son; but you are not obliged to extend it to the case of the lodger-tenant. The value of the property will be shown by the assessment roll, and it will be easy to determine how many sons will be qualified. I propose that sub-section 8 be amended by inserting after the word "farm" in the second line the words:

Or of any person actually domiciled in any dwelling house as tenant therein where such dwelling house and the land if any held with it are of the actual value of $300.

These words are from the Ontario Act, which does extend the franchise to the sons of tenant farmers. I have shown how it may be extended to the sons of other tenants without going to manhood suffrage, and I put the qualification at $300, following the lines of the Ontario Act, in which the qualification of such tenants is put at $200, double the amount required to qualify a tenant himself.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have gone over the lists of tenants in one of the townships in my riding, and I find there are 78 tenant farmers in it. Are we going to disfranchise the sons of 78 tenant farmers in one township?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). They never had votes.

Mr. McMULLEN. They have votes under the Ontario Act, and it is important they should be allowed to have votes under this. I know one case where a man rents 200 acres of land for which he pays $400 rental, and yet his two sons will not have the right to vote. If a tenant who pays a rental of $20 a year is entitled to vote, why should not the sons of a tenant who pays a sufficient rental to make $20 each, if divided, be entitled to vote?

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. LANGELIER. The right hon, gentleman has I understand consented to take into consideration the case of Prince Edward Island. I will bring under his notice a case concerning Quebec. In Napierville there is a whole township which was originally granted by the Crown to the Hon. Mr. Baby. The lands have since been granted to farmers for a certain number of years, and if the sons of those tenants are not to be entitled to vote, there will not be a farmer's son in all that township who will have the right to vote.

Mr. MULOCK. While it may be said that a tenant farmer could give his son a vote by putting him on wages, that is not the usual practice, and to encourage the sons of tenant farmers to remain with their fathers, to encourage filial duty, the franchise should not be limited to the sons of freehold farmers, but should be extended to the sons of farmers who have leases for a reasonable time, say five years.

Mr. SCRIVER. I hope the hon, gentleman will not limit his consideration to the cases of what he calls building leases of twenty-one years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Mr. SCRIVER. There are cases of emphyteutic leases made for 99 years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will take care of that. Amendment negatived.

Mr. CASEY. This clause provides that only as many farmers' sons shall qualify as the property would qualify if they were joint owners with their fathers. Considering the length we have gone in enfranchising different classes, I do not see any reason for continuing this restriction. All the arguments I have applied to the case of tenant farmers' sons will apply to this case. In my own county, I find by inspection of the lists, 320 farmers' sons were qualified under the late Ontario Act, while I find by the census of 1881 there were 755 farmers' sons in that county. These 400 sons of farmers will be included under Mr. Mowat's Act and excluded under this Act. We should not disfranchise anyone who has a vote in the Provinces. These sons of freeholders might be able to qualify if they were servants instead of sons, and it is not fair that they should be disqualified because they are working on their father's farms. I move that clause 7 be amended by ommitting the proviso in reference to the division of the value of the property. That will leave all the sons of freeholders who are themselves qualified at liberty to vote. That is in consonance with the spirit of this Bill, and particularly in consonance with the spirit of the people of Ontario. I cannot help reminding the First Minister again that Mr. Meredith, the leader of the Conservative party in Ontario, moved a resolution in the Ontario Assembly, in favor of manhood suffrage, so that at the next election Conservative members from Ontario will have a beautiful time. The elections for the Local House and for this House may take place at the same time, and we shall see the Conservative members for a riding in the Local House, asking for support because he advocates manhood suffrage, and the Federal representative of the same riding asking for support because he opposed it. I think that, as the Conservatives of Ontario are in favor of manhood suffrage, we are entitled at least to ask that we should approach so near to it that the intelligent sons of our farmers should be enfranchised.

Mr. LISTER. I think sub section 7 should be eliminated altogether and sub-section 8 should be amended. I think that the tenants of Ontario as well as those of Prince Edward Island, should have the right to exercise the franchise. Any hon gentleman who will take the trouble to go over the voters' list of his district, will find that at least nine-tenths of the people named on the list are farmers.

Now, this farmers' son suffrage is not a very old one. When it was agitated some years ago it was thought to be a dangerous innovation, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, if I am not mistaken, were not entirely in accord with the proposition to enfranchise the sons of farmers. Experience has proved that it was no mistake; experience has proved that the farmers' sons of this country were thoroughly qualified to exercise the franchise in an intelligent way. Why should not these men still continue to exercise that right for the election of members to this House? Why should not the sons of tenant farmers have the right just as much as the sons of proprietors? As the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, they go to the same school, they associate together, they have the same measure of intelligence, and there is no reason why the son of a farmer who happens to be a tenant, should be excluded from the exercise of the franchise while the son of his neighbor, who happens to be the owner, is included. The reason for giving the franchise to the sons of farmers was, that it would be an inducement to those sons to remain at home and help their aged parents to work the farm. If that argument was good in their case, it is equally good as respects the sons of tenant farmers.

Amendment negatived.

On sub section 8,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am going to move an amendment equivalent to the one that has just been passed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that is done I wish to call the First Minister's attention to the word "continuously" in the 19th line of the 8th paragraph. Now, he knows that in all probability these clauses will be considerably fought over by the respective parties, and it is desirable that there should be as little confusion as possible. A considerable number of residents in towns and cities are persons who are getting more and more into the habit of spending a considerable part of the year away from their ordinary residences on which the vote takes place, and I apprehend this word "continuously" might give rise to a considerable amount of wrangling, as the son of such a person could hardly swear that he had been a year continuously in residence, if, as a matter of fact, he had spent several months away from the domicile.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The last clause will cover that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think so, because there it provides for occasional absence from the residence of the father and mother. I am referring to the case where a whole family is absent for quite a long period during the summer season.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that word "continuously" would be reasonably interpreted as meaning six months in the year. A person is continuously resident where he has got his domicile, if he has no other. I take it that the hon. gentleman who comes down here to Parliament, is still continuously resident at Kingston.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I raised that objection because this is sure to be litigated a great deal. I think a dispute would arise on the meaning of the word "continuously." The Minister may be correct enough, that a proper construction would be to pay no attention to such a discontinuance of residence as I speak of; but I am certain the point would be taken, and it covers, probably, some thousands of cases throughout the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has never been any difficulty raised. The word "continuously" has always been in the present Act since farmer's sons have had the franchise, and the question has never been raised.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But this is a new franchise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a new franchise, but the question has never been raised as to farmers' sons under the present Act.

Mr. MILLS. It could not be in the case of farmers' sons the question was not likely to arise under the Ontario Act, and could not become a practical question.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I desire to move in amendment that the following words be inserted after the word "farm:"

 $^{\prime\prime}$  Or of any person actually domiciled in any dwelling house of at least he actual value of \$200.  $^{\prime\prime}$

I heartily approve of any extension of the franchise in the direction of manhood suffrage. This amendment imposes residence as a necessary qualification. Next, he must be the son of the man who is a landowner to the value of $400.

Amendment negatived.

On sub-section 9.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to add after the word "boats," the words "nets, fishing gear and tackle."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES. This proposition is one to give the fishermen a vote, and the question is, does it attain that object? The hon, gentleman makes it essentially necessary that the fisherman, qua fisherman, shall possess certain real estateit does not matter how little. If he possesses $5 worth of real estate and $150 worth of fishing gear, he has a vote. I do not think it is desirable, if you wish to confer the franchise on the fishermen, to make it necessary that he should possess any quantity of land. I do not think there is any principle or reason in it, as it is not essential to a fisherman carrying out his calling properly that he should be the owner of real estate at all. He may occupy a temporary stage on shore and carry on his calling in that way, as a great many of them do in the mackerel fisheries. If you wish to confer the franchise upon this class of people, you should not annex a condition which, in nine cases out of ten, will not be complied with, and, as a matter of fact, large numbers of them do not possess real estate. I move to add, after the word "tackle," "or boats, tackle or other implements of his calling."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot agree to that. If the fisherman rents a house he has a vote as a tenant—he has a house of some kind, either as owner, tenant or occupant. He gets a vote under the other provisions of the Bill in that case, but as it is represented to me that the fisherman has a very small tenement generally, and lives most of the year on board his boat, if he is the owner of property, this clause gives him the franchise in addition to the other. It is to give him the right to vote as the owner of property, although it may not be of the value of $150, if it can be supplemented by the value of his boats, his nets, or his gear. This is a substantial concession to the fishermen.

Mr. DAVIES. I go further than the hon, gentleman, and I say that as real estate is not necessary to enable the fisherman to carry on his calling, he should have a vote provided he has sufficient money invested in personal property. Take the case of a fisherman possessing a boat well fitted out and furnished, worth $1,500 or $2,500, he would not have a vote, but if he had $5 worth of real estate in addition he would have a vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He must have a house. Mr. DAVIES. He lives on his boat.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not all the year round, and besides he is assessed on his earnings.

Mr. DAVIES. The condition attached is unnecessary and illegical. A fisherman possessing $2,000 or $3,000 worth of personal property will not have a vote; whereas, if he had $150 worth of sand bank, he would.

Mr. KIRK. It seems to me that the amendment of the right hon. gentleman will secure the vote to owners of real estate, who are fishermen; but I do not think it extends the franchise to the sons of these men.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If they are fishermen, they will have their earnings.

Mr. KIRK. But they may not amount to $400 a year. Amendment lost.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not agree with the principle of this clause. I do not object to fishermen being enfranchised in a ready way, but it seems to me that the clause is open to the objection that it is class legislation, and I cannot see on what principle the fishermen are entitled to legislation that is denied to any other of our industrial classes. There are a vast number of mechanics who, for the purpose of their trade and calling, have kits of tools that serve to them the same purpose as do the boats, nets, gear and tackle to the fishermen; and on what principle is it that these men are not granted the same privilege that is conceded to the fishermen. Then, the ordinary carter or the man who carries on business as a cabman—

Mr. MITCHELL. I know my hon. friend does not desire to curtail the privileges of any of the people of the Maritime Provinces—we are getting very few in this Bill—and do not let an hon. gentleman who has a feeling in common with me about manhood suffrage, prevent this one concession. Let us get this fishermen's clause pass, and we will then talk about the carters.

Mr. MULOCK. But the hon, gentleman asks for something for the Maritime Provinces which he will not help me to get for the other Provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly I will help you, if you do not obstruct.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it not better to get a clause that will apply to all equally meritorious callings? I would ask the Premier if he would have any objection to a similar provision being inserted, applicable to other trades.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That has been settled already.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not remember any expression of opinion falling from any person against the argument I advanced, or any decision being arrived at by the committee on that point. However, I will adopt the suggestion of the hon, member for Northumberland, and move a substantive motion after this clause is decided upon. The hon, member for Northumberland tells me he is going to support me in that.

Mr. DAVIES. My hon, friend has just anticipated me, I had a motion prepared to the same effect, which I intended to move as soon as this clause was carried.

Mr. KIRK. I would like to ask the First Minister if a fisherman living on property of which he is not the owner, or of which he does not hold the deed in fee simple, would be entitled to vote under this clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. KIRK. Then this clause will disfranchise a great many people who are simply occupants.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will vote as occupants under a previous clause.

Mr. DAVIES. If a man of this class votes as an occupant he must be the bond fide occupant of real property of the value of $150. He erects his stage on the shore contiguous to the fisheries, but he will not come under the title of occupant, because he does not live there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has his home. Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. DAVIES. He certainly cannot qualify on the fishing stage, where he lives in the summer and carries on his trade. If he can qualify as an occupant, there is no necessity of giving him this special privilege. This clause, as it is worded, will not reach a large class.

Mr. KIRK. A fisherman may have a home that will not reach $150 in value.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then, he votes on his earnings.

Mr. KIRK. Then, I do not see any necessity for this clause at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman wish to strike it out?

Mr. KIRK. No, I do not.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon gentleman really wishes to reach the class of people we are talking about, he must insert, after the word "owner," the words, "tenant or occupant." I do not think he will object to that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, Indeed I will. I think it is highly objectionable.

Mr. GILLMOR. In the county I represent, there are 5,000 of these people. During certain seasons, the fishermen from the island and the mainland go to some locality where it is convenient to pursue their calling, and while there, they erect their tents; and, so far as I know, they have left their homes to go there. They stay there two or three months, as long as they can catch fish; but, in my constituency, I do not know of any fishermen who have not their homes as well.

Mr. KIRK. If a fisherman owns property sufficient to give him a vote under the occupancy clause, there is no necessity for this clause. But the very fact that it is inserted, shows that there is a necessity for it; and I think the word occupant should be inserted here, to meet the case that this clause is intended to meet.

Mr. DAVIES. I move in amendment that the following words be added:

Is a mechanic or artisan and is the owner of real property and tools or implements of his calling, within any such electoral district, which together are of the actual value of $150.

This will place the mechanics and artisans in the same category as fishermen. There is no reason why the implements in the one case should not count as well as in the other.

Mr. PAINT. The concession extended to the fishermen is necessary, inasmuch as all he has may be swept away several times in one season, which is not the case with the mechanic.

Mr. MILLS. His real property would not be swept away, and it is upon the real property that all parties are qualified. In the case of the fisherman, an exception is made by allowing his personal property to be included, and unless you give other classes the same right, you will be destroying the principle of uniformity, which is so much insisted on. Should the First Minister reject this suggestion, a large number of artisans in this country cannot fail to conclude that he is hostile to their liberties and interests.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that amendment goes far enough. I move that these words be added:

Is engaged in any trade, occupation or calling, and is the owner of chattel property, required for the purposes of such trade, occupation or calling, and real property within such electoral district, which together are of the actual value of $150...

Unless this amendment be adopted, in Toronto alone there will be a great many men employed in industries who will not have a vote. It is unjust to deny to the workingmen in manufactories what is granted to other classes. I hope the Prime Minister, if he does not now decide in favor of the amendment, will take it into consideration, and will be able to meet the views which have been expressed upon this point.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course he will, but do not make your speech too long. You are spoiling it.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not making it any longer than necessary, but this is a matter of great importance, and I do not think that, since we have begun to discuss the details of this Bill, we have had a clause proposed which would be more appreciated than that proposed by my hon. friend from Queen's, or one in that direction.

Mr. SPROULE. I can hardly think the hon. member for North York is serious in saying that this Bill will disfranchise the mechanics in Toronto. According to the report of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, the mechanics in the city of Toronto and the wage-earners, although they only work 251 days in the year, averaged $444 of earnings. These included blacksmiths, blacksmiths' helpers, boiler makers, boiler makers' helpers, bricklayers and masons, car builders, carpenters and wood workers, cigar makers, cotton mill operatives, laborers, machinists, moulders, painters, plasterers, plasterers' laborers, printers, sewing machine hands, tin and coppersmiths, tool makers, and a large number unspecified, the total number employed being 590.

Mr. MULOCK. What about those who did not get those wages.

Mr. SPROULE. This represents all classes, and I take it that the others would earn a similar amount.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the property of fishermen is very readily distinguishable from the tools of the artisan. The boat of the fisherman very nearly approaches the character of a house. It is, as nearly as you can imagine, equivalent to real property. It is a moveable house.

Mr. DAVIES. How about the nets and the tools of his trade?

Mr. McNEILL. I am not speaking of the nets, but of the boat. I recollect on one occasion having a conversation with the late Lord Cairns on the subject of the Alabama, and I remember his making the observation that, in point of fact, a ship, in his opinion, very nearly approached to a tenement.

Mr. TROW. According to the statement read by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), there are very few operatives in the city of Toronto, which has a population of about 130,000, for he states there are only 590.

Mr. SPROULE. No; I said that was a report from 590 wage-earners.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the argument of the hon. member for East Grey improves the matter at all, because he admits that these workmen were earning enough wages to qualify them. Some of the fishermen earn enough to qualify them in the same way, but we are legislating to give them a double chance, and why should we not do the same in regard to the other classes of wage-earners? A proposition of this kind should be applicable to all classes, and I think this principle should be conceded. In any case, it is of sufficient importance to be considered by the First Minister. I would not ask him to give a decision to-day, because no doubt he would require time to consider it, but I hope that, before we get out of committee, we shall have some expression of opinion on the subject from him.

Mr. PAINT. The fisherman is entitled to extra consideration on the ground of his precarious calling.

Mr. DAVIES. Would the hon. gentleman suggest some chise, the mechanic in the rural constituencies is deprived word in the Bill to show that is the principle on which the of it, though he may be equally intelligent, simply because concession is granted? The hon, member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) suggested it was given to a fisherman because his boats and tackle were looked upon in the nature of a tenement. The hon, gentleman was not aware that we had already moved that the fisherman who possessed $1,000 worth of property in boats and tackle should have a vote, but the leader of the Government thinks he ought to have at least $1 worth of real estate. There may be a reason for that, I do not know. I agree with the hon, member for North York (Mr Mulock) and accept his amendment to the one I proposed, as being broader and better carrying out my intention that all artisans and mechanics of all kinds engaged in trade should be entitled to vote if they were possessed of personal property, and for the same reason as fishermen. No reason has been given for withholding it from the mechanic and artisan, while giving it to the fisherman.

Mr. BURPEE. I would ask the First Minister to consider the opportunity there is here to make faggot votes. A man may have a joint interest in real estate worth $100, but if his boats and tackle are worth only $149 he cannot have a vote. I cannot see why fishermen should be placed on a different basis from anyone else.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it must be becoming pretty clear to both the First Minister and his colleagues, that they might just as well have accepted the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) which has the merit of being clear, consistent and logical, and vastly less open to fraud than a great many franchises the First Minister is proposing to introduce; and I entertain no doubt whatever that but a very short time will elapse before we will be obliged to come, substantially if not in name, to this amendment. There has not been advanced on the other side of the House one logical argument, even one plausible or specious argument, why the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland should not be accepted. One hon, gentleman tells us that he proposes to give this to fishermen because their trade is precarious. Well, it is only too well known to all of us who pay any attention to these matters, that the wages earned by many classes of mechanics in this country, are very precarious. Indeed, it is a rare thing, and only in prosperous years, that many of the best paid trades have 250 days' employment in the year. Very often they are without employment for many months together, and they are just as subject to the vicissitudes of fortune as the fisherman can be. Then another hon, gentleman stated that because 590 men of different trades in Toronto, very variously paid, earn an average of $140 a year, therefore these men would be entitled, under the wage-earners' franchise, to get a vote. That does not follow at all. One-half of these men may be receiving a great deal more than $140, but probably a great many of them are receiving much less, and if you came to examine it you would find that a large percentage of them were actually in receipt of less than $300. Now there can be no argument advanced for discriminating between fishermen, and ordinary mechanics and artisans. If the one class are entitled to the franchise under this particular law, the other class should be, and within a short time they are sure to get it.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in dealing with this question, gave us statistics from the Ontario Bureau of Industries, which dealt exclusively with the wages earned by mechanics in cities, but he will recollect that in rural municipalities mechanics of the same industry and intelligence, do not earn the same wages. The reason is that it is cheaper to live in the country than it is in cities. Therefore, while the mechanic in the cities may secure the right to the franchise, the mechanic in the rural constituencies is deprived of it, though he may be equally intelligent, simply because he does not earn as much. I think the amendment of the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) ought to be adopted for this reason; there has been a difference made in the value of real property required to enfranchise a man in cities, and in towns and villages, and so there ought to be a difference made in the amount of wages earned, otherwise some classes are going to be disenfranchised in rural municipalities, while they will have the vote in cities. A great many will be disfranchised under the reduced wage earning qualification. I cannot understand why, if a fisherman invests $150 in boats and nets he should have a right to vote as a result of that investment, but that a carpenter or a mechanic who has invested $150 should be refused it. If we adopt this principle in regard to fishermen, it should be extended to all similar classes.

Mr. WILSON. I support the amendment because, if this privilege is granted to fishermen, it should be extended equally to mechanics. There are mechanics in towns and villages, who though intelligent and industrious men, yet will not be enfranchised on account of earnings. Every day the First Minister is tending in the way of manhood suffrage. It is desirable that such should be adopted, for it would be the means of doing away with all these different qualifications and the enormous expense that would be involved on the country.

Mr. TROW. I do not see why this class of voters have not as good a right to the franchise as any other class, and I cannot see any reason why the fishermen should be favored specially by the First Minister, unless he regards them as the wards of the Government, at least to the tune of $150,000 a year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is a barefaced observation on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I cannot understand how it is that as chattel property has been acknowledged as the basis of franchise for one class, the various industrial classes of the country, chiefly mechanics, should be excluded from those benefits. Very large number of them are engaged in the different mechanical pursuits, they necessarily require large quantities of tools, and if the fishermen are allowed to exercise the franchise on their kit I think it is only reasonable that a mechanic should have the same privilege. If they do not, a number of very active and intelligent men will be excluded from the franchise. At any rate, this clause is another argument in favor of manhood suffrage.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The proposition of the amendment is one directly in accord with the clause under Mr. PATERSON (Brant). consideration, and it seems to me that no valid objection can be raised against it. If such a provision is good in the case of the fishermen, why should it not be good with reference to mechanics owning a certain amount of property, consisting of the implements of their trade? If this amendment is not adopted, putting mechanics precisely on the same footing as any other class, I think we would be making a very invidious distinction, though, of course, having voted for the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, in favor of manhood suffrage, I do not object to the fisherman clause.

Amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

I have not been very fortunate in my suggestions to the First Minister this afternoon, but I think I am justified in expecting that the one I am about to propose will be favorably received. The hon, gentleman has already determined that a fisherman must have a certain amount of real property, though he does not insist on his having the whole amount required by the other classes of the community, and since you give the fisherman a certain farmers' sons and landowners' sons. On what principle do status, because he owns real and personal property together, then you must apply to him the same results which flow from his possessing property and having grown up sons. You give farmers' sons a vote, and I approve of that, and you give votes to the sons of other owners of real estate, and I think that is a good provision. I ask you to confer on the sons of fishermen the same rights as you do on the sons of owners of real estate. It frequently happens that the father and several sons live and work together, and they have about equal intelligence and education, and they are equally fitted to enjoy the franchise. If you give the franchise to the sons of those in Ontario, who invest their money in real estate, I do not see how you can deny the right to the sons of fishermen, who invest their capital partly in nets, in gear, and partly in real estate, or if not, you lay yourselves open to very illogical results. If a fisherman has $1,000 worth of boats and fishing gear, and his sons live with him continuously and share with him the dangers of his occupation on the sea, on what principle can you withhold the vote from these young men, while you give it to the sons of farmers who have only $400 of real estate to qualify both alike? You cannot justify it on principle or on reason; and if you make this distinction, you create a good deal of jealousy and give rise to agitation which can only have one result in the long run, that of fishermen's sons being placed on the same footing as farm. ers' sons. You have properly extended the principle beyond farmers' sons, and you give the franchise to the mechanic or anybody else who has real estate of the value of $400, and to his sons as well. If you apply the same principle to the sons of fishermen, you will be conferring a privilege on an intelligent and industrious class of young men, who are good citizens of the State and in every way worthy of the trust.

Mr. GILLIMOR. I endorse what my hon, friend has said. I am not in favor of class legislation, but if there are any class of persons in the Dominion who ought to be favorably considered, I think it is the fishermen, because they do not participate in many of the advantages resulting from the expenditure on railways and other public improvements. The reasons given by the Prime Minister for conferring the franchise on farmers' sons I thought were very good, but with us in New Brunswick farmers' sons do not as a rule remain at home so much as fishermen's sons. If you look at the census, you will find that, while certain portions of our population remain stationary, the fishing population is always increasing. Their young men are not induced to go to the West to take up farms, and they remain at home more than any other class. The object of the young fisherman is not to get a farm; his home is on the water, and his ambition is to become the owner of a vessel as soon as he can save money enough out of his earnings. The farm is rather kept for the father, who, when he reaches a certain age, and that is not very old, is allowed to remain at home and cultivate his little piece of land. It is true, you have admitted the personal property qualification to aid these fishermen. I agree with the hon, member for Sunbury that we ought to leave that with all classes as before; but if we cannot get it for all, I do not wish to deprive the fishermen of that advantage. But I do think it would be doing a wise and generous thing to confer the franchise on fishermen's sons, who, as a class, I can testify, are deserving and intelligent, and if the hon. Prime Minister did so he would not regret it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret very much that the hon. First Minister cannot see his way to assenting to the proposition made in the amendment of my hon, friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). It appears to me to be a reasonable proposition, and one that can be justified on precisely the same grounds as you justify giving the vote to you propose to give the vote to the son of a farmer? The object is to keep him in the country and to make him a citizen by giving him an interest in the country and a voice in making its laws. You also enfranchise the landowner's son, he may not be engaged in any trade or calling; he may be living on twenty or twenty-five acres of land; and you give him a vote for the same reason as you do the farmer's son. We give them a vote in order that they may realise fully that they have a stake in the progress and prosperity of the country. That is the only reason upon which we can justify giving either the farmers' sons or the land-owners' sons a right to vote. Does not precisely the same reason apply to fishermen's sons? They are just as intelligent, just as well able to exercise the franchise, just as likely to make as good citizens in every respect, as the sons of farmers or landholders. It is provided that every fisherman who has real property and boats and tackle to the value of $150 shall have a vote. There is no provision as to how much property he must own; so that should he own but a few dollars worth, he will, provided his boats and fishing gear make up the difference, have the right to vote. Therefore the personal property owned by a fisherman is treated practically as real estate, as he is given the right to vote on that, and treating his personal property as real property, as land, you are bound to give the fisherman's sons the right to vote as you do the farmer's son.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved into Committee.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words with regard to this question of fishermen's sons. I am sorry I was not able during the afternoon to impress on the First Minister the necessity of enfranchising the sons of tenant farmers. The same reasons exist with regard to the sons of fishermen having a vote as to the sons of tenant farmers. If there is any class in the community in which we should endeavor to create an interest in the franchise of the country, it is the young and rising class. The oppor-tunity of taking that interest should be given as early in life as possible. It has been suggested that the farmers might put their sons in the position of wage-earners, but the farmers do not always feel disposed to enter into contract with their sons in order to give their sons the privilege of voting, especially as, after a few years, they might be compelled to pay large amounts as wages to their sons should a quarrel arise. Nor is it desirable that the son's franchise should depend on any action of the parents; we should endeavor to take them completely from the control of the parent in this matter, and no impediment should be placed in giving them the right to exercise the franchise. When we have given this right to farmers' sons we should give it to other sons. I do not see any reason for refusing it to the sons of fishermen. This clause enabling fishermen to vote on real property and personal property qualification is a peculiar clause; it looks as if they have to be the owners of real estate as well as of chattel, and the owners of chattel as well as of real estate, in order to enable them to vote. If a fisherman owns sufficient property to qualify himself and his sons, why should those sons not be enfranchised without requiring the tather to make them wageearners or to give them an interest in his property? I am satisfied that we are disfranchising a large percentage of the electors when we strike out the sons of tenant farmers. That is a class which is increasing, and the sons of fishermen are also increasing in more than one section of the voter to some one else. Now, what is the nature country. We ought in fairness to give the same privilege to the sons of fishermen that we have extended to the sons in the property upon which he is to qualify, or is it of farmers. I would call the attention of the First Minister to this point. By the interpretation clause, a son is declard to mean a step-son or a son-in-law or a son. Supposing the son and the son-in-law live on the farm with the father, and the property is only sufficient to qualify one in addition to the father, who is to have the vote the son or the son-inlaw? Hon. gentlemen may think we are suggesting these things with a view to delay, but from the commencement of the discussion of this measure we have simply endeavored to present reasonable arguments in favor of reasonable changes. We are sorry to think that, after spending almost the entire afternoon in discussing the question of the enfranchisement of sons, we have not been able to accomplish anything. Still, though we have failed to obtain it in the case of the sons of tenant farmers and mechanics who are tenants and not owners, I should like to assist in securing it for the sons of fishermen.

Mr. LISTER. This is what may be termed a fancy franchise, I suppose the First Minister has introduced it in order to gain a little popularity in the Maritime Provinces. If it is right that the fishermen of the Lower Provinces should vote upon personal property, the same reasoning applies to people in the other Provinces of the Dominion. However, as it has been determined that these people should be entitled to a vote, and as, in the other Provinces, where the franchise is based upon real estate, it has been thought wise to give the franchise to the sons of owners. I can see no reason why the sons of the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces should not also have that right. I do not pretend to urge that personal property should be the basis of the franchise, but, when this House has decided that it should be the basis, it is manifestly unfair and unjust to exclude the sons of those men, when the sons of those who are qualified in the other Provinces are permitted to vote. Will the hon, gentleman say that in granting this privilege, to those people, there is any danger to the commonwealth, that there is any fear that those men who, reared upon the sea, who form our merchant navy, could not safely be entrusted with the franchise? No man will say that they are not loyal, that they are not intelligent, that they are not in every way competent to exercise the franchise intelligently, and for the best interests of the country. If the First Minister persists in refusing them the franchise, he will do an act that cannot be justified. He will exclude from the right to exercise the franchise a large body of men upon whom the future of this country greatly depends, and who largely contribute to its wealth and greatness. I trust the First Minister will consider this matter, and find it to be his duty to admit to the franchise men whom this section of the Act must necessarily exclude. I do not see how hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who come from the Maritime Provinces, can justify this attempt to prevent their fellow citizens from having the same rights as the young men of the older Provinces. I repeat that if it is wise and prudent to give the sons of farmers and the sons of landholders throughout this country the franchise, the reasons are equally cogent why you should give it to the sons of fishermen in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MILLS. Of course-

Mr. MITCHELL. Come Mills, hold on and let this motion pass.

Mr. MILLS. We have two classes of franchises proposed in this Bill, which is rather an unusual course

Or is it an interest some interest less than ownership? similar to that of a tenant? The hon. First Minister has refused to give the franchise to the sons of tenants and occupants. He has admitted that there are certain classes of tenants whose title much resembles that of freeholders, and that it might be right and proper to put their sons' privileges upon the same footing as the sons of freeholders. Now, in the clause that we have adopted, you have the principle that the fisherman is not a person having a limited interest in the property upon which he qualifies, but he have an absolute interest. The property on which he qualifies is his fishing tackle and boats, that is to say, personal property. Another has a freehold estate. Of course, if a fisherman has a freehold interest in a sufficient amount of real estate to enable him to qualify on that alone, his son, if the estate is sufficient, would also be qualified, not as a fisherman's son, but as the son of an ordinary holder of real property. If a fisherman has property worth $300, his son would be entitled to vote under the preceding clause, 8. Now, if that fisherman's son is entitled to vote, why would you refuse the right to the son of another fisherman who is qualified to vote under section 9? Supposing a fisherman had $250 worth of property, in that case his son could not qualify. Suppose in addition to that, that he has $2,000 worth of property in a boat or vessel. You will refuse to the son of that man who has $2,000 worth, the right to vote, and you give it to the son of the fisherman who has $300 worth. It is clear we are proceeding upon no settled rule or principle, nothing you could recognise as a principle on which you would be able to say, if a party is qualified under such a section another party, upon the same kind of reasoning, and upon the same principles, would be qualified under the next section. That you do not recognise. There are no lines laid out that you can trace through this Bill and say that they are lines or principles which may be easily and fairly applied. We are proceeding in a haphazard sort of way, without any recognised rule of conduct; and it does seem to me that we are creating a whole congerie of the most serious difficulties in this Bill, that will be presented to the revising officer. There is no reason or principle which would exclude the son of a fisherman who has $250 worth of real estate, and a vessel worth $2,000, while you admit the son of a fisherman who has $300 worth of real estate, and a boat worth $50. Take, for instance, the son of a fisherman who has $200 worth of real estate. You say he may vote; there is no doubt about that. But you say to the son of a fisherman who has a boat worth $2,000 and $250 worth of real estate, that he may not vote. Now, what reason have you for saying that the son of the one may not be just as safely entrusted with the franchise as the son of the other. Is he more likely to undervalue the electoral privilege; is he likely to be less qualified; or to be less acquainted with the constitutional system under which we live; is he likely to be inferior in point of intelligence, training, and public spirit, for the exercise of the franchise, than is the fisherman who happens to have $300 more of real estate? You can assign no sufficient reason why you should entrust the son of the farmer with the electoral franchise and refuse it to the son of the fisherman. We are simply acting in an arbitrary manner. We have not adopted any settled rule or principle since we passed the third section. We are making provisions in a most arbitrary and capricious manner, and in dealing with a question of such consequence, we ought to proceed in a more rational way. We, on this side, have proposed amendments. We have received no answer except a manifestation of an obstinate desire by the Government not to accept any suggestion from this side of the House. I trust this proposal will receive the attention of the committee. I invite hon, gentlemen opposite to approach this question as fair-minded men, anxious to pro-Mr. MILLS.

Bill that are best suited to secure what is right and fair to all classes of the community in every part of the Dominion. If we desire to do so, the committee will accept the proposition of the hon, member for Queen's.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It may be laid down as a fundamental principle that, in arranging a franchise for the whole country, no class should be discriminated against. This wholesome principle has been departed from, not only in the case now before the committee, but in the case of sons of tenant farmers. It would be desirable to get back to that wholesome rule. The fisherman derives his livelihood and wealth from the sea, and his stock-in-trade, boats, tackle and implements, are just as much his capital as is the farm of the farmer or the workshop and property of the manufacturer. So, if we place him under disabilities, we make an invidious distinction which this committee is not warranted in making. Viewing the matter in this light, it was a mistake to require the fishermen, in order to obtain the franchise, to be rated for real property at all. The clause should have provided that where fishermen have personal property such as boats, fishing tackle, of sufficient value to entitle them to the franchise, they should possess it. It has been objected that a fisherman requires some real estate to live upon. It may not necessarily be so. He may be a batchelor and may board. He may be worth thousands of dollars in boats and fishing tackle, and yet not own a little piece of real estate sufficient to give him a vote. Another class in regard to which the committee have departed from the wholesome rule laid down, is that of tenant farmer's

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That matter has been decided.

Mr. APMSTRONG. No disability should be thrown on fishermen or on any other class of the community.

Mr. TROW. The franchise might safely be entrusted to the sons of fishermen, who as a rule are well educated and would exercise it usefully to the state. I cannot conceive why the First Minister should have any objection to conferring the franchise on this class, even if they own no real estate. There is no party advantage asked whatever, because in all probability those young men would take sides in politics just the same as any other class.

Mr. MULOCK. Sub-section 9 declares that real estate and the fishing tackle of fishermen shall be considered equal to the real estate of other persons required in order to qualify. If so the fisherman should stand in the same position as regards property qualification and be entitled to all the privileges flowing from it in the same manner as is the owner of real estate under sub-section 8. Under that subsection the owner of real estate, having his son living with him, and they not being entitled to vote, otherwise can have his son's name entered on the list, provided the value of the property is sufficient to entitle two persons to vote on it, as joint owners. If the property qualification of a landsman is to be treated in that way and he must have a certain value in property, whether it be real or personal, on what principle do you deny the franchise to the son of the fisherman which you give to the son of he farmer? We are working up a scheme which was recommended on the ground that the House should establish a uniform franchise, and here we have a franchise given to one class and refused to another. If the fishermen are to be legislated for, well and good, but they should not be singled out as a class, but the whole of our industrial classes should be legislated for in one class. We desire, as far as possible, to meet the views of the Premier, who has invited us to assist him in making this Bill uniform; but do hon, gentlemen now say that they do not want uniformity? If they do, then they approach this question as fair-minded men, anxious to pro- have abandoned one of the strong grounds on which the Bill mote the public interest, and to secure those changes in the was recommended. All our legislation should stand uniform over all classes; it should be like the gentle dew from heaven, which falls on the just and the unjust; but this scheme is being worked out in an illogical, partial and unfair way.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I desire to enter my protest against the lack of uniformity which pervades this section of the Bill, and which, if the amendment is not adopted, will be conspicuous for its uniform want of uniformity. When a man's son is placed on the list on the ground of having a certain amount of property, you should not abandon that principle either in connection with fishermen or the tenants of real estate. It must be remarked and recognised that where the enfranchisement of the sons of owners has already been put in practice, it has been successful in a marked degree, and so much so that its success was made the ground for its introduction of this Bill. In Ontario its success was so well recognised that the principle was lately extended. We find that it is proposed in this Bill to give the vote to unenfranchised Indians, on the basis of the land which they have solely in common with their tribe. Now, if we abandon any absolute principle to such an extent as that, does it not seem strange that we should draw the line at the sons of our own people? This clause applies more directly to an important class in the different Provinces, a class who, as the hon, member for West Lambton pointed out, would be largely drawn upon for our naval defence, if we are forced to that alternative, and a class which at present is a very important one in this Dominion. Why, then, do we not hear from the representatives of constituencies where there are a large number of fishermen who will be deprived of the franchise if this amendment is not adopted. I press this amendment strongly because, if its principle is admitted, we will secure the right which should be equally recognised, of giving the franchise to the sons of tenant farmers in Ontario.

Mr. WILSON. Many amendments have been proposed on this side of the House in the direction of an extension of the franchise which hon, gentlemen opposite do not see fit to reply to. Certainly all of these amendments cannot be bad; some of them ought to meet with their approbation. With regard to the amendment now before us, the hon. First Minister in charge of the Bill has expressed neither his willingness nor his unwillingness to accept it. advocating what we believe to be a just and proper principle, and we have heard no argument to refute what we propose. We have affirmed the principle that if a farmer after years of industry has acquired a certain amount of property, and his sons are working with him, they ought to be placed on the voters' list; and if the fisherman, instead of using the profits of his avocation in purchasing land, chooses to invest it in fishing tackle and other implements necessary to carry on his pursuit successfully with his sons, both he and his sons ought to have a right to record their votes at an election as well as the farmer and his sons. ask whether any just reason has been given why these men should be denied the right which has been granted to the farmers. True we hold the farmers of this country in high esteem; we appreciate them very much; they are very important factors in the community; but those who follow the dangerons avocation of fishing, who increase our navy and render it valuable to the country, ought at least to be treated as well as the farmers. The hon. First Minister started out with the proposition that we were going to have a uniform and symmetrical franchise; and yet this distinction is made between the farmers and the fishermen, and hon. gentlemen opposite do not bring any arguments to show why they should not be placed on the same footing. I say this is not treating the House fairly. Unless they can show that it is in the interest of the country that this amendment should not prevail, we are entitled to ask that it should be adopted, and until they give us some reason Bill it will, under one provision or another, give to the why they should not accept it this measure ought not to people of Inverness practically manhood suffrage. There-carry. Do they contend that they have made this Bill perfect at the outset, and that they are not going to accept any amendments? We have seen already that this Bill is by no means perfect, and this clause is as faulty as any other. You are going to do an injustice to the sons of the fishermen; you are going to do a wrong to those who are following an important and dangerous calling; you are holding out to them no inducement to continue in that calling. You tell them: If you go and buy a few feet of land we will let your sons have votes, but if you invest your money in boats and fishing tackle we will not let you have that right. Is that a proper principle? I believe hon, gentlemen opposite ought to rise superior to party feeling on this occasion, and do justice to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. Will the Government not respond? I hope they will, but I have no faith that they will; I have lost all faith in them, because they have treated other amendments in the same manner; and before the country can get justice these men will have to leave the treasury benches and let men take their places who will deal fairly with every interest in the country.

Mr. DAVIES. I regret very much that while these arguments are advanced on this side, they have never been responded to by the hon. First Minister or by any hon. gentleman opposite. The arguments are either good or bad, and they ought to be accepted or rejected; they ought to be treated with respect. It is not fair to the thousands of sons of fishermen who are to be disfranchised, that this proposition should be treated with silent contempt. I am more than astonished that the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) who makes himself from time to time the champion of the people of the Maritime Provinces, and at times with good effect, and meets with a good deal of sympathy on this side, should remain silent when a claim is put forward on behalf of the fishermen. He has a good deal to say about the Indians but not a word about the fishermen, although he represents a county in which there is a large fishing interest. And what has the hon. mamber for Richmond (Mr. Paint) to say on this subject? Is he in favor or opposed to having fishermen's sons put on the same footing as farmers' sons? Either the proposition is just or it is not, and there must be some occult reason why hon. gentlemen opposite will not express an opinion on it.

Mr. PAINT. We have been taunted by hon. gentlemen opposite with not replying to this proposition. There is no necessity, for the reason that the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) has admitted, that in his own county this measure would enfranchise a thousand fishermen, and so throughout the rest of the maritime counties.

Mr. GILLMOR. I did not say any such thing.

There is some mistake somewhere; per-Mr. PAINT. haps it was 800; and it is the same throughout all the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I am very much pleased with the high compliment paid me by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., but I may assure him that he knows very little about the county which I have the honor to represent, when he runs away with the idea that I represent a fishing county. I can assure him that the county I represent is an agricultural county, and the sons of farmers there have been enfranchised under the Bill. It is true there are a few fishermen in it, and I can assure my hon. friend that if I know anything about the people, and I think I do, this Bill will practically give manhood suffrage to the people of Inverness.

Mr. MITCHELL. Glad of that.

Mr. CAMERON. When the lists are prepared under the fore they have no reason to complain; I believe that will be the case in all rural districts in the Dominion and particularly among the fishermen.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon, gentleman object to the enfranchisement of the sons of fishermen?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The sons of fishermen may be enfranchised under this Bill in my county, because they happen to have the real and personal qualification necessary to give them a vote.

Mr. MILLS. It is rather singular that the hon. gentleman should assign as his reason for supporting this Bill that it will practically give manhood suffrage. Is the hon. gentleman in favor of manhood suffrage? I think he has voted against it. If he is consistent and thinks the Bill will lead to that conclusion he ought to vote against the Bill. He will have to explain his explanation. He will have to tell the House how he is opposed to the principle of manhood suffrage and is in favor of a Bill which he says will practically lead to manhood suffrage. He has not answered the question put him by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) as to whether he is in favor of enfranchising fishermen's sons, but says he thinks they will be enfranchised under this clause. Then from an abundance of caution he ought to vote for the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I may say to the hon. gentleman that when I am in favor of manhood suffrage I will tell him so.

Mr. PAINT. When the hon. member for Inverness said the hon, member for Queen's, P.E.I., knew very little about the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, he did him a great deal of injustice, inasmuch as that hon. gentleman received a fee of $8,000 and upwards for advocating the arbitration claims before the Halifax Fishery Commission and is now suing for $8,000 more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And one result was the country was bettered by $4,500,000.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman thinks because a certain counsel received a fee for advocating the fishermen's claims before the Fishery Commission, the hon. gentleman thinks that the fishermen's sons should not be enfranchised. The only reason why I appeal to the hon. member for Richmond is that I notice he takes more than ordinary interest in the public affairs of this country lately, and I hope the rumors we have lately heard have some foundation, that he will have more influence shortly in the affairs of his country than he has had heretofore. I would like him to answer the question I put him; is he or is he not in favor of conferring the franchise on fishermen's sons?

Mr. PAINT. I wish to leave something for the Opposition to do when they get into power.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) has said that the sons of fishermen in his county would have votes, because the fishermen there possess the necessary real and personal property to enable them to vote. But the Bill does not allow personal property to count in giving votes to fishermen's sons. It is only where the father owns a sufficient amount of real estate to give himself and his sons a vote that the son can have a vote. Personal property does not count. It may be that in Inverness the fishermen have sufficient real estate to give themselves and sons votes, but that is not the case in all the counties. It is said that the incomes of fishermen's sons ought to give them votes. It is quite possible that fishermen's sons may earn $300 a year in catching fish, but will they get credit for having earned that much whilst they are remaining with their fathers. I do not think it is likely Mr. CAMEBON (Inverness).

title in fee simple. Fishermen who are squatters and do not own $150 dollars worth of real estate would not count as owners, and therefore would not be entitled to a vote. no matter how much they might possess in the way of boats or nets or personal property. I think this clause will deprive of the right to vote a number in Nova Scotia who would have that right if the words "or occupiers" were added after the word "owner."

Amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

On section 5.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg to move an amendment of which gave notice some time ago:

That the following be inserted as sub-section 10 of section 4 of the said Act :-Or is an Indian or person with part Indian blood who has said Act:—Or is an indian or person with part indian blood who has been duly enfranchised, or is an unenfranchised Indian or person with part Indian blood who lives in a fixed habitation and follows some trade, calling or occupation common to civilised life, though he participate in the annuities, interest, moneys and rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, subject to the same qualifications in other respects and to the same provisions and restrictions as other persons in the electoral district

That is the amendment of which I have given notice; but I have added to it the following:

Provided that, in the case of Indians living on reserves, this Act shall apply only to such as occupy separate holdings or allotmens therein, and Indians so occupying separate holdings or allotments, surveyed or unsurveyed and whether location tickets have been issued therefor or not, shall be entitled to be registered on the list of voters, subject to the same qualifications in other respects, and to the same previsions and restrictions as other persons in the electoral district.

This has been so much discussed that I need say very little about it. We have heard beautiful principles enunciated by our Opposition friends. The hon, member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) said that it was a wholesome rule that no class of the community should be discriminated against. That is an admirable principle to go upon, and I entirely concur with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. We have just carried the section referred to, and this appears to be an addition to it. I do not think I can accept it now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is a new clause.

Mr. DAWSON. I moved it as an addition to the clause.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, It is an addition to clause 4.

Mr. DAWSON. I move it as sub-section 10, in addition.

Mr. MILLS. I understood that the First Minister was to inform us as to what he proposed on the Indian question when we came to the disabling clauses, and, if the hon. gentleman could make his motion in such a way as to adapt it to the point at which the First Minister proposed to amend the Bill, we should have the one discussion on that matter. If not, we shall have a discussion to-night, and another discussion when the First Minister's proposition is before us.

Mr. DAWSON. I am exceedingly obliged to the hon. gentleman for the suggestion, but, in the meantime, I shall make the few remarks which I intended to make upon the additional clause which I have proposed, leaving it to the House to do what it may think fit in the matter. This addition is very much like the Ontario Act in regard to the Indian. The Ontario Act gives a vote to Indians who "do not reside among Indians." I understand that to mean Indians who live in separate habitations, but it is a rather ambiguous phrase, and I think it will be more clearly understood as I have put it. I think it is unfair to deny the right to vote to those Indians who are named in my amendment, because of the money which they derive from the Government. No Government can exercise any control over those moneys. They are justly due to the Indians and no Government can ever deprive them of them. Therethey will. The First Minister explained that the word fore to say that those who do not participate in the annui-"owner" in sub-section 9, meant an owner possessing a ties shall vote and that those who do participate not vote is not a very fair distinction. With regard to Indians living on reserves, I think those deserving of it should have the vote. On these reserves there are clergymen, Indian merchants, and half-breed farmers, and it would be very unfair to deprive them of the franchise simply because they reside on the reserves. Some of the Indians on the reserves are very far advanced, and are entirely fit to exercise the franchise; many of them are far advanced in civilisation and education. I have put in the words "separate holdings on the reserves," also the words "reserves unsurveyed." great many of the reserves are not surveyed. I know of one reserve 40 miles long, where the Indians live apart from each other and have large farms. Yet these locations have never been surveyed, and they have no location tickets for them. I have no objection that something should be introduced providing that in estimating the value of the Indians' property, the land which he holds on the reserve should not be considered. I am not anxious to give all the Indians on the reserves, the franchise. I know very large reserves on which there are over 1,000 Indians, and I believe this Act would not give votes to more than 30 or 35 of them, at the outside.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the hon. member is not in order. In the first place, it cannot be put as an addition to clause 4, because that is already passed. It cannot be put as a new clause, as it is not in the proper form, and as another opportunity will be given to the hon. gentleman to bring this up, I cannot put it before the committee at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman will have an opportunity of putting his motion before the committee and stating his views upon it, and under the ruling of the Chairman, which I think is clearly right, my hon, friend cannot present it just now. I mentioned the other day that this subject would be brought up on the disqualifying clause; that is to say, at this moment an Indian, being a person, shall have the same right to vote when properly qualified, as the whites. When we come to the disqualifying clause, it can be inserted there what Indians shall be excepted, if any, from the general provision of the Bill. I think my hon, friend had better withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. I must bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, if the motion is not in order at the present time. But I trust the First Minister, when he brings forward his amendment, will have in view the provisions I have suggested. I think they are very reasonable, and I shall take another opportunity of explaining then. With the consent of the House, I shall withdraw the motion for the present.

Amendment (Mr. Dawson) withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is to apply to such cities, for instance, as Belleville, St. Catharines and Hull, which are not electoral districts.

Mr. MILLS. If the First Minister will look at the definition of town or city, he will see that it means any electoral district, and a corporation that is designated a city or town, by the law of the Province in which it is situated, is wholly independent of any electoral divisions or boundaries, and that being the case this clause is clearly surplusage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have taken the opportunity of stating that I shall alter this clause. The hongentleman may remember that it was discussed, and it was stated that there were certain ambitious cities that were really towns; they were not electoral districts. On consideration, I think cities which are portions of counties, should be rated as towns, and that will reduce the qualification to the qualification granted to towns.

Mr. KIRK. Halifax, for instance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Halifax is an electoral district.

Mr. KIRK. No, it includes the county as well as the city.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the 3rd clause it is provided that in cities a property shall be of the value of $100, and in towns $200. I propose that in cities, not being electoral districts, the franchise shall be $200.

Mr. MILLS. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has had new light on this question. I suppose he has been looking from the hill here across the river to Hull, where there are a good number of small holdings, and he has had pointed out to him the importance of making a distinction and bringing them under the lower qualification so as not to do injury to a very excellent friend and an hon. member whom we all admire. When the hon. gentleman has undertaken to go this far, why does he not wipe out the distinction altogether?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will allow this section to stand over so that I can further consider it. The hon. gentleman said I looked across to Hull. But I have had representations from other places as well as from Hull, and therefore I must consider well this sub-section.

Mr. CASEY. This is a point we urged last night. I urged it myself, but not until two or three had done so. The idea was first put forward by the hon member for Megantic and the hon member for Quebec East.

Mr. BURPEE. I desire to call attention to the position of St. John. The electors can vote for three members—for one member for the city and two members for the city and county.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is the only franchise of the kind in the Dominion. I do not see how the First Minister is going to deal with it, except by making a special provision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The electors will vote in the city proper and in the city and county, just as at this moment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought the hon, gentleman was going to produce uniformity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not pedantic uniformity,

On section 6,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Suppose a property is not sufficiently valuable to qualify two partners, will the property not be represented?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If there are two pieces of land lying side by side and each of them comes up to the value of $150, each of the owners will have a vote. If the whole piece becomes one property held by the same two men and it does not give a vote to both, neither shall have a vote on the property. That is the present law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been the law in Ontario; but unless I am misinformed it is not the law to-day in Quebec. In that Province the property would be registered in the name of the senior member of the partnership.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Public Works knows that in the Province of Quebec where a property is worth more than is required to give a vote, the person who stands first in the firm is entitled to the vote. In Ontario unless the property is equally divided among all the parties so as to give each a vote, none vote. The hon, gentleman in this section is not proceeding on the principle of valuation, so far as tenants are concerned. With regard to the other clauses he has adopted a wholly different view. A tenant would require to have provision made that where the rent is $40 two might have a vote, or $60 that three should have a vote.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps on this clause the right hon, gentleman will state more distinctly than he has yet done, whether tribal Indians living on reserves would be qualified.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it was understood that this would be discussed on the qualification clause. While I do not wish to be irregular, I hold this, that while I would not exclude all Indians living on reserves, I would exclude some. But we will discuss that point when we come to the proper clause.

Mr. FLEMING. I would suggest in order to make this clause cover the ground mentioned by the hon. momber for Bothwell, that after that word "value" in the eleventh line these words should be inserted " or the rent payable is of sufficient amount."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see no reason for altering a clause which has stood since 1841. It is the law of the land, and everybody understands it.

Mr. FLEMING. The hon, gentleman will observe that, under the law, the qualification of the tenant has been based on the actual value of the property under lease. In this Bill it is provided that the amount payable shall be the ground of qualification. My suggestion is for the purpose of making the clause clear, consistent and complete.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot see it at all, as I find that it accords exactly with the clause of the Statutes of Canada of 1859.

Mr. MILLS. My hon. friend from Megantic (Mr. Langelier) informed me this morning that the law of Quebec with regard to parties in partnership is, that where a property is not sufficiently divided to give votes to all, the senior partner gets the first vote, then the next, and the third and so on, according to the value of the property.

Mr. CASEY. It is possible that a large number of persons, say eight or ten, might be the joint owners of a piece of property, and it would be rather too bad that none of them should vote, so that I think the clause should indicate which of them would be qualified.

Mr. FISHER. Until 1882, the law of the Province of Quebec was the same in this respect as the present Bill. though I cannot state what changes have been made since. I should think, however, that the hon, member for Megantic would not be likely to be mistaken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I call attention to this fact: an owner of real estate worth $150, as well as the tenant on the same property, would have votes. Now if a property of that value gives two individuals a vote, why should not joint owners in a large property have the same privilege?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a great deal of waste land in the country, but you do not give the vote to the land but to the individual. The land is not represented; the people are represented; and whether they hold jointly or singly, they must have an interest in the land to the amount specified by the Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite agree with the remark of the hon. First Minister, that it is the individual who is represented and not the land, and that is the strongest argument used in favor of manhood suffrage.

Mr. EDGAR. I am afraid that this clause, while very reasonable in some respects, will cut out fishermen who ought to be qualified if they are joint owners, because it refers only to joint owners of real property, whereas fishermen are qualified on a combination of personal and real property. Unless the First Minister wishes to be down on Mr. Mills.

How, however, he says we must go back to property representation. I say it is the individual that should be represented. The hon. gentleman will not allow two persons who own $150 worth of land between two two tes, but he will allow one person to have two votes, provided he has real property of the value of $150 mm. Mills.

fishermen, as he was when he declined to give fishermen's sons a vote, I think a change is required here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not in the least.

On section 7,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is the old clause.

Mr. EDGAR. I wish to draw the right hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that by this clause the principle of residence is acknowledged as to the income vote, and I certainly think the same principle ought to be adopted as to all other kinds of votes. We all know that the non-resident vote is a fertile source of illegal expenditure of money. There is nothing that creates such a temptation to illegal expenditure, as we all know who have had to run elections, as the demands made by non-resident voters to have their expenses paid to induce them to come and vote; even where they are willing to give up their time, they are not willing to spend any money. As we are following the Ontario law in various respects, we might follow it, I think, in acknowledging the principle of residence in all cases. For that reason I would move that the words "in respect of income," be struck out. That will make residence essential to all voters.

Mr. CASEY. I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman's object in moving this amendment. We have discussed the question of non-residence somewhat, but it is one which I think should be much more thoroughly discussed. A number of hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of the proposal to exclude non-residents from voting as if it disfranchised those voters. The hon member for West York (Mr. Wallace), in particular, deplored the condition his riding would be in if the 450 non-resident voters who vote in that riding were prevented from doing so. I think it was 450.

Mr. WALLACE (York). 600 or 700.

Mr. CASEY. That is stronger still. Those men have votes elsewhere, and the fact that they vote in the west riding of York is an injustice to all the other residents of that riding. They are not content with voting in the riding where they live.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They may not have votes elsewhere.

Mr. CASEY. I fancy that most of them vote for the hon. gentleman, or he would not be so anxious to retain them on the voters' list. As the hon. gentleman's majority is considerably less than 600 or 700, he is in fact elected by persons who do not live in his riding at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They live in Canada.

Mr. CASEY. But it would be as just to allow me to vote in Prince Edward Island as to allow non-residents to vote in West York. This defeats the object of having geographical boundaries to electoral districts altogether The reason why we define an electoral district by geographical boundaries is to secure that the persons who shall elect a member shall be, as a general rule, residents, neighbors in close community with each other. The other view is that, say The other view is that, say 600 or 700 non-resident voters of West York, for instance, shall have the right to vote there and also the right to vote where they reside. This destroys the principle of representation we have agreed on. As the hon, gentleman said a few minutes ago, it was not the representation of property but of individuals he desired. Now, however, he says we must go back to property representation. I say it is the individual that should be represented. The hon, gentleman will not allow two persons who own $150 worth of land between them to vote, but he will allow one person to have two that a proposal to exclude non-resident voters would shut some out of the vote altogether, because they might have no other qualification than the real property in the district where they do not reside. It is hardly possible that such people would not have sufficient income to qualify where they do reside, but to meet these extreme cases these people could be given a vote on their real estate and not be allowed to vote elsewhere. It is time we had a clear expression from hon. members as to whether they wish property to be represented or persons. And even as regards property qualification, the Bill is illogical, for while a man who owns a number of small lots, worth $150 each, in different electoral districts, may have a vote in each, a man who owned $10,000 worth of property in one district can only have one vote. To be logical, the hon, gentleman should give the latter as many votes as the number of times his property is worth $150. For all these reasons, I move that from the words "and persons," in the 4th line of the clause, to "situated," inclusively, be struck

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, when we had before us the Bill for the distribution of seats in 1882, told us that there was great importance in adhering to what he called the sacred principle of representation by population. Under our constitution we have that principle as between the Provinces, and if we adhere to that principle it is plain that no elector would be entitled to more than one vote. The First Minister told us the other evening, very properly, that the vote is not given to the property but to the man, and that the property is only the evidence of the man's fitness to exercise the vote. That is the obvious principle upon which we are proceeding. We do not give a man one vote because he has $150 worth of property, and two votes because he has $300, and three votes because he We are not dealing with the Parliament of Canada as if it were a banking corporation, in which each individual represents by his votes the amount of stock he brings to the common fund. We give the vote to the individual and require that he shall have a certain amount of property as the evidence of his fitness to exercise the franchise. The person who is entitled to exercise the franchise may exercise it somewhere, but not everywhere. No matter how much property he may have, and how widely that property may be disseminated over the country, we are departing from the principle of representation which is laid down in the fundamental law when we give him more than one vote. It is to the population that the representation is given. Upon what rule of consistency can you give any man more than one vote, unless you group constituencies, and then you may give each man as many votes as there are members to be represented in that particular group. We provide that the elections must take place on the same day. If a man has property in London, and in Toronto, and in Ottawa, he cannot vote in each place on the same day, so that you practically disfranchise him by the present law, in regard to his voting in more than one place. Why should he be able to vote twice because he owns property in Toronto and in the County of of York, while he could not do so if his property was in Toronto and in Ottawa? In view of the provisions of the constitution and of the reason for requiring a property qualification at all, in view of the fact that it is to the man and not to the property that the vote is given, and that the property is a mere evidence of fitness, it logically follows that the rule should apply—one man, one vote.

Mr. HESSON. How is it that, in the city of Toronto, you give two votes instead of three? The hon. gentleman knows that, under the new Mowat Bill, an elector has the privilege of voting twice in the election of three members. Why should he not vote three times?

Mr. MILLS. The hon gentleman asks a question which reside in border counties know that, if you take up the is not pertinent to this matter at all. I am not going to voters' list when it is twelve months old, you will find a enter into the question whether the representation of minorities is better than the simple representation of majorities or not. The Province of Ontario had adopted that principle with regard to Toronto, but that is not involved in the question before us. The First Minister has stated that it is not the property but the individual who gets the vote. We know that if a man has $150 worth of property it is as much evidence of his fitness, under the Bill now before us, as if he had $150,000. Once admit that he has the qualification, and you stop at that point. We have in our universities a certain curriculum, and we say a man who passes an examination shall have a degree. All men who pass it are not of equal intellectual attainments, but there is a qualification to which all are admitted. You are doing the same thing in this Bill. You say what the minimum qualification shall be in each case. A man having shown his fitness by the possession of that qualification, you stop at that point, and you say you will give him a vote. But upon what theory can you give him three or four votes? The very moment you admit the right to vote in a different constituency you also admit that you ought so to alter your law as to enable him to do that. But you make it impossible, because all the elections are to be held on the same day. How is a man who has a property qualification in Winnipeg, and another in Halifax, going to vote in both places? When you say that a man shall have more than one vote, and that a wrong is done him if you do not give him more than one vote, you have no right to have all the elections on the same day, and in doing so you condemn your own policy. I say that we ought to provide that the man shall vote in the place where he resides. Then there is less danger of personation, less danger of fraud, and there is less expense entailed upon committees in bringing up non-resident voters. It seems to me, we are logically called upon to carry out the principle of one man, one vote. The First Minister laid down a rule that property was only an evidence of fitness. That being the case, it does not matter how much property a man has; he is only entitled to one vote. Why should a man who has property in Toronto and York have the privilege of voting twice, while a man who has property in London and Ottawa has only the privilege of voting once? The Minister of Customs said, some time ago, that he would be disfranchised under this Bill, because he is not a voter in this place and has not the necessary qualification in the constituency where he would reside were he not a Minister. Well, I say that is a case to be considered. How are you to decide when a man has no vote where he resides, whether he can produce evidence that he is entitled to be entered upon the register there. If you can say: No matter where the property may be, that man has the necessary qualification; and you accept that as a qualification, the fact that he is resident in one place and his property is situated in another, ought not to entitle him to vote twice, but it ought to entitle him to vote where he resides. The rule of the constitution is, representation by population, which the First Minister called a sacred principle. And the rule of the representation of property, and of interest, and of all that sort of thing, upon any artificial scheme or contrivance, is something that does not belong to our constitution or to our system. I trust the First Minister will accept this amendment, and recognise the rule of one man, one vote. He has laid down a doctrine here to-day consistent with no other principle; he has accepted the principle of holding all the elections on the same day, which is consistent with no other principle, and he has made it impossible for a man who has property in different constituencies, widely apart, to exercise his franchise in each. I do hot know how far the hon. gentleman has looked into this question, but I have given it some attention; and all those whe reside in border counties know that, if you take up the considerable percentage of those whose names are on that list residing in a foreign country. Now, those parties are brought back to vote—possibly in a manner contrary to law, and the election is contested. How are you going to contest the election in this case? You cannot issue a summons to bring the parties before the court. They are residing beyond your jurisdiction, in a foreign country.

The election trial comes on an I the witnesses are not to be obtained, for your court has no power to bring them. The hon, gentleman knows what happened in one of the western constituencies in that particular, and the same thing may happen in a score of others. Now, you get rid of great temptations to fraud, and you get rid of what is of no earthly advantage to one party more than another. Why bring back a man from a foreign country, who has gone abroad and intends to reside abroad, to come here and vote in what is now to him a foreign country? I say, on the very principle of expediency the doctrine of one man, one vote, is the rule that ought to be adopted. If the hon, gentleman proposes an amendment, to give to a man who has a qualification in one part of the country a vote in any other place where he resides, I am prepared to support that.

Mr. FAIRBANK. It seems to me this is a question that can be considered without party violence. I think, speaking of the Province of Ontario, with which I am best acquainted, that no hon, gentleman on that side of the House will contend that there are more property owners in the Province of Ontario who are Conservatives than who are Reformers. There can possibly be no party advantage, unless it is admitted that one party has superior advantages in fetching votes into the constituency. If there is no party advantage, I think we can look upon the question unembarrassed from that point of view. Now, Sir, there is no doubt that the property qualification is merely nominal; the real underlying principle of this measure is the man instead of the property. It will not be maintained for one moment, looking at this Bill as a whole, that it is property that really lies at the bottom of this franchise. Take, for instance, your $2 a month rent. That rental would probably represent property of very small value indeed, property of less than $100 value. I have myself known many properties not worth $200 that rented for three times that amount. It will not be maintained that a shanty representing less than $100 is more important than the man, with a numerous family, who is a large tax-payer to the Dominion, and probably pays more taxes than some owners of considerable property. The real principle is that the man is the voter; that is the principle of representation where there is taxation. It is true, we have not got up to that point yet; but we have gone as far -using the term applied the other night in regard to Mr. Gladstone, that he was a practical statesman—as the hon. gentleman felt he could go. I am sure the First Minister, in this regard, is controlled by some circumstances. What controls him I do not know, but he has, no doubt, gone as far in that direction as he practically can go at the moment. The real underlying principle is that the man instead of the property is represented. Test it by an imaginary case, but one which is not altogether imaginary. A man has property in four constituencies, sufficient to entitle him to a vote in each. It only requires $600 to do that. Hence, $600 of property, so situated, gives this result: One man equals four votes. Again, a man has a property worth $60,000, situated in one constituency. Result: One man equals one vote. The proposition seems absurd. Still. it is the one we are acting upon in giving the man who has the vote to a man who has barely sufficient property to entitle him to a vote. Objection has been made in regard to disfranchising a person if he did not live in the locality. I fully believe that is unjust. If a man has not a vote in the constituency where he resides, and has a vote in another have been made by some hon, gentlemen who have spoken constituency, he should vote in the other constituency. An Mr. MILLS.

amendment in that direction would receive my hearty concurrence and endorsement. I believe it is a notorious fact that if you were to take out of past elections protests respecting non-resident voters, you would eliminate one very great cause of litigation. It is a cause of corruption and much bribery. I do not seek the suggested change from personal interest. On that point I am satisfied I should lose by it; but I believe that it is in the general interest of the country as a whole, and of the principle which lies at the bottom of it, that one man should have one vote. In case he has not a vote where he resides, he should be entitled to vote where his property lies.

Mr. McMULLEN. In municipal elections an elector is only entitled to vote in one polling sub-division. In regard to non-resident voters at Dominion elections, there are persons brought considerable distances, and more corruption arises on account of those persons being so brought than in any other way. In my election some parties came from the United States, I believe, on both sides. It is desirable that those people should not have the right to come back here and register their votes. When non-residents are allowed votes an injustice is done to the farmers. People in the cities have, in some cases, votes in different constituencies, whereas this is seldom the case with farmers. On one occasion I voted five times at elections, and rode 40 miles. I do not think that system should continue.

Mr. HESSON. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman as to the practice having been in the past attended with troublesome and dangerous results, and leading to a large amount of fraud. I speak of what I know in the county I represent; and I have pleasure in saying that I do not know, during the last two elections, being advised to assist any gentleman to reach the constituency from outside, and look at this clause as being one of the most beneficial in the Bill. If a man has sufficient interest in elections to go to a constituency and vote, I do not see why he should be deprived of that privilege. The very evidence that a man has distributed his wealth and interests in other parts of the country makes it clear that the individual ought not only to be represented in the county where he resides but in such places as he has accumulated property. The hon. member for South Perth, residing in North Perth, should be disqualified in the constituency which he represents. He would also be disqualified in other counties where he has property. I do not think he should be deprived of that privilege, or that any member should be so disqualified who possesses intelligence. I do not recognise it in that way, and I do not think the hon, gentleman intended it in that way. I think, as long as a person possesses the privileges of a British subject he should not be deprived of those privileges, because circumstances compel him to live out of the country. There is no party advantage to be obtained by this provision, as far as I can see, as I believe the parties who are to be represented would be about equally in both political parties. So far as my own county is concerned, there are a large number of property holders living outside of Stratford who are Reformers, and this is particularly the case with one township, which the hon, member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) formerly represented-North East Hope. A large number in that township own property in Stratford, and I believe the whole of them are Reformers, and I think it would be unsafe and unfair to disfranchise those parties. I look upon this class of voters as a class that are well fitted to exercise the franchise, and whose interest in the country is calculated to guide them in doing what is right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not at all mean to say that this is a question which does not present some difficulties on both sides. I believe the objections which cies at large, the same rule we adopted with respect to constituencies individually, and that is, if the man had the right to vote in half a dozen counties he should be obliged to make his selection, and vote in one particular county, just as at present he has to do, if he has a vote in half a dozen municipalities in one county. It appears to me to be absurd that if I happen to have property in four or five townships in one constituency I am obliged to content myself with one vote; but if immediately outside of this county there are four or five townships in which I happen to have as many votes, in surrounding constituencies, I may, if time permits, cast my vote in those various constituencies. I do not see that there is any sound reason which applies in one case that does not apply in the other. As a matter of fact, I know, as many other hon, gentlemen know, that this practice of bringing in what is called the foreign vote, by which I mean simply persons resident in other parts of Canada, is a most prolific source of expense to the two candidates, and under the present election law is often the ground for contesting elections. In many cases, on that ground alone, elections on both sides of the House might be vitiated if anybody chose to take the trouble. Now, I think this a question which is of interest to the House at large, for I do not think this is a party question. I think the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) was right in stating that one side would not benefit any more than the other by the foreign vote, in the sense in which I use that term. But I found in all hotly contested elections with which I have had anything to do, in some way or other, considerable sums of money are always spent in bringing in outside voters, and in many cases those elections would be vitiated by the money expended, although it may have been expended without the knowledge of the candidates, and may not have come out of their pockets. It seems to me that the whole argument is in favor, not, perhaps, of disfranchising a man unless he votes in the particular locality in which he resides, but of making a selection of the particular constituency in which he shall cast his vote. It appears to me to be absurd that the mere accident of a man holding property in two contiguous constituencies should enable him to cast two votes, when, if they were several hundred miles apart, he is utterly unable to do so.

Mr. WALLACE (York). We have heard a good deal to-night, Sir, about this new principle which has recently been discovered, that one man is to have only one vote. We were also told by the hon, member for Bothwell, the other day, that it is the outcome of the election campaign of 1883 for the Local Legislature of Ontario. But that principle was never heard of during that campaign, so far as I have heard. I do not think it was enunciated in a single election address, or in a speech on a campaign platform, but it was suddenly sprung on the people, for some reason, during the last sitting of the Ontario Legislature, when the new Franchise Bill was introduced. The effect of this principle will be, in a good many cases, that men who should be entitled to vote will have no vote at all. Take the case mentioned by the hon member for Bothwell, of a man having a vote in London, another in Toronto and another in Ottawa. Well, Sir, if he says the possession of property is evidence of fitness for a vote, and he owns $200 worth of property in London, $2,000 worth in Toronto, and $2,000 worth in Ottawa, if, as he finds, London is hopelessly Tory, and his vote will do no harm there, why should he be prevented from coming down to Ottawa, where he has ten times as much property, and recording his vote here, if he sees fit? But the amendments which have been moved to this clause will prevent him recording his vote in Toronto or in Ottawa, where he holds property, while property is the evidence of fitness. Another view of the matter is this: One person may hold property in a number of different places and be prevented tioned the other night that last year, in one constituency, of Ottawa; he may be an unmarried man, who boards out or resides with his parents; he may have a business in the city of Ottawa, and reside outside the city limits. He has no vote in the city of Ottawa, because he does not reside there, and he has no vote in the county of Carleton, outside of the city, and there is no way in which he can get a vote. He may not be able to vote on income heaving his profits for the very may be not be income, because his profits for the year may be nil, and he would not be able to swear that he had an income for that particular year; and therefore he would be disfranchised altogether. Then, by the present law of Ontario, in the city of Toronto a man has two votes for two candidates; that destroys the principle of one vote for one candidate; if a man chooses, he can cast his two votes for one candidate. If three candidates run, two of them being Conservatives and one Reform, a man can plump his two votes for the Reform candidate. I believe that principle is wrong in practice, and the principle enunciated by those amendments is also wrong. A man might have property in two electoral districts and live in the third, and if he is not a man with a household, he is deprived of a vote in the three districts; and so he has no vote at all. I think the clause is better than anything else that has been proposed.

Mr. TROW. I do not think wealth should constitute a man's right to vote. A man with $200 has as much stake in the country as a man with $200,000. I do not see why a monopoly should be given to a man of wealth. I do not know anything that causes more fraud or corruption than bringing foreign voters into a county. The amendment would do away with a great deal of expense to candidates; as a rule, we find that our protests depend very materially on outside voters. There is no advantage in bringing in foreign voters. If there is, I should say it is entirely on the side of the Conservative party, because, as a rule, they are possessed of more means and are more lavish in the expenditure of money than the Reform party. I think the hon. First Minister should confine himself to the principle of one vote to one voter. It will do away with a great deal of trouble and expense to candidates, and give general satis-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would say to the hon. member for West York that I recognise the force of the objection he made. What I suggested was, not that a man should be disfranchished, but that he should be compelled to elect where he would record his vote, just as at present; if a man has a vote in six or seven townships, he has to elect which he will cast his vote in.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) said it was unfair to disfranchise a man who had left the country and might still be regarded as a British subject. The hon, gentleman knows that if a tenant leaves a constituency after his tenancy expires he is not at liberty to vote; but if a man is on the assessment roll as an owner, even though he has sold his property and gone to reside in a foreign country, he can come back and vote, so long as his name is on the voters' list. That was the law in Ontario previous to the new law, and that will be the law under this Bill. If the owner of a property is registered on the voters' list, and he sells the property and goes to the State of Michigan, and purchases there and settles down, he can, nevertheless, come back to this country and cast a vote here, until a new voters' list is prepared.

Mr. WALLACE. It might entice him to stay.

Mr. MILLS. That is hardly likely, if he would not stay in the first instance; and it is hardly worth while to farnish facilities for bribery in order to take so improbable a chance of bringing a man back. The change in the population in the Province of Ontario is very great; I menfrom voting altogether. He may own property in the city where the voters' list was about eight months old, there were 128 non-resident voters, nearly all of whom were residents in the State of Michigan. If these men were all brought back to vote on one side, they would be sufficient to change the result of the election, although they have no longer an interest in the country. That is an undesirable state of things, and is wholly indefensible. What I complain of is, that this Bill will tend to perpetuate that system. By giving a man one vote, you give him all that he is entitled to, and if he votes where he resides, that is sufficient. I remember, in my first election in Bothwell, in 1867, the town had a population of nearly 4,000; the oil business came to an end; a large number of those engaged in that business left; their names were still upon the register; and quite a number of men came down from London, at the instance of my opponent, and personated a number of the parties who had left. -Nobody knew whether they were the right parties or not; and I remember five men, who were not out of the country, came to vote for me and found that others had voted in their names. Opportunity is given to do that sort of thing by this system of non-resident votes allowed in this Bill.

Mr. HESSON. While the connection of the tenant with the property ceases as soon as the tenant leaves, it has never been recognised that because the owner of property is out of the country he ceases to have an interest in it. As soon as he separates himself from the ownership, his right to vote should cease, although, in the past, he had the right to vote if still on the voters' list, even after he had parted with the property. There is little chance of there being doubt as to the personalty of owners of property, because they are, as a rule, well known in the community; but in the case of tenants, who change their holdings very often, the difficulty of recognising them is much greater.

Mr. VAIL. It is very unfair to put non-residents in the position to give three or four votes, if their properties are not too far apart, while in cases where the distances are too great the owners of properties cannot exercise their right as non-resident voters. For instance, a man who had property in Nova Scotia and property in Ontario could not vote on both, while a man who had property in two constituencies close together could give a vote in each. A man should be compelled to vote in the district in which he resides; but if he had not sufficient property there and had sufficient property in another district to qualify, he should be allowed to vote on the latter; to meet this case, all that will be necessary will be to make the man swear that he had not property qualification in the district in which he resides, but had it in the district in which he is going to vote.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I question whether the amendments proposed, while curing one defect, are not likely, perhaps, to have the effect of preventing some persons, perhaps by moving or by other means, from having a vote. One man should have one vote and no more. If the amendments before the committee will have the effect of preventing some men from having a vote at all, that is a subject to which we should address ourselves and which we should remedy; but under the clause, as it stands, a person having property in different electoral districts could vote in each district in which he had the property. I think my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) would agree with me in objecting to that, as he voted for manhood suffrage.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I am in favor of manhood suffrage; but if property is to be the qualification, it is a different thing.

Mr. PATERSON. Under manhood suffrage a man votes because he is a man, and has only one vote. The hon. member for West York voted for that, and he is not in a Mr. Mills.

position to object to the amendment, which carries out, as far as it can, the principle of manhood suffrage. Property is not the basis of this suffrage. You have departed from the basis of property in giving a vote to the wage-earner or a vote to the man who has income and has no property at all. If a man had a large income, part of which was derived from investments in one constituency and part in another, he would not be permitted to divide his income in such a way as to get votes in the different constituencies. When the hop, gentleman voted for manhood suffrage he distinctly took the position that one man should have one vote, and that is reasonable and right. We recognise the fact that a man votes because he is a man and because he contributes to the revenues of the country, and has to assume the responsibilities of citizenship, and has to share in the defence of the country. It is especially a strong argument when it is a franchise, in a case where the contributions to the revenue are obtained almost alike from rich and poor. I can understand a distinction in regard to municipalities; I can understand that a man having property in different municipalities should have the right to vote in these different municipalities, because the revenue of the municipality is derived from taxes levied on property in the municipality. But that is not the case in regard to this The man who might vote in six different counties contributes no more to the revenue raised by this Parliament than the man whose property lies in one constituency. Why, then, should he have more than one vote? I would be willing to aid the hon, member for West York in devising some amendment which would prevent a man losing his vote altogether, because his property was in a constituency different from that in which he lived; but no man should vote in more than one electoral district. The suggestion of the hon, member for South Huron is logical, as to a man being permitted to choose in which electoral district he shall vote, if he has property in more than one. It might entail expense, but it would be to the man himself. I think the amendment ought not to be resisted by the Government, because it is fair and equitable.

Mr. TEMPLE. I would ask the hon, gentleman how he would manage in a bye election, where a man owned property in one riding and was residing in the other. He would be disfranchised, unless the plan of the hon, member for West Huron were adopted.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The man, in that case, would be no worse off than any other elector in the constituency. If he elected to be put on that electoral list he would have a vote, and if he did not he would not. That is the position he would occupy in a general election, and he would occupy a no worse and no better position in a byeelection. It is in the direction of the proposition of the amendment, namely, that there should be only one vote for one man. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) remarked that at the local elections, when the principle of an extended franchise for Ontario was submitted and adopted as the result of these elections, we never heard anything of the principle of one man, one vote. Well, in that case, that was a subsidiary principle involved in the great extension of the franchise; but if that is a good argument, how much better argument does it present for this Bill not being proceeded with, because we never heard anything of the Bill at the elections in 1832. If that is a necessary result of the wide extension of the franchise that has taken place in Ontario, it follows, almost of necessity, that this is not an equally great extension of the franchise, no matter what hon. gentlemen may say, unless a similar principle becomes a necessity in the working of this law. It is incontrovertpersonation. I sympathise with the views of the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Hesson), that there should be a provision that every man should have one vote; and if, as the Minister of Customs stated the other night, the effect of adopting the one man, one vote principle, would be to deprive him of his vote, I would certainly not advocate it as strongly as I do. I can conceive, within the limits of that principle, that the opportunity should be given to gentlemen occupying similar positions to himself, whereby they could vote; but what I do object to is, that one man should have half a dozen votes.

Amendment negatived.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am going to propose an amendment to the 7th section, and leave it to the consideration of the Government. I move, after the word "registration," in the 18th line, to substitute for the remainder of the section, the following words:—

And persons qualified otherwise under this Act as voters shall only be registered as voters, and vote in the electoral district where the property in respect of which they are qualified, is situate; provided aways, that persons registered in more than one electoral district shall not vote in more than one district in the same election.

That practically enables every man to vote who has property anywhere, but he must make his selection.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to say that I see no reason why stipendiary and police magistrates should be disqualified. Stipendiary magistrates are not appointed by this Government, and they receive compensation from the municipalities. However, we can express our views on that matter on the motion for the third reading.

Mr. VAIL. The stipendiary magistrates are only paid by fees.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In Quebec, stipendiary magistrates, police magistrates and recorders are all paid.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). In towns over 5,000 inhabitants, in Ontario, it is necessary, under the law, to appoint a police magistrate, and the municipalities pay him. It is optional in towns under 5,000 inhabitants for the town to appoint them, and they can pay by salary or fees as they please. In many towns of Ontario, under 5,000 inhabitants, they have appointed police magistrates, and they are paid by fees; but as he is the only magistrate that can act in that town the business is confined to him, which makes it an inducement to the municipality to appoint them. I think it would be clearly an injustice to deprive such an officer of a vote, where he is paid no salary, and where he assumes the responsibilities of the office largely as an honorary officer. Stipendiary magistrates, I believe, are in a different position, and, of course, magistrates in cities are paid by the cities.

Mr. BOWELL. They are appointed by the Local Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The principle which applies to a magistrate is on account of his position during election times. If he takes an active part in elections, or if he votes, prisoners may be brought before him at that particular time, and it was with that idea that these officers were disqualified under the old law. It is the same principle that disqualifies judges of the Supreme Court—that they should be perfectly free and independent, and should not mix with politics.

Mr. VAIL. I do not think that there is a stipendiary magistrate in the Province of Nova Scotia, except in the city of Halifax, who is appointed by the Local Government. All the rest are appointed by the municipalities, and, so far as I know, they get no pay—at least, that is the case in Digby.

Mr. BERGIN. The police magistrates are appointed by the Local Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). So are all magistrates, and if the principle is correct, the hon gentleman should disfranchise all of them. But it is not in towns alone that difficulties arising under the election law are dealt with by the magistrates, as those in townships would be in many cases in the same position. Why you should debar a police magistrate from voting and allow a justice of the peace to vote, who performs the same class of duties, is a distinction which I cannot understand.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman himself, a moment ago, supplied the reason. Police magistrates are not in the same position as justices of the peace, for, as he told us, they perform all the duties of a magistrate.

Mr. CAMERON. And what does he get for it?

Mr. BERGIN. He is paid.

Mr. CAMERON. It does not follow that a police magistrate gets a salary, as the municipality may get the appointment made without salary.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, gentleman may be correct, but I never knew of a case where there was an appointment without salary. In Stratford the salary fixed at first was $700, and shortly after the appointment the magistrate applied for a larger salary and it was increased. The police magistrate has much larger judicial powers than an ordinary justice of the peace, and I think he should be removed as much as possible from the sphere of politics, especially as cases often come before him arising out of elections, where party feelings run high and where suspicion might be aroused, even if it was not justified.

Mr. VAIL. All these magistrates administer the same law. The only difference is, that the stipendiary magistrate is confined within a small radius, while a justice of the peace has jurisdiction over a whole county.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is a stipendiary magistrate not paid?

Mr. VAIL. Outside of Halifax I do not think there is one who is paid a salary in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then they are not stipendiary magistrates, because a stipendiary magistrate is one who is paid a stipend.

Mr. VAIL. They are paid by fees.

Mr. KIRK. Whatever may be the case in Halifax in some portions of Nova Scotia they are appointed by the municipal council and are paid by fees. While I can see a good reason why the judges of the various courts should be disfranchised, I cannot see why the judges or the recorders of the Probate Court should be disfranchised. They are not paid by salaries, but by fees, and in many counties the labor and the fees are very small.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that the following clause, which I have taken from the Nova Scotia Franchise Bill, and which I think a very good one, be inserted in the section, applicable to all voters:

In the case of sons of farmers or of owners other than farmers, the time spent by such sons, as mariners or fishermen, or as students in any institution of learning, within the Dominion of Canada, shall be considered as spent at home.

Amendment agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have the Government received any further intelligence from the North-West that they are able to communicate to the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only information we have received is from certain sources, but not from an official of the Government—that the prisoners who were taken in the late raid by Poundmaker have been all released, and that Poundmaker or his band have sent a sort of flag of truce, wanting to know on what terms they may surrender.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 9,

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps before the right hon. gentleman moves his motion with regard to the Indian clause, we might, on this side, propose our amendment with regard to revising barristers. The amendment is:

That no revising officer of any electoral district, while he is revising officer, or for five years thereafter, shall be qualified to be a candidate in any electoral district, or in any part of which he has been such revising officer.

It seems to me that is a reasonable proposition. It is, I believe, similar to the provision of the law of England, and is consistent with the principle of equity—that a gentleman who has been engaged in the preparation of the voters' lists in any electoral division, ought not himself to be a candidate in that division while he is revising officer or for some time thereafter; otherwise he might have very strong inducements to prepare a list in his own interest. We ought to seek, so far as we can, under the provisions of the law to prevent parties who have a particular public duty to perform, not to undertake the discharge of that duty where their interest and the public interests may conflict with each other. I think that view is sound, and is strictly applicable in this case. In England the party who acts as revising officer cannot become a candidate for representation in the electoral district for which he has acted.

Mr. CASEY. I think no one can hesitate to adopt this amendment in order to prevent the possibility of the revising officer making a list upon which his own election may turn. It is quite clear that if it be proper for a Government official to make the list in any case, it would be exceedingly improper and fail of any possibility to secure a fair voter's list to allow such person known to be a candidate to prepare the list on which the election would be held. Even although he were a most honest and exemplary person, no one would believe that his decisions were impartial Sir John A. Macdonald.

and fair. There is no doubt that the revising officer should be prohibited from being a candidate for a certain period after he has prepared the voters' list, but what that period should be remains to be determined.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would at once say that, if the hon, gentleman would alter his amendment by which it would be provided that no revising officer shall be a candidate at any election where a list settled by him would be used, I would at once assent to it. But I will not go farther and make it a matter of prohibition, of disqualification for five years as though he had done something wrong, in like manner as a man is disqualified during eight years for bribery. I admit the proposition that no revising officer, whether county judge or otherwise, should be a candidate if the list on which the election would be held has been settled by such revising officer.

Mr. BLAKE. I am inclined to think that five years would be too long a time; but the right hon, gentleman also errs in his contention. I cannot remember the provisions of the English Act, but speaking from a memory which is not too strong on the point, I think it mentions two years. However, I have asked an hop member to obtain the English Act. The principle that this would be a penal disqualification does not apply to the case. What is wanted is so to prevent its being the interest of the revising officer to act unfairly because he knows that he may very soon be a candidate; and it is important to fix a term of years, not so long as five, after the preparation of the list during which the revising officer cannot become a candidate. You want to let the revising officer know that when he is preparing the voters' list, he cannot for a certain number of years, long enough to eliminate all matters so far as questions of self-interest are concerned, become a candidate. That is the object, and, if I mistake not, that object is sought to be accomplished, not by what the hon. gentleman proposes, but by providing a certain specified time after the lists have been prepared during which a revising officer cannot become a candidate. Human nature is much the same across the Atlantic as here, and an analogous clause to that in the English Act should be introduced into this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To show my anxious desire to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather to meet their suggestions whenever reasonable, I will agree, if the term be made two years, to accept the amendment. I will give a reason. If this Bill passes, the voters' lists will be settled in 1886. We must have an election in 1887, and therefore the list in 1886 is the first basis on which the subsequent revision in 1887 may take place. Allowing for the depravity of human nature, if we could suppose such a thing, the revising officer, if he were not fit to be a revising officer, might settle the list in 1886, hoping that his successor in 1887, if he resigned, would not materially alter the lists so as to affect the general election. So without waiting for the English precedent, and the term I do not remember, I have no objection to making the term two years.

Mr. MILLS. I am quite ready to accept that.

Amendment, as amended by inserting two years instead of five, agreed to.

Mr. CASEY. I think there is another class of persons who should be excluded from the exercise of the franchise. I refer to a large number of those who constitute the Civil Service of the country. I am not prepared to say how far this exclusion should go, but it is quite evident that there are a very large number of persons in the Dominion, a disproportionate number in this city, and a large number in any city where there is a large Customs and Post Office—persons who are employed in the Civil Service at considerable salaries, whose living depends on the places they hold, who are supposed to be non-political in the execution of their duties, and yet who are allowed by this Bill to cast votes, the result of which may be to oust from office those who appointed them, or to bring back to office those from whom they expect favors in their profession. Now I think that is anomalous. I have the highest respect for the greater number of the members of the Civil Service, and I do not think it is derogating from the character of those gentlemen to say that they, as non-political officers, as persons appointed to execute, not the will of the party but the will of the State, persons requiring to deal with both political parties in the country, and to act as impartial instruments in carrying out the will of the Executive—to because it places him in the embarrassing and dansay that to allow such people to perform political acts is an anomaly. It is always objectionable prima facie to restrict his own political views and his retention in office. the franchise at all, but it is supposed to be exercised by those who are in a position to exercise it with impartiality, with freedom from dictation and from the extraordinary temptations which a place under the Government brings with it. If we had a non-political service, as they have in England, if people entered the service, not by the will of the political head of the Government of the day, or the political head of the Department in which they are employed, and if by means of competitive examinations or some other means all parties could be admitted, if they held office practically during good behavior, if they were allowed to be promoted on their merits and not by caprice or favoritism of a Minister, those temptations might be less, and it might be possible that they could exercise the franchise without danger to the State, or to their character as impartial servants of the State. But I think that now when appointment to office, continuance in office, promotion in office, and amount of salary, depend upon the will of the head of the Government or the head of the Department for the time being, it is not safe for the State, it is not safe for the Civil Service, to allow those dependent persons to exercise the franchise. It may be said, as it has been said, that the ballot would be an efficient protection to civil servants against the danger of their being driven to the polls en masse to vote for their superior. I admit that in certain cases where there are only a few civil servants in a place, the ballot might be a protection, but in a city like Ottawa, where there is a disproportionately large number of servants, or even in Toronto or Montreal, where there is a large number of them, it would be quite possible for the superiors of those employés to know whether they had voted for the Government or not, as cities like those are pretty carefully canvassed and the proportion of Government supporters and opponents in the Civil Service would be pretty well known to their superiors, at all events, sufficiently so, that a count would show pretty clearly how the great majority of their votes were cast. might not be possible to bring it home to every individual, but the Government would know whether the great majority of them have voted for their party or not, so that in those cases, the ballot will not be an efficient protection to the civil servant himself. But, apart from any fear of compulsion on the part of the Government, it will be in the interest of the civil servants to vote for the party that put them in office, because, under our present partisan system of managing the Civil Service, it is only from that party that he can hope for favors or promotion, unless they are officers of marked efficiency or indispensable in their Departments. Apart, then, from all fear of compulsion, the motive of selfinterest will compel the great bulk of the Civil Service of the day to vote for those who appointed them, and when one party has been a long time in office, of course the Civil Service will be almost wholly of the com-plexion of that party, and the way in which their sons employed in the various Departments of the Govern-influence would be east at the polls, could be determined ment should be loyal to the Government for the large, as in Ottawa, Toronto or Montreal, the provise allowing the civil servants to vote, puts in the hands of the Government of the day, if it has been long in office and has a majority of its friends in the Civil Service, the power of practically deciding the representation of those cities, hecause most cities of the size are so closely divided that the Civil Service will be practically able to carry the election one way or the other. There is no doubt that is the case in Ottawa where the Civil Service vote carries the election. whereas, if they were disfranchised, the result might be different. I do not say that it always carries it, but, when the strength of the condidates is nearly equal, it often does carry it. It is unfair also to the civil servant It is unfair to the State, because it gives those who, under the present system, are the servants of the Government of the day, the power to decide on the representation of cities in which they form a large proportion of the electorate. I think, therefore, that some measure of restriction should be placed on the franchise for civil servants. Some of my friends have perhaps considered the matter more than I have myself, as to how far that restriction should go, and probably they will present amendments embodying their views. Of course there are some men who, though they belong technically to the Civil Service, hold positions of such trifling value, that they could not be considered as influencing their views, and there are others, such as country postmasters, whom I suppose no one proposes to disfranchise. But I think the great majority of the civil servants should be asked to choose when they are offered a position under the Government, between the certainty of considerable income and provision for their old age, and the exercise of that right of the franchise which they would have if they remained outside the service of the Government. The principle must be established that anybody who becomes a civil servant ceases to be a political individual, to take part in political struggles, or to use his vote one way or the other in deciding the destinies of the country. If you allow civil servants to vote, I do not see on what ground you can prevent them from interfering in an election, making speeches or canvassing for one candidate or the other. I know that is a most objectionable thing, but I think not more objectionable than that they should exercise the ultimate right of citizens. For these reasons I hope the hon. gentleman will accept some restriction of this clause.

Mr. MILLS. I move:

That no person holding any office or place in the Civil Service of Canada, to which an annual or other salary is attached, and who may become under the law entitled to a superannuation allowance, shall be entitled to vote at any election of a member for the House of Commons. I trust that the Government will be disposed to accept this amendment; I believe it is in the interest both of the public and the Civil Service that it should be carried. Under this Bill not only judges but even police magistrates are disqualified, who are not officers of either Government, and who are in many cases paid only by fees. If the hon gentleman can go so far-farther than it seems to me in that case than is necessary—it is of infinitely more consequence to the efficiency of the public service and the purity of elections that the principle set out in the amendment I have out into your hands should be accepted. We have in this country adopted the English system of a permanent Civil Service occupied by men who hold office during good behavior. It is of great consequence, in my opinion, that when persons enter the public service they should cease to be partisans. almost to a certainty. So in a city where the service is time, being as it is that the judges should be free from political or personal influence. No one supposes that every judge on the bench, if allowed to exercise the elective franchise, would be biassed in the discharge of his judicial duties on that account; but in order to prevent not only all temptations, and all possibility of being consciously or unconsciously influenced, but also to secure the public confidence in the impartiality of the bench, we provide that those who occupy those judicial positions shall cease to have the right to exercise the elective franchise. Well, it is of just as much public consequence that those employed permanently in the public service should be dealt with in the same way. It is important that every Government should feel that the officers by whom it is surrounded are loyal to it, are not intriguing against it or seeking to embarrass it, and are prepared faithfully to discharge the duties assigned to them. As long as you permit the various public officers to take part in political contests, just so long will it be impossible to have an efficient public service, just so long will it be impossible for the Government to place implicit confidence in those by whom it is surrounded. I would like to know how it is possible that a public officer can discharge his duties in an efficient manner, if he is engaged in a political contest, if he is perhaps seeking to overturn the Government that for the time being he is called on to serve, or is seeking to obtain political support for that Administration, instead of devoting himself loyally to the discharge of the duties of the office which he holds. The present position of our public officials is an anomalous one, and cannot continue. We must choose between neutrality of public officers in politics, or we must determine that those who engage in the public service must go out with the Administration they serve. This is the system prevailing in the United States. It is of great consequence that the public service should be occupied by men of efficiency, but it is of still more consequence that it should be occupied by men who do not endeavor to embarrass the Government. If you adopt the system of allowing persons in the public service to be voters they must make up their minds that their positions cannot be permanent; they must go out with the Government that appoints them. I believe almost every officer in the public service at this time would be pleased to be relieved of the duty of exercising the elective franchise. He is unfairly pressed to go to the polls and vote; if the right of voting is taken away from him, he is no longer to be influenced in that way; he is no longer likely to busy himself about political conflicts, instead of the discharge of his public duties. I remember a public officer who declared that he was sick, who went to a physician and obtained a certificate, and who a week afterwards was found revising the voters' list, contesting the right of some persons in this city to remain on the voters' list, and actively canvassing for a political candidate at the time opposed to the Administration. I know of another public officer who was a member of the municipal council and a member of the Conservative Association of this city, who withdrew himself for some days from the public service and devoted himself to the revision of the voters' list. That condition of things will always continue so long as the present system remains in vogue. In order to get rid of that system and to secure an efficient public service, the right to exercise the elective franchise should be taken away from these permanent public officers, who are expected to serve the public as long as their health remains, and at the end of a long service to be retired on a superannuation allowance. It is open for them to decide, before they enter the public service, whether they will remain freemen to exercise the electoral franchise or become neutral men in politics, devoted to the public service. If they are anxious to exercise the electoral franchise, if they wish to take part in political contests, let them withdraw from the service, Mr. MILLS.

they are in the public service, so long is it important that they should be excluded from the public arena. I hope the Government will accept this amendment. It is in the public interest, it will contribute to the efficiency of the public service, and will do a great deal to remove suspicion in the minds of Ministers from those who are permanently employed in the different Departments.

Mr. SMALL. I would like to ask if the division court clerks and bailiffs, who are immediately under the superintendence of the Attorney General of Ontario, are disquali-

Mr. MILLS. I have not looked at the Act, but I know the division court clerk in my constituency, Mr. Stevens, was actively engaged against me.

Mr. SMALL. That is the one exception.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Every license inspector is an agent of the Ontario Government-I will not say so much for the commissioners—and goes from house to house, in every section of the country, canvassing against the Opposition. In Hastings two of the most active men in the county elections, on the side of the Local Government, are the license commissioner and inspector. A man who had a hotel there for 15 years was refused a license by these men, because he would not vote for their candidate. The inspector, as a rule, considers he gets his $400 a year to act as agent of the Local Government and is most active in elections. The hon, member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) will not deny what I say. Why should not Dominion officials be put on the same footing as the Local Government officials?

Mr. LISTER. The hon, gentleman does not seem to understand the nature of the amendment. It is proposed to disfranchise those civil servants who are directly entitled to be called civil servants, who reap the benefit of the Superannuation Act, but it is not proposed to disfranchise the outside service. Everybody knows that the license commissioners, division court clerks, and bailiffs, are not civil servants in the technical meaning of the word; they are not subject to promotion or superannuation. The license commissioners are not paid; and these officials are not permanently appointed. There is a wide difference between that class and the class treated in this amendment. The hon, gentleman called attention to the political work of those engaged in the outside service. I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the post office of this House, less than a year ago, an official left his place and went canvassing through one of the adjoining counties on behalf of the Government, making speeches to the electors and doing all he could to help the Government candidate. When challenged as being a servant of the Government, he said he had resigned; but within a week after the election he was back in the old place, having been reappointed. There is also the famous Mr. Wilkinson who was appointed to a position in the Weights and Measures Department and as a Government valuator, and who traversed the country from end to end as political agent for his intimate friend the First Minister; and the result was that instead of his being reappointed to the position he had resigned he was given the very valuable and remunerative office of registrar in the North-West. It is all very well for the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) to make the statements he has made, but he has not sustained them by a single particle of evidence. We have the evidence on this side of dozens of cases of Conservatives receiving Government pay and disgracing the position they hold and the Government by taking an active part in elections. The sooner we take the step proposed in the amendment the better. It is not in the interest of any Government, Reform or Conservative, and they will stand exactly as other citizens. So long as that the men who are engaged in the public Departments should be partisan. If our Civil Service were on the same basis as the English Civil Service, where the officials are entirely free from all influence of the Government, it would be well to give our civil servants the right to vote. In England it is not the Government, but a commission appointed free from all bias or partiality, which has to do with the appointments. A man who wants to enter the service is not asked whether he is Conservative or Radical or Reform, but has to depend altogether on his qualifications to fill the position. The men who have the right to appoint them are not the members of the Government, all Government influence. from and are free There we have not the disgraceful scenes we have in this country. There we do not find men who have been appointed to positions in the Civil Service having ten or fifteen years added to their time in order that they may receive an enormous superannuation allowance. These men may have been obliged to resign in order that their places may be filled by some partial man selected by the chief of the Department. We know that these things take place in this country, and when the promotion of a civil servant depends on the friendliness of the first Minister, upon the outside influence he can get, upon the faithfulness of his service to the party which appointed him, it is improper, to say the least, that such a man should have the right to exercise the franchise. It will inevitably come to the principle referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that to the victors belong the spoils. You are shaking the tenure upon which these men hold their offices, and when hon, gentlemen on this side succeed to power, as they will in two years, it is not to be expected that they will assume the control of those different Departments while they are the control of those different Departments while they are full, as they are now, of political partisans of hon. gentlemen opposite. If the result is that these men have to go, and that other men in accord with the principles of those who have the control of affairs have to take their places, they will have to blame hon. gentlemen opposite for it. When we were in power seven the activity of this tory, that many of the civil years ago, it is a matter of history that many of the civil servants were faithless to their chiefs, and the members of the Government had many difficulties to overcome. It is more than you can expect that hon, gentlemen will submit to have men in direct antagonism to them, without one feeling of sympathy for them, who would rather see diffi-culties placed in their way than they would help them, remaining in the Civil Service; and, if the destruction of the present system of Civil Service takes place, hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for it. If there are any Reformers in the service—and I doubt if there are very many we know that they are hounded down, that they are afraid to express an opinion, they are like cowed dogs, afraid to say anything because there are so many around them who will remember what they say; they are afraid to freely exercise the franchise against the party in power for fear that they will lose the position they occupy or the just promotion to which they are entitled. Is it not more just and statesmanlike to say that, when a man accepts a position in the Civil Service, whereby, after a certain number of years of service, he becomes entitled to superannuation, wherein, if he conducts himself properly he will receive due promotion is it. ducts himself properly, he will receive due promotion, is it not better in the interests of Canada and of the service itself that that man should be raised above and beyond all political influence? Would it not have the effect of purifying the Civil Service, of making these men loyal to the country and not to the men who appointed them? Efficiency in the public service is what we are seeking for, it is a desirable thing to attain if it be possible, but, if you allow these men to retain the franchise, as they have it now, it is impossible to have a set of civil servants in the City of Ottawa who can free their minds from the influences which exist. I do not blame them; they cannot help it. No doubt in ernment is altogether and continually in the power of the Ottawa they are very anxious to carry the city, and it is almost impossible for the civil servants to exist in their position if they vote against the Government, er, if they do, they have to vote in a sneaking way and not let anyone know how they vote. Anyone who looks at the matter from an impartial standpoint must see that the position of the civil servants to-day is an unenviable one as far as they are concerned, and is dangerous to the country at large. If we are to have a free, pure civil service, it is absolutely necessary that these men should not exercise the electoral franchise. I hope the First Minister will take this amendment into consideration. These men should be placed above all political parties, they should have but one master to serve, the country at large, not the Conservative party or the Reform party. They should be loyal to the country which pays them, and should take no part whatever in political contests, and, as far as possible, should free their minds from political bias. If the Civil Service were placed in that position, men who came into power would feel that their subordinates would be loyal to them as to those whom they succeeded.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to take advantage of this opportunity to make a stump speech for the country, or to make charges which cannot be substantiated.

Mr. LISTER. You do not do that for nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. What does the hon. gentleman say? He does not answer. If he had as much honesty and courage as he has insinuation, he would repeat his statement. We understand then that he will say privately what he dare not say publicly. This question is important, because if the amendment be carried, it will have the effect of disfranchising a large number who now exercise the franchise. I have heard it stated more than once by hon, gentlemen opposite that, if any person were refused the franchise, or were dis-franchised, the burden would be on those who disfranchised him to prove why it should be done. This proposition will have the effect of disfranchising hundreds and thousands of capable, intelligent citizens, than whom, I suppose, in this country, we have no more capable or more intelligent; and if we are going to adopt that proposition, I think we had better come down to cool and calm grounds, and look it over thoroughly. I am opposed, on the face of it, to taking the right of suffrage away from any intelligent and capable citizen, who has it now, on the sole ground that he is in the service of the country. Gentlemen say that he is in the service of a Government, but, after all, if we have anything underlying the Government, it is the country that is represented in the Government, and it is in the service of the country that these gentlemen are engaged. Now, if you make a comparison between those who are appointees of a Provincial Government, such as my hon. friend near me has referred to, and those who are in the service of the Dominion, I hold that, on all grounds, the vote cannot be so well taken away from the civil servants of the Dominion as it can be from the appointees of the Local Governments. Now, the interests which will sway a civil servant may be divided into three classes. There is, first, the interest of appointment. He gets the appointment, and he is supposed to be, when getting it, a friend of the appointing power; we will take that for granted in reference to both the Local and the Federal Governments. But in the Local Government there is nothing to intervene between the appointing power and the person. There is no test of fitness, and the appointment is in the discretion of the power that makes it. But when you come to the Civil Service of the Dominion, the case is different. The ultimate appointment may be in the power of the Government, but there is a test of fitness which will generally be found to weed out the more incapable of those who undergo the test. Now the appointee of a local gov-authority that appointed him. He can be dismissed at any time by the same power that appointed him. He holds his position, not by virtue of any law, but by the will of the power that appointed him. But in the Civil Service of the Dominion, after the appointees have passed the test of examination, they hold their positions permanently during good behaviour. They may get their appointments under one Government, but you take the civil servants at any period of time, and you will find that a very large portion of them have not got their appointments under the Government which, for the time being, holds sway. Now, there is the other inducement of pay. The local appointees get their pay directly from the Provincial Government, and at the favor and grace of the Provincial Government; but the civil servants of the Dominion get their pay according to fixed law, according to the regulations of the service, and the Government of the day, and the department under the Government, have not sole power with reference to those persons. Their pay is fixed on a regular scale, which is laid down by law, and our appointments in the Civil Service of the Dominion are as a rule, permanent appointments. Then there is the interest of continuation. No one will doubt that in this matter, Dominion civil servants have by far the advantage in the relative argument; they are more permanent, by the very nature of their appointment and the nature of their service, than are the appointees of the Local Governments. So I say, on the comparative view, you cannot consistently deny the civil servants of the Dominion the right of the franchise, because they are interested parties, and yet give it to the appointees of the local powers. Then, if you take the question on the broad ground of right, what reason is there that an intelligent man in the pay of his country, should be denied the highest right of a citizen, to have a practical share in the Government of the country? Does he not know as much, probably, as any other man of similar capacity, about the country, about its needs and requirements? He is able to form a far more intelligent idea, because he is nearer the seat of Government and comes in contact with a great many sources of information that others cannot possibly have. The one ground that is strongly urged against giving him the franchise is this: he may be a partisan. So he may be a partisan, but not necessarily so. I believe, if we take the 700 or 800 civil servants in the Inside Service to-day, you will find that the greater part of them are not amenable to the charge of partisanship, and I believe you will find that very few of them are partisans in the sense in which some hon, gentlemen have spoken. But do hon gentlemen suppose that refusing the right to vote from an intelligent man takes away from him all interest in politics? If they do think so, they are greatly mistaken. The highest interest a man takes in politics, the doepest patriotism which he feels, does not depend upon the right to vote; it springs from far higher and better metives, and a right to vote is simply one way he has of expressing the interest which, on other grounds, he holds in his country. Is there a man outside who earns his pay any more certainly than the civil servant of this country? Is he not worth that which is given him? Is not the salary paid him as a fair reward for his services?—not as a charity, not as a gratuity, but as earning his pay, and being an intelligent and capable servant, he ought not to be deprived of his right to vote.

Mr. MILLS. So is the judge.

Mr. FOSTER. The position of a judge and that of a civil servant are very different indeed, and the hon. member for Bothwell knows it right well, and the mere captious remark he interjects cannot be fairly sustained. My own belief is that a civil servant, under our present rules, should not be deprived of his franchise. There may be occasionally partisans, but it is not right because one, or two, or three, Mr. Foster.

may be partisans, that the great body of civil servants should be disfranchised.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman has assumed that there is a clear distinction between a judge being refused the right to exercise the franchise and a civil servant occupying an equally prominent position; and he assumed that that distinction was present in the minds of every member of the committee; but he failed to tell us wherein that distinction lay. I would have been pleased, and perhaps convinced, had the hon, gentleman shown some reason why he is in favor of disqualifying a judicial officer and in favor of retaining the franchise for Civil Service appointees.

Mr. FOSTER. I supposed you would all know that, without my telling you.

Mr. DAVIES. It is not plain to my mind-

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is to my mind.

Mr. DAVIES. And I hope, before the debate closes, that we will have from the hon. gentleman more light. I think he stated very fairly that where it is proposed to disfranchise any class of the community, the onus of proving that they should loose their franchise rests upon those who make the motion. I think the onus does lie upon those who propose to disfranchise the civil servants, of proving that the proposition is a sound one. What good reasons have been advanced? It has been stated already, and it is a statement with which I thoroughly agree, that there is no greater benefit conferred on the State than that of giving it a thoroughly good Civil Service; and if there was a Civil Service in Canada placed upon a foundation which left appointments open to considerations of merit and not of political partisanship of favor, and if subsequent promotion were made upon merit and not upon political favor, then it would appear very harsh to disfranchise civil servants. But does any hon, gentleman imagine that by merely making the statement that appointments to the service, or promotion afterwards, are based on anything approaching merit, any man would believe him? Any man on either side of politics, the veriest child in the country, knows that the only passport to appointments and to promotions is political favor. The civil servants are political partisans, and are thoroughly imbued with the idea that in order to show a reason for their promotion they must prove themselves to be thorough-faced partisans. With respect to the Civil Service in the Maritime Provinces, will the hon. member for King's declare that any man would hope to obtain a position in the Service unless he was a thorough-faced political partisan?

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the inside service?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows more than that: that when a person has been appointed to the Service, if he has any hope of promotion, he bases that hope simply upon service he can do to the party which has appointed him. I take my experience in my own county at the last election. The most bitter partisans I had to meet, the men who went from house to house, the men who worked quickest to circulate political falsehoods and lies, who took the stump against me, were men occupying positions in the Civil Service. There are very few members on this side of the House, especially from the Maritime Provinces, but will support the position I have taken. If you grant these premises, I submit that sufficient grounds have been made out for disfranchising civil servants. You must adopt one or two alternatives. Place the civil servants on a proper basis; and it is the interest of both political parties, of the Service and of the State generally, that the Service should be placed upon a basis other than a political one. The right to enter that Service should depend upon merit, upon the result of competitive examinations, not on having member of the Government as a friend. Did the hon. member for King's when he made the statement, as to the test of fitness, mean to imply that appointments are made on the ground of fitness? Does he not know, what the country knows, that the examinations are a farce, and that there are now six or seven hundred young men who have already passed the test and are now awaiting appointments. Will the hon. gentleman say that members of the Reform party are appointed? What a farce it is. The hon. member for King's knows that it is worse than not having any test whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to offer a personal explanation. The hon. gentleman would intimate that I said merit was the test. I distinctly stated that, for argument's sake, I would admit that appointments went by political favor; but, interposing between that and the great mass of applicants, was this test. The hon. gentleman should have been fair enough to have given me credit for that statement.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman argued on two lines. One was a comparative one, and the other was as to the matter of right and wrong. The hon, gentleman drew a distinction in favor of Dominion officials as compared with the officials of the Local Governments, and pointed out that the test of fitness applied to the former appointees and not to the appointees of the Local Governments.

Mr. FOSTER. And I did not state the other.

Mr. DAVIES. I have tried to show, and I think I have succeeded, that the test of fitness is merely a nominal one, which is productive more of evil than of good, because the test of fitness is used for the purpose of leading the public to believe that politics do not enter into the matter of appointments, while, as a matter of fact, they do. Why do the Government not put the Civil Service on a good footing and leave it open to young men, irrespective of politics? Because they want to wield the Civil Service as a political weapon; they have used it as such in times past, and they intend to do so in the future. In some of the Provinces the appointments to the Local Government Service are made on the United States system—to the victors belong the spoils. They take part in political campaigns and assume the responsibility of their actions. If the opposite party come into power, they go out. Here you put up a nominal barrier, which throws the responsibility off their shoulders, while, at the same time, you allow them to become partisans and commit all the evils they can. The other test was to make promotions in the Service depend upon merit. Does the hon, member for King's believe that such is the case?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. I have not heard the hon gentleman to whom I put this question reply. I assert, with strong confidence, that promotion depends, to a very large extent, upon political favor.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Nonsense.

Mr. DAVIES. I am acquainted with members of the Civil Service in Ottawa, and there is not one but has told me, when I-put the question to him, that unless he was a political favorite he had no hope of promotion.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What about Mr. Burgess and Mr. Parmelee?

Mr. DAVIES. I have not heard that Mr. Burgess, of late years, has been a very strong Reformer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear,

Mr. DAVIES. I have not heard it alleged against him, as one of his offences, that he sympathises very strongly with the Reform party. And if hon gentlemen opposite, out of six hundred cases, are only able to name one case, the exception would simply prove the rule.

Mr. BOWELL. What do you say in regard to my Department, where leading Reformers, appointed by your own people, have been promoted?

Mr. DAVIES. I say nothing about the hon, gentleman's Department; I am dealing with the general condition of things. If I am wrong in my belief that merit, and and merit alone, should be the test of appointment to the Civil Service, of promotion in the Civil Service, of obtaining superannuation—that the ground should be based on fair play and justice—prove that I am wrong, and I will vote against the amendment.

An hon, MEMBER. Not a bit of it.

Mr. DAVIES. I know where men have been superannuated and large sums added to their superannuation amount because of their political services. Hon. gentlemen know it; the names have been brought down to the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Bring them down.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon, gentlemen brought them down last Session, and they were challenged to point out if this was not the case. I think I can advance—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Go on.

Mr. DAVIES. I can go on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, do it.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman remembers that a few years ago, when the superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway became poorly, he had not been very many years—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hardly think the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. DAVIES. I am perfectly willing to go into it, and I make the statement, at any rate, that there are such cases within my own knowledge. I have made the statement before, in the presence of the former Minister of Railways, who was responsible for the matter, or I would not make it now. I make the statement that political services and favoritism had a great deal to do with the amount awarded in the superannuation of the late superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway; and I say, therefore, that the basis upon which the hon. member for King's argues the question is a false basis, because he assumes the existence of facts which do not exist; he assumes a proper Civil Service system, one somewhat akin to that of the mother country, where merit alone is required, and political services are ignored. But surely there is hardly a member in this House but will acknowledge that no man in the Civil Service expects promotion unless he is able to show a political record to his superiors which will justify his promotion. If that is the state of facts-

Mr. BOWELL. Those are not the facts.

Mr. DAVIES. If that is the state of affairs, and it is the state of affairs which I derive from an examination of the records—

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, no.

Mr. DAVIES, I ask the hon. member for Cardwell to read the superannuation list.

Mr. WHITE. We have been discussing promotions in the Departments.

Mr. DAVIES. If he will look at the number of years added to those who receive superannuation, and inquire into their political opinions, he will find that my statements are correct, and I know it from personal conversation with members of the Civil Service in this city. I find a unanimous consensus of opinion from all of them that political service has a great deal to do with promotion in the Civil Service. That being the case, you must adopt one or two courses: either put the Service on a basis irrespective of politics altogether, which would be in the interest of both parties and the public in general—either do that or adopt the United States system, and let them go out on a change of Government, as the parties who appoint them go out, and let the next party which comes in have men in the Departments in whom they have confidence—you must do either one or the other of those things, or else you should disfranchise the civil servants from exercising political privileges. The hon, gentleman asserts that, if they are disfranchised, they will still retain their political proclivities, and do a great deal to advance what they believe to be the interest and welfare of the State. But, supposing they do that, that is not where the harm is done.

An hon, MEMBER. The harm is done by the vote, then?

Mr. DAVIES. These men feel themselves in an awkward position; they want to exercise the franchise, but they feel that they dare not do it in the way they would like to-

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). What is to prevent them?

Mr. DAVIES. Because they would incur the political enmity of their superiors.

An hon, MEMBER. What about the ballot?

Mr. DAVIES. Is the hon. gentleman green enough, or does he imagine that I am green enough to believe that, because we have the ballot, the way he votes is not known.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh; hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. I suppose the hon, member comes to this conclusion, that he is willing to let the civil servant deposit his ballot, but he is never, by word or sign, to express his sympathy with one party or the other.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). You do not propose to let him do that by this Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. They are merely men, and if they take a strong political view, one way or the other, they will express it or it will be dragged out of them by those who, as an hon. member behind me has said, are nothing more nor less than spies in the Department, who report it to their superiors-I know it myself—report to their political superiors how they vote. I believe, from what I have heard of the Civil Service in Ottawa, that the whole system is a carefully prepared political system, for the purpose of promoting the interest of the present party and continuing them in power. Now, Sir, before I sit down, let me say a word with reference to the hon, member for East Hastings. I was for some time in doubt as to the real secret of the continued success of the Hon. Oliver Mowat and his Administration in Ontario. I think, in listening to this debate, I have discovered it. The Hon. Oliver Mowat has laid down his standard of right and wrong, and it is so perfect in the eyes of hon, gentlemen opposite

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh; hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Let those laugh who win. The hon, gentlemen, I say, believe that the standard laid down by Mr. Mowat is so perfect that he always concludes his arguments by referring to what Mr. Mowat has done, and what he has not done. The question comes up of disfranchising the Civil Service. Well, it may be right or it may be wrong, but the hon, gentleman says, let us see what Mr. Mowat has done. If he has done it, well and good, but if not you cannot vote for it. This is the argument and the only argument, and I appeal to the committee to say if that is not the case with the hon. gentleman. The laughter of the hon. member for East Hastings has ceased. What is the matter? Why does he not laugh now? Mr. Mowat allows division court clerks and bailiffs to vote. Mr. Mowat must be right, Mr. DAVIES.

because he must believe that the standard set up by Mr Mowat is a perfect standard, and he tries to adapt everything to it; though, if it does not suit him, he is apt to make reflections on the Administration in Ontario. For those reasons, and believing, as I do, that entrance into the Civil Service, promotion in it afterwards, and superannuation subsequently, are largely and improperly based upon political merit and favoritism. Until that system is remodelled and placed on a better basis I will support the principle of the amendment.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The hon, gentleman made a remark that the Local Government of Ontario had appointed certain officers. Well, if that is the case, it certainly makes them more partisan, more anxious for the success of the party who appointed them. I remember the time whem municipal councils had the appointment of license inspectors, and we had no such trouble, so far as efficiency is concerned, as we have now. What I was finding fault with was that the license commissioners and inspectors appointed by Mr. Mowat were going around using their influence against the present Government, and in favor of the present Opposition.

Mr. BLAKE. Was that right?

Mr. WHITE. I do not think it is right; but where are there any Dominion civil servants who do the same thing? Can the hon, gentleman point out where? Mr. Lalley, the gentleman appointed as inspector in East Hastings, goes from house to house and from place to place electioneering for Gritism. I can take the petitions that have been presented to the House, and I can point out where a party has signed name after name, and he was appointed by Mr. Mowat. If the hon, leader of the Opposition believes that it is wrong for Dominion officials to interfere in elections, why, in the name of common sense, does he not prevent Mr. Mowat from doing wrong? Does he not control him?

Mr. BLAKE. No; no more than he controls me.

Mr. WHITE. I am surprised at a gentleman so candid as the hon, leader of the Opposition making such a statement. Does any man believe to-day that had it not been for the leader of the Opposition Mr. Wheler would have been appointed to the position he occupies? Of course the hon, gentleman got him appointed, and why? Not because he was so much better fitted for the position than any other man, but simply because the Grits knew Mr. Edgar would be elected to the place. It is as plain as noonday. Did not the hon. gentleman write to the Reformers of that county, saying that he wanted Mr. Edgar elected—that he wanted his assistance? If he could control Mr. Mowat to appoint Mr. Wheler, and could control the Reformers of West Ontario to elect Mr. Edgar, I ask him to control Mr. Mowat to appoint men who will not interfere in elections. I ask the hon. gentleman to point out any part of Ontario where Dominion officials have taken an active part in political contests. We do not know of any in our part of the country. We do not ask or expect them to do so. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) made a remark that I think was very unbecoming of an hon. member of this House. He said that when the elections took place the civil servants were forced to go and vote favorably to the Government, and he said they acted like cowardly dogs, or cowed dogs. He compared the civil servants to cowed dogs. I think that is unfair in any hon gentleman. I believe the mem-bers of the Civil Service are as fair, and honest, and impartial a class of men as there are in the country. When the Ballot Bill was introduced into this House I voted against it, and I would do so to morrow. I like to see what side a man is on; but I would remind the and therefore we should not disqualify. Why does not the hon, gentleman argue it as a matter of right and wrong in itself, irrespective of what Mr. Mowat does? Simply say, in that eloquent tone that he is gifted with, that it was necessary, so that the employes of a large employer of labor should have the ballot to screen them. Well, under the ballot who can tell how a civil servant vote. Who can tell how any man votes who goes behind the screen and marks his ballot? Very few men tell us how they vote, and it is against the law to do it. I never took the trouble to ask a man how he voted; and it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite, before they talk as they do of the Civil Service of the Dominion, to clean their own doorstep, and to cause the man they control and keep in power to prevent his civil servants from taking an active part in elections.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not rise to take any active part in the discussion; but with reference to what the hon. gentleman has said of me, personally, I wish to say that I have no control whatever over Mr. Mowat, any more than Mr. Mowat has control over me. Our spheres of action are, as I have always conceived, entirely different. I have to deal with the politics of the Dominion as the leader, however inadequate, of the Liberal party of the Dominion; my hon. friend, the Attorney General of Ontario, has to deal with the provincial politics of the Province, and in these I interfere very little, indeed, although I have always felt at liberty to interfere, and have interfered, by addressing my fellow-countrymen at times of general elections. With reference to the crucial test to which the hon, gentleman refers, I beg to say to him that neither to Mr. Mowat nor to any member of his Government who had any authority whatever, did I ever say a word or write a word or make an intimation with reference to the appointment of Mr. Wheler; nor did I ever communicate with the constituency of West Ontario, until I was informed by Mr. Wheler himself, as he thought it his duty to inform me, that he was about to accept an appointment, which had been arranged with the Local Government; and upon being so informed, I did what I believe I had a right to do—I sent a letter, in answer to an enquiry from several of my friends, as to the man who I thought should succeed to the nomination of the party for the vacancy about to take place. I answered their enquiry, and named my hon, friend the present member for West Ontario; I said it was not my business to choose; it was their own business; but to those who asked I would not refuse to give my advice. They were good enough to accept my advice, and my hon, friend sits here for the good of his party as well as for the good of the country.

Mr. TASSE. I intend to vote against the amendment, for several reasons, which I will explain. In the first place, the object of this Bill is to enlarge the franchise, and the purpose of the amendment is to restrict it. In the second place, it has been stated that the Civil Service employees desire the passage of an amendment of that kind. I think that statement was made by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I would like to know on what authority that hon, gentleman says that the Civil Service of the country desire to be deprived of the franchise.

Mr. DAVIES. Their own statements—numbers of them. Mr. TASSÉ. I would like to know what are those statements; they have not yet been submitted to the House. I believe, on the contrary, that the Civil Service employes desire to continue to exercise the right of voting which they have exercised so far to the satisfaction of the country. It has been stated by the hon, member for Queen's that they could not vote with perfect liberty. For what reason? Is it because we have secret voting in this country? Is it because we have the ballot, which hon. gentlemen opposite advocated for so many years? Is it because the ballot fails to ensure to the voters of this country the utmost freedom is opposed to the disfranchisement of civil servants, but the that hon, gentlemen opposite desire that an important fact that he is opposed to the assential that he population should be deprived of the right to vote? The hon, member for Queen's, P.E.L. (Mr. Davies), has stated that the Liberal members of a clean sweep and putting in a considerable number of civil servants, but the fact that he is opposed to the disfranchisement of civil servants, but the merits of the case. Should the Opposition come into power at the next election, what is there to prevent them making at horself the servants are proposed to the disfranchisement of civil servants, but the fact that he is opposed to the disfranchisement of civil servants, but the merits of the case. Should the Opposition come into power at the next election, what is there to prevent them making at least that the liberal members of a clean sweep and putting in a considerable number of civil servants.

the service in Ottawa are considered as mere spies. have been in Ottawa several years; I had the honor of being an officer of the House, and I know something of what is going on in the various offices, and I beg to say that the statement of the hon, gentleman is most unfounded. We all know that among the most important officers in the Departments are to be found Liberals. Among the various Deputy Ministers are found prominent Liberals; Liberals are found also among the chief clerks and other officials, and none of them are considered as spies; on the contrary they are considered and respected as they should be. I was employed in the service of the House for several years, in the translator's branch, and I may say that of the six officers in that branch 1 was the only Conservative. This, in itself, is sufficient to show that all the employes of the Government are far from being Conservatives. Now, it has been said that the Government try to influence the civil servants in order to make them vote for Conservative candidates. Well, I have been twice a candidate for the city of Ottawa. The seat which I have the honor to occupy was previously filled by a French-speaking Liberal, and I had the honor to capture that seat in 1878 against all the influence of the Mackenzie Administration. Although the then Prime Minister himself did me the honor of visiting my constituency and addressing the electors against my candidature, I was elected then, despite the influence of the Liberal Government. I was re-elected in 1882, with the influence of the Conservative party, the same influence that elected me in 1878; and if Ottawa was represented from 1874 to 1878 by a Liberal, and since by a Conservative, that fact shows that the civil servants of Ottawa exercise their right to vote with the utmost liberty and freedom. If there is one class of the population which is entitled to vote on account of its intelligence, it is assuredly the Civil Service of Canada, which, both by talent and efficiency, can be compared favorably with any similar class in either the adjoining Republic or Great Britain.

Mr. DAVIES. I desire to correct a very important error into which the hon member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) has fallen. He charged me with stating that the Liberal officials in the Civil Service were spies.

Mr. TASSÉ. Were considered spies.

Mr. DAVIES. I not only did not say so, but such a thing was not in my mind. So far from charging the Liberal officials of the Service with being spies, I must say that all those I know are gentlemen. What I said was, that there are members in the Civil Service who are prevented from freely exercising the franchise, or expressing the political sympathies, one way or the other, because of their existence in the Departments of spies. I do not charge Conservative members of the Service with being spies. I know a great many of them who are gentlemen; but I say there are spies, who make it a point to report the political proclivities of officials who oppose the Administration. That is known to the Service.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) told us, quite unnecessarily, that he was going to vote against the amendment "for various reasons." I should suppose he had something between 500 and 700 reasons for opposing it, for that would represent the proportion in which the civil servants of Ottawa voted at his election. Were this amendment adopted it would simply cut away the ground on which he stands, and seriously endanger, probably destroy, his prospect of continuing to hold his seat. No wonder he is opposed to the disfranchisement of civil servants, but the servants whose votes would elect any member we chose for have been misled, but it has been rumored that political Ottawa? Would the hon gentleman then object to the dis-franchisement of the service as strongly as he does now? He asked what Civil Service employees desire to be deprived of the right to vote. The hon, member for P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) said that some civil servants did so desire. Perhaps the hon, member for Ottawa would like to know their names, but I think he should be satisfied with the assurance of the hon. gentleman, and not enquire further. I hope he will be satisfied with his assurance that there are some members of the Civil Service who do not want to be called upon to make an invidious choice between their political opinions and those superiors on whom their bread and butter depends. He wants to know whether the ballot does not secure the utmost freedom of action; whether, under the ballot, it is possible to know how people vote, and who can tell how the Civil Service are going to vote? I think the two members for Ottawa city can generally tell how they are going to vote. I think they had an idea before the last election.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. The other member for the city of Ottawa says yes, that they had. No doubt they canvassed them. They would have been very foolish not to canvass them, under the present system. It is then established, on the confession of one of the members for the city of Ottawa, that they knew how the Civil Service were going to vote. Does the hon. member for Ottawa who has spoken on this subject (Mr. Tassé), mean to say that the civil servants are of such a character that they cannot tell how they are going to voteafter they have stated how they will vote, that they cannot be believed? I do not believe he has any such intention; I do not believe he saw the consequences of the statement he was making; but in that statement he insulted the whole Civil Service. The idea of asking whether the ballot secures secrecy in reference to the way in which a man votes! I do not suppose that one civil servant out of ten would refuse to answer the question as to how he was going to vote; and, if he did, his refusal would give the answer. That man would have magnificent chances for promotion; he would have a very powerful claim upon the hon members for Ottawa when the next vacancy occurred! It is clear that the members for the city of Ottawa know to a nicety, know to a man, how every member of the Civil Service will vote, if he votes at all. The only question will be: Does he vote? There can be no mistake of that point. The list is in the hands of the committee, and if they vote it is known whether they voted Reform or Conservative. Is it hard to find how many of the Civil Service have supported their temporary masters, how many have refused to vote, and how many have gone out to support the Opposition? It is not hard to understand what will follow the casting up of this balance sheet. It is not hard to see that those who voted will feel the effects sooner or later. No one has contended that no civil servant was promoted for merit. The service would not last five years if no one was promoted for merit. They must promote some persons who have made themselves indispensable, but a Reformer must be very indispensable indeed before he has any chance of high promotion. We all know that the general rule is that those who are of Liberal antecedents, and show no extraordinary merit, sufficient to make themselves indispensable, must be content with the annual increment of $50, until they reach the head of their class, and must wait there until the Government is forced to promote one of them occasionally; but, while this process is going on, political friends of the Government are being taken in and put over the heads of those who ought to have been promoted. It is not only this Government that Mr. CASEY.

favoritism has influenced the acts of every Government in Canada. The question has been asked, in a sneering way, across the House: Can you give any instance of partisanship? I know there are a number of people in the Civil Service who have no particular political views, who have been so long in the Service that they have come to be mere executive machines, and do not care about parties at all. But most of them are not so. They were put in the Service because they were political partisans or the friends of political partisans, and no doubt they preserve the same views, unless they are miserable turncoats, who have been bought by an office to desert their party. I do not say that there are any of that kind; I do not know that there are any; but it is possible to imagine one. We are asked if the Service is partisan as a whole. I think the answer must be, that if it is not partisan as a whole, there is a majority of partisans in it. The length of time the Conservative party has been in power, during the last thirty or forty years, has greatly exceeded the time the Reform party has been in power. As to particular cases. We had an instance of a Mr. Gray, an employe of the House of Commons Post Office, I believe, who was sent out to do political work. Then there was Mr. Evanturel, who was a civil servant when my hon. friend from East York was in power, who canvassed against the Government of which he was a servant. Political partisanship may be exercised both ways. After Mr. Evanturel went out of the Service he received his reward. He received a retiring allowance of $1,000, and he was made the Conservative candidate for Prescott county, for the Local House against Mr. Hagar. Was he a partisan, and did his partisanship d him any good? The members for Ottawa would answer in the negative, no doubt. But there are more unpleasant ways in which partisanship has been shown. It has been published in the papers that a certain person named Dionne, in connection with one named Garon, the former being an employe of the Department of Public Works, were fined in the police court for inciting a number of persons, mostly belonging to the Civil Service; in fact, for heading a mob of these persons and creating a disturbance in a meeting at St. Anne's, in this city. When the partisanship of the Service breaks out in such a disagreeable form as this we cannot shut our eyes to it. I do not say that the whole of the Service is parti-There are a number who are impartial, and a number who are indifferent; but the newer part of the Service, those who are fresh from receiving their reward, are active partisans of the Government, and it has never been the policy for the present Government to discourage that partisanship. The hon, member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) went into a long eulogy of the ability of the civil servants—as if that had anything to do with the case. He was asked: Is not a judge just as able and just as well qualified as a civil servant? And he said there was a great difference between the two cases. So there is a great difference, and it is this: that the judge may be assumed to be an infinitely superior man, mentally, and to have a greater stake in the country, and to have a clearer comprehension of political issue, than any member, except the highest grade, of the Civil Service. Another difference is, that the judge is absolutely independent of the Government of the day. He holds his office during good behavior, and can only be removed by misconduct, or a breach of trust of his office. But the civil servant can be removed any morning by his political head. There is no parallel between the two cases. If the judge, highly educated, and with the knowledge of law and statesmanship he must possess, is not qualified to vote, on the ground of dependence, how can the Civil Service clerk be qualified, whose salary is the only means of maintenance he has in has done these things, but every Government in Canada has done acts of that sort, which might be construed as political dent on the mere caprice or the ill-humor of his favoritism. My hon, friend who sits in front of me may political superior? All legislators have decided, as a rule, not to enfranchise judges, and all the more strongly should we decide not to enfranchise civil servants, who, as compared with the judges, are mere creatures of the Minister's will and pleasure. But the hon. member for King's, N. B., went on the draw a parallel between the case of the civil servants of the Dominion and those of the Provinces; and he said the appointee of the Local Government was entirely in the power of that Government, and that it was not so in the case of the Dominion appointee. Well, Sir, whose creature is the Dominion civil servant, if he is not the creature of the Government who appoints him? He says there is a test of fitness imposed that excludes men who are ignorant of matters contained in examination papers. But the passing of that test does not give them a right to be in the Service. The law only provides that they may not be appointed unless they pass that test. We do not object to that, but we complain that no man can be appointed unless he is a Tory, or the particular friend of a Tory. We do not complain that the civil servants are ignorant, and not able to vote intelligently, but we complain that many of them are partisans, and that they are unable to exercise the franchise freely and intelligently, from the knowledge of what is hanging over them if they go against the Government. He says that in the Dominion Service officials are appointed during good behavior. I was astonished to hear him say that; we know it is not the case. A judge is appointed during good behavior, but a civil servant is not; he is appointed during the pleasure of the Minister, and is liable to be dismissed at any moment, with or without reason given. Of course, it is usual to give a reason, but he may be discharged, so far as the law goes, with or without a reason. The hon, gentleman says that in the Provinces they get their pay direct from the Government, and that it is not so in the Dominion Service. Well, where in the name of goodness do they get their pay in the Dominion Service, if it is not from the Government? Are they paid by fees? Are they paid from the proceeds of concerts held for their benefit? If they do not get their pay direct from the Government, where do they get it from? Certainly, they get their salaries from the Government, and the Government may raise them, by promoting the civil servants, or lower them, by degrading the civil servants. They are utterly dependent on the will of the Government. hon, gentleman goes on to say that promotion goes by examination in the Dominion Service, and here again I was astonished to hear the hon. gentleman say that. Promotion goes by the same rule as appointments. A man cannot be promoted until he has passed a certain examination, but his promotion afterwards is entirely at the discretion of his superior. The superior can say to this man: Step up; or to the other man: Step down. The hon. gentleman's contention that the Dominion Civil Service is more independent than that of the Provinces is absurd on the face of it. His argument is based on the assumption that the Provinces have no Civil Service Acts; but surely a gentleman of his political knowledge cannot be ignorant of the fact that most of the Provinces have a Civil Service Act, and in the Province of Ontario the Civil Service Act is every bit as severe as the Dominion Act, and therefore every check that exists here, exists in the largest Province of the Dominion, and in most of the others. I am bound, however, to agree with the hon. gentleman, when he says that a man's interest in the country springs from other motives than the right to cast a vote. Now, that very truth demolishes all the house of cards that he tried to build up in opposition to this amendment. Why, Sir, if a man's tend to be very much in favor of extending the franchise, interest in the country and his desire to do his duty to the country does not depend on his right to vote, why oppose taking the right to vote away from him? His House, and has spoken very strongly with regard to the loyalty to the country and his desire to do his civil servants. He said that in 1882, at the time of his duty to the country are manifested in doing his election, some of his most prominent opponents were civil duty in the position he holds as a civil servant. That is what he is hired for, that is what he is paid for-to exercise his loyalty to the country as a civil servant. That is where he can exercise all those great abilities which the hon, gentleman credited him with, and which so many of the civil servants undoubtedly possess. An attempt has been made to make a great point about the partisanship of certain Ontario officials. But these are not of the same class as those who will not be touched by this amendment.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). They are worse. They go out when the Government goes out.

Mr. CASEY. We are willing to allow the hon. gentleman to have all such officials in his county to help him.

Mr. WHITE. I help myself, without officials.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon, gentleman is much worse treated than his confrères.

Mr. WHITE. How would I get them appointed, when there are no positions for them.

Mr. CASEY. This Bill will make positions. If the McCarthy Act is sustained there will be plenty of positions. In my county there has been an inspector of licenses, at a salary of $600. One year he had no ficenses to inspect; another year he had one. If the McCarthy Act is sustained by the Privy Council, this amendment will not prevent officials appointed under it from voting and helping the hon. member for East Hasting.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want their help.

Mr. CASEY. I deny that all officials in Ontario are Grit partisans. I am informed that the Ontario license inspector at Ottawa was a Conservative when he was appointed, and has never since aided the Reform Government.

Mr. TASSÉ. Do you mean to say he has interfered against the local Government.

Mr. CASEY. He has not interfered at all. I am so informed; I do not know personally.

Mr. WHITE. He could not hold his position if he did

Mr. CASEY. I am informed that the hon member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) was a license commissioner under the Mowat Government.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Mowat at first appointed two Reform commissioners and one Conservative commissioner in each district. He soon changed his idea, and he now appoints all Reformers

Mr. CASEY. There is the case of a body of officers who were wiped out by the stroke of a pen-I mear the inspectors of weights and measures appointed by the Reformers. The hon, member for East Hastings has declared he thought interference by officials in politics was wrong, and asked us to stop Mowat. In turn, I ask him and his colleagues to stop the First Minister. He should unite with some hon. gentlemen opposite, not including the hon. members for Ōttawa city, who do not feel in that way, ir producing an impression on their leader, so as to lead him not to allow the servants of the country and not of any party to become political partisans and take part in political contests.

Mr. HACKETT. It is very unreasonable that the civil servants of the country, who form a very intelligent class, should be deprived of the privilege of casting their ballot. There could not be a greater hardship inflicted on them, and I am surprised that hon gentlemen opposite, who prehon, gentleman's statement.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman was in my county.

Mr. HACKETT. No; I was looking after my own county. So far as relates to the county of Prince, in 1882 civil servants, and there are civil servants there on both sides of politics, did not take any active part in the campaign. I am of the opinion that if such active measures had been taken by them in Queen's county as the hon. gentleman mentions, we should have heard of it in the Opposition press at that time, and that press would have called the attention of the country to the stand taken by the civil servants. But the hon, gentleman's experience on that occasion was only the experience I had in 1878, when I first contested Prince. The whole Civil Service of the Island was in the hands of the Opposition. In 1874 a sweeping change was made, and all civil servants who were appointed by the Conservative party were dismissed without cause. They were all removed; one or two were appointed again, but the great majority of the civil servants of the Island of Prince Edward were Liberals in 1878. Sir, if active measures had been taken by the Conservative Civil Service in 1882, I want to point out to the hon. gentleman what measures were taken by the Liberal Civil Service in 1878. We all know that the superintendent of the Island Railway, Mr. McKechnie, a respectable gentleman in other respects, who was appointed by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) issued a circular letter—I do not know if he had the authority of the Minister, but he was acting directly under him-but he issued this letter to every employé on the railway, instructing them to vote for the Liberal candidate.

Mr. DAVIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT. It is a fact, for the letter was published and I saw it in the hands of a section-man. It was sent to all the workmen on the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. All that I can say is, that I never heard of it.

Mr. HACKETT. I am sure the hon, gentleman would be too fair a man; but nevertheless the superintendent of the Island Railway on that occasion did as I state. It is a matter of public notoriety, and we know, Sir, that when the pressmen visited Prince Edward Island, I think in 1877, a gentleman who was the editor of the Conservative paper in my own county, and who, I think, is within the sound of my voice at this moment, made application to Mr. Mackenzie to have a pass over the railway, the same as the other members of the Press Association, but he was refused, and he was told that it was not customary to give passes to Opposition editors. You can imagine the contest we must have fought, contending for the Conservative cause in Prince Edward Island in 1878, with such partisans controlling the Departments there. Some of the Grits—some of my opponents in 1878—were Customs officers who went from meeting to meeting and took the platform against me, and made the most stirring speeches.

Mr. DAVIES. As they do now.

Mr. HACKETT. The most exciting election, almost, that we ever had on the Island, took place last summer, when the hon, gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Jenkins) was returned; and I have not seen it stated in the press, nor has it been brought to my notice, that the Custom house officials, or the railway officials, in the county, holding Dominion offices, took the stump and canvassed in favor of the Government candidate. Now, a great deal has been said about the superannuation of Mr. McNabb. He was not superannuated for any services he rendered in have been railway superintendents—no, I will not say the Mr. HACKETT.

every possible occasion. This is the first time I have heard | Prince Edward Island; he was not there during any electhe statement made in public. Of course I do not doubt the | tion contest. He was for twenty-five or thirty years in the service of his country elsewhere as a railway engineer. He was a competent and capable man, until he met with an accident; but he was of that nervous temperament and disposition, and felt so badly the effect of the accident which he met with, that he applied for superannuation. The doctors sent very strong certificates to the Government; and in compliance with his request, having served his country so long, he was superannuated, and I do not think he received anything more than justice at the hands of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." We have men in Prince Edward Island in the service of the railway who are 75 years of age. Perhaps they have not applied for superannuation; I do not think they have. I believe they are not able to perform their duties, but the right hon. the First Minister, in a mistaken feeling of sympathy, no doubt, has stood by them, and would not superannuate them, simply because he thinks it would be unfair, and because they have not been a sufficiently long time in the service to entitle them to any great amount of superannuation. I hope that his kindness in this respect will be rewarded. I do not think that very strong pressure has been brought to bear on him from the Island, at all events, and I think those who have been a long time in the service should not be put out of their positions without receiving fair superannuation. I say it would be an unreasonable thing, it would be a terrible mistake, that the intelligent civil servants of this country, from one end to the other, should be disfranchised, and more especially by the acts of hon. gentlemen opposite. We know the stand they took with regard to the Indians; how hotly and strongly they opposed granting the franchise to the Indians possessing property qualifications, the same as white men; and now they go so far as to say that the capable and intelligent civil servant of the country should be disfranchised. The principal reason they had that the Indians should not be enfranchised was that they were not intelligent men, but here we have intelligent and competent men, and they would place these men in the same category with the Indians. I think it would be a mistake if the amendment were adopted, and I shall oppose it.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman has used some arguments which I think are very strongly in favor of the amendment. If the hon, gentleman's statements can be received and full credence given to them, the facts appear to be, that every Liberal appointee on the Island disgraces his position by making himself a strong political partisan. On every hustings he says that these men appeared-

Mr. HACKETT. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Does he approve of it?

Mr. HACKETT. I say that is not done now.

Mr. DAVIES. He says that they work day and night in the interest of the Reform party, but that the Conservative appointees are the most immaculate men that ever lived. Does the bitterest partisan on that side of the House believe it?

An hon. MEMBER. If you say so, we must believe it.

Mr. DAVIES. I notice the hon. member for Toronto is one exception, and I am glad of it; no, I see the hon. member for Richmond signifies his approval, too. The fact is, that the appointees made in 1873 and dismissed by the Mackenzie Government were appointments made by a moribund Tory Government, just as they were going out of office. We need not go back to these old sores, but many of those on the Island who hold Customs offices, or who present superintendent of the railway, because he has acted impartially in political matters, but some men under him, the men who control the subordinates of the railway, exercise their influence without hesitation in getting the employes to vote in favor of the political party to which they belong. It is notorious that, in the last election, officials took the stump and canvassed from house to house against

Mr. HACKETT. Name.

Mr. DAVIES. The first one that occurs to me is the collector of Customs at Rustico, who did nothing for five weeks, except to draw his pay and attend to politics. Talk about the press; that was named in the press at the time, but perhaps the hon, gentleman does not read the papers of the Opposition side of politics very carefully. He was not on the Island at the time, but perhaps his colleague, who knows the facts, will say whether I am over-stating them or not. The hon, gentleman has made an attack on Mr. McKechnie. I am not concerned in defending him, but I had an intimate acquaintance with him, and I must say that there was less politics on the Prince Edward Island Railway then than there has been since, and that the politicians of both sides were allowed full liberty to visit the railway works to canvass, a liberty which is now refused. I say the statements of the hon, gentleman, applied to his political opponents, show conclusively that the amendment should be adopted, because his opponents, at least, appear to have no right to the franchise, because they would abuse it. He wishes the House to assume that the Conservative appointments are all immaculate. That is always the case. The appointees of the Conservative party are always pure and spotless in their political life. He always does his duty, never interferes in politics, and is always pure and spotless in his political life—that is what he wants us to assume. He knows that is nonsense.

Mr. HACKETT. The hon. gentleman has totally misrepresented what I said. I said that in 1878 officials took part in politics, but that in 1882 they did not; they appeared then to have a proper sense of their duty. The hon, gentleman named one; but he is a man who only receives $100 per annum, and who does not occupy a very high or important position. Although I think a public official has no right to go on a public platform and make speeches, I think he would have a right to deposit his ballot; and that is what the great bulk of the civil servants on Prince Edward Island do.

Mr. TASSÉ. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not yet made good their contention, that the men who constitute the Civil Service desire to be deprived of their political rights, and I do not think they can do so. During the last few days this House has been flooded with petitions signed by Liberal supporters of the Opposition-

Mr. LISTER. And Conservatives.

Mr. TASSÉ. Well, before taking the responsibility of asking the committee to deprive the men who compose the Civil Service of the right to vote, I think hon. gentlemen opposite should at least present to the House a petition, signed by a sufficient number of those gentlemen, expressing their desire to be deprived of that right which they have exercised so far.

Mr. MACKENZIE. And be dismissed for sending such a petition.

Mr. TASSE. If it had been presented under the Administration of the hon, gentleman, that might have occurred. such petition has been presented to us, and I deny that hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House have a right to pose here as the mouthpieces of the Civil Service, because they have not been authorised by them to state that they desire to be deprived of the franchise. I believe it is contrary to the public welfare that public employes should course, and I have not the slightest fault to find with 263 interfere actively in politics; but the members of the Civil Service, who are intelligent men, who possess a deep acquaintance with the public affairs of this country, who are thoroughly posted as to the political antecedents of the public men of this country, are in a better position, owing to these exceptional causes, to give an intelligent vote than almost any other class of the community; and we ought not to take the responsibility of depriving these men of the right of voting, without knowing that such is their desire. I deny that all the members of the Civil Service in Ottawa belong to the Conservative party. A very fair percentage of them belong, as we all know, to the Liberal party.

Mr. LISTER. Not many.

Mr. TASSÉ. Well, if my hon. friend had been in Ottawa during the Administration of the Liberal party, extending from 1874 to 1878, when hundreds of appointments were made, he would, perhaps, have come to another conclusion. I deny that the voting members of the Civil Service are all on the Conservative side, but I say now, that they ought to be, after the effort that has been made by their Liberal friends on the other side of the House to deprive them of the right of giving an independent opinion on the public affairs of the country. I would say to the hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that the Conservative candidates of this city do not depend on the votes of the Civil Service to be elected. It is true, we receive a majority of their votes, and I am proud of it, because they are votes of men who are capable of making an intelligent choice between the candidates who offer themselves for conducting the public affairs of the Dominion. There are in the city 5,000 votes, out of which 300 or 400 belong to the Civil Service; and a better proof that the Conservative candidates of this city are not elected mainly by the Civil Service vote lies in the fact that at the last election, as well as in that of 1878, the Conservative candidates had a majority, not only in the section of the capital where the Civil Service vote is situated, but we had the honor to secure a majority in every ward, and especially in that section of Ottawa where the working classes live-in the ward of Ottawa, in the ward of Victoria, and in By ward, as well as in every other ward of this city. This fact proves conclusively that the Conservative candidates have not to depend on the Civil Service vote to obtain seats in this House as the representatives of Ottawa. Is it surprising that the city of Ottawa should have expressed itself on the Conservative side either at the last or the previous election? The city of Ottawa has only done what has been done by every great city of the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. TASSE. My hon friend says, "no." On what side was the great city of Montreal, the great city of Toronto, the great city of Hamilton, which elects Liberals to the Local House, the city of Halifax, and a great many other cities and towns that I could mention? The city of Ottawa has maintained its political principles, and I am afraid, for the sake of my friends on the other side of the House, that as long as they fail to submit to the people of this country a better policy than they have now, it will be many years before the people of the city of Ottawa elect members to support

Mr. IRVINE. I would regret very much to give my vote to prevent any resident of Canada from exercising the franchise, but I am not sure, from the course some persons in the Outside Service have pursued, however the members of the Inside Service may act, that it would be a very wholesome provision to deprive them of the use of the franchise. With reference to the officials in my own county, many of whom are Conservatives, in both elections in which I have run I must say that they have pursued a wisely reticent them. I cannot say the same in reference to those in the constituency the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue represents. In my first election two or three officers in the Outside Service came down to my constituency and canvassed and spoke against me. There names were Mr. Bedel, collector, who worked in the parish of Kent, on the east side of the River St. John, and Mr. Baird, preventive officer, who worked in Wicklow, on the east side. They had not, however, much influence in those parishes, for they were given to understand, very early in the day, that they had much better attend to their own business. Men such as these may make very good partisan officers, but are very poor men to be trusted with the franchise.

Mr. FOSTER. It occurred to me that possibly the zeal now manifested by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question had not its counterpart when they held office. From 1873 to 1878 they held office, and it will be interesting to see how far they then held to the principle they lay down to-day. From Confederation until 1873 the election laws of Canada in force previous to Confederation were continued, and in 1873 a temporary Act was passed, which perpetuated nearly all the principles of that law. In 1874, however, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they introduced an election Act, and in that Act they did away with all the disabilities of the old Act, as regards people in the pay of the Government, except in the case of judges. These disabilities were enacted in the old statutes as follows:-

were enacted in the old statutes as follows:—

"The Chancellor and Vice-Chancellors of Upper Canada,—the Chief Justice and Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada,—the Chief Justices and Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas in Upper Canada, and of the Superior Court in Lower Canada,—the Judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty in Lower Canada,—the Judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty in Lower Canada,—the Judge of any Court of Escheats,—all county and circuit judges, all commissioners of bankrupts,—all recorders of cities,—all officers of the Customs,—all clerks of the Peace, registrars, sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, deputy clerks of the Crown and agents for the sale of Crown lands,—and officers employed in the collection of any duties payable to Her Majesty, in the nature of duties of Excise,—shall be disqualified, and incompetent to vote at any election of a member of the Legislative Council or of the Legislative Assembly."

This section was repealed and section 39 of Act of 1874 was put in its place, as follows:

"The Chancellor and Vice-Chancellors of Ontario and the judges of any court now existing or to be hereafter created, whose appointment shall rest with the Governor-General of the Dominion, shall be disqualified and incompetent to vote at the election of a member to the House of Commons of Canada."

These very officials whom those hon, gentlemen now want to see disqualified were disqualified under the old Act; their disqualification was continued under the Act of 1873 but it was removed by the Act of 1874, the work of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of those hon, gentlemen then had seats in this House. had a great many mature opinions as to what the ballot would and would not do; and it is remarkable how differently hon. gentlemen opposite regard its working in this particular compared with their views as to its effect when introducing the measure. The hon. Mr. Dorion, in introducing his election Bill, giving the ballot and removing the disabilities hon. gentlemen now wish to restore,

"He would add that secret voting, while it did not prevent candidates paying away as much money as they pleased, would so regulate matters that the party who paid money would not know how the party to whom he paid it had exercised the franchise, and thus the ballot would take away one of the principal inducements to bribery."

Now, if any man in the world would be apt to know how a person voted under the ballot it would be the man who paid money to get him to vote a certain way. Later on, we find that when the hon. Chief Justice's opinion was asked as to the advisability of excluding Civil Service clerks, he said:

consider it was desirable they should mix themselves up in politics, because, if they did, they would not have the confidence reposed in them by the public it was desirable they should have."

Mr. DAVIES. That is the kernel of the whole thing.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend understands that a judge has to do with trials, and if he takes part in politics he will be apt to lose the confidence of those who appear before him, who may belong to the opposite political party. I commend these salutary lessons to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to none more than to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who, if I mistake not, with all his philosophical lore and depth of logic, had a seat in the House at that time.

Mr. FISHER. Some hon. gentlemen on the other side have stated, and stated fairly enough, that the onus of proof was laid upon those who desire to disfranchise any individual in this country. It is a great pity that the right hon, gentleman who introduced this Bill, and his colleagues, were not possessed of that opinion when he proposed to disfranchise so many individuals as are disfranchised under this Bill. My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., however, has fully accepted the responsibility laid upon us in supporting this amendment, of providing the necessity of disfranchising those civil servants whom it is intended to disfranchise. The germ of that proof is in the statement that those civil servants are open to charges of partisanship. I do not mean that, as civil servants, they have not the right to be partisans; but, unfortunately for the Civil Service and for the country, I believe that the results of their partisanship will work to their detriment or to their advancement in the Civil Service. In a Service which was not managed by the political chiefs of one great party, it would not matter much whether a person showed political partisanship or not; but when the chiefs of the Service are leading one of the great political parties we can see very easily that the partizanship of the employé must be very closely connected with his remuneration or advancement. I do not wish to charge hon, gentlemen opposite with being more partisan than are the chiefs of the other political party. believe this would be the case under either political party. I believe it is almost necessitated by the party system of our Government, and as long as we have the country governed by party I believe that this argument will hold good. The hon, member from Prince Edward Island gave some instances of gross partisanship which had been performed by Liberals in the Civil Service. I do not know whether his statements are well founded or not, but whether Liberals or Conservatives had done this, it does not matter; the deed itself is the best argument which can possibly be advanced for the adoption of the amendment of the hon, member for Bothwell. I have known one or two instances of a similar kind. Hon, gentlemen opposite have intimated that civil servants are not partisans, and have not been used in political campaigns. I know that, in my own political contests, I have had to contend with one, if not two, of the servants of hon. gentlemen opposite, who stumped my county against me. It was not in the election in which I was successful, in 1882, but in the bye-election of 1880, when I was defeated by a small majority, and when I had the whole political influence of hon. gentlemen opposite thrown into my county. At that time, a gentleman in the employment of the Department of Agriculture came into my county and stumped it thoroughly, and met me on almost every platform. I do not mean to attribute my defeat on that occasion to the services of that gentleman on the platform. Whatever other services he may have performed, I am not well enough acquainted with him to say; but on that occasion I met "Under the ballot, he could not see why Government officials, including Customs officers, should not vote. He thought every one should vote under the ballot. His motives for prohibiting judges from voting [and I commend this to my hon. friend, my intelligent, learned, goodnatured friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies)] was that he did not to find out, although I have asked for the information, what other business he had in the Eastern Townships at that time of their lack of intelligence. We do not wish to disfranchise or that any remuneration which he was receiving for the services he owed to his country was decreased in consequence of the services he performed for his party and his political chief. I do not consider that that is a sufficient reason why the Civil Service should be disfranchised. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) has said that the Civil Service do not desire to be disfranchised. I am not in a position to say that they all desire to be disfranchised. I can only say that I remember four different individuals in the Civil Service, residing in this city, one of whom is a Liberal, and, in regard to the other three, 1 do not know that they have any political bias, but they all informed me that they would like to be disfranchised. The one who was a Liberal told me that, in consequence of being a Liberal, he did not dare to vote openly, or to announce that he had voted against hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not very familiar with the members of the Civil Service, but in one or two discussions in which I have taken part, when members of the Service have been present, I have not heard one single civil servant express the desire to have the franchise continued to them. I do not think that this is a very strong argument either, because I do not think it is necessary that the civil servants should want to be disfranchised. If their enfranchisement is a wrong to the country and a disadvantage to the service, it is not necessary to ask them whether they want it or not. I vote for the amendment of my hon. friend from Bothwell on other grounds. I vote for it because I believe it is for the benefit of the Civil Service itself and for the benefit of the country that they should not have the franchise. It is all very well for hon, gentlemen opposite to say that they vote by ballot, and that it is not known how they vote. Do those hon. gentlemen want the civil servants to conceal their sentiments? If a civil servant is known to be a Liberal, and casts his vote for a Liberal candidate, it is known, almost to a certainty, and that is enough to imperil his advancement in the Service. I suppose it can be made secret, and I suppose in some case it is made secret, but in many cases it is perfectly well known how the individuals vote, though they vote by ballot. In the Province of Quebec a larger number of civil servants are disfranchised than it is proposed to disfranchise by this amendment. In that Province not only the provincial civil servants, but the servants of the Dominion Government, are prevented from voting. The law of that Province disfranchises the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Superior Court, the judge of the Vice-Admirates court, the judges of Sessions, the district magistrates and recorders, the officers of Customs, the clerks of the pages the registrary the sheriff. Crown, the clerks of the peace, the registrars, the sheriffs, deputy sheriffs deputy clerks of Crown, the officers and men of the provincial and municipal police force; and further than that, agents for the sale of Crown lands, postmasters in cities and towns, all officers employed in the collection of duties payable to Her Majesty, in the nature of duties of Excise, including collectors, as well of federal as of local revenues. This law, be it observed, was passed by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite; it was the Conservative Government in the Province of Quebec who disfranchised all those civil servants, not only the servants over whom they had control, but the servants of the Government of their own friends here at Ottawa. And much more, therefore, is it necessary, that the servants of this Government should not be allowed to vote for the Government who has control of their remuneration and advancement. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), contended that the civil servants were men of high intelligence. I have no quarrel with that statement; I believe that they are fully them because they are less intelligent than the rest of the community, but upon a wholly different ground, which has been clearly set forth. The hon, gentleman implied that the test of intelligence was sufficient to put them out of the range of political partisanship. I do not think it is the less intelligent classes of our community alone who are open to the charge of partisanship, or of strong party bias. I believe there are men sitting in this House, of the highest intelligence in the land, who are as strong political partisans as can possibly be found among the most ignorant people of the country. But unfortunately the intelligence test of these civil servants is not carried far enough to remove them from the political arena. If that test were made as it is in the English Civil Service examinations, then the test of intelligence would not only show that these people had a right to vote, but it would remove them from the political arena, by making them independent of party control. The test of which the hon, gentleman has spoken only shows that those who pass it have sufficient intelligence to perform the lowest duties connected with that branch. But their appointment still lies in the hands of the chief of the Department, as well as their promotion and dismissal. The hon. Minister of Customs has pointed to some examples in which men have been promoted, irrespective of their political opinions. I am glad to hear that that is so; I am willing to admit there are many such examples; and that only shows how very able and competent must be the Liberals in the Service, who have been able to obtain that promotion, in the face of their political opinions. I have no doubt, however, that for the sake of that advancement they did not sacrifice their political opinions, but I am afraid there are many gentlemen in the Service who have not as much moral courage, and who, for the sake of promotion, might change their opinions. Hon. gentlemen opposite have contended, I think the hon. member for Ottawa claimed, that the civil servants are not partisan. Now, I think no one who is acquainted with the administration of our Civil Service system will deny that appointments to that service are nearly always made to recompense some political service. Men are appointed to the Service simply because they have been partisans, and their political services enable them to curry favor with the Government and to press their claim for appointment. The greatest argument that can be used to the head of a Department for the appointment of a person, is that so and so was able to do me (the member for his county) some political service in the last election. Now, I think it is very desirable that this disfranchising clause should go much farther than it does; I think we, on this side of the House, have clearly established our proposition that members of the Civil Service should be disfranchised, and I intend to support the amendment of the hon, member for Bothwell,

Mr. CASGRAIN. The question with me is whether the benefit that would accrue from disfranchising civil servants would outweigh the possible evil. I admit that they are so much under the control of the Government that they can scarcely give an unbiassed vote. There is another class of civil servants who have a dread of the powers that be, and accordingly vote in a certain direction. So they do not give a free vote, as they would do if they were not under the influence of the Government. The Government and heads of the Departments use the civil servants as canvassers at elections, and for that reason, among others, I would not allow them to exercise the franchise. No doubt some of the civil servants simply exercise their right to vote, but there are others who act very differently. I can of the average intelligence of the community. But I am quote an instance in my own case. An employé in the not aware that any hon, gentleman on this side of the office of the Board of Works canvassed my county openly, House desire that they should be disfranchised on account and of course it was to the neglect of his other duties. I would not object to that, if the individual opposed me as a citizen and assumed the responsibility of his vote. Although this step proposed is a grave step to take, yet in view of the evils arising from the system, I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment, and I believe that a number of the civil servants would prefer that they did not possess the right of the franchise.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I am very reluctant to continue this debate, because the subject has been very fully discussed, and it may be that what I am going to say may not throw any light on the subject, or convince anyone. But perhaps it may be as well, as I have pretty strong opinions on the subject of Government officials voting, and the way in which they should exercise the franchise, that I should give expression to those views, so that I may not be accused of having failed to give, when this subject was before the House and was so thoroughly discussed, my views, because they are quite strong views. I am strongly of the opinion that the civil servants should not be disfranchised. They should have the same privileges as other citizens, if they possess the qualifications that other men are required to possess in order to exercise the franchise. That is the first principle I lay down. The second principle is, that they should be at perfect liberty to exercise the franchise, irrespective of party. They should exercise it in a way so as not to make themselves offensive, not to make themselves incur the enmity of one party or the liking of the other party. That is the course I think they should pursue, if they want to retain their offices. If, however, they want to throw themselves into election conflicts, they must take the risk into their own hands; that is, they must stand or fall by the party; and civil servants should be at liberty to take that active position. Let them, if they please, take the hustings and act as would the candidate or his friends. Then they must accept the fate of their party, and go down with it. If their party stands, they will stand with it, and vice versa. If he mixes in politics, and holds very strong opinions, and desires to do all he can for one of the parties, and takes the hustings, or otherwise makes himself a political partisan or a canvasser, while I admit he has a right to do that, and no fault can be found with him, if the party remains in power he will remain in power; still, if it does not, he should be put out. He should take the fate of the party, and go out with it. Those are the principles I entertain. In the county I represent I know several people who hold Government offices and who voted against me. I find no fault with them for having voted against me, and even if they have, in an inoffensive way, said something against me. I would never ask for their dismissal on such grounds, because they have a right to exercise the franchise. But when a civil servant takes the stump and goes to the extent that some have gone to in my county, of breaking the election laws for the purpose of defeating the candidate whom they knew to be friendly to the Government, then I think such an officer should be dismissed. I say this publicly, in this House and in the presence of the Government. But if civil servants only go to the extent of simply exercising the franchise they should not be disturbed. These are the three principles I lay down as guiding me in giving my vote: Civil servants should have the franchise. they simply exercise it they should not be disturbed. they exercise it in any other way, they should accept the fate of their party, and either stand or fall with it.

Mr. McMULLEN. When we consider that there are between 3,000 and 3,500 civil servants, we must recognise as many people as possible. Consequently, this class was the kindly turn, which they might naturally expect if they Mr. Casgrain.

not excluded. We have had ten years' experience of the ballot, and we have some reason to believe that those people have not followed the course indicated by my esteemed friend who has just sat down. If the civil servants had adopted the course of simply voting and taking no active part in support of either political party, this discussion might not have taken place. But we know that, notwithstanding the fact that they have had the privilege of exercising the franchise in a quiet way, under the operation of the ballot, there has been great evidence, on the part of individuals at least, if not on the part of the whole Civil Service, that they have, in many cases, shown themselves to be partisan, and taken a prominent and open part in the elections of this Dominion. Now, I contend, in the interests of the Dominion, that it is highly desirable that those people should be completely removed from any political influence or sympathy which they might exercise on behalf of any party. In the first place, take the Civil Service in Ottawa. It is desirable that when there is a change of Government the Government that comes in should meet with a class of civil servants who have no bitter political feelings, but are prepared to discharge their duties as honestly and faithfully under the Government coming into power as under the preceding Government. Now, we have reason to believe that when the hon. member for East York went into power in 1873 there were in the Departments at Ottawa people who were willing, from day to day and from week to week, to make known to journals on the Opposition side little incidents which transpired in the offices - they were anxious to pick up and communicate anything with which fault might be found, to their opponents. Now, I care not what Government is in power, I hold that as long as you perpetuate to those people the right to exercise the franchise you continue the feeling which will lead them to do little things of that kind, that are very objectionable. Now, is it not desirable to guard the franchise so as to secure for the people of this Dominion the free and independent exercise of that franchise, and, as far as possible, thus secure the free and independent exercise of their citizenship. are now considering the enfranchisement of something over 3,000 individuals. If you scatter them among a number of evenly-balanced constituencies, where there are a dozen or two in the service of the Government, you may affect the returns of a dozen constituencies. I dare say there are in this House a dozen or more who have been returned with from ten to twenty of a majority. Well, if you permit a certain number of civil servants in any particular constituency to exercise the franchise, you are, to that extent, aiding the Government of the day. I find that there is on the list, at the present moment, no less than 1,753 civil servant officers who are eligible to be superannuated to-morrow—that is, officers who have served in the Civil Service over ten years. When they serve that time they are eligible to be superannuated, and can fairly claim retiring allowances or superannuation under that system. I am sure that any gentleman who understands the extent of the influence that, no doubt, can be exercised on the part of the Government upon any of those who are seeking retiring allowances under the operation of this statute, will easily see how far their influence will go in a matter of that kind. When you consider that they are looking forward, after the expiration of those ten years, to some day getting a retiring allowance at the hands of the Government, and that their retiring allowance will largely depend on their apparent service, along with the favor and kindness of the Government, you must see that it would be natural on their that this is an important question, and I do not think the part to cultivate a kindly feeling on the part of those who time devoted to its discussion has been in any sense lost. In are in power. They are anxious in their own interests to 1874 the ballot was introduced, and no doubt the Liberal place themselves in a position, so that if it was necessary to Government were quite willing to extend the franchise to approach the head of the Department they would meet with were politically devoted to the cause of the head of that Department. So I say that it is natural that they should support the party in power, whichever party it may happen to be. I say that this is not an independent and untrammeled exercise of the franchise by any means. You are giving ballots to men who are going to cast them in their own personal and individual interest. He cannot possibly separate himself from the fact that it is his interest to keep on the best terms with the party in power. Politics has little consideration for him, unless in his own personal interest, and it is natural to suppose that he would cast his ballot in favor of the head of the Department, simply because he wants to be on good terms with him. There is another point. I understand that those civil servants pay no taxes; they are not liable to be taxed for their income, and therefore I do not think it is right that they should be permitted to exercise the franchise. It is a well known principle in England that those who do not pay taxes should not be permitted to vote, and it is a principle carried out in a good many of the United States, so that I think the case of our civil servants would not be worse than the case of others who are similarly situated. The hon, member for King's referred to the fact that Mr. Dorion, in introducing his Bill, did not suggest the disfranchisement of that particular class. But if you look back to the discussion, you will find that the former member for Ca dwell, the late Hon. John Hillyard Cameron, strongly advocated the continuation of the provincial voters' lists. Other members of the Conservative party took the same political view, but hon, gentlemen opposite now turn round and hold an opposite view. We can point to dozens of cases in which hon. gentlemen opposite expressed different political opinions in the past from those they entertain now. I cannot deny the propriety of the hon, members for Ottawa city advocating the enfranchisement of the Civil Service. No doubt it is in their own interest. It reminds me of a story about a member of the Scotch Church, at the time of the disruption. He was asked why he did not come out and join the Free Church, and he said he had five living reasons why he should not leave the church to which he belonged—a wife and four children, and that the church contributed a certain sum annually to his support. I dare say there are 600 living reasons why the hon, members for Ottawa should support the enfranchisement of the Civil Service, because no doubt their strong advocacy of this matter will create a kindly feeling which may be of advantage to them on a future occasion. I believe, if we were privately and individually to consult the feelings of the Civil Service, we would find that a very large percentage of them would prefer being placed in a position where they would not be asked or driven to exercise the franchise by either party. In the next place, it is unreasonable to expect them to sign petitions in favor of their being disfranchised. that would be virtually saying to the party in power: We do not want to support you; we do not choose to give you our votes; we wish to be placed in the position of not being obliged to vote for anybody. You would not expect them to say to the party in power. We are opposed to you. It would be unfair to them to place them in that position. We know from the returns which have been laid before Parliament, that there are in the city of Ottawa, at the present time, 140 civil servants, who have received not only their annual salary for the services they perform, but something like $57,000 during the last year for extra services, or an average of $412 apiece. You can hardly expect that an officer placed under obligations of this kind to the Government he serves would be likely to give a very independent vote. He would naturally say to himself: I have been favored in a good many ways, and it is desirable, in my own interest, in every way, that I should support the party in power, who have treated me so kindly. You year, it is an unvarnished and unbiased showing of the deprive the judges of the right to exercise the franchise-lactual facts in the Blue Books; and in order to have that why? Simply because they are the higher servants of the Dominion; they are supposed to adjudicate on issues between the two political parties; and it is proper that they should be free from any bias. That is perfectly right; but it is just as necessary that the Civil Service of this country should be kept absolutely free from political influence, in order that they may efficiently and faithfully discharge their duties to the public. I have heard it stated that, in one of the Departments in this city, from week to week and from month to month, financial statements have been prepared for publication in the Mail newspaper in Toronto, setting forth the financial condition of this Dominion in a very bright and glowing color. If this is done in any Department of the Civil Service it is very wrong. I do not desire to prevent any journal in the Dominion from using any just means to procure information; but, for an official of any Department to prepare statements for publication, in order to put a bright side on the financial condition of the Dominion, is exceedingly wrong and imprudent, and should not be permitted. In order to prevent anything of that kind, the Civil Service should be kept absolutely free from political control; and unless you disfranchise them altogether, so that they will have no interest in the political issues that come before the country from time to time, their political feeling will undoubtedly grow upon them, because we know perfectly well that a man who exercises the franchise from year to year becomes more and more interested in the success of his party. We know, too, that men who are freed from the exercise of the franchise gradually lose that one sidedness and that interest in party politics which they might otherwise feel. We know that men who have had seats in Parliament, and are appointed county judges, at first show a little favoritism to their friends, but after being on the bench a number of years they lose that feeling, and it would be almost impossible to decide on which side of politics they were. It is just as important that the members of the Civil Service should be free from that kind of influence as the judges. With regard to the superannuations, it is unfair to place the civil servants in a positon to claim an increased number of year's service when they come to retire. We know that in the past a great many years have been added to the service of those who have retired on the superannuation list, and the expenses of the country have been very seriously increased thereby. It has been stated by one gentleman that there are grounds to believe that these additions have been made in some instances through political favoritism. I do not say whether that is the case or not, but it is highly desirable that such a state of things should not be continued. The civil servant who goes out at an election and does all kinds of dirty work. whether he is a Conservative or a Reformer, will naturally expect to receive some favor in return. In every election you will find public officials in almost every constituency of the Dominion. It is decidedly wrong that they should be required or permitted to do such duty. They should not be permitted to have any opportunity whatever of taking part in any political contest. During the last ten years they have proved themselves unworthy of the exercise of the ballot; if they have taken part in elections to such an extent as to warrant this House in believing they are unable to make a prudent and judicious exercise of the franchise under the ballot, it is but right, in the interests of the country and of the Departments, that this privilege should be taken from them. Men so devoted to one political party will, in the discharge of their duties, try to make matters in their own offices to appear in such a shape as to put the best side they possibly can, on even a black cause. If the country requires anything, it is a well prepared statement of its affairs every we must have a class of civil servants completely free from party bias. I think very warmly on this question; I have taken an active part in the investigation of the superannuation question since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, and I have been able to ferret out some of the evils of the system. In many cases additions have been made to our annual expenditure under the system, which would not have been made if those in the service of the country had not been devoted political partisans. Year after year people have been superannuated, who, if they had not given that evidence of deserving more than fair and reasonable treatment at the hands of the Government, would not be to-day in the receipt of the very large amounts they are drawing from the resources of the Dominion, living in comfort and ease. I will take another opportunity of making some remarks on the subject of superannuation. am opposed to the enfranchisement of any class which is not in a position of exercising the privilege conferred upon them as British subjects with that independence which should characterise the exercise of the franchise, no matter by whom it may be exercised. No doubt the city of Ottawa is held in the interests of the Government simply because a large number of civil servants vote for the Government candidate; no doubt they consider it their interests to continue in power any Government which is so kind as to give to 140 of them $57,000 in a year for extra services; it is but human that they should. Just so long as they exercise the franchise so long will the Government deem it desirable to increase the expenditure year by year. We are anxious, on this side, that the franchise should be given to all who, by their circumstances and intelligence, are in a position to exercise it independently and intelligently; but as regards the Civil Service, I am of opinion that they are not in this position. I take the same stand in their regard as in the case of the Indian; to give the franchise to the one is equally objectionable as to give it to the other.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), in dealing with this question, evidently had in his mind's eye the large class of civil servants in this city and the advantage that must necessarily result to himself in being put on record as the defender of that class. As I understand it, at his last election the hon. gentleman had a majority of 317, while, as a matter of fact, there are 400 Civil Service employes in the Departments, supposed to be Conservatives. The hon, gentleman said he had not only a majority in the quarters of the city where the civil servants reside, but also where the workingmen reside; but it is well known that at that particular time there was a very large development of dandelions on the Parliament grounds, which required a large number of the workingmen of this city to clear away. Hence originated the name "the dandelion brigade." The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), in reading the Consolidated Statutes of 1859 and those of 1874, omitted to read a subsequent clause in the latter, which materially alters the case. It is to the effect that all persons qualified to vote at the provincial elections shall be entitled to vote at the Dominion elections. In Ontario, officials similar to those it is now proposed to disfranchise have been disfranchised, such as postmasters in cities and towns, and Customs officials. The hon. gentleman said that these Civil Service officials occupy positions after passing examinations under the Civil Service Act, but he omitted to state that the Act exempts a number of officials from its operation. I do not wish to further detain the committee, but as it is alleged that the license inspectors and Division Court officials in Ontario are active political agents, I may state that in the riding I represent the chairman of the Conservative Association is the Division Court clerk, and the inspector of licenses under the Dominion License Act is the vice-president.

Mr. McMullen.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to speak for a moment on a question which I suppose is a question of privilege. I will guard myself against bringing up anything to provoke discussion. On the 18th May the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) felt himself constrained to appeal from a decision given by you, Mr. Chairman. After that appeal had been taken I rose and attempted to address you. The committee, misunderstanding the object for which I rose, asked me to maintain order, called upon me to sit down, and I need not read the Hansard report which I have beside me, which shows that there was a good deal of disorder in the House. I attempted to make myself heard, but the committee got beyond your control, and I therefore was unfortunate enough not to be able to attain that object. I suppose the committee were fully of the opinion, as the reporters in the press gallery seem to have been, that I desired to thrust myself on the committee and on your ruling, and, after you had decided that it should not be argued, to argue it. I do not care personally for the comments in the press which have appeared in consequence of the misconception of the position which I took, but I simply desire to read to the committee what the Hansard shows was the position which I took:

"Listen to me. When the House was appealed to before, when the Speaker was in the Chair, the Speaker said that, before the appeal was decided upon, there should be a discussion as to the point."

When I rose, it was not to challenge your ruling, it was not to refer to your ruling, but it was to avail myself of the privilege which I understood, by the ruling of the Speaker before, I had, that before a point was submitted to him it should be argued in the committee. The committee, being in such disorder, thought I was endeavoring to force myself on you and on the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As this resolution has been disposed of, and as there is another resolution on this head which I intend to present, I do not think it would be worth while to go into it now. Still, I do not think that hon, gentlemen have carried out the arrangement, which was that I was to have the opportunity of moving that to-day. That was frustrated by the debate which arose, and in which the hon, members have been repeating the same thing over and over. I do not think the arrangement has been carried out in a good spirit.

Mr. MILLS. I do not agree with the hon, gentleman. He said he wished to carry the two sub-sections of the 9th section without carrying the section, and I told him that there were three amendments which we desired to make, one relating to the revising officer, the one just voted down, and the one relating to the Indians. I thought that, as the discussion on the Indian question was likely to be longer than that on the other two, it would be more convenient to take the other two first, and I intimated that when I rose. I would have taken my seat if the hon, gentleman had intimated that it was his desire to begin with the Indians; but knowing what the nature of the amendment was and what sort of discussion was likely to take place on this particularly short day, I thought it was more desirable to get the others disposed of, than to bring up a discussion which we certainly could not have got through to-day. I do not think the Minister is doing me justice in saying that there was any violation of the understanding.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There may be a misunderstanding, but I stated to the hon. gentleman that the First Minister would make his motion about the Indians to-day as section c, and that the hon. gentleman would then make his motion about the civil servants and that about the other matter. I thought the hon. gentleman understood fully that the First Minister was to move first, because I told him it would be section c, coming immediately after sections a and b.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know anything about the arrangement, because I was not here, but I heard my hon. friend from Bothwell make the suggestion that it would be more convenient that these amendments should be moved first, and the First Minister certainly did not indicate any dissent. It was, in a manner, placed in his hands, and instead of suggesting that there was any violation of an arrangement, he entered into the question of the revising officer, and we settled it, and the present discussion has been participated in equally by both sides of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the hon, gentleman moved his amendment I thought the discussion would be so short that I did not object to it, but the hon, gentleman was actually writing it while the hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) got up and refused to sit down, and spoke at large, without any amendment being before the Chair, until the hon. gentleman made his motion. thought that unfair.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will remember that I rose before the hon, member for West Elgin and stated the effect of the amendment I intended to propose. The amendment was in the hands of my hon. friend beside me, but he was not here and his desk was locked, and I had to write out another amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a misunderstanding, and I shall say no more about it. Under these circumstances, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6:5 p. m., until 1:30 p. m. on Tuesday, the 26th May.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 26th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock. PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—PETITIONS AGAINST THE FRAN-CHISE BILL.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to an article of the Ottawa Citizen, of this city. On a former occasion, when I received a petition which I asked the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to present, on which he had alleged there were twenty-eight Conservative signatures, the Citizen made the charge that these sig natures were probably obtained by forging them. A short discussion arose, and an impression was attempted to be left upon the House that, if those names were not forgeries, they were obtained by fraud or misrepresentation. I do not think, in justice to those twenty-eight men who signed that petition, and in justice to the hon. member who presented it, and to myself, who asked him to do so, the matter should remain in that position. Especially is this the case, as I to-day received a communication from Wiarton, the place where the electors were who signed the petition, from over twenty of those Conservatives who were alleged to have signed it by fraud and misrepresentation; and I ask permission to read this communication to the House on the subject, as a matter of privilege. It is addressed to myself, and is as follows:

and the free exercise of the franchise.

This document is signed by (AC) Samuel Atkinson, Conservative; (AC) John West (his mark), Conservative; (AC) Thomas Vogan, Conservative; (C) Frank Campbell, M.D., Conservative; (ABC) A. G. Staley, Conservative; (ABC) E. A. Pinnok, Conservative; (ABC) J. J. Clark, Conservative; (A B C) Charles Reckin, Conservative; (A B C) Henry Richmond Anthony Ealy, Liberal Conservative; (C) A. R. Davis, Liberal Conservative; (C) James Hunter, Liberal Conservative; (C) J. Robinson, Liberal Conservative; (C) Sableir Brothers, Liberal Conservative; (C) John A. James, Liberal Conservative; (B) (!) W. Heath, Liberal Conservative; (B C) James McKim, Independent Conservative; (C) W. J. Clark, printer, Liberal Conservative; (BC) Nathaniel E. Low, P. L. Surveyor, Liberal Conservative; (C D) James Redfern, Liberal Conservative; (C) R. Collins, Liberal Conservative. There is another name, J. F. Kent. It may have been struck out as there is a mark through it, but I cannot tell. In connection with the document there are two declarations, as follows:-

Canada, Province of Ontario, County of Bruce, Wiarton, 21st May, 1885.

I, Alexander A. Campbell, of the village of Wiarton, county of Bruce, hereby certify that I did personally wait on the parties marked "C," signers to foregoing declaration; that I used no improper means nor misrepresented facts to obtain their signatures, and that the above signatures are bond fide, and I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true.

ALEXANDER A. CAMPBELL

Sworn before me, the day and year first above mentioned, at Wiarton, in the county of Bruce.

A. M. Tyson, J. P. County of Bruce.

We, the undersigned. Samuel Atkinson, Walter Roach Holdin and Herman J. Spence, all of the village of Wiarton, in the county of Bruce, hereby certify that we did accompany one Alexander A. Campbell when he waited on the parties signing the above declaration, opposite whose names are appended our several letters, and that the parties so indicated did-freely sign their respective names, without improper solicitation on the part of Campbell aforesaid, and that the signatures to which we wouch are the bona fide signatures of the parties therein named.

SAMUEL ATKINSON, for letter "A," 8 names. W. R. HOLDIN, for letter "B," 8 names. HERMAN J. SPENCE, for letter "D," 2 names.

Sworn before me this 21st day of May, 1885, at Wiarton, in the county

A. M. Tyson, J. P., County of Bruce.

I think, in the face of these facts, the allegation that the signatures were obtained by fraud and misrepresentation cannot be maintained.

Mr. McNEILL. I suppose it devolves upon me to make a personal explanation with respect to the matter which the hon, gentleman has just brought before the House. I received a letter from a gentleman living in Wiarton, who is, as every one will admit who knows him, as much respected for his conscientiousness and for his strict probity as any man in the county of Bruce or in the Province of Ontario. That gentleman wrote to me in a letter, which I have not here at this moment, but which I will take an opportunity of reading to the House, that the signatures of the Conservatives on the petitions were obtained by misrepresentation of the grossest kind; and among other misrepresentations used was the statement that it was proposed by the First Minister to entranchise the North-West Indians. And, if the names which have just been read were obtained under such a statement, after the explanation made by the First Minister to the House, I contend they were obtained by misrepresentation-I do not wish to make use of stronger terms. I contend that the names so obtained were perfectly valueless; and I am "We, the undersigned Conservatives (and electors), desire, in the most emphatic manner, to contradict the gross insinuation made in the House of Commons, to the effect that our names were secured on the Wiarton petition against the proposed Franchise Bill by fraud and misrepresentation; and we further desire so say that we think it quite consistent with the principles professed by the Liberal Conservative party to protest against a measure which we consider is intended to stifle public opinion and the tree exercise of the franchise."

The names so obtained were perfectly valuetes, and the most perfectly valuetes, at the most perfe enfranchise Strike-him-on-the-back and all the other Indians mentioned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. And so it was.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

On section 9,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was arranged that this matter respecting the Indians should be finally concluded and voted upon on Saturday, and that on Tuesday we should commence with the clause respecting the registration of voters; but better late than never. I stated on several occasions, when we were discussing matters with reference to the franchise of the Indians, that the proper time to bring them up would be on the qualification of voters. I have prepared a sub-paragraph, which I shall read. The clause points out who shall not vote at elections, and as we have adopted a sub-section, providing that the revising barrister shall not vote for two years after revising the lists, that would be paragraph c and this will be d:

Indians in Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territories, and Indians on any reserve elsewhere in Uanada, who are not in possession and occupation of separate and distinct tracts of land on such reserves, and whose improvements on such separate tracts are not to the value of at least $150

Mr. MACKENZIE. Occupation as owners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is a distinction without a difference.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman may think so, but I do not. It is drawn up by myself, though I think it is rather unfair that Indians should not vote who have a right in the soil on which their improvements have been made. But in order to prevent, as far as I can, any objection, I hold that Indians on a reserve, who have distinct and separate holdings, who have made improvements -a house or other improvements—to the value of $150, should have a vote, just as much as any other occupant or tenant. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the question of the propriety or impropriety of allowing Indians on the reserves to vote at all. It has been discussed ad nauseam, first on the interpretation clause and subsequently at great length by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite. I shall move this amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They will vote ad nauseam, too.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt the votes we have given are a good deal of a sickener for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman has stated that the question as to the propriety or impropriety of Indians on reserves voting has been very much discussed, that he does not propose to add any discussion to what has already taken place on that question, because it has been discussed ad nauseam. Well, I do not think the hon. gentleman has discussed that question very much himself. I do not think the hon. gentleman has said very much in defence of this clause, and from the benches which are filled by his usual followers, there have proceeded, from time to time, from more than one of his supporters, observations indicative of opposition to this clause, as now proposed to be amended. Now, Sir, although the hop. gentleman thinks that there has been quite sufficient discussion to enable the committee to dispose of this clause, I do not share his and too much associated with recent tragic events, to opinion, because I have not yet heard any ground attempt to force the proposition with reference to them on upon which this clause, with its qualifications, can be the people; but if it was his intention that the Indians of clause, what he meant with reference to the Indians, and he hon. gentleman's second thought and better advice, are Mr. McNEILL.

told us it was intended to include the Indians in Manitoba and British Columbia. He stated that positively, in answer to my hon. friend. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Mills) was unable, as most of us were unable, to understand how it could be that the hon, gentleman was bringing forward this proposition, and he wanted further explanation than that which was accorded by the language of the Bill itself, and this was the explanation which the hon. gentleman made—that it was to include the Indians of Manitoba and of British Columbia. My hon, friend then asked as to the Indians of the Territories, and the hon. gentleman answered in the affirmative. We at that time supposed that the intention of the hon. gentleman was somewhat like that which he now proposes by this amendment, namely, that if it was the Indian on the reserve who was to have a vote, it should be when he had a location ticket, or a separate holding. We did not then conceive that the hon, gentleman could have in his own mind the idea of permitting the Indian to vote who had no such holding, but had simply his share of the title which his band had in the reserve itself. It subsequently appeared, however, that the language of the Bill was capable of such an interpretation, and now the hon gentleman proposes that, as to the Indian on the reserve who shall have a vote he shall vote if he has in effect a separate location ticket, on property improved to the value of $150. With reference to the explanation which the hon, gentleman makes, he stated a very considerable time—I think, perhaps, a fortnight or more—after his original statement, that it was intended to include the Indians of Manitoba and British Columbia—he stated that it was not his intention that they should vote. He stated that when he introduced the provision in the Bill, his mind had been rather directed to the Indian of the Eastern Province, but of course he could not get over the proposition that the language of the Bill really included them, and that his intention really did include the Western Indians as well, because the language of the Bill itself clearly included them, as we now find confessed from the proposal which is brought before us, and also because, in answer to a question by my hon. friend from Bothwell, the hon. gentleman stated distinctly that such was his intention. I suppose, Sir, that the little plan to exclude the Island of Prince Edward from the uniform application of the franchise having fallen through, it having been found that if that little plan succeeded, it could only succeed by virtue of the destruction of the general principle of uniformity. We are now to apply the hon gentleman's vague observations on the second reading of the Bill as to pedantic uniformity, to the Indian of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman, the declared friend of uniformity, was not friendly to pedantic uniformity; and he intimated that there would be occasions to assert the virtue of diversity and non-uniformity—as I say, most of us supposed that this was applicable to Prince Edward Island; but after a considerable time that plan failed, and now we have got where the pedantic uniformity comes in. It would be pedantic uniformity to give the Indians of Manitoba a vote; and, therefore, the Indians of Manitoba are disqualified, while those of the other Provinces are allowed to vote. Well, I suppose it is really because the hon. gentleman felt that these Indians were in too close proximity to those euphemistically named chiefs which the hon member for North Bruce alluded to a moment ago-Strike-him-on-the Back, Poundmaker, Big Bear, and the others-in too close proximity to them, at any rate in the minds of the people, the people; but if it was his intention that the Indians of properly adopted. When the hon, gentleman first brought Manitoba should have a vote, then we find that a very large forward this measure he was asked, upon the interpretation number of the Indians of that Province, by virtue of the placed in a different position. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not, as I have said, argued out this question. He strikes out the Indians in Manitoba, in Keewatin, and in the North-West Territories; he therefore admits that under the Bill, not merely the Indian in Manitoba, but also the Indian of the District of Keewatin, and the Indian in the North-West Territories, would have a vote. You will observe that the hon. member for North Bruce and others have said that it was not intended by this Bill to give the Indians in the North-West Territories a vote, but if the Bill does not do that why does the hon, gentleman exclude him just now? Of course, we know perfectly well that at this instant the North West Territories have not representation in Parliament, and therefore at this instant the Indians of the North-West Territories would not have a vote; but this Bill is intended to be the imperishable memorial of the hon, gentleman's name and fame, to be handed down to future generations. It therefore ought to be prepared totus, teres, atque rotundus, so as to require no alteration or change to be made in that day when the North-West Territories shall have representation. He anticipates that day; he is providing for including the peo-ple of the North-West Territories with the view of giving them representation; and the hon. gentleman, anxious to prescribe how they shall be represented, what persons shall be qualified to exercise the franchise in those Territories, when they are to be represented, takes time by the forelock—or shall I say by the scalplock?—and says beforehand to Poundmaker, and Big Bear—perhaps neutralising the conciliatory efforts of his agents who are now engaged operating with those eminent citizens: Gentlemen, to you I give notice even now, that in the happy day which is coming when the North-West Territories shall be represented, you shall be excluded from that most valuable privilege of the capable citizen. Now, with reference to the Indians on the reserves, elsewhere in Canada, the hon. gentleman proposes to exclude the Indian, who is not in possession and occupation of a separate and distinct piece of land in the reserve, and whose such separate tract is not of the value of $150. and whose such separate tract is not of the value of $150, The hon, gentleman does not by that proposition in the slightest degree answer the difficulties suggested from this side of the House. He does not answer the difficulty as to the dependent position of the Indian there, as to the wardship of that Indian, as to the character of his holding, by whose g ace he gets it and holds it, and what his relations r are to the band and to the Superintendent General. On the contrary, under the provision as it stood before, the Indian was more independent than he is under this provision, because under the law as it stood, if the whole reserve was divided up amongst the Indians would amount in value to such an amount as would give the qualification, any one of the Indians would have the right to vote, a right which the hon, gentleman could not deprive him of-a right which the hon, gentleman could not deprive him of—a right which he would hold by Act of Parliament, not by the grace of the Superintendent General; but the hon, gentleman, pretending to give an advantage, says to the House that though he thinks it rather unfair to the poor Indian to deprive the other Indians of their votes, he will not give it as a right, but as a favor to those to whom he gives location tickets or who have separate holdings: so that no Indian shall have a right to separate holdings; so that no Indian shall have a right to the vote unless he gets a location ticket—that which he does not hold absolutely or by a form of title, as any other citizen. Now, Sir, we are considering the question of the future franchise of the inhabitants of Canada, and we have a proposal from the hon. gentleman with reference to the Indian franchise which ought to have been accompanied by those statements which, as a Minister of the Crown, as the First Minister, as the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, as the promoter of this Bill, it was the hon. gentle-learned from the hon. gentleman how many Indians would have been enfranchised under this proposal. We ought to have learned what the present condition of things is, and what he expects it to be. In discussions in the English House of Commons, upon proposals to enlarge the franchise, statements with reference to the effect of the proposed enlargement, and calculations as to the numbers of citizens who would be made capable of enjoying that franchise, have always been made and have formed the subjects of discussion. Here, after a long, after, the hon. gentleman says, a too long discussion, he brings down a proposal to us which he did not choose to indicate earlier, and we have no statement of its probable effects, or of the number of persons out of the 105,000 Indians in the Dominion of Canada who are to be enfranchised by it. Is it a measure for the enfranchisement of the Indians as a whole, in the body? How does it affect British Columbia? I am not prepared to say, but I daresay my hon. friends from that Province—except the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Baker), who, I believe, declared the other day that he thought the Indians ought to have a vote—are, some of them, at any rate, pretty well satisfied with the Bill. I presume that out of the 35,000 Indians in British Columbia, a very small number will get the franchise, and I presume that they may have a pretty good expectation that the system of giving separate holdings upon the comparatively small reserves that exist in that Province, will be more extensively applied. But with reference to the older Provinces, to which the hon. gentleman says his attention was especially directed in preparing this measure, I ask what is to be the effect of the franchise? How many have such separate holdings? Is the amount to be confined even to the location ticket? The question is brought before the House by the hon. gentleman once again saying that he is reluctant in making this change, that he thinks it is hardly fair to a great many of the Indians. To how many of them is it unfair? What proportion of the Indians are being treated with harshness in restricting the franchise to them, as he says it will be restricted? And what proportion are now being the densely. The latter will be a very variable quantity; it will depend largely upon the urgency and pressure of the local agent and of the Superintendent General as to the exagent and of the Superintendent General as to the expedience of separate holdings on the reserves and the conditions upon which these holdings are to be given. Now, a good many gentlemen have been disposed to treat this question, as the hon, gentleman, in the words be threw out, treated it—that it was hardly fair to the Indians, that he was sorry to do it—in a somewhat sentimental manner. I meintain that these of my who object to mental manner. I maintain that those of us who object to the hon. gentleman's proposal to give votes to the tribal Indians living on the reserve are not, by any such objection, in the slightest degree, open to the charge of want of sympathy with the Indian. On the contrary, we have sympathised in time past, and in spite of the tragic events pathised in time past, and in spite of the tragic events of the past few weeks we, too, to-day do sympathise—who but can sympathise?—with the nature and condition of these, if not original, at any rate immemorial, owners of the soil upon which our ancestors intruded. But it is not the case that sympathy is to be the ground upon which the franchise is to be extended. I had occasion myself when I filled is to be extended. I had occasion myself, when I filled the office of Minister of Justice, to consider a case with reference to some of these Indians whom the hon. gentleman to-day is excluding—Indians in the district, I think, of Keewatin, and I felt a very deep sympathy with two of them, two sons. I will state the circumstances. They had deliberately murdered their aged mother. I was called upon to say what, if any, proceedings should be taken against them; and it appeared from incontestible testimony that these unfortunate heathen Indians had nourished for generations the belief that an aged woman, such as she was, man's duty to have laid before us. We ought to have approaching the period of death, under certain circumstances became possessed of supernatural but maleficent powers, and could and would, unless slaughtered, be the death, not merely of her family, but also of large numbers of the tribe to which she belonged. Under their religion, if you can so use the phrase, it became a part of the duty of these two sons to put an end to their mother; and they discharged it with tears and grief, as a religious duty incumbent upon them by their laws, rites and ceremonies, to avert the result to which I have referred. That is the sort of people who are to be excluded from the franchise by the hon. gentleman's amendment, and who, but for that amendment, would be included. Being satisfied this was their ancient rule, I felt it would not do to take proceedings with the view to hang those two, and I ordered a personal visit to be made to every individual of the band, the law and customs of our country to be explained to them, and to be pointed out to them that any repetition or attempt to repeat such a crime would be followed by the utmost rigor of the law; but I felt that, under the circumstances, it would do more harm than good to take further proceedings with reference to the act that was past. These are the class to which the hon. gentleman, but for his amendment of to-day, was going to give the franchise; and I can say we can sympathise with these people, we can bear with them, we can tolerate many things as due to ancient, ingrained habit, costoms, and religion so called, we can deal tenderly with them—without at all agreeing that they are capable citizens, proper to be entrusted with the franchise. They are not, in a word, fit to vote. For innumerable generations they lived, as hunters principally, a nomad life, and they had their own civilisation, their own rules, their own notions of manly virtue, their own vices and faults, and we came here and we added some of our vices to them. gave them the appetite and the means of drink, and we gave them painful and loathsome disease, and our efforts to civilise them have been very largely, no doubt, a failure. once before, on an Indian debate, adverted to the strength of the wild strain in the blood of the Indian. I told the House some years ago of two cases, to my own knowledge, of young men, school fellows of my own for many years, apparently very civilised, well instructed, capable in all respects, but who, after they had grown up among the haunts of men so instruct ed and with the opportunities of leading such a life as we would prefer, returned, at mature years to the band, and to the wild life of the Indian. You cannot hope in any brief space, in a space which you can measure, even in a few generations, to extinguish that wild strain in the blood, and those longings for the tribal life, and the free life and the wild life of the Indian. It is useless, therefore, to discuss this question, as if such a solution of it were to be obtained by all the efforts we can use, and by all the efforts we have been putting forward by example, by local agents, by school teachers, by missionaries, by priests, by their being surrounded by the habitations of white settled people. If all that has done so little, what is the giving of a vote going to do more? It is not going to help the Indians; it is going, as you propose to give it, to add another element to his degredation, and to degrade the white along with him. Now what is the position? I stated the position with reference to the Indian early in this debate, immediately after the hon, gentleman had made his explanation, and I reinforced that position then by a perusal of the relevant parts of the Indian Act. I am not about to advert again to them, though the hon. gentleman's amendment and the language with which he put it in your hands, Sir, renders it absolutely necessary that they should be adverted to again, to show how utterly he has mistaken or chooses to misread the whole discussion. I am not myself, however, about to advert again in detail to the provisions of the Act, but I say they are provisions—and I read them and I proved it—which show that the Indian is not within the year ended the 30th June, 1879, the hon. gentleman stated meaning of those words as applied to the exercise of the this: Mr. BLAKE.

franchise, which show that the tribal Indian living on his reserve, even although he has this separate holding, under the hon, gentleman, is not a capable citizen. I say he is not. I say you disqualify him, you incapacitate him in many of those respects which we call the primary and essential elements of manhood and citizenship; and while you disqualify him and incapacitate him in these, you have no right to give him the crowning badge, the flower of freedom—the vote. You tell him: You shall not deal with your own, with what we call by courtesy your own, as you like. Why? Because you have not capacity to do it, because you will be deceived, because you are too improvident, because you must have a Superintendent General, a Deputy Superintendent General and a local agent to look after you, to control you, to mahage you, to husband your reserve, to decide which of you shall have a holding, to dispense favors among you, to assist you in the determination of whom shall be your chief and so forth. But you say to him: There is a process by which, by certain gradations, after an interval of years, having proved by your conduct in the first place and by your conduct later, having undergone a period of probation, that you are fit for enfranchisement, you shall be enfranchised and become a free man, and shall have a vote as you ought to have a vote. But now, you say, while all these badges of war, of tutelage, of inferiority, of incapacity remain—while they remain upon your Statute Book marked upon the Indian and his life, while they remain in actual practice, while you declare it would be the worst thing in the world for the Indian to remove them, while you say the operation of enfranchisement cannot be even accelerated without danger, while this is your own description in your own laws of the condition of the Indian, you say to this Indian so circumstanced: We will give the franchise. He cannot take care of himself, we have to take care of him; but, incapable as he is of taking care and controlling his own, we will give him the right to manage our affairs. We have to manage his, he shall manage ours. Now the Province of Ontario has a number of equally balanced constituencies, in several of which there are Indian reserves, and the attempt of the hon gentleman is practically to control the white vote in those constituencies by the addition of the Indian vote. And he has two great forces to assist him in his government. He, the First Minister, the dispenser of the favors of Parliament, the dispenser of the bounty of the nation, the ruler of the Indian, his guardian, can help himself well enough; but that, perhaps, is not alone enough, so he has the hon. gentleman his colleaugue beside him, the hon. the Minister of Customs; for I see by the Orange Sentinel, in its last edition, that there is an outburst of joy on the proposal to give the tribal Indians the vote because of the number of Orange lodges among them. So that, with what the hon. gentleman the First Minister as Superintendent General and the hon. the Minister of Customs as the representative in this Government of the Orange body, the hon. gentleman is quite sure that the Indians of Ontario will vote right, anyway. The whites are to be so ruled, the white electors in the constituencies are to be so ruled, are to be ruled by virtue of the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Customs, as an influential Orangeman, having an influence over the Indians. As I have said, I am not about to advert in detail to the clauses of the Act, but I am about to do what I have not done hitherto, I am about to refer you to some passages in the hon. gentleman's own report; not the report of his deputy, not the report of his local agents, important as they are; but every passage which I shall read to you is a passage in the hon. gentleman's own report, signed by himself as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, indicating to my mind as clearly as possible the monstrous character of the proposal he now brings forward. In the report for the

"It will give your Excllency pleasure to learn that the condition of the aboriginal inhabitants of the Dominion is, on the whole, not only satisfactory, but gradually and surely improving. In the older Provinces, they have in many cases attained to an intellectual and educational standard not second to that of their white neighbors, engaging with much success in agriculture, mechanics, commerce, and the learned professions, and taking a creditable part in social and religious life and in the political government of the country.

I need hardly say that these observations applied as a rule—at any rate the last one—to the enfranchised Indian because the unenfranchised Indian had no vote. But now, after that rose-colored statement of the condition of the Indian in the older Provinces has been read—and I should like to hear the number of instances to which it applies in the Province of Nova Scotia—

Mr. KIRK. Not one.

Mr. BLAKE—In the Province of New Brunswick, in the Province of Prince Edward Island, and in the Province of Quebec, and even in the Province of Ontario—I do not deny that it applies to some cases, but they are rari nantes in gurgite vasto—the majority are in the other condition—what does he say?

"In Ontario, more especially, they are abandoning the old tribal system and the state of tutelage which it involves, assimilating with the rest of the population, and assuming all the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens."

The hon. gentleman's general observation, you will thus find, is applied particularly by him to the Province of Ontario, and, when he comes to give us the description of the most advanced in the Province of Ontario, what is the test of advancement which he gives us, what is the main and crucial test of advancement which he gives? It is this:

There is the process of emancipation, there is the process of enfranchisement which the hon, gentleman rejoiced to see going on, which he was desirous to see go on still further, and which was to result, after the abandonment of the tribal system, after the abandonment of the state of tutelage which the tribal system involves, in an assimilation with the rest of the population, and then the assumption of all the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens. But now, while yet they are tribal Indians, while yet they do not abandon, and do not choose to abandon, the tribal system, while yet they are in the state of tutelage which that tribal system involves, as I have here confessed under the signature "John A. Macdonald," which follows a page or two further on, while yet they are in that state of tutelage while yet they decline to assimilate with the rest of the population, while yet they decline so to acquire, so to assume, to repeat the hon. gentleman's language, all the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens, the hon. gentleman proposes to give them rights, privileges and immunities which we should rejoice to see them have if they were citizens like ourselves, but which the hon, then and always hitherto thought incompatible with the retention of the tribal system, incompatible with the state of tutelage which it involves, incompatible with a non-assimilation with the rest of the population, incompatible with the non-assumption of all the rights, privileges and responsibilities of citizens. How shall these men decide for us what the political government of the country is to be? How shall they decide for us what our rights are to be? How shall they decide for us what is the due and the proper course of a free man, when they are not free men themselves? That is what the hon. gentleman proposes. fitting that those who are in a state of tutelage should control the free men? And yet the hon, gentlemen says here that the tribal system involves a state of tutelage. And he says that those who are in the state of tutelage shall conthat, because he is their tutor, because he is the man who has them in a state of tutelage, they shall vote, so as to control the free expression of the free citizens of this country. Then, in the reports for the next year, the hon. gentleman himself—for I say I adhere only to reports which are signed by his own name—says:

"The small Wyandotte band, whose reserve is situate in the township of Anderdon, in the county of Essex, will this year have completed their three years term of probation for enfranchisement, and will then be entitled, under the provisions of the Indian Act of 1880, to letters patent for their respective holdings, and to have the capital at their credit in the hands of the Government divided among them, and, upon this taking place, they will cease to be Indians in every respect within the meaning of the law."

So there is a statement, obviously with gratification, of the result of the provisions for enfranchisement in their practical application. Then, when the hon, gentleman goes on to discuss the conditions of some of the Indians who are to be enfranchised, he, as I have said, indicates time and again, their dependent condition. For example, speaking of the Indians of the Province of Quebec, whose reserves are more favorably situated, as respects soil and climate, he says:

"They are less nomadic in their habits, they live in villages or on reserves, and the wigwam is, with them, a thing of the past. There is, however, but little progress among them; although they have, as a rule, abundance of land of good quality, from the cultivation of which, if prosecuted with ordinary vigor, they might procure an ample subsistence for themselves and families, and, in order to encourage them to do so, seed grain, potatoes and garden seeds, are supplied to such of them as have land prepared for the same."

Take your Indian, give him his allotment, let him have his separate holding, his shanty worth $150, and his fence and so forth worth $150 of improvements upon it, and then let the Superintendent General, forsooth, decide that he has properly prepared his ground and is entitled to some seed grain—potatoes or garden seeds—or the contrary; and, the Superintendent General having decided whether he shall have the raw material for the cultivation of the ground, give him the vote, the free vote which he will exercise, no doubt without the slightest regard to the power of the seeds and roots for planting your ground, or not, and it is in my judgment whether you shall have them or not. The hon, gentleman goes on to speak of the western counties of Nova Scotia:

"The Indians of these counties pay but little attention to the cultivation of the soil. The efforts of the Department have been for several years unceasingly directed towards inducing them to settle on and cultivate lands on their reserves, and in the furtherance of this object seed grain, potatoes and garden seeds are distributed every spring among such of them as are disposed to use them; and although, as a general thing, the attempt to make an agricultural people of them has hitherto proved unsuccessful, yet the reports from some localities of Indians adopting that mode of obtaining a subsistence are sufficiently encouraging to justify increased efforts being put forth in that direction."

There is your free man again; there are the Indians of the western past of the Province of Nova Scotia, living on their holdings, and being persuaded by the Superintendent General to cultivate the soil by an annual distribution of seed grain, potatoes and garden seeds, amongst those disposed to use it. Of course they will vote against the Superintendent General:

"In the eastern counties of the Province a healthier condition of matters exist, especially is this the case in the Island of Cape Breton, where the Indians live for the most part in houses, make good use of the seed given them by cultivating their lands and raising crops of sufficient importance to materially aid in the support of themselves and their families."

course of a free man, when they are not free men themselves? That is what the hon, gentleman proposes. Is it fitting that those who are in a state of tutelage should control the free men? And yet the hon, gentleman says here that the tribal system involves a state of tutelage. And he says that those who are in the state of tutelage shall control the free men. The hon, gentleman adheres to the view you strongly denouncing this proposition of the hon. gentleman, from the intimate knowledge you must have of the red men in whose vicinity you live:

"The Superintendent of the Indians in the northern and eastern counties of the Province of New Brunswick, reports an improvement on the whole in their condition, and he anticipates a continuance of the same, owing to the commencement last spring"—

Now, what improved these Indians in the year 1880? What made them better off? What made them more capable citizens to exercise the franchise? I will tell you what it was:

"Owing to the commencement last spring of the system of distributing seed among such of the Indians as were cultivating land, instead of handing the money to them as had been previously the practise, when it was used for other purposes than that for which it was intended."

They had a present each spring to buy seed. They were not to be trusted with the money, because they used it for other purposes. The Department had to go back and treat them like children, and give them the seed itself, and, Sir John A. Macdonald, the Superintendent General, reports a material improvement in the condition of the Indians of New Brunswick, because the Superintendent had resorted to the practice of restraining them by giving them the actual seed instead of the money. There is a similarity among them to the Indians I recollect reading about whom the hon. gentleman is disfranchising in the North-West, who boiled the seed potatoes, who cooked the seed grain, and who ate the oxen for the plow, and the cows that were intended to give milk and for breeding purposes. Even giving them in kind did not always answer the purpose. I should not be surprised—in point of fact I have it in some of these reports, that even giving the seed in kind did not always secure the planting of the seed by the more civilised Indians in the eastern part of the country. That is the better part; then on the west side of New Brunswick there is a statement with reference to Victoria and Madawaska, where the agent says:

"The Indians of those counties are industrious, temperate and contented, and that they are every year advancing slowly but surely towards a higher state of civilisation."

Then he goes on to say of the Indians on the west side New Brunswick:

"Those Indians, like their brethren of the western counties of Nova Scotia, are unsettled in their habits;"

Now, Sir, what is the independent voter, the independent Indian voter in western New Brunswick, in the habit of doing? What do you think the Superintendant General complains of?

"And the constant appeals to the Department for increased assistance indicates but little advancement towards their becoming self supporting and independent."

It was rather an annoyance, you know, to be called on to give out the public money to assist the Indian before he was an independent voter, but now that he has become a free and independent voter, how rejoiced the hon. gentleman must be to know that the Indian on the west side of New Brunswick is improvident, that he uses up his money and means too fast, because he will have to come to him and say: Please let me have some money; please give me some assistance, some blankets, some food, something to cultivate my land with. And the Superintendent General will be generous, the Superintendent General will be gracious, he will scold him no more, and he will take care that his just and reasonable requests for pauper relief are acceded to; and so he will secure his independent vote. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to discuss a most interesting topic—the elevation of the Indians by means of education. Of course, we know that the process of elevation is slow, and that it is by dealing with the young alone that we can hope for material progress. He says:

"The greatest obstacle to the successful education of Indian children at day schools consists in the irregularity of their attendance, caused in RAME.

part by the neglect of their parents to oblige them to attend, and by the frequent absence of many families from the reserves while fishing, hunting and berry-picking. In order to remedy this state of things as far as possible, the teachers have been instructed to adapt to the periods of vacation the time when the Indians will be absent from the reserve."

There you see the difficulty. The Indian is not merely irregular, nomadic, absent himself, but he does not cause he children to attend, and he frequently takes the child away from the reserves on his expedition. Then, the plan recently adopted in connection with Indian day schools in Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territory, of granting bonuses to teachers, etc., is stated. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to deal with general observations of high consequence:

"And the Indian day school is, however, under the best of circumstances, attended with unsatisfactory results, the Indian youth, to enable him to cope successfully with his brother of white origin, must be disassociated from the prejudicial influences by which he is surrounded on the reserves of his band."

There is the statement—the reserve band surrounds the Indian with prejudicial influences, and if you are going to elevate the young Indian, if you are going to put him on a par, and bring him by degrees up to the standard of his white brother, you must disassociate him from the prejudicial influences of the surrounding band.

"And the necessity for the establishment more generally of institutions whereat Indian children, besides being instructed in the usual branches of education will be lodged, fed, clothed"—

Now what? Listen, fathers of families throughout Canada; listen to the character of the persons who are to have votes and control your destinies. What is to be done with the children who are to be elevated?——

"kept separate from home influences, taught trades and instructed in agriculture, is becoming every year more apparent."

Kept separate from home influences! That is the character of the Indian parent, that is the character of the Indian voter. That is the elevated condition in which the Superintendent General says the Indian voter of to-morrow occupies—not merely of to-morrow but of "of old to-morrow." That is the character of the parent—that if the Indian daughter, or the Indian son, is to be advanced, if real progress is to be made, if he is to be put in a position in which he can cope with his white brother, one of the conditions stated by the right hon, gentleman is, that he is to be taken away from the reserves, and a second condition, is, that he is to be kept separate from home influences. It is these people who are to control our destinies. Every year it is becoming more apparent, in spite of the hon. gentleman's long continued effort, that if you are going to make anything of the Indian in the sense of the white man, you must do it through education of the young, and that if you are going to educate the young Indian successfully You must take him from the prejudicial influences of the reserves, you must keep him separated from home influences, and it is these home influences which have been potent enough and prejudicial enough to induce the hon. gentleman to give the tribal Indians the franchise. Then the hon, gentleman has pointed out the prejudicial condition of affairs upon the bands, and goes on to discuss the question of tribal government:

"Convinced of the desirability of introducing, as soon as Indian bands are prepared for it, a better system of managing their local affairs than the one which at present prevails among them, under which the chiefs (who in many cases are hereditary, and therefore may or may not fairly represent the intelligence of the band) control such matters—the Department despatched a circular to the various Indian superintendents and agents calling upon them to report whether the bands under their supervision were sufficiently enlightened to justify the conclusion that the inauguration of a simple form of municipal government among them would be attended with success."

The hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) read this extract a little while ago; but the hon gentleman must have forgotten it, and it is to bring it to his remembrance that I read it again.

Mr. HESSON. It is to take up time.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says it is to take up time. I deny the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. HESSON. It looks very much like it. That quotation has been read half a dozen times.

Mr. BLAKE. I tell the hon. gentleman that I have yet hope that even the hon. gentleman may yet see light upon this question. I yet entertain the hope that though the hon, gentleman cannot answer our arguments, yet he may be convinced by them, even though it may require a surgical operation to achieve that result. I do not know whether it will require chloroform in order that that surgical operation may be performed; but whatever is possible must be done in order to convince him, and if not to convince, to convict the hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman said he was convinced as to the advisability of introducing as soon as possible among the Indians a better system of government. What was that better system? A simple form of municipal government was that better system, according to the hon. gentleman's own words. He was not, however, satisfied as to their being sufficiently enlightened for a simple form of municipal government, so he sent his agents to find out whether, in their opinion, the Indians were sufficiently enlightened for the introduction among them of such a system with success. The question was whether the Indians were sufficiently enlightened to justify the conclusion that they should have a simple form of municipal government. What was the answer?

"From the majority of its officers who have replied to the circular, the reports received led to the conclusion that the Indian bands within their respective districts are not sufficiently advanced in intelligence for the change."

We have it in these reports; they have not been brought down. Allusion is made to some of them, and extracts are given; but it would be most interesting to know what was the view of these agents in regard to the condition of the Indians. But we have the summing up of the right hon. gentleman-a most favorable summing up, for he wanted to accomplish his plan, and his only doubt was whether his wards were sufficiently enlightened to permit of their being entrusted with a simple form of municipal government with success. He enquires of the local superintendent. He receives as an answer that they are not sufficiently enlightened to have such a system as is proposed. In 1881 the Indians are deemed to be sufficiently enlightened to introduce among them a simple form of municipal government; and yet the right hon. gentleman now proposes to give them power to govern this whole Dominion.

"An attempt will, however, be made at an early date to obtain the consent of the more advanced bands to the establishment of some such system."

It is stated how it was to be done:

"It is thought that a council, proportionate in number to the population of the band, elected by the male members thereof, of twenty-one years and over, and presided over by a functionary similar to the reeve of a township, might answer the purpose; or in its initiatory stage the council might be presided over, with better results, by the local Indian superintendent or agent."

There you have the same hon, gentleman; you have the suggestion that the hon. gentleman's deputy might with better results preside over the municipal council. Now I pass to the next year, where I find the hon. gentleman deals with the Indians of the older Provinces again. He says:

"It is to be regretted that so many of the Indians of the older Provinces, although possessing lands of first-class quality, situated within easy reach of good markets, and residing in the vicinity of white farmers from whom they might, if so disposed, acquire a knowledge of farming profitably, evince such inability to profit by these advantages."

white farmers from whom they could acquire a knowledge of profitable farming; but even with all these advantages they were unable to farm with advantage. Yet the hon. gentleman now proposes to enfranchise them and give them power to decide our destinies and to vote for members of this House.

"Their farms, generally speaking, are not only managed in such a way as to afford profitable returns, but in too many cases they do not produce sufficient to meet the wants of their families."

They have no rent to pay, they have first class lands, but with all these advantages they are unable to produce sufficient to provide for their families.

"And consequently basket making, axchandle manufacturing, bead work, moccasiu making and other Indian handicraft have to be resorted to in order to supply the deficit; and to dispose of these articles the Indians have to visit numerous places, and thus their old, and to them, congenial babit of wandering about the country is fostered, which is attended with evil results to them, morally and materially."

What is to be done for the Indian after this description of his condition; with the Indian in the older Provinces who possesses such advantages and is surroundered by such favorable circumstances? Is he to be left to himself?

"The appointment of local agents possessing a practical knowledge of farming, who would instruct the Indians in that art, and in raising and taking care of live stock, and in keeping their buildings and fences in repair, would no doubt effect a change for the better in the condition of the Indians of these Provinces."

You want to establish a man who will be his guardian, who will teach him to farm, how to care for stock how to keep up his fences and his buildings. He could not do those things himself. Quis custodiet ipsos custodes.

"The services of an active inspector, possessing sufficient knowledge in such matters, to enable him to judge whether or not matters were being properly managed on the reserve, would also be of incalculable benefit."

You want some one over the Indian as instructor, you want a local superintendent to go there with authority from headquarters, to show that headquarters are watching over the local agents who are watching over the Indians, and thus see that everything is going smoothly.

"Until a system of the kind above indicated be inaugurated, no material improvement in the condition of the Indians of the older Provinces may be expected."

There the hon, gentleman declared that until a system of this description be inaugurated, a system, namely, under which there will be persons to teach them farming, to keep up their fences, to manage their stock, to look after them to see that everything is right, no material improvement in the condition of the Indians may be expected. But the right hon gentleman is now going to improve the Indian by giving him the franchise. The right hon gentleman says:

"The strange aversion evinced by very many of the Indian bands in these Provinces to their reserves being sub-divided into locations for different families has prevented the issue generally (as was contemplated) of location tickets to individual occupants covering the land held by them."

They are averse at present to a subdivision of locations. Until the hon, gentleman wanted it they did not do it generally, and it has not been much done. But now if the Indians know they are going to have a vote, which is a species of property, a new right capable of being turned to their personal advantage, perhaps the hon, gentleman will have an opportunity of giving them more location tickets, and thus will have power over them to be recompensed in due time.

"Some bands however whose reserves were sub-divided many years since, willingly agreed to accept the tickets; the holders of the same appearing to understand that they gave them individually a better title to their respective holdings than they previously possessed."

And perhaps the hon gentleman would tell them: Now the location ticket and the franchise. You shall have the vote if That is their condition. They have first-class land, they you have the location ticket; you shall have the ticket are within easy reach of good markets, they reside near if you are a good Indian, and if you are a bad Indian I shall exercise my power and deal with you with reference to those holdings. Won't you take the ticket? And the Indian answers yes, and votes accordingly.

"And it is hoped that in time all of the bands will consent to their reserves being sub-divided and location tickets being given to individual occupants of land therein. It is worthy of consideration whether legislative measures should not be adopted for the establishment of some kind of municipal system among such bands as are found sufficiently advanced to justify the experiment being tried. It is hoped that a system may be adopted which will have the effect of accustoming the Indians to the mode of government prevalent in the white communities surrounding them, and that it will thus tend to prepare them for earlier amalgamation with the general population of the country."

There is the hon. gentleman's system. He feels that the tribal, the separate system, the holding system, is one which holds the Indian back, which does not either entitle him to or fit him for the rights, the privileges and the responsibilities of citizenship, and he bends himself in every way to getting rid of it. He hopes to educate him to farming, he hopes to educate his children away from home, he hopes to get him to adopt a municipal system of government, he hopes to get him to adopt a system of enfranchise ment, and he hopes that something may be done by slow degrees to prepare him for early amalgamation with the white population of the country. And now, all of a sudden, while all these things are as yet unaccomplished, he proposes to make him one of the white population of the country, at once, and in its most distinctive badge, the badge of the franchise. Then, dealing with the Ontario Indians on reserves, and referring to the Indians at Fort William, he save with reference to the schools there:

"They erected a new council house during the past year. There are two schools on the reservation, one for boys and the other for girls. Both are conducted efficiently. The attendance is, however, small, mainly owing to the fact that the parents do not provide for sufficient clothing for the children."

There is the hon. gentleman's statement, that the Indians who are to have a vote presently do not provide enough clothing for their children, so that the poor, naked creatures are not able to go to school. But the parents are to have a vote, and no doubt that will make up for the want of clothing on the part of children. An hon friend beside me says they will vote in puris naturalibus, and perhaps we will find that something may be done to enable them to vote in this way without their being dealt with for violating the laws. Then he goes on, referring to the Western Superintendency of Ontario:

"The Chippewas of Sarnia occupy a valuable tract of land capable of being successfully farmed, and affording rich compensation to those so cultivating it. But far from this being the case with the present occupants a recent investigation into their condition reveals the fact that a large majority of them not only fail to cultivate the land successfully have being the large majority of them not only fail to cultivate the land successfully have being the large majority. fully, but are living in actual misery

There is the hon, gentleman's own statement of the Chippewa band. Then he says with reference to the Indians on Walpole Island and other points in that neighborhood:

"Resident agents should be stationed on or in the immediate vicinity of the several reserves, possessing qualifications that will enable them to instruct the Indians in farming, and to energetically protect their interests in the timber and other valuables on the reserve; and it is proposed at an early day to effect a change in the manner indicated."

They want protection, they want a protector, an energetic protector, they cannot take care of their own timber on their own reserves, they are lost and ruined for want of a protector, and he says they shall have an energetic protector in the person of my deputy, and they shall vote as well. Then the hon. gentleman, referring to the Wyandottes,

"These Indians are also under the superintendent stationed at Sarnia. The large majority of them were enfranchised during the past year, having served the term of probation required by the law; they received letters patent conveying to them in fee-simple the lands individually assigned themselves and their families."

There he shows a case under which the existing laws have sufficed to enable the Indians to become citizens on equal Mr. BLAKE.

terms with the white population. Then, as to the Indians of Quebec, the Algonquins, and the Têtes de Boule of the Rivers Desert and Gatineau, he says:

"The agent reports that in a reasonable time these Indians will become as good farmers as many of their white neighbors. Location tickets covering their individual holdings were this year issued to them."

So there is slow but satisfactory progress going on there. Then, Sir, with reference to Nova Scotia, speaking of the Micmaes in Richmond county let us see what was the position of those independent voters in that year. They are described generally as being industrious, honest and temperate, but notwithstanding that how are they off?

"A few of them, however, do not pay much attention to the cultivation of their lands, being given to wandering habits. The crops of last year, especially oats and potatoes (on which the Indians chiefly depend) were a failure."

And had it not been for something, which the Superintendent states took place, they would have been in sore straits, and what was it? What was it prevented the Indians of Richmond county from being in sore straits? Sir, it was the relief money sent them by the Department. The hon, gentleman sent them poor relief, and this was the dole which prevented starvation among them, although they are sober, honest, temperate, and industrious Indians. They were dependent, not withstanding these good qualities, on the generosity administered by the hon gentleman at his discretion, to keep them from starvation, so you see how amply qualified they are for exercising the vote freely. We do not assume that they are base enough not to entertain the sentiment of gratitude; we do not assume that they are unintelligent enough not to know from whom they received that relief from starvation; we do not assume that they are of a level low enough not to know what they may hope or dread from the good or ill will of the Superintendent General at such times, and knowing these things we know how the tribal Indians will vote. The next year the hon. gentleman goes on to discuss the condition of Indian matters in the older Provinces, and he says in his report for the year

"The condition of Indian matters in these Provinces is, on the whole, satisfactory. Any suffering of consequence during the year was confined to certain bands in Nova Scotia which found the scanty stores laid in by them quite insufficient to tide them over the unusually protracted winter. * * * * The increased desire among the Ind ans of the older Provinces for additional schools on reserves on which none have as yet been established or where those already in operation are deemed insufficient, may be regarded as an indication that the much-to-be-desired demand for enfranchisement on the part of some if not of many, of the bands, may follow as the result of this inclination for further enlightment, and every facility compatible with reason to enable them to become enfranchised should be afforded those anxious for the step.

Admirable statement! He says there is a greater demand for schools and what does that point to? It points to an indication that there may follow what he much desires-a demand for enfranchisement on the part of some; he thinks it is likely to follow because the request for schools is an indication of further enlightenment, and further enlightenment will lead to that much-to-be-desired demand for enfran chisement. Now the hon, gentleman proposes to give them the vote without enfranchising them, to enable them to vote without making them free, to leave them subject to their present disabilities and incapacities, and nominally to enfranchise them so far as the vote is concerned, while in all the material ingredients which involve the requisites for a free vote he leaves them in a position of tutelage and wardship. He says:

"The law might possibly be with advantage amended in this respect, so as to give the Indians desirous of enfranchisement increased facilities for accomplishing their object.

"I am pleased to be able to report that five bands in the Province of Ontario, and two bands in the Province of Quebec, accepted location tickets covering their individual holdings. And thirty-six members of the Wandotte band of Auderdon, County of Essey, having, as stated in my report of last year, been enfranchised, received letters patent covering the lands individually covered by them."

So you see there is slow progress, but some progress, towards the hon. gentleman's aspirations, which were to educate the Indians and they asked for more education; to get the Indians to accept separate holdings and they accept separate holdings; and to get the Indian to apprehend slightly in some degree, the opportunities of entranchisement, and the hon. gentleman thinks there is some movement in that direction. Speaking of the Ontario Indians, and speaking with reference to the band on the Sarnia reserve he says:

"There should and would be some fine farms on this reserve, if they were properly managed. As it is, the Indian owners either overcrop the land until the soil becomes worn out, or they allow it to become overgrown with weeds. On the reserve at Kettle Point and the kivière aux Sables there are some tolerably well cultivated farms and good orchards. On Walpole Island matters are somewhat better than on the Sarnia reserve. The same remark, however, in regard to overcropping the land, applies also there."

Then, with reference to the crops on the reserves of the Chippewas and the Munceys, he says:

"Leases of lots and parts of lots which are not used by the Indians have been, with the consent of the band and others will probably be rented, to respectable white farmers, on leases of short terms which bind the lessee to pay a handso ne rental, make valuable improvements on the land, till it in a husbandlike manner, and at the expiration of the term of lease, peaceably give up possession of the land without compensation for improvement."

Remember that this is a proposal to lease to white men lands which are claimed by individual Indians, and to charge for these leases. What has the hon gentleman to say to the individual Indian?

"The individual Indian claimants of the location leased will receive the rent."

Why, of course, he should receive the rent; it is the rent of his own holding which he has agreed so lease to the white man. Why should he not receive the rent? Ah, but he only receives it on one condition.

"Provided they work the parcels of land retained by them in a proper manner, otherwise, the rent will be placed at the credit of the whole band."

The local superintendent is to decide whether the individual Indian retaining a portion of his own holding, and allowing a portion to be leased to the white man, is working his own proportion in a proper manner. If the Indian superintendent says to him: Lo (or whatever his name is), yes, you are operating it in a proper manner, you will have the land; or he says: Lo, you are negligent; you went picking berries or hunting or basket-making—yes, and you went to the polls, and I am afraid you did not vote right; you cannot have the land-I will take it away from you. You will observe how fully these persons have the capacity of citizens, what sort of right they have to possess their own; they are to have the right of renting a piece of their own land to the white man, provided they work the rest in a proper manner to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General. The local superintendent may say: See, here, Lo, you are not working that piece properly; and if Lo does not do the right thing by the Superintendent General, why, he is not to have his rent. Now, you may suppose that the Indian has been improving very much during this series of years, and that what would be very bad a few years ago would be very good now. Let me read what the hon. gentleman himself said in his report for the year 1883:

"The condition of Indian affairs in the older Provinces renains unchanged to any important degree. The Indians of Ontario and Quebec, with the exception of the bands on the North Shore of the lower St. Lawrence, are mainly self-supporting; and those in the Province of Ontario, with the assistance of their annuities and the interest on their invested capital, may be considered as being, on the whole, in confortable circumstances. These Indians cost the country nothing except the support of schools for a few of the bands who have not funds sufficient in the hands of the Government from which to pay the expense of teachers saiaries, etc."

So that, even among the best classes of Indians, so pleasantly described, the Superintendent General can at his discretion devote a portion of the public funds for a portion of their expenditure.

"The Indians in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are not in so satisfactory a condition as their brethren in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This is probably to be accounted for by the fact that they were not treated with the same liberality before these Provinces formed part of the Dominion. Their wright to ample reserves never having been recognised; consequently they have no funds at their credit, and the assistance rendered them is from appropriations annually made by Parliament for the relief of the necessities of the most aged and helpless among them."

There you are. The Snperintendent General asks yearly from Parliament money for the assistance of the poor relations of these Indians; and they are to form voters, capable citizens, fit to be trusted with the franchise. In dealing with details the hon gentleman, speaking of the Indians in the county of Northumberland, says:

"In the same county, in the township of Alnwick, there is also a Mississagua band, who, I regret to say, like their brethren on the Rice Lake reserve, persist in illegally renting their land to white people, who farm it very badly and take all that they can off without putting anything on the soil to renew it. The result is that the land is being impoverished. The Department has endeavored to check this state of things, but with only limited success."

You see that these capable citizens cannot legally rent their lands, but sometimes they do it illegally, and the Superintendent General points out the deplorable result. They do not know what is good for them; they cannot be trusted to act for themselves in the renting of their own lands, but they can be trusted with deciding the destinies of Canada.

"It is hoped that the agents for the Rice Lake and Alnwick bands who were appointed but recently, will be able to adopt such measures as will check the evil and promote agriculture among these Indians which is one of the principal reasons for local agents being appointed."

Then speaking of the Parry Sound district, he says:

"In order to stimulate the Indians of the Parry Sound district to increased efforts in farming, the Department offered prizes for the best produce raised on their lands, and an Indian agricultural exhibition was held at Parry Sound, but it proved a failure."

There is the paternal rule of the Indians. I do not object to the offering of prizes for an agricultural exhibition or to using a portion of the public moneys to help them along in any way: but when the Superintendent General has to decide whether the exhibition shall take place, or whether any public money shall be given to it, he shows that he is not in such relationship with them or they with him that it is right to trust them with the franchise. Then speaking of some of the Quebec Indians, the hon. gentleman points out with reference to the Caughnawaga reserve:

"A sub-division survey of the reserve (which has hitherto been held in common by the band), has been in course of prosecution for the part few years. It is thought that the survey will be completed next spring, when a fair distribution of the farms, in 50 acre lots, will be made among the members of the community."

It is the Superintendent General who is to make a fair distribution of the estate among them, and afterwards to receive their votes. With regard to Nova Scotia he says:

"In the county of Antigonish there are several reserves, all of which are occupied by Micmacs, who, during the year, erected a few new houses. Owing, however, to the migratory character of these Indians, they only occupy their houses for a short time in the year. In the county of Halifax"—

Here, Sir, I find your friends. Listen to the character of your new voters:

"In the county of Halifax there are several reserves, but it is regretted that few of the Indians reside upon them; they prefer frequenting the suburbs of the towns and cities where they manufacture baskets, tubs and other articles of Indian ware, from the sale of which they derive sufficient revenue to support themselves and their families. Many of them are addicted to the inordinate use of intoxicants."

There you are! I am glad to know that there are not many of them; but that is the condition of the Halifax county Indians as described by the Superintendent General who proposes to give them votes. Then, in the report for 1884, the very last year, the hon. gentleman states:

"Indian affairs in Manitoba, Keewatin, and in the older Provinces of the Dominion, have moved on in very much the same groove as here-tofore."

have select schools to which the best children will be sent.

Then out of this select few, out of this small minority of all

So that you see there is no sudden change which fits the Indian to vote which he was not fit to do before. If there is progress, it is very gradual; it is the same old rule, the same old rut. Then there are some pleasing statements made as to demands for agricultural machinery, the formation of agricultural societies, the erection of more commodious school houses and so on.

"In this last respect, however, there is still much room for improvement. Schools for the higher education of Indian youth should be established in the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in which the brightest and most promising pupils of the day schools might be trained in industrial pursuits, the knowledge of which would enable them eventually to raise in the social scale to an equality with the white citizen or husbandman."

Here is the process of natural selection by which you can get an Indian who shall, in the end, rise to the condition of a white artisan or husbandman. First of all, drop the father and drop the mother; they are too old dogs to learn to dance, you can do nothing with them. Secondly, take the child away from them, because, not doing anything themselves, they will hurt the child if you leave it under their control. Thirdly, take the child to a day school. Fourthly, select the brightest and most promising pupils out of the children at the day school, and establish a school for the higher education of the Indian youth, in which you will put those brightest most promising, those select of the select of the children, and train them in industrial pursuits; and thus, when you have consigned to the low level in which they are, the father and the mother, when you have put the children in a day school away from the tribal and parental influences, when you have selected out of those the best and brightest, when you have taken the best and brightest away from the average children and put them in a special industrial school, you may be able to enable those eventually "to rise in the social scale to an equality with the white artisan and husbandman." There is the process by which you will get a man who is on an equality with your ordinary voterthe ordinary white artisan or husbandman. And if that is all necessary in order to get a man who shall be on an equality with the ordinary voter, how much below that condition of equality is the adult Indian, the tribal Indian on the reserve, without all this process of weaning away, education and selection, which, in its last and highest result, as its crowning glory and power, is to raise a few of the children to an equality with the white artisan and husbandman.

"The interesting reports, published as appendices to this report, from the principals of several institutions of this kind which are in operation in the Province of Ontario, furnish pleasing evidence of the happy results of such training to the Indian youths who have completed their course in them; and that the Indians appreciate such advantages is proved by the large number of applicants for admission to the more central institutions, already exceeding the capacity of the buildings to accommodate them. The progress of Indian children at day schools, however efficiently conducted as such institutions may be, is very greatly hampered and injuriously affected by the associations of their home life, and by the frequency of their absence, and the indifference of the parents to the regular attendance of their children to such schools. Industrial schools, at which the children are not only educated, instructed in industries, fed and clothed, but in which they are also severed during the school term from all connection with home life, are obviously preferable, as in them the obstructions to education, complained of in the case of day schools, do not exist."

There is the hon. gentleman's method of ultimately bringing

There is the hon gentleman's method of ultimately bringing the young generation, the children of the Indian of the present day, up to a condition of social equality with the white artisan and husbandman:

"The Indians of the Province of Quebec and the Maritimes Provinces certainly merit more liberal treatment in the matter of education than they have hitherto received at the hands of the Government; and unless improved methods for educating and training the children are adopted, but little hope for the intellectual enlightenment or social elevation of the Indians of those Provinces need be entertained."

So no enlightenment, no social elevation, can be attained est rights of freemen. Why is this new proposition now under your present system; you must, beside the day school, introduced? It was not in contemplation in any previous Mr. Blake.

have select schools to which the best children will be sent. Then out of this select few, out of this small minority of all the Indians, you may, in some future generation, produce, in some instance, social elevation and intellectual enlightenment.

"I would suggest, that in order to give practical effect to the above ideas, two schools of the industrial type, with accommodation for at least 80 pupils in each, should be established in the Province of Quebec, and one of such institutions in each of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that into either of the latter institutions, Indian children from Prince Edward Island, be also admitted; the number of schools to be hereafter increased, should the success of those first established justify such augmentation."

There is the hon, gentleman's statements as to his process for ultimately bringing a few young Indians up to the scale of the white artisan and husbandman. I maintain that this series of statements, given in the hon, gentleman's own report, under his own signature, upon his responsibility as Superintendent General, as Minister of the Crown, as First Minister of the country, with reference to the wardship, the tutelage, the necessary dependent condition of the Indian population, with reference to their condition in respect of elevation and enlightenment, with reference to the difficulties in taking any steps towards that, are proof positive that the proposal before us is to give the franchise to incapable citizens, to men who are not citizens in the true sense of the term, who are not fellow citizens with us, because they have not, to use the spirit of the hon. gentleman's language, though not his exact words, the rights, privileges and responsibilities; and not having the duties and responsibilities, neither ought they to have the rights, the privileges, or the immunities of citizens.

Mr. FLEMING. The First Minister has been good enough to give us his opinion that the proposal to give votes to the Indians has been discussed ad nauseam. The hon. gentleman has not heard one-tenth of the discussion; he will become aware, ere long, that in every home in this country the question of giving a vote to the Indian yet under the hon. gentleman's control is being discussed; he will be aware, ere long, that the free men of this country are earnestly discussing the rights of the wards of the Government to be put in the same position as responsible citizens. For that reason, the hon. gentleman has not heard the last of the discussion. For that reason, although I did advert to this subject some days ago, I cannot permit myself to remain silent to-day. I fear that the influence which the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs may exercise over some bands of Indians may have the effect of disfranchising my whole county. My county may, in the exercise of the rights which free men have, choose to send me or some other gentleman to this House as representing their views; but that expression in the future may be rendered valueless by the votes of some of those Indian bands which are under the control of the Superintendent General; and I cannot remain silent while there is a possibility of such a result being brought about. This proposition is a new one; it is an unheard-of proposition. The leader of the Opposition has read from the report of the Superintendent-General himself, signed in his own hand, a declaration, clear and distinct, that the people to whom he is now about to give the right to vote are not capable of exercising the simplest right. In 1880, as it appears by the report, he ascertained that the Indians were not capable of having introduced among them the simplest form of municipal government, were not able to elect a reeve and councillors or to pass by-laws for the making of bridges and roads throughout the reserve, even though their by-laws and resolutions were to be revised by the Superintendent General himself, even though the local agent sat at their head as their chief officer. Yet it is upon these people that he proposes to confer the highest rights of freemen. Why is this new proposition now election Bill, or until this year. It is not here now for an outrage upon freedom. any good public purpose; there is no public demand for it, the rights of the free people of this country are not going to be enhanced by it, and no advantage will be conferred upon the Indians by it. It is simply here because the hon. gentleman knows that the free citizens of this country are beginning to find out that the Government of which he is the head are governing this country to its injury, and because he knows that unless he can adopt some means of strengthening his position by exercising a control over a large number of electors throughout the country, many of the counties he now holds will be wrested from him. Therefore he proposes to take away the right from a number of the free citizens of this country and to confer it upon the unenfranchised Indians. Is not that the effect of it? If the controlling voice of any county is in the hands of the Indians, and the Indians are in the hand of the Superintendent General, he is stealing the vote of some other constituency and preventing it from receiving free expression in this House. The hon, gentleman knows that this is a party measure, that it is not a measure in the public interest, but is one which he himself has determined, in the exigencies of party to push through this House at all hazards. He knows that he controls the voice of hon, members on that side of the House.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order. The hon. gentleman says that the right hon, gentleman controls the votes or the voice of hon, members in this House. That is not a parliamentary expression.

Mr. FLEMING. I beg to withdraw the unparliamentary expression. I will say that he knows that the views which he may give to hon gentlemen opposite will be adopted, and he also knows that hon, gentlemen who have expressed themselves on that side in reference to this proposition have expressed themselves in a sense contrary to the hon. gentleman's proposition. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) declared a few days ago that it was not the intention of the Bill to give Indians upon reserves the vote

Mr. DAWSON. No; I said unqualified Indians on

Mr. FLEMING. The hon. member for New Brunswick said the proposition of the Bill was not to give to Indians, situated in any other way than white people were, the right to vote. The hon member for Kent (Mr. Landry) said:

"I say it matters not what nationality a man belongs to, whether he be Indian or negro, if he possesses the same qualifications for the franchise that a white man does, he ought to receive it. This Bill does not propose anything else."

The hon, gentleman misunderstood the Bill.-

"Why should not the Indians have the franchise as well as anybody else, provided they stand upon the same footing as others?"

That is the proposition which has come from this side of the House, that, so soon as you have put the Indian upon the same footing as others, he should have the franchise, but why should he have the franchise before he is put upon that footing? and that is what the hon, gentleman proposes by his Bill and his amendment. He proposes that Indians living on reserves, that have not the capacities of white people, that are not subject to the same laws so far as civil rights are concerned, shall be put on a footing different from that upon which many white people of this country are put. Many artisans and others, who are making the wealth of this country, have been deprived of the franchise by this Bill, which is more restrictive than a number that have been adopted in the Local Legislatures. The industrial class of the community has been in many cases deprived of the right they would otherwise exercise, and their right is handed over to the Indian that is under the control of the hon, the First Minister and his agents. It is land agents are going to give the right to vote to Indians with-

The hon, member for Kent went on to say:

"All this Bill proposes to do is simply to place the Indians on an equal footing with other men, and to give them equal privileges whenever their conditions are equal. That is the interpretation I put upon the Bill, and I believe the country will so understand it."

I wonder whether the hon, gentleman so understands the Bill now. Are the conditions of Indians residing upon reserves equal to the conditions of the white settlers or the colored people of this country? No matter what the color may be, those who are subject to the responsibilities of citizenship ought to have the right to vote, and as soon as the red man assumes those responsibilities, he should have the vote, and would have it by the law of the land. The hon. gentleman proposes, however, to give this right to those who are not subject to those responsibilities. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), went on to say.

"While we refuse to give them the same privileges as we give white men, does such a policy not tend to keep them down? Does it not tend to keep them in that humble and lowly position? The sooner we, by legislation, give them a helping hand and raise them to a higher level, the better it will be for them and the better it will be for this Dominion. In view of these facts, I think there is no harm in adopting this clause of this Bill and entranchising those Indians who are equally qualified with white men to exercise the franchise. If it should be found, after a few years' experience, that they do not exercise the franchise in a proper way, then we can change the policy and adapt it to circumstances. But let us give them a trial, at any rate; if they do not use the franchise properly, we can take it away from them."

He does not propose to east upon them any of the civil rights of which they are now deprived, but he proposes simply to give them the right to vote, and we know they are not any more free to exercise that right than they are to exercise any other right they possess. They are not free to sell their lands, or to dispose of their property, or to contract debts, and yet they are to be entrusted with the highest rights a free man can exercise. Sir, we have not heard from the other side of this House, a single utterance from hon. gentlemen in defence of this monstrous proposition. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), declared on page 1491 of the Hansard:

"But no one proposes to give it to the wild Indians of the forest, or to the Indians upon their reserves.

Now, the proposition is, according to the explanation made by the hon. Minister to-day, to give the franchise to Indians on the reserves, and on separate holdings. Now, we all know that the great majority of the Indians upon these reserves, in Ontario at least, are living in separate houses. The wife, in a large number of instances, supports the husband by her labor, and the husband is to be entitled to exercise the franchise but not the wife. While there are a number of intelligent Indians on the reserves capable of intelligently exercising the franchise, and who would make capable citizens, I complain that we draw no distinction between these and Indians who are not so. But even the intelligent Indians are not subject to the liabilities of other citizens, they pay no taxes, they have no municipal government except such as the Government imposes upon them by the local agent under the superintendent. What will be the practical working out of this proposition? The revising officer, in other portions of this Bill, is instructed to obtain assessment rolls, and to make them prima facie evidence that the person is entitled to vote. But there are no assessment rolls on the Indian reserve, no means by which the revising officer can obtain this knowledge unless he goes to the reserve and makes an assessment himself. whom the revising barrister officer from receive his information, is the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, the officer of the First Minister here, who can tell him what persons are entitled to be put upon the roll, and what persons are not. Does the hon. Minister suppose he can make us believe that these local superintendents out obliging them, in some way, to vote for their party? Why, the whole Bill is a party measure. It takes precedence over every other public measure simply because it is a party measure, and it is being pushed through from day to day because it is supposed that it will advance the party interests of hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. gen tleman is pushing this measure because he wants the votes of his Indian wards. He will need votes at the next election and he knows it, and so he is now laying up a store of votes that will be ready to his hand in time of need. It is just another instance of what we have had years ago. The Indians are to have votes in order that the Superintendent General, by the influence he exercises over them, may secure those votes for himself. We know that the hon. gentleman, some years ago, called for $10,000 more when he was in a strait for votes, and it would be the last time of calling. But the hon, gentleman does not propose this time to ask for another $10,000; he proposes to enfranchise a number of Indians whose votes he will control, and so avoid the necessity of asking for another $10,000. For these reasons, and for a number of other reasons which I shall take occasion to present at a future stage of the debate, I am opposed to the proposition to enfranchise the Indians who are not placed in the same position as white men.

Mr. GILLMOR. This Bill, which we have been discussing for many weeks, was originally introduced by the hon. leader of the Government. The Bill as presented some months ago was the deliberate conclusion at which the First Minister had arrived as the measure he intended to lay before Parliament to be enacted into law. Of course, there have been some alterations made and some improvements made in the details; but after this Bill has been perfected so far as it may be, it reminds me of a story told of a doctor who was asked his opinion with respect to encumbers. He said: Pick the encumber, peel it, salt it, put vinegar on it, and then throw it out of doors. My opinion of this Bill is that it was never needed by the country, and should be treated as the encumber.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman must discuss the amendment.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not want to trespass on the patience of the committee; but I contend we must have considerable latitude in discussing this Indian question. It involves the character of the electorate of the Dominion. If it does not mean that, it means nothing. If we are not at liberty to express our opinions with respect to the electorate, the discussion will be very much curtailed. But everything I will say will be relevant to the question before the committee. This is a very broad question. We have been discussing the extension of the franchise, and this is an extension of the franchise. It will be perfectly in order, if we are going to extend the franchise to one class of persons, to refer to other classes. The Government propose by this Bill to extend the franchise to Indians. It is quite proper for me to state how the electorate will be improved or affected by extending the franchise to other classes. Instead of extending the franchise to Indians, there are 300,000 white men who have advantages of education, religious instruction and civilisation, and yet do not possess the franchise. The franchise could be conferred upon them without degrading the electorate or society. In the early part of the discussion with respect to Indians the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), who is very much better acquainted with Indian character than I am, moved an amendment, to add in the fourteenth line the words: "who has been enfranchised under the Indian Act, and has had conferred on him the same civil rights as other persons qualified under this Act.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Some other member proposed that amendment.

Mr. FLEMING.

Mr. GILLMOR. I thought it was the hon. member. That, however, was a very good amendment, and I am quite in accord with it. I contend that no man is entitled to exercise the franchise who has not taken upon himself the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, and throughout this discussion no one on this side of this House has objected to giving Indians the franchise after they have attained that position. The proposition to extend the franchise to a class of persons who, notwithstanding all that has been done for them, have not reached the position of citizenship, is a monstrous proposition and a degradation to the electorate of the country. It may be thought that this debate has occupied a long time; but when we see the position taken by supporters of the Government, the fact that they have not taken part in perfecting this great measure of reform, it appears to me, if they understand the question, as if they are not very anxious to discuss the question before the House and the country. The First Minister has stated in this House that not a single Indian has been enfranchised. The leader of the Opposition interrupted, and said the Wyandotte band had been; whereupon the First Minister said he had forgotten that circumstance; that that was a small band, which had been broken up and had subsequently acted as individuals. Now, here is the pith of the whole question. The Wyandotte band had risen in the scale of civilisation, after many years of assistance, and separated themselves from their tribal relations, and acted as other men, by assuming the responsibilities of citizenship and with all the duties belonging thereto. When they assume these duties we are in favor of their enfranchisement, and personally I sympathise as deeply with them as any other member. When we remember them in their rude and savage state, there was something grand about the Indians; but unfortunately they are in a different condition to-day. Until the Indians separate themselves from their tribal relations they cannot be enfranchised with safety to the State or with any advantage to the Indians. When they occupy the position of citizens, I repeat, hon gentlemen on this side of the House will be as ready to extend the franchise to them as are hon, gentlemen opposite; for when an Indian occupies that position he is as free as any man. He is not under the control of the Superintendent General or of any other man, unless he chooses to put himself under that control. He is free to act as independently as any representative sitting in Parliament. I have heard it stated by some hon. gentlemen, including the Premier himself, that this was giving the Indian a chance to rise. Well, Sir, the Indian has had a chance to rise. The tax-payers of this country have given the Indians a chance to rise, the Government of this country has been aiding and fostering them for years and years past, and they have had opportunities. But it seems to me that they are destined as a race to fade away before civilisation. In some respects I regret it, but because such is the case is it wise for us, if we cannot raise them to this level, is it wise for the country to go down to the same scale as themselves? I speak advisedly, and I say that no good to the Indians and a great deal of evil and degradation and disgrace will be heaped upon the electorate of this country, by making these people voters; and I say that the electorate of this country are not better than they should be, with all the advantages of our civilisation. I was much pleased that, although my hon. friend from Kent, N.B., spoke from the Government side, and was supposed to represent their views—I was pleased with the sympathy he expressed for the Indians, and I agree with him that when they arrive at a certain stage of advancement they should occupy the same privileges as the whites. I agree with him when he said that the Indian, after he has arrived at that stage of civilisation and that condition which entitled him to vote, and when he had the same qualification as the white man, he should have the franchise. In this we are at one with him. I also agree with something my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Foster) said, as to the Indians, and I will take occasion to quote what he said with reference to the matter. He said:

"You say the Indians ought not to be enfranchised,"-

There, I think, the hon. gentleman was mistaken. We do not say that certain Indians should not be enfranchised, because there are certain Indians who are already enfranchised and have the qualifications:

"You say the Indians ought not to be enfranchised, and you make a comparison between the Indians whom you say this Bill will enfranchise and the gentle and sweet women of our country; you say it is an outrage that the Indians should be enfranchised and that the women should not. Now, I hold as strongly as hon. gentlemen opposite can, and just as honestly as hon. gentlemen opposite do—not more honestly; I do not say that—just as honestly as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and his honest countenance tells me that he holds it honestly—I say I hold as honestly as he does in favor of the complete enfranchise say I hold as honestly as he does in favor of the complete enfranchise say I hold as honestly as he does in favor of the complete enfranchise ment of women, married, single or widows, who have an equal property qualification with men, when once you fix the condition of a franchise by a property qualification. But I say, too, that I believe in enfranchising the Indian. I believe that the Indian who earns a living for himself, the Indian who has real property, who occupies a home, who has a salary or income, who is looking up to that greatest boon which men in a civilised country can claim, and which men in a savage country can aspire to—the boon of full and perfect citizenship—I say I could not, in justice to history and my own convictions, deny the right of the franchise to that man. Hon gentlemen opposite get up and they thunder away for hours and hours, in a futile attempt to mislead the country into the thought that every savage Indian in the great North-West is. into the thought that every savage Indian in the great North-West is, forsooth, to be enfranchised, and made a voter under this Bill; that Pi-a-pot, and Pat-him-on-the-back, and those other Indians, with whose names hon. gentlemen are suspiciously familiar, shall have votes

Now, I agree with the conclusions to which my hon. friend comes with regard to the class of Indians that ought to be allowed to vote. But he must have learned by this time that this Bill includes a great many more than he referred to; and I am curious to know how he, and my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Landry) are going to meet the proposal to enfranchise Indians who have not arrived at that condition, who have not become citizens in the full sense of the word. With regard to the sweet and gentle women of the country, I would rather have heard him make that speech, and make such a speech as I expected of him, when that subject was under discussion. But he was silent, I believe, when that discussion was going on. But after his expressions of admiration for the women of our country, I do not understand how he has managed to live so long in single blessedness. With regard to the qualifications of women for voting-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hardly think the hon. gentleman is in order in referring to female franchise.

Mr. GILLMOR. Well, he was speaking on the Indian question at this time, and I was just following him. I am surprised that the hon, member who sees so much sweetness in the fair sex should not ere this have wo'ed and won some fair one to himself. He seems disposed rather to imitate the bee:

"And like the busy bee improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day from every opening flower."

I wanted him to speak on the enfranchisement of women, because I think he could have used language which would have convinced hon gentlemen on the Government side, but he chose to put it off. He did not think anything of the sweet women when they were under discussion, but when we are on the Indian clause new light fell upon him, when it was too late. I endorse every word that has been said by my hon. friends from New Brunswick with reference to the enfranchisement of the Indians. New Brunswick is my native Province; I have lived there all my life; I have been acquainted with the Indians in our vicinity for over half a century, and though I have seen Indians in my own county who could read and write and have adopted the customs of bribe members of Parliament took place in Ontario; but if who, with safety to society or advantage to himself, could enjoy the franchise. I think my hon. friend from Northumberland will endorse those sentiments.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Will this amendment give one of them a vote?

Mr. GILLMOR. I do not know whether it will or not, but I presume it will to others, who have no better qualifications than the Indians to whom I refer. Perhaps my hon. friend and those who have Indians residing on reserves in their own localities will know about that better than I do. But this I do know, that for half a century at least the ratepayers of New Brunswick have been contributing to the support of the Indians, that the Indians have been under the control of the Government of that Province up to the time of Confederation, and that then the General Government took them under their care. That was a declaration that the 30,000 or 40,000 Indians in the older Provinces were unable to take care of themselves. This Parliament saw that it was necessary that these people should be guarded and protected, and to that end passed the Indian Act. I have read that Act from one end to the other, some 113 clauses, and what do I find in it? Do I find that it has reference to a class of persons whom Parliament thought could be trusted with the franchise? Not at all. I find three classes referred to in that Act—the Superintendent General, who is the chief man, his officials under him, and the Indians, who are totally helpless, who have not the intelligence necessary for the management of their own affairs in the least degree. (The hon, gentleman read a portion of the Act.) These Indians cannot sell to a white man or to an Indian; their property can-not be taken for debt, and they cannot dispose of it to anybody without the consent of the Superintendent General. I remember that many years ago there was a great man down at the seaboard whom the people reverenced so much that when the children were asked who made them, they answered Colonel McBane. That is something like the influence of the Superintendent General over these Indian tribes. They cannot be free men while they are under the control of himself and his officials; and I am surprised that it should have entered into the mind of any man or body of men to extend the franchise to this class of persons, when there are so many men in this country who are well qualified to exercise that privilege, but who are denied it. I have always been in favor of manhood suffrage; I think the best qualifications for the franchise are intelligence, independence, and a good moral character; and we step over 300,000 men of that character to give the franchise to the Indians, whose progress is slow, and few indeed of whom have arrived at that stage of intelligence and independence to entitle them to vote. No doubt, in the older Provinces of Canada there are a few who have risen to that condition of intelligence and cultivation; but they can vote now if they choose to throw off their tribal relations. When an Indian becomes intelligent enough to do business for himself he ought to see the beauties of our civilisation sufficiently to withdraw from his tribal relations and to become, in every sense of the word, a free and independent man. It is a bold thing to come into this Parliament, at this age of the world, at this time of civilisation and refinement, and propose to enfranchise a class of men, most of whom are little raised above the barbarous condition of their race. I cannot understand the motive; I do not wish to attribute motives; I know that now, with all the advantages we possess, the electorate of Canada has become exceedingly degraded and corrupt. That such a state of things exists in this country is more to be deplored than anything else. I thought that the corruption of the electorate had reached its culminating point when the attempt to the whites, I say deliberately that I never saw an Indian it is the intention of this Government and its supporters to enfranchise the Indians of this country, in order to bring them to the polls to support their party, it is the crowning act of political rascality. We have continued this debate because it is important, because we want the electors of this Dominion to understand it and come to the rescue. This thing has been sprung upon the country, and the voice of the people, wherever it has been expressed, has been overwhelmingly pronounced against this measure. We have continued it for two reasons. For the reason that we want the electorate of this country to be pure and independent. If white men can be corrupted, we do not want whole tribes to be brought into the electorate who can be taken to the polls as sheep to the shambles. There is good reason for the long continuance of this debate, and I can give a personal illustration why a man should hold on when he is safe, an illustration which, I think, applies to the revising barristers and the Indians in this Bill. Very early in my career, during a political canvass, I went to a farmer's house, and as I took hold of the latch I heard the growl of a very big dog inside. I held on to the door, refusing to allow the people inside to open it, although they assured me that I need not be alarmed, that they knew the dog and he would not hurt me. But I did not know the dog, and therefore held on to the door. Finally, however, after a good deal of pressing on their part, I allowed them to open it. What was the consequence? As the dog went by, he grabbed my trowsers and took one leg of my pants, together with a part of the skin. I made up my mind then that when I had an animal so dangerous under my control I would not open the door until I was confident he was taken good care of. We have got this Indian now; he is not our Indian. We have this revising barrister now; he is not our barrister. We are, therefore, afraid of them, we hold them there, and they will never get out at us and do any harm until we open the door. But the moment we do, I am afraid we will be served as I was by the dog, which, I was assured, would not bite if let at large. I do not know how long we can hold on to the door, but I will hold on to it until that dog is taken care of, if I have the strength. This Bill is not brought out to show fair play between party and party; it is not intended, in my humble opinion, to de justice to all parties; it is not based upon principles of open-handed justice and fair play. I believe the free men of this country do not believe in this Bill. I do not know how many Liberals and how many Conservatives signed the petitions against it, but I know that every letter that I have received is against the Bill, and one of them is from a man who usually votes Conservative. With regard to the qualifications of the Indians to use the franchise, you have only to turn over the reports of the agents to see the class of people they are. We have to pay agents all over the Dominion to look after them, to see that they use the means we furnish them with in a proper way. The hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) described one who was worth some $75,000. I wish they were all worth that much, so that we could relieve the people from the tax of supporting them; but the man who had the ability of accumulating that money ought to assume all the responsibilities of free men, he ought to separate himself from the tribe and become a man and a brother, and have the right to vote as other citizens. We have been endeavoring to induce the Indians to change their habits of life, but we find singularly few of them who have any inclination to change. They retain their instincts, and refuse to settle down, as a class, to farming operations and mercantile pursuits, or to any of the industrial pursuits of the white men. It is not in their nature to do so; the most we can do is to act generously towards them, help them, feed and clothe them, if necessary; but to admit them to the franchise, to allow them to come in and offset an equal number of white voters, cannot be defended on any line of argument. It cannot be considered in any other light than that of a miserable party stratagem. Let hon. Mr. GILLMOR.

gentlemen opposite put themselves in the place of their opponents and see how this thing would work. If the leader of a Government I were supporting were to make any such proposition I would leave him the moment he made it; but I venture the assertion that we will never have such a proposition as that coming from the leader of the Liberal party. I do not wish to enter into the minds and hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite, but the fact that they have not given to the country arguments in favor of this proposition is an evidence that they do not feel themselves very safe; the fact that their press has not, ever since this discussion commenced, given the truth to the people, is an evidence they dare not put the case as it stands. Our view is, that when the Indian has arrived at that stage of civilisation and advancement to entitle him to become a free man he should have the franchise; but the Government press endeavor to give a contrary impression, and refuse to discuss the question on its merits. They say the Session is late, and the time is precious, and we know what we want, and that is enough for you to know. That is not the way the country expects to be enlightened on an impor-tant measure of this kind. This is not a measure which should be brought down, with any show of decency, at the close of a Session. The leader of the Government said, some years ago, that a measure of this kind would require a three months' Session to be discussed properly; and we will see that, although it has been brought down at the end of the Session, it will not fail to be properly discussed. have got the Indian and we have got the revising barrister, and we do not intend to let them out, so long as we can, consistently with our duty to the country, keep them

Mr. FISHER. It was with the deepest disappointment that I listened to the statement of the First Minister. When, a little while ago, he promised to introduce some changes in regard to the Indian franchise, I fully expected that he intended to make some radical change, and not that he intended to trifle with the intelligence of the House so much as to leave the matter practically as it was before or, possibly, to make it a little worse. I did not suppose that he ever intended to meet the views of this side of the House, for I do not think that is the plan or the practice of the right hon. gentleman; but I thought his followers, finding the opinion which was entertained in the country, had urged upon him some radical change which he had accepted, so I was deeply disappointed to find that he was not doing anything of the kind. Hon. gentlemen opposite, this afternoon, interrupted my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) to ask him how many Indians in his Province were going to be enfranchised by this measure. It is not the place of any hon. member on this side, but of the First Minister, to answer that question, and if those hon. gentlemen have not received that information in their caucuses they should ask it here, so that the First Minister may answer it in public. Hon, gentlemen opposite seem to think it is quite sufficient that they should know what is intended by the Bill, and do not give us or the public any information in reference to it. If the public know anything of its provisions it is due to the action of hon. gentlemen on this side, in upholding this protracted debate and in causing the country to learn the effects which the provisions of this Bill will have. The leader of the Government has not seen fit to tell us how many Indians will be enfranchised under this Bill. The first reason of his silence which is likely to occur to us is that he does not know. I doubt if he or his colleagues have ever considered the scope of this Bill, in regard to the general electorate of the country, though no doubt they have carefully and willly considered its effect on certain constituencies which they wish to influence. There is, however, another possible reason for the silence of the First Minister, and a most discreditable one, if it be true, and that is, that if he told us how many Indians would be enfranchised under the provisions of this Bill we might be able to compare his statement with the number who may become enfranchised under it before the next general election. It is true that to-day the Indians of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Quebec may not to any extent be enfranchised by this Bill and the amendment, as very few of them have their location tickets and have improvements worth $150, but it is quite possible that when the Bill is passed the Indian agents of the right hon, gentleman may give location tickets to such a large number of Indians in constituencies where their votes are desirable for Government supporters that, in a short time and, at all events, before the next general election, the number may be largely increased. If the hon, gentleman has such an intention in his mind it would explain his not giving the information, because it might be compared with the results in those constituencies. Since this question first came before the House I have gained some more knowledge about it. The proposition then laid before the House was different from the present one, and the present proposition is still very objectionable. Hon, gentlemen on this side of the House then contended that the present proposition was the real proposition involved in the Bill, and although I was disappointed at the statement of the First Minister this afternoon, I was somewhat comforted by the reflection that he had completely disposed of the statement of the hon, member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), in speaking of the disingenuous manner in which signatures had been obtained to a petition from his county. He stated that those signatures had been obtained under the pretence that this Bill intended to enfranchise the Indians of the North-West; and he went on to contend that such was not the case, as the Bill was originally brought down. But when the leader of the Government placed this amendment in your hands, he impliedly admitted that the contention that the Indians of the North-West were to be enfranchised under the original proposition was correct. He says that was the intention of the Bill. If that had not been the intention, why did the hon. Minister, in this amendment, propose the enfranchisement of the Indians in the North-West Territories? Meagre as his remarks were, they removed any ground for the accusation against gentlemen who had obtained signatures to that petition, and against the hon. gentleman who presented it to this House. In studying the Indian Act, since this question was first discussed, I have discovered some things that surprised me. Hon. gentlemen on this side contended at first that only the enfranchised Indians should be given votes, whilst no Indians maintaining their tribal relations ought to be given a vote, in the interest of this country. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) who, I am glad to acknowledge, is a great authority on Indian questions, replied that it was unfair to ask the Indians, proud as they were of their tribal relations, to cut themselves away from those relations in order to have a vote. I supposed, of course, that when they became enfranchised they would necessarily have to abandon their tribal relations. But in examining this Act I find that such is not the case. I find that nothwithstanding that he may be enfranchised under the Indian Act, he still remains a member of the band, in so far as all the privileges and advantages of that band are concerned, but he is cut away from the band in so far as the disabilities are concerned which place him in a state of tutelage. In order to make this clear, I will read some clauses from the Indian Act. (The hon, gentleman read the 99th and some following sections of the Indian Act, to show the condition of the entranchised Indian.) There is one exception here which I wish particularly to be noticed, namely, that which money of their band. Furthermore, it allows them to participate in the councils of their band; and here, I contend, is the only real privilege which the Indians can possibly claim as attendant on connection with their band. If they are allowed still to vote for their chief, or to be elected chief, nobody can pretend that they are no longer allowed to participate in the advantages and benefits accoruing to them as members of that band; and if this is the case, these Indians cannot have any reasonable objection to becoming enfranchised under the terms of the Indian Act. Then the hon, member for Algoma wished to preserve to the Indians all those traditions and sympathies which they hold as belonging to an ancient race. I contend that under this Act there is nothing which prevents them so retaining their sympathies and their traditions. When they are enfranchised under the Indian Act the only thing they part with is their civil disability; they are removed from the state of tutelage which the First Minister has so often referred to in his Indian reports. But it still leaves the enfranchised Indians all their peculiar ideas and race sympathies. Therefore, those who desire that the Indian must be enfranchised under the Indian Act before he obtains a vote can no longer be open to the charge of dealing harshly with the Indians, because they still retain all the advantages which their tribal relations give them. It is true that by their enfranchisement they lose all their tribal relations which are disadvantageous to them, by which they are kept from being citizens; and in asking the Indians to so enfranchise themselves and relieve themselves from this disability, this mark of inferiority and servitude, we are not asking them to do anything contrary to their self-respect, or anything against their tribe and race. Until the Indian is enfranchised he is really in a state of servitude. Questions have been raised during the discussion as to why we should give the vote to negroes and others besides whites, apart from Indians. It is not our object to deprive Indians of the right to vote when they occupy the same conditions as white men, negroes, Mahomedans or East Indians. I desire, as do all hon. members on this side of the House, that the Indian shall be placed on the same plane with other people, with respect to the privilege of voting. What we object to is, that Indians under a different set of conditions shall be allowed a privilege denied to other races and colors. Under the Indian Act the Indian is not allowed to will property. Under the twentieth section, although he may hold a location ticketwhich, under the present amendment, would entitle him to vote—he is not allowed to will property. That is a privilege which white men, and Africans, and anyone else is allowed. That is absolute entail, and it shows that the property is not his to do what he pleases with, but is really Crown property, held under the Superintendent General. Any Indian who, previous to the selection of a reserve, happens to hold any property in it which would not be supposed to be in common, which he may have created, just as a settler creates improvements, has not the right to such property; but by the twenty-first section, if it happens to be taken as portion of a reserve for a particular band, he has only the same privilege as any Indian who holds under a location ticket. Although an Indian may have obtained the property before he became part of the band, still, after the Government chooses to take the land as a portion of the reserve, he then has to give up the property to the Government, and it is held by the Superintendent General. Under the twenty-second and twenty-third sections the Superintendent General can lease or occupy lands belonging to Indians. He can allow other people to go on a reserve and, by his license, take possession of a portion of carefully reserves to the Indians enfranchised under the the land, cut timber, mine, or otherwise work and occupy Indian Act such privileges and rights as enable them to the land. This is not just and right to the Indian, if he has remain members of their band, and enables them to participate in the annuities, allowances, rents and interest sively that the Superintendent General and his agents have control of the reserves, and not the Indians thirty-fourth Furthermore, under the section, Indians who may have shown their advanced state by undertaking agricultural operations upon locations, and are called upon to do road work and statute labor, not in the same way as citizens are called upon by municipalities, are called upon to do the work by direction of agents appointed by the Government. Here, again, is a means by which the Government and the Superintendent General can control and influence the Indians with respect to voting. By the thirty-eighth section it is conclusively shown that the Indians are minors and in a state of tutelage. I allude to the restriction with respect to intoxicating liquors, which are not allowed to be sold on Indian reserves. In view of my well-known opinions in regard to the liquor traffic, it is far from my wish to complain of this restriction upon the Indians; but when I find such a restriction is not imposed on other classes, that all other classes are allowed free access to liquor, unless they see fit by their vote to exclude it, I hold that this is a state of things proving that the Indians are not free men and are not entitled to the vote. We find also, by another section of this Act, that the Indians are allowed to elect their chiefs, and that, in fact, a certain kind of municipal organisation is allowed to them; and one would suppose, at first sight, that such a permission would entail upon them a certain amount of independence and give them a certain amount of training in political work. But if you read the Act you will find that that permission is simply given to them when the Superintendent General or the local agent chooses to allow it. They cannot demand it for themselves, no matter how far advanced in civilisation they may consider themselves to be, for they must prove to the satisfaction of the agent and the First Minister that they are likely to exercise that privilege as pleases those autocratic individuals. I believe this right will be given to them just so often and so long as they show that they are amenable to the instructions of the agents who control them; just so long as they show themselves sufficiently subservient to the Government who controls their destinies, that right may be given then. But that auch a right would be given to a band who would perversely—as the hon, gentleman would think—oppose the hon, gentleman, I do not think it would be expected that such would be the case by anybody who is conversant with the methods by which those hon, gentlemen carry on their political work in this country. Then the Indian is not taxable. (The hon. gentleman here read section 75 of the Act.) There, Sir, you see the essential and fundamental difference between the Indian upon the reserve and the white man or the Indian living off the reserve. The tribal Indian on the reserve is not liable to bear his share of the burthens of the country and to assume those responsibilities of citizenship upon which the right to vote should depend. By section 77 we find that no person may sue an unenfranchised Indian for a debt, or take any security or lien upon his property. Any particular article which an Indian may buy may be seized again for the payment of its price, but no other personal property or real estate of the Indian is liable to seizure. The right hon. gentleman proposes to give the vote only to such Indians as obtain a location ticket from the local agent. Those who do not know the Act may think that the right hon, gentleman has made a restriction by this amendment, that he has made the Act better, fairer, and more just to the two great political parties of the country, and to the Indian himself, than it was before. But when I come to examine the way in which the Indian gets his location ticket I find that such is not the case. I find, on the contrary, that this amendment provides machinery by which the right hon. gentleman can more surely and safely control the votes of the Indian. Under the original propo-Mr. FISHER.

the valuation of which, when divided up among the total number of adult male Indians, would give each a vote, would have a vote. If, however, a reserve was worth, say $10,000, and there were in the band 100 Indians, none of them would have a vote, because the amount represented by each would only be $100, which would not be sufficient to qualify. But under the present proposition the agent who controls the destinies of the band can issue his location ticket to as many as he pleases, so long as the value of each is represented by not less than $150. The agent has in his own hands the absolute power of conferring the right to vote on certain Indians, and restraining others from voting, and by his political foresight he can select those whom he knows to be subservient to himself and the Government, or grateful to them for services they have rendered. He can exclude every Indian who may happen to have been fractious or rebellious to the authority of the agent, or who may have been intelligent enough to form his own opinion in political matters. By this proposition the right hon, gentleman is really taking to himself and to his agents a greater power for the control and the creation of votes than he had by the Bill as it originally stood. By the Bill as it originally stood, if that band held a reserve valued at $30,000 every man of them would have the right to vote, on the basis of holding the property as partners and occupants in common, each of whom held a share worth $200. Under the present amendment none of these Indians have the right to vote at all; their vote is only given by the agent, who controls the band, and their right is absolutely done away with. I cannot call that a right for which these men have to sue at the hands of an irresponsible Indian agent. Under the Bill, as it was introduced, they would have a chance to show their right; but under this amendment the power to vote is not a matter of right at all; it is a matter of favor, which can only be exerted by the political supporters of the right hon. gentleman. I do not wish to attribute motives to the right hon gentleman or to any of his followers, but if I had heard a single word from any one of these hon gentlemen, explaining that this amendment had been introduced for the purpose of restricting the vote, or giving it to such Indians as really deserved it, and explaining how it was intended to bring that about, one might have attri-buted to them a proper motive in introducing it; one might have confined oneself to endeavoring to show that they were not going the right way to attain their object; one might have attempted to show that they were not going to give the vote necessarily to the Indians who had the right to vote, but only to such as might have curried favor with the agent in charge of the reserve. But the right hon, gentleman in introducing his amendment, did not deign to tell this House or the country anything of the kind; he did not give us more than a minute, I cannot call it explanation, but of speech; he simply stated that he had determined to do this. Well, such autocratic action on the part of a Minister of the Crown may be pleasing to that hon. gentleman himself; it_may be pleasing to his colleagues and supporters in this House; but I have reason to believe that it is not pleasing to his supporters in the country. I believe the day has come when those who have hitherto supported the right hon gentleman and his followers are dissatisfied with such an autocratic proceeding. The people of this country are looking with wonder at this Parliament, where argument after argument is advanced by this side of the House, showing why this Bill should not become law; and they are gazing in wonder upon the spectacle of the great majority of the members of this House sitting silent and not attempting to support the Bill by argument, statement or explanation. It reflects very little credit, indeed, upon hon. gentlemen opposite that they do not try to support or defend the action of their chief in this House. I know that I can speak for those around me when sition of the Bill every Indian in a tribe living on a reserve, I say that we are reasonable enough to receive argument and explanation if we can get them; but while we cannot get these, we cannot, in justice to ourselves, attribute to them any other than an improper motive for the course they are taking. It is because they dare not explain their motive that they do not do it. I can well understand that there are motives which they do not choose to put on record, which they are ashamed to place before this House and the country. I regret that this House has been so long detained by the consideration of this Bill. If reasonable explanations had been given of it on its first introduction into this House, and proper discussion had been held upon it as it passed through committee, I believe the discussion might have been very much shortened; but we have tried again and again, day after day, to lay before the committee our reasons for opposing this Bill, and we have not had these reasons answered, except on two or three occasions, when the hon, gentlemen who attempted to answer them did not know what they were talking about. We have been discussing this measure from day to day, longer than we wished, so that hon, gentlemen opposite might thoroughly understand it; and, still more, so that the country at large might understand it. It is evident from the words of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to-day, that he did not thoroughly understand this question of the Indians; it is evident that the country at large does not understand it. Hon, gentlemen opposite have attributed a meaning to the Bill, which the right hon. gentleman explained was not the true meaning, and the amendment really bears his meaning. I oppose the meaning of this amendment, and I believe the country will oppose it. I oppose it in consequence of what I believe to be its insidious character, and because it will have a worse effect than even the original Bill. It is in consequence of this feeling that I felt it to be my duty to my constituents and this House to say a few words upon the amendment before you put it to the vote.

Mr. BURPEE. Among the provisions of this very bad Bill, I consider that before us to be one of the worst. The longer it is discussed the more apparent its perniciousness becomes. For my part, I will not characterise it as I feel it should be characterised, but I do think that the country and the House should have sufficient time to fully consider this provision of the Bill. Since 1867 we have had several Franchise Bills proposed to the House of Commons, and all of them, for prudential motives, were withdrawn by the leader of the Government. The provision of the measure before you was not in any of those Bills. This is a new proposition, and should, therefore, be all the more fully discussed. If the Bills introduced before were too objectionable for the House to consider, what can we say of this measure, with its Indian franchise? No free country, no country enjoying British institutions, no House of Commons, should pass such a provision as the one before us. I have been gathering what information I could from different parts of the country, as to the sentiment of the people on this measure, and I must say that while they object strongly to many of its provisions, this particular one which we are now discussing is received with amazement. Knowing the Indians, as the people in their vicinity know them, they are astonished that they should be entrusted with the franchise, to the exclusion of other citizens whom this Bill will disfranchise. Why not, some people say, allow this measure to be passed and leave the Senate to deal with it, whose business it is to stop hasty, objectionable legislation? If I thought the Senate would deal with the Bill on its merits I would be willing to leave it to be dealt with by them, but it is well known that the Senate is mainly composed of political partisans, and the decision they will come to, we are confident, will be in favor of the Government measure. As the hon, member if this provision be allowed to escape out of our hands I am afraid the Senate will not stop it. I am in favor of giving a vote to all on equal terms, provided they take upon themselves all the burthens of the State, and are capable of exercising the franchise as free citizens. We have already excluded one race from the Bill, we are now about to enfranchise another. There is as good reason for excluding the Indians as for excluding the Chinese. The Chinese who have acquired property, and have become British subjects, and are doing business in the country, are developing the country, and I think those portions of them have a better right to vote than the tribal Indian, who is not a free agent but a ward of the Government. I do not say that the Chinese are a desirable class of people to encourage, but I say that if they are here and take an interest in the country and aid in its development, they are better fitted to be entrusted with the franchise than the tribal Indians who, under the amendment in your hands, Sir, will not be able to vote unless they have a location ticket, which is in the discretion of the Government agent to give them or not, as he choses. This question, after the many days of discussion it has had, does not appear to be quite fairly understood by the country. Hon, gentlemen opposite are so reticent in expressing their views that only one side of the House is represented in the discussion, and that portion of the electorate who only read the press representing gentlemen opposite are scarcely acquainted with the provisions of the Bill yet. I believe an Indian should not have a vote unless he puts himself on equal terms with a white man, and then I have no more objection to his having a vote than I have to an African or a Chinaman having it, or in fact any citizen. But the Indians cannot get their location tickets unless it is the will of the Government agent to give them, and they cannot do business for themselves in any shape. They are wards of the Govern-ment, and are minors, in the eye of the law, and are upon an entirely different footing from others who are to have the vote. I do not think the Government should ask to enfranchise some 10,000 voters over whom they have direct and entire control. We make very stringent laws with reference to bribery and corruption, and forbid candidates using any influence, directly or indirectly, to obtain a vote; but the Indian is under the entire control of the Government, and to propose to give him a vote is worse than absurdity; it is an outrage upon the franchise. There are only about 1,550 Indians in New Brunswick, but their votes will be considerable, and a few votes some times turn an election. They are more directly dependent upon the Government than even the Indians in the Upper Provinces, for the $5,000 to $6,000 which they receive annually is controlled in its distribution by the agent, who gives to one Indian what he likes and withholds from another what he likes. Of course, there are reserves in New Brunswick belonging to Indians, but they are not so valuable as they are elsewhere, and, in my opinion, would not give them a vote if they were divided among them at a proper value of $150. That, however, is for the executive to deal with, and the Indian agent, and will give the latter more power still. In fact, he has the whole of the power. An Indian is prohibited from drinking liquor, and if you sell a glass of liquor to an Indian you are fined $200, which is a very heavy penalty. That is shows the manner in which the Indian is regarded. They are not looked upon as having intelligence, and are therefore not in a position to exercise the elective franchise; they are not intelligent; there are very few Indians who can write at all. Every Indian child in New Brunswick has the opportunity of going to school, but their disposition to rove from one portion of the country to the other prevents their attending school. In fact, their disposition is entirely opposed to education. As our own hands we had better not allow it to be opened, for them than a child two years old. They are, therefore, entirely incompetent to exercise the franchise in a rational or intelligent manner. In New Bruswick, the Indian report states that there are somewhere in the neighborhood of 1,520 Indians, of whom 1,150 are stated to be resident on their reserves. The Indian agent has put down their residence, but I know, of my own knowledge, that a large portion of them reside for only a short time on the reserves. They are wandering tribes, so much so, that although they reside in several counties, the Indian agent grouped them altogether, because he could not distinguished which of them belonged to one county and which to another. The description given of them the other day by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) was anything but flattering, but I have no doubt, from my experience of them, that it is correct. He represents them as wholly incompetent to exercise the elective franchise, and I believe it is a fact. The quantity of cultivated land put down as occupied by the 1,500 Indians and upwards in New Brunswick last year is 2,074 acres; new land broken up, 22 acres; number of houses or huts, 227. Well, I never saw but one house built by an Indian in my life; their dwellings are mere huts or wigwams. They are said to have 76 barns and stables, 17 ploughs, 26 harrows, 10 waggons, 24 horses, 29 cows, 15 sheep, 60 swine, and so on, in about that proportion. Then they raised 2,365 bushels of oats, 1,190 bushels of buckwheat, 6,980 bushels of potatoes; and they caught fish to the value of some $5,000.

The committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. BURPEE. Before six o'clock I was giving you a statement, from the report of the Indian agent of New Brunswick, of the amount of stock held by the Indians and the crops produced by them during the previous year. The amounts given by him, I apprehend, are quite as large as the facts would warrant. He explains that it was very difficult to get an exact account from the Indians themselves; they were scarcely intelligent enough even to do that, but he has done the best he could under the circumstances. Notwithstanding that the amounts are so small, compared with the number of Indians, they are quite as large as you could expect, from the manner in which they do their farming. The fact is, they are bad farmers. They merely scratch the earth and throw in a little grain, or plant a few potatoes, and that is the amount of their farming. In order to give you an idea of the manner in which they farm, I will read you an extract from the agent himself. (The hon, gentleman read from the Indian report the statement of the agent concerning the farm operations of the Indians in the counties of York, Charlotte, Woodstock and St. John). Here it seems that the agent expended nothing for seed upon the reserves in Woodstock, because he feared that they would eat the seed instead of putting it into the ground. Now, Sir, these are the parties, or a portion of them, whom the hon, gentleman proposes to enfranchise by the Bill. Some portion of the press of New Brunswick has stated that the Indians were to be enfranchised under this Bill upon the same conditions as white people; yet they occupy a different position and are to be enfranchised under different conditions, as I have fully proved. The Indians almost entirely depend upon the Government and their agents. The location tickets come from the Government or their agents. The Government agent at each reserve can give a location ticket to any party he pleases, and withhold one from any party. But the Indians cannot sell the land, or lease it, or sell the timber from it, or the agricultural products grown on it, without first consulting and obtaining the consent of the Government. Indians cannot make contracts and cannot make a will. In fact, intelligence of the members of this House—that he should Mr. BURPEE.

the agent has to be consulted in everything they do, and he holds them, so to speak, in the hollow of his hand. The Indians of New Brunswick receive between $5,000 and $6,000. The Government agent can give it to such parties as he pleases, and withhold it from others; the money is entirely at his disposition. Indians so largely dependent upon the good will of the agent of the Government should not be allowed to vote and have influence on the results of elections. If the Government divided up the reserves, and gave each Indian his own share in fee simple, and thus relieve him from all control by the Government or his agent, if the Indians thus became free men and managed their own property, they would be fit to exercise the voting power if they have the necessary amount of property qualification. But it is highly improper that while we disfranchise two or three very large classes of young men we should propose to enfranchise Indians. In New Brunswick there will be not less than 20 per cent. disfranchised of persons owning real estate between $100 and $150, and another class, because this Bill has not a personal property qualification. I do not deny that some of those will come in under other qualifications. But I maintain that one-half will not do so. Large numbers, equal to about 10 per cent. of young men, will be disfranchised in New Brunswick, and these form a most intelligent class and should be retained in the country. It is said that there will be very few Indians enfranchised in New Brunswick. No doubt that is the case, as compared with the member in Ontario and Quebec; but there are large reserves in New Brunswick, and no doubt the Government candidates will see that those reserves are well represented at the polls and that location tickets are procured for a great many Indians. Even if few are enfranchised in New Brunswick, still the principle of this clause of the Bill is wrong, and I strongly protest against it. I beg to move, in amendment to the amendment, the following:-

No Indian shall vote for the election of a member of the House of Commons who has not been enfranchised and has not had conferred upon him the same civil capacities, and who is not in possession of the same qualifications as are required in other voters under this Bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. A similar motion has already been negatived by the committee, and I cannot receive this one.

Mr. MILLS. If a comparison is made with the amendment published on page 1540 of Hansard, it will be evident that this motion is not the same. This is a negative proposition, and the other was an amendment to a proposition.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It was not only an amendment to a proposition, but there was an amendment moved by Mr. Edgar, declaring "that no Indian shall be enfranchised who does not possess the same civil capacities as other voters under this Bill," which was negatived. I, therefore, cannot receive this amendment, which is a similar amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I believe the majority of the members of this committee will agree with me that there is no justification for extending a different rule to one class of the community than to another, and will agree also that a first element of a man's ability to exercise the franchise intelligently is that he should have a certain amount of qualification, so that he may be able to record his vote in the interest of the commonwealth. If the hon, gentleman could show that the Indians, whom he proposes to enfranchise, are capable of an intelligent vote, then he has made out his case; but if you find that neither he nor the papers throughout the country, which are always so ready and anxious to extol him and do his bidding, have not a word in the defence of this proposal, then I say there is no justification for such a proposition. We find that he himself is perfectly indifferent with regard to this proposal, and he gives no just reason why it should be accepted. I say that it is not dealing fairly with the committee and is not giving due weight to the not think proper, that he should not condescend to give a single reason why these Indians should be entranchised. It is perfectly monstrous that we should be asked to adopt a proposition to enfranchise a class who have never been enfranchised in any country in the world.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear; but I venture to say that no other Premier in any country in the world has ever come down to a Parliament with such a monstrous proposition as this, and a proposition as to which no explanation has been given. I say he is treating the House, and not only the House, but the whole country, with that contempt which I think the country will ultimately resent. I ask the First Minister to go to England, from which he is so fond of bringing precedents, and though he claims to be a true and loyal representative of the mother country, though he claims that none but the Conservative party are loyal, and that all intelligent Englishmen coming to this country adopt his views—I ask him if he can point out in the mother country any proposal to enfranchise such a class as these people—the Indian to whom he proposes to give votes. 1 think every member of this committee must contend, as has always been contended, that a man in order to be an elector, should have some fitness, some qualification, that he should in some way be trained, educated or cultivated to an intelligent exercise of the franchise. But would an Indian coming to the poll be able to decide intelligently which of the candidates would be a fit and proper person to receive his vote? Would he be competent to cast his vote in an intelligent manner? I say that no member of this committee who knows that class can say that he would. As showing what the opinions of others are as to the qualifications of electors, I refer the First Minister to the writings of Mr. Mill, and though I do not agree with all his sentiments, still the extract will show the class whom this writer considers ought to be enfranchised. (The hongentleman then proceeded to read the extract.) Now, I ask whether the Indians who are about to be enfranchised under this Bill will be able to go to the polls and cast an intelligent and independent vote? I think you will agree with me that they will not. The very first provision we make with respect to voters is that they must be of the age of twenty-one years and upwards; we do that because we believe a minor, under the control and guardianship of his parents, would be unlikely to cast an independent and impartial vote. Is there not just as much reason why an Indian, who is under the supervision and tutelage and dictation of the Superintendent General, should be prevented from casting a vote? While I should be willing to give to a regularly enfranchised Indian the same rights and privileges that other people possess, under similar circumstances, that is all that we should be asked to do. All we have to do to learn the actual condition of the Indian in his tribal state is to refer to the annual reports of the Superintendent General and his agents; and I am sorry the hon. First Minister did not peruse them before he brought in his Bill. If he had done so, although I have very little faith in his doing that which is in the interest of the country when his own political interest stands in the way, yet I believe he would not have attempted to force upon the House this proposition. There may be a reason why the First Minister desires these Indians to be enfranchised. We know that there is a very active agent among them; we know that Dr. Oronyhtekha has been doing a very large amount of missionary work among them, as the hon. Postmaster-General well knows. He gives the whole of his time to that work, although he does not devote himself to one lodge; he has a multiplicity of lodges to attend to; and withal he is a good Tory. I am a little inclined to think that he may be an official of the Government to-day. Dr. says the Orange Sentinel—the enfranchisement of the Oronyhtekha goes from one band to another to organise Indian. Why should the Orange Sentinel be so anxious 266 lodges; perhaps they may be temperance lodges, but they are generally Orange lodges.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not correct.

Mr. WILSON. I can show to my hon friend where he has organised an Orange lodge in the county of Middlesox, and where a building has been erected for the use of the Orange Indians. I can refer him also to the county of Hastings, where there are a good many Orange lodges among the Indians, and it looks to me as if the object of enfranchising these Indians was to increase the strength of the Orange organisation in this House. The hon gentleman shakes his head. We know his sincere desire for the success of the Orange organisation; we know how his heart would leap with joy if he could succeed in getting a few more Orangemen here, and if he could succeed in fastening on the people of Canada that particular Bill which he desires to have fastened upon them. We know that this Dr. Oronyhtekha is a devoted Orangeman; we know that in the Province of Ontario nine out of ten of the enfranchised Indians will be Orange voters; and we know full well how they will vote. We know that the Orange organisation is a political organisation-perhaps it may be religious, or the two combined. If we find the First Minister so anxious to have these Indians enfranchised, may there not be a sinister motive in his desire. I should not be surprised if my hon friend, the Minister of Public Works, should have a visit from this Dr. Oronyhtekha down in his locality, with the view of enfranchising some of the Indians down there; but they must become good Orangemen before they get the right to be placed on the voters' list. It may be that the First Minister, a brother Orangeman, desires to have this provision passed for the purpose of giving increased strength to the Orange voter, and obtaining a larger Orange representation in this House; and therefore he may send the doctor down there for the purpose of organising some Orange lodges in that locality. I would ask the Minister of Public Works to be upon his guard, as the Commissioner of Customs may, perhaps, have a little more influence with the First Minister than the hon, gentleman. He may find there may be too many Orange votes, and the Blues may not, in the future as they have been in the past, be able to resist the agents brought in by the First Minister. An article which appeared in the Orange Sentinel lately will show that I am not exaggerating when I say that it will be dangerous to enfranchise these Indians, as they will become a danger to the State on account of the organisation to which many of them belong, the Orange society, being hostile to the religious views and sentiments entertained by our friends from the Province of Quebec. The Orange Sentinel says:

"It is claimed that the proposition to confer the right of franchise upon our civilised and loyal Indian population, as contemplated in the Franchise Bill now before the House of Commons, is a true solution of this difficult Indian problem, and it is contended that it will lead our Indian brethren gradually from one step to another, until they will have taken their places side by side with us as citizens of the Dominion. The question is of interest to us now—(No doubt that falls sweetly on the ears of the hon. Minister of Public Works)—for, as is well known, we have flourishing Orange lodges in many of these reserves, and we speak what we know when we say that many of the members of these lodges are as intelligent, well-informed and capable men as are to be found any where in the Dominion. If given the franchise, they would be able to exercise the right as intelligently as any other voters. Those who hold a different view will do well to read the able letter of Dr. Oronyhtekha to the London Free Press. It is a calm and dignified appeal on behalf of his race, such as may be expected from our eminent brother, which answers every objection urged against the enfranchisement, and is all the more powerful because of its being thoroughly non-partisan in its character, and coming from the Indian standpoint."

Now, you will see that it is a matter of urgency which the Orange body ought to consider well—so the Orange body ought to consider well-so about it? The writer states that they are as intelligent and capable as their fellow white citizens. Well, if they do not take the trouble to become enfranchised under the Dominion Act they cannot be as capable as the white citizens. I am perfectly willing that they should be enfranchised under the Dominion Act, and if they are as intelligent as the Sentinel says they are, we are willing to give those who come up to the standard of the Act the privilege of voting. I deny, however, that Dr. Oronyhtekha is a nonpolitical man. I say he is not only an out-and-out Conservative, but is besides an Orangeman of the first water, and my hon. friends from Quebec will learn to their cost, perhaps too late, that his object is to organise these various lodges, and that probably the First Minister in introducing this clause has had a similar motive. I ask my hon. friend to go over the records and see whether the Indians have complied with the requirements that a white man must comply with in order to vote. He will find such is not the case. Let us consider the effect the enfranchising of those Indians will have. You remember the pathetic appeals made by the First Minister, when he said he desired to introduce a Bill that would remove all discord, so that every individual, no matter in what Province, might have the same right to go to the polls. Has he adopted that course? He is going to enfranchise some of the Indians, and others he will not. We know the Indian nature; we have heard the First Minister state, time and again, that they are a jealous race, and if he gives a vote to some and deprives others of it he will create discord. We have to-day an evidence in the North-West of the consequences of creating discord; and I would advise the First Minister that the course he is now taking may be the source of a great amount of irritation among the various classes of Indians; I warn him that instead of having his difficulties confined to the North-West, he may create difficulties in the older Provinces. I would appeal to the Government not to run the risk of doing anything that might create difficulty in Canada. Let us for a short time look at the condition in which we find the Indians in the various parts of the Provinces, and I am very glad that the amendment moved by the First Minister gives me the opportunity of referring to the North-West Indians without being out of order. If you will turn to the report of 1884 you will find that the Superintendent General does not give a very glowing picture of the prosperity and the advancement of the people you are now asking us to enfranchise. (The hon, gentleman read from the report references to the Indians of Metlahkatla, the Qu'Apppelle district, and the Chippewa, Muncey and Oneida bands.) The First Minister proposed to enfranchise the Indians in British Columbia, and the most intelligent class of them probably were concerned in the difficulties he here refers to. He intended to enfranchise the Indians in the North-West Territories had not his attention been specially called to that matter. The Chippewas, the Munceys and the Oneidas live in sections of the country not far from the county which I have the honor to represent, and yet the report shows that their progress is small. The Minister of Customs should not complain of me for referring to the fact of these Indians being Orangemen, when the Indian agent himself, in his report, states that the Oneidas are building a council hall which is to serve also as a lodge room for the Good Templars and the Orange society. The report shows that the schools on these reserves are not well attended. The number of Indians living in that locality is said to be 1,345, and the probabilities are that 500 or 600 would be enfranchised under the present Bill. school, which is supported to a great extent by the contributions of that very liberal body, the Methodists. Yet the fact is notorious that all these efforts have produced very little results indeed. Coming to our locality, what is the condition in which you find them? They are ever anxious to obtain something to drink, and when they do succeed in getting something to drink, they become thoroughly intoxicated, and have to be put in the lock-up, and thereby become a source of annoyance and vexation to peaceable citizens. (The hon, gentleman proceeded to read from the report of the Indian agent at Mount Elgin, giving an account of the operations of the industrial institution established amongst them, and of the extent to which the Indian youth availed themselves of the school facilities afforded them.) Almost every statement in the reports goes to show that the Government of the day have up to the present time considered that the condition of the Indians is not such as warranted their general enfranchisement. If they are not competent to be enfranchised it is not in the interest of the Dominion and of good government that they should be allowed to cast their votes at parliamentary elections. To say this proposition is a monstrous one is to express but feebly the iniquity that is concealed under this clause. Let the First Minister appeal to the country on this Bill, if he dare. Let him tell the people that he intended to give all the Indians votes, until he ascertained that such would not be a popular measure, and then proposed that the franchise should be given to such as obtained location tickets. If the Indians had been suffering hardships I could understand such a proposal. But such is not the case, except in so far as it has been caused by neglect on the part of the Interior Department. I am decidedly opposed to the First Minister's proposition, and it would be much better for the country if we hesitated before taking a leap in that direction, which cannot fail but be fraught with serious consequences. I look upon the amendment of the First Minister as illusory. If it were to pass, it would be even worse than the original clause, for it would have it optional with the Government to say whether Indians should be enfranchised or should not. Furthermore, it would place the Indians under the direct control of the Minister. On account of these and many other reasons, I feel it my duty to vote against this clause, as I have voted against the principle of the Bill. The voice of the country has been one of protest against this proposition, such popular sentiment being represented by petitions, public meetings and expressions from the pulpit, and the Government ought to listen to the voice of the people. Let them even now amend the Bill, by wiping out the clause enfranchising Indians. When the Indian becomes enfranchised, when he subjects himself to all the duties and all the requirements of the State, let him then have the privilege of voting, but not till then. I shall vote against the amendment of the First Minister.

was, the Munceys and the Oneidas live in sections of the country not far from the county which I have the honor to represent, and yet the report shows that their progress is small. The Minister of Customs should not complain of me for referring to the fact of these Indians being Orangemen, when the Indian agent himself, in his report, states that the Oneidas are building a council hall which is to serve also as a lodge room for the Good Templars and the Orange society. The report shows that the schools on these reserves are not well attended. The number of Indians living in that locality is said to be 1,345, and the probabilities are that 500 or 600 would be enfranchised under the present Bill. (The hon, gentleman read from the report concerning the Indians in the county of Hastings.) Every means possible have been used to elevate these Indians and make them competent citizens. Various religious denominations, especially the Methodists, have labored persistently among them, and have established a can be no great risk in that; surely that is not a very sweeping measure. The hon, leader of the Opposition has referred to Indians totally uncivilised, to the savages of the forest and prairie, and the impression goes abroad that it is to those men that the Bill is to give the franchise. But the Bill means nothing of the kind. He referred to a murder having taken place in the district of Keewatin, but all Indians are not so degraded as that, and it would be easy to cite instances amongst white people where crimes just as great as those committed by Indians have taken place. The leader of the Opposition also said that they led a nomad life, but except with regard to the Indians on the prairies that is not the case, as they have certain regular hunting grounds and places where they can find food easily, but they are not at all such wanderers as they are supposed to be. Hon, gentlemen opposite say they have no objection to giving to advanced Indians, Indians who are capable of exercising the franchise intelligently, the right to vote. Now, Sir, that is just what the amendment proposes to do, because it provides that no Indian shall have the right to vote unless he is qualified as a white man is qualified. A great deal has been said, to the effect that the Indian living on the reserve cannot have the same qualifications, because he draws annuities from the Government; that he is under a sort of tutelage, that he does not pay taxes, etc. Well, Sir, he taxes himself sufficiently to make roads through his reserves and to other settlements, and he pays taxes to the Dominion Government. The reserve of the Indian may, I think, be looked upon in the light of an entailed estate in England. In such an estate the proprietor has only a life interest, and the estate is not liable for his debts; but still the life proprietor is not deprived of his civil privileges on that account, and he is not looked upon as being in a state of tutelage. I would draw attention for a moment to a misapplication of the name "Indian," which has been repeated very frequently in this debate. The half-breeds of Manitoba are Indians; they are of the same class of people that we call Indians here, for the Indians of the older Provinces are not full Indian -they are simply half-breeds. When Manitoba became a Province of the Dominion these half-breeds elected representatives to the Parliament of Manitoba; they took positions in the Ministry, and they certainly were not behind their white neighbors, either in intelligence or in general knowledge. Two hon, gentlemen from New Brunswick have described the Indians of that Province as being in a very inferior position, as being exceedingly degraded and unfit to exercise the franchise. Now, if that is the case, it must be simply from the manner in which those Indians have been treated. For 200 years they have been in the midst of civilisation, and if the system adopted towards them has been no better than to produce such a class of men as they describe, it is time that system were altered. But I say, Sir, that the adoption of this new system, which gives them the franchise when they have advanced to a certain stage, will have a tendency to elevate them, to make them take an interest in the country, and make them good citizens. It is unfair to the Indians to draw a comparison with those who owe their degradation to the white man, as those Indians in New Brunswick seem to do. These hon. gentlemen spoke of the Indians as living on the tax-payers of the country. It may be in the memory of some hon. gentlemen that the Imperial Government, in 1857, appointed a commission to enquire into the condition of the Indians in Ontario; and what did they say in their report? They expressed themselves in the strongest language they could command, as to the injustice that had been done to the Indians, by depriving them of their lands, robbing them of vast territories, for what they considered a mere nominal consideration. So that all that the Indians have received from the white man they have repaid ten fold. If the white man has kept the Indians in a degraded position, it is high | believes that this Bill is uncalled for and unnecessary at all, time that he should adopt another system, and endeavor to lead them forward and lift them up in the social scale, and try to make good citizens of them. The enfranchisement under the Indian Act, which is spoken of so often, is no enfranchisement at all. That is a mere catch word; it is merely a scheme to divide up the reserve and give to each Indian his portion. An Indian, to become enfranchised under that Act, no matter how advanced he may be, has to give up his holding elsewhere, and go and live on the reserve, and go through a probationary course. But that is no enfranchisement. It is merely designed to break up the reserves into allotments and to do away with the tribal system. Whether it is a wise plan or not, it is an enfranchisement that does not apply to the present case at all. But it has been claimed that the enfranchisement of the Indian would degrade the electorate of this Dominion. Could anything be more absurd than to suppose that the enfranchisement of a few thousand Indians in the older Provinces-no more than onefifth of the whole number—would produce this terrible effect on the electorate of 5,000,000 of people. This old system has been tried long enough. It is surely time now that instead of keeping the Indians in tutolage and treating them as mere children, a more advanced method of dealing with them should be tried. The first French settlers in this country dealt with them in a far different way. They granted lands to the white people who allied themselves with the Indians; and that system worked very well indeed, in bringing about friendship and union between them, and I believe the two races became largely amalgamated in portions of Lower Canada, Those early French settlers treated the Indians much more humanely than they have been treated since. Taking this Bill as it stands, with this amendment, and comparing it with the Ontario Act, the difference is not so very great. Hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches generally admire the Ontario Franchise Bill; and as it provides for the exercise of the franchise by the Indians, I do not see why they should not accept this amendment. The only difference between the two Bills is, that in the Ontario Act the Indians who receive pay from the Government are excluded under certain conditions, while this Bill does not make that a ground of exclusion; but it excludes them if they are not otherwise qualified. In fact, I think the Ontario Act goes quite as far as this Bill does; and I must say that I rather like this Ontario Act, if some slight amendments were made in it. As to this cry, which has been raised both in the papers and in this House, as to the enfranchisement of the wild Indians, the Indians of the plains, surely this amendment has done away with all cause for that cry; and now that such an immense step has been taken towards meeting the wishes of the Opposition, I think it would be only fair, and reasonable to suppose that they would advance a step to meet the views of the other side. I cannot conceive of this opposition, which describes everything that is proposed as something monstrous, something terrible, something atrocious. Here is a step towards making this Bill similar to the Ontario Act, and giving our hon, friends on the Opposition side almost all they could reasonably desire, and still the opposition is as strong as

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We have arrived at that stage which the hon. First Minister saw fit to tell us was the proper stage at which to deal with the Indian question; and he promised that when we arrived at that stage he would propose some amendments, showing what he really designed when he first framed this Franchise Bill. The amendment is in your hands, Sir; we see what the First Minister designs now, whether he designed it originally or not. I am not in favor of this proposition. I am one who

I do not wish to widen the discussion; but the persistency with which this measure is urged by the First Minister, without its being asked for by any one, from one ocean to the other, so far as we know—and they have been challenged to say if any one has asked for it-how he should be the means of obstructing public business, of unsettling the credit of the country, and damaging the private financial interests of many people of the country, and why it is that his supporters behind him, many of whom I know cannot approve, in their heart of hearts, of that Bill, have not the manliness and courage to say so, are things I cannot comprehend. It is time for you to withdraw your Bill; it is evident, from all we hear, that the country does not want the Bill, that they never asked for the Bill; it is evident that the country has pronounced against the Bill in a manner so unmistakable that it cannot be misunderstood by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the petitions which have come in from ridings represented by hon, gentlemen in this House who are supporting the Government, petitions from their own constituents, praying that the Bill may not become law, there are enough names entered of those who supported some hon, gentlemen opposite, who have signed these petitions, to wipe out the majority by which those hon, gentlemen obtained their seats; yet we find them still maintaining their adhesion to the First Minister and endeavoring, at the expense of all public business, to push through a measure which their own constituents tell them they do not want. We are forced to ask the reason why? It cannot be argued any longer, with any show of decency, that they are endeavoring to carry out this measure for the good of the public; and when we see the persistency with which they still cling to it, we are forced to the conclusion that was borne in on our minds when we first saw it, that they are pushing forward a measure conceived for the purpose of strengthening their own party and damaging the chances of their opponents. That conclusion is forced home on us irresistibly. But, though that be the case, we are not contending against the Bill on that ground. If hon gentlemen opposite are willing to take all the discredit that their action will bring upon them, they are welcome to all the advantage they can secure from the passage of the Bill. They may now cast all the scorn and contumely they please on the signatures of the respectable people who have petitioned them to desist in their course, but when again they have to face their electors and acknowledge that they were deaf to these remonstances of their constituents, it may perhaps dawn upon them that, instead of strengthening their own position, they have done that which materially weakened it; and they may find that in their desire to weaken some of the members on this side, they have failed in that attempt. It is more than possible, it is even probable, that many who are destined to be excluded from this may, after all, find that they have not had their position so terribly weakned as the result of the Bill. The people of this country like something that is manly, something like fair play; they have been nurtured with British notions. They like the idea of British fair play, as between man and man; they do not like a sneaking attempt to legislate men out of the House whom they are afraid to meet in a manly way. There is a moral sentiment in the country that revolts at the perpetration of an Act such as meditated by hon. gentlemen opposite. I read in the Mail newspaper a letter from a Dr. P. E. Jones, an Indian chief, written evidently in a strong partisan frame, in which he is pleased to allude to him from his possession by giving him a sum of money for the fact that the opposition to this measure is because the it, thus taking him off the holding upon which he has the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) are to lose their seats by it, hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) are to lose their seats by it, and that is the cause, he says, of the whole tempest in the in what sense? That he can sell it, dispose of it, teapot. Who told that gentleman that either of these seats will be lost, as a necessity of this measure? He speaks about being snubbed during Mr. Mackenzie's reign, by band and the approval of the Superintendent General. That the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, when clause, I can tell the hon, member for Algoma, is just Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

endeavoring to get certain claims of his band settled, but since Sir John assumed the reins he has had them settled. Was there an understanding, when that claim was settled, that there was to had them be a compensation given in return for it? Was it talked over between the Superintendent General and this Indian chief, that as a result of their giving the Indian votes, the latter would pledge himself it would have the effect desired on certain members of this House? Are we to understand that from the letter of Dr. Jones, who writes to the Mail in a partisan strain? These are questions I would like to have the First Minister in his seat to give us an understanding about, so that we may know what was the aim, intent and scope of the Bill, so far as hon, gentlemen on this side are concerned, when hon, gentlemen opposite advised it, meditated it, and carried it out, with their own secret desires hidden from us. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) thinks we are unreasonable on this side, because, he says, the First Minister has met our views in reference to this matter. Well, at an earlier stage, the hon. member for Algoma, with all his learning and ability, gave us a clear illustration that he had failed to comprehend this Indian question at all. It was not till after I had challenged the First Minister himself, and he rose from his place and told the hon member for Algoma that he had misunderstood the Bill, that the hon member was set right. I hope now my hon. friend will not feel annoyed if I tell him that, if he is sincere, he is still in profound ignorance of the nature of the amendment, or the new clause proposed by the First Minister. Is it designed to wipe out the objections taken by members on this side? What is the ground of our contention? Is it that the Indians should be kept down? Again and again we have repeated, as the hon, gentleman knows, that the Opposition have but one desire, and that is to elevate the Indians. What we have contended, what we have proved so conclusively, that no hon. gentleman opposite, or newspaper supporting the party opposite has dared attempt to controvert, is that, in this Bill, you do not elevate the Indian, you do not lift them up one iota; he remains in the same state of tutelage, the same low, unenfranchised condition, under the Bill itself, with this clause in, which is proposed to be added, as he does at present. It is but giving a vote to him while he is in the absolute control of the Government, to be told by the Government, through its agents, to march to the ballot box and mark his ballot, and if he cannot put a mark there, in the ear of the agent of the Government, the servant of the Superintendent General, to declare that he cast his vote on behalf of the Government candidate. What effect will this "living in separate holdings," being inserted as a proviso, have? What unenfranchised Indian does that shut out? Do people suppose that the Indians all live in one vast tent? Do not they live on their reserves, in their little holdings, some larger and some smaller, and cannot the revising barrister easily state whether, in any one of them, there is an amount of work, or work done to the land to improve the soil, to the extent of $150? The unenfranchised Indian is given the right to vote in this clause just as effectually as before. Nay, more so; for if there was an Indian of sufficient independence to let it be known that he would vote against this Government, what power has the Government in their hands? The Superintendent General can remove manage it, as he pleases? No; nothing of the kind. He cannot do anything with it, except with the consent of designed to give the vote to all the unenfranchised Indians. virtually, that there are in this country, ignorant or learned, rich or poor. The only effect of that resolution is to provide that the Indians in Manitoba and the North-West Territory shall not have the right to vote. In the other Provinces it leaves the Indian question just where it was and where the First Minister designed it should be, that these wards of the Government, who are in a state of tutelage, under the control of the Government of the day. It might apply to the vast majority of Indians in my own county. be said that it would be humiliating for the First Minister would it be a greater humiliation than the hon, gentleman has gone through half a dozen times since he introduced this Bill. At first he told us he was in favor of giving a vote to unmarried women, but as the debate proceeded, we judged from the actions of hon gentlemen opposite that he had given them to understand that, though he had expressed himself in that way, they should vote it down. At the inception of the Indian debate, in answer to the hon. member for Bothwell, the First Minister stated that the unenfranchised Indians of the plains would have a vote under this Bill. (See page 1484.) What humiliation he has undergone at the hands of his followers since then; how many hon. gentlemen opposite have virtually given the lie to the utterances of their leader, have virtually said that, when he uttered those words, he stated what was not true. One of them said that, when he used those words, with all the solemn duty of a Minister of the Crown resting upon him, he was using bye-play. The First Minister has not said he was using bye-play or that what he said then was not true, but the resolution put in your hands this afternoon declares that, when Sir John Macdonald used those words, he stated what was true. Otherwise, why was it necessary? The hon. gentleman had to submit to these humiliations, and we have had the humiliation of seeing him also state that he always, in his own mind, meant to confine it to the Indians of the older Provinces. What humiliation is that, that a gentleman of the profound learning and legal knowledge of the First Minister, who fully intended that the Indian clause should apply only to the Indians of the older Provinces, should so frame his Bill that it included the Indians of the other Provinces and of the North-West Territories, and should have told the hon. member for Bothwell that its effect would be to enfranchise the Indians of the west. I cannot conceive of humiliations much greater than that, even if the Bill were withdrawn. Again, we heard speeches from the members from British Columbia, and after they had spoken we find that the effect of this proposition is not to confine the Bill to the Indians of the older Provinces, for the Indians of British Columbia are not excluded. These are some of the various phases, states and conditions of mind in which the hon, gentleman has been since the introduction of this Bill; these are some of the contradictory statements made by him and his supporters in reference to this matter. All Indians are not in the same state of advancement in this country. My hon. friend from Essex has in his county perhaps the most advanced band; they have availed themselves of the provisions in the Indian Act for enfranchising and emancipating themselves, and the Superintendent General tells us they have proved the wisdom of their application and his wisdom in granting it. They stand in this country free men to exercise their right. I wish that were the case with more of our Indians. I believe there are more who are fitted for it. I believe that, on the reserve in my own county, many have attained to a stage which, if they were emanciped from Government control and free to manage their own affairs, would fit them to give a vote, if they desired to do so; but I do not believe that any good will be accomplished by the thing to say in your affairs if you are going to take part in Government trying to thrust upon them what they have ours. Would it not be reasonable? Would it not be right?

never asked for. I will tell hon, gentlemen opposite what I would tell the First Minister if he was in his place, as he ought to be, for, if his aim is to strike a blow at some members of this Opposition he ought to have the manliness to face them and get his answer. I tell them that I question whether many of the leading Indians in these bands will avail themselves of the privilege of voting. What is reported to have been uttered by a young and intelligent should have the power to cast their votes while they are Indian of the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinté will, I believe, do not believe that, if this Bill is put into effect, you will be to withdraw his Bill now. Granted; I grant it freely. But able, unless compulsory means are used, to get the Indians of the Six Nations to cast a vote for one candidate or the other, because they take the position that they are not subjects of the Crown, but allies, and they will use such language as is reported to have been used by this young Indian:

"In a recent interview with one of their intelligent young men, he stated that his people did not want the franchise on the basis of tribal lands. These lands are secured to them by treaty with the Crown, free from all taxation—a perpetual inheritance. He said they considered the attempted legislation as being part of a scheme to place their reserve under ordinary municipal control and taxation, and finally to deprive them or their children of their birthright.

"They fully recognize that under existing election laws they are them or their children of their birthright.

"They fully recognise that, under existing election laws, they are subjected to no privation or unfairness, for it is open to any tribesman to go off the reserve and achieve a franchise 'on an equal footing with Europeans." The above remarks represent the general feeling of the Mchawks, notwithstanding the assertion of their fellow-tribesman, Dr. Oronhyatekha, of London. His statements must therefore be made rather as a paid Government official than as an heir of the original proprietors of this continent."

Sir, this is an attempt to force upon the advanced and educated Indians that are in the possession of the Six Nation reserves, who were the original proprietors of the soil, who settled upon the lands that were given to them as a reservation, and who wished to maintain their independence and not be bought. For they will know that if they exercise the right to vote and participate in the government it will not be long before their white brethren surrounding them will raise an agitation that they shall be under municipal taxation and pay their share of the county and municipal taxes. Therefore, the very class that, if any, were fitted to enjoy the franchise, will be the very class that, I believe, will not avail themselves of it, but will say that it was not their own demand, that if they touch it at all, it will comcompromise them in their tribal relations, which they wish to preserve. Those who will get the franchise will be those of less intelligence, those who have not advanced as far as the others. But it is claimed we are doing them an injustice, because they live in this country, and they ought to have the right to vote. Sir, they will have the right to vote the moment they desire to become one of us, to become citizens, and avail themselves of the machinery provided for that purpose. But they do not want to become citizens. They want to maintain their tribal relations, to preserve their identity as a separate people, and in doing that they want to follow their own desires. If Dr. Jones, the chieftain who writes that letter in the Mail from that partisan standpoint, were here, I would ask him this question: Are you prepared to let the white people that surround your reserve take part in your elections, to take part in the election of yourself as a chief of the Mississaguas? What would be the reply? He would say: No; we have nothing to do with you. We are a distinct people; we are our own nation, and you have no right to come in and interfere with us at all. Would not they tell us that, and would not they be right in telling us that? Most undoubtedly they would be. Keeping themselves in that position, they can say who shall be chief among themselves. But if they are able to say who shall be chief here, who shall bear rule here, there will be a very good reason why others will say: We want to have some-

Have any one of us any right to go on these Indian reserves and vote in reference to their selection of a chief? and do you think they will avail themselves of what the hon, gentleman wishes to force upon them when they have that alternative staring them in the face? No, Sir; the proposition of this Bill is not to enfranchise the Indian in the full sense, not to do him a particle of good, but to gain a party advantage through the agency of these Indians. I tell hon gentlemen opposite that they think they are going to accomplish a great party end and damage hon, gentlemen on this side of the House by it, they have all the discredit of the attempt, and I question very much if they will derive much benefit from it. Dr. Jones truly says that if two or three members of Parliament are to be deprived of their seats in order to do an act of justice to another race of people, is that a reason why they should not have it? Jones is right when he uses that argument. The seat of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has no business to be secured to him if, through the securing of it, an act of injustice is done to a large body of people, or to any individual in this country. Now, Sir, other amendments will be put into your hands upon which I shall avail myself of the opportunity of speaking. I am willing to assume my full share of responsibility for having talked too much on this question before the House. But I desire now to point out to you the effect of the amendment in your hands. I venture to say that the clause proposed to be put in by the First Minister will not go into the Bill as it The Minister has brought it in after full consideration as to its effect, as to its bearing, and it may be rather a difficult thing for him to yield in the matter, but I say it will not go in in that way; if it does, the people of the country will have something to say about it. What does it do? It excludes the Indians of Keewatin and Manitoba, and admits the Indians of British Columbia. What is the effect of that? Let me read to you—and bear in mind that every worl I shall read will be the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, the description of Sir John A. Macdonald of those Indians, in his report to His Excellency the Governor General. This is what he says, with reference to those Indians that he is excluding from Manitoba and Keewatin:-

"The band who occupy the reserve at Lac Seul are in a very prosper ous condition, possessing fine fields, in which they raise crops of cereals and roots. They also occupy well-built houses, and keep them neat and clean. There is considerable competition among them as to who shall have the best farm. These Indians have adopted the system so uncommon in Indian communities, and yet so desirable, of residing on separate farms, instead of all living in close proximity to each other. The latter system is disadvantageous from a sanitary point of view, and it retards greatly the progress of the Indians in industry, self-reliance and enterprise. A very good school is in operation in the vicinity of the reserve, and the Indian children who attend it are making satisfactory progress." "The band who occupy the reserve at Lac Seul are in a very prosper

These are the Manitoba Indians described by Sir John A. Macdonald in his report, whom he proposes to shut out from participating in that inalienable right of the Indians to vote as mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson)

"The Indians owning the reserves at the Manitou River possess large and very well cultivated fields of potatoes and corn. They are described as a remarkably energetic and industrious class of Indians."

Further down the report goes on to say, and let me direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this:

"Adverting to the reserves and bands which come under Treaty No. 1, the principal reserve is that of St. Peter's, situated on the Red River; and the band of Chippewa and Swampy Cree Indians, who occupy it, comprise the most numerous Indian community in the Province of Manitoba. These Indians raise large quantities of produce, and the hay on the reserve is generally an enormous crop. The crops of the past year were, however, not as abundant as is usually the case. These Indians own a large number of live stock, and many of them are the possessors of improved kinds of machinery, such as reapers, mowers threshing machines, etc.; also owning light carriages for driving purposes, and large double waggons for use in their farming operations, the old 'Red River cart' being discarded for the more modern conveyance. The catch of fish by these Indians is usually very large, and that of last year was no exception.

Mr. Paterson (Brant).

"They constructed a road of four miles in length, besides building a number of bridges and ditches on the reserve during the year. "There are several good schools in operation on this reserve."

They are christian people, I believe. They are, however, shut out by the First Minister, after days of considering this Indian question. You cannot find, in any of the Provinces, a description of a band of Indians more advanced than this band in Manitoba. Yet the hon, gentleman deliberately excludes them from this Bill. Yet we are having a uniform Here the most advanced and the most intelligent of the Indians are to be shut out. By-and-bye I shall show what classes of Indians are to have votes. Here is another extract from the First Minister's report:

"The band cocupying the reserve at Fort Alexander found themselves in rather trying circumstances last winter, owing to the failure of the grain crop of the previous season, the scarcity of fish and the absence of remunerative labor, which they formerly had no difficulty in obtaining at a saw mill which was operated for several years on the reserve, but which was last year removed to another point.

"Two schools are conducted on the reserve. One of these institutions, which is established in the interests of the children of the Roman Catholic portion of the community, is described as being most ably managed."

Yet they are deliberately excluded by this measure. Here is another extract:

"The band occupying the reserve at Fairford are in a most satisfactory condition. Every year the progress of this community is noticeable; and in no year was it more remarkable than last season, the crops having been greatly in excess of those of previous years, and consisting of wheat, barley, oats, potatoes and hay. Their cattle are also increasing in number.

"The council of this band framed, with the assistance of the agent, rules and regulations for the better government of the reserve, under the provisions of the Indian Act, 1880, and these having been submitted to Your Excellency in Council, were duly approved of, and thus have

"There are two good schools on the reserve, and the pupils in attendance are making very satisfactory progress in their studies."

But these are Indians purposely and designedly shut out from voting by the First Minister. Here is another ex-

The Indians have fine gardens, and their splendid fields of potatoes, the superintendent reports, are kept scrupulously free of weeds. These Indians devote almost their entire time to agriculture. Their cattle are increasing in number and are well cared for.

"The school on this reserve is ably conducted and the pupils are making very satisfactory progress. The school house recently erected is reported to be an ornament to the reserve.

"The band who own the reserve on Water Hen River are in equally as good, if not in rather better circumstances, than the band last referred to. They display remarkable industry in the tillage of the soil, which is amply rewarded by the comfort in which they live, their families being well clothed and fed, and the number of new dwelling houses and stables erected by them affords a further gratifying indication of improvement in their tastes and habits. These Indians also possess a splendid herd of cattle, in which they take great pride.

"They have a very excellent school on the reserve, at which the pupils are instructed in the English, French and Ojibewa languages, and show remarkable proficiency in these as well as in their other studies."

These are Indian bands purposely excluded by the hon. gentleman's proposition from the right to vote. Let me read a description of some of the bands to whom the First Minister proposes, among others, to give the right to vote, while at the same time he shuts out these Christian Indians. Here is a description of the condition of Indians in British Columbia, to whom the hon, gentleman gives the right to vote, while he refuses to give that right to the Indians of Manitoba:

"A considerable amount of immorality, arising from the use of intoxicants, and the cohabitation of Indian men and women with other than their own consorts, is reported to exist on this reserve (Williams Lake). This condition of things results, as a matter of course, in the prevalence of disease and poverty, and in the existence of great unhap-

"Special legislation to put a stop to this evil of illicit intercourse on the part of Indians who, at least, profess to be christianised, appears to be necessary.

'In heathen tribes of Indians, however, the kindred evil of polygamy has always been practised, and heathen Indians will only be brought to refrain from practising it when the enlightenment, which ever attends the inauguration of the christian religion among the heathen, shall have changed their views in this as well as in other matters.

"On the other hand, were legislation, having for its object the forcible suppression of the evil, to be introduced, I fear that, if it proved operative at all, it would only become so after vary serious trouble had ensued, especially with the more populous tribes; and the enforcement of such a law, would certainly be attended with difficulties of a most complicated character when it came to be applied to individual cases. For instance, the settlement of the question of priority of right when several women claimed the same man as husband would be most difficult; and then another question, most difficult of solution, would arise, in regard to the legal rights of the children, issue of such marriages. I apprehend, however, that the enforcement of any law that would interfere with their preconceived ideas as to marital rights would be so strongly resisted by heathen tribes generally as to render it inoperative. Moreover, the inculcation in the minds of Indians of principles that will lead them, from conscientious convictions, to abandon voluntarily the habit of polygamy, as well as other heathenish practices, is, I submit, the work of those who charge themselves with the responsibility of imparting instruction to them in the tenets of christianity."

I have read from the Eirst Minister's own report. What are we asked to do? I ask no favor from the Conservative press; but I desire, in the interests of the people, and in the interests of morality and of righteousness, that they do for once publish what is the truth; that they for once let that class of the community who take their intelligence from their papers know that the First Minister has this afternoon submitted to the committee a clause, the effect of which is, within the walls of this great national temple of justice and righteousness, to ask this christian Parliament to put a clause on the Statute Book of Canada that exalts heathen polygamy, with its practices, above christian religion, with its virtues.

Mr. PLATT. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has expressed surprise at the action of Opposition members in connection with the matter before the committee. The Opposition will cease expressing surprise at his opinions if the hon, gentleman speaks many more times on the Indian question. He seems to have undertaken to enlighten the House as to the bearing of whatever amendment is proposed on the Indian clauses of this Bill. He has expressed pleasure at almost every amendment made by the First Minister, and he allows an amendment which he suggested himself to be superseded by another; and yet this hon, gentleman now has the boldness to tell the Opposition that that amendment should suffice. I suppose the hon, gentleman will allow members of the Opposition to judge for themselves of the meaning of this particular amendment. If we take the construction put upon it by him, or if we had accepted his construction of the original clause, we might have been satisfied. It meant anything or nothing, according to the hon, gentleman's opinion, and he instills his opinion into the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, until they are led themselves to believe that the meaning of the clause was entirely different from that which the First Minister said it was. Now, the First Minister has not vouchsafed an explanation of the amendment, and the hon member for Algoma has given his explanation. By and bye, when the First Minister gives his explanation, it will be found as different from that of the member for Algoma as was his explanation of the original statement from the explanation given by that hon, gentleman. Well, Sir, the amendment in your hands certainly has given rise to disappointment on both sides of the House. It must have been a disappointment to members on the Government side, when they found an amendment proposed which gives a flat contradiction to nearly all the arguments they have advanced in relation to the Indian clause. They have been telling us that the tribal Indians were not to be enfranchised, and several of them expressed themselves to the effect that, if that were the meaning of the clause, the House would not find them supporting the measure; and that is one of the reasons why the First Minister has seen fit to make the change. He has had a double purpose in view. He wished to lead the Opposition and the country | serves while they are under the control of the Indian agent.

to suppose that he was meeting us half way, and he was convincing his own followers that he was removing an objectionable feature from the measure when he placed the amendment in your hands. Well, he may have convinced those supporters who were opposed to the original clause of the Bill, but I can assure you that he has not convinced us on this side that he has made any advance in the direction he pointed out, or lessened the obnoxious character of the clause of which we complained before. I say, so far as the two clauses are concerned, the original and the amendment, as far as I am personally concerned, I prefer the original clause. In that we had uniformity; in this we have destroyed uniformity and have increased the power placed in the hands of the Indian agent. I find that the Indians have been given such location tickets as are mentioned in the proposed amendment, and I do not know exactly what it means. I find that it is stated in the report with regard to the Golden Lake agency, South Algoma: (The hon. gentleman here quoted from the report in question.) I would like some hon, gentleman to state whether it is his own land-whether the Government have issued a patent to him? If so, in what position does he stand? Does he own the lands in fee simple? And owning his own land, working it for his own benefit, paying no municipal or provincial taxes, is it not a misnomer to call the land his own? Is not that land still at the disposal of the agent and the Superintendent General? Is it not competent for the agent, or the Superintendent General, to remove those Indians from those locations? They have simply got holdings by the grace and favor of the agent, and they feel a greater obligation after receiving those tickets than before receiving them, and, therefore, giving votes only to such Indians as receive separate location tickets increases the power and influence of the agent and the Government to a dangerous extent. He will have in that very way the making up of the list. Before the voters' list is made up at all the Indian agent can go through the reserve, locating such as he thinks proper, giving tickets only to those who are friends and supporters of the Government. If there are some Indians who, in his opinion, will not vote as he wishes, they will not get location tickets, and only those will get them who, in his opinion, will support himself and his friends. For that reason I am justified in saying that the amendment is even more obnoxious to hon, gentlemen on this side than was the original clause. But, after all, does the amendment relieve the Indian from those disabilities under which he lives at the present time? Is he any less the ward of the Government? I say no. Is he any less responsible to the Government for almost his every act? The amendment does nothing towards removing those disabilities which have heretofore been held Why, Sir, sufficient to disqualify him from casting his vote. the Superintendent General to-day, under the Bill proposed, as in years gone by, will have power of being almost supreme upon the reserves. He is the man who favors the Indian in finding a market for his flour or his fish, he gives him seeds and, perhaps, some of the implements upon his farm. He may give them permission to cut wood; he is the man who pays the annuity; he assists in the managing of their schools and the employment of their teachers, and to some extent he assists in the payment of those teachers. He writes their wills, or sanctions them after they are written. He is the man who gives them the location ticket upon which they are to qualify as voters. More than that; he is supreme amongst them, in a judicial capacity. Let me give you a description of the extent to which the Indian agent has shown himself capable of exercising judicial powers on the Indian reserve. (The hon. gentleman then quoted from the report on Indian Affairs for 1885.)
The Indian agent is supreme; and for that reason we have objected to the enfranchisement of the Indians on the re-

does not destroy the effect of the measure, so far as its apparent intent is concerned. The hon, gentleman has been very careful in this amendment not to exclude from the operation of the Act the Indians of Ontario. In no instance do we find any change made, where there is a possibility of the Indians acting beneficially to certain politicians in Ontario. The allusions to the Ontario statute show that the fight over this Bill is not a fight between two parties here so much as a fight between hon, gentlemen opposite and the Legislature of Ontario; and if there is a pernicious clause in that Act, that is deemed sufficient justification for inserting it here. With regard to the question of uniformity, the right hon. gentleman seems willing to sacrifice it on every occasion. It was at first the crowning argument for this Bill; now it is of no necessity whatever; but the right hon, gentleman is careful not to sacrifice that principle unless there is something to be gained by the sacrifice. It would be a sacrifice of uniformity to disfranchise a part of the Civil Service. That has been steadily resisted. It was a sacrifice of uniformity when a portion of the fishermen were excepted. In every instance in which there has been a breach of the principle of uniformity it has not been done by depriving of the franchise those people who, to a certain extent, might be said to be under the influence of the Government. The fishermen receive a bounty, therefore we must add them to the list; the Civil Service are under the control of the Government, therefore they must not be disfranchised. While we cast off the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. we must retain the Indians of Ontario, because we need them for a purpose. It has been made easy for the classes I have mentioned to become registered, but there are a class of voters whose registration the Government have taken care to make difficult. I will not refer at any great length to the exclusion of the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West Territories by this amendment; but I am surprised that the right hon. gentleman should have run the risk of dealing so partially with the Indians. One would think that as Superintendent General he would have been very careful indeed not to do so, for fear he would rouse the jealousy of some and excite the admiration of others of those savage tribes. The hon, gentleman once expressed his opinion that this Parliament should act very carefully towards the Indians of this country. In 1872, when an election Bill was before this Parliament, promoted by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, one of his followers, Mr. Chauveau, proposed to restore the right to vote to a small Indian tribe which had been deprived of the right by some arrangement of the municipal list, and Sir John Macdonald spoke as follows:—

"As a matter of necessity, if these thirty-four Indians were allowed to have an assessment list, other Indians similarly situated must have the same right. The question was, were we prepared to allow Indians all over the Dominion to vote. His hon, friend must admit that these thirty-four Indians should not be accorded privileges which were denied to others. It would be soothing the feelings of thirty-four Indians and wounding the feelings of 3,400. His hon, friend would see that it would be the giving of every Indian throughout the Dominion, being a householder to the value of $20 rental, the right to vote, and he did not think the Government was prepared to go so far."

The hon, gentleman seems to have forgotten the necessity of dealing impartially with the Indians; and now he is going to gratify the feelings of one section of the Indians of this country and wound the feelings of another section. What he was very careful not to do in 1872 he is willing to do in 1885, whatever may be the results of his action. He finds it necessary to depart from the rule of impartiality, and to adopt a rule of very great partiality in dealing with the Indians. We have heard a great deal said about the inability of the Indians, about their being disqualified in various ways from exerting influence on the Mr. PLATT.

This amendment, as the previous speaker has pointed out, he be an Indian or not, what is the first qualification of a voter? When about to pass a Bill adding to the present electorate, what class of people should we feel naturally called upon to add? Are we to choose from amongst the most ignorant in the land or from among the more intelligent? I say the first qualifaction for a voter is an adequate provider of the fication for a voter is an adequate knowledge of the duties and responsibilities of a member of Parliament. A man who does not know what is required of his representative is not a man upon whom we should seek to thrust the franchise. If he has it, well and good; but a man who has not adequate knowledge to understand what he wishes his representatives to do for him and what his representative is empowered to do, is not a fit and proper person to have thrust upon him the responsibility of the franchise. Then, the voter should have the disposition to act in the interest of the country; he should have the desire to do right. Have we any evidence whatever that the Indians, especially those who are living on a reserve and are separated to a great extent from the rest of the community, are desirous mainly of the public good? What is there to induce them to act in concert with the rest of their fellow citizens throughout the rest of the Dominion, and in the interest of the country? We have it laid down as a law by Bailley, that: "Any part of a community that may be separated from the rest—any body of men, however large or however small, will prefer its own interest to that of the whole when these two interests interfere with each other." Is it likely that the interest of the public and the interest of the Indians on the reserves will be identical for many years? Is it not rather likely that the two will interfere? Do we not know that the impression of the white people is that these reserves and the Indians upon them are a great drawback to the advancement of civilisation and commerce? Are not our people anxious these tribal relations should be broken up and the Indians now on the reserve be scattered, and become mingled with the community at large, and those tracts which are now almost unproductive be made to blossom as a rose, and become equal in value with the surrounding country? For many years to come, so long as these reserves are upheld, a diversity of interests will exist between the Indians and the whites, and so long these men, whom we are now about to constitute voters, will act in their own individual interest and not in the interest of the public at large. Hon, gentlemen opposite are no doubt much disappointed at the continuation of the debate, but many on this side are likewise disappointed. I say the First Minister is responsible for its continuation. Before he placed the amendment in your hands, Sir, he could have made such concessions as would have been acceptable to this House and to the country, for enough has been said to lead him to a correct conclusion as to the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides. Had he even shown a desire to meet the wishes of the House and the people, the debate would have ceased long ago; were the wishes of both sides consulted, the unanimous advice would be to strike out the Indian clause altogether and let the Indians become enfranchised through the only method by which we can enfranchise them. The Indian Act was intended for that very purpose; we have laid down the road by which the Indian can travel to the privilege which hon, gentlemen opposite are seeking to give him without an effort on his part, and when he will have reached that goal, we will have accomplished a double purpose. We will have given him the franchise which he can exercise with discretion and to the benefit of the country, and, to a certain extent, we will have rid ourselves of the difficulty and trouble of maintaining these reserves. I may say that the Indian Act might be amended. Let us adopt an easier method. By all means let us enfranchise the Indian and place upon him all the responsibilities of citizenship political affairs of the day at the ballot box, but whether before we entitle him to vote. There are many reasons against giving the tribal Indians that right; there are the difficulties that will occur at election times from these people taking part in elections, such as the danger of strong drink being distributed among them. We have two measures, both of which professedly are intended for the elevation of the Indians—the Indian Act and this Bill. The one tends to elevate the Indian in a particular sense, lift him up step by step from the foot of the ladder, until he becomes a true, genuine citizen of the country, when he will have conferred upon him, as a matter of course, the privilege of exercising the franchise. This Bill seems rather an instrument calculated to further degrade the Indians. It will not lift him up a single step, but will thrust upon him a responsibility he dare not and cannot exercise of his own free will. What a great contrast between the two measures. I have here a couple of articles written by different authors, which describe exactly the effect of the two. The following remarks from Baillie site has acted in this way. We know that the Ministerial aptly illustrates the Indian Act:

"Far from enslaving, it makes more and more free those on whom it is exercised; and in this respect it differs wholly from the vulgar sway which ambition thirsts for. It awakens a kindred power in others, calls their faculties into new life, and particularly strengthens them to follow their own deliberate convictions of truth and duty. It breathes conscious energy, self-respect, moral independence, and a scorn of every foreign yoke."

That explains the aim and result of the Indian Act, if carried to its legitimate conclusion; but the Bill we are now considering is aptly described in the words of Dr. Channing:

"There is another power over man very different from this; a power, not to quicken and relevate, but to crush and subdue; a power which robs men of the free use of their nature, takes them out of their own hands, and compels them to bend to another's will. This is the sway which men grasp at most eagerly, and which it is our great purpose to expose. To reign, to give laws, to clothe their own wills with omnipotence, to annihilate all other wills, to spoil the individual of that self direction which is his most precious right—this has ever been deemed, by multitudes, the highest prize for competition and conflict. The most envied men are those who have succeeded in prostrating multitudes, in subjecting whole communities to their single will. It is the love of this power, in all its forms, which we are anxious to hold up to reprobation. If any crime should be placed by society beyond pardon, it is this."

Here, I think, we have a brief and apt description of the intent and purpose and aims of the two Bills which we have been considering in comparison with each other. Let us amend or enlarge the Indian Act, so that we can carry out the purpose for which it was enacted, and leave the enfranchisement of the Indian where it was left when that Act was placed on the Statute Book, and when they have gone up grade by grade and arrived at the true status of a citizen they will obtain the franchise and be able to exercise it with benefit to himself and the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). This question, it may be admitted by all parties, has been pretty fully discussed, at least on this side of the House. There can be no doubt in the minds of the people that the Opposition have endeavored to do their duty in this matter. Parliament is supposed to be a deliberative body. It is supposed that the gentlemen who are sent here to represent the people will express their opinions on the various subjects which are brought up for discussion, but during this debate we have had a peculiar spectacle presented to the people. We have had introduced one of the most important measures ever proposed since Confederation, and we have on record the opinion expressed by the Premier himself, that this Act was of such great importance that it would require the whole of one Session to discuss it properly. In the face of that statement, we are perfectly justified in discussing it clause by clause; but I fail to understand why it is that hon, gentlemen who sit on the other side are so loath to express their opinions on this important question, and how they can justify their course in studiously remaining silent. Occasionally, goaded on by the arguments and the taunts which have been | Columbia. If we want any more evidence of this, we have thrown at them from this side of the House, they have it in the fact that the First Minister has come down here endeavored to say something in justification of the Bill, to-day with an amendment which excludes Manitoba, Kee-but in all the speeches I have heard and read from that side they have studiously avoided coming to the discussion of the question before the House. They have attempted, in their own way, to make the country believe that the views expressed by the Opposition are not sound, and the Government press, in the Province of Ontario, at least, have taken the same position; they have refused to publish the actual facts in connection with this measure, or to give the Bill itself, and they have misrepresented the arguments presented in this House, and the statements made by the Premier in introducing this measure. They have persisted in publishing statements which have been proved to be false on the floor of the House, and by the Opposition press in their contentions with the Government organs. I do not wonder that that portion of the press which voices the sentiments of gentlemen oppopress is a subsidised press; that it is not a free press; that the organs of the Government are bought up by the money which belongs to the people of this country; that they are, like the Indians, the wards of the Government, sustained by the pap which is fed to them by the Government; that they meet around the Government table, and pick up the crumbs scattered to them from time to time. The Government press of this country is not free. It is bound in the same shackles which bind the Indians, to whom this Bill proposes to give votes, and, therefore, it does not voice the sentiments of the people. I sen glad to know there are some independent Conservatives in this country, who have signed petitions expressing disapprobation of this measure. I know that this fact has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among gentlemen opposite, who have seen these petitions presented day after day, and have been convinced that there is a feeling aroused throughout this Dominion which will tell upon Notwithstanding all the statements that these signatures have been placed there without authority, in fact, that they have been forged, hon. gentlemen are, no doubt, uncomfortable in their positions. They know, after examining those petitions, that names of many prominent Conservatives in several constituencies are to be found appended to them. The day will come when they will have to give an account of their stewardship, and will have to show why they have sat there in dumb silence when such an important measure has been under discussion-why they have refused to open their mouths, either by the agreement come to in their caucus or the mandate given forth by the First Minister, which compels them to remain silent. They are not worthy representatives of a free people in a country possessed of free institutions and a free government. They are not mon worthy of being entrusted with the task of representing free constituencies, men who dare not lift up their voices in justification of the course they are pursuing. Do we find the First Minister attempting to justify this section of the Bill? Not a bit of it. We find he pretends that he is making a concession, and he gets up in the House and announces that after weeks and weeks of consideration of this important Indian clause he has come to the conclusion that he will make some alteration in the original Bill. But does he make any statements to justify the change, or to justify giving the vote to the Indians at all? Not one word in justification either of the change or of the original proposition to give all the Indians of the Dominion a vote. I contend that the Government supporters and the Government organs may say what they please with regard to this matter, but it is on the records of this House that the First Minister contemplated by the Bill, and the Bill shows it, giving votes to all the Indians throughout, not only the older Provinces, but the North-West Territories and British watin and the North-West Territories; and yet the newspapers supporting the Government have been stating for weeks past that the First Minister never contemplated passing such a measure as this, and I believe the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) read a statement from the Montreal Gazette to the same effect. All the organs of the Government must know that it was the original intention of the First Minister that all these Indians should be given Minister bringing down a proposition that Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West shall be exempted from the provisions of this Bill. Sir, we contend that the amendment is no improvement, so far as the older Provinces are concerned, on his original proposition; we find, in fact, that the amendment is even more objectionable, and I have no doubt it will be more objectionable to the country at large than the original Bill. The original Bill contemplated dividing up the reserve and giving votes to all the Indians on the reserve; but this amendment gives a vote agent. I would like to ask hon gentlemen opposite whether it is likely that the Indian agent will be found giving location tickets to bad Indians? because, I prethis country, who will not vote for constitutional Tory government, who will not vote for the perpetuation of the power of the right hon. gentleman and his supporters. I fancy that the Indians who will support the Government will be considered good this experiment. Indians, and will get their location tickets, and be entitled to vote. Therefore, I do not see that any concession has been made by the First Minister in this amendment. I have heard it sometimes remarked by hon. gentlemen opposite that no special advantage was proposed to be given to the Indians by giving them the vote. I do not know whether these hon, gentlemen believe that or not. I think my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has often contended that no advantage over other citizens would be given to the Indians in giving them a right to vote. Now, I think the facts are all against this assumption. I contend that every man in this country is entitled to a vote, and I believe it would have been better for the Dominion at large if we had adopted manhood suffrage than the provisions of this Bill. But, Sir, I am forced to the conclusion that this Indian clause is an effort to introduce class legislation here. The Act contemplates that the white man or the colored man shall be possessed of a certain property qualification to entitle him to vote. With regard to the Indian it is different. He is not responsible, in a great many ways, as the white or the colored man are responsible—he is not, in fact, a free agent at all, but is, to all intents and purposes, an infant in the eye of the law, and yet we are proposing to give these men votes in Dominion elections. The First Minister has often described them as wards of the Government. They are not considered fit to be entrusted with the management of their own affairs; they cannot control their own lands; they cannot rent their own farms; they have not sufficient enterprise, in many instances, to provide their own seed grain; and when it is given to them, as was stated here to day, they have not sense enough to put it into the earth, but prefer rather to eat it up. They are, according to the First Minister, unable to undertake the most simple form of municipal government, and yet should have sent him here to misrepresent them. he proposes to give them a vote, in order, as I believe, to swamp the votes of white men in some counties of this Dominion, especially in the Province of Ontario. And in other respects the Indian is not a free man. He is not required to do jury duty, and in that case the conclusion of the Government is a wise one, as no intelligent man in this country would desire to have his case tried before an Indian jury, for the simple reason that Indians, as a in saying I am accustomed to that. I do not trouble the Mr. Somenville (Brant).

rule, are not possessed of the necessary intelligence which would enable them to arrive at a proper conclusion with respect to any matter that might come under the consideration of any court. They are not responsible in other ways. They are not in a position to be sued. If they contract a debt, no one can recover. They are not, even in this respect, on the same level as your own child, because, if a white man's child contracts a votes, but not enfranchised. But to-day we find the First debt, the father may be made responsible. But these Indians, who are not responsible for any debts they may contract, are to be entrusted with votes, while our boys, now fighting for the liberties of the people in the North-West, who may be over 18 years of age, are not entrusted with that power. Those young men have undertaken responsibilities which are greater than any which the Indians are required to assume. Furthermore, I wish to note the fact that a large number of intelligent citizens of this country will be disfranchised by this Bill. This, of course, is denied by some hon, gentlemen opposite, and by some of the organs of the to the men who obtain a location ticket from the Indian Government. But I noticed the other day a report of a meeting held at Brantford, where careful calculations had been made as to the number of mechanics and other laboring men in that city who would be disfranchised by this Bill. sume the agent will think that all the Indians are bad who I suppose the calculation was correct, or it would not have will not vote for the representative of the Great Mother in been made at a public meeting, at which parties in favor of the chised, while the Government proposes to enfranchise the tribal Indians on the reserves. We have had the statement of the representative of East Toronto (Mr. Small), that the Bill will not disfranchise more than 50 of the Toronto volunteers in the North-West. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what right he has to disfranchise even 50 voters? What will the people think of their representative, when he rises in this House and says the Bill will only disfranchise 50 volunteers in the North-West?

Mr. SMALL. The 50 volunteers to whom I referred would not have votes in consequence of being minors.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. gentleman said it would disfranchise them.

Mr. SMALL. No; of course not. They will have to be enfranchised first. But they will not have votes.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The statement of the hon. gentleman was, that only 50 volunteers of those now fighting in the North-West would be disfranchised by this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Every hon, gentleman knows that was his statement. He knows himself that was his statement. But the hon. gentleman now rises and endeavors to creep out of the difficulty in which he placed himself, by saying that they would not be disfranchised because they were not now enfranchised.

Mr. SMALL. I cannot make the hon. gentleman understand what I said.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Probably not. The utterances of the hon, gentleman are so hedged about that it is difficult for anyone to understand them. I am surprised that the people of East Toronto understood him, and that they

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. member must not say that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He misrepresents the volunteers, certainly. If, however, I have said anything unparliamentary, I am prepared to withdraw it.

Mr. SMALL. The hon. gentleman is accustomed to that. Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon, gentleman is mistaken House frequently, and so the hon. gentleman cannot say to what I am accustomed.

Mr. SMALL. I have heard you talking a great deal of rubbish.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. member for Algoma stated, with a good deal of force, that the Indians are brave Is that any reason why they should be given a vote? The Zulus of Africa are brave men, and they showed bravery in all engagements with British forces. I see no reason why, because Indians show bravery, they should be given the vote. Then the hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) went on to take the same line of argument that organs of the Government have taken, that it never was the intention of the Government to give a vote to the wild Indians of the west, which, I think, has been satisfactorily explained already. But I should like to call the hon, gentleman's attention to the fact that in Ontario we have some Indians who may be said to be yet wild Indians. There is a large number of pagan Indians on the Grand River, men who are not civilised in any way whatever; but they are said to be more trustworthy than some of the civilised Indians. They, no doubt, have holdings and pieces of land which they cultivate, and on which they live, and according to the statement of the hon gentleman, they should be entitled to vote. They are not quite so savage as some of the Indians who have taken up arms in the North-West, but there are quite a number of such Indians in one of the best districts of Ontario. Then I find the hon. gentleman referring to the New Brunswick Indians. The hon, member for Algoma has said they have been degraded by the white men.

Mr. DAWSON. I said they were so represented by one of the representatives of New Brunswick.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. If the statement was not correct the hon, gentleman should not have repeated it here. It must have been correct, or the hon, gentleman would not have said they were degraded if they were not degraded. The hon, gentleman is willing to have those degraded Indians vote. I do not think he can justify this proceeding.

Mr. DAWSON. I said the representatives said that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. gentleman assumed from the statement made that it was correct. If the degraded Indians are to be given votes in New Brunswick and the West how can the hon, member for Algoma justify that position?

Mr. DAWSON. I did not say that. I said if it was correct it afforded very good ground for our believing why a different system should be adopted.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in a short speech, talked very eloquently about some Indian chief at Caughnawaga, who was an enterprising man and able to manage his own affairs. There are, of course, some exceptional cases where Indians are possessed of intelligence and are capable of doing business and managing their own affairs. When they reach such a condition they should step out of the Indian reserve and become free citizens of a free country, and then they should be properly enfranchised, and would have to assume all the responsibilities of white men. But I do not think it is right, Sir, that one single Indian should be selected out of a band, or that a certain number of Indians out of the whole Indian population of the Dominion should be selected as a justification for the proposition that all Indians should be given votes. And then, as a sample of the intelligence of these Indians, whom this House now proposes to enfranchise, I might refer to what was stated by the hon. member for East Grey, in a short speech which he delivered here the other evening:

"In the election before last, in the Muskoka district, the timber inspector there, who supported Mr. Mowat's candidate, went out among the Indians, and it was currently reported, and I believe correctly, that he bought up nearly all the Indians in the district, collected them all in one place, and took them to the polls and got them to vote. After that he took the Indians away, took their dresses from them and put them on the squaws, and took them in, and got them to poll their votes."

Now, are those the kind of voters we want in this country? Are those the kind of voters the hon, member for Cardwell would like to have?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I can tell the hon. member that it was just such voters that defeated me in Montreal—voters by the telegraph system, as it was called, where people changed their dresses and voted as other people.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Were they Indians?

Mr. WHITE. No; white people.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Did the men put their clothes on the women, and did the women vote? I think, Sir, if the women of Montreal voted against the hon. gentleman they showed their good sense, but I doubt if they were so degraded as to dress themselves in men's clothing and go to the polls, and put in their votes against the hon. gentleman. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, assuming that his statement is correct—and not knowing the facts, I assume it is correct—is that any justification for him giving those men votes who have been degraded to such a degree—the voters in the district of Algoma?

Mr. DAWSON. Not Algoma-Muskoka.

Mr. SOMERVILLH. Yes, Muskoka. You have a particular regard for Algoma. I would ask the hon. member for Cardwell if he can justify, before the House and the country, or before the electors of Cardwell, the proposition to give votes to the class of people whose actions have been described by the hon, member for East Grey.

Mr. HESSON. Who was most to blame, the Indians or Mowat's white men?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon, gentleman is awfully troubled about Mr. Mowat. If there is anything he dislikes it is the name of Mowat.

Mr. BEATY. It is a mote in his eye.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is well to see that some of the hon. gentlemen representing Toronto are waking up. We have had two speeches from them to night, one from the hon. member for East Toronto, and the other by the hon. member for West Toronto, the latter being a joke, or an attempt at a joke. I would just say that it is rather surprising that the name of Mr. Mowat should have such a baneful influence on hon. gentlemen opposite, whenever it is mentioned in a discussion here. They seem to think that he is capable of doing all that it is possible to do in Ontario. I know that their leader has assumed, in times past, that he was a greater constitutional lawyer than Mr. Mowat, but the courts of this country, and of the old country, have decided that Mr. Mowat is the greater constitutional lawyer.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman is getting very far away from the question.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I will try to get back to the Indians, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Get back to the squaws.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Perhaps you have some Indians in your county, and you will be getting back to the squaws. Among the hon, members of the House who are heartily in accord with the Premier in regard to this Bill, we find the hon, member for East Hastings, who is very anxious that the Bill should pass. He has substantial reasons for desiring that the Bill should pass. He is one of the men representing the Conservative side in this House, who are bold enough to say that he believes in the provisions of this Bill, and that the Indians should have votes. And why? ply because there is, in his constituency, a band of Indians, and in that constituency there are a large number of Orange lodges, which are mainly composed of Indians. There are Orange lodges composed entirely of Indians, and we all know the hon, member for East Hastings is a bright and shining light in the Orange order. No doubt it would be very convenient for him to go out on the Indian reserve in his constituency at election time and address his brethren in his regalfa. No doubt it would be inspiring to them, that their representative in Parliament should come and address them in their lodges, and try to induce them to vote for himself, as the Government candidate, in any election which might take place there. But it is well to inquire what the First Minister expects to gain by the passage of this Indian clause of his Franchise Bill. Does he introduce it from patriotic motives? Is it from a desire to elevate the Indian and make him a better man and a better citizen? I think it must be perfectly clear to the mind of every gentleman in this House that no such reason actuates the First Minister in introducing this clause. I am satisfied that there are not half a dozen gentlemen supporting him who believe that he is actuated by any such desire. I am satisfied they do not believe it, simply because they do not get up here and express their opinion in support of this Bill, and because the First Minister does not himself say so. I am forced, therefore, to the conclusion that he does not care for the elevation of the Indian, that he does not hope to raise him out of the serfdom which he is placed under, as a ward of the Government, dependent on the generosity and, in many cases, the charity of the Government. His idea in introducing this clause is of another character altogether. He knows that with his local agent and his revising barrister he will be able to secure on all the reserves of this Dominion the almost solid vote of the Indians; and this is his only and sole object in introducing this clause into this Bill. He says he was only imitating the example set by the Hon. Oliver Mowat, the Premier of Ontario, in doing so. Now, I want to read the enactment of the Ontario law with regard to this, to show that the enfranchisement of the Indians by the two Acts is not placed on the same basis. (The hon, gentleman read from the law referred to). I contend that there is no similarity between the provisions of the Ontario Act and those of this Bill with regard to the enfranchising of the Indians; and the statement of the First Minister that he was simply adopting the enactment of Mr. Mowat cannot be substantiated or justified, for the for the first time in the history of the world, a measure of simple reason that it is not founded upon fact. Then, we are told that by this amendment the Indian who resides on a reserve, and who has improvements to the value of $150, and a location ticket, is to be entitled to vote; but I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that on a large number of the reserves in Ontario the improvements have been made, even the houses and the fences have been built, by and at the expense of the Government. These improvements are not the improvements made by the Indians themselves, but are made at the expense of the people of this country, for infants under the care and management of the Indian agent; and therefore an Indian in those circumstances does not occupy the same position as another elector of the country, who has made his own improvements on his own property. There is not much difficulty in discovering the motive which has actuated the hon. First Minister in seeking to give votes to all the Indians of the Dominion, except those of Manitoba and the North-West. There are fifteen counties in Ontario alone which will be more or less affected by this Indian vote. There are a number of gentlemen who occupy seats in this House and who give a vigorous opposition occasionally to the measures proposed by the Government, whose positions Mr. Somenville (Brant).

will be endangered by this provision; and no doubt the motive of the First Minister was not to elevate the Indians or to place them in a better position to secure the rights and privileges of the white man, but to try to defeat several of the gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches in this House; and I would like to ask how such a course can be justified? I think I can demonstrate to this House that the liberties of the entire people of this Dominion may be injured, the very expression of their opinion may be thwarted by giving votes to the Indians on the reserves. Suppose that after the next general election parties come to this House about equally divided; suppose the First Minister comes back here with only two or three of a majority, though I fancy he will not have that, and suppose this Bill is passed in the meantime, and the Indians on the reserves are enfranchised: I would like to ask this House if it is not manifest that the whole freedom of the citizens of this country may be injured by this Bill; they would have obtained their small majority through the influence of the Indian vote, and thereby be enabled to retain power and place here against the will of the great majority of the white voters of this Dominion. They would be robbing the free citizens of this country of the right to say who should be the members of the Government to control the affairs of this country and who should represent them in this Parliament. In that case, I would like to ask if the voice and the free will of the people of this Dominion would not be subverted by this Bill. Could the Czar of Russia introduce a more tyrannical measure than this? I would like to know if the hon, gentleman has any right to endanger the whole electorate of this Dominion by such a measure as this, in order to bolster up the party in power. I believe in party government; I believe that in this country, as well as in others possessing representative institutions, we must have government by party; but I fail to see where party government is in existence at the present time. It is a one-man Government we have here, as clearly evinced in the discussion of this measure. The supporters of the First Minister have taken no part in the discussion whatever; the First Minister introduced a Bill, he decided it should be put through, and his supporters will come to his rescue, no doubt, when the vote takes place; but I believe there is a day of retribution coming, I believe the time will come when these men will have to stand before their electors and justify their course in this House in supporting this monstrous proposition to give votes to the wards of the Government and give them the opportunity of out-voting the free citizens of the Dominion. I would like to ask how it is that, this kind has been introduced here? In no country enjoying responsible government has the vote been given to the Indians. In the United States no attempt has ever been made to give them votes, although in many of the older States there are bands of Indians just as intelligent as any we have in our Provinces. There has been no party man or statesman in the American Republic who has ever dared to outrage the people of that country by attempting to grant the suffrage to the Indians on reserves. We all know the course pursued by the First Minister at former elections, in order that he might retain place and power; but in introducing this measure, and in forcing his supporters to vote it through, he has excelled himself. His supporters have not had the courage to stand up like men and express their reasons for the vote they propose to give; they have not stood up like representatives of a free people and attempted to argue against the propositions laid down and sustained so ably by hon. gentlemen on this side; and I say it is a shame that men who come here to represent the people should sit here, as they have sat for weeks past, not daring to open their mouths. They sit there quietly, occupying the position of serfs.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The word is not parliamentary.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not want to say anything offensive to hon, gentlemen opposite; they are really not serfs, I believe, and I will call them simply a mechanical majority. They believe, with the hon, member for King's (Mr. Foster), that it is the duty of gentlemen who represent the constituencies of the Dominion to come here merely for the purpose of recording the will of the Premier or the will of the Government. But I think that hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have some respect for themselves and some respect for their constituencies, and ought to discuss this as intelligent men; they ought to have some respect for the electors who sent them here. If they had, they would express their opinions on this Indian clause. The men who sent them here will require some explanation at their hands. I do not believe that the members on this side could be induced to support any Government, or the leader of any Government, who introduced any such outrageous proposition as this; I believe there is an independent feeling amongst the Reform representatives in this House, which precludes the possibility of their supporting anything of the kind. Further, I do not believe that any Reform leader would introduce any such outrageous proposition. No intelligent elector in this Dominion, Conservative or Reformer, will justify this measure. We have had expressions of opinion from Independent Conservatives and Liberal Conservatives and Conservatives pure and simple, who have declared, by signing the petitions sent here, that they are not prepared to uphold the Government in enacting this measure. The people should be consulted before such a measure as this is made law. We are not afraid to go to the people; we are anxious to go; we believe the people are not prepared to sustain this Government in this outrageous attempt to thwart the will of the people; we would be only too glad if the First Minister would dissolve this House to-morrow and go to the country, and I am satisfied that not only on this Bill, but on all other subjects, the First Minister would find he is not sustained by the people. It is somewhat strange that the First Minister should claim that this measure is a reform measure; it would be strange, indeed, if a reform measure should emanate from the leader of the Government or his colleagues. The history of the world indicates that reforms have been fought for always by Reformers, and any reforms which the people have secured have been secured through the exertions of the Reformers. But I fancy this is merely a pretence of the Government to protect themselves before the electorate. I fancy that the indignation of the people of Canada will be widespread with regard to this outrageous proposition, and that the meetings which have been held in a large number of the towns and cities of Ontario indicate only a tithe of the feeling which is spreading through the Dominion in regard to it. I am satisfied that if the Government does not retrace its steps and withdraw this Bill, or take out the obnoxious clauses before the House rises a wave of indignation will spread throughout the Dominion, and the gentlemen on the Treasury benches will yet discover that they have made a mistake in attempting, by this Bill, to strengthen their power and injure the freedom of the citizens of this country, by giving a vote to tribal Indians, who are not capable of managing their own affairs, and who, in ninetynine cases out of every hundred, are not sufficiently intelli-gent to mark their ballots, and who will be directly under the control of the Government agent and the revising barrister. If time would permit, thousands more would sign petitions against the passage of this Bill; but I hope that good sense will yet prevail, and that the Government will see they are not justified in pursuing the course they have adopted. How is it that no members of the Government, except the First Minister, have said anything in justification of this measure? We know they are capable justification of this measure? We know they are capable of doing so if they could justify it, and I am forced to the member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), who has resided among conclusion that they cannot justify it, and I believe they will find at the next election that the people cannot be induced, by the bonds of party allegiance, to forget their manhood and desert those principles of justice which every free man ought to uphold.

Mr. TROW. Every member ought to enter his protest against this measure, which has probably created more excitement throughout the country than any which has emanated from the Government during its career. The numerous petitions which we receive are signed, evidently, by members of both political parties. This has been denied by some hon, gentlemen opposite; but I can vouch for the fact that those I have received from my constituency are signed by many leading Conservatives. I have no doubt that, if the Government persist in pushing this measure through this House, they will lose prestige with the people. I do not know but that the Opposition, in discussing this measure, is conducting a political contest much cheaper than they could in going round their respective counties. This discussion has been confined almost entirely to members of the Opposition. It is an unfair fight—a one-sided fight.

Mr. BOWELL. You cannot complain, if you have it all your own way.

Mr. TROW. We should not have it our own way.

Mr. BOWELL. Your leader did not say so.

Mr. TROW. My hon, friend, the Minister of Customs, who has so much debating ability, when he was on this side of the House would not allow any measure to pass without having a fling at its promoters. The hon, gentleman who just took his seat said hon, gentlemen opposite were a servile following. I do not wish to say that, but they are an obedient following. I do not know that there is any man in the Dominion or on the continent of America who has so much control over his followers as Sir John Macdonald has. I have known him in this debate to raise his hand when an hon. gentleman got up to speak, and he fell down instantaneously, as if he was shot. There was no displeasure; it was simply a jack-in-the-box; it was instantaneously and effectively done. It is surprising that they have not a spirit of independence, that they do not say: This is a measure which affects my riding; petitions have been sent in, signed by supporters of mine, and I must speak and explain my views in reference to it. I have noticed many hon. gentlemen who have attempted to speak, but they dare not. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who is a very fluent and flowery speaker, is very anxious to bear his part in the discussion, but he is dumb, like the rest. I am surprised, also, that the Conservative press is so reticent of late. You will find that that end of the gallery, which is usually filled by reporters in the Conservative interest, has been vacated.

An hon. MEMBER. Talked to death.

Mr. TROW. They have nothing to do. They are lying dormant. There is no item of news in the Conservative press in reference to the Franchise Bill. They are anxious for some information; they are anxious for the hon. gentlemen who represent their views here to express themselves on the floor of the House. There are two sides to every question. The Bill before the House is revolutionary in its nature, and ought never to be brought before this Parliament without first having been pronounced upon by the people. It has not been asked for by anyone, that I have heard of.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman will please confine himself to the motion before the House, and not discuss the Bill.

the Indians for half a century, and who understands them, if anybody does, says that the Indians having the same qualifications as the white men certainly should not be deprived of the franchise. Who is to be the valuator of their lands? An Indian having three or four acres of improved land certainly would be valued by the Indian agent at $150, so that all Indians on the reserve would be qualified to vote. It would not exclude any Indian, so far as I know. At the same time, their relations with the Government are such that they would vote as the agent dictated to them. Probably ninety-nine out of every hundred of them cannot write, and they would have to go before the agent or the deputy returning officer and ask which way they should vote. Of course, he, as their instructor, as their father confessor, almost, would naturally advise them to vote with the Government of the day. We find by the reports that even the Indians who, by having a few acres of improved land, would be qualified to vote, are not proper parties to be entrusted with the franchise, the dearest right that any Briton can possess. I will read a few lines from the Indian report of the First Minister. (The hon. gentleman read from the report concerning the Chippewa bands on Lake Huron, showing their indifference to the school facilities provided for their children. He also read from the report concerning the condition of the Indians of Vancouver Island, and the immorality prevailing amongst them.) The hon member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) stated that the half-breeds of Manitoba, properly speaking, were Indians. I am surprised that he made that statement, because he has been in Manitoba, and must know that the half-breeds, as a rule, are educated, and most of them are agriculturists. They are not wards of the Government, and are entirely different from the Indians whom the First Minister wishes to enfranchise. Numerous meetings have been held throughout the country to protest against the passing of this Bill. We find that on Saturday night last a very large mass meeting was held in the city of Montreal, attended by over 3,000 people.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). About 175.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Three hundred.

Mr. TROW. The paper says there were over 3,000 electors present, of all shades of politics, who were unanimous in condemning the Bill. Meetings were also held at Ingersol and at Embro. I think it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to use their influence with the First Minister to induce him to modify the Bill, especially in one or two particulars. It is an extraordinary fact that the First Minister has not met the Opposition at the general elections since Confederation in a fair fight. First, he spent money lavishly. Next, it was misrepresentation. Next, by cutting and carving 50 or 60 different ridings. His present object is to take charge of the voters' lists, to give revising barristers an opportunity of putting on such voters as they please. We consider it our duty to fight this matter out manfully. are satisfied there is a piece of leaven that is leavening the whole lump; that the discussions here have convinced many of the Conservative voters in South Perth; and that, as regards North Perth, in view of the petition I presented to-day and the petition I presented a few days ago, the case of the present representative of that riding is hopeless. The measure should be withdrawn.

Mr. HESSON. I wish to refer briefly to the remarks made by the last speaker. The hon, gentleman has referred to the petition he presented from North Perth, which he thinks goes to prove that Conservatives are largely petitioning the House. I cannot allow the matter to pass without entering my protest against the hon gentleman's state question; they speak of the followers of the Government ments. I think I know the electors of Stratford, after a being dumb, of their being servile followers, and they Mr. TROW.

although he formerly lived at Shakespeare. I have gone carefully through the list he presented from Stratford, on which there were 163 names, after the petition had been peddled round from house to house and from hotel to hotel—I know all about it because I spent a week at home, and the hon. gentleman did nothing of the kind-and I find only nine names which I would pronounce as those of Conservatives out of the whole 163. If I wrote to each of those gentlemen, they would respectively give very good reasons why they signed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HESSON. Those reasons would be very good on their side, but not in justification of the Reform party, whose members pressed them to sign. With respect to the whole petitions presented by the hon. gentleman, I find but nine Conservatives out of 574 electors. I do not pretend to say that those gentlemen had not some reasonable cause urged upon them; but every one of them who signed it would not only be willing to sign a petition to send the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) to Batouche's Crossing, or anywhere else, but also to transport the whole Grit party out of the House. I must confess that I never saw more indignation expressed by intelligent electors than I met with on my journey, and especially during the week I spent in my own town—expressions almost of contempt, for the manner in which the House was spending its time, and the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite were wasting the time of the House, causing expense to the people, and inconvenience to the business men of Canada, simply because the Government were discharging their duty, in bringing down a Bill entirely within their power and jurisdiction. Yet hon, gentlemen opposite expected that the country was going to rise in arms and express terrible indignation. The hon gentleman speaks of meetings that have been held, but what are those meetings? There is one city of 9,000 inhabitants in the county of Perth, and they have not had sufficient indignation to get up a meeting, and the same is true of every town and township in the county the hon. gentleman represents. Now, if that is evidence of indignation with this Bill, I am at a loss to know what indignation really means. The hon, gentleman has referred to meetings held elsewhere. Well, if he had read the Mail of to-day he would have seen an account of a meeting which was not quite according to his mind. It is headed "A Grit Indignation Meeting closes with cheers for Sir John." I do not think we will object to that kind of meeting, especially when I inform you it was attended by Mr. Preston, the paid agent of the Reform party, who travels throughout the country, as the agents of the Farmer's Union did, to stir up indignation and misrepresent the case to those who did not read the matter for themselves, and had not heard it explained. We find that the paid agent of the Reform party was sent down to Ridgetown, where he called a meeting to misrepresent the case.

Mr. DAVIES. What were the misrepresentations?

Mr. HESSON. It was represented there that an attempt was made to enfranchise the Indians of the North-West.

Mr. DAVIES. And was not that attempted at first?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why is there an amendment excluding them?

Mr. HESSON. It is too late in the day to utter such statements to the people. I believe the electors of Canada understand the question, because the press has discussed it; but hon gentlemen were not satisfied with that. They complain that hon, gentlemen on this side have chosen to sit still and allow them a full opportunity of debating this question; they speak of the followers of the Government residence there of over forty years, as well as does the hon. apply to them nearly all the harsh names they can find in gentleman, who has only latterly gone to reside there, their vocabulary, because we allow them to debate this question undisturbed. The reason we did not engage in the discussion was not because we could not find something in favor of the Bill, not because the Government had not a right to pass the Bill, not because they had not fully considered every clause, though changes might be found desirable as the Bill proceeded. The Government have never proposed to legislate for the whole people, without consulting them, they do consult their friends from time to time, and that is what has made them strong in the House, and strong in the confidence of the people behind them. Now, with regard to the challenge of the hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), to appeal to the people, we have, in our recollection, challenges of that kind made on former occasions, when hon, gentlemen had to go to the country a year too soon for them, and I do not think they had much to boast of.

Mr. PATERSON. You gerrymandered the country.

Mr. HESSON. They had nothing to boast of, and when they came back, they came back, if not in a smaller minority, at least not in increased numbers. .I do not suppose it is the duty of the Government to dissolve the House at the will of any particular individual in this House, but hon. gentlemen seem to think that they alone represent the will of the people of Canada, and that really we had no right here except to listen to them. Now, that we listen quietly, now that the press has been quiet, though their own papers have not been silent, why should they complain if the Government is going to do something which is to prove so disastrous to the country, and especially to the Conservative party; and if Conservatives are signing these petitions, it is the very thing which should gratify them. We are silent, and Ministers are silent, because the Minister in charge of the Bill has, I think, in sufficiently clear language for the comprehension of any hon. gentleman, explained his views. I do not think the Bill required much explanation, because each clause explains itself as it goes on. I rose to say, with regard to these petitions, that I have looked over the names carefully, and that I know the names of the electors as well as the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) does, and that I challenge him to a test in that matter. I do not think hon. gentlemen on this side should be lectured as we have been, night after night, because we chose to sit silently and allow hon, gentlemen opposite to have the time they desire, because we treat them in a courteous manner, although every one of them, almost, without exception, has been called to order during the discussion. The hon, gentleman says "no," but if he will look at Hansard he will find that not only has the Chairman called them to order, but that they have been called to order by hon, gentlemen on this side, who felt their temper riled by the remarks that have been made by hon, gentlemen opposite throughout this long debate.

Mr. McMULLEN. Had the hon. member for North Perth delivered his speech a little earlier in the discussion, possibly it might have deterred hon, members on this side from proceeding further. His remarks have shown pointedly the position which hon gentlemen opposite are disposed to take with regard to this measure. He stated that when he was at home he found a unanimous condemnation of the course adopted by the Opposition. Well, I must say that it is the first time that we have heard of any announcement of that kind; and possibly, had he gone to the Opposition and quietly whispered about the indignation he found in the country, without exposing us to the House, we might have quietly with drawn from the discussion, and not made a further exhibition of ourselves to the country and to the House. However, I think the duty performed by the Opposition, so far, in place of being condemned by the people of this Dominion has been fully appreciated by them. It has been said that a great deal of time has been taken up by us, and tioned the number of times that one hon, member addressed the House on this and, I believe, a number of other questions. Hon. gentlemen opposite were once in Opposition, and I have quietly looked over the discussions of 1877 and 1878, to see how much time they occupied. I find that the Minister of Customs addressed the House in 1877, 110 times, and in 1878, 95 times; Sir Charles Tupper, in 1877, addressed the House 158 times, and in 1878, 144 times; the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) spoke, in 1877, 148 times, and in 1878, 112 times; the hon. First Minister, himself, thought it necessary, as leader of the Opposition, to address the House, in 1877, 253 times, and in 1878, 129 times; and the Minister of Public Works was not silent on these occasions, either, but in 1878 addressed the House 129 times. So that hon gentlemen opposite, when they felt it their duty to oppose the measures before the House, did not hesitate to take up the time of the House; but because we feel it our duty, on this occasion, to offer our objections and criticisms, they say it is obstruction.

Mr. HESSON. Would the hon gentleman allow me to say that when I referred to the number of times an hon. member addressed this House it was on one single Bill, on which he spoke seventy-three times. If I had taken the trouble to ascertain the number of times he and others addressed the House during the whole Session, the number would have been very much larger.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have been giving our opinion on two very important questions—the enfranchisement of civil servants and the enfranchisement of the Indians. I took occasion, when this Bill was introduced, to warn the Government of the extended discussion which would, no doubt, take place on a measure of this kind. I think there is no question that could be introduced into Parliament more likely to secure extended discussion than one relating to the franchise. It affects every man who sits in this House, and it is one in which the people are deeply interested. In England, when measures relating to the franchise are brought forward, they are discussed at great length, and it should certainly be expected that these criticisms would take place in this country upon a Bill of such an important character. If you should take one of the shorthand reporters out to a private room with the members who are supporting the Government, and ask them to state privately what their views are with regard to the intention of the First Minister as to the enfranchisement of the Indians, and what they said was taken down and published, I venture to say that it would be the most ridiculous exposure of their views in connection with that matter that could be conceived of; because I do not believe there are half a dozen men on the Government side who can give a clear and distinct statement of what the First Minister means by this measure. He stated, at one time, that he intended to enfranchise all the Indians of the North-West: he afterwards withdrew from that position, and now he confines the enfranchisement to the Indians of the older Provinces and those of British Columbia. I understood that one of the members stated that it was not the intention to enfranchise the Indians of British Columbia; but I see nothing in the amendment to show me that that statement is true. We have been creeping from one point to another, and changes have been made in the Bill continuously. It is difficult to state what further amendments may not yet be made. The hon. First amendments may not yet be made. The hon. First Minister has not yet, evidently, settled in his own mind what he intends on this whole question. Perhaps it is because the Opposition have so intelligently discussed the question that he has obtained light upon it. I would like to see a question of the importance of this question fully and fairly discussed on all sides; and I have felt somewhat surprised that the followers of the Government the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) men- have, from day to day, declined to raise their voices in support of the possition taken by the First Minister. Perhaps they do not agree with the views he holds, or else they have decided to place the matter entirely in his charge, and allow him simply to carry the Bill, with whatever amendments he thinks proper to introduce, and then do as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) says, register the will of the Government. Now, there are two great objections to the enfranchisement of the Indians. In the first place, they are absolutely and completely under the control of the Superintendent General, and in the next place they will be absolutely under the control of the revising If they are to be permitted to vote at all on a portion of the reserve, it will be through the kindness and assistance of the Superintendent General. Their names will not be on the assessment roll, because they will not be taxed; and they will only be put on the voters' list through the operations of the Superintendent General and the revising barrister. It is very easy for any person, knowing the influence the Superintendent General exercises over them, to tell how these people will probably vote. I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that they will only be granted their privilege of voting because they will be expected to give their votes to the Government in power. It is extremely objectionable that any percentage of electors should be placed in that position. If there is anything that we should hold sacred and dear, it is the right of the franchise to be exercised by a free and independent people, without danger of its being overbalanced by the votes of those whom the Government control. There is no necessity why we should so far depart from the ordinary course followed in enfranchising the people of the Dominion. Judging from the reports, those Indians are only a class of semi-civilised creatures, not possessed of the education or information sufficient to enable them intelligently to discharge the duties of electors. What appears to be exceedingly ridiculous in the whole proceeding is, that this Bill should exclude the sons of tenant farmers, intelligent young men, who have had the advantages of a liberal school education and have been brought up in a christian community, from the franchise, and give it to these untutored, semi-civilised, irresponsible beings. In the United States no Indian can vote who does not pay taxes and discharge the duties of an ordinary citizen; and, fulfilling those obligations, he is, as a matter of course, placed on a level with other people. The word "Indian" need not be used at all. It will be time enough for us to consider this Indian question when we will have manhood suffrage, which, perhaps, we will have before very long. But until we reach that point we should not pass a special clause giving the franchise to the Indians. The only conclusion we can arrive at with regard to this Bill is that it was introduced for a political purpose, that of strengthening the Government and weakening the Opposition. A device similar in its intent to this was adopted at the last elections, and now, before another general election, we find the Government taking this means to avoid defeat. It is the intention of the First Minister, I believe, to press this measure through at any cost, but if he thinks that we will at all weaken in the discharge of our duty he is greatly mistaken. At the last general election I heard it often said that the Opposition were charging the Government with acts which they did not charge against them on the floor of the House. As regards the Franchise Bill, we are determined that no such charge will be advanced, with the slightest basis for the assertion. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) urged that the Indians should be enfranchised, on the ground that many of them might have houses on the reserve, and might have made improvements on their lots to the extent of $150; but he omitted to mention that they pay upon. I desire the representatives from Quebec to undernot axes or assessments of any kind. Instead of thrusting upon these people the privilege of citizenship, we should has been introduced because the present Ontario Government try and raise them from the position they occupy, by educational influences; and then, when they showed their willingness to assume all the obligations, as well as enjoy all the privileges of citizenship, I would have no objection to give them votes. You might as well, in South Brant, for instance, say that 100 Conservatives, instead of having one ballot, should have two. Under the amendment introduced by the First Minister it would be possible to enfranchise every Indian living on a reserve in the older Provinces, and I have no doubt it is the intention to do that. The hon member for Cardwell, the other evening, stated it was only the intention to enfranchise Indians who held property separate altogether from reserves, but the member for Algoma says the amendment is to enfranchise Indians who live upon reserves and have improvements worth $150, over and above the property they hold. I should like to know which is right. We might know if the First Minister were here, but he is not, and we are talking to empty benches. Still, we shall continue to offer our objections. The First Minister's time may be taken up by other important measures, and I sympathise with him in that particular, but he should be here to listen to remonstrances from this side, and we should have a fair hearing for any amendments we have to propose. We have been offering amendments and making objections, but we have not been successful in getting any of our amendments accepted. I offered one myself.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I shall come to the Indian.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. You are going into the whole matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is very hard to confine us to the Indian, because we have not been successful in our amendments on other clauses. However, I shall refer to the Indian. We should educate the Indians to the standard of intelligence before we place the franchise in their hands. They will require, in many cases, to have their ballots marked for them, and if the subordinates of the Superintendent General are at the polls, is it not reasonable to sup-pose that the Indians will vote for the Government from whom they get their allowance every year. I would like to hear hon, gentlemen opposite give their reasons for supporting this Bill, but in place of that they pin themselves right down to the clause and shut their eyes to every objection. I would not like to say that the First Minister has gagged his followers; I am glad to say that there is at least one hon, gentleman who cannot be gagged, and that is the hon member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). He has broken through the rule to night and offered some remarks with regard to the Indians. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is also largely interested in the Indian question, as there are a good many of them in his constituency, and I should like very well to hear his views on the subject of giving them the franchise. I have been a good deal through the Algoma district, and I must say in all my travels I never met an Indian that I believe you could educate in half an hour what a vote was, let alone marking the ballot. They are people who never heard of such a thing, and I do not think they have any idea of the honor there is to be conferred upon them. I am sure that in place of their discharging the duty intelligently the revising barrister and Superintendent General will do the whole work for them. It is stated, with respect to the Indians, that on receiving potatoes for seed they planted them whole, and shortly afterwards dug them up and eat them. Yet it is proposed to enfranchise such Indians. Again, it has been found, with respect to Indians in the woods, that they cannot be depended has introduced a Bill to disfranchise a number of people in that Province. Such is not the fact, and the Mowat Bill has widely extended the suffrage. I was in Montreal on Saturday, and had an interview with a Conservative with respect to this Bill. He told me that the general feeling in Montreal among moderate Conservatives is antagonistic to the Bill. They were in favor of retaining the present franchise. In discussing this measure we are simply discharging our duty, and when our party come to occupy the Treasury benches we shall amend the Act in the way we have indicated.

Mr. MULOCK. I entirely agree with the sentiments which the hon. member for North Perth says were expressed by his constituents: that it is not in the interest of the country that the time of the House should be taken up by obstruction, or whatever it may be called, but this debate has been a most important one, dealing with a measure which is most unnecessary, and which should not, at all events, have been introduced at the time it was introduced. When the Indian clause was first introduced it proposed to give the franchise to every Indian possessing the necessary qualification, but as time went on various views were presented by various members. I will not raise any verbal criticism of the amendment, except with regard to this point: that I think the amendment will be open to the construction of enfranchising a whole band, merely because they jointly occupy a separate property, and that the whole band jointly have made improvements to the extent of $150, so that I think a verbal amendment is necessary to limit it in accordance with what appears to be the intention of the First Minister. The various changes which have been made in this Indian clause have, so far as they have gone, met the prejudices or criticisms which have been raised against the measure, but I am sorry to say that I cannot give my assent to the amendment. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. members as to property qualification, or manhood suffrage, I think all are agreed that it is most desirable that voters should possess some degree of intelligence and education, so that they may exercise the franchise wisely; and though it may be difficult to test such a qualification, yet in this Bill intelligence or education appears to have been left out of the question, and now an amendment is proposed, containing a general proposition which, I think, in its language, will overreach the object of the promoter of the Bill. I think it is impossible to enfranchise a class in this way and de justice. There are Indians and Indians. There are some Indians who are capable of exercising the franchise intelligently, and others who are not, but the amendment provides no means of discrimination. I refer for a moment to some remarks which were made last Session, and reported in Hansard, second volume, page 1110. (The hon. gentle-quoted from the debates in question). The hon. member for Northumberland, who speaks from a long experience, said he was not aware of a single Indian in the Province of New Brunswick who was to day able, intelligently, to exercise the franchise, and it is clear that the Indians of Nova Scotia, as a class, are not entitled to enjoy the franchise. On the same page of Hansard the Premier said, speaking of the Indians of British Columbia: (The hon. gentleman again quoted from Hansard). The hon. gentleman, then the Minister of Public Works, gave his opinion on the Indians on the 22nd of May, 1883—I read from Hansard, page 1376—referring principally to the Indians of the North-West:

"If you wish to educate these children you must separate them from their parents during the time they are educated. If you leave them in the family they may know how to read and write, but they still remain savages."

A year ago he told us that, and to-day he proposes to give them the franchise. In 1876 there was a Bill before the Bill, but we would not finally pass the 9th clause, in order House to consolidate the Indian Act; and the Premier, then that the next day, Saturday, the First Minister might make in Opposition, used these words in regard to the Indian race. I read from Hansard, page 1991, vol. 2:

"We have seen the Indian race improved by education, but you can not make the Indian a white man."

The Minister of Public Works endorsed that statement; and yet these Indians, who, in the opinion of the Government, were children in 1876 and savages in 1883, are, in 1885, to be put on a par with the white man. Now, I am going to read some extracts from the Indian report, to show the condition of the Indians in British Columbia and elsewhere. (The hon. gentleman read a number of extracts from the Indian report for 1884).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is time to adjourn.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Go on; it is early yet.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is a quarter past two. I think our constituents will feel that we have done our duty to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. And more than your duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Lost; carried.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the noes have it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think we could possibly get through to night. I know there are several other gentlemen who wish to speak on this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is the fifth week we have been discussing this measure, and the Indian question has been discussed, I think, three out of the five weeks. Then, again, there was a positive pledge made by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that this clause was to be voted on by Saturday night, and that we were to have the next clause, relating to revising barristers, on Tuesday morning. That arrangement has been shamelessly broken, in order that the hon, member for West Durham might make his speech to day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When was that arrangement made? Because I was present on Friday night, and I do not recollect that any agreement was made as to anything more than that two or three motions should be made, if the disqualification clauses were allowed to go on. Was this pledge made on Saturday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it was made on Friday night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But on Friday night I was present myself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman was not present when the arrangement was made between Mr. Mills and Sir Hector Langevin.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was here until the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, and I did not understand, certainly, that any arrangement was made as to taking the vote on the Indian question on Saturday.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, member for Bothwell, on Saturday, most distinctly repudiated having come to any such arrangement, and he repudiated it in the presence of the Minister of Public Works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated in the presence of the hon, member what I state now, and it was this: It was understood that we would pass the 7th and 8th clauses, and the First Minister would move his motion between the 7th and 8th clauses, and then we would take up the 9th clause; but, inasmuch as there were amendments to be made to the 9th clause, we would only pass the paragraph on the printed Bill, but we would not finally pass the 9th clause, in order that the next day, Saturday, the First Minister might make his motion, adding a new paragraph concerning the Indians, which would be paragraph C, and that the hon. member, on his side, was to move one or two additional paragraphs; one was about the Civil Service, and the other about revising barristers. He wanted to amend paragraph B, and to add a new paragraph about civil servants, and it was well understood these would be gone through on Saturday. But when we met here on Saturday, instead of the hon. gentleman allowing the First Minister to go on with his motion, he got up and made a speech, and moved the revising barrister paragraph, which was lost. Immediately afterwards, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) made a speech, as if he were to make a motion to the paragraph about the Civil Service; but it was only to give time to the hon member for Bothwell to prepare his motion, which he was then preparing, and he then got up and made his motion. The First Minister was, therefore, prevented from making his motion, because these gentlemen, along with others, took all the time, until six o'clock on Saturday. That was the understanding. Of course, the hon. gentleman thought otherwise on Saturday, and here we are, at nearly half-past two o'clock, about this motion, and we are now asked to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIES. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this was a private arrangement which took place  $\mathbf{T}$ here between him and the hon member for Bothwell. was no understanding on the floor of the House. The hon. member for Bothwell is not here to speak for himself. But he did not understand it as the Minister of Public Works now understands it, when it was mentioned on Saturday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I mentioned it twice, and certainly he did not rise in his place to deny it.

Mr. DAVIES. He stated he would take the earliest opportunity to do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He did not venture to do it then.

Mr. DAVIES. I was sitting alongside of him, and I heard him say that he did not make any such arrangement as the Minister of Public Works now states. But that arrangement was a private one, and is a matter between the Minister of Public Works and the member for Bothwell, when he is present; and therefore I think that if any misunderstanding took place between them the member for Bothwell should be present when the Minister of Public Works makes

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says it was a private arrangement. We all know perfectly well what it was.

Mr. DAVIES. I say I assume it was, because no public arrangement was made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Arrangements are generally made in that way. We know perfectly well that the nominal leader of the Opposition has, to a certain degree, abdicated his functions, and Mr. Mills was obviously leading on that side, and I think hon. gentlemen of the Opposition were bound by any arrangement he made, public or private.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt about that. If Mr. Mills so understood the matter, everybody here would hold themselves, and rightly hold themselves, to be bound by it. But, I must say this: I was present here myself up to 12 o'clock on Friday night, up to the time the House adjourned, and I recollect very well the hon. member for Bothwell coming to me and telling me that he thought it would be well to adjourn, if we got clause 7 and 8, I think, passed, and the two sub-sections of the other one, to which there were some amendments to be made. He asked me if I was willing to agree to that, and I said yes. That is all I recollect about the matter. I had no conversation with the Minister of Public Works, though 'debate you have introduced on your proposition. Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

I am quite sure the Minister of Public Works would not make any statement he did not believe to be correct, and I am certain the hon. member for Bothwell would not have made an arrangement of that kind and then broken it. I do not understand the First Minister to have been concerned in it in any way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; but I have given my sense of it from the information I got from my hon. friend. The two gentlemen met behind the Speaker's Chair and made the arrangement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I got my information from the member for Bothwell. As a matter of fact, I may say to the hon gentleman that I was, myself, responsible for the conduct of the Opposition on Friday-not Saturday, as I was not here then. But on Friday evening I was here, and I perfectly recollect that the hon. member for Bothwell came to me and mentioned the matter, as I have stated. I was a good deal astonished to hear that there had been any dispute on Saturday about the matter. I think it unfortunate there should be any misunderstanding of this kind, because, of course, if there is, there is an end to any possibility of making other arrangements. At the present moment, I may say that I do not think that the discussion is likely to be protracted long to-morrow, but I do know that two or three hon gentleman desire to speak. The hon gentleman must recollect that the amendment which he proposed, and which I have just had an opportunity of inspecting, was one of some serious importance, differing materially from the proposition those gentlemen had supposed was likely to be made with respect to the Indians.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not understand from the Minister of Public Works that we were to have a vote on the Indian question on Saturday. I think the hon. gentleman did not say so. I understood an opportunity would be given to the First Minister to propose his amendment. Of course, if he says he had an understanding with the hon, member for Bothwell that a vote should be taken on the Indian question on Saturday, that places a different question upon it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was the understanding.

Mr. PATERSON. That is certainly a surprise to me. I do not see how the hon. member for Bothwell made the proposition, knowing that a great many members desired to speak. He certainly says he did not do so. The Minister of Public Works had not stated, until now, that there was to be a vote. I know the hon, member for Bothwell wants to speak himself on this question, as do several other members, and I think it would be unfair to him. Certainly, I do not want to be a party, nor does the hon. member for Bothwell, to anything like a violation of good faith. That should not be charged, especially when the hon, member is not present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand, the hon. gentleman opposite has taken the responsibility, across the floor, of stating that to-morrow this will be disposed of within reasonable time-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; within reasonable time. This particular Indian question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I shall move the committee rise.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it understood that no amendments are to be permitted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I understand is, that the Indian question is to be closed to-morrow—this Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This whole question, so that we may get upon the next clause. It will not shut out amendments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon, gentleman will allow me to repeat what I said before he came in. I desire to know whether by this amendment it is intended to require each Indian to have improvements to the value of $150?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. My attention has been called to the matter; and now that we have got into good humor again, I should like to amend it by wording it in the singular instead of the plural.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 2:30 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CARON. I received to-day, from General Middleton, a telegram, dated Battleford, which I think will possess interest to the House. It is as follows:

"I have made prisoners of Poundmaker, Lame Man, Yellow Mud, Blanket, Breaking-through-the-ice—about the most influential and dangerous men about him. I also have two men who killed Payne, Indian instructor, and Treemont, the rancher—White Bear, who killed Payne, and Wahwanite, who killed Treemont. My next task will be Big Bear. Poundmaker brought in two teams and gave up 210 arms and five revolvers. I ordered them to give up flour, horses and cattle, and am sending part of the police to see that they are all given up. The 90th just arrived in camp by steamer; rest coming by land. If obliged, propose to organise force of mounted infantry from police, Boulton's mounted scouts and some mounted artillery—in all about 300 men—with light carts and as little baggage and supplies as possible, so as to scour the whole country and strike rapidly. I expect Big Bear will soon give up. If he does, I shall treat him as I have done Poundmaker; if he does not, I shall attack him."

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. Probably it would have been better if the Minister of Militia had read this dispatch in support of the First Minister's admendment now under the consideration of the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A suggestion was made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), as to the wording of my amendment, and I quite agree with him in regard to it. I therefore propose that the latter part of the clause should be put in the singular instead of the plural. At the same time, I desire to provide for a case which certainly did not occur to me. It might happen that an Indian living on a reserve might not have a vote there, but he might have property elesewhere. I would propose, with the consent of the committee, that after the word "Territories," the following words be inserted:

And any Indian on any reserve elsewhere in Canada, who is not in possession and occupation of a separate and distinct tract of land in such reserve, and whose improvements on such separate tract are not of the value at least of $150, and is not otherwise possessed of the qualifications entitling him to be registered on the list of voters under this Act.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not be better to divide it into two paragraphs, paragraph "C" to be "Indians in Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territories," and the remainder of the paragraph to be sub-section "B."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Before I address myself to the subject of the amendment and the clause of the Bill before the committee, I wish to make an observation or two with reference to the statement made by the First Minister last evening during my absence. The First Minister informed the committee that an arrangement had been made between the Minister of Public Works and myself, and that that arrangement had been departed from-in fact, that we had broken through the arrangement, and the hon. gentleman said we had shamefully disregarded the arrangement which had been had between us. Now, I beg leave to give to that statement a most explicit denial. The hon, gentleman and myself had a discussion with regard to the point at which the committee should stop on Friday evening. I suggested to the Minister of Public Works that we should stop when we reached the end of section 8. The hon, gentleman expressed his desire that we should go through the provisions of clause 9. I mentioned to him that we had amendments to move, and three of those amendments, of which I had a knowledge, I mentioned to him. He also stated that the First Minister intended—as we knew, from his announcement, if he adhered to his intention—to move an amendment to this section, and I agreed on behalf of our friends here-for my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) was leading the Opposition that evening—that we should consider the provisions of section 9, with understanding that the section was not carried, and that it should be open to us next day to move the amendments we desired. Now, the understanding between the hon. gentleman and myself had reference solely to the point we should reach, and the condition in which clause 9 should stand when we closed our proceedings in the committee on Friday We had no discussion as to the length of time which should be taken up with the consideration of section 9, or any amendment to it, on the following day. Sir, I had no authority to agree to any such understanding, and the hon, gentleman did not propose it. There was no intimation that there would be any such agreement between us; the sole subject of discussion between the Minister of Public Works and myself was the condition in which we should leave section 9 when the debate closed; and when the hon, the First Minister proposed an amendment I supposed he was proposing to carry the clause, and I objected. The committee remember that very well. Now, the subject of this clause, and of the arrangement between the hun. gentleman and myself, was referred to by the First Minister in the discussion on Saturday. The First Minister said:

"As this resolution has been disposed of "---

This was a resolution proposing to exclude the Civil Service from the list of voters—

"and as there is another resolution on this head which I intend to present, I do not think it would be worth while to go into it now. Still, I do not think that hon. gentlemen have carried out the arrangement, which was that I was to have the opportunity of moving that to-day."

Now, that was what the hon gentleman stated the arrangement to be. He did not for one moment, on Saturday, hint that we were to take up the subject of the Indian, and that we were to close the discussion on that day. He never intimated such a thing on that day. He added:

"That was frustrated by the debate which arose, and in which the hon. members have been repeating the same thing over and over.
not think the arrangement has been carried out in a good spirit."

I took exception to that statement. I said:

"I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. He said he wished to carry the two sub-sections of the 9th section, without carrying the section and I toldhim that there were three amendments which we desired to make, one relating to the revising officer, the one just voted down, and the one relating to the Indians. I thought that, as the discussion on the Indian question was likely to be longer than that on the other two, it would be more convenient to take the other two first, and I intimated that when I rose. I would have taken my seat if the hon. gentleman had intimated that it was his desire to begin with the Indians; but knowing what the nature of the amendment was and what sort of discussion was likely to take place on this particularly short day. I thought it was more desirable to place on this particularly short day, I thought it was more desirable to get the others disposed of than to bring up a discussion which we certainly could not have got through to-day.'

Now, Sir, there was an expressed declaration of the reasons I proposed to move those two amendments first, and I waited for a moment, in order that the First Minister might object, if he saw proper. I did so because I believed the discussion on them would be comparatively short, and we would be able to get through with them, and I stated I thought it was more desirable to do that than to take up the discussion of the Indian question, which we certainly could not have got through with on Saturday. Now, if there was any such understanding, why did not the hon. gentleman take exception to my observations then? But he did not do it, and the conclusive answer to his statement now is, that he did not do it because there was no such understanding. Sir, the hon, gentleman never intimated to me that he desired any such understanding, and he knew we came to no such understanding. All the hon, gentleman proposed to discuss was: Shall we stop at the end of section 8 or go on to section 9 as it stands? I wished to stop at section 8, because we had these amendments to move, and the hon. gentleman said we will go through section 9 as it is here, but not carry it, and leave it open till next day. But as to what we might do on that section, there was no understanding whatever. I reported the matter precisely as it was to the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), because he was in charge of the Opposition on that day. do not propose to make any further observations on this matter, but I must express my astonishment that any statement like that should have been made to the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I was not a party to that arrangement at all. I can only speak, from the statement made to me by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, as to what that arrangement was. As I understood it from him, it was this—that all the amendments that might be moved by hon. gentlemen on the other side would be moved the next day, that I should have an opportunity of moving my resolution respecting the Indians on the same day, that that clause should be got rid of on that day, and that on Tuesday morning we should commence the discussion on the revising barrister; and my hon. friend reiterated that statement last night. I was going on with my amendment, when the hon. gentleman rose and moved his amendment respecting revising barristers, I think it was. I could have no objection to that, as I really understood from my hon. friend that the whole thing was to be finished. Then the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) rose and commenced speaking, and did not sit down until the hon. member for Bothwell had prepared hurriedly the second reso lution, and then the one sat down and the other got up and proposed the second amendment. That was about the Civil Service. That was rather remarkable, but still believing that the arrangement would be carried out, I thought there would be plenty of time to dispose of it; but when we approached six o'clock, I found that the whole time had been taken up in discussing these two amendments. Therefore, I gave up the matter, and I said I really did not think the arrangement had been carried out in the correct spirit, convenience of public business, and unless they are clearly Mr. MILLS.

My hon. friend, I think, will reiterate the statement that it was a decided bargain that that whole clause relating to the Indians should be disposed of on Saturday, so that on Tuesday we might commence the discussion of the registration clause, and the appointment of the revising barristers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry that there should be any misunderstanding; but when the matter was fresher in our memories than it is to-day, that is to say, on Saturday, I stated the case as I understood it, and I repeated it yesterday. I find in the Hansard that I stated

"There may be a misunderstanding, but I stated to the hon. gentleman that the First Minister would make his motion about the Indians to-day as section C, and that the hon. gentleman would then make his motion about the civil servants and that about the other matter. I thought the hon. gentleman understood fully that the First Minister was to move first, because I told him it would be section C, coming immediately after sections A and B."

What confirms me in my recollection of that statement is that, when the House went into Committee of the Whole on this matter on Saturday, the hon, member for Bothwell

"Perhaps before the right hon, gentleman moves his motion with regard to the Indian clause, we might, on this side, propose our amend-ment with regard to revising barristers."

Showing that the hon gentleman expected that the First Minister would make his motion about the Indians as subsection C, which was to come after sections A and B sections, which had been accepted on Friday night; so I think the hon, gentleman will see that the statement I made was perfectly in accord with the understanding between us. Of course, I do not say that the hon. gentleman had any intention of deceiving us; I would never say that of any hon. member of this House. It is an unfortunate thing that there should be a misunderstanding; but I inferred from these statements that the intention was that the hon. First Minister should make his motion first, and that after that was disposed of, the hon. gentleman should move about the Civil Service and the revising officers.

Mr. BLAKE. There are two entirely distinct questions. One is the question which was discussed the other day; the other is the question now raised, and which, I believe, was raised last night. The question as to whether the Indian amendment should be moved first, is one thing; the other as to whether the debate should terminate on this clause on Saturday is quite another thing. The hon, member for Bothwell stated in my hearing on Saturday, upon the suggestion of the hon. First Minister, that the arrangement had not been carried out in a good spirit, that he himself at the opening of the discussion had suggested to the First Minister that probably it would be more convenient to take the two amendments of the Opposition before he moved his amendment. I heard him say that, and the hon. gentleman appeared to assent to it; he acknowledges having assented to it. The hon. First Minister did not object, and permitted those two amendments to be moved. I therefore do not see that there was anything improper in the hon, member for Bothwell making that suggestion, and leaving it to him to decide whether he should make his proposition with reference to the Indians first, or whether these two amendments should be taken first; but upon that day there was no statement made to this House that there was an agreement that the debate on this particular clause should close on Saturday and that the debate on the revising barristers should commence on Tuesday. I agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works not only in form but in spirit; and what I regretted was to hear that the hon. First Minister had used a phrase, which I hope on reflection he will recall, that there had been a shameless disregard of an arrangement. Of course, if there is a misunderstanding it is to be regretted, because arrangements privately made across the floor are for the understood, and fairly and honorably observed on both sides, it will be much to be regretted. But it would be infinitely more lamentable if there should be a suspicion on one side or the other that there had been a wilful violation of good faith. In what spirit did the hon. First Minister and the hon. Minister of Public Works meet this House on Saturday? The First Minister stated that the arrangement had not been carried out in good spirit. He moved the adjournment of the House at six o'clock, having got rid of the two amendments; and he did not then say that it had been agreed that the debate should close on his amendment that night; he said he was to have the opportunity of moving first. Then the hon. Minister of Public Works, in the fair way in which he conducts business, began his observations by saying that there must have been a misunderstanding, and then he said that he had stated to my hon, friend from Bothwell that the First Minister would make his motion first. My hon. friend has acknowledged that, and said he offered that suggestion to the First Minister for the convenience of business, which the First Minister adopted, and which occasioned that departure from the arrangement which my hon, friend would have made. But the Minister of Public Works did not upon Saturday say that it was agreed between him and my hon. friend from Bothwell that the discussion should close upon that clause. He made no statement then, nor has he said to-day that that was part of the arrangement. That is the charge which the First Minister made, I understand, during the absence of my hon. friend from Bothwell last night. My hon, friend had therefore nothing to answer upon that Saturday upon the subject. The First Minister moved the adjournment at six, because it was impossible to get through the discussion in time, and be in a position to move his Indian clause upon the resumption of the House. He did not then declare, nor has the Minister of Public Works declared, that there had been anything said as to the discussion being closed on that day. It was not until yesterday that statement was made. Then the First Minister closed the whole matter by saying, it is a misunderstanding, and I shall say no more about it. Then, upon the Tuesday, he resumed not merely the discussion of the original alleged misunderstanding as to the order of the motion, but he makes a fresh statement, and says upon further consideration it has been recollected there was another term in the agreement which was not merely what should be done, but also the course the discussion should take in the way of its being concluded. I do not know what the First Minister said, but he has repeated his statement just now, and the Minister of Public Works has said to-day, that was part of the arrangement as he understood it. If he did so understand it, of course I will accept his statement, but it was unfortunate it was not stated on the occasion when the nature of the understanding came under discussion, namely, on the Saturday itself; and it makes it plain that my hon. friend, from his point of view, is equally warranted in stating very positively that it was not his understanding. I have heard nothing but what was said in the committee on Saturday, and there was not the slightest pretence on Saturday, when the hon gentleman was making his explanation, with his colleague beside him, that there was an arrangement that the discussion should be closed on Saturday. He said it was a misunderstanding, and that he would say no more about it. It is a pity he did not adhere to that statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The reason why I acceded to the hon. gentleman going on with his two motions on Friday was very obvious. It was in my mind that all the amendments were to be concluded on that day. It was a matter of little consequence in what manner these different amendments should be moved, but it was more proper that moved before the Indian new clause, because the clause read before it referred to the revising barristers and others who were to be disqualified. I saw, when the proposition was made, that it was a very reasonable one, and I acceded to it; it was in my mind that the whole thing would be closed on that day. True, as the hon. gentleman says, there was no express mention made of the understanding that we should go on to the next clause relating to the revising barristers the next day, and that was rather an omission. But having said it was a misunderstanding, there was no more to be said about it. I would certainly not have said more about it, if it had not been that yesterday the debate on the Indian clause was pressed, as I and every hon. gentleman felt, and argued for the purpose of throwing over the division yesterday; and I considered, when it was really understood by my hon. friend, and conveyed to me as the understanding, that the whole thing was to be closed on Saturday night, and when it was debated with the obvious object of preventing division being taken last night, that certainly the agreement was broken, both in spirit and in

Sir HEUTOR LANGEVIN. When I had that understanding with the member for Bothwell, I stated to him exactly what I have stated here, and I will show why the inference I drew was the proper one. I stated that the First Minister would make his motion about Indians Saturday, as section C, and that the hon, gentleman would then make his motion about the Civil Service, and also about the other matter. I knew perfectly well, that of the three motions, the one about the Indians would be debated more than the other; and when I stated to the hon, gentleman, that on the following day, Saturday, the First Minister would make his motion as Section C, and then would take the other, the inference was, that the motion of the First Minister would go through that day. It is only a recollection that came to my mind whilst the discussion was going on, that when I had an understanding with the hon, member for Bothwell about the work to be completed on Friday, he suggested to take sections 7 and 8 only, and I said: That is not work enough, the First Minister has a motion to make that will come between 7 and 8, and then we shall take section 9 down to the revising barrister, so as to finish that work. Then he said: We cannot finish section 9, because I will have a motion or two to make in addition. I answered the First Minister has his motion about the Indians and will make that as clause C. He said, we had better take section 9, so that we can consider it, without finally passing it. I stated then, my hon, friend, the First Minister, would make his motion section C on Saturday. It stands to reason, coming after A and B, that it should be the first motion; and I am very sorry there should be any misunderstanding about it. Of course, the work being completed about section 9 on Saturday, the revising barrister clause was the next one to come up on Tuesday, and it was perfectly well understood it would be The discussion was quite different on Saturday. Instead of the First Minister moving his motion about the Indians, the hon, member for Bothwell made his motion, with the prefix that I read just now, about the revising barrister, and then the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) got up and began to make a speech on the Civil Service, immediately after which the hon member for Bothwell made a second motion, so that my hon. friend on my right had no chance whatever to make his motion about the Indians with advantage, the discussion continuing until six o'clock.

Mr. BLAKE. I must differ once again from the Minister of Public Works. I heard my hon. friend make a suggestion to the First Minister, as to the comparative convenience of the order of motions, and the First Minister assented to his views. It was in that way alone they came this amendment quo ad the revising barrister should be to be taken in that way; but, with reference to the statement of the First Minister as to the other part, I am very glad he made it, and it was worthy of himself to have made it. It appears to be perfectly plain, it was an inference the Minister of Public Works drew; and he drew the inference because the First Minister was going to move the other clause first, and the other amendments following, all would be completed Saturday. The Minister of Public Works has not stated it was argued between himself and the hon. member for Bothwell, these three amendments would be completed Saturday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated to the hon. gentleman that the First Minister would make his motion about the Indians on Saturday, as section C, and that the hon, gentleman would then make his motions about the Civil Service and the other matter. That was Saturday. Of course we cannot tie hon. members on both sides and prevent them speaking; but, so far as we were concerned, I thought this motion would go through, and the three amendments with it.

Mr. BLAKE. We know all the views of the arrangement. What my hon, friend says is that his inference was the order would be, first the motion about the Indians, and then the two motions of my hon. friend from Bothwell. There was not a distinct statement that the two motions would be read that day, still less concluded. And so the whole tissue of statement upon which the First Minister declared that there had been a shameless disregard of an arrangement comes to this, that an inference was drawn by the Minister of Public Works, from his own statement as to the order in which the motions would be taken up, that the debate would then be concluded. I do not say he drew an unwarrantable inference, though I think he drew a strong one, but, if there was an arrangement that the debate should be closed that day, it would have been more convenient that it should have been stated here. It does not appear to have been so stated, and it is very easy to understand, from the very fair statement of the Minister of Public Works, that there was a misunderstanding, and that my hon, friend from Bothwell did not mean to agree to anything except as to the order in which the discussion should take place.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The inference I drew, and the understanding I suggested in regard to the section was so clear to me that, when I related to my hon. friend on my right that the understanding was such, he stated that his motion would come first, and the hon. gentleman's two motions would come afterwards, and that therefore we should be free for the revising barristers on the Tuesday. That is what I thought was understood between the hon. gentleman and myself, and I can only repeat that it is a pity that there should be any misunderstanding.

Mr. MILLS. When the hon. gentleman came to section 9, when you, Mr. Chairman, were in the Chair, 1 got up and repeated what I understood to be the understanding, in order that the whole committee might be informed as to the terms upon which the adjournment was to take place. I have looked at Hansard, and I find there is no report of that, but I daresay it will be in the recollection of the committee that that took place. There were two matters about which we were anxious to come to an understanding. One was where we should stop, whether at section 8 or section 9; the second was in what state section 9 was to be left when we did stop. The reason for leaving it in that way was that the hon. gentleman said the First Minister wished to move an amendment. I said I wished to move certain amendments. I did not understand that there was any Mr. BLAKE.

Bill, as the member who moved the adjournment of the House, I supposed it was his right to move his amendment first; not because I thought there was any arrangement on that subject between the Minister of Public Works and myself. Our discussion with regard to the motions that were to be made was merely for the purpose of giving him our reasons for keeping section 9 open, and he stated the First Minister's intention to make the amendment in order to assure me that there was no intention to prevent us from amending section 9. That is precisely how the matter stood

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose that is the end of it. As to the motion now before you there is a suggestion by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), that the amendment had better be divided into two. I have no objection to that, but, for Heaven's sake do not let us have a separate discussion on the two motions.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course not.

Mr. MILLS. Before I enter into the general discussion of this question, I would say with regard to the amendment that, whether the First Minister intends it or not, the result will be that, if an Indian, who is part holder or a holder along with his tribe of an Indian reservation, chooses to live off the reservation, even though he may have made no improvements, he will be still entitled to a vote under this amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, No.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, that is clear. The hon. gentleman disqualifies certain Indians from voting, he states what Indians are to be disqualified. An Indian who is a resident upon a reservation, if the reservation is sufficient, when divided amongst the band, apart from this amendment, would be entitled to his vote as a part holder in the reservation. If he does not reside on the reservation, he is not disqualified; this amendment does not reach him. If a whole band of Indians were to live off the reservation, although they had no improvements upon it, if the reservation was sufficient in value to give all the Indians over 21 years of age a vote, such Indians would be entitled to vote. They are not excluded by this amendment. I think this is a very important departure from anything that we have had in the electoral law of Canada before, and I think it is entitled to more careful consideration than it has hitherto received. I am surprised that hon, gentlemen from Ontario who know the character of the Indians residing within their electoral districts can have so long remained silent and allowed the Bill to reach this stage without making an earnest protest. It is necessary to look at the history of the Indian population and to see what the policy of the Imperial Government has been in regard to them. Hon. gentleman sometimes forget that some of these Indian bands have been under the influence and jurisdiction of the Crown for more than two centuries. We know, in looking at the history of the discovery of this continent, that the Indian population was held to be in such a condition that they had no rights of property in the soil. The Crown took possession of the country, and it was recognised as the property of the Crown, notwithstanding that the Indians occupied it for the purpose of hunting. As early as the time of James I, we find the law officers of the Crown declaring that the recognition of any right of the Indians in the soil was based on public policy and on a desire to secure peace in the settlement of the country and not because the Indians had any property in the soil. In fact, you find grants made to the Hudson Bay Company, to Sir Fernando Gorges, to the Plymouth Company, to Attorneyagreement as to the order in which those amendments were to be moved, and, when I asked the consent of the First Minister to move my amendments first, it was because, as the leader of the House, as the Minister in charge of the fact, the Indians were held to be in so low a state of civilisation that they had no rights of property in the soil. This same rule we find recognised in nearly all the colonies, and the policy of the Crown was, when grants were made, not to deal with the Indians at all with reference to the possession of the country, but to leave those to whom a proprietary right had been conceded, to make such terms as they might think proper with the Indian population. This was the case in the State of New York when that colony was granted to the Duke of York, and when certain parties undertook to deal with the Indians, and to obtain from them a title to the soil and to hold lands in opposition to the grantees of the Duke of York. Chief Justices Holt and Polloxfen were consulted by the Lords of Trade and Plantation who were advised that the Indians had no property whatever in the soil, and that the Crown might deal with them as a matter of public policy or convenience for the purpose of protecting their interest and securing peace to the settlers; but that when the Crown made a grant of a large extent of territory to any of its subjects, it was the business of those subjects to deal with the Indian population. So you will find that in the early history of the English colonies of North America, the Government established no Indian Department and made no arrangement with the Indian population, but they left the lord proprietors, to whom this vast extent of territory had been granted by the Crown, to deal with the Indians in their own particular districts. Thus, on the grant made to the Duke of York, of the Province of New York, the Duke, or his governors, dealt with the Indians in this manner. They were his wards, they were under his control, they stood in the same relation to the lord proprietors of the country that the serfs in England. before the abolition of slavery, stood to the noblemen upon whose estates they resided. That was their position, and when William Penn came into the possession of the colony of Pennsylvania, and when he dealt with the Indian population, he professed to purchase the country from them, he made treaties with them in order to secure their good will, and to prevent any injury happening to his people whom he brought out for the purpose of colonising the large extent of country which the Crown had granted him. In dealing with the Indian population he dealt with them as his wards, and that policy was continued by the English Government, who completely ignored the Indian population in all their transactions. I say the policy of treating the Indians as or villeins of the proprietors of those extensive grants was continued down until the year 1755. At that time the French were making inroads upon the borders of the country claimed by Great Britain along the Ohio, and along the south shores of the lakes. They were making treaties and establishing friendly relations with the Indian population, seeking to secure their trade, seeking to secure their support as allies, against the various English colonists to the south. Well, there was a convention called in the colony of New York, in 1755, to consider the question of a federal union of all the British possessions in North America, and as a preliminary to carrying out that scheme, it was provided that the Indians should be taken from under the control of the different proprietary governments, and placed under the control of two superintendents. There was a Mr. argument to show that the Indians never had any right in Stone, who was made superintendent of what was called their own country, that the whole country belonged to the the Southern Department, and Sir William Johnson, the superintendent of what was called the Northern Department. Two superintendencies were established, and the Indians who, up to that time, had been treated as wards under the control of the proprietary governments on the continent, were afterwards treated as wards of the Crown. That, I say, was the beginning of the system of taking recognition of the Indian population on behalf of the Crown. Shortly after this, certain gentleman is clearly out of order. The committee has already arrangements were made between the English already decided that the tribal Indians may have a vote, Government and the Six Nations through these two and this is simply the disqualification of a portion of them.

superintendents, and the policy of dealing with the Indians of securing to them certain reservations and protecting. them in certain rights was adopted as a matter of public policy, in order to prevent a renewal of those conflicts which arose shortly after the conquest of Canada. It is true that some English moralists, men like Governor Endicott, Roger Williams and Wm. Penn, undertook to deal with the Indians as having certain proprietary rights. But this was not the general policy of the Imperial Governor ernment; on the contrary, they held that the Sovereign was lord of the fee, and that the Indian population were to be treated with by the different proprietors, and paid such sums as these might think necessary to secure peace and security to those who were engaged in colonising those parts of the proprietary governments as were set out for settlement.

Mr. DAWSON. I rise to a point of order. The discussion which the hon gentleman is bringing up is a very good one, and might be necessary at a future period, but it is evidently intended to influence a case now before the courts as to the rights of the Indians in the soil. He has no right to do this on the question of enfranchising the Indians. There ought to be some notice given before a discussion of this kind is started, in order that others might be prepared to have something to say about it.

Mr. MILLS. I have no intention whatever to influence any pending case. I am only entering into this discussion to trace the policy of the English Government towards the Indians and to point out the present condition of the Indians. I want to show what the Government has undertaken to do for the Indians, and to show what progress they had made during the 200 years that they were wards of the lord proprietors who had obtained the lands under grant from the Crown itself. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this question, whether the condition of the Indians is such as to lead us to suppose that they are likely to make such progress at an early day as to fit them for the exercise of the franchise that is about to be conferred upon them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it is a question of order; and I think the question is well taken.

Mr. MILLS. I deny there is any such proposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A point of order has been taken, and must be decided. Let us argue upon that.

Mr. MILLS. I am speaking to the point of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman is going on with his speech.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all. I was showing the pertinence of my remarks to this question. We are here proposing to confer the franchise upon a population that are in a semibarbarous condition—upon people who are not allowed to hold their lands, and I wish to show that this population have been under the surveillance of the Government for two centuries, and it is my right to do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now, about this point of order. The hon, gentleman commenced with an elaborate argument to show that the Indians never had any right in Crown. That has nothing to do with this question, which is, whether the Indian on reserves shall be qualified or disqualified. Now, the hon gentleman will not argue that reserves, specially set aside by the Crown, do not belong to the tribe of which each individual Indian is a member, so that the general argument whether the whole country originally belonged to the Indians or not, or whether they

The hon, gentleman is making a speech in order to prove that the decision could be overridden by saying that certain tribal Indians should not have votes. That is not the question; that has been decided by the committee. The question is what individuals shall be excepted from the general principle that tribal Indians might vote, if otherwise qualified.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman is right in his contention, if the committee has already decided that the tribal Indians shall vote, why does he now propose an amendment that tribal Indians in Manitoba and the North-West shall not vote. We can limit it still further. whole question of the limitation and fitness of the Indians to vote is before the committee.

Mr. BLAKE. If the committee has decided that a particular class, the Indians of the North-West, shall vote, how is it in order for the hon. gentleman to propose an amendment to take away that right? That is what the hon. gentleman is doing. If the committee has so decided, the hon, gentleman is out of order. If the committee has not so decided, it is open to move that Indians in Ontario, New Brunswick, or any part of Canada should be excluded, and therefore the whole question is open.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. With respect to the point last raised, I think the question of the enfranchisement of the Indians was passed and confirmed by this committee on the amendment, and it was clearly understood that exceptions should be made, and that therefore reopens the question. So I do not think any reference to that point is out of order. A discussion as to the proprietary rights of the Indians as affecting anything outside of this House,—if the hon. gentleman pursues that course of reasoning I shall certainly consider his remarks out of order. I do not, however, know that he has done so thus far.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no objection to a discussion of the proprietary rights of the Indians, if it is understood that we all shall be allowed equal latitude.

Mr. MILLS. I am not proposing to discuss the proprietary rights of the Indians. No doubt we shall have an opportunity of doing so on another motion. Looking at the progress made with this Bill we shall have quite enough to attend to within the four corners of the Bill, and the public are specially interested in this Indian question at the present moment, not in the proprietary rights of the Indian population. It is the political right which the hon. gentleman proposes to confer upon Indians in which the public are particularly interested; and it is to that question I propose to invite the attention of the committee. In order that we may be better able to consider the political enfranchisement of the Indians, it is important to know what is the intellectual and industrial status of that population and what progress they have made—whether that special class to whom it is proposed to confer the franchise is likely to elevate them or to lower the political institutions of the country. The relations of the Indians to the Crown are to some extent involved in this question, for, as the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) has said, some of the Indian tribes residing within Canada have always denied that they were subjects of the Crown. They say they are allies of the Crown, that treaty relations recognises them as such, and this is specially applicable to the Six Nation Indians, who reside near Brantford, in the county of Hastings and in other portions of the Dominion. The 15th article of the Treaty of Utrecht recognizes them as allies of the Crown. There was an alliance made between them and the Imperial Government for the purpose of resisting French encroachments on the Ohio, and in other portions of the King's Dominion between what was the French country and the Thirteen Colonies. The hon. gen-Sir John A. Macdonald.

terms of the treaty which exists between them and the Crown. I do not know how far, in a court of law, those Indians would be held to be regarded as British subjects.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear. There are the Treaties of Lancaster, Logstown and Utrecht between England and France, which recognises them not as subjects, but as allies. They refused to be called subjects, and the hon. gentleman knows they have refused to accept enfranchisement in many cases because they thought they would be making concessions which would interfere with the ancient pretensions which they have on all fitting occasions invariably upheld. Those Indians were under the control of the British Government for more than two centuries. Before that time the Six Nation Indians were under the control of the Dutch. They were armed by the Dutch, and they were able to make conquests among the surrounding tribes, even exterminating many tribes in Ontario, and they settled down in the vicinity of Albany and had placed over them an English superintendent who gave them instruction and rendered them assistance. School teachers were appointed, clergymen were sent amongst them for the purpose of giving them religious instruction; and this was done for more than a century before the United States ceased to be British colonies. After the war of independence, they left their reservations in the State of New York and had reservations granted to them in Ontario. Since 1783, for more than a century, they have been under British influence, under the instruction of religious and secular teachers, and we see at this day that a large number of them adhere to their ancient habits, and that a considerable number of them living in Brantford still claim to be pagan Indians. If they have shown themselves so much opposed to assimilation, to the adoption of the habits of the white population, how does the hon. gentleman expect that by conferring upon them the electoral franchise it will better fit them for citizenship? people from other countries who come and settle here are soon absorbed in the surrounding population. They forget their ancient language and habits. They bring a certain amount of knowledge and industrial practices to the common stock, but these and they too are merged in the rest of the population. But the Indians are in a wholly different position. They do not readily adopt the habits of civilised life. They do not intermingle with the wholly population. They have no disposition to assimilate, no desire to imitate the white population, preferring to maintain their ancient habits and usages. And it does seem to me an extraordinary proposition, when these people have made scarcely any progress for two centuries, that the hon. gentleman should transfer them to the voters' lists. Now, Sir, we know that this provision of the hon. gentleman's Bill, although brought forward for the first time, has been under consideration for the last two or three years. It has not been announced to the public; the public have not been informed of his intentions; but I remember very well that the party who ran in opposition to me at the last election announced to his friends that the First Minister was to introduce a Bill enfranchising the Indians of Moraviantown on the Thames, the Indians of Walpole Island, and the Indians in the vicinity of Brantford, and that it was at that time seriously contemplated to enfranchise the Indian population. Well, Sir, I now wish to call the attention of the committee to the preparation the hon. gentleman has been making with a view to the enfranchisement of the Indians. The hon. gentleman felt it would not do to suddenly enfranchise the Indian population without some preparatory steps being taken to secure the good opinion, and to make a favorable impression on the minds of the Indian population. tleman proposes to deal with the Indians contrary to the It would seem that there are certain Indian bands scattered through Ontario, were a portion of the reserves they received from the Government have been sold by the Crown, and the moneys have not been accounted for. I believe it is stated that some of these sales took place as early as 1820, and from that day to this, the moneys derived from those sales have not been accounted for by the Superintendent General or the party administering Indian affairs. Let me call the attention of the committee to an Order in Council which the hon, gentleman adopted and which, although I do not know that he has laid it before Parliament, would be of very great importance in the discussion of this Bill. On the 30th of June last an Order in Council was carried, in which it is stated:

On a report dated 7th June, 1884, from the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, stating with reference to a claim made by a band of Indians known as the Mississaguas, of the Oredit, who at one time occupied a reserve in the township of Toronto, Ontario, but who subsequently removed to the Grand River, and are now settled upon lands in the township of Onandaga, which forms part of the Six Nations Indian reserve, that certain moneys which were received by the Orown Lands Department of the old Province of Canada, in payment for lands surrendered by these Indians in the year 1820, to be sold for their benefit, but

Department of the old Province of Canada, in payment for lands surrendered by these Indians in the year 1820, to be sold for their benefit, but which moneys were never placed to their credit, and that after careful enquiry has been made in this matter it has been ascertained that the claim of the Indians is a just one.

"The Minister reports on the subject under consideration as follows: That in the year 1858 the special commissioners who were appointed for the purpose of investigating Indian matters in the old Province of Canada reported, with reference to the Mississagua band in question, that in 1828 there was a balance then due these Indians amounting to Canada reported, with reference to the Mississagua band in question, that in 1828 there was a balance then due these Indians amounting to $8,303.50, together with interest thereon, and on comparing the total quantity of land in the reserves which were surrendered, and which were situated at Port Credit, Oakville and Bronte, with the quantity ascertained to have been subsequently sold, the statement of the commissioners as to the amount due in 1828 appears to be correct; and subsequently to that year the sales recorded of the lands at Port Credit, described in the surrender as block F, would appear to have produced the sum of $6,316.37, and the interest on this amount, calculated from the dates of the different sales at six per cent., amounts to $18,362.81, making a total sum due these Indians for the sales at Port Credit of $24,678.98.

"That with regard to the sales of lots in what was formerly known as the Bronte Reserve, and which is described as Block G in the surrender, it would appear from a statement received from the Crown Lands Department, that the amount collected from the Drown Lands Department, that the amount collected from the purchasers was $2,218.25, upon which sum the interest at six per cent. from the dates of sales amounts to $6,069.73, the total amount therefore due these Indians on account of the land last referred to, is $8,287.98.

"That with regard to the lands at Oakville, which are described as Block B in the surrender, it is concluded from the papers and statethat in 1828 there was a balance then due these Indians amounting to Block B in the surrender, it is concluded from the papers and statements of record in the Department, that the amount received therefor, viz: $4,080, is included in the amount stated by the special commissioners to have been due these Indians in 1828 as above described.

"It will thus be seen that the several amounts due these Indians are

Let me say here that the hon, gentleman seems at once to have communicated to the Indians at Brantford, this report which he made to Council and the Order in Council haste to incur this liability on behalf of these two Governitself. The hon, gentleman informed these Indians, with | ments on the eve of introducing the Bill to enfranchise 269 out communicating with the Government of Ontario or the Government of Quebec, that this sum was due them. I understand that the invariable rule has been that no sum or charge was to be made to the debt of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, without the assent of the Governments of those Provinces, and without communication first having been made to them. The hon, gentleman shakes his head, but that rule has been adhered to so far as I know in every instance except this, and the hon, gentleman himself has refused, since the adoption of this report, to entertain a similar proposition without first having communication with the Governments of those Provinces. In 1841, when the union took place between Upper and Lower Canada, the debt of the old Provinces was assumed jointly by the new Government. This debt was a debt existing before the union; it is a debt chargeable to the Government of the two Provinces if it were a just debt. Yet the hon. gentleman has taken upon himself, without any legal authority whatever, to make a charge against the Government of Ontario and the Government of Quebec. How could be do that? This is a debt sixty years old and I say, Mr. Chairman,—and this is my point in this case—that the whole charge was made for the purpose of securing the political good will of those Indians before the franchise was conferred on them. I say it was a most improper proceeding. It was not only contrary to law, contrary to the practice prevailing, contrary to the conduct required by good faith towards the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, but it was a most improper action looking at what the hon, gentleman intended to do. For three years the hon, gentleman has been contemplating conferring the elective franchise upon the Indians, and before doing that he has raked up an old claim, which for aught I know may have already been properly met, and he has admitted it to the Indians as against the Local Government without any communication to the Government on the subject. Here is a communication, dated the 5th of September, addressed to the Superintendent-General by the local superintendent at Brantford:

"Sir, I have the honor to acquaint you that at a meeting of the Mississaguas of the Credit in council held yesterday, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—Moved by John Cheechok, seconded by James A. Wood, Resolved: This council do heartily thank the right hon the Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, for his kind attention and consideration, in having the claims of the band satisfied, in the manner set forth in the Order in Council of the 30th June last."

There is the expressed good will of the Indian, and for what? For this, that the hon gentleman has made a charge against Ontario and Quebec of $70,000 without the knowledge or assent of either of those Provinces. Like Artemus Ward, who was ready to sacrifice his wife's relations for the purpose of upholding the union, the hon gentleman is pre-pared to impose any amount of burdens upon the Governments of Ontario and Quebec for the purpose of securing the good will of the Indian population upon the eve of their political enfranchisement. I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether this was a valid claim or not; in point of law it is not; but I do not pretend to say that it ought to be ruled out on that ground, if it could be shown that this money had never been accounted for, and that the Indians had not received the sum for which the reservations had been sold. But the hon gentleman had not the facts to enable him to decide conclusively that that was the case. It was an obligation of sixty years old, which he had not considered before, although he had been in office nearly forty years; and it was his bounden duty to call the attention of the Governments of Ontario and Quebec to the matter, so as to give them the opportunity to say whether they were willing to assume this obligation or not. The hon, gentleman gave them no such opportunity, and he has exhibited this extraordinary the Indians. First he employs agents to organise them into Orange societies, then he proposes to vote them this large sum of money, and then to confer upon them the elective franchise. This question was before the Legislature of Ontario last winter, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to the observations made upon it by the treasurer, and the committee will then be better able to judge of the propriety of the hon. gentleman's course. The treasurer says:

"We are confronted with a claim of $68,000-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It has been pointed out to me that this has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. MILLS. I think it has very much to do with the franchise. If the hon, gentleman undertakes to give the Indians a bribe, and then to confer the franchise upon them, it is something the House should take notice of; and I wish to state these facts to the committee so as to enable them to judge whether persons so treated can exercise the franchise independently. If the hon. gentleman proposes to recognise debts of 60 years' standing-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think we can go into the merits of that. It is not relevant.

Mr. MILLS. It is relevant as showing the nature of the Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What has that to do with the franchise?

Mr. MILLS. It has everything to do with it. The hon. gentleman proposes to confer the elective franchise upon men to whom he has given, without the sanction of Parliament, at the expense of the Local Governments and without their sanction, a large sum of money, and then to confer the elective franchise upon them. If that is not relevant, it is impossible for me to understand what is relevant.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon, gentleman is able to point out that the Government possesses certain influences that they can exercise over those who are being enfranchised by this Bill, and further proceeds to show that there is a danger that they might use those influences, it seems to me pertinent to the question. It would be one of the reasons that might be urged, and urged strongly against giving Indians in that position a vote. The hon. member for Bothwell claims that they are not only in that position, but that they have exercised that influence. As I understand, that is his line of argument.

Mr. MILLS. That is precisely my position.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The charge is that some Indians have been bribed by the Government declaring that a certain sum of money was due them, that the Government acted improperly in bribing them, and that therefore the Indians must be disfranchised.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I think one main argument my hon friend is bringing against giving the Indians votes is that the Indians are, from the nature of the case, to a great extent in the hands of the Government of the day, and in illustration of that he is pointing out that particular transaction. It seems to me that it is a very pertinent thing, and a very strong argument. If the relations which exist between the Government of the day and the Indians are such that the interests of a whole band may be largely affected by the Government of the day, there is no doubt that they are in a very special sense at the mercy of the Government, far more than ordinary white men would be. It seems to me that to establish that my hon. friend should be allowed to give illustrations showing what has actually occurred.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government decides that certain contractors on the railway have a right to a side. You have ruled, Sir, that I am not at liberty to read Mr. MILLS.

certain sum of money; there is a report saying that a certain sum is due them—therefore we should pass a Bill that all contractors shall have no vote.

Mr. VAIL. You are now proposing to enfranchise a certain class which had not the franchise before, and it is perfectly right that any hon. member debating this question should state why he believes this class is not an independent class and should not have the franchise. My hon. friend from Bothwell is attempting to show why it should not enjoy the franchise, and he ought to be allowed to state the circumstances which warrant that assertion.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman is going much further. He is discussing whether, with reference to a certain debt, these people are entitled to it or not. Such a discussion is not relevant to the case. He can refer to certain facts that have transpired, but cannot enter into them as a discussion.

Mr. MILLS. I had no intention of going into the merits of the case. I was showing that no matter what the merits might be, this was not a thing that the First Minister ought to have done, and that if there was a debt at all it was a debt to the Provinces which it was for the Provinces to decide whether they would recognise or not. I was stating that the First Minister had departed from the recognised rule, and that he was doing so for some object or other, which object was being developed in the Bill now

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman brings a charge of that kind, I will be glad to meet him; but it has nothing to do with the subject under discussion. He is taking an unworthy advantage of his position to make statements which he has no right to make, and which are utterly false and untrue, like all the statements of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the statement made by the First Minister, that my hon. friend from Bothwell is in the habit of habitually making false statements, comes within the limits of the ordinary rules of debate. If you so rule, we will be happy to meet the hon. gentleman as to the value of his statements.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I understood the hon, the First Minister to say that, like many of the statements or most of the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), this one was false. I do not think that was saying he always makes false statements.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I raise another point, that the First Minister, having charged my hon. friend from Bothwell with making a false statement, my hon. friend must be permitted to prove that the statement he is making is not false.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said that whenever the hon. gentleman brought up the charge, I would be ready to answer it; but he has no right, and it is an unworthy and unparliamentary course to try and raise it in this discus-

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman said a good deal more than that. He has said a good deal more than that many times this Session, in the House and out of the House. I have not thought it worth while to notice many of the hon. gentleman's statements, but I will tell him this, that he has made statements that are untrue, and I will at a fitting opportunity prove they are untrue.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All right.

Mr. MILLS. I will do more. I say the hon. gentleman is not believed on his own side any more than he is on this the statement of the treasurer of the Province of Ontario for the purpose of showing the true inwardness of this transaction, as a part of this enfranchisement Bill. submit to your ruling, and will not discuss that question further, but I will take another opportunity, if not in the House somewhere else, of bringing the whole of those facts before the public, in order that they may judge precisely the character of the hon. gentleman's transactions. I hold in my hand the report of the First Minister, and among the other things which the hon, gentleman has stated in this report is the following:

"The Oneida band erected a new building to serve as a council hall and as a lodge for the Good Templars and the Orange society."

Mr. WALLACE (West York). Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. No doubt the hon. gentleman is pleased with that. I told the Minister of Public Works when this Bill was introduced, that the object was to get rid of hon. gentlemen on this side, and to transfer his followers from that side to this, after the hon. gentleman had been duly strengthened by the Indian vote and the lodges that are established amongst them. The hon. gentleman has, in this report, mentioned only one lodge, that on the Oneida reserve, but he knows that the Indians of Walpole have been so organised, that the Moravian Indians through the exertions of his agent, Mr. Beaty, of Highgate, have also been organised into Orange lodges, and we have no doubt that the same policy and practice has been generally pursued, and that in this Bill, as well as by these liberal donations, the Indian population is being fitted for the exercise of the franchise in the way best suited to the hon, gentleman's interests. I say that the Indian population are unfitted for the exercise of the franchise; I say that, as a race, they are not capable of any great improvement. There is, here and there, an Indian amongst them who is qualified for enfranchisement, and where he is, the elective franchise ought to be conferred upon him as an incident of those qualifications which he possesses, as any other citizen. But the hon gentleman's Bill proposes to do more than that; it proposes to enfranchise the Indians of the various reserves where their improvements are worth the small sum he mentions, although their ability to hold those improvements is wholly due to the interference of the Government in protecting the property as an Indian possession. Let me call the attention of the House to this fact that the Indian fund, which raises some of those Indian bands above want, is not due to the industry and thrift of the bands themselves. What is their position? When many of those bands came across from the United States, after the American revolution, reserves of very considerable size were marked out for them. Those reserves were larger than were required for their own immediate interest, and they consented to the surrender and sale of a portion of the soil. This surrender and sale has created an Indian fund belonging to the band to whom the reservation belongs, and that fund has principally contributed to the support of the Indian population. It is impossible to show that there the power of the Superintendent-General to refuse a division are any Indian bands in this country which have any of the property when he thinks the Indians in any band money accumulated, except that which has been accumulated for them by the Government through the sell-taken from an Indian, the Superintendent-General can say ing of a portion of the reserve so surrendered; yet the hon. gentleman proposes to enfranchise those Indians who have exhibited none of the elements of progress and thrift required on the part of any other population of Canada. The Chippawas, the Ottawas, the Delawares, the Oneidas, the Six Nations, are all the Indians who reside south of Lake Huron and north of Lake Erie and Ontario and who came across the border. They were Indians under the control of the Crown before Canada became a British possession, and, when the territories south of the lakes ceased to be British, these Indians became the wards of the purchaser from the Crown. They came across into Canada, and had reserves granted to them, stood in the same relation to him that the serfs did to the

and the moneys which have been accumulated and constituted funds belonging to the different bands have been moneys derived from the sale of a portion of the reserves in the way I have indicated. The condition of the Indian population in the Maritime Provinces and in some parts of the Province of Quebec, where the reserves are of very limited extent, shows what the Indian will do when he has no special advantage conferred upon him by the special interference of the Government. It is well known that the maxims of the Indians are that it is better to lie than to sit, better to sit than to stand, better to stand than to walk, better to walk than to run. These are the maxims of a thriftless population, who do not desire improvement, who will not make those exertions that are necessary for improvement. Great sacrifices have been made on behalf of the Indian population. Missionaries and school teachers have gone among them, Government interbeen exercised over them, special ference has officers are appointed for the purpose of protecting these wards of the Government who are incapable of protecting themselves. I should like to know of any Province in which there are not agents for the purpose of looking after the Indians. You know what would become of the Indian if the Government did not interfere in his behalf. You do not allow the natural law of the survival of the fittest to operate in regard to him. You prevent his extinction by want or disease by special interference in his behalf. Yet these are the men, these objects of charity, upon whom you propose to confer the electoral franchise. Let me call the attention of the committee to the relation which exists between the Government and the Indian population. not a rule that you apply under the Independence of Parliament Act for the purpose of disqualifying certain parties from sitting in this House that does not apply against giving the Indian the elective franchise. He is not in a position of independence. His relations to the Government are of such a character that it is against his interest, as it is against the interest of the State, that the elective franchise should be conferred upon him. Before Confederation we had an Act providing for the enfranchisement of the Indian population, and the only band of Indians enfranchised under that Act were the Wyandottes, a band of so-called Indians that had almost ceased to be Indians, and in whom you could hardly trace any Indian blood. The Indian Act places the control of the Indians entirely in the hands of the Superintendent-General. The hon. gentleman proposes to give to Indians having a separate holding the vote, but whether they have a separate holding or not depends upon his will. The law says that he, in the exercise of his own discretion as Superintendent-General, shall decide whether the Indian reservation shall remain a unit or shall be sub-divided and allotted to different individuals. That is not an exercise of the judicial power. It is purely a matter of discretion and it is an arbitrary discretion, bound by no rule, and it is in whether the sum to be paid for them shall be taken out of the funds of the Indians or shall be obtained from other sources, so that it is in his power to impose charges upon the band and to withhold compensation from particular Indians. The fact is that the power over the Indian is absolute, and it is a population of that character on whom the hon, gentleman proposes to confer the elective franchise. No people could be more helpless. When the first English lord of the manor in England before serfdom was abolished. That state of things lasted until 1755, and from that time downward, the Government have assumed the wardship of the Indian population. They took it out of the hands of the lords proprietors, who had purchased from the Crown large estates on this continent, and the Government still retain that hold over the Indians. In reading the sections of this Bill, you recognise the relation between the villein and the lord of the manor, and there would have been as much propriety in conferring the franchise upon the villeins on an estate in former times as upon the Indians while they stand in this relation to the Crown. By this Indian Act it is provided that the Superintendent-General may issue a location ticket when he approves of it and not before. He is the sole judge. He is not obliged to assign any reason to anybody—to his colleague or to the Indian who may make the application. When the Indian gets a location ticket, he cannot transfer to anyone out of the band his interest in the land and cannot transfer to another Indian without having the consent of the Superintendent-General. Why, Sir, is such a man a free man? Can he exercise the elective franchise freely? Can he vote against a Minister of the Crown, or against a candidate who supports the Minister of the Crown, while such power rests in the hands of the Minister? Then we find with regard to leaseholds, that if an Indian who has a location ticket, chooses to lease part of his lands to another party with the consent of the superintendent, unless he cultivates it in a way to suit the superintendent, then this officer may refuse to allow him to receive the rents and profits of his own land. Is that man free to vote as he thinks proper? I do not care how intelligent he is; apart altogether from the question of the general intelligence of the Indians, you place him in such a position that if he had the intelligence of an ordinary white man, he could not exercise his freedom in voting while his relation to the Crown is such as it is at present. Now, Sir, this Indian discussion has presented many phases since this Bill was first introduced. When it was introduced I asked the First Minister whether his intention was to enfranchise the Indians of British Columbia and Manitoba, and he replied, "Yes." I asked him whether it was his intention to enfranchise the Indians of the North-West Territories as soon as they were represented in this House, and he said it was. In fact he made a broad declaration as to these Indians with regard to the electoral franchise. After some discussion had taken place it was discovered that this might not, after all, be a very popular proposition, especially as the Indians of the North-West were engaged in committing depredations, and the hon. gentleman wished to resile from that position. He endeavored to explain that he only had the Indians of the older Provinces in his mind. true, his attention was specially called to the Indians of British Columbia and Manitoba; it is true that the conse-quences of the adoption of this Bill with regard to the North-West Territory, as soon as they would be represented, were also called to his attention, and he gave, with regard to all these, an affirmative answer as to what Indians were to vote. At a later period he resiled somewhat from that position, and he said that only the Indians of the older Provinces were to vote. Now we have this amendment before us. We find he has gone back from the position he took with regard to the Indians of British Columbia, and he now intends that they shall exercise the electoral franchise. Well, Sir, I have no doubt that there has been a change in that particular again, because one hon. member on that side declared he was most anxious that the Indians of British Columbia should have the elective The Indians in that country are numerous and formidable, they have overawed the white population, have created not a little anxiety, and are still Mr. MILLS.

friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson). I say we are very sure that when the hon, member spoke, the First Minister had again made up his mind not to leave British Columbia out, but to include the Indians of that Province in the class who were to be enfranchised. But, Sir, we find that the organs of the hon, gentleman everywhere represent that he only proposed to put the Indians upon the same footing as white men and to give them the same opportunities; and yet to-day, when the hon. gentleman put that amendment in your hands, he assured the House he was doing the Indian an injustice, that he was requiring of him a larger qualification than he was requiring of other citizens.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Mr. MILLS. I so understood the hon. gentleman. We find, Sir, under the provision of this Bill, that these Indians scattered throughout Ontario, who have homes upon reservations, if they withdraw from reservations, would be entitled to vote. Sir, if you look at the reservations in that Province, you will find that there are twelve constituencies, at least, that may have their political complexion changed by the Indian vote. In fact, whether there are twenty-four Reformers or twenty-four Tories sitting in this House as representatives of those particular constituencies, may depend upon the direction in which this Indian vote shall be cast. Now, the hon. gentleman may think that a matter of small consequence, but I have known Governments in the United Kingdom to last for a considerable period of time with a smaller majority than twenty-four. I call the attention of the members of this House to this point, whether they are from Ontario or other Provinces, that the question as to which party shall control the Government of this country at the next election may depend solely upon the votes of the Indians in the Province of Ontario alone. Sir, I regard this as a matter of no little importance, whatever hon. gentlemen may think. But let me tell this House that the vote of this country will not be the vote of the white population as it is, with the Indian population added to one side. The petitions which have been received from nearly every constituency, and especially from those constituencies in which Indians reside, show that there has been no question before this country since 1837 that has so deeply moved the population of the Province of Ontario as this Franchise Bill, and no portion of that Bill has created so profound an impression upon the people as that section which we are at this moment considering. Whatever the hon, gentleman may think, I am satisfied of this, that in the county I represent if the hon, gentleman adds two hundred Indian votes to his own side, there will be more than 200 Conservative votes, which were on his side, that will be found on the other side at the next election. There can be no doubt that will be the result.

Mr. HESSON. Then what are you complaining about? Mr. MILLS. I am complaining about the infamy of the proposition.

Mr. HESSON. If the proposition gives you a majority, that is all you desire.

Mr. MILLS. I have stated, and I repeat it, that I do not propose to admit as a principle that we are bound to do evil that good may come; to accept a measure wrong in itself, because I believe it will not work to the injury of myself and my friends, which was the object the hon. gentleman had in view when he proposed it. We know the malevolent motive from which the proposition has emanated. It has been declared again and again. The hon. gentleman's supporters—I will not use a stronger expression -in the country have admitted that the measure was for the purpose of strangling certain representatives on this side that the Gerrymander Bill failed to defeat. But I tell subject to their ancient habits, as was shown by my hon. I the hon gentleman and the hon member for North Perth that it is not every scheme of political janissarianism that succeeds. Men are not so easily strangled except by public opinion, and there is too much sense of fairness among the people to allow them to be led to adopt a course so discreditable to themselves and so disastrous to the well being of the country. Whenever our condition is such that members on either side of the House are disposed to support that which they believe to be wrong in itself becarse it is proposed by their leaders, we have reached a condition very closely bordering on revolution. We know how the civil war in the neighboring republic grew up, and how nearly the hon, gentlement is starding on the hair had a remaining the starding on the starding of the s man is standing on the brink of a precipice which may lead to serious disaster to the country. But we trust there is sufficient moral strength in the country, sufficient sense of fairness in the Conservative party, not to follow the hon. gentleman in the atrocious course in which he is now leading his followers.

Mr. DAWSON. I have only a word to say, and it is with respect to the first part of the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) opened his speech with the question of the Indian territorial rights, but as he has not persisted in discussing that matter it is quite unnecessary for me to enter into it now, further than in reply to the few words he uttered, to say that when that question comes up I shall be prepared to show that the right to the soil was originally in the Indians, that it was acknowledged to be so by the Imperial Government of Great Britain, that it has been acknowledged to be so by the Federal Government of the United States, and that both the Imperial Government of Great Britain and the Federal Government of the United States simply exercised a preemptive right to purchase from the Indians. In the United States the separate States were pre-vented from purchasing from the Indians. By the rule of Great Britain, whatever may have occurred in the early settlement of the country, latterly when the country became organised, and even before the cession of this country by France, there was a well considered system by which the rights of the Indians were acknowledged That being the case, I shall be prepared to show that it was the policy of the Crown to acknowledge the Indians' territorial rights. The hon, member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) yesterday read extracts from the report of the Indian Department, showing how far advanced some of the Indians were in the Province of Manitoba, and how unjust it was to deprive them of the franchise and give it to other Indians. I will read a short extract relating to the band to which the discussion which has just taken place has particular reference. It is as follows:—

"The Six Nation Indians, whose reserve is situated on the Grand River, in the Counties of Brant and Haldimand, are increasing in numbers and in prosperity. Many of their farms are well cultivated, and the products of the soil and of the dairy exhibited at their annual agricultural exhibitions command the admiration of all persons who attend them. Their exhibition of this year was remarkably successful; and the Six Nations combined with it the centennial celebration of the grant made to them by the Grown of the tract of land of which their grant made to them by the Crown of the tract of land of which their reserve forms a part, in recognition of their loyalty and valor, as practically proved on numerous occasions on the field of battle, in defence of the British flag. The exhibition was well attended, and addresses commendatory of the fealty and prowess of their ancestors, and of the progress made by the present generation in civilization was delivered. commendatory of the fealty and prowess of their ancestors, and of the progress made by the present generation in civilication were delivered by members of the Senate and of the Heuse of Commons, and by other distinguished persons. The quantity of new land broken by these Indians during the year amounted to nearly six hundred acres. They have an excellent school system on the reserve; and the institutions are efficiently conducted."

Surely there is not great risk in giving the franchise to such people?

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I have no desire to enter into the larger question which has been suggested by the remarks of the hon, gentleman who has just sat down, but it is evident that we have a considerable amount of Indian dis-to the question of the propriety of conferring the right to vote on unenfranchised Indians. That proposal has still the same characteristics that marked it when the Bill was originally introduced. In the first discussion of the clause there was a general concensus of opinion that it was not the intention of the Government to confer the franchise on Indians in the Territories and Dominion generally; that it was to be conferred upon a particular class of Indians, the Indian who had practically assumed all the responsibilities of a civilised state, the Indian who held a holding in his own right. Eventually, that construction of the Bill was abandoned. The First Minister explained in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the intention was to give votes to the Indians of the eastern Provinces, and the Indians in Manitoba, the North-West Territories and British Columbia. Subsequently, the First Minister said it was his intention to confine this provision to the Indians in the eastern Provinces, and we had a proposition submitted as an amendment to the clause by that hon, gentleman, apparently giving a still different phase to the case, and today we have still another phase given to it. These changes have each, apparently, been made to meet objections made on this side of the House, as well as the representations made by supporters of the Government to members of the Government. But, notwithstanding these objections and representations, notwithstanding the feelings expressed in the country with reference to this provision of the Bill, practically we have come back to where we started and to the original intention of the Bill. There is the same inten-tion and determination of the First Minister in these amendments to give a vote to all the tribal Indians, as was originally intended by him. It has been contended that the Indian has arrived at such a stage of mental, moral and material development as to entitle him to the franchise equally with the white citizen. I should have been glad if that were the case, but the reports on Indian affairs do not convey that assurance with any strongth or definiteness. The First Minister in speaking on this question on the 4th of May, said he took it that the Indians of the Province of Ontario, could, as a rule, read as well as the white men. Now, if that were the case it would not only be contrary to the well known desire of the Reform party throughout the Dominion to refuse them the franchise, but it would be contrary to right and justice in every respect. I think that phase of the question has been amply and satisfactorily settled by the views already expressed on this side of the House. Hon, gentlemen have been told over and over again that the tribal Indian is still a minor, that the state administers all his material affairs, and yet it is proposed by the present amendment, that the Indian, no matter what his relationship to the state or to the remainder of the community, should have the right to a vote. I wish to refer for a moment to the position which the Indian in the neighboring country occupies toward the state, because it is stated in an organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and one which must more than usually be held to express their opinions, that the Indian in the United States has the same privileges as the white men. Now, I have looked over the State constitutions and I find only in the State of Minnesota, is the The constitution Indian dealt with in any way whatever. of that State provides that every male of 21 years, of the following classes shall have votes: First, white citizens of the United States; secondly, white foreigners who have declared their intention to become citizens; third, persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilisation; fourthly, persons of Indian blood residing in the State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilisation, after an examination before any district court of the State, in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been proved cussion yet before us. I intend, however, to confine myself | by such court, capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State. Now, that is the most liberal provision which exists in any State in the Union, and it may commend itself to hon, gentlemen opposite who, though they show a disposition to follow the instincts of British institutions, are disposed, in many cases, to follow the procedure that has been adopted in the country to the south of us. I should be glad if they adopted in this instance the very wise limitation that has been made in the constitution of the State to which I have referred, that limitation being the most liberal in any state of the Union. Moreover, the language of the Act of Congress, of 1866, which dealt with the question of citizenship, and involved the then recent enfranchisement of the negro, provided:

"All persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding the Indian, if not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States."

Morse on "Citizenship," defining this clause, says:

"This does not include Indians born in and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; but an Indian, if taxed, and if his tribal relations have been abandoned, is a citizen."

Similar to this is the position which has been taken on this side of the House with reference to conferring the right to vote on the Indian, and we have invariably shown the distinction which has arisen for the first time upon the introduction of this Bill, regarding the status of the Indian; that he is to be enfranchised for the purpose of voting, but is not to be enfranchised in any other respect; he still remains a minor, with respect to the disposition of anything he acquires, and with respect to the management of his private affairs. While he still remains under the control of the Superintendent-General he is to receive the most sacred rights of citizenship, the right to say who shall govern him, and in what way he shall be governed; and it is proposed to do that while white people who do not possess property of the value of \$300, who do not earn \$300 a year, and who do not pay a rental of \$20 a year, are not entitled to vote. we have thought it well to restrict the qualifications in these respects, is it sufficient to say that the Indian who shall have made improvements on his private reservation to the value of \$150 shall be capable of voting? How are these improvements made? It does not require a very careful examination of the report of the Indian Department to see that in many instances not only are the Indians aided in their means of subsistence, but in building houses and in furnishing them with appliances for tilling their land. Are these the means by which the white citizen secures the right to vote? Is it by virtue of a grant from the Department of Indian Affairs that he has the right to say who shall represent him in this House? Not by any means; he has to secure the necessary qualifications by his own labor. Under these circumstances is the Indian going to be a free citizen in the exercise of the franchise? It is fatal to free institutions and unbecoming of hon. gentlemen opposite to submit a proposition of that kind to any representative body which has a proper respect for British institutions. It is fatal to the principles on which our constitution is founded; and the undermining of our constitution is begun when such a proposition as this is seriously contemplated. It has been held by the First Minister that the Indians in the Province of Ontario are in a fit condition, in the way of education and intelligence, to exercise the franchise. I will refer to the report of the Superintendent General for the year 1884 to see whether that is the case not. hon.  $\mathbf{or}$ (The gentleman read from the report referred to.) Any Indian who is disposed to accept the full privileges of enfranchisement can become enfranchised under the Indian Wherever the pernicious influences of the liquor traffic have been brought to bear on the Indian, he has retrograded perceptibly, and it is to people susceptible to such influences that it is proposed to give the franchise. Stringent provisions have been made against the exercise localities in British Columbia, I find the following. (The Mr. CAMERON (Mildlesex).

of undue influence over the electorate, and yet this provision gives the right to vote to an Indian, while the Indian Department has the power to give him or to withhold from him, that sustenance which may be necessary to him in consequence of his own improvidence and lack of thrift. The reports of the Superintendent General show that but little educational progress has been made amongst the Indians, even of the most advanced bands, and by these it appears that everywhere the Indian is still under the direct supervision of the Government. He may be refused a concession, or given a concession, but in every instance he can be made to understand that the concession is dependent on the course he will pursue towards the Government candidate. Now, Sir, I will quote one or two more cases from the report as it regards the Province of Quebec, to show that both in regard to the intellectual development of the Indians, and in regard to their industrial progress, they are still far behind the white settlers. (The hon. gentleman proceeded to read from the report concerning the Indians of Cornwall Island, St. Louis, County of Laprairie, and Caughnawaga.) In Caughnawaga, I understand the Indians are supposed to be the most intelligent and progressive of any, and still it is stated here that there are only a few successful farmers among them. (The hon. gentleman proceeded to read from the report concerning the Micmac Indians of New Brunswick, in the County of Richmond, and the Indians in the Counties of Pictou and Colchester, Scotia, showing the condition of agriculture among them, and their low intellectual development) In Prince Edward Island also the condition of affairs is reported to be unsatisfactory. I have endeavored to show, from the Superintendent General's own report, the condition of the Indians at the present time as regards their qualification to exercise the franchise. The report incontestably proves that the qualifications deemed necessary for freemen to exercise the franchise are not possessed by the Indians. It would be very interesting, if I were not precluded from doing so, to glance at the returns indicating the condition of the bands under Chief Beardy, under the Chief occupying the Duck Lake reserve, Big Bear, Poundmaker and others in the North-West Territories, who have recently occupied a hostile attitude towards this country. They are spoken of as being industrious and frugal, but this statement must be a comparative one, because these bands who are spoken of as industrious are really dissatisfied with their surroundings and are in revolt. It is important that this committee should anticipate the ultimate consequences of enfranchising the Indians. With respect to the Indians of British Columbia, it was at first understood that the First Minister did not propose to give them the right to vote, and an hon. member was even ruled out of order on the ground that the Act did not apply to them. We are, however, informed by the most recent amendment of the First Minister, that the Indians of British Columbia are to be enfranchised. In the report for 1884, the hope was expressed that some of the more civilised bands in these Provinces, will avail themselves of the provisions of the Indian Advancement Act. It was only a hope that was indulged in, that they would take advantage of these small municipal privileges and facilities, and yet it is seriously proposed that we shall now give to these Indians the power of determining who shall or who shall not be members of this House, notwithstanding that they are still participants in the advantages conferred by the Crown. (The hon, gentleman here quoted a number of other extracts from the report of the Superintendent General as to the Indians of British Columbia.) We are not to assume by any means that they are to have these separate holdings in fee; they are merely to acquire the right of occupancy in each of those holdings, they are still wards and minors, and yet they are to exercise the right of voting. Then as to the schools, in those particular hon. gentleman here quoted further from the report.) Such is the idea held by these Indians whom it is now proposed to give the right of franchise as to the advantages of education, and such are their actions when facilities are afforded them to obtain that education. Within the last 21 years the white people of this country have absolutely expended a sum approaching $200,000,000 in order to perfect the education of their children, and yet, while they have voluntarily submitted to this taxation, the House solemnly refused the motion of the hon, member for Northumberland in favor of manhood suffrage, and it is proposed to give the franchise to these Indians, who are not only not educated, but who are indisposed to take advantage of the offers which missionaries and others present, in order that they might acquire an education. Such men, I say, have not the first qualification which is expected in citizens who exercise the franchise, and it is false to one of our most sacred political bulwarks that such men should be empowered to say who shall or shall not be legislators. occupying seats in this House. (The hon. gentleman quoted further from the report, with reference to the Indians of British Columbia.) The Tyendenaga reserve, in the County of Hastings, which has been referred to more than once, I am prepared to admit, is one of the best reserves in the Province of Ontario, so far as material improvement is concerned, but let us see what the relation of that band is to the Government and to the Superintendent General.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). They are independent of both the Government and the Superintendent General. The money that is given to them is their own money; they do not thank the Government for it. The land was sold, and they invested their money with the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). According to the report, the money was not distributed alone as annuities, and consequently they are to some extent under the control of the Government. If it were an annuity such as I would be glad to know the hon, gentleman possessed, an annuity he had purchased from the Government, under any provision the Government would make, and that would leave him entirely independent of the Government of the day, or, for that matter, the Opposition, I would say there was no point in the objection I am making; but I contend that, excluding the annuity, there are objections sufficient in the other items that are distributed by the Government to make good my contention that these men cannot enjoy the freedom which it is absolutely necessary they should enjoy in order that we may have from them an expression of opinion at the polls as free as that from others.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). 1 say they are as free as you are.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I think it would be better if the hon. gentleman would get up and give his view of the case fairly at length.

Mr. WHITE. I have done so.

Mr. CAMERON. Since this amendment has been submitted, the hon gentleman has made no remark except in an interjectory manner, in answer to the observations I have made. I do not know whether the First Minister has given him particular instructions to remain silent, but I say if these amendments are not open to the objections we make, hongentlemen opposite should endeavor to give some proof that they are not. Since this question has been under discussion, we have had any number of different constructions placed on the clause before us. It is contended that it applies to no Indians who have not separate reserves, that, in fact, it means practically what is defined in the Ontario Act. That however has been contradicted more than once by the First Minister himself.

Then we have had the amendment submitted yesterday, and which has been changed again to-day. We have had all these amendments made with the one purpose, to give a vote to Indians, no matter whether they have severed themselves from the tribal relations or not, no matter whether they have acquired any property in the reserve that would be of the flimsiest character or not, and no matter whether they practically work the reserves upon which they are or not. The evident purpose and intention of the Bill, as amended, is to admit to the franchise all the Indians that a partisan revising offi-cer will consider himself justified in admitting. Its intention is to enfranchise as many of the Indians as it is possible to find of mature ago on a reserve. The hon. member for Algoma has more than once stated, and stated explicitly, that he would not support any such proposition, and he endeavors to shelter himself now behind the contention that this would not be effected by the amendment before us. But I hold it will, and it is for hon. gentlemen opposite, who are not desirous that the clause should have that wide latitude, to suggest some other wording which will confine it within the limits they desire to give it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have demured to our contention that the provision has the width we allege. Well, if it is not their intention that it should have that width, why should they be adverse to such a change being made in the construction of the clause as will more definitely determine its intention. We are not opposed to the vote being given to the enfranchised Indian. He can secure that right under the law as it now stands; under the Act of 1830, he has all the same facilities to acquire the right to vote as any citizen has. Consequently there would be no reason or purpose whatever in this clause we are discussing, if it was not intended the unenfranchised Indian should secure the right of which the enactments now on the Statute Book deprived him. I hope that the provisions of this clause will yet be limited to those Indians who would be enfranchised under the Indian Act. The First Minister has expressed his opinion that it is unfortunate that the Indians have not been relieved from their tribal relations long before this. It is in his power to make such a proposition to this House as will facilitate the emancipation of those Indians, and nothing would be more popular in the localities lying contiguous to the Indian reservations. I do not attempt to show that that course would be a judicious one. I do not propose it. I leave it for hon, gentlemen opposite to judge, but, if they maintain that the Indian has reached that stage of intellectual development that makes him a capable citizen, we have no right to retain him in the position of minority which he now occupies, and we have no right to hamper the development of the locality in which he lives by retaining him in the tribal relationship while we give him the right to vote. In regard to other classes of the community, provisions are made that they must live in houses of a certain value, or pay a certain amount of rent, or derive a certain amount of income or wages, but we are abandoning those provisions in reference to the least educated class of the community, and are making qualifications apply to the Indians which we ourselves furnish them. The the Indians which we ourselves furnish them. The Department has the liberty to give the Indian the aid from the Indian funds that his necessities may require, and on that expenditure by the Department he may acquire the right to the franchise. That is not what the country understands by this Bill, and it would be becoming on the part of the Government to await the verdict of the country in relation to this measure. If hon. gentlemen opposite are as confident of the popular approval of this measure as they pretend to be, why do they not appeal to the people of the country in defence of it? But it is because they dare not do so, it is because they desire to appeal at the next election to another electorate than the one to which they appealed in 1882. We opposite—if I except the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) who, I really believe, wishes to deal honestly and fairly about this matter. We have had no defence of this proposition in its altered form. The alteration, Sir, has not removed our objections to the Bill. We find that the same principle underlies it still, namely, the principle of giving a vote to the enfranchised Indian instead of giving it to the Indian on the interest that he holds in the tribal reservation. Sir, I would be glad to see this provision of the Bill eliminated; I would be glad if hon. gentlemen opposite would have the courage of their convictions and vote it down before it is too late. If they expect to derive any personal advantage from it, I think they will be mistaken. I believe that the people, independently of their political predilections, will condemn this measure when they have an opportunity. We have already seen many of them change their political allegiance when the question of the National Policy was submitted to them in 1878, and in 1882. I am prepared to admit the fact, while I question the reasons that induced them to change their allegiance. But I say that fact proves conclusively that the people of Canada are not so bigoted in their adherence to party, that they will not follow their own convictions of what is to their interest and best in the interest of the country. And I do not believe that the people are so bound down by party thraidom that they will follow hon. gentlemen opposite to the length of submitting to the degradation involved by the passage of this Bill; and from an intimate acquaintance with a few constituencies, at least, I am satisfied that when the time comes they will mark their disapproval of this iniquitous

Mr. FAIRBANK. I am glad that there are a few minutes left for me to express my opinion on this clause. It is true that I said a few words upon it on a former occasion, but it was under most unfavorable circumstances, at the beginning of the last day of that now well-known Session of fifty-seven hours, while the sunlight was breaking through those windows.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). Give us something fresh.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The first question claiming our attention is, what was the the state of the Indians under the Bill as introduced? As I understood it, it clearly defined how it was that Indians, who jointly or separately had property qualification, whether in a band or out of a band, on a reserve or off a reserve in any Province, having representation here, and in any Territory as soon as it had representation here, should have the franchise. The remarks made by the First Minister in answer to the pertinent questions propounded by the hon. member for Bothwell, (Mr. Mills), have been referred to sufficiently often that I need not repeat them. However, they are questions and answers which hon. gentlemen opposite have not heard the last of. On a subsequent day the member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) put the same questions to the First Minister. His answer was: I have already answered that question. That answer had been treated by the Ministerial press as a joke. It was no joking matter. To use the First Minister's phrase, that allegation is too thin. In the present amendment that question is fully stated and finally settled. It defines by excluding from the Bill some provisions that were in it before. If they were not in, there was no necessity for putting them out.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. FAIRBANK. In the few moments allotted to me before the committee rose, I endeavored to point out the you have.

Mr. Cameron (Middlesex).

scope of the Bill as it passed the second reading and went to the committee. I pointed out that it embraced the entire Dominion. There have been contrary contentions maintained by hon, gentlemen opposite and by their press. The amendments introduced by the First Minister will for ever settle this question. It has been claimed that the Bill only applied to the older Provinces. To-day, under the amendment submitted, British Columbia is included and made subject to the provisions of the Bill. I am chiefly interested at this time in enquiring its effect within the older Provinces. The amendment provides, what the Bill did not provide for, that the Indians to whom is to be given the vote should have a separate holding; that is to say, that they, with the consent of the band and what is more important with the consent of the Superintendent General, Indians should have allotted to them respectively a portion of land. It provides that there shall be improvements upon this land. This point of improvement is intended to convey the idea that it is evidence of the Indian's industry, intelligence and fitness to vote. When hon, gentlemen opposite at some further stage of the discussion are uncorked, and we hear from them, we shall hear them dwell upon this point to a certain extent. They will say that those Indians have a property qualification, and why should they not vote as other men? Throughout the discussion in the Ministerial press the point has been kept out of view that giving the vote was not enfranchising. The enfranchisement of the Indians is provided for by law. It is a certain process by which he is made free from the disabilities under which he labored, and he is released from his tribal condition. I wish to examine for a moment into this question of improvements. I am well aware that much consolation is expected to be drawn from it; that it is to let hon, gentlemen opposite down more easily. I have said that the allotment was made by the consent of the band and Superintendent General; indeed, without the consent of the latter the Indians could do very little indeed. The improvements must amount to the value of $150. Let us for a moment consider them. They will consist in part of the dwelling. It is not very extravagant that we should estimate the value at $70, even as an Indian's dwelling, then it remains to provide for $80 more of improvements. In Ontario the lands occupied by Indians were at one period heavily timbered. The average value of clearing land there may be said to be $20 per acre. Lands slashed would be classed as partially improved—say $10 per acre, therefore, if an Indian has a log cabin or a house worth $70 and has slashed eight acres of timber for the purpose of selling the timber to somebody else, he will have made the necessary improvements under this Bill. He will have given evidence of the industry and the intelligence which hon, gentlemen ask for. It will not matter though the Government has made this clearing, as they have made it in many instances, or erected the building, still the man is qualified to vote. It would be far better if a very small piece of land is tilled, if there is a small corn patch cultivated entirely by the squaw, that will all be evidence of his fitness to vote. Who is to make this valuation? The Ministerial press, to some extent at all events, have stated that the list which goes before the revising barrister will be the list prepared by the municipal officers. But how is it to reach the reserve? Is there not a high wall around the reserve which will prevent the municipal list from entering it? This will be worked by the revising barrister, or by the judge who, the member for West Toronto said, would do the work so quickly that it would not occupy more than ten days in any constituency. But if the value of improvements were much greater, it does not touch the point. The point is giving a vote to a man who does not possess the liberty to exercise the right as we possess it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). They have as much liberty as you have.

Mr. FAIRBANK. Unfortunately, I cannot hear the gentleman. I say the point of the question was the giving of votes to men who are not citizens in the same sense in which we are citizens, and who are not amenable to all the laws, as we are. The question has been asked from the Ministerial side of the House, how many Indians this Bill would enfranchise, and though it has not been answered, I think we can approximate the number which it is intended to enfranchise or to give the vote to. In Bothwell, I believe, it is expected to give a sufficient number of votes to finish the work which the gerrymander and the returning officer could not do. In South Brant it is hoped to furnish a sufficient number to serve the hon, gentleman who now represents the constituency in the same manner. In East Hastings it is hoped that there will be a sufficient number of Indian votes to make what was a doubtful constituency, secure for the hon, gentleman who represents it now.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). That has been said for 16 years.

Mr. FAIRBANK. In other constituencies it is expected to do the same kind of work. The First Minister, yesterday, in answer to an observation of the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), told us what was expected from this measure. He said of the Indian votes, that these votes will make you sick. It is expected that the Indian votes, of which one end is held by the Superintendent General, will make the Grits sick. Sir, it seems to me in the nature of an Indian alliance. We had one in the North-West latelyan attempt at an alliance between Louis Riel and the Indians of that section. It did not succeed, and this attempted alliance may succeed no better. After the explanation we have had, it is hardly necessary to enquire how the Indians came into the Bill. Who put them there, and when? Who asked for it? Was it himself? Was it his neighbors? The petitions which have been presented to the House show whether it was his neighbors who have asked him to be put there or not. The Indian was not there a short time ago. Who put him there? The First Minister has answered that question-to make the Grits sick. We were not in much | Conservatives as there are in the district I represent. For the doubt about it. The expressions of joy from some members Indian I would ask that he be allowed to enjoy his council, on the Ministerial side indicated quite clearly who it was asked to have them put there. Sir, a short time ago woman was in the Bill before us. The Indian was not in it. Woman is now out and the Indian is in. He was quietly led in, bare-footed or in moccasins so as not to make any noise. Woman was publicly kicked out, and I think she will remember the manner of her exit. Mr. Disraeli said that Lord Palmerston had caught the Reform party in bathing, and had stolen their clothes. I think the First Minister has been bathing in the stream of promises, of which he is fond. The women of Canada chanced to go by there and they seated themselves upon his clothes; he cannot get ashore, and now he seems to be paddling to the other shore to a wigwam standing there, where he hopes to borrow a blanket to keep him warm in the winter of his discontent. Sir, when the Indian assumes the responsibilities, the liabilities and duties of white men, I would be the last man in Canada to stand up and oppose his enfranchisement. I give place to no man in my friendly feelings towards the Indian, but until he assumes those duties and responsibilities, I believe the vote will be anything but beneficial to him, if it is given to the banded Indian, and he accepts it, because there are serious doubts in my mind whether his own discretion and judgment will not lead him to decline it, but if it is given and accepted it will not be beneficial to the Indian. Will he vote as an individual? No, Sir; he will vote as a band; the council fires will be lighted when he goes to the polls. If it is accepted and has the effects in certain districts which it is expected to have, if it overcomes the white majority, ill-feeling between the white man and the Indian will be inevitable. That is not in the Indian's interest. The citizens of a constituency who are in the posed to throw into the electorate of this country a class of 270 majority, the full citizens, liable to all the provisions of the law, on finding their will thwarted by an unemancipated Indian vote, will not be satisfied, and the impressions formed by them will not be beneficial to the Indians. We shall hear the plea: Why should the Indian not have a vote if he has the property qualifications of a white man? Sir. does the tax collector enter the Indian reservation? Does the collector of debt enter the Indian reservation? Has the militia bugle any note that calls the Indian to military duty? When a public highway strikes an Indian reserve it has to go around it or bridge it. Has the head of the Indian Department any papers in his pigeon-holes to-day asking for contributions to those so situated? Sir, did the picture ever present itself to you of a Minister canvassing an Indian reserve for votes? Fancy the Minister of Customs visiting an Indian reserve for votes, making his approaches gradually. He commences with the young, disposed to teach the young idea how to shoot, by putting coppers on a stick; he makes a further advance, not with the three R's, but with the three B's—brooms, baskets and beads; still further, he carries on a fur trade, buys muskrat skins, and pays with bits of mink. The thought occurs to my mind, how are the mighty fallen! A right hon. gentleman whom we have recently heard much of as having been forty years in public life, who has for a quarter of a century directed the destinies of Canada, who has heretofore been accustomed annually to hunt for political elephants, coming down to set traps for rats and mice on an Indian reserve! Sir, has he so little confidence in the white man that he has to fall back on the Indian? Is the white man to have no rights that the Indian need regard? The proposition to place the ballot box on the Indian reserve meets with approval nowhere. It suits the purpose of gentlemen opposite to ridicule the petitions that have been presented to this House. They may see the day when they will regret that. I have not referred to the petitions which have been presented by myself; but those petitions contain the names of as intelligent and prominent his bands and his traditions, that he be treated with kindness, with liberality, with honesty and with truth, and that the best men be brought in contact with him. The Indian of North America has suffered enough; add no new sufferings to him. Do not introduce him into political warfare; do not force him to come to Parliament and sit up until two o'clock in the morning; do not lay upon him the charge of obstructing business because the Government will not bring business down; do not force him into a position to be found fault with because he will not support a measure designed and intended to perpetuate a party in power, and having no other design.

Mr. LISTER. I feel that I need offer no apology to this House for asking their attention for a few moments while I discuss the measure now under consideration.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The eighth time.

Mr. LISTER. Sir, the hon. member for East Hastings is becoming a nuisance in this House.

Mr. WHITE. You apologise to the House for the eighth

Mr. LISTER. This Bill has been for the last four or five weeks debated by this House, but the section now under discussion has only been incidentally referred to. The question of giving the Indian a vote is one of momentous importance; it is a question which should receive the serious consideration of all the members of this House, whether they be supporters or opponents of the Government. It is proposed by this Bill to confer upon a class of the community rights they have never had before; it is pro-people totally unacquainted with the affairs of the country, with the political issues which come before this Parliament, and with everything that should fit a man to fulfil the duties of a citizen of the country. In discussing this question there are several things to be considered. In the first place, it is the duty of Parliament, before they confer upon the Indian that great privilege, to be satisfied beyond all peradventure that the person to whom they are giving this right is sufficiently intelligent and sufficiently advanced in civilisation to appreciate that right and to exercise it intelligently. If the person who is to be enfranchised does not possess these qualifications it is a dangerous thing for the Government to add to the electorate of the country that class of people. I need only refer to the reports of the hon, gentleman who leads this Government, to show that the Indian is not fitted to exercise the franchise. I will confine myself. however, to that portion of the report which deals with the Walpole Indians, and the band of Chippewas residing near the town of Sarnia. I find that, so far as the Chippewa band is concerned, living near the town of Sarnia, the hon. gentleman reports that, with the exception of two or three of them, they have made no advancement during a number of years; that much of the land which was originally cleared by the Government for the Indians has been neglected, and is covered with brush wood. Speaking of the Chippewas, the hon. gentleman gives a similar account; their cleared land is less in extent than it was ten or twelve years ago. I have referred to those two instances simply to show that, so far as those Indians are concerned, for the last twenty or thirty years no advancement has been made by them, according to the report of the Superintendent General; and they are a very favorable portion, compared with the other Indians the hon. gentleman also proposes to enfranchise. To a very small extent do they associate with the whites; they are totally unacquainted with the ways and manners of the whites, and I believe only within the last year have they attempted to elect their own chiefs. Their reserves are a source of injury instead of benefit to the country. One of the most important roads in the county of Lambton runs along the reserve, and there is no worse road in the country; repeated applications have been made to the Indian office to obtain assistance for the purpose of putting that road in condition, but so far these efforts have been fruitless. The applicants have been told that they must go to the Indians on the reserves to get their permission to have the funds in the hands of the Indian Department expended on the road; but it is well known the Indians will not, under any consideration, give their consent to a proposal of that kind. The consequence is, that one of the best situated roads in the county of Lambton is left in a state dangerous to public travel.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You say the Government control the Indians, and you now say the Indians control their own funds.

Mr. LISTER. They do not. The Indian superintendent says to the people who ask for the assistance to build the roads that they must go to the Indians and get their sanction before the Government will be willing to pay the money; but it does not follow that the Indian superintendent has not the right, if he thinks proper, to take the money for the purpose of building the road. I only mention the fact to show the difficulty people living near the reserves have to encounter in dealing with the reserves. In the county of Lambton there are 6,000 acres of land on the reserves, 5,600 of which have never had a plough put through it. No effort is made to cultivate the land, and instead of that large block being fertile, and an advantage to the country at large, it lies there useless. Another objection which has been urged over and over again is, that so long as the Indians labor under disabilities they should not have the right conferred upon them to vote. Before giving the Indian the franchise you should remove from him the disabilities which now exist, and by law declare him a free man, and relieve him from the control of the Superintendent General and his minions. This is the most preposterous proposition ever submitted to Parliament, that a man who controls 16,000 or 18,000 Indians in the Province of Ontaro, as absolutely as the Southerner did his slaves, should ask this free Parliament to give these people the right to vote and to allow their votes to weigh against those of the white men who assume all the responsibilities of citizenship and render service to the country in various ways. It has been stated that we took days in discussing whether an Indian was a person, but the Superintendent General, in his interpretation clause, declares that the expression "person" means any individual other than an Indian, so that, according to him, an Indian is not a person. The clauses of the Indian Act provide a very simple means by which those Indians who desire it can obtain enfranchisement, but this Bill proposes to give the vote to those who have no responsibility, who pay no taxes, and whom the First Minister has declared unfit for the simplest form of municipal government. If Indians do not take advantage of the enfranchising clauses of the existing law, simple as they are, that is a most convincing proof that they do not wish to obtain the privileges of citizenship. It is pretended that an Indian has a right to acquire property, and it is said that that property belongs to the Indian. But if that property belongs to the Indian, accumulated by his thrift and industry, the Government step in and say that he shall have no right to dispose of it as he pleases, that the will of the deceased Indian shall be frustrated if the First Minister thinks proper to disallow it. That is the man who the First Minister says is intelligent enough to have the right to vote. Then the Indian cannot dispose of or sell his timber; he cannot lease his land.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, he can. I say that the Indians do lease their land.

Mr. LISTER. The hon, gentleman says he can sell it.

Mr. WHITE. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LISTER. That shows the utter ignorance of the hon. gentleman who undertook to correct me, as he will see by reading section 21 of the Indian Act. (The hon. gentleman read section 21). Does the hon. gentleman still say that the Indians have a right to lease their land?

Mr. WHITE. I do. I say they do it, too.

Mr. LISTER. There is one ground upon which the hongentleman has been basing the giving of the franchise to the Indian, namely, because he has a right to lease his land. But the statute law of this country says distinctly that he shall not sell, nor shall he lease, the land upon which he resides. Then, Sir, it is proposed that the man who has no proprietary interest in the land, who cannot sell it, who cannot mortgage it, who cannot lease it—it is proposed by the infamous measure now under consideration to give that man the right to cast his ballot for members of this House. More than that: if the hongentleman will look at section 26 of the same Act he will find that the Indian cannot even sell the timber which is growing upon his land. (The hongentleman read section 26). So he will see that the Indian cannot even sell the timber, or the minerals, or the stone upon the land he is entitled to occupy upon the reserve without the written consent of the Superintendent General. Yet the hongentleman will get up in this House and say that that man shall exercise his right as a citizen of this country, the highest right of a citizen, that of casting a ballot for a member of stated, then a man is no friend to the Indians who will urge

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The farmers' sons and the mechanics' sons who are enfranchised here, have they a right to sell land? Have they a right to mortgage land?

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman compares the farmers' sons of the country with the Indians.

Mr. WHITE. No, I do not.

Mr. LISTER. I want the House to take notice of that.

Mr. WHITE. I consider the Indians as good as you or I, or any other man in this country.

Mr. LISTER. All right.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. member for Hastings is out of order. He has no right to interrupt an hon, gentleman when he is speaking, and I hope he will not do it again.

Mr. LISTER. Then, Sir, let us go a step further. It is proposed to give the vote to the unenfranchised Indian. What are his legal rights? I again refer the hon. gentleman to the Indian Act, section 78. (The hon, gentleman reads the section in question). So that an Indian may have $10,000 worth upon his holding on the reserve; he may contract debts to any amount, yet no judgment can have any force or effect against his property upon that reserve. No property can be seized under execution against that Indian except it is property on the reserve that is liable to taxation. Even the poorest man in this country, if he contracts a debt, has to pay it. He is brought up before a judge, on a judgment summons, and if he does not pay the debt the chances are that he is incarcerated in gaol. But the privileged Indian of this country, the particular ward of the Government, the individual over whom the Government takes such a lively interest, and protects his land and timber for him, he may contract a debt to any amount, from one end of the country to the other, and yet no one has any redress against him, by execution or otherwise, as long as that Indian holds his property upon the reserve. What is proposed to be done is dangerous to the Indians themselves, and it is an injustice to them. The Indians have not asked for representation in this House, and that they shall have the right to vote conferred on them. There has been no petition, no evidence whatever, that the Indians want to exercise the franchise. I believe they do not want this right conferred on them, because the moment it is conferred the thin end of the wedge enters into the Indian system under which they have lived. Hon, gentlemen opposite may talk, but when an election comes round no doubt we shall find the hon, member for East Hastings canvassing the Indians in his county, going through the reserve with a horde of camp followers, using every possible argument to persuade the Indians to vote for him. To place the Indians who have not had the simplest form of municipal government, who know nothing of the institutions under which they live, at the mercy of a horde of politicians looking for votes, unscrupulous as to the means to be used to obtain votes, is to place the Indians in an unenviable position. The effect will surely be to destroy the Indian system which has existed here for 50 or 60 years. The moment they begin to appreciate their strength and to find they are able to control the election in a county-because in some counties they will be able to thwart the will of the white men—at that moment the danger arises. Portions of the Indians will be found to be anxious to have lands granted them, and they will bring such strong pressure to bear upon the representatives that they will be compelled to yield to their wishes. If hon, gentlemen think that such is in the interest of the Indians they will support the Bill. But if the effect of giving the franchise to Indians, when not stand well for young members to say that I fear they have not asked for it and do not want it, is as I have re-election. Like every other member of the House, that they be given the vote. The First Minister has this matter under consideration no doubt some little time. Within the last year he has dismissed the Liberal agents throughout Ontario and substituted Conservatives, whom I will not call tools of his own. He had a motive in doing that, and it was that when he gave the Indians the vote he would have them under his control. The position of the agents themselves, for in the event of a change of Government they must understand they cannot retain their position, is also imperilled. It has been said that Mr. Mowat has given the right to vote to the Indians. I admit that is the case, to a certain extent. There are two classes which are given the right to vote under the Ontario Act. First, those who have been enfranchised; second, those not enfranchised, but who do not live with the tribes, and who do not receive any annuity or interest money, and who do not reside among Indians. If Indians occupy such a position as that of the latter class they are not under the influence of the Dominion Government, and so far as outside influence goes, they are the same as any other members of the community; and if those men have, by thrift, acquired property, there is no reason why they should not be allowed to vote. They pay taxes, do not reside upon reserves and have severed their tribal relations, and there is no reason why those men should not be entitled to vote. It is impossible, under the hon, gentleman's Act, that these men can exercise the franchise freely, because anybody who reads the Indian Act must satisfy himself that the influence of the Government is all-powerful with the Indian, and that if the Indian does not yield to the will of the Government it may thwart him in every possible way. In fact, it is almost impossible for the Indian to get along unless he yields to the wishes of the powers that be. Under these circumstances, I say that there never was so monstrous and scandalous a proposition made to any Parliament in the wide world as to enfranchise these men, who are dependent on the will of the Government, who have no rights whatever, so far as the law is concerned, and who have no control over their own property. I mistake the feelings of the people of this country if they are prepared to accept and consent to so monstrous a proposition. I believe it will never be sanctioned by the people of the country. I believe it is an innovation upon our parliamentary system; that it is a revolutionary measure. If hon. gentlemen had submitted such a Bill as this before the elections of 1882 I believe they would have been defeated, and that when they go to the country again the people will show their utter condemnation of the measure by defeating the men who have so misused the confidence which the people put in their hands. There never was, in the whole history of this country such a measure proposed, and I believe it is impossible for men ever again to introduce to this or any other Parliament so iniquitous a measure.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I notice that there are a number of young members in this House, and I am glad to see young men in the House, because they are generally kind, energetic and intelligent. The younger members of this House, in addressing the committee, have frequently referred to the east riding of Hastings. I have said before, and I now repeat, though I do not like to repeat what I formerly said-I do not like to listen to speeches prepared and written on paper. I do not like to see men rising to address the House, and having to read a lot of books in order to make a few remarks. I have no notes of what I am going to say, and no blue book, and I have not written down the remarks I intend to make. I have had the honor of being sixteen years a member of this House, and surely it does

I am in the hands of my friends. They may not select me, but if they do, I will guarantee, with or without the Indian vote, that I will carry the east riding of Hastings by the parties I have worked for at $4 or $5 a month thirty-three or thirty-four years ago-those who know who I am, what I am, where I came from, and how I live. The statement has been made by three of the gentlemen who have addressed the House that smong the Indians in their section of the country there is not a man entitled to the franchise. In addressing you the other evening I said I would not refer to other Indian reserves, but I think I have a right to refer to the reserve in East Hastings. The statement was made last night that there are a number of Orange lodges in that reserve. It is not true; there is one. There are some of the Indians on that reserve who belong to Orange lodges, some to temperance lodges, some to Masonic lodges, and some to Oddfellows. I think they generally belong to the Church of England, and on the reserve they have two churches. They pay a minister, but if the bishop sends a clergyman to them of whom they do not approve, they make the bishop remove him. Some members of the band insisted that they should employ Church of England school teachers, but let me say to their credit that they employ teachers, no matter whether they are Catholics or Protestants, no matter what Protestant church they belong to. To say they are not independent of the Government is to say what is not correct. They got from the Crown of Great Britain a whole township; they surrendered three fourths of that territory, and the money which is invested out of the sale of these lands is theirs. It belongs to no one but the Indian band. I ask, in the name of common sense, if it is not right, when the land is sold, and the money is collected and invested, that they should be entitled to the interest of it? Is it not as much theirs as any money that is invested in Government funds?

Mr. LISTER. Give them the deed of their lands.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I was speaking of the land which was sold and the money invested. I say they are just as well entitled to the interest of that money as any party in this House or in this country who invests money in the Post Office Department or in Government bonds. Who will deny it? No man can. They are asked by Mr. Mowat's Bill to resign the interest of this money in order to be enfranchised, but I say that it would not be fair, right or just. Then we are told that they do not rent their lands. The Indians in our township make their own arrangements; they go to the Indian council and make the arrangements with the white men to rent their land. They go to the council and lease their lands, the lease is signed, and the rents are collected. The rents are claimed in advance. They are sent to Ottawa, and the check is sent back on the Bank of Montreal to the Indians.

Mr. LISTER. Does the hon, gentleman say that the law permits them to do that?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I think if the law did not permit them they would not do it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why does the check come to Ottawa, if they do their own work?

Mr. WHITE. I will tell the hon. gentleman. A few years ago, since I became a member of this House, a number of people bought the rents in advance; they got the orders from the Indians, and sent the orders to Ottawa, and the Government allowed them to collect the rents through the orders; but I insisted that the money should be paid at Ottawa, and that the checks should go back to the Indians, who could do as they liked with them. In my township, the rents are collected six months in advance; they are sent to Ottawa, and in less than one week the checks on Mr. WHITE (Hastings).

the Bank of Montreal are returned to the Indians. Indians are treated in the same way as the hon, gentleman himself or any other man who has business with the Government. Is there anything wrong in that, and have the Government any control over men in that position? They have not. It is said that the Indians have no roads. The Indian band, last year or the year before, purchased from an Indian woman of that tribe, a lot of land at Deseronto for $8,000; they cut it into lots and sold half of it for $35,000; they paid the owner the $8,000 and invested $27,000 with the Government; and they are going to draw $20,000 to put up wire, board, and cedar fences on their lands; and I have no hesitation in saying that two years from to-day there will not be any land better fenced than the Indian reserve in the county of Hastings. Why do you not go and teach your Indians to do likewise? Go and do your duty by the Indians and you will find them worthy of every position. In our township some of their lands are rented to white men and we collect from the white men on the Indian reserve $700, which goes into the municipal treasury. When a road is to be built the Indian council pays part, and the township council the other part, but in fact the Indians pay the whole, because $700 are collected on the reserve. Now, are they not just as much enfranchised as any man in this House? Do they not pay taxes? Do they not build roads? I say they do. We have no trouble in building roads in that township. We have seven miles of gravel road running from Richmond to the village of Deseronto; it is a free gravel road, passing through the reserve; it has to be kept up by the municipal council; but all other roads are built partly by the council and partly by the Indians. They support their churches and schools; they employ common school teachers, without regard to the church they belong to, which shows them to be as independent and free as other citizens in the community. They belong to what organisation they please, they are as well entitled to vote as the white man. Then, we are told that they have not a right to make a bargain, or to buy or sell. They sell their barley; they send their milk to the cheese factories; they buy and sell their horses, their buggies, their reaping and mowing machines, the same as white citizens. I could name a gentleman employed by this House who lends money to the Indians on the reserves, and who gets his interest as regularly as from white men, and perhaps more so. Under these circumstances, why should they not vote? But hon, gentlemen opposite say we compare the farmers' sons with the Indians. I contend in many cases that the Indian is as good as a white man, I care not whether he is English, Irish, Scotch, German or Canadian. Why is he not? Is he not a responsible being? He is just as loyal and good as the Grits who sneer at him. I ask if the farmer's son has a right to sell or lease his father's farm. Has the mechanic's son the right to sell or lease his father's property? Not at all; yet he has the right to vote. Then, the Indian who has his land allotted to him, and has $150 worth of improvements made upon it, will, under this Bill, have a vote. I ask, does the Indian not pay cash for the lumber, nails, glass and putty he uses in his buildings, as well as the white man? If he puts barns and other buildings on his land why, in the name of common sense, should he not have the right to vote, if he has $150 worth of property? Is he not responsible to the laws of the country? Does he not wear clothes, and smoke tobacco, and pay duty, as well as any-body else? And does he not pay taxes upon these articles? Yet it is said we are not a friend of the Indian in allowing him to be enfranchised. contend that we are. If hon, gentlemen opposite discharge their duty on the different reserves, as I have tried, in my humble way, to discharge mine to the Indians of the east riding of Hastings, they would find the Indians qualified to vote as intelligent men. The hon. member for Middleses said, and I was proud to hear him say so, that he was quite willing to admit the Indians of the east riding of Hastings were further advanced in civilisation than any other Indians in the country. Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite discharge their duty to the Indians? Why do they not advise them? Tell them what is in their own interest and benefit; insist upon the Government doing their duty to them; and then you will have as good and intelligent Indians as there are in the east riding of Hastings. Hon, gentlemen opposite say we are going to have 100,000 votes less under this Bill than under the Mowat Act. I say it is not true; I say it will increase the vote; because property will be represented, no matter where situated, and a man will have the right to vote where he has taxable property, anywhere in the country. Take the Bill, as it is now proposed to be passed, and it will be seen that the difference of income between $250 and $300 is very slight. There is no industrious mechanic or laborer who will not earn $300, and when you take a $100 assessed value, you will find it will give $150 real value, and thus give the vote to men who are on the assessment roll for $100. I am satisfied, as soon as this Bill passes, there will be no trouble over it in any part of the country. I have had the pleasure of meeting my constituents two or three times since the Bill has been introduced, and did not hear a person say a word about the franchise; their only cry was: Why is the House remaining so long in Session, for we see nothing wrong or injurious in the Bill, and when we get Mr. Mowat's Bill, and put the two side by side, we are satisfied the difference will be so slight that there is nothing to find fault with? Hon. gentlemen opposite are keeping this House in session a great deal longer than they should; they know that very few hon. gentlemen can afford to remain here from their business and their homes, and it becomes exceedingly monotonous to have to listen from day day to the same speeches. The hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat, made a few remarks on this question. But how many times had he addressed the House already? Some eight or nine times. Has he not read the same clause eight or nine times over? I believe this Bill should pass. Do we not give votes to Africans and all other people, and if the African, coming from the South perhaps, a slave, has the right to vote, why should not the Indian have that right? The Indians on the Mohawk reserve celebrated their centennial in September; they left their homes in order to live under the British flag; they have, for a hundred years, owned property and managed it and paid their debts, and why should they not be given the vote, as other men? How is it that the Province of Quebec is not finding fault with this Bill, or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, or Manitoba? The whole objection comes from the Province of Ontario. I contend that the changes made in this Bill are not as great as those made by Mr. Mowat in his Bill of last spring, yet where did the Conservative party hold meetings, get up petitions, and keep the House in session, as hon. gentlemen are doing? Hon, gentlemen opposite criticised the Bill unfairly and not impartially. The best evidence that the right hon. the leader of the Government is acting in the best interests of the country is that scarcely one of the leaders of the Opposition remains in the House, with the exception of the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), and he is not satisfied with the tactics pursued by hon, gentlemen opposite. They can sit there till September so can we, and until October, November and December. We have just as much interest in the progress of this country as hon gentlemen opposite, and are as anxious as they to have good laws, and keep the House in session as long as they please; the Government supporters will do their duty and stand true to the Government, even should this Session run into the next. We, on this side, when in Opposition, did not pursue this course. We had a policy; we educated the country up to it, and appealed to the country successfully on it at two elections.

Mr. MILLS. Did not the hon, gentleman's leader say that if the gerrymandering Bill had been proposed by us on that side, and he had been with the Opposition, he would have taken care that the House would have been in session until August before he would allow it to pass.

Mr. WHITE. Did you hear him say so? I think you must have dreamed it; no person in this House heard him say so. The hon. gentleman would not make such rash statements. The Opposition said, withdraw your Franchise Bill; but it will not be withdrawn. It will become law, and hon. gentlemen opposite may as well know it first as last.

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister ought to be able to speak for himself.

Mr. WHITE. I am proud of the Indians in the east riding of Hastings. I am happy to say they will intelligently and impartially exercise the franchise, without being compelled to vote. They do not allow the Government to control them; they control their own business, and I hope the Indian will live to see the day when he will have a seat in this House. He will not then be criticised, and misrepresented, and slandered, as he is now. I say the criticism of the Indians by hon. gentlemen opposite is unfair and untruthful.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not intend to take up the time of the committee with a speech to-night. I had intended to speak on the Indian question, but the debate has been so prolonged that I will content myself with moving an amendment to the amendment which the hon, the First Minister has submitted to the House, and I will do it almost in silence. I have a few words, however, to say, in order to make my amendment intelligible With reference to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, which I suppose were intended not for the House but for the country, I think his charge against hon, gentlemen on this side is most unfair and unjust. The remark made by his own leader, who has had more experience in Parliament than even he, with his boasted sixteen years' sittings here, should suffice to convince him that a Bill of such a radical nature as this cannot be disposed of in the summary way in which ordinary legislation is disposed of. The First Minister is on record as saying in his place, as leader of the House, that a Bill of this kind, to be properly considered, should occupy the attention of Parliament for a whole Session, and the hon. gentleman knows-or if not, he has learned by this time, and those associated with him have learned also-that, if important Bills of this character are brought down in the expiring days of a Session, in the hope that they will be forced through without criticism or debate, those hon. gentlemen have counted without their host, so far as the Opposition in this House are concerned. If the hon. gentleman intended that this Bill should receive that consideration which its importance deserves, it might have been brought down, and should have been brought down, within a fortnight or three weeks of the opening of the House; and the six or eight weeks we spent here, doing little or nothing, meeting and adjourning, after conversation on some trivial subjects, might very well have been devoted to the consideration of this Bill, and the cost—opposite, and are as auxious as they to have good laws, and we discharge our duties as citizens just as well. They can country will suffer from the prolongation of this debate would have been entirely saved, had the First Minister brought down the Bill at the time he ought, when it could have been considered and discussed, and passed through without any undue prolongation of the Session. The hon, gentleman devoted himself to proving that the Indians on the reserve in his district are worthy of the franchise; and, to hear him argue, one would suppose that they did not come within the provisions of the Indian Act at all. They are free men, he tells us; they own their land; they lease their land; they buy, they sell, they make contracts, they incur liabilities and discharge them. The hon. gentleman must either be very ignorant or, if the facts exist as he says they do, matters are carried on there in direct violation of the law of the land, and he should at once take steps to withdraw the Indians on his reserve from the operation of the Indian Act. The hon, gentleman ought to know, and if he will take the trouble to read the Act before him, he will see at once, that his statement that they have the power to lease any lands on their reserve is not correct. No matter how educated they may be, no matter how civilised they may be, the law has declared that every one of them. until he is enfranchised, is a minor, a child, a ward of the Superintendent General. The 38th section expressly enacts

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Are you aware that we have been forty-two days on this Bill now?

"No reserve or portion of a reserve shall be sold, alienated or leased, until it has been released or surrendered to the Crown for the purposes of this Act."

And then follow the exceptions:

"Excepting that in cases of aged, sick and infirm Indians, and widows or children left without a guardian, or in the cases of Indians engaged in the practice of any one of the learned professions, or in teaching schools, or in pursuing a trade which interferes with their cultivating land on the reserve, the Superintendent General shall have the power to lease, for their support or benefit, the lands to which they are entitled." So that, even if an Indian on his reserve has become an educated man, has joined one of the learned professions, standing on a par with one of the most educated men in the first city of Dominion, the law tells him he is a minor in its eyes, and he cannot sell or lease or dispose of one acre of that land. When the hon gentlemen removes these disqualifications from the Indians on his reserve, when he places them on the footing he says they stand upon, the footing of free men, who are able to contract, and have incurred the liabilities and have the privileges, and possess the qualifications and the disqualifications of citizens, the conclusion of his argument would be a sound one—they should have the right to vote. But, until he establishes these facts, and until he exempts them from the operation of the Indian Act, or until they themselves take advantage of the provisions of the Indian Act and become enfranchised, and own the location on which they live, and in accordance with the 88th section of the Act:

"From the date of such letters patent all distinction between the legal rights, privileges, disabilities and liabilities of Indians, and those of Her Majesty's other subjects, shall cease to apply to such Indian, or to the wife or minor unmarried children of such Indian."

Until that time he must not talk about their standing in the same position or upon the same footing as farmers' sons or mechanics' sons, or any other free men. The hon. gentleman, although I have no doubt, in my own mind, that it was farthest from his thoughts, deliberately insulted every farmer's son in this Dominion. I do not think he intended to do it, but when he told the farmers' sons and the mechanics' sons that they were no better and no freer, and occupied no better position, and were no more independent, quoad their vote, than the Indian on the reserve, who cannot buy or sell, who is not independent in any respect, who is the ward of the Superintendent General, and cannot do anything without his consent, he insulted the free and independent sons of the farmers and mechanics of this country. In looking at the amendment proposed by the First Minister, I notice that, although Manitoba, Keewatin and Mr. DAVIES.

is not mentioned at all. I think I may fairly say that the House has not been treated fairly with respect to that amendment. Although my own parliamentary experience has been very short, I have read a good deal of parliamentary history, and I think I might fairly challenge, in Britain itself, or in any one of its dependencies, the production of a Bill of one-half the radical importance of this Bill, affecting so deeply, as this does, the very constitution of the country, by which so many thousands of the hitherto free citizens of this Dominion are disqualified, and so many more thousands are enfranchised, who have never been thought of or recognised as free citizens, who have never been dreamt of as exercising the crowning privilege of a free citizen, namely, a vote, which has been thrust upon the Table without any explanation whatever. I want to know if there is a gentleman sitting on this committee who understands why British Columbia has been excluded from this amendment.

Mr. WHITE. They are good Indians.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not ask the hon, member for East Hastings. He makes such ridiculous and childish remarks that I do not think they are worth noticing. I ask any hon, gentleman in this committee, why have the Indians of British Columbia been placed upon a different footing from the Indians of Manitoba? Is it because they are better educated? Is it because they are better qualified? I am not going to weary the committee by reading extracts from the Indian report of the First Minister, with respect to the Indians of British Columbia, but I am going to call attention to the silence, to the ominous silence of hon. gentlemen who represent British Columbia in this House. There has not been a statement made by any responsible gentleman in this committee to justify the giving the franchise to the British Columbia Indian while witholding it from the Manitoba Indian. We are voting in the dark; we are voting without explanation. The First Minister evidently does not consider it necessary to give any explananation whatever. There is one curious fact in connection with the Indians of British Columbia, to which I wish to call attention. Since this debate began I may say that I have read more Indian literature than I ever did before, ard I find that while, according to the Indian Act, the Indians of many of the Provinces are entitled, after undergoing a certain probation, and by getting the sanction of the band to which they belong, and by getting the approval of the Superintendent General, to become free men and possess the rights and disabilities and liabilities that belong to a free citizen of a free country, that while that right extends to the Indians of all the other Provinces, it does not extend to those of British Columbia. The British Columbia Indian must always remain a ward and a slave, and these are the men, numbering, approximately, 40,000, that you propose to enfranchise and place on a par with the free citizens of this Dominion; these are the men who, by your own legislation, you have declared are unfit even to be enfranchised, who never can become enfranchised, who cannot own land, who cannot contract to sell or to buy, who are slaves, to all intents and purposes—these are the men you single out by your Bill for enfranchisement. Sir, while you are doing that in British Columbia, on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, what are you doing down in the Provinces on the Atlantic Ocean? In Prince Edward Island you are taking 1,500 or 2,000 of the best young men in the island and disfranchising them. You have committed a cruel and wicked wrong, and you know it; and you justify that according to the law, or the principles, laid down by the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), as the law of compensation—the only answer he gives to it. The 2,000, the 4,000, the 5,000 Indians who are not capable of being enfranchised under the Indian Act in British Columbia, are the North-West Territories are mentioned, British Columbia given the privileges of free citizens, but you are depriving young men who, for thirty years, have exercised that right in Prince Edward Island, from exercising the franchise hereafter. And that is the law of compensation. That is the just, the fair, the honest Bill that you want us to accept, without criticism, without remark, and more than that, not only in this House, but through your press, you condemn us for raising a voice against it. It is based upon iniquity from beginning to end, and you know it. The hon. gentleman knows it. It cannot be defended, either here or in the press, or on the platform, where the facts are acknowledged. You do more than that. You go to the Province of New Brunswick and you disfranchise men by the hundred. We have had a report from the county of York alone of 800 free mon who are to be disfranchised, of 500 in adjoining county of Sunbury, 500 in the constituency of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. King), and the same proportion, no doubt, exists in other constituencies of New Brunswick, from which we have not yet got returns. You do this, and you do it, as it becomes you, in solemn silence, and you complain because we, on this side, raise our voices in protest against the iniquitous outrage. I can tell hon, gentlemen that throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion an agitation is spreading, but nowhere is it so strong as in the Province of New Brunswick, if I can believe the letters that come from there and the reports of my hon. friends around me.

Mr. TEMPLE. I can show you some letters, also, that perhaps you would like to read.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon, gentleman does receive letters—and I don't dispute it—they are directly opposed to those I have seen received by gentlemen on this side of the House; and it is a most extraordinary thing, and no doubt it will seem extraordinary to the people, that although, in the hon, gentleman's own constituency, where these men are being disfranchised—the hon, gentleman cannot deny it—not only does he view this Bill with complacency but, with positive approval.

Mr. TEMPLE. Well, I do deny it.

Mr. DAVIES. You deny the figures which are given? Does the hon, gentleman deny the figures which are taken from the assessment rolls of Sunbury, Queen's and York counties? Here is the paper which I have in my hand, giving the names, a paper which comes from his own county.

Mr. TEMPLE. What is the name of the paper?

Mr. DAVIES. The York Gleaner.

Mr. TEMPLE. Oh, oh!

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman laughs, but his laughter is no answer. This paper gives the name of every parish in his constituency; it gives the number in each parish that has been disfranchised by this Bill; it shows that 804 persons, outside the city of Fredericton, have been disfranchised. And the hon, gentleman has formally accepted the disfranchisement, and given his reasons for in But what I am discussing now is the abominable injustice, the double injustice, you are doing, that while you are disfranchising these free men who, certainly, have never shown themselves unfit to exercise the franchise, you are, acting upon this wonderful law of compensation, making up for it by giving the franchise to the Indians of British Columbia, who are not capable, even by your own standard, of ever becoming free citizens. The law does not allow them. The law says—I suppose there must be some object in exempting them from the privilege offered to other Indians—they shall not become enfranchised; they shall not own the land and become free citizens. Still you are enfranchising them. That is a matter, to a large extent, resting with the members from British Columbia. An hon, member from that Province, I think, a few days ago expressed approval of this enfranchising clause, so far as Indians are concerned in that Province. At all events, all the members from British Columbia voted for it. The way we look at it is that, when the members for a Province vote for a particular scheme, we think they must know more about it than other members. My amendment does not propose to touch British Columbia. The hon, members from that Province must take the responsibility of their actions and must give an account to their constituents. But I propose to add to the amendment the words Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. In other words, I seek to place those five Provinces in the same position, in regard to the Indians, as is Manitoba. The hon member for East Hastings says that in this country we admit the blacks and persons irrespective of color to the franchise. Thank God, in this country there is no distinction of color. If a man is a free citizen we do not care whether he is black, brown or white; but we draw a distinction between a slave and a free man. I, in common with, I think, two members, hold peculiar views with respect to the Chinese. I was not in favor of their being disfranchised; but both sides of the House were in wonderful unanimity, and favored it. The hon. member for East Hastings was in favor of disfranchising the Chinese.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I was not in the House at the time when the vote was taken.

Mr. DAVIES. Then you are in favor of enfranchising the Chinese.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I am in favor of enfranchising the

Mr. DAVIES. Then there are four of us, and we make quite a strong party. The hon, member for East Hastings spoke of the Indians on his reserve, not only as being free men in all respects, but as being liable to taxation and subject to all the disabilities and liabilities of white men.

Mr. WHITE. I said they pay taxes.

Mr. DAVIES. The law says distinctly that they shall not be liable to any taxation. (The hon. gentleman quoted a section of the Act). So the hon. gentleman's statement of facts is without foundation.

Mr. WHITE. I said that Indians, equally with white men, pay taxes to municipalities; that money is taken to build roads and bridges. The Indian council provides money to build half the bridges and keep them in repair.

Mr. DAVIES. I am dealing with the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that Indians were liable to taxation, the same as white men. I say that every statement on which the hon. gentleman has based a conclusion is erroneous.

Mr. WHITE. I say they pay taxes—they pay duties to this Government, the same as other citizens.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman says they pay duties, the same as white men pay, on the reserves.

Mr. WHITE. The same as any other men.

Mr. DAVIES. I repeat that the facts on which the hon, gentleman has based his conclusion are erroneous. There is no tax payable on a reserve. The hon, member (Mr. White) wound up by saying that the Indians were just as much entitled to enfranchisement as a white man. They are taught from childhood to look up to the Superintendent General, at whose dictation they will vote when this Bill becomes law. So far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, no one member has dared to rise in his place and say there is an Indian in the three Maritime Provinces who is fit to exercise the franchise. They are a degraded and dying race, going down before civilisation; they are deteriorating year by year; they are a degraded and ignorant race, who will not have the slightest conception of what Parliament means by this legislation, but who will be ready to sell their vote to the highest bidder when they get it. The attempt to confer the franchise on such Indians and to disfranchise white people is one of the most infamous propositions ever submitted to a christian Parliament. I challange any hon. member from the Maritime Provinces, on either side of the House, to rise and tell the committee that in his opinion the Indians of those Provinces form a class of men who are worthy of being enfranchised. I turn up to the reports of the Indian Department—and if the reports with respect to other Provinces are on a par with this one, they are very misleading—and I find the following with respect to the Indians of Prince Edward Island:

"In the case of some of the non-resident Indians—for instance, those at Rocky Point—it is perhaps better that they should remain where they are, as they are doing tolerably well, from an industrial point of view, and occupy comfortable houses."

It is absurd to talk about those Indians occupying comfortable houses and doing pretty well. They live in wretched cabins and in birch-bark wigwams, and depend on the charity of the people in the towns. Every hon, member from the Province knows that fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES. The jeers and sneers of hon gentlemen opposite are not going to make matters any better. There will be a day of reckoning, when hon gentlemen opposite will have to come face to face with those whom they have disfranchised. And I do not know that, perhaps, you will be as much the gainers as you imagine you will be. I move, in amendment, to add after the words "North-West Territories" the words, "Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman said he would move his resolution silently, or that he would merely make a few remarks. He has kept his word.

Mr. DAVIES. You have to thank the hon, member for East Hastings for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My attention has been called to a statement made some time ago, in the discussion on the word "Indian"—that Manitoba, the North-West Territories, Keewatin and British Columbia, should be excepted. Since that time I have heard a good deal of debate on the matter. I have heard some hon, gentlemen of the other side speak about the Indians of British Columbia, and state that they were superior to the North-West Indians, that they were much more industrious than the prairie Indians, or the Indians of the plain. One hon gentleman from British Columbia spoke in favor of their being allowed the franchise, and I had the impression that that was the general impression. I have, however, been reminded that I had made that speech, and I would now move that the words "British Columbia" should be inserted as well as Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territories.

Mr. MILLS. I referred, in the early part of the afternoon, to a matter with reference to the amendment which the First Minister has put in your hands. I again call the attention of the committee to the phraseology of this amendment. It states the Indians "in Manitoba, Keewatin, the North-West Territories, or any Indian on any reserve, who is not in possession, etc.," shall be disqualified, except on the conditions herein stated. Now, what would be the effect if we were to adopt the provision of this Act without this amendment? I think it is clear that the Indian would be entitled to vote upon precisely the same conditions, with regard to property, whether that property be their interest in the reservation, as any other class of the community similarly situated. The occupant on an Indian reservation would have the same right to vote, under section 6, which we have already adopted, as the occupant of any other property in the country. I ask the attention of any lawyer in this House to the wording of that section, and I say that, so long as an Indian is on a reserve, he must, under the amendment, have improvements worth, the value of at least $150. But if he is not on a reserve what is his position? Supposing he is one of a band, and chooses to withdraw from the reserve, then he does not require these improvements and the provisions of section 6 will apply to him; and if the whole of an Indian band were to withdraw from the reservation and reside elswhere, the value of that reserve must be considered, and if it is sufficient to give each one a vote, he is entitled to such a vote. I think that is as plain as any matter can well be, and as to the legal construction there is really no room for doubt. Apart from that, I wish to call the attention of the committee to some observations made by the First Minister, as to the ground for enfranchising the Indians under the provisions of this Act. The hon, gentleman said:

"Oh, let me get through. When the word "Indian" was put into the Act by myself, I must say that I had reference in my own mind to the Indians of the old Provinces, where they are educated and have been under a civilising process for years and years, where they have schools, where they can read and write—the greater portion of tnem. I take it that the Indians in the Province of Ontario, as a rule, can read as well as the white man."

And again he said:

"If you go to any of the reserves in the older Provinces, you will find that the Indians have good houses, that they and their families are well clad, the education of their children is well attended to, their morals are good, their strong religious feeling is evident. You will find as good churches and as regular church-goers among the red men as among the white men. You will find that in every respect they have a right to be considered as equal with the whites."

Now, against his statement that the education of their children is well attended to, that their morals are good, and that their religious feeling is evident, I put the statements he has made in his report to His Excellency the Governor General, in which he says that the Indian children, in order to have any chance of success, must be taken from under the control of their parents and from under parental influence. I ask the hon, gentleman to reconcile the one statement with the other. He declares that the Indians are living in good houses. I contest that statement, and I challenge him to the proof. I declare that it is not true. I declare that if he grants a commission I will prove that it is not true—that it is wanting in accuracy in every particular. I will show that Indians are not educated, as he says they are educated, that they are not attending schools, as he says they are attending schools. I will show that they are not attending church, as he says they are attending churches. Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman will only examine his own reports he will see that his statement is not a true statement. It does not represent the facts as they are, and I charge the hon. gentleman with making a statement which was intended to mislead the committee and the country in this particular. Sir, let him look at these reports and compare the statements made in them during the past five years with the statements made in that speech.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon gentleman is exceeding the limits when he says the First Minister intended to mislead the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order, and I call attention to your own ruling. I must say that, after what passed from the First Minister to my hon. friend from Bothwell to-day already, which you ruled in order, I cannot conceive that my hon. friend can be out of order in making this statement.

regard to property, whether that property be their interest in the reservation, as any other class of the community similarly situated. The occupant on an Indian reservation would have the same right to vote, under section 6, which statements that were not true—of making false statements. Now, I am not making a charge the evidence of which is not before the committee. I referred here to a speech, and I read the words. I turned to his own report and I referred him to the words of that report. He says in that report that the parental influence of the Indians is such that the children cannot be improved without taking them out of reach of that influence. He declares that their influence is as good as that of the white population, and that they are as intelligent. Why, Sir, I tell him that four-fifths of the Indian population over twenty-one years of age cannot read or write.

Mr. FARROW. How do you know?

Mr. MILLS. I know that is so, and I am ready to establish the fact if it is contested; and yet, Sir, here is a statement made as a pretext for the enfranchisement of these Indians that is not accurate in any one particular. Now, I call the attention of the committee to that fact, and I ask them whether they are ready to vote that these men ought to be enfranchised upon the hon. First Minister's statement, which every hon. gentleman in this House, knowing anything of the Indian population, knows is wholly at variance with the facts.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived. Yeas, 42; nays, 68.

On amendment of Sir John A. Macdonald,

Mr. BLAKE. If a reason were wanted for the protraction of this debate, which the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) said was too protracted, it would be found in the proposal now before us. The hon. First Minister has felt the situation to be so extraordinary that he began yesterday afternoon by proposing to amend his own clause; and that having been before the committee for two days, he is now proposing to amend his own amendment. I do not object, on the point of form; I do not insist that he shall find a colleague to amend his amendment for him. Yet the hon, member for East Hastings says the debate ought not to be protracted. Why, if it had not been protracted up to this time the hon. First Minister would not have seen light. His mind has been in a state of flux and fluctuation. There are 125,000 Indians in the Dominion, by the census. And he began by telling us that he was going to enfranchise them all—at least, all the male adults, or very nearly all. Well, after a fortnight or so of discussion, he decided that he would not enfranchise the Indians of Manitoba, the North-West Territories, Keewatin or British Columbia. After the lapse of another fortnight he comes down and says: I have changed my mind again. I am not going to enfranchise the Indians of Manitoba, Keewatin and the North-West Territories, but I will enfranchise the Indians of British Columbia. And now we have, I will not say his last thoughts, but his last thoughts up to this moment, and some 35,000 Indians who, an hour ago, were to have the franchise are disfranchised again. Consider what a proportion of the population of British Columbia that is. Why, it is the largest half of the whole population of British Columbia that the hon. gentleman is disfranchising.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No.

Mr. BLAKE. How many are there altogether in British Columbia, does the hon, gentleman say? I suppose he does not know. Well, it is a fluctuating quantity. Of course, the hon, gentleman will understand that when I say the larger half I was not including the disfranchised Chinese. The census returns give the whites as 19,000 odd, the Indians as 25,000 odd and the Chinese as 4,350. Since that time, of course, we know there has been a considerable increase in the Chinese population.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. And the whites have doubled.

Mr. BLAKE. I was going to say something about the whites, but the hon. gentleman will allow me, considering his views, not to mix the whites and the Chinese together; I was dealing with the Chinese separately. I say the Chinese have very largely increased; but a considerable time ago we decided that the Chinese should not have the franchise. I do not include them in the population of British Columbia; but when I find by the census that there are 25,000 Indians, and by the last Indian report of the hon. First Minister that there are some 35,000, I want to know how many whites there are, and whether my statement is incorrect, that as to the voting population of British Columbia, as it was an hour ago, the Indians are the larger half of it.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The white population has increased since then some 15,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite aware that the white population has very considerably increased since that time, that a considerable proportion of that population are engaged in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that it is uncertain how many of that portion of the population will remain in the country. But I will accept the hon. gentleman's figures; I will assume that there is an increase of 15,000. Well, 15,000 and 9,000 make 34,000, and the tabulated statement in the hon. First Minister's report for 1884 gives the number of Indians as 34,617. So that the larger moiety of the voting population of British Columbia, as it was an hour ago, as it is this minute, until this amendment carries, is the Indian population. Well, I say this is an important question. It is a question with reference to the Province of British Columbia, about which the hon. First Minister has been in a state of doubt and suspense for this long time; he has been hither and thither, up and down, forward and backward. What motives, what arguments, what views, have procured the results he has indicated to the House from time to time as his intentions? We do not know. We are told without reasonable explanation what the hon. gentleman's conclusions are. He begins by telling my hon. friend: Yes, the Indians of British Columbia are to be enfranchised. Some time afterwards he said: I do not think very much of them; I do not intend to enfranchise the Indians of British Columbia. Two days ago he said: Yes, I do. Now, after two days' debate he says: No, I do not. I do not know whether this may lead to the conclusion that, as the hon. gentleman began by intending to enfranchise the whole Indian population in all the Provinces, numbering 131,000, and as of these 131,000 he has now excluded by this amendment the great bulk from the franchise, perhaps, if the debate continues a little longer, at a subsequent stage of the Bill the hon. gentleman may continue in the same path; and although he is not disposed this evening, although he is not yet ready to adopt the amendment of my hon friend from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), yet considering what we have found has taken place in the hon gentleman's mind, after the deliberation and discussion, although one-sided, during which we have been endeavoring to convince him, further discussion may have its effect; each drop of water affects the rock, and equally good results may ensue with regard to the small remnant of the Indian population the hon, gentleman now proposes to enfranchise. I am sure that would be the result, were not the hon. gentleman's secret object, nay his obvious object, in the whole matter, connected with the Indians of the older Provinces, and not with the Indians of the other Provinces. I am sure the hon. gentleman from Victoria, who furnished the right hon. gentleman with figures with reference to British Columbia, has heard with confusion and shame this last declaration of the First Minister. We know, from what he said the other day, what his feelings are. He was anxious that the red man should be given the franchise as a free and independent voter, and for a fortnight he was in gloom because the hon. gentleman said the Indians in British Columbia would not be enfranchised; but after a fortnight, the First Minister declared that, after listening to the hon. gen tleman's appeal, he would enfranchise the Indians. Two days later, however, after the hon gentleman felt that the few words which had fallen from him on the floor of the committee had changed the iron will of the First Minister, he finds the iron will has become bent again, and his Indian friends are not to be enfranchised after all. We will, no doubt. have another eloquent appeal from him, with a view to preventing the passage of the amendment, and to securing for those Indians in tribal communities the rights and liberties he thought he had obtained for them, but which now he finds snatched from the lip that was about to drink. If anything was wanting to show that this debate has not been so needlessly protracted as the hon, member for East Hastings declares it has, it is these fluctuations of the First Minister. He has been gathering light from various quarters. At one time he has viewed the subject in one way; at another time he has viewed it in another way; his mind changes as the debate progresses. We now find him settled to the view that, of 131,000 Indians in the Dominion, only that smaller portion resident in the older Provinces of the Dominion is to be enfranchised. I am not, myself, about to oppose the hon. gentleman's amendment to the amendment; I think it is a very good one. Second and third thoughts are better, but I think this is about the fourth thought, and fourth thoughts are the best on this occasion, for on them he has arrived at a right conclusion with reference to the Indians of British Columbia; and perhaps, at the second stage of the Bill, we may find the hon gentleman has reached a right conclusion with reference to the Indians elsewhere.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I ventured, in the few remarks that I made to the committee last night, to say that the clause as proposed by the First Minister would not become law in the shape in which it was. Though not claiming to have the gift of prophecy, I claim to have that prophetic utterance fulfilled. The clause has been amended; the Province of British Columbia has been added, whether as the result of the extracts I read from the reports of the First Minister himself to His Excellency the Governor General, I cannot say. It has been added, at any rate, to the great displeasure of the junior member for British Columbia (Mr. Shakespeare), who has been so anxious to have the Indians of that Province enfranchised. I read extracts from the report of the First Minister himself, where he pointed out that heathen polygamous tribes engaged in their heathenish practices, and maintained that it would be impossible, or at least unwise, by process of law, to attempt preventing their indulging in heathenish rites, and I contrasted that condition with the condition of some of the tribes of Manitoba that were being excluded, notably the St. Peter Indians, to whom he has in his report given a good character. We have now, as the result of more mature consideration, the proposition of the First Minister to do what I ventured last night to say he would have to do, exclude those polygamous tribes of British Columbia from participating in the vote he is about to confer on other Indians. The First Minister said the reason he would exclude the Indians of the newer Provinces was because they had not the same facilities of education that the Indians of the older Provinces had. But what are the figures given by the Minister himself, in his report to the Governor General, with reference to the education of the different Indian bands in the different Provinces. He reports that out of 33,559 Indians in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, 1,261 are attending school; while in the Province of Quebec, out of 1,223, only 467 attend school; so that there are as many Indians attending school in Manitoba and the North-Mr. BLAKE.

107 attend school in Nova Scotia, 118 in New Brunswick and 15 in Prince Edward Island, yet deliberately he is excluding the Indians of Manitoba, who have more children, in proportion, going to school, than have the Indians in some other Provinces. There has been no straight line pursued by the Minister in this question, and hon, gentlemen stand there convicted in dealing with this Indian question, from their own action, from the change in their purposes and designs, of what they have been charged with, that the whole proposition to bring the Indians into the electorate of this country has been designed to weaken the force of one political party and to strengthen another. It is evident that it is not for the eleva-tion of the Indian. The amendment that is offered is based upon no line that can be justified, by reason, by common sense, or, I was going to say, by decency. There are sense, or, I was going to say, by decency. There are Indians and Indians, as the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) said last night, and if the desire was to deal with these Indians in an intelligent manner, the way to deal with them is that laid down in the Indian Act, not to give the vote to whole bodies at once. In the Province of Ontario there are bands of Indians and there are bands of Indians. There are some members of a band who are intelligent, and who are far more advanced than other members of There are other bands which have the same band. attained to comparative intelligence, and according to the report of the Minister, there are those which are sunk low in ignorance and low in habit, and yet there is no distinction drawn, no educational distinction, no distinction other than that of property, which the most ignorant Indian in any Province may have as well as anyone else. I hold, then, that it is proved that this proposition is not for the advancement or the benefit of the Indian. If the First Minister has determined to throw aside the consideration that we think is of importance and that leads us to vote against his whole proposition, the fact that the most intelligent as well as the most ignorant Indian is under his control, has not the management of his own affairs, and is a minor in the eye of the law; if he will not regard that, and is determined to enfranchise some Indians, let him not do it by Provinces, or even by bands; let him have some kind of educational test, some test of capacity, but do not let him, in an indiscriminate way, give the vote to all the Indians in the Provinces, whether they be barbarian or civilised, ignorant or educated. True statesmanship would make that imperative on the part of the First Minister. You are doing discredit to the more advanced Indians, the Indians described by my hon. friend from East Hastings, by giving the most ignorant and debased Indians in the Provinces the same right, provided they have $150 worth of improvements made, in If the First the judgment of a revising officer. Minister will not regard it as an objection that these men are not free men-and that they do not desire to become free men is evidenced by their not taking advantage of the Indian Act—there might be some justification for selecting some individuals out of the bands of the hon. member for East Hastings, some of the bands in my own county, and many others; but this proposition is to force this vote upon the most debased, uneducated and illiterate Indians. There is more involved in this Indian question than I think the First Minister has comprehended. I can speak disinterestedly in this matter, for the effect upon an individual should have no weight in doing an act of justice, if it be an act of justice, to a community, but there are questions involved in this which require more serious consideration before they are dealt with. Why do not the educated and intelligent Indians avail themselves of the machinery for enfranchisement contained in the Indian Act? The First Minister would tell you that it is because they desire to preserve their tribal relations. Is not that a declaration on the part of those educated and intelligent Indians that West, in proportion, as are in the Province of Quebec. Only I they do not want to become citizens of this country in the ull acceptation of the term, but that they want to remain part of their tribes, and to preserve their separate nationality, and to have their voice and their influence there. As they would resent any attempt on the part of their white brethern who surround them to enter upon their reserves, and vote for their chiefs, and make their rules and regulations, they will be precluded-and no doubt they will look at it in that light-from exercising the vote which is propose to be given to them. There are other considerations. Has the First Minister considered the whole cost? How are you to vote many of these ignorant Indians? Will your voters' list be printed in their language? Will the notices you give them be in their language? In the more intelligent bands in my own county, when some Indian cases come up in the courts of justice, the interpreter has to be there, and how will the Indian interpret your law, how will he know what answer to give when the question is put to him, "For whom do you vote?" The interpreter will have to be there. These Indians speak different languages and dialects, and many of them refuse to converse in English, though, perhaps, in a measure, they understand it. We are indiscriminately bringing into the electorate of this country a people who are foreign to us in a certain sense, and who desire to remain so. If the First Minister desires, as I believe he does, to see wiped out the distinctions that exist, I am at one with him in that. But this Bill does not propose to do that. That is provided for in the Indian law; under that law those Indians who desire enfranchisement must get people to vouch for them, and after they have been vouched for, the Superintendent General must exercise his discretion, and then they must serve a probationary term of three years before they are allowed to obtain their land in fee simple, which is then entailed, so that they cannot part with it. There you have a process of selection, and yet, while proposing to retain those provisions, the hon. gentleman proposes to give them all the right to vote at once, making no distinction between the intelligent and the unintelligent, the heathen and the Christian, the semi-civilised and the civilised Indian. I hold that if the First Minister is earnest in his desire to benefit the Indian, to elevate him, he should, at any rate, let this matter stand over till he has given it a little more consideration, and until he sees that this Bill will be perfectly useless to accomplish in the slightest degree the elevation of any Indian in this country, and to consider the way in which the different bands of Indians view their relation to the Crown, and are likely to view this clause, which, I believe, many of them will not avail themselves of. If the First Minister will not recognise, as we do, that the Indians, being in a state of tutelage, not free men, in the full sense of the word, without the responsibility of citizens, they should therefore not be given the right to vote, I do ask him to have some process of selection, whereby those who are best fitted should be given the vote. It is a new thing altogether that an Indian should have the vote, and if he will bring some of them within the electorate it is but reasonable that some distinction should guide us in giving the vote to other than the mere possession by the Indian of $150 worth of improvements on the land he holds.

Amendment to amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to.

Mr. TROW. There are a certain class of men on each of the reserves who, from their superior intelligence over the bands with whom they associate, and with whom they are connected, should have the right to the franchise—I refer to those half-breeds who are still the wards of the Government and are connected with the band, but are of superior education and intelligence. I move, in amendment to the amendment:

Indians or persons of part Indian blood who have not been partly enfranchised, and Indians or persons with part Indian blood who reside among Indians.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think this amendment is in order, in view of the amendment which the committee has already voted down.

Mr. MILLS. That was a different clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a disabling clause.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a distinction; it is going a step farther than we went before. The proposition we offered before was voted down, and that was that only enfranchised Indians should have a vote. This proposition includes Indians who have not been enfranchised under the Indian Act, but who are living among white people, who have property, and are subject to the responsibilities of property, occupying a different position from Indians on the reserves, whose property is not liable to seizure. This proposition is that of the Mowat Act, word for word, that has been commended, and which the First Minister said he was humbly following. It embraces the very class of voters that the Mowat Act does.

Mr. BLAKE. We are now upon the clause proposed by the First Minister to disqualify certain classes of Indians, which disqualifies all Indians who, but for this proposed amendment, would be qualified, all Indians excepting those who have improvements to the value of $150. Now, has the committee decided that these Indians shall have a vote? If it has, then the hon, gentleman's amendment is not in order. But the hon. gentleman's amendment proposes to disqualify a certain class of Indians who, but for this proposal, would have a vote, and it cannot but be in order to make another proposition with reference to the disqualification of certain classes of Indians. It cannot be only the First Minister's proposals that are in order and those of other hon, members of the House that are to be out of order. You will observe he proposes the disqualification of certain Indians who, under the Bill as it now stands, would be qualified. I think he is quite right to propose that, because there was a distinct understanding that when the disqualitying clauses came we should be able to propose disqualifying amendments, and the First Minister, in pursuance of that, has proposed, without objection, a disqualifying amendment; and now my hon. friend proposes to disqualify all those Indians who are living on the reserves. He proposes to leave the vote to the Indians who are enfranchised, who are not living on the reserves. It is simply an enlargement of the disqualifying amendment of the First Minister. The First Minister says: I will disqualify the reserve Indian, unless he lives on a separate allotment and his improvements are worth $150. That you consider in order. Now my hon, friend says: I want to disqualify the Indian who is living on the reserve altogether. It is a question of degree, not of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It brings up the whole question we have been discussing. It is in order.

Mr. FLEMING. The proposition of my hon. friend is to exclude from the franchise all Indians except those not wholly enfranchised under the Indian Act, or such as have not separated themselves from the band and acquired property, the same as other people in the country. I urge upon the First Minister the adoption of this amendment, for the reasons, already urged, and for other reasons. I urge it because the House has, at his instance, adopted the proposition to require a holder of property in cities and towns to have property to the value of $300 and $200 before entitled to vote. I urge it because the workingmen of this country, for whom the hon, gentleman has professed in the past very warm regard, are required to have $300 of property as a necessity for them to exercise the franchise. The hon. gentleman proposes to confer upon Indians, who have no civil capacity, who do not add to the wealth of the country, the right of vote, and in some instances to hold the balance of power in counties, on possessing $150 of improvements on the reserve, no matter how the improvements may have been obtained-no matter whether they were created by the Government or by any other means, whether the Government have cleared the farm or furnished the lumber to build the house. The hon. gentleman professes to be giving an enlarged franchise, and says this will be the means of giving the working people an influence in public affairs not hitherto possessed by them. But the hon gentleman is not reducing the franchise as low as obtains in some of the Provinces. The hon, gentleman is increasing the property qualification in Ontario for workingmen, but he is taking away from the working people rights they would possess but for this Bill, and giving the franchise to men who have a simple voting power of $150. I commend to the workingmen the hon. gentleman's conduct in this matter as their professed friend, and I urge upon him that while he requires a workingman to acquire, by his own industry, $300 worth of property to entitle him to vote, he is taking away that little influence left to the workingmen by giving the vote to Indians under his own control.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Trow) negatived.

Mr. KING. The members for New Brunswick have already called the attention of the Government to the fact that the Indians of that Province do not possess the qualifications which should entitle them to the franchise. I have not yet heard any hon. member from that Province rise and dispute the statement made by us in that regard. I might call attention to the report of the First Minister, but I desire specially to read a short extract from a speech delivered in this House by the hon, member from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). That hon, gentleman said:

"I may tell the right hon. Premier that I disagree entirely with the views he has expressed in relation to the Indians, so far as the section of country from which I come is concerned, at least. My Province is amongst the oldest Provinces of this Dominion. The early settlement of what was the Province of Nova Scotia, which covered the country of what was the Province of Nova Scotia, which covered the country from which I come, dates back several centuries, and it may be classed amongst the older Provinces of the Dominion; and I can tell the right hon, gentleman that the descriptions he has given of the Indians of the other Provinces are as far from the actual fact as day is from night; and I can fully endorse the statement made by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that any man who knows the tribal condition of these Indians—the miserable, wretched state in which they exist, their beggary, humiliating and debased condition—Ispeak of it with regret—and knowing it, could for one moment think of giving that class of people the elective franchise, simply could not have fairly considered what he was attempting to do. Sir, I am speaking my honest convictions, and I intend to do it to the end in this matter. The elective franchise is too sacred to be dealt with by prejudices, by party purposes or by whims." or by whims."

Those are the words of that hon. member, a gentleman who, I believe, on most occasions supports the Government. fully endorse the statement contained in that speech. believe it is as near the truth as anything yet stated, or that can be stated, in regard to the Indians of New Brunswick. If those statements made by the hon, member for Northum. berland are not correct, I should like any hon. member to rise in his place and contradict them. If those statements are true, and they have gone uncontradicted, should not an exception be made in favor of New Brunswick? If that statement be true, why should the Government seek to enfranchise the Indians of that Province? There is no reason why the Indians of New Brunswick should have the franchise conferred upon them. I will not say but that some hon, members may expect this proposition to affect their elections. I do not believe it will influence many elections. I know, in the county of Kent, there are indians, some of whom might be enfranchised under this Act.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I do not believe it will give one of them a vote.

Mr. KING. If, under this Bill, not one Indian in New Mr. FOSTER. If the hon, gentleman will take the Brunswick will be entitled to vote, then why impose it on Hansard report of his remarks, he will find that the state-Mr. FLEMING.

the Province? If, after one hundred years, the Indians are not qualified to vote under this Bill, why does the hon. gentleman insist on this clause?

Mr. LANDRY. Because it does no harm.

Mr. KING. It has the effect of interfering with people of the other Provinces.

Mr. LANDRY. We want to enlighten them.

Mr. KING. I do not consider it necessary that the Indians of New Brunswick should be enfranchised. There is not one Indian in New Brunswick who has $150 worth, or is fit to have the franchise conferred on him.

Mr. LANDRY. I was speaking of my own county, and I said I did not believe it would give one of them a vote.

Mr. KING. I believe they are as well qualified there as in any part of New Brunswick, and I know something about them. I say it is an outrage that these Indians should have the franchise conferred on them while the Bill would disfranchise a large number of the white people of New Brunswick. I procured from an officer in my county a statement of the number who would be disfranchised, and I am informed that, during my absence, the accuracy of that statement has been questioned. I can only say that the secretary treasurer of my county is a gentleman standing high in the estimation of the people of that county, that he is well known to almost every gentleman in this House from New Brunswick, that he fills the office of registrar of deeds, of secretary-treasurer, and some other important offices. I do not know that he had any interest in sending a report which was not correct. The statement was one which surprised me, but the facts are that this Bill, if it passes, will disfranchise a very large number of persons in my own county. I called the attention of another gentleman from another county to these figures, and he said he was surprised that such was the case. I told him that he had better inquire in his own county, and he looked over the lists and he found that there were some 804 who would be disfranchised in York county. The hon, member for Sunbury found that over 400 voters would be disfranchised in his county, and I say it is unfair to attempt, by a Bill of this kind, to disfranchise the white people in New Brunswick and enfranchise the Indians, when no gentleman will claim that there is an Indian in New Brunswick who is qualified to vote. I move, in amendment to the amendment, to add, after the words "North-West Territories," the words "New Brunswick."

Mr. FOSTER. I want the House to understand clearly what the assertion is that the hon. member for Queen's makes. Does he make the assertion before this House, that actual information has been sent to this House from either York, or Sunbury, or Queen's, that under the operation of this Bill exactly so many persons will be disfranchised? Is that the statement he makes? Or, is this the statement he makes: that information has been sent from those three counties, that on looking over the assessors' lists so many were found who were assessed on property of the value of $100, but less than the value of $150? Now, which of those is true, for there is a great difference?

Mr. KING. I would like to answer the hon. gentleman. The statement he last made is the statement I made, that on the assessment list the secretary-treasurer of my own county informs me that he finds—I do not recollect the exact number, but 420 and some odd persons, who are assessed on real estate of a less value than $150, but exceeding $100.

ment he made a little while ago and the statement he makes now are not one and the same. He stated before that that many would be disfranchised.

Mr. DAVIES. So there are.

Mr. KING. That would be the effect of it. I understand that the hon, gentleman has stated that the assessed value of property is far below the actual value, but I do not believe the hon. gentleman will go before his municipal council at the next meeting and tell them that they are appointing men, sworn to make a true valuation of property, for assessment purposes, based on the actual cash value of the property, and that these men do not do their duty. That may be correct of the officers of his own county, but it is a charge which I would not have the hardihood to apply to the officers of my county. I believe, on the contrary, that on account of the large depreciation in the value of real estate which has been going on in many parts of New Brunswick, property is assessed too high rather than too low. The lists in many places have remained the same for ten years. I am voting on property, myself, which I would sell for half its assessed value, and the hon member for Sunbury owns property in my county, and he is paying taxes on a valuation of $1,000 in excess of the value he puts upon it.

Mr. VAIL. When the First Minister made his short explanation with regard to this Bill, he gave us to understand that he intended to include the Indians in all the Provinces, but I did not suppose for a moment that he intended to give a vote to all those people living on the reserves, whether they were intelligent enough to understand their duties as voters or not. My idea was that he intended to give votes only to that class who were given votes by the Ontario Act, in which case I would have found no fault, because I think that all intelligent Indians, all Indians capable of exercising the franchise, and understanding fully the obligations and responsibilities of electors, should be entitled to vote. Shortly afterwards, however, in answer to my hon. friend from Bothwell, the right hon. gentleman stated that he intended to give the vote to the Indians of the North-West—to Poundmaker and Big Bear, and all the rest of them; and upon hearing that statement I made up my mind that the whole thing was a huge joke, and that he did not intend to enfranchise any of the Indians. A few days afterwards we heard whispers from the other side that the First Minister did intend to enfranchise some of the Indians, but that when he explained to whom he intended to give the vote they were sure hon, gentlemen on this side could not object. A little later on the First Minister stated that he intended, by an amendment, to confine the vote to a certain number of Indians, which would include those living on reserves who held and occupied land on which their improvements amounted to $150. When we heard that he intended to include all tribal Indians, while he kept the power in his own hands to say who should and who should not be entitled to vote, we made up our minds that, after all, our first impression was correct, that he intended to give the vote to all the Indians in the older Provinces that it was at all possible for him to enfranchise. Now, I do not know a great deal about the Indians of Ontario; but if the Indians we have in the Maritime Provinces at all compare with the Indians in Ontario, I cannot, for my life, see the justification for giving the franchise to any Indians who are on the reserves and who live as the Indians, generally speaking, do in the Maritime Provinces. In the county I represent there are some 200 or 300 Indians. A few of the younger men are employed in the spring of the year in driving logs and timber down the streams, and some few work in the mills; but with that exception they employ themselves in fishing and shooting, and their whole time in | fication in Nova Scotia, while at the same time, it enfransummer is spent off the reserve. They spend no time in improving their lands; they pay no taxes: they are not worthy of being called by the name of citizens, and they are not such people as should really be enfranchised. notice that the appropriation made for the Indians in Nova Scotia is, in all, some $5,000, of which $1,400 or $1,500 is expended in paying agents, $1,200 or $1,300 in buying food and the necessaries of life, and some $1,300 or $1,400 in the purchase of seed grain, potatoes, and farming implements, in order to induce them, if possible, to cultivate the soil to some extent, in order to provide a living for their families through the winter. Now, if the Government find it necessary to expend over one-fifth of the whole grant for the 2,000 or 3,000 Indians in Nova Scotia, in food, to enable them to get through the winter, it is quite clear that they do not occupy sufficient land to entitle them to a vote under this Bill, nor cultivate their land to a sufficient extent to give us any hope that they will in the future become useful members of society, or convince us that it will be of any advantage to the State to endow them with the privilege of voting. I will just refer for a moment to the reports of the local agents in the county of Digby, to show that there is no such improvement going on among the Indians of Nova Scotia as to justify the Government in expecting anything in the future from them. (The hon. gentleman then read from the reports of 1877, 1878 and 1884.) We ought to be satisfied by this that there is no improvement going on among the Indians in the Province of Nova Scotia, at least in the western portion. I know nothing of the eastern portion, where, I believe, there are a few Indians of a little better class than those of the west. Our Indians spend the time hunting, fishing and shooting, principally porpoises, and do nothing else for their support; they take no interest in politics and know nothing of politics, except that Sir John is the Premier, and they look to him for the money they are to receive. With all due deference to what the feelings of the right hon, gentleman may be in regard to the Indians, he is not doing them any favor by granting them this privilege, and by doing so the whites will feel they are degraded to a great extent. In Ontario, where there is a large number of Indians, their votes, in many constituencies, will swamp the white vote, and one can easily understand with what a feeling of abhorrence the white citizens will regard a law which gives the vote to such a class as this. I cannot believe the right hon, gentleman would be so persistent in his determination to force this Bill through the House, at a great expense to the country, unless he was going to derive from it some political advantage over his opponents. To say that this country will be benefited by enfranchising the Indians is to state something no intelligent man should believe. If these men are intelligent enough to vote, why does the hon. gentleman keep their money in the treasury of the Dominion? Why does he not distribute it among them? If they are a people capable of properly using the franchise, they are capable of managing their own property and transmitting it to their descendants. I felt called upon to take part in this debate, because nothing has been said with regard to the public sentiment in Nova Scotia, and it might, therefore, be inferred that the Indians in that Province were fitted to exercise the franchise. That they are not, cannot be denied. Has any man from the Maritime Provinces asked for this Bill? True, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Paint) said that he thought the Indian ought to have the right to vote, but there is not a man in this House besides that hon, gentleman who holds that opinion. If the Indians are to be given a vote, let them be first put on the same footing as white men, and then I shall have no objection to allowing them to vote. This Bill will disfranchise many people who have hitherto voted on the personal qualichises those Indians who pay no taxes. It will therefore create a great deal of dissatisfaction. I admit that the income clause will cover a few of these men, but the papers in Nova Scotia, which were of a different opinion at first, are beginning to discover that many will be disfranchised who had votes under the personal property qualification.

Mr. PAINT. I am sure the hon. gentleman must be pleased at the attention with which the House has listened to his remarks. Let me present another picture. In the county of Richmond the Indians have a chapel which costs them $8,000, which they paid for out of their own money, and they have a comfortable glebe house. A large number of them can read and write; a number live in frame houses and some in log houses, and they have cattle. I can say the same for the county of Victoria, but I do not know so much about the other two counties in the island of Cape Breton. In the county of Inverness, however, they have a very valuable tract, that has not been much infringed upon so far. The timber upon it is nearly intact, apart from the damage by gales. The member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) can answer for that.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman referred to the county of Inverness.

Some hon, MEMBERS. He did not.

Mr. VAIL. He said they were in as good a state as they were in his own county.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No; he did not.

Mr. VAIL. I am not sure that they are not under the same agent.

Mr. PAINT. No.

Mr. VAIL.

Mr. VAIL. The local agent says:

"When not in real destitution, they seem always happy and contented much more so than other people would be under similar circumstances."

That does not look to me as if they had chapels, and houses, and barns to make them happy and comfortable.

Mr. ALLEN. At the town of Owen Sound we had a band of about 300 Indians living for ten years. Our Indian experience has been neither profitable nor pleasant, and I believe the present course of the Government has a tendency to make Indians dishonest, dissatisfied, and worse citizens than they otherwise would be. If the Indians were treated as other people, if the Indians in the Saugeen peninsula, who receive annually from $12,000 to $18,000 in two bands, which number about 700, were to divide the property which they consider belongs to them, and if they were allowed to become citizens and to manage their own affairs, and to be responsible for their debts, and to sue and be sued, I believe they would be in a better position than they now are. We have found the Indians thriftless, drunkards, and unwilling to pay their just debts. We found them an intolerable nuisance in Owen Sound, and we experienced a very great relief when they were moved forty miles further down the bay. I was at home on Monday, and I know the feeling in that part of the country in reference to this clause of the Franchise Bill. Both Reformers and Conservatives, in the county of Bruce and in the county of Grey, say they will oppose the Government on this Bill; that it is giving an undue advantage, placing the Indians in a position they should not occupy as long as they are wards of the Government and treated as minors. I will support and vote for a measure putting the Indians on the same footing as white men, allowing them to transact their own business. In my part of the country many gentlemen of all shades of politics say openly that this Bill is not for the benefit of the Indian, but is intended for party purposes, and there are Conservatives not sanction any such measure. When the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) gets back to Wiarton, where those 28 Conservatives are who signed that petition which was presented the other day, and signed it principally for the reason that this Bill will enfranchise the Indians living a short distance from their place, he will have a hot and lively

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. PAINT. That is not to the point.

Mr. ALLEN. We are talking about the Indian franchise, and I am giving the reason why the gentlemen in North Bruce signed the petition.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. You are discussing the petitions, not the question before the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. The petition was a request to this House not to pass the Franchise Bill. They sent a petition because they believed the Indians should not have a vote while they are under the control of the Government.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hope the hon. gentleman will keep close to the question.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the question is the enfranchisement of the Indians.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. No; it is the disqualification of the Indians.

Mr. ALLEN. I am giving reasons why they should not be enfranchised, namely, because they are wards of the Government, and because, while the Government controls their local affairs, and while the local agent is to be the party who is to recommend them to get the location ticket which will give them a right to vote, they cannot give a free and unbiassed vote. I was speaking to an Indian agent on Monday, and he is more bewildered, I think, than any man I have met, with reference to the qualification of Indians. He says he believes no Indian in the band which he controls will have a vote. He certainly does not understand this Bill. Nor do the leading Conservatives in my town who say no Indian in the North-West could vote; and when I showed them a statement made by the First Minister, that Big Bear and other Indians of the North-West could vote, they were almost incredulous, and said the Hansard I showed them was printed in the Globe office. The people in the country are not satisfied that Indians should be allowed to vote while they remain wards of the Government. Both Conservatives and Reformers in that part of the country condemn the measure, and you will find that those hon, members who will vote for it in this House will be left at home at the next election.

Mr. KIRK. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Paint) has said that in his county the Indians were so well off that they had built for themselves a church worth $8,000, and a manse, for both of which they had paid. Now, if the Indians of Richmond county have done that, they have done more, I think, than the white people of Nova Scotia have done. In the county of Richmond there are 248 Indians, and to pay $8,000 it would require upwards of $30 per head for each man, woman and child, including the papooses; or, reckoning five individuals to a family, this church alone, to say nothing of the manse, cost $160 for each family. Now, I venture to say that there is no settlement of white people in the Dominion of Canada, I do not care how wealthy, who have done more than that towards building a church. I think the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in making that statement, as much so as some other hon, gentlemen who claim that the franchise is going to increase the number of voters in the Dominion. Whilst I am up I wish to read a short paragraph from the Halifax in my constituency who are liberal enough to say they will | Herald, with reference to a statement made by myself in this House on a former occasion. (The hon, gentleman read the article in question.) I do not know, and neither does the editor of the Halifax Herald know, that the Indians are enfranchised in Nova Scotia. I will promise the editor of the Herald a leather medal if he can point out to me one instance of an Indian ever having voted in the Province of Nova Scotia under the local law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know of one Indian in my own constituency who does, and he always has voted for me.

Mr. KIRK. If the hon. gentleman will satisfy me of one case he shall have the leather medal. I would like him to give the time, place and circumstances under which any Indian gave a vote. I know perfectly well that Indians who are in the same condition as white men can vote, but I say that the laws of the Province of Nova Scotia prevent the Indians from voting who receive aid from the Government as paupers, and I know that there is not one Indian in the whole Province of Nova Scotia who does not frequently receive such aid; and under the law of the Province, neither black, nor white, nor red man can vote who has received aid as a pauper from the Government, or from any source. In that way, although Indians may be enfranchised, they will not have votes. The Indians in that Province are an illiterate, ignorant class and, moreover, an improvident class. Under this Bill not more than twenty Indians will have votes in Nova Scotia, if the assessment roll were taken as a basis; but with the aid of a revising barrister a great many would be enfranchised. I was astonished when I heard the First Minister's statement as to the intelligent and educated condition of the Indians of the older Provinces. I thought that Nova Scotia was one of the older Provinces; and then I thought that perhaps he looked upon Nova Scotia as a new Province, or had forgotten altogether the condition of the Indians there, as described in his own report. The hon, member for Queen's stated that four-fifths of the Indians could neither read nor write. That is the case, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. There are only four Indian schools in the Province, three of which are in Cape Breton Island. In Nova Scotia, how-ever, the Indians have a right to attend the public schools. In King's county I observe that only one is in attendance, and that is about the proportion throughout the Province. Special mention is made in the report of the Indian Department of the death of one Indian, who was the only self-supporting Indian in the county of Queen's. I can see no reason why the Indians should be enfranchised. There must have been some powerful reason for seeking to secure the Indian a vote. It cannot be in consequence of the number of Indians in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, because there are not many in these Provinces, but in consequence of the number in Ontario. I can fancy the Minister of Marine and Fisheries visiting the county of Colchester, where there are a good many Indians. He will call a public meeting in the town hall at Truro. He will attempt to make a speech to the free and independent electors there. Not many Indians will come to that meeting; so he will afterwards hold a special meeting in one of the Indian's wigwams. I fancy seeing the Minister addressing the Micmacs as the free and independent electors of the Dominion of Canada, and going round among the squaws, and kissing the papooses, in order to influence their husband's and pa's to vote. I am happy to say that, in my county, there are no Indians, and I therefore will not be troubled with anything of this kind. There are members on this side of the House whom they fear, and hon gentlemen opposite are determined to get rid of them. In 1882 they tried the Gerrymander Act, but it failed to get rid of these men. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be afraid to meet those on this side in fair, open and manly discussion, and so they adopt other means. They impose the franchise on the Indian, and try quite a reasonable hour; I think we ought to have finished to get rid of these gentlemen by the tomahawk and the scalping knife.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it is out of order to discuss the Gerrymander Bill, and besides it is contrary to the arrangement by which we were to get through this clause long ago.

Mr. PAINT. The hon, gentleman has doubted the accuracy of my statement. I say the chapel and glebe are good, substantial structures, creeted by the Indians, and are worth $8,000. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Digby accusing the Indians of poverty and misery, when the hon, gentleman should remember that the statement went through all the press of this Dominion that the maintaining of the pauper poor in his county had been sold at auction.

Mr. KIRK. What does the hon, gentleman say? That the people of my county have been sold by auction? There is not a word of truth in the statement. It is false.

Mr. VAIL. The hon, gentleman has referred to the people being put up at auction in my county. I merely state that the statement he has made has no foundation in

Mr. MULOCK. The First Minister stated this evening that it was not intended that the Indian entitled to land, as tribal Indians, should qualify on the value of the land itself, if he happened to move off the reserve; and by the wording of the amendment, the land which is held by the Indian may be itself made the qualification, if he happens to move off the reserve. I think the intention of the Minister would be better expressed if the words "on the reserve" were struck out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The other clause says "in possession and occupation."

Mr. MULOCK. But it may not mean actual occupation. Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the Indians are to have the same privileges of white men, will liquors be allowed to be sold to them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That has nothing to do with the franchise.

Mr. PATERSON. But what will be the effect?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will not give that privilege.

Mr. PATERSON. At present, these newly made citizens are visited by agents, who are paid to report to Parliament what potatoes they grow, what children have been born, and so on. I want to know if the special privileges conferred on them will not be extended, and if we will not have agents appointed in the different counties to report to this Parliament how we are getting on.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that there are many of the Indians who do not speak English or French, and that there is no provision made for interpreting. It seems to me the hon. gentlemen will find it necessary to make such a provision in this Bill, or by an amendment in the Election Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If so, we would have to provide for the Germans, and the Poles, and the Mennonites, and people from the south and west of Ireland, who do not speak the English language.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all.

On section 10.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think this is a while ago. However, I do not complain; we have got through a very important portion of the Bill, and we have now entered upon another portion, which has received a great deal of discussion, and which, I must say, within reasonable grounds, called for discussion, though I think the bounds were immensely exceeded. However, I do not wish to press for anything more to-night, and I will move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12:35 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS:

THURSDAY, 28th May, 1885.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I beg to move that the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates be adopted. I might say that last week, when the report was presented, the leader of the Opposition asked that a statement should be made as to the probable saving effected by the proposed changes, and that we should adjourn the debate so as to take up the question—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot take it up to day.

Mr. WHITE. No; but I propose simply to make a statement as to the probable saving to be effected by the adoption of the report presented last week. I might say that in the present edition of Hansard there is 1,350 copies of what is called the daily edition—that is, the number sent around to members every day. Of the bound edition there are 1,100 copies of English and 350 French. Under the proposed arrangement we will have 600 copies of English and 180 of French, it being proposed that each member, instead of receiving five copies, shall receive but two, which will effect a saving in the number of copies of 670 altogether. The cost of the composition, that is, the mere typesetting, will not be materially changed by the new process, because there will be the same amount of matter to be set up, but a very considerable saving will be effected in binding, paper, and presswork, in the boxes in which these Hansards are sent to members, and in the express charges in sending them. The saving on these items is estimated in the aggregate at $4,000. That statement has been made up by Mr. Hartney, Mr. Brewer, and also Mr. Romaine, who made a very careful estimate of the probable saving. The amounts paid for salaries of reporters, translators, French proof reader, English proof-reader—the gentleman who prepares the index—and the amanuenses, will be the same. The cost of Hansard last enses, will be the same. The cost of Hansard last year, which we suppose may be regarded as a reasonable Session, was $38,114.84, but that did not include the increase in the salaries of the translators and the short-hand writers. The reporters, translators, proofreaders and amanuenses cost now, at the rate which was agreed to be given last Session, in the aggregate $26,696. row. Sir John A. MACDONALD.

The proposal made by the reporters themselves, and which forms part of this report, is a mere suggestion. Of course. the Debates Committee have no power to make an absolute recommendation on that question, and the offer is stated, that is, that the reporters, whose salaries are now annual salaries, and who are practically officers of the House, should be employed during the recess, where the Government require the use of short-hand writers, in connection with commissions, the court of claims about to be established, the Supreme Court, if necessary, departmental enquiries, or other work of that description. By returns which have been brought down this year I find that that the cost, during the last three years, of mere special reporting work, chiefly on commissions, amounted to about $4,000 a year; so that the saving in printing and from the use of the reporters in that way would be about $8,000 in the aggregate. I may say, however—if one may anticipate a report which will probably be shortly made from the Printing Committee - that if the printing of Hansard is included in the contract for the general printing of Parliament, the probability is that the cost of printing will be very much reduced. The contract for the printing of Hansard now is a special contract. It was made with the contractors for the printing of Parliament—in fact, no one else in the city was able to undertake it—and they charge 60 cents a thousand ems for composition. Looking at the matter with some practical experience, I think that will probably be reduced at least one-fourth, if the printing of Hansard is included in the general contract. So that, according to my estimate, the saving that would be effected by all these changes is about $10,000 a year. Hon. members will notice by the report presented, that the form of Hansard is proposed to be changed. Instead of having the large, bulky volume, in large type, the proposal is to make it an octavo volume, uniforn with our Journals and Sessional Papers, and printed in smaller type; as, after all, it is a matter of record, and the question of larger type is of no possible value. In that way we make a large saving of presswork and paper, and also in binding. We pay, to day, for the binding, 90 cents a volume. The estimate made as to what it will cost in the new form is 40 cents a volume, less than one half; and I may say that the estimate I have made is on the basis of three volumes octavo, instead of two large quarto volumes. The whole saving, as I said, will amount to about $10,000 a year.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought the hon, gentleman had arranged to give us the information as to the probable saving before he proposed to move the adoption of the report.

Mr. WHITE. I am going to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLAKE. I asked twenty-four hours' notice. I may say, however, that the information the hon, gentleman has given requires to be supplemented by a division of the saving into two items. I think different considerations apply to the reduction in the number of copies and to the size of type, and we ought to know, before we are called upon to deal with the two propositions, what the effects of each, separately, would be.

Mr. WHITE. The reduction on the printing and paper and binding will be somewhere about one-half.

Mr. BLAKE. About $2,000 each.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; that is about the estimate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest that instead of the debate being adjourned the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman move it to-morrow.

Mr. WHITE. We will give twenty-four hours' notice.

Motion to concur in Report withdrawn.

IMPORTATIONS OF PRISON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. PLATT asked, Have any importations of manufactured goods, the product of prison labor, imported from the United States, been seized or detained by the Customs authorities of Canada? If so, who were the importers, and what disposition has been made of such goods?

Mr. BOWELL. Several importations of goods, in whole and in part the product of prison labor, have been detained by the Customs. In every case where it has been conclusively shown that the order for the goods was given prior to the passing of the resolutions, the importers have been permitted to re-export the goods. It is not deemed advisable to give the names of the importers.

GOVERNMENT QUARANTINE.

Mr. TASCHEREAU asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint, as has been already done, visiting physicians stationed at Father Point, who will visit and accompany, as far as the quarantine station at Grosse Isle, if there is reason, or Quebec, each steamship, whether carrying mails from beyond the sea or emigrants or passengers, and who will report on the sanitary condition of the steamship?

Mr. POPE. With respect to the first part of the question, it has been done already. At present, all the mail steamers that call at Rimouski are examined by a physician there; all other vessels and steamers are examined at Grosse Isle.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, Whether it is true that the Militia Department deducted from the amount of pay due to Achille Blais, a private of the 9th Battalion, who died at Winnipeg while he was in the service of the country, the funeral expenses of the said Blais?

Mr. CARON. So far as the information the Department has obtained is concerned, it is not true. Every expense connected with the death of any of the volunteers has been met by the Government, so far as they could be ascertained by the Department.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, Whether it is true, as stated by the special correspondent of the Toronto Mail at Clark's Crossing, on the 8th May, that soldiers pillaged the houses of half-breeds and destroyed a quantity of articles belonging to them; if it is true that they demolished Madame Tourand's house at Fish Bay, broke her furniture and broke up a sewing machine and a stove; if it is true that at Gabriel's Crossing they destroyed the windows of the residence of one Vandal, broke up the clock and bedsteads and strewed the floor with the remains of broken furniture, and then, next day, set the house on fire; if it is the intention of the Government to instruct commanding officers to take the necessary steps to prevent a repetition of such excesses and to punish those who have been guilty of them?

Mr. CARON. It is not true. Strict orders were given by General Middleton to the force not to enter any house or touch any property, under pain of severe punishment. Official despatches received mention nothing about Madame Tourand's furniture, sewing machine or stove. Some broken glass must be expected where guns are brought to bear upon a village; but no official account has been received as to the number broken on Mr. Vandal's residence—nor about | ring to the letter written by General Middleton, that letter his clock or his bedstead. The intention of the Govern ment is to allow the commanding officer, who knows his duty as a soldier, to look after the troops under his command.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government has received despaches not yet laid on the Table giving accounts of: 1. The Duck Lake fight; 2. The Fish Creek fight; 3. The fights at and near Batoche; 4. The fight with Poundmaker; 5. The evacuation of Carlton; 6. The affair at Frog Lake; 7. The affair at Fort Pitt; And from whom have such despatches been received, and when?

Mr. CARON. Telegrams were received, which I communicated, from time to time, to the House. Now, that the troubles are, I hope, very nearly finished, the Department expect to receive official reports of the different engagements which are mentioned in this question, which reports will be laid upon the Table.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government has given any instructions to or communicated with General Middleton, as to the disposition of any of the insurgents who have surrendered?

Mr. CARON. No instructions were issued to General Middleton, except in so far as instructing him to send to Regina the persons whom he considered should be committed for trial.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What is the number of claims, so far, recognised by the half-breed commission now at work? What is the number of claims rejected by the commission?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The commissioners have, up to date, reported the issue of 140 certificates for scrip to North-West half-breeds. There is no report from the commissioners, up to date, having reference to rejected claims.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the number of the North-West Police exceeds that authorized by law, and, if so, to what extent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About 240 recruits have been engaged, in view of the proposed increase of the force. We hope to get a good many from the battalions now in the west when they are ordered home.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many claims preferred by Manitoba half-breed minors, remain, for want of proof, as yet unacknowledged by the Government? How many claims so preferred have been rejected?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report from the Department is that:—(1.) There are fifteen claims filed in the Department of the Interior preferred by Manitoba halfbreed minors which require additional evidence before they can be recognised. (2.) The Department has no means of ascertaining how many of those which were preferred will be rejected, until the evidence in each case has been received.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is, how many have been rejected; none have been, I suppose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume not, from the answer.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government gave General Middleton any instructions or suggestions, or had any prior communication with him, or has received any despatch not brought down, from him, on the subject of: (1.) His message or proclamation to the insurgents after the Fish Creek fight? (2.) Or his message to Louis Riel at Batoche?

Mr. CARON. No instructions were issued about the first or second portion of this question. As to the question refer-was read here by myself, when it was communicated to me by telegram.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government intends to propose to Parliament some increase of pay to the volunteers on active service in the North-West, so that their families may not be dependent on private contributions for subsistence during the absence of their bread-winners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole question of the treatment of the volunteers on active service, and of their families and also with respect to the families of those who have, unfortunately, fallen, and also with respect to the wounded, is under consideration of the Government, and the matter will be submitted to Parliament during the present Session.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Were the seven-pounder guns used in the fight with Poundmader, Mounted Police guns? If not, to what part of the force did they belong?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They belong to the Mounted Police.

PAYMENT OF CLERKS IN DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any of the clerks in any of the Departments have not received their pay at the ordinary times of payment? If so how many clerks, and in what Departments, for how long and for what reason? Whether the delay in despatching parties on the Geological Survey is attributable to there being no available appropriation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are no clerks in the Department of the Interior who have not received their pay at the ordinary times of payment. The Director of the Geological Survey says: "No delay has, up to the present, occurred on that account. Two parties have been dispatched, one to Hudson Bay and one to Lake Mistassini. The other officers have been busy with the preparation of their maps. The lateness of the season also made it advisable not to take the field as early as usual, viz., the middle of May."

Mr. BOWELL. There has been no delay in my Department.

DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL FRANCHISES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the First Minister received from the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia the following despatch:—

Halifax, February 17th, 1885.

Right Honorable Sir John A. Macdonald, Ottawa.

In view of the intention of the Dominion and Provincial Governments to introduce Franchise Bills, it seems probable that there will be much confusion and inconvenience. It is very desirable, for the convenience of the public, that the Dominion and provincial franchise be the same. On behalf of the Nova Scotia Government I would suggest that action be deferred for the present, and that during the recess a conference be held between the Dominion Government and such of the Provincial Governments as may consent to participate, with a view to an agreement on a uniform franchise. Please let me know by wire whether you can entertain the proposal.

W. S. FIELDING.

Whether the said despatch has been acknowledged, and if so, when? Whether the said despatch has been answered, and if so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A telegram from Mr. pany's tract. The total number of settlers on the tract at Fielding about the franchise has been received. I have that time was twenty-nine, including the ten settlers who searched for it and cannot lay hands upon it. I have no were on the land prior to the commencement of settlement doubt I will find it; we are now looking for it, and the by the company.

Mr. Caron.

answer will be endorsed on its back. All I can say, however, is, that no action was taken.

DOMINION LANDS PATENTS—CHARGES OF FRAUD.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether besides Laing, the clerk at Ottawa, one Mathewman, a clerk at Winnipeg, is implicated in charges of fraud in connection with the procuring of patents of Dominion lands? Whether it has been ascertained that Mathewman has for a long time been taking bribes either in money or in scrip or land for the procuring and expediting of patents?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is not now and never was at any period, a clerk in the service of the Department of the Interior, either at Winnipeg or elsewhere, of the name of Mathewman, There is a brother-in-law of Mr. Laing, whose name is Mathewman, but he is a resident of Ottawa, although it is understood he has at various times made lengthened visits to Winnipeg. The whole subject covered by this enquiry is at present under investigation.

GOVERNMENT AGENTS IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES—FEES FROM SETTLERS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government has received any information that any of its agents in the North-West Territories have taken for their own use fees or money from settlers in connection with land cases?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has not received any information that any of the agents of the Department of the Interior have taken, for their own use, fees or money from settlers in land cases, but it has been made cause of complaint against some of the agents that in their capacity as justices of the peace, they have taken fees for affidavits, which were made before them for the convenience of settlers, and which, if made before other magistrates, would have been subject to the fee charged by the agents.

COLONISATION COMPANIES—TOWNSHIP SURVEYS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What were the dates of the surveys of the townships allotted to the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, and of the approval of those surveys? How many settlers were reported by the surveyors on the tract? How many settlers were reported by the inspector of colonisation companies on the tract prior to the commencement of settlement by the company. At what date or dates did the inspector report on this tract? How many reports did he make?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The following is the information asked for:—

PRINCE ALBERT COLONISATION COMPANY.

The surveyor reported five settlers on the tract. The inspector of colonisation societies reported ten settlers on the tract prior to the commencement of settlement by the company. Date of the report of the inspector, 19th November, 1884. The inspector made only one report on this company's tract. The total number of settlers on the tract at that time was twenty-nine, including the ten settlers who were on the land prior to the commencement of settlement by the company.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What were the dates of the surveys of the townships allotted to the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Colonisation Company, and of the approval of those surveys? How many settlers were reported by the surveyors on the tract? How many settlers were reported by the inspector of colonisation companies on the tract prior to the commencement of settlement by the company? At what date or dates did the inspector report on this tract? How many reports did he make?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The surveys were made and approved as follows:—

Tp.	53,	R.	23,	w. 4th	Mer.,	surveyed	sesson	'82,	approved	22nd	Jane.	'83

The surveyor reported 44 settlers on the tract. The inspector of colonization societies reported 49 settlers on the tract prior to the commencement of settlement by the company. Date of the reports of the inspector, 30th August, 1884. The inspector made two reports, both on the same date; one upon townships 53 and 54 in ranges 23 and 24; and the other upon township 55 in ranges 23 and 24. The total number of settlers on the tract at that time was 115, including the 49 settlers who were on the land prior to the commencement of settlement by the company.

MANITOBA ROUNDHOUSE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, When, and in whose name, did the patent for the roundhouse property in Manitoba issue? Is it one of the patents irregularly issued?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was incidentally ascertained about a year ago, that the roundhouse at Selkirk is probably upon a part of lot 72. This lot is shown, by evidence furnished to the Department in the usual way, to have been occupied at the time of the transfer by one George Johnstone, a half-breed, who sold to one Thomas Taylor, in the month of July, 1874; Taylor, in November of the same year, sold to one David Glass, barrister—now city solicitor-of Winnipeg, and at the time of the purchase, I am informed, a member of the firm of Sifton, Glass & Fleming, railway and telegraph contractors; Glass sold to one John S. Dennis, jr., of Winnipeg, Dominion Land Surveyor, on the 13th March, 1882; and shortly afterwards, the claim having been approved by the Department of Justice, patent issued to Dennis. If the Department of the Interior, at or before the date of issue of the patent, had had information that the roundhouse was upon this lot, the ground occupied by it would have been exempted from the operations of the patent.

FRENCH CANADIANS IN CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CATUDAL asked, What are the names of the two French Canadians employed in the inside branch of the Customs Department at Ottawa? What is the annual salary or monthly pay of each? When were they appointed?

Mr. BOWELL. The names are Charles Boivin and Alide Lacerte, they received, respectively, $600 and $500. The first was appointed 14th July, 1883, and the second, 1st June, 1882. These officers were appointed to the inside service on vacancies being created through the superanuation of Messrs. Hay and Peachy.

WATERPROOF BLANKETS.

Mr. CATUDAL. Has the Militia Department purchased a quantity of rubber or waterproof blankets for the use of the Volunteers in the North-West or elsewhere? If so, from is the letter:

whom were such blankets or covering purchased and what prices were paid?

Mr. CARON. The Department of Militia has bought 1,700 waterproof blankets from George May of Ottawa, at $1.40 each; 1,200 from the Gutta Percha and Rubber Manufacturing Company of Toronto, at $1.38 each, and 500 from the Goodyear Rubber Company of Montreal, at $1.25 each, making in all 3,400 waterproof blankets.

PETITIONS AGAINST THE FRANCHISE BILL.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to make a personal explanation. A short time ago I received a letter, which I hold here, from a gentleman in Wiarton. I am under rather embarrassing conditions in connection with this letter, for I have not yet received authority to read it, but, under the peculiar circumstances in which I stand, I am satisfied that my friend would allow me, in justification of my own character for veracity, to read this letter to the House. A day or two after the receipt of the letter-and I say this only to explain why I read it—I received a communication from the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), calling my attention to a petition which had been sent from Wiarton against the passage of the Franchise Bill, and which he informed me had been signed by 28 Conservatives. I replied to his letter immediately, thanking him for his communication, telling him I had heard of the petition already, and also something as to the means that had been employed to obtain signatures to it. Being in possession of the information I then had, I attached not the very smallest importance to the petition, so far as it was an exposition of the views of those who had signed it, but I considered it interesting as an evidence of the manner in which the signatures were obtained to that petition. I was in the Library on the subsequent day when the hon. gentleman made a reference to a paragraph which had appeared in one of the local papers, and as I was not present, my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White), said that he thought that the hon, gentleman, under the circumstances, cught to have read the communication that I had sent to him. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Elgar), said that no doubt, if I were in my place, I would be able to say whether the names had been obtained improperly.

Mr. EDGAR. No, whether they were forgeries or not.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, I was informed that the hon. gentleman was speaking of whether they were obtained by misrepresentation or not; but, of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. Nevertheless, my hon, friend thought that the hon, member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), being in possession of this document from me, might have communicated the contents of it to the House. My hon, friend who sits near me, from Cape Breton, had been shown by me the letter which I had received from the hon. member from West Ontario. He then got up in his place, and very kindly, in my absence, in order to justify the statement I had made in my letter to the hon. gentleman, said he was aware that I had received a letter from one of my constituents, stating that these signatures had been obtained by misrepresentation. Now, the House will excuse me for the length of time I have taken in respect to this matter, because I am desirous of explaining how the contents of this letter came before the House at all. When I received this letter, I had no intention of reading it, unless I had permission from the writer. But, under the circumstances, as I have said, I think it would be only right that I should communicate to the House the contents of the letter. It is dated the 14th May, and I received it two days before the hon, gentleman brought up the matter in the House. This

" WIARTON, 14th May, 1885.

"ALEX: MONBILL, Esq.

"I have no doubt you will be surprised when you see the number of Conservatives that have signed the petitions, as I was myself. But when you are acquainted with the means used to get signers you will not wonder at the number of names on it.

"Alex. Campbell, of Manlay's drug store, handled the petitions. As petitions are a common occurrence, and almost everybody signs them if the party operating them'is liked, that has been the case in this instance. Few of those signing it took the trouble to read it, and simply took Campbell's word for the contents. Some say they signed it without knowing what it was. To others the petition (that is Conservatives) was read including the North-West Indians, etc. All kinds of deception was practised, as only Grits know how to practise it, and the Conservatives who signed the petition, when it is too late, are very angry at themselves for allowing any Grit to so far impose on them. I write on behalf of those Conservatives who have signed, showing how their signatures were obtained. These are facts that have come under my own observation when it was too late to remedy them."

I think hon, gentlemen will admit that when I was in pos-

I think hon, gentlemen will admit that when I was in possession of that information I was perfectly justified in making the statement I did. Of course I cannot read the name of my informant, but I may say that the person who wrote this letter to me is as honorable, and upright, and as thoroughly trustworthy a man as can be found anywhere, and I am just as certain as I can be of anything told me by any man, that the gentleman who wrote me this letter was requested by some of the signers of that petition to do so; and I am just as certain, also, that he believed when he wrote the letter that he was expressing the views of all those Conservatives who signed that document. I may also say that since then I have received a letter from another gentleman in reference to the petition, in which this passage occurs:

"A large number of names were got by fraud and misrepresentation, so far as I can learn."

Now, so far as the document presented by the hon. gentleman a day or two ago is concerned, I would just say that having looked it over since then I must in all candor confess that I see names upon that document of thoroughly intelligent men, who have always been considered, and who are, good Conservatives. It is only just and right that I should make that statement. But I may say at the same time that there are other names upon that document, which are purported to be signed only by Conservatives, of men who, I think I can say without doubt, voted against me at the last election; and I think I shall be able in a short time to give the House further information on this matter. I should just like to say that so far as I am concerned I think that the Conservatives who signed that petition are perfectly justified in signing it, are perfectly justified in signing any petition to this House which they believe to be a righteous petition. I am satisfied that hon members on both sides of this House will agree with me when I say that I am not one of those who hold that the best friends of their party are those who, in ordinary parlance, "go it blind," or in other words, who put party before country; but I do say, and I repeat, that I am satisfied that many of those who signed this last document would not have signed it had they been in possession of all the facts in connection with the matter.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have got a letter also from Wiarton which you will permit me to read, as it will assist my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to put those Conservatives who signed this petition in a proper light. I do not like to see it stated that intelligent Conservatives would sign a petition not knowing the nature of it. I think it is a reflection upon them which I would not allow, as I have a great many Conservative friends myself, and I could not allow the Conservative party to be so slandered without entering my protest against it.

Mr. McNEILL. I am quite certain the hon, gentleman does not wish to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, I am not going to. Mr. McNEILL.

Mr. MoNEILL. I did not say that any gentleman who signed that petition did so without knowing the nature of Mr. LANDERKIN. I will read this letter, with your permission, which says:

"I am happy to inform you that 27 Wiarton Conservatives signed a petition against the Franchise Bill. Now, I see by the Tory papers that the Tory crowd claim a fraud. Such is not the case. Surely it does not reflect much credit upon Wiarton Conservatives to say they don't know what they sign, as well as to say they don't know which way to vote, and only go the way they are dragged by the nose."

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 10,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a subject that has already been discussed at considerable length, that is to say, the mode of registration and the officer who is to be appointed to register the voters. I may say that with respect to the 10 and 11th clauses, which have excited most discussion with respect to the persons to be appointed, the revising officer, that several hon, members in speaking to the clause objected to the word "may" and desired it to be "shall." I do not think that is necessary under the ordinary mode of statutory construction; but the word "may" will be altered to "shall". The clause reads at present:

"A revising officer to be appointed under this Act may,"

I change that to:

"A revising officer to be appointed under this Act shall, in any Province, except Quebec."

I propose to except Quebec and British Columbia. The reason I make British Columbia an exception as well as Quebec from the general rule laid down as to the appointment is, that on the mainland, in the interior of British Columbia, there are no practicing barristers and there are some judges who may be appointed, but they may not all be available. With the exception of these two Provinces it is proposed that the revising officer shall be either a judge or a junior judge of any County or District Court (putting in the word "district") in the Province in which he is to act, or a barrister of at least five years' standing at the bar of such Province. In the Province of Quebec he shall be either a judge of the Superior Court of Lower Canada, or an advocate or notary (it is proposed to insert "notary") of at least five years standing. As the House knows, the notaries in the Province of Quebec are leading men, and are as much, if not more, acquainted with, and employed in, matters connected with real property than are With respect to the Province of British advocates. Columbia I propose that the following words be inserted:—

And in the Province of British Columbia the revising officer shall be either a judge of the Superior Court or of the County or District Courts, or a barrister of at least five years standing, or a stipendiary magistrate.

Stipendiary magistrates are men—at least some of themwho formerly performed judicial functions, they were Gold Commissioners and acted generally in a judicial capacity. The clause as I now propose to submit it to the committee will read as follows:-

Any revising officer to be appointed under this Act shall, in any Province except Quebec and British Columbia, be either a judge or junior judge of any County or District Court in the Province in which he is to act, or a barrister of at least five years' standing at the bar of such Province. In the Province of Quebec he shall be either a judge of the Superior Court of Lower Canada or an advacate or notary of that Province of at least five years' standing. Province of at least five years' standing.

There is a proviso added to the clause, which I propose to amend. It provides that the same returning officer may be appointed for and require to discharge the duties in respect to more than one electoral district. I also propose that he nay be appointed for a portion of an electoral district. I add that clause because judicial districts, certainly in Ontario, and I believe it is the same in other Provinces, and electoral districts, are not the same. Take the case of an electoral district. A large portion of that district belongs to one electoral district. There may be a portion of it attached to another electoral district for electoral purposes. Then it will be more convenient to make the judge of the municipal and judicial district the revising barrister of that portion of his judicial district which belongs for electoral purposes to another district. Then, after the lengthy discussion which I have already mentioned, I propose that in all cases where the revising officer is not a judge himself, there shall be an appeal to the courts, and that shall be as well on fact as on law, and it shall not rest with the revising officer to grant it. Under an appeal made under the conditions specified in the Bill, the appeal shall go. These are the suggestions I make with respect to this branch of the subject. The first clause before us is merely authorising the appointment of the revising officer, the tenure of his office, and so on. I move the adoption of section 10.

Mr. BLAKE. The proposals which the hon. gentleman have laid before us are, I regret to hear, inadequate to the position of the case as it has been demonstrated in the discussions to which he has referred. The clause which we have before us, the hon, gentleman has thought, and rightly thought, involves, in order to its consideration, an explanation of his purposes with respect to dealing with the subject. But that clause in itself, even standing alone and without reference to the other clauses, deals with this subject in a manner which I think is entirely unsatisfactory, because it prescribes, in general terms, the duties of the functionary who is to be appointed by the Governor in Council. That duty is declared to be, not to revise but to prepare, revise and complete the list; and therefore, we are face to face in this clause, limiting ourselves to the four corners of it, and not extending our view as we may fairly do as we have been invited to do by the explanation of the hon. gentleman, with the two questions: The mode of the appointment of the revising officer; and a general description of the functions of that officer. I object to the duties assigned to the revising officer. I say that the name of that officer is, having regard to his duties, a misnomer. The hon. gentleman does not propose to make a revising officer; he proposes to make an officer who will make the lists, and having made them, revise them, and, having revised them, complete them; and therefore the primary function of this revising officer is to do something which he is afterwards to revise. Now, I say that that very statement of the case, shows that there is here a proposed combination of functions, which are certainly distinct; and, to a certain extent, as I think I shall demonstrate, incompatible functions. I say it is better that the person who is to revise the list, should revise the handiwork of another, rather than his own. We have had a good deal of revising going on the last two or three weeks in this Parliament, and one of the inconveniences has been the conjunction of the offices of maker and reviser of the document. The revision would have been better, the amendments more extensive, much more would have been struck out, and put in, had it not been that the reviser in chief of the document now under consideration, was also the maker of that document, and was obviously desirous that his handiwork should be confessed by him as little imperfect as possible. Now, practice shows the propriety and convenience of the separation of those offices, as well. Whence do we draw, whence does the hon, gentleman revision of that list, and the framing of the voters' invite us frequently to draw, our inspiration in our legislation, except from the old land, and the practice in England ever since—so far as I know—they have had a system of registering and revising the lists, and certainly ever since the time of the passage of the great Reform Bill of 1832, has been in accordance with the argument I present to you, namely, that the functions of making and of revising the lists ought to be, as it is there, in wholly separate hands. There the lists are made by those who best know how to make the lists. The lists are made by the local authorities of the small sub-divisions, having that local and minute knowledge of the inhabitants in the sub-division, of their position, of their property, of their standing, which enables them to make a good list, and the list so made is revised by another and distinct officer, appointed by other persons, and in a different fashion. Then, Sir, we are not necessarily confined to our knowledge of the English practice as a guide—but we can refer as a guide to English practice which has worked satisfactorily. It is not simply because it has been written down in English Statute Books, but because it has been found to work so well-not without inconvenience and difficulty, I admit-but so well, so much better than any other scheme that can be devised and that, although attention is being directed to this subject continuously, although it forms a large part of the practical working of the election law, although the franchise has been extended several times, and although propositions for the extension of the franchise and the more perfect representation of the people in Parliament have been before the English people and the English House of Commons, off and on, for a great many years, you do not find any serious proposal to alter this arrangement by which the local authorities of the small sub-divisions, having the knowledge and experience to which I have referred, make the primary lists. We are not, however, confined to English statute law, or English experience; we can turn to our own. We find that in the different Provinces in which lists have been prepared, the system has ruled with us up to this time, of a local making of the lists. I do not speak of a provincial making of the lists, I do not use the word local in that sense, but with reference to the small sub-divisions of the electoral district, the municipal sub-divisions out of which the electoral district is composed, and when I speak of local authorities, I speak of that class of authorities which are created under-it may be the Provincial Legislature, it is true-but in which the men are appointed, as a rule, by the people of the locality themselves. I say, then, with us, in the old Provinces of Canada, before Canada was a Dominion; in the other Provinces, where there are lists, since Canada has been created a Dominion, the rule has been the preparation of these lists by local authorities. So that we can appeal to our own practice, to our own experience, as another reason why we should adopt this plan. I may go further, Sir. This, if it is not the first time, as I have said before, when the hon. gentleman has brought forward a Franchise Bill in this Parliament, and his Bills of the earlier years, the Bill of 1869 I think, the Bill of 1870 I am sure, contained different provisions from this. It contained the provision, objectionable as I conceive in the highest degree, that the Governor in Council should appoint the persons to make the lists, but it recognised the wisdom of the view that the persons to make the lists should not be the persons to revise it. For the hon. gentleman in that measure proposed a board of three persons for each electoral district, who should make the first list. He felt that a more minute local knowledge was necessary than could be obtained by the appointment of any one individual for an electoral district, and therefore he proposed more than one so that there might be an aggregation in the mind of the board, of the local knowledge which was essential, and he proposed a bond to prepare the first list, and after that preparation of the first list, the list for the first year, was to be with the judiciary—with the County Court judges, with the District Court judges in Quebec. The Province of Nova Scotia had, at that time no County Courts, and in that Province on that ground, the hon. gentleman made special provision for the appointment of a revising barrister. But throughout the whole of the rest of the Dominion, where he could find county judges, or district or superior judges, as in Quebec, the hon. gentleman proposed a separate board for making the lists, and the subsequent operation—not for the first year only, but for all time thereafter—was put in the hands of the judiciary exclusively. The list which was revised first by the judge, was to be the basis of the list for every subsequent year, so that the Government nomination had nothing to do with any such proceeding. Now, the reason of the thing is in accordance with these views. whether I do not establish a very strong prima facie case for the adoption of these views, when I point to the legislation and the practice of England in like matters, to the legislation and the practice of the Provinces of old Canada and of the Provinces since Canada was confederated in like matters, when I point to the hon. gentleman's proposal in a like matter, in the years 1869 and 1870. But, Sir, one may ask why it is that there is this consensus of legislation and of practice. It is founded I believe on good sense, on the exigency of the case. What should be our object? Our object should be to obtain as good and full a primary list as possible. As little as possible ought to be required to be subject to an appeal, which is a source of trouble and expense and loss of time to the individual voter or to the party organisation—I say, as little should be left to an appeal as possible; and, in order that as little should be left to appeal or revision, in order that as little as possible should be left to the subsequent proceedings, requiring attendance of parties and the taking of evidence at a time to be fixed, it is necessary that the first list should be as full and complete as possible. in the effort to secure a proper representation of the people in Parliament we can deal with no more important topic than the machinery for the making of the lists; and it has been recognised in the discussions in the English Parliament as an object of primary and growing importance to secure that by a plan giving as little room for doubt and difficulty and omission and erroneous insertions as possible, so that the voter shall get on the list with as little trouble to himself as possible. If that is the view in England, where wealth abounds, where party organisations exist in every constituency which is at all equally divided, where it is a custom to have an attorney or several attorneys in the different parts of the riding engaged from year to year in making out and completing the lists, where a system almost perfect in its operation has prevailed for years, involving a very great expense—if that was important there, how much more important is it here. That difficulty has given rise to recent legislation in England with the view of reducing the expenses of elections—not the expense of the immediate canvass at the polls, but the constant drain of expenses, even upon wealthy candidates and wealthy party organisations, which were going on from year to year for a considerable time before the elections; and with the object of remedying this abuse which had grown up, it was pointed out that the list must be so made as to cause as little expense and inconvenience as possible to the voter in getting his name placed upon it. Now, how can that object be reached? It is assential to reaching that object that there should be minute local knowledge on the part of those who make the primary lists. It can be made effectively only by those who know a small area of the country, who know everybody in that area, where they live, how they live, and who have that general information that we usually have about our neighbor. That local knowledge infinitesimally small compared with the whole number of on the part of certain individuals in order that cases in which the function is discharged by those officers. Mr. BLAKE.

they may discharge their duties the municito pality, is an essential element in the making of a good list. Talk to me about being able to make a list from the assessment roll without more knowledge; you cannot do it. There may be Provinces and there may be counties-I know there are counties in the Province of Ontario-in which by degrees the assessment has approximated to the real value of the property; but I know also that there are many instances in which the assessment furnishes no just basis on which you can calculate the value of a man's property; because it is rated at much under its real value. It was only yesterday that the hon, member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Foster) was complaining of my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), because he had used an argument derived from the assessment roll as to the disfranchising operation of the Bill in his Province, and he said that was not a good argument, because you could not depend on the assessment roll, for, although 25 per cent of the present voters might be disfranchised if you did, they would not be disfranchised because their property was worth more, that appeared by the assessment roll. Upon that arose an issue of fact. My hon. friend said the roll represented the real value in the Province; and how had that been brought about? A few years ago the assessment had been an undervaluation, but the real value had depreciated while the roll had kept up, so that there was an approximation. That state of things exists in some cases; in all cases it does not exist; but even if you were to confine yourself to the roll, local knowledge is required to enable you to judge who should be on the list. But that is not all. Under this measure large numbers of persons are entitled to the vote who do not appear on any assessment roll at all, and therefore the qualification of these persons must be ascertained from other sources of information than the assessment roll. From what source? From the local knowledge of the individual within a small area within which a man's intimate local knowledge extends; he knows the people, he knows the property on which they live, he knows those who have incomes. He may not be able with the most complete knowledge to give an absolutely perfect list; but if he, with all the knowledge he has, can only give you an approximately accurate list, how accurate will be that which is made by one man for the whole district? It is clear that an essential element for the making of a complete list is the sub-division of the work among a number of persons in the different localities, with regard to which each has accurate and full knowledge. Now, Sir, the mode in which this is to be obtained is by taking as the makers of these lists those municipal functionaries, who, from their knowledge of the peo-ple, and from the general nature of the work they have to accomplish for the municipality, have the requisite information to enable them to give you a good list, and these persons being appointed by the people-in some cases through the medium of elections, in some cases indirectly through the medium of the councils whom the people themselves elect—are responsible directly to that small community whom they serve, in the midst of which they live, and of which they have knowledge; and in each one performing for that small portion of the community to which he is responsible, the function of making the primary list, you have the best guarantee you can have for its being well made. I am not saying that the system is perfect. Hon. gentlemen bandy charges across the floor of fraudulent assessments. There is no doubt there have been fraudulent lists made, and for political purposes; but if you search the records, and look at the number of cases in which there have been

I say that in the whole Province round, in the townships or reference to a Dominion election. I maintain, therefore, villages or towns in which this function is discharged, the primary function of preparing that from which the list is ultimately to be made, ascertain the number of cases in which there are careful lists made, in which there is no serious ground of complaint. They go unheard of, unnoticed; nobody says anything about them. They are like God's blessings, air and water and sunlight; but there are cloudy days and rainy days, cold and wintry days, and those make a mark, and we grumble about them. So it is with the lists. There are municipality cases in which the officer does not rise to his duty, in which he has erred or, worse than erred, acted improperly, and those you must expect under any human machinery. Do you suppose you are making a perfect human machine? Do you suppose that any machinery you can make will be automatically perfect? Do you suppose that there will not be difficulties and inconveniences in this machinery? Of course there will; but we have had a practical experience of great value, of large extent, for a great number of years, in the making of lists, which, practically, has answered very well on the whole, and it has this immense advantage: That the people are accustomed to it, that the people have confidence in it, that the people know that their right to be put on the list is dependent upon a man living in their own small community, known to them, and who holds his office during their good will. I say, therefore, before you reject that plan and adopt another, you have carefully to consider, not whether there may be an occasional instance of an abuse of this power, but whether, upon the whole, this plan has worked well, and whether it does not give prospects for working at least as well as the one you propose. Is the one you propose likely to work better? If it is not, you had better leave things as they are; there is no use in changing except for the purpose of improvement. Now, this work has to go on in the different Provinces, and it has to go on practically by this class of officials. They have to keep on making lists for the purpose of ascertaining who the voters shall be, whether you pass this Bill or not, and there is another reason for not making a change unless there is some imperative necessity. Why should unless there is some imperative necessity. we make a double function? Why have two sets of men preparing lists practically of a majority of people, the same in each community? Why should we have one set of lists prepared by officials, not appointed by the Local Governments, if that is your abhorrence, but appointed by the people themselves, the electors themselves, through the medium of their councillors, as a rule, and then have another set prepared by some county judge or barrister? Why appoint some county judge or some barrister to do practically the same work for you? Of course, I do not say that the lists will be the same, because you have a divergent franchise; but we know that divergent franchise will to a very large extent, embrace a very large number of men who will be on both lists; and the question of the excess on the larger list is, after all, a question which is comparatively easy to settle if you have that local knowledge which is an essential element in a satisfactory settlement. This is, as I have said, the advantage of having the present plan, of having a plan which will be continued, whether you like it or not, as a means of pre-paring electoral lists for the provincial elections; and to impose upon the people the duty of looking to a double making of the lists is, it seems to me, a very serious thing. I say you impose that upon them when you propose that other functionaries shall make the lists. Any man who knows that under the least liberal of the two franchises he is entitled to vote, knows practically that he will be on the list, if he has confidence in the local authorities; but he will have now to make another enquiry as to a different and it is only as a test, of course, that it could have been mode of treatment by another functionary, who is a resident proposed; it is not the test I would myself propose, the in a county town or in some large place in the county, with | payment of taxes—is one of very simple application, and it that we ought to leave the making of the lists with those local officers who have the best means of knowing those things which are essential to the making of a good list, and it will not be denied that we can impose this duty upon them as we have heretofore imposed administrative, official and judicial duties, from time to time, upon any of the citizens of Canada, as well by virtue of their official titles as by virtue of their names. In Ontario, I should say that it would be better to authorise the local municipality itself to name the person who should make the lists—the municipal council or the representative of the municipal council in the locality. The worst plan of all is that which puts the making of the lists in the hands of the Government of the day. Now, let us consider what the proposal is. The proposal is that the revising officer, who may be, as the hon. gentleman hints to us he most often will be, a County Court judge or a district judge, shall make the primary lists. How is he going to make them? He, of course, has not that minute knowledge of the condition in life of all the people within his county, of the qualifications and position of the men, young and old, which each, in his own little area—the municipal authorities to whom I have referred-naturally, and as a part of his duty, possesses. He will have to rely upon information given. If he is going to make anything like a correct primary list, he will have to make a visitation of some kind, and to find out, here, there and the other, from this man and who ought to be on the list. He cannot make a domiciliar visitation. It is not intended he should go up and down the concession lines and find out who is entitled to vote and who is not; he has to take the assessment roll in a sense as a primary basis, but when we give him the assessment roll, and even with reference to the names on the assessment roll, there is much he is expected to attain by personal enquiry. I may say that is not the idea; the hon. gentleman has not pretended it is. If it were we know the County Court judge could not discharge the duty consistently with the proper performance of his other duties. It would be impossible for him to make such an inquisition as that; but the revising officer, whether he be barrister or County Court judge, will have to communicate with people here and there, possessing minute local knowledge, and try and find out from them who should be on the list. Is it not better to take those people themselves and make them responsible before the light of day, before the face of the people, for the making of the primary lists, than to allow Mr. Justice so and so, or Mr. Barrister so and so, the revising officer, to communicate with and obtain from them, irresponsible, without the sanction of an oath, without the discharge of official duty in this regard, that information without which he is helpless to prepare anything that may be called a primary list. He has to communicate with these people all over the county, get that loose information he will get in that way, instead of getting information upon their responsibility to the public, by their being persons warranted to discharge the duty, responsible under the law as regards those whom they wilfully put off the lists or wrongfully put on them, for neglect of duty to the local authorities. I therefore contend we are on this clause face to face with a great fundamental question, the practical operation of which is going very seriously to affect the representation of this people in Parliament. Had the amendment of my hon, friend from Northumberland carried it would not have accomplished all that it. Because some expected from some people people talk as if it would have saved entirely the expense involved in your system, but it would have accomplished much, because the test which was proposed-would be a comparatively easy thing to make a perfect list according to that view. The task under this Bill, which contains so many different franchises, based upon so many different qualifications, requiring so much knowledge which can be obtained only by investigation, except from those who have that general knowledge of the people amongst whom they immediately live, is a task entirely different, and therefore, the more complicated your franchise, the greater your number of qualifications, the larger the sets of conditions under which people are admitted or excluded, the narrower the distinctions of value and otherwise upon which depends the right to be placed upon the list, the more important it is to consider whether the capacities of already acquired knowledge or the capacity of acquiring the knowledge satisfactorily by any one man, County Court judge or other, is going to be such as that this scheme shall carry satisfactorily, is going to be such as that the primary list shall be well and thoroughly and completely made. Now 1 turn next to the function of this officer. His only function under his name, the only function he can consistently perform is that of revision, the function of a revising officer. The hon. gentleman, not to day, but on former occasions, stated that this revising officer would be the judge in a great many cases, but he pointed out rather ominously, in one of the statements he made in the course of this debate, that we must not forget that in the Province of Ontario there were some forty counties, I think, while there were ninety-two constituencies, as much as to say that it could not be that always or in a good many cases the County Court judge would be called on to discharge the duty. At a subsequent period of the discussion, the hon. gentleman stated that more light had flowed in upon him since he spoke before, and that he had received communications from many County Court judges, indicating that they would make no difficulty, and that they thought the work could be well and thoroughly performed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Several County Court judges, not many.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardonseveral only. I told him at that time, and I tell him now, that the proper function, the function that could be practically discharged, that of revision, the function which they are discharging now, he will find no difficulty whatever in obtaining their assistance to discharge, always supposing he gives them some remuneration for it; but, as to their undertaking to make the lists and do it satisfactorily, I do not think that is within the bounds of reason to expect. I maintain that, if it is to be the rule that the County Court judge shall be the officer, and, if it is only in those cases in which he declines, either from reluctance to undertake that task, which would be very rare, or from inability to discharge it coincidently with the discharge of his judicial functions, which will also be very rare, I say if, in these cases, the appointment of revising officer is to be made, this clause ought to be amended further, and the provision ought to be distinct and express that the County Court judge or junior judge, describing him properly, shall be the revising officer in all cases except when he declines to act. And I say that, in those cases in which he declines to act. he being bound to act unless he gives due notice of declinature, in those cases, be they few or be they many, the Government should not appoint the revising officer who is to fill his place. I say that the revising officer who is to act under those circumstances should be appointed by some other authority than the Executive of the country. I maintain that, as to the judge, he should not owe his appointment in this regard to the good will or pleasure of the Executive, and I maintain a fortiori that, as to the revising officer, he should not owe his appointment to the good will and pleasure of the Executive. Do you want to make the judge suspected? Pass this Bill as it is, in which you know that as we have not a political officer like the Lord Chan-Mr. BLAKE.

his appointment as revising officer is not dependent upon his judicial status, but upon the will and pleasure of the Government of the day, in which it may not be continued from year to year, except in so far as satisfactorily to them he discharges his duty; pass this Bill in the way you wish, if you want the revising officer to be suspected, if he is not a judge. It has been impudently stated, in a sheet supporting the Government from time to time, for years past, that I could not oppose this proposition because I once referred the hon, gentleman to the revising officer in England, because, when he was proposing a board of three persons to be named by himself, I pointed out that the English system of revising officers worked on a different line, and that the revising barrister was appointed not by the Executive, but by the judges of the land. Therefore, forsooth, because I am not in favor of the principle of this mode of appointment, because I objected then to what the hon, gentleman was proposing in this very regard, I am bound to favor it now. I am not inclined, I hope, to place on too low a position the political morality of our country, the political morality of parties, the standing of those who at one time or another may have the majority in this country, but I say that you have got to remember, whatever elevated view you may take with reference to our status, however far you may be disposed to go in the assertion that Canada will not depart from those principles of justice and fair play which must underlie parliamentary government and all other forms of governmentand without it, your talk of self-government is a farce, and your talk of parliamentary government is worse than a farce—however much you may be disposed to affirm that no party when in power will use its power to aggrandise itself to the prejudice of the minority, to perpetuate its own power by unfair means, we cannot contend that we are less liable to misuse our strength, that we are less restrained by high considerations of the character to which I have refered, that we are less moved by those baser considerations to which I have refered than the English people, the English parties, the English Governments; and yet there no Government was bold enough to propose to the free Parliament of England that it should be entrusted with the nomination of the men to make or to revise the lists, no Parliament has been base enough to surrender to the Executive Government, in which it confided, that power. They felt that it was a power which ought not to be asked, and they did not ask it. They proposed a different mode of appointment. Why? Why is it that an English Government proposed to an English Parliament, and an English Parliament accepted and recorded upon the Statute Book, where it stands, amid all the vicissitudes of electoral laws, from that time to this, the proposition that the judges of the land should be the persons who should appoint the revising officers? It was because they felt that it was a power with which the Government of the day ought not to ask that it should be entrusted. It was because they felt that the appointment coming from that source was coming from a suspected and a painted source in the eyes of the people; it was because they felt that those engaged in the discharge of this duty could not do it with a fair chance of being considered impartial between the two great parties, if they were the nominees of the Government of the day; it was because they felt that the well working of the system depended upon the adoption of that special and peculiar provision which, in this case, and for those purposes, they used. Now, Sir, I have referred more than once, and I shall refer again, to the hon. gentleman's own statement on this subject. When he first introduced his Bill he told us the revising officer in England was appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who, we know, although a judge, is also a political officer, and a great member of his political party, a great member of the Administration; and the inference was naturally drawn cellor here, that as there is no member of the Cabinet here who is Lord Chancellor, it was no great step, in fact it was following up the same lines, that what was done by that political officer in England, should be done by the Governor in Council here. I have called the hon, gentleman's attention more than once to the mistake in fact which he made when he made that statement, to the fact that he was inaccurate in declaring that a political officer had the appointment of revising barristers in England, to the fact that the revising barristers of the metropolitan county are appointed by the Lord Chief Justice, and the revising barristers of all the other counties are appointed by the senior judge of the Court of Assize, going on summer circuit, if I remember aright. There, in the county for which he is to make the appointment, on the bench of justice, that justice which he is called upon to dispense at the same moment to the people of the county, in public, before their faces, with the two great political parties represented, the judge, the non-political officer, is called upon to discharge, as one of his functions, this power, this office, of appointing the revising barristers. I say you cannot devise a better plan, so far as I know, in principle, however much you may vary in detail than that; I say you cannot find a stronger proof that the power which the hon. gentleman proposes to take to himself of appointing the person, whether he be judge or barrister, is a power which would not be asked in England, which would not be given in England, and if not asked and not given in England, I want to know why it should be asked and given here. I want to know on what ground the hon. gentleman sets himself so much higher than an English Prime Minister, having control of English and Imperial affairs, and controlling an English Parliament, that he should say that the appointment of such a man, surrounded by those checks and restraints by which he is surrounded in the exercise of his power, should be entrusted to him. I aver, therefore, that the revising officer, whatever his functions, in the rare cases the hon. gentleman says, in the cases, be they few or many, in which the holder of that office is unable to execute the duty, then his appointment ought to come from an unobjectionable source. What is to be this duty which is going to be discharged? It is the duty of making and revising the lists of the jury empanelled to try the Government of the day, which is to try the question between the Government and the Opposition. Why should those who are in the majority, who have all the advantage which place gives, which power gives, which patronage gives, which majority gives—why should they in addition have the power of naming the men who are to settle the lists of those who are to determine whether they shall continue to hold this power or not? I ask for answers to these arguments. We have not heard any answers yet. We have heard no reason given why the views taken in other countries, the views so obviously based upon reason and justice, should not be applied here. I maintain that those members of Parliament who will assent in silence to the passing of a law to surrender to the Government of the day the appointment of the men who are to make and revise the lists, are unworthy of sitting in a free Parliament, and those who feel, as my hon. friends near me feel, that this is a question vital to the reality of free representative institutions, are not merely at liberty, but are also bound, to struggle to the utmost of their ability against the incorporation of this vicious principle in the law of Canada. Sir, what has been one of the results of this discussion? Early on the second reading we herd the Secretary of State say that there was an appeal from the revising officer, as before. It was shown immediately afterwards that the Secretary of State was mistaken, that just as the leader was mistaken about the English law, so the Secretary of State was mistaken about the law which he was recommending to the House. Now we are told, after a long interval of time, instead of hon. members talking, evidently with his disapthat there is to be an amendment, that there is to be an I provalappeal, first, as of right, and, secondly, in fact as well as in We are not told to whom that appeal is to be, as yet. We have not got the details of that appeal before us, but we are given a general principle of action. The hon. gentleman has confessed that his first proposition is indefensible as it stood; the hon, gontleman has confessed that it would not do to leave the revising officer power to say whether there should be an appeal, that it would not do to restrict the appeal to questions of law. The hon, gentleman has confessed that the powers, the final and conclusive powers, practically, that he was about to confer upon his nominees, the revising officers, were powers which he ought not so to confer, and he is about to amend the Bill and to render it in that regard less outrageous than it was when he first pressed it upon the attention of the House. Sir, that man would take but a very cursory, imperfect and superficial view of this matter, who would suppose that the amendment of the hon, gentleman removes the evil. The evil is at the source, the taint is at the source, the difficulty is at the source. It is the suspected and improper authority who is to appoint the officer, that makes the difficulty. the difficulty. Why, Sir, to say that our present system involves occasionally some injustice in the making of the lists to the one party or the other, that occasionally an over zealous and improper Conservative assessor or functionary, makes the lists wrongly, and occasionally an improper and over zealous Reform assessor does the same thing, and that that is a reason for this change—I do not say for a change but for this change—is absurd; because this change is one which puts the dead weight of a revising officer all the time on one side, which says it shall be the nominee of the Government in all cases who shall make the list, and the other party, the party of the minority, shall have the function of appeal. It is a very great blessing that it is able to appeal, but it is a very great misfortune that it should always have to appeal. And as a matter of fact many appeals will not take place, because the difficulty, the expense, the loss of time, the uncertainty, the trouble would prevent the appeals which ought to take place. But, as I said on the second reading of the Bill, the lists will be made right for the appointers of the revising officers. We are to have an appeal, and, though we are thankful for small mercies, though he gives us now at this late hour, the right to make an appeal, we insist, with all the force with which we can insist, that he has not the right to take to himself the power of appointing the maker of the lists of those who are to judge him. To these proposals of his, which are to combine the functions of making and revising the lists in one single man, who cannot be competent to do the thing, who cannot be competent to do it for the reasons I have stated, and to remove the making of the list from those best qualified by knowledge and experience, and the confidence of the people to perform that function, and hand over to the Government of the day the appointment of the maker and reviser, I, for my part, offer my humble, and earnest, and strenuous, and lasting, and persistent opposi-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not object at all to the line taken by the hon. gentleman in the argument he has just closed. On the contrary I would rather congratulate the committee on the fact that we are arriving at the last, even at the eleventh hour, at a legitimate discussion of the measure before us. It is a pleasing contrast between to-day and the discussion that has been going on for the last five weeks. And the reason of the difference is, that the hon. gentleman has, in an able argument, addressed himself to what he considers to be the defects of the measure and has pointed out in what respects the measure can be improved,

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Instead of hon. members evidently with his disapproval, discussing the matter, not with a view, even after the principle was adopted by the House, of improving and amending the measure, but of defeating it fas aut nefas. The hon. gentleman has divided his subject into two parts. First, he objects to the mode of the appointments. Second, he objects to the duties imposed on the revising officer. Although the hon, gentleman made that arrangement of the subject, he addressed himself to the latter head first. He objects to the duties that are imposed He says that the name of the offion the revising officer. cer is a misnomer; that the revising officer prepares the lists. That, after the explanation that has been given, seems to be a mere technical objection hardly worthy of the hon. gentleman. The revising officer, according to the clause now immediately before the committee, is to prepare, revise and complete the list. That is true. That is the language of the section; but the Bill must be read as a whole, and it will be found that the Bill makes the revising officer really a revising officer in every respect, except in those particulars in which there are no means of having a revision, because there are no means under the present franchise of having any original list to revise. The Bill provides that the assessment roll, where there is an assessment roll, shall be taken as the evidence of the franchise. The hon, gentleman may say the language is indefinite. I am quite willing to hear suggestions, although all and any suggestions that have come from the other side I have endeavored to meet; I do not think they have been made in the spirit in which they have been received. But still that will not prevent me from receiving on the part of the minority, and receiving with respect, any suggestions made from any party in this committee, and of accepting them if they meet with my judgment. I have no fault to find in this matter. I desire to have a good measure. I desire to have a measure that will meet, as a whole, as I believe this measure will meet when it goes to the country, with the approbation of the country. I desire to make this a good and beneficial measure; I desire to make it as perfect a measure as discussion will make it, and I will not at any moment hesitate, if I think any suggestion is made that will improve the measure, to accept it. The hon gentleman spoke of the Bill as first introduced in 1869 and 1870, and said that the propositions made in those Bills, I think in both of them, according to my present recollection, that the first list should be settled by a board of registration, and that there should be an appeal from such board. Those hon. gentlemen present who were sitting in Parliament when those measures were said before it must remember that the most objectionable feature in the whole Bill, according to the mind of the House, was that same board of registra-tion. It was opposed on the ground of the enormous expense it would involve. We hear much of the expense of the present system without such a board of registration, and how much more would have been the expense had that board been established with the subsequent appeal? So I have no hesitation in saying that the objection to that system was so great, as being uncalled for, costly and complicated, that it had of necessity to be excised, expunged and removed from any measure of this kind before it could meet the acceptance of either side of the House. The hon. gentleman says the revising officer has anterior duties. But this measure will try to deprive the revising officers of the necessity of having anterior duties, and it is only in those cases where there are no means of obtaining correct lists that the revising officer will be otherwise than a Sir John A. Macdonald.

hon, gentleman is correct in saying that I stated—and I was incorrect—that the revising officers were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, instead of in metropolitan counties by the Lord Chief Justice, and in other counties by the judges of assize. When a Minister prepares a Bill and lays it before Parliament he does so with the hope and expectation of its becoming law, and a Minister ought not to introduce a Bill without reasonable expectation of its meeting the views of the majority of the representatives of the people. A proposition of a similar nature to that in England would not, I have ascertained beyond a doubt, not only during this Session, but in many Sessions when this question came up, have met the expectations of Parliament. Why it is I do not say. Why there is a difference in the public mind in Canada and in England I do not know; I cannot quite fathom it; but I have an impression on my mind, and it is an impression amounting to a certainty, that any proposition that the appointment of the revising officers should be left to the judiciary in the different Provinces would not meet with the approbation of the majority of Parliament. I, therefore, took the next and best, because the best is the best possible mode of getting good, efficient, trustworthy officers, and officers beyond suspicion. In order to do that this clause which is now before the committee provides that these officers shall hold office during good behavior. They shall not be subject to removal at caprice, or at the pleasure of the Government of the day. I am quite well aware that this provision is open to the objection that as to the first appointments the Government of the day will have the appointment of these officers. It is true; and it is true that the Government of the day appoint all the judges, and with regard to them, the practice has been, as a general rule—I myself have not followed that rule with any great closeness, as perhaps is known to a good many hon, gentlemen in this House; but the general rule, when judicial appointments are made by any Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, other things being equal, political friends are chosen for elevation to the bench. But it is always understood and felt that the moment a man is made a judge, no matter what his political antecedents may have been, as he is appointed during good behavior and cannot be removed at the beck or will of the Government of the day, he at once gets a status and sufficient independence to act as an honest man. So by this Bill it is provided that the revising officer shall hold office during good behavior. It is true there is this distinction made between the tenure of a judge of the Superior Court and that of the revising officer, that in respect to the former, the judge can only be removed by the vote of both Houses, the Senate and the House of Commons. But it would be obviously improper to allow the Senate to have a voice in a matter affecting elections to Parliament. It is obvious that this House must retain that whole subject within its own grasp, its own supervision, and therefore, whereas a judge of the Superior Court is removable on a vote of both Houses, the revising officer under this Bill, is removable on a vote of this House. So that, if there is any reasonable ground for supposing that the revising officer has acted improperly, partially, or oppressively, or is a partisan, that matter being laid before this House, which is chiefly interested, he will be removed. And we all know, Sir, that, no matter what party is in, if a revising officer really performs his duty, if no wrongful act can be proved against the revising officer, no malversation of duty, no decided or distinct incapacity shown, no House of Assembly would assume the responsibility of removing him by a vote. It would set the whole country against the majority to do such a thing; the whole moral sense of the country would be opposed to the majority who would give revising officer. The hon, gentleman draws a comparison between the system in England and that proposed here with respect to the appointment of those officers. The proved, unless his conduct proved that he deserved to be removed. That, Sir, was the best and only course that could be taken, as I understand it, and as I know and feel, so as to meet the support of the majority of the representatives of the people in Parliament. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman objects to the revising officer preparing the lists. He says he should have nothing to do with it. Well, Mr. Chairman, we must have some person to do that, and in the majority of cases there can be no diffi-Take Ontario, from which I am afraid the majority of the speakers on both sides have drawn their illustrations. because the majority of speakers have come from that Province; in the Province of Ontario what is the practice now? The assessor makes his lists, and he assesses all those who are ratable in any way, and that list is revised by the local municipality, by the Court of Revision. There is an appeal from the Court of Revision, both as to law and fact, to the County Court judge. Now, Sir, this measure means and designs to propose that the revising officer shall do the same acts, have the same powers and guidance as the county court judge has at this moment in Ontario, the only difference being-and you can quite understand it, the difference arises ex necessitate—that, whereas under the present system in Ontario, the local assessment list is finally revised and settled by the Courts of Revision, by the municipality, in effect the appeal to the county judge is only in individual cases of appeal. This system provides that the final assessment list shall as now, as finally settled by the Court of Revision, be the basis of the voters' list, the basis on which representation is founded; and instead of individual cases being appealed, in effect the whole list is appealed at once to the county judge or the revising officer. The hon. gentleman says that the most minute knowledge is required in order to form those lists. Well, the revising officer in England has not such a minute knowledge. He is appointed from the bar; the majority of the bar are assembled in London.

Mr. BLAKE. That is to revise the lists, not to make them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that. The majority of the bar are assembled in London; the young barrister, who gets his 100 guineas or his 200 guineas, goes to the county or riding and gets from the overseer of rates the list as primarily made to him, and he adds to it. That is the system the hon. gentleman wishes to have, but there is this distinction, that in England a revising barrister is a stranger altogether to the county, but here we hope, as much as possible, that the revising officers, whether they are judges or not, shall be men acquainted, or who ought to be acquainted, with the general circumstances of each individual constituency. The revising barrister in England comes from London, and the hon. gentleman praises that system. But if I remember a right—the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong—there is no income franchise in England, and the voting is taken, even under the new Reform Bill, from the householder, combined or single, and there is no such franchise as there is given here. But I would ask the hon gentleman, supposing there had been, as I dare say there will be, in England, as England has in many measures followed, in respect of time, the example of Canada-

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—in many cases, as I could prove. Supposing, now, that, following our example, there should be a wage-earners' vote in England, or an income vote, do you think they would alter the present system, which the hon. gentleman praises so highly? Do you think the revising barrister would not still be appointed, would not still come down from London, and be obliged then to pursue the course which this Bill proposes. He would have grand householders grand ratenavers, the means before him in the list returned by the overseers; and he would have to assume the same responsibility, and the same initiatory process as we propose in this Bill. Under this Bill the names on the voters' list will be taken from the assessment roll. Those not on the assessment roll, I am satisfied, experience will show, will be a small minority in comparison with those who have established their right to vote upon the approved and revised assessment lists in the various Provinces; and it is only in a small degree that he will be obliged to use his own judgment upon the evidence before him as to those whom he will not find on the assessment rolls of the Provinces. Now, what is our system? In the first place I may say it will be the effort of the Government to obtain the services of men in judicial positions whenever they can 'be obtained; and it is only in cases where they find that that cannot be done, either from unwillingness, or incapacity, on account of ill health or old age or other causes on the part of the judge, that the Government will exercise the power given to them of appointing revising officers. The hon, gentleman says it should be obligatory—that there should be a clause in the Bill providing that only in case of declinature or refusal to act by the judge, another person should be appointed. But the hon, gentleman knows too well that there are judges who having once held their position, feel disinclined to give it up; he knows very well that too often and that although the judge, in the opinion of the suitor. and perhaps of the Government ought to have resigned, he cannot without a painful process be induced to resign. In such cases it must be that a person other than the judge shall be appointed; but the measure will provide that in such cases where a revising officer other than the judge is appointed, there shall be an appeal both as to law and fact. It is true, it may be inconvenient to have such an appeal; it may be expensive more or less, but it is expensive now, under the present system. All appeals are expensive, but appeals are the exceptions. If a revising officer acts fairly and is known to be an honest, straightforward man, the necessity for appeal will be small, and the only danger in allowing appeals is—as hon, gentlemen on both sides have seen—that it sometimes gives an advantage to a rich man who can afford to fight it out to the last, to keep out the poor man who has been elected, and has apparently got the votes of a majority of the people. But that is an incidental advantage that the rich man has that cannot be avoided. If there is to be an appeal at all, of course those who can afford to take advantage of the appeal will do so. Sometimes we have seen it taken improperly for the sake of delay, and for the sake, perhaps, of wearing out the unfortunate man whose means do not enable him to fight it out to the last. The hon. gentleman says he is so strongly opposed to this monstrous measure that he advises it being opposed in every way possible. Of course, Sir, I understand that; I understand the line the hon. gentleman has taken; I understand the line hon, gentlemen opposite have taken. I pay respect to their opinions; I am glad to hear them expressed when they are expressed for a genuine, legitimate purpose, and not for another and less parliamentary object. I shall not detain the committee any longer. I shall be glad to hear, and I have nodoubt I shall hear, all arguments that can be offered both for and against the system proposed by this measure; and I can only assure the committee, as I have already stated, that any suggestion which is made with the evident desire of improving the measure, or removing any doubts, or making specific any uncertainties in it, will be received by me with every respect, and with an anxious desire to meet the wishes of both sides of the House.

then to pursue the course which this Bill proposes. He would have quoad householders, quoad ratepayers, the man's general argument; I have no doubt that will be done by others; but he evidently misunderstood my statement. I stated that local knowledge was necessary to the making out of the lists. The hon, gentleman apprehended me to be guilty of a fallacy, because I was recommending the English plan of appointing revising officers, who, he said, came from London, and whose function was similar to the function of his revising officer. There he entirely misconceives the case. In England the lists are made up by the local officers, and the revising officer is simply a reviser. He comes down to the locality; objections are made that such a name that ought to be on the list is not on, and that such a name that is on ought to be taken off; he hears the evidence, and he deals with the case as an appeal against the list. He has nothing to do with the making of the original list, which is made by those persons in the locality having the local knowledge which I argued was essential to the making of the primary lists.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not misapprehend the hon. gentleman's argument at all; but my answer was that in effect our system is the same-that as the revising barrister in England takes the list prepared by the local officer, so in Canada, under this Bill, the revising officer will take the local assessment list, prepared by the local assessor and approved by the local municipality, and that in that regard the duties of the revising barrister in England and those of the revising officer under this Bill are identical. The only difference is—and that difference I stated plainly—that under the new franchises given by this Bill there are people given votes who do not appear on the original list; ex necessitate there is a difference in circumstances, and therefore there must be a difference in provision; but for the vast proportion of the voters whose names appear on the assessment list the duty of the revising officer in Canada and the duty of the revising barrister in England are the same. I could if I would provide that if there were any means the revising officer should only be a revising officer; but under the circumstances that cannot be.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, by throwing out the Bill and keeping the present system, that can be. But under the present system and under the present Bill, that cannot be avoided, and my argument was and my inference was, and I think the House will agree with me, that if it so happened to morrow that in a new Reform Bill in England there was a vote given, such as we have given it to the wage-earner, or a vote given to the income payer who did not appear on the local rates, I will venture to predict, and I am sure no hon. gentleman will say it would not be so, that the same system of appointing a revising barrister would exist, and he would be obliged, from the stress of circumstances, to be as this Bill proposes he should be, the revising officer in all cases where the rate rolls showed that a vote existed, and that he would still act as the revising barrister under that name, although he must of necessity have the power conferred upon him to put on the lists ab initio those names that did not appear on those rolls, and he would still retain his mode of appointment and would still be appointed from a distance.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I deem it my duty to the profession to which I belong, more particularly in the Province of Ontario, to say a few words in answer to the substance of the complaint which the leader of the Oppo- is to be performed in the presence of all parties, where sition has made against this clause in the Bill. The objection which he has urged rests upon the theory that the members of the profession to which we both belong, will be found so neglectful of their duty, so blind to that sense of honor which we all claim is the disthat sense of honor which we all claim is the dis-tinguishing mark of our profession, that they will violate associations, both Reform and Conservative, attend these Mr. BLAKE.

that they will dishonestly discharge their duty as revising barristers, should they be appointed to that office; and that from the ordinary members of the profession who may be appointed to fill that office, the same impartiality, the same administration of justice will not be obtained as will be obtained from the County Court judges. He insists that the appointment of judges should be made obligatory, unless in the case of declinature or other special reason of that character; and the reasons he advances for that position is that other men in the profession appointed to that particular position, men who are not judicial officers, cannot be relied upon to discharge their duty with impartiality. A charge of that kind is an insult to the profession to which he and I belong, and I regret that insult should have come from the recognised leader of the bar of Ontario, the Treasurer of the Law Society, who, himself, in conjunction with the Benchers of the Law Society, of whom I have the honor to be one, is responsible for calling men to the bar and confiding to them the obligations and duties of the profession to which we belong. On behalf of the bar of Ontario, from whom those revising officers are to be selected, I repudiate the charge. I say it is an insult to it, and that the last man in the world who ought to have made that charge or insinuation is the leader of the Opposition, the head of the bar in Ontario. I am quite sure, from what I know of the profession in Ontario, that no man will be appointed to this position of revising barrister who will not discharge his duty as fairly, as impartially, and as honestly as if he were a County Court judge, and a safeguard is provided by the Bill, as the leader of the Government has stated, should any delinquency occur, and I am quite sure none will occur, in any more frequent instances than those in which it has been found necessary to apply the power of the law to delinquencies on the part of County Court judges. I think I am only expressing the general opinion of the public in Ontario, the general opinion, I am sure, of the profession in Ontario, when I say that men can and will be found to discharge this duty where they are appointed in the place of County Court judges or instead of County Court judges, because county court judges are not to be found to discharge it, who will discharge it as fairly, honestly, and impartially as would any County Court judge or Superior Court judge. More over the duty is one that is to be discharged in the light of day; it is not to be discharged in a back room, without the knowledge of the public and the scrutiny of the public; it will be discharged in the presence of representative men of both political parties; and those administering this office will know that whatever they do will be scrutinised, will know if they depart from the line of rectitude, which ought to be followed be every one fufilling a judicial obligation, they will be subject to that obloquy and disgrace that always attends the breach of an obligation of honor on the part of any one committed with such obligation. I regret that the charge, or rather the insinuation, should have come from the hon, gentleman who has made it. I regret he is not in his place to hear my observations and to justify his conduct in making this insinuation, if he can do so, an insinuation that the profession in Ontario is so low in honor, so sunk in public esteem, so unworthy of reliance that it cannot be trusted to discharge that duty which this Bill proposes to entrust to it, and a duty, too, which is to be entrusted to it under the obligation of an oath, and which every one has an opportunity of seeing what is done, of scrutinising what is done, and, if injustice be done, of making it public and appealing from the unjust decision. We know how these lists are revised, we know that the their duty, their oath of office, for partisan purposes, Courts of Revision which, it is provided by the Bill, shall be held by every municipality, in order that the people interested may not have to travel far, may be present and see what is going on. We know the general interest that is taken, in these things, at any rate in Ontario, and that when any court of that kind is sitting there will be numerous representatives of both parties present, who understand all the circumstances; and we know that what ever the revising barrister does, will be done honestly, conscientiously and impartially, be he Conservative or Liberal. In fact, if my hon. friends opposite occupied the treasury benches to-day, I would be willing to see a provision of this kind put in the Bill, having every confidence in the honesty and integrity of the Liberal or Reform members of the profession in Ontario, who are almost as numerous, I presume, as the Conservative members, and who, I believe, if appointed, as they would be under a Liberal Government, to this office, would discharge their duty as honestly, impartially as Conservative members of the profession.

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps you would like to see us make the appointments, now.

My hon. friend's observation is Mr. CAMERON. simply absurd, and he knows it. He knows, as an ex-member of the Government, that when he sat on this side he did not usually appoint members of the party to which he was opposed to office, and I think that the character of the appointments made by the Government of to day will compare favorably with those made by the Government of which he was a member. With reference to the general provisions of the Bill, I do not at the present moment intend to enter into a discussion of them, nor do I propose to discuss the details of this particular part of the Bill now before us. At a later period in the discussion, if necessary, I may have something to say on the subject, but at present I simply rose, at the first opportunity, in order to say a word in vindication of the profession to which I have the honor to belong, and to express my regret that the hon. gentleman, the recognised leader of the profession in Ontario, should so far forget himself as to make the insinuation against us he

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman, in proposing this section of the Bill, has adopted toward the committee a tone wholly different from that which has characterised his observations in the earlier discussions that we have had upon this Bill. He has been complimentary to my hon. friend who leads this side of the House. He has spoken in high terms of the ability with which he has addressed himself to the consideration of this section of the Bill. There is nothing which the First Minister has said in reference to the able speech of the leader of the Opposition which would not be endorsed on this side of the House, but we regret beyond anything else that the Government and the majority in this House have not been led with the same efficiency, and that the hon. gentleman has not addressed himself with the same ability and care to the consideration of the measure as my hon. friend who addressed you from this side of the House. The First Minister proposed this measure, a measure of very great consequence, which is revolutionary in its character, which is making radical changes in our parliamentary system, if it should become law, in a speech of little more than eight minutes in length. I venture to say that no Minister of the Crown in England has ever introduced an important measure of this kind with such a speech as the leader of the Government introduced this to the consideration of the House or the speech in which he moved the second reading of the Bill. The hon, gentleman pro-posed important changes in our constitutional system, changes that had not been discussed on the hustings, that had not received the attention of the people, that had not been discussed in the press, and yet the hon gentleman never for one moment addressed himself to the effects that these usually regarded, or accepted, as complete in itself, and the changes were likely to have upon the electorate of Canada. revising duties of the judge are not often called into oper-

When Mr. Gladstone introduced his recent measure. reforming the parliamentary representation of the United Kingdom, he went into minute details with regard to it. He told the House what the effect of those changes would be, he told the House what classes of the people would be admitted, the number in the different constituncies that would be admitted to the electoral franchise who had not enjoyed it before, and what would be the aggregate of electors that would be added to the electoral body throughout the United Kingdom. The hon. gentleman gave us no information of this sort. To-day he addressed himself to a discussion of the particular clause before us, and he told us how anxious he was to receive suggestions from this side of the House, and how anxious he would be to adopt those suggestions if they met with his approval. Well, we have been rather unfortunate in obtaining the approval of the hon, gentleman to those changes which we have hitherto made, and, if the hon, gentleman is now disposed to give a little more attention and consideration to the suggestions made from this side of the House, I think it will be necessary that he should begin this Bill anew, that we should turn back to the first clause and go over it again. I remember reading an ancodote of a New York elergyman who had prepared his sermon with some care, and who was addressing a very large audience on a very warm day. He noticed that a large portion of his audience were asleep, and, when he had done, he said: I have taken a very great deal of care in the preparation of this discourse, I have given the subject a very great deal of consideration, and, observing that a large portion of my audience have not been listening to what I have had to say, and now, seeing they are waked up, I think I had better begin again. We are very much in that position. We have been obliged to give a very great deal of attention to the measure which the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House and which we are now considering in committee. Unfortunately the hon, gentleman has kept us here from very early hours to very early hours again, and he has not been here for the purpose of hearing those suggestions which we have from time to time made. He has been for a great portion of the time absent, and, if he is now disposed to listen with attention and care to what the Opposition have to say upon this Bill, I think he will be obliged to begin again and to remain in his place and listen to what we have to say, not merely with regard to this clause but with regard to those other clauses which have preceded it, and which have been adopted by the committee. The hon, gentleman, in replying to my hon, friend, said: Oh, the objections which you make to the functions of a revising officer are rather of a technical character. We say they are not of a technical character. The objections we make to the functions of the revising officer are of the essence of this particular proposition. We say that the duties imposed upon him are duties that a revising officer ought not to undertake, that the name is a misnomer. The revising officer ought to have nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the list. The hon, gentleman says there is no original list. No, there never can be an original list under the system he proposes, but there is an original list in England, which is prepared by the clerk of the municipality and by the overseers of the parish. That list is made as complete as possible. The work of revision is a work which sometimes, although it is always possible, is not found necessary, and it often happens that a revising officer, although appointed for the work of revision, finds there is no revision required. The list as originally prepared is the list that remains for the purpose of being used in the parliamentary elections. That is exactly the position of things in the Provinces at this moment. The list that is prepared, under the law as it now stands, by the clerk of the municipality and by the municipal courts of revision, is a list that is usually regarded, or accepted, as complete in itself, and the ation. The hon, gentleman says that it is impossible to prepare a list independently of the revising officer, I say it is not impossible. I say there is no difficulty in pointing out to him how such a list may be prepared, There is no difficulty in obtaining persons with the necessary local knowledge to prepare that list, and unless we have a proper preparation of the list, with persons on the ground possessing the necessary local knowledge, it will be impossible that we can have a satisfactory list without a serious expense incurred every year. The hon, gentleman says he desires to make this a good measure. I do not think that is possible. We may make this part of the measure unobjectionable. It is possible to make this a very much better measure than it is now, but there are parts of this measure over which we have gone, against the improvement of which the hon. gentleman has set his face, which are of so serious a character as to render the measure radically defective, even though all the improvements required in this portion of the Bill should be effected. The hon, gentleman said: It is true I proposed a revising board in 1870, but that was objected to by my supporters and by the country, the proposition was regarded as monstrous, the expense would be so enormous that it would not be for a moment entertained. Well, this is a very extraordinary character for the hon. gentleman to give a proposition which he himself had made, and it does seem to me that if we are to have a voters' list indepen-dent of the provincial list, then it will be necessary to subordinate the question of expense to the question of the preparation of the list. If the hon, gentleman feels that it is impossible to incur the expense necessary to make a satisfactory list, one that will be accepted as a fair list to those who are to be placed upon it, then I say that he ought not to have undertaken the work at all. The question of the exercise of the electoral franchise is a matter too important to be allowed to remain in an unsatisfactory condition, simply because the hon, gentleman cannot afford the expense. But, Sir, I say that we can make it satisfactory, we can improve the machinery for preparing an independent list, without incurring any additional expense, and without exciting suspicion that is done for the purpose of promoting the interest of a party instead of being a means of securing the fair expression of opinion in the country. Now this Bill exhibits a disposition on the part of its promoter, from beginning to end, not to secure a complete and fair voters' list. but to get such a list as will secure to the Administration a party advantage.

Mr. BOWELL. No, no.

Mr. MILLS. I will undertake to show that what I state is the fact; I will undertake to show that the Minister of Customs will not be quite satisfied with a fair list.

Mr. BOWELL. You have no right whatever to say that.

Mr. MILLS. I will undertake to show that this proposition submitted to us is not a fair proposition. Sir, the hon, gentleman says that the revising officer in England has no initiatory duties. Why has he no initiatory duties? Because the list is prepared by the municipal authorities, because the clerk of the municipality and the overseers of the parish prepare and complete the list? The hon, gentleman has referred to the class whose names are not upon the assessment roll, although qualified to exercise the elective franchise. Well, Sir, would the duty of putting them on the list much hose who are upon the ground, who know the facts, who know whether certain parties possess a rating which would entitle them to go upon the voters' list, and those parties, in a great majority of instances, would be put by the local authorities on the list, and the expense of amending the roll by revision would be reduced to a minimum. Now I find that all the wage-earners will not be found on the assessment roll. The assessment roll, then, is not an original preparation, is not such a preparation as will supersede the necessity of a properly prepared list as contra-distinguished from a revised list. Then there are the tenants. If the hon gentleman had, in this Bill, adopted the rule of taking the assessed value of the property as a test of qualification of the tenant, then the assessment roll would enable the party in whose hands it was placed to see what tenants had a right to go upon the voters' lists. But the hon. gentleman has not done that. He has provided that the amount of rental paid shall determine the qualification of the tenant, and that being the case the assessment roll gives no indication of the right of the tenant to go upon the list, and the qualification of all tenants who are qualified to go upon the list, must be ascertained from other source than the assessment roll. Then there is the class of those who have a certain income. They may or may not be upon the assessment roll. I believe in the Province of Quebec there is no such thing as assessment for personal property, so that in the Province of Quebec there will be no such thing as a party on an assessment roll assessed for income, and those who are entitled to vote in consequence of the amount of income which they annually have, will not be found upon the assessment roll. Besides, there is the class of the fisherman. Now if you take these classes who are not likely to be found upon the assessment roll, two of which never can be found upon the assessment roll, you find that nearly 35 per cent of those who would be entitled to vote under the Bill, will not be found upon the assessment roll, and if they go upon the voters' lists they must either appear in person and show their right, or the fact that they are qualified must be ascertained from some other source. Why, Sir, if you take the parliamentary elections in this country at any time since the Union and make a change of 5 per cent from one side to the other, you will change the majority from one side to the other; and if that is the case, is it not a matter of immense consequence when you find that in the material that is placed in the hands of the revising officer for the purpose of preparing the voters' list, at least 30 per cent of those who are entitled to go upon the lists, are not upon it, and when only 5 per cent is sufficient to change a minority into a majority? I say this is a condition of things that ought to be avoided. What change is to be made in this proposition in order to get rid of that difficulty? Why, Sir, to avail ourselves of the local machinery, to say that the local officers who know the provincial law, who have the duty imposed upon them to prepare the voters' list, shall, under our law and by our authority, be called upon to prepare the voters' list for the election of members of the House of Commons. They reside in each township; they know, not only the farmers, the mechanics and merchants, but they know their sons, they know the wage-earners, they know who are steady in their habits, who earn a sufficient amount of wages to entitle them to go upon that list; they know who are the men of capital who have money loaned out to their neighbors, or who are possessed of other securities, and who have sufficient income to enable them to go upon the list. They are therefore prepared to utilise the assessment roll, so far as it can be used, and to make a list as complete as possible. We have, then the machinery already existing if we choose to utilise it. There is another point I wish to refer to. In the early past of this discussion I pointed out that in our contested elections we declared that the provincial courts should be the courts for the purpose of trying election petitions. Our right to do that was contested, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England were called upon to decide the point. They held that, as we had absolute control over the subject vincial court for the purpose of making the trial; and if we so designated and imposed the duty upon it, it was not optional to perform that duty. It became a Dominion court for the purpose of trying actions, just the same as if a court were created wholly independent of its having a local existence before. I say the same thing can be done with regard to the preparation of the voters' list. If we choose to say in this Bill, by a new clause, that the parties who are appointed by the local law to prepare the lists shall be officers of the Parliament of Canada for the purposes of this Act, they will have that duty imposed upon them, and will be called on to fulfil it, not as officers of the Local Legislature and as officers having derived authority from local laws, but as officers of this House, under the laws of this Parliament. There is no more difficulty in doing that than there was in saying that a provincial court should try contested elections for the House of Commons. It is a perfectly simple plan. We can attach to the due performance of the duties of those officers such penalties as we think the public interest may require, and we may give an appeal to a county judge. We shall be acting as is done in an analogous case in England with respect to the preparation of lists, and also in an analogous case under the Ontario and Quebec laws and in two at least of the three Maritime Provinces. There is no practical obstacle to having someone to prepare the list distinct from the party who is to revise it. If we adopt that system, we shall be in this position: We shall have men who know all the people who reside in the municipality and know who ought to go on the voters' list, and appeals would be confined to a few cases where the right to vote might be in dispute and where names might accidently have been overlooked. It, moreover, gives the advantage of enabling parties to enquire beforehand. Everyone knows that members of the municipal council, assessors and clerks, become acquainted with almost every instance of oversight; so that when the time of revision comes they are easily corrected, and the appeals taken before the revising officer are very few indeed. Suppose an opposite course is adopted. Here is a county with 40,000 or 50,000 people. The county judge or revising officer is called on to prepare the list. He has put into his hands copies of the various assessment rolls. He is told there is no difficulty, that he can accept those whose names are on the roll as owners and occupants. But there is the large class of tenants. There are wage-earners; there are those who have incomes, and are entitled on that account to go on the voters' list. All those parties must apply to have their names put on the list before the change can take place. I know of my own observation, as do other hon. members, that if you leave off any considerable number from the voters' list in any year, except that on which elections take place, the names practically remain off. Such is a condition of things we ought to avoid. It is not merely necessary that we should give facilities for having names placed on the list, but we should adopt such a system as will prevent any considerable number of names being left off. The great objection is that 25 or 30 per cent. of those whose names should be on the list will be omitted from the list as prepared. Measures will have to be taken to have the names put on, and evidence will have to be produced. Who is going to look after those lists? There is hardly a member from the rural districts who has not ten or twelve municipalities within his constituency. How is he to know whether the list is properly made up? How is he to know how many names have been left off? Even if a member resides in the constituency he represents, he cannot know more than 25 or 30 per cent of the residents. He will be obliged to go into every polling division and call a meeting of his friends, to go over the list, name by name. The next point is to see that the names of parties omitted are pose? Well, Sir, I know by practical experience the purinserted; to see the party and ascertain whether he will pose for which that was done, and I daresay there are attend at the Court of Revision and make application. The candidate or member must do that not in one division but in thirty, and must spend a month in meeting friends. The candidate must take means for the purpose of calling them together, for the purpose of having all names put on the list. Suppose there is not much political excitement prevailing at the time, difficulty will be found in getting the voters out. After all these measures are taken the list will be defective. Suppose that a wageearner wants to get away to attend the court, his employer will not consent to his leaving, he finds it impossible for him to get away, he has something for him to do that particular day, especially if his political opinions differ from those of the wage-earner, and the result is that the wage-earner cannot get his name on the list. I say, if any gentleman will take the trouble of counting the time of calling meetings together in each polling division, of examining the list, of going over that list with the people of the division, of taking the necessary steps to secure their application for the correction of a list, and the time which is lost in attending the Court of Revision, he will find that the expense of a proper revision each year will be quite equal to the expense of an ordinary election. Now, I say frankly I would rather meet my constituents under an ordinary and fairly prepared voters' list under the present system, and incur the expense of an election each year, than incur the expense of correcting and revising the list under the system which the hon. gentleman proposes. I say we are called upon to take a practical view of this question, to look at it and see the features which it will present when it comes to be worked out. I have given you an idea of what it costs one man in time and labor. Consider the amount of time lost by the various parties, the time required in giving notice, the time required in visiting 30 different polling divisions and it will require 30 days at least to do that—and see how you are going to do all this and get that list revised, and if there is not some special favor on the other side, there is another party which will have just the same difficulty and expense to incur. This is not a matter that the community are going to meet together as a unit for the purpose of considering. We will meet together as parties; the Conservative party will look after the interest of the Conservative party, on the voters list, and the Reform party will do the same thing. There will therefore be double the amount of expense—there will be the same expense to both sides in many instances, there would be in the case I have mentioned, the one side. The hon, gentleman has us that once these revising officers are appointed they will be such fair minded men that there will be no desire on the part of any party in this House to remove them. I wonder if the hon. gentleman remembers when there were officers of weights and measures appointed. How long were they allowed to hold office after the Government which made the appointment went out of power. I wonder if the hon gentlemen remembers that not the Government, but Parliament itself, provided for the appointment of the returning officers; and named them in the Bill. The Government of the day did not ask that those returning officers should be appointed by the Governor in Council. They proposed that they should be certain responsible officers in the country, and they were named in the Bill as the parties who were to be returning officers in the election. How long were they allowed to retain their place after the late Administration was defeated? Why, Sir, we had the law changed, we had the appointment taken out of the hands of Parliament, we had the former Bill repealed, and we had the hon. gentleman carrying through this House a law taking the appointment of those officers into his own hands. For what pur-thing like mine. Now, I say that these officers are not officers in whom the people of this country will have the utmost confidence. Let me take the case of the returning officer who returned a party for Muskoka, who Parliament believed had no right to sit here. He was summoned to this House for dereliction of duty under an Order of this House, to show cause why he made an improper return, and I am informed, and I believe the Public Accounts will show, that that gentleman, after being brought here, was paid by the Government whose interests he had served, and was sent back to his business, paid by the Government for making a trip to Ottawa and back, after having violated his duty in returning a party whom the people refused to elect. Yet, in the face of these violations of law, the hon. gentleman asks us to believe that the people of this country will have confidence in the man whom he, an interested party in the contest, names as the revising officer. Why, Sir, the proposition is monstrous. It is so utterly at variance with every principle of natural justice that a man should be made a judge between two contesting parties by one of them-such a proposition is so contrary to all our notions of natural justice that it does seem to me that the hon, gentleman could not have been serious when he declared that he had no doubt that Parliament and the country would have confidence in the appointments thus made. Sir, the hon, gentleman admits that this is not the English practice. In England, in the metropolitan county of Middlesex, and in the city of London, the revising officer is appointed by the Lord Chief Justice, and in other counties by the senior judge during the summer assize, and this is only for the purpose of revising. The work of preparing the list is in the hands of the municipal authorities. The hon, gentleman proposes to take from the municipal authorities the right to prepare the list. He proposes to give the preparation of the list to this creature of his own appointment, and he proposes that not only the preparation of the list shall be in his hands, but the revision of the list. Why, Sir, the very man who prepares the list, makes it with an imperfect knowledge, makes it imperfect possibly from partisanship, possibly from ignorance, a list which must necessarily be imperfect, is the man who is to have the revision of that list which he himself has prepared. Now, I say that in another feature we are not following the English practice. The hon. gentleman told the English people that he was the one man in this country who was disposed to follow the English precedents, to keep English precedents alive here, that the other party were constantly looking across the border and were inclined to be influenced by American opinion and precedents, and yet the hon. gentleman in an important matter, without any necessity, apart from political exigency, is proposing a radical departure from the system of preparing the list which prevails in the United Kingdom. He has proposed, Sir, what no Government in the United Kingdom has ever asked a Parliament, what no Parliament in the United Kingdom, since the fall of the Stuarts, would have ever entertained, and that proposition, is one which, in my opinion, will degrade Parliament, will prevent a fair expression of the country, will prevent the preponderating political sentiment of the country, prevailing in Parliament. This provision of the Bill is a provision calculated to prevent a proper expression of opinion, because it prevents a proper preparation of the voters' lists. Sir, a prominent supporter of the hon, gentleman, in the city of Torontc, in a communication he wrote to a newspaper, not long since, said he regarded the stuffing of the voters' list as being quite as objectionable as stuffing the ballot box. I think so too, and I believe the majority of the people of this country think so; and this proposition is one that must have the effect of stuffing the voters' lists, whether it is so in intention or not. The hon, gentleman says we want of preparing and revising the voters' lists in the hands of Mr. MILLS.

other hon, gentlemen who have had an experience some-lour revising officer to do what the revising officer now does in Ontario. If he does, let him provide the machinery for the preparation of the list, and let there be an appeal from the list so prepared to the county judge, and let that county judge not be appointed by the Governor in Council, but by Parliament; let Parliament say in the Act that wherever the county judge or the district judge, as the case may be, exists, he shall be the revising officer. Thus we shall take the appointment out of the hands of the Government, and make the judge independent of the Government for the purpose of revising the list; and we shall leave with the people themselves the work of preparing the list. Every law of this sort is only satisfactorily carried out when it is interpreted through the eyes of the public—when the people themselves understand what the law means. Let them prepare the voters' lists; let them say who are entitled by this law to be placed on the voters' list; and if they have done anybody a wrong, there is an appeal to the county judge. But this is a proposal to put the whole machinery, not merely for the revision but for the preparation of the list in the hands of the Prime Minister for the time being. It is proposed to give him some such power as the Roman centurion we read of in the Scriptures, who said, "to one man I say go and he goeth, to another man I say come and he cometh, to this man I say do this and he doeth it." We allow him to say that A or B shall be the revising officer, who shall receive such compensation as the Prime Minister provides, and who shall say who is and who is not to go on the voters' list. He interprets the law, from him there is no appeal, unless he is not a judge; but in the majority of cases he will be a judge, receiving his appointment, not from Parliament, but from the Government, from the Prime Minister; and while depending upon that Minister, he will be called upon to discharge the duties he imposes upon him. The hon, gentleman said that in England the revising officer has not such local knowledge as we claim for him. We do not say that here the revising officer should have it, if you confine him to the work of revision; in England, the list is prepared by the overseers of the parish and the clerk of the municipality. The hon. gentleman's reference to England is not in point, because he proposes to create an officer with functions wholly different from those performed by the revising officer in that country. The hon, gentleman said that in England they may follow one practice and give the wage-earners votes. They are not likely to follow our practice in England; there would be great deterioration if they did. In England, the political standard is higher than it is in our country. No Prime Minister of England could persuade his followers to entertain such a proposition as that now submitted to us. No Prime Minister of England has ever proposed to take the appointment of revising officers into his own hands and impose upon them not only the work of revision, but the work of preparing the voters' lists. I do not believe any Parliament in England since the period of the revolution has been so far lost to its sense of duty as the representative body of the nation, so wanting in public spirit as to entertain such a proposition if it had been made; and yet that is the proposition which the hon. gentleman makes to this House, and which he expects those who support him will vote to make law. In England, if wage-earners were given votes, it would be the duty of the overseers of the parish, and not of the revising officer, to put them on the list. Their work would be as complete as possible before the work of revision would be undertaken, and we know that there as here, under our municipal system the work of revision is reduced to a minimum. One hon. work of revision is reduced to a minimum. gentleman has said that my hon. friend who leads on this side of the House was casting a reflection upon his profession when he said it was an improper thing to put the work men who were mere creatures of the Prime Minister. I have as much respect for the legal profession as that hon. gentleman; but I do not know that they are morally more trustworthy than any other class of the community. I believe the agriculturists, the merchants, the mechanics, the doctors, and the clergymen of the country are quite as upright, quite as honorable, quite as distinguished for their integrity, as those who belong to the legal profession. I do not care what profession these men may belong to, I do not care how honest in intention they may be; what I do care is that those who undertake this work shall be above suspicion, that they shall not be appointed by the leaders on one side or on the other, but that they shall derive their authority from some independent source, and that they shall not be suspected when they give a decision that they give it under the pressure of the Prime Minister for the time being, which it seems to me is the effect of the proposition submitted to the House. I do not think this proposition ought to be carried. I believe it is of the utmost consequence that this work of preparation should be kept distinct from the work of revision, that the work of preparing the lists should be left with the different municipalities, and the work of revision to the judiciary of the country. In that way both the preparation and the revision of the lists will be out of the hands of the Government and out of the hands of the opponents of the Government; but they will be in the hands of impartial persons. We know that in the various municipalities those who prepare the lists belong to both political parties. It is a rare thing to find a municipal body in which both parties are not represented, and even where there is, there is a law of compensation by which the parties who lose in one instance gain in another. But in this measure there is no such law; the dice are loaded, and they are to be cast always in the one way, in favor of the Administration, under the influence of the Administration. I have no objection to hon, gentlemen governing the country as long as public opinion is in their favor, but I object to a system that will retain them as rulers of the country when public opinion points in the opposite direction. And so I say, we wish to create an impartial voters' list, to leave the people free from the shackles which the First Minister wishes to impose upon them, to leave them free to express their own unbiased opinion. It is true the public occasionally err, but it is better they should go wrong freely than that they should go right under coercion from the Treasury benches. What we desire is that people may be allowed freedom to express their opinions at every general election, and that the preponderating political opinion of the country shall always be able to secure a majority to represent it on the floor of Parliament.

Mr. LANGELIER. Yesterday, in the course of the discussion on the amendment taking away the franchise from certain classes of Indians, a remark was made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that he was not afraid of the effect the giving of the franchise to the Indians would have in his own constituency. I was very much struck by the way in which that remark was taken by an hon. gentleman opposite. It was the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), I believe, who said at once, why then do you oppose it? Evidently, in his opinion, provided the one party had nothing to lose by a measure proposed, such measure should not be opposed by that party, even if it were ruinous to the country. If I were to take the same view the hon. member for north perth seems to take, I should certainly not oppose this portion of the Bill, for if there is one thing which, in my opinion, will damage the Conservative and benefit the Liberal party, it is this. I propose however to the Liberal party, it is this. I propose however to the Liberal party, it is this. I propose however to the Liberal party, it is this. I propose however to the Liberal party, it is this leading our party, but because it not because it will damage our party, but because that will favor them. Like the distinction want a system that will favor them. Like the distinction of the Bill, for if there is one thing which, in gambler, they want to play with marked cards; or, like the cowardly duellist, they want to fight their adversary after they have destroyed his weapon of defence. That is the system they want to use against us. The system that will favor them. Like the distinction of the Bill, for if there is one thing which, in gambler, they want to fight their adversary after they have destroyed his weapon of defence. That is the system they want to use against us. were to take the same view the hon. member for North I am sure it will injure the interests of this country. Those tem that is proposed to be introduced is not only new, is 274 who have studied at all the political institutions in other countries, know that in all those countries which have acquired, in any degree, parliamentary institutions, the making of the voters' lists has always been entrusted to the local authorities. I shall not mention all the countries of Europe where the representative system is in existence; I may say however that in France, which has seen many kinds of Government, it never occurred, even under the second empire, to her political men to establish a system by which the Government would determine who should and who should not vote at parliamentary elections. What do we see in England? From the first moment that lists of parliamentary lists electors have been made, the making of those lists has been confided to the local authorities; it never occurred to any one to confide the making of them to parties appointed by the Government and under the dependence more or less of the Government. At this moment, the Imperial Parliament is about to pass one of the most important laws concerning elections ever enacted, and no one has thought of proposing to introduce such a system as the one sought to be forced through this Parliament, that of giving the making of the voters' lists to officers appointed by the Government. What is the reason given for this proposition? What is the reason given for taking away from the local authorities the making out of those lists? Is it because we have a new system of Government? We have the system of Confederation which has been in existence for nearly 18 years, and have no complaints under it against the present mode of deciding who shall have the right to vote. have heard some hon, members bring very serious charges against the municipal officers in Ontario entrusted with the preparation of the lists, but I do not think any such charge could be supported by evidence. I am sure none such could be made as regards the Province of Quebec, on any just grounds. I think it was the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) who said that great injustices and frauds were committed by the municipal councils.

Mr. HESSON. What I said was that it was well known to all the members from Ontario that the elections, in the main, were carried very largely on political grounds, that the councillors were so elected in the first place, and that they appointed the assessors who made out the rolls, and that the courts of revision were appointed in a similar way. I also urged that the leader of the Opposition was responsible for bringing party politics in the election of the councillors, because he advised his friends to look after the voters' lists, and that consequently the object was to have the preparation of the voters' lists in partisan hands.

Mr. LANGELIER. That does not mean anything, if it is not intended to mean that the lists are not properly made. The First Minister did not give a single reason for the change proposed, but he said the majority of his friends in the House wanted the new system. I was much struck by that remark. He did not advance one argument to show why the system which has been in existence so long, has worked so well in the Province of Quebec, at least, and I think also in the Province of Ontario and the other Provinces, should be done away with, except the argument, if it can be called so, that the majority of his friends did not like that system. Why do they not like it? If it has given satisfaction to the whole country, why should it not give satisfaction to them? The reason is obvious, it is because that system gives justice to every one on both sides, and that is not what the hon, gentlemen opposite want. They that is not what the hon. gentlemen opposite want. They want a system that will favor them. Like the dishonest not only a system in favor of which no good reason can be given, because I am sure that, if any good reason could be given, it would have been given by the Premier this afternoon when he explained the reason for introducing that system. The only reason he gave was that it was the wish of the majority of this House that the change should take place. It amounts to this that it is within the power of a majority of this House to say stat pro ratione voluntas. Whether there is a justification for introducing a system or not, whether that system is unjust or not, provided it pleases the majority, it is a good principle of legislation to intro-

I want to show first, that the new system proposed will be extraordinarily expensive. Figures have already been given in the course of the long discussion through which this Bill has passed, but I will mention facts which I am sure will not be controverted by those who know anything of the preparation of electoral lists in the Province of Quebec. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) the other day made the remark that, for several years, he had been secretary-treasurer of his municipality, and there may be several other hon, members who may be as well acquainted with the making of electoral lists as the hon, member for Bagot. I call upon them to controvert, if they can, the statements I am going to make. I think it is a very moderate estimate to say that the making of a list in a single municipality cannot take less than eight days. It takes at the very least a week to make a good list, under the present system, by the municipal officers, who also have the making of the valuation rolls. They know each man and each property. They are extremely familiar with all the details, the knowledge of which is necessary to the making of a good list. Still, it takes them a week at least to make a good list. There are, on an average, fifteen municipalities in every electoral division. I am not speaking of large cities, but of counties in the Province of Quebec. That makes fifteen times eight days for the preparation of the list. We may say, in round figures, that four months will be required by the revising officer, supposing him not to take more time than the local officers take now. It is selfevident that it must take much more time in the case of a man such as the revising officer will be, who will know nothing of the property in that municipality, who will be a perfect stranger, who will come there and will act only on the information he can get through the county. He will have to divide the municipality into polling sub-divisions. That is another very difficult duty. I can speak from personal knowledge of the difficulties that a revising officer of that kind will experience. I was carrying on an election last summer, and that election lasted nearly two months. It was in a county which was in a large measure new to me. I could not now undertake to make a list of the county. I drove through the county in every direction several times; still I would not take upon myself to make a proper polling division of that county, because it requires for a man to be very familiar with every locality, and with the citizens of every locality and the peculiar circumstances, to enable him to make a good polling division. What will it be then for a revising barrister who will arrive quite raw, quite new, in an electoral district to commence to make the lists in every municipality? He will have to act upon the information given to him. Do you think he will go to the heads of the Liberal party in every municipality to take information? indeed, we may say with perfect certainty that the example the will be do? He will go to the wire-pullers of the of making this list will reach half a million dollars. Conservative party in that locality to get information. The hon, member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) complained that the leader of the Opposition had insulted the Bar of Ontario by insinuating that these revising officers would not be impartial. I shall come to that in a few moments, but I must say now that, supposing the revising officer to be as impartial as it is possible to conceive, it will be impossible for him to act impartially, salaries to certain lawyers. I must admit that a good deal Mr. LANGELIEB.

because, in making the electoral lists, he will have to take information from other parties who will not be under oath, he will have to take information, as I said, from the wirepullers of his party. Of course they will tell him: Make the division in this way and in that other way. I am not making idle suppositions. I am only stating what we have already seen on several occasions, when returning officers have been obliged to make polling divisions because they had not been made by the municipal authorities. I have seen some of these divisions made in the best way to prevent a majority of the voters being able to cast their votes. We must not suppose that all those who give information to the revising officer will be angels, and will give only the most honest and the fairest information. It would be having a very high opinion of human nature to suppose that the revising barrister will take into his confidence the leaders of both parties in every muncipality, in order to get impartial and fair information from them. One thing is sure, judging from the past and from the conduct of the officers in the past, that the officers will apply to the heads of the Conservative party in every place.

Coming again to the question of the great expenditure that this will entail, we should add to the four months, which, at the very least, will be required to make the list for each county, two months at least for the revision of those lists, especially the first list to be prepared under this Bill. There must be, first, a list made for each municipality, then the municipality must be divided into polling subdivisions, and then there must be a second sub-division. If that does not take at least two menths, I shall be very much mistaken. This makes six months that the revising officer will have to pass in the making of the list for each municipality. How much will he be paid? It will be impossible to get any decent lawyer to give up his profession or avocation for six months without giving him, at the very least, $1,000, and I am very much afraid, speaking for the Province of Quebec, that the Government will only get inferior, second or third-class lawyers, to give up their profession for six months for $1,000. That is a very moderate estimate of what the Government will have to pay. To that we must add the salary of a clerk, and it is making a very moderate estimate, also, to suppose that he will be paid $300 a year. I do not think it will be possible to get a clerk for $300 a year, but I am putting everything at the lowest figure possible. Then there must be a bailiff; that bailiff certainly will not get less than $200 for the large quantity of work he will have to do. That makes Then we have to altogether $1,500 for each county. add to this the travelling expenses of the revising officer, and of his clerk, of his bailiff, and the expenses of printing. Now, we have had some experience of the cost of printing when it is done at the expense of the Government. During this very Session, in the Public Accounts Committee, we have seen printers paid seventeen times the cost of ordinary composition for certain pamphlets. We may be quite sure that this printing will not be open to public competition, but will be given only to friends of the Government. Altogether, it is impossible that the expenditure under this Bill will be less than $2,000 for each electoral division, and as there are 211 electoral divisions in Canada, and we shall probably have more after the next census, the expenditure will reach very nearly half a million dollarsindeed, we may say with perfect certainty that the expense as I have already said, if I were to consider this measure only from a party of point of view, I should rejoice at it. I have not forgotten the outcry raised in the Province of Quebec by some of the hon gentlemen opposite from that Province, when the Supreme Court was created. A regular howl was raised against the Liberal party because it had, as was asserted put the country to an immense expenditure in order to give fat of damage was done our party by that cry. But what does that court cost us now, against which such an outcry was raised? For the last fiscal year I see the expenditure in connection with it was $56,426, whereas the cost of these 211 supreme courts that are going to be created by this Bill, will be at least half a million dollars. I would like to see what defence hon. gentlemen opposite can make to this proposition. I see before me some of those who raised such a howl against the Supreme Court, on account of its cost and its affording fat salaries to a few lawyers, and I would like to know what they have to say in defence of a proposition to give salaries to 211 lawyers, at an expense of half a million dollars.

But not only will this system be very expensive, but it will be less efficient than the system now in existence. As I stated a few moments ago, it is a very difficult thing to make a good election list, so difficult that even when it is made by a local officer there are sure to be some mistakes. I do not think there ever was a list made by the secretarytreasurer which had not afterwards to be corrected by the municipal council, although it was made by a local officer, who knew every individual living in the municipality and the probable amount of property in his possession. I am now, of course, speaking of the Province of Quebec, with which I am specially acquainted, but I suppose the case is much the same in the other Provinces. Every man in a municipality knows what property his neighbors have, and the assessor cannot easily be deceived on this point, But when the list is to be prepared by a perfect stranger going into the county, knowing neither the individuals, nor the amount of their property, how is it possible that he can make a correct list? For instance, take a lawyer going from the city of Quebec into the county of Gaspé, or the county of Bonaventure; what can he know of the electors or their means? What can he know of the wages earned by the laborers of that county? A great many of the electors are away from certain counties at certain seasons of the year, and how is this revising officer to get the information which will enable him to put them on the list or exclude them from it? Now, we have obtained a concession from the First Minister, that the valuation roll shall be prima facie evidence of the value of property to qualify those who are to qualify on real estate. Several new franchises have been admitted, and very properly admitted. Farmers' sons, or proprietors' sons, are admitted, and wage-earners are admitted under the Bill as it now stands. Now, how would it be possible for a perfect stranger to go into a county and say how many sons a farmer has who would be qualified to vote? It is next to impossible. The consequence is, that that officer will have to act on second-class information, and of course he will take his information from the wire-

But the worst feature of this Bill, after all, is its injustice and its want of impartiality. By the section now under discussion the appointment of the revising officer is to be left to the Governor in Council. (The hongentleman read section 10 of the Bill, concerning the appointment of revising officers.) Now, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a portion of the section is the very best answer to the contention of the First Minister. He said, a few moments ago, that the system proposed is virtually the English system. It does not require a very strong argument to prove that this is not correct. It is only necessary to read the section to show that there is no comparison between the English system and the system proposed by this Bill. As was stated by the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), under the English system lists are prepared by the local authorities, by the overseers of the county municipalities, and by the clerks of cities and towns. They are local officers, that he will appoint men quite independent of

It is exactly our system, with the differences of detail which are inevitable on account of the difference of our municipal But taking into account the differences that exist between our municipal organisation and the municipal organisation in England, there cannot be more similarity than exists between the system now in force in England and the system in force in this country, up to this moment, and which it is proposed to abandon. Are those officers in England who prepare the lists those who revise them? Not at all. What are the duties of the revising officers in England? They are exactly the duties which are performed by the judges in this country in cases of appeal; I speak, at least, for the Province of Quebec, with the laws of which I am very familiar. I can state without fear of contradiction that the revising officer performs the same duties as are performed in Quebec by the judges when an appeal is taken from the revision of the municipal officers. It is impossible to have more precautions taken than are taken in Quebec to have correct lists. The list is prepared by the local officer, who knows everyone. It is submitted to the municipal council, to which every elector has a right to make complaint. Everyone can take cognisance of the list immediately after the municipal officer has prepared it; and he must swear to its correctness.

I heard a very strong remark made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) who stated that it was an insult to the legal profession of Ontario, at least, to insinuate that a lawyer, being under oath, could do anything but what was perfectly just and fair. I do not like the plan of opposing class to class. I belong to the legal profession myself, and there are very respectable people in that profession; but that profession is like every other, and I do not pretend that lawyers are above other men, as regards justice and impartiality. All classes in this country should be put on the same footing. It must be admitted that injustice and perjury have been committed. As soon as the list is prepared it must be sworn to by the officer who has prepared it. In Quebec we have more than an oath of office taken in advance. That was not found to be sufficient; so, after the local officer has prepared the list, he must take a special oath before a justice of the peace, swearing to the correctness and impar-tiality of the list. He must state under that special oath that, to the best of his knowledge, it is a correct list of persons entitled to vote, that he has knowingly ommitted no one and has not improperly inserted any name on the list. There is nothing of that kind provided to be done by the revising officer in the Bill now under discussion. He will only take the general oath of office. In answer to the hon. member for Victoria, I may say that the legal profession of Quebec occupies just as good a position as that of any other Province; but there is party spirit in the legal profession of Quebec as in the profession of every other Province. I do not say that lawyers of standing would perjure themselves, but it is very well known in Quebec, as in every other Province, there are in the profession kings and pigmies. There are kings, like the hon. member for Victoria, and he cannot judge all lawyers by himself. He, of course, would never lower himself by acting against his oath; but he cannot make himself responsible for every other lawyer. There are lawyers who may perjure themselves and be false to their oath; there are very few who would commit perjury and swear to statements that were not correct; but party spirit may lead men very great distances. It is a well known rule, and one followed in all countries, that a law should not place a man all party leanings. He will appoint party men, and perhaps very bitter party men. Is it desirable to appoint men who will be placed in the position of choosing between the interests of their party and their duty? It is against all principles of morality and of legislation. We can only judge of the future by the past. We have seen the effect of the interference of the Government in the past in election matters. It is very well to talk of respect paid to an oath; but we have seen, in Quebec and in other Provinces, returning officers, who are supposed to be officers occupying as high a position, if not higher, than that which will be occupied by the revising officer, commit improper acts. I am going to speak of occurrences within my own personal knowledge. In 1871 the law left the task to the Government of choosing any revising officer whom wished. Α certain revising officer appointed for the election in Quebec Centre. He was a professional man, a notary, one of the profession from which it is proposed to select these officers. At that time the nominations were public. No precautions were taken to allow the free and independent electors to come near the hustings to propose a candidate. The hustings were surrounded by bullies, so much so, that any respectable person could not get near them, and one man could not get near the place, although he was one of the supporters of the party, because he had so respectable an appearance. The returning officer was deaf to all the voices proposing an Opposition candidate, though he heard the nomination of the Conservative candidate. The result was, that he declared the Conservative candidate elected by acclamation, although it was well known that another candidate was to be proposed. During the following Session an enquiry took place, and dozens of witnesses swore before the Committee on Privileges and Elections that they had proposed another candidate, that they had shouted his name very loudly, so that every one understood the name very well, the candidate being a gentleman who is now in the Senate. But although the returning officer was a professional man, although he had taken the oath of office, as the revising officers will do, he was deaf to all the cries of those who proposed the Liberal candidate, although his ear was very acute in hearing the name of the present Minister of Public Works, and he declared him elected by acclamation.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. LANGELIER. When the committee rose I was showing, in reply to the statement of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) that it would be an insult to the legal profession to suppose that revising barristers, sworn to do their duty, would act otherwise than in an impartial manner-I was giving instances in which professional men, appointed to still more important and responsible positions than those of revising officers, had acted in anything but a fair and impartial manner. In 1867 there were a great many of such cases, and one of them came before this House in 1868. I allude to the case of the returning officer for Kamouraska. How did he show his impartiality and fair dealing before the nomination came on. He commenced to show the strongest spirit of partisanship. He wentso far as to tie up his dog's tail with a red ribbon in order to insult all the Liberal party in the county, and this was but a trifle compared with what he did when nomination came on. By his pro-clamation he disfranchised all the municipalities where it was generally known the Liberal party would have large majorities. He declared those municipalities should not vote; and this was not an isolated instance. We saw the Mr. LANGELIEB.

to that shameful trick of preventing electors in the Liberal parishes from voting, and still these men were under oath. And in order not to perjure themselves they took the precaution of getting the opinion of a lawyer in favor of the course they were pursuing. The law at that time required the secretary-treasurers to send duplicates of the election list to the registrar. Under the pretext that copies instead of duplicates had been sent, whole municipalities were distranchised; but it is a remarkable fact that copies had also been sent from several Conservative municipalities, and it was not considered that they should be disfranchised; one course was followed towards the Liberal municipalities and another course towards the Conservative municipalities. Still, that was the conduct of responsible men. This is an answer to the remark of the hon, member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) this afternoon, to the effect that it was an insult to the legal profession to suppose that legal gentlemen should be anything but impartaial under oath. Without going contrary to his oath, it would be very easy for the revising barrister to say he was acting on information, as he might be careful only to go to the Conservative party for information. So many abuses were committed by the returning officers to whom I have referred, that it was thought proper by our friends, as soon as they came into power, in 1874, to change the law. It had always been their contention, while out of power, that the officers connected with the election of members of the House of Commons should not be appointed by the Government, but should be entirely independent of the Government should be public officers, in responsible positions, who should be ex officio returning officers; and as soon as they came into power they made good the promises they made in Opposition, by enacting that the registrars or sheriffs should be ex officio returning officers. In 1875, in order to put an end to similar abuses in the local elections, the Legislature of Quebec, directed at that time by a Conservative Government, enacted a similar law. All this shows the danger of the system now proposed, of putting into the hands of the Government the appointment of officers who are going to have so much to do with the election of members to the House of Commons. But it is stated that these officers shall be, as far as possible, taken from among the judges. Well, even in the Province of Outario and in the other Provinces which have county judges, that will be impossible, in a great many cases. I understand that in the Province of Ontario there are only torty-two county judges, whereas there are ninety-two constituencies. If the county judges were to be ex officio revising barristers, the objections of the expensiveness and the inefficiency of the new system would remain; but there would not be that strongest of all objections founded upon the partiality of the lists. The county judges, being independent of political parties, are supposed to be free from partisanship, and to be likely to make fair lists. But in the Province of Quebec even that would be impossible, because we have no county judges, and it is entirely out of the question to expect the judges of the Superior Court to prepare the electoral lists. Their number is not large enough, and they have not too much time for the performance of their ordinary duties. What, then, will be the result? The result will be that in the Province of Quebec, at least, none but lawyers or notaries will be appointed to make the lists. I would call the special attention of hon. members from the Province of Quebec to the danger for that Province, in particular, of the system now proposed. I am going to quote a few lines from a book written by a Conservative writer; it is entituled: "Le Canada sous l'Union," by Mr. Turcotte. Speaking of the abuses committed in the first election under the Union, the writer shows the danger of entrusting to the Government the appointment of the officers who are to manage the elecsame thing repeated in several counties, where they resorted tions. At that time the appointment of the returning officers was put in the hands of the Government. The result was that the then Governor General, Lord Sydenham, succeeded in electing a majority of the members, although the majority of the electors were opposed to the Government he had formed. The following constituencies were practically disfranchised: Beauharnois, Vaudreuil, Rouville, Montreal, Chambly and Terrebonne. In these counties members were elected to whom the electors were opposed. One man, who afterwards occupied a prominent position in this country—I refer to Sir Louis H. Lafontaine—was defeated by the means used by the partisan returning officers, and here is what he said, speaking of his rejection in the county of Terrebonne, in a letter addressed to the electors:

"Un fait patent que personne ne peut nier, qui résulte des actes mêmes de lord Sydenham, c'est qu'il s'est identifié personnellement dans la lutte électorale de notre district, dont il a pris un soin particulier à changer les places de poll; et que, dans ces comtés, la lutte a été accompagnée de violence, de l'effusion de sang et de meurtres. En fixant pour votre comté le lieu de l'élection à New Glasgow, dans les bois, à l'extrémité des limites de ce comté, lord Sydenham a commis une injustice flagrante."

The same system might be resorted to by a partisan revising officer. The Bill provides that it shall be the duty of the revising barrister to divide each municipality into polling divisions. Every member of this House has had more or less to do with elections, and knows the influence that a certain division into polling districts may have in favor of the one party or the other. On the occasion to which I refer, instead of fixing the place of nomination at the real centre of the county, it was placed at New Glasgow, in the bush, at an immense distance from the central place. What was done on that occasion by the partisan returning officer might be more easily done by a revising officer. He might divide the municipality into polling divisions, in such a way as to make it almost impossible, in many places, for the Liberals to poll their vote, or make it exceedingly expensive for them to do so. I have seen that done on certain occasions by partisan returning officers. Every man knows, that under the present law, in the Province of Quebec, at least, when the municipal councillors have not divided a municipality into polling divisions, it is the duty of the returning officer to do it. In some cases, where the municipal councils neglected to do so, a partisan returning efficer has divided the municipality in such a way as to practically disfranchise nearly the whole Liberal party in certain polling divisions, the polling houses being put in places where it was practically impossible for the Liberal party in the municipality to exercise their franchise.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that is confined exclusively to Conservative returning officers?

Mr. LANGELIER. No; but the same thing can be done by the revising officers.

Mr. BOWELL. That was done in my own constituency—not in my election, but at the last local election, in the Liberal interest.

Mr. LANGELIER. What the hon, gentleman says is in support of my contention.

Mr. BOWELL. I understood the hon gentleman to be contending that that would be done by the revising barrister; but that, under the present system, where the returning officers are confined to registrars and sheriffs, that cannot be done. In my county the returning officer did the same thing.

Mr. LANGELIER. When a municipal council neglects their duty, it is the duty of the returning officer to make the polling divisions. In a few cases the municipal council neglected their duty, and it was done by the returning officers in the way I have stated. Under this Bill, the divisions of a municipality by a Government officer will become the rule. Sir L. H. Lafontaine goes on to say:

"Il a voulu défranchiser virtuellement votre comté; et un fait important à constater, c'est que là, lui, lord Sydenham, est descendu dans l'arère pour combattre corps à corps avec un simple individu. C'est lui qui engageait la lutte avec moi; le Dr McCulloch u'était qu'un prêtenon. Il m's vaincu; mais il y a de ces défaites qui sont plus honorables que la victoire, il faut marcher dans le sang de ses concitoyens amis ou ennemis."

Here are some instances of the frauds and injustices which have been committed, when a partisan officer had to do with the conduct of an election. Well, it is proposed by this Bill to put all the elections into the hands of a partisan revising barrister. This is a danger for every Province in the Confederation. It threatens this country with the overthrow of its representative institutions; but there is a special danger to be feared from it, as regards the Province of Quebec. The only guarantee we have of preserving our local institutions, our special institutions, which the promoters of Confederation were so careful to preserve, is the free and untrammelled exercise of the franchise by the electors of the Province of Quebec. I do not suppose we shall ever have a Governor General who will act in the same way as Lord Sydenham did; but it is easy to suppose that we may have a Prime Minister desirous of destroying the local institutions of Quebec, of invading the local rights of Quebec, and nothing would be easier for that Prime Minister than to secure the election of more tools in several counties, by appointing partisan revising barristers, who will put on the voters' lists only the electors prepared in advance to support the course proposed by the Government, or to have revising barristers who would practically disfranchise large portions of several constituencies, those portions which it was known in advance would be opposed to the policy of the Government. I repeat, if there is a Province in the Confederation which should be opposed specially to this portion of the Bill, it is certainly the Province of Quebee; and I am astonished to see hon, members, supporters of the Government from that Province, prepared to support that portion of the Bill. When I say they are prepared to support it, I must modify that statement; they do not seem to be prepared to support it very cordially. Not one of them has dared to stand up and say he is satisfied with the Bill which they are prepared to vote for, but I am sure, if the First Minister were to go to every one of them and ask him: Do you prefer this Bill should pass or not? I am sure each one would answer that he would prefer ten times over that it did not pass. They support it only for party purposes; and I must say this to the credit of the Conservative members of the Province of Quebec, that if they are prepared to vote for the Bill they have the decency, at least, not to say anything in its favor.

After each election which our adversaries have carried, we always hear a great deal of boasting from them of their immense success; we hear them say that the electors approve of their policy. Supposing, after this law is in force, an election is carried by hon. gentlemen opposite-I do not expect it will have that result-but suppose it will, will they be able to boast very much of the result? Will they be able to say it proves that public opinion is in their favor? It would only prove that the electors, selected by partisan officers, would be in their favor, but not at all that public opinion was in their favor. It has always been a great point in elections to secure fairness and impartiality. I remember hearing a very interesting remark made by the late Mr. Justice Willes, in an election case, when giving a reason why, in election cases, the wrongful acts of the agent go against the principal, which is not the case in civil cases. The reason he gave was, that an election should be carried only by fair means, and he compared it to a race, which, he said, if won by foul means, should not be considered as gained, but as lost to the party guilty of the fraud. Could an election carried under this Bill by electors selected by partisan officers be fairly considered as an election earried on in a regular manner and showing the strength of public opinion? I say no. There is no man who will say that the election will show the public opinion of the country; it will only show the so-called public opinion formed by the revising barrister appointed by the Government.

I think I have proved that the system proposed will be extremely expensive, that it will be much more inefficient than the present system, that it is more dangerous, that it will bring partiality into the making of the election lists and will be dangerous for the whole country, and especially for the Province of Quebec.

Mr. VALIN. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the Opposition is very much afraid of the revising officers. We do not fear, because we are not accustomed to use the means which these hon, gentlemen most always use. It is true, the present system is very well liked by these gentlemen, because it leaves the door open for them to commit frauds and to cause the lists to be revised according to their own notions. I am speaking from personal experience in my own county. I shall speak of what has taken place during last election in my own county. The hon, member who has just spoken (Mr. Langelier) ought to know something about it. During that election people have taken the trouble to travel over every parish in the county with a notary, making out deeds, in order to increase the number of voters and in order to have the list revised and names struck out. The present Bill cannot give, especially in that part of the country, a great number of votes to these gentlemen, and this is easily understood; but if we give them the privilege of revising the lists we know what will happen. What has happened last year might happen again this year, and I have no doubt that that might be continued in the same manner for a long time to come. Deeds have been passed in all the parishes in my county, or nearly so, and as many as three different votes have been given on the same farm. Those who had so divided their lots were to annul the deeds immediately after votation, but there has been a case where the sons of a farmer declined to annul the deeds, and father and sons were left almost penniless. Well, what we wish to have to-day is revisers, who will be sufficiently independent from these gentlemen, revisers who will be under the control of the Government, and by this means I hope we may have justice. The present Government do not expect to remain in power for centuries; it may turn out some of these days that the hon, gentlemen opposite may come into power; and it is for that reason that, on our part, we should like to have the right of appeal. I suppose that that right will be used, and that everything that can be done will be done to have as many votes struck out as will be possible. It is not known who the revisers will be; I suppose that we are going to appoint Liberals, because we know very well that if the Liberals were in power they would appoint Conservatives. There is not the least doubt about that. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said about this Franchise Bill that our ears are full of it. I believe that the gentlemen who have said so much about this Bill are sick of it. I believe that their own seats must have heard more about it than hon. members on this side of the House, and that their voices must have resounded very often in their own ears. It is evident that if the present system was to continue these gentlemen would not find it necessary to make great contests; all that they would have to do would be to use the means which were employed in my county, and go round the country in that manner; it is well known that corruption would soon have changed the majority of the people: We know that we, the Conservatives, have not practised the same system as these gentlemen, so that we will probably have a considerable increase of votes in my county. This is the reason why, for my part, I am in favor of the present Bill; and I especially approve of that clause which will give cost. I expected, when the First Minister addressed the Mr. LANGELIER.

us revisers appointed by the Government. We will have more chance to have justice when they will be appointed by the Government, than if their appointment was left in the hands of the present mayors. We know that the mayors who, in my county, are working in the interest of the Liberal party, are very apt to commit irregularities. I do not know who advises them in that way, but then, every year we have long lists, which give us a great deal of trouble to revise them; and if competent men are appointed by the Government it will do away with a great many difficulties with which we have to contend at the present time.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon, gentleman practically agrees with me. He says that, in his county, some people in certain municipalities have been making electors by assigning portions of their property to their sons, or to some other relatives, in order to qualify them. The hon. gentleman cannot be ignorant of the fact that the law of Quebec provides for such a case. There is an express clause in that law, saying that, whenever it is proved before a municipal council that a property has been assigned or transferred or leased to a party for the only purpose of qualifying him as an elector, the council has the right to strike out the name of that party. If that is not done in the hon, gentleman's county it is his own fault or the fault of his friends. I know his county pretty well.

Mr. VALIN. You ought to know it.

Mr. LANGELIER. Yes; I know it pretty well. The hon, gentleman will not contradict me when I say that a large majority of the municipal councils in his county are Conservative. Why did they not correct these mistakes or frauds of which he speaks? I think he has no right to come here and make the complaint; this is not the proper place for it. I know that, on a certain occasion, he made a complaint against the valuation roll, which went as far as the Court of Appeal. That shows that there is a remedy for frauds, if frauds there are. The present system will not shut the door to such tricks as those he speaks of. I am not prepared to admit or to deny the statements he has made. I do not know anything of them, but I know that the law now proposed will not only not shut, but will open wide the door to the commisssion of the same acts of which he complains. What is there in the present law to prevent the making of electors by transferring or assigning property sufficient to qualify them? The only difference is, that when the property is assigned or transferred it is the revising officer who will have to decide whether the property is of sufficient value, instead of it being decided, as now, by the municipal council. But this will not prevent the evils of which he speaks. Now, there is a remedy. If the secretary-treasurer does not correct those abuses the municipal council may stop them; if the municipal council do not stop them a judge of the Superior Court, when appealed to, will correct those frauds or mistakes. Under the present Bill, instead of that, we shall have the revising barrister appointed by the Government, who will make the list. If such frauds are committed in the interest of the party, I can say, without much fear of being mistaken, that the officer in question will be very chary of striking off the names of parties put on the list in that way. He will be, first, the party to make the list; then he will revise it; then he will decide the appeal taken from his own revision. What can we expect? It is possible that the revising officer will correct his own work, and admit the mistake, but it will show a great deal of philosophy on the part of a revising barrister to admit that he has committed a fraud or made a great blunder; so, instead of the advantage we now have of correcting those frauds or mistakes, we shall have no correction, and the fraudulent lists will remain fraudulent.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have to consider the question of House this afternoon, that he would have given us some information as to the probable cost that will be involved in the inauguration of this system. It is a very important matter. If, by the operation of this Act, we are going to increase the annual expenditure, it is a very important consideration in connection with this Bill, and one which should be closely criticised. Several statements have been made on this side in regard to the probable cost, but we have had no such statement from the other side. The only suggestion the First Minister has made on the subject was when he stated that the county judges had been agitating for an increased salary, that some suggestions had been made in that direction, and that, by a sum being added to their salary, they possibly would perform the duties of revising officers in addition to their present duties. We do not know whether the amount added to their salaries will be the same amount as will be given to revising officers, who are not judges. Undoubtedly it is going to cost a considerable sum of money, and it is exceedingly desirable that we should have some more information upon this point before we can agree to pass this clause. Now, another objectionable feature connected with the revising barrister is that the Government is asking to be empowered to fix the salary by Order in Council. It has also been intimated that it will probably cost more the first year than it is likely to cost in subsequent years, because the revising officer and his assistants will have more work to perform the first year. Now, I do not believe that after the system has been put into operation, and the revising barristers have been granted an allowance for the first year, they will very willingly consent to a reduction, even supposing the work should be less in after years. I am quite sure it is not the Government's intention to reduce the judges' salary after it is once established, and consequently there is no probability that the amount granted to each revising officer the first year will be reduced, but it is more likely to be increased. there is another point worthy of mention. It is going to be impossible to fix the same salary for each officer, because there are some constituencies in which there are 6,000 voters, while in others there are only 3,000. Where there is a large number of voters the revising barrister will expect a proportionately large allowance for discharging his duties. He will not be willing to perform the duty in a constituency of 6,000 voters for the same salary as he would in a constituency of only 3,000 voters, and the consequence will be that so many arguments will be used in favor of increasing the salary of the revising barristers that it will go on increasing from year to year. They will constantly be representing the work done by them as something very onerous, to which they would like to have a respectable salary attached. With regard to the appointment itself, I claim that it is an imprudent act on the part of the Government to ask that they should control the appointments in each constituency. They ought to endeavor to rid themselves of the odium, that will undoubtedly rest upon them, of appointing their own political friends in every constituency. It appears that it struck the First Minister as necessary in the interest of his party that he should not only ask power to make the appointment, but that he should make it in such a way that the revising officers will hold their office as long as they live, or until such time as some serious complaint is made against them. I hold that they should have adopted either the course that is pursued in England, and allow the judges of the Supreme Court, who go from circuit to circuit, to make the appointments, or else they should have sought in some other way to relieve themselves of the odium that will hang around the Government for taking power to make partisan appointments. Although the revising officer may, in some cases, desire to do his duty with some measure of fairness,

We all know that in England, from which the Prime Minister is fond of quoting precedents, the judges make the appointment of the revising barristers, and we have courts here similar to those of England. When the hon, gentleman intended to follow so closely the English precedent he ought to have provided for the appointments of revising officers to be made by Superior Court judges. In the United States the appointments of supervisors or select men are made by the people themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. HESSON. I hope hon. gentlemen will keep a little more quiet. The hon, member has only spoken fifty-three times on this subject!

Mr. McMULLEN. I have not spoken more frequently than I considered it to be my duty to speak. I have a right to criticise every item. I am discharging my duty, and I will do it fearlessly, to the end. In the Uunited States I have said those men are chosen by popular vote. No party in power, whether Democrat or Republican, has a right to select the men who shall fix the voters' lists. In some places there may be a majority of Democrats appointed, and in others a majority of Republicans; but the people are responsible for the result. In this connection we have a right to review the work to be performed by the revising officers. They will have to get copies of the assessment rolls in each municipality. Afterwards, they will have to make out duplicate copies of those rolls. They must post them up in several places, for the purpose of giving the electors an opportunity of seeing what names they contain. After a number of days the first revision will be held. It will be the privilege of any elector to attend and present his objections to any names on the list, or suggest that names be added. After the first revision the electoral lists will be prepared. Those will have to be posted up and remain posted for some time. Then will come the second revision of the list. As soon as the first revision is over several lists will have to be prepared and posted up. Afterwards the second revision will be held. It will have to be held in each municipality, of which there are from ten to fifteen in each electoral district. If the revising officer spends only one day in each municipality he will not get through the second revision in less than about fifteen days. I have been accustomed to municipal work for twenty years, and I am satisfied there will be considerable work for a revising officer to do, and more work during the first year than subsequently, due to curiosity on the part of the people. I have no doubt that the work will be larger than it would be after the system is in operation for several years. I claim that by this system the Government will shoulder the responsibility of endeavoring to cook the voters' list in every constituency, and in place of putting themselves in such a position, they should try to relieve themselves of a charge of that kind. If the Government were disposed to place their case fairly and honestly before the country they certainly would not seek, by a system of this kind, to control the voters' list in each constituency, and place themselves under the suspicion of putting some names on and taking others off. Whether that would be the case or not I cannot say; but of one thing I am certain, and that is, that there is a general suspicion that it will be done in some cases. If judges are appointed I have no doubt that the duties will be fairly and honestly performed in most cases, though there may be such a thing as even judges forgetting their high positions, and permitting their political feelings to bias them in the discharge of their duty. I hope, however, that such cases will be rare. The revising barristers, however, are like other men, and as we admit that there are partisans and men holding extreme views on there will always be a certain amount of dissatisfaction with all sides of politics, when the Government appoints a him on account of the fact that he is a political partisan. man of that stamp he will undoubtedly try to show his willingness to discharge his duties, with an eye to the best interests of his party, and in such cases there will undoubtedly be great dissatisfaction, and possibly difficulties may arise of a very serious kind. We know that a law was passed some years ago by which the Government took into their hands the power of appointing returning officers in places where sheriffs and registrars could be got, but perhaps were not considered desirable men to appoint. I know that in my county we have a sheriff and two registrars, and that one of those registrars was permitted to stay at home, and a man was appointed in the centre riding who never had performed the duties of returning officer, and in many ways was completely ignorant of those duties. While there was no evidence of his acting in an improper way, possibly, if matters had come to as close a shave as in some other constituencies, he might have been willing to lend himself to acts which might have been questionable in themselves. We know that, by the action of one of these returning officers the hon. member for Bothwell was deprived of his seat for some time, and that another man represented the constituency in this House until the courts awarded the hon. gentleman his just rights; and if the First Minister should strike such a man as that, and appoint him a revising officer, no man would say that he would not be willing to do acts just as questionable as those which were done by that gentleman. The hon, member for Victoria was very indignant this afternoon at the leader of the Oppositisn, because he made some remarks which he thought were not complimentary to lawyers. I think the hon, gentleman exaggerated what the leader of the Opposition said; but, at any rate, though lawyers are a respectable class of mon, they are like other people, and there are among them extreme partisans, men who would lend themselves to political acts of a very questionable kind if they had the opportunity. I believe there are barristers of five years' standing who, if they had, to-morrow, the opportunity of discharging the duties of a revising officer, would be willing to perform those duties in the best interest of their party, and I have no doubt, before we have had many years experience of this law, we will find, in sections where those men are appointed, just as great an outery against the appointments which the hon. gentleman makes as we have heard with regard to his appointments of returning officers. I contend that there has been no evidence presented to this House in favor of this provision, and the fact that the present system has worked so admirably well shows that this change is not a desirable one, that it is, in fact, absolutely unnecessary. The only ground upon which any gentleman on that side can ask that this Bill should be put in operation is the ground of party exigency. I believe, if you obliterate the ill-feeling which exists between the First Minister and the Attorney General of Ontario you would do away with the necessity of this law altogether, and it is too bad that the country, owing to this unfortunate state of things, should be asked to incur an annual expense of $300,000 or $400,000 for the operation of this law. The First Minister laughs when I mention these figures, but as we have not had the slightest intimation from him or from hon, members on that side as to what the estimated cost will be, we are justified in holding that our estimate is nearly correct. I hold that the system under which the municipal councils have in their hands the preparation of the lists has worked most admirably, and that they are the best judges and revisors. Though politics may rule in some few townships, as a general thing they do not, and the men elected discharge their dnties with credit to themselves and advantage to the township. These men, from year to year, seek the honor being elected to positions in the council. and they perceive the necessity of cultivating the the good feeling of the people and of seeing that every rightful Mr. MoMULLEN.

the first place, the assessor has to put a fixed value on the entire assessable property of the municipality. Before he proceeds to perform that duty he has to make an affidavit, declaring that he will faithfully, truly and impartially discharge the duty of assessor. After that he makes his return to the municipality under oath. That return goes before the court of revision, every member of which has to take an oath and sign a declaration that he will faithfully, truly and impartially, to the best of his ability, discharge his duty as a member of the court of revision for that municipality. They then proceed to revise the voters' list; and every man being well acquainted with the section of the municipality which he represents—as the municipality is generally divided into wards—those whose names are improperly left off are generally put on the list at the court of revision, if there is any application. If there is not, and the court of revision omits any names, the parties, or their friends, can appeal to the county judge, who appoints a place where the appeal can be heard and witnesses examined, and he then proceeds to put on those names which he considers ought to be put on, and strikes off those he considers ought to be struck off. That is a convenient and cheap way of preparing the voters' lists at present, and it has worked admirably. Although, in some municipalities, we have had very keen political contests, the results obtained have been, on the whole, more satisfactory to the electors than those that will be obtained under this new Act. When you have a system in force that has worked so well as the present system it is unwise to discard it, and adopt another that is new to the country, and that will cause a considerable amount of expense and trouble to the people, and will end in a considerable amount of confusion. The next officer of importance is, the municipal clerk. He has to perform certain duties in connection with the revision of the list; he has to see that the list is forwarded to the different officials in the county; he has to post copies of the list up at different points, in order that the electors may have an opportunity of investigating it; and he has to make a declaration that he has performed his work; he has also to make a return of every man in the township who is liable to pay poll taxes or to perform statute labor. In this way he becomes familiarised with the names, and he gets so thorough a knowledge of every man in his municipality that he is able to judge at once whether a man is entitled to be put on the list or not. In a municipality in my own section of country, where there were some 900 ratepayers, where a by-law was submitted for a bonus to a railway, and where there was only one voting place, the clerk of the municipality was able to name every single ratepayer, without turning up the list, simply because he had occupied that position for fifteen years. That gives you an idea of the extensive knowledge the municipal clerk has of the residents of his municipality. I would like to know if such an extensive knowledge is not a decided advantage to any man called upon to make up the list. The revising officer will be possessed of no such information, because he will probably leave his clerk to prepare the list. If the hon. First Minister had embodied a clause in his Bill providing that the clerk of each municipality should be ex officio the clerk of the revising officer for the preparation of the list in that municipality, it would have been a great advantage. But I can easily conceive why he did not do that; all the clerks in the municipalities are not of the same political stripe, and the probability is that they would not just perform the work they would be asked to do. But it is not too late yet; and if the hon. First Minister would consider the question of utilising the municipal clerks, such a change in his Bill would facilitate the business of making up the lists. A very large amount of money would be saved by using the present lists. It is imprudent on our part to incur the elector in the municipality is placed on the voters' list. In expense of making out second lists. The Provinces of this

Dominion stand in the relation of partners; there are seven of us, and what is a saving to one is a saving to another; and if, through the co-operation of the Dominion Government with the Local Government, and the Local Government with the Dominion Government, money can be saved to the people, is it not desirable to save that money? If by the Dominion adopting the municipal and provincial machinery which is in force, and which has rendered acceptable service in the past, a saving is going to be effected to the Dominion, would it not be wise and prudent to continue to use that machinery? It looks like rivalry among the members of a family to inaugurate a system that is going to cost the country a large amount of money, simply because there are some Provinces with which the present Government are not on such terms as to enable them to accept those changes in the voters' list which the Provinces have made-not because they are not in the right direction, or because they do not extend the franchise to classes who ought not to have it, but simply from a pure spirit of spleen and bitterness. Now, the First Minister has told us that the municipal assessment rolls and lists are going to be utilised, but they are only to be utilised as a guide; and if the revising barrister chooses to value a man's property less than that put upon it in the assessment roll, he can do so, and he can do so while refusing to accept any evidence to the contrary. It is all very well to talk about appeals, but appeals are very expensive affairs; and the poor men, who are the class that will be left out, will not be inclined to consult a lawyer, and take all the expensive measures necessary to be placed on the list, so that the probability is, the majority of those struck off the list will remain disfranchised. As regards the cost of this new machinery, we have a right to feel disappointed that the First Minister has not ventured to give us any estimate. Figures have been submitted by hon members on this side, which go to show that it will cost between $300,000 and $400,000 a year; but even supposing it cost only $1,000 for each constituency, which would be only $300 for each officer, a sum lower, I imagine, than even a third-class man can be got for, it will foot up to $211,000 a year. In our present position, I think this expenditure should be avoided, on the ground of economy alone, if on no other. It is unwise that we should open the door to an expenditure of so large a sum, and leave it solely at the disposition of the Governor in Council. The revising officer will undoubtedly be treated and recognised as an officer of the Government; he will seek to discharge his duties to the satisfaction of the Government, conscious that if he does that he may reasonably expect an increase of salary, or, at any rate, that his salary will be continued. Although we have the statement of the First Minister that, after the first year, the expenditure will, probably, be much less, I venture to predict it will be greater; I venture to predict that, in place of the revising barrister's salary being reduced, it will be increased. Before inaugurating this system we should carefully count the cost, and we should ask ourselves where are we going to find the money to pay for it. The people are beginning to feel seriously alarmed at our continued increase of expenditure, and we would be untrue to their best interests if we continued to add-to their burdens without seriously considering whether the increase is absolutely necessary or not. In this case there can be no doubt that it is not necessary. The First Minister said this afternoon, he was willing to accept suggestions, if we were prepared to make them, that he was open to conviction on any point that might be raised, and be worthy of his consideration; but ever since the discussion has commenced we have been pressing reasons why changes should be made. The First Minister has been so much out of the House that we have had to state over and over again our objections to this Bill, in order, if possible, to reach his ear, and we shall have to continue to do that. I have made suggestions country. But instead of that, it is now proposed to appoint to-night myself as to utilising municipal clerks as clerks to the revising barristers, and I am satisfied that he did not hear what I said, so that some other man may have to repeat them, until they reach the ear of the First Minister. The revising barrister is given a great deal of power in exess even of the powers given to a county judge, whose duty it is to listen to complaints and hear evidence on both sides when it is presented. But the revising officer can hear evidence or not as he pleases. He is both judge and jury, and can put a name on the list or put it off. If he has reason to believe that a man is dead or has left the constituency he can strike the name off, whether the man is dead or has left or not. I am satisfied that when this Act becomes law a great deal more work will have to be performed by Reform candidates than ever before. In my constituency I stand in a more awkward position than most men in this House. I have a constituency where there are four county judges who have jurisdiction. There is a judge and there is a deputy judge in my county, and the two ends of my constituency belong to different counties. In 1882, whether as a matter of kindness to me or to the hon, member for North Perth, they attached a portion of his riding to mine, and the same in regard to the county of Dufferin. I suppose the county judge would perform the duty in the county of Wellington; then, when we come to revise the voters' list in the county of Perth, we will have to get the county judge of that county, and in the east part of the riding we will have to get the county judge of the county of Dufferin; so that we will have to get three judges to revise the voters' list for one constituency. There is another power which it is unwise to vest in the returning officer, and that is the power of arranging the wards. In most cases the wards in the several townships are conveniently laid out a present. In some cases, perhaps, they are not. But the revising officer is not supposed to accept the divisions as they are now, but, if he likes, can sub-divide any town or township. If there are more than 200 ratepayers in a sub-division, instead of putting off a concession or half a concession, to bring the number within 200, he may divide it again, and so make a good deal of confusion. As has already been stated by the hon, member from Quebec, he may seriously inconvenience one political party and accommodate the other. In one township in my constituency, the ward in the south end gives as large a Conservative majority as the ward in the north end gives a Reform majority. Now, if the revising officer should think it advantageous to his party, he might so divide the township as to make all the Reformers go from the north end to the south end, and some would have to travel twelve or fourteen miles to give their votes, while the Conservatives would have the poll at their own door. That would be an injustice. It may be said that no man would do such a thing, but our past experience leads us to believe that there are men in the world capable of doing almost everything, politically, and I believe that some of these revising officers will so divide the muncipalities as to largely favor one party at the expense of the other. Mr. Chairman, I felt it my duty to my constituents to make these few remarks, and to give my reasons why I am opposed to the Government assuming the appointment of the revising officers who are to make up the voters' lists.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Before this clause is submitted to a vote I desire to say a few words as to the mode of preparing the voters' list. We have had a good many years' experience in Ontario of a system which has proved very satisfactory. We know that in Ontario, and some of the other Provinces, there are simple means provided, and the municipal machinery is set to work to secure a voters' list, and this system we might adopt in this Bill and at a small cost to this revising barristers and adopt a machinery that is complicated in character and expensive in its details. We are asked now to sanction a system that will involve, for the salaries of the 211 officers, an expenditure of at least $211,000. The First Minister has not made any estimate as to what will be the probable cost of this measure to the country, but some hon, gentlemen on this side have made a very reasonable calculation, and their estimate is that it will cost something like half a million dollars a year. No hon. gentlemen opposite have yet challenged the correctness of these figures, except the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty), who estimated that the measure might cost as high as $100,000 per annum. Let us take the experience of England, where this system has been at work for some time. We find, in the English Act, that the revising barrister is to be paid a sum not exceeding 200 guineas per annum, and in addition there are other expenses which necessarily belong to the working of the machinery provided; for instance, there is a provision by which, in populous constituencies, more than one revising officer can be appointed. Consequently, it is a fair deduction that in no constituency in this country can the revising officer be expected to perform his duties for less than $1,000 a year. Now, it has been alleged by hon, gentlemen opposite, whenever they deign to speak on the question, that this system will give us greater security in the preparation of the voters' list; but is there any gentleman opposite who will say that there is greater security in the existence of a revising barrister, nominated by a gentleman supporting the Government of the day, responsible, practically, only to them, than there is in the system that at present exists in the Provinces? Some hon, gentlemen have sought to throw contempt on the assessors and clerks of Ontario municipalities, and have charged them with being partisans. If it is, as these gentlemen allege, impossible, under a system having so many checks, to prevent fraud and the undue exercise of power, are these not much more likely to arise under a system by which the revising officers are practically independent of every elector of the county. The municipal officials are responsible to the municipal council, and in each municipality the official is only one of two men who has the arrangement of the list. There is a vast difference in regard to the preparation of lists under the present system and that proposed. Journals supporting hon gentlemen opposite have not defended the Bill on its merits. I ask hon, gentlemen opposite to point out a single Ministerial journal in Ontario which has discussed fairly the revising officer clause. No statement made in regard to that official has been made in good faith, but with the evident design of misrepresenting the position of the official. Moreover, the journals usually supporting hon, gentlemen opposite have misrepresented the position of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. They have attempted, in every way, to impute to us motives for the stand made by us in defence of the rights of the people, charges that were in every sense unbe-It is not necessary here to defend our position; it will only be necessary to do so when hon. gentlemen opposite make a more decided stand on this phase of the question than they have heretofore done. We have not heard from hon. gentlemen opposite at any length in defence of this particular clause of the Bill, which is one of the most pernicious and the most likely of all the clauses to deprive the free and independent electors of those rights that ought to be inalienably theirs. Under our system of government we have been constantly departing from that principle of administration that leaves it in the hands of the Government of the day to have any connection with the electoral machin-ery. Up to within very recent years this House had the privilege of administering the law in connection with election protests; but the consensus of opinion induced Parliament to abandon that system, and now allows such cases to be tried by judges. There are, now, no people in the Mr. CAMBRON (Middlesex).

Dominion who are in favor of changing the system from that which at present exists. In that and in many other respects we have attempted to separate the Executive from the electoral functions of the Government. It is a step backwards to admit the principle involved in the clause, and submit to the appointment of revising officers to prepare electoral lists and make appointments for the Government. Now, I strongly favor the system which has heretofore been in existence for the preparation of these lists. I believe that that system is such as to secure the preparation of the lists as nearly perfect as they can be, and as free from the suspicion of partisanship and favoritism which must attach to lists prepared under the system now proposed. I believe the municipal officers of the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with which I am best acquainted, taking them all in all, are equal to any other class in the community. Besides the experience which they gain from engaging in municipal affairs, they have the local knowledge and acquaintance with each minor municipality which should be possessed by men occupying such positions, and would it not be better that these men should have the power of preparing the primary lists than the officials in whose hands the Bill proposes to place that power. I believe that under the Bill no perfect primary list can be prepared, and consequently no final revision, that does not comtemplate the engrafting of the municipal machinery and municipal officials in a Bill of this kind. Though one or two gentlemen have thrown doubt on the good faith of some of these assessors and clerks, they have toned down their expressions to such a degree that there is very little force in their remarks. But even if there were some complaints, does not the appeal to the judge offer the strongest incentive to these officers to perform their duties carefully, so that their municipalities should not be put to expense? And though there is an appeal under the Bill, when the judge is not the revising officer, it does not imply the same closeness of supervision that exists in the appeal from the present voters' lists. I desire also to point out that, while the assessor has to make a solemn declaration that he has done his work conscientiously and thoroughly, to the best of his belief, the revising officer is only required to subscribe his name to the list as being the list for that particular constituency. It has been said that the fact that the revising barrister has secured from the Law Society the privilege of practising his profession will be a security that he will conduct himself with propriety; but while I would not depreciate the character of the legal profession, I believe you will find that in all the public acts of the clerks and assessors throughout the Province of Ontario they have shown themselves equally competent, equally responsible, equally well-behaved, in proportion to their numbers, as the members of the legal profession of that Province. But that is not taken as a sufficient guarantee that these officers shall do their duty fairly, for other guards are thrown around them. Still, in the face of that fact, we are urged to accept the parchment which has been granted to the barrister as an ample guarantee of his moral responsibility, his legal knowledge, his good faith, and everything else involved in the responsibility which the Bill places on him. I say the best guarantee we can have is the security involved in a most stringent supervision; otherwise, we are throwing odium on every official in this Dominion on whom we place responsi-bility, because in proportion to their responsibility we take security for their good behavior. For instance, the Minister of Customs will not put a man in the position to handle the money passing through his Department without taking some kind of a security. He does not take the man's word, he takes his bond; and I would ask if any greater responsibility can be placed in the hands of any man than the preparation of the electoral list, on the proper arrangement of which depends the rightful discharge by each constituency of its duty to the country. But we were told, some time ago, by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), that if this is as bad a Bill as the Opposition contend, then let them appeal to the country upon it.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I did not say that. Read that, if you can find it.

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot find it at the moment.

Mr. LANDRY. No, nor to-morrow, either.

Mr. CAMERON. However, if the hon, gentleman disclaims it-

Mr. LANDRY. If the hon, gentleman will allow me, I will tell him from memory what I did say. I stated that if hon, gentlemen opposite contended that the Bill was so atrocious in its character, the Conservative party would likely be defeated by it before the country, and that if that was the case, it was advantageous to them, and they ought to let it go, so that we might be defeated.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, if you place in the hands of partisans the preparation of the lists, and appeal to the country, you are not giving any fair opportunity of an appeal to the same electors who elected the hon. gentleman and myself. If there is any honesty or earnestness in the proposition of the hon. gentleman, the proper time to give us such an opportunity is before the Bill passes, and then the country will be able to say whether they approve of the measure or not. Now, I will read the hon. gentleman's remarks, which are to be found at page 1556 of the Debates:

"The country has put them in their present position, and they must be considered as representing the will of the country, and therefore are justified in pushing this measure through. If it be such a bad Bill as the Opposition contend, let them appeal to the country."

Now, I accept the hon gentleman's proposition. Give us the opportunity to submit the Bill to the people, to say whether such a clause as we are now discussing should become the law of the land. But the hon member for Kent has not been alone in his challenge. The leading organ of the Conservative party very recently used this language:

"We should advise a dissolution of the House. We should accept Mr. Edgar's insult to the loyalty of the people of Ontario as a challenge to a battle à l'outrance. We should force through all the necessary measures, sacrificing everything not essential to public business, and drag these Grit traitors and treason-mongers to the foot of the polls, which the people of Oanada would speedily convert into a gallows. That would teach them a lesson in loyalty, as understood by the people of Canada, and especially by the people of Ontario."

We have had these challenges hurled at us from inside the House and from outside the House; and yet where is the indication that hon, gentlemen propose to follow up the challenges they make? Is there the slightest intimation that they will suspend the operations of this Bill until the views of the people upon it are obtained? Is there any evidence whatever, except their disinclination to discuss the measure, that there is a single individual in the country, outside of the partisan press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, who is really anxious to see this measure pass? All the evidence that has been submitted goes to show the contrary. Wherever public feeling exists it is against the Bill, and particularly this clause of the Bill. That feeling exists, because there is manhood in the people of Canadabecause there is, independent of political allegiance, the feeling that whatever party is dominant it should only be dominant as a result of the votes of a majority of the people; and the adoption of a clause of this kind, for placing the electoral vote practically in the hands of one man, really makes it possible, and is designed to make it possible, that the Government shall decide what members shall sit in this House. In this respect the Bill lacks the first element of foirmers. It leaks all that is corrected that the moral sense of the people, or the would and the possible to the property of the respect to the people would be sufficient to expected that the first element of foirmers. It leaks all that is corrected the moral sense of the people, or the would be less legislation of a prohibitory character enacted in the House. Would it be reasonable to dispense with those enactments on the ground that the moral sense of the people, or the would be less legislation of a prohibitory character enacted in the less legislation of a prohibitory character enacted in the sense of the reasonable to dispense with the first element of fairness. It lacks all that is essential to freedom of choice by the electorate; and the country, on to restrain him, if he sees a judgeship or some other emolu-awakening to a full realisation of the purpose of the measure, will, in spite of the gagging that is attempted by this clause, in spite of the loading of the dice, in spite of marking of the cards, express their disapprobation of the measure, and particularly of this clause, on the first opportunity that will present itself. I only regret that the offer of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) is not sufficiently endorsed by other hon, gentlemen on that side of the House. We have been told by journals supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, that this is a transcript of the English law, so far as the revising officer is concerned. I think it has been already clearly established that there are very material differences between the two, especially in this respect: that here the revising officer is made the sole controller of the voters' list, while in England the revising officer merely acts as reviser of the list; but I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to produce an instance where any of the prominent daily journals supporting hon. gentlmen opposite have admitted that that distinction exists. On the contrary, they have invariably alleged a similarity between the provisions of the two Bills. If we have departed from the established English precedence, if we go against the experience that has justified England in continuing that provision since 1843, there must be some special reason for it. The First Minister tells us that the majority of Parliament are opposed to the English practice in this particular phase of the Bill, which left the local municipal officers to prepare the primary lists and left the revision solely in the hands of the revising officers. But if they are opposed to that phase of the Bill, why do they not express their opinion? Are they only to express it through the First Minister? It is beneath the dignity of hon, gentlemen opposite to occupy such a humiliating position. The First Minister, no doubt, was saying the truth, when he said he did not know why they should be opposed to the English practice. We also are destined to remain in ignorance, since they will not or are not allowed to give their reasons. The appointment of the revising barrister was defended by the First Minister on the plea that any partisan conduct on his part would ensure his dismissal by this House. We have had evidence of partisan conduct brought before this House in more instances than one, and my experience has been that the decision of the House depended largely on the fact as to whether the partisan conduct was in the interest of the majority or not. On that fact largely depended the disposition of the question raised as to the behavior of any particular officer of this Parliament. I do not think an Assembly of this kind should be entrusted with the decision of the case of a revising barrister, whose conduct is denounced. His position should be sufficiently independent of this House as not to involve the contingency that his conduct might come up here for revision; otherwise, it cannot be expected that his conduct will be of a character to entitle him to the confidence of every section of the community. It is alleged, besides, that the moral sense of the people will act as a controlling influence on the revising officer. The phrase is an admirable one, but it expresses an opinion which, in practice, we throw every day a doubt upon. Hon, gentlemen opposite indulged in the fallacy that the moral sense of the people would restrain the half-breeds and Indians of the North-West from rebellion. For two years and more they indulged in that fallacy, if we are to believe the public documents, but they eventually realised that the moral sense of the people did not restrain them from rebelling. We do not trust, by any means, to the moral sense of the people, or there would the moral sense of the revising barrister will be sufficient ment in the distance, as the reward of his doing the bidding of the Government. In answer to the objection that the revising barrister will not have the local knowledge of the constituency possessed by the different municipal officers in the municipalities, the First Minister states that men will be appointed who will be acquainted with the circumstances of the constituencies. But in many rural constituencies it will be impossible to find a man sufficiently acquainted with every section to properly do this work. Let hon, gentlemen opposite refer to their own experiences, and ask themselves whether, in all cases, they have a thorough acquaintance with every section of their constituencies; and if they have not, as I think they will generally admit, how is it they have not? And is it possible that a man, who is only interested in making himself acquainted with the constituency for one particular purpose, will make that acquaintance which practically involves the knowledge, not only of every individual, but also as to the individual circumstances of each individual? It is alleged that the majority of the voters will be on the assessment roll. That may be the fact, and yet every objection which has been urged against the measure has as much force as if the reverse were the case. The right hon, gentleman knows how many there are on both sides of the House who hold their seats by a majority which, if one vote had been changed in every polling sub-division, would have been converted into a minority. How easy would it then be for a man who has the least predisposition to party instincts to put one vote off or put one on in every polling sub-division. How many constituencies would show a different result had that course been adopted at the last election? In England, they have recognised the local machinery and have made the municipal officers their officers, as far as the primary preparation of the lists is concerned, and the reasons for doing that in this country are all the stronger, because our municipal machinery is much the more perfect of the two. I assume that there is a purpose in this. There is no doubt that, practically nominated as they will be by the supporters of hon, gentlemen opposite, the revising officers will be the Conservative election agents for the preparation of the voters' lists in every constituency. I do not think hon, gentlemen opposite fully realise the unfairness of the position which the revising officers will occupy under this Bill, which is so outrageous that I trust they will remove these men from the aspersions that must necessarily follow their acceptance of the position, if they are to be merely the election agents for the party in power for the time being. It cannot be expected that one party is to be dominant forever in this country, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are dealing with this matter, as between themselves and their consciences, to say whether this proposition is a just one. I say it is scandalously unfair to take the public money to the extent of half a million dollars a year and use it to further the ends of one political party. In the English Act ample provision is made for a notice to the party appealed against, but under this Bill the revising officer can practically disfranchise any man of his own will. A man's name may appear on the primary list, and that man may be satisfied that he will be an elector; but the revising officer, when he makes his final revision, can strike the name off, without any appeal being lodged and without stating any reasons for the removal of the name. Is it safe or prudent to leave the electoral lists in the hands of any man who has such powers as these? The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who has been willing to put himself in our place and to look at this matter from an honest and fair standpoint, said:

"If hon. gentlemen opposite happened to come into power—and unlikelier things may happen—I would not like them to have the power in my constituency of nominating the man who shall say who ought to vote for me, and I think it unfair to press a measure of this kind, so objectionable as it is to so many hon. gentlemen, when a very much more simple remedy can be provided."

Mr. Cameron (Middlesex).

I am sure that the hon, gentleman would not have made such a statement if he did not conceive that a revising officer appointed under this clause was sure to develop into a partisan, and that this would be productive of pernicious results, to the prejudice of one or the other political party, as they might happen to be the ins or the outs for the time being. The Bill proposes to hand over the preparation of the voters' list and the disposal of the people's rights to a horde of partisan revising officers, whose first act, in the majority of cases, will be to favor the men from whom they secure their appointment. It is most unfair that such a course should be followed, and that, on the flimsy charges that have been submitted against the present system. a measure of such a drastic character should be proposed. Mr. Chairman, Addison, in one of his tales, tells of a man in his time who attended fairs to sell pills which were proof against earthquakes. I think this measure of a somewhat similar character. It is introduced to avert the earthquake that is evidently approaching, and is destined to create such a commotion among hon, gentlemen opposite as that they will scarcely realise their present existence. Now, we hear hon. gentlemen opposite and the Conservative press frequently dilate on the injustice that is done to the municipal councils and the municipal officers by the encroachments of the provincial Local Government of the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, if that is the case, if hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in their contention that the Local Government is encroaching on the rights of municipalities, I call upon them now to stand up in defence of these municipalities and these municipal officers, from whom this Bill proposes to take away rights and privileges which they have long exercised, to the general satisfaction of the people. I say that the assessors and the clerks of the municipalities have proved to be capable men, and yet you propose, by this Bill, entirely to ignore them in providing machinery for the preparation of voters' lists. I repeat that to take away from these municipalities the power to control electoral lists, and appoint partisan revising officers, ignoring the machinery that already exists, is the most serious encroachment that has yet been attempted on the municipal powers. Since this discussion commenced no attempt has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite to defend this clause of the Bill. They believe this clause is worth a whole Session's talk. They realise that an advantage is to be gained by the passage of this clause; but that is not the position which their constituents expect them to occupy. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has invariably stood up in defence of the municipal authorities against the alleged encroachments by the Provincial Government. Why does he not stand up and make some defence of this clause, and give reasons why the municipal machinery should be no longer used and the municipal officers abandoned. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) is always ready to make charges against the good faith of the Ontario Government in regard to the municipalities; yet, when the Administration have departed from one of the fundamental principles, which he has charged the Liberals of Ontario with abandoning, we do not hear a word from him in regard to this clause. They have entirely forgotten the charges made by them on the hustings, that the Provincial Government of Ontario are encroaching on the power of the municipalities. "A needy man's budget is full of schemes." That saying applies to the present Government and to this case. Independent of the National Policy, the Government felt the necessity, in 1882, of gerrymandering the constituencies, in order to secure a majority in this House. The same spirit is prompting them in respect to this clause, which is one that cannot be defended on its merits. Hon, gentlemen opposite say: We have a majority; we intend to take advantage of it; we will have the country gagged by the time the Opposition can appeal to them. If that is not the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite, as indicated by their silence, what is their motive in not defending such an atrocious section? The same tactics adopted in the passage of the Gerrymander Act are being pursued to-day. Let hon, gentlemen opposite look at Hansard, and they will see whether any attempt was made to defend the Gerrymander Bill on its merits. There was no such attempt. They are willing, to-day, to push through this offensive measure, which is contrary to all that is fair, and manly, and honest, as between man and man; they are willing to remain silent, in order that the measure may become law. Their silence, and the misrepresentation of their organs are, however, having the effect of making many Conservatives feel that there must be something decidely wrong in this measure. I shall be, indeed, glad to find the details to which I have objected, altered. I should like the measure to have some reasonable appearance of honesty about it. I should like it, not in the interest of a political party, or in my own political interest, but in the interest of this country. Equally as I wish a greater element of fairness in this measure, do I protest with earnestness and fervor against the adoption of a clause that is fatal to fair play, on which the marks of unfairness are manifest everywhere, that is obviously intended to strike at one political party, while it is intended to buoy up hon, gentlemen opposite with advantages at the next general election.

Mr. FLEMING. Before this clause is adopted I would like to have the privilege of saying a few words with reference to it. The hon, the First Minister told us last night that this particular clause was one that was properly open to considerable discussion. He told us to-lay that this power which the Government was attempting to take into their hands was one to which some reasonable objections might be taken, and therefore you will not be surprised if some of us desire to enter upon its discussion for a few moments. This provision is introduced into the election law of the country for the first time, after we have been getting along very well under the existing system since Confederation. There has been no voice from the public asking the old system to be changed. There has been no portion of the community finding fault with the existing system, and at this day, without there being such voice, there is a provision being introduced into this Bill that is not attempted to be defended in this House or out of this House—a provision that cannot be defended anywhere. The First Minister, himself, to-day, in moving the adoption of this clause, did not attempt to defend it. He said the power which is about to be taken into the hands of the Government is open to objection. He says it is not as fair a measure as that which exists in England. He says the reason he has not introduced the English system here is because it did not commend itself to the majority of the members of this House; that he had ascertained this Session, and previous Sessions, that the majority of this House would not adopt the English system. How did he ascertain that fact? Was it from the voices we heard in this House, from the expression of hon. members discussing the question in open Parliament? Where was it ascertained? It was ascertained in the caucus, where hon, gentlemen dispose of the affairs of the country. They have adopted this new system of governing a free country, by giving away their views in caucus and then coming in as a solid voting phalanx, for the purpose of carrying through every measure which cannot be defended in Parliament.

Mr. SMALL. That is business.

Mr. FLEMING. The Whip from Toronto says that is business; he supports that system; he calls that responsible government; he says that is representative institutions. Hon, gentlemen know that the very moment they give up their opinions in caucus and refuse to express them in open Parliament they abdicate their functions as representatives of the people altogether, and become the servants of the Ministry of the day. The hon gentlemen have adopted this system of expressing their opinion in caucus and giving up what independence of thought they have there, and refusing in the House, in obedience to the resolutions in caucus, to express their views upon any public measure which comes before the House. This is the doctrine we are to have adopted here; this is the doctrine to be forced upon this country by those who are calling out for trampling feet to come in thousands and wipe out the Opposition; this is the doctrine adopted by a party which calls upon thousands of independent loyal electors of Ontario to come down to Ottawa and drive these nasty Opposition members out of their places altogether.

An hon. MEMBER. There are enough here to do it; come to the point.

Mr. FLEMING. The hon, gentleman sees the point clearly. He sees the reason why they are not discussing the power which the Government are taking into their hands by this clause of the Bill. He sees the reason why they have thrown away the powers which were given them as the representatives of the people, of discussing on the floors of Parliament measures which are brought in for the consideration of the people's representatives. Hon. gentlemen know that they have not attempted to defend this proposition in the face of Parliament. They know why that to-day their First Minister, their leader, has not defended it. They know it is not defended by any independent journal in the country. They know that the only defence which has been attempted to be given to this Bill, and the powers which are secured to the Government by this particular clause, has been an attempt male by a subsidised press, that does not express the independent opinions of any section of this country. They know that that press, in order to induce the people to believe that the provision was harmless, has totally misrepresented the provisions of this Bill. They know that they have concealed its obnoxious provisions from their readers, and that they have misrepresented this Bill and absolutely told falsehoods with regard to this particular clause. They know that they have been instructed, I presume, to earn the subsidies given them from year to year by misrepresenting the measures which have been attempted to be rushed through Parliament in silence by hon, gentlemen opposite. The painful duty is, therefore, cast upon us, of discussing this Bill from day to day, in order that the people of the country may know its provisions. Where else are they to obtain their knowledge? They cannot obtain it from the expressions of hon, gentlemen opposite, because they do not express themselves. They cannot obtain it from the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, because, when they discuss it at all, they discuss it in a garbled and distorted form. They conceal its objectionable features and misrepresent almost every feature of the Bill. Therefore, it becomes our duty, as the representatives of the people, as the only ones who will give knowledge to the people of what is going on in Parliament, to discuss this Bill, and therefore, we are here discussing it. The hon. First Minister to-day declared that this provision was open to objection, because it gave the Government the power of appointing the makers and revisers of the lists, but that he could not secure the passage of a Bill similar to the law in England, where the judge of Assize in the different counties appoints the revising officer. He ascertained that fact, the hon member for East Toronto (Mr. Small) tells us, in cancus. Why could be not pass such a Bill in this House? Simply because the necessities of hon. gentlemen opposite are so great that such a Bill would not answer their purpose. There can be no other reason. I dare any hon. gentleman to get up and state if there is any other reason. They dare not accept the challenge. Even the hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), who comes to the rescue of the Government when they are in a tight place, on other occasions, fails to come to their rescue now. The hon. First Minister said to-day that this particular clause of the Bill was objectionable. Then, why introduce it at all? If he has not sufficient power over his supporters to pass a Bill that is a fair Bill, such as the English Act is, why introduce it at all? Is there any hon. gentleman who can answer? Not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House can do so because they dare not state the purpose for which it is introduced. They are silent. They know that there was no public necessity for this Bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Will the hon, gentleman please discuss the clause?

Mr. FLEMING. The clause is the kernel of the Bill. There is no public necessity why the Government should take into their hands the appointment of persons to make up the electoral lists throughout the country. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, if there is a sentiment of honesty left in them, if there is a single constituency in the country that has expressed a desire to have a revising officer appointed by the Government for making up the list. Hon. gentlemen are silent again-because they cannot answer. There is no public necessity for this provision; then, why does the hon. First Minister introduce it, when he himself says that he would prefer the English system, if he could carry it through this House? If his supporters are not sufficiently enlightened to-day, let him wait until he has educated them up to that sense of fair play and honor that will enable him to secure their support for a fair and honorable Bill. The hon. gentleman says that the revising officer in England is very similar to the revising officer. similar to the revising officer here. In England the revising officer revises the lists after the overseers of the parish have made them up; in Canada, under this Bill, the revising officer makes up the list from the very beginningin the words of the Bill, he is to prepare, revise and complete the list. The whole electoral list is to be handed over to an officer appointed by the Government. We are not sufficiently verdant to believe that these officers will be appointed in any other way than on the nomination of the supporters of the hon, gentleman in the different constituencies; and in those constituencies which are represented by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the nomination will be in the hands of the leading wire-pullers of the Tory party there. I can tell who, in my county, will be asked to nominate the revising officer; and everybody knows that the revising officer, notwithstanding that he is going to be a lawyer of five years' standing, will be a Tory; and when I have said that I have said enough. When I have said that, I do not require to say that he will be a partisan, or will be wanting in a sense of fair play, because I have only to refer to the conduct of the majority in this House, in pressing forward a Bill of this kind. We know that he will be appointed for the purposes of this Bill. His duty will be, according to his appointment and according to his political light—the light which an active Tory politician always possesses—to devise means to secure the election of the Tory candidate. That is his primary duty; that is the reason of his appointment; and he is removable by the majority of the members of the House of Commons, who are elected under his manipulation. But the hon, gentleman says that there are, by this Bill, votes secured to persons having incomes, and to wage-earners and others, that are not enfranchised in England, and that, therefore, it is necessary there should be some person to have control over the voters' lists from their beginning; and therefore it is necessary to confer additional powers upon these revising officers, powers which are not conferred upon any revising barrister in England. Why, the hon. gentleman must have forgotten himself. He must know that in Ontario, at all events, persons having incomes have MR. FLEMING.

votes; that under the Bill passed last Session wage earners have votes to a much larger extent than is provided in this Bill, and that the lists are made up by the local authorities, under the same system as that which has prevailed for years past, without any difficulty arising. hon gentleman desires to establish that there is only the smallest shade of difference, a difference that does not amount to anything, between this Bill and the English Bill. The English system is that the judges appoint the revising barristers; the electoral lists in England are prepared by the people themselves, through overseers; in England there is a sense of fair play. In the Empire of Germany, under Bismarck, there is a more liberal provision than is in this Bill; there the lists are prepared by the municipal authorities, subject to an appeal to the judiciary. In France they are prepared by the mayor, a delegate of the prefects, and a delegate of the municipal council. Are we going to be worse than France? Is this free country going to be worse than Germany? Are we going to place ourselves more in the hands of the Executive than Germany or France? There is not a country in Europe with representative institutions, in which the electorate is placed in the position ours is about to be put in. In Spain they have a freer way of making out voters' lists than the one proposed here. There the lists are prepared by a commission composed of the alcade and four persons appointed by the municipal council. Are we going to place in the hands of our Executive a power the Government of Spain does not exercise? In Italy the lists are prepared by a commission similar to our municipal council. In fact, in all the countries in Europe that have representative institutions the lists are prepared by the people themselves, and in all cases there is an appeal to the judiciary. Under the Bill, as introduced here, and which has secured the approbation of hon. gentlemen opposite in caucus, there was an attempt made to fasten upon this country a provision to appoint officers who could do what they liked with the lists, and whose decisions are not subject to appeal. From the time we have had representative institutions in Canada, the local authorities have prepared the lists. Are we now going back to a system which does not obtain in any country blessed with representative institutions, and which is not imagined in any free country in the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite say they will do this because they are in the majority, and Conservatives of the same stamp in the country talk in the same spirit. They say: You may fight against the Bill, but it will become law. That is the only reply they have to make; it is their only defence. In the words of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, "there ain't nothing more to it." Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of drawing their inspirations from British institutions. Filled with the fire of British institutions, flowing over with British valor, they make up their minds, silently, to tie the hands of the electorate of the country, to put shackles upon the free expression of the public will. By the Indian provision and the revising barrister provision they seek to exclude hon. members now in the House from their seats, and to secure the election of Government supporters in their place; and yet we hear them talking about drawing their inspirations from British insti-Who ever heard of a Briton tying the tutions. hands of his opponent before striking him? Who ever heard of a Briton endeavoring to tie the hands of his opponent before entering into the fight? We will fight you at the polls, they say, but we will first tie the hands of those opposed to us. I admire the inspiration, I admire the effects of British inspiration upon hon. gentlemen opposite. It has a wonderful effect upon them. It makes them valorous. It is the essence of bravery to tell us that they intend to bind our hands and tie our feet before they will enter into the contest with us before the people of the country. And, if that is not sufficient, "the Opposition, at a time like this, don't count." The subsidised newspapers of the country are brought in to bully the Opposition. Drag them to the foot of the polls, which will be a gallows to them. The rope is prepared. They are preparing the them. The rope is prepared. They are preparing the rope in this clause to-night. Hang them, because they are fit for nothing else. They are obstructing the business of the country. They are obstructing the Parliament of the country. They are obstructing us from passing a measure intended to perpetuate us in power forever. They are obstructing us from passing a measure which will bind the electors of the country, which will enable the officers of the Government, the Tory hacks throughout the country, to become the manipulators of the voters' lists. We are obstructing the passage of a magnanimous measure like that. Bring down the trampling feet of thousands of loyal Canadians, that will rise at the call of the First Minister and will ring with trampling feet around these grounds, to wipe out these fellows who are obstructing the passage of a measure so noble in its purposes. Bring down their thousands, place them in the square out there, commanded by the revising officers, the lieutenants in the great brigade, Lieut.-Col. Bunting at their head, Major Meek, Major Wilkinson, Mr. Stinson as commissary of the battalion; bring all these gentlemen down here, with their thousands, and Kirkland, the American, with his Gatling gun, the thousands of trampling feet, and what dismay will be cast upon the ranks of this small Opposition. They will fly at once, and enable the Government to pass this Bill, which is called for by every patriotic Canadian, without further debate or delay, this Bill which is intended to enfranchise so many that are not enfranchised now, which is intended to enable the Government to strike off all the naughty Grits throughout the country that may be objectionable to them. The spirit which dictates the bringing down of the trampling feet is the same spirit that will cut off so many of those voters who are objection able to hon. gentlemen. The Opposition don't count in the House or the country. The Opposition don't count in a time like this. Let hon. gentlemen get up and defend this Bill. There is a place where they will have to defend it. No matter whether our hands are tied or not, no matter whether we are bound in the contest in which we are about to enter with hon. gentlemen opposite at the polls, or not, when that time comes they will find that no amount of trampling feet will deter us from doing our duty; that we are determined then to do our duty as we are determined to-day; that though the electoral lists may be in the hands of their partisans throughout the country, though they may strip off from the electoral lists those who have a right to be there, because they don't count, because their voices would be against them, and therefore they don't count, when they have done that, we will meet them on the hustings and on the platforms of the country, and we dare them here, or there, or elsewhere, or anywhere, to defend a proposition as subversive of public liberty as this is intended to be.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We are arrived at clause 10 of the Bill, I think, and I might say to you that I am not in favor of the clause. I do not agree with the principles of this Bill, and many of its details are very objectionable. This clause is perhaps one of the most objectionable in the whole Bill. The very first words that my eye catches are these: "That the Governor General in Council may." We have been told by the First Minister that the word "may" is equivalent in law to the word "shall." These words have reference to the appointment of a gentleman to prepare and revise and complete the lists of the voters who are to be allowed to exercise the franchise in this free country of ours. Sir, it is fitting that a measure which is conceived and carried through in that spirit should have, in one of its clauses, a provision that the Governor in Council may appoint an individual with the powers that are given him by this Bill. How are appointments made by the Governor in Council? At whose instance? At whose recommendation? The member for Victoria, a strong supporter of the Government, gave us to understand this afternoon, in language that was not very dubious, that the Government would appoint those who were friendly to them; and he might have gone further, and stated that the Governor in Council, in making these appointments to office, the First Minister, whose name really might be substituted in place of the Governor in Council, will be pressed by his supporters, each one in his own locality, and in the electoral districts that have sent repregive certain powers to the Governor in Council, but I do not know that there is anything to compel us, in a case of this kind, to place the power proposed to be placed here in the hands of the Governor in Council. It may be necessary, at times, that some things that cannot be done in detail by Parliament should be done by proclamations of the Governor General in Council, being authorised to do that by Parliament, but I cannot see that there is anything that would necessitate, if such an individual as this is to be appointed, that he should be appointed by the Governor General in Council; because, as has been brought before your notice, in England, where an individual is appointed to revise the list, who, hon gentlemen and their press are pleased to tell us, is one performing the same duties as the one proposed to be appointed by this Bill, the appointment is not made by the Governor General in Council, because hon, gentlemen opposite-or rather, I think, they have not attempted to say so, but the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite have not scrupled to say we are following the English precedent in this case. It has a very bad look about it, to say nothing stronger, that the Government should take into their own hands the appointment of an individual irresponsible to the people who is to have the full control of the making, the revising and the completing of the list of individuals who will be permitted to vote for members of this House. And yet I am not astonished to find that clause in the Bill. The whole conduct of the Government and of their supporters, since this Bill has been introduced to the House, is in full keeping with the spirit of the first proposition here. I think I am not going too far when I say that they have apparently resorted to the Governor in Council, in appointing these officers, in order to rule the country through secret caucus, and not through parliamentary discussion in parliamentary halls. That has been their course in the whole matter. The Bill was introduced in a speech of eight minutes, and all the arguments that have been given in its favor have been given in a very few sentences by those empowered to speak. The hon, member for Lennox (Mr. Pruyn), early in the debate, gave us to understand that the provisions of this Bill had been determined upon, that its principles had been determined upon, that the Bill was to go through, that it did not matter what discussion took place upon it, and it was no use for the members of the Opposition to contend against this Bill, because the Conservative party in the House are a unit upon this question; and he gave us clearly to understand then that the whole matter was arranged upon in secret caucus. And it has come to this, that in Canada, where we supposed we had free and representative institutions, where laws were introduced and discussed fully by both parties, that practice has been departed from, and a party meet in secret caucus, where honor binds them to keep their mouths sealed as to what transpires in the caucus, when not even their own friends in the country are informed of what takes place; yet in that secret place is to be perfected and completed that which is to form one of the statute laws of this free country of ours. Sir, it is fitting that a measure which is conceived and carried through in that spirit should have, in one of its clauses, a provision that the Governor in Council may appoint an individual with the powers that are given him by this Bill. How are appointments made by the Governor in Council? At whose instance? At whose recommendation? The member for Victoria, a strong supporter of the Government, gave us to understand this afternoon, in language that was not very dubious, that the Government would appoint those who were friendly to them; and he might have gone further, and stated that the Governor in Council, in making these appointments to office, the First Minister, whose name really might be substituted in place of the Governor in Council, will be pressed by his supporters, each one in his own sentatives here who do not support the First Minister at present, those who are the recognised heads of the party to which he belongs in the county represented by opponents here, will present the name of this barrister to the First Minister; and if the First Minister was to say that he did not approve of the nomince of the member supporting him, or the persons recommending it from other counties in which he has not a supporter in this House, what would be the pressure put upon the First Minister? What would be the argument that would be used by the individual presenting the claim? What would be the arguments used by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson), for instance, when he makes his recommendation of the man he wants to be appointed to control and revise the list, and after that, of his own motion and in his own manner, to complete the list, if the First Minister was to say to him: I do not think the barrister that you are recommending will command the confidence of the country—what would be the reply of the member for Perth? Would it not be: Sir, he has been one of the most faithful members of the party that you have had in the whole county of Perth. For years and years that man's abilities and that man's means, perhaps, have been expended in furthering the interests of you, Sir John A. Macdonald, in securing the return of candidates to support you in this House, and it is poor recompense now for him to be passed by in favor of someone else. Sir, it will be almost inevitable that the man who will be appointed to this position will be a man strongly partisan in his feelings, and is it desirable that political partisans should have the manipulation, nay, more, the absolute creation and fixing of the list of men entitled to vote in this country? Have not hon, gentlemen opposite sometimes complained that through a political party being in a majority in a certain municipality the assessors, who were sworn to do their duty, appointed from year to year, responsible to the municipal councils, and the councils responsible to the people, and answerable to them once a year, that they have, through their strong partisan feeling, done an injustice to some electors of the county? Has not that been urged from the other side? And if that be true in their case, there is a remedy in the hands of the people. But here you have a man subject to like passions with these assessors, influenced by the same partisan feelings, who is to be appointed by the Governor in Council, and he is to hold his office during life. Sir, you can see The very first sentence of that clause must strike every man who values free institutions every man who values free institutions and who recognises the principle that the people are the governors and that the Ministers are but the servants. Here we have a subversion of that principle. We propose to exalt the servant over the master, and to prevent the master exercising his free will and giving directions as to how his servants shall conduct his affairs. It is an upsetting of the principle of constitutional liberty that ought to prevail in this country. It is taking from the people who ought to be the source of power, that power which ought to be theirs, and giving it to those who are not the masters but the servants of the people. If the people were consenting parties, the objection might not be so strong. Are the people consenting parties? Is the Bill not so arranged as to prevent the people from exercising the power which is theirs; is it not an attempt to take the power from them before they have a chance to pronounce it? The next portion of the clause sets forth that the Governor General in Council shall appoint such an officer within three months after the coming in force of this Act. This is giving the Government power to take away the liberties the people have enjoyed since Confederation, and for years before, when they were distinct Provinces, without giving the people a chance to say whether they favor such a proposition or not. The Government think we should sit day after day and if you take the clerks and bailiffs, who are to be associated Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

night after night to pass this measure; and when it has received the sanction of the Governor General and become law, within three months of that time the Governor in Council may appoint revising officers to enter upon their work of fixing the lists in such a manner as to prevent the free expression of the will of the people. If there was any desire on the part of the Government to do what is right, to restrain themselves within constitutional limits, they would alter the words "three months" to "three years," so that the people might have an opportunity, at the polls, of pronouncing as to whether they would allow the Act to come into force or not. Will they venture it? No. The Government and their supporters are unable, for if they were willing they would do so, to prevent the passage of a Bill brimfull of iniquities, which the Government are determined to have put through before the people can pronounce upon it; for they well know that if the people had an oppor-tunity of pronouncing upon it the Bill never would be crystalised into one of the statutes of Canada. Do they think the liberty-loving people of this country want an Act placed on the Statute Book more infamous than any to be found on the Statute Books of Spain, Italy, or the countries that are least progressive on the continent? No. My suggestion to replace the words "three months" with "three years" is one of those practical suggestions which the First Minister called for this afternoon—a reasonable proposition, which hon. gentlemen opposite must admit; a proposition which is eminently right and proper. But the First Minister is not present to hear the suggestion and avail himself of it; but his able colleague is present, and I venture to recommend the suggestion to him. I do not object to the word "proper" in the clause. If you can find a proper person to carry out the provisions of the Bill I do not think I would have so much objection to his being appointed, or so much objection to the Bill itself. But if a proper person is to be understood in the limited sense, and in the sense designed to carry out the Act in the spirit in which it has been created, then I object to it. If he is to be a proper person to carry out the Act, which is to strangle one political party and strengthen another—if those are the characteristics of a proper officer, I am opposed to such an officer. And if a proper person, in the broad and full acceptation of the term, is to be appointed, tell me where you will find him. A man, to perform the duties of this officer, fully, faithfully and impartially, will be an individual whom, I think, you will not be able to find either within the ranks of the legal profession, the mercantile profession or the agricultural community. He would be required to be possessed almost of attributes higher than may be ascribed to man, in order to carry them out fully. Where can you find one individual who is fit to be the judge of the value of all the properties in an electoral district—a man of sufficient knowledge to know every man who should or should not be on the list? He is to be called a revising officer. Sir, I object to the name. It is not a proper name. It is a misleading name. To call a man who prepares the list and then looks over it, and strikes off or leaves on any name he pleases, and then completes the list to his own satisfaction, is hardly the proper term. Yet, Sir, if I were asked to do so, I do not think I could give him a designation which might not seem to be contemptuous, and that I do not wish to do, with regard to gentlemen who have not signified their acceptance of these positions. They are to be appointed for each or any of the electoral districts of Canada. We have 211 representatives in this House, and perhaps in the neighborhood of 200 electoral districts, so that you will have 200 of these gentlemen appointed; and if I were to mention simply the expense connected with the payment of those officers, I should mention a sum of money which ought to startle the people of Canada, in the present state of our finances. But with them, you have an army of about 600 paid officials, whose salaries or remuneration are not fixed by this Bill, and as to which we have had no information from the leader of the Government, his colleagues or supporters, with the exception, I believe, of the member for West Toronto, who fixed the gross amount at something like $100,000. I hold that his estimate was an erroneous onethat it did not represent the full amount. Figures have been given on this side, estimating the cost from $300,000 to $500,000-about half a million has been pretty well agreed upon, on this side of the House, as the annual cost of these officers and their assistants throughout the country, Sir, Canada cannot stand that drain upon its resources at the present time, and in the present condition of our finances. If hon, gentlemen had any concern for the welfare of the country, or any proper appreciation of its financial condition, with our increased expenditures and diminished revenues, they would hesitate before attempting to saddle upon this country an additional burden of hundreds of thousands of dollars, in order to put into operation a law which, when it comes into effect, will not produce any beneficial results in this country, a law powerless to do that, but potent, if used in a wrong manner, to produce grave disaster and dire results; potent to produce enmity and illwill between those who, common citizens of a common country, ought to be bound together by that tie which binds men together when they live in a free country, when, though differing in their views, they give expression to their views, but neither one attempting to take an unfair, an unmanly, an ungenerous or an unjust advantage of the other. Even under the most tavorable circumstance you can imagine, with perfect men to carry out the machinery of this Bill, it will not be potent for any good, but there are within it elements which will tend to produce, if it is not worked aright and in a fair way, anything but that feeling of cordiality and good-will which it is desirable should exist among the citizens of a common country. I notice, next, that they shall hold office during good behavior. Well, I do not know if I should object so much to their holding office during good behavior, if that good behavior was to be understood in the full acceptation of the term; if it meant that they were to behave well, as we understand it. But here, again, I fear that the gentleman who drafted this Bill would be apt to judge a man's good or bad behavior by the manner in which he discharged his duties in accordance with the spirit of this Bill. And what is the spirit of this Bill? The spirit of this Bill is, that one political party shall have an undue advantage over another political party. Who will deny it? Will any hon. gentleman opposite, as they have been challenged time and again, rise and deny that that is the spirit of this Bill? Will any of them rise and say that, in their secret caucus, to which we were not admitted, and of which we know nothing, party advantage was not mentioned as flowing from the operation of this Bill? Dare they, with a love of truth in them, rise and deny that this has been talked over? In caucus, in secret among themselves, did they not design deliberately that this should be the scope and the purpose of the Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. PATERSON. Then, what is the object of the Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. That is your own question; answer it.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon, friend ventured on thin ice, and when I ask him the question now that he ought to answer, what is the intent and the object of this Bill? he does not answer. Is it that half a million dollars may be added annually to the outlay of the country?

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it for the purpose of securing a fairer return of members of this House than has been secured hitherto?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. And how will the hon, gentleman accomplish that, by the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. Go on with your catechism.

Mr. PATERSON. I ask the hon. gentleman to say how this will accomplish it.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not want to take up too much time.

Mr. PATERSON. The gag might be removed for once to let the hon. gentleman speak; he is brimfull of a desire to speak; but I venture to say that if he rose, he could not lay his hand on his heart and say that it was not with a desire to get an advantage over another political party that this Bill was introduced.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, I could.

Mr. PATERSON. I have often admired the amount of cheek the hon, gentleman is possessed of, but in no case did he display more than when he rose and denounced members on this side of the House for what he was pleased to term obstructing public business. The thing is too ridiculous—that the Opposition can obstruct the business of the House—those who have not control of the public business, those who cannot, from day to day, call up item 10, Bill 103, from the Order Paper; and that is done week after week by the leader of the Government. Look at the Order Paper, and see the measures that stand before this party measure—for it is a party measure; it is not public business. Therefore, who is responsible, if there is delay in attending to public business, but the gentleman who day, after day and week after week, passes by public business, that has priority on the Order Paper, and calls up this party measure? We, on this side, are anxious for public business to brought on; as patriots, we lament that gentlemen opposite should so far forget the responsibility they owe to the people as to neglect the public business; that they should, within thirty days of the time when millions of money will have to be borrowed to meet our obligations, let it be known on the other side of the ocean that the supplies have not yet been passed, that authority has not yet been given for the ways and means of raising money to meet the expenses of the country; we lament that the Government should, day after day, obstruct the public business by calling up this party measure out of its place, and putting the House into committee upon it. It is time the Government realised that the eyes of the country are upon them. The question is being asked, very anxiously, every day, when will the Government cease this obstruction and attend to the public business? The best interests of the country are being imperilled by their passing over public business and calling up a measure that is not designed in the interests of the country, and is not asked for by the country. Will they call a Bill in the public interest which they will not venture to say a man, from ocean to ocean, has asked for, but which thousands and ten of thousands of the people of this country are protesting against? Do you call that attending to public business? What more have we in this Bill? If the phrase "good behavior" is to be interpreted according to the spirit of this Bill, that one political party shall have an advantage over another, when will you remove a man for bad behavior when you have the Conservative party elected year after year through his carrying out the object and intent of this Bill? If that is to be the interpretation put upon the phrase "good behavior," then I say the gentleman is to be appointed for a long series of years, if indeed an indignant populace, an indignant electorate, tied though they may be by this Bill, as I believe it is designed they shall be tied, shall not rise superior even to the bonds that are sought to be placed upon them, and hurl from position and power those who are elected as their servants to do their will and to look after their interests, but who have sought to dethrone their masters and reign themselves in their stead. If the phrase "good behavior" was to be interpreted in the full acceptation of the term, less could be said against it; but the hon. First Minister is not in his place to tell us whether we are to interpret it in a broad, general sense, or in the spirit in which this Bill is conceived and sought to be carried out. But if he should be wanting good behavior, it will be possible to remove him by an address of the House of Commons. If it were possible to conceive of such a thing happening as that this Government should appoint certain gentlemen who would disregard their oaths of office, and would, by putting on the names of one party and striking off the names of others, secure the return of a majority of members of this House to support the present Government, I suppose, in the broad acceptation of the term, that would be bad behavior; but the address is to be passed by a majority of the House of Commons, and would those gentlemen, elected under those circustances, denounce the conduct of a gentleman who was the means of their election, good behavior or bad behavior? He has certain duties assigned to him. What are they? The duties of the gentleman to be so appointed by the Governor in Council are to be, "to prepare, to revise, and to complete, in the manner hereinafter provided, the list of persons entitled to vote under the provisions of this Act." Very extensive duties are given to those gentlemen; there can be no doubt about that. They are to prepare the lists; after they have prepared them, they are to revise them; and after they have revised them, they are to complete them, in the manner hereinafter provided. That leads us to the contemplation of the subsequent clauses of the Bill, in which the various duties of the revising officers are set forth; and, as I said before, it is not my desire to detain the committee by examining at length the other provisions of the other clauses of the Bill, which comprise the duties alluded to here; but you will observe the lists of persons entitled to vote are to be prepared by this gentleman, are to be revised by him and completed by him; and, as the Bill stands, after he has made his own list, revised his own list and completed his own list, there is to be no appeal from him on any matter of fact. But hon, gentlemen opposite may say the First Minister has announced he will make a change in that. Perhaps it was a mere oversight in his mind that he did not, in the first place, give an appeal on a matter of fact. Perhaps, as in the case of the Indians of Manitoba and British Columbia, whom he meant always to exclude from the Bill, but was so unfortunate as to word it that they were included, this appeal was excluded. It is peculiarly unfortunate, that with that idea in his mind, he should have taken care, expressly, in plain words, to say, that no appeal was to be allowed on a matter of fact. It may be that his original intention was to do as he proposed to do now. In case a barrister of five years' standing be appointed, he is graciously pleased to allow that there may be an appeal on a matter of fact; and, after being constrained thereto by the arguments, if not by the desire of hon. gentlemen on this side, he says it will be his sovereign will and pleasure to appoint county judges in some cases, but if a county judge is to be appointed there is to be no appeal from him at all. I have as high an opinion of the integrity and honesty of our judges and of their capacity in some matters as I have of any class of citizens in the country, and greater, I may say, than some. But there are other matters on which I do not consider a judge's opinion or his judgment is as good as the opinion and judgment of others, who may not even be in any of the professional ranks of life at all. It is part of the duties of this revising officer to determine the value of properties, and I do not believe that a judge on the bench, except he may have had some exceptional state your case, and you may appear before him. Yes, means of acquiring the knowledge, which will not be that is true; that can be done; but when you have gone the case with many of them, is not and cannot be as good there and stated your case, the whole matter is left with Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

a judge of the value of property as local officials, who have been for years entrusted with the making up of valuations and whose judgment has been proved by the fact that when a judgment has been rendered and a property assessed at certain values on the assessment roll it stood there at that rate, all parties being satisfied with its fairness, so that scarcely any appeals have been made. Let him be a judge. and grant him all you can desire, duties are here devolving upon the revising officer that cannot be performed by a judge as well, if he wants to act conscientiously and honestly. as by the local officers who, for years, have been entrusted with the duty, and have done it for the interest of those who have entrusted them with it. From his judgment there s to be no appeal.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). There is no appeal now.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. member for Hastings says there is no appeal now; but no one knows better than he, for I have just read the clause, that the commencement and the revision and the completion of the lists are in the hands of that judge, and in his hands alone, whereas it is now, first, in the hands of the local officers appointed by the municipality, sworn to do their duty, engaged, in many cases, for years, preparing the assessment roll; and from that assessment roll an appeal can be taken, if there is a difference in judgment between the man who has thus been assessed by them and the municipal council, that the people appoint, that the people vote for every year; so that if the least incapability is found one year, the council, responsible to the people, must see to it that a capable man is put in next year; and if the council neglect to do that, the people see that the council is replaced by another council. There is, first, then, the judgment and the action of the assessor, subject to the appeal to the municipal council or the court of revision, composed of members of that council, whose judgment is brought to bear upon it, a judgment quickened by the fact that the people have power over them, and that only twelve months can elapse before the people will have an opportunity of pronouncing upon them. After you have had the valuation of these two independent parties, responsible to the people, then the person who thinks an injustice has been done to him has an appeal to a judge, outside of these parties, who shall arbitrate as between him and them; and yet the hon, member for East Hastings would seek to infer, by his remark interjected here, that because after the list has gone through all these stages there is no appeal from the judge, it is the same thing that the judge himself should be the valuator of the property and of the many reasons why a man should be on and off, that he should be the judge in the incipient stage, in the revising stage, and the completing stage, and no appeal can be taken from him. I do not care who they may be, but, as a liberty-loving Canadian, I do not want a despot in this country, even though the despot be a good man. I do not want a man to be made the arbitrary ruler and governor of the electorate of this country, even if he is a good man; and no man who loves British institutions, and constitutional freedom, and liberty, ought to be found supporting such a proposition at all; and yet, that is what is contemplated in this clause, recited in this clause, and will become part of the statute law of Canada if this House sees fit to pass it, and it is endorsed by the other branch, and sanctioned by His Excellency the Governor General. Among the duties that are upon him are the duties of holding court for the revision of the rolls. The gentlemen opposite, I suppose, might tell us that you have that opportunity, and you have kept it out of sight—and I wish to be fair on this occasion—they will say: You can go before the judge, or before this revising officer, and can him, and on his judgment, as a last resort; and he may not care what evidence you produce; he may not care how strong your case may be, if you have not convinced the judgment of that one man—I am speaking now of him as an honorable man, as a man wishing to do right—if you have not convinced him as to your contention as to values, that ends it; there is no appeal from him. Is there any such precedent in British history or in the history of any country? In this country, in any other matter, we go before the judges of the land and take our suits before them, and the judge gives his decision. We are bound to say that our judges endeavor to give decisions that are right and just, and yet are not the cases innumerable, almost, in which, with this judge endeavoring to do right, one of the parties is not satisfied with the decision, and appeals to a higher court, appeals to a number of judges sitting together, of higher rank than the judge before whom the case was tried, not because he thinks the judge was doing him an injustice designedly, but because he did not agree with his judgment. And he has the right, as a British subject should have, to appeal to a higher court, and the case may be taken from the jugment of the judge below and argued there. It may be that the judgment of the judge below may be confirmed by the judges of higher rank and grade, but is the appeal shut out from the Canadian, then, not on a point that involves the birthright, the dearest privilege of a Canadian citizen, the right to vote, but on a matter involving a few pounds of money, it may be? Is his right shut out then? No; he may appeal to a tribunal higher than that, a tribunal sitting in this city of Ottawa, the Supreme Court of Canada. He has his appeal there, and even then-

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Then he must stop.

Mr. PATERSON. He can, after that, or he can elect between that and going, if he chooses, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, in order that he may get what he thinks is his right.

Mr. WHITE. The case must cover over $2,000, then.

Mr. BERGIN. In the case of a vote, is that right given? Can you go beyond the county judge?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not speaking of the county judge. I have described that.

Mr. WHITE. You know that no one can appeal to the Privy Council unless the amount is over $2,000.

Mr. PATERSON. I said for a sum of money; let it be $2,000; and will anyone say, that if a man may have, for what would be a paltry sum of money to many of the inhabitants of Canada, $2,000, the right by law to appeal from the judgment of a judge to judges, and from judges to judges, and from judges to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, still, when the vote of a man, his right to say who shall make the list that shall govern him, is involved, in that case he shall have no appeal from the judgment of the judge, let him be determined to do right, not being that which is really right in itself; that there shall be no appeal from him, and that the right to vote, the dearest right of a free man, shall be taken from him, because of the judgment, the defective judgment, of that judge.

Mr. WHITE. It is the case now.

Mr. PATERSON. It is not the case now.

Mr. WHITE. It is the case now.

Mr. BERGIN. You cannot appeal from the decision of the county judge.

Mr. PATERSON. Have I not told the committee time and again that this is the last resort? Cannot the hon. gentleman see, does he not know the different stages it passes through and the judgment pronounced upon it before it reaches that judge at all? Does he not know—and this is the point I am making, and hon gentlemen need have it does not affect my position, because, in making up the no difficulty in seeing it—that in the matter of a vote there is appeal, and appeal before the matter is decided under the present law, and that in the law they propose there is a decision rendered, and there is no appeal whatever to it

Mr. BERGIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Do you propose that, in the case of the decision of a revising barrister, an appeal should be granted from court to court, as you have been describing for the last

Mr. PATERSON. No; I made no proposition of the

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). You covertly said so.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not, if I may be allowed to contradict the hon, gentleman, and to contradict him flatly.

Mr. FERGUSON. I say again that you did.

Mr. PATERSON. I contradict him again, and flatly, because he has no right to-

Mr. FERGUSON. Your own statement will bear me

Mr. PATERSON. I did not so mean it, and you may accept that explanation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes, of course I will, if you say you did not mean it.

Mr. PATERSON. I resent the imputation that I covertly

Mr. FERGUSON. I did not intend to say anything disagreeable, but I will leave it to the Chairman and to the House whether the House was not led to understand that.

Mr. McNEILL. He meant that that was implied; he did not mean to say anything disagreeable.

Mr. FERGUSON. Of course, if you say you did not mean it, that is another thing.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman could not have followed my argument. I pointed out that in Ontario there was a process of preparing the electoral lists, that there was an appeal to the municipal council, and from the municipal council to the judge, and it stopped there; but that, under this Bill, the judge is to make the list, and there can be no appeal from his decision. I proposed then to point out that, in all the provisions of this Bill, there is no right of appeal. The hon, gentleman has mentioned the sum of $2,000. There is an appeal from a higher court to a higher court, and the appellant can go to the Appellate Court in England. I used that as an illustration of how keenly Canadians guard the right of appeal, in order that full justice may be secured to them. In that sense I used it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Will the hon. gentleman

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I will allow you, presently. I used it as an illustration of my argument, and hon. gentlemen opposite should have understood it in that way, when I had gone through a description of the manner in which these matters were managed now. Now, my hon friend from Brockville, who is a lawyer and ought to know, may be able to set me right on some point.

Mr. WOOD. The only point I desire to refer to is this: I do not think there is any appeal from the municipal council at all in regard to the voters' list. There is an appeal from the assessment roll to the court of revision, but if you wish to appeal to the county judge now, you appeal independently of any action of the municipal council.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman, being a lawyer, would know better than I; but he will see that it does not voters' list they are guided absolutely by the values put upon it by the assessors.

Mr. WOOD. The clerk of the municipality cannot be guided by anything else; he has no option. If a name has been omitted from the voters' list, either by the clerk having omitted to see it on the assessment roll, or if the assessor himself has omitted to place it on the voters' list, then the person can appeal to the county judge, independently of the action of the assessor or of the clerk, and have it placed upon the list—which is exactly as under this law. The same person can appeal to the revising barrister.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). This is not final. If a party wants to appeal, he goes to the judge, who fixes a day. The list is final when the judge sets a day to examine it; then, if there are any appeals, they are brought before him on a day fixed by the judge in each municipality.

Mr. PATERSON. It is as I stated. The only point the hon. member for Brockville made was that the clerk might, by error, omit a name; but he admits what I contended, namely, that the clerk has no option in the matter; the values are there for him, and he prepares the list therefrom; and although, technically, there may be that difference, virtually you have an appeal from the assessor to the court of revision, and from the court of revision to the judge. It cannot be otherwise. And can the hon, gentleman not see what a vast distinction there is between that and giving to this judge, who will not be as good a judge, probably, as the assessor, the absolute power to determine the value of that property, and, having determined it, notwithstanding any representations that are made to him, his judgment remaining the same, to refuse to alter it, making him absolute and sole judge as to the value of the

Mr. WHITE. He uses that very same list.

Mr. PATERSON. He is not bound to use that same list.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, yes, he is.

Mr. PATERSON. Is he bound to be controlled by that list? Is he bound to accept the values that are on that Mr. WHITE. I say, in general, that the revising officer, or the judge, will take the list after it goes through these different processes you speak of.

Mr. PATERSON. I want the hon, gentleman to answer distinctly: Is he bound to accept the values that are on the list?

Mr. WHITE. In his own judgment.

Mr. PATERSON. Because, if the hon. gentleman had said yes, he would probably have had an opportunity of voting on an amendment making that clear and plain.

Mr. BERGIN. If the appeals suggested by this speech of the hon, gentleman are granted, may I ask when we may expect to have a voters' list confirmed in Canada?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, if the appeals were to be granted, as I mentioned, the hon gentleman could easily find out. The voters' list would be complete and finished in Ontario at the same time it is finished and completed now.

Mr. BERGIN. You would even have to go to the Privy Council.

Mr. PATERSON. No; we do not propose to take the vote to the Privy Council. We propose to take the vote through the course it goes through now in the different Provinces. The hon, gentleman cannot be so densely ignorant as not to understand my argument. My answer to him is, that the rolls will be finally completed and revised just at the date at which they are under the Ontario Act. I was endeavoring to point out, when the hon. be paid by any party to any other party to any application before him, Mr. Paterson (Brant).

gentleman broke in upon me, that a person being left off the list, or a person being put on that some one thought should not be on, would have his case brought before the revising officer. I was pointing out that although that may be done there is no other tribunal to which he can appeal against the judgment, if it be a party that wants to go on who is not on, and who is entitled to go on. I am not saying anything against the judge, but there is no way in which that party can appeal. There are daugers staring people in the face that will prevent them availing themselves of this opportunity of even laying their case before some of these revising barristers—I will not say before the judges—because I do believe that there will be such pressure brought to bear upon the First Minister in connection with the gentlemen that are to be appointed, that if I was to give him credit for every intention to do right he will make appointments so strongly partison in some cases that these officers will be unable so to clear their minds of prejudice as to do full justice in the matter.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon, gentleman think that a stronger pressure will be brought to bear in the appointment of a revising officer than is brought to bear in the appointment of a county judge at present?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I do. I do not think the First Minister would yield in all cases. I do not think that the Mr. PATERSON. hon, gentleman has regarded the appointment of judges as patronage to be exercised by members supporting him. think the Government have been careful in that matter.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that the hon, gentleman will find that just as much care will be taken with reference to these appointments.

Mr. DAVIES. Judges will seek to get these appointments by doing political service within the appointment.

Mr. McNEILL. There will be an appeal to the judge, and that will show the impropriety of the conduct of the officer. It will all be done before the eyes of the public.

Mr. PATERSON. We will not argue that point; subsequent events will determine whether it is so or not, and I am sure members of the Opposition will heartily rejoice if they find the suggestion of the hon member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is correct. My objection applies all the same. I do not care how high a judge may be—I give him all honor and credit for a desire to do what is right -but I have an undying objection to let this right and this liberty, that involve the exercise of judgment in matters outside of judicial proceedings, to be placed in the hands of any one man, I do not care how high he may be.

Mr. McNEILL. That is the case at present.

Mr. PATERSON. Suppose a man brings his case before the revising officer. We will suppose that the revising officer is a partisan. What position does the applicant occupy? Clause 30 says:

"The revising officer may issue, at his own instance, or on the application of any person supporting or opposing any objection, claim or proposed amendment to a voters' list, at any of the courts or sittings for prelimininary or final revision under this Act, a summons, in the form in the schedule to this Act contained, to any person to attend at such court or sittings, and (if required) to produce any books or papers in the possession or power of such person, and to give evidence thereat relating to any matter connected with such revision, and in the event of such person not attending after being served with such summons, the revising officer may punish such person as for a contempt of a court of record: Provided, however, that no such person shall be compelled to attend under any such summons unless the witness' fees and expenses allowed under the tariff of the Superior Court in the Province have first been paid or tendered to such person."

The next section but one provides as follows:—

"The parties to any application before any such court of preliminary or final revision may appear by solicitor or counsel, and the revising officer may, in any case, award the costs of any witnesses, and a sum "en bloc" for other costs, not to exceed , to as he may direct, and the amount of such costs shall be certified by the revising officer, and may be recovered, on such certificate, as an ordinary debt due to the person to whom they are awarded by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction in civil cases in the Province."

I speak with some reluctance on this question, as I am not a lawyer; but I speak within the hearing of legal gentlemen who may correct me, such as the hon, member for Lincoln and the hon, member for Brockville. As I understand the operation of the clause—if you can suppose that a partisan revising officer may be appointed—it might be this: If a humble individual, whose name had been omitted from the list, desired to have it placed there, and came before the revising officer, that officer could, if I understand the interpretation of these clauses aright, of his own mere motion take such action that for all time to come this individual would never think of coming before him with any matter of complaint. The revising officer has the power, at his own instance, to summon, not only one witness, but any number of witnesses, to give testimony; he can bring them from a distance, if he pleases, at great expense, their time being paid for; in a word, he can make the costs so heavy as to make them unbearable for the individual; and according to the section I last read, the returning officer will have full power, not subject to any appeal, to decide who shall pay the costs and what the costs shall be. Can anything more monstrous be conceived. How could a poor man resist such an official? It may be that I am wrong, but in my opinion such power is conferred on the returning officer as will enable him to exclude hundreds of voters from the list, and deter them from appealing, by the power he possesses to summon witnesses and assess the costs upon any individual he thinks proper, even though the witnesses he may summon should bear testimony that would support the contention of the applicant. However it may be in the case of a judge, whom I cannot conceive would so act, such might occur in regard to a revising officer. The applicant would not be in a position to appeal to the county judge; he would have had enough of the matter. He would be apt to say: If, in this free country, I have to undergo legal penalties and disabilities in my endeavor to enforce my rights, and they have been refused to me, I cannot, in my straitened circumstances, or, even as another man might say, with my moderate means, having regard to my family, any longer protest against the wrongs that have been inflicted on me, wrongs that never would have been inflicted on me had the Parliament of Canada not wilfully departed from the path of justice that has been pursued for eighteen years, and devised the scheme whereby such a thing is possible as that under which I am suffering. I point out this one feature, in which even this opportunity that is afforded to the individual, of laying his case before the revising officer, may work to his injury to such an extent that he will be deterred from taking action by way of appeal. Do not such provisions act as stench in the nostril. Are there not good reasons why the Bill should be discussed, that hon gentlemen opposite should not remain in silence and simply say they are ready to vote for the measure. That is not the position they ought to take. I trust it is not the position they will take; but we shall see, as we get further on in the various clauses in the Bill. To the part of the plane which provides that the officer part of the clause which provides that the officer shall take an oath, of course no exception can be taken. The last part of the clause provides that in the event of the death, resignation, removal, inability or refusal to act of any such revising officer, another may, in the same way, be appointed in his stead, who shall hold office under the same tenure and with the same duties and powers. There is no relief promised there, through the death of one of those officers, and that is something which no one will desire. But, if the system were found to work injuriously, the Governor ner, irresponsible to the people, to discharge the same duties and exercise the same powers. Sir, the clause before you is objectionable in almost every line of it, and that such a provision should be introduced into a Bill-to say nothing of the Bill itself-that it should have been conceived by a responsible Minister, in a free country, almost passes comprehension; and to suppose that a majority of a Parliament, elected by the people of a free country to guard the rights and liberties of the people, should so far torget the sacred trust reposed in their hands by the people, as deliberately, without the consent of the people, in opposition to the will of the people, to rob them of their rights and liberties, is something we are not even yet prepared to contemplate. They say we do not want the Bill; that we obstruct it, with a view to prevent its passing. Sir, let them proceed with the Bill. We do not take them by the throat, as some of them desire to say, nor do we make any attempt to do it, but we discuss this Bill; we want it understood. We say that principles dear to the heart of every man who loves freedom and liberty are subverted in that Bill, and that we would be worse than recreant to our duty and the trust reposed in us if we did not discuss itviewing it as we do-fully, frankly and fairly. All we ask hon, gentlemen would be that, should they think it is their duty, they should allow the people to pronounce on this Bill, and to say, as between us, who is right and who is wrong-the party who are seeking to make it a part of the statute law of Canada, or the party who, in the name of the people of Canada, protest against this infringement of their rights and liberties. We have done this, and we propose to do it. As clause by clause is reached, if they contain provisions which we regard as iniquitous, the duty rests upon us of pointing them out. We have to regret that the whole people of this country have not yet had a full opportunity of understanding the nature of this measure. If all portions of the Canadian press would but print this Bill, which is sought to be made the law of the land, if, in their comments upon it, they would tell the truth and make known its provisions, then, Sir, I believe you would have had an agitation greater than that which you now see throughout the country; you would have still stronger appeals against its passing than those you have heard, and you would have petitions more numerously signed than those which have been presented to the House. Sir, the liberties of the people ought to be as dear to the Conservative portion of the country as to the Liberal portion of the country. True, they were not forward in securing those constitutional rights which they now enjoy in common with us. That is not in accordance with their traditions and their past history. Their history shows how they have warred against the liberties of the people of Canada, liberties which they now enjoy, and which where secured in spite of those who professed a like political faith with them in days gone by. And as the Reformers fought for and obtained those rights and liberties which were refused in times past by the Conservatives of those days, of whom those hon, gentlemen are the successors, is it not right that they should resist the attempts to have those rights and liberties wrenched away from them. I hold that the tenth clause of this Bill is intended and designed to wrench from the people of this country the rights and liberties which were contended for and secured to the people of this country in days gone by, and that the Liberals of to-day would be worse than recreant to their trust and to the traditions of their party, unworthy the name they bear, if they allowed this clause to go through, without resisting the attempt to wrench from the people the rights which were secured to them by the Liberal party in days which have long gone by.

if the system were found to work injuriously, the Governor in Council has power to appoint another, in the same man will adjourn the House, as the hour at which we usually adjourn will not afford me as much time as I should like to occupy in discussing an important measure of this kind.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). We will wait for you, doctor.

Mr. WILSON. Then, Sir, I would say that appeal after appeal has been made from this side to hon. gentlemen opposite, to rise and explain the object of this clause; but we find that they sit in stubborn silence, and refuse to show any disposition to explain or modify this clause. Now, we are perfectly well aware, by the course they are pursuing, that they intend to force this measure through, whether we, on this side, will or not. They feel that they have satisfied themselves prior to the introduction of this Bill as to its effects; they have fully consulted each other in caucus as to the results which will flow from it, if it becomes law. The First Minister has announced to-day to a free Parliament that his followers would not allow him to introduce a certain measure, the measure to be found on English Statute Book, and I ask him why would they not allow him to introduce that measure, or allow the revising officer here to represent the same position that the revising barrister does in England? Why was such a measure as that objectionable to his followers? I do not wish to impute motives, but would it be improper to say that the reason they did not desire to have a clause of that kind incorporated in this Bill was that they desired to obtain a substantial advantage for their party by this measure? We have, time and again, pointed out to this House that the introduction of such a measure as this by hon, gentlemen opposite does not indicate a disposition on their part to deal fairly and justly with the Opposition. I feel that, not only on this clause, but on every other clause of this Bill, we should offer strenuous opposition, and ask for explanations from those in charge of the Bill, It is necessary that they should explain to us why hon. gentlemen opposite refuse to consent to a Bill similar to the English Act. It is their duty to rise now and explain why they objected to the proposition of the First Minister; but we have found that appeals to them heretofore have failed, and we expect that this appeal will fail. To me, it would seem that they have weighed well the advantages likely to arise if they could get a revising officer who would prepare the voters' lists in their interests. But hon. gentlemen opposite say: Oh, these revising officers will be appointed for life, and they will be entirely free from Government influence; they will be elevated above the plane of partisanship, and will therefore be as independent as the judges on the bench. I deny such a proposition. They are appointed to do the bidding of those who appoint them, and they know full well that if they carry out the views of their masters they will be rewarded.

Mr. WHITE. I am very sorry you have so little confidence in the revising barristers of this country.

Mr. WILSON. I have just as much confidence in the revising barristers as I have in the Government of the day, and in hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I believe that when they can use their position to further the interests of their party they will do it. If hon. gentlemen opposite have, in the face of the desire of the First Minister, insisted on having revising barristers, who will be appointed by the Government of the day instead of by the judges, it is a strong indication to me that they wish to place this measure on the Statute Book for party purposes alone.

Mr. WHITE. Have you confidence in the judges?

Mr. WILSON. I have as much confidence in the judges as my hon, friend opposite. If the Superior Court judges had been selected to appoint the revising barristers I would have been better satisfied with this clause of the Bill than I am at present.

Mr. WILSON,

Mr. WHITE. If the revising barrister does wrong there is an appeal to the judge.

Mr. WILSON. That sort of pleading will have no effect. What are we asked to do? We are asked to appoint a revising officer, not only to revise the lists, but to express his opinion as to the value of the property, and as to whether a man has a right to be placed on the list or not—in fact, to make the list. And yet, will hon members opposite tell me that there is any comparison between this revising officer and the judge? Nothing of the kind. The object of hon gentlemen opposite is a different one; their object is to gain a party advantage—to deprive the people of the country of the opportunity of going to the polls at the next general election to record their verdict against the Government of the day—to stifle the free expression of the electors at the coming election, and that is, no doubt, the reason we have such a clause as this.

Mr. BOWELL. You do not mean that.

Mr. WILSON. The hon, gentleman may have the habit of expressing what he does not mean, but I am not prone to do so. If I ever felt a sincere desire, I desire that this Bill should be made complete, that we should remove from it all the objectionable clauses and purify it of all the impurities it contains. Hon, gentlemen opposite must feel, if they will only lay aside their partisanship, that this is not a fair course that they are taking towards the Opposition—that this is a blow directed against us. Are they not, day in and day out, taunting us about our small number, and boasting that they have the confidence of the people? But when in a short time there will be an opportunity of appealing to the people, are they willing to appeal to the same jury to whom they appealed before, and who gave them the verdict? Are they willing to use the same voters' lists? Are they willing to use the same reason of ascertaining whether they still possess the confidence of the country as they did before?

Mr. WHITE. We could not appeal to the same list, because Mr. Mowat changed the law, because he changed the list altogether, and the same thing has been done in Nova Scotia. The franchise has certainly been extended in Ontario and Nova Scotia far beyond what it was in the last election.

Mr. WILSON. We have heard a great deal with reference to the voters' list being so very different in the Province of Ontario from what it was before the last Act. My hon, friend knows well that the voters' list which will be in use at the next election, as prepared by the Province of Ontario, includes a larger number of people than the former list. My hon, friend says the Bill before us is enfranchising a larger number of people than the old Bill on which this Parliament was elected; therefore, why would they not appeal to a tribunal equally well prepared to record a verdict for or against the Government. Let us consider for a moment what will be the effect, if we adopt this clause as it is now presented to us. Every hon, member is aware that it will entail a very large expense. That I would not object to so much, were it absolutely necessary that the Bill should be passed. If it was necessary we should have a Dominion franchise I could understand there would be an excuse for this large expenditure. Various estimates have been made as to what this Bill will cost. We know well that whatever generosity there may be on the part of judges and lawyers, and it is from those the revising barristers will be appointed, they are not prone to do much work without being well compensated; and it is not likely the cost of having this Dominion franchise will be less than $400,000 or $500,000 a year. Are we prepared to incur that expenditure, merely that we may have a Dominion franchise and a less number of people enfranchised and a less well-prepared list, without any additional advantage at all. Again, we have the objection that a vast amount of inconvenience and confusion will be created in the various municipalities in other sections of the Dominion. We have at present the means whereby the present voters' lists are prepared, means which are well understood. I would like to call your attention to the difference in the preparation of the voters' list under the Ontario law and that which will take place under this Bill. Under the Ontario law the assessors are sworn to faithfully perform their duty, and I believe we can with as much safety to the assessors doing their work well as we could to the revising officer. After the assessment roll is made those who may feel themselves aggrieved may appeal to the court of revision, which is held in every municipality. At this court of revision all parties are heard, without the necessity of having a lawyer, and without costs. I have every confidence in the municipal councillors who compose these courts of revision. If anyone feels aggrieved by the decision of the court of revision, he can appeal to the judge, and there the voters' list becomes a finality. The revising barrister, under this clause, accepts the assessment roll as prima facie evidence. That amounts to nothing. That concession on the part of the Minister of Customs amounted to nothing, and he knew it was no protection whatever.

Mr. BOWELL. Why did your party ask for it, then?

Mr. WILSON. It may be that we were trying to see if hon. gentlemen would make any concession, good, bad or indifferent. This being a bad one, was one which they consented to make. The revising officer can say whether he will or will not accept this assessment roll as sufficient evidence to place a man upon the voters' list. He takes this list, together with what other information he can receive. To whom will he go to get information? In East Hastings, to whom would he appeal for information as to who should and who should not be placed upon the voters' list? Is there one hon, member on that side who does not feel that the object of the revising barrister is to benefit the Conservative party.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman apply that observation to a judge?

Mr. WILSON. I will refer to the judges when I reach that point. It is more natural to expect that a man appointed by a certain political party, other things being equal, will show favors to the party from whom he receives his appointment.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon, gentleman apply that to the judges?

Mr. WILSON. If the hon. gentleman comes to my county I will give him an opportunity of seeing that even a judge is not above being a partisan. Although, as a general rule, I have every confidence in the judges of the country, and in their acting impartially, if the hon. gentleman comes to my county and there finds a judge who deliberately gives a written decision on the bench, delaring that, in common law, a man is justified in castigating his wife, we may conclude that the judges sometimes are not more pure than the revising officers appointed by the Government of the day.

Mr. McNEILL. It is the duty of the hon. gentleman, in such a case, to impeach the judge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So he has attempted to do.

Mr. WILSON. I was going on to point out the manner in which the revising officer would prepare the roll, and I think I was about to convince you that it could hardly be expected that he would be as competent to prepare the roll as the municipal officers are. I was also going to show that he would be called upon to act, not only as a revising officer, but as an assessor. Now, Sir, I think, if you are going to have a man able to perform the duties of an assessor he ought to be thoroughly acquainted with the various localities of the municipalities that he has to assess. As a rule, assessors are appointed by the municipality on account of their fitness and acquaintance with the values of property, but your revising barrister will not be possessed of that information, and therefore we cannot expect that the voters' list would be as efficiently prepared by a revising officer as it is by the municipalities. Now, some hon, gentlemen opposite have contended that the revising barrister, under this clause, is similar to the revising barrister under the English franchise law. To show how mistaken those hon. gentlemen are, and what a difference there is between the two officers, I will read you a few extracts from Brotherton on the franchise. (The hon. gentleman read sections 28, 29 and 31.) You find here that there is an opportunity for every individual who has a right to be placed on the voters' list to establish his claim. His petition is sent in to the revising officer by the overseer or the recorder of the municipalities.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. WILSON. I wish you would keep order, Mr. Chairman. If you do not, I shall be compelled to go down nearer the reporter, where I can have myself heard. You will find here, Mr. Chairman, the course that is pursued in England to secure to every individual who is entitled to it the right to be placed upon the votors' list.

An hon. MEMBER. Trow! keep away from him, and let him go on.

Mr. WHITE. The hon, gentleman should have a right to go on speaking. He is paid by the hour; he is paid by subscription.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I never object to any man imputing motives or acts of which he is guilty himself; therefore, I do not object to an insinuation of that kind. I am satisfied that this Bill, appointing a revising officer, will not meet with the approval of the electorate and that when it is presented to the people, and when it is shown that it will deprive the electorate of an opportunity of their names being placed on the voters' list at the will or pleasure of the revising officer, it will produce a revulsion of feeling, adverse to the Government of the day and in favor of those who have fought valiantly for the rights and privileges of the whole people of the Dominion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire myself, and so do some other hon members, to offer a few remarks on what the hon gentleman acknowledged to-day to be the most important portion of the Bill; but at this hour I propose that the committee rise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not exactly state that this was the most important portion of the Bill, but one that would certainly, from what I had already heard, cause a good deal of discussion. But it occurs to me, from the little I have heard, that some of the discussion has been of the old stamp and not in the line meant by the leader of the Opposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWWIGHT. I may say that the speech of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) was an exceedingly able and powerfully delivered speech, which I only regret was delivered to a small audience. I dare say some of the speeches the hon. gentleman would not have cared so much to hear; but I do not think there has been any attempt on the part of hon. gentlemen to unnecessarily delay the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg to move a verbal amendment. That at line 32 the words, "for such purpose," be struck out, and the letter "a" inserted.

Mr. DAVIES. It is my intention to move an amendment to the clause.

Mr. CASEY. Is it the intention to allow amendments to be moved, apart from that amendment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. CASEY. There are several amendments.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It is irregular to proceed to discuss a clause without there being any amendment. We have been discussing a clause while there has really been no amendment before the committee, which I find, according to English precedents, is not according to rule. There ought to be an amendment before the committee while the clause was being discussed, and to make the proceedings more regular an amendment should be placed before the committee.

Mr. CASEY. I have never heard of any such understanding or rule in this Parliament. The question we have been discussing is as to whether we should have this clause or not. The discussion, in my opinion, is quite in order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I point out that business will not be furthered by proceeding with the discus-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If this subject had not been fully discussed weeks before we came to the clause there might have been something in the hon. gentleman's

Mr. CASEY. It is simply absurd for the hon. gentleman to say that the clause has been sufficiently discussed, and to say, after the ordinary understanding we have had, after thirteen hours' work, that because the right hon gentleman thinks so, this clause has been sufficiently discussed, is simply absurb. It is not in accordance with the understanding the hon, gentleman has been acting upon for some time past, and I am afraid it will not result in furthering the discussion on the Bill, simply because we cannot discuss it intelligently at this hour in the morning. We have shown our desire to discuss the Bill fairly and to the purpose, and the best proof of that fact is, that the right hon. gentleman has adopted a number of suggestions made on this side during the discussion, because they commended themselves to his reason. On the understanding I have mentioned, it was understood that we should sit at reasonable hours, and I am sure no one will say that to sit after this hour would be reasonable.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the hon. gentleman hardly wishes us to go into a discussion of this clause, which he will admit is a very important one, at this time of the morning. The hon. member for South Huron wishes to address the House, and I intended to speak, perhaps, for twenty minutes or half an hour. I think there has been no evidence of any intention of preventing discussion, or improperly delaying the proceedings, and as the hon. gentleman knows well this clause is one which must be more fully discussed, and amendments will be submitted in the proper time, but it is unreasonable to ask that we should go on at this hour of the morning.

Mr. HESSON. Hon. gentlemen should remember that the provision of this clause was very fully discussed along with the general principles of the Bill, and that no new light has been thrown upon it, as each speaker has repeated simply what the previous speaker said. I think, after all this repetition, they must themselves feel that they have debated fully a question which was very fully discussed before, unless they have something new to say upon it. 1 wonder that intelligent gentlemen should get up, one after the other, and simply repeat what was said by previous speakers. Surely they must admit that there are men intelligent enough on this side to know the purport and effect of the Bill, and who know its effect and its provisions as well as if they were to talk about it for a week. They there were several amendments to be moved. Mr. DAVIES.

have had an opportunity to move their amendments during the whole day, but they have not done so, and I do not think it is right that they should go on again, after coming fresh from the country, and repeat the same speeches over and over again, at this stage of the debate.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman knows that we have to meet here at half-past one to-morrow, and what condition will we be in if we continue at work for some hours longer. Human nature cannot stand it; and if we went on for three hours we would not be any further ahead. The desire to facilitate business is just as strong with some on this side as on the other, whatever charge they make against some of unduly protracting the debate. I do not think the speeches have been unduly protracted to-night, as only some five or six have been made on this clause. Hon. gentlemen may force us to go on for some hours, but it will not facilitate the passage of the Bill; and in what condition will we be to continue the discussion to-morrow.

Mr. McNEILL. The question is, what position will we be in to-morrow night, supposing we adjourn now?

Mr. HESSON. The leader of the Opposition so ably discussed the clause to day that I do not think hon, gentlemen can throw any further light upon it; and I think, if these hon, gentlemen on that side had come into the House and listened to the speech of their leader, they would have been content to sit silently, after hearing it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, member for West Elgin says there was an understanding. I am not aware of any understanding.

Mr. DAVIES. A tacit understanding.

Mr. EDGAR. Practice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not an understanding. The ground taken by the hon, member from Prince Edward Island is really trifling with the House. He said, a little while ago, that he had an amendment. Why does he not move it? I think the hon member for West Elgin said there were several amendments, and here we have been discussing this measure all day, and not an amendment has been proposed. The amendment was spoken to by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) fully and ably, presenting all the arguments that could, by any possibility, be brought up against the clause, and the discussion has been a more repetition of those arguments. There could not be any new suggestions with respect to that clause. And now they say they are going to commence with amendments. If the hon, gentleman was really in earnest he would have his amendment ready. However, I venture to say he has not it ready now, though he said he had.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman says: "I venture to say he has not his amendment ready now, although he said he had;" that is to say he was lying. When an hon. gentleman, even if he be a Premier, says that an hon. member utters a distinct untruth, he is out of order, and I must ask that that statement be modified or withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman puts words in my mouth. I did not say he was lying. That is an inference the hon. gentleman drew. I said, I ventured to say that he had not his amendment ready. He may have lost it or mislaid it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will you bet?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said there were half a dozen amendments. I venture to say there were not half a dozen amendments.

Mr. CASEY. I did not say that. I said I understood

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is trifling with the committee, and now he appeals for delay.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman believes I would have made the statement I did unless I was going to move an amendment. My amendment is not only ready but it is in my hands, and I have been here the whole afternoon waiting for an opportunity to move it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Let us have it.

Mr. DAVIES. I hope the hon. gentleman will do me the justice to say that he did not wish to accuse me of that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not. I do not want to make any unpleasant charge against the hon. gentleman. The hon, gentleman said he had an umendment, and made a short speech, and I called on the hon, gentleman to move it.

Mr. DAVIES. I was just waiting to see how far the hon. gentleman would go, and I was about to rise, if the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) had not got up so hurriedly.

Mr. PATERSON. I want to call attention to the very irregular course pursued by the First Minister. He has allowed this clause to be discussed all day, and he comes, at two o'clock in the morning, to propose an amendment. Such an irregular course is a bad example to set to the other members of this House.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Perhaps it would be unfair to compel the Opposition to speak after two o'clock. They evidently have an object in detaining the House in session as long as possible. I read in the Globe of the 21st instant this paragraph:

"The letter of 'Ontario,' in another column is one that everybody should read. What the writer says is an evidence of the depth of the feeling prevailing in the Province. No doubt many are prepared to make the sacrifice he suggests."

When I read this paragraph a few days ago, I thought it was due to myself and to the great Dominion of Canada, to read the letter of "Ontario," and I find some paragraphs in it to this effect:

"Never was an Opposition in so favorable a position to stand a siege. The Administration of Sir John Macdonald is bleeding at every pore. The financial difficulties crowding upon the Government are sure sooner or later to be fatal, and these difficulties are all of their own creation. The North-West rebellion not merely increases these difficulties, but adds new and serious complications arising out of the capture of Riel—complications which will be harder to solve than were those resulting from the Red River rebellion in 1870—and these troubles, also, are of the Government's own creation. The Canadian Pacific 'Oliver Twist' is asking for more, and the French supporters of the Government are dictating their own terms. Every Province, not excepting Ontario, is in a state of dangerous discontent, and all that is necessary to rouse Ontario is a continuation of the gallant fight in the House of Commons against the infamous proposal to impose on the people the most odious tyranny, under the guise of constitutional forms, and to confer the parliamentary franchise on Indians who, as members of tribes, are still wards of the Government, and incapable of assuming the responsibilities of citizenship. Under these circumstances, a dozen resolute men could 'hold the fort' at Ottawa, and it will be a diagrace to the Liberal Opposition if it ship. Under these circumstances, a dozen resolute men could 'nou the fort' at Ottawa, and it will be a disgrace to the Liberal Opposition if it is surrendered now. Had the Gerrymander Bill of 1882 been dealt with in the way referred to it would never have been passed."—

So there appears to be an object in this delay; it is simply following the instructions of the organ of the party. But that is not all:

"But while the duty of the Opposition in the House of Commons is plain, the duty of those who are in sympathy with the stand they have taken is equally so. Every means should be resorted to for the purpose of making the public appreciate such self-sacrificing devotion to duty and principle, and one of the most effective would be the creation of a fund, with a view to adding to the sessional indemnity of the members."

The idea occurred to me, when I read this sentence, whether hon. gentlemen were paid by the acre which they placed in Hansard, or by the hour; probably by the acre. Then it is very unfair to ask them to remain here after two o'clock, because, certainly, they cannot cover as large an acreage after that hour as they could by daylight:

"That indemnity is calculated for an average of not more than three months, and already this Session has lasted almost four. As yet very little of the money required for the public service for the financial year commencing on the first of July next has been voted in committee, and not a dollar of the proposed appropriations has been voted by way of concurrence. Sir John, by bringing up his Franchise Bill day after day, has himself pointed out the way to his own discomfiture, and if the blockade which he has created is not raised by the 30th of June, the supplies will have come to an end and not a dollar will be available for the payment of salaries or for any other public purpose whatsoever. Nothing would do so much to strengthen the hands of those who are fighting the people's battle and to strike terror into the hearts of those who are seeking to fetter them, as the raising of a testimonial fund at once, as a mark of appreciation, and as a measure of substantial assistance.

"In order to be effective, however, the movement should be organised assistance.

"In order to be effective, however, the movement should be organised at once, and should be pushed with the utmost vigor. 'He gives twice who gives quickly.' A committee of members of Parliament should be formed to take charge of the fund, and those who feel disposed to give anything should not wait to be asked, but forward their contributions—anything from $1$ to $100—care of The Globe, and they could be acknowledged in the columns of the paper, either over the real name or over a nom de plume. Such an opportunity of striking for freedom will never again occur in the lifetime of any of us, for never in the history of parliamentary institutions has such a retrogressive and indefensible measure as Sir John Macdonald's Franchise Bill been proposed in a legislature with British traditions to inform and inspire it.

"Ontario." "In order to be effective, however, the movement should be organised

I think it is hardly fair, if my hon friends opposite are to be paid by the hour, by the day, or even by the acreage on Hansard, that we should compel them to speak only till daylight.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After that, I cannot desire to rob my hon, friends opposite of another day's pay. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2:40 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to make a few remarks of a personal nature. Prior to the 21st May, I presented a petition from the inhabitants of Meaford, praying that the Franchise Bill may not become law. On the 21st of the month the hon. member for King's (Mr. Woodworth) said, in his place:

"When the proper time comes, I intend to call the attention of the House to the gross breach of privilege on the part of hon members in asking that these petitions be received and read, when they ought to have known, had they taken the trouble that parliamentary practice requires them to take, that the signatures to these petitions were in many cases in the same handwriting, and that, therefore, the petitions should not have been laid on the Table of the House."

He further said:

"I have looked over them, and have had an expert examine them, and the best authority that can be received in a court of justice in this matter, the authority of a competent expert, can be received before a committee of this House, to show that these petitions were signed by the same persons, and that the signatures are in the same handwriting."

Then he went on to name the parties who had signed the petition in St. Vincent, in the county of Grey:

"James Oliver and J. N. Oliver, Thos. Harris and Alb. T. Harris, A. Thompson and William A. Ellis, James Sparling and Chas. Collier, J. M. Smythe and Chas. Parkin, Amero Tait and Alex. Sauter."

He said, further:

"I have only referred to the signatures which it would be patent and clear to a boy ten years of age are in the same handwriting. In most of the soft pencil signatures the same man has put down signature after signature, and you cannot tell what the signatures are and what the names are. Not only the petition I have drawn attention to, but nearly all the petitions against the franchise presented to this House, have the same indelible mark."

Now, as soon as the inhabitants of Meaford saw that in the Hansard, they immediately went to work, and sent me the following statement:

"COUNTY OF GREY, TO WIT:

"I, James Drummond, of the town of Meaford, in the county of Grey

"2. That I am one of two persons who circulated said petition, having secured nearly every name thereon.

"3. That the allegation that the names of James Oliver and J. N. Oliver, Thos Harris and Albert T. Harris, A. Thompson and William A. Ellis, Jas. Sparling and Charles Collier, J. M. Smythe and Thos. "4. That J. N. Oliver and James Oliver are father and son, respectively, and that the son, James, signed his own name and also that of his father, who stood near, and instructed him so to do.

That I verily believe not one signature was placed on said petition unless by the party purporting to be named thereon, or by his full authority, and that not one has signified a desire to withdraw his name, but, on the contrary, many electors regret that time will not permit petitions to be presented to them for their signatures.

"JAMES CLELAND, J.P., County of Grey, Ontario."

In addition to that, I have a letter from one of the same parties, speaking about his signature and about the statement of the hon member for King's, in reference to the fraudulent entries. As to the expert, he says:

"The alleged expert had better serve his apprenticeship to the business over again, though I fear it would be a waste of time, for he evidently has not the natural capacity to tell a chicken path from the track of an elephant. I have read Mr. Woodworth's remarks in the Hansard to many of the signers of the petition, and they are not in a maisble mood, I can assure you, respecting the matter. J. N. Oliver, a Conservative, by the way, is hopping mad at having his name questioned. He says his signature is as good as that of Sir John A. Macdonald any day, and, as for Mr. Woodworth, he thinks he must be an ass."

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman ought not to read such an expression to the House. It is unparliamentary, and to read a letter reflecting upon an hon, member of the House is not correct.

Mr. ALLEN. I apologise, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the House will accept the apology.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the First Minister, whom I see in his place now, to the fact that about fifteen months have elapsed since an Order of this House was Mr. ALLEN.

passed, directing the Government to lay before the House a copy of the list of the Grand Trunk stockholders.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thanks, gentlemen, very much, It is new that I have got any sympathy from that side of the House on this question till lately. I feel that the Government should be very severely censured for their neglect for allowing a whole year to pass over without giving effect to that Order. I took an opportunity, early this Session, certainly over three months ago, to lay before the House the desirability of getting another Order for a full statement. and that Order was also passed. I have several times endeavored to impress upon the Government that they should take means to procure a return to that Order of the House, but up to this time they have entirely neglected their duty. Hon, gentlemen opposite complain of the Govern. ment's neglect of duty in a great many other things, but the instance that I refer to specially is their neglect to procure an answer to this Order—whether they are afraid of Mr. Hickson or of Sir Henry Tyler, I do not know. The excuse that the Government made, when I last called attention to this matter, was that they had to send to the other side of the Atlantic in order to get a return. I am told that the president of the company is now in this country, and I hope that at an early day the Government will be enabled to inform this House that they have at last, through the favor of the Grand Trunk Company, got their consent to lay on the Table of this House the statement of the shareholders of the company. At all events, I think, it is time the Government should have some little respect for their own dignity, that they should insist on the Order of this House being complied with, and insist on the respect that is due by a corporate company to the Parliament of Canada, and see that that return is laid before this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry we have not been able to procure the returns the hon. gentleman required. As I understand it, the Order of the House was sent home to England, where alone the list of shareholders could be made out; that return has not been made, and that is all I can say about it. I do not know when Sir Henry Tyler, the president, will be in this country; he is now in the United States; but when he comes here I shall ask him why it is not produced, and I shall read to him from Hansard the speech my hon, friend has made to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right. I hope he will comply with the request, and at once consent to give the return, and you can tell him that if he does not you will have him brought to the Bar of the House in order to assert the dignity of the House.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 10,

Mr. DAVIES. When the committee rose at a quarter to three o'clock this morning, I stated that it was my intention to move an amendment to this section, putting another section instead of it, and the First Minister very improperly, as I thought, and unjustifiably suggested that I had no amendment to propose at all, and he was very properly called to order by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I think before the House adjourned, however, he was satisfied that his statement was uncalled for, and that I had an amendment in my hand, and was prepared to move it—in fact I was ready to move it at the time. The amendment had been carefully prepared beforehand. I am the more anxious to put myself straight before the committee, because I do not choose to submit to a charge of that kind by the First Minister, to the effect that I was merely trifling with the House. The 10th section proposes to vest in the Government for the time being the appointment of an officer who shall be the revising officer for each electoral district. He is not to be revising officer in the sense in which that term is understood in any other country of the world outside of Canada. His duties, in the first place, are not to revise at all, but to make up. He has no data on which to proceed. He has to take the best information he can get, to use the best material that comes to his hands. He has to prepare, in the first instance, a list, and, at a subsequent period he may himself revise it. Now, it has been very strongly objected-and no sufficient answer has been made to it that I have heard—that it is improper and unfair to vest in the Government for the time being the appointment of a person whose duties will be political, who will owe his position to political friends, and who will be practically appointed by the member who represents the district where he has to exercise his powers of making up and revising a list. It is very well to say that the appointment shall be made by the Governor in Council. That reads very well in the Bill, but, practically, we know that in the majority of instances he will be the nominee of the member now representing the county who supports the Government. Now, we know that is talked about openly. If you talk to hon, members in the corridor or on the streets, they will tell you: I intend to nominate so-and-so for my riding. He is a good man; he will not do anything that is wrong. In the sense that those hon, gentlemen mean he certainly will not do anything that is wrong as against them; but it does not follow that a gentleman, even although he may have been five years at the bar, if he owes his appointment entirely to political influences, and if the duties he has to discharge are to a large extent political as distinguished from judicial, it does not follow at all that he can be placed in the same category for impartiality as a judge. It has been argued here that we have no complaints to make against the judiciary of the land; they have been men of strong political feelings, but once they get upon the bench they leave those feelings behind them and discharge their judicial duties impartially. I am bound to say, Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, that is the case. Our judges do discharge their duties impartially, but why? Because, when they once get upon the bench, they are entirely removed from all political aspirations-or ought to be at any rate, and I believe to a large extent they are. They know that their conduct will be closely scrutinised by a body of intelligent and learned men who plead before them from year to year. They know, if they exhibit any partiality it must be in the face of the public; but they have no special motive for departing from a fair and honest discharge of the duties that belongs to their position. But how will it be with the revising barrister? He will be in the first instance recommended for this appointment by the member of the county. After appointment he will hold office during good behavior, that is, he will hold it as long as he does nothing which, in the opinion of the majority of the House of Commons, deserves censure at their hands. If, for instance, the hon member for Carleton, who appoints the revising officer, places in his hands a list of those whom he alleges are entitled to be placed on the first list, the officer will not question the propriety of acting on the hon member's suggestion, and placing those names on the list. He will not see that is wrong. But where will be the Opposition candidate? Will the revising officer do the same thing for him? Practically it will amount to this: The names which the Conservative members wish to be placed on the list, will be placed on it in the first instance; while the names suggested by the Opposition candidates, indeed, by the local officials to whom it is entrusted. These will be placed on the list only on the individual application of the parties, and after a great deal of expense and trouble has been undergone. We have already in most of the Provinces of the Dominion, voters' lists prepared by municipal officers. With the exception of one or two hon, gentlemen opposite, no one has objected to the manner in which those lists are prepared by the municipal officers. The answer is, that those officers received their appointment direct from the people. If a charge of unfairness is proved against them, the officers are no doubt removed. If that system were continued, not only would it be a great advantage to have the experience gained by those officers, but great advantage would arise from saving in expense. expense of the First Minister's system is placed at not less than half a million dollars. I have not heard any hon, gentlemen opposite submit a statement to show that the estimate is too large.

Mr. FARROW. The hon. member for Toronto submitted one.

Mr. DAVIES. I had not the advantage of hearing that estimate. That is a very serious amount, and if it can be reduced by adopting the existing system, it would be of great advantage. In Prince Edward Island, where there are no voters' list for the provincial elections, the amendment proposes that the lists be made out by the judge of each county. The scheme of the First Minister is one which has no precedent. The English system is entirely different; the American system is different, and the systems of Germany and Spain are entirely different. This system is unique; it has no precedent, no parallel. It vests in the First Minister, for the time being, power so great, that if he chooses to exercise it, he can return eight or ten members to this House. Personally, I should much prefer that a clause be inserted giving the right to the First Min-ister to return twelve members, because the public would then know what they were doing, and it would not be necessary to go through the farce of an election. I beg to move that the following be substituted for clause 10:-

The voters' lists shall be prepared by the municipal officer or officers who, under the laws of each Province, is or are required to prepare the voters' lists for elections to the General Assembly. In the Province of Prince Edward Island, where there are no voters' lists for provincial elections, the voters' list shall be prepared annually by the county judge in each respective electoral district. Every such officer shall, before he enters upon his duties, take an oath of office before a judge of the Superior Court or a court of record in the Province in which acts, in the form contained in the schedule, which he will in which acts, in the form contained in the schedule, which he will hereafter cause to be deposited with the clerk of the Crown in Chancery

Mr. FISHER The amendment of the hon. member for Queen's will practically retain in the hands of the local authorities the preparation of the voters' lists. By the a loption of that amendment one of the greatest blemishes in the Bill will be removed. The revising officer, although to a certain extent, performing the duties of a revisor is much more largely a maker of voters' lists, and attempting to fill this double capacity I do not think he can possibly do his duty fully and faithfully. I have heard supporters of the Government say outside of this Chamber, that this provision was an imitation of the English law with regard to revising barristers, and that it was unreasonable in this country, where we draw our inspiration so largely from English precedents, to object to the appointment of such officers here. Well, I think that is an erroneous statement of the case. It is true there are revising barristers in England, but those gentlemen do not make the lists, whereas, as I have pointed out, the revising officers under this Bill are not only to revise the lists, but to initiate the making of those lists-two functions which I believe are incompatible. I am pretty well acquainted with the method of preparing the voters' lists in my own Province, and the work, I find, is very well performed officials live in the midst of the community with whose lists they have to deal, they know the names of the individuals, and they also know the property or the basis upon which those individuals seek to qualify. I heard, not long ago, a statement of the number of appeals from the original voters' list which were carried to the courts of Quebec last year, and I found that the number was ridiculously small, so small as to prove conclusively that the original voters' lists are very correctly prepared. The officials proposed in the right hon, gentleman's Bill will be charged with the duty of preparing the lists ab initio, and to perform that duty for the whole county he will not only have a great deal more labor cast on his shoulders than is now borne by the persons who prepare the lists in Quebec, but they will have to go around from one locality to another over the whole country, and make themselves acquainted with the conditions and circumstances of the various municipalities. He is obliged to hold a revision of the list, in every muncipality of which he has charge, and to do this in the larger counties will require a great deal of time. He will have to go considerable distances to hold what we may call, little courts here, there and everywhere in his county. All the work that is now done by the local authorities for the municipal and provincial elections, will still have to be performed, and in addition, there will be practically the same work to be gone over again by the revising officers. It is true, it will not be entirely the same work, because the voters' lists under the Dominion law, will be different from those for the local elections, but a large portion of the work will be merely a repetition of what is performed by the local officers. Some hon, gentleman, have objected here and elsewhere, that the local municipal authorities have been just as partisan as it is possible for the new appointees of the Government to be. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Valin) alluded to certain municipalities, in which he said, the local authorities had wrongfully taken some names off the lists and put others on that should not have appeared there. He seemed to have forgotten, howver, that in every such case there was redress by appeal, while under this Bill there would be practically no redress. It is true that the right hon, gentleman has modified the Bill so as to allow appeals both in matters of fact and in matters of law, and I trust that that modification will take away some of the objections which we have heretofore urged against the Bill. Still, it does not remove the objection to which I now address myself. The hon, gentleman intimated that the new arrangement would not be any worse than the old, but I think it will, and for two or three reasons. The hon. gentleman pointed out some municipalities in which injustice had been done to certain Conservatives, but he failed to point out that in the same county, there are two or three Conservative municipalities, and I have reason to believe that some of those Conservatives did injustice to the Liberals of the county, and perhaps to as great an extent as in others the Liberals did injustice to the Conservatives. We find therefore, that under this municipal arrangement, although in some cases a little injustice may be done to one side, in other cases in the same county, the injustice may be on the other direction. We have there a balance of one evil against the other. I do not say that that is a good thing; I believe that in both cases a radical wrong was done to the electors who were themselves aggrieved by the partisan municipal councils; but the results to the country at large were not so injurious as they would be under this Bill, because, unfortunately, the revising officers will be of one political stripe through the length and breadth of the land. In my own county, where there is a municipal council opposed to me politically, adherents of the party in power as the advocates; and the some supporters of mine suffered an injustice; and I dare result of this amendment will be that where by any Mr. FISHER.

ment is not so great as under a partisan political officer. Under the municipal arrangement there is the safeguard that it is in the hands of the people themselves; if they feel that they have been aggrieved by the wrongful act of their muni. cipal officials, they can expel them at the next municipal elections and put new men into their places. But under this Bill the people have no recourse whatever; it is only the House of Commons itself that can have any recourse; and we are well aware that if these partisan officials do an injustice, it will be to people who will be represented on the floor of the House by the minority, not by the majority. One very great evil of the provisions of this Bill is that such injustices or such malpractice be committed by the revising officer, we may have brought into the arena of party strife, constant complaints in regard to elections and the election returns. Some years ago the trials of election disputes and the discussions relating thereto were removed from the arena of Parliament, and I believe that removal was a very great gain to the dignity of this House, and the progress of public business; but under this Bill we may have all the details connected with elections brought before the House of Commons, and that will be a great misfortune, both for the House itself and for the purity of elections in the country. There is another very strong objection to the arrangements under this Bill which would be obviated by the amendment of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). Under this Bill the revising officer has to undertake a very considerable labor, and for that labor he will have to receive a considerable salary. At present our voters' lists in the Province of Quebec are prepared absolutely free of expense. The municipal officials are obliged to prepare them without any additional charge over and above their ordinary salary. Should this House decide, as proposed by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, that these same officials should have the duty of preparing the voters' lists, I daresay some slight remuneration would have to be given to them for that work. I believe it is not legal for this Parliament to impose work on the municipal officials of the country without their consent and without reimbursing them for that work. But no one can suppose that such remuneration would be anything like as great as that to the revising officer. There is at present a sufficient expense entailed on this country without imposing upon us an additional burden that is unnecessary; and I contend that the necessity for the machinery provided by this Bill has never yet been shown by any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. The hon. First Minister, in introducing the Bill, did not himself say it was a necessity. I understand, that yesterday afternoon, although I was not present, the hon. First Minister proposed an amendment to the effect that in the Province of Quebec notaries, as well as lawyers or barristers of five years' standing, should be eligible to act in this capacity. I suppose the notaries would also require to have five years' standing in their profession before they could act. I do not consider that that amendment is of any value whatever. In some of our counties, the notary who is best known in the county and who is likely to obtain this apointment may be a man of greater experience and higher social standing than the barrister or advocate who resides in the county; but I do not admit that the notarial profession as a rule stands higher than the profession of the law in our Province. The only alvantage which could be urged in favor of the hon. gentleman's amendment is that it would give a greater choice of men. I do not wish to attribute any political motives for this proposal; but I think we shall find that in many cases in the Province of Quebec the notaries are just as likely to be strong political say that in other cases the same thing has occurred; but the chance there is a lawyer or advocate in a county likelihood of that occurring under the municipal arrange- who is not an adherent of hon, gentlemen opposite, and there should be a notary in the county who is. the notary will be chosen instead of the advocate; and no doubt the rule will work the other way. Yesterday afternoon the hon member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) defended his profession from what he considered to be an aspersion cast on it by hon gentlemen on this side. I do not know that anybody on this side has said a word against the profession as a body; we are well aware that it stands the highest of any profession in this country, and the hon, gentleman's defence of it was altogether needless. Under this Bill, however, the Government would have to appoint third or fourth rate lawyers, for it is not likely any lawyer who is in the enjoyment of a lucrative practice would be induced to give that up for the sake of manipulating the voters' lists in the constituency in which he happened to live. There is, however, a class of briefless lawyers and notaries who have very little to do and will be only too glad to accept this position and do their work in a partisan manner. Should the First Minister, however, intend to appoint men of good standing in the profession, he will certainly have to attach a larger salary to the office than any that has been imagined by hon, gentlemen on either side or indicated by himself; but should that be his intention the expenditure will be enormous. It is absurd that these revising officers should first make the lists and then revise them; it is contrary to all principles of justice and legal practice. Not only will the appellant have to establish the facts of his appeal but he will also have to remove the prejudices of the judge since he is compelled to appeal from the decision of the revising barrister in the first instance to the same revising barrister on the revision of the list. Allowing the same person who makes the list to revise them, is contrary to English practice. In England the local authorities—who correspond to our municipal authorities, to whom my hon friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) wants to give the making of the first listsmake the lists, then the revising barrister, who is appointed, not by the Government, but by the judges, is appealed to in cases of dispute. This is as it should be, and were we to take that plan as our model, it would do away with a great deal of the objections raised. Believing that the amendment will throw a greater safeguard around this clause, I shall support it.

Mr. COOK. I have not attempted to address the House upon this subject, although the discussion has been prolonged for the last six weeks, and you have reached the 10th clause, and I suppose, if they receive the scrutiny that they deserve, the other clauses of the Bill will have to be discussed in the same ratio, and we may therefore expect that we will commence our fall ploughing before the Session is closed. I think, upon so important a matter as this, it is necessary that the representative of the people should look closely into a matter that is going to affect him in so large a degree, not alone in reference to the question of the expense that will be incurred by the passage of this Bill, but also as to the means that may be adopted and will likely be adopted if we take the past as a criterion for the future, as to what the result may be in election campaigns or in the fixing of the voters' lists. I remember, when a comparative boy, the speeches that were made by the Prime Minister, when he called upon his friends throughout the country to look closely after the voters' lists, when he called upon his Conservative friends to look closely after the municipal elections, to see that they carried the municipal elections, and that, by carrying the municipal elections, they got their officers elected, so that they could make the voters' list as nearly favorable to his party as possible. That was a common cry throughout the country. It was a cry that was hurled from one constituency to the other all over the old Upper and Lower Canada man finds now that his own friends in the different municipalities are acting fairly, and he begins to suspect them. He is afraid that they will not make the voters' lists in accordance with the views expressed by himself, and that the consequence may be disastrous to him at the next general election. I have had the honor of visiting some parts of the country while this discussion has been going on. I have had conversations with both political parties.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. COOK. I have met the respectable Conservatives, who do not murmur as some other gentlemen do over there, and many of them expressed their opinions in conversation. One gentleman said: Why, I do not know what this country is coming to. One gentleman said: I fear that our great Chieftain wants to become dictator, he wants to dictate to the people how the elections shall be carried in support of himself. This was but a mild supporter of the hon, gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very mild, I am afraid.

Mr. COOK. A mild supporter. I met another, and a most respectable Conservative, a legal gentleman in the city of Toronto, a very strong supporter of the hon. gentleman——

Mr. McCALLUM. Name.

Mr. COOK. I am not in the habit of naming private conversations, perhaps as the hon. gentleman does. He said: I fear the old man is losing his head. He will enfranchise the Indian, and he will drive two Conservatives away for every Indian vote that he makes. I hope that will be the case, and I verily believe it will be the case. I believe the people of this country are fair minded after all. We saw that exemplified in some constituencies at the last general elections. We saw that exemplified in East York, in South Brant, in Bothwell, and I think that, if this Bill unfortunately becomes law, you will find that it will be exemplified in every constituency in the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, we are at the 10th clause, as I said. That provides for the revising barrister, that beautiful gentleman, who will lovingly approach the hon, the Premier with his arm about his neck, and will declare to him: I will do thy bidding, and I will do it well. Of course, I do not expect the hon. gentleman will appoint barristers in every constituency. I do not think he will appoint a revising barrister, for example, in West Ontario; I do not think he will appoint a revising barrister probably in South Simcoe; I do not think he will be guilty of appointing a revising barrister in a constituency that he knows is safe one way or the other, a constituency that is either Reform strongly or Conservative strongly; but it is the little ones between, where it is hinging just upon a few votes; then he will put his hands in his pockets and declare to the people upon the hustings: See how fairly I have dealt with them, see what I have done; here I have appointed a judge, and there I have appointed a judge, but we had no judge to appoint in this constituency—that is one which was a close constituency—we could not get a judge there; I am very sorry, very sorry indeed; it would be a very happy thing for me if I could appoint a judge in that case, but I could not and so I appointed a revising barris-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that I see how he would do it if he were on this side.

as possible. That was a common cry throughout the country. It was a cry that was hurled from one constituency to the other all over the old Upper and Lower Canada before the Dominion was confederated. The hon. gentle
Mr. COOK. Then the hon. gentleman should not put weapons into the hands of his opponents by which he will be killed, for, just as certain as the sun rises and sets, he will be defeated at the next elections in this country. When he comes before the country again—and he dare not do it to-day, although it is recorded that he threatened his supporters that, unless they came to his rescue and put this Bill through, he would dissolve Parliament and go to the country—he will be defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COOK. There are some hon, gentlemen behind him who cheer, who know that their political existence depends upon the passage of this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. COOK. There is one hon, gentleman who sits behind him, laughing as he may laugh, trying to laugh, who may laugh on the other side of his mouth at the next election, even with the Indian at his back; and he knows that, with the Indian at his back, he will not have the opportunity of coming here again. Mr. Chairman, I know something about this thing. I remember that in the last local election for Algoma, an officer in the Indian Department was sent up there, and these poor Indians were trotted out to the polls to record their votes, and when they got there they found that the scrutineers on the Liberal side declared they had no vote, and they would not let them vote. Therefore we know that the hon. gentleman has had some experience already in this direction. He knows that he cannot lead them up to the polls and make them vote as he sees fit, and so he wants this Bill to enable him to do so.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I rise to a point of order. We are not discussing the Indian clause.

Mr. COOK. I know where the shoe pinches.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I am following the hon. gentleman, and shall not allow the discussion to wander from the amendment.

Mr. COOK. I was intending to come to it in a roundabout way. Now, the voters' lists in the Province of Ontario are made up by the municipal councils. I am perfectly satisfied with the way in which they are made up in my county, although I think about two-thirds of the municipalities in my county have Tory councils. I have more confidence in the Tories than the hon member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) appears to have, because I heard him declare in this House that he would not believe the assessors, a great many of them, under oath.

Mr. HESSON. I rise to correct the hon. gentleman. He is entirely misrepresenting my statement again. I said nothing of the kind, and if the hon, gentleman had been present, he would not have dared to say so. I repeat again, that what I said was this: That the municipal elections in Ontario were generally held on political principles, and the councillors being so elected, the assessors were consequently so appointed, and the Courts of Revision were appointed upon the same principle, each side always endeavoring to obtain a majority of their own political friends, whether Grit or Conservative, as representing the county or town. That course, I said, was advised by the leader of the Reform party at Toronto, who told them to look after the voters' list. The voters' lists were therefore prepared in the manner I have described-first, by election of members of the council who were of a particular stripe, then by the appointment of an assessor of the same stripe, by the majority of the Court of Revision of the same stripe. If the hon, gentleman denies that, then he denies what no other gentleman in this House would deny, who has fought the municipal elections in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. COOK. I believe a great deal that the hon. the value of land. As a rule an assessor is apgentleman has said. He said, as far as his know-pointed from each political party—I know that it is ledge goes, the municipal elections have been the way in my county, and everything goes on beautifully held on a partisan and political ground. I have no and well—swimmingly in fact—no jars at all. We have doubt about that, because I do not think the hon, gentle—had five elections under this law as it now stands, and why man knows anything beyond his own political party. I in the world could we not have five more elections under Mr. Cook.

concur with what he says. I know the Conservative party have run their municipal elections on politics, and they have always had that advantage. But still I believe there are Conservative assessors in the country, who are sworn men, and who are capable men, and who will, under oath, do what is fair and right. They may err in judgment, One man may hold that a property is worth so much, and another man may hold that it is worth more or less; but I do not think because one man holds one opinion and another man holds a different opinion, that that is perjury. Men's opinions differ. My opinion differs from that of the hon. gentleman from North Perth (Mr. Hesson), for which I thank God. Now, Sir, the revising barrister is to take the place of the assessor. He is to be paid—by whom? The people already pay for the assessors, they already pay for the municipal machinery, and now you want to tax them to a greater extent, at a time when this country is laboring under one of the greatest financial depressions we have ever had, and when the national debt of this country is increasing at a rate that is appalling. Still, the hon. gentleman proposes to add to that national debt at least half a million dollars a year. Some hon, gentlemen say it will not cost as much as that, but I am satisfied the expense will be greater. When we remember the officials that have to be paid, and the expenses connected with their positions, and when we remember that men who are employed by the Government are not very careful about how they expend Government money, particularly if they are Tories, the expenses that will be incurred will be something enormous. Some hon. gentlemen have said half a million dollars, and I think that is far within the mark. I would much sooner say three-quarters of a million dollars. Some have said $800,000, and I think it will be as much as that. The greatest trouble will be that there will be two voters' lists, and people will not know which one to vote upon. A man may be enfranchised under the local law and disfranchised under this law, because there is no doubt that a very large number of people of the Province of Ontario will be disfranchised under this Bill. Why, Sir, in the shire wwn of my county, the town of Orillia, lying on Lake Couchiching-just opposite, on the other side of the lake, is an Indian village where every Indian will be enfranchised, while on the Orillia side white men who have been voting for years and years will be disfranchised. I know something of the facts of which I speak.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Question.

Mr. COOK. Well, Sir, this revising barrister is a gentleman who will be appointed by the Government; he will be appointed by Sir John A. Macdonald—if I may make use of the name.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You say the Indian village will have votes on the opposite side of the lake, while the people on the other side will not have votes. Why?

Mr. COOK. Because they will be disfranchised under this Act. They have votes under the local law, but they will not have any under this law. I like these interruptions from my hon, friend from Hastings. I know he takes a great interest in the Indian question. We always see his face blooming when he talks about Indians, because he knows how many there are in his county who he expects will vote for him. Now, Sir, the mode of making the assessment roll in the Province of Ontario is a very convenient one. The people understand it. The assessors have the benefit of each other's judgment in reterence to the value of land. As a rule an assessor is appointed from each political party—I know that it is the way in my county, and everything goes on beautifully and well—swimmingly in fact—no jars at all. We have had five elections under this law as it now stands, and why in the world could we not have five more elections under the same law? Sir, the reason is not far to seek. The leaking out of the very ends of men's toes; you find them hon, gentleman knows the financial condition into which he always crying about patriotism. We have heard it. Some has brought this country, and he is airaid to meet the people again. He knows the depths of degradation to which he has brought the people; he knows the difficulties in the North-West, the disturbance in the Lower Pro-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. COOK. I am in order. Prince Edward Island is dissatisfied, New Brunswick is dissatisfied, Ontario depressed. It is well to let hon, gentlemen opposite know that something must be done. It would be well to let the right hon, gentleman appoint members to this House from the word go. He does it in the Senate. He appoints the senators; they are all good friends of his, and he might as well do the same thing here. And he is doing this under the guise of English precedent. Some people in the country yet fail to understand it. I suppose all members opposite do or they should do at all events; but some people in the country do not quite understand. They say: are following English law; I do not object to that. But when you come to explain the matter to them, when the thing comes to be brought under their notice in the hideous shape in which it is before this House, they open their eyes with disgust. They say: We do not think it possible that the old chieftain, will attempt this thing at the close of his career; that he will stoop to such degradation as this in the closing portion of his political life. There has been a great deal said in this House about petitions. I will not transgress the rule, but I can talk about petitions, because they are directed mainly against the revising barristers. People say: If you take away the revising barrister and the Indian, Sir John will not want the Bill; it would be no use to him at elections. Therefore, the Indian must be in it, and the revising barrister must be in it. With respect to the petition that came from my constituency, I think I will take an opportunity, if necessary, to read a letter sent by the president of the Reform Association at Gravenhurst, Mr. Isaac Cockburn, brother of the member for North Ontario, in which he states that he could, if he had had time, have secured every single man in that village, but nine. There is a large Tory majority in the village. That fact shows there are a great many Conservatives who are prepared to sign the petitions. This petition that was presented by myself had 105 names, 18 of which were those of Conservatives. No doubt, it is a certainty, that those Conservatives will vote with the Liberals at the next election. They will make a difference of thirty-six votes, and give a Reform majority in the village. I do not make this statement from a political standpoint; we are not here to look after our political advantage, but to look after the interests of the country; to see that the people's rights are fully maintained; that popular Government is maintained; and we are here to check the Government in their endeavor to overthrow responsible government. Why what would we come to with the revising barrister? An oligarchy such as that we had forty years agothe old family compact? No; it would be even ten times worse. We would then have an oligarchy all centred in one man. At that time there were twelve men and they all had something to say. Some people have called this a cowardly Bill. Some people have said it is the Bill of political cowards who hide themselves in their rifle pits and wait for the approach of the enemy, when they will have a full swing at their whole bodies.

Mr. RYKERT. How fine that is.

Mr. COOK. Yes, it is very fine. There are patriots,

hon. gentlemen opposite cannot rise and make a speech unless they constantly repeat the word patriotism. Whenever you hear the cry of wolf look out that some one has not shorn a sheep. Look out, because I know something about that myself. Some people say if we are following the English precedents in this matter it is not so bad. But you find it is not English precedents; you find that the Premier is going to appoint a revising barrister, although the appointment is to be made in the name of the Council, and so forth, but we know what that means. I will be within my limit upon this clause if I refer to a few campaigns, because if we had had revising barristers then we would not have had to resort to other means. Probably we would not have had the Pacific scandal. I had to fight Sir Hugh Allan's money.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman must discuss the question before the Committee.

Mr. COOK. If we had had revising barristers I would have been about $15,000 better off. As you, Mr. Chairman, have ruled, and I have great respect for the Chair, I do not wish to trouble your feelings or to go contrary to your instructions. Sir, I now have to desist from referring to some of the campaigns which have passed in the history of the country within my own recollection, though I should like to have given them some consideration, but I suppose I will have an opportunity of doing so at a later stage. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are at the revising barrister clause, and I am perfectly in accord with the amendment moved by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, that is, if the Bill is to become law. But I would rather not vote for it, because I do not want it. There is not a feature of the Bill which is worthy the consideration of this House. The whole thing is bad from beginning to end. can tell my hon. friend, the Premier of this country, that he is making a great mistake pushing this Bill through at the sacrifice of the public business. We know how far we have gone in the Estimates, and we know the number of important Government Bills to be passed through this Session. We know that the Estimates must pass-and they always take a month or six weeks at least to get through with, and I know there are things to be unearthed; I know that a scrutiny should take place, and I give my hon. friend to understand that it shall take place, so far as I have anything to say about it. I say that although they press this Bill on from day to day, thinking perhaps that the other business will not receive due consideration, and that members of this House will want to get away-I say they are mistaken. I have not heard a grumble or a mutter from this side. They are all prepared to stay here till next year and they do not want an additional indemnity.

An hon. MEMBER. You will get it by subscription.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have to ask the hon. gentleman to confine his observations to the clause before the committee and the amendment which has been moved thereto. He is not discussing that now, and I hope he will not require me to call his attention to the matter again.

Mr. COOK. I was speaking of the length of the Session, and that if we discuss the revising barrister clause for the next three or four weeks-and there are sixty-three clauses in the Bill-there is not much chance of our getting through this year, and I want to get home before the fall ploughing, in order to get at my lumbering operations.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The sooner you begin discussing the clause the sooner you will get through.

Mr. COOK. We are now discussing the revising barrister clause, and these gentlemen will be appointed from cities, political patriots, personal patriots, public patriots. One towns, and villages, for you do not find them in country of the great signs of the times is that you find patriotism places. These gentlemen are supposed to value the proplaces. These gentlemen are supposed to value the property and make up the lists. How is he going to do it? The thing is simply poppycock. He will have to go to every farm and count the number of sheep that the man has in his field, the number of pigs, the number of hogs-

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. COOK. And there are some old swine over there, He will have to count the number of cows.

An hon, MEMBER. And the calves.

Mr. COOK. He will have to pay particular attention to the sex, for he will have to put a value upon each. He will have to take the household furniture, and the children in the house, because he will have to find out how many of them are the age of 21 years in order to make up the list properly. He knows as much about a farm, probably, as he knows about the good time coming, or the heaven above him, and they say lawyers do not know much about that, and get there very gradually. How is he going to get this information? Is he going to go to the assessors? If he does, after what has been said of them by the hon, member for North Perth and others, they will say: If you do not believe the valuation we give on oath, we will give you no further information. They are not officers of the Dominion Government, and the Dominion Government has nothing to do with them. I remember introducing a Bill into this House which required the assistance of the municipal authorities, but I was compelled to withdraw it because the House had no right to deal with such matters. passing a Bill, and you do not know how it will be carried out. These men will get two or three parties about them, and you may be sure it will not be their political opponents, and they will ask information from them. They will ask who is this fellow? He is a Grit—he is a blawsted fellow; and the man will say: We will not put him on. A great deal of this will be done if this Bill passes. I still have hopes that the Bill will not pass, but, if the Government are bound to put it through I hope they will amend it. If they are bound to impose the enormous expense of working this Bill upon the country, I hope they will make it workable. Under the Bill as it stands, some hon, gentleman on the other side, who is a barrister, or some one who is not a member, can be appointed a revising barrister, he can cook his county and make his list, and then resign and become a candidate. He will be elected of course without any difficulty by his own arrangement of the voters' list. I am sure that it such a Bill was proposed by a Liberal Government, and hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting on this side of the House, they would not allow this House to rise for a twelvemonth. It has been said that this was a sequence to the Gerrymander Bill. The Gerrymander Bill did a great deal of good to their friends, but it did not accomplish all that it was intended to accomplish, and the consequence is that they now propose to take this means to choke off and kill some hon, gentlemen on this side of the House. I said it would be difficult under any circumstances for the revising barrister to make out the list, even if he is an honest man. I would not believe much in the good faith of the revising barristers who would be appointed by the present Government, simply because I know that Government took to themselves the right of appointing returning officers on former occasions, and we know how they were appointed; we know the result of their appointment. I know that my hon, friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was kept out of this House for nearly two Sessions by a partisan returning officer—one of the most shameful things that has ever been perpetrated in this country. I warn the hon, gentleman that this country is in a state of excitement at the present time. Thinking that the attention of the country was directed elsewhere, he has tried to shove through this House this infamous measure. Well, Sir, he may succeed; he may put this Bill through, but I assure the hon. Mr. Cook.

just about as closely as that gang was that went into Middlesex on one occasion. I assure my hon. friend that the people of this country will not allow any man to go into a county to say who shall not be put on the list when they are entitled to be put on. If these revising barristers leave off men who are entitled to be put on the list, I warn the hon, gentleman that the consequences may be serious, because I know the feeling and temper of the people to day. One gentleman in the city of Toronto said to me, "Why. Sir, we have more cause for rebellion to-day than we had in '37." That is the feeling that exists in the country. I endeavored to calm his feeling; I told him that the Government were bad, but that we would try to bring them to a position where they would not be so far astray. ple of this country are beginning to understand this question; they are beginning to understand that the Government of this country want to perpetrate this outrage in order to perpetuate their power. But, Sir, there is a day of reckoning, there is a day of punishment and revenge com-That punishment is near at hand; that revenge is about here. Hon, gentlemen will find it at the next election.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I propose making a few observations on this clause of the Bill. I think it will be admitted by both sides of the House that of all the clauses of this Bill, the clause we are now discussing is the most important, and requires a very full and free discussion. surprised that when the First Minister moved the adoption of this clause he did not condescend to give any explanation to the House why he thought it wise in the public interest that the appointment of the officer who creates and revises the voters' lists should be a nominee of the Crown. It appears to me that a proposition for so radical a change in our legislation requires at the hands of its introducer a full explanation; but the First Minister said absolutely nothing as to the reasons which suggested this change to his mind. It does seem to me to be an extraordinary power for the Government to assume—the appointment of an official, who is to be a supporter of the Government-a partisan; because we may rest assured that no one but a tried and warm supporter of hon, gentlemen opposite will be appointed to the position. Now, I venture to say that in no British colony, certainly in no colony on this continent, has any such proposition ever received the sanction of the Legislature. It is not the law in any land, so far as I have been able to discover, that the Administration of the day have assumed the unchecked, unrestrained, unlimited power of nominating the officials who are to prepare and revise the voters' lists, and to manufacture all the machinery necessary for the creation of the electoral body. It is the first attempt in the history of this country or in the history of any other country, to earry through Parliament a proposition of that kind. In a free country such as Canada is, with free institutions and responsible government, the voice of the people should find proper and legitimate expression at the polls and not be gagged or restrained by any legislation Parliament may see fit to pass. The effect of this Bill will be to place in the hands of irresponsible and practically irremovable officials the whole power of creating the voters' lists and the unlimited and absolute power of revising the voters' lists. True, the Bill allows an appeal to be taken from the decision of the revising officer on questions of law, and the First Minister stated the other day he now proposes to extend that right to question of fact as well; but we know there will be difficulty and great expense connected with the appeal. The evidence taken before the revising officer and the law points raised have to be submitted the court of appeal, and as that cannot be done by an ordinary elector, he will have to employ some one learned in the law to prepare his case and argue it. gentleman that the revising barristers will be looked after ! The fact that there is an appeal in questions of fact and of law, where the revising officer is not a County Court judge. is of little importance, because the expense will be so great that, unless the candidate sees fit to bear it, the appeals will be few and far between. The best way you can get the free expression of public opinion at the polls is to leave the creation and revision of the voters' lists entirely in the hands of the local authorities. It is nonsense to talk of this or any other Parliament representing the voice of the people, when at the outset we propose to take out of the hands of the people the power of creating and revising the voters' lists, and centre that power in the hands of an irresponsible, irremovable official appointed by the Government. You can, to a large extent, gag public opinion in many ways. We know that Parliament, by the rearrangement of constituencies, by the rearrangement of the boundaries of electoral districts in counties, can so arrange them that the voice of the majority of the people may be completely swamped by that of the minority; we know further that by appointing partisan returning officers, the expression of the public opinion may be checked. We have illustrations of this in this Parliament. I do not mean to say that every revising officer appointed under this Bill will be an improper officer. The First Minister will, in some cases, appoint County Court judges, but I fear very much he will appoint them where the revising officer can be of no service to either political party; but where the majority is limited, where the majority may be within a hundred on either side, the First Minister will find it his interest to appoint revising officers, perhaps men not of the most scrupulous character, who will do the bidding of the hon, gentleman with respect to the revision of the voters' lists. What I complain of is that this or any Government should have the power of creating any official who would have the power, under an Act of Parliament, to create or manufacture a voters' list, so that it would not represent the true, honest sentiment of the people. Legislation of this kind is not legislation that would proceed from honest statesmen. It is one-sided legislation, legislation solely in the interest of a political party. It may be the hon. gentleman's turn now to have a Bill of this kind, but supposing, in the whirligig of events, hon. gentlemen opposite should lose their seats on the Treasury benches, they would be the first to complain of the provisions of this Bill. It is not fair, it is not honest, it is not in the public interest, that any legislation should be sanctioned by this Parliament, the effect of which necessarily will be to place the control over the voters' lists, and thereby the control of the elections of the representatives in this Parliament, entirely in the hands of one man. Such legislation is worthy only of the days of the Walpole's, or the times of the Stuarts or the Georges. I can have no objection that whatever political party has the confidence of the people should hold the reins of power, but what I do object to is that if there is a majority of the electors opposed to a political party, the views of that majority should be prevented finding expression on the floor of Parliament. It may be the result of the Bill that although a majority of the electorate be opposed to the policy and the legis-lation of hon. gentlemen opposite, their opinion may not have effect, because the revising officer has it in his power by improper conduct to so gag and check public opinion that the voice of the people will not have legitimate expression in Parliament. A political triumph A political triumph so acquired is no triumph at all. A victory obtained not by the free and independent voice of the people at the polls, but by the action of a revising officer, is not a victory that any hon gentleman can feel proud of. Such legislation as this is unworthy of statesmen and unworthy of the people of Canada, and, if the Bill passes in its present shape, with the absolute and unlimited control given to one officer to tamper with and to cook the voters' list, I am satisfied that the people, when they have an oppor- be, the Court has no power to rectify the wrong committed tunity of pronouncing upon the subject, will in no way sanction it. The first proposition is that the hon, gentleman shall himself have the power of appointing 211 revising officers. Some of these men may be judges who have already their parchment from the Government to discharge their judicial functions, but we have no assurance that there will be a single judge appointed. The hon, gentleman and some of his followers say the Government will appoint the County Court judges, but the First Minister is careful to provide that he shall not be bound to appoint any single County Court judge, or junior judge, or Superior Court judge in the Province of Quebec. He takes the absolute power of appointing either the County Court judge or the junior judge or the revising barrister; and when he is called upon to make the selection, I fear very much that there will be few counties in which he will find it in the interest of his party to select the judges. Although I am opposed to the principle of this Bill, and am opposed to this clause, it would not be so objectionable if the First Minister provided that he should appoint the judge or the junior judge of the County Court in every instance, and that, where he was unable to discharge the duties, the First Minister should take to himself the power of appointing a revising officer from the ranks of the profession. But the First Minister does not do that. He takes the power of appointing a revising officer. He selects those 211 men, if he sees fit, from his own followers, his own hangers on, his own dependents, because we cannot expect, and we do not expect, that any revising officer will be selected from the ranks of the profession who belongs to the Liberal party. I have pointed out the inevitable results of that, and neither the First Minister nor any hon, gentleman on that side has made any answer to the statement that, by taking this power, they can practically send to Parliament whom they see fit. In subsequent clauses of this Bill the First Minister gives the revising officer extraordinary additional powers. The revising officer prepares the list and revises the list, and, when the list is revised, the revising officer is bound by section 26 to trans-mit that list to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and he advertises that list. There may at that very moment be a hundred appeals before the Superior Courts from the decision of the revising officer, but he is bound all the same to send the voters' list, when completed, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. These appeals may be pending, and a new election may be ordered and may take place while these appeals are pending, and yet, if it takes place then, the voters' list as transmitted, although it may be fraudulent, although names may be on it which ought not to be there and names may be left off which ought to be there, is final and conclusive; and, if any question subsequently arises as to the validity of that election, as to the frauds committed by the revising officer, as to his misconduct, as to his putting names on that he ought not to put or leaving names off that should be on, or tampering with the voters' list after it is finally completed, the 28th section of this Bill absolutely prohibits and restrains the judges of the Superior Courts from enquiring into the irregularity or misconduct of the revising officer. That is an outrage. What is the effect of it? Take a county with a majority in favor of either candidate, of 50. You get the revising officer to add 50 names to that roll that he ought not to add, 50 Liberals added to the roll that ought not to be added, and the result will be that the Conservative candidate will be defeated. On the other hand, by the revising officer adding the names of fifty Conservatives who ought not to be added, or leaving fifty names off, that ought not to be left off, the result will be that the wrong man is elected, the man who does not really represent the voice of the majority of the people; and, under the 28th clause, no matter how scandalous and outrageous the frauds may by the revising officer. That is an improper power to be given, one that no Parliament ought to give to a revising officer, one that no Government ought to vest in any official, I do not care who that official is. It makes it the stronger when that official is irremovable except on an address from the House of Commons, when it is a permanent appointment, and he cannot be interfered with except for cause, and that upon an address of this Parliament. These are objections of the first possible consequence, that ought to have weight with reasonable and thinking men, and that ought to prevail against this clause. The hon, gentleman could avoid a great deal of the anticipated wrongs that may result from the enactment of the 10th clause by appointing the county judges or the junior judges. Nobody that I am aware of objects to the appiontment of these officials to discharge these duties. They have discharged them in the past, and have discharged them tolerably, fairly; they are the revising officers now, and what reason has the hon gentleman and his followers for making the change which is now proposed, and appointing some one who is not clothed with the responsibility of a judge? Whatever we may think of some of the recent appointments to the judiciary, we pride ourselves as Canadians upon the fact that, as a general rule, when a member of the bar is appointed to the bench, he lays aside, as far as it is possible for frail humanity to lay aside, his political proclivities, his political inclinations, his political prejudices, and he goes on the bench free from all the party leanings he may have had when in active political life. We have, at all events, a guarantee in so far as the judges of the County Courts are concerned, that something like fair play will be dealt out to both political parties. It is of the first possible consequence to gentlemen upon both sides of the House that we should have a fair and honest voters' list. It is of the first consequence to the people of this country that we should have a fair and honest voters' list. What is the result if you have not such a list? Do you suppose that if the people of this country became satisfied in their own minds that a list made by a revising officer appointed not in the public interest, but in the party interest, acting unfairly, acting frauduently, acting contrary to the spirit and intent of the law-do you suppose that in a free country like this, where the people have been accustomed for so many years to manage their own affairs in this respect, that they would tolerate such an outrage? There would be dissatisfaction and discontent, and something more serious would ultimately be the outcome. Unless the people have a fair and honest list they will be dissatisfied and discontented, and unless they can get redress under the law, they will seek some other mode of working out their own political destiny. Now I say again, that no Minister of the Crown in any English colony, or in any other country—I make the statement boldy—has ever submitted a proposition of this kind to Parliament, that the Government who controls the maojrity of the representatives of the people for the time being, should take to itself absolute and unrestricted power to appoint an official to create a voters' list. Sir, the right to exercise the franchise is a sacred right, dearly cherished by our people, and the moment you interfere with that, you interfere with something they highly value. Now, Sir, there is no position that a man can aspire to that is more honorable, and perhaps more earnestly sought after, than that of the representative of a free people in a free country, but I say that if men are to occupy seats in Parliament, not by the free, uncontrolled, ungagged voice of the people, but if they are to be members of Parliament by Act of Parliament, through the intervention of a revising barrister appointed by the Executive of the day, all the dignity and all the attraction that cluster around the position of member of Parliament, are gone, and the member of Parliament simply becomes officers, and he gives those officers so appointed unlimited the creature of the Government and a member by Act of power with respect to the voters' lists. In the United Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Parliament. Sir, the First Minister often tells us that he draws his inspiration from English sources; sometimes he has said he draws inspiration from our friends on the other side of the line. I do not care where he gets his inspirations if they are only honest inspira-tion. I do not care where he gets his models and precedents if they are acceptable to the people of this country. But in draughting this Bill, and forcing it through Parliament, I challenge hon gentlemen opposite to point out a single country where they can show a precedent. You will not find it in England, or in any English colony, and you will not find it in any State of the United States. Now, we may very properly take a leaf out of the book of the experience of our neighbors to the south of us, and an experience that has extended over 100 years. I say that we would be fools-we would be worse, we would be madmen-if, when we find legislation on the other side of the line working satisfactorily, with the experience of a century to back it up, we did not adopt that legislation if we found it suitable to our circumstances. In the United States the creation of the voters' list is left practically in the hands of the people, who have the absolute and supreme control, both as to the creation and the revision of the voters' list. Now, we find that in the State of Maine the voters' list is created in the following way: The electors, at their annual meeting in the month of January, select either three, five or seven selectmen, as the locality may decide. The assessors of the municipalities are bound to send to these selectmen a list of the taxpayers and of those qualified to vote. These selectmen, from that list, prepare the voters' list, and upon a certain day, and at a certain place, both fixed by law, these selectmen meet and revise the list. Everything is thus left in the hands of the people, and neither the Federal nor the Local Legislature has a particle of control over the voters' lists. Most of the States of the Union have got different systems for the preparation of the voters' lists, but in none of them will you find a system that does not leave the matter in the hands of the poople at large. In the State of Pennsylvania the electors, at their annual meeting, select three men, one of whom is called the judge, and the other two are called inspectors, and these three men form the board of election registrars. So in Pennsylvania, and in several other States, the law is careful to protect the right of a minority, to protect the rights of both political parties. Every elector has only got two votes. No elector in the State can vote for more than two of those judges, and thereby the minority in the State can at least have one of those three judges. Now, Sir, that looks to me to be a fair and reasonable proposition. Three men are appointed to prepare and revise the list. The absolute untrammelled power is left in the hands of the people, unchecked by any restraint so far as the Federal Parliament is concerned. In Rhode Island the town council are a board of canvassers. On the first Monday in January they meet at a place and time stated by law. They prepare the voters' list, and afterwards revise it. Taking these three illustrations I have given, they stand out in marked contrast with the course the hon gentleman proposes to pursue in this Bill. In every one of those States, so careful are the authorities that the public interests shall be protected, that the interests of the respective political bodies shall be protected and guarded in the creation and revision of the voters' lists, that the task is placed entirely in the hands of the people themselves. In the United States, where politics run as high, probably higher than in Canada, you see how careful and cautious the majority are with respect to the rights of the minority. The same care, forethought and independence do not exist here. The First Minister in no particular intends to protect the rights of the minority. He places absolute, unlimited power in the hands of the revising States there is no Government interference, either by the Federal Parliament or by the State Legislatures. It rests with Canada, and it is the only instance, I believe, in the history of parliamentary government, to have the Government assume the power of dealing with the voters' lists in the way they propose in this case. Take some other States. Take the State of New Jersey. There the people elect, at the annual meeting, one person as a judge and two as inspectors of elections. These three persons constitute the board of registration. Every person who has a right to be put on the voters' list is placed on it. Every elector, at the election at which those three men are nominated and elected. has only two votes, so that in every instance the minority will at least have one member of the board representing their political opinions. In the State of New York the principle adopted is somewhat similar. In Minnesota, township supervisors are elected annually by the people, who also elect the election judges. The town clerk for each township is also clerk of the board of elections. They attend on a day and at a place fixed by law, are bound to attend and prepare the voters' list, and upon a day and at a place fixed by law, they attend for the purpose of revising the list. The basis on which the judges proceed is the voters' list of the preceding year. In that State, as in nearly all the States of the Union, the power of making and correcting the voters' list is left entirely in the hands of the people without any official control either by the Federal Government or State Legislatures. In the State of Michigan the aldermen of every incorporated city, the supervisor treasurer and clerk of every township shall constitute the board of registration. At a date and place appointed the board meets and revises the voters' list. They represent the people, and if they do wrong, violate the law, perpetrate a fraud, and do injury to either political party, the people have it in their own power to dismiss them at the next annual meeting, and they do dismiss them accordingly. They have a guarrantee of fair dealing in this board of revision, because if the board acts improperly it is in the hands of the people, and they have power to punish its members. Such are the modes adopted in several of the States of the Union, and I have only given these two or three instances in order to illustrate the policy pursued here. They leave the creation of the voters' list in the hands of the people. There is no revising barrister no enormous expense such as we are asked to incur by the proposition now before the committee. The local authorities are utilised in every instance; they create the voters' list and they revise it, and there is no appel from their judgment to the judgment of any court or higher authority. In a country like this, where we are a self-governing country, supposed to be free and independent, assumed to have intelligence enough to manage our own affairs in our own way, why should it not be a proper and fair thing as between man and man, as between the opposition and the Government, that the creation of the voters' lists should be left entirely in the hands of the people themselves? You will not find such a proposal as this in any British colony; and as the hon. gentleman says, he draws nearly all his inspiration from England and English sources, you would naturally imagine that the hon. gentleman would have sought in some English colony for some precedent for his action. He will seek in vain. He will find no English colony where a law such as the hon, gentleman proposes has ever been placed on the Statute Book. It is true that in Victoria, one of the Australian colonies, the Government appoint revising barristers. But the revising barrister has no such power, no such unlimited, unrestricted power as that officer will have under this clause of the present Bill. In that colony he has what are practically semi-judicial and semi-ministerial functions. His judgments are not final and conclusive in any sense. He is appointed by the Government, it is true, and is called an electoral registrar. In that colony the head of the department is charged with ground of reason and common sense, a principle which has the administration of the laws respecting elections and he appoints officials. He sends the electoral registrar blank certificates as to the right to vote, and the clerk of every council, as he is bound by law to do, sends to this electoral registrar on a given day in each year, a list of every ratepayer whom this clerk supposes has a right to voto; and every ratepayer who goes to the electoral registrar obtains a certificate setting forth that he has a right to vote. Objection may be made at a given time to the list of electors as prepared by the electoral registrars in the col-Those objections are transmitted by the electoral registrars to the clerk of the Court of Petty Sessions. This court hears objections made to the electoral list; in other words, this court reviews the judgment of the electoral registrar. The Court of Petty Sessions is composed of a judge learned in the law and of magistrates, and this court has power, as I have said, to review the judgment of the electoral registrar. More than that. The revising officer's judgment and even the judgment of the Court of Petty Sessions are not finel and conclusive. There may be a protest against misconduct and fraud on the part of a revising officer or the electoral registrar or those charged with the preparation of the lists. Those allegations can be inquired into by the courts, which has full, unlimited, and unrestricted power, as they have here at the present time, unless this Bill becomes law. The hon, gentleman says he draws his inspiration from the mother country. Let us see what the mother country has done in this respect. Let us see if she has adopted such a law as this. England has not done so. Under the law of England there is no power to appoint a revising officer vested in the Executive. The revising officer is invested with certain judicial and Ministerial functions. He is appointed not by the Executive of the day, for so anxious and careful is the Imperial Government that even a shadow of a suspicion should not rest upon the character, the reputation, the integrity, the fair play, of these revising officers, that they have vested that power in the highest judges of the realm. What a marked contrast between what the First Minister proposes and the law which now prevails in England. In England, in the county of Middlesex, and the surrounding boroughs, they are appointed by the chief justice of the Court of Queen's Bench. In the outside counties they are appointed by the senior judge of assize, and for a term of only one year, so that, if at the end of the year it is found that the revising officer does not discharge his duties fairly and honestly, you may rest assured that his name is dropped from the list for the succeeding year. If the First Minister would only adopt that course, if he would leave the appointment of the revising officers in the hands of the chief justices of the Supreme Courts in the various Provinces, or the judges travelling on circuit, this clause of the Bill would be shorn of many of its objectionable features. But in its present form, this Bill will be not only objectionable to hon. gentlemen on this side, but I predict that the day will come when no more determined opponents of this clause will be found in the country, than hon, gentlemen sitting on that side. Hon. gentlemen must not suppose that they have got a lease of power in perpetuity. They must not suppose that times do not change, or that they are going to remain where they are for all time to come. The moment that the time will come, and come it will, when hon. gentlemen must sit on this side of the House, I say there will be no more fervent or determined opponents of the principle of this clause than hon, gentlemen who are now advocating it, in the hope of getting some petty, party, political triumph. I supposed that the day was past in the Parliament of Canada when, for the sake of a petty, political triumph, a great principle would be departed from, which has been recognised in the mother country and in the colonies, a principle which is fair, a principle which can be justified on every prevailed in the United Kingdom for years, without objection from either political party, and under both Liberal and Conservative Administrations. But the hon, gentleman does not propose to adopt that principle. He proposes to retain in his own hand the appointment of these officers. With a flourish of trumpets he announced some amendments yesterday afternoon, but what did they amount to? I suppose the Mail will declare to-night that the First Minister of his own motion had made some amendments which will do away with all objection to the Bill, that he has done what he has always intended to do, that he has made the County Court judges the revising barristers in every county where there is a County Court judge. What do these amendments amount to? He changes the word "may" into the word "shall," and he enables himself to appoint, in addition to a Supreme Court judge in Lower Canada, a notary public, and instead of some other official the stipendiary magistrates of the Province of British Columbia. Every objectionable feature of this clause remains in it as it was the first day that the hon. gentleman introduced the Bill. They are there still in all their hideous deformity, and nothing he can do will tone it down or improve it, except doing away with the clause altogether, or allowing the judges of the Supreme Courts in each Province to make these appointments. We are satisfied to leave these appointments, if we are bound to have revising officers, in the hands of the judiciary. We have some faith still left in them, although the First Minister has been making, of late, appointments to the bench of a questionable kind. Still we have some faith that that will not be swayed altogether by political influencies emanating from Ottawa. We have some faith that these judges will have a due regard for the public interest and the interest of both the political parties into which the people of this country are divided. We have some faith that their own sense of decency and propriety will, in some respects, compel them to appoint men fit for the discharge of these important functions. In the hands of the hon, gentleman himself, we have no confidence, no faith, and we have every reason to have no confidence and no faith in him. The hon. gentleman's course of conduct from the day he introduced this Bill down to this hour, has precluded the possibility of our cherishing the slightest confidence that he will make these appointments except to serve his own political purpose, and that being the object of the Bill, we know perfectly well that the First Minister intends to carry out to the end the object he had in view when he introduced the Bill. Now, I say that the course which has been followed in the two greatest and freest countries under the face of the sun, is well worth the consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if they would only listen to the voice of reason, if they would only look at the lessons taught us by the history of the past, if they would only take the examples spread out before us, in the legislation of the mother country and the United States, I would have some hopes that we could appeal to them with some measure of success, and ask them not to put the power of appointing these officers in the hands of the Executive, but permit the judges to make the appointments. There is another feature well worthy the consideration of this House, and one which to my mind presents objections that are almost unanswerable. Under the present system, as you well know, we have a cheap, economical, simple method, which costs you nothing when you are running your elections. It costs you nothing to get ten or twenty copies of the voters' lists and you know that you require these lists in canvassing every polling sub-division. You can get all this without the cost of one dollar; the revision of the voters' lists costs you but little; the preliminary revision costs you nothing, and if you have an appeal, the man to whom the appeal is made dwells at your door; you have free access to him; so under this Bill, If any other than the judge is appointed there is an appeal to the Court of Appeals at Toronto. Well, although you have a general knowledge of the law, I do not think you would care about appearing there before the eminent Queen's Counsel who would probably appear against you. The result would be that you, Mr. Chairman, would have to put your hand in your pocket, pay for the revision of the voters' list, and pay counsel a reasonably good fee in order to have the legal points that would necessarily arise under this Bill argued before the Court of Appeal. The enormous expenses of carrying out this Bill are almost past calculation. Has any hon, gentleman ventured a calculation of the cost of this Bill? The First Minister whose business it was when he asked Parliament to legislate in this direction, whose bounden duty it was to his own followers, before he committed them to the passage of this Bill, at the very first stage to submit to Parliament a reasonably fair detailed statement of the probable expenses connected with the administration of this Bill after it becomes law, never opened his mouth on the subject. Hon. gentlemen opposite are asked to take a leap in the dark. They are asked to vote for this Bill wholly ignorant of the enormos burden of expense it will necessarily impose on the people of this country when it becomes law. The First Minister has unbounded faith in his followers. He has reason to have faith in them, otherwise he would not submit a proposition of this kind to them and expect them to vote it through without further explanation than he has given. Now, I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House. If the First Minister desires that the members of this House shall honestly and fairly represent the public opinion of the country, he ought to leave the creation and the revision of the voters' lists in the hands of the people. It is in vain for the hon. gentleman to expect to get an honest expression of opinion—if he wants an honest expression of opinion from the people of this country—with a machinery so manufactured as the hon gentleman proposes to manufacture it, under the powers vested in the revising barrister by this clause of the Bill. If he wants to get a free expression of opinion as to his acts and policy, let him leave the creation of the voters' lists in the hands of the local authorities; but if he will ignore the local authorities and will have a revising officer, then, in fairness to the people of this country, in fairness to the liberal element of this country, let him leave the appointment in the hands of the judges. No fairminded statesman would take to himself the appointment of a revising officer who has the power of creating and revising the voters' list in the interest of the party from whom he derives his powers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not spoken much on the merits of this Bill, but I wish to give expression to the opinion I entertain of the particular provisions contained in clauses 10 and 11. We have been told from the commencement of this discussion that in his own good time the First Minister proposed to make such important concessions and modifications as would very greatly remove the objections which even his own press and his own followers admitted, and which we on this side of the House, speaking not only for ourselves, but in the general public interest, alleged against the details of this measure. We have now, I suppose, had an opportunity of seeing what those concessions and modifications are likely to amount to. Yesterday the First Minister, in a very remarkable speech -a speech which deserves, perhaps, more attention than it has hitherto received—explained to us what his views were as to the modifications of these two clauses; and fearing lest I might misinterpret him I have waited until I had the report of his speech in my hands before discussing it. Now, I want to call the attention of this committee, you can go to him and argue your own case. But it is not and as far as I can, the attention of the country, to the very remarkable admissions and confessions contained in the words of the First Minister yesterday. It is a very unusual thing indeed to find a First Minister, at this stage of a measure, coming down to us and using language which shows clearly that in his own mind he saw perfectly distinctly that this measure was indefensible on its merits; that is to say, as to the main and central proposition of this Bill, that the Government of the country, that is, the nominees of a particular party in this country, should take into their hands the absolute control of the electoral lists upon which the representatives of the people are elected. The hon, gentleman admitted candidly for once that so far as he could find out, it would be impossible for him to carry through Parliament—a Parliament in which as everyknows, he exercises a most extraordinary body influence—a proposition to adopt the fair and equitable rule which is laid down in England, and which prevents either political party from exercising a control over the voters' lists. Now, Sir, I can only conclude that the hon. gentleman's intellectual part on this occasion got the better, to a certain extent, of his moral part. He saw, as he could not help but see, particularly after the argument of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), that such a proposition could not fail to strike the mind of every man in this House as being a most unreasonable and unfair one. Here are two parties who have been pitted against each other for many years. We are appealing, as two litigants, to a jury, and one litigant attempts to make it part of the law of this country that he should choose the jury by which he is to be tried; because that in practice is the result of the two clauses we are now considering. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman says that he had ascertained that a proposition of a similar nature to that in England would not meet the expectations of Par-He tells us he does not know why. It is quite evident that to his own mind the proposition commends itself as a just and reasonable proposition that the revising he could not, as has been suggested so often, and as is sugofficers, the men who are to make these lists, should be chosen by some independent parties, who have no interests of their own to serve. Then he goes on to say:

"Why it is I do not say. Why there is a difference in the public mind in Canada and in England I do not know; I cannot quite fathom it; but I have an impression on my mind, and it is an impression amounting to a certainty, that any proposition that the appointment of the revising officer should be left to the judiciary in the different Provinces would not meet with the approbation of the majority of Parliament."

The hon, gentleman does not say that it would be with the approbation of a majority of the electors, or of a majority of the independent, honest, this country. What he thinking men all through this country. What he says is this, and I call the attention of the House to it. He does not believe that he could carry this measure through Parliament, that he could control his own majority, unless he was able to give them some extraordinary inducement in the shape of the appointment of revising officers, who could make things pleasant for a great many of them in a great many doubtful constituencies. That, and nothing less than that, is the only deduction that can be drawn from the words used by the hon, gentleman yesterday, which I have now before me in the Hansard; and therefore it is, he said, because he, the First Minister, a man who undoubtedly exercises a perfectly unexampled influence over his followers, because he could not persuade his own followers to accept this Bill without holding out this inducement—I will not say this bribe—he has recourse to this most extraordinary step of appointing, by his own proper motion, men to decide who are to be the jury before whom his case is to be tried at the next election. No such confession was ever heard before, no such ground for a measure of this kind was ever advanced before, that I ever heard of or recollect, in any Parliament.

when he introduced this Bill, the difference between his method and the English method, and he admits candidly he was incorrect in supposing the revising barristers were appointed by a member of the Government and not by the Lord Chief Justice and the judges of the assizes. also is a most extraordinary confession to make. Here is a measure which the hon. gentleman has had in his hands, not for one or two, but for 16 or 17 years, and as to this fundamental feature of his own Bill the hon, gentleman did not know, when he introduced the Bill, whether it was in accord with the English system which he professes to desire to follow or not. I shall not stop here to point out the very serious inconsistency between that and his other statement, that he had ascertained beyond a doubt that a measure modeled on English lines would not meet the approval of the majority of Parliament. If he thought this measure was modelled on English lines, as he said he did, a few moments before, I do not see why it was he should be at the pains to ascertain that, if modelled on English lines, it would not meet the approval of the majority of his followers. This I leave for the hon, gentleman to explain at his leisure. What I desire to call attention to in connection with this clause is this: It is perfectly clear to everybody, it has been proven to demonstration, that in all other countries it has been the object and purpose of their Legislatures to keep the work of the preparation of the lists wholly apart and distinct from the work of the revising officer. That has been admitted; the hon, gentleman intimated that he would have liked to have done so, but the circumstances prevented him. I say that in itself is so grave an objection, that if he found that by no means he could conceive, he could keep them separate, that alone was a most excellent reason for not having introduced this measure until he could have devised some means by which the man who has to revise the lists should be a different person from the man who originally composed it. Nor can I see why gested by the amendment in your hands, impose, as the House has undoubtedly the power to do, on these local authorities the duty of compiling the lists, even if he intended himself to keep the power of appointing the officers by whom they should be revised. Looking at the matter in a different light from that in which it may be viewed by a mere politician, looking at it as a statesman, the hon. gentleman ought to consider very seriously this fact. He knows, even if his followers do not, that the real strength of the two parties, particularly in the chief Province of Ontario, is very nearly the same. There is, probably, taking Canada all through, but a very small numerical difference between those men who support the Opposition and those men who support the Ministry. That being so, a wise and prudent statesman would be very careful indeed how he introduced a measure which he knew, whether rightly or wrongly, the Opposition must of necessity regard with great dissatisfaction and distrust. Here in Canada, our position is not so well secured, our future is not so well assured, that any man who really has the welfare of Confederation at heart should do anything he could help to exasperate and intensify the division which has already become too apparent between these two sections of our people. I do not know whether it has attracted the hon. gentleman's attention as much as it has mine, because his duties have been of a class which have compelled him to reside here very closely, and have prevented him, perhaps, from becoming as well acquainted as he was in former days with the undercurrents that affect the people's minds in other parts of the Dominion, but I have no doubt whatever in my own mind, that one, though by no means the only or perhaps the chief cause, of the great emigration which has been going on for a long period of time from various parts of Canada is this, that from various Then he says, in another passage, that he did not know, causes there is arising in the minds of a great many of our people a profound distrust of the course of the Government. and I say that measures of this kind are calculated in a very great degree to increase that distrust. Take this measure. The hon, gentleman, as he said himself, felt and admitted that it was a measure which the Opposition might justly regard with distrust. He knows, we all know, perfectly well, what sort of persons are likely to be entrusted by one political party with the task of preparing the electoral lists, on the result of which the retention of office of the hon. gentleman depends. I do not mean to say that such a measure, if it had been introduced by a Government of another political stripe, would have been worked better by them than it will be by the First Minister. What I say is this: What he proposes to do is to entrust the present Government with a power no Government should possess, he proposes to put temptations in the way of himself and followers to which no politicians of any kind ought to be exposed, and to which they will inevitably succumb. The hon, gentleman says he cannot get this measure through the House, he cannot induce a majority of his followers to support it, without some such inducement as he holds out by giving them the power of appointing the revising barristers. Well, I think the hon, gentleman does not do justice to a very considerable portion, at any rate, of the gentlemen behind him. I do not believe, and the whole conduct of the debate tends to confirm me in that non-belief, that the great majority of the hon. gentleman's majority are at all in favor of this measure. Very few of them, indeed, have come to his rescue, or have endeavored to argue this question on its merits, and notably has that been true both of his colleagues and supporters from the great Province of Quebec. If the hon, gentleman's object was, as he stated, simply and solely to give us a uniform franchise, if he does not desire to obtain that under conditions which cannot prevent those consequences that I have alluded to, the hon. gentleman could very easily have done it by resorting to the English method of appointing these barristers. Now, he has given no reason (other than the simple affirmation that he could not induce his majority to accept it) based on a fair consideration of the circumstances, why that should not be done. He knows perfectly well that, if he had at an earlier stage declared that he would have met the wishes of the Opposition on that one point, that he would have permitted the revising barristers to be appointed by persons in whom they would have reasonable confidence, all this most prolonged and protracted discussion would probably have been avoided, and a very great injury to the business of this country would not have been incurred, and that he might long ere this have disposed of all the legitimate business which could come before us. If the hon. gentleman had a fair reason for that course, he was bound to give it. As he has given no reason for it, I am bound to suppose, as I have said, that the real reason can only be this: that his followers had no heart in this matter, that they did not desire this Act, that they could not be induced to support it unless some very strong inducement was held cut to them whereby they might gain some political advantage which would be an equivalent to them for the unpopularity which they knew must attach to many of the provisions of this Act. I desire to say a few words with respect to the class of persons to whom this arduous and delicate duty is about to be entrusted. I entertain no prejudice myself against the legal profession. I believe that the legal profession contains within its ranks quite as large a percentage of honorable and able men as any other profession of equal numbers; but, on the other hand, I know and everybody knows perfeetly well that the legal profession, besides containing its full percentage of honorable and able men, contains also its full percentage of exceedingly black sheep; and I cannot feel at all satisfied that the average five-year-old barristers, to whom almost of necessity these tasks will be entrusted, himself, and at no very distant day, than this measure Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, are likely to belong to the class of honorable and capable men from whom judges are chosen, to whom most of us would like to see matters affecting our life or property referred. The whole thing is based on a false principle. It may be true that, when you take out of the legal profession men who have attained a high degree of eminence in it, when you place them in a position apart, in which they are at one and the same time removed as far as possible from all corrupt influences and subject to a very strict scrutiny, first on the part of the bar, and then on the part of the public at large, it may be true, and it is true, that, as a general rule, the tradition of the profession prevents those men from going astray and renders the public willing as a general thing to confide in their impartiality and honor. But all the conditions which go to make a judge a fair and impartial person suitable for the deciding of such a question as this are conspicu-ously absent in the case of the barristers whom the hon. gentleman proposes to appoint. We all know-all of us who have had any experience in election matters-that, of all men in the community, the class of needy and briefless barristers are the ones, on both sides, I admit, who, for very obvious reasons, take the keenest interest in politics. They are usually the bosom friends and sworn advisers of the political candidates in the region in which they reside; they are almost all of them aspiring to become candidates themselves; their training up to a certain point, the training of the earlier years of the profession, is not one calculated to foster a fair and impartial tone of mind. In the upper branches of the profession I believe it is so, but it certainly is not in the early years, when these gentlemen are anxious by any means whatever to obtain a reputation and an influential clientele. These men, being such as they are, are the persons to whom the hon. gentleman proposes, in a considerable number of cases, to entrust this very delicate duty. They are persons, in the first place, to whom it must be supposed that the stipend, whatever it may be that the hon. gentleman proposes to attach to this office, will be one of considerable importance. It is quite clear that the hon, gentleman will not be able to secure the services of lawyers of high standing. I cannot tell exactly what the time would be that would be required to perform the duties imposed on revising barristers under this Act, but I should say that in all probability two or three months' time would be taken up at least. No lawyer in fair practice can afford to take this unless on one or two conditions—unless he has political aspirations of his own, or unless he is a man who is looking forward to judicial preferment, and willing to make certain sacrifices for the purpose of putting the party leaders under obligation to him. I have no doubt whatever that the better class of men the hon. gentleman may appoint will be that class of men who will be looking to their political friends for advancement, at a reasonable time, to some position on the bench, and the worser class will be men who will have probably fewer scruples, who will be subject to fewer restraints than any other class in the community. I say there can be, and there will be, no confidence whatever felt in these young lawyers, to whom, of necessity, this work will probably fall, because I believe that the sense of the House is with me when I say that you will not be able, except under very peculiar circumstances, to induce lawyers of good standing and high repute in their profession to accept this rather onerous and disagreeable duty. I am afraid that, in this, as in a good many other matters, the hon, gentleman has taken another downward step. I tell him this is neither in the interest of good statesmanship nor in accordance with the principles of the party which, at any rate, he once professed to maintain. I say there could be nothing done which I believe is more likely to recoil on which he now proposes to pass into law. The hon, gentleman would do well to remember, and his friends would do well to remember, that, when you commit a plain, manifest injustice for the benefit of one political party, you, as a general rule, instinctively excite a vastly more formidable opposition among the members of the party you design to oppress, and you rally round them a far greater number of the neutrals, who exist in considerable numbers in every country, than you would otherwise do. I recollect very well—I was not in Parliament at the time, but I took a tolerably keen interest in politics even then—what I must call another bit of sharp practice, when in 1858 the hon. gentleman succeeded in exposing his late antagonist, Mr. George Brown, to considerable humiliation and putting him to considerable expense and trouble, and I recollect what was the impression produced on some of the most valuable supporters the hon. gentleman then had; and I believe that, now this measure has come to be thoroughly understood, now that it has been discussed from one end of the country to the other, the hon, gentleman will find that he will lose a very considerable number of the staunchest and best of his supporters, when they come to understand, as they are beginning to understand pretty clearly, how thoroughly and radically the hon, gentleman has departed from all those traditions of honesty and fair play in the dealings between one great party and another that we used to make it our boast we had inherited from our English ancestry. There is another objection to this measure. I say this is another long stride towards the creation of a class of professional politicians. It is perfectly clear that not merely is this Bill going to inflict a very considerable additional expense upon this country, but it is going to inflict a considerable additional expense on most of the members of Parliament. They will be obliged to watch these lists, and, unless, as we contend, these officers who are appointed as revising barristers are openly and undisguisedly the partisans of one party alone, which in the case of the county judges I certainly do not believe they would be found to be, hon. members will find that they will have to pay a great deal more attention, and to undergo a very considerable deal of additional expense, for the purpose of keeping these lists correct or filled in their own favor. all that means a considerable additional expense; it means probably a considerable additional central organisation. It means that these men who are engaged in political life shall sacrifice more and more of their ordinary avocations; and, as I said before, we are going on to make an additional stride towards the creation of that class of professional politicians who, as we know, exist in certain portions of the neighboring States, and whom almost all honest Americans regard as having been the source and original cause of great evils in American politics. That may be in part impossible to avert, but I say the hon. gentleman has incurred great responsibility, and is doing, in my judgment, very great injury to the welfare of both political parties in this country, by introducing a measure which makes the existence of these men even more of a necessity than has been the case heretofore. Then there is another consideration. Whatever faults the First Minister may have, he does, at any rate, possess intellect enough to know that there are serious defects for which no cure has yet been found, in our representative system. He knows that the two great parties in this country are not fairly represented, as a rule, on the floors of Parliament, that a very trifling alteration of the constituencies on either side, may produce an enormous alteration in the numbers of the parties confronting each other here. Now this mischievous tendency the Bill of the hon. gentleman is going to intensify. He has a great opportunity, to undertake the creation of a uniform franchise for this Dominion, an opportunity which will probably never occur again to himself or discussion, and to that extent remove certain powers from anybody else, under as favorable circumstances, in which he could have used his great experience and his undoubted ability in matters political, for the purpose of seeing whether he could not, to some extent, remedy that evil. Instead of that, the hon gentleman has been teaching us by various lessons, first of all by his Bill of 1882, by the gerrymander he then introduced, and now by this attempt to gerrymander the voters' lists, what is very likely to come to pass under the operation of these various Acts, that a decided minority of the people may chance to return a majority of the representatives to Parliament. There is no doubt that that is an evil which is likely to occur under such institutions as these that are now growing up in Canada; and I can say this to hon. gentlemen, to my brother representatives in Parliament, that there is no one thing which ought to be more carefully avoided by statesmen than to bring about a state of things in which the majority of the people could feel, or could assert, that they were deprived of their fair representation on the floor of this Parliament. The basis on which Parliamentary institutions rest is this: They are supposed to represent the fair and unbiassed will of the people. Now all these Acts which the hon. gentleman has been placing on the Statute Book tend directly to prevent the will of the people from being fairly represented here. I say it tends directly to very corrupt practices, although it may possibly dispense with a certain amount of the corrupt expenditure which has so often been resorted to at elections. I say that the parties to whom the nomination of the revising barristers must of necessity be entrusted, will be under the greatest temptation to put those important duties in the hands of men who will be under their control, who will look to them, or the Government of the day, for preferment, and who will be known to them to be unscrupulous political partisans. The hon, gentleman is deliberately taking all the precautions he can to prevent any check being exercised upon the acts of these men. It would be bad enough if these lists were compiled by independent authorities, for we all know the immense power that an unscrupulous revising officer may exercise, even in such a case; but when these men are at the same time to compile the lists and then to preside over the revision, it is impossible to understand how any measure can be submitted to this Parliament which is more likely to tempt men to an improper abuse of their power, or which is more likely to inspire all the members of the Reform party throughout this country with a profound distrust of the motives and conduct of the Government of Canada. And as I believe, Sir, that that is a very serious misfortune, and is likely to work serious mischief to the country at large, I, for my part, shall oppose the introduction of the most pernicious principle which is now, for the first time, sought to be crystalised into law and placed on the Statute Book of Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. I think no portion of this Bill demands fuller consideration than the machinery for the preparation of the voters' lists. Last night the Premier made certain announcements to the House, and if the tenor of these announcements were incorporated in the Bill they would remove certain objections. The Premier stated last night that the revising officer would take the assessment rolls for his guide, and make up the list from them, and that he would be bound to place upon the list all those who, according to the certified assessment rolls, appeared to be entitled to be placed upon the list. If I understood him aright, he stated that the revising officer would be bound by their assessment rolls. Now, is there any way by which he is bound, or is it proposed to amend the Bill in such a way that the revising officer shall be bound by the list in the first instance? Because if that provision is to be inserted in the Bill, it will, to that extent, limit the the revising officers. Is it intended to have a provision of that kind inserted in the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1 think the Bill is quite right now.

Mr. MULOCK. Not quite. The next section provides that the revising officer shall procure certified copies of the last revised assessment rolls, and therefrom, and with such other information as he may obtain, shall make up the original list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It means from information that he can get from the assessment roll.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand it is necessary for him to go out of the assessment roll in order to procure the information. I understand, under this Bill, that perhaps there will be persons entitled to be placed on the list whose names do not appear on the assessment roll, and therefore they must first appear on the voters' list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot conceive, in the Province of Ontario, at least, that any person who has a right to vote will not be found on the roll. In the Provinces where there is no income qualification and wageearning qualification, it may be otherwise; but so far as Ontario is concerned, certainly the whole of the electorate will be found on the assessment roll.

Mr. MULOCK. That being the case, in making up the original list, that is the list which is the foundation of the corrected list, the revising officer will find upon the assessment roll the names of all who should be on his list. Or, at all events, the names that appear on that roll ought primá facie to be placed on his list, leaving the public to attack the list. It is in that direction that I am asking the hon. gentleman if he cannot insert an amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That does not arise on this

Mr. MULOCK. I felt when the First Minister assured the committee yesterday that the revising officer would be bound in the first instance to accept the assessment roll as prima facie evidence, that if an amendment to that effect were made in the Bill, one of the objections to this clause would be removed, because it has been urged that it is competent for the revising officer to take the revised assessment roll, but ignore it and take other information. As the First Minister stated that the revising officer would be bound by that list, I inferred that an amendment would be submitted to carry out the hon. gentleman's statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have not come to that.

Mr. RYKERT. Section 12 provides for it.

Mr. MULOCK. It does not say that the revising officer has to adopt the assessment roll in the first instance.

Mr. RYKERT. There is an appeal in the event of parties being left off the list. Omissions occur every day in the clerke' list.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a common occurrence, I admit. I hope the First Minister will see his way to insert an amendment in the direction I have indicated. I am anxious to have the Bill satisfactory, which, of course, is the object of every member of the House. I can conceive of no subject that can be submitted to a free Parliament representing free institutions more important than the one we are now discussing. We have boasted that we enjoy representative institutions; that we have here an almost perfect form of government for the people by the people, and I presume it will be contrary to the genius of our institutions if we, in the slightest degree, endanger the hold of the people upon them, if we, in the slightest degree, weaken their power to withdraw confidence in the Government. Yesterday the First Minister, in dealing with the question of revising officers, stated that he felt I hope has been held out to us that these appointments are Mr. MULOCK.

it his duty, when introducing a measure into Parliament, to be reasonably sure that the measure would become law. He stated when he introduced this Bill that he did not deem it necessary at that stage to offer arguments in favor of its adoption, because, he said, it was built upon the same lines as Bills previously introduced, the principles of which he had then fully enunciated. If we turn to Hansard of past years we find that when the hon, gentleman introduced the previous Bill he said it was a Bill following closely the lines of the English Act—I suppose referring to 6 Victoria. The First Minister informed the House on this occasion that revising officers were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who was one of the Administration of the day, and he gave us to understand that he was following that precedent in making the appointment of revising officers dependent upon the Government of the day, there being no official here occupying the same position as the Lord Chancellor of England. The hon, gentleman further stated in support of the measure that it was necessary we should pass a Bill of this kind; that it was an anomaly that the Canadian Parliament should not control its own franchise; that we represent British institutions on this continent and draw our inspiration in regard to the creation and management of them from the institutions of the mother land. He told us, in fact, that whatever precedent Great Britain supplied, that precedent it was the duty of this Government to follow. At the time the hon, gentleman framed the Bill and recommended it to Parliament he was under the impression that the revising officers in England were appointed in a certain way. Ever since the announcement was made on the floor of this House, the public have been educated, through his party's press, to believe that the Bill proposes to appoint revising officers in the same way as revising barristers are appointed in England. At last we have it admitted on all sides that the original announcement was a mistake; that the revising barristers were never appointed in the manner indicated, and that no such precedent as was stated exists. being the case, is it not reasonable, now, That that after the members of this House have been misinformed as to the nature of these precedents the measure should be recast, so as truly to carry out the spirit of the Premier as indicated in his remarks, when he said that we must draw our inspiration from British institutions and follow their example as closely as circumstances would permit. He told us last night that he would have difficulty in inducing his followers to consent to the power of the appointments in these cases being vested in the courts. But that does not furnish a reason why the Premier should ask Parliament to place power in the hands of the Government. What inference can we draw from his remark that his followers would not consent to these appointments being in the hands of the courts. Are we to draw the inference that the Premier, personally, is in favor of such a proposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not say the hon. gentleman did, but I ask if we are to draw that inference—the inference that his followers and himself differ on this question, or are we to hold them all equally responsible and equally of the same opinion. If so, it will not do for the Premier to say: I decline to ask that the courts shall make appointments because my followers object to it. If the Premier objects let him say so with arguments; if his followers object let them do so, and give their reasons. But has any hon, gentleman supporting the measure, up to this time, told us why he objects to the courts of the land making these appointments? Until they do so, neither the House nor the Premier is justified in departing from the wholesome precedents furnished by British institutions, and the example which we are here invited to follow. As no to be made by a non-political body, we must discuss this clause of the Bill as we find it, we must point out its imperfections, and I trust that the Premier will receive recommendations in that spirit in which he invited them. and will endeavor to remove those features of the Bill which are calculated, in the slightest degree, to endanger the liberties of the people. I object to the present proposal as to the appointment of the revising officers on the grounds advanced by the Premier himself, because he is not following British precedents, he is not taking his inspiration from British institutions. This clause involves the creation of a new tribunal; it is an original design, for which I believe there is no precedent in any country which enjoys free institutions to-day. We have in the mother land, whose example we are so proud to follow, a system which has been working for half a century, which has the confidence of the people there, and results in bringing to the Parliament of Great Britain the best men of that country, irrespective of politics. There is no possibility of the revising officer there unjustly interfering with the rights of the people, and surely we would not be doing an unwise thing in following such an example until, at all events, it has been proved wanting. As an admirer of the spirit of British institutions I would feel a sense of relief which passes expression if I could be sure that this crucial point of this Bill were to be placed beyond party considerations for all time. I would call the attention of the Premier to the fact that the adoption of a uniform franchise does not render it necessary to adopt Dominion machinery, such as is introduced into this Bill. The Bill itself tells us that. It declares that in certain cases the local authorities shall be officers of this House. The Bill imposes duties and obligations upon the municipal officers of the land, and it would be sufficient for this Parliament to create a Dominion Franchise and then relegate the working out of that scheme to the local authorities. There is a wide difference between Parliament declaring its own franchise and creating new machinery for working it out. The working out of that franchise can be effectually performed by existing machinery, all of which will be of great benefit to the country; and that being the case, I see no sound reason why we should, as a Parliament, create new tribunals for carrying out the law of this Parliament. Parliament has declared what is and what is not law, and it leaves the carrying out of those laws to the courts. True, a part of the officers of those courts are appointed here, but it is equally true that the executive officers of those courts are not appointed here. Take those branches of the law which are completely under the jurisdiction of this Parliament; this Parliament declares the law within its proper lines, but the construction of these laws may be vested in courts which are created by Local Parliaments. The Government of Canada alone appoints the judges, but every other official of the courts, so far as I remember, is appointed by the local authorities, and is under the jurisdiction of the local authorities as well as under the jurisdiction of the central authority. That being the case, why cannot the Government require the local authorities to carry out their measure, and thus have it carried out by a tribunal in no way biased or interested in the result? You will then have a system which will receive the confidence of the public. I can conceive of our being guilty of no greater crime against the State than to destroy the confidence of the public in our representative institutions; and if you transfer the power of making up to the rolls to officers appointed by the Government, in whom, even if they discharge their duty impartially and honestly, there is a want of confidence in the minds of the public; you weaken the trust of the people in the only institution that stands between them and their rights and liberties, and cause them, necessarily, to lose confidence in the laws which are on one side; but, on the contrary, I believe, if they are passed by this House. Adopt this measure, and what could be analysed, and the one side set against the other, we are some of the minor consequences? In this House, and in the presence of this Government, I am perhaps justified in calling the question of expense a question of minor consequence, because the question of expense does not seem to enter into the consideration of public measures in this House at the present time. But it is our duty to carefully guard the public exchequer, and not add unnecessarily one dollar to the public expenditure; and can it be said that this is a necessary expenditure, when, as I have indicated, every dollar of expense that will be incurred under this system can be saved by adopting the local system? I would entreat, I would beg, the Government, in the interests of the country, to think more than once before they add unnecessarily to our financial burdens.

The committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. MULOCK. I propose now to call your attention briefly to another serious objection to the measure. I do not conceive that it is possible, by the machinery proposed in this section, to carry out effectively and in the best possible way the will of the people. This involves, necessarily, a comparison between the existing systems and the proposed system. This comparison I shall not make in detail, but briefly state that under the present system the preparation of the lists is entirely in the hands of the people. This Government is not responsible for any errors; it is entirely blameless if any occur, and the people have it in their power to correct the errors. The people are entirely responsible for the correctness of the lists on which the elections take place, so that if it should happen that by errors on the part of the present authorities the elections have not been such as they would have been had the lists been otherwise, still there is this satisfaction in connection with it, that the people themselves are to blame, for they had it in their power to make a perfect list, and if they did not do so it was their fault. But under the proposed scheme the people will not be in that position. A governmental officer, who will be considered the agent of the Government, will prepare the lists. It is true the Bill contains minute directions as to his duties, but there is a vast difference between the duties of this officer and his powers. His duties are one thing, his power another; and whilst it is true that there is or is intended to be some remedy provided in case he should neglect his duties, we all know the difficulty in the way of poor men getting justice in any courts. We are told that every court in the land is opened to the poorest as well as to the richest. That is a very good statement to make in theory, and no doubt the advantage under which a poor man labors cannot be avoided. The inequalities of conditions of men cannot be helped, but when we are now endeavoring to provide a scheme that will enable the poorest as well as the richest to enjoy the franchise which we give them in the earlier parts of the Bill, we are not justified in adopting any machinery which will injure the operation of the franchise of the Dominion, if better machinery can be adopted. Well, I submit that no case can be made out for disregarding the existing machinery of the country. That machinery has been tried for many years, and there is no man bold enough to stand up on the floor of Parliament and tell us, with proofs, that the present system is a failure. I am not going to claim more virtue for one class of the people than another. I am free to admit that at times the spirit of partisanship may warp and has warped the minds of those who have been entrusted with the powers and duties of preparing the lists; I do not admit that all the errors, either intentional or accidental, would find, throughout the whole Dominion, that the errors on the one would substantially balance those on the other. In proof of that, we have an assembly gathered here to-day who claim they represent the people. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House to-day who will venture to say he does not represent the voice of the people in his riding? Has there been a member of Parliament since Confederation who has been prepared to admit, and truthfully admit, that he enjoyed his seat in Parliament through the trickery or the chicanery of those who have to do with the lists. In 1882, when this Assembly was elected, we claimed it was a representative institution. Was there any imperfection then in the system? If there was, it existed in 1878. Why did not the Government, in 1878, with its immense majority, provide a true system of representation? On the contrary, they announced to the country that they were the chosen of the people, not the chosen of a defective system, but substantially the chosen of the people. Where, then, is the evil? It is idle for hon. gentlemen to refer, as hon. gentlemen on the other side have done, to the wrong-doing of a Grit assessor or a Grit council or a Grit court of revision. Those statements prove nothing. They simply are assertions; and even if such errors have occurred, the remedy is with the people, and the people are to blame if they permit those errors to remain uncorrected. But now it is proposed to change the system which is admitted throughout the whole country to be a fair one. What greater argument has been advanced against the Liberal party in the Province of Ontario than that it had a centralising policy? When the Ontario Government took upon themselves the power to appoint bailiffs to the courts we were told that they were wresting power from the people, and every attempt was made to discredit them with the people, on the ground that they were not trusting the people, and were setting themselves up as a little oligarchy. If that were a misdemeanor on their part, is not the same criticism applicable to the Government to-day, which proposes to do, on a wholesale scale, and directly for their benefit, what they condemned others for doing, although it was not done directly for their benefit? We are told that the revising officer is to be a professional man of standing, and that he is to be free from all control; that he is to hold his office during good behavior, which means for life, and is only to be removable on a vote of this House. Well, technically, he may enjoy that position; but, after all, to whom does he owe that position? He owes it, to begin with, to the Government of the day. Is the Government, in making that choice, going to choose from the profession, without regard to the political views of the profession? What is likely to be the action of the Government in that respect? On what principle do they proceed in making appointments to the judiciary? Is it not almost an invariable rule to fill up vacancies with those entertaining political views in harmony with the Government of the day? Are they likely to depart from that rule in the choice of revising officers? True, it may be said, as a blind to the people, that those officers are to be chosen by the Governor General in Council, but we all know what that means. The Governor General can do nothing. He is a constitutional Governor; if he does anything, he acts unconstitutionally; all he has to do is to assent. Now, I am not one of those who will say or think that the members of the profession chosen to discharge these duties will, as a rule, intentionally violate their obligations. I have a higher view of human nature than that, and if I had not, at all events I should endeavor to take that hopeful and better view of the case. Nevertheless, I cannot be blind to the consideration that when a partisan is chosen by the Government to discharge such duties as will devolve on a revising officer, when I remember that he will be of the same political stripe as the Government of the day, when I remember that he will feel he owes his appointment to his had never been broached in Parliament. The fact that party, that his party is still in power, that he is not yet to-day the people's representatives in Parliament could ven-Mr. Mulock.

quietly shelved into some place on the bench, but is still fighting the battle of life, engaged in all the struggles, and has not yet given up political aspirations—when I bear in mind all these considerations I cannot but believe that however pure-minded may be these officers their actions will be influenced by the false position in which they are placed. For this reason alone we should avoid placing the choice of these judicial officers in the hands of those who are so directly interested in the manner in which these officers shall discharge these duties. I have shown that it is unnecessary, while the Government may wish to establish a Dominion franchise, that that franchise should be worked out by machinery, the creation of this House, but that the Government could use the existing machinery, that is not under their control. What have the municipal officers done that they should be set aside? Are all the past assessors and the prospective assessors of that character that they are not to be trusted? Has the action in the past of the courts of revision been such that they are not to be trusted? Will any member of the Government or of the House say that, in discharging their duties, they have been unfaithful stewards? If no one will make that charge against them as a class, on what ground are they deposed? The reason is, either that they have been unfaithful or faithful. The one answer cannot be established; the other would be a reason for continuing them in office; but here it is proposed to establish a scheme which does not commend itself to my mind as just or fair. In dealing with this question of franchise, probably the most important that is entrusted to the Government, it is their duty to so deal with it as a sacred trust that all their actions shall commend themselves to all classes of the people. Absolute fairness towards the people should be a binding obligation upon this House. Suppose that this vast power which is to be vested in these officers should be abused, and that constituency after constituency should be controlled by them, with the result that a Parliament would assemble here which did not represent the will of the people, then, truly, the prophecy of the First Minister would be verified, that free institutions in Canada were on their trial when this Bill was receiving the consideration of Parliament, and would be painfully verified when we found that free institutions had been destroyed. Why run that risk, when we have the experience of existing systems to our credit? Why bring all these troubles and complications on the people when it is not neces-Why add this burden to the people's already overladen backs? For my part, representing a constituency where the municipal principle prevails, and where, if I remember correctly, as many municipalities are controlled by Conservatives as by Reformers, I have not the first word of compaint to offer against the system, or against any individual Grit or Tory who has been entrusted with the system. On the contrary, I say that they have loyally, faithfully and honestly done their duty, irrespective of party considerations; and I think my experience is the experience of all hon. gentlemen in this House. Therefore, in the name of my constituency, at least, I protest against the deposition of these officers; I protest against the deposition of these officers; I protest against an army of lawyers being sent broadcast over the country to do the work which is now done at no cost to this country or to its Central Government; I protest against my people being saddled with the expense of maintaining this court-maintaining the lawyer, and his clerk, and his constable, paying his printing and advertising bills, his rents, his travelling expenses, and all the other etceteras incidental to the maintainance of such a court as this; I protest against this measure as unnecessary, as unwise, as calculated to produce no good result, but, on the contrary, to do grievous harm. I would wish that this proposition ture to make such a proposition to us shows that the people are somewhat careless about their rights. Is it not an ungrateful return to the people from this Government that, after they have placed them in power on two successive occasions by overwhelming majorities, after they have had confidence—and, unfortunately, too much confidence—reposed in them, they should now not only not be grateful, but should endeavor to take away from the people their control over Parliament. It would have been far better for this country if no statesman had shown himself so courageous or felt himself so firmly seated in power that he could make such a proposition to the free people of Canada, who, perhaps, are to be free no longer. Far better would it be if we could turn back the hand on the dial that has marked the flight of time, and return to the time before such a proposition was ever made to this institution.

Mr. MILLS. Before the amendment is put, I wish to move an amendment to it providing that—

The municipal or other officers who prepare the voters' lists shall divide the municipality into convenient polling divisions, but not so as to embrace more than 200 electors in any polling division, and the voters on such lists shall be arranged in alphabetical order for each of such polling divisions.

In case these propositions are not accepted, this will come up again, with regard to the functions of the revising officer, but the proposition made by my hon. friend is that the preparation of the list shall be put in the hands of local parties. If his proposition is accepted the municipal officers who prepare the voters' list under the law of the Province will be authorised to prepare the voters' list for this Parliament, not because they are provincial officers, but because we name them as the parties to perform that duty. Whatever powers they possess will be powers which we confer upon them, and will not be derived from any local authority. I have before referred to chapter 10 of the statutes of 1874, where provision is made for courts for the trial of controverted elections. You designate in that Act those courts which had an existence as provincial courts, and you confer certain powers upon them. The Privy Council has held that that court exist for the purpose of trying elections by virtue of the Act of this Parliament, and if the hon, gentleman accepts these amendments and says that the clerks of the municipalities, who, under the local law, have the power to prepare the local list, shall also have the power to prepare the list under this law, then they will be our officers for that purpose, and we can authorise them to divide the municipalities into polling divisions. They would do that better than the revising They are on the spot, they know every concession line, and the best place for polling places and for establishing polling divisions. They can state where those polling divisions shall exist, and if they fail to do that there is already a provision in the law that the returning officer can do it. The hon. gentleman, in another section, provides for an alphabetical list, but it is to be a list for an entire division. Now, it is of great consequence that this alphabetical list should be a list for the polling divisions, and in that case it will be easily exempt, and each local party who would be authorised to prepare a list in the first instance would only have to examine that portion of the list in which he is specially interested. That would be of great advantage, and if the hon gentleman wishes a fair list prepared, at hittle expense to candidates, he will secure it in this way, and will reduce the work of the revising officer to a

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am a good deal tempted to address the committee, but several considerations induce me not to enter into the discussion, especially as I think my hon. friend's amendment, as well as the amendment of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), had better be addressed to a subsequent clause. The clause now before the committee is simply empowering the Governonly.

ment to appoint a revising officer; it will certainly be his business to prepare a revised list, and in that regard the amendments are not irrelevant, I admit; but still they would come in more wholesomely, I think, in the next clause, where the whole subject will be discussed, and I am quite ready to discuss it with the hon, gentlemen.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman will see he provides that the revising officer shall prepare the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. MILLS. Then, if we carry the clause declaring that he shall prepare the list, how are we going to provide afterwards that the list shall be prepared by somebody else? If the hon, gentleman will agree to let this clause stand over, then we can have the whole question open to consideration some other time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It says that he shall prepare and revise the list; then the mode of preparation is shown in the subsequent clause. For instance, he has to get copies of the assessment roll, and such other information as he can get. I think the ingenuity of the hon, gentleman will easily prepare an amendment to that clause, which would prevent us from having a long discussion on those two amendments and, as the hon, gentleman knows, there is a desire to avoid discussion, if possible, on this clause.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon member is prepared to consider the question as to who shall prepare the list, we might amend the existing clause by striking out the word "prepare" altogether in this clause, and at a subsequent stage consider who is to prepare it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I dare say, when the Speaker is in the Chair, with a full attendance, hon. gentlemen opposite will free their consciences and minds by moving resolutions and taking divisions, so as to put themselves on record, and then, I dare say, we shall have an opportunity of discussing all the points.

Amendment (Mr. Mills) to the amendment negatived. Amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I propose to move an amendment to section 10 in pursuance of the observations I made this afternoon. I regret that the First Minister was not present and did not get the benefit of my observations, but he will see them in Hansard, and I still hope that he will accede to my proposition. The line of argument I adopted was that the Government should not have power to appoint these officials, but that the appointment should be in the hands of some independent body; that, in fact, the system pursued in England should be adopted here. I therefore move this amendment:

therefore move this amendment:

That all the words before "and," in the 29th line of section 10, page 9, be struck out, and the following substituted therefor: That within three months after the coming into force of this Act the Unief Justice of the highest court in any of the Provinces shall appoint a proper person, to be called a "revising officer," for each or any electoral district of Canada, who shall hold office during one year, and immediately before the expiration of any year the judge of any Assize for any county or counties in Canada, except in the Province of Quebec, where the Superior Court judge of the judicial district in an electoral district, or partly an electoral district, shall, at the sittings of each Assize or court, appoint a proper person as such revising officer for the judicial district for which he holds said Court of Assize, who shall hold office during or year, and such appointment shall be made by such judge from year to year, and the duties of such revising officer shall be to prepare, to revise and complete, in the manner hereinafter provided, the list of persons entitled to vote under the provisions of this Act in such judicial district.

Then I leave untouched all portions of section 10 to the word "and," and simply make provision for the appointment, declaring that it shall be made in the first instance by the Chief Justice, and subsequently by the judge of the Court of Assize. The officer so appointed will hold office during one year only. Substantially this amendment is the adoption of the English law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It does not say one year only.

Mr. CAMERON. The officer is appointed for a year. I provide that before the expiration of the year a judge of Assize will appoint some one to succeed him, and so on from year to year. The same person may be re-appointed.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. LANGELIER. I beg to move the following amendment:-

1. The secretary-treasurer or clerk of each municipality in the Province of Quebec shall, on or before the first judicial day in January in each year, make, in duplicate, a list, in alphabetical order, of all persons who, according to the valuation roll then in force in the municipality for local purposes, and as revised, if it has been revised, even for local purposes, appear to be electors by reason of the real estate possessed or occupied by them within the municipality, or by reason of their being sons of proprietors of real estate, or by reason of his revenue or earnings, as provided by this Act.

2. The secretary-treasurer or clerk, in drawing up the list of electors, shall distinguish the persons who appear to be qualified as owners, from those who appear to be qualified as tenants or occupants, or owners' sons, or as having a revenue or earnings, and shall specify the real estate of those who are qualified on real estate.

Amendment negatived.

On section 11.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In this section the word may" is changed to "shall." In the section as drawn it applies to every Province but Quebec, in regard to which there are special provisions. British Columbia is now added, because on the mainland there are no judges available and no barristers; but there are stipendary magistrates and gold commissioners, who possess civil and I think criminal jurisdiction; those are experienced men and will perform the duty in a very satisfactory manner. With regard to Quebec, the word "notary" is inserted, because notaries form a branch of the local profession and are specially acquainted with the conveyance of real estate and are fully as qualified, and perhaps in some respects better qualified, than many advocates, to discharge the duty of revising officers. I provide, also, that a revising officer may be appointed for and be required to discharge the duties of more than one electorial district. I find that county judges, or, at all events several of them-a good many of them now, from whom we have had communications—are not at all afraid of the duties, and have expressed their perfect willingness to undertake more than one electoral district. I also provide that a revising officer may be appointed for a portion of an electorial district, so that if a county judge of a judicial district has lost, for electoral purposes, cortain townships of his county, and they have passed to another county, it may be more convenient that he should have charge, as revising officer, of the whole judicial district, although a portion of it may belong to another electoral district. These are the amendments I propose to the clause.

Mr. MILLS. In the Province of Ontario there are something like forty judicial districts, and if the hon. gentleman were to allow the judge to act for his own judicial district it would be of no consequence to any candidate, or any member, whether the portion of the district for which the judge acts is embraced under the judge of one county or another. In that way every electoral district would be embraced under the jurisdiction of some judge or other, but what the hon, gentleman proposes now is to confine the judge to the électoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it is just the other way.

Mr. MILLS. Which other way?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object is that the county judge, when it possibly can be done, shall be the revising officer for the whole of his judicial district, but I must make this provision, because a revising officer must be provided for the electoral district. I may say that the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B., who is not in his place, wished to insert the Surrogate judge, that is, for New Brunswick, but I am not exactly prepared to accept that.

Mr. DAVIES. The amendment simply amounts to this, that it leaves the discretion in the Government to appoint either a county court judge or a barrister of five years' standing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. That is the main objection, as we understand, that has been urged on this side during the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is so.

Mr. DAVIES. I need not repeat the arguments against that objection, but propose to submit an amendment, which is pretty much in the line of the hon. gentleman's amendment, but omitting this objectionable portion, which permits the Government to select in any particular district, a barrister of five years' standing instead of a county court judge. I need not repeat the arguments which were advanced so forcibly this afternoon. The hon, gentleman remembers that it was urged by the opponents of this provision that it left the power in the hands of the First Minister, for the time being, to appoint, in those districts which were closely contested, not a county court judge, but a barrister, and in that case, ex necessitate, from the condition of politics in this country, the appointements would be made on the recommendation of the member for the county, or the chief political wire-ruller in the county. The First Minister would not, of course, be bound to accept every recommendation, but practically that is what it comes to. Well, we have had experience of that, and the hon. gentleman, though he shakes his head, will acknowledge that while he may exercise firm control and keep a firm hand on the reins in the guidance of his party generally, still, in making appointments in particular districts he has to give way, largely, to the member representing those districts, or the main politicians in those districts. Now, whatever virulence or bitterness there may exist in districts where there are large majorities on one side or on the other, we know that that virulence and bitterness are intensified in counties where the majority is very small, and we know that the temptation to pass over the county judge and appoint a partisan barrister would be ten times as great in a county where the majority is 5, 10, 20 or 30, as in the county where there are 200 or 300 on one side or the other. In point of fact, in those counties in which the majorities range from appoint a judicial officer, who is removed from political 100 to 500 there would be little objection to appointing a feelings and leanings altogether, and in whom the public barrister of five years' standing; and why? Because his have confidence, and in case of the inability of that officer power for doing evil would be minimised by the existence of the enormous majority, and little objection could be taken to his appointment. He could not do a great deal of harm. even if he desired; but I put it to hon, gentlemen who want the Bill framed in such a way as to do even-handed justice, can it be defended that in 8, 10 or 15 counties, where the majorities range from 5 to 20-is it fair to place in the hands of the political party in power the right to appoint the man who shall make up the lists and revise them? We know what it means, and if we were to debate it for ten hours more we could not make it clearer. It is patent to the minds of every one. I only want to put the fact on record, and as it is not contradicted I assume it may be stated as a fact, admitted by both sides, that in counties where the majorities are from 5 to 20, the appointment of the revising barrister, if vested in the Prime Minister for the time being, means the control of the county. There is no question about that; it is not denied, and therefore I say the First Minister is retaining in this clause the most objectionable feature in the Bill, next to the Indian clause, and that is the right to appoint, in those counties, not the county court judge, not a stipendiary magistrate or notary, but a barrister of five years' standing. It has been argued, and argued well to-night—argued irresistibly, to my mind—that you do not appoint first-class men for revising barristers. It has been urged that first-class barristers were men of high character. We know that the men occupying the first positions at the bar are men of high character. They would not be there if they were not, and if these men were appointed we would have some guarantee that justice would be done. But we know that the men who will accept these appointments will not be such men; they will be political hacks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; yes, yes.

Mr. DAVIES. We all know that, from personal experience. Take the great Province of Ontario: is there an hon. gentleman in this House who imagines that any one of the first ten or twenty barristers of that Province would accept these positions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIES. And, therefore, it is the gentlemen who are not holding briefs, who are just coming to the bar, who, perhaps, have strong political aspirations, strong political leanings or feelings, who have not practiced—they are the men who will be prepared to accept these appointments and will use all the means in their power to get them. So in the Maritime Provinces. It is not supposed that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) or any one occupying his position, would take such a position, even if it were offered to him. An hon. friend says he would not get it, but even if he could get it he would not take it. Who will take these positions, then? The juniors, the young men beginning life, and who hope to make positions for themselves, politically. Not the man who is striving to make advance. ment in his profession, purely as a professional man, not the man who hopes to reach the top of his profession by proving himself to be a lawyer of high attainments, because he knows that by confining himself to legitimate practice he will soon reach a proper place in his profession. But it is the man who has not got these hopes and attainments, but who hopes for political preferment, who will seek for and obtain these appointments. Now, I think that is highly undesirable; I do not think hon members on either side should desire it; I think it would meet with general acceptance on the part of the majority of this House if the Prime Minister for the time being—I do not care whether he is Liberal or Conservative—was obliged to to discharge the duties of revising officer, then to vest the to speak so positively as he has done. I did not mean where the vacancy arises. The Chief Justices of the Provinces do not belong to any one political party. Whatever they may have been, nowadays they are not partisans at all. Holding the positions they do they are removed from party politics.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Speak for your own Province.

Mr. DAVIES. I will speak for my own Province, and I will do more, for I have the honor of the acquaintance of the Chief Justices of more than one Province. I think I am speaking for the judiciary of the Dominion of Canada when I say that those who have attained to the positions of Chief Justices of the respective Provinces have left their party politics behind them, and are impartial, and fair and just; and I do not think the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) will dare to stand up on the floor of this House and assert that on the part of any of the Chief Justices there has been any partisanship. I know the venerable Chief Justice of the Province of New Brunswick, and a gentleman more respected and impartial does not exist in any part of the Dominion of Canada, and I am sure he is held in high respect by the hon. gentleman himself, and by the Conservatives of New Brunswick as well as by the Liberals. In fact, I do not know what party in politics he belongs to, because he has been for twenty years removed from the political arena.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. DAVIES. Why, I am speaking right to the kernel of the question; I am advocating that in cases where a county court judge cannot, from any cause, discharge the duties of revising officer, the place shall be filled by the Chief Justice of the particular Province. This amendment cannot be said to be prompted by political feelings, because I believe that if you go back to the political leanings of the Chief Justices of the several Provinces you will find that more of them were Conservatives than Liberals. However, my experience of the bar has gone over fifteen or sixteen years, and I think I am in unison with all the members of the bar, on this side of the House, at any rate, when I say that none of us have found in the Chief Justices of any of the Provinces any political feelings to prejudice or mar their judgments. I move, in amendment, the following:

The county court judge in each county where there is such judge shall be the revising officer for the electoral district or districts, or parts of an electoral district, within such county, and in the Province of Quebec the Superior Court judge of the judicial district in each electoral district or part of an electoral district, shall be the revising officer for such district or part of a district. In any case where a judge, who is a revising officer under the Act, shall be unable to discharge the duties of revising officer for his entire county, or for any part thereof, he shall forthwith signify such his inability to the Chief Justice of the highest court of his Province, and if his inability extends only to a part of his county, he shall specify particularly which part, and such Chief Justice shall thereupon forthwith appoint another county judge or a barrister of at least five years' standing as revising officer in the place of the judge so signifying his inability to act for the county or part of the county, as the case may be, and the person so appointed shall have all the powers conferred upon a county judge acting as a revising officer under this Act.

This provides, in the first place, that the county judge shall be the revising officer, and in case of his inability to act, the Chief Justice of the Province shall appoint another judge or a barrister to act in his place. If he appoints a barrister, the presumption is that he will appoint a man who will be impartial, while if that appointment is made by the Premier, the presumption is that it will be political.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). It may bring rather cheap popularity on the part of the hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat to declaim so loudly in favor of the Chief Justices of the different Provinces of the Dominion. All I said to the appointment in the Chief Justice of the particular Provinces thereby to imply that any of them were partisans in poli-where the vacancy arises. The Chief Justices of the Provinces tics. I do not believe he knows the Chief Justice of New Brunswick sufficiently to be able to speak as positively as he has done. That does not lead me to state, on the hon. gentleman's challenge, that he is a political partisan; but I say this, that, speaking for New Brunswick, I would prefer not to have this duty imposed on the Chief Justice of that Province—not casting any imputation upon him, but because I think the Chief Justice should be entirely free from the suspicion of being a par-tisan. How would it be if the Chief Justice appointed the revising barrister? As party politics go, there are very few lawyers who do not adhere to one side of politics or the other. I do not mean to say that they would not do their duty impartially on that account; but what position would the Chief Justice be placed in? He would have to choose, in each of the 14 or 15 counties, a partisan on one side or the other, and by so doing he would probably leave it open to some partisan to say: He is a partisan himself; he has chosen a Grit here or a Conservative there; and he has taken the advice of so-and-so to do it—for he would necessarily have to take the advice of some one, and I am free to admit that he would be quite as ready to take the advice of our opponents as of our friends.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman has not evidently heard the amendment. I do not propose that all the appointments shall be in the hands of the Chief Justice. I propose that the county judges shall be revising officers, and it is only in case of their inability to act that I propose to vest the appointment, not in the Premier of the Dominion, who must necessarily be a partisan, but in the Chief Justice of the Province, who is necessarily removed from party influence; and I would ask my hon. friend, who belongs to the party which boasts that it derives its inspiration from England, whether the judges who appoint revising officers there are considered by the people of England to be partisans, or to necessarily appoint partisans.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The circumstances of the two countries are entirely different. In England, you have a very large population and a very large bar, a great portion of whom are not partisans, on one side or the other. In this country, and more particularly in the Provinces, there is a small bar, a small number of men qualified to accept the position, and the appointments would necessarily, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Kent (M. Landry), been pointed out by my not. Including the result of the point of partisanship, to which, in the case of England, they are not. The appointments are vested in the judges of Assizes in England, because on their various circuits there is a large attendance of briefless barristers, who go on circuit as soon as they are called, and who have no decided political convictions on one side or the other, so that there is a field of selection there which we have not in this country; and I quite agree with the observations of my hon. friend from Kent, that it would be very undesirable to introduce further Chief Justices, or other judges of this country into the arena of politics. I do not think their introduction into politics, so far as they have been introduced, by giving them the trial of election cases, has been beneficial to the estimation in which they are held by the public for impartiality. We have seen, in our Province, judges accused, most unjustly and disgracefully, of partisanship, to which charge they were in no respect open. We have seen one of our judges so basely and unjustly accused of partisanship that not only he but several of his brother judges have deemed it necessary, from the bench, in their charges to the jury, to refer to those accusations and to condemn them; and we would find the same accusations repeated in reference to the appointment of revising barhon, gentleman was, that he had not such an acquaintance risters by a Chief Justice or by a judge, if that system were with the Chief Justices of the other Provinces as to be able introduced here. That system would be still further introducing the bench into politics, out of which, undoubtedly I have heard it said, ad nauseam, that, drawing inspirations the bench had better be kept.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon member for Kent (Mr. Landry) thinks it would not do to call upon a judge or a Chief Justice to appoint these officers, because he would be suspected by the people of acting in a partisan manner if he made the appointment, and that would be, of course, bad for the judge, and it would be bad for the revising officer. It would be bad for the revising officer, because he would hold his appointment from a tainted and suspected source, and his decisions would hardly be received with that respect with which they would be received if he were appointed by a person who was not a partisan. That is very plain; the very function which the revising officer is called upon to discharge would be rendered more difficult to discharge.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I have not said that.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course the hon, gentleman did not say that, but it is the inevitable inference from what he did say. It is the conclusion that inevitably follows from his argument. If the people suspected the judge to be partisan because he made the appointment, they would suspect the person appointed to be a partisan. But how strong a position is that revising officer to occupy when he is appointed, not by a judge, whose ordinary business is to dispense justice, who. I believe, has the respect of the population—and particularly the Chief Justices, who, as a rule, for a long time, have left the struggles of the bar and of political life and have become more inured than the puisne judges to the routine and calm of judicial life, and that serener atmosphere which is said there to prevail but by the First Minister If he is to be suspected to be appointed improperly when appointed by a judge, if that suspicion is to arise and to be made a substantial difficulty in that case, in what light is he to be regarded when he holds his appointment from the head of a political party which has the majority for the time being? It is quite clear his position must be much weaker than that of the revising officer appointed by the judge. The hon, gentleman says we must keep the judges free from the suspicion of being partisans, and in order to keep them free from the suspicion of partisanship, which would follow from their being given this particular appointment, to be discharged by them as a high function connected with the administration of justice to the people, for the right to be a voter is a part of the common justice of the country-in order to prevent them from being suspected of partisanship in the administration of this function we are to refuse to entrust them with the duty with which the English judges are entrusted, and we are to hand over to the First Minister of the day that duty, although the English people say that they would not trust the First Minister of the day with it. The English people say: We will trust our judges; we will not trust the First Minister of the day. The hon, gentleman says the Canadian people are not to say: We will not trust the judges, but we will trust the First Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the first place, the difference between the appointments in England and the appointments that are to be made in this Bill are very remarkable, in one instance. Hon, gentlemen opposite say: Oh, these young barristers will be briefless barristers. They will have no buisness; men leading the profession will not accept the appointment. Who are appointed in England but young barristers, who get a hundred guineas, or thereabouts, by the judges? They are young; they have political aspirations. An hon, gentleman said last night, if they do not get large pecuniary remuneration they will look to political advantages. That same argument is applicable in England as it is here, with this marked difference that here the majority of the revising barristers will be judges, whereas in England they are all young men. Then, from English laws and English institutions, this legislation is unheard of, that it could not be possible to happen in England. Well, in the Imperial statutes of 1884—I am not going to mistake the Chancellor for the Chief Justice this time—47-48 Victoria, chapter 35, passed last July, with respect to the county of Dublin, where the revising barrister was a judge, the Recorder of Dublin, that position is taken away from him: "It shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland for the time being, from time to time to appoint a barristerat-law, who shall have actually practised for ten years at least in the Superior Courts of Dublin and shall not, at the time of his appointment, have ceased to practice, to discharge all the duties in regard to the registration of voters and the revision of the lists of jurors in the county of Dublin, which were capable of being discharged by the Recorder of Dublin." Thus, only last year, under this Act, the office of revising barrister was taken away from the Recorder of Dublin and handed over to Lord Spencer, who has got constitutional advisors, and we did not find, from Mr. Parnell or any of those who serve under him, and are continually denouncing the tyranny, oppression and unconstitutional action of the Castle, the barbarous oppression that has been practised in Ireland by the Castle authorities. one single objection raised to the Lord Lieutenant appointing a revising barrister for the county of Dublin.

Mr. BLAKE. There is such a thing as the exception proving the rule, and out of 600 or 700 constituencies of Great Britain and Ireland, the hon. gentleman has found a statute passed, I do not remember under what circumstances, or whether Mr. Parnell objected to it or not—probably the hon. gentleman has looked at Hansard and found he did not. It is very surprising that he did not; I think he could not have been there, or else he would—we do not know what particular reasons there were to justify this particular case, but certainly it was not the rule.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the commencement of my system.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the thin end of the wedge, and they put it in in Dublin city. My impression is there was some strong reason given for that, and the proof is that the provision which makes him a political officer also gives him the duty of revising the lists of jurors as well.

Mr. BERGIN. Is not that a political thing in Ireland?

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know. I do not know what side the hon, gentleman now takes upon that very large question he now puts to me. I remember when he took one side; I do not know whether he now takes that or the other side on these Irish questions. The argument on this question from hon, gentlemen opposite is a little inconsistent. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) told us a little while ago that the case in England was quite different from what it was here. There, he said, there were a great number of barristers, a wealth of barristers, in every place, who were not partisans, who were not politicians at all, who were entirely neutral, and that there was ample room to choose men who were perfectly independent and in whom the people would have confidence, and that there would be no difficulty, therefore, of the judges making a selection, without being obnoxious to those charges of partisanship which are given as a reason why they should not appoint these officers here. The First Minister does not say the same thing. He says it is the young, briefless barrister, who is looking for preferment, whom they appoint.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is what you said yesterday.

cable in Rugland as it is here, with this marked difference that here the majority of the revising barristers will be judges, whereas in England they are all young men. Then, situation of affairs. I do not remember any instances of the appointees being revising barristers except one, and certainly, though he was not a gentleman in very large practice, he was not, in the sense of the hon. gentleman, a young, briefless barrister. I only remember his name because the Lord Chief Justice of England, who had appointed him successively for years, in the end declined to renew his appointment-I refer to Edmond Beales. He had been appointed for several years by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, and though he had not a very large practice he was a man of considerable knowledge and of considerable eminence—a marked person. The Lord Chief Justice had occasion to deal with the question whether Mr. Beales should be reappointed, and Mr. Beales had taken a very active part in a particular political party agitation, at the time, and the Lord Chief Justice declared that he thought it inexpedient to reappoint Mr. Beales, and Mr. Beales applied to know the reason, inasmuch as it was, in a sense, a stigma on him not to be reappointed, and the Lord Chief Justice wrote a public letter, in which he explained his views, not that he condemned Mr. Beales or thought that it was at all certain that he would be influenced, but he thought the public confidence would be, to a certain extent, impaired by the continued appointment of a person who had felt it to be his duty—as no doubt it was his duty, as a free citizen, entertaining those feelings—to take an active part in a particular agitation at the moment, to take part in the revision of those lists. That was the view of such a high judicial functionary as Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, who, as a politician, when he was a politician, belonged to the same party as Mr. Beales. He, therefore, might be supposed to sympathise, if he had any sympathies, with that style of view which Mr. Beales adopted. Can we expect that from the Minister of the day, who is to make the appointment here. We cannot expect such a line of action. I say there is no ground whatever for our deciding that our judges are less worthy of confidence than the judges in England, and that our First Ministers are more worthy of confidence than the First Ministers in England; and yet, that is the proposition of hon. gentlemen who sustain the proposition of the Government and decline

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). The hon. gentleman has shown it seems to me, his usual ability, in getting a meaning out of what is said by another entirely different from the ordinary meaning attached to the words used. If the language I have used could imply in any way what the hon. gentleman has said, I was very unfortunate in my choice of language; that is, that because a revising barrister was named by the Chief Justice, the public would look upon him with suspicion, because the source which appointed him was stained, politically. I have never used any language which would give that meaning, and yet the hon gentleman deduced from the position I took that that was the case. What I meant to say was, that while the judge might make as impartial a choice as could be made, as politics stood in this Dominion now, he could not, under any circumstances, name any one who was not a political partisan, in the sense of being on one side of politics or the other. He would name a barrister this year; the barrister would fulfil his duties; he would give dissatisfaction to somebody, to one side or the other, I care not which; he might lay himself open to being discussed on the public hustings and in the public press, to have his name heralded all over the country, and the next year the same Chief Justice would have to make the choice again. He would have to decide upon the opinions put forth in the public press as to whether he had made a good choice or not the first time, and in doing so he must necessarily decide for the contention of one party against the contention of the other, he would have to say: I have weighed the Mr. BLAKE what has been said in his favor, and I must make the choice. and decide for one side of politics or the other in making the choice for the next year. There is an immense difference between the Government making the nomination and the Chief Justice making it, because the Chief Justice must hold himself entirely aloof from politics, he must do nothing which would appear a choice between the parties; and if he does not do that the first year, he must necessarily do it the next year, when sides have been taken for and against his nominee of the first year. There is a very great difference. If there should be political differences among the people as to the choice made by the Chief Justice, how are they going to visit it upon him in any way, except by being suspicious of him? They have no recourse against him. They have against the Prime Minister, if he makes a poor choice. If the Government make a poor nomination, if the nominee shows himself a violent partisan, and does injustice to one party or the other, by the decisions he may give or the lists he may pre-pare, the country can condemn the officer and can condemn the Government, and put them out of power. How can they reach the Chief Justice? Only by mutterings, or by throwing suspicion upon his character as a judge, and in that way sapping the very foundation of justice. With the that way sapping the very foundation of justice. With the Prime Minister it is different. They have a right to approve or disapprove of his actions, and to try to get the dominant party in the Dominion to oust him from his power if he makes a bad choice. One is a man who has a right to be a political partisan, I do not mean to the extent of doing an injustice to any one, but to the extent of upholding his party honestly, and making the choice, all other things being equal, between his opponents and his friends. It is the duty of any Government, not to do injustice to anyone, but to choose their friends instead of their opponents, when other things are equal. But the Chief Justice has no such right, and would leave himself open to suspicion in such a case, without remedy or redress on the part of the public.

Mr. BLAKE. Then this is too delicate a task for an independent man to perform. It is so delicate a task that an independent man, occupying an independent position, ought not to be asked to undertake a task of such delicacy and difficulty, but it is to be left to one of the parties to choose the arbitrator between it and the other party.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I speak under correction, because it is many years since I resided in Dublin, but my recollection is that the Recorder used to be an officer of the corporation in Dublin.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very likely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that is the case. We know only too well, however, and we must regret it, that the relations between the corporation of Dublin and the Government of England have been strained to the last degree, and most undoubtedly, as between the two, it may have become necessary for the Government of England to take the matter into their own hands, knowing that, if the Recorder was an officer, as I think he is, of the corporation of Dublin, empowered to choose the jury list, it would be a very questionable thing to obtain a conviction of any offender under a jury list made by an officer of that corporation. I am sorry to have to say it, but it is the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite true. Recorder is appointed by the corporation, and he might be a very proper person, when political feeling is runing high and political trials are going on, to select the jurors. But here the selection of the jurors is taken away from him, and the power is given to the Lord Lieutenant and not to the pros and cons, what has been said against this officer and I Chief Justice, in Ireland, or to any Chief Justice, to appoint the revising officer. It is given expressly to the Lord Lieutenant. In case of the absence of the revising barrister, if the Lord Chancellor, or Keeper, or Commissioner of the Great Seal for Ireland, for the time being, are satisfied the revising officer for the county of Dublin is unable, from unavoidable absence, to discharge his duty, it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal to appoint some other person. He is sworn of the Privy Council.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid it is like a good deal of English legislation for Ireland, experimentum incorpore vili.

Mr. MILLS. This subject is one of far greater importance than hon, gentlemen opposite seem to think. We must remember that we are taking, in this matter, a retrogressive step; we are going back upon the policy of the Government for the last fifteen years. Formerly we had controverted elections tried by this House, and we took the matter out of the hands of the House of Commons and entrusted it to the ordinary tribunals of the country. Now, one hon, gentleman opposite this evening has regretted this step. He says it has been a disadvantage to the courts. But anxious as the hon, gentleman at the head of the Government is to adopt a policy of retrogression and to incorporate ancient abuses in the legislation of the country, he has not ventured to propose a return to the ancient system of trying controverted elections in this House. But it does seem to me that it is quite as important to secure a proper voters' list and to prevent political parties tampering with that list, as it is to secure a proper trial of controverted elections. The hon, member for Kent (Mr. Landry) says that if the First Minister makes bad appointments he will still be responsible to the House, and who, he asks, is to hold the judge responsible? I say the judge is far more responsible than the First Minister, for he can be attacked by Parliament if he fails to discharge his duty properly. This proposition provides that Parliament shall exercise the power of appointment, and that the judges shall be appointed for the purpose of trying controverted elections; and it is only in case a judge intimates his inability to do that that the Chief Justice of the Province shall make the appointment; and if a judge should abuse his powers in this matter, which is extremely unlikely, the number of cases would be so few that it would not, in all probability, seriously affect the representation in Parliament. But the hon, gentleman proposes to put into the hands of one man not merely a few isolated cases, but the appointment of revising officers, who make up the voters' lists, over the entire Dominion.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Not one man.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; it is in the hands of the Prime Minister for the time being. The hon, gentleman says that if the Prime Minister acts improperly the public will hold him responsible. But I say, if Parliament itself is corrupted, if the men returned to Parliament are returned upon a corrupt list, how are you to obtain redress from a Parliament so constituted? How are you to punish the Prime Minister for improper action, in a Parliament where a majority of the members have been elected by means of that improper action? Are they going to sit in condemnation of an act by means of which they succeeded in getting into Parliament? Sir, we have, for some time, been trying, by slow degres, to secure reform. We have succeeded in securing a fixed period for elections all over the country. We remember the election of 1867, and again in 1872, when some took place in the month of July, some in August, and some late in September. That abuse has now been corrected by legislation. Then we proposed that certain responsible officers should be returning officers. But the hon gentleman has repealed that law by the majority that supported him in Parliament. He has taken the appointment of returning officers into his own hands. He names whom he pleases, and some of those gentlemen, at the last election, whom he named, committed gross abuses. The hon gentleman shakes his head, but I tell him it is a fact. I say that, in my case, in my constituency, the returning officer whom he named was a perjured man; I say he opened the ballot boxes, contrary to his oath, that he took papers out of those ballot boxes, and that he tampered with the ballots.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I am in order. I am stating facts. I am stating what has grown up under the law, as the hon, gentleman has made it. Now, he proposes to take another step and to interfere with the purity of the election by corrupting the voters' lists, by stuffing voters' lists, instead of stuffing the ballot box. He will not consent that Parliament shall state who are to be the parties who shall make these lists. He is not willing that the judges of certain courts shall do, in this country, what the judges of certain courts have power to do in England; he proposes to take into his own hands the appointment of revising officers. If judges are appointed, it is because he chooses to name them, and we know what the result will be. The hon. gentleman's conduct as Administrator in this country is sufficiently well known. We can judge as to the future by what has been done in the past. In the ninety-two electoral districts of Ontario judges may be appointed in forty or fifty. To do what? To prepare voters' lists where a majority of the voters is known to be unalterably Tory or unalterably Reform. But were the parties are nearly equally divided, revising barristers, who have sympathy with the hon. gentleman, and who will seek to secure his good opinion, and promotion at his hands, will be the most available officers; and they may alter the voters' list in such a way, by altering the valuation of the property on which the party qualifies, so as to affect the results of the elections. In every general election since Confederation 5 per cent. of the votes taken off one side and added to the other would change the political complexion of the Government. If that be so, it is easy to see what an immense power revising officers will have. The hon. gentleman has said that $150 will be the qualification. revising officer may decide that a certain property is not worth that amount, and that the person in question cannot go on the list. Another party has a property of a certain amount, and although the assessor holds that it is not of the required amount his name will be put on the list. So, the results of elections may be determined, not at the polls, but at the time the revising officers prepare the voters' lists. We wish to have a fair and proper list made, and we cannot have such so long as the appointment of the revising officer is in the hands of the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon, member for Simcoe this afternoon made a charge against the returning officer at the late Bothwell election, which I did not think it necessary to notice at that time, because the hon, gentleman knows nothing about it, except what he has read in the Globe. But the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) just now repeated that charge, and he knows all about it.

Mr. MILLS. I do.

ment? Sir, we have, for some time, been trying, by slow degres, to secure reform. We have succeeded in securing a fixed period for elections all over the country. We romember the election of 1867, and again in 1872, when some took place in the month of July, some in August, and some late in September. That abuse has now been corrected by legislation. Then we proposed that certain responsible officers should be returning officers. But the hon gentleman's attack upon him now is, that the judge man has repealed that law by the majority that supported that he ordered the hon. gentleman to pay the returning officer's costs.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to say-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. MILLS. I think, after the hon. gentleman's statement, I may be allowed to make a somewhat more specific statement.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to address himself to the clause under discussion.

Mr. DAVIES. I have a remark to offer with regard to the precedent which the First Minister has cited in support of his proposition. I have not had an opportunity of looking at Hansard, and I suppose the hon gentleman has.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Parnell made no opposition to the proposal. Whether the hon. gentleman is wright or wrong, we will ascertain afterwards. I submit this to the committee: In the Empire of Great Britain appointments are made to the position of revising barrister by the judges who go on Assize; but there is one exception, and I give the hon. gentleman credit for having ferretted it out. He has found an exception, and where is that exception? We have heard, year after year, and we know it as a matter of history, that Ireland has been in a state of quasi-rebellion, that it has been exceptionally governed, governed almost as a Crown colony; that the Habeas Corpus Act has been suspended; that the Crimes Act is in force; that there are measures adopted in regard to Ireland which would not be justified in any other part of the British Dominions, and which even the Prime Minister of Canada could not justify, if he attempted to apply them to the Dominion. In order to justify this provision, the First Minister has had to go to Ireland, to that misgoverned country; and he has extracted from it the one single precedent, to justify the adoption of this clause here; and therefore hon, gentlemen who sit behind him approve his conduct, and disapprove of the general policy of the British law; they approve the particular, exceptional legislation, applicable to the exceptional circumstances of Ireland alone.

Amendment to amendment negatived.

Committee rose and reported progress.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that the Senate had passed the Canada Temperance Act Amendment Bill, from this House, with certain amendments.

Mr. JAMIESON. I should like to ask the leader of the Government whether an early day could not be fixed for the consideration of these amendments.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not know what they are.

Mr. JAMIESON. I believe important amendments have been made, and I think every facility should be given for their consideration.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. BOWELL presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:-

Mr. Cameron (Victoria).

Territories, this sum being in addition to the amount submitted by His Excellency, under date the 11th of April last.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA, 22nd May, 1885.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the Message be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BOWELL. If the House consents, it is absolutely necessary that the Government should be furnished with an additional sum to that which has already been voted by the House a short time ago-$700,000-to meet the expenses which have been incurred in the unfortunate troubles in the North-West, and I would ask permission to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply on His Excellency's Message, and the estimate of $1,000,000, to meet the expenses in connection with the North-West troubles.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that all that is necessary is to call the order. The Message has been referred to Supply. There is an order to go into Committee of Supply, and if you call that order it is sufficient.

Mr. BOWELL. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I followed precisely the practice which was pursued when my hon. friend the Minister of Militia moved the House into Committee of Supply, when he asked for the vote of $700,000. If that practice was wrong, I am wrong; but I took the resolution, word for word, from the proceedings of the House.

Mr. CARON. On a previous occasion, it will be remembered that it was my duty, as Minister of Militia, to appeal to the patriotism of this honorable House to consent that the rules should be suspended, and that the House should go into committee and pass the vote that I asked, to meet the first expenses occasioned by the outbreak in the North-West. The appeal which I made was received as I expected it would be, and I met with the response which I anticipated from the hon, members of this House. The vote which I then asked for was at the very outbreak of the disturbances in the North-West. To-day I have to make the same appeal to the House and to ask for a further sum of $1,000,000 to meet the expenses in connection with those disturbances. But to-day, I am glad to say, that the appeal which I make is made under more favorable circumstances than the one which was last made. Through the pluck of our volunteers, through the management of the Major-General Commanding, and his officers and staff, the troubles which at one time appeared possible might last longer than we can now see they will last, are now pretty well ended. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that up to the present time the Department have been very anxious, indeed, as will be readily understood by hon, members of this House, that the pay of the men should be met punctually and without any possible delay. The sum of money which was entrusted to the Department of Militia, the sum of $700,000, has now been expended, and it becomes necessary to provide for the pay of our volunteers who are still at the front. I may say that we calculate that the pay and subsistence of about 6,000 men, composing the present force, comes to about half a million per month; the expense incurred, so far as transport is concerned, and forage for about 700 horses, which compose the force comprising the artillery and the mounted force, are very heavy, and I now ask and hope that the House will follow the example of what it has already done, and will consent to the rules being suspended, and to the vote being agreed to and concurred in to-night.

Mr. BLAKE. On the former occasion the notice of the vote was on the Table for a great many days, and the Message having been delivered to the House it was com-The Governor General submits to the House of Commons the expediency of granting $1,000,000 for the purpose of meeting the expenses now being incurred in connection with the troubles in the North-West petent for the hon, gentleman to have moved the House into committee, in accordance with the regular rules, to have taken the regular stages, which are proper for money resolutions, which are prescribed as the proper stages of deliberation in such important matters. The hon. gentleman on that occasion did not take that course; although he had brought down the Message, although it had been laid on the Table, although he had placed himself in a position to go through the regular course of procedure, he abstained from taking that course, until on one evening, when he informed us that the Treasury was absolutely empty, so far as his appropriation was concerned, and he called upon us to suspend all the rules, in order that he might be able at once to carry out those financial arrangements which his own neglect to proceed earlier had rendered it impossible to proceed with regularly. Upon that occasion I expressed my regret that the hon. gentleman, having known that he had a war on his hands, having known that he would want an extra vote, had not applied earlier, and when he did take the initiatory stage of bringing down the Message, had not acted upon it earlier, so that the regular course might have been followed; but I said that under the circumstances, and on the statement which the hon. gentleman made, I should not, for my part, interpose any obstacle to the suspension of the rules upon that occasion. I certainly did not expect that the hon. gentleman would propose to repeat the same policy. I make no objection, although I think it an unreasonable thing that the hon, gentleman should bring the Message down at ten o'clock at night and propose to take a vote in Committee of Supply upon it at the instant. Still, that is the rule of the House. I believe he is entitled, according to the rule of Parliament, having brought this Message down, having procured the reference to Committee of Supply, the order for Supply being on the Paper, to go into Supply. But, Sir, the Message you read is dated the 22nd of May. It is dated one week ago, and for a week the hon, gentleman has been carrying the Message about in his pocket, and he lays it on the Table at ten o'clock Friday night, and he says, not merely do I wish to go into committee, but to obtain concurrence in the vote. Now, what excuse is there for that? More than a week ago the hon. gentleman had found that he wanted a million. On the 22nd of May he gets a Message, but he does not bring it down on the 22nd, or in any one of the intervening six lawful days; but he brings it down now, and he says: I must ask you to suspend all rules? Why? Because, I have neglected my duty, because I have not brought down the Message earlier; because, knowing that I wanted the money, I procured that authority to get the money, but I kept that authority in my pocket, instead of presenting it to Parliament. I make no objection to going into Supply, but when we get out it will be time to consider when the report shall be received.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir PECHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to enquire from the Minister of Militia whether this $1,700,000—that is to say, this sum and the sum we voted before—will, as far as he knows, clear what may be called the military expenses of the expedition. I presume it is for military purposes alone that he requires it, and can he give us any rough estimate—of course, I cannot expect a detailed estimate—of what more expenses may be incurred? I should imagine, from what he stated, that this would about close his expenditure up to date, not more.

Mr. CARON. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the expenditure exceeds the vote which I am now taking. Hon. toon in any other spirit than that. When things have to be gentlemen will understand how extremely difficult it has been for the Department to get the vouchers—indeed, to get great distance, no man, having the smallest feeling of fair accounts, from the more remote portions of the North-West Territories. I have endeavored to get in the accounts as rapidly as possible, and within a very short time now I hope to be able to lay before the House an approximate estimate, much more exact than anything I could give to-night, of what the expenditure will be.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has given us an estimate of the pay of a certain number of men for two months, for transport, and for some other necessaries. Is this estimate for the same classes of expenditure, or does it include expenditure for munitions of war?

Mr. CARON. No munitions of war at all.

Mr. BLAKE. Men's pay and transport?

Mr. CARON. Subsistence, transport and forage.

Mr. BLAKE. Does it include the purchase of animals?

Mr. CARON. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Have there been any horses purchased?

Mr. CARON. No. Not out of the amount granted.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon, gentleman not give us some character of estimate as he gave us at the time of his initiatory vote?

Mr. CARON. The only estimate I could give is the one the hon, gentleman has himself given. It would be quite impossible for me to give any more information than I have given to-night. It would be useless for me to attempt to give any information which would not be exact, and it is impossible for me to be any more precise until I have received the information which I have just referred to as being expected to come into the Department within a few days. The amount of money now asked for is for the purpose of meeting the expenses incurred by the pay of about 6,000 men, and I calculate about 700 horses; but even that is only approximate. The transport has been, as we all know, very heavy, and we have had to purchase supplieswhich had to be sent at very large expense, from the fact that no delay could be allowed—to meet the wants of the troops who were fighting our battles. That is about the only information I can give the hon, gentleman in explanation of the vote I am now asking from the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I must say I think it would not have been impossible for the hon, gentleman to have given us some more information. We do not know whether this $1,000,000, with the $700,000, covers, as far as he can calculate, his whole expenditure up to this period for the different classes of expenses which he has enumerated, namely, pay, subsistence of men and horses, and transport. Of course, if his present estimate covers the transport of the men home it would not be difficult to make an estimate what that would be; but if it covers the transport of the men up to this time, I think the hon. gentleman might, very much better than he was able to do a number of weeks ago, give us a calculation of what the cost of transport has been. He says he estimates that there are 6,000 men, at $500,000 a month. The great bulk of the men having been under pay for at least two months, you would have $1,000,000 for the pay of the volunteers; then the $700,000 would be divisible into transport, subsistence and forage.

Mr. CARON. And supplies—hospital supplies and clothing.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon, gentleman not give us any idea of how this $700,000 is made up—whether it covers the whole or part of the expenditure up to this time for these classes of expenditures. I may add that I am quite prepared to make very great allowances for the necessarily enhanced cost of an emergency such as this. It would be grossly unfair to those in authority to deal with this question in any other spirit than that. When things have to be done in a very great hurry, on a very large scale, at a very great distance, no man, having the smallest feeling of fair play, would be disposed to exact such a very strict and accurate inspection of the procedure which was being taken with the view to economical results as under ordinary, normal conditions. But while I state that as my present feeling, and the feeling with which I shall be quite disposed to criticise the details of this expenditure, I must say that I have been alarmed by statements I myself have received as to the character of some of the management in the North-West, with reference to the transport of the expedition thither. My particular information has been with reference to the transport of some supplies from the front into the interior. I do not make or imply any charge against the Minister of Militia, directly, for that. I have no grounds upon which I could make or imply any such charge against him, because I do not know what has reached his ears, or whether it reached his ears in time to mend the abuses, for so they seem to me, from the information I have received, that have grown up in those remote districts. I am afraid it will be found that some of the hon. gentleman's officers—and I once again say he was obliged, in a hurry, to find men to do the duty, a duty to which they were unaccustomed, and therefore I am not surprised that there were mistakes—made contracts of a most extravagant character, and that there was a waste of force and energy, and an expenditure on a scale and with a profusion which it is extremely difficult to understand. That being the state of the case, as stated to me, I am anxious to know what, from the hon. gentleman's information, this estimate divides itself into, in the general sense in which I have put it, and whether it covers the whole cost of this branch of expenditure.

Mr. CARON. I can state to the hon, gentleman that when it became necessary for the Department of Militia to send in, at a moment's notice, some 5,000 men, to meet the immediate necessity, I felt, as ever hon, gentleman will understand, the full responsibility which devolved upon me. I felt it was imperative for the Department of Militia, that it was due to the country and to the volunteers who are sacrificing their business to fight the battles of their country, to make every provision so that these volunteers would suffer as little as possible in the campaign that was then opening. I am perfectly prepared to say that at that moment, when it became the duty of the Department of Militia to organise the commissariat, it was impossible for the Department to make anything like a bargain. We had to take advantage of everything we could lay our hands upon, so as to convey these supplies as rapidly as possible to the front. From that period we have been greatly reducing the cost of transport, and every other branch of the service. We have been reducing it to a system; we have been cancelling contracts where we considered the transport was too extravagant or too high, and when that transport which, according to our views, was more expensive than it should be, could be replaced by a cheaper transport, provided it would not interfere with the operations of the troops at the front. Our troops depended absolutely on the transport; the season was most inclement; the roads were impassable; moreover, the teamsters were very reluctant to undertake the service, from the fact that at the time the cry had gone over the country that the dangers of war were really very much greater than they turned out to be; and it became almost impossible for us to organise any thing like a transport system. I question whether, if it had not been for the help that was given to the Department by the Hudson Bay Company, and the valuable assistance given us by Mr. Wrigley, the gentleman who is in charge of the Hudson Bay Company at Winnipeg, it would not have been impossible to achieve what we have achieved. The great difficulty was, at a moment's notice, to organise all these different branches of the service, and hon. gentle men will understand that we had no time to spare. It had do not know anything of the way in which it was to be done at a moment's notice; consequently, the expense done, but the system followed appears to consist in Mr. BLAKE.

was greater than if we had had five or six months before us, and could use our own men and organise under the supervision of our own staff. We had to depend upon strangers. The hon, gentleman, in his opening remarks, referred to what he called my neglect in not bringing down the first Message before the time I did. When the Message came down I explained that I had been using the money that had been voted by Parliament for the purpose of meeting the immediate expense that occurred in despatching troops to the front; the $700,000 that was granted at the time has all been expended. The expenditure has been for the payment of men and for the large quantities of supplies we had to get. We had to provide blankets, rubber blankets, socks, shirts, boots, shoes, almost every article that was required in that campaign, and naturally most of those articles were paid for out of the money which was given me. I do not wish to mislead the House by making statements here tonight that later might be considered statements made at haphazard. I say that the amount of money which is now asked for is for the purpose of meeting $500,000 for the pay and subsistence of about 6,000 men per month. Besides that we have 700 horses, the cost connected with which it is next to impossible for me to say. We have very little information about the column which is under the command of Major-General Strange. Hon. gentlemen know that the lines were all down for a long period of time; we had to use couriers, at a heavy expense, and hon. gentlemen will be surprised when they come to consider what that service, which was indespensible, cost. The general and other officers commanding columns had to be kept in daily communications with headquarters, so that their wants might be attended to, and we paid an immense amount of money in keeping up a system of couriers, who kept the different commanding officers and the Department in daily communication. When the accounts are brought down hon, gentlemen will see that, under the circumstances, every possible precaution was taken by the Department. ment to secure as much economy as possible; but I felt the responsibility of my position, and I felt I would not be deserving of the position I occupied, if I had hesitated one moment, for any consideration of expense, to do all that lay in my power to make a success of the campaign which is now very nearly terminated and which might have lasted very much longer. I do not wish to keep back information, but I do not wish to go into details before I can get information in so precise and exact a form that it may be of use and value to the House. Hon, gentlemen will see that every precaution was taken to meet the immediate wants of the troops, to meet the requirements of a great emergency, and to do so as economically as possible, under the circumstances.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would call the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to some information which I have got, and which I think is reliable information. I understand that, in several places where corps of volunteers are stationed, supply officers have been appointed. Instead of appointing some of the officers, who would be quite able to perform the duty, some people have been appointed, taken from all parts of the country; in fact, political partisans.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANGELIER. This seems to surprise hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. If it is desired, I can give names. I may mention one case. I will not give the name, unless it is insisted on. At Calgary, a broken up grocer from Montreal has been appointed supply officer, and I am told that, in almost every place where volunteers are stationed, the same thing has been done. I do not say it has been by the orders of the Department of Militia. I appointing people from several parts of the country, who have no particular experience in purchasing supplies, who have, at all events, much less experience than the officers in command of the corps stationed in these places. I am told that these supply officers receive very high pay. I do not object to that, but I think it would be advisable to give those positions to the volunteers themselves. They are giving their time for almost nothing for this country, and I think if there is any advantage to be given, it should be given to them, rather than to political hacks.

Mr. CARON. Under the emergency, I used the officers to command the troops, and I used the grocers to look after the groceries. I believe I am not open to the charge of any political partisanship so far as the management of this campaign is concerned. The hon, gentleman's information, I already perceive, is not always very correct, and I think that, when the time comes to discuss these matters, which it is impossible to discuss to-day, because we have not got the information, I shall be prepared to meet any charge brought by the hon, gentleman, or any other hon, gentleman, and to explain the line of conduct which I have adopted and carried out, and which, so far as we know, has been successfully carried out.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman has not yet answered either of my questions. He has not given me any apportionment. He says that about $1,000,000 of the $1,700,000 is for pay, but he cannot give any apportionment of the other $700,000. That is an answer, but he has not answered the other part of the question, whether this $1,700,000 represents his approximate estimate of the expense under those heads up to this date, or, if not, up to what date?

Mr. CARON. The $700,000 is all expended. The $1,000,000 I am now asking for will represent the expenditure for one month, under the different heads I have mentioned, which the Department will be called upon to pay.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the $1,700,000—the $700,000 already voted and the $1,000,000 now asked for—will leave us at least $300,000 behind?

Mr. CARON. It is impossible for me to say.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman says the $1,000,000 represents the total expenses for one month.

Mr. CARON. As far as I have been able to give the hon. gentleman the information. Of course, I do not want to be tied down to any statement I may make, because it is impossible for me to give any reliable imformation now.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite understand that the hon. gentleman cannot give as exact an estimate on this subject as he could give under ordinary circumstances, with reference to ordinary estimates, nor do I ask as much. I quite understood, when he came to us, a good while ago, that his statement was necessarily of the vaguest possible character, and I did not ask any questions about it at all. It was accepted in the sense which he intended. I do not intend to hold him to the division which he then stated. I do not make any comment upon the fact that the amount to be paid is very much larger, because it was impossible for him to know how much the forces would be increased which it was his duty to call into the field; and if he had to get more men, of course he would have to give more pay. But, of course, it is possible to come nearer the thing now than it was then, because then he was dealing almost entirely with the future, and now, as he tells us, he is dealing almost entirely with the past, though not yet with the recorded past. Now, he says that $1,000,000 is a rough estimate of a month's expenditure for all those heads. So my remark was that, as this has lasted about two months, that would be $2,000,000, and that would leave us $300,000 behind, or about that.

Mr. CARON. The hon, gentleman will understand that the expenditure has been increasing every day. When I asked for the $700,000 we had a very few battalions called out. They were going to the front; but the great expenditure which was incurred when they left the line of railway to go into the interior, increased our expenditure enormously. The hon, gentleman cannot have the least idea of how rapidly the expenditure increased as soon as our troops left the line of railway. The different services, as I have tried to explain, had to be organised immediately, and the expenditure for transport was very large indeed. I have given the hon, gentleman every information which I possess; and I do not believe that it is possible, or could have been possible, to make it any more explicit than I have done, because I have not the information which will permit me to make an estimate, and tell the House exactly how the expenditure is divided.

Committee rose and reported the resolution.

SUPPLY-CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolution reported from Committee of Supply.

That a sum not exceeding $1,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty, for the purpose of meeting the expenses incurred during the year ending the 30th June, 1885, in connection with the troubles of the North-West Territories; this sum being in addition to the amount of $700,000 voted in Committee of Supply on Thursday, the 23rd of April, last.

Mr. CARON moved the first reading of the resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. The hop, gentleman has heard the statement which I made with reference to his proposal a little while ago, that this report should be received now. I pointed out that, on the first occasion when a vote of credit for the operations of the war was asked, a Message was brought down, submitted to the House, and left on the Table for many days before any action was taken upon it, and then we were called upon to act upon the score of a public emergency, which caused the hon. gentleman to invite us to suspend all the rules and proceed immediately to a concurrence in the resolution, in order that he might get money which he required at that instant. I pointed out at that time the inconvenience of that course, and that I did not perceive how the hon. gentleman could justify those delays which had resulted in the emergency at that moment. Notwithstanding, I yielded, since he stated that the emergency existed. I did not expect a recurrence of the same procedure, and on this occasion the hon. gentleman has had ample opportunity, from week to week and from month to month, to know when his resources were getting low, and when he would want more money, and when it would be necessary to bring down a Message asking for more money. At least a week ago he decided that he would want $1,000,000 more, and he obtained the assent of the Council to that Message on the 22nd of May. He retained that Message from the 22nd May to the night of the 29th, and then he says: The emergency is so pressing that I must ask you to suspend all the rules and give me the money in ten minutes, instead of adopting the ordinary, the wise, the salutary, the constitutional practice of the House in regard to votes of money. Now, the hon. gentleman has not answered that observation. Before I can give my consent to the suspension of the rule, I think it is fitting we should have some explanation of the circumstance to which I have

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The circumstances have materially altered since then. The fortunate results of the action of our little army have been such that we hope they are nearly approaching to the suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of peace. At one time it looked as if we were threatened with a long war, and we might have had to ask for a larger sum. As regards my hon, friend asking for an explanation just now, I am going to follow this motion with another, that when this House adjourns it stands adjourned until Monday at half-past one o'clock, as my hon. friend, I think, would like to have concurrence in this resolution, so that he may utilise it on Monday.

Mr. BLAKE. I am unable to observe the validity of the hon, gentleman's explanation. On the 22nd of May the Government decided that they wanted a million for the war, and they obtained His Excellency's assent to a Message to this House asking for a million. The hon. gentleman says he waited from day to day to know whether he would not be wanting some more money, and that was the reason he did not submit that Message. He knew he wanted that much, at any rate, and he thought he might want some more. But now that the war is going to finish, and he will want less money, he asks for the million at once. The emergency has got greater, the pressure has got more extreme, just as the necessities of the Government got less. There is really no excuse, when, on the 22nd of May, that million was wanted, why the ordinary form of procedure should not have been observed. I wish to emphasise that proposition, because you will observe how rapidly bad habits grow. I suppose, if it had not been for my hon. friend's generous assent the last time when the Government was asking $700,000, the hon. gentleman, instead of keeping that Message in his pocket, would have put it on the Table, and we would have had reasonable notice of what the demands of the Government were, and would have been in a reasonable position to have accumulated such information as we could from the outside, since the hon. gentleman does not choose to impart any to us. But when I was so willing formerly to permit the rules to be infringed, in consequence of the hon, gentleman's demand, he trusts to that, perhaps mistaken generosity, and he goes farther the next time; for, instead of bringing down the Message, as he did the last time, he keeps the Message in his pocket and fires it off at us as if it was a Gatling gun, with a million shots in it. I therefore feel it necessary to emphasise the circumstance, in order that it may be understood, if it be the unanimous pleasure of the House upon this occasion once again to depart from the salutary rule, that it is not done without remonstrance, without protest, without objection and without a formal statement, which I beg now to make, that except for cause which indicates an emergency not capable of being guarded against by earlier action on the part of the Government, I shall be extremely indisposed, on any future occasion, as one humble member of this House, to permit a violation of its wholesome rules, nor should I do it now, except for one thing—it is not the Government that would be punished, but the volunteers, and as the volunteers are to be punished for the sins of the Government if this report is not now received, I do not propose that to their hardships should be added another hardship; therefore I shall give my consent.

Resolution read and concurred in.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose this is treated as the former one, as a vote of credit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. O, yes. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the resolution adopted this day, that when the House adjourns it stand adjourned until to-morrow, be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. What business does the hon, gentleman propose to take up on Monday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A new measure altogether—the Franchise Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10:40, p.m. days only? If so, why so? Sir John A. MACDONALD.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 1st June, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GOVERNMENT RIGHTS TO THE BEACH AND DEEP WATER LOTS OF CERTAIN RIVERS.

Mr. VANASSE asked, Whether the Dominion Government is the proprietor of the beach and deep water lots on the banks of the rivers Yamaska, St. Francis and Nicolet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say, after consulting with the Minister of Justice, that he is not in a position to give a positive reply on this point. Everything depends on the land grants on the shores of the river. In some instances grants have been made down to the water, and in other cases they have been made as far as the middle of the river, and then those grants have their effect. If, on the contrary, the grants have not been made as far as the shore of the river, then arises the question to which authority, the federal or local, is entrusted the control of the bed of the From a decision given by a high court of justice, and from an Order in Council passed some twelve or fifteen years ago, it seems that the control of the rivers belongs to the Crown, as represented by the local authority. However, if the part of the river mentioned in the enquiry of the hon, member is part of a harbor, then its control belongs to the Federal Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. Blake) asked, Whether the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have signified to the Government their willingness and ability, under the resolutions on the Table, to acomplish the several points proposed by the president to be acomplished, in case the Government acceded to the terms of his letter of the 18th March last, viz.: 1. To complete the road; its equipment, fixed and rolling, improvements and terminals, between Montreal and Coal Harbor, on English Bay, including snowsheds, &c., and Quebec terminal facilities and telegraph system; 2. To extend the Manitoba South-Western Railway; 3. To complete the line to Sault Ste. Marie; 4. To secure a connection with the city and harbor of Quebec; 5. With reasonable aid from the Government, to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway system to the ocean ports of the Maritime Provinces; 6. To aid indirectly in securing the early completion of the Ontario division to the Datroit river; 7. To remove forever all necessity for any further applications to the Government for assistance on the part of the company.

Mr. POPE. I am not aware of any correspondence having taken place since the resolutions were laid on the Table.

SALE OF TICKETS ON THE CHATHAM BRANCH OF THE INTERCOLONIAL,

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Is it true, as stated in the Miramichi Advance, of the 21st May, that the Government refuse to allow Intercolonial Railway tickets to be sold at Chatham station, of the Chatham branch road? If so, why so? Is it true, as stated in the same paper, that the Intercolonial Railway issues return tickets from Newcattle to St. John, good for eight days, while the return tickets from Chatham Junction to St. John are good for four days only? If so, why so?

Mr. POPE. The Chatham branch is on exactly the same basis as other branches, as regards the sale of tickets over the Intercolonial Railway, namely, to sell tickets over the Intercolonial Railway to St. John, Moncton and a few other places. The manager of the Chatham branch, although it appears he had tickets printed, has never offered them for sale, and refuses to sell beyond the limits of the Chatham branch. The Intercolonial Railway has a ticket agent, on commission, in Chatham, who sells through tickets to all points on the Intercolonial. Return tickets between Chatham and St. John, and also Newcastle and St. John, have been good for eight days. Chatham Junction being in the middle of a swamp, and no settlements near, remained, until recently, good for four days only. The manager of the Chatham branch, however, only sells tickets to Chatham Junction; hence return tickets from Chatham Junction to St. John were found to be necessary, in consequence of the action of the manager of the Chatham branch, and they were then made the same as those to Chatham and Newcastle. Since the question was put upon the Table I have received the following letter:

"I am in receipt of your favor of the 21st instant. I find now that the tickets from St. John to Chatham are in order, being issued on the same terms as to Newcastle. The difference in the return tickets occurred at Chatham Junction. I have learned, since writing you, that this matter has been rectified also."

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY-LOCATION.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the plan and profile of the proposed change in the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway, near the Illecillawaet Creek, B.C., have yet been laid before the Government? If so, when? Whether such plan and profile have been approved? If so, when?

Mr. POPE. It has not been laid before the Government Does that answer the whole question?

Mr. EDGAR. Yes.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CURVES, TAN-GENTS AND GRADES.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government engineers have prepared, with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, tables of curves, tangents and grades, in sections similar to those laid before Parliament in the report of the surveyors of the Yellow Head Pass, and similar to those laid before Parliament this Session in respect of the surveys of the proposed Short Line Railway? Whether the company has submitted to the Government Whether the the Government engineers or the company have been requested to prepare and submit such tables? If not, why not?

Mr. POPE. In answer to the first part of the questionthey are in course of preperation; to the next part—no such thing has been submitted to the Government; the answer to the third part—the Government engineers are preparing such tables.

SAWDUST IN LA HAVE RIVER, N.S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Does the Department of Marine and Fisheries intend to put the sawdust law into operation in relation to the La Have river, in the county of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, during the present summer?

Mr. McLELAN. It is the intention of the Department

FISH LADDERS IN THE LA HAVE RIVER, N.S.

the present fish ladders from the dams of mill owners in the La Have river, Lunenburgh county, and replace the same with Danison's natural fish-ways as recommended by him-

Mr. McLELAN. It is the intention of the Department to place fish-ways in the dams for fish, and the enquiry is now being made as to the best means of doing so.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CONNECTION WITH QUEBEC.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government has yet completed plans to be submitted to Parliament for the Canadian Pacific Railway connection with Quebec?

Mr. POPE. No, it has not.

SHORT LINE TO THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government has yet completed plans to be submitted to Parliament for the construction of the short line between the Province of Quebec and the ocean ports of the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. POPE. Only such as the hon, gentleman has seen before the House.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government has yet completed plans to be submited to Parliament for the construction of the Cape Breton Railway?

Mr. POPE. No; they are considering the question.

PRIVILEGE-TIMBER REGULATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. GORDON. Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, I rise to a question of privilege. My notice has been drawn to an article in the Ottawa Free Press, of Friday last, reflecting somewhat upon members from British Columbia-at least, severely reflecting upon two of them. I will read the article, and then explain the charges:

"Mr. Reid, M. P., for Caribeo, B. C., left for home a week ago on the pretence that he did not care to support the Franchise Bill any longer, but the true cause of his sudden disappearance has now come to light. He had always been a steadfast supporter of the Government, but before his departure he received a telegram from his leading constituents, telling him that he was at perfect liberty to oppose the Government if they did not immediately modify the obnoxious Dominion timber regulations. Mr. Reid therefore left for home on account of the threatening aspect of affairs in his Province. British Columbians here are receiving telegrams affairs in his Province. British Columbians here are receiving telegrams of an alarming nature from that Province.

"Mr. Blake will, to-morrow, formally ask the Government whether it is aware of the rumors of disastisfaction in British Columbia on account of the Dominion timber limit regulations, and if it has taken steps to remove that dissatisfaction by the modification of the regulations. "This morning Mr. Gordon, M.P., was approached by an inquisitive Liberal member of the Parliament, who desired to know what truth there was in the rumors coming from the Pacific Province.

"It would be wise for our people,' said Mr. Gordon, M.P., 'not to take extreme steps, but to present their grievances formally, and then they will be redressed.'

"But what were you British Columbian members doing,' replied the Liberal M.P., 'when these objectionable timber regulations were passed? You were here at the time.'

You were here at the time.'

"'Oh, we were not consulted,' replied Mr. Gordon.

"'Not consulted,' replied the Liberal M.P., with astonishment, 'why, what kind of Government supporters are you, that the Government does not consult you respecting matters concerning your own Province?'

Bearing upon the same subject, I will read a similar article in the St. John Telegraph, being a special, dated at Ottawa, May 27:

Mr. FORBES asked, Is it the intention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, through its proper officer, to remove new regulations enforced upon the holders of timber limits in the railway belt of British Columbia, he was to oppose the Government, which he has hitherto supported. Mr. Reid immediately left for the Pacific coast to see what was the matter. British Columbia papers received here to-night openly talk of armed rebellion and secession from the Confederation if justice be not done. It is the North-West trouble in a new form."

Now, Sir, from my long acquaintance with Mr. Reid, and and from a thorough knowledge of his character, I felt that the article with reference to him was false in every respect, but in order to make sure, before bringing the matter before the House, I sent him this telegram:

"Free Press says you left on pretence that you did not care to support the Franchise Bill any longer, but that the real cause was that you had received a telegram from your leading constituents, telling you that you were at liberty to oppose the Government if they did not immediately modify their obnoxious timber regulations. Is the statement true or false? Answer.

"D. W. GORDON."

To which I received the following reply:

" VICTORIA, B.C., 30th May.

" Free Press statements are both decidedly untrue. Please correct

"JAS. REID."

Now, Sir, with reference to that portion of the article referring to myself, I have this to say: That since I have been a member of Parliament I have never intruded my society upon any member, so far as I am aware of. I have always met in a friendly spirit members from both sides of the House, and have always regarded conversations held with them as of such a character that I should consider it not only unwarrantable but dishonorable to go and peddle those conversations to the newspapers of either party, with a view of making any political or party capital out of the With regard to the conversation that is said to have occurred between myself and the "inquisitive" member on the other side, I do not know that I can call to mind which member is alluded to. I have had conversations with several of them, and also with a number of citizens, who were enquiring as to the state of affairs in British Columbis. I did not guard my remarks, as I felt that I was talking to honorable men, I have always felt, in conversation with members on both sides of the House, that I was talking with honorable men. I do remember saying, as reported, that I thought it would be better for our people not to take extreme measures, and that the grievances, if any, would be removed. I am astonished to think that the inquisitive member even put that into the report. With regard to stating that the British Columbia members were not consulted—I am perfectly satisfied, if I have any recollection of what occurred, that it is entirely untrue. The question was asked me (and there was a gentleman present who called my attention to it afterwards) and I turned away without making any answer to that question. I had reasons of my own for not answering such a question. The conversation extended to many minor details as to the timber regulations, which I do not think it necessary to repeat, and which I will not repeat. But the most significant part of the whole matter is the fact that dove tailed in between these calumnies on Mr. Ried and myself we find a notice of that interesting question, that one of the Minister's has just asked, shall be allowed to stand over until the First Minister is in his place, viz.:

"That Mr. Blake will, to-morrow, formally ask the Government whether it is aware of the rumors of dissatisfaction in British Columbia on account of the Dominion timber limit regulations, and if it has taken steps to remove that dissatisfaction by the modification of those regulations."

I am sure Mr. Reid does not, and I am sure we do not wish to become scapegoats for carrying any such questions on Mr. Blake's part into British Columbia. The distortion of a conversation between members is totally unworthy of any hon member, and if the hon member who is responsible depressed, that the increase of dues is materially affecting Mr. GORDON.

for it will rise in his place it will release all other hon. members on that side of the House from being, as it were. regarded as the inquisitive member.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I happened to be present at the time the conversation referred to took place. The hon. member called my attention to it when he saw the article the following morning. I remember the discussion that took place in regard to the timber dues in the North. West and in British Columbia, and I can say that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, used no language or said anything from which the inference could be drawn that is contained in that article. I remember distinctly, when the question was asked to which reference has been madewas somewhat curious to ascertain whether the hon. gentleman had been consulted by the Government, and being so curious on the point, I remember most distinctly that he made no reply to the question asked. I think it is a pity that the sanctity of private and confidential conversation—not confidential, but private—in the smoking room and in the corridors of the House should be thus violated and made use of by hon, members and published, even if they were true. I am free in conversing as to political affairs and as to matters before the House, and I do not think any hon, member should make use of such conversations for party or other purposes. I think it is a pity if such is done, and I hope the present case will act as a reproof to members, or will, at least, put Conservative members upon their guard in using language in conversations on matters of this kind.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The statement made by the hon gentleman is quite correct. It is not creditable that private conversations of members outside of the Chamber, and made in confidence between members, should be retailed. But the hon, gentleman must recollect that this is not the first time this thing has occurred. We have had in the House more than one hon. member stating that private conversation between himself and another hon, member had been used for party purposes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the Minister of Customs made that statement himself.

Mr. BOWELL. You ought to be prepared to sustain that assertion.

ST. CLAIR RANCHE COMPANY.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, How much rent has been paid by the St. Clair Ranche Company? How much rent is due by that company? How much stock has been placed on its range by the company? Has the company complied with the terms of its lease? Is the Government aware that the lease is an obstacle to settlement, and is being held on speculation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. One thousand dollars has been paid. There is no rent due by the company. So far, the company has not placed any cattle on the ranche. In fact, the lease is not yet executed. The lease will not prove an obstacle to settlement, and is not being held on speculation.

DOMINION LANDS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA-TIMBER DUES.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government has recently largely increased the timber dues on Dominion lands in British Columbia over the rates here-Whether the Governtofore imposed by the authorities? ment has established any limitation as to the area of British Columbia timber limits to be conceded to an individual? Whether the Government has been informed that the sawmilling industry in British Columbia is very much it, and that great discontent has been produced by the regulation? Whether it is intended to modify the regulation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Since the opening up of the country and the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway the timber in the railway belt of British Columbia has been greatly enhanced in value; and on the 25th April regulations were passed by the Governor in in Council, by which an increase in the duties imposed under the regulations with respect to British Columbia was made. The area of the Dominion timber limits in the railway belt is fixed from time to time by the Governor in Council. Representations have been received from prominent members of Parliament from British Columbia that the timber industry is depressed, and the matter is now receiving consideration at the hands of the Government. That is the answer sent to me by the Department. Personally, I have received representations on the subject, stating that the timber industry is depressed, and asking for a reduction of dues on timber in the railway belt.

COLONISATION COMPANIES.

Mr. EDGAR (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the Government have yet settled their plans for modifying the agreements with colonisation companies? Whether the proposals of the Government on this subject will be laid before Parliament?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The proposal of the Government will be laid before Parliament. It is not quite settled, but it will be laid before Parliament.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 12,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to observe that the member for North York (Mr. Mulock), is present. I have remodelled the clause to a considerable extent, and if hon, gentlemen will look at it they will see how it is proposed to amend it:

it was first introduced the revising officer was bound to propare his list in a certain way, by obtaining a certified copy of the assessment roll from the local municipality. Of course, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, that is all satisfactory, so far as it goes, but I understand in some

"The returning officer who prepares the first list of voters of any electoral district under this Act shall, as soon as possible after taking the oath of office, obtain a certified copy or certified copies of the last revised assessment roll or rolls, if any there be in the electoral district for which he is appointed, and also a certified copy or certified copies of the last revised list or lists of voters of such electoral districts, prepared under the statute of the Province relating to the assessment and voters' lists respectively, for elections for the Provincial Legislature."

I put in an amendment, because I find there is neither an assessment roll nor a voters' list in the Province of Prince Edward Island; and so I insert, that where there is no such list a certified copy of the poll book or poll books at the last election, in each electoral district, shall be obtained. Then the next line is struck out—about the non-payment of taxes on income:

"And he shall proceed, as speedily as possible, with the aid thereof, and of such other information as he can obtain, to ascertain and prepare a"

Now, I insert some words providing that the revising officer shall prepare a preliminary list for the electoral district and publish it. I insert here:

"Shall ascertain and prepare a separate list for each municipality in the electoral district, and wherever there is not a municipality, a separate list for each township, parish, polling district or other known division of the electoral district."

The clause then proceeds:

"Of the several persons who, according to the provisions of this Act, are entitled to be registered as voters, and to vote under this Act at any election for such electoral district, which list shall contain the names of 281 such persons in alphabetical order, and shall be in the form contained in schedule "D" to this Act, indicating in the proper column thereof whether such persons respectively are qualified in respect of real property, as owners, tenants, occupants, purchasers in occupation under the Crown, or otherwise, stating the numbers of the lots, portions of lots, and concessions, streets or other most available description of the real property in respect of which they are so qualified, and their post office addresses, as nearly as can be ascertained by the said officer, or as farmers' sons, or the sons of owners of real property other than farmers, stating the numbers of the lots, portions of lots, concessions or streets, or other available description of the real property of their fathers or mothers, in respect of which they are qualified as farmers' or other owners' sons, as hereinbefore provided, or whether they are qualified in respect of income; and as to sons of farmers or of other owners as aforesaid, and voters on income, stating also in the said list, in the proper columns thereof, the residences and post office addresses of such persons, as nearly as can be ascertained by him; and after having so prepared the said list the revising officer shall sign the same as such."

Then I add a proviso to the following effect:-

"Provided, that such assessment list shall be taken by the revising officer as  $prim\hat{a}$  facte evidence of value, and such voters' list or polling books, as the case may be, as  $prim\hat{a}$  facte evidence of the qualification to vote."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think it a very unreasonable proposition on the part of the First Minister to expect the committee to discuss intelligently the amendments which he proposes to make, having sprung them on the House on the very spur of the moment. Now, on this occasion the First Minister proposes four or five amendments. They are intertwined and interlarded with the clause in such a way that it is utterly impossible, for me, at all events, to understand their true meaning. I think the least the Government could do in such cases would be to give notice of these amendments, at least a day in advance, so that we may understand how far they materially change the clause which is under discussion. Now, I do not think that any person in the House, except the First Minister and the hon, member for North York-and I do not suppose that they are the only members of this House—can understand clearly the effect of these amendments. As I understand this clause, it provides the mode in which the revising officer shall procure the necessary evidence upon which he is to base his first voters' list. Under the Bill as it was first introduced the revising officer was bound to propare his list in a certain way, by obtaining a certified copy course, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, that is all satisfactory, so far as it goes, but I understand in some of the Provinces they have no such thing as an assessment roll at all, and there, of course, it would be useless to attempt to obtain it. He is also authorised to obtain a certified copy of the last revised voters' list, prepared by the proper officer, of voters on income who are in default.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is all struck out.

Mr. CAMERON. So I understand. Does the hon, First Minister intend that it shall be a condition precedent to a man's right of registration that he shall have paid the taxes imposed upon him by the local municipality, or can he vote if he is assessed on income, whether he has paid the taxes or not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON. There is no restriction whatever?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No restriction. It is similar in that respect to the last Ontario Act, which does not provide that a person qualified on income must have paid his taxes.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon, gentleman has made another amendment in this section, the nature of which I do not exactly understand, as the information on which the revising officer shall base his first list. So far there are just two sources of information—the assessment roll and the voters' list. I understand that the hon, gentleman also proposes that the revising officer shall get a certified copy of the voters' list used at the last election, and, where they have not a voters' list, a copy of the poll book used at the last election. That comes back to the old proposition we have been arguing for all along. The hon, gentleman proposes to authorise the revising officers to utilise to a large extent the local machinery. He goes to the assessor or municipal clerk and gets from him the last revised assessment roll; or he gets a certified copy of the voters' list used at the last election, or a certified copy of the poll book used at the last election, and from these three sources he is authorised to make up his voters' list. The hon, gentleman having utilised the local machinery so far, it would be infinitely better if he utilised it for the preparation of the voters' lists in the first instance. The local officials have every information and material at their hand, and they can make out the list at very little cost to the country a large. The hon, gentleman knows that the revising officer cannot get certified copies of the assessment roll or of the provincial voters' list, or of the poll book, without paying for them. Who has to pay for them? The revising officer in the first instance, and then the country. If the hon, gentleman, instead of authorising the revising officer to utilise the local machinery, would himself utilise it, and authorise the men who now prepare the voters' lists for the Province, to prepare them for the Dominion, the lists so prepared would, I think, be satisfactory to all parties. We know that the local officers are not all of one political stripe; some are Liberals, though the majority, I am sorry to say, are Conservatives; but they are responsible to the people. If they are guilty of any frauds or wrongs, they are liable to be turned out of office at the municipal election which comes around every year; so that there is some guarantee that justice and right would be done if the matter was left in the hands of the local authorities. Can the hon. First Minister assign any substantial reason, why, having gone so far, he does not go the whole distance? He cannot say that he has no authority or control over the municipal officers, and cannot make them Dominion officers for the preparation of the list, because that is just what he does. He authorises the revising officer to get from them the necessary information, and if he cannot force them to give it, this proposition is wholly useless. There are reasons why the preparation of the voters' list should be left with the local authorities. The revising officer is entirely dependent on the information he gets from them. The local officer-the assessor, or the clerk of the township, who prepares a list under the local full knowledge of every individual in the municipality. He has perhaps lived there all his life time. I do not suppose that in the Province of Ontario, there is a township clerk who has been four or five years performing his duty, who is not as thoroughly conversant with every individual in the municipality as the hon, gentleman is with his followers; he knows every man, and his qualifications, and if he does not know every particular about him, it is the easiest matter in the world for him to get the information to enable him to prepare a correct voters' list. That being so, why should not the hon. gentleman get direct from the local authorities what he authorises the revising officer to get from them at second hand? The hon. gentleman knows that the system of utilising the local machinery for the preparation of the voters' lists has worked satisfactorily where ever it has been tried. It has worked satisfactorily in the Provinces hitherto; I venture to say that he has never had a complaint about it. That system prevails in the United States; the judges and inspectors who may be appointed, according to the different laws in the different States, have full power to prepare the voters' lists in the first instance. So in England, the hon gentleman knows, that the local authorities are utilised for the preparation of the voters' lists, and the revising officer's powers are limited solely to Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

the revision of the voters' lists prepared, in the first instance, by the local authorities.

Mr. IVES. I rise to a question of order. By adopting the tenth section, this committee has settled the principles that the first list shall be made and prepared by the revising officer. The hon gentleman is now going over the same ground, arguing that the lists should be prepared by the local authorities.

Mr. CAMERON. That question was up when we were discussing the 11th sub-section; and it was quite understood we would have full liberty to discuss, as the First Minister himself said, the mode in which the first list should be prepared, and that is the point I am now discussing. This section defines, to a certain extent, the duties of a revising officer; and I am now discussing, not the propriety of the appointment of the revising officer, for that has passed beyond the region of discussion to a large extent, but the question how the lists should be prepared. In that I am clearly in order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman cannot discuss the question as to the appointment of the revising officer, but the manner in which he performs his duties can be treated under this clause.

Mr. IVES. The hon, gentleman wants the lists to be made by the local authorities and not by the revising officers. I say that is out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. I say it is not. The revising officer may be appointed only to revise the lists prepared by the local authorities. Parliament has decided there shall be a revising officer.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. He is appointed by the previous clause to prepare the lists.

Mr. CAMERON. I am pointing out how he can procure the lists. He can procure them from the local authorities more economically and much better than by making them himself. Is that in order?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. IVES. The 10th section says his duty shall be to prepare the lists.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I call the hon, gentleman's attention to that, and he has to direct his argument to the question how the revising officer is to prepare the lists.

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister on Friday evening said:

"It will certainly be his business to prepare a revised list, and in that regard the amendments are not irrelevant, I admit; but still they could come in more wholesomely, I think, in the next clause, where the whole subject will be discussed."

According to that, the hon gentleman is perfectly in order

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think I at all meant to alter in any way the clause that was passed, which says the duty of the revising officer shall be to prepare and revise the lists. That is settled by the committee as far as it can be settled, but, I take it, the hon, gentleman is going on to argue that he might prepare the lists on the lists previously prepared by the local officers. That is shaving it pretty close, but I dare say it is within the clause.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think I am shaving it close at all. I am arguing that the revising officer instead of doing the work himself should have it done by the local authorities. That would be much less expensive and much more convenient to the parties interested, and it would place the work in the hands of men thoroughly conversant with every fact and circumstance necessary to be known in order to prepare an honest and satisfactory voters' list.

That has been done in the United States, it is done to-day in England and in the Australian colonies. In England there is a revising officer as here, but he does not directly go to the locality and prepare the voters' list. He utilises the local machinery in every borough and parish, and he revises the lists so prepared by the local authorities. What will be done under this clause? The revising officer will remain at one locality and send around to all the different localities for the purpose of getting information to aid him in the preparation of the lists. He can compel every one who desires to see whether his name is on the register or not, to travel to where the revising officer is, for the purpose of ascertaining that information. Take the county in which I live: Should be county judge be made the revising officer, he will, of course, remain in the county town distant from the other end of the county, and every elector who lives at the extreme limit will, if he wants to make sure that his name is on the list, have to travel all the way from that extreme limit to interview that officer. If the revising officer were to utilise the local machinery, the local authorities, all this work would be done in the locality in which it ought to be done, and done to the knowledge of everybody directly concerned. I move in amendment to this section:

That the following words be added after the word "Legislature," in the 7th line, 10th page: Also a list of the persons entitled to be registered as voters under this Act, to be prepared and furnished by the officer whose duty it is to prepare the voters' lists for the elections to the Provincial Legislature in each Province.

That is an amendment which should meet with the approval of anyone who desires that the voters' list should be fairly

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I disagree altogether with the amendment which has been proposed. The hon. gentleman says it is very unreasonable that we should press this section, amended as I propose, without giving time to discuss it. It has been discussed at full length, and all the various subjects to which the amendment refer have been laid before the committee at full length. I do not think the clause required the amendment which I have moved, requiring the assessment roll to be taken as prima facie evidence. I think that is the necessary meaning of the clause as it is; but, as it has been so strongly pressed, in order to prevent the possibility of a doubt, I have proposed that the assessment roll, so revised, shall be held to be prima facie evidence of value, and that the voters' list, or the polling-book, where there is no voters' list, shall be primá facie evidence of the right to vote. I think there cannot be any doubt of the meaning of the clause now. The hon, gentleman says: Why should we not have got the local officers to prepare the lists? The whole aim of this Act is to remove the great evil, especially in the Province of Ontario, of the local assessment system in Ontario, and, I believe, in some degree in the Province of Quebec, the assessment roll is prepared in a common sense way for the purpose of assessment of property, for the purpose of paying the taxes, but it has been found, as everyone knows, as the hon gentleman knows, that there has been-I do not say on the part of one party alone-in Ontario and in Quebec, a struggle to get assessors appointed of a particular stripe. There is a political element in the selection of assessors who are to prepare the voters' list and there is a great temptation on the part of the predominant party in the municipality to introduce that political element. It is true that the assessors are sworn, but they consider that they perform their sworn duty if they do not diminish the revenues of the municipality, so that in accordance with that view, one man may be left just outside the limits of the franchise and another may be brought just within them. It is only human nature, but it is a fact, and, say that he was singularly ignorant of the facts. We want to get a pure list.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen may jeer, but the fact is that we want a pure list, a list which is not the selection of an assessor or a Court of Revision, but one which we want a judge to settle; and he is to take the assessment roll as primá facie evidence. We are discussing the voters' list for the first year, for the basis, the fundamental voters' list, under which the new system starts. The judge has the assessment roll before him, he sees what the assessor says is the value, and, unless there is any dispute, unless in fact there is an appeal, he gets the value in that way. That can be impugned. Anyone interested can impugn it, can say he is assessed too high or too low. As regards the personnel of the list, he is obliged to take the name of the party on the votors' list as being prima facie evidence of his qualification to vote. The assessment roll cannot be prima facie evidence of the right to vote, because it merely shows the amount of assessment, and the party may be an alien or a minor. Therefore the assessment roll cannot be prima facie evidence of the right to vote; it is only evidence of the value of the property. But the judge sees that the property is assessed at that amount, and that certain persons were on the last votors' list. There is primá facie evidence that those persons have the right to You have the assessment roll to show what is the value of the property, and the county judge or revising barrister will have to assume that such a party has a right to vote and that the property is of the value described, unless the statement is rebutted. It is in the interest of having a thorough, a full and a complete voters' list to carry out this system, and I think hon. gentlemen will see it. I admit that they are opposed to the introduction of the new system, I admit that they would prefer that the Provinces should continue to have the right to fix the franchise for this House, but that is settled as far as this committee is concerned. This committee has decided that we should have a new system, and for that purpose it is necessary to have a correct voters' list, and I do not think the ingenuity of man can settle a more complete system of checks in preparing that list than that which is proposed. The judge will be sworn as the assessors have been sworn, and he will have to decide in the light of day, having the prima facie evidence before him, and there will have to be evidence in rebuttal of that before he can act or before any name can be struck off. I think I have gone so far as I could go. I must adhere to the clause as I have proposed to amend it, and I am very much disappointed to find that it has not been accepted more readily than it has been apparently by hon, gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS. I quite admit that in agreeing to the second part and adopting the clause we have already adopted, we have committed ourselves to the principle of a voters' list, independent of the list of the Provinces; but we are free now as we were before to take into consideration the machinery which we shall employ for the purpose of preparing that list. It is a well known rule of statutory interpretation that when one clause is inconsistent with another clause, the subsequent one shall override that which precedes it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MILLS. I say yes; and I say further, that it is quite open to us to go on and amend the provisions of this section, and to provide here for the preparation of a voter's list quite inconsistent with the provision of the section proceeding; and that fact coming to the attention of the committee, it will be for us to say whether we will adopt that provision or not. The hon, gentleman recognised this rule if anyone said he did not know that this took place, I should on Friday evening, when he had this subject under consideration; his attention was called to the fact that it would be more convenient to keep open the subject as to the preparation of the list, and he admitted that we could deal with the whole subject again upon this clause that is now before us. The amendment of my hon friend from Huron proposes that the revising officer, in addition to the assessment roll, shall avail himself of the information which may be furnished by the various parties who are connected with the ascertainment of the value of property, and whose local knowledge enables them to know who is entitled to be placed upon the list. The hon, gentleman says that the revising officer is to avail himself of the assessment roll, but at the same moment he attacks the honesty of the assessors. He says that, although gentlemen are sworn, it is notorious that the value they put upon property is not its actual cash value. Now, I do not admit that the hon. gentleman is correct. I believe they place the value, in many instances, below that which the party who holds the property would be disposed to take for his property, but I say that in almost every case the value is put quite as high as the property is likely to sell for at a cash sale. And supposing that is the case, is that any reason why the hon. gentleman should throw away the machinery which is thus furnished for the purpose of preparing expeditiously a proper voters' list? All the committee need do is to keep that fact in view, namely, that the property is assessed below its real value, and then to fix a lower standard for the qualification of the voter, so long as a monetary standard is retained, then that which would be fixed if the actual value of the property was in every instance had—that is all that is necessary. The hon, gentleman knows that if property is assessed at $150 that is worth $300, all he need do is to lower his standard of qualification, and he thus accomplishes the same object that he would accomplish by increasing the valuation of the property. But the hon, gentleman overlooks what is far more important, that is, the making up of a voters' list. He knows that he has not, under this Bill as it stands, the necessary machinery for the purpose of making a proper voters' list in the first instance. He has taken the rental value of property held by tenants. Now under the law of Ontario, and of nost of the Provinces, he has no means of ascertaining what the rental value is. What is he going to do? Is he going to put tenants upon the voters' list from the assessment roll after having that information which he says here is to determine whether they are to go upon the voters' list? The hon, gentleman has not informed us upon this point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I did inform the committee; I read the amendment to the committee which I proposed to lay before it, and the matter was postponed until we returned to it. It was simply this: That in any case where it appeared on the assessment roll that the property was valued at $150, that was to be primatacie evidence that the tenant paid sufficient rent. I read the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. This is the first time I have heard it, and my hon. friends beside me say the same thing. Supposing that to be the case, then how is it with regard to tenants who are assessed below $150, and who are paying more than $20 a year rental?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will have to prove it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman admits, then, so far as they are concerned, that he begins with an imperfect list, and the hon, gentleman should have got rid of that difficulty from the very start. Then take another case. The hon, gentleman here proposes to give the vote to wage-earners. Now, how is the class of wage-earners to be ascertained? The hon, gentleman has not informed us. He knows that so far as Ontario is concerned—

Mr. MILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon, gentleman will look at the income clause as it passed the committee, he will see it provides for every possible mode of income by earning, as well as by the receipt of money, and therefore what is called a wage-earner franchise in the Ontario Bill is an income franchise in this Bill—precisely the same. If a voter is put on the list of the Ontario assessment roll as a wage-earner, he must, of course, come in under income here

Mr. MILLS. That is quite beside the question. The question is: How are these persons' names to be got upon the voters' lists? Now the Ontario law has provided for that, but it does not come into operation immediately, and the hon. gentleman's list will be made up before he has even that information, so far as Ontario is concerned. Then, how is it with regard to the other Provinces where no such provision is made? If the Government of Ontario does not choose to provide that parties who are wage-earners and who have a certain income are to be taxed upon their wages or their income, there would be no reason why their names should go upon the assessment roll, but there is a reason for putting them upon the voters' list. But the hon, gentleman knows that in the Province of Ontario, even though those parties have not their names upon the assessment roll, they would, through local agencies, be known to the municipal officers and to the clerk, and there would be no difficulty, even without any formal application on their part, to ascertain, in a great majority of cases, who they are, and to put their names upon the voters' list. But how is the revising officer to know who the parties are and whose names should be upon the list. Their names will not be on any assessment roll in the first instance. If the First Minister appoints a judge, he may possess some local knowledge, but how many will he know out of the 40,000 or 50,000 people, and how many of the wage-carners and people of moderate income? We have statements here showing that the tenants and wage-earners will constitute 30 per cent. of the electors, and the bulk of those will not be on the assessment roll in such a form that it may be transferred to the voters' lists. The hon, gentleman might appoint the present officers to constitute a court of revision to prepare a list for the use of the revising officer, giving it only such value as it may have as a means of enabling the revising officer to make up his list. At all events the First Minister should furnish facilities for the preparation of a fair and full voters' list in the first instance. He is, however, furnishing a plan under which 25 per cent. of the voters will not be placed on the voters' list, and yet the hon. gentleman refuses to adopt the only efficient measure by which such a fair and complete list can be obtained in the first instance. There is no other country in the world having such a voters' list as is proposed. The hon, gentleman says there is a struggle constantly going on in the different municipalities between the two parties respecting the appointments of assessors. I deny it. Is any such struggle going on in every municipality?

Mr. FARROW. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the hon, gentleman whether there is a party contest in every municipality on this point?

Mr. FARROW. In every one.

Mr. MILLS. As to who shall be assessor?

Mr. FARROW. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. 1 do not admit it. I know many municipalities where the Reform party has an overwhelming majority, and where the reeve, clerk and assessor are on the opposite side of politics.

An hon. MEMBER. Give the name.

myself, when it was part of Bothwell, a majority of 240. John Mason, a Tory, was reeve of that township for five or six years; the clerk was a Mr. Gesner, a political opponent of mine for more than twenty years. Yet the First Minister comes here and makes statements that are not borne out by the facts. Let him produce statements showing the political opinions of municipal officers, and show that where his own friends are in the majority they have endeavored to appoint municipal officers of their own political party. The hon gentleman proposes to take the machinery for the preparation of the voters lists out of the hands of the people; and he, in effect, declares they are not fit to be trusted with the initiatory stage respecting the preparation of such lists. We know what a cry was raised against the little tyrant Mowat, because the Ontario Government appointed certain license officers for the purpose of carrying into effect the License Act. Yet the First Minister has taken control of the returning officers, and he now proposes to take control of the revising officers and all the machin-ery for the preparation of the voters' lists. The hon. gentleman undertakes to purify the moral and political atmosphere and to raise the moral standard of public affairs. That localities and municipalities are not altogether governed by party considerations is shown by the fact that a Reform mayor in this city had a majority of 700, while the city itself is Conservative and sends supporters of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman is not justified in the course taken by him at the present time. We all know why it is being pursued. It is not for the purpose of getting rid of political bias in the preparation of the voters lists, or in order to give the people a fairer list, or to prevent sharp practice on the part of the Conservative party and Conservative assessors. But it is in order that that very condition of things may be brought about. We know the class of men who will be appointed revising officers and that the voters' lists will be manipulated. We ask that the municipal officers shall be utilised for the purpose of giving the necessary information to the revising officer. The assessment roll will furnish very inadequate information, and we ask the hon. gentleman to amend this clause so that those parties which have special information will be called upon to give to the revising officer that special information. But if the section is carried out as the hon. gentleman proposes, he will have at least 30 per cent. of the names left off, and those parties, in order to get their names on the list, will be obliged to make special application, or they will be disqualified from voting. I say that is not the way in which the voters list should be made up in the first instance. It is our duty to protect the voter, to secure to him his right with as little trouble to him as possible, and in order to do that it is necessary that the amendment of my hon. friend from Huron should be adopted, and that his correction should be made. The hon, gentleman has proposed an amendment providing for a separate list in each municipality. Take Toronto, which is a municipality, and the hon. gentleman will have 15,000 or 20,000 voters for the whole city, and the names will be arranged alphabetically under the amendment as proposed. I ask how is such an alphabetical list going to serve any practical purpose? The names might as well not be arranged alphabetically at all. What we require is an alphabetical list for each polling division, in order that the people in each locality may have facilities afforded them to see whether any names are left off or put on. It will be easy to detect omissions where you have an alphabetical list for a polling division, but it would be almost impossible in a list for an entire municipality as large as many of our city and town municipalities are. I think the amendment is a reasonable one, and that it should be sustained by the committee.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the statement made by is proposed? It is proposed that that assessment roll, thus the hon, gentleman must be satisfactory to the committee made, thus revised, shall be taken as prima facie evidence

Mr. MILLS. Take the township of Orford, which gave in one respect at any rate. During the long discussion on this measure, it has been described as a disfranchising Bill. as a Bill which is going to take votes from those who had votes under the law existing in Ontario. Now we find that the chief objection which the hon, gentleman has to this mode of preparing the lists, is that there will be on the voters' lists at least 30 per cent. of the persons entitled to vote who are not on the assessment roll at all. Now, inasmuch as the assessment roll is the basis of the list in Ontario, where the franchise is wider than in any of the Provinces except Prince Edward Island, we at least have some satisfaction in knowing that the hon. gentleman has come to the conclusion that this is not a disfranchising Bill, whatever else it may be. It is a Bill which will give us according to the hon gentleman's own statement, 30 per cent. more voters than are to be found on the assessment roll in the Province of Ontario, for, as I understand, he speaks of the Province of Ontario, which is

Mr. MILLS. I did not speak of Ontario, specially. I pointed out that the hon, gentleman's provision would only apply to Ontario after the new Act came in force, and the list would be required to be made up under the law as it now is—and that it did not apply to any other Province.

• Mr. WHITE. It is satisfactory to know, at any rate in regard to Ontario, that the lists provided for by this Bill will give us 30 per cent. more voters than are on the present lists. I certainly understood the hon. gentleman to be speaking of Ontario; but of course we are bound to accept his statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He did not mean it at all.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is another thing in which I think the hon, gentleman is not quite fair, and that is in saying that we, on this side of the House, object to the municipal officers who prepare the lists—that we object to the assessors. As a matter of fact, the assessors have little or nothing to do with the preparation of the lists. The assessors go round and make their assessment for the purpose of taxation—that is all they have to do. Then the assessment roll comes up before the Court of Revision, which is the municipal council. The Court of Revision hear complaints that the assessment is too high or too low, or that some persons have been left off the roll altogether. They complete their work in that way, and make what may be called a revised assessment roll, and then from that revised assessment roll the clerk of the municipality prepares his voters' list, which, after all, is a mere copy of the roll, in so far as that roll indicates the persons qualified to vote. And then, Mr. Chairman, after that there is an appeal from that voters' list-which is to be published and put up so that the people can look at it-there is an appeal to the county judge, who in this case sits as a final court of review over the voters' lists, and from whose decision no appeal can be had. Under this Bill we do not make any attack on the assessors; they will still be the same officers, appointed in the same way, for the preparation of the roll. That roll will go before the Court of Revision in exactly the same way as it does now; the members of that court will sit as revisors on that roll, they will will hear complaints with regard to it, they will finally revise it, and everything occurring up to that stage will be precisely the same after the Bill passes as before. There is no suggestion of impropriety on the part of the assessor—no reflection on him or on the municipal council at all. There is no attempt at assuming the functions, or interfering in any way with the functions, either of the assessor or the municipal council in so tar as that council acts as a revisor of the roll. But what is proposed? It is proposed that that assessment roll, thus of the right to vote. We have heard during this discussion, so far as the Province of Ontario was concerned at all events-and I think from the manner in which it has been discussed, it has been largely discussed from the standpoint of the experience in Ontario—we have heard all through the debate that under the law as it exists in Ontario, we have had a very much larger number of voters than we will have when the Act passes. In fact, I think hon. gentlemen have undertaken to prove that even under the existing law in Ontario, this can scarcely be said to be an enlargement of the franchise. Well, the revising officer, whether a county judge or a barrister of five years' standing, is instructed to take that assessment roll, which is precisely what the clerk of the council would be compelled to do if it were in his hands, he is to prepare a copy from that roll, of the names of persons who by it and by its terms appear to be entitled to vote under the qualification fixed by this Act of Parliament. When that is done it is published just like the original copy of the voters' list, and then he sits just as he would sit in review on the township clerk's copy he sits in precisely the same way to hear any person coming before him to complain either of being left off or that persons have been improperly put on the roll. So that the only difference in the matter is simply whether the township clerk shall do the clerical work of copying that roll, taking that assessment roll as a basis of making the voters' list, or whether the revising barrister shall do it. Now, we are told by hon, gentlemen that the work had better be done by the municipal clerk, because he has the local knowledge which enables him to do it. Well, with all respect to the township clerks, who are undoubtedly as a general thing intelligent, and as men go as much disposed to do right as people generally will be, we must remember that that local knowledge of which so much is made, may actually become the very reason why he will not always get the finest kind of voters' list. The local knowledge may be the knowledge of the party interest in a particular township. The township clerk may be, and often is, a very active politician on one side of politics or the other. He may know very thoroughly what persons had better be put on, and what persons had better be left off, and with the best possible desire to do just exactly what is right, that very local knowledge may possibly be the means—I do not say it would be, but the danger is certainly greater than it would be under the revising officer-it may actually be the means of leaving off votes or putting on votes, which are not the result of a mere transcript of the assessment roll. In so far as they are a transcript of the assessment roll, there is no difficulty either way, for it is merely clerical work in either case. The revising officer makes up his list first from the assessment roll; he has to assist him in that, the last revised voters' list, so that if the revising officer was found leaving off the roll persons who were there and who prima facie had a right to be on, in consequence of the amount for which they were assessed, or in consequence of the fact that they were on the voters' list before under qualifications similar to those we have, he would, by that very fact, establish an accusation against himself of having been guilty of partiality unless he could prove that the thing was done by oversight or accident, which is not likely to occur. So that the whole question is simply whether the township clerk—not the assessor - shall make the preliminary copy or whether the revising officer shall make it. Whether the township clerk makes it or the revising officer makes it, it is to be hung up; it is to be open to the supervision of every elector who is interested in seeing that there is a good, proper and honest assessment roll-open to the supervision of every man on either side of politics who may desire to see that his own friends are on the roll and that none of his opponents are on who ought to be off; then it comes before the revising officer, just as to-day it comes before the judge sitting as final revising and cities of Canada on political principles, that the asses-Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

officer of the voters' list. It does seem to me that the attempt to make out that this is a means to get an improper list must utterly fail, seeing that the final revised list is to be made by the very officer who at present makes it, the county judge, and in the next place because the work of the local officials is taken as primá facie evidence of the right of the parties whose names are on the roll to vote. I think we had better adopt the clause amended as the First Minister proposes, and reject the amendment of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. TROW. The reasoning of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) is not logical if he says that a total stranger to a municipality, not acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and perhaps not knowing a single individual there, is better qualified to make up the voters' list than the assessor and clerk, who may have been a resident in the municipality for a quarter of a century, and has a character to sustain in the neighborhood. In regard to the remarks of the hon. First Minister to the effect that the assessors are partisans, I deny that entirely. In the county of Perth, which I can best speak for, the assessors are the best men to prepare the preliminary list for the revising officer; and notwithstanding what the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Farrow) says about their being political partisans, I deny it; any of them that I am acquainted with are just and honorable men. In one particular township in my own riding, where I had 150 majority, all of the officials are Conservatives, which proves that the Reformers of that township are not anxious for office. The hon. member for North Perth will not get great credit from the municipalities in that county for stating that the officials are placed in their positions as political partisans for a particular purpose. The rolls I have seen in the different municipalities are generally honestly made up, and I think the hon. First Minister should certainly utilise the officials who prepare the rolls now, who are familiar with the work, and who could do it better and more cheaply in every respect than a stranger.

Mr. HESSON. I must rise for about the fifth time to correct the remarks made by hon, gentlemen opposite. made a statement, which I think is patent to every gentleman who has canvassed a municipality in Ontario, either for township or for county purposes, that elections are carried on political grounds. I am sure my hon. friend should not be the gentleman to complain of that or to suggest that it is not the case, for he had the pleasure of representing one township as reeve for 21 years; no Conservative dare oppose him, because there was a Grit majority of 300 in the township. I ask him whether during 21 years they had a Conservative reeve in that township, a Conservative assessor, or a Conservative collector. Why, Sir, even to that fence viewers and the road masters, the officials were Grits. On the other hand, to show the liberality of the Conservative party, in the city of Stratford, where my hon. friend and myself reside, we have to day a Grit mayor, and we have allowed Grits every year to have seats in the council without attempting to oppose them, although my hon, friend knows that we have carried every ward in that city except one for years when we choose to contest them. But I rose to correct again, for the fifth or sixth time, what my hon. friend charges me with—that I charged the assessors with doing what was unfair, and with doing it in a fraudulent way. The hon, member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) charged me in this way:

"I think it was the hon. member for North Perth who said that great injustice and frauds were committed by the municipal councils."

Now, I never made use of such a word as frauds, or said that great injustice was done. I pointed out the fact that the elections were contested in the townships and towns sors were appointed on political principles, and that the courts of revision were appointed from majorities obtained according to their political principles, and that if this Bill were all that hon. gentlemen opposite said it was and simply brought into this House for a political purpose, it was not worse than the old state of things. That was the nature of my remarks. What I said in reply to the hon, gentleman was this:

"It was well known to all the members from Ontario that the elections in the main were carried very largely upon political grounds, and that the councillors were so elected in the first place, and that they appointed the assessors who made out the rolls, and that the courts of revision were appointed in a similar way. I also urged that the leader of the Opposition was responsible for bringing party politics in the elec-tion of the councillors, because he advised his friends to look after the voters' lists, and that consequently the object was to have the prepara-tion of the voters' lists in partisan hands."

I have to correct a misrepresentation of my remarks again. I would like hon, gentlemen to cease misrepresenting me and quote my exact words, when they do quote me at all; they have no right to suppose that I will be here on every occasion to correct them when they attribute to me the remarks I never made. I would not notice this were it not due to myself and to a class of citizens before whom I wish to stand right, especially the Conservatives who act honestly in politics; I cannot say so much of both sides. The hon, member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) said:

"I have more confidence in the Tories than the hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) appears to have, because I heard him declare in this House that he would not believe the assessors, a great many of them, under oath."

I never said anything of the kind. I defy any gentleman to look up Hansard, I defy any hon, gentleman who was in this House when I made a few remarks on this question, to say that I ever used such words. The hon, gentleman misquoted me, and, as I happened by mere accident to be in my seat at the time, I immediately rose and set him right in the following words:

in the following words:

"I rise to correct the hon, gentleman. He is entirely misrepresenting my statement again. I said nothing of the kind, and if the hon gentleman had been present he would not have dared to say so. I repeat again, that what I said was this: That the municipal elections in Ontario were generally held on political principles, and the councillors being so elected, the assessors were consequently so appointed, and the Courts of Revision were appointed upon the same principle, each side always endeavoring to obtain a majority of their own political friends, whether Grit or Conservative, as representing the county or town. That course, I said, was advised by the leader of the Retorm party at Toronto, who told them to look after the voters' list. The voters' lists were therefore prepared in the manner I have described—first, by election of members of the council who were of a particular stripe, then by the appointment of an assessor of the same stripe, by the majority of the Court of Revision of the same stripe. If the hon, gentleman denies that, then he denies what no other gentleman in the House would deny who has fought the municipal elections in the Province of Ontario."

I sav that the elections in the townships, towns and cities

I say that the elections in the townships, towns and cities of Ontario, and the hon. gentleman knows it well are so conducted, and if this Bill had the effect simply of carrying on the same state of things, matters will be no worse than they are.

Mr. TROW. The hon, gentleman, wincing under the castigation he is receiving from the corporations in his ridings for having charged those municipal bodies with being partisans.

Mr. HESSON. Quote my words.

Mr. TROW. To satisfy the hon. gentleman I will read what he said:

are taken, in the first place, upon the principle, and they choose their assessors. What better would it be if this suggestion is carried out? I think it would be very much better, and we will get rid of some portions of these partisen struggles, and it will be in the interests of the country if we could have gentlemen appointed by the Government for this purpose, gentlemen who have reputations, and who are responsible to this House. I do not think any gentleman would value his position so low that he would be willing to place it in the hands of his party, and say I will sacrifice my reputation for the paltry pittance you give me as a salary to discharge that work. I think it is asking too much of the members of this House to believe that we should get rid of the political principle by still leaving the appointment in the hands of the electors. My hon. friend must know that has been the trouble in the past." My hon. friend must know that has been the trouble in the past.'

Mr. HESSON. Does my hon, friend find the word "fraud" there, or that I would not believe the assessors on

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I think it would be well if the right hon, gentleman would define to the committee what part the revised assessment roll and the voters' lists, as finally revised, are going to play in preparing the lists under this Act. In the amendment he has placed before the committee, he stated that the assessment roll is to be taken as primá facie evidence of a man's right to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of the value of property.
