Mr. ARMSTRONG. Of the value of property. But I find that the amendment says that is only a part of the evidence, that he is to take such other evidence as he thinks right in making up the voters' lists. If the assessment roll, as finally revised, were to be taken as the absolute basis of the voters list, and then additions made to it or names struck off, at the final revision of the revising officer, a great part of the difficulty would be obviated. There would then simply remain the question of expense, which is a question for the Government to take hold of; this side of the House is not responsible for it. But if, as the Act at present provides, the revising officer is only to take the assessment roll as as evidence of valuation, and may of his own will and motion reject such names or put on such names as he may see fit, the same difficulty exists; we will have still a person appointed for a partisan purpose, who may enter only such names as suits himself and then shall have the final revision of the voters' lists. I was sorry to hear the remarks made to day and on a former occasion regarding the assessors and municipal clerks. It has been stated again and again that the reason for taking this matter out of their hands is because, as a general rule, they are partisans. I submit that if there is any force at all in that objection, it applies much more forcibly to this Bill; because in the case of the assessors there is a remedy provided, sure, quick and decisive, should they act in a partisan manner, whereas under this Bill there is no remedy. So far as the assessor is concerned, he performs his duty under oath.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will he not still take the same oath as before?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is an insult to any assessor to insinuate that he will perjure himself or violate his oath. But it does not rest there. There is an appeal from the assessor to the Court of Revision.

Mr. McCALLUM. What is the appeal for?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is against under-valuation or overvaluation. It is free to every man who thinks he is wrongly "The hon. gentleman says that persons should be elected for the purpose of preparing voters' lists. Now, we elect a council for the very rurpose of appointing the assessors, and the hon. gentleman knows, and every member of this House knows, that not only are the councils elected on political principles, but the assessors are appointed on political principles, but the assessors are appointed on political principles, but the assessors are appointed on political principles. My hon. friend knows it perfectly well. He knows that the great struggle has been between the parties on that point for years. I give him my own county as an instance; I do not think there is a single township in which the assessors have not been elected on that principle for years. In the city in which I have lived for the last forty years that battle has been fought out from year to year between the two great two great that battle has been fought out from year to year between the two great parties. My hon, friend will not be in any better position if the council kept off the assessors roll, or who thinks his property valued have even had a Conservative reeve, and once gave a Conservative warden to the county. But the matter does not end there. If any man feels aggrieved with the decision of the Court of Revision, he has an appeal to the county judge, and, so far as I know, those appeals have always been fairly dealt with in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. McCALLUM. Would not that be the same under this Act?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. This Act, in effect, declares that the assessor is not to be trusted, that the Court of Revision is not to be trusted, that the clerk of the township is not to be trusted, and finally that the county judge is not to be trusted.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will the hon. gentleman allow me-Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McCALLUM. I only desire to say-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I cannot allow interruptions, unless the hon, gentleman who is speaking permits them.

Mr. McCALLUM. I stated—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The right hon. gentleman who proposes this Bill declares that the voters' list, prepared in the manner I have described, is not a pure list, and that the object of this Bill is to produce a pure list. He, in effect, says that the eight men who are now engaged in getting up and revising the lists, and who do their work under oath, are not able to get up a pure list; and he proposes that the whole thing shall be left to the judgment of one of them, the county judge or of some one else whom he may appoint, and that all the others who now have anything to do with the preparation of the voters' list are not to be trusted. It will be an intolerable hardship if the alphabetical list is to be made for the whole municipality, instead of for each polling sub division, because I know townships where there are from 2,000 to 2,500 voters, and it will entail an enormous amount of labor to separate these, while it is a simple matter in a polling sub-division where there are not more than 200 voters. In the one case it will be very difficult to watch the list, while now it is quite easy, and under the new system it will almost be impossible to say that the roll is correctly made.

Mr. SPROULE. Notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), there is a great deal in the contention that the assessment roll is not an evidence of the correct value of the property. No doubt, the assessors endeavor to do their duty, but it is evident that they do not always succeed in that. In my county, there are every five years county valuators sent round to rectify the assessment of the township, or reassess the whole county, and I think that the last time such county assessment was made there was a difference of about $2,000,000 in the amount as assessed by the local assessors and the county valuators. I know of cases where land of equal value on different sides of a township line is very differently assessed. I believe the township assessors endeavor to do their duty fairly, as they are sworn to do; still, they have different views as to the value of property. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) contended that we have power to compel municipal officers to make up those lists. If they are appointed for that purpose and paid for it, I think we have, but not otherwise for they receive their instructions from the municipal governments. It was also contended that the officers entrusted with this duty under this Act could not get a copy of the voters' list. My experience is that these voters' lists are on sale in every township or county for a price ranging from 10 cents to 20 cents, so Mr. Armstrong.

Reform. There have always been Conservatives in it; we that it would be very easy for the revising officer to get a The hon, member for Bothwell contends that 25 or 30 per cent, of those entitled to vote under this Bill would not be found on the voters' list of the Province. That is an amusing contention in view of the fact that the hon, gen. tleman the other day alleged that the Ontario franchise gave votes to a large number who would not be entitled to vote under this Bill. That is in keeping with most of what the hon. gentleman says in this House. Now, there was another argument something like this: That the clerk of the municipality would be the best party to prepare the voters' list, because he was acquainted with the people and had this duty to perform every year. He has nothing of the kind to do. He can only copy the list after it has been revised by the assessor and municipal council of the municipality, and he has no more to do than the clerk who will be employed by the judge to copy the revised voters' list from the assessment roll which he receives from the clerk of the municipality. He has only to keep what is given to him by the municipal council after the assessment has been made, and after the municipal officers have revised that list. There is a great deal of force in the contention of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) that the very knowledge the township clerk possesses ought to unfit him for the discharge of that duty. And why would the judge be more likely to do it impartially than the clerk? For the reason that he is not acquainted with the political leanings of the voters in the township; he is not interested in knowing whether a man is a Conservative or a Reformer when there is an application made to him to put that name on or strike it off. He has an entirely different duty to perform, and the less he knows about the people of the township the better. The only thing he needs to know, after he accepts the revised assessment roll as prima facie evidence of the value of the property upon which a party shall be entitled to vote, is the value of that property; he does not want to know anything about that person's politics, and that is the reason why he is likely to do his duty impartially.

> Mr. DAWSON. The hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) and some other members, in considering the wording of this clause, seem to forget that in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion there are districts with numerous settlers where there are no voters' lists at all, and where there is no township laid off and no assessment roll or anything of that kind. In these cases there ought to be some provision made whereby it may be ascertained what people are living there and what property they are possessed of that would entitle them to vote. In my district with its 55,000 people there are some places where the polling stations are 100 miles apart; that district is 900 miles from east to west, and 300 miles from north to south. It is not like those little constituencies that you can drive around in a day and make up the assessment rolls. I think these unorganised districts should be taken into account as well as these organised districts where you have assessment rolls, and I think this provision very fair and very ample for that purpose.

> Mr. MULOCK. When the First Minister addressed the committee on Thursday last, he stated that the revising officer would be bound by the assessment roll, and that he was anxious to have the power and duties of the revising officer correspond as nearly as possible, mutatis mutandis, with the powers of the revising officer in England, and I presume that we are proceeding now with that object in view. Now, if the English statute is to be our guide at all, we find by it that the revising officer has very different duties to perform from those which it is proposed to assign to the revising officer here; and the remarks I made on Friday night, which resulted in the First Minister recommending the proviso to the 12th section, were with a view to following out the line that he indicated and to harmonise this measure with the English Act. Now if we look at the English Act 41-42 Vic., cap., 26, we find that the lists are prepared by the overseers who are municipal officers, and then they are dealt with by the revising officers, the revising officers have nothing to do with the original preparation of the lists; and I am anxious, if possible, that this Bill should provide that the assessment lists shall be binding upon the revising officer in the first place. Now, I see a great distinction between the proposition now made by the First Minister and the position which I think should be taken. I suggest that the assessment rolls should be, in the first instance, binding on the revising officer to this extent: That he should examine them and that the name of every person appearing by the assessment roll to be that of a duly qualified elector, should be transferred, without any discretion on the part of the revising officer to this preliminary list. If, however, you simply say, as the proviso offered says, that the revising officer shall take the assessment roll and voters' list as prima facie evidence, it still leaves him judicial powers before he has prepared his preliminary list. He can judicially hold that he has reason to disredit the assessment rolls, and he can ignore them entirely in the first instance. Now, it appears to me that after a person, claiming to be an elector, has had his qualification approved by the assessor, after the Court of Revision has sat to correct mistakes, there is a fair prosumption that all mistakes have been corrected; there is a fair presumption that all persons whose names appear on that revised assessment roll, and who by that roll appear to possess the necessary property qualification, are entitled to vote. At that stage it ought not, I submit, to be in the power of the revising officer, on any unauthontic information he may obtain ex parte, to ignore the revised assessment rolls. Therefore the distinction between the amendment which I placed in your hands and the proviso is this: That in dealing with the names of the class of people to which I have referred the revising officer shall simply have ministerial duties, and that it shall be his duty to transfer from the assessment roll to his primary list—called by the First Minister the fundamental list all names which appear on the revised assessment roll. It does not deprive him of any power later on to correct mistakes occasioned by mistakes in the assessment roll, if they are brought to his notice. The English Act states that the revising officer shall only have such power as would follow if the committee were to adopt the suggestion I have made. He simply can correct. I do not find there is any provision whereby a revising officer can overrule the overseer's estimate of value. His powers and functions are set forth in section 28 of the English Act. With respect to the illustration furnished by the First Minister, namely, that persons might be placed on the assessment roll who were aliens and therefore not entitled to vote, I do not see that is any reason for discrediting the assessment roll. It is true that names of persons may appear on such roll who are not able to vote. The revision of such names is the sort of work the revising officer is to do, unless it is still left to be done by the machinery of the Election Act. Under the English Act, sub-section 7, the revising officer has to deal with that class of cases. the primary list is made up the court is held, and if there is such an objection as has been suggested, that for example one political party. The people select the very best men a certain person is an alien or is civilly dead in who have an interest in the county, men of property and any way so that he cannot enjoy civil rights, then the revising officer, on evidence being adduced, districts and are quite competent to make up a list that can strike the name off the list. That appears to be will be fair and just between the different parties. the right time to strike it off. The presumption of I know the Province of Nova Scotia and I do not think the last in that all results and the religious that all results and are quite competent to make up a list that the last in that all results are the religious and I do not think the last in that all results are the religious and I was a record rule convention to do with the the law is that all persons placed on the roll enjoy all politics has, as a general rule, anything to do with the civil rights. All I ask is that this presumption shall preparation of those lists in the Province. I know that be allowed to stand good until the revising officer has in Halifax they sometimes take off and put on a good held his court, when legal evidence must be given in order many names, at the Court of Revision there, but outside of 282 to adjust the rights of parties. For these reasons I think the provision proposed does not go far enough; I recognise the intention of the First Minister, and I still hope the hon. gentleman will meet the objection I have made. What I ask is, that so far as regards the assessment roll and the voters' list, the revising officer shall, in the first instance, be obliged to transfer the names from the assessment roll to the primary list, instead of at that stage giving any judicial

Mr. VAIL. The great objection I have to the proposal is that it will be quite impossible to prepare a satisfactory and correct list without a large expenditure of public money. Our present mode in Nova Scotia is for the municipalities to appoint assessors. They are obliged to furnish revisers with a copy of the assessment list. The revisers revise the lists, and they are obliged to furnish the clerk of the peace with copies, and from that list the sheriff makes up the list of votors. It is a simple and inexpensive method. Let us suppose that a revising officer has been appointed, and he proceeds to commence work. He calls upon the clerk of the peace to furnish him with the assessment roll. It will be found that the roll does not contain a number of names of parties who will be entitled to vote under this Bill. It will contain a number of names, in the case of Nova Scotia, who will not be entitled to vote under this Bill; and it will be quite impossible for the revising officer to use that roll as anything more than simply a guide. It will be necessary for that officer, after he gets the list, to go into every polling district of the county and make a perfect examination of the lists, and compare the names with the people of the district, before he can ascertain who will be entitled to vote. Take the county I represent (Digby). The shire town is placed at one end of it. Three roads run parallel through the county, each having a length of 50 miles. The county judge and all the barristers, with one exception, live in the shire town. How can the judge, or revising barristor, be sufficiently acquainted with the persons living in the county to prepare a correct list unless he personally visits every part of the county? He must do that, and go over those three roads, having a united length of 150 miles, which, counting there and back, will give a distance of 300 miles. When he has done that he will only have his first list. It is necessary that list should be revised, then he goes over the district the second time so as to give people an opportunity of saying whether names have been improperly omitted or whether names should be struck off. In his final revision it is necessary to make the same journey. It is, therefore, quite impossible for a revising officer to perform the duties satisfactorily which have been discharged by municipal officers in regard to the pre-paration of the voters' lists. Those officers do not reside in one locality but in different parts of it, and they know the men whose names should be on the list, and in that way they obtain a very correct list. Under the proposed system it will be quite impossible to get a reliable list except at very great expense. That is the greatest objection I have to the proposed mode of appointment. The present method in Nova Scotia has worked satisfactorily. happens that a partisan may be appointed, either as assessor or as reviser; but it is not the rule, and very few appointments are made because the individuals belong to Halifax, I do not believe that half a dozen names are put on or taken off. If the Premier would only adopt that system, so far as obliging the revising officer to take the local lists to base his list upon, it would be more satisfactory in every way. The preparation of the list will cost very little, as the revising officer will have all the information necessary to enable him to arrive at a correct conclusion. Even although the committee has decided to adopt the revising barrister clause, I think we should do the best we can to assist him in arriving at the best method of obtaining information on which to base the voters' list.

Mr. TUPPER. The innocence of the hon. gentleman with regard to one matter in the Province from which we both come, is extraordinary. He stated that he could not call to mind any county in Nova Scotia in which political feeling was much involved in connection with the preparation of the assessment rolls and the revision of electoral lists. This is an astonishing statement after the debate which has taken place in the Local House upon a Franchise Bill which his friends introduced. No doubt the hon, member for Digby has seen that Bill, and no doubt he has read the debate.

Mr. VaIL. No; I have not.

Mr. TUPPER. Then the hon, gentleman should have done so before attempting to make such a statement as the one to which I have referred; for in that debate it was admitted all round, it was not contradicted by a single member of the Local House, that the grossest partisanship existed in connection with the preparation of the electoral lists in Nova Scotia. His own friend, Mr. Longley, in introducing the Bill, said the great object of the Bill was to do away with the partisan abuses in connection with the making up and preparation of the electoral lists. I have before me a report of the debates when that Bill was before the Local House. The leader of the Government in Nova Scotia, Mr. Fielding, another friend of the hon. gentleman, took the same ground in connection with one clause, the clause enfranchising farmers' sons. The leader of the Government said the reason the Government had thought proper to bring down that measure, was that all over the Province the law as it stood before the Bill was introduced, was so evaded that farmers' sons went on the list without qualifications, and that the feeling of the country was so strong, the evasion of the law was so general, that he felt it necessary to bring in a law legalising a custom which these voters had followed without legal sanction. The leader of the Opposition also made a remark which was not challenged, to this effect:

"The strength of political parties in each locality depends somewhat upon the acts of the assessors and revisors, and the consequence is that the control of the appointment of assessors and revisors, becomes a matter of the greatest political consequence."

That is in a Province where, according to the hon. gentleman, they do not mix up municipal matters with politics. A member of the Government also said:

"Reference has been made to the undesirable mode of making up the electoral lists under the existing laws."

Those are the laws which the hon, gentlemen have admired so much during this discussion.

Mr. VAIL. From whom are you quoting?

Mr. TUPPER. From Mr. Longley. I suppose you will acknowledge him an authority upon matters with which his Government is called upon to deal.

Mr. VAIL. Certainly.

Mr. TUPPER. He went on to say:

"The other object of the Bill is to remedy, as far as practicable, those evils. Under this measure introduced to-day, it is not hereafter to be in the bands of partisan assessors and revisors, to decide who are to be electors. We make it law under a penalty that the assessors are bound to send up the names of parties to be put on the lists."

Mr. TUPPER. I think I must add to the charge of innocence against the hon, gentleman the fact that he does not understand the language of his own friends. He must Mr. Vail.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says, "hear, hear," and therefore I take it that he will be surprised to find out that the Bill as passed, is, so far as this point is concerned. simply the old Bill which existed before, and under which all parties admitted that partisan acts were committed, and with the simple change that a stringent oath was framed, which is to be taken by the assessor. Mr. Longley continued:

"Those names must go on the list. This is the greatest purpose of the Bill. We do not propose widely extending the franchise, because any one looking at the Bill for a moment will see that; but we believe that, by the agency of this measure, we shall do away, to a great degree, with the evils of partisan assessors and revisers' boards."

Now, I take it that that statement was accurate because it was not challenged, and I could go on to read extracts from members after members who gave instances in their own counties where the grossest abuses arose in connection with the preparation of the lists. After such statements by members of the Executive Government it ill becomes any member from the Province of Nova Scotia to assert that politics have not entered into the prepartion of the voters' lists in Nova Scotia.

Mr. VAIL. If the hon, gentleman was surprised at my innocence, I am much surprised at his ignorance, because he does not understand the law which has been passed in Nova Scotia, nor the old law which was on the Statute Book for 10 or 15 years, although he is a lawyer. As to what these members of the Local House may say, it may be that they were referring to the county represented by my hon. friend, but at any rate, it makes little difference to me what they say. I think I know as much about Nova Scotia, take it all in all, as any man in the Local House, or in this House, and I do not know that there is a place in Canada where politics enter less into the preparation of the lists than in Nova Scotia, the hon, gentleman to the contrary, notwithstanding. The hon, gentleman has referred to the law recently passed in Nova Scotia, but does it provide a new system of making up the electoral lists? As the hon. gentleman evidently does not know much about the old law, I will read him one clause of the old law, under which we have been running elections for the past 20 years:

"If the assessors neglect to make up or deliver the list, or wilfully deliver an incorrect list, or if the revisers neglect to revise the list so delivered, or wilfully transmit an incorrect list, for every neglect or wilful delivery or transmission of an incorrect list, every assessor or reviser so contravening this Act shall pay a penalty of $100, which any person may recover with costs, and each day a list is delayed shall be a separate offence."

Mr. TUPPER. Did I deny that.

Mr. VAIL. If they put a penalty clause in the Act, is it an improvement on the law which has been in force for the last 20 years? The hon, gentleman does not understand the law. The hon, gentleman says he could prove that in my own county politics have been allowed to enter into the preparation of the lists. I deny it. I have represented that county since 1867, except for a short period; we have had the same revisers since that time that we had for 10 or 15 years before, and I do not think there have been two names added to the list or two struck off in any one year since I have represented the county. I have so much confidence in those men who were appointed before I was in politics and who have done their duty so faithfully that I do not look at the lists except just before an election to see if any alterations are necessary. Having held an office in Nova Scotia for eight years which brought me into communication with these men, I think I know as much about this matter as any man in Nova Scotia or in this House.

not take me to task because the Government, while introducing a Bill which they said was to wipe out the great abuses that existed under the present system, and adding a stringent oath to the Bill, neglected to carry out that provision. The former extracts were too long for the hon. gentleman to follow. Here is a short one:

"It will be remembered that when it was brought before the Legislature before the hon. Provincial Secretary it was not brought forward in a vaunting spirit as a great reform, but was introduced particularly with the purpose of doing away with a great deal of illegality and partisanship now existing in making up the electoral lists."

is that not enough to satisfy the hon. gentleman? I do not quarrel with him for misunderstanding me, but I do not see why he should misunderstand or villify his absent

Mr. VAIL. Whom are you quoting from?

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Longley, a member of the executive

Mr. VAIL. I am not responsible for that. Mr. Longley lives in Halifax, and he may have been referring to the partisanship that existed there. I expressly exempted that city, and said it was customary for a great many names to be put on or struck off there.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) whether any of his friends in the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia admitted serious abuses to exist, and proposed, in order to correct those abuses, that the preparation of the voters' lists should be taken out of the hands of the local authorities, and placed in the hands of the revising officers appointed by the Government of the Province for the time being.

Mr. TUPPER. Perhaps my hon, friend will not be surprised to learn that my friends in Opposition in Nova Scotia have borrowed a leaf from hon, gentlemen opposite. They have not propounded any policy on that subject.

Mr. VAIL. Yes, they have proposed manhood suf-

Mr. BURPEE. By the adoption of the 10th section, the committee has decided in favor of the revising barrister, but the manner in which he shall carry out his duties is prescribed in the section now before us. I think the leader of the Opposition has very well characterised the title of revising officer as a misnomer, for certainly his duties relate more to the making up than to the revising of the lists. The revising officer, we are told, is to be a judge or lawyer of five years' standing. I say nothing of the judges; but I do say that there are many lawyers of five years' standing who are violent partisans and who should not be entrusted with the making up of the list. It has been said that the assessors are partisans, and that we should take the duty of making the lists out of their hands; it is said that there is a political struggle over the appointment of assessors. In the Province from which I come I have never seen any such struggle; but we propose to end this struggle by appointing a purely partisan revising barrister. We intensify the evil by providing for the appointment by a partisan Government of a man who is clearly a partisan. The fact is the revising barrister with the duties and powers as defined by this Bill, is not to be found in any other British colony. No British colony would trust the Ministry of the day with the appointment of a revising barrister to make up the lists by which the members of the House of Commons are to be elected to support or condemn the Ministry. This clause in fact provides for the making of a jury by an officer appointed by the party to by tried, to try that party. That is extremely unfair. In England, it has been well said the revising officer is very different in the different districts, and make out as nearly as may be a from what he is under this Bill, and I wish to correct an impression that is sought to be conveyed by organs of the in New Brunswick are two councillors elected by each parish, Government. Only a few days ago, the organ of the Government in the Province of New Brunswick made this

"The machinery provided in this Bill is that which has been in operation in Great Britain for years. Why then should the free trade Liberals of this Province complain?"

The writer assumes that the machinery in this Bill is the same as that which has been in use in England for years. I dony that statement. It is well known that in En land the lists are made up by the municipal officers, the overseers and parish clerks, and not by the revising officers, and then the revising officer, instead of being appointed by the Government, is appointed by the judges. Thus it will be seen the two systems are entirely different. I am glad to see the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry), in his place, because I wish to refer to a proposition he put forward in this debate, namely, that this provision of the Bill is similar to a provision in the Bill introduced in New Brunswick last Session, but which did not become law. He intimated that the revising barrister under the New Brunswick Bill had the same duties to perform as he has under this.

Mr. LANDRY. Did the hon. gentleman take that from what I said, or from the St. John Globe?

Mr. BURPEE. I took it from the hon, gentleman's speech in the Hansard which I have in my hand, and will read, if allowed to do so:

"If this same measure had come from the leader of the Government of New Brunswick there would not have been a word said against it. Lookat the Bill as it passed the Lower House in New Brunswick. It would not only change the franchise for the election of members to the Legislature of New Brunswick, but the franchise for the election of members to this House also; yet these hon. gentlemen did not say a word against it."

The hon, gentleman goes on to say:

"The revising barrister is, there, not to be removed by another party but the party that appointed him. Now, if a Bill of this kind passed in this House can be used for a party purpose, surely a similar measure passed by another House can be used for a party purpose in the same way Therefore, my hon. friends from the Province of New Brunswick would not have maie that objection against the Bill if it had been proposed by some one else, but he simply does so because it was proposed on this side of the House."

The hon, gentleman here intimated distinctly that the Bill now before the House is similar to the one which was passed in the New Brunswick House, but which did not become law.

Mr. LANDRY. No I did not.

Mr. BURPEE. In confirmation of that, I have letters in my possession from different parties who give that construction to his language.

Mr. LANDRY. The St. John Globe said I stated so, and that is no doubt where the people to which the hon. gentleman alludes got their information.

Mr. BURPEE. I do not know what the St. John Globe said. I do not know that I have read it, but I know the construction put upon the hon. gentleman's remarks by the people. Under the present law of New Brunswick, we have revisers; we have no revising barristers, there are no legal gentlemen upon the board, the assessor is sworn to do, is duty and is enjoined to put a valuation on the property, which would be the value it might be considered to bear if it formed part of an estate after a man's death. The system in New Brunswick is very strictly guarded. There is not only the assessor, but, as a check upon the assessors, valuators are appointed every three years whose duty it is to value the property in the whole county, and they ere appointed by the municipality. These valuators take the whole electoral district and consult the assessors in the different districts, and make out as nearly as may be a with the third appointed by the municipal council. They are not revising barristers. They are practical men who know all about the different localities. They have no power to put anyone on the list in the first instance, but are com-pelled to take the names from the assessors. They submit pelled to take the names from the assessors. their list to the public for a certain time, and every person has the privilege of going before them and producing evidence. From the revisers' list there is no appeal. It was proposed in the Bill which did not become law that there should be an appeal to a revising barrister, but he was to have no right to interfere with the assessors' list or with the revisors' list, except on appeal. Whether that was a judicious measure or not, I think does not matter, but I have heard very few complaints in regard to the present mode of making up the list, and I think there is hardly any necessity for anything further in that Province. I think that, to take the power of making up the list out of the hands of the municipal authorities is injudicious. Gentlemen on the other side say that the revising barrister will be impartial because he may be a judge.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That is not the question.

Mr. BURPEE. Cannot I consider the possible or probable action of the officer who will be appointed to carry out the provisions before you? If we are to take the action of the present Government or of any other Government preceding it, we must come to the conclusion that no person will be appointed to carry out these provisions unless he belongs to their own political party. I do not believe they will go to the Reform party to get a revising officer. But to put power into the hands of a political partisan to make up a list of voters for the election of a member who is to support or condemn the party appointing this gentleman, is certainly, in my opinion, a most outrageous act. If I could characterise it in milder terms I would do so, but I think it deserves very much stronger terms. I do say that when a man has power to select his own jury to try his own case, he will be very likely to get a verdict in his favor. Then there is the question of expense. It has been proved beyond doubt that this Bill will entail a cost of $1,000 or $1,500 for every average electoral district, and the people of that district will indirectly have to pay it. In my opinion this is one of the strongest arguments against this section of the Bill, namely, that it will entail a heavy expense on the Dominion at a time when we are ill able to bear it. For these reasons I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. BAIN. I had hoped, when the First Minister refered to the amendment which was proposed when the House opened with respect to this clause, that the section respecting the position of tenants upon the assessment rolls of the various Provinces where the qualification is not entered in the form of rental, would have received some attention at his hands: and I hope yet that he will carry out the partial promise he made to the House a few days ago and enable the revising officer, when making up his roll, to place upon it all tenants who may appear as occupants of property to the value of $150, which would qualify the proprietor, without compelling these tenants to appeal to the revising barrister afterward to have their names placed upon the lists. I conceive it would facilitate matters very much, because, if these parties, from any accidental cause, should happen to pay a rental below the property qualification, those few exceptional names could then be struck off in the second revision, and it would be made a correct list in future. But I think it should be a matter of instruction to the revising barristers that these parties, where there is not a rental qualification upon the face of the assessment roll, should be entered upon that roll as bond fide tenants of property, fairly qualified, when the property is shown to be valued at $150. Respecting the mode Mr. BURPER municipal experience, I have a strong leaning towards employing in some way the municipal officers. I do not propose that they should be made independent of authority; they may be employed under the supervision of the revising barrister. Notwithstanding all that has been said about the partisan action of municipal officers, I think that they will be found to be, on the average, of as good a material as the revising officer can summon before him, for the purpose of obtaining any other information with respect to the qualification of voters. There may be extreme cases in which the assessor allows his feelings to get the better of his judgment; but I must say this, with respect to the township clerks who would be the parties under the amendment of my hon. friend to make up this first list, that so far as my personal experience goes, in referring to my own riding, that if partisanship is the first qualification for a revising barrister to discharge this duty, I would be no worse off than I am with the township clerks. In my own riding it happens that all the municipal clerks who now make up the voters' lists belong to my political opponents, with exception of one, and he is under the control of a Conservative council, and I suppose under these circumstances he will be looked after in the discharge of his duty. But aside from that, the making up of this list by the municipal officer is largely a question of clerical work. He is not authorised to put a man on or to out a man off; he simply makes up the voters' lists from the assessment roll as completed by the court of revision. We propose, to a certain extent, to make those rules the prima facie basis on which the revising officer can make up his list. I wish to impress upon the First Minister that by employing those municipal officers, who now have the custody of those rolls, to prepare and make up the voters' lists, with such additional evidence as may be put in their hands with reference to parties who may not appear upon this list, they have an advantage in the matter of cost, which will be a considerable item if all the assessment rolls of all the municipalities of the whole Dominion are to be copied for the purpose of placing them in the office of the revising barristers. I venture to say that on an average, over the various ridings of the Domidion, the municipalities will vary from four to ten in number, and it will be a small municipality where the copying of the assessment roll would not cost at least $10, and perhaps $15, in the large municipalities. Now, if it costs, on an average, $50 to $100 to copy these rolls for the revising officer, I think it is plain that a very large saving would be effected if the first duty could be imposed upon the municipal officers in preparing the first list, whether they are known as town-ship clerks or secretary treasurers, or whatever other name they may bear in the various Provinces. They will have the subsequent advantage that they are the custodians of these rolls; and I understood the First Minister to say that we should have a subsequent court of revision held by the revising officer or the judge in each of these municipalities, so that the municipal clerk could still discharge the duties of clerk to the revising officer or judge before whom he could produce the rolls for the purpose of settling any question of value that might occur with the additional advantage of his familiarity with the subject he would make a much more efficient assistant to the revising officer in the subsequent revision of the list than would a new officer who would not possess that particular knowledge. It cannot be that the clerk appointed to assist the revising officer will have duties of such a nature as to fully occupy his time. In my municipal experience I am not aware of any charge of fraud having been sustained against the officers in making up the voters' list from the assessment roll. Any difficulties that may arise with respect to improper or unfair valuations by the is assessor would be perfectly open to revision and correction shown to be valued at $150. Respecting the mode by the revising officer on the second revision of the list. of making up the first list, I confess, from my But it will be much simpler if in the first instance the duty is left to be discharged by the various municipal officers now charged with the work. This is also true as regards expense. It is well worthy of consideration whether it is not desirable to effect the material saving that would be effected by adopting this plan, without involving additional duties upon the revising officer upon the second revision, when the voters' lists will be completed. There necessarily must be more or less difficulty in transferring voters' lists made upon a different basis and from assessment rolls that do not cover all classes of persons entitled to vote under this Bill. These difficulties will obtain in a greater degree, if you place the working out of the first lists in the hands of men who have had no experience in that direction. It is important that every man who has apparently a fair and equitable right to be placed upon the first list should be placed there; but, unless some modification of this clause is adopted, it will be found that a large number of names will be left off when it is printed and in the hands of the public for review. I suggest whether it would be possible first to effect a division into polling divisions, which becomes a subsequent part of the revising officer's duty, and have the list printed in alphabetical order in subdivisions, which would enable voters of different districts to more easily check the names.

Mr. WELDON. The discussion seems not to have been confined to the amendment merely but also to cover the clause generally. One of the great objections to this Bill is that it is entirely framed with respect to the Province of Ontario and entirely ignores the positions of the other Provinces. First, there is a reference to a revised assessment roll. We, in New Brunswick have an assessment roll, but it is not revised. Another point is as to a revised list in an electoral district. Now it is only defined what the rolls should be in an electoral district, but I think it should also be defined as to cities, towns, parishes and polling districts, and that it should be arranged so that there may be no technical advantage taken which might materially affect the preparation of the lists. I have also noticed that this clause is in other respects, with regard to obtaining certified copies of the list, applicable only to Ontario and not generally applicable to the Provinces. With regard to the amendment, I would point out that as in the Province of New Brunswick each county is a municipality, instead of a township or village as in Ontario, there should be some change so as to give the Province of New Brunswick the advantage of a separate list for each town, parish, or polling district, according to the intention of the Bill. As it has been pointed out that the assessment roll ought to be the basis upon which the revising barrister shall form his list, I may say that in New Brunswick the assessors prepare the list, not so much with regard to voting as to the collection of the local and county taxes. Provision is also made for a valuation every 5 years of all the lands, and also by persons being compelled to furnish certain particulars to the assessors. By these means, the roll is made practically correct, and I am happy to say that I have never in all my experience, heard the charge of partisanship made against our assessors in New Brunswick or any suspicion attached to them in that respect. Formerly the assessors were chosen by the people, but since the introduction of municipal institutions, they are appointed by the county councils. Up to 1882 the revisors could add or take off names from the roll, and they did so, acting upon the advice of the late Judge Fisher who introduced the Bill in the Legislature; but just before the last election, it was held by friends of the right hon, gentleman that the law was improperly construed in that respect, and the revisors were shorn of a great deal of their power, and it was largely in consequence of that fact that the franchise law of that Province was sought to be changed. I am sorry to say that some of the newspapers of New Brunswick have misrepre- have to be ascertained very carefully, and I know of no sented this Bill. They have stated that its provisions were practically the same as those of the English law, when, as we all know, it is an entirely different measure. It was charged in one of these organs that I had stated in this House that in my opinion we had no power to pass such a Bill. Anyone who knows what I said, or who knows me as a lawyer, knows that I could not have made such a statement. What I did speak of was as to the true meaning of the 41st section of the British North America Act and the policy of passing such a measure as this. The words revising barrister, as applied to the officer provided for in this Bill, are a misnomer, because, so far from his duties being merely to revise, he has the whole machinery in his own hands, and he is to prepare the lists at his own discretion from such information as he can obtain, no matter where or how he gets it. Some hon, gentlemen have charged the assessors with partisanship, but the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) disfavors that idea, and the general feeling, as shown by the tenor of the debate, has been that both in Ontario and Quebec the assessors, as a general rule, have honestly and fairly done their duty. The assessment list is not made simply for voting purposes; that is not its primary object. A man's name is put upon the assessment roll by virtue of the claim the municipality has upon him to contribute his share to its revenues. And by virtue of that claim he becomes entitled to vote. The very object of this clause, as the hon. First Minister proposes to amend it, is to take the assessment roll in the first instance as the basis of the voters' list. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) provides that the assessor should make up a list of the persons entitled to vote, not an absolute list, but for the use of the revising officer. What objection is there to that? The assessor knows everybody entitled to vote in his locality, and in making up the list he could have no partisan object in view, and if he had, he would be checked by the subsequent machinery of the Bill. Take a large district, like the county of Northumberland in our Province; it would be impossible for a county court judge or a revising officer to go through that county and ascertain the different persons entitled to vote; he would have to rely on local information in the long run. Take my own county or the county of York, it would be utterly impossible for one of these officials to ascertain who are entitled to vote in either of these counties without obtaining local information. He has to take the assessment roll as his guide or to seek information from persons who understand the locality. At present, tenants or occupants and farmers' sons have no right to vote, and their names do not appear on the assessment roll. How is the revising officer going to obtain the necessary information regarding their qualification without going to the district himself or taking the ipse diait of any one who comes before him? If the assessors were required to make up, in addition to the assessment roll, a list of persons entitled to vote under this Act, the revising officer would have something to guide him, and he could verify it with very little trouble. He would not be bound by it; but it would be official information for him in the first instance, and would be obtained at very little expense; otherwise, the revising officer would have to make a personal inspection of the county and is paid by the day, or he would compel the people to come where he held his court, and great expense would be incurred, which might be saved by the adoption of my hon. friend's amendment. I do not think the amendment at all interferes with the principle laid down by the right hon. gentleman. It is merely for the purpose of getting the aid of the local machinery so as to reduce the expense and get at the information in a manner by which justice would be done to all. With regard to the extension of the franchise, it is entirely new as regards our Province, and, being entirely new, it will persons better able to carry out, in the first instance, the divisions with regard to the extended franchise than the assessors who are bound by the valuations made by valuators appointed every five years, and whose work is done very carefully. I cannot urge too frequently upon the committee that the valuation is made, in the first instance, for the purpose of ascertaining the taxation of property and those who have a right to be taxed, and the right to vote follows merely as a consequence; so that the assessors are far less open to the charge of partisanship than the revising barristers appointed by a political party will be. If the judges had been given the power of appointing the revising officers, there might be an argument for taking the preparation of the lists out of the hands of the assessors, and placing it in the hands of men whose appointment was not partizan. Had this power been given into the hands of the Chief Justice of the Province of New Brunswick, there would not, in regard to that Province, be a word of complaint. I am sure the hon, member for Kent election shall be held could only have emanated from the (Mr. Landry), in his remarks, had no intention of imputing anything improper to the Chief Justice, or of inferring that this charge, if confided to him, would be abused in any way. Having presided 20 years over the New Brunswick court, very ably and to the general satisfaction of the public, we may fairly conclude that in this instance also he would do his duty fairly. Had the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) been adopted, there would therefore have been less chance of partisanship; but by adopting this provision now under discussion, I am afraid will be dropping from the frying pan into the fire.

The committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

On Friday last, we passed a clause which provided that an individual to be called a revising officer should be appointed by the Government for each electoral division. The clause we are now considering describes the duties of that individual, and compels us to come to the conclusion that the name itself is a misnomer. The person who is appointed to perform the duties described in this clause, is not a revising officer at all. He is an officer to make lists, not to revise them, at least primarily. His principal duty is to make lists. The lamented William Shakespeare—I do not refer to any member of this House—and (What's in a page 2). said "What's in a name?" but that Mr. Shakespeare to whom I now refer evidently knew nothing of the Franchise Bill. Had he read this Bill, he would have known there is a great deal in a name, that in fact, in the words of another immortal author, "There's millions in it." If we were to call this individual, whom the Bill calls a revising officer, by any of the other aliases which would more properly describe his duties and functions, it would be easily seen that there is a great deal in a name. If we were to call him the list maker, the vote maker, the chief cook of the voters' lists; if we explained that he was an oracle, a person inspired, not exactly by the divine afflatus of the Gods, but by the afflatus of the right hon. the leader of the Government, a person intended to speak the words of that right hon. gentleman, to do his work, and to further his interests in every way; if we were to give him a name that would carry that idea with it, it is easily conceivable that the people would look with greater suspicion upon his appointment than when we call him by the simple and unpretentious name of revising officer. A revising officer is a person who corrects lists made by some bodyelse; this revising officer is to make lists on his own, and then go through the form of revising them afterwards. His powers are very much like those which were attributed by a poor negro, in tion and branch associations of the riding. The result Mr. WELDON.

my part of the country, to the school trustees in the section to which he belonged. "It was," he said, "most lemoncholly that poor, weak, human nature should have such supernatural powers." It is very lemoncholly that poor weak human nature should have such supernatural powers as this creation of the brain of the right hon. gentleman is endowed with by this Bill. He is in a special sense the child of the right hon. gentleman; the conception is his alone, the conception is worthy of him, the conception is one that I believe could have originated in the mind of no other Canadian states. man. I will go further and say that the conception is one that could have originated in the mind of no statesman of Great Britain or of the United States, as far as I can judge by the past actions of the inferior politicians of those countries. The idea is grand and comprehensive and thorough. The idea of appointing a political agent of the Government, a personal nominee of the Conservative candidate in each riding throughout the Dominion to form the lists upon which the brain of the right hon. gentleman himself. It is one with which his name will be linked to all posterity, and which will be looked upon as the fitting crown and culmination of his political career. Some of us have heard and have believed that the vox populi and the vox dei are the same thing, but the hon, gentleman has gone further, he has created the vox populi, and he is going to make the vox populi himself. He has adopted a means to enable him to nominate the vox populi in each electoral district, to nominate a person who shall say who shall utter the vox populi.

Some hon. MEMBERS, Question.

Mr. CASEY, What does the hon, gentleman say?

Mr. PAINT. How many times will vox populi be pronounced?

Mr. CASEY. I think it will be pronounced about 211 times in the next general election, and I do not know whether the hon, member for Richmond will like the way in which the vox populi will be pronounced in his own county, or if he will regard it as a joke, as he seems to do now. The leader of the Government has tried to bring that voice into accord with his own, to tone it and to tune it, and to make it sound such soft and sweet melodies for his followers as they could desire. The country would have been startled if the officer referred to in this discussion had been given a name to express his powers, but the right hon. gentleman has been careful to take the name from the political system of a country foreign to us, Great Britain, where it does express the powers of the officer concerned. For a time, no doubt, the people as well as the members of this House were inclined to think there was something comparable in the duties of these two officers, but their eyes are being opened, and I intend to show in a little detail how very different the duties are. The right hon. gentleman has apparently gone some distance to meet our views by declaring that the assessment rolls and voters' lists and poll-books shall be primá facie evidence. He has gone far enough to prove that the views which we have urged are sound, but he has not gone far enough to carry soundness he admits, doctrine, whose into the effect. He empowers his protégé to get such other information as he may think fit in order to fill up the gaps left by these lists. What does this mean? Is the officer to drive from concession to concession as the assessor does, in order to find out how many people have an income of $300 a year and how many pay $20 a year rent? Of course not; neither he, nor his clerk, nor his bailiff, nor any other of his official family will do that. He will go to the friends of the man who appointed him, to the organisation of the party candidate who made him revising officer, to the Conservative associaof the intentional looseness in this clause will be that the Conservative voters of the classes not shown on the assessment rolls or old voters' lists will be put on at the expense of the country, while the Liberal electors will only be put on at the expense of the Liberals themselves. Why does not the hon, gentleman strike out the words "and all such other information as he can obtain," and leave the revising officer bound by the names found upon the assessment rolls, old voters' lists and poll-books? Undoubtedly large classes would be left off in that way, and would have to appeal, but they would be divided between the two parties; a proportionate number of Reformers and Conservatives would be left off, and all those who were not found on these lists would have to appeal. In fact, they would be in the same position as the income voter in England. I find it stated in Rogers' Election Law that the names of income voters are not put upon the rough draft of the voters' list in England at all, and only go on the list by subsequent application to the revising barristers. Whig, Tory and Radical—all the income voters, and, I think, all the lodger voters, too—go upon the list only by appeal made through the oversiers to the revising barrister. What is the object of that? Simply because the income and lodger qualifications are of a nature that is not easily shown by documentary evidence, and do not appear on the assessment rolls of the parish. It is but fair and right that persons asking to be qualified under these franchises should not be put upon the list except on sworn evidence, put in in open court before the revising barrister; and the same thing that is fair there is fair here. Our income and tenant franchises are of such a nature that it will not be improper to require sworn evidence of qualification before applicants under those franchises are put upon the list. I say, then, that if this clause is to operate fairly between the two parties, nobody should be put upon the first rough draft of a list made by the revising officer except those whose qualifications are shown by the assessment roll, the voters' lists and the old poll books. I do not think, indeed, that the revising officer should be the maker of that first rough draft at all; I think with my hon. friend who has moved the amendment, that the municipal officers alone should be entitled to prepare that. Of course, there are a number of persons not at present included upon the a sessment rolls whom they would have to include in this first draft; and what is to hinder us from asking them to include those persons? What is to hinder us from directing that the clerk or assessor of every township should prepare a primary rough list, including not only those persons now included upon the assessment rolls, but also other classes whom this Bill gives the franchise to? Have we not power over these officers? Undoubtedly we have. By this Bill we direct the assessor to provide a copy of his assessment roll for the revising officer. And if we can do that we could direct him to make a separate list of persons not included on that roll. But hon gentlemen opposite do not want the assessor to have anything to do with the voters' list. Why? Because he is apt to be partisan. Well, Sir, in the first place, he is not at all certain to be partisan. Men who seek to hold office under successive municipal councils, are very apt to become neutral so as to keep in favor with successive councils who may differ in politics. But suppose all the assessors were partisan. To whom do we appeal from the assessors—who will be Grit or Tory about in proportion as the population of the Demicroabout in proportion as the population of the Dominion is Grit or Tory? We are to appeal to officers who will be invariably partisan. Each one is sure to be on one side or the other in politics. When a Conservative Government is in power, they will be Conservatives, and when a Reform Government is in they will be Reformers. We are to get men who will be always partisan instead of men who may is a downright insult to any self-respecting and reputable be partisan. But we are told we shall have the security of lawyer in Ontario, or any where else, to offer him such a the oath of the revising officer. Well, I think we may fairly position, to ask him to put himself in a position where he put the oath of the assessor against the oath of the revising officer. It is certainly no degradation to the legal profession in Canada to say that the oath of the average honest farmer, such a man as is apt to be chosen for assessor, is as good as the oath of any lawyer, as good as the oath of any barrister of five years' standing, as good as the oath of any county judge, or of any other judge, that he will fairly discharge the duties of his office. But under the present system we have not only the oath of the assessor, we have five councillors sworn to do their duty, who revise the work of the assessor, we have the oath of the municipal clerk, and we have the judge sworn to do his duty, who revises the work of the other seven-we have eight oaths under the existing system against one under the system that is now proposed, and if these eight oaths, including the oath of the county judge in Ontario, are not as good as the oath of one barrister of fire years' standing, then I say the race of five-year old barristers is becoming something of an altogether supernatural excellence. My hon friend from Victoria (Mr. Cameron) said that the insinuation that the revising barrels. But the partisan was an insult to the whole bar of the Dominion. He considered that the profession to which he belongs inculcated such ideas of honor and uprightness that it was monstrous to suppose that any member of that profession could so far forget himself as to be guilty of the slightest partiality when acting under oath as the political agent of the Premier of the day. I think the hon, gentleman is too charitable. He is judging other barristers of Canada by his own high standing. He knows quite well he would not for a moment allow his party leanings to sway his opinions upon the most doubtful point of qualification. He believes that the other barristers of Canada of five years' standing have reached the same superhuman standard. I do not think, Sir, they have; I am sure the people do not believe it is so. They believe that the barristers of Canada, without exception, are subject to the same temptations and the same weaknesses as a member of Parliament; and if we find ourselves occasionally acting from partisan motives in the House, is it reasonable to suppose that the five-year old barrister, to whom we propose to entrust our political destinies and our political life, will not act from partisan motives occasionally? I think I could name, without any disrespect to the bar of Ontario, a few barristers of five years' standing in that Province who would be apt to act on partisan principles in this office, no matter how many oaths they took. I do not mean to say these men would consciously perjure themselves, but I mean to say that they are so subject to partisanship and their moral vision is so oblique in respect to political matters that things which are unfair, unreasonable and unjust in themselves, would seem to them fair, reasonable and just. Of course, they would consider that they were acting upon the highest and most patriotic motives; but I am prepared to assert that not only some of them, but the great bulk of them—nay, all of them, would do that which would seem to the rest of the community unfair, unjust and iniquitous, by whatever high patriotic and lawful motives they were actuated. I am going very far when I say this, and take it for granted that the officer will act from such motives I have stated, for I cannot help knowing from experience of such officials appointed by this Government how they act. It is the most charitable thing to assume obliquity of moral vision instead of bad intention. But suppose we take the most able and clear-sighted lawyer that can be named on the Conservative side and make him revising officer. No one would expect that he would act fairly. Whatever party was injured by his decision would feel that it was the act of a partisan. It would be looked upon by both friends and foes as a party tool, placed there to do dirty work, an officer who is to give all his decisions from partisan motives.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon, gentleman is not speaking to the question.

Mr. CASEY. I am speaking of the revising officers' duties.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is discussing rather the question of the revising barristers.

Mr. CASEY. I am discussing their duties. I repeat that it is an insult to ask any self-respecting barrister of Canada to accept that position and discharge those duties which will place him in a hopelessly invidious position, a position which will heap disgrace on him in the eyes of a great many of his fellow-citizens. The hon, member for Victoria said the duties would be discharged in the light of day. The hon. gentleman has overlooked part of the duties of the revising officer. In section 55, which must be read with this section, he is distinctly directed, "of his own motion," to make certain changes in the list without notice being given.
That is not discharging duties in the light of day. I desire That is not discharging duties in the light of day. I desire to point out some reasons why it is far preferable that the primary voters' list should be made by municipal officers and not by the revising officer. The manner of his appointment casts a strong suspicion on his motives and fitness for the task. The nature of his duties raises a stronger The duties discharged by revising officers in England are quite as large and wide as should be entrusted to revising officers here. What are the duties of such an officer in England? He is to take the list made by the overseers of each parish—as to the manner of making which the House has some information. These overseers are elected by the ratepayers. What shall he do with that list? Rogers, on elections, says that a revising barrister is empowered, first, to correct any mistakes on the list; and he goes on to say what mistakes may be corrected. The revising barrister may correct figures made in error—a name of a township erroneously put at the head of a list, and so on. When a christian name of a voter or a wrong description is inserted he may make the necessary correction. He may expunge the name of any person whose qualification is insufficient, in law, to confer a vote. "But this does not authorise him to strike off the name of a voter who is not objected to, although the Court of Common Pleas had decided that the voter could not have sufficient qualification "-even although the revising barrister knew the alleged voter could not have sufficient qualification. Under the English law he cannot expunge any name from the list, of his own mere motion. Look at the difference betwen the powers of the officials in England and here. One is superlegal, independent of the law, does not take evidence; the other is strictly limited by the law. The English official is not to make any changes, except such as are called for by the electors themselves. He can neither expunge a name nor insert a name unless objection is taken. Those objections must be lodged with the board of overseers, with a body corresponding to our township court of revision. With that body objections are lodged; from it they go before the revising barrister, and on the case thus presented the claim either stands or falls. The barrister is purely judicial and has no ministerial duty; he does nothing of his own mere motion, and nothing at all except upon evidence laid before him in the light of day, and given upon oath. The English revising barrister has also "power to expunge the names of persons who are dead, or have been proved guilty of bribery, treating, or using undue influence, or against whom judgment in any penal action has been obtained." That would be a very insert the name of any such persons, whether on the register or only claimants for registration, in a separate list, to be headed, "List of persons disqualified for bribing, treating, or using undue influences." Now, Sir, by section 38 of 6 Victoria, chapter 13, it will be seen that there is a very striking difference—I think the greatest difference—between the two officials. There is a great deal of difference in the method of appointment. That has been dealt with. In the one case he is appointed by an impartial judge; in the other he is appointed by the person most interested. The English officer is a judicial officer; he has only to decide on claims which are laid before him. The Canadian officer is to be a ministerial officer; he is to act of his own motion, in the interest of his own friends, if he chooses to take action. He is not to wait to be called upon by any of the voters of the electoral division, either as to striking off names or putting on new names. The two things go together-his supra-legal powers and his supraconstitutional appointment. One is the complement to the other-carries out the purpose of the other. appointed for a purpose, and his duties are so arranged as to carry out that purpose. What the purpose is is so evident that I need not explain it further. Now, Sir, the right hon, gentleman himself, the father of this Bill, told us the other day that his amendment making the assessment rolls the prima facie evidence of the primary voters' list made the duties of the so-called revising officer similar to those of the real revising officer in England. He said that in one case the voters' list was appealed from to the revising barrister in individual cases, whereas, in the other, the whole list was appealed en masse. Taking his own statement, it does not appear that the duties of the two officers are similar, as there is something different in appealing a votors' list en masse from allowing appeals in individual cases. One opens up the whole case; it puts the whole list at the mercy of the revising officer, while in the other he is only allowed to decide individual cases. But the right hon, gentleman did not state the case correctly, as the duties of the two officers are not similar, even to that extent. The English revising officer makes no list at all. He simply corrects the errors in the list made by the parish overseers, when the correction is demanded by some one who is interested in each case. The other official has to take the assessment rolls, and has to make from those rolls, or "from such other information as he can obtain," a list to satisfy himself, and then, and then only, does an appeal come in. There is no appeal from the assessment to the revising officer, but from the last voters' list of the revising officer there is an appeal from the revising officer to himself. He is himself called upon to say whether he has acted unfairly, partially, or blunderingly, and if we know anything of the average opinion of their own conduct, possessed by the five years' old barristors of Canada, we can easily come to the conclusion that they will be very unlikely to decide against the course they have themselves pursued. There is not the ghost of similarity between the two cases, and the right hon. gentleman's attempt to draw a parallel between them is wholly misleading, or, at all events, it goes in the direction of misleading, and looks as if it were intended to mislead. I do not think it can mislead any person who is familiar in the slightest degree with the duties of the two officers. I do not think that any person who has read even once what are the duties of the English revising barrister could be led for a moment to suppose that the duty of the proposed officer under this Bill will be similar to his daties. But the making of the right hon, gentleman's remarks could have no effect at all if not to mislead somebody in this respect. Now, the hon, member for East Grey does appear to have been misled by those remarks, for he said that the revising officer had only to take the assessment sidering. The revising officer in England is called upon to copied out, and then revise it. He said that the Mr. Caser.

revising officer did not need to know anything of the neighborhood, of the people, or of their politics, and that it would be better for him not to know anything of them, in order that he might be more impartial. This shows that he, at all events, has been misled by the explanations of his leader. That is not the state of the case at all. The revising officer does not take the assessment roll and simply copy it, and revise it, but he takes the roll, as far as it goes, adds as much as he chooses of his own motion—and then it may be appealed from to himself! The hon, gentleman says he does not need to know the neighborhood, or the people, or their politics, but I would ask how is he to fill the gaps in the old voters' list or in the poll books unless he knows the people of the locality? He cannot do it himself; he must get the information somewhere; and we all know where he will get it. He will have the assistance of a clerk, and we all know who he is likely to be. He will have the assistance of a bailiff, and we know what sort of a person he is likely to be, and what sort of information the triumvirate is likely to obtain, and we know what the result is likely to be on the list. Now, the Premier argued something in same strain a little before my hon. friend from Grey, and therefore cannot be suspected of plagiarising from that hon, gentleman. He said that in England the revising barrister was sent down from London, that he did not know anything of the people or the neigh. borhood, and had none of the local knowledge which we said was necessary to the person who made the list. Well, Sir, the revising barrister in England does answer to the description which my hon friend from Grey, in his darkness of mind, applied to the so-called revising officer in Canada. The revising barrister in England does not need to know anything of the neighborhood. He is all the better for not having the local knowledge, all the more likely to be impartial, because he does not know the politics of the recoller who come before him on anything and where of the people who come before him on appeals, and why? Because he is a judicial officer; he has merely to decide on points of law and fact brought before him, just as a judge of Assize does in travelling about on circuit. But the Canadian revising officer has to do more than that; he has to fill up gaps; he has to act on information obtained, not judicially, not on sworn evidence, but obtained any how, from the sources to which he is most likely to go for it. I am told that he will probably have some local information, because he will probably be a resident of the electoral district. Very likely he will. Some nice young Conservative lawyer in the county town will be very apt to be the revising barrister where a judge is not appointed. There is one class of local information that he is quite certain to have. He is quite certain to have that kind of knowledge which the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) said he should not have, the knowledge of the politics of the individual.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman is entirely mis representing me. In answer to the arguments, I think, of the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the hon, member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), that the lists should be prepared by the municipal officers, because they would be more likely to act impartially, I asked if it was not more likely that a person who was a stranger to the people would act impartially.

Mr. CASEY. That was exactly the remark on which I was basing my argument. That is just the kind of information the revising officer is sure to get. He is not going through those districts without a guide, philosopher, and friend, in the shape of the secretary of the Conservative Association—at all events, he will not, in East Grey; he will have some kind friend at his shoulder to tell him what the politics of the people are; he will get just the sort of information he should not have, to be impartial.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose the same remark would apply to the English revising officer.

Mr. CASEY. There my hon, friend shows his utter blindness to what the English revising officer does. He does not put any one on or off the list, except in open court and upon sworn testimony. He does not make the list; he can only insert or strike off a name on application; he only decides judicially on those cases which are brought before him; but this man is a list maker. Now, it has been urged that the voters' list should be made up by polling subdivisions instead of by municipalities. I think the arguments in favor of that view are unanswer-A thorough canvass would be almost impossible if all the electors of a municipality were to be put upon one We have been accustomed, in almost every part of Canada where we have voters' lists, to have them arranged by polling sub-divisions, and I do not see why they should not be so arranged under this Bill. I do not think the hon. First Minister has any particular objection to that; it has only escaped his notice, and I have no doubt he will, as he has done already, take this further step towards improving the Bill in its working. Then there is the clause about tenants. I have no doubt the hon, gentleman has simply, through oversight, forgotten to do what he said on the 22nd of this month he would do, and which I think should be done here. He said:

"It was argued last night, with a great deal of force, that in Ontario the assessment roll, for instance, says: John Jones, lot No. 1, value $150, as the assessed value. Then he is marked as tenant, but that does not show what rent be pays at all. But I would make a proviso that if that property is assessed at $150, which gives the franchise to the owner, that shall be prima face evidence that the tenant has a right to be registered. If it is proved afterwards, on objection, that he does not pay $20 a year, the prima face evidence is rebutted."

I am sure it is entirely through oversight that the right hon, gentleman has neglected to make provision to that effect in this clause, namely, to make such an arrangement as would make the assessment roll to a great extent prima facie evidence of the qualifications of tenants. It would take a long time to discuss the provisions of this clause in detail. It is very clumsily put together; it is put together as if it had grown by accretion rather than by organisation -as if bit had been added to bit, without organic union in the section. I admit that some parts of it are not as clear as they ought to be to me, although I have given it a good deal of consideration; I am sure it will not be clear to those electors who will give it much less consideration than I have done; but it is only of a piece with the whole Bill in that respect. The whole Bill is undoubtedly of the same nature as the section in that respect. It is hard to understand; it is a bungle and a blunder. This clause alone, the conferring of such duties as are by it conferred upon a Government official, a party tool, a nominee who holds office virtually at the pleasure of the Government, is an insult to the whole community; it is an insult to the public intelligence and the public independence of the country to ask this community to submit to a dictation that no country which has representative institutions at all would submit to. Even Russia is not an instance; Russia is a pure autocracy; there is no disguise about it; the Czar rules by his own will, and not through a revising officer. We are told that in France a great deal of power is put into the hands of the Government, but never was any power so absolute as this thought of in France. In England there was never anything to compare to it, nor in the United States. In no free country has anybody dared to propose anything like this; in no free country has anybody ventured to think that the people would tamely submit to a usurpation of their constitutional rights and privileges such as this. This one section contains the venom of the whole Bill. Give the right hon. gontleman this section and the 10th section, and he cares not what the qualifications are, whether there is uniformity or variety in the electorate. The Conservatives themselves are awakening to the iniquity of these clauses. When we find a lifelong Conservative like Mr. D. B. Read, of Toronto, giving voice, in his letter to the Globe, to language stronger than any which any Liberal, or Grit, or Radical, has put his name to in the press; when we find him declaring that he has seen smaller causes than this produce a revolution, we must believe that there are Conservatives who believe that they are being insulted and wronged by this Bill. When we find a Conservative expressing his views, as the one did whose letter was read here by the hop. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) the other day, we must believe that the Conservatives are waking up. We believe that the country is patriotic and sound to the heart, and that the soundness of its heart will be evident by its actions the next time the country is heard from; we believe that Conservatives and Reformers throughout the Dominion are waking up and showing the indignation such a measure must cause in the heart of every free man. Conservatives are co-operating with us. I do not say they will become Grits in other respects, but I know they are co-operating with us in opposition to the Bill, and will give effect to their indignation at the next general election; and I believe the moral atmosphere of the country will be all the clearer for the storm this Bill is producing. There is no use in hon, gentleman opposite trying to deny that it is raising a storm. Had we not the North-West troubles and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and other vital matters to occupy the public attention at this time as well, the storm would make itself heard in such a manner that not even the most bigoted Conservative, the Conservative most entrenched in his party egotism, could fail to be aware of it. The time has come when the patriotic men of both parties will go to the polls and declare their opinions on the questions of the day, without regard to party lines, but having regard solely to their conscientious opinions. I am glad this much good has come out of what otherwise would seem an incurable evil. I believe that good will flow unintentionally out of this proposition and out of the operation of this Bill, a good! that may outweigh the evil; I believe the patriotic people of both parties will be fused and hammered into one by the attempt of the Government to usurp power, by the attempt of the Government to sweep out of existence those whom they are pleased to consider the representatives of an insignificant minority of the people.

Mr. McCALLUM (Monck). I am sorry to see hon, gentlemen opposite still keeping on their course of obstructing the business of the country. I can tell them that if they console themselves with the feeling that there is any movement in their favor among the Conservatives of the country they are very much mistaken. There may be a few disappointed Conservatives, such as the gentleman from Toronto, by the name of Read, but we have had such gentlemen before, and we have had one, in particular, of whom hon gentlemen opposite made one of their leaders; but as to any movement in the most distant way approaching anything like agitation against this measure amongst Conservatives, hon. gentlemen opposite need not lay that flattering unction to their soul. Speaking of the assessors, we would fancy, to hear them, that this officer had to make out the voters' lists. What he makes out is a roll, not for the purpose of making voters' lists, but for the purpose of raising revenue for the munici-pality and for the administration of justice, to be a charge are three assessors and three revisors in every parish, and upon the property of the municipality. Of course, from that roll the clerk makes out the voters' list, and where is the difference if the revising officer makes it out or the clerk? I do not see any difference, whether the revising officers' clerk or the clerk of the municipality copies the roll for the household, and I have never heard of any objection to their voters' list. The hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) action. It is so perfect that, for twenty years, during all Mr. CASEY.

speaks of the barristers being party tools in the hands of the Government. Why, in that he insinuates that the judges of this country, who will have the final revising of the lists. will be party tools. Under this Bill the judges are to be the final revising officers in the Province of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman insinuates they will be tools, and hon. gentlemen opposite find great fault with the Bill because the revising officer makes out the voters' list in the first instance and then appeals from the list to himself. Any revising officer, whether he be a barrister of five years' standing or a judge, will be very glad to correct any omission or mistake he has made, in the same way that he does now. If these gentlemen are bound to continue this obstruction, with their arguments repeated over and over again, the people of this country, not the Conservatives alone, but the Reformers of this country, will hold them responsible for the waste of money they are causing. I only got up to protest on behalf of the people of this country. Are a few Grits in this House going to control the majority; are a few gentlemen here, who are discontented, who are looking for power, to run the people? I simply rose to protest against this course, and I will say no more.

Mr. GILLMOR. If the hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) had occupied the short time he was on the floor in speaking to this amendment he would not have obstructed the business of the country. He has not undertaken to show why this amendment should not be adopted. He has talked about obstruction. I think the mover of this Bill asked the members of the Opposition to help him to perfect this measure, but it is very evident that anything which will affect the material ingredients of this Bill will not be adopted. Hon, gentlemen are very grateful for any amendment which will remove the poision out of this measure, but when any amendment is suggested which will interfere in that way, that is obstruction. Some very objectionable clauses have been already adopted. The Government have taken power to appoint their own nominee as the revising officer. The mover of this Bill gives as a reason for this, that the municipal officers are corrupt, that they are influenced by party feeling, and therefore cannot be trusted. That is why he wants this perfect measure, and the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) says the necessity for this extraordinary measure is that the municipal authorities and the people cannot be trusted, and we should have a measure free from party influence. Admitting, for argument's sake, that they are correct, that is an evil, but it is not a universal evil. If one county does anything objectionable, some other county is an offset to it. Is not the Prime Minister a party man? Is he more free from party prejudices and preferences than the electorate of this Dominion? It is a mere absurdity to pretend to state that the electoral system is going to be rid of party preferences by this measure. We have not to go very far back in the history of this country to see where the leader of the Government and his supporters resorted to extraordinary means to strengthen their party. I have never heard of the evils referred to existing in the Province of New Brunswick. In the county I represent it is impossible for one revising efficer to perform the duty imposed upon him by this Bill. We have a population of a little over 26,000, and to do this duty it requires about eighty-four officials. There there are fourteen parishes in the county, and these officials do the whole of this work more thoroughly than it can be done by any revising officer, and at very little cost. In the parish in which I live, the assessors know every man and his of which time I have been in politics, I have never heard any objection made. They are not all supporters of mine, but we never think of their politics. I never look over the list, except about the time of an election, and sometimes you find one name off which should be on; but, of course, that cannot be remedied then until the next election. How is it possible for a revising officer to go all over the county of Charlotte, or the county of Kent, or the county of Westmoreland, which is a large and populous county, and make up this list? It is quite impossible. The mover of the Bill has admitted the principle of this amendment already, because he has agreed to take the assessors' list and the poll book as a basis. He will have, of course, a large number of voters on the list upon which we have been elected, but he has got a large number to add to his list; he has got to add every farmer's son, all the tenants, all the property-holders' sons; he has got to add fishermen who qualify on real and personal property. How upon earth can any revising barrister ascertain that fact? The hon, gentleman might as well abandon the assessors' list as to continue that as a basis, and let the revising barrister go over the whole county to find out who is to be added. Therefore I think he has admitted the whole principle when he takes the assessors' list as a basis to start upon. I do not see what objection there can be to it. It is impossible, I say, for any revising barrister to do this duty properly. It would take him a year to get up one list, and then he could not do it as well as it is being done now. The hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry) is a lawyer, and he ought to understand how impossible it is for the revising barrister to know as well as the municipal officers who now make up our voters' lists. You cannot find any one man who can do it over the whole county, unless he works for months and months. I could not do it in my county. I would not know whether a farmer had one son or two sons, or whether he had any sons at all. I would have to ascertain from some disinterested source, at any rate, to satisfy myself. But the men now who make up the list know all about it. They know how many sons a farmer has, they know the qualification, they know every tenant. How can the revising officer find out every tenant in a city, or town, or incorporated village? If the right hon. gentleman and his friends want to make the Bill less objectionable let them adopt this amendment, and they will still have advantage enough. They have still got the revising barristers, of their own appointment, of their own political stripe; I do not wish to attribute motives to them, but of course they will put in political friends. Now, I think it is an insult to the people of this country, after so many years' experience, after the present system has worked without friction for so long a time, when nobody has found fault with it, when it has grown up after years of effort and of trial-I say it is an insult to the people to come down with this cumbersome measure and take away from the people the management of their own affairs. Hon, gentlemen opposite say they want a fair and honest system, that shall be freed from all party bias, thereby accusing municipal officers of being I do not want to accuse hon, gentlemen dishonest. opposite, but I say it is behind the age for any civilised country, on a pretence of getting free from political influence, to introduce such an infamous measure as this, and attempt to justify it. Mr. Chairman, I believe all these smiles and all these offers of concessions by the Government are a mere sham and a mere pretence. They are willing to pay tithes of mint and cummin and annise, but the weighter matters of the law the Premier and his followers do not pretend to amend. They are going to keep the Indian and the revising barrister, no matter what follows. Why should they have a revising barrister at all? It is nonsense to call him a revising barrister. But he would be, if you allowed the local authorities to make up the list, and then allow him to revise it. The local authorities have to assess all the properties for their own purposes, and these are the men, above all others, who know who are qualified. I say it is quite impossible for any stranger or any individual in the country to do this work. He has got to go all through the municipalities, and how is he going to get his information? Perhaps he might come down to Charlotte county and ask me to go with him, and I might get into his waggon and drive around with him. If he wanted to see a man himself, or see the property on which he is qualified, he has either got to go on to the place, or take somebody's opinion. Well, he might come to me. I might be influenced by party feeling, and I might not give him correct information. He might go to my opponent, and he might be influenced by party feeling, and where is this revising barrister to get his information? I tell you this revising barrister cannot do the work satisfactorily. He may be as honest as it is possible for a man to be, but the work is more than he can do. Now, the county I live in has about 26,000 people in it, and we have eighty-four men, revisers and assessors, in all the various localities, who are familiar with the men who go on the assessors' list, who make the voters' list, and they are just as familiar with the voters as the Prime Minister is with his colleague who sits beside him. They live in the locality. There are twenty-eight councillors, some forty-two assessors and fortytwo revisers; they are in every corner of the county; they know every man who is qualified to vote. There has never been any difficulty; the system is a perfect system. These men never enquire whether a municipal council is composed of Conservatives or Liberals. The system works so harmoniously that I think it is a pity to give it up; and, apart from all desire that the Bill may not pass, I do feel sad—yes, I do—that we are going back to introduce such an expensive, and such a difficult, and such an intricate system, to supersede one so simple, so based upon common sense, and upon common justice and fair play to all parties. I do hope that the hon. Premier will see that is almost impossible—I say quite impossible—for this revising barrister to do this work fairly and properly. He has got to go all over the county and see everybody. He might as well not have the assessors' list as the basis at all. I think the Prime Minister cannot realise the difficulties this revising barrister will have to do his work. I would like to have my hon. friends from New Brunswick explain how it is possible that, in a county of 25,000 or 30,000 inhabitants, scattered over a large area, for any man to ascertain just who is qualified to vote, and put them on the voters' list. has to see all the parties and the property in order to ascertain the facts, because he cannot know them himself, and cannot possibly obtain them otherwise. I do not see that the First Minister is sacrificing any principle by accepting this amendment. He has already adopted the assessors list, and said that the poll books may be made a basis on which to form a list, and afterward the revising officer can add or omit names; but I would again urge that if the officer has to do this work himself it is a moral impossibility that he can accomplish it. I should like to convince hon, gentlemen opposite on this point, so as to lead them to accept the amendment. They have enough advantage in this Bill at present. They say they have no advantage. We would think we had a great advantage if we had the naming of the revising officers. If hon, gentlemen opposite want to make the Bill less objectionable they should adopt this amendment, and let the revisors' list be the basis on which the revising officer should make up and complete his list. The First Minister has adopted the principle by taking the assessors' list; but it is quite impossible for the revising officer to find out all tenants who pay $2 a month rent, all the farmers' sons, all the fishermen's sons and the wageearning class—it is a needless and impossible undertaking.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. member for Monck

(Mr. McCallum) has ventured again to use an oft-repeated expression, that the Opposition are obstructing public business by discussing the clause and amendments. We can business by discussing the clause and amendments. afford to smile at such a term. The country is not so ignorant as not to know in whose hands the conduct of public business is; that the First Minister is the sole guide as to the public business that is to come before the House, and day after day and week after week he has passed by twelve items to bring on Bill No. 103. It is rather amusing, when such is the actual state of affairs, for an hon. gentleman opposite to endeavor to charge the Opposition with obstruction tactics. We will not, however, be deterred from expressing the reasons that induce us to support the amendments to the various sections of the Bill. The present amendment is one which will effect as much good as any minor amendment that will be submitted. The necessity of adopting the amendment is practically justified by the fact that no hon. gentleman opposite, from the First Minister down, has attempted to show that this is not a real amendment, designed in the interests of the country. That justifies all the pleas that can be urged by us for its adoption. In the discussion of any measure it is the bounden duty of hon, gentlemen opposite to accept amendments, when good reasons are assigned for their adoption, and when they themselves are unable to show why the amendments should not be adopted. No hon, gentleman dare attempt to do so in this case, because it would be an impossible task to accomplish, and they do not care to attempt a task beyond their strength. The amendment is designed to save the people a vast amount of money. That is an argument which should have considerable weight. Hon. gentlemen opposite dare not take the ground that it is designed to have an imperfect list. If not, the machinery proposed by the amendment would secure a perfect list at much less cost than it is possible to secure it under the machinery of this Bill. If any hon, gentleman opposite desires to controvert this position, I will be most happy to hear him.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I believe it will cost a good deal

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give his reasons.

Mr. LANDRY. The hon. gentleman has told us that hon. gentlemen opposite are perfectly justified in having a long discussion on the one section, and reiterating the same arguments, one getting up and using an argument, and the next member rising up and using the same argument, because on this side of the House we have not tried to answer those arguments, and therefore they think they are justified in going on for ever. Then the hon, gentleman has challenged us to say that the amendment would not save a vast amount of money if it were adopted. I accept that challenge. I do not know what the hon. gentleman may have in his mind; but with respect to the amendment before the House, he cannot read it and assert that the adoption of it will be a saving in the expense. I will read it, and see if I cannot change his mind by the simple reading of it. I do not care to accuse the hon. gentleman of being ignorant of what is before the House, as some hon. gentlemen opposite declared I was ignorant of the business before the House the other day, because we are all apt to be mistaken. Now, this amendment does not propose to strike out one word from the motion of the First Minister. I start out with that proposition. The same machinery will remain there; the same duties are left to the revising officers; they will have the same work to do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LANDRY. Then I have not read the amendment aright. I will read it. It is in the following terms. hon. gentleman read the amendment.) This amendment additional expense. Take New Brunswick; in the county I represent, it will add from 24 to 30 additional officers. all of whom will have to be paid, as they will not work for nothing. This may not apply to Ontario—I do not think it would-but I speak for New Brunswick. In the county I represent it will, I say, cause the appointment of from 24 to 30 additional officers, to do what duty? It will give them the duty of preparing just such a list as the revising officer is authorised by this Act to prepare. It does not say how these additional officers shall do it at all, but they are bound by this clause to prepare a thorough list. How are they going to do it? Are we to have thirty men going all over the county getting the information? If so, instead of the one carriage, mentioned by the hon. gentleman, we will have thirty carriages going through the county getting the informationthirty persons preparing that list, and what for? To put in the hands of the revising barrister the list prepared by them. It may be useful as information, of course; but is that the best way? And it does not say that it is to be taken by the revising officer as prima facie evidence. These thirty gentlemen in my county are, by this amendment, authorised to prepare the list and put it in the hands of the revising officer for the purpose of additional information.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant),

An hon. MEMBER. Each in his own parish.

Mr. LANDRY. It does not say so, as I find it here. But even if it were, there are thirty in the same county, three in each parish, if you will. These gentlemen will come in and hand their list to the revising officer, and for what purpose? Simply as additional information. It may be useful information, but it is information which he can get by gentlemen who are interested. Will not those men who are interested in getting on the voters' list, farmers or farmers' sons, or tenants, or whatever they may be—are they not capable of sending a letter to the revising officer, saying that they are authorised to vote, although they are not on the assessment roll, or on the voters' list of last year, because it was more restricted than the measure before us now—cannot they say, for this reason, their names are not on the list, and that therefore they write to the revising officer. I say that they can, and that that information is just as useful to the revising barrister as the other, and just as authentic. There is no provision for its being done under oath, and if hon gentlemen can get over that, and say that it will not be an additional expense, I fail to see it, for I think there will be a great deal of additional expense. If it were said that those thirty men were to prepare the list in the same manner as for the Local Legislature, and then if the revising barrister was bound to take that as the list to revise, there might be some argument in it. But he is not bound to take that list; he is bound to procure all the information as pointed out by the hon. Premier's proposition just the same, though he is to have the additional information which is provided for by this sub-amendment. While on my feet, I may say that I would not have been tempted to speak only for the challenges which hon, gentlemen opposite are so fond of throwing out to this side. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), whose speeches I admire, whose speeches I like to listen to -I must say that he has that way of throwing out challenges to hon. gentlemen, and he calls them cowards; he says that they dare not get up on their feet, when perhaps their reason is that they do not propose to give hon, gentlemen opposite a text which will last them for three weeks, as happened in my own case, when I addressed the House on this subject. I only gave some of my views very briefly, but they have done my humble effort the honor of quoting me frequently, and have sometimes misrepresented me, though I know that they do not do it intendoes not propose to take out anything from the original tionally—I know that I speak very fast, and perhaps I am amendment as proposed by the First Minister. It will add not interpreted quite as I intend, but, at any rate, they have done me the honor of citing my remarks. Perhaps these hon, gentlemen wish that I may do the same thing again, and furnish them with a text; perhaps they have run out of material, and therefore they have challenged me to address the House again. Well, it is a pleasure to give them the opportunity, but I hope that they will not avail themselves of it as a text which will last them for three weeks. I think I have been misrepresented by the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee), not intentionally, for I give him credit for sincerity, as I do every hon. gentleman, or, at any rate, those coming from New Brunswick, for I think we should stand by one another in that respect at least. We must support one another as coming from the same Province, letting others from the other Provinces deal with their colleagues as they choose. I may say that I never intended to convey, nor do I think the language I used conveys, the idea that everything in this Bill, as regards the revising barrister, was similar to the one passed by the Lower House of the Local Legislature of New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman said that the people down there so understood me, and I venture to say, if they did, it was because two of the papers representing the opposite side have been kind enough to say that I declared in so many words that it was a similar Bill. What I said on that occasion was, in effect, that the point of similarity in the two Bills was that the revising barrister was the court of last resort, in the one case as he was in this case, before the right of appeal was given, as is now proposed. In that particular, I said that there was a resemblance. I said if this can be used for the purpose of making a partisan list, the other can; because, if you went to the revising barrister under the New Brunswick Bill with a long list of 200, 300, or 400 names which had been rejected by the revisers—if you went to the revising barrister appointed by the Local Government with that list, and he was a partial man, one who intended to prepare a partisan list, he could put every one of them on, because he was the court of last resort, and he had as much power to favor the Local Government as it is claimed the revising barrister would have under this Bill to favor the Dominion Government. I did say that if this Bill had been proposed by the Local Government of New Brunswick I thought my hon. friends from New Brunswick would not have opposed it. I made that remark, however, in this connection: I was speaking of the New Brunswick members of the other side of the House who had contended all along and had reiterated that they should go to the country on the same list—to the same electorate that sent them here—and I said that that was impossible if the Bill in the Local Legislature had become law, because, by that Bill they did not merely wish to change the electors for the Local Legislature, but the electors for this House as well, and therefore hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick did not raise their voices against it when they saw the Local Legislature changing the electorate who sent us here. But when this Government proposed to do so it was an outrage, it was something which should not have been done, and that we should go back to the same electorate who sent us here. That is the sense in which I made that remark. I did recognise-and I think you will find it in my speech-that this was not the same Bill, with the same machinery, or in the same terms, but as to the revising barrister being the court of last resort, it was the same. These are all the observations I intended to make, and I think my hon. friend from Brant will be satisfied that this proposition will add materially to the cost of the Bill, unless these thirty men in one county are all willing to work for nothing.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is this proposition involved in the hon, gentleman's argument, that he must suppose that the time of the judge or the revising barrister—whose main business in life, I suppose, will not be the revision of the municipal officer may have in spare hours to prepare these lists. If his argument is to be good, he must expect that the judge or the revising barrister will do the mere clerical work for the same price as the municipal clerk in the same township, city, or town.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). He still has to do the clerical

Mr. PATERSON. Well, if the hon, gentleman is willing to rest his case on that, I am willing to allow it to rest there, as such a statement answers itself The list of voters must be prepared by some one. It is ridiculous to suppose that the judges and the revising officers will do that mere clerical work at the same rate as municipal clerks, who could do it with so much greater ease, being accustomed to that kind of work.

Mr. WHITE. The judge has still to do the work, under this amendment.

Mr. PATERSON. No; the hon. gentleman is all wrong; the judge will not have the work to do. The hon, member for Kent has evidently fallen into the same mistake. Will these hon, gentlemen seriously argue that if the amendment is engrafted as part of this section the judge or the barrister will only have to sit down and copy off name after name from the list? Nothing of the kind. The revising officer would have the list furnished to him by these disinterested parties—a complete list of persons entitled to vote at elections for this House; and his duty would then be purely a judicial one, to sit and hear appeals from the list so furnished. That is the position the amendment would put him in.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON. If hon, gentlemen opposite will admit that my proposition would be less expensive, I suppose it could easily be arranged. If they succeed in showing that this amendment will not accomplish what is intended I suppose there would be no objection on this side of the House to let them word a resolution that would accomplish We say it does accomplish it, and all we want hon. gentlemen opposite to do is to commit themselves to the principle that the gentlemen who prepare the lists for the Provincial Legislatures shall prepare the lists for the House Will the hon. member for Cardwell agree to of Commons. that proposition?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The point for argument is simply what the cost of this amendment is going to be. If the hon. gentleman will take the clause and the amendment together, he will find that if this amendment were inserted the revising officer would still have to get the assessment roll and the revised list of voters. He would then have to get this particular list of voters proposed to be made; and from these he would have to make up his own list of voters, and that would necessarily cost more by the extra cost of this additional list.

Mr. PATERSON. No; the effect would be that this list would be made up for him. The hon, gentleman thinks that this amendment should be read with the words "also a certified copy of the last list of voters," struck out. If he is prepared for the amendment that can easily be done. If the amendment prevails, the hon. gentleman knows that in the very list of voters proposed he would have what he contends for. It is above all things, matter of cost and everything else, indispensible that you have an absolutely correct list. You have no right to play on the electors in the matter of their votes; every man entitled to be on the rolls should be on, and a man who is not entitled should not be on. I say again, advisedly, to get a complete and proper list, and at very much less expense, the means proposed in this amendment are entirely preferable to the machinery provided in the Bill. It will not be difficult for hon. gentlemen rolls—will not be worth more to him than the time the opposite to ascertain that for themselves, by entering into communication with any municipal clerk or officer, and ascertain from him for what amount they could get such a list from him. Everybody knows that a judge or a barrister will not do mere clerical work as cheaply as it can be done by those whose duty it is to do such work; besides, it will not be likely to be as correct; and, as absolute correctness is required, the judge or barrister, or a clerk who might be engaged for the purpose, would be obliged to travel to different parts of the county to make himself acquainted with the electors in the different municipalities, and their circumstances, in order to gain such information as is already possessed by the municipal officers. On that ground alone the amendment should commend itself to hon, gentlemen opposite; but there are other grounds for it. It will retain to the people, in a measure, powers that have been theirs since we have been confederated—powers which, I believe, they are jealous of - that is, to have their own officers perform this initial work. Then, if you will have the revising officer, his duties will be, as his name indicates, of a judicial character—to hear appeals from the work of those municipal officers. What can be said against engaging the municipal officers to do this necessary work? There have been no statements made, but insinuations have been thrown out, that you cannot get a fair and impartial list from them, because political partisanship dwelling in the breasts of these officers would bias their judgment. When it was charged home to the hon, member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) that he had more than insinuated—that he had made the broad charge—that assessors and others might be charged with this, he attempts to dony and explain it; and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) intimates that a person altogether unacquainted with the municipality would be more likely to do the duty fairly and impartially than the municipal clerks who prepare the voters' lists in Ontario. What is embraced in that statement? That the municipal clerks of Ontario, in their positions, are political partisans. Does the hon. member for Cardwell believe that? Is there any hon. gentleman from Ontario who believes that? Do the hon. gentlemen not know that the municipal clerks of the various municipalities of the Province of Ontario hold office year after year, and many for a score of years? Do they not know that they act as returning officers for the council that presides over the municipality year after year. Do they not know that they are in such a position that if there was any class of men who would be supposed to naturally free themselves from political bias and partisanship in office it is these same municipal clerks, who act as returning officers at the elections for the various councils. attempt to be partisan in their dealings would at once injure their position, as councillors and a mayor may be returned to-day who may be Conservatives, and the next year they may return a mayor and councillors who may be Reform. I hold that men of that class, even if they were not actuated by principle, would desire, to retain their position, to act independently; and it is against such a class as these that the statement of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) were levelled this afternoon, as men who would be not as likely to do what is right and fair, not as likely to be free from political partisanship, as men appointed by the First Minister, who, as the hon, member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) told us would be, as every one knows they will be, supporters of the right hon. gentleman. Each one of them will be a Tory, at any rate, if not a Tory of the Tories. In the very construction of this section, in the very voting down of this amendment, there is an implied insult to all the municipal officers in the Province of Ontario, because that amendment can only be voted down on the principle laid down by the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White), that their political views will not enable them to do their duty as honestly, as faithfully and as con- the rights they are jealous of, and which ought to remain Mr. Paterson (Brant).

scientiously as political persons appointed by the head of the Government, who is himself the leader of one of the great political parties of the day. The proposition is one, I think, that will not bring much strength to hon, gentlemen opposite. It is one that may not find an echo in the breasts of the Conservatives of this country, to say nothing of the Reformers. It is doubting the impartiality, the good faith of the Conservative municipal clerks as well as the Reform clerks, in leaving this duty in the hands of the municipal clerks, many of whom have done it for years, and whose conduct, as far as I am aware of, has never been impagned. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if there have been any charges made against any municipal clerk for violating his office, when he has been sitting and acting as returning officer for the return of a mayor for a city or town, or a reeve in a township, but we have had cases mentioned to us, in the course of this very debate, of returning officers appointed by hon, gentlemen opposite for elections to this House who have violated that which is honorable and fair. I do not think any charge of that kind can be brought against the municipal clerks of Ontario, and yet, forsooth, the proposition that the preparation of the lists should be left in their hands cannot be entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite. No; because there is danger of these gentlemen, who have sworn to do their whole who have ever done their whole duty, are not to be trusted with it, but it will be safe to leave it in the hands of partisans appointed by the leader of a political party, or if not in his hands altogether, part of it to be in the hands of a clerk appointed by this revising barrister, and responsible to the revising barrister alone. Does any body believe that the revising barrister's clerk will be one of any higher character, one more likely to act impartially and do his duty faithfully, than the clerks of municipalities, many of whom have been in their position for years? No, Sir, they will not. More than that; you have the assurance and the guarantee that those municipal clerks are responsible to the council. The council is responsible to the people, and any variation from the strict line of impartiality or fair dealings would be visited with the merited displeasure of the electors, who could reach the council, and that council could reach the clerk. You may have that list prepared by the clerk nominated by the revising barrister, and he will be above the people; he will, in preparing the voters' list, go over the country, discharging the duty as he thinks fit; he is not responsible to the people; he may add names or take them off, and he has to answer alone to the revising officer; and besides, he is unsworn, as far as I can make out by the Act. The revising officer may then shield himself behind the list prepared and handed to him by his appointee, and he may say: This is the only means of information I had; I trusted the clerk; I supposed he would have done right, and I accepted his list; if any harm has been done, it is a great pity you did not come before me and let mat-ters be known. Thus, the people will be subjected, if they would remedy any injustice, to all the expense that is entailed in applying to these revising barristers for relief. I hold the amendment ought to be accepted by the Government, if they desire to secure, in a degree, a measure of impartiality and fairness. It is a reasonable amendment, and pressing it upon the attention of the committee is warranted by the fact that there has been no information given from the other side of the House that they are prepared to accept it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not attempted to show, until the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) rose, that by this being adopted—and I will do him the justice to say that he did not argue that was the reason the machinery of the clause was adopted—but he argued that, as adopted, the machinery would cost less. I believe that, on the grounds of economy, the amendment ought to commend itself; and I believe, further, that it leaves to the people, in a measure, in their hands. I urge it on the ground that it will be more likely to secure a more impartial list. Whether it will be adopted or not I do not know, but we have done our duty in pressing strongly and at length our reasons for adopting this amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I was indeed gratified to find that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) and the hon, member for Kent (Mr. Landry) did raise their voices in favor of economy in the construction of the measure now being discussed. I demur, however, to the position they take as to the construction of this amend. ment. I think that the intention is quite evident, and if not sufficiently explicit to satisfy the hon, gentlemen opposite, it is quite open to them to admit the principle and alter the phraseology to suit. I rise to support the proposition that is involved in moving that the primary construction of these lists be left to the municipal authorities throughout the country. If there is any doubt as to the intention of the amendment I am sure the mover will be glad to meet the wishes of hon gentlemen opposite. The placing of the lists in the hands of revising officers is an evidence of a lack of trust in the people, and proves that hon, gentlemen opposite consider that their future existence as the dominant party lies altogether in their being able to manipulate the voters' lists. This amend-ment practically says that the lists shall be primarily prepared, as heretofore, by the officers of the municipal bodies. These are of all shades of politics; they are not elected on account of their political proclivities. The performance of this work is one of the incidents of their position as municipal officers. The same consideration applies to municipal councillors, and consequently we have in the municipal bodies and their officials men who can prepare these lists without any suspicion of partisanship. They are closely watched; any action in which they display party bias is scrutinised, and if the partisanship is continued these officials are punished. For these men it is proposed to substitute men who are the appointees of one political party only and who, while operating in different parts of the Dominion, will not be so careful in the performance of their duty, because their master will be here, at Ottawa, instead of being, as in the case of municipal officials, close at hand. We are assured that the revising officer will be absolutely impartial; that he, of all men, will be absolutely pure in his inclinations and perfect in his aspirations; that he, of all others, is to be at once capable of preparing an absolutely correct list, and disposed to do so. Yet hon gentlemen opposite not only charge the present machinery with being imperfect, but impugn the impartiality of the assessor, the clerk, the council, and even the judge of the county. Sir, a great deal has been said impugning the good faith of the municipal assessors in the different Provinces, particularly in the Province of Ontario, and detracting them for the manner in which they have discharged the duties they have heretofore performed in connection with the voters' lists. I cannot speak from a lengthened experience, but the experience I have tells me that in the locality in which I reside the municipal assessor and the municipal clerk have been appointed and have held their position entirely independent of the political complexion of the municipal councils under whom they serve. In the west riding of the county of Middlesex more than one-half the municipal clerks are Conservatives, and yet a majority of the councils are of a different stripe of politics, and the majority of the municipalities give, in the greater number of instances, political majorities of a different kind. Now, Sir, it cannot be the case but that these men must have discharged their duties honestly or the party in the majority would have demanded that they should be removed from their position. I can say the same thing of the municipalities where the Conservative party he will have the best recommendation for reappointment or is in the majority in my own constituency. There are municipalities where the Conservative party has received majorities of over one hundred, and yet the municipal clerk in one of these municipalities has been of a different political complexion. These facts furnish the best evidence that can be produced of the satisfactory working of our municipal system, as regards the preparation of the voters' lists. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not scrupled to throw discredit upon municipal officers—not, I believe, because they felt that they were really worthy of blame, but because they felt that some defence was necessary for the proposition contained in this clause, and felt it necessary even to go the length of attacking the good faith and the honest discharge of duty by some of their supporters in order to justify the introduction of a measure and the pressing of a clause that, under no other circumstances, they could find a defence for. The proposition is unfair and unjust, and it has not the manly characteristics about it that ought to belong to a proposition coming from the majority in Parliament. The proposition raises a doubt in many minds as to whether hon, gentlemen opposite are confident that they can retain their boasted majority of 1882, and whether they do not believe that if they were now obliged to go to the country a different result would follow. A peculiarity of the proposition involved in this clause is that the revising officer will have the privilege of making an appeal from himself to himself. The hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) held that some such machinery as was provided in the Bill was necessary, because this Parliament could not compel municipal officers to discharge any duties under this Act. If this be the case, how are we going to carry out sections 13 and 15, which involve the employment of municipal officers? Suppose a municipal officer should refuse to act under this Bill, what recourse is provided? It must be assumed, from the position taken by the First Minister, and from the sections to which I have referred, that he will be able to control municipal officers for the purposes of this Act. Then if the municipal machinery is utilised, as I suggest, we shall be able to prepare the voters' lists by a simple means, instead of by the expensive and complicated means contemplated by this Bill. The First Minister has asserted that the assessors considered their oath did not bind them further than that they consider their sworn duty performed, if they do not diminish the revenues of the municipality, when they had completed work for the municipality. Even if it were assumed that their obligation goes no further-and that would be assuming a great deal, and doing them a very great injustice-it would still become a question whether they have done their work honestly, because every rate-payer is interested to know that his neighbor is not assessed too low as well as himself too high, and it would be a satisfaction for people to know that they were assessed equally with their neighbors. There is no better security than that under which men would, on fair and just grounds, obtain the right to vote. The people know the value of having their neighbors' property equally assessed with their own, because on that fact will depend whether they pay more than their share of taxation or not, and in that way we have the assurance that the lists will be fair and proper, as the law contemplates. The First Minister argued this afternoon that the lists, under this proposed system, will be free from all the taint or suspicion which may attach to voters' lists prepared under existing systems, and yet, Sir, the lists under this system are to be prepared by an official whose very recommendation to his position is the fact that he is a partisan. Our municipal officers are primarily appointed on account of their fitness for the position, and the fact that succeeding councils may change politically is a strong restraint on their conduct; whereas the revising barrister will feel that continuance in office if he discharges his duty to his party as he is expected to do. The submission of this Bill shows that hon gentlemen opposite, although they invariably attempt to conceal it, are afraid of public opinion, and have a contempt for public sentiment. When our municipal system was first introduced a Tory nobleman of that time made the remark that they were sucking Republics. Nevertheless, our municipal system has answered its purpose admirably in all the Provinces where it has been adopted. These institutions have brought home to the people a knowledge of their power, a knowledge of the fact that the money they contribute is their own, and they are consequently induced to watch its expenditure very closely. It has educated them in self-reliance, in selfgovernment, in fair play towards one another, and it has furnished our legislative halls with many men who have done those institutions credit. That being the case, it is a retrogressive step, a step in accord with Tory instincts, that we should forsake those old land marks and adopt a system such as that proposed in the Bill. I would ask hon. gentlemen, if the municipal authorities of this country are amenable to all the charges of partisanship and dishonesty which have been alleged against them, how does it happen that these hon, gentlemen have a majority in this House. If they say it is in spite of the system, I say it is nothing of the kind, because it is a fact that their friends as well as their opponents have an equal share in the preparation of the voters' list; and the close supervision which is exercised over this local machinery is the best guarantee that no gross scandals or departures from what is fair and honest will take place, because, if they did, those who are independent of political leanings would demand that the wrong should be righted. I have almost invariably found, in my intercourse with these officials, that they are disposed to do what is right between the political parties. Whether that disposition was induced by the knowledge that they were closely watched, or by an instinct to do what is right, under all circumstances, I am not prepared to say. But in what position do we find some hon. gentlemen opposite, who come here, the representatives of constituencies where all the municipal officials are Conservatives, and who allege that the municipal officials throughout the country are dishonest and unfair, on account of their political partisanship? The city of Toronto and the city of London, for instance, have invariably, I think, had Conservative majorities in their councils and Conservative assessors; and yet hon. gentlemen hear those assessors maligned equally with others of a different political stripe, in order to find a justification for a measure that ought never to have been submitted to this House. I say it is unfair to the municipal officials of the Province of Ontario, independent of their political predilections; and, as between them and the officials likely to be appointed under this Bill, I believe the people of Ontario, by a very large majority, would prefer the existing machinery. Besides the very grave doubts that will be cast on the good faith of any officer appointed as proposed by this Bill, the less expensiveness of the municipal machinery ought to be an argument for its adoption. I think the municipal officers throughout the country could be induced to do the clerical work involved in the primary preparation of these lists at a fraction of the cost at which the revising officers could do it. The difference between the duties of the revising officer here and those of the revising officer in England is so great that even the clerk provided under this Bill will have much more to do in a constituency of the same kind than the revising officer in England. If that is the case, it is fair to assume that the cost is going to be the very utmost farthing of what has been estimated by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Not only would the muni-Mr. CAMEBON (Middlesex).

appointment would give much greater confidence to the people of both political parties. Then, leaving the appeal to the county judge, as it exists in the Province of Ontario now, we have all the precaution that any fair minded-man can ask; and I think that the comparatively few appeals that have been made to the judges have been due largely to the fact that an appeal lay to the judge. That was pres. ent to the minds of the municipal officials when making up the lists, and it is a much stronger deterrent than anything by which the revising officer can be bound. I cannot conceive how hon gentleman opposite can, by any possible system of argument, arrive at the conclusion that this fiveyear old barrister can exercise the functions imposed upon him under this law with the same honesty and fair play to the political parties as the municipal assessors and clerks. If it is the case that the municipal officials can discharge this duty more thoroughly, it is reasonable to suppose that there is an ulterior motive in the intention to appoint these revising barrister with the powers to be conferred upon him by this provision; it is reasonable to suppose that the design of hon, gentlemen opposite is to thwart the free expression of the public will and to secure a position at the polls which public opinion will not justify. It is precisly as if one of two litigants insisted on having his own jury appointed. It has been represented that the struggles in the municipal elections is in order to get political assessors of a political stripe appointed. Well, if the assessor were to occupy a position towards the municipality that the revising officer, under this clause, will hold towards this country, I could understand the object of making a fight over the appointments of the assessors. But it has been shown, over and over again, that their position is entirely different. It hon, gentlemen opposite, however, are prepared to view the assessors in that light, how much more strongly does it apply to the position they take in trying to secure the appointment of revising barristers, with power to make the lists to suit themselves. I believe that by accepting this amendment these lists will be prepared in a way that will give satisfaction to both parties, in a way that would prevent any doubt being thrown on the good faith of any of the parties concerned, and I am therefore of the opinion that it should be accepted, rather than the clause as it appears.

Mr. LISTER. As I understand the matter, the Government has determined that the revising officer, so called, shall be the person who shall prepare the voters' lists and also revise them. The preliminary list which is to be prepared by the revising officer will be the basis for all future lists, and it is therefore pre-eminently important that the first list should be made as correct as possible. It has been stated, over and over again, that the name "revising officer" is a misnomer, as he is to be a person to prepare the list instead of to revise it. No matter how zealous the officer appointed may be in the discharge of his duty, it will be impossible for him to prepare the voters' list required under this Act. Many people are not thoroughly conversant with the law, and will not take the trouble to see that their names are upon the list, and the revising officer, while he may be acquainted with the town in which he lives, will not have the requisite knowledge in regard to the remote parts of the country for which he has to prepare the voters list. But the local officers have this knowledge. The assessors are acquainted with the circumstances of every family in the municipality, and the preparation of the list could be entrusted to no persons more capable than the assessors and the clerks of the municipalities. The latter have generally held office for many years, no matter what the political complesion of the council may have been, and if the preparation of the lists were left to them they would be as nearly correct as it is possible to get them. It has been stated that we are following the English cipal officials do the work at much less cost, but their system in passing the present law. I give that a flat contradiction. We are adopting the name used in England. but on every page of this Bill fraud is written, and there is a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to control the electorate of the country. In adopting the name of revising officer you are misleading the people to believing that we are adopting a system which has been in existence in England for many years. According to Rogers on Elections, page 115, the overseers of every parish and township in the county are the persons who prepare the list. The overseers of those parishes occupy positions similar to our municipal officers throughout this country. The list having been prepared and posted up, and appeals being put in against it, the revising officer merely goes there as a judge. He has nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the list; he never sees it, in fact, until he opens his court and is called upon to adjudicate upon the claims made, either to have names struck off or to have others put on; so that, as far as this Bill is concerned, it bears no similarity whatever to the English Act. I deplore that the Government should have felt it necessary to put the country to the enormous expense which this Bill must necessarily involve, in view of the fact that in every Province of the Dominion we have had a system which has worked admirably, a system which has cost the Government absolutely nothing. I believe that when the people have an opportunity of pronouncing upon this measure they will resent the action of the Government in taking away from them the rights they have always enjoyed of preparing their own lists. I believe that if it is not a revolutionary measure it strongly tends in that direction.

Though these appointees may exercise their power honestly, still the Government are putting into their hands a power which, in the hands of unscrupulous men, might imperil the very commonwealth itself. I regret very much that hon gentlemen opposite, in defending this measure, should have attempted to discredit the municipal officers of this country. I say that if there is any class of men in the country who are intelligent and honorable it is the municipal officers, in the Province of Ontario, at all events. When hon. gentlemen charge these officers with partisanship they do them a grievous wrong. These men have occupied their positions ever since municipal institutions were introduced into Canada, and from my own experience I can say that, so far as I know, these men have always discharged their duties honestly and honorably. It may be that in some isolated cases a man may have acted in a partisan manner, but we must remember that the municipal councils always have these men under their control, and can censure or remove them if they do wrong. I trust the Government will see its way clear to adopt the proposition contained in the amendment of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. WILSON. If the Government are determined to push this measure through it is our duty to do all we can to render the vicious clauses of the Bill as little objectionable as possible. There is not a more important provision in this Bill than that of the revising barrister, and his duties. We all feel that every man who is enfranchised or is entitled to have his name placed upon the voters' list ought to have every facility granted; every opportunity should be allowed him, and he should have no difficulty in having his name placed upon the voters' list, that he may have an opportunity of recording his vote for the man of his choice when election takes place. Even if a county judge were appointed he could not be expected to know people in different parts of the riding. Therefore, it cannot reasonably be expected that he would be able to prepare a list as do the various assessors and other municipal officers. The revising officer will, under municipal officers. The revising officer will, under this Bill, have power to remove names from the list.

The form the part of the present Administration; they have shown great patience; but a very patient community, once aroused, will rise with all its might and drive those who have been able as possible. There is not a more important provision opporessing it from the position they occupy. People say, and say truly, that the Administration; they have so oaministered; the affairs of the country that they know they ought to be removed from power; but in order to keep themselves in the position they occupy they are adopting a method of stuffing the ballot boxes, to prevent a free and his as dangerous experiment, and I believe it will be the very means of removing you from the position they occupy. People say, and say truly, that the Administration; they have so administered the affairs of the country that they know they ought to be removed from power; but in order to keep themselves in the position they occupy they are adopting a method of stuffing the ballot boxes, to prove t ther their names are on the list or not, and therefore the revising barrister would not be able to form a list from the assessment roll. I say, let every man who is on the voters' list be accepted, unless he is appealed against, and unless you do so, I do not see how you can have an efficient list. The revising barrister or judge cannot devote much time to his work, and therefore he will have to depend on his clerk, who cannot have the same knowledge of the constituency as the municipal clerks; and what means will the clerk or the bailiff have of obtaining information? Unless, there-fore, it is made obligatory on the revising barrister to accept the voters' list, inconveniences will be con-stantly cropping up. The argument that the list prepared by the municipal officers is partisan, is one of the weakest that could be presented to the House. These men are sometimes the very best men in municipalities; many of them have had long experience; they have been sworn to do their duty impartially, and they are liable to penalties if they act contrary to their duty; and it is absurd to say that they would not act more fairly than the revising barrister. Our municipal system, wherever it has been tried, has worked well, which would not have been the case if these officials were guilty of the partisan conduct ascribed to them by hon, gentlemen opposite. I say that they have performed their duties well, and as to the revising barrister, even if a judge is appointed, his clerk will have to do the greater part of the work in connection with the initial list, and that clerk is certain to be a partisan. Supposing a Reformer were selected as a clerk for the first election, representations would be immediately made to the Government requesting the removal of such clerk of the revising barrister. The object of this Bill is, no doubt, to further the interests of the party in power. If the revising officer be a county judge he may not be a partisan, but if he be a lawyer of five years' standing he will be a partisan, and I have no more confidence in lawyers than I have in other people. He has a motive in being a partisan. If he acts faithfully in his first calling it will be an inducement to the Government to promote him to a judgship or to some other higher position. If it is your wish to get as perfect a voters' list as possible your duty is to accept the list as prepared by the municipalities under the provincial Act. Again, if you adopt this revising barrister clause, it may recoil on your own heads. You have no certainty of remaining in office longer than the present Parliament, and if you dread the partisanship of the municipal officers on account of their being under the control of the Local Legislature, how will it be when you change places with us on this side of the House? Should not this be a warning to you against taking an undue advantage of us at present? I believe, judging from the expressions that have come from every part of the Dominion, that this very revising barrister clause will be the cause of your downfall; the people have endured many acts on the part of the present Administration; they have shown great patience; but a very patient community, once aroused, will rise with all its might and drive those who have been oppressing it from the position they occupy. People say, and say truly, that the Administration of the day have so administered the affairs of the country that they know they ought to be removed from power; but in order to keep themselves in the position they occupy they are adopting a method of stuffing the ballot boxes, to prevent a free and independent expression of public opinion upon their acts. I say this is a dangerous experiment, and I believe it will be the very means of removing you from the position you hold. This is an iniquitous clause. It is intended to prevent that free expression of sentiment which you ought to court. If you had been acting in a manner in which you ought to act as stewards of the people, you would not be afraid to appeal to them on fair and equal ground; but you have not that you may be able to say who shall be elected and who shall not. Looking at the Bill from first to last, if I could have my way, I would strike out every clause, and think I would improve the Bill by so doing. Consider the course you are now pursuing. Ask this House whether it is in the interest of the general commonwealth that this measure should pass. It may be that your love of office is greater than your patriotism, but I would ask you for a moment to allow patriotism to have sway, and let the love of office give way on this occasion, by striking out the clause and allowing the motion of the hon, member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) to prevail. Entertaining those views, I will have much pleasure in voting for that amendment, and I hope the Government will see the necessity for incorporating it in the Bill.

Mr. KING. To judge from the protestations of hon. gentlemen, one would think this measure only con-cerned the Province of Ontario. I claim, however, that in the clause before us the people of New Brunswick are as interested as any others. I thought, at the second reading of the Bill, that when in committee the Government would be prepared to make some important changes. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) told us that the principle of the Bill, was to be adopted, but that in committee amendments to it would be necessary, and I expected that hon. gentlemen to suggest some amendment or, at any rate, to acquiesce in some of those proposed. He has, however, failed to come to time, and I take it for granted he was prepared to accept the Bill as it came down. As the hon. member for Brant pointed out, the amendment of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) would, if adopted, affect a large saving in the matter of expense. That statement was challenged by the hon member for Kent (Mr. Landry), who said he believed the amendment would be more costly, for, instead of one person seeking for information, the revising barrister, it would require some thirty. True, under the system that prevails in New Brunswick some thirty persons would be required to get the same information, but they would reside in the different parishes, and be possessed of local knowledge, and thus have no difficulty in getting the information required. In fact, if the Government are determined to have men specially appointed by themselves, for the purpose of preparing the first list, it would be much cheaper for the Government to select three men in each parish to prepare them for revision by the revising officer, and the lists would be much more carefully made out. The hon. member for Kent says the revising officer could get all the information by letter that he required, without being obliged to make a personal visitation. I believe he could but that is just one of the means I do not approve of, and the gentlemen selected by the council would not have to resort to any such means, because they would have all the local knowledge necessary themselves. The hon member for Kent (Mr. Landry), according to his remarks, though he has attempted to give another construction to them since, endeavored to make out that the revising barrister, under the Bill introduced in the New Brunswick Legislature last year, had the same powers as the one under this Bill. I can easily show that that is not the case as he was not the maker of the list. Mr. Macleod and Mr. Hannington, both Conservative members of the Local Legislature of New Brunswick, expressed the view that the revising officers that were proposed to be appointed under the Bill introduced in that House would, of necessity, be partisans, and objected to it on that ground. I have already pointed out that 427 persons who are assessed on real property in my county would be left off this list, and I do not expect that the revising officer appointed by this Government would take the trouble to put any on who were not of the right political stripe, while a very heavy cost would be necessary hon, gentlemen opposite whether there has been such a confor the Liberal party to bring before him those cases which dition of things in this country as to justify the taking of Mr. WILSON.

they thought should be put on. I believe the county court judges will discharge their duties faithfully and honestly, but we have no guarantee that they will live forever, and the chances are that in future the appointments to that position will be made with regard to the special fitness of the judge for performing the work of the revising barrister rather than in regard to his fitness for any other duties he is called on to discharge.

Mr. WELDON moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion negatived.

Mr. KING. I believe the object of this Bill is to benefit the Tory party in Canada. I have lately been through the Province of New Brunswick, and I find the opinion prevailing among all classes of the people, is that the Government are pushing this measure through Parliament solely with the view of gaining a party advantage at the next election. If the question were submitted to the people of my Province you would not find a corporal's guard of honest men to support this Bill. For the last thirty years our local system has worked well, and has given satisfaction to everybody, and we see no reason for a change. Nobody is more opposed to this Bill than the honest Conservatives of New Brunswick, and if it becomes law they will resent it at the next opportunity.

Mr. MILLS. In speaking on this clause this afternoon, I observed that nearly 30 per cent. of the parties who would be entitled to vote under this Bill would not be upon the assessment roll, and that it would not be in the power of a stranger to place their names at once upon the lists. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) inferred from these observations that by this Bill there would be a considerable extension of the franchise. That did not at all follow. It did not follow, because we could not put the names of wageearners, and tenants who were qualified to vote from rental, and the farmers' sons, and the sons of other property holders, in all the other Provinces except Ontario—I say it did not follow because these parties would not have their names upon the assessment roll that there was necessarily an extension of the franchise. Why, Sir, in the Province of Prince Edward Island the names of those parties would not be upon any assessment roll, and yet in that Province there would be a limitation and not an extension of the franchise. The Prime Minister and his supporters have informed us that this measure was intended to mitigate the rancour of party feeling, that the assessment roll was improperly made up, that we must have some fairer voters' list, and therefore the Government must take the appointment of revising officers into its own hands. Now, I would like to ask the hon, member for London (Mr. Carling), who is a member of the Administration, whether the assessors and municipal officers in London have been so far influenced by party bias that he thinks they have disregarded their oaths and have prepared unfair voters' lists?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I observe that Mr. Taylor is seeking to disturb the proceedings of the committee, and I wish specially to call your attention to the fact. If necessary, I will name other gentlemen on that side, and will call the attention of the press and the country to their conduct. I know hon, gentlemen opposite have held that the Local Government, in taking control of certain appointments, have unfairly influenced local elections. But this is a much more serious matter. It is the appointment of a large body of men throughout the Dominion who are to prepare the voters' lists which will be the very basis of the elections. I ask appointments out of the hands of the people and placing them in the hands of the Administration. It has been observed in this discussion that we do not propose, by the amendment of the hon. member for West Huron, to prepare a voters' list. That is true. We proposed it on Friday night. We proposed that the municipal officers shall assist the revising officer in preparing a voters' list, and shall furnish him with the material from which to make the list. Now, we can limit the power of an officer as much as we please. We can say to him: You shall not have any discretion in the matter, so far as the original preparation of the list is concerned; you shall take the valuation of the property which you find upon the assessment roll; and with regard to tenants, wage-earners, and those who qualify on income, you shall take the list that is prepared for you by the municipal officers mentioned in this amendment. It is perfectly competent for us to take that course. We can say that the revising officer shall prepare the voters' lists from materials we here designate. I have pointed out that a large number of names necessarily will not be found on the assessment roll, the names of wage earners, farmers' sons, tenants, and other classes. It requires local knowledge to put those names on the roll without very serious trouble and great expense. One hon. gentleman has stated that to obtain the services of thirty officials will cost more than the machinery proposed. I say they will not. The returning officer, being a stranger in nine-tenths of the constituencies, must summon parties to appear before him and produce the necessary evidence; that must involve great expense and much waste of time. The municipal officers referred to will have no travelling expenses to pay, no enquiries to make; they will act on personal knowledge. The work could be carried out by those officials at much less expense, and the revising in each case would be confined to the work of revision. The amendment proposed by the First Minister suggests a means of getting over the difficulty we have pointed out, by using the last election roll in those portions of the Dominion where there are not properly prepared voters' lists. Take the case of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, and see what the effect would be. All the names of those who, under manhood suffrage, voted at the Dominion election in 1882, would go on the voters' list, whether they possess any proper qualification or not. Not less than 25 per cent. of the voters in those Provinces placed on the list would not be entitled to vote. It will be absolutely necessary for the revising officer to see, not only that names are added, but that very many names are struck off. That is an extraordinary condition of things. A large number of people will thus be placed on the voters' list whom everyone knows will not be entitled to vote, and it is certain to lead to a contest as to who should vote. Suppose no revision is held before an election: those 25 per cent. would remain voters, and from contests that might arise elections might be voided. The committee has been told that judges are to be appointed revising officers in Ontario. The hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) told us that, but the First Minister did not

Mr. RYKERT. That is not the question now before the committee.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman should have called "question" when the hon, member for Monck was making his statement. The hon, member for Monck, in addressing the House, told us that the judges were to be made revising officers, and I say that is apart from the question. I did not call the hon, gentleman to order, because the extent of the power which you leave with the revising officer may, to some extent, depend on who the revising officers may be. If you are to have the judges as revising officers, then you would only have the question of inconvenience.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, gentleman has no faith in the judges; so he told us the other day.

Mr. MILLS. I told you nothing of the sort, nor did I tell the committee, nor anyone else.

Mr. HESSON. I refer to the hon. gentleman's own statement in Hansard.

Mr. MILLS. I refer to the fact that I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. HESSON. I tell the hon, gentleman—

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask you to call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, member for Victoria called you to order, and spoke very sharply, and now the hon. gentleman—

Mr. MILLS. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order; the hon, gentleman has the floor.

Mr. HESSON. I am in order; I simply wish to correct his statement.

Mr. MILLS. The statement of the hon, gentleman is as inaccurate as his charge about the assessors. I say we have had no assurance from the Prime Minister of the appointment of judges as revising officers, as stated by the hon. member for Monck. I say that we are obliged to keep in view the fact that these officers are not judicial officers, that their functions will be, in a great measure, ministerial, and that being the case, it is part of our duty to limit their discretion and power, and to see that they are rendered capable of doing as little mischief as possible. I have given the reasons why I think the revising officer should make up his list in the first instance, from the voters' list, with the additional information afforded by the assessors' roll. In that case the voters' list would be much more complete, in the first instance, and we would have much less difficulty in the work of revision at the subsequent stage. I am satisfied that hon. gentlemen who give this measure such an energetic support will find it will be quite as costly and inconvenient to some of them as it will be and as it is intended to be, to hon. gentlemen of this side.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am so much opposed to the system proposed in this Bill, as compared with the present system, that I would not feel justified in allowing the clause to pass without stating my objections to it. The people of my Province hold very dear the present system, which allows the people themselves to prepare the lists at the least possible expense. It is a system which commends itself to members of this side, at least, who have endeavored to keep down the expenses of the Government, and who are opposed in toto to the principle of adding unnecessary burdens upon the people. We cannot have as correct lists by the proposed system as by the one now extant, as no stranger, without going to vast expense, can prepare the lists as correctly or as fairly as they are now prepared by the local officers. I oppose the system because it is a scheme of centralisation; it is taking away from the people those rights which they hold dear, under our municipal institutions, of which we feel justly proud. They are controlled by the people of this country, and they cause the people to feel that they have an interest in the government of the country. By taking away that system you vote non-confidence in the people, you give them to feel that they are slighted, that they have been acting unfairly and unjustly, and that they are not to be trusted longer with the preparation of those lists which have hitherto given such general satisfaction. Under the present system every safe-guard is provided to obtain a correct expression of the popular will. Under the proposed system there are no such safeguards against omissions and injustice of every kind, as there are under the present system. Judging by the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, one would suppose that the assessors are not to be trusted to do what is fair and honest on account of their party bias; but in the riding I have the honor to represent, although many of the assessors are opposed to me in politics, I have never heard any complaint of them. Sometimes omissions occur in the list, but mistakes of that kind can be rectified, and I cannot understand how a revising efficer, who may possibly be a stranger in the locality, can prepare a satisfactory list. I think the insinuations made by hon. gentlemen opposite against the assessors and clerks of this country will be met with just indignation by all of those men who are elected by the people. I protest with all the force I can command against this Bill, because it is a direct insult to every municipal councillor in this country, to the assessors and to all who are engaged in the preparation of the lists, which have hitherto given uch general satisfaction. I protest against this measure because I believe that a Government which will pass a measure for the purpose of bolstering itself up and keeping itself in power is exceeding what is justifiable in party rule. Every right-thinking man, who is not bound down by party ties, and will bring an unbiased judgment to bear on the question, cannot fail to be convinced that the system which has been in vogue for eighteen years in Canada is the best, the safest, the fairest, and above all, the cheapest system we can have. That is something the people want. They do not want to be saddled with enormous debt. The expenditure of this country is $12,000,000 more than it was a few years ago; it is increasing at a rate that the people view with the gravest alarm. Almost $2,000,000 have been voted to restore peace and order in the North-West; we do not know how much more is to be voted; half a million more is proposed by this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I see you are shaking your head, Mr. Chairman. I quite agree that the contemplation of such a vast expenditure makes many more than yourself shake their heads. I am glad to see that even now you begin to realise the perilous step this country is taking.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman will please confine himself to the clause, and leave the question of debt.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think everything connected with the preparation of the lists is involved in the discussion of this clause. I am anxious to preserve the rules of debate, and I hope they do not prevent me dealing with the question of the vast cost to this country which is proposed by this Bill, in connection with the preparation of the lists. The Government may pass this Bill, but it is well that the people should know what it entails upon them. We do not get uniformity by this Act; we have several franchises under it; then, the idea is, that the revising officer can be an assessor, a county clerk, a council and a judge. I think it is rather derogatory to those officers to suppose that one revising barrister is equal to them all. The expense that this new system will cost, over that proposed by the amendment, which leaves the making of the first lists in the hands of the municipal officers, is a question which, in our present depressed state of affairs, ought to receive pressing attention. We are adding expense to expense, without any particular benefit to be derived therefrom. I oppose this Bill because I consider it is an invasion of the rights of the system to remain in operation under this Bill.

Mr. Landerkin.

Mr. DAWSON. I am always an attentive listener, but it gets a little wearisome when the same thing is spoken over and over again, and I have heard the same ideas expressed to night that were spoken a fortnight ago. Hon. gentlemen repudiate the idea that they are talking against time, but it certainly looks very much like it. One hon, gentleman said that the provincial franchise had worked admirably for eighteen years. What franchise? The provincial franchise is not a fixed thing, and the Ontario franchise, which is now to come into force, is as different from any we have had before as this Dominion franchise is. It is a new and experimental thing, and it is assuming what is not the case, to say that it has worked well for eighteen years. Another gentleman referred to the petitions which have been sent in against this Bill. One came from Port Arthur, which has a population of about 6,000, and there were only 55 signatures; and though I thought I knew everyone there, though I have resided there, and have seen the place grow up, there were many of those signatures that I did not know. These rolls which have been so much discussed will be at the disposal of the revising officer, as well as any other person, and there are vast areas where there are no assessment rolls or voters' lists. In the district I represent there are wide areas without any assessment roll. Household suffrage obtained there, and assessment rolls were not necessary, and when this new Ontario law goes into operation the household suffrage will still to some extent obtain there. This Act provides that where there are no assessment rolls, the last list of voters shall be taken as the basis for making up the roll. I think that is a very good basis. Every hon, member speaks from the particular circumstances of of his own district, but there are other districts in Ontario, besides those for which the hou. gentlemen have spoken. It is stated that the revising efficers will always be partisans. Is it not assuming too much to believe that barristers of five years' standing and judges will be mere partisans, to suppose that they will not be men of honor, as capable of exercising an independent judgment as men in similar positions are now. If anything could justify the music which sometimes rises in this House, it is the extreme bitterness with which some hon, gentlemen on the opposite side express themselves. I was very much surprised to night to hear my hon, friend from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), whom I had always considered the mildest mannered man in this world, express him self in such a strain of positive bitterness.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it not the member for West Elgin that you mean?

Mr. DAWSON. There must have been something to disturb the equanimity of my hon. friend from East Elgin. Then, the hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was also a little strong in his expressions. I remember one night during this discussion hearing that hon, gentleman say something to the effect that his language could not keep pace with his ideas; to-night I think the case was reversed, for his language appeared to outrun his ideas; his language ranged over the whole continent, while his ideas seemed to be entangled and stumbling far behind.

Mr. WATSON. I believe the municipal voters' lists should be used in making the preliminary list of the revising barrister. In a county such as the one I have the honor to represent, which is 150 miles long by 120 wide, it will be very awkward to have only the revising barrister to make up the list in the first place; it will be very awkward for the revising barrister to find out who has a right to be on the list in the remote parts of the county. I think that taking the preparation of the lists out of the hands of the local officers is, people and will add vastly to the expense of the people at to a certain extent, an insult to those officers. In the time when they can ill afford it. I hope the Government will look into this measure, and will allow the provincial against them; I have seldom heard of their making system to remain in operation under this Rill any mistakes, or that anybody was aggrieved at their action.

So far as the county of Marquette is concerned, the voters' lists have been prepared with the utmost accuracy; the officials, in all cases, have done their duty well, and there has been nothing like what some hon, gentlemen opposite have referred to as existing in Ontario, where elections are run on party lines and where officials are appointed for the purpose of fixing up the lists for a particular party. I believe that the true mode of preparing the list is that at present adopted by the local municipalities. It should be prepared by the people and for the people. The local officials are far better qualified for that purpose, and they know who has a right to vote and what has not, better than any revising officer would know. The hon member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) finds fault with the statement that the provincial franchise has worked well for eighteen years. It has worked well for eighteen years, and no hon. gentleman opposite has yet pointed out any single instance where it has not worked well. It seems to me that it makes no difference who has the preparation of the list, so long as it is correct; it matters little what mode the Provincial Legislature adopts for making a franchise, so long as a majority of the qualified electors are able to elect the candidate of their choice. I do not see why the First Minister should object to having the preliminary list based on the list prepared by the local officers. Those lists can be revised again, and the revising officer might be allowed to revise them. If this gentleman is to be a revising barrister, what is he to revise? Is he to revise a list prepared by himself? This Bill, now forced upon Parliament, has never been asked for by the people. From the petitions that have been presented to this House, it appears that it has roused up, not only Reformers but Conservatives. It is my opinion that not only the officials of the council, but the councils themselves, will look upon this Bill as a sort of insult to the municipal officers. There is no doubt that the present mode of preparing the list is very satisfactory to the people. It has involved very little expense, and in Manitoba, at least, the municipal officers who prepare the list receive no extra pay for such work. If any names are left off the list parties can appeal, first to the court of revision, composed of the municipal council, and after the list is revised by the council, they can appeal to the county judge. This has given entire satisfaction, and no doubt it will do so in future, better than the Bill now before the House. Under this Bill the revising officer has to be a lawyer. The First Minister has so framed the franchise that a lawyer will be necessary to interpret the meaning of the measure. My feeling is well expressed by the words of a Conservative gentleman, Mr. D. B. Read, of Toronto, who says: "I think no such power should be given to political saints, much less to political sinners. I believe the intention of this Bill is evil, and not good, to the electors.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I beg to move an amendment, that the following words be added after "district," in line 16, page 10:-

And shall, in the form of the schedule to this Act contained, divide And shall, in the form of the schedule to this Act contained, unviewed very city, town, ward, parish, township or other municipality or division in the electoral districts, or, in default of such municipality or division, every tract of land therein having, according to said list, more than 300 voters therein, by well-defined boundaries, such as streams, side lines, concession lines or the like, into districts, in such manner that the number of voters in said polling districts shall be nearly equal as may be, and not in any case exceed 200.

And also that the following words be added after "order," on line 17, page 10:-

For each of such polling districts.

Section 18 provides that before the final revision the revising officer shall make this sub-division. In the interest of the public, I think it might as well be made early as late. sub-divisions should be into municipalities, but they will be amendments in the interest of myself or of my party, and very large. The sub-division should be made before the first revision.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think I have very great encouragement in according to amendments offered by hon, gentlemen opposite. Whenever I make an amendment in accordance with the views of those hon. gentlemen, or which has even the appearance of meeting their views, it is a signal for renewed opposition and renewed obstruction. We cannot disguise the fact that the debate to night has been one of obstruction-of decided obstruction. Everybody must admit it has been so. I had intended, perhaps, to have gone some way to meet the views of the hon, member for St. John, who spoke in a manner which would not justify me in calling his remarks obstruction—but his was a singular exception to the speeches which have been made to-night. Of course, I cannot move the amendment, but perhaps it will be supposed that the hon. Minister of Public Works moves an amendment on the

Mr. PATERSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but is my amendment voted down, or does the hon. gentleman propose now to amend my amendment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it is voted down.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, there is another which I wish to

Mr. DAVIES. I had one in my hand on the same subject and I think it is on the point that the right hon. gentleman refers to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. First, I wish to meet the views of the hon, member for St. John, by inserting the words "the last revised assessment roll or rolls."

Mr. DAVIES. In Prince Edward Island the counties are divided into school districts, and each school district has a roll, and perhaps the First Minister would have no objection to add, after the word "appointed," the words "or any city or town, or any parish, or any school district therein

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; that would not do. I have inserted an amendment, providing for a certified copy of the poll-books where there are no assessment rolls.

Mr. DAVIES. I would point out that these rolls of the school districts contain the names of every property owner within them, and, collectively, the names of all the property owners in the county, and this would be simply placing us in the same position in this respect as in the organised municipalities.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we had better hold that over for the present. There is another suggestion of the hon, member for St. John which struck me. He said that in New Brunswick the whole electoral district or county was a municipality. I propose to provide for such cases, by saying that where the electoral district is a municipality, a separate list shall be made for each township, parish, etc.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the First Minister if it is intended that a municipality is a municipality for the election of councillors, or for members of the Local House?

Sir JOHN. A. MACDONALD. You have not a municipality for electoral purposes; you have counties and districts for that purpose.

Mr. PATERSON. I wish to make a remark or two, in moving my amendment. The First Minister says he has not been met in a proper spirit, and therefore he allows the amendments to be voted down. I want the First Minister One of the suggestions of the First Minister was that the and the committee to understand that I am not moving that they are matters of as little concern to me, individually. as to any hon. gentleman opposite. I think I put my case very fairly. I deny any attempt to take up the time of this committee. I deny having said anything that I did not feel called upon to say, with reference to the amendment which I offered before. I did not feel that it was necessary to continue an apology to the committee for offering the remarks I did.

Mr. RYKERT. Eleven hours on a section.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not responsible for that. I have a right to speak on behalf of my constituents. There was a motion before this committee that warranted me in saying all I said, and would have warranted me in saying double what I said. My amendment was one that ought to have commended itself to the committee. Was it not in the interest of everyone?

Mr. RYKERT. No; it was not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was an absurd amend ment.

Mr. PATERSON. Then the hon. gentleman proposed an absurd clause in his Bill, for the amendment is, word for word, taken from his Bill, only in the Bill the division is to be at the final revision instead of the first. Is it not better for the revising officer to make his division on the first list, when the people have have a chance to see it? We can look through a list as well as the hon. gentleman can; but unless he thinks it is convenient to have 2,000 names to look through, when he might have had 200, I say my amendment was in the interest of the people, and it was voted down. I make these remarks in reference to what was said by the First Minister. I think his remarks were dicourteous; he undertook to deliver a lecture to me, and he insinuated, not that my amendment was an improper one, but because he had made amendments in other directions, which had not been received in the proper spirit, it was not even worth while to put this amendment, although, when I moved it, I said only a few words, willing to let the good sense of the amendment speak for itself, and that was the spirit in which it was received. I am not going to find any more fault. The hon, gentleman has a right to speak, I suppose, as much as I; I want to recognise his position as leader of the House, but I do think he was not justified, even in the position he occupies, from anything I said or did, in delivering a lecture which I not being one of his good boys, and well trained, was not willing to submit patiently to. That having been voted down, I ask the attention of the committee to this resolution which 1 propose:

That the following words be added after the word "order," in line 17, page 10:—For each of the polling districts, as set out for use at the then last election of a member of the House of Commons.

We will take it for granted that the revising officer could not make his division at the first list; and fully impressed with the idea I sought to carry out in the last amendment, I seek now to have it done by proposing this amendment. It simply proposes that the revising officer, after he has made his first list, shall have it printed. It will be as easy for him to have it published then as after the final revision. I say no more; it will so obviously commend itself to the good sense of the committee that I leave it in your hands.

Mr. MILLS. This is a proposition to take the polling divisions as they existed at the elections of 1882. I think it would have been more convenient to have adopted the other amendment, but that failing, this is better than nothing. I do not admit at all the observation of the First Mr. Paterson (Brant).

There is no more difficulty in making the division into polling divisions in the first instance than there is in the last; and though this amendment will not be quite as satisfactory as the other would have been, it will certainly be better than the proposition the First Minister makes. He proposes that each municipality should be arranged alphabetically. If the list contains several thousand names it would be almost impossible to tell whether names have been improperly left off or improperly put on. I think it is to be regretted that the hon, gentleman has not accepted the amendments proposed from this side of the House in the spirit in which they have been proposed. We have been sincerely anxious to propose amendments, but every amendment has been voted down in dogged silence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must say that that is too barefaced a remark for the hon. gentleman to make. The hon. gentleman vowed, when this discussion in committee commenced, that the only way of pleasing him was to withdraw the Bill. That was his statement, and his whole course has been to force the Government to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I did not say so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He said so, and everybody heard him say so.

Mr. MILLS. It is not true. The hon, gentleman has no right to say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The statement that amendments were not received in the right spirit does not come properly from him. Other gentlemen who have proposed amendments and have discussed them might have made such a remark, but under no circumstances could it properly come from an hon, gentleman who made up his mind that he should weary out the majority, and the hon. gentleman cannot, in candor, say that that was not his intention.

Mr. MILLS. An hon. gentleman opposite, I think it was the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), suggested a number of changes that might promote the business of the House, and when he was mentioning them I mentioned the withdrawal of the Bill as one of them. observation does not admit of the interpretation the hon. gentleman has put upon it, and he knows it does not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman, in his speech, said this Bill was so obnoxious from beginning to end that no man would have a right to obey it. The hon, gentleman said it would be disgraceful that this moasure should be passed.

Mr. MILLS. I say so still, and that statement is perfectly consistent with what I said. I say the hon, gentleman knows as well as any hon, gentleman that the measure is a discreditable measure, calculated not only to discredit Parliament but to discredit the country as well.

Mr. CASEY. The proposition that if an hon member declares a Bill to be obnoxious, discreditable, unconstitutional, no attempt should be made to improve that Bill, to render it less vexations, less unconstitutional, can be regarded as only absurd, as a proposition one would never expect to hear, even from the Prime Minister. I did not think the right hon, gentleman would have lead us off into this digression, after we had been discussing this particular section of the Bill all evening. It is all very well for hongentlemen who have done nothing but how and bark and growl to repeat these noises now, but our discussion has had the effect of causing the hon, gentleman to amend this Bill in some respects. It is nonense to talk Minister addressed to this side of the House. I think the about obstruction; if the Bill has been amended at remark was uncalled for, that the amendment was absurd. I all it is in consequence of our so-called obstruction.

There is one point to which I called attention this afternoon, and which I wish to bring to the hon. gentleman's notice now. He promised, on the 22nd of last month, to introduce a clause providing that when a tenant was assessed for $150—we were dealing with cities and towns—that would be accepted as prima facie assumption that they pay $20 rental. This is the place to introduce that amendment, and I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he intends to move it.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DAVIES. The amendment the right hon gentleman has suggested, as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, does not meet the circumstances of the case. His amendment is, that copies of the poll book should be submitted to the revising officer, and put in his possession, to be accepted by him, as the assessment rolls are in the other Provinces. The hon, gentleman is only making confusion worse confounded. The last voting lists are based on manhood suffrage, and they contain a thousand votes which cannot be put on the list now. If a copy of the poll books is to be accepted as prima facie evidence that every man named there has a right to vote, the consequence will be that you will give the right to vote to a thousand men, in direct violation of the law, men who have not the qualifications required by this Bill. If the revising officer has to accept the poll books as primá facie evidence, the onus is thrown on the candidate to have every bad vote removed. The revising officer, if he puts on or off votes, as he pleases, will throw the onus on somebody, of going in and having names put off.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is right.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman says it is right that 1,000 votes not qualified under the law should go on, in direct violence of the law. Men who have admittedly not all the qualifications will be on the voters' lists, and then you say let somebody knock them off. But that somebody may knock off some 500 or 600 votes which he knows will be against him, and may leave on 500 of those who are in his favor, though both equally unqualified. If the hon. gentleman would adopt my amendment, to return to the revising officer the assessment rolls in each of the school districts, the revising officer would have the same data as is furnished by the assessment rolls in the other Provinces, and then the farmers' sons and the sons of land owners and the others who would be left out would claim their right to be added. You are making the poll book containing the names of hundreds who have no votes, prima facie evidence of their right to be on the voters' list, and I must therefore bring rebuttal evidence to strike off these names. I say it is an unjust and iniquitous provision. The school district assessment rolls show every man who has an acre of land on the island, and if you take those, any man who wishes to come in under any other provision can apply for that purpose, as he must elsewhere. You put on 1,000 men who have no right to vote, and you throw the duty upon the candidate to show that they should not be there. It will create tremendous trouble, unless both parties agree to leave them all on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These school assessments show only the names of proprietors of land. What is to become of the income voters and the tenants? The argument of the hon, gentleman is a justification for the expression, "and such other information as he can get." There is nothing to prevent the revising officer, after taking the last polling list as prima facie evidence of the right to vote, sending for the sch of assessment rolls; but they must be very imperfect and cannot be of much real assistance to the revising officer, because the real property voters must be a very small proportion, especially in Prince Edward Island. The hon, gentleman it will cost thousands those circumstances.

allow the last polling list to stand? He does not like to put in any objection, because he might object to the wrong man; he might object to a man who might say: I would have voted for you if you had not put me off. I do not think we can accept this amendment.

Mr. DAVIES. By the use of the school assessments we should be precisely in the same position as Ontario. You have no income tax in the municipalities in Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. You have not in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is an income franchise in New Brunswick.

Mr. DAVIES. There is none in Nova Scotia. In the cities and towns in Prince Edward Island we have the income tax as well, and the assessment roll gives the name of everyone who pays that tax. The hon, gentleman makes the assessment rolls prima facie evidence in Ontario. Do they show the farmers' sons?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. They do not, in the Maritime Provinces, at any rate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You have only to ask the man if he has any property.

Mr. DAVIES. The man would not be there. He would be on the list, and I should have to bring evidence if I wanted to strike his vote off. That will cause tremendous expense. Somebody will do it, and the other will suffer. The man who has the most money will go in and strike off his opponents. We are legislating deliberately to put on a lot of men who have no votes. There is such a thing as justice and fair play, and we are not getting it. It is a most iniquitous thing.

Mr. MILLS. The right hon, gentleman's explanation was untonable. If he takes the last polling book he will put on the name of all parties who had votes at the previous election. They are not voters, but he provides that they shall go on the list. Sir, we are informed that the hon, gentleman has promised the members for Prince Edward Island, or certain of them, that they shall have manhood suffrage; that this Bill shall be altered in the other Chamber, and when it comes down here the hon, gentleman will support it with this change. He is so much devoted to the principle of uniformity that he will not consent to make the amendment here. It would be a disagreeable business to give Prince Edward Island manhood suffrage and withhold it from other portions of the Dominion.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). In Prince Edward Island, in 1882, every person 21 years of age, who was a British subject, was allowed to vote. Does my hon. friend suppose that they are going to be 21 years of age forever?

Mr. DAVIES. If my hon, friend had run an election in Prince Edward Island he would learn that there are hundreds and hundreds who vote upon manhood suffrage qualification at every election, and these young men who voted at the last election possess that qualification now. I would like the hon, gentleman to consider the words a little lower down, and strike out the words that the poil books shall be prima facie evidence of the right of every man there to vote. That is what I object to. Every man in that book, whether he has the qualification or not, is to be put on, and to knock him off you must bring counter evidence to show that he has no vote, which will cost, perhaps, $10 for every vote. Why, it will cost thousands of dollars to run an election under those circumstances.

Mr. RYKERT. It puts money into circulation.

Mr. DAVIES. If that is the principle upon which hon. gentlemen are going, it justifies a good many epithets that are used against the Bill. It is most unjust and most arbitrary, and calculated to impose a fine upon every man who seeks to get elected. What can he do, with 7,000 voters in the county, and with 1,500 or 2,000 of whom have voted on manhood suffrage? You would have to go through the county and bring evidence to show that these could not vote. It is something I would not relish, but if it cost a thousand, or two thousand dollars, I would be obliged to do it, in selfdefence, and my opponent would have to do it, too. I would like to put 500 votes in the county of the hon. member for Inverness, particularly if they were opposed to him, and see if he would like that.

Mr. CAMERON. I could spare 500, and I would have 350 majority afterwards.

Mr. DAVIES. It is not fair to make the polling book prima facie evidence of a right to vote, when you know that that polling book contains the names of thousands of voters who have no vote under the Act. I would move that the words, "or polling books," be struck out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the most unpatriotic speech I ever heard delivered in the House of Commons. He is in favor of manhood suffrage. He says that every man, a British subject, coming to twenty-one years of age, has a right to vote; yet he says that he will willingly spend his money, a thousand or perhaps two thousand dollars, for the purpose of depriving a large body of men of the right to vote, who ought to have the right to vote, because he thinks they don't look upon political subjects the same way he does. Why, Mr. Chairman, if we want to hold up the hon, gentleman to his constituents as being an unpatriotic man, a mere blind partisan, not caring whether he deprives one hundred or five hundred men of their votes, and, at the same time, believing that every one of them ought to have a vote-if that won't ruin him among his constituents it will be just about as bad as it was with the Hon. David Laird some years ago.

Mr. DAVIES. This is the style of argument we have heard all through this Bill. The hon. gentleman deliberately passes a law to deprive these men of the right to vote, and when I move an amendment to continue to them that right he votes the amendment down. Then he comes in afterwards and says: We will put a thousand votes on the list that have not the right to vote, and you must take the chance of letting them vote you out of a seat. After this Parliament has declared that these men shall have no right to exercise the franchise, the hon, gentleman still allows them to send a man to represent them here. I am told it is unpatriotic. What nonsense that is! I do not wonder at his own supporters behind him smiling in derision. The hon, gentleman knows very well that the candidate will be obliged, in self-defence, to take that course. His opponent will take it. Do you suppose, when there are 500 men who have not got the right to vote, on the list, that you are going to let them remain there? In self-defence you will be obliged to do it After I have aserted, by my voice and vote, the right of these young men to vote, and after the right hon. gentleman has deliberately, by law, taken the right away from them, for him then to say it is unpatriotic to prevent them going on the list is the height of absurdity.

Mr. CASEY. The remarks of the right hon, gentleman do not deserve to be called a reply. If they were delivered outside this House they would be designated as the most wretched twaddle. To hear such remarks from the gentleman who is de facto leader of this country, in answer to a Mr. DAVIES.

the jollity in which we were disporting. The demand made by Prince Edward Island, that the polling books should be adopted as the basis of the voters' lists, is simple justice and The hon, gentleman refused manhood common sense. suffrage to Prince Edward Island, and insisted on a property qualification, and now he declines to take the only means of carrying his plan out. The hon, gentleman's action is only capable of two explanations: Either he does not see the drift of the suggestion, or he does not wish to see it. Probably the hon, gentleman wants to retain manhood suffrage by a side wind. If manhood suffrage is retained in Prince Edward Island we want it retained by law and not by a side wind. I have voted for it, and I will vote for it again. but I want it retained by regular means. The First Minister distinctly stated that he would make provisions by which the assessment rolls should become prima facie evidence as to tenants. In the discussion on 22nd May the hon. gentleman promised to introduce a clause which would enable the revising officer to make certain use of the assessment rolls in regard to tenants. He has paid no attention to that matter. I will quote the words he used on that occasion. He said:

"That in case any assessment roll shows a party to be a tenant, but does not show the rent he pays, I propose to add a proviso which, although it does not go as far as the hon. gentleman wishes, goes a considerable step towards it, and I propose to provide that the fact that the property in respect to which he pays a rent is assessed at $1.50 shall be accepted as prima facie evidence that the tenant has a right to be on the register."

The hon, gentleman promised to insert a provision of that kind in the Bill, and this is where it should be inserted. I call his ttention to the desirability of making the change now.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman has not answered the point I put to him, so we will give him an opportunity of voting whether he will carry out the arrangement he proposed or not. As he proposed to carry out the arrangement, no amendment has been prepared by this side of the House, reliance being placed on the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) stated that he did not see any difference between the powers exercised by the clerk of a municipality in Ontario and the powers proposed to be conferred on the revising officer.

Mr. McCALLUM. I did not say that. I said this: That I did not see what difference it made, whether the clerk of a municipality copied the assessment roll or whether the revising barrister did it.

Mr. MULOCK. It is the same idea. It makes no differ ence who copies the roll. The hon, gentleman was expressing satisfaction with the Ontario system, and pointed out that our rolls were made up by clerks copying from the assessment rolls. He saw no difference, in substance, between the present system in Ontario and the one which would obtain under this Bill.

Mr. McCALLUM. I did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK. I understood the hon. gentleman made that statement.

Mr. McCALLUM. I did not say that; the hon. gentleman is wrong again.

Mr. MULOCK. Whatever was the drift of the hon. gentleman's observations, I drew this inference: He was quite satisfied with the way the lists were made up in Ontario to-day, and by illustration, he pointed to the fact that the clerks copied simply from the rolls, and he would wish us to believe that he thought the revising officer would serious speech, is saddening. It has sobered us up from be the same in that respect. The duties of the clerk are simply to copy. The Revised Statutes of Ontario, chapter 9, entitled "The Voters' List Act," section 2, defines the matter. (The hon. gentleman read the section.)

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). There is not a member from Ontario but knows that as well as you do. Do you think we are a pack of fools?

Mr. MULOCK. I read the statute to show that the clerk in the Province of Ontario is obliged to transfer to the voters' list the names of all persons who appear to be entitled to vote according to the assessment roll, and my suggestion should apply to the revising officer in preparing his original list. The First Minister stated that it was desirable to minimise the duties of the revising officer anterior to the period of revision, and if we can, to a certain extent, control his power in making out the lists, we are carrying out the policy of the First Minister, and carrying out a sound policy. We should not unnecessarily delegate power to any person, and we should restrict the discretion of the revising officer as much as possible. The First Minister thinks my amendment is covered by his proviso, but I favor my amendment, because it provides that the alphabetical list shall include all who appear to be entitled to the franchise by the revised assessment roll, so that it would leave the revising officer no discretion. He could be compelled by mandamus to transfer them, whereas, under the proviso, he is left with judicial powers. At the stage when he is gathering material to make his list, he is to consider the rolls as prima facie evidence, which implies that he may have other evidence. If he is bound by the rolls at that stage, they should be conclusive evidence, instead of prima facie evidence, as the words primá facie evidence imply the power of weighing evidence at that stage. After the voter has had his name placed on the list, after the assessor has used his own knowledge to place him on the list, and that name is left on the list, then the only kind of evidence that the revising officer would have would be hearsay evidence. He cannot have, at that stage, as good evidence as the assessor has had.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the amendment I have moved fully meets the object of the hon. gentleman. He says that prima facie evidence should be conclusive evidence. Well, it is conclusive evidence if it cannot be rebutted at any subsequent stage. To give an illustration: The revising officer, in preparing his list, is in the situation of a grand jury, who judge upon the prima facie evidence, but when he comes to settle the rolls finally, he sits as a judge and jury, and he will be bound to hold to the prima facie evidence unless it is rebutted afterwards. That is the opinion which I have come to, and with every respect for the hon. gentleman's argument, which I quite appreciate, I cannot see my way to a change.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon, gentleman knows as well as I do, and better, that the grand juries do not receive rebutting evidence at all, and the revising officer may. If he thinks the word "conclusive" would not answer, he might get over the difficulty by saying "conclusive for the purpose of the preliminary roll."

Amendment to amendment negatived.

Mr. DAVIES. I would move that the words "or polling books" be struck out. The revising officer could then take such means as he liked to ascertain who were tenants or occupants, income voters, or farmers' sons.

Mr. MILLS. We have, in this amendment, as we have had in many others this evening, an evidence of the anxious desire of the hon. gentleman to receive suggestions from this side of the House. He assured us, a few days ago, how sincerely anxious he was to receive suggestions from this side of the House, and we see, from the spirit in which every proposition from this side has been met, what his anxiety amounts to.

Amendment to amendment negatived, and amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to.

On section 13,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose some amendments to this clause. It has been suggested to me that it would be as well to send copies of the list to the unsuccessful candidate at the last election. That is done under the Ontario Act.

Mr. MILLS. That is not only done, but there are a good many things done which are not done in the provisions of this Bill. The hon, gentleman proposes that two copies should be sent to each candidate for the House of Commons. In Ontario there are ten copies sent, the intention being to enable a candidate to place a sufficient number of copies in the hands of his friends in the different polling divisions. The hon, gentleman will see that that is a matter of very great convenience. There are not often more then or eight polling divisions in a township. With two copies it is impossible that that can be done. There are other provisions in this section which are in the highest degree unsatisfactory, apart from the provisions in the beginning, which I shall not mention, as my hon. friend has an amendment to it, which will require a great deal of consideration. The hon gentleman provides, also, that copies of the list shall be furnished at a price proportionately sufficient to cover the price paid for them. The hon, gentleman might put the lists into the hands of a few of the friends of the Government, and the proportionate price might be very exorbitant. Under the Ontario law these lists are furnished at a mere trifle, and under the English law at 6d. per hundred names. Here, that would be 10 cents per hundred names, but in this Bill you charge 6 cents for ten names, nearly ten times the charge in England. In Ontario a very much smaller sum is charged, excepting the furnishing the special names after the lists have been revised by the judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman speaks about the number in Ontario. The numbers sent here to the members of the different parties are the voters' lists finally revised. This is merely the preliminary list, which will be posted up in the post office, and elsewhere, so that the people may see them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose the hon. gentleman will not expect us to go on with amendments; if so, I propose to discuss the motion to adjourn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1 do not wish to press hon, gentlemen unduly, but I think if there are really any amendments prepared they should be laid on the Table, so that we may know what they are. In England that would be compulsory.

Mr. PATERSON. In that matter the hon gentleman himself has set us a bad example. He came down with important amendments to this clause under discussion, of which he gave no notice, and which altered some of the amendments we proposed to make. I think the hon gentleman should also lay any amendments he intends to make on the Table.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the Bill is a very good Bill, as it is, and perhaps I will go on with it as it stands. I did not suppose any hon. gentleman opposite came to fight out this one clause until 3 o'clock in the morning. We have discussed this clause 11 or 12 hours.

Mr. PATERSON. You did not accept our amendments. Committee rose and reported progress.

HOUSE OF COMMONS:

TUESDAY, 2nd June, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

Mr. RYKERT. On the 26th May a petition was presented from certain electors of the town of Niagara, praying that the Franchise Bill may not become law. I beg leave to present a petition, signed by a large number of the said ratepayers, representing that their names were obtained by false and fraudulent representations, and that, having ascertained the particulars of the said Bill, they are anxious that the Bill should be passed for the public benefit, and to prevent the interference of designing and unscrupulous men in the Local Legislature, and further, they desire to prevent an unscrupulous Opposition in this House from wasting the time of Parliament. This petition is signed by nine out of the twelve who signed the other petition.

Mr. EDGAR. I think a question of privilege has arisen in connection with the remarks made by the hon. member for Lincoln. I would like to read two letters which I have received to-day upon that subject, because it is alleged that gentlemen on this side of the House have presented petitions, the signatures to which were obtained by misrepresentation. A letter which I received to-day from St. Catharines states:

"I understand that Mr. J. C. Rykert is endeavoring, through one of his hacks, Thomas Beatty, Inspector of Weights and Measures",—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I do not think that this is a matter of privilege. When the petition comes up on the motion to read and receive it, that will be the time, if any, to discuss it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Allusion was made to the fact that these names had been obtained by fraudulent pretences. I think, under those circumstances, an explana-tion is in order, and ought to be permitted. It having been said by the member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), in presenting the petition, that these names had been obtained by fraudulent pretences, no objection can be made to the course of my hon, friend,

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the petition states

Mr. EDGAR. The hon, member alleged it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that that is an allegation of the petition.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman was stating the allegations contained in the petition. The question may be, whether the petition is to be received or not-I do not know yet; I think the proper time would be when the motion is made for reading and receiving that petition.

MEDALS FOR THE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, prepare the primary list, they can with perfect impunity I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia the question throw that list out of doors. There is no provision in the Sir John A. Macdonald.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of of which I gave him private notice. Is it the intention of the Government to have a medal struck for presentation to those volunteers who have been called out for active service in the North-West, as a token of how highly the people of the Dominion appreciate the patriotism, courage and devotion with which, without warning, they have responded. in the hour of danger, to the call of duty.

> Mr. CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that the matter to which he has referred has not yet been considered by the Government.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). Before the amendment of which the First Minister has given notice is proposed, I desire to move an amendment to the first part of this clause, the object of which is to furnish means for providing printed copies of the primary voters' lists. For some years we have had printed voters' lists in some of the Provinces, and the advantage has been so apparent that I think it very desirable the same facilities should be continued. It is true that there is an optional provision in this clause for printing the lists, but the purpose of my amendment is to make it an absolute necessity on the part of the revising officer that these lists shall be printed. In the Province of Ontario it was held as a decided boon when the Legislature changed the law in the direction of requiring the lists to be published. Municipal bodies have furnished these lists at their expense, but the expense has been so small, comparatively, that no one has been found to take exception to the course that has been since followed. The municipalities get them printed cheaply, and they are furnished in sufficient number to supply every one who desires to secure a copy. I am satisfied that the departure proposed in section 13 will be extremely unsatisfactorily, and I trust the First Minister will consent to such an amendment as will make it not merely optional with the revising officer, but one of his duties, to secure the printing of these lists, in order that they may be supplied in such numbers as that all may procure a copy who desire. It is provided in a subsequent part of this clause that one copy of the list shall be posted up in the office of the clerk or the corresponding officer of each municipal and parochial division, and that it shall be open to inspection by any person, free of charge. I assume that it is intended to furnish conveniences whereby any elector may ascertain whether his name is on the list, and if he finds it omitted, that he may have an opportunity of entering his protest. If the lists are not printed, the only opportunity the majority of the electors will have to ascertain whether their names are on the lists or not, or whether names are on the list that ought not to be there, is the written list that is in the possession of the municipal officers; if that list is printed in sufficient numbers, it will evidently be a great convenience to the electors. That is an additional reason why the amendment should prevail. There is a further reason why printed lists should be adopted under this clause. Hon, gentlemen opposite have more than once alleged that the municipal clerks cannot, under any legislation passed by this Parliament, be compelled to carry out any requirements of this Legislature. Supposing that to be the case, and knowing the refusal of Parliament to recognise their position in the preparation of the list, as we have done by adopting the clause and rejecting the amendment of the hon, member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), proposing that the municipal clerks should

Bill for attempting to control those municipal officers. There is no provision in this Bill for a return of the courtesy extended to members of the Dominion House by having copies of the voters' list, which are sent to them, furnished to the Local Legislature. There is no recognition of their claims in this Bill, but no doubt that ommission will be remedied. It is important that the voters' lists should be printed instead of "made," as provided for in this Bill. When we compare the cost of voters' lists in England with the proposed charge here, we see the extravagant amount proposed in this Bill. Under the English Act a ratepayer is entitled to receive a copy of the voters' list, if the names do not exceed 1,000 for is.; if they exceed 1,000 and not 3,000, for 2s. 6d., and so on; the amount charged for a list over 9,000 names being 10s. Under this clause, for a list with 1,000 names, ratepayers in Canada will have to pay $6, or twenty-five times as much as the English ratepayer. If the number of names on the list exceeds 3,000 the charge will be $18, or twenty-nine times as much. Experience in Ontario has conclusively shown the advantages that result from having a printed list, and that well circulated; and a similar practice should be followed here. In order to carry out these view I beg to move:

That the words "make or," on the 39th line of paragraph 10, be struck out; also that the word "make," on the 40th line of paragraph 10 be struck out, and the word "printed" be inserted therefor in each case.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I trust the First Minister will make some reply with regard to the amendment of my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Cameron), as he may thereby shorten the discussion on this clause. The question involved in this clause is a very important one to the whole Dominion, as a question of expense, and also to the candidate who may be engaged in a contest. As, however, the First Minister does not appear disposed to express any opinion on the question just now, I shall, in a few words, explain my views on this question. At present the clause does not compel the revising officer to print a single copy of the preliminary list, as he will comply with the provisions of the clause by simply writing out a certain number of copies. One copy is to be sent to the clerk of the municipality—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If my hon friend will to examine thoroughly into the condition of the electorate allow me, I would say that here is one instance where it would have been well if the hon gentleman had moved his amendment last night, so that we might have considered it. On looking at it for the first time, I may say that I shall at a reasonable figure, so that candidates and others who accept the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. It would have been well for the First Minister if, instead of putting my hon friend to the trouble of framing his motion and making his observations upon it, he had framed this Bill in the first instance so as to cover this case.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh; never satisfied.

Mr. CAMERON. Hon, gentlemen opposite are perfectly eatisfied with any proposition that may be submitted. We may go on day after day discussing a proposition of this kind, and then the First Minister comes down and makes an amendment. If he had framed his Bill, in the first instance, with the care and the deliberation which he should have given to a Bill of this magnitude and importance, it would save a considerable amount of discussion. Although the amendment of my hon, friend is a proper one, so far as it goes, the First Minister must see at a glance that it does not go far enough. Is the hon, gentleman prepared to make any additional amendment with respect to this clause?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Let us dispose of this first.

Mr. CAMERON. I propose to discuss the whole clause. voters' lists in my county, and the same remark will apply All that is required by this amendment is that the revising to other districts; whereas, if the voters' lists were printed officer shall print some fifteen or twenty copies of the electoral list, which are distributed among certain persons. But we all know that each candidate in a contest requires a very large number of copies in order to conduct his campaign with reasonable satisfaction. Where is he to get these copies, unless the First Minister will provide that, as in the English Act, a certain number shall be printed, in order to satisfy all reasonable demands for them, by candidates and others who may require them, and at a reasonable expense. By the Bill they can only be obtained from the revising officer, by paying 6 cents for every ten names. A candidate would require to have at least four copies for each electoral polling sub-division; and as there are an average of seven in each electoral district, there would be required at least twenty-eight for each candidate, or fiftysix for the candidates alone. I know that, in my own constituency, while engaged in a contest, I never have less than from twenty to twenty-five copies of the voters' list, and every candidate will require to have at least that number. The opposite candidate would require to have the same number. How are you going to get these voters' lists? Under the Bill, as now framed, all that the revising officer requires to get printed is something like twenty copies, and if you require any additional copies you will have to pay him a sum not exceeding 6 cents for every ten names. Take my sum not exceeding 6 cents for every ten names. Take my own constituency as an illustration of the hardships this provision imposes on the candidate. In that constituency there are seven municipalities and thirty five polling sub-You require for each municipality at least four copies; so that, at the very least, each candidate will require twenty-eight copies. He gets two copies, under the Bill, so that he requires to purchase at least twenty six copies, in order that he may be able to get the constituency canvassed in each sub-division. There are nearly 5,000 names on the voters' list of the electoral district of West Huron; but assuming that there are 4,000—multiply 26 by 4,000, and it makes 104,000 names; which, at the rate of 6 cents for every 10 names, amounts to $624. It is a monstrous outrage; no official of the Government should be allowed to take 6 cents for every ten names; and without this expense it is utterly impossible for the candidate to obtain the requisite number or voters' lists, in order to examine thoroughly into the condition of the electorate in the particular constituency. Thefore, the hon. gentleman ought to adopt the English law, and compel the revising officer to publish a sufficient number and to sell them require the voters' lists will not be imposed on by the officials entrusted with the administration of this portion of the Bill. Under the Ontario law each candidate, the defeated as well as the successful, gets ten copies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of the voters' lists?
Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is not the voters' list.

Mr. CAMERON. It is much more important that the political party should have a sufficient number of copies of the preliminary list, because there is only a limited time allowed to prepare objections to the list. The candidate has to send a copy of the preliminary voters' list to each polling sub-division, and find out from the residents there whether any parties entitled to vote have been left off improperly, or whether any parties are on who ought not to be on; and with the limited time allowed for objections to be put in, it becomes absolutely necessary that we should have more copies of the voters' list than the law provides we should have. An enormous sum would have to be paid for voters' lists in my county, and the same remark will apply to other districts; whereas, if the voters' lists were printed in sufficient number to supply all demands, and the revising officer were only to charge the reasonable cost of printing, the objections to this clause would be removed. By the English law the local authorities are compelled to publish the voters' list in sufficient numbers to satisfy all demands, and there is a schedule which limits the charges to 10s. for any number of names exceeding 9,000; 7s. 6d. for any number between 6,000 and 9,000; 5s. for any number between 3,000 and 6,000; 2s. 6d. for any number between 1,000 and 3,000; and 1s. for any number up to 1,000. No ore could object to those charges. In my county, I would have to pay, under the English law, 5s. for a copy of the list, or $20 for twenty copies, whereas, under this Bill, the charges I would have to pay would be enormous. This is a matter that will work both ways, for I apprehend that hon, gentlemen opposite will require copies of the voters' list for their canvass just as well as Liberal candidates, and unless they can get them from the revising officer without pay they will have to pay the same charges. Apart from the question of cost, there is another extraordinary provision in this clause which I think the First Minister ought to amend. The voters' list, in order to be of the slightest utility or advantage to the public, will require to be published somewhere. To send them to the officials mentioned here is of some consequence, but not very much. Those copies will never reach the hands of the persons who really take an active interest in the political affairs of the constituency. There ought to be some additional mode by which the public at large will be enabled to see how the register, for the time being, has been made up. The hon. gentleman proposes that there shall be a publication of the list. What publication does the hon, gentleman propose by the Bill? He directs that a copy of the voters' list, the preliminary voters' list, shall be transmitted to the clerk of the municipality; and he directs that the clerk shall post up the list. Now, on clause 14 there is another direction, that two copies of the preliminary list shall be transmitted to every postmaster in the electoral district, and that the postmaster shall, in a public and conspicuous place in his post office, post up the list. We know that in Ontario, at all events, these lists are with the clerk of the municipality, and certain other officials, and we know where to go and when to go in order to examine the lists. That official is compelled to post them up and keep them posted up. Under this Bill the only persons compelled to post their lists up in a public and conspicuous place, are the postmasters of electoral districts. In some electoral districts there are municipalities where there are no postmasters. I have in my mind one municipality in a riding in the west where there is no post office, and in that case the only public notice of the publication of the electoral lists would be the notice published by the county clerk. How is he compelled to publish them? This clause says he shall post them up, but does not say how long. He may post the list up at noon, and it may be torn down five minutes later, and he is not compelled to post it up again. During the whole time that elapses between the publication of the list and the revision, the list may not be posted up for two consecutive minutes in the office of the clerk of the municipality. That is unreasonable. Those who are not in the inner circle, who have not the ear of the revising officer and his clerk, and his constable, may know nothing about the revision of the voters' list. The letter, and even the spirit of this provision of the law, may be complied with, and yet there may be no publication whatever for five consecutive minutes in any municipality. The hon. gentleman ought to provide that the local officials, such as the clerk of the township, the sheriff of the electoral district or the county, the treasurer, the clerk of the county, and the other public officials should be compelled, not only to postup, but to keep posted up the voters' lists during the whole | way, and not as a joke.

space of time between the day of publication and the date fixed for the preliminary revision. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the English electoral law he will find, in section 23, how the publication is arranged for there. Why he should not compel any person except the township clerk or the clerk of the municipality to post up these voters' lists and then not compel them to keep them posted up for a given time, the interval between the days of publication and preliminary revision, is to me incomprehensible. Why he should not compel the local officials, the sheriff and the county treasurer, and the county clerk, to post up and keep posted in their offices, in conspicuous places, these lists is to me equally incomprehensible. Had the hon. gentleman referred to the English Act, he would have found there express provisions that certain public officials are bound to post up the voters' lists in a conspicuous and public place and keep them posted up. Section 23 of the English Act provides as follows:-

"Every notice, every list registered, or other document herein required to be published, shall be published, except where some other mole or place of publication is herein expressly provided, by being affixed in some public and conspicuous situation, on the outside of the door or outer wall near the door of the buildings hereinafter named for that purpose."

What would be the effect of a strict compliance with this clause, in so far as the county clerk is concerned? know that in Ontario the township clerks, as a rule, keep no public office; their office is in their own home. All this Bill requires of the clerk is to post up the list; it does not say in a public, conspicuous place, or to keep it posted up. He may, in strict compliance with this law, post it up behind his door, under his desk, in any place not conspicuous, where it cannot be seen at all, and he may keep it posted up for only five minutes in strict compliance with the law. Surely that is not the kind of publication the hon. gentleman contemplates, or which ought to be given to documents of this kind. In England it is not published in the office but on the door or in some conspicuous place near the door, so that if the elector cannot attend during the official hours he can still see the list, or the notice of its revision, or any other notice required to be given under the English electoral law. In order that the people may have the fullest possible information, the English law requires that every church and public chapel in every parish or township, every place of public worship that belongs to the Established Church or any dissenting body shall be utilised as places where these notices of revision and of the voters' lists shall be published, and they are required to be posted up at certain other places as well; and in another clause publication is provided for in a newspaper in each county. If the hongentleman desires the kind of publication that the people have fairly a right to demand at his hands, now that he is inaugurating a new system for the preparation and the revision of the voters' lists, he should provide that not only the clerk of the municipality should post up and keep posted up the notices in a public and conspicuous place on or near the door of his office, but he ought to provide also that a copy of the list should be sent to every teacher in the electoral district and every church in the electoral district, so that the lists might be posted up at the church doors and the school-house doors

Mr. BOWELL. And the pulpit.

Mr. CAMERON. That might not do the hon, gentleman much good. He, perhaps, does not go near the pulpit very often.

Mr. BOWELL. You never should judge others by yourself.

Mr. CAMERON. I am arguing this matter in a sensible regard to the point the hon. gentleman is now discussing, in Ontario?

Mr. CAMERON. No; but it is very different.

Mr. BOWELL. This is not half so expensive.

Mr. CAMERON. I say it is very different, and the hon. gentleman does not know anything about the Bill if he says it is not. Under this law, the only publication required is by the clerks of the municipality and the postmasters in the electoral districts, but the clerk of the township is not bound to keep it posted for five minutes. The hon. gentleman's remark in reference to putting it up in the pulpits is a small joke which is not worthy of discussion.

Mr. BOWELL. You are turning the whole thing into ridicule, for the sake of your audience.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Government desire to have a proper publication, let them adopt the English law on the subject, or let them send these documents to the public officials who are recognised, especially in Ontario, and let these documents be posted where the public can have access to them at all hours of the day. Hon, gentlemen have adopted a system which will work admirably in the interests of the party, but it is not a fair system. Under the English law, these documents must be posted in a conspicuous and public place, and must be kept so published, and, if they are mutilated or torn down, maliciously or otherwise, the official charged with the duty of posting them, is bound to post them up again, and, if any one improperly removes them, he is liable to a penalty. This Bill provides no such guarantees or protection for the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always the Conservative committee to look after their interest. They have the revising barrister, who is the nominee of the Crown, and they have the constable and the clerk, who will be party men. These three men are always there, charged with looking after the interests of the Conservative party. Those opposed to the Government have no safety or protection, and any amount of fraud can be perpetrated under the Bill as it stands. The list may be revised without the public knowing anything about it, for it is not necessary to post it up more than a few minutes. The leader of the Government invited amendments and suggestions in reference to the Bill, and yet, when amendments of the first possible consequence to the purity of elections and to the public at large are suggested, the hon. gentleman will not pay the slightest attention to them. From beginning to end he has made no amendment designed to protect the public interest, but simply those in favor of his own party. I have been surprised at the way in which he has treated amendments coming from this side, while professing a desire to deal fairly by his political op-ponents. The hon, gentleman ought to utilise the local machinery for publishing the lists as well as in other particulars. There is no difficulty in calling upon the township clerk, the sheriff, the county warden, every official who derives his authority from the Local Government, to give the necessary publication to these documents. The hon, gentleman pretended that these local officers were partisans, and were elected on political lines, therefore it was not safe to entrust the publication of these lists with the local officers. But how did the hon. gentleman undertake to remove the partisan character of these officials with respect to their dealings with the voters' lists? By the First Minister himself appointing a revising officer, who everybody knows will be of one realistical desirable appointment. political stripe, and by permitting him to appoint a responding to that. We have, it is true, a nominated clerk and constable who will be of the same political stripe. parish clerk, but he has no office, and the question arises,

Mr. BOWELL. Has there ever been any difficulty in I daresay that in some localities the local officers may be partisans, but there is always a check upon them. Even in the discharge of so small a duty as this, they are amenable to the people, because they are appointed by the local authorities who derive their authority directly from the people, to whom, every year, they have to give an account of their stewardship. But we have no such guarantee for the impartial conduct of the revising officer. The official that is appointed under this Bill is not removable except by an address of the House of Commons. He is responsible only to the First Minister, he holds his office during life, and, worst of all, he is a partisan, and likely to be a partisan of the worst kind. Therefore, to tell us that it is not safe to trust the publication of the voters' lists the duties that are imposed upon revising officers, to the local authorities, is an insult to the people of this country that I trust they will not submit to. We were told, also, that complaints were made of the partisan conduct of the local authorities, and that in one Province the law was changed because the local officers, charged with the administration of these duties, were partisans, and the public interest was not safe in their hands. Sir, when that proposition was submitted to Parliament, did the Conservative members propose that you remedy that evil by charging the Administration of the country with the appointment of officials to prepare the voters lists and in whom certain other powers and authorities are vested by Parliament? Sir, nobody ever proposed such a thing. In the Province of Ontario, where a new electoral law was passed during the last Session of the Local Legislature, did the Conservative party insist upon the Government assuming the power of appointing these officers? No one ever suggested such a thing as that. No man, up to the present time, has ever suggested that the local officers were so partisan in their character that it was unsafe to leave the preparation of the voters' lists and the publication of the notices in their handa; and it is only after eighteen years that the hon. gentleman has suddenly aroused himself to a sense of his duty to the people, and that, on account of the partisan character of these officials, he must take their appointment into his own hands. I have pointed out that under the first clause of this section, even with the amendment of my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Cameron), the hon. gentleman still leaves it in the hands of this revising officer to exact from any candidate who is running for Parliament, an exorbitant sum of money for the necessary number of voters' lists to serve his purpose in canvassing the constituency. The revising officer, moreover, is not bound to give any notice at all of the publication of the list. If he posts it up, and it is torn down five minutes afterwards, he is not bound to put it up again, and there is no penalty imposed for not keeping it up. If the hon, gentleman desires the public interest, if he desires fair play to be meted out to both parties, he ought to accept the amendment providing still further that a sufficient number of these lists shall be published, and that the officials shall not only stick them up in public places, but shall keep them stuck up during the whole period between the first publica-tion and the day fixed for the preliminary revision of the voters' lists.

> Mr. WELDON. With regard to that I suggest that there ought to be a limitation as to the number of copies, say not less than 200 should be printed. I think there is a difficulty with regard to the list that is to be posted up by the revising officer. The clause says that it shall be posted up in the office of the clerk or other corresponding officer of each municipal or parochial division in the electoral district. Now, in New Brunswick we have no officers cor-where is the list to be posted up. It is provided by the 15th section that where you object to a person's name you have got a right to write opposite to the copy posted up in the office, the words "objected to"; that in addition, you have not merely to give notice, but you have to sustain your objection by inserting opposite the party's name, the word "objected," on the list, which is in the office of the clerk. Now, this is a very important matter. In our own Province we have no individual who occupies such an office as is here contemplated; there is no public office within the parish where such a list could be posted up. Then again, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) has pointed out that the parish clerk or revising officer is not bound to maintain that list, or be under obligation to let parties go there to make objection. It seems to me that there ought to be some such mode as we have at present in New Brunswick, that the list should be posted in three public places in the parish where persons could have an opportunity of seeing the names that are on it. Under this Bill, the list is to remain in the office of an individual who is not amenable to the people. He is subject to no penalty if he neglects his duty. Then, with regard to copies, we ought to have a provision that a sufficient number shall be printed. It is all important that full information should be given, and that it should be furnished to the different parties by the most suitable officers. The First Minister suggests that the clerk of the muncipality or town should be the officer. We, in New Brunswick, have corresponding officers in the parish clerks. The great difficulty is, that those persons are merely nominal officers and take no interest in such matters. I would suggest, that in our Province, the commissioner of civil courts, who exercises jurisdiction over civil cases within the parish, should act. He would be more accessible to the public, and there would be greater facility for obtaining information from him than from parish clerks. The number of copies proposed is entirely too small. The sheriff of a large district is only to receive two copies. In some parishes there are more than three polling districts. There should be at least a sufficient number for each polling district. With respect to the notice: there is no provision made to prevent the notice being pulled down half an hour after it has been posted up. This might be done by either accident or design, and names that should have been struck off might thereby be retained. The officer appointed should be responsible for seeing that the notice is kept posted during the proper time. Copies of the primary list should be distributed to parties applying. The expense will be comparatively small compared with other expenses, and the proposed arrangement, about 6 cents, is really a tax upon the electors and the parties interested.

Mr. MILLS. It is important to consider what the list is that it is proposed to print and publish in the manner described in this section as amended. It is stated in the Bill that this will be found in a schedule. I turn to a schedule and find a form given, which provides for ascertaining the nature of the qualification, the municipality or place where the qualification is situated, and so on. All this is given on page 29 in the schedule attached to this Act. If this voters' list is printed according to the schedule, why does not the First Minister provide that the list shall be divided, instead of being allowed to remain in municipalities, which in Ontario may mean a city, town or village. How is the party who wishes to inspect the list, who is desirous of seeing whether the parties entitled to vote have their names on the list or not, in the case of a large electoral district like Ottawa or Toronto, if the whole district is included in one list? Surely, if the revising officer is required to put down the property on which each party resides, he can put them in the particular local municipality in which they reside, in which case there would be no difficulty or inconvenience. The greater Mr. Weldon.

number of names comprehended in the list, the more difficulty there will be in determining whether the list is complete or not; but if the list were segregated into proper divisions, there would be no difficulty in determining whether the names of parties with whom you are acquainted in particular localities, and whose names ought to be put on the voters' list, were really on the list or not. It seems to me it should be provided that the voters' list should be put up for each separate town, township or village in the different municipalities, and in the case of cities, in each electoral subdivision, in order that there may be no difficulty in inspecting it. The list is for the purpose of enabling the various parties to see whether it is complete or not, and if there are defects to correct them with facility, and anything which makes that process easy, it is desirable to adopt. I trust the hon. gentleman will see his way to an amendment in this direction, in order that we may not defeat the whole object of the publication, by embracing the whole municipality on one list, when it may include three or four electoral divisions, as in the case of the city of Toronto, where, unless such a change is made, it will be necessary to go through several thousand names for the purpose of seeing whose names have been improperly put on or left off. I say it is not a desirable thing, and certainly, while the hon. gentleman may protract the discussion upon the Bill, he can gain nothing by keeping it imperfect in that particular.

Mr. VAIL. It seems to me that the provision is not at all suited to the Province of Nova Scotia. In several of the counties of Nova Scotia we have not more than two municipalities, and if the list is only to be posted in the office of the clerk of the peace, those in the more remote polling districts would have to come at least fifty miles to inspect it, in order to see whether their names are on the list, and to attend at the proper time to have them put on if they are omitted. In Digby, we have two municipalities, and the shire town is in one end of the county, and one polling district is at least fifty miles away. The difficulty would be met very easily by the revising officer being obliged to post up the list in each polling district the same as is done with regard to Prince Edward Island. Take, for instance, the county of Halifax, which, outsile of the city, is one municipality. The clerk of the municipality resides in Halifax, and if I am not mistaken, it is from seventy-five to ninety miles from Halifax to the county line. Surely it could hardly be expected that men would go that distance to find out whether names have been improperly put on or

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Move.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend from Digby is very much mistaken with regard to the publication of the lists provided for by the Bill. It is much more extensive than the publication of the preliminary list as provided by the law of Nova Scotia. By the 13th section of this Act, copies of the list are to be sent, not only to the clerk of the municipality, but to the sheriff, the warden, the mayor, the clerk of the peace and other officers, and section 14 provides that two copies shall be sent to each postmaster in the municipality. By the provisions of these two sections the publication would be much more extensive than that provided by the law of Nova Scotia. In the electoral district in which I reside there would be no less than fourteen copies posted up, while the law of Nova Scotia only provides for three. The great objection urged against this Bill up to this time has been its expensiveness; but I observe that my hon, friends opposite are determined to make it as expensive as possible. The publication of the preliminary lists is certainly as extensive as any reasonable person should desire, but they are insisting on having such a publication as would make it very expensive to the Dominion, and they complain with very little reason that they themselves will be put to a great deal of expense. In the Province of Nova Scotia there is no provision made for lists being provided to either the representatives in Parliament or their opponents. At any time he requires a list for the purpose of having it properly revised by the revising officer, I have never heard of any gentleman complain that he had to pay the usual compensation for having the list made up for him. I do hope my hon. friends opposite will be satisfied with the publicity given by this Bill. At any rate, I think every representative from Nova Scotia should be satisfied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would say to the hon gentleman who has just spoken, that the position he describes is totally different from the existing state of things in the Province of Ontario. Our only security against the very extraordinary and extravagant powers which are given to certain Government nominees under this Bill is that full publicity should be obtained. I believe the county judges will act with reasonable fairness and justice; but in the revising barristers I have no confidence whatever; I look upon them as being likely to act in the most partisan manner; I have not the faintest belief that they will be anything but the most unscrupulous partisans; and we are bound to insure the only possible check that can be put upon them, that is, that the utmost publicity is given to the lists. In Ontario-I do not know what is the case in the other Provinces—whenever the lists are completed, not only are 10 copies sent to members of Parliament, but every candidate at any election to the House of Commons receives 10 copies also, and each township and each sub-division is clearly defined; so that every opportunity is given for the detection of any omission or of any person being improperly put on. The publicity would give us at least one facility for detecting the improper addition or omission of names. In addition to the suggestion made by the hon, member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) that the revising officer should be compelled to print at least 200 copies, I think we should do very well to imitate the example of the Ontario law, and insist that a larger number of copies than two-ten is little enough-should be sent to all the candidates as well as to members of Parliament, and besides that the list should be divided into sub-divisions. There is very great force in the objection made by my hon, friend behind me that the rate of hix cents for ten names is outrageous. The English rate, as pointed out, is a great deal less, and the very highest rate I think that ought to be allowed to be charged, if any is charged, would be ten cents per 100 names.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will accept the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon).

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Weldon) agreed to. Amendment (Mr. Cameron (Middlesex) agreed to.

Mr. INNES. As the hon. First Minister has accepted the amendment of the hon. member for West Middlesex, as well as that of the hon. member for St. John, perhaps he will accept the one I propose to move with reference to the distribution of the voters' lists. The clause provides that, in addition to the sheriff and warden, the mayor, the clerk of the peace, and other municipal officers, two copies should be furnished to each member of the House of Commons. As several hon, gentlemen have pointed out, that number is practically useless. I propose to recommend that ten copies at least should be furnished not only to each member of the House of Commons but to each member of the Local Legislature and to each candidate for whom votes were east at the last election, The hon. member for West advance the interests of a party, nevertheless the Huron (Mr. Cameron) has pointed out how expensive it Bill is one that affects the interests of the people. were cast at the last election, The hon. member for West would be to pay for copies. Even the number that I have but still it would mitigate the evil. I would also propose that, for the purpose of a wider distribution, copies of the list should be placed in the schools of every school section. This is also a clause that is in force in the Ontario Act and which has answered the purpose admirably. We know that there is a school in every school section, and that no voter is far from these schools, so that he will have every opportunity of examining the lists if he chooses, with very little inconvenience and loss of time. I would therefore move:

That the words "registered letters" be added after the word "mailing," line 47, page 10; and that the following words be added after the word "district" in line 49, page 10: And the member or members of the Provincial Legislature for the said electoral district or any part thereof, and to every candidate to whom votes were given at the last election of members for the House of Commons for said electoral district and at the last elections of members of the Provincial Legislature of said electoral district or any part thereof, and to the reeve or other chief officer of such municipality, 10 copies each; and that the following words be added after the word "district," in line 55 page 10: And to every justice of the peace in the electoral district, and the head master or masters of every public and separate school in said electoral district, and to the aldermen and councillors of each municipality.

This will tend to the wider distribution of the lists, and be a great convenience, not only to members of both sides, but also to electors generally.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HICKEY. I think that the amendment I have in my hand will add to the distribution already provided for in the Bill and make it sufficiently extensive. I propose that clause 13 be amended by adding the words "aldermen or councillors" after the word "mayor," in the 48th line, and the word "councillors" after the word "reeve" in the 52nd line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I accept that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood the First Minister to have made an amendment that not less than 200 copies should be printed. Of course if they are printed, they may as well be distributed, and I was wondering whether the hon, gentleman had gone into his calculation as to whether the distribution he had provided for would consume these 200.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Copies of the list may be procured by any person on application to the revising officer, so that he must keep a certain number on hand. This is of course only a preliminary list, and has no analogy to the voters' list distributed in Ontario, which are the revised

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the copies to be obtained from the revising barrister be charged for at the rate of 6 cents per ten names, the rate fixed in the 16th section.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The section says: "If printed, they will be furnished at the cost of printing. There will be 200 printed at least, but I left the clause in to meet the very improbable contingency of the 200 running out, in which case of course the applicants will have to pay for the additional copies at that rate.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman provides the same number of copies for an entire riding that the Ontario Act provides for a single township. As the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) remarked it is of the utmost importance that publicity should be given to these voters lists. Though this Bill seems to be treated in the House as a measure which primarily should We should give the utmost publicity to the lists and everyproposed we should receive, ten copies each, is too small, thing pertaining to their preparation. It has been provided that these lists shall be printed. That involves the cost of composition, no matter how many are printed. The cost of the composition is assumed by the Government, and the multiplication of the lists afterwards is a very small matter, simply involving the press work and the cost of the paper. It is just as well to print 1,000 or 2,000 copies as to print 200. In my riding there are six municipalities, and 1,200 copies are printed under the Ontario Act—200 for each municipality. The hon, gentleman provides for printing not less than 200 copies. The cost of multiplying them would not be more than 25 cents per copy. Under the English Act, 6 and 7 Victoria, chapter 18, copies of the alphabetical list were to be delivered to anyone who applied on payment of a certain fee, which at that time, 1843, was 1s. for 1,000 names, 2s. 6d. up to 3,000, 5s. up to 6,000, 7s. 6d. up to 9,000, and 10s. above that number. By 41 and 42 Victoria, chapter 26, more efficient provision was made in regard to the posting of these lists. They were to be posted and kept posted in some conspicuous position in the post offices and telegraph offices, as well as in the municipal or parochial offices. This Bill does not provide that these notices shall be kept posted, but only that they shall be posted. The Voters' List Act of Ontario is much more liberal than this Bill. It provides that at least 200 copies shall be printed, one of which shall be kept posted, and two copies of which shall be sent to every municipal councillor, the treasurer of the municipality, the sheriff, clerk of the peace, every postmaster, and every master or mistress of a separate school, and ten of which shall be sent to the member for the constituency and every candidate at the last election, and the reeve; and provision is made that each of these persons shall keep these lists posted. Thus the utmost pains are taken to secure publicity, but this Act is deficient in this respect. If we are to incur the expense of having separate voters' lists for Dominion elections, and the expense of revising barristers, bailiffs, clerks and constables, we should at least be liberal in the matter of furnishing the public with the means of ascertaining whose names are upon the the voters' lists. We should not save at the spigot and waste at the bunghole. The voters' list should be published for each separate municipality, for the confusion which this Bill will create in any case will be added to if these lists embrace the whole of an electoral division. We should afford the utmost facilities for the examination of these lists, and I believe we ought to publish at least as many as are provided for under the Ontario law. This is a matter of such importance that I ask the First Minister to give it his candid consideration. The Bill is objectionable in itself, but, if we are to have such a measure, let us make it as little objectionable in its details as possible.

Mr. TROW. I think the First Minister should be a little more liberal in the printing and distribution of these lists, According to the amendment of the hon, member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) each municipal councillor shall receive two copies, that will be at least ten for each municipality; two for the clerk of the Crown; supposing there are only two candidates, that will be 28. On an average there are seven municipalities in each riding, which would require seven times that number or over 200, to say nothing of the sheriffs or other officials, or of a distribution to other parties who may require to use them. I think the First Minister should increase the number by 50 or 100. The expense of printing this additional number would be very trifling indeed.

Mr. MILLS. I am sure that 200 lists will not be sufficient to supply many of the electoral divisions. gentleman will see that at least 200 lists will be required for the villages, towns and townships, and this will mean 140 or 150 lists for each electoral division. These lists, Mr. CHARLTON.

the municipality, will have to circulate over the entire municipality, whereas those for the township, apart from the candidates, would only apply to the officers residing within the limits of the township.

Amendment (Mr. Hickey) agreed to.

Mr. VAIL. I desire to propose an amendment that the list shall be posted in as many places as possible, and in places where the voters will be sure to have an opportunity of examining them. I move in amendment to the amend.

That after the word "parochial," in the 46th line, the words: In one or more of what the revising officer considers the most public place or places of each township, parish or polling district, or other known territorial division of such electoral district.

This is the same as is proposed for Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES. The effect of the amendment will be to make about the same number of publications in districts where there are municipal divisions, as is provided for in districts where there are no municipal divisions. It puts them both on a par.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose an amendment as I have no right to do it myself, I will suppose that my hon, friend makes it—that the 45th line shall read: "corresponding officer of each municipal, parochial or other known division.

Mr. DAVIES. The difficulty is that there are no officials of these sub-divisions. There is no division of the county smaller than a municipality, which has an officer corresponding to the clerk.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are to be two copies sent to each postmaster.

Mr. DAVIES. When the hon, gentleman provides for those counties where there are no municipal divisions, he makes the identical provision that the hon, member for Digby (Mr. Vail) suggests with reference to counties where there are municipal divisions.

Mr. VAIL. We have only two townships in the county of Digby; therefore the only territorial lines would be the township lines. The hon, gentleman will see at once that it is necessary to be more definite. It is quite true that the 14th clause meets the case to a certain extent, where the revising officer is to send these lists to the postmaster, but they may be torn down the next day, and there is no provision for keeping them up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will read in the 14th clause:

"Two copies of the said list, certified as aforesaid, shall be mailed to each of the postmasters in the electoral district, who shall forthwith, after receiving them, post up one of them in a conspicuous place in his post office, where the said list shall remain."

I think that will meet the case.

Amendment (Mr. Vail) negatived.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The amendment I have to propose is for the purpose of facilitating access on the part of candidates and others interested to the voters' lists at a reasonable rate. I draw the attention of the House to the position in which interested parties will be placed under the provisions now before us. The clause immediately preceding this provides that the revising officer shall make up the voters' list alphabetically for each municipality. effect of this is that the first list, under which the first redivision will be made, will be for the whole municipality. In practice no doubt the first list will be the one most closely scrutinised by those interested in seeing that proper parties are on it. The effect of having those large lists for each municipality, will be that each one desiring to become acquainted with the votes in a particular sub division will although they may embrace the whole of the electors within | be obliged to obtain a copy of the voters' list for the whole municipality. That will cause an unneccessary addition to the number of names required to be printed; and if the names were printed by sub-divisions the voters' lists would go four or five times as far as they will under the present arrangement. I hope the First Minister will reconsider this point. The post office distribution will not cover so wide a field as the First Minister anticipates. In some townships and municipalities, from local circumstances, two-thirds of the post offices are outside the boundaries and in adjoining townships. Municipal boundaries do not in any way regulate post office matters, and although the lists are posted up in the various post offices, still there will be a large number of persons who will not see them. Every facility should be provided for enabling the public to see those lists, as many of those who are most desirable to have on the list will have least opportunity of seeing and inspecting the names. With respect to the price of the list: I really think that although it is fair that the revising officer, or the public treasury, should be protected against loss in supplying the lists, it is hardly sufficient protection to the parties requiring copies of them, to enable him to charge at this rate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is only if it is

Mr. BAIN. Still he is left free to charge for them at whatever rates may be involved in the question of printing. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be the cost price

Mr. BAIN. As a matter of fact, the cost of the lists will fall upon the candidates, and I understood the hon. member for East Grey to say last night that the lists for the Legislative Assembly were now procurable at all times in his riding by the payment of not more than 20 cents per copy. In England they cost 1s. per 1,000 names, which is a still lower rate. In my own riding, which may be conwhich sidered as an average one, there are 3,500 names on the list, and one whole copy under the provisions of this Bill will cost $21, while in England it would be less than $1, being but 3s. 6d. I would propose that these printed lists should not cost more than 10 cents per 100 names, which would be about $3.50 for a complete list for a riding, a price of which no one could complain. We know as a matter of fact that when the type is set up and 200 copies are struck off, the mere printing of 100 extra copies would involve but a small extra cost, and I think it is in the public interest that they should be furnished at as reasonable a cost as possible.

Amendment (Mr. Bain) negatived.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I notice that, while postmasters are required to post the lists they receive in a public and conspicuous place, no such provision applies to clerks. I think that they should be required also to post them in a place where the public could have access to them. I think also that the First Minister should adopt the English system by providing that in case the list is torn down, accidentally or otherwise, the official should be compelled to replace it and keep it up the prescribed time.

Mr. SPROULE. It does say that the clerk shall keep it posted up.

Mr. CAMERON. It does not say in a public or a conspicuous place,

Mr. DAVIES. There is no official place mentioned where the list would be accessible to the ordinary voter, and where it would be protected from being destroyed or torn down. The law, I think, would be complied with even if it were posted outside of a building or on a fence. I would therefore move that after the word "district," in the 14th line, the following words be inserted: "The office of each clerk and assistant clerk of the county court in each district." 286 where there are municipalities; but there are seven of these clerks of circuits in each electoral district, and their offices are open to the public for certain hours, and documents are accustomed to be posted there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it is clear enough as it is. The revising officer will attend to that.

Mr. DAVIES. Still it is entirely in his discretion, and I cannot see what possible objection there can be to requiring him to do it. The hon gentleman has accepted other reasonable amendments, and I think he will not deny that this is a reasonable one. He does not know these localities to which I refer as well as I do, and I should think that he would be willing to accept practical suggestions from those who do know the circumstances of the locality. I do not think there would be anything wrong in requiring the revising officer to publish them in this place. It is what was done under the local law.

Amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to enquire what the hon. First Minister means by "a price proportionately sufficient to cover the price paid for printing the same. It appears to me that this would impose an unnecessary expense on the candidate. No one would object that a reasonable sum to defray the cost of printing and paper should be charged, but the word "proportionately" hardly means that. It means that if an additional number of copies were obtained, the cost would be divided over the whole number of copies charged for, while the hon gentleman knows that the cost of printing the first hundred is a great deal more than the cost of the second or third hundred. This is particularly important, because the rate of 6 cents for 10 names, if the list is not printed, is very high. We shall probably have an average list under this Bill of 4,000 or 5,000 names, which at that rate would cost $24 or $30. Six cents for 10 names is a very extravagant rate, judging by the average price paid for the direction of printed matter here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Six cents for 10 names are only charged when the list is in manuscript; but there is no chance of its being in manuscript if there are a sufficient number printed. The hon, gentleman knows that the list is not a mere list of names; it contains also a description of the property and the vote; there are half a dozen columns to be filled up. As regards the printing, this phase means that anybody can get the list at cost price.

Mr. MILLS. "A price proportionately sufficient to cover the price paid for printing" may be a very variable sum; it may be five times as much in one locality as in another. That is not the rule adopted in the English law; there a fixed sum is provided, and the party knows what he must pay. If the charge made for printing the voters' list were like the charges made for some other Government printing which has come under the notice of the Public Accounts Committee, it might be ten times what it is worth. The hon, gentleman may pooh-pooh the statement, but we have had information on subjects similar to this. It is of some consequence that there should be a fixed sum charged, so that every candidate and every citizen in any part of the country could obtain a copy of the voters' list on precisely the same terms. Under the clause, the matter is left to some local printer to whom the revising officer may have given the contract at very unreasonable rates. That is not a fair condition of things; all the people of the country should in this respect stand upon a footing of exact equality. There should be no more paid at Vancouver than at Toronto. Under existing facilities it would be possible for the Govwe have no officers corresponding with those in Provinces stereotype plates; that could be done here for the whole Dominion, and there would be no trouble in printing additional copies when they were required. A price proportionately sufficient to cover the price paid for printing is altogether too indefinite an expression. There should be a fixed sum.

Mr. DAVIES. The remark of the hon. First Minister that the list contained a description of the title as well as the name might be a good answer for raising the fixed price per hundred names suggested by the hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), but it was no answer to the proposition that a fixed price of some kind should be established. lished. I do not suppose that in the central districts there would be a great deal of inconvenience felt from the wording of this section, because printing is so cheap and competition so great that a revising officer can hardly go astray if he goes to any of the leading printing establishments; but the hon. First Minister will know, if he consults his supporters from outlying districts, that the prices they are compelled to pay for printing of this kind is often something enormous, and unless there is some restriction imposed, the wording of the clause as it stands will place candidates in outlying districts in a very unfair position. I would suggest that after the word "same" in the eighth line on page 11, the words should be added, "but not in any case to exceed 12 cents per hundred names." It is of no use to pass by this section cavalierly, because the expense is going to be very serious. If 12 cents is not enough, make it 14 or 15 cents, or whatever is enough; but it should not be left for a printer to charge what he likes. gentlemen opposite must see that the list is their list as well as ours; it is not a party matter; there should be some fixed sum.

Mr. CHARLTON. The charge made in this Bill for a copy of a portion of the list, I would point out to the First Minister, is just five times greater than the cost in England. The charge is at the rate of 1s. sterling for 200 names or 6d. sterling for 100 names, just five times less than the charge proposed in this Bill of 6 cents for 10 names. This is an extravagant and outrageous charge. With regard to the printed lists, the principal cost is the cost of composition; after that the cost of obtaining copies is a mere trifle. We can obtain printed copies of speeches in this House, from 25 to 36 pages, at 1 cent a copy. This Bill provides for the distribution of from 150 to 175 copies in an entire riding, while the Ontario Act provides 200 copies for each township or about 1,200 copies for the riding. I urge upon the consideration of the Minister that the cost of increasing the number of copies of the voters' list after composition is so small as to render it almost not worth discussion whether there be 200 or 2,000 for each municipality. The cost will not exceed 2 or 3 cents at the outside. It is of the highest degree of importance that the greatest publicity should be given to these lists, and a reserve supply should be provided sufficient to furnish every man who desires a list with one at a small charge, say 10 cents a copy, which would more than compensate for the cost of printing.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island labored under a mistake when he said no party consideration was involved in this matter. The reasons for objecting to any amendment to this clause, as regards distribution and the cost of furnishing copies, are distinctly party reasons. There is not a constituency in the Dominion where there are not two or three little organs of the Government, some slightly prosperous and others near the brink of starvation, and the Government think it desirable to allow the revising officer to give the printing to whom he chooses, at what price he chooses. Of course, under these circumstances, the right hon. gentleman cannot be expected to change this provision even though public opinion demands a change.

Mr. Mille.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose it will not be disputed that what is desired is publicity in this matter, so that everybody may have an opportunity of seeing the list before the final revision. The Government have refused to adopt the Ontario system of a free distribution of a sufficient number of those lists among a large number of persons. In England the system is adopted of distributing copies to be posted up at the doors of churches and chapels and other public places for distribution, and of furnishing copies to those who desire them at an extremely cheap rate. There are in England them at an extremely cheap rate. There are in England two classes of lists quite distinct. The one is the general register of names which is changed every year, and the other is a smaller list, what they call the list of claimants, which is made up before the revision by the overseer of the parish for the revising barrister. That list is printed. These are made out by the overseers, showing the names of all who claim to be added to the register, and all names on the register which are objected to, and those which the overseer himself thinks ought to be objected to, or added, or marked dead. These smaller lists are furnished for a price of 6d. for a hundred names. The register itself, which is more analogous to these lists which we are considering, is furnished at a mere nominal price-1s. for 1,000 names, 2s. 6d. up to 3,000, 5s. up to 6,000, 7s. 6d. up to 9,000 and 10s. for 9,000 and upwards. Under the provisions of this Bill, there is a great uncertainty as to the price to be charged, because the revising barrister will not know how much to charge the first applicant, as all the other copies may be left on his hands and he is to charge sufficient to cover the cost. There should be some provision for a specific sum per copy or per hundred copies.

Amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to move in amendment that, after the word "same" in the 8th line, the following be added:

But not to exceed 50 cents for each copy of any voters' list for any electoral district.

That will be more than the ordinary cost of a voters' list. My hon, friend beside me (Mr. Weldon) has a list containing 5,000 names for his own constituency which only cost 25 cents a copy. This would be a maximum price which would certainly exceed the cost of printing the list in any ordinary constituency. If the hon, gentleman desires to give some protection against improper conduct or jobbery on the part of the returning officer in connection with a local printer, these words should be added.

Mr. WELDON. In reference to the amendment of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), it is very important that a price should be fixed, because, as the Bill stands at present, the revising officer can charge what he pleases, and I do not know if it is intended that the charge should cover the cost of the copies which he is bound to deliver to different parties. Our lists in New Brunswick are printed in broad sheets, and we have to get them in pamphlet form at our own expense. I have a pamphlet here, containing nearly 6,000 names, which costs only 25 cents a copy. It contains 68 pages, and the price is $25 per 100. The candidates arrange among themselves how many copies they shall have printed, and we get them at a very low figure. These lists could be printed also at a very low figure, and it should not be left to the revising officer to decide on the price. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) will know that after the first hundred is printed the rest of the price is merely nominal—not much more than the expense of the paper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will accept the proposition; we will make it "not to exceed fifty cents per copy."

Mr. VAIL. I think we ought to define that to mean for each electoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is only one list to be prepared. There can be no doubt.

Mr. DAVIES. There will be a doubt raised, because, where you have to make up an alphabetical list for each township, it will be argued that this means fifty cents for each township.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, put it for each electoral district.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not know whether it would be desirable to give instructions to the revising officer in the sense of an amendment I have prepared, namely, to add to the end of the clause that "the said printed list should have sufficient margin opposite each name thereon to permit a person objecting to any name thereon to fulfil the requirement mentioned in the last two lines of section 15." A person has to write "objected to," and his name, address and occupation, opposite the name of the party to whom he objects, and that will take considerable margin. If the revising officer, in having the list printed, should not leave sufficient margin to enable a person to fulfil the requirements of section 15, objection might be taken to it.

Mr. SPROULE. You are cutting your amendments down to a fine thing now.

Mr. PATERSON. The requirement is absolute in section 15 that the person is to write opposite to the name of the party objected to, besides the words "objected to," his own name, address and occupation. On some of the electoral lists that I have seen it would be impossible to write these words.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have got seven electoral lists, one for every one of my townships, and in not one of them is there place sufficient for these words to be inserted opposite that of the party objected to. As this marginal note is to form the basis of an appeal, it is very important that there should be sufficient margin to write the words as required in section 15.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I presume in printing those lists that ordinary common sense will govern the action of the revising officer. The first list is the preliminary list. It is, in fact, of the character of the original assessment roll before it goes through the Court of Revision, and in that case the proper course for the revising officer would be to print those lists, to be used afterwards, in galley form, the effect of which would be to save largely the cost of making up, folding and stitching, which is, perhaps, the heaviest part of the cost of printing an ordinary pamphlet.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon, gentleman does not see my point. It is provided as one of the requirements that the name and address shall be written opposite each name that is objected to; and if owing to the lack of margin there is not sufficient room to thus enter the words this objection would be held to invalidate the claim.

Mr. CASEY. There is no provision for sending copies to parties entitled to receive them, beyond first copies. The remedy, however, I think is to be found in amending section 15. In Ontario the judge makes the corrections on one of the rough lists, as does the revising barrister in England.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If hon. members will read section 15 they will find it contains no reference to printed voters' lists. (The hon. gentleman read the section.)

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The bon. gentleman who has just spoken is in error. If any person objects to the name of another person on the published list he must write his objection and sign his name, address and occupation as the person objecting opposite the name objected to, so that the party shall not be taken unaware.

Mr. HESSON. I have several copies of voters' lists here, and there is not a page on which I could not write everything required by this Bill.

Mr. WELDON. The hon gentleman must bear in mind that this is a statutory power, and in such a case the orders must be strictly followed. I think it would be better that this amendment should be held over until we discuss the 15th section, as its construction will largely depend on that section. It is provided that not only the name shall be written in the margin, but the occupation, address, and so on, which will require a considerable space, and besides, it will have to be put directly off or else questions may arise on the appeal. We should remember that when statutory conditions of this kind are not complied with, the appeal falls to the ground as the courts would have no discretion.

Mr. McCALLUM. It seems to me that there is a good deal of hair splitting in such a discussion. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if the revising barrister or judge made a mistake of this kind, he is going to take advantage of his own neglect?

Mr. WELDON. It is not the revising barrister; it is the person objecting.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is absurd to say that the revising barrister will not leave room, or that he will take any technical advantage of that kind, to prevent people exercising the privilege which the law confers. It may be a nice question of hair splitting for lawyers, but I am satisfied that nothing of the kind will occur. No man who is fit to act as revising barrister would be guilty of such neglect.

Mr. LISTER. There is no hair splitting about the question, for the wording of the statute is imperative, and if it were not complied with, the appeal would be rejected and necessarily.

Mr. McCALLUM. Who makes the voters' list in the first place.

Mr. LISTER. The revising officer, of course.

Mr. McCALLUM. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. Is it not wise and prudent to provide by the statute that there shall be sufficient margin rather than to run any risks by leaving it to anybody's discretion? The hon, member for Cardwell conceded that a margin was necessary, and if so, why not place the matter beyond controversy, so that the provisions of the Act may be fully carried out. If a sufficient margin is not provided, the person appealing would have to paste a piece of paper to the list upon which to write his name and the other particulars. I think such a provision is exceedingly important, because the revising barrister may not have that great fund of common sense which is possessed by the hon, member for Cardwell and the hon. great fund of common sense member for Monck, and they may overlook the matter and thereby prevent the right of appeal from being exercised. This preliminary list is very important, as it is a complete record of the appeals, and upon it everything should be found that is necessary to entitle a person to appeal. If this provision is made it will be part of the duty of the revising officer to see that the printer carries out the Act by leaving a proper margin. The hon member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) certainly has not given this matter consideration, or he would not have ventured the statement he made to the House to-day. It is physically impossible for the hon. gentleman or anyone else to write what is required by this statute in the margin of the voters' list. There may be half a dozen appeals against half a dozen consecutive names, and each appeal must be opposite the name; so that the margin must be sufficiently wide to enable the person appealing to state the ground of his appeal directly opposite the name of the person appealed against. All that is required is that the paper on which the list posted up is printed should have a wider margin than the other lists. The proposition is so reasonable that I cannot understand why the hon. First Minister resists it. If we are to have a Bill of this kind, it should be made as workable as bossible, so as to afford as many facilities to the local authorities and to persons who take part in elections, and to throw as few difficulties in their way, as possible. Now, I desire to call the attention of the hon. First Minister to the provision which is made for the posting up of the list in the office of the clerk or corresponding officer in each municipality or parochial division; but no provision is made for the event of that list being carried away or destroyed before the revision takes place. If that occurred, how would it be possible for a person desiring to appeal to enter his appeal. The Bill should provide that as soon as that list is destroyed and removed, so that the elector cannot have access to it, it should be the duty of the officer to immediately post up another. The hon gentleman may say that that is something not likely to happen, but they did not think so while passing the English law, because we find that it makes provision for such cases. That such a provision ought to be contained in our Act is evident from the fact that the English Legislature found it necessary to make it part of the law there; and a penalty not exceeding 40s. nor less than 10s. was provided, to be imposed on any person who destroyed, mutilated, effaced or removed the list. I hope the House will see its way to adopt these provisions, which are so essential to the proper revision of the lists.

Mr. McCALLUM. When hon, gentlemen opposite speak of the revising barristers, or the officers to be appointed to administer this law, if they do not say in direct language, they insinuate that they will be dishonest. I would ask the hon, gentleman, if he were a revising barrister under this Act, and had the ordering of the printing of these voters' lists, and if he failed, either from neglect or on purpose, to leave margin enough, does he mean to say that he would take advantage of his own fault to defeat the law? I do not believe he would; but he gets up and insinuates that the judges of the land would do that. Whether you provide for a margin or not, I am satisfied that the men who have to prepare these lists will see that there is sufficient margin left, so that men can appeal and the law can be carried out in every particular. I hope the hon gentleman will offer something more tangible than this, because I am sure the revising officer, whoever he may be, will make provision so that he will not take advantage of his neglect or fraud.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. gentleman knows that the power given here is a statutory power, and consequently every condition of it must be strictly adhered to. The hon, gentleman says the revising officer will be careful to have a sufficient margin on the printed voters' list to enable him to insert the words "objected to," with the objector's name and address. He may do so, but he is not bound to do so.

Mr. McCALLUM. He is bound to administer the law.

Mr. CAMERON. The law should compel the revising officer to do what he ought to do. It should compel him to leave a certain margin. The hon, gentleman says if he does not do so, he cannot take advantage of his wrong doing. But the question is not one between the claimant and the revising officer, but between the complainant and the public at large. All the court of appeal will enquire into is whether every term and condition required by the law to entitle a party to appeal has been complied with, and if it has not, whether through the fault of the revising officer or not, the appeal will not be allowed. effect of this clause, as it stands, is simply to puzzle, to har "Rogers, on Elections," lays down this point very rass and make it most difficult for electors, or complainants, Mr. Lister.

clearly. So strict is the law, that if a single condition has not been complied with, whether intentionally or not, the appeal absolutely falls to the ground. Even should the respondent not appear at all, the appelant must satisfy the court that he has complied in every respect with the provisions of the law. What has the revising officer to decide? He has to decide whether or not the man whose name is on the list is entitled to be there, or whether one who has been omitted should be put on; and he is bound to see. before he is seized with the appeal, that every condition of the law is complied with.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is the revising barrister who puts the name there in the first place, and he must provide a margin so that a man may object according to law. If he did not he would not be honest. The hon, gentleman is suggesting that the revising barrister will not be honest.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am afraid it is impossible to teach the hon, gentleman law. When I have finished with it I will send him over "Rogers Election Law." I was going on to observe, when for the fifth time interrupted, that it is not a question between the complainant and the revising officer, but between the complainant and the public at large. There is this further difficulty that the appellant is compelled to write the words "objected to" opposite the name of the person who is objected to on the voters' list, as well as the name, address and occupation of the appellant.

After Recess.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). On another clause, I endeavored without effect to induce the hon, gentleman to adopt the provisions of the English law in reference to the posting up of another voters' list in case of the mutilation or destruction of the one originally put up. Now, supposing that, when the complainant comes to the clerk's office, where he is compelled to mark his objection in the margin of the voters' list, he finds there is no voters' list, he will be unable to comply with the law. This clause will compel him to do something which it is impossible for him to do. In the schedule the words are as follows:-

"Such person so objecting shall also, at the time of giving such notice, write opposite to the name of such person so objected to in the copy of said list posted up in a public office nearest to the residence of the person objected to, in the electoral district, the words 'objected to' and sign his own name."

In the enacting clause of the statute the appellant is bound to write the words "objected to" opposite the name of the person to whom he objects, on the list posted in the clerk's office. Now which is the appellant to comply with? Is he to comply with the clause of the statute that compels him to write the words "objected to" on the voters' list in the clerk's office, or is he to comply with the notice given by the revising officer that he is to write those words on the voter's list nearest to the place of residence of the person complained against. It is clear there is room here for doubt and difficulty. Electors are not all lawyers, and it will not be easy for them to understand something that even a lawyer cannot understand. The section ought to be amended or the schedule ought to be amended. Now, the law further on says that the complainant or appellant shall write his name, that is, his own name, opposite the name objected to on the list. He cannot comply with the law unless he writes his own name. Supposing a person cannot write at all, then it is clear he cannot comply with the law. That is clearly laid down at page 158, "Rogers on Elections" (the hon. gentleman read therefrom).

or objectors to comply with the strict letter of the law, opposite who will be left off the primary list; and it is the What is the object of putting that clause in the law at all? It is not in the English law. There is no necessity for it. In England it is not so—at least, so far as I can gather from "Rogers on Elections." All that is required is that notice shall be given to the overseer of the parish, where it is a county election, and the town clerk, where it is a borough election and to the revising officer. The objector in that case must serve the notice upon the clerk and upon the revising officer. So far as I have been able to ascertain, in England it is not necessary that any such words as are required by the law here should be written opposite the name of the person objected to. If it is not necessary in England why should it be necessary in Canada? I say the words ought to be struck out altogether, and then my hon. friend's amendment would not be required.

Mr. MILLS. If we knew the Minister's intention with respect to section 15 it would be easier to deal with this particular amendment. If the latter part were dispensed with, this amendment would be dispensed with at the same time, and some other means adopted of giving notice of the intention to question the right of the party to have his name on the voters' list If hon. members will look at the latter part of section 15, it does not appear that objection could be taken on every voters' list, but only on those posted up in the office of the clerk of the township or parish. whole plan of taking objection, as proposed, is not a good one. A better plan would be to allow that, when a name was questioned, a written notice should be sent to the clerk of the municipality, and it might be his duty to mark opposite the name on the voters' list that the name was questioned. There are many ways in which provision might be made that would obviate the necessity of this amendment, and would render the power of appeal easier and much less open to question than by the provision in this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought the hon. gentleman moved the amendment rather in jest than in earnest, and therefore I said nothing about it. If we had been allowed to go on to section 15 it was my intention to strike

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The First Minister has given an answer to himself as to whether this is a proper motion, for he states that he proposes to strike out the last lines of section 15, which does away with the necessity of my amendment. But the fact of that clause remaining in the Bill, and that no intimation had been given as to changing it, is ample justification of my having moved that amendment. The discussion has led the hon, gentleman to say that the words in the last few lines of section 15 should be removed. If I had not proposed this motion it would have been taken for granted that the words were required and the question would not have been raised. The question was a very pertinent one. The statement of the First Minister now proves it. I at first thought it would only be necessary to call the attention of the First Minister to the point; and it was only when he did not seem inclined to listen to the suggestion that I proposed the amendment. I did so without confering with anyone. I used my own common sense, and looked forward to some of the clauses ahead. I moved the amendment at this particular stage because exception might be taken when we came to section 15, that section 13 should have been amended at the proper time. My position has been supported by the positive declarations of legal gentlemen on this side of the House, which have not been controverted by hon, gentlemen opposite. They stated that the omission of the words in question, being a statutory declaration, might invalidate an appeal. That was not an unreasonable view when we consider the whole spirit of the Bill, and the spirit manifested in trying to force it through the House. There bounden duty of the Opposition in the public interest to see that no one can shelter himself behind technicalities. hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has stated that revising officers being the persons charged with making up the voters' list would be men of character, and they never would take avantage of technicalities; and the hon. gentleman asked if judges would do so. It must be remembered that part of this work will be done by clerks to revising officers, who will not be responsible to this House. Yet I am told in view of these facts, and without any intimation having been given that the hon, gentleman intended to strike out part of clause 15-for the hon, gentleman said last night it was a good Bill and did not need amendment—that my motion was unnecessary. But the amendment will not remove the difficulty unless the hon. gentleman consents to strike out the last line of the schedule as well.

Amendment (Mr. Paterson) negatived.

On section 14,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The First Minister will find it convenient, on looking at the way this will work out, to alter either this or the preceding section, so as to provide that the list to be put up at each post office shall be the list of the municipality and not of the whole electoral district. He will see that if you are going to put up a list say of 6,000 names with the description and other particulars, they will require a most enormous placard unless it be printed in excruciatingly small type. Such a list would occupy on a rough guess, some 30 superficial feet, which would be very inconvenient for the purpose of examination in the first place, and it would be exceedingly inconvenient in many of these post offices to find a proper place to put up such a thing; whereas if the lists were sub-divided among the various municipalities, the thing would be brought within a reasonable compass, and would be much more convenient.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had that in mind in connection with my amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I would suggest instead of the words "said list" being used, it should be "said list relating to a certain municipality." Before recess the hon. First Minister held that the list referred to was the list for the entire constituency. If that is the case, the language of the clause would not convey the same meaning unless the list for the entire constituency were posted up in each post office, while as proposed to be amended, it refers to the list relating to each municipality, so there would be a conflict of terms. I suggest that it read "of that part of the said list."

Amendment (Mr. Cameron) agreed to.

Mr. KING. Section 14 provides that two copies of the list shall be furnished to each postmaster, and that it shall be his duty to post one of them up in his office. That is, in my opinion, good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. The 13th section provides that two copies shall be furnished to the sheriff, warden, mayor, clerk of the peace and treasurer, or officers corresponding thereto, in each electoral district, but there is no provision made for compelling these officials to post either of the lists furnished to them. It is important that the utmost publicity should be given to the list. If all the precautions provided by this Bill were taken to publish the list, they would not prove as effective as the means adopted at present under the law of the Province of New Brunswick. In that Province the day for the final revision of the list is fixed by Act of Parlia ment, and is known to every elector in the Province—in fact, it is as well known as Christmas. But under this it will not be many known supporters of hon. gentlemen simply rests in the discretion of the revising officer to fix a day to suit his own convenience, and not a day to suit the convenience of the electors. I therefore beg to move:

That the word "who" in the 20th line on page 11 be struck out and the following words be inserted in place thereof: And each of the said postmasters, and the sheriff, warden, clerks of the peace, and treasurers, and parish court commissioners or other officers to whom two copies of the said list are to be mailed under this Act; and that the word "post" be struck out of the 22nd line and the 2 th line on page 11.

Mr. MULOCK. This amendment I think is a very reasonable one. What it provides will cost nothing to speak of and will help to give publicity to the lists. In view of the territorial size of some of the municipal constituencies in this Dominion, we ought to avail ourselves of all public officials in order to make the lists as accessible to the electors as possible. In Manitoba, I am told, there are ridings 150 miles in length, and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) told us last night that his riding was 900 miles long by 300 miles wide; and no doubt when we come to give representation to the North-West Territories, we shall find there ridings of immense proportions. This proposal is to place the lists in the hands of various municipal officers to post them up in their offices where they may be seen by the public.

Mr. RYKERT. It is already provided in the previous section.

Mr. MULOCK. They are not bound to post them up. The amendment secures greater publicity for the lists, and I can see no possible objection to it. There are not enough offices in the North-West at present in which to post these lists where they will be seen by the public, and no doubt in many parts of the older Provinces the same difficulty exists. I think it is in the right direction, as it will tend to enable the public, without expense and unnecessary trouble, to ascertain how far the lists are correct and how far they are not.

Mr. LISTER. Unless we make it imperative on the officials mentioned in section 13 to post up those lists in their offices, there will be very little use in sending them. Of what possible advantage will it be to the public if those officers receive the lists and they are not compelled to post them up.

Mr. CHARLTON. In order to make the Bill acceptable it is necessary to give the public such opportunities for information as they may desire with regard to the working of the Bill. The circulation of a few extra copies is a matter of very small moment as regards expense. By the English Act, the lists are required to be published much more widely than they are by the provisions of this Bill. After they are published by the overseers, they have to be affixed in some public and conspicuous position in every post office and telegraph office and in every municipal and parochial office. Surely the hon, gentleman will not object to giving our lists the same publicity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 13th clause provides that the revising officer shall publish the said list by causing one copy thereof to be posted up in the office of the clerk or other corresponding officer of each municipal or parochial division, and by mailing to the member or members of the House of Commons for such electoral district, to the sheriff, warden, mayor, clerk of the peace, etc., under whatever official name they are known. I take it, it is a matter of necessary inference that if the revising officer sends these by mail to these official parties, it must be for the purpose of their posting them up and not that they may throw them into the fire.

Mr. DAVIES. It is not a necessary inference that they will post them up in their offices. The hon. gentleman did not think so, or he would not require the postmasters, to whom he also sends the lists, to post them up. One Mr. King.

class of officials he requires to post them up, the other class he does not. Therefore the inference is irresistible that the other class are not to do what they are not told to do. The amendment only earries out the view of the First Minister, by not leaving it open to any official to refrain from posting up the list if he chooses. It does not require any additional copies, but only that the copies provided to be sent, in the 13th section, shall all be posted up.

Mr. MULOCK. The First Minister will see that under section 13 the clerk of the municipality is directed to post up in his office the copies sent to him. If the inference is that every officer who receives a copy will, without instructions post it up, why provide that the clerk of the municipalities shall post them up? There are other classes under this clause who receive these copies but certainly are not expected to post them up. For instance, members of Parliament are entitled to receive them, but they cannot be expected to post them up.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They can post themselves about it.

Mr. MULOCK. Our ridings are very much more extensive than those in England. For instance, the riding of my hon. friend from Algoma would be about as large as the whole of England. I hope that the First Minister will see that this is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. WELDON. This is only carrying out the object of the 13th section. These lists are to be sent to two classes of persons—to members of Parliament and unsuccessful candidates, and to the sheriff, mayor, warden and other officials on behalf of the public. The latter are to receive them because the public come in contact with them, and therefore publicity is given to them. The section points out what postmasters are to do with the lists, and the natural inference is that the others, who are not so directed, are not to do the same thing. I think the amendment of my hon. friend from Queen's is only carrying out the object of giving publicity to these lists.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment, pressed as it is by my hon. friend from St. John.

Amendment (Mr. King) agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The English law provides for a continuous posting of these lists, and for the punishment of anyone who mutilates or destroys them. I move that the following words be added to clause 14:

And, in case the said list so to be published as aforesaid shall be destroyed, mutilated, defaced or removed before the expiration of the time required for such publication, the said parties hereinbefore required to publish the same as aforesaid shall, as soon as conveniently may be, publish in like manner in its place another list in some public and conspicuous place in or near their said offices; and any person who shall unlawfully destroy, mutilate, efface or remove any such list so affixed as aforesaid shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding $20, to be recovered in a summary manner before any justice of the peace.

We know that mischievous people are in the habit of pulling these things down without any cause. Any person so guilty, especially in regard to a list which it is of the first consequence to make public, ought to be punished. This is an exact copy of the English law.

Mr. LISTER. Without the list referred to, the revising officer would have no material upon which to proceed in the revision of the list. I think the Bill would be imperfect if provision were not made for keeping the voters' list continuously in the office of the clerk of the municipality. We find that in England such a law is now in force; that the lists required to be posted up in the places mentioned in the Act, if they are mutilated, destroyed or removed, a similar list is to be reposted. The English law also provides a penalty for any party taking down or mutilating the list, and I think there should be some such provision in our own law.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the old adage is true, that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well, I think provision ought to be made for the continuous posting of these lists, if they are to be posted at all. If no provision is made to secure the continuous posting of these lists, or to secure their being put up again if they are torn down or mutilated, then it seems to me that the provision in regard to that posting is simply a farce. Moreover, it is certainly proper that any person who wantonly removes, or effaces, or destroys these lists, should be punished. In our laws it is made an offence to take down an ordinary advertisement posted upon trees or public places; the rights of individuals are protected in this way, and surely the rights of the public should be protected in the matter of these lists that are to be posted up for public convenience. I think the amendment ought to receive the support of every member of the House.

Mr. WILSON. If the right hon, gentleman desires to meet the public convenience he ought to take means to have this list kept continuously posted up. In some sections that list may have been made very favorable to one party, and those that were upon upon the primary list would have a desire to keep from the other party any information in connection with the lists and the names upon it. If there be no penalty and no obligation to keep the list posted up, a designing person might destroy the list and by that means withhold information from those parties who would have an interest in looking after it, I think the First Minister ought to allow this amendment to pass and to that extent protect those who ought to be placed upon the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think experience has shown that there has been any pulling down or destruction of lists in Ontario or elsewhere. No such provision has hitherto been found necessary in England or Canada, and I do not think it is well to crowd the Act with penalties.

Mr. MILLS. There is some difference between the list proposed by this Bill and the list that formerly existed in Ontario. In the Province of Ontario the assessment roll formed the basis for making a complete list. The hon. gentleman will see that a large number of persons must have their names put upon that list about whose right to be there, a great deal of doubt may exist, and it is therefore clear that it is important the list should be preserved and kept public in order that it may be inspected. Now, in Prince Edward Island, he proposes to take the last pollbook as the basis for the preparation of the list, and he is going to establish a property qualification in place of manhood suffrage. There must necessarily, therefore, be a large number of persons whose names will be upon the list in the first instance, that ought not to be there. It is clear, therefore, the public have great interest that this list should be kept open for inspection. The list proposed by the hon, gentleman does not stand in the position of the old list in Ontario. It is open in a very much greater degree to objection, especially the first list prepared, and if the hon, gentleman is anxious to give due protection it is necessary some step should be taken such as is proposed. Such a list as that proposed is open to fraud in regard to some of the persons put upon it, wage earners, tenants paying an amount of rental bringing them just within the qualification. Protection can only be afforded by making of those who wilfully destroy or mutilate those sources of persons destroying the lists liable to punishment.

Mr. CHARLTON. I call attention to the provisions of the English Act, 6 and 7 Vic., cap. 18, sections 23, 24 and 25 (the hon. gentleman read the sections). The English law makers considered that it was proper and necessary that a list should be published, it was necessary to make provision for its efficient publication, providing in what accordingly.

manner it should be posted, and that it was the duty of the officer who posted it to keep it posted. Furthermore, English law-makers decided that it was proper and necessary to provide for the punishment of individuals who removed such lists, the punishment being by fine after a trial before justices. I hold that if it is necessary under this Bill to provide for the publication, it must be done so as to protect the public interest and ensure to the public that the list will be kept posted. It is therefore necessary that proper punishment should be inflicted on such as wantonly remove those lists; and for the Government not to provide punishment for parties who wantonly remove the lists, is to take a step backwards and to come short of the requirements of the Bill, and to leave the public without an assurance that the Bill will be carried out efficiently and satisfactorily.

Mr. MULOCK. If the provisions of the Bill ordered that officers shall do certain acts and it is not provided that they shall be punished for non-compliance, it is a mere blind. Nothing is more important than to keep these lists posted. The time is already too limited within which objection can be made, and it will even be necessary to consider whether more time should not be granted, especially in view of our sparse population. To state in this Bill that lists are to be put up by certain officers, and yet fail to insert a clause to punish them for allowing them to be removed, is an illusory and not a substantial publication of the list. What we aim at is a substantial publication during the period provided. Anything less than that will not be satisfactory to the public. If the officer does wrong, neither the Government nor Parliament will be blamed, if Parliament has adopted all reasonable precautions in order to enforce compliance with the law. But if Parliament does not provide the requisite machinery and that wrong-doing shall be punished, Parliament will be charged with negligence and carelessness. There is a clause which says that if the municipal officer who has control of the assessment rolls does not furnish a certified list to the revising officer, that officer will be liable to certain money penalties. Why, then, are not penalties inserted in this case? The object of the Government must be to continue publication, and that means that the list shall be kept continually posted.

Mr. DAVIES. The only suggestion made by the First Minister was that it did not appear likely that any one would be found to wilfully destroy and take down the lists. While it is not wise to impose unnecessary penalties, the imposition of those which are necessary may be a good thing, and the sole question here is, would it be at all probable that these lists would be mutilated or destroyed. If the list were mutilated or torn down, those in the immediate locality would have the only means taken away from them of discovering whether names were improperly put on or struck off, and this would be particularly the case in Prince Edward Island, where there will be a large number of names which will not be entitled to a place on the list. There will therefore be motives for people to pull down or destroy these lists, not merely for the love of mischief, but with a view of destroying the record of names which may be improperly on the list. A man may go into the postoffice and pull down the list before the face of the post master, and there will be nothing to prevent him from doing so. I think we would not be going far wrong in following the experience in England, by providing for the punishment information.

Amendment negatived. Yeas, 36; nays, 47.

On section 15,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen will see that clauses 15 and 16 should be transposed, and I move

Mr. DAVIES. Is not the wording of this clause wrong in the first two lines?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The previous clause provided that the list shall be published in a certain manner, that the notice of the holding of the sitting shall also be published in one or more newspapers, and that same notice states not only that the list has been published in the manner prescribed, but that the specified sitting shall be held. In the 2nd line of the clause, after the word sitting, I insert the words "mentioned in such notice." This gives notice that the publication has been made in the manner prescribed by the Act, and that the sitting will be held.

Mr. WELDON. It strikes me that one publication in a newspaper really amounts to nothing at all. As at least four weeks and possibly five weeks will elapse between the time of the first publication and the time of the holding of the court by the revising officer, more notice should be given. Therefore I would move:

That the words, "at least one" in the second line on page 12 be struck out and the words "three weeks" be inserted in place thereof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that notice ought also to be given in all the newspapers published in the electoral district. As a rule there are at least two newspapers in each district, certainly in the Province of Ontario. They are usually of opposite politics, and each person as a rule takes the newspaper which represents his own side of politics, and does not very often take the other. Of course, if but one receives the notice, we must presume that the one supporting the hon. gentleman will be the one selected. I think very little additional expense would be incurred by publishing the notice in all the newspapers, and it would certainly give more publicity.

Mr. CHARLTON. If my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) will permit a suggestion from me, I would suggest that the amendment be as follows:-

That the word "one" in the 2nd line and the words "one or more newspapers" in the 3rd line be struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "Every newspaper."

The Bill as it stands would be liable to this objection in addition to many others, that it would furnish the right hon, leader of the Government with additional patronage for his organs. All are interested in having the greatest possible publicity given to this notice; it should be published in every newspaper in the riding, in the organs of the Opposition as well as in those of the Government; we should act impartially towards all the journals published in is more notice than hon, gentlemen opposite have already the riding.

Mr. VAIL. There are some districts where there are no papers, and I would suggest that in such the notice be published in the local Royal Gazette.

Mr. MILLS. I think a more efficient means of publication than the Royal Gazette could be devised. We know that the returning officer at the time of an election publishes proclamations everywhere, and the revising officer, besides putting an advertisement in the newspapers, might put up posters of some sort which would give general notice to the electors. As there is no time fixed when the enquiry shall take place, it is desirable, if there is to be an efficient revision of the voters' list, that there should be publicity given of the time and place of holding the court of revision. The hon gentleman could easily correct his clause so as to meet the difficulty. There are new districts in Muskoka and Algoma as well as in the more sparsely settled portions of the old Provinces, where newspapers are not published, and where notice of some sort ought to be given to the electors.

Mr. VAIL. In this Bill, it is put in the power of the revising officer to appoint a time for the revision of the lists. In the law of our Province, a regular date is fixed for leven a pretence of giving publicity. Sir John A. Maddonald.

revising the lists, so that the people of the different localities are always prepared for it; but when you leave the matter in the hands of the revising officer, the utmost publicity as to the date should be given, so that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. CASEY. The required publicity can only be effected by inserting this notice in all the newspapers published in the riding. A notice published either in the Conservative or Liberal newspapers would only reach approximately half the people of the district. In the cities, a notice in a couple of papers on each side would probably be sufficient, but in the country districts there is no way of securing the required publicity except by publishing the notice in every paper in the electoral district. In my riding, there are three papers, and those only reach a comparatively small proportion of the people because they are purely local and circulate only within a small circuit of where they are published, but there are two papers published in the county town of St. Thomas, just outside of the riding, which reach, if anything, a larger number of people in the riding than the small local papers published within its borders. The notices should be published, not only in the papers in the riding, but also in one paper in the county town of the county in which the electoral district is situated, whether it is in the riding, or not, and where there are no newspapers in the riding, proclamations should be posted up. I will however leave the hon. gentleman to deal with the newspapers, and move the following amendment:—

That the following words be added:—And if no newspaper is published in the electoral district, then by printed proclamation posted in conspicuous places throughout the electoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no pleasing hon. gentlemen opposite. In discussing clause 14, we had a series of amendments, and one especially from the hon. member for King's N.B. In the first place the notice has to be posted in the post office, then in the office of the warden, reeve, mayor and clerk and every body else, and it was argued by hon, gentlemen opposite that that was absolutely requisite in order to give sufficient notice. Then the clause that is now before us is almost a work of supererogation. It has been argued by hon. gentlemen opposite that, if clause 15 were adopted with the amendments, there would be ample and sufficient notice to the public; but this goes further, and says that, if there be a newspaper, the revising officer shall give one insertion in one such newspaper. That declared is sufficient. The hon, gentleman says the revising officer will take a partisan paper. The clause says the notice shall be inserted once in one or more newspapers. It is clear that the revising officer will, like everyone else, try to make matters pleasant, and, of course, if there are two leading newspapers, newspapers worthy of the name, he will insert his notice in them both, in the same way as returning officers do, and as all public officials do, except sheriffs in Ontario. If it were required that this notice should be published in all the newspapers in every electoral district or in every municipality, it would entail a very large expense without any corresponding benefit.

Mr. CASEY. I am not aware of any agreement on this side that the notice given under section 14 was sufficient. In any case, the right hon, gentleman has expressed his own opinion that it is not sufficient by moving section 16 which provides for giving further notice. I agree that, as it stands, it is a work of supererogation, for it will give very little additional information to anybody. It is a pretence.

Mr. HESSON. Not at all.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend from Perth says it is not

Mr. HESSON. I did not say anything of the kind. If | insertion in the newspaper of the electoral district. I think you give the article to one newspaper all the other newspapers will refer to it.

Mr. CASEY. In my opinion it is merely a pretence of giving publicity. If the notice is published at all, it should be published so as to reach everybody. In Ontario we have been accustomed to have the notices, in regard to these lists, published very fully. The right hon gentleman says the revising officer will see that due notice is given. We cannot judge as to what the revising officer will do, because there is no officer of that peculiar breed now in existence. He is a new and original conception of the right hon. gentleman, and we have nothing to compare him with. The probabilities are that, unless we insert this amendment, he will only publish the notices in the papers of his own party. It is useless to pretend that the publicity given by posting lists in post offices and similar places is sufficient. I have known such notices to be posted without anyone paying any attention to them. I would be prepared to see the newspaper clause done away with altogether, if the hon gentleman would accept the plan of proclamations posted as fully and widely as proclamations calling an election, but that I think would be more expensive than the publication in newspapers.

Mr. VAIL. There are two separate notices. One is the list itself, but this refers only to the fact that the list is posted, so that parties who are interested may themselves examine it.

Mr. DAVIES. I shared in the view of the First Minister on the first reading, because I thought the notices required under section 16 were additional notices of the lists, but my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Vail) points out that it is a different notice which is to be given under this section, a notice that the lists have been published and that the parties must go to the places named to see them. I do not find the schedule to which the First Minister refers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is schedule D.

Mr. WELDON. It seems to me that this notice is quite different from the notice which is put on the list. It is to give information that these lists are published and that the officer will hold a sitting at such a day. I do not think there is any need of a newspaper at all. The object of the newspaper is to call attention to the fact that the list has been published, and if the voter wants information to see whether his name is on it, that directs him where to go to find a list; but if he wants to see if an individual is on who has no right to be on, he goes to that list and finds at the bottom of it directions as to what course to pursue. Therefore, it is not necessary that it should be published in a newspaper, and I would suggest that a period of three weeks prior to the revision, would give sufficient notice.

Mr. EDGAR. The publication by merely one insertion might give no notice whatever, because, in the absence of saying when that one insertion shall be, it might be too late to give notice of application; it might be within a week, or a day, before the sitting, and the notice will be too late to inform the public that the list was posted or that the court is being held.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentle man will see that we are copying at a humble distance the law of the Province of Ontario, which provides that the voters' list shall be published in some newspaper in the municipality, if there be a paper in it, and, if not, it is to be published in the neighboring municipality, and there is only one insertion. The object of publishing that is to give notice that the list has been revised, so that the public may have an opportunity of appealing to the county judge. In the same way here we provide for giving full notice to all officials, and for the notice being posted up in the offices of that is amply sufficient; at all events, being in an economical mood, I shall not agree to publish it more than once, nor yet shall I agree to publish it in all the papers. I think we might leave it to the revising officer.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt the revising officer will use his discretion in a beneficial way in the right hon, gentleman's interest. In my own riding there are three papers. The smallest paper in the riding has no politics at all, and has about 500 or 600 subscribers. A notice published in that paper would meet the requirements of the law, but it would be seen by only 500 to 600 people, whereas there are over 5,000 voters in my riding who have a right to know when the list is published, and when the revision of it is to be made. It is just such cases as this that the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk is intended to prevent. In its present shape the clause appears to be intended to give every facility for holding the sittings without the necessary publicity being given.

Mr. VAIL. In Nova Scotia there are four or five counties where there is no local newspaper, though the county I represent has a newspaper. In the case of those counties with no newspapers, I think, at all events, the notice ought to be published in the adjoining municipality.

Mr. DAVIES. In the county of King's, P.E.I., no newspaper is published at all. The newspapers are published in Queen's, from whence they circulate throughout the Province.

Mr. BAIN. You will find that difficulty in closely settled counties that are near large centres of population. In the south riding of my own county there was no newspaper published in the towns of that riding in former days, and I think there is none yet. The municipal notices for South Wentworth and North Brant are published in the Hamilton papers; and this plan should be adopted in the present case.

Mr. AUGER. In Bagot, which is a very large county, there are no newspapers.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). In many of the rural constituencies of Ontario no newspapers are published. Such is the case in East Middlesex and South Middlesex. The clause should be amended so as to allow the revising officer to publish the notices in one or more newspapers published in any constituency adjacent to the constituency in question. I suggest that the clause be amended so as to require advertisements to be published in three newspapers. if there are that number published in any constituency, and if there is no newspaper published in a constituency, the returning officer shall be required to publish the notices in one newspaper or more in the adjoining constituency. As this is a radical change of system, the people will require considerable education before being posted in the details. The lists are now to be published in January instead of July, August, or early in September, as at present, and in view of such a change I hope the First Minister will consent to such a publication as will practically secure the end aimed at.

Mr. CHARLTON. The leader of the Government informs us that we are very unreasonable in demanding a further publication, after declaring that the publication made by the posting of a notice is sufficient. If the hon, gentleman had proposed to drop this provision with regard to the publication in the newspapers, he would have been logical, but he assumes himself that it is necessary to have further publicity. We claim that there should be the greatest possible publicity, and that if the notice is published in the newspapers at all, it should be published in a fair and efficient manner, and that there should be no partiality in officials, and for the notice being posted up in the offices of the selection of the journals in which the notice is to be those officials. We provide, besides, that there shall be one inserted. The First Minister informs us that the revising barrister will select the papers without reference to politics. Well, we shall be somewhat curious to see what the result will be in the light of his prediction. I hazard the prediction that his selection will invariably be made with reference to politics, and that under this section, where there is one Conservative journal, it will be selected, and where there are more than one in a district, the notice will be published in them all. This looks like the purport of this section, and I have no doubt that in this matter, as in other cases where the Government has advertising patronage to bestow, it will select its own friends.

Mr. HESSON. No doubt of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, gentleman has more honesty than discretion, because his declaration is directly opposed to the assertion of his leader. I have no doubt that he is right, and that the journals will be selected only with reference to their political standing. What we contend is that as this is a notice affecting all classes and both parties, such a degree of decency should be observed as would require the selection of journals of both parties. The adoption of such a provision, and the insertion of the notice three times instead of once, will not largely increase the expense. In Toronto, Montreal, and a few other places, the expense might be beyond the limit of propriety, but in most ridings you will find only two or three, or at the most, four journals.

Mr. HESSON. In Perth there are twelve.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is, six for each riding, and in most cases the expense would be inconsiderable, and would be richly repaid by the reputation the Government would have for acting with impartiality, and without reference to political bias. This section as it stands would empower the revising barrister to select merely the journals of his own party, and to select them all even if there are twenty, and as the hon. member for South Perth says, he will do so. While we believe that the principles of this measure are radically wrong, we are called upon to make its details as workable as possible.

The amendment (Mr. Casey) was then put.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. White, Cardwell). In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The amendment has been voted upon.

Mr. CASEY. The Chairman had not declared it lost when I rose to my feet.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The motion was put.

Mr. CASEY. The motion was put while I was on my feet, addressing you, Sir.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CASEY. The arguments on this motion have been all on one side.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to argue that point.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I declare the hon, gentleman out of order.

Mr. CASEY. I am speaking to the point of order, and therefore I cannot be out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon, gentleman will gain nothing at all by this conduct. I say it is scandalous on the part of the right hon, gentleman to try to force down discussion which must come. He will gain nothing by it; he will make nothing by insisting on your ruling. He makes nothing Mr. Charlon.

whatever by insisting on getting a ruling from the Chair. I was rising to address you, Sir, when you put the motion, and I am sure you would not have put the motion if you had heard me.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I waited for some time after the hon. gentleman sat down before putting the motion. I then put the motion, and declared that the nays had it. It was after that the hon. gentleman rose.

Mr. CASEY. If you declare that you did not hear me address you, I call for a division.

Amendment (Mr. Charlton) negatived. Yeas, 43; nays, 60.

Mr. CASEY. I will have to say now what I could have said in half the time we have been debating the point of order; so nothing was gained by the insistance of the right hon, gentleman on the point of order. I say that the argument on this question has been all on one side. The hon, gentleman has not seen fit to argue the propriety of these proposed amendments at all; he has simply poohpoohed them, although he must know that they are important. Unless he gives reasons for objecting to the publicity we ask for, we must come to the conclusion that what he objects to is the publicity itself. He has created an officer who, by virtue of his duties, is a suspicious character, who will never be anything but a suspicious character, and whom the community will desire to watch with the utmost carefulness; and he has, obstinately and wilfully, and without reason given, declared that he will not allow us to secure for the public that opportunity of watching him which we are anxious to obtain. When the right hon. gentleman, with an attempt at jocularity about his being in an economical vein, which we do not see evidences of in any other direction, refuses to go to the trifling expense of inserting a short advertisement in two or three more newspapers than he proposes, and a few more times than he proposes, we can come to no other conclusion than that he does not want the public to know the facts that should be brought before them by this notice, but that he wishes his tool, his party agent, to have an opportunity of doing his work under the shade. It is rather startling to us to find a question of this importance received as it has been by hon, gentlemen opposite—to find an attempt to hiss and hoot and bark down the discussion; and I would call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that dogs are not supposed to be in this Chamber without their masters. We hear now and have heard during the last few nights barking in this House which could only proceed from a dog. I am sure no hon, member of this House would so disgrace him. self as to imitate that quadruped, and can only assume that some members has smuggled a dog under his desk, and I would ask you to call one of the pages to turn him out. We have shown the importance of this matter, and the only answer we get is a hoot, a hiss, or a bark. It is, of course, impossible, in the face of the obstinate resistance, the unargumentative resistance of the hon. gentleman and his followers, to carry what we desire, but we are determined that our views shall be fully put on record. The hon. gentleman has refused to allow the notice to be inserted in more than one paper; then let it be inserted several times in that paper. The English law in this respect is preferable. It provides that the notice shall be inserted in "one or more papers circulating in the county;" while this clause provides that it shall be inserted in a paper in the county, but makes no provision if there is no paper published in the county. I hope, with the reverence he professes for English practice, and with his professed intention of following English practice in this Bill, he will see his way to assimilate it in this respect with his professed model.

Amendment (Mr. Weldon) negatived.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That ought to be carried. In North Brant, owing to the particular boundary given by the Gerrymandering Act, they happen to be without a newspaper.

Mr. KING. In the two counties adjoining Queen's, King's and Sunbury, there are no newspapers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are Provinces where there are no municipalities, and I would suggest an amendment which the hon gentleman may move if he chooses: "And in case no newspaper is published therein, then in some newspaper published in a neighboring district."

Mr. CASEY. The wording of the English Act is preferable. A newspaper may be published in an adjoining district and not circulated at all in the one in question. By saying, in a newspaper circulated in the district, it does not matter where it is published.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). The county which I represent will give a fair idea of the difficulty that may arise. My riding is composed of a part of Oxford, Brant, and Wentworth, and the papers that circulate in one part of the riding do not circulate in the others, and there is no newspaper published in the riding; so that if the notice be published in a newspaper in the adjoining riding it will only reach the electors in one part of North Brant. To reach the whole of that riding it should be published in newspapers circulated in both ends and in the centre. I do not suppose that my county is the only one of this description to be found in the Dominion, and in such counties it is necessary the publication should be made in papers published in several of the adjoining municipalities.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. member for Queen's N.B. (Mr. King), said that the counties on both sides of his, Sunbury and King's, had no newspapers. I believe there is a small newspaper published in the latter, but it is entirely devoted to chemical fertilisers, and my hon. friend from King's.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) moved that the words "one or more" be erased and "newspapers" be substituted, and the following added:—"if there is that number, and if not, in the newspapers circulated in such district." This will meet the objection of the hon. member for Brant to some extent, and it will also meet the case of the county which I have the honor to represent, as well as that of many others. There is difficulty in framing any one clause that will meet the different circumstances mentioned here; but, if we determine to publish these notices in three newspapers, if there be that number in a constituency, that will meet the case, to a great extent; and if there be no newspapers published in the constituency, as in the case of Brant, the notice should be inserted in newspapers published in three different points, at some distance apart, each paper having a circulation in a portion of the constituency.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the following words be added after the words electoral district:—"and in case no newspaper is published therein, in one or more newspapers published in a neighboring electoral district."

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). The amendment, as it stands, will be of no use in my riding, which is 65 miles long, and embraces part of three counties. I suggest that the word "districts" be substituted for the word "district," because the papers published in the district adjoining one end of my riding would not reach the other end.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That would only give the revising officer the option of using newspapers published in more than one adjoining district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I agree.

Amendment agreed to, with the addition of the words "or districts."

Mr. MULOCK. We ought to have the time limited within which this advertisement should be published. It might be published at the last moment, before the sitting of the court.

Mr. WELDON. It says "immediately."

Mr. MULOCK. What is "immediately?" There should be a limitation. Immediately is a relative term. Would there be any objection to enacting that the first insertion should take place at least three weeks before the final revision?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman does not like the word "immediately," I have no objection to take the word in the Ontario Act, which is "forthwith."

Mr. MULOCK. We are not legislating for Ontario altogether; we are legislating for the whole Dominion. The Ontario Act provides that the same practice shall be followed as is required in the case of appeal to the court of revision, so you must go to the Assessment Act to find out what the requirements of the law are, and that Act provides that the publication must take place at least ten days before the sitting of the court. If the First Minister desires to follow the Ontario Act let him follow it in that respect, but in view of the size of some of our constituencies, I think ten days is not sufficient, and I, therefore, move that the first publication shall be at least three weeks before the sitting of the court. The public are entitled to reasonable time in which to obtain whatever advantage this Act gives them, in order to control the attendance of unwilling witnesses, and also to make their own arrangements; because this Bill provides that there shall elapse at least an interval of four weeks between putting up this notice and the sitting of the court, and I think the publication of the notice in the papers should take place at least three weeks before the sitting of the court. That gives the revising officer a margin of one week.

Amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to. On section 15,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that in the 34th line the word "nor" and subsequent words be struck out. There is no necessity, I think, for having "nor more than five weeks." Then, in the 40th line, after the word "form." I propose to insert "form E," and I will strike out the words for that purpose. Then, in the 47th line, after the word "address," to strike out all to the end of the clause. That was understood a little while ago.

Mr. DAVIES. The draughtsman who drew up this clause evidently intended there should be one list of voters for every electoral district, and that there should be one preliminary revision of that list made. But the First Minister has altered the scheme of the Bill in that respect, and the Bill, as it now stands, down to section 14, provides for lists for every municipality and other sub-divisions of the electoral districts, so that, in some districts, there will be five, six, seven or more lists. It is apparent that it will be impossible to revise these lists at one place, or with one preliminary revision. I look upon the preliminary revision as the most important revision which will be held. The right hon. gentleman shakes his head, but I have studied the Bill pretty thoroughly, and I know that in the ridings with which I am best acquainted the preliminary revision will be the most important, and the subsequent revisions will not amount to a great deal. There will be a few legal objections made to certain names, and a few appeals; but the practical work of revision, the striking off and adding on, will, I am satisfied, be done at the first preliminary revision. Now, take Prince Edward Island, in which the hon, gentleman made an alteration last night. He has placed upon the list of voters there every man who voted at the last general election; he has made the poll book prima facie evidence of the right to be placed on the new voters' list. Well, we know, as matter of fact, that there will be a good many hundred names placed upon this new voters' list that will not have the legal right to vote. Their right to remain on that list will be questioned, and must be questioned, at the first preliminary revision. In the county of Queen's, which I have the honor to represent, the shire town is situated in the centre of the county, and from the south end to the north end of the county is a distance of 60 or 70 miles. Now, it is perfectly absurd, it is out of the question, to say that the revising officer could hold the sitting in Charlottetown to revise 7,000 voters' names, and ask men to come there a distance of 60 or 70 miles. It would not only be ruinous to the people themselves to come such a distance and remain while the revision is going on, but it would be impossible to induce the hundreds of people whose evidence will be necessary to remain for the necessary length of time. The scheme, as it has been remodelled, provides for an alphabetical list being made out in the subdivisions of the county. When we had a voters' list prepared for Prince Edward Island the county court judge held a court for preliminary revision in each circuit of the county. That riding has six county court circuits, and the people are accustomed to go to those circuits. So far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, I think the preliminary revision should be held in each of the county court circuits; that would be six places in the riding. It would be very much easier for the county court judge, or the revising barrister, to travel to five or six different places in the county than it would be for hundreds of people to flock in from all parts of the county to one central place. I propose, in revision if they please; but there is no necessity, those amendment:

That after the word "place," in the 33rd line of the 11th paragraph, there be added the following words: "or places in each municipality or parish, or, in Prince Edward Island, in each county court circuit in the electoral districts, as he shall deem most convenient for such purpose. Take Charlottetown: it has 2,000 voters, and the revision will take several days. It will be perfectly impossible for people far out in the county to attend. The cost will be so expensive that they would prefer to abandon the matter. I assume that it is intended to amend the section in accordance with the preceding amendments, so that the scheme of the Bill shall be thoroughly carried out. The scheme I propose will not be inconvenient to revising officers. There are county court houses in each district where the sitting can be held. It will be much easier for one man to go there than for 500 people to attend at some other point. There is no party object to be gained by this amendment, it being as much in favor of one party as another. We are all anxious not to throw too many obstacles in the way of the people getting on the list, or to names being struck off.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The alteration in the Bill to which the hon. gentleman has referred is that of having several lists instead of one list; but it in no way alters the balance of the Bill. It was made for the purpose of meeting the objection that it would cause confusion, perhaps expense, in having a long list of all the voters in a constituency put up in such municipality or other division of the constituency, and therefore, according to the Bill, as amended, instead of there being one list for each municipality there will be several and distinct lists for the different polling divisions. And the lists which interests particular sections of constituencies will be made up and put up. The plan of the Bill remains as it is now. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) says this preliminary revision is a most important portion of the Bill. It is comparatively unimportant, and the only doubt I have is as to whether this clause should be in the Bill at all. This clause is only put in for the first settlement of the voters' lists under this Act. In the subsequent annual revision it is not provided that there shall be a preliminary revision. In the second year, the voters' list having been once settled, the officer will take the voters' list of the year before, and will visit each municipality or other well-known division, and with that list in his hand he will add new voters, and strike off dead voters, or those absent, or those who have lost the franchise, and he will settle the list at once. But, in order to have a good list to start with, it was thought well this system should be adopted. Let me shortly go over it. In the first place, the revising officer takes the revised assessment roll, or the poll books, or the voters' list, as the case may be. He takes those books as prima facie evidence. He makes out his list, showing every name that the assessment roll shows to have a vote. He takes other such information as he can obtain, in order to add other names. He publishes that list. It goes to every municipality. He says: There are the parties who, on an examination of the assessment roll, have a right to vote. Then he announces that he will hold a court-if a county judge, in his own office, and if a revising officer, in some other place; and he will receive all papers sent in, applications that may be made to be placed on the roll by mail or otherwise, and all objections made to the names appearing on that roll. It is not required that anyone should be present. The practical working of the plan will be this: The political associations of the two parties that govern the country will send in their lists, I have no doubt. Individuals who are interested will send in names or their objections. They need not attend at all. But the revising officer will get all those applications, and all the objections. In the next clause, the 17th clause, it is provided, however, that parties may attend the preliminary documents being sent in being sufficient for the purpose. He takes the applications; he reads them and adds them to his list. He makes the objections to them on his list; and after that list is completed, that is the preliminary list, the original list of applications—the applications with the objections noted—the revising officer, with the complete list, goes and visits every municipality, holds his court there and settles the list finally. That is the important portion of it. It may be, indeed, as has been pressed on me, that there is no necessity for going to this trouble to get this information, even for the settlement of the first list. But I think it will be well, and I think the plan will commend itself to the judgment of the committee, that we should take this additional trouble. Although the revising officer will have the assessment roll, the voters' list and the poll book, still he will be ready to receive all applications made to him from any source to put names on the list, and that additional list showing every possible applicant and name, including wage-earners, tenants, occupants and so on; and then with that very full list the officer will go and visit every municipality; and then, at the solemn sitting in each municipality, he will settle the list. That is the scheme. In subsequent annual revisions of the list by the revising officer there will be no necessity to continue this preliminary business. All the officer will have to do will be to annually go round, at a time announced, and well known to the municipality, to receive applications and objections, and so settle the list. In England this work occupies a very short time. So it will be here, when we get a good and satisfactory list. It will be done with very little trouble, time and expense. This preliminary revision will cost us some money, but it will be well worth the money, in order to start with a full, thorough list; and I believe such is the political activity in the minds of our people that every elector worthy of having a vote, and the various political parties will take the highest and deepest various political parties, will take the highest and deepest interest in making a good start and getting up a full list; and it is for the purpose of giving them an opportunity of doing so that this clause has been put in.

Mr. MILLS. I think if the hon, gentleman really holds to the views he is enunciating, it is an argument against the existence of this clause altogether. He must remember that he has furnished, under the provisions of this Bill, very imperfect material to the revising officer, out of which to prepare the voters' lists. The new law in the Province of Ontario will not be in operation, and the assessment roll will not be prepared with reference to that law, so that there will be a great many serious defects in the assessment roll, as a means of information to the revising officer, even in the Province of Ontario. The hon gentleman seems also to forget that the wage-earners, a large class of tenants and income voters, will not be upon the roll at all, and how does he propose the revising officer shall get the information in the first instance? The hon. gentleman has objected to the importance of having local aid and knowledge in the collection of information for the revising officer, and now he proposes, with imperfect material, to deny to the revising officer the opportunity of acquiring such further information as will enable him to make a more perfect list in the first instance. Take my riding It is made up of townships from as an instance. two different counties; the people of the counties are seldom together, and the county towns are outside. The most central part of the county is the town of Dresden, from which the people of Sombra, on the river St. Clair, are 35 miles distant. Sarnia is their county town, and they are not in Dresden once in one year or in two years. Bothwell is 24 miles eastward, and how will those voters, whose names will, necessarily, be off in the first instance, attend these meetings? The revising officer will require a longer time to deal with these lists than would be required for a judge to hold an ordinary assize court for the county, and if the candidate has to bear the expense of the attendance it will cost more than running an ordinary election. If he takes the wage-earners alone, he will have at least 100 people, in an ordinary township, who will be entitled to go upon this list. They will not be upon the list unless they attend personally for the purpose, and unless the judge or the revising officer holds his court in the municipality they will not have an opportunity of getting there at all. I say that this procedure ought not to be had at all, unless the court is held in every municipality. If the hon. gentleman intends that the electors shall not have an opportunity of having a proper list, if his object is to put obstacles in the way of preparing a list in the first instance, then the course he is pursuing is perfectly intelligible to us all, and it will serve its purpose, but it will not serve the purpose of preparing a proper list. In an ordinary constituency it is no exaggeration to hold that out of 4,000 or 5,000 electors from 500 to 1,500 will be off the roll, after the revising officer has used all the materials that he may have at his disposal. There will be, at the very least, 25 per cent. of the names to be put on the voters' list, by actual attendance and evidence, either in this case or at a later period, at the final revision. It will be utterly impossible to make the list perfect unless the revising officer meets the electors in their own immediate vicinity; he must go to them, for they will not come to him. Electors are only induced to attend under the pressure of the excitement of a general election. When that takes place they may go a few miles for the purpose of recording their votes, but they are not going to travel thirty or forty miles to have their names put on the list, when they may be obliged to wait four or five days, or even a week, before the revising officer can reach their particular applications. Some of us remember the period in the political history of Upper Canada when the electors were all required to go to the county town in order to record their votes; and one information he requires, and where he will have an oppor-

of the advantages of the introduction of our municipal system was, that along with it we succeeded in securing the polling of votes in each local municipality in the first instance, and ultimately in polling sub-divisions in each municipality. This is a proposition to go back to the old condition of things; the old inconveniences and expenses are revived in another form; the hon. gentleman wishes to re-establish, under the guise of a Franchise Bill, those abuses which we supposed were corrected in the days of our fathers. I say this is a monstrous provision, and I can tell hon, gentlemen opposite that if they undertake to carry this into practical effect days will have to be spent in the perfection of the list, and they will require to bring voters thirty or forty or fifty miles, and keep them for an indefinite period of time at the place where the preliminary revision is taking place in order to make a comparatively correct list in the first instance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS. Hon. gentlemen take exception to that; but every hon, gentleman knows the assessment roll will not give the revising officer the information necessary to enable him to prepare the list. The hon, gentleman refused last evening to take the assessment roll in Prince Edward Island, which would give a large amount of the information required. He will take the poll books of 1882, which record the vote of every British subject over twenty-one years of age, and at least 25 per cent. of the persons whose names are in the poll books will not be entitled to vote under this Bill. How does he propose to get them off this preliminary list? The revising officer will have to bring some of them 70 miles.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HESSON. You have just been told that there is no necessity for it.

Mr. MILLS. I say there is. Does the hon. gentleman deny that the hon. First Minister proposes to take the poll books of Prince Edward Island for 1882, that he proposes to transfer the names on those books to the new voters' list, that there are many men without property who voted then, and that some procedure is necessary to get their names off the list? We are told that in the county in which the city of Charlottetown is situated, from the county town to the extreme borders is a distance of 70 miles, and those parties must all be brought to one place for the purpose of giving evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MILLS. I say, yes. I want to know how the revising officer is going to make his revision without subponeing those parties to give evidence; he has to pay their expenses for the time they are kept there, and my hon, friend beside me says there are upwards of 2,000 in his county whose names must be taken off at some time or other, either at this preliminary revision or at the final revision. If it is an unnecessary provision it should not be there; if it is necessary, the hon, gentleman should furnish facilities to carry it out fairly and honestly, and it cannot be carried out fairly and honestly under this Bill. Where is the revising officer or the judge to sit in Algoma? At Port Arthur? Are all the voters of Manitoulin Island to be taken to Port Arthur, a distance of 200 miles? The hon, gentleman knows that this is a proposition to put obstacles in the way of properly correcting and revising the list. If he is willing to have a fair and honest revision of the list made it is necessary that the revising officer should meet the electors in the municipality where they belong, that he should there revise the list, in the presence of those who are capable of giving him the tunity of examining and cross-examining the parties on the property on which they propose to qualify. Therefore, if the hon. gentleman wishes to obtain a fair list, let him accept the amendment of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). If he wishes to put obstacles in the way of a fair list, if he wishes that the list shall be a sham and a delusion, and will not represent those honestly entitled to vote under the law, it is only necessary to adhere to the Bill as we have it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are none so blind as those who will not see. I thought, after my explanation, that the system was plain, and that instead of offering obstacles it facilitated the formation of a good and perfect list. The hon, gentleman says this clause is not wanted at

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that. I said that if the First Minister's line of argument was correct the clause was not wanted at all, and he ought to have struck it out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says this clause puts obstacles in the way, and that it will require people to be brought seventy miles, and all that sort of thing. It has no such intention, and the hon, gentleman has not read the clause or he would not say so. He says the revising officer should visit each municipality and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the people. That is provided for in the Bill. This is simply an additional means of information. The people need not go a mile; they need only go to the nearest post office and mail a letter, stating they apply to be put on the list or to get some one taken off the list. The political parties may send in lists, saying how many owners, tenants, occupants, farmers, fishermen, have been left off by the revising barrister; and the revising officer, instead of sitting in secret in his office, will sit in open court. The representative of a political party may go and hand that list to him, or he may mail it, if he likes. The revising officer has prepared these lists on the assessment roll and books, and on this preliminary sitting he receives all applications made to him to be put on the list, and adds the names of the applicants. He then goes round and visits every municipality, after giving full notice of his intention. He takes up a new name, not on the original list, say John Jones, wage earner, and asks if there is any objection to the name, and if there is any objection the person objected to has to prove his right to vote, in the same way as in the case of an appeal from the court of revision to the county judge. This is simply an additional means for completing the lists. No man need leave the plough or the work bench, but can send in his name and have it put on. Instead of being an obstacle, this provision is an additional convenience. The hon, gentleman has attacked the system. I do not suppose I can convince him it is a good system; but supposing he is right and I am wrong, the majority of the committee have declared that this system should be adopted. and there is no use harping back, and saying it is a bad system. The only thing for us to do is to work it out as well as we can. I declare this clause was put in by myself for the purpose of making the preliminary list as full as possible, so that every person having a shadow of a claim shall appear on it; and after the revising officer goes round, as the hon, gentleman says he ought to, he will be able to separate the chaff from the wheat; the real voter will be left on the list, and those who have been weighed in the balance and found wanting will be set aside.

Mr. VAIL. The more I hear the several clauses discussed the more I am convinced we never should have attempted to meddle with the election law. It is evident that the framers knew nothing whatever about the effect of some of the provisions. I am quite sure the representatives of Nova Scotia could not have read the Bill, or they would have seen that the provision that the revising officer shall sit in the lude to the final revision, but it should be an effective pre-Mr. MILLS.

shire town of the county and revise the list, and that there shall be only one sitting, is not at all suited to the Province of Nova Scotia. The counties in Nova Scotia are long and narrow, and in some of our counties the shire town is at almost the extreme end; in others, they are within four or five miles of the county line one way, and 60 or 70 miles from the other. Take Hants county: the revising officer holds his court in Windsor, 70 miles from some of the outlying districts. Take Halifax county: some of the districts are 70 to 80 miles from both of the shire towns. Halifax and Dartmouth, so that people will have to travel 70 or 80 miles in order to see whether their names are on the list. Take the county of Digby: the people in one part of the county would have to travel 40 or 50 miles to the shire town to see if ther names are on the list. In no way can this be arranged satisfactorily, except by compelling the revising officer to hold his court in several places in the electoral district. In Digby, for instance, an arm of the sea runs right through the county, so that there are actually two counties. Digby neck is divided off, and there are two islands at the lower end, Long Island and Brier Island, inhabited by fishermen. How will any of these men at Westport or Brier Island, 50 miles away, be expected to leave their fishing and go to Digby, to see whether their names are inserted or not; and it is impossible for the officer to know how many fishermen in that particular locality are to be put on the list. The fishermen themselves will not know, for they are not in a position to study the law, and the consequence will be that a great many of them will be left off, unless some provision is made, obliging the revising officer to hold his court in two or three places in the electoral district.

Mr. FISHER. The right hon gentleman said, at first, that he did not suppose this clause was necessary, but a few minutes ago he stated that this preliminary revision of the lists was really the most important.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not; I said the

Mr. FISHER. Yes; he said the making of the first lists was really the most important part of the whole Bill, because the first lists will form the basis for future lists. It is therefore very important that every possible precaution should be taken in the preparation of the first lists, to see that the right people, and only the right people, are put upon them. He says it is not necessary for the people to come to the revision, as they can apply by letter to the revising officer, and he can act upon that application. In that case there is no necessity for the revising officer to sit at all. He can do all that in his own office, without taking any evidence, except these letters. If a public sitting is to be held it must be for the purpose of taking evidence and obtaining information. Under the 17th section it is provided that evidence will be taken from those who may then be present, so that the hon. gentleman expects that the people will come before the revising barrister, and will not only communicate with him by letters. If the people near at hand can attend this preliminary revision, the same right should be given to people far away, and that can only be done by the revision taking place in different sections of the larger counties.

Mr. HESSON. Look at clause 21.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to see that the hon. member for North Perth is waking up to the necessity of advancing some arguments, although he may be the only one on that side who is, and although his arguments may not be very strong ones. The clause to which the hon, gentleman refers has reference to the final revision, to which I am not alluding. I think the right hon, gentleman is quite correct in introducing this preliminary revision as a necessary prelude, and in order to be that it must take place in different parts of the counties. The week's notice provided for is not sufficient to enable persons to communicate in writing with the revising officer, and if arguments have to be advanced and replied to it is impossible to carry them on by letter in the time specified. I have known two whole days to be occupied in my county by the revision of the voters' list of one small municipality, and I believe the revision of the list for the whole county will take, at least, a week. I know my people, and I know that they will be present themselves to watch the action of the revising barrister. It is absolutely necessary that the preliminary as well as the final revision should take place in every municipality. In the Province of Quebec, if I object to a name on the voters' list, I have to send in my objection to the secretarytreasurer of the municipality, and that officer has himself to give notice to the person whose name is objected to. I think that is a much better proceeding than the one proposed by the First Minister. It is also throwing the work on the person to whom that work belongs, I mean the secretary of the revising officer. The precautions in the Bill with regard to sending a letter, I think, are very insufficient. If notice is to be sent to a person whose name is objected to, it certainly ought to be sent by registered letter, and not by mailed letter, so that it may be sure that the person gets it. The hon, gentleman might object that we are asking something that will greatly increase the work. But he must remember that the chief portion of the work must be done in making the first list, after this new Bill comes into operation, and I do not think it would be asking too much to ask that the revising officer should take the trouble to go to the people, instead of asking the people to come to him.

Mr. HESSON. I think my hon, friend must have over looked the fact that the revising officer is to prepare his list from the evidence furnished him by the assessment rolls in the first instance, and by the voters' lists in the second instance, from which sources of information he ought to be able to place all properly qualified electors on the list. When the notices are so widely distributed, as has been conceded by the Bill, all parties who are not on those lists, as prepared in the first instance by the revising officer, would have an opportunity of appealing when he held his court under clause 15. It is a matter of little importance where that court will be held, or what point he may consider his headquarters, where parties may write to him or appear before him, in person or by proxy. It is only those who are left off the original list, after they have been duly notified, who will have to appear before him in person or by letter. If objection is made it may be made in writing, and the party objected to must be notified. Then he will appear, or some person on his behalf, though he is not bound to appear. Then it is only when the party appears in that particular electoral division, not in the riding, but in the particular part of the riding where the vote may be cast; and when the revising officer appears there, the party concerned goes before him. The proposition of my hon friend is simply to involve an unnecessarily large amount of cost, to require the revising officer to pass through the whole of the district for the purpose of receiving what might be conveyed to him by letter. Hon, gentlemen opposite have said a great deal about the cost of working this Bill, but every proposition they have made to-day has been in the direction of multiplying diffi-culties and increasing the cost to the country. They have They have asked that the notices should be published in all the newspapers. In my own county there are at least twelve newspapers, and it would cost a good deal to publish the list in all these papers.

Mr. WATSON. I would remind the hon member for attends there on a certain day, and if the people raise North Perth (Mr. Hesson) that hon gentlemen on this objections, evidence is taken, the matter is disposed of, and side of the House were, from the first, opposed to this Bill, there is a final revision. Under this Bill the revising on account of its cost and its injustice to the electorate, but since the House has decided that we are to have a Dominion voters' list it is our duty to make it as perfect as possible. If it is going to cost a few dollars more we must not disfranchise people. Now, in the county I have the honor to represent there are twentynine municipalities. From the principal town in that county, Portage la Prairie, it is 175 miles to the municipality of Shell River. I do not think it is fair to compel the people to travel 175 miles to Portage la Prairie to have their names put on the voters' list. Besides, hon. gentlemen must remember that in some electoral districts we have not got regular mails; in some municipalities in my county we have only one mail a week. Now, if a man applied to have his name put on the list it would take him two weeks to get an answer, and before he could be notified of the day of revision it might be too late for him to furnish his evidence. There are a good many reasons why I think it preferable that the revising barrister should visit all the municipalities in preparing his list. It might be a little more costly, but it would be much more convenient for the electors. The idea of having the revising barrister sit in one particular part of the county is a mistake. I think there will be more difficulty in preparing the first list than in revising it afterwards, and if the list is made right in the first place it can only be done by the revising barrister visiting each municipality. There are a great many people who will not understand this new franchise, and unless the revising barrister goes amongst them, to give them an opportunity of being entered on the list, a great many names will not be entered at all. The great object in preparing the list will be to have the names placed on the preliminary list. Then, any person who objects will have the privilege of looking at the list and making objections. Action can be subsequently taken, and evidence adduced to have the name struck off. There is no doubt that a great number of persons may apply to have their names put on who will not be entitled to vote. If that is the case, the revising officer will have it in his discretion to say whether he will allow those names to be put on or not. In the final revision names may be struck off and others inserted. If it is necessary to have this Bill passed it is necessary that precautions should be taken with respect to the first list. It will not be so necessary in subsequent years, because there will be few changes. The revising officer should visit each municipality for the purpose of preparing the preliminary list. It will be a great hardship to persons in counties such as I represent to have to travel long distances at a large expense in order to have their names placed on the first list. The hon. Minister states that both political parties are very active, and that the names will be placed on the first list. I do not think it should be necessary for a man to be constantly watching the voters' list to know whether his name is on it or not. In my county I do not know, personally, one-third of the electors.

Mr. HESSON. You have the assessment roll.

Mr. WATSON. There will be 200 or 300 persons left off that list who should be on it, and it will be difficult to ascertain these facts without incurring much expense. The revising officer should be compelled to visit each municipality in order to make up his primary list.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, gentleman seems entirely to ignore the fact that county court judges, at the present time, go wherever they hold courts of revision and hold a final revision. If any parties desire to appeal they do so at that time and place. Take the county of Perth; there are three places where the judge holds division courts; he attends there on a certain day, and if the people raise objections, evidence is taken, the matter is disposed of, and there is a final revision. Under this Bill the revising officer will have to visit each county independently, and that brings him much closer to individual electors than the present mode.

Mr. WATSON. That explanation will do very well for people who are near the centres of population, but it will not apply to persons far away from centres, and who take but little interest in political affairs. Suppose I were to attempt to look after the voters' names in Marquette, there might be a hundred men qualified to be placed on the list, and I not know it. People may be very intelligent, but they do not care to put themselves to much trouble about having their names on the voters' list.

Mr. HESSON. What advantage will it be to an elector to be placed on the primary list and not on the list finally revised?

Mr. WATSON. If he is on the primary list and is entitled to vote, his name cannot be struck off. Every possible facility should be given to the people to have their names placed on the voters' lists. If Judge Ryan were appointed returning officer in my constituency he would probably sit at Portage la Prairie, from which it is 175 miles to the municipality of Shell River, and there is railway communication for only about 70 miles. At Shell River the mail does not arrive more than once a week, and in other parts once in two weeks. The same difficulties to which I have alluded will prevail in Algoma and Selkirk.

Mr. AUGER. Few of the hon, gentlemen opposite seem to be willing to take the First Minister's word about anything; but I am willing to take it, so far as it goes. The returning officer, it is said, will be an independent officer, and will follow out the law. What is the law? It is provided in section 12 that the revising officer shall prepare the lists of persons who are entitled to be registered as voters; that is the first step. The next step is set forth in clause 15, which points out that notice must be given to the parties against whom objections are raised. If they want a name entered on the list, or taken off, they must notify him. By clause 17, after he has initialed these cases they are decided—they are final. There is no appeal, because it would simply be an appeal to the revising officer himself, and that is not provided for. By clause 25 provision is made both as to the preliminary and final revision, as to the examining of witnesses, the production of books and documents, just as in any court of record.

An hon. MEMBER. That is for the final examination. Mr. AUGER. No; that is for the preliminary as well as for the final.

An hon. MEMBER. No; it is for the final.

Mr. AUGER. Well, if the hon. gentleman cannot understand plain English it is not my fault, and if the hon. gentleman will study the law he will see that it is as I have stated. If he cannot make it clear, let him consult some of the lawyers on his own side, and he will find that this is for the preliminary as well as for the final revision. This shows that the work will actually be done at the preliminary revision. It will be at that revision that names will be added and taken off, and therefore I say that that revision should take place in each municipality, and the final revision in the county, where any errors may be corrected which may have been overlooked in the first revision. Perhaps that was the intention of the framer of the law, but he may have got the thing turned around, as in the case of clauses 15 and 16, where he got the wrong clause first. In my own county, for instance, there are fourteen muncipalities, and some of the people live at a great distance from the centre. Both parties would have to bring witnesses, and if one party was not present the others would practically settle the matter, the list would be initialed and the others would have no remedy. But if the work were inpon it by the hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). distributed over the municipalities it could be attended to The 12th clause provides the way in which these lists are Mr. Heston.

properly and at much less expense, and it must be remembered that most of the expense will fall on the candidates, or leaders of the party, as a great many of the electors do not take much interest in matters of this kind, and therefore the question is one of equal interest to hon. members on both sides of this House. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite do not care much about the expense, and especially the First Minister, so long as it carries out his own political ends. I hope the amendment will be adopted, especially as it would involve no more cost to the Government, and no more trouble to the revising officer, while it would save thousands of dollars to the candidates, or to the electors. In my own county it would take at least three or four weeks if the preliminary revision was made in one place whereas, if it were carried on in each municipality it would require very much less time and expense.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I think it is very important that this section of the Bill should be amended in the way proposed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). It is a mistaken idea that hon, gentlemen opposite are laboring under, that the Opposition are trying to prevent the perfecting of this measure or to increase the cost of operating it. I think we ought to have a common interest in this matter, now that the majority have decided that we shall have this Bill; and therefore it is in the interest of both parties that we should make the Bill as perfect in all its details as possible. It will be admitted that in the Province of Ontario, at least, we have now facilities for the preparation, revision, and final revision of the voters' list which we shall not possess under this Bill. We all know that we have our local courts of revision, where the electors who live in the municipalities can readily be present, and we do not want to put the electors throughout the Dominion to any greater trouble than they are now compelled to undergo in order to perfect their lists. I think it is just as much in the interest of hon. gentlemen supporting the Government that this alteration should be made in the Bill as it is in the interest of hon. gentlemen on this side. Under the present system the electors are not required to send notices or letters to any persons residing at a distance, and it must also be borne in mind that there are a large number of electors in the different constituencies of the Dominion who are not regular and constant readers of newspapers, and who may not have an opportunity of learning the provisions of this Bill. In introducing a new law of this kind, we must take into account the difficulties a great many of the electors will have to contend with under it. Although we have been discussing this Bill for a long time, it appears to me that there are some gentlemen in this House who do not yet fully understand it; and if that is the case with intelligent representatives of the people, how can you expect those electors who have no such opportunities to become acquainted with its provisions. Therefore, it would be in the interest of gentlemen opposite, as well as in our interest, on this side, that every facility should be afforded to the electors in the preparation of the first list. Even supposing that the expense for the preparation of the first list will be made greater than at present by the amendment, it will be a justifiable expense; but I do not admit that the expense will be greater. The amount of money saved to the country at large will be much greater than the increased wages paid to the revising barristers for these various visitations. This is a matter that not only affects the electors; it affects, also, the time and expense incurred by gentlemen who hold seats in this House, and who will have an interest in seeing that the lists are properly prepared and revised. It is plain, to my mind, that the interpretation that should be put upon this first revision of the voters' list is not the interpretation put to be prepared; it provides that the revising officer shall obtain his information from the provincial lists and the assessment rolls, and by any other means that he may be able to avail himself of. The next section provides he shall publish the list, and that afterwards he shall hold a court; and I contend that the court he holds for the preliminary revision of the list is as much a court as the final court he holds. I agree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher). In the Ontario system it is not required that the elector should go to the trouble of notifying parties against whom he objects or whom he wishes to be put on the list. That duty should be given to the revising officer. If I desire to have a number of electors struck off, because I believe they are not entitled to be on the list, I do not think I should be required to discharge the duty of an officer of the law, and notify these parties. I do not see how it can be denied that this is a court. It is as much a court as the final court of revision, as will be seen by referring to the 25th section. If it is not intended that the revising officer shall sit in court, but that he shall merely receive his applications by letter, without examining witnesses, why is it stated that he is to be governed by all the rules of a court of record, and that he is to sit in judgment on the evidence? I do not see what objection there can be to passing the amendment. Not only to save ourselves expense and trouble, but in the interests of the electors, it should be adopted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fail to see what earthly objection there can be in allowing the revising officer to go to the municipalities. As matters stand in Ontario, the people there have the convenience that the lists are made up and the court of revision held in each municipality, a court which holds a position closely analogous to that occupied by the revising barrister at this preliminary investigation; and then when an appeal lies to the county court judge he goes round to each municipality and holds his court there. The First Minister has shown himself disposed to accept suggestions to night. This is a case in which he ought to continue showing that good disposition. There is no doubt whatever that to compel men to travel thirty or forty miles to the revising barrister is a great tax on them, and with the probability, then, that they will have to wait for several days together before each particular case can be taken up. The right hon, gentleman said that the representatives of each party would take the matter in hand, that they would make application to have men put on or off, in a wholesale manner, 300 or 400 at a time. If it goes, as the First Minister appears to think it will go, into the hands of the associations, or of persons employed by them, these things will be argued, especially in the first instance, at very considerable length. It is quite likely that very nearly as long a time will be taken up in considering these various cases, especially in the preliminary organisation, as would ordinarily be occupied in the disposal of an assize, and the First Minister knows-no one better -that that may take seven, eight, nine or ten days, or possibly a fortnight. It would not so much matter it the thing were thoroughly understood, but I repeat that it is not understood. A number of curious objections are likely to be taken in the first instance, where you are applying a new statute, every word of which is going to be litigated, in all probability, by the parties employed by the respective political parties. It is quite clear that the First Minister, or whoever drafted this Bill, expected that these people would be present, as the next clause shows. It would be a very great and unnecessary hardship to insist on all these persons coming to one particular point in an electoral district, and I think the First Minister should either concede it is not to be supposed that the hon, gentleman can decide them at once. He has conceded some other points, and I think he would do well to take this into his consideration,

Mr. WELDON. No doubt the principle has been affirmed by the committee, but there are many salient points which require careful consideration. This preliminary revision is important, because the list then made will be the basis of the lists to be used hereafter. It was originally proposed that a complete list should be made out of the whole électoral district, but that has been departed from, and I think the First Minister has wisely conceded the point, that before any preliminary revision, the alphabetical list should be made out for each municipal or parochial division. The preliminary list will be the list on which future lists will be based, and to some extent the powers of revising barristers are restricted in regard to the final list. The Bill provides that the revising barrister shall hold a sitting at such place in the constituency as he may deem necessary. The right of the franchise belongs to every one who is qualified under the law, and he should have that right with as little expense as possible. The expense, if any, should be borne by the country and not by the individual; but the revising officer having power to hold his sitting in any part of the electoral division, those who desire to appear before him must go there at their own expense. It is true that the Prime Minister says they need not go at all; but, especially in regard to the preliminary list, a man will want to see whether he is there or not, whether he is to remain there, and, more particularly, whether any objection has been made to his name. He will want to attend in person. Otherwise, the county judge or the revising barrister will act as we know the judges act, ex necessitate rei, when the parties fail to attend. This is to be a court of record, with the power to bring witnesses. In New Brunswick you are creating an entirely new tenure, and how is the revising officer, sitting in the centre of a county, such as Westmoreland, Northumberland or York, very large counties, ranging over 100 miles, from one end to the other, to ascertain the different classes of persons entitled to vote, who are not shown on the assessment rolls, or in any other way, unless the revising barrister receives the information by letter. If the revising officer holds his court in the locality he has the party there on the spot who can give him information, but who would not be present if the court was held 50 miles from his home. No person is going to attend this court of the revising barrister in the centre of the county unless he has some particular object. Take, for instance, a district which the revising barrister never visited. How is he going to ascertain whether the electors have a right to be on the list? He knows nothing about them, and the result is, the list will be imperfect. The whole scheme of the Bill was placed upon the principle of their being one list; that having now been altered, it seems to me we should at once provide that the revising officer shall hold his court in each locality, in order that he may see the people, and hear objections, and obtain information upon which to frame his preliminary list. This preliminary revision is particularly important, because it is to be the basis of the final revision; and, practically, it will be the basis of every future registration, from year to year. It may increase the expense a little for the revising barrister to visit the different municipalities, but it will save expense to the people, who, otherwise, might have to travel 50 or 60 miles from home, or else make up their minds to remain off the list. As the revising barrister is paid by salary, the only additional expense will be in his travelling expenses. It seems to me that to do justice to all the electors, to have a thorough investigation of the this or reserve the point for further consideration and dis-different franchises, to get all those upon the list who are cussion. These matters often come up unexpectedly, and entitled to go on, and to get rid of those who are not entitled, it is absolutely necessary to make such a preliminary list in the different parishes or municipalities, where parties can attend and be heard, and where the revising officer shall have the opportunity, not only of hearing the parties, but, if necessary, of obtaining information as to the relative position of the voters, as to the tenants, farmers' sons, and others qualified under the different franchises. I contend it would be utterly impossible for him, at a distance, to give a fair valuation. Either he will be biassed by some particular individual from whom he obtains information or he will not be able to get the information at all The only additional expense involved would be the travelling expenses of the judges. On the other hand, great expense would be saved to the people interested. Take the case of the county of St. John: If the revision were held at the city of St. John it would take parties at the eastern end of the county three or four days to reach there, involving great expense and loss of time. If, however, the revision were held at the village of St. Martin's, the parties would be put to little expense.

Mr. DAWSON. The big district I represent has been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite as furnishing an instance where the provisions of this Bill would not apply. I merely rise to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the district—although very large, as an electoral district—is divided into two judicial districts, with two judges, who have the esteem and respect of the whole community, and who will, no doubt, make excellent revising officers.

Mr. MILLS. There can only be one of them appointed

Mr. DAWSON. Either of them would make a good officer. The district has now a population of about 55,000, and yet I do not see any great difficulty in working this clause, except in one instance, at Moose Factory, where there are about 250 white settlers, who should have the franchise. Where there is a will there is always a way of getting over these difficulties. I am exceedingly pleased to see hon. gentleman opposite taking such an interest in the district I represent, and always bringing it forward as an example of something good. I must, however, say that very early in the Session I had to answer an enquiry of a very distinguished member of the Opposition as to where it is; he positively did not know where Algoma is. Although it is coming into notice now, and notwithstanding that hon members from the Maritime Provinces tell us so much about their great districts and the vast interests they represent, the whole of the Maritime Provinces, with Newfoundland added, might be put down in Algoma, and yet there would be plenty of space left. I merely rose to say that notwithstanding the great size of my district the Act can be worked in it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It must be a source of gratification that while the hon, member for Algoma had to give us a mild lecture last night about hon, members talking of their own ridings, yet to-night he has drawn attention to his own district. It has furnished one of the many instances of how the Act will work. We need not, however, take so extreme a case as the hon, gentleman's riding, for this clause is objectionable in the riding of any hon, gentleman opposite, except in the case of an electoral district comprised within the boundaries of a city. The amendment proposed by the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is one that ought to be pressed on the First Minister until he gives some intimation that he will be prepared to consider it. It has been charged by an hon, member that the adoption of the amendment would very much increase the cost; and the charge was made that it was the desire of the Opposition to make the Bill as expensive as possible. That charge will not lie, because Mr. Weldon.

of the Bill. It might, however, be argued that since the principle was adopted we had tried to make it more expensive. That would be a fair statement to make; but it would require to be proved that the changes proposed would add to the cost. That would be a difficult task to undertake. If you might suppose that it would add to the cost of the revising barristers if they held sittings in different places instead of in one place, the expense has been located by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), who has pointed out that the expense would only be augmented by the amount of the travelling expenses of the revising officer. But the expense connected with this Bill is not to be fully comprehended by the expense attending the revising officer. The revising officer and many of the electors have to be brought together, and in getting them together there must be more or less expense involved. If you take the revising officer to the individual he will have to incur expense. If you have to bring individuals to the revising barrister the expense will have to be incurred and defrayed by the individuals; but if it might appear to be a charge upon the Consolidated Revenue, it would still remain a fact that under the operation of the Bill the cost to the country would be much less, for it is a simple proposition, that in taking the greater numbers to the less, there must be a larger expense. Then, Sir, looking at it in that light, if the Bill is put in operation is it not fair to charge on the revenues of the Dominion of Canada, the expense attendant upon it being put in operation? I think no one will care to controvert that proposition; and, therefore, having adopted a Dominion franchise, the fundamental requisite is that all who are entitled to be registered as voters, should be on the list, and that those who are ineligible shall not be allowed to remain thereon. That being established, the question of expense becomes a secondary question. The principle must be maintained that justice must be done, no matter what the expense may be; and having decreed that we shall bring the Bill into operation, we are bound to see that justice is done to all, even if some expense may attend it. There is still another reason, and that is, that people of this country have been accustomed to have every facility for rectifying errors in connection with the lists, such as they will have under the operation of the amendment now proposed. In the Province of Ontario, with which I am best acquainted, they have every facility of that kind, and that being the case, they are entitled to demand, at the hands of this House, in passing a Franchise Bill, that they shall not be called upon to go to any more expense or trouble in a preliminary revision of the voters' list than under the existing system. Just imagine the state of affairs if the clause, in its present shape, is adopted. I will not take an extreme case, but an ordinary electoral district. A court will be held for the preliminary revision of the list, and the inhabitants will be required to repair to this one place. My impression is, that the errors which will have to be rectified on this list, considering the manner in which it is prepared, will run up to the hundreds, or, at any rate, to the scores, and the court may, therefore, have to go on from day to day, and these persons will be at the expense of remaining at this place during the court, or else their homes, at a great expense of time and money. Let me call attention to the cost which may be put on the individual so summoned to attend this court at the mere whim of the revising barrister. (The hon. gentleman here quoted sections 38 and 39 of the Bill). This revising officer, sitting at a central place, in a large electoral district, upon a person making application to him to have an error in the list rectified, may say that he wants to hear a little more about this case, and, at his own instance, summon men from distant parts of the county to come there arrives he may be proceeding with another case on the roll, | electoral district. I differ with the First Minister as to the and the court may have to adjourn over the night. All the witnesses have to remain; another day's court may be held, and after all these expenses have been incurred the revising officer, as sole arbiter and dictator, can turn around and say: I assess you who have made application to have your name placed on the list for all the costs and expenses of these witnesses whom I have summoned, and having heard their testimony, I find, after all, that you are not entitled to be placed on the list. That is possible—shall I say, not improbable?—under this Bill. Does the hon. gentleman say that there is no danger of the court holding its sittings day after day, but that the cases will be quickly disposed of? The schedule of the Act with respect to the summoning of witnesses, says that the witnesses are summoned to appear before the revising officer, "and so on, from day to day." You can see that if this clause were maintained as it is, it would be an absolute impossibility, in many cases, for parties to have simple justice done to them; and I hold that above all things the foundation principle ought to be that justice shall be done, and the matter of expense must come in after. On principles of equity, if expense is to be incurred it ought to be borne out of the revenues of the Parliament which is making this one of the statutes of the land, and ought not to be placed on the shoulders of an innocent person seeking to vindicate his rights. Every consideration points in the direction of the amendment of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I venture to say that no defense worthy of the name can be offered for this clause, as it stands in the Bill, and I hope that representations so strong and so persistent shall be made on this side of the House, that the hon. First Minister will be led to give an intimation that it is his intention to accept the very reasonable and proper amendment that has been offered.

Mr. FLEMING. The clause now under consideration provides that one week before the sitting of the court, any person having any objection to any of the names on the list may give notice to the revising officer, and to the person objected to, that he entertains such objection. Any person desiring-

Mr. VAIL. It appears to me, seeing that we met at half past one to-day and that it is now two o'clock, that the First Minister should consent to an adjournment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must get through before Christmas.

Mr. FLEMING. Subsequently, the Bill provides that a court shall be held for the purpose of hearing the objections. Surely the observations of the First Minister do not apply to this court, when he says it is not necessary that the parties shall attend. Surely it is asking too much that the parties who apply to the revising officer to have their names inserted on the rolls shall all assemble in one place in the electoral district to answer those objections. It may be that a person living at the extreme end of the county is objected to. He must appear to substantiate his right, or be removed from the roll. It is true, he may make application afterwards to be put on the roll at the final revision; but no elector ought to be deprived of that right; it should not be something that he has to go and seek, at his own inconvenience and expense, but it should be freely accorded to him. Surely the hon, First Minister can see his way to providing that the court shall sit at different localities throughout the district, in order that the applications and the objections may be made and deter-discuss this measure, on the other hand, we must do our mined by the best evidence that can be adduced, the duty to the country, by preventing the House sitting for evidence of the parties interested. Such evidence cannot three or four months more. We have been in session over construction of this clause and the subsequent clause. If I was acting as a revising officer under this Bill I would feel that I had no power under this provision to make any changes in the list, except on the notice that is provided in this section. It is a court of record, and a court of record will only receive such evidence as, in courts of record, can be regarded as evidence. Under clause 17 the revising officer must publicly proceed to the preliminary revision of the list, basing such revision on the evidence and statements before him, and of the persons who may be present. He has no power to put on names suggested to him by letter. Is the revising officer to accept the lists sent to him by a political agent, and add the names, or take names off, without evidence whatever? The whole frame of the Bill regards the revising officer in this investigation as a court intended solemnly to deal with the rights of parties. There are so many serious objections to this clause that I shall not attempt to point them all out. The matter is so outrageous that it cannot be possible the committee will adopt this clause without amendment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved that the committe rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think not; we have discussed this clause for several hours already.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have scarcely discussed it an hour; it was only put about one o'clock. It is a clause to which hon. members do not attach, in the slightest degree, an obstructive sense; it does not, in the slightest degree affect the principle of the Bill, but it is in the highest degree important that this matter should be made one of convenience. We sat until four o'clock yesterday morning; and to be compelled to sit after two o'clock this morning is too great a strain.

Mr. HESSON. Merely to allow hon. gentlemen to talk.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon, gentleman is altogether wrong; this Bill is crudely drawn, and every argument that has been made shows that important alterations have to be made. Some were of very considerable importance, affecting the practical working of the Bill, to a great extent. This particular amendment is one that certainly deserves some consideration. I cannot conceive why any objection should be made to it. It seems to me a thing which might be very fairly conceded, even if there was a little undue pressure on this side. It does not add, to any material extent, to the expense; it is an obvious convenience to the public; and, at any rate, it ought to be considered at a reasonable time in the day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not our fault that this comes so late. We have been seven weeks on this Bill, and though this clause may not have been specially discussed more than an hour or two, as the hon gentleman says, nevertheless the principles involved in this clause have been discussed for weeks. This was foreseen, and was discussed and rediscussed for weeks, day and night. It is true, we were sitting here till half-past three yesterday morning, and it is half-past two now; but the hon. gentleman must see that if we want to finish the business of the House this year we must sit it out; we cannot get slong unless we sit it out. If hon gentlemen want to discuss, we must discuss, but we must show to the public and our constituents that if hon, gentlemen have such a great desire to be adduced before him at one particular place in the four months, and hon gentlemen have taken nearly two months to discuss this measure, and we are at the 15th in the world; it would greatly occupy the time of the clause out of 63.

Mr. MILLS. There are three features in this Bill which hon, gentlemen on this side of the House feel are very objectionable. Two of these have been already disposed of, the Indian question and the revising barrister; and the third is the clause we have now before us. We have discussed the other two objectionable features at such length as to give to the people an opportunity of learning not only the character of the clauses but our views in regard to them. Whether our views are right or wrong, they are honestly entertained and they have been fully expressed. This is another clause to which strong objection is felt on this side. We only commenced to discuss it after midnight, and we ask the opportunity to discuss it when the gentlemen who represent the press are in the gallery, and when there is time to give it fuller consideration. As the Government yielded nothing of a practical character on the other points, we hoped they would have met what we believed to be the wishes and convenience of the country on this question, and we ask the opportunity of discussing it at a reasonable hour. My hon. friend, a few evenings ago, came to an understanding, that a certain division should be taken at a reasonable hour, and I heard the Prime Minister ask whether it was a reasonable hour after 11 o'clock. Yet he has us here from one o'clock till after two in the morning, maintaining that two is a reasonable hour. It is after two now, and we want an opportunity of a fuller discussion on this clause.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS. I say it honestly, and this is not a reasonable hour for that full and frank discussion which it should

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). We have disposed of three very important clauses, to day and this clause involves considerations of the first possible consequence. It is rather hard that we should be asked to discuss this question at this hour in the morning, after sitting till nearly four o'clock yesterday morning. Several gentlemen on this side desire to discuss the clause. I desire to say something on it myself, but at this hour it is not fair for the Government to ask us to proceed. I do not think anything will be lost or gained by an adjournment now, except that we will have a night's rest and will preserve our health. The First Minster has asked us to make suggestions, but we cannot do that in an intelligent way at this hour.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I have shown that whenever any amendment was proposed or suggestion made from the other side that fairly met my judgment, I tried to meet it, and even in cases where I thought there was no necessity for an amendment, yet it was pressed so strongly, either that the clause was not specific enough or that it might be made more apt, that I yielded my own opinions in order to meet the views of the gentlemen opposite. But in this case I must say that I am satisfied that the clause is a good one, and that the mode of getting this preliminary revision prescribed by the Act is the best one; and it occurs to me, either that the clause must be dropped and we must have the final revision without this preliminary meeting, or we must insist upon it as it is. I cannot at all entertain the proposition which was made from the other side, that we are to have two expensive circuits, by which the revising barrister is twice to revising barrister, and therefore greatly increase expense. Moreover, it would greatly disincline the judges, whom I desire to have as revising barristers, to accept office, if they were, in one year, obliged to make two circuits, withdrawing them from their ordinary avocations. In my opinion, there is not the slightest necessity for it. This preliminary meeting is so valuable that I do not wish to see it wiped out of the Act. It is inexpensive; it will enable the judge to prepare a preliminary list, which can afterwards, in circuit, be fully gone into. I cannot, therefore, hold out any hope that any arguments used by the hon, gentleman will induce me to concede to any of the amendments made to the clause. I think it is a good clause in itself, and any alteration of it, by extending the circuit, would be a mistake, for the reasons I have given. I can assure the hon. gentleman that, so far as I am able to judge, when this clause is voted upon it will be voted upon as it stands. It may be right; or it may be wrong, but I am satisfied it will be carried as it stands. The hon. gentlemen, as it seems to me, have done their duty in making their protest, and I have no doubt, with the Speaker in the Chair, this and the other important clauses will hereafter be fully discussed. Therefore, I do not think hon gentlemen should press a further discussion in committee, but allow us to go on; let this be carried, and afterwards it can be discussed fully, when the hon. gentlemen, in the face of day, can vindicate their objections to the clause as it now stands.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The result of the hon. gentleman's course is this; that those of us who have not expressed our opinion on this question will be deprived of the opportunity. I know there are several gentlemen who desire to discuss it on its merits, but at this nour of the morning it will be utterly useless to attempt it. It serves no purpose to discuss it at this hour. The discussions will not be reported in the newspapers, and we know that even in Hansard, at this late hour of the morning, discussions generally do not receive that attention they otherwise would.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Discuss it on concurrence and on the third reading.

Mr. CAMERON. But if we discuss it now we do not require to discuss it on the third reading.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would remind the hon. gentleman that there is a motion before the House for adjournment, which I think will receive the support of both sides of the House. I heartily support the motion to adjourn.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Three clauses have been passed to-day, which is greater progress than has been made on any occasion since this Bill has been under discussion. There would have been no difficulty whatever, if hon. memters on this side had been so disposed, in protracting the discussion on the first clause.

Mr. MULOCK. The motion that the committee rise is a most reasonable one. Considerable progress has been made. We are now on a peace footing. If we are now told, at a quarter to three o'clock, that there shall be no cessation of labor, I cannot accept that determination except as an intimation of a desire to terminate existing relations and to declare war. I dare say the minds of those who have expressed themselves against the clause are also pretty determined, but it may be that after a pleasant sleep and meeting again at the proper hour we will be able to see the go round every section of the constituency, in order to matter in a different light. It may be that we can find make the list. I think that one is quite sufficient. some common meeting ground in this matter, and if so, an It would be a criminal waste of money; it would do no good end of the issue on this point having been reached, we will proceed to the next clause, knowing that nothing has occurred to mar the relations which now prevail. Speaking in all sincerity, I believe it will be for the interests of the majority to be reasonable, under the circumstances, and to carry this motion.

Amendment negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That motion being disposed of, I would say now, that in the hope of making greater progress than one clause a day, and that we will be met in the spirit promised by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that we will make substantial progress, I move that the committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2:45 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 3rd June, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE-CORPUS CHRISTI.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That when the House adjourns this day, it will stand adjourned until Friday at 1.30, and that when it adjourns on Friday it will stand adjourned until Saturday, at 1.30, and that Government measures will have precedence, on that day, after routine.

Motion agreed to.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 15,

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island will be carried, for, if the clause passes as it stands, and only one court of revision is held in each riding, it will cause great inconvenience and expense. It would practically mean that there would be no revision at all, because the expense of bringing witnesses so far will be too great to bear. For instance, in my own riding, if the court was held in the centre of the riding, we would have to bring people some forty or fifty miles, and that is a thing altogether impracticable. I think we should hold a court at least in each municipality, in accordance with the system now in force in the Province of Ontario, a system which gives very general satisfaction. I think it would be even better if we could have a court in every electoral sub-division, as it would be a great convenience to the people and would lessen the cost of appeal. In many of the ridings the people would probably have to go twice as far as in my own, and it would be impossible for the candidates to bear the expense of bringing the witnesses so far. I think the amendment is one which should commend itself to the judgment of the Government, if they wish to consult the convenience of the people, the convenience of the candidates, and the expense to which they will be put.

Mr. DAVIES. I must say that I was extremely disaplyiven a week beforehand, the publishing of the list in pointed in the explanation the Prime Minister gave of his every electoral sub-division, notice to the returning officer, understanding of the meaning of this section, and of the duties the revising officer would have to discharge at the preliminary revision.

Mr. McCALLUM. Question.

Mr. DAVIES. We are going to talk to the question, and I ask the attention of the hon. member for Monck for a few moments, while we carefully discuss it.

Mr. McCALLUM. Well, talk about it then; but you are simply standing still.

Mr. DAVIES. We cannot hope to convince the hon, gentleman if he will turn away and not try to understand the section.

Mr. McCALLUM. Let the hon. gentleman go on, and not stand there saying nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman is most unreasonable. If he will listen to me a moment, he will see that from the standpoint from which we view this section it is absolutely essential that the amendment should be accepted; for if I were a revising officer, acting as a judicial officer, I certainly would not put the construction on this section that the Prime Minister intimates he would put upon it. Now, the First Minister's explanation of the preliminary revision is simply this: Instead of being a revision in the legal sense of the term, where a preliminary list is taken and alterations made, in accordance with legal evidence and with legal rules, which would do justice to both sides and ensure an impartial list, it is simply a preliminary making up of names. Let us see what antecedent work is to be done before you come to this revision. The revising officer has to obtain a certified copy of the revised list of voters. He then obtains a certified copy of the assessment roll, and from those two sources of information he is supposed to gather sufficient information to enable him to make up a proper voters' list. But inasmuch as he has not local knowledge, the First Minister says that the officer must look about and get some additional information. After he has gained all possible information from the assessment roll, the voters' list, and from private letters sent to him by those who wish to add to or subtract from the list, and all information from any source to which he has applied, he then takes the list and prints it. He is directed to furnish a copy of that printed list—a list made up after he has exhausted all sources of information—to every official in the county. More than that. It must be made up according to electoral sub-divisions, to ensure that those who possess local knowledge will be able to examine it, and see if fair play has been done. Then, if you object to any names, you have to give notice a week before the revision to the revising officer that you object to a certain name or names; or if you wish to place a name on the list, you have to give a similar notice. Then the court is held in a public place in the county, and it must be intended that such shall a public court in the sense in which that term is generally understood, where there is a presiding judge, who will decide on the conflicting evidence given by both sides. Take my own county. A revision is to be held at Charlottetown. Say I object to 100 names of men who live about eighty miles away in one part of the county, and in he same way to a number of names of persons who live at the other end of the county. If those 200 men do not come to the court on the day named, what will be the result? The First Minister tells us that this is not going to be a public court—that the men need not come in. What, then, is the meaning of all the notices to be given a week beforehand, the publishing of the list in that I am going to object to John Smith's name, if, when the court is opened, the returning officer is able to say: I have received a private note from John Smith, and I will put him on or off the list as I please? That is not going to be a revision, when a partisan returning officer can add or strike off names without hearing evidence. Let the First Minister strike these sections out of the Bill-the whole thing is worse than a farce, because you impose on those who want the list to be correct a heavy expenditure for travelling 80 or 100 miles to see whether the objection is going to be sustained or not, and then the revising officer can say, following the language of the First Minister: This is not a revision; I have letters before me in regard to these cases, you can come up again on the final revision. This scheme, as outlined by the First Minister, is one that will work serious injustice, if there is a particle of partisanship in the returning officer. At the final revision the parties will again have to incur a like expense. Either strike out the preliminary revision altogether, or strike out from the Bill all provisions which prima facie would lead any reasonable man to imagine that there was to be a real revision of some kind. This, I say, will be worse than a farce; because, instead of taking evidence he will decide questions on private letters. The draughtsman of the Bill must have intended this to be a real revision, and in order to have such the revision officer must go to the locality. It is monstrons—it is an injustice of the worst kind to drag men 50, 60 or 80 miles to sustain applications to add names, or to refute objections. The First Minister has deliberately placed on the list in my county 800 or 900 names, well knowing that not one of the men will be entitled to vote. He compels the revising officer to put them on the list, because he says the poll book must govern you as to making up the first list. In order to have those names struck out I shall have to procure evidence from many quarters. It is going to cost an enormous amount of money to bring such evidence into court, and even then the judge may tell me: I have a private letter from your opponent, and I am not going to strike the names off. I appeal to the common sense and honesty of the committee to say whether they approve of such a scheme. It is very well for the hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) to sit there and laugh.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon, gentleman makes a man of straw and then knocks him down. He always does so.

Mr. DAVIES. What is the straw? Is it that the revision is not intended to be a real revision, but that the returning officer will take letters of private information furnished, not publicly, but privately; not given on oath, but in some other way, and decide the matter sitting in his private office and not in a court. The seventeenth section provides that the revising officer shall publicly proceed to the preliminary revision of the list, basing such revision on the evidence and statements before him, and so on. It is no doubt on the word "statements," that the First Minister bases his explanation. In large constituencies where there are 6,000 or 7,000 voters, the expense involved in producing evidence will be so large that no man of moderate means will be able to bear it unless he is supplied with money by some association. It opens the door by which a returning officer can do wrong without laying himself open to punishment or impeachment. It is a scheme by which an unjust revising officer can make up the lists so that they will all be in favor of one party. It will not be a just revision, but one which may contain the names of those only on one side. No doubt, some judges would pay very little attention to the statements of the First Minister with respect to the scheme, and would decide cases on evidence submitted. I submit that the preliminary revision is the main revision, especially in this case, when you are making up the voters' list for the first time. It is not going to be repeated every Mr. DAVIES.

year, and therefore the cry of expense is not a just cry. The list made in the first year is to be the basis for all future years. It must, therefore, be fought out then; and it is essential that it be fought out justly and fairly to both sides, and fought out in the locality where the voters live. The system which centralises the preliminary revision, 70 or 80 miles from where the voters live, is an unjust system, and will be worked to the advantage of one party if the revising officer allows himself to be made a partisan, which I am afraid he will do in some cases—I do not say in all. I hope this matter will not be treated in the spirit of levity that the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) displays towards it; it is too serious a matter to be so treated. If there is a clause in this Bill that requires exhaustive and thorough discussion, this is the clause. I believe the whole Bill hinges upon it. In its present shape I look upon it as worse than the revising barrister or the Indian clause. The putting on the list of 100 or 200 Indians is not so bad as the clause that enables the revising officer, in my constituency, for instance, to put 600 or 700 persons on the list who he thinks should have votes, and does not give me an opportunity to have the list revised in the locality where the men live, and where I could bring evidence to show that they did not own property and had not the right to vote. I trust the matter will receive greater consideration than it has yet received, and that hon members will not treat it lightly, because I look upon this clause as one of the most serious in the Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. The committee adjourned last night in the hope, I think, that a night's reflection would enable us to find some fair solution to this problem. The Bill, in providing for a court of revision, contemplates both parties being able to be present, but it is quite clear that at the court of revision proposed it will be practically impossible for the public to be present. I think there is a fair middle course which, if adopted, would be productive of no harm, and would, perhaps, accomplish the main object of the mover of the Bill. It is idle to go through the form of offering to the electorate a court unless they can take advantage of that court. The map of the Dominion, especially of the Province of Ontario, furnishes sufficient proof that the public will not be able to attend the court. Some of the ridings in the Province of Ontario are of extraordinary shapes and proportions. Take, for example, the riding of North Ontario, which is, I believe, over 100 miles in length, and proportions. in some places only eight or ten miles in width. It is idle to offer to the electorate of that riding the advantages of a court which is to sit in but one part of the riding, because it must, on the average, be nearly fifty miles distant from the homes of the electorate. An objection from the homes of the electorate. An objection may be made against a name upon the list, and the judge is obliged to adjudicate upon that objection at this preliminary court of revision according to the evidence then before him. The person who makes the objection may be the only person present to give evidence upon it; the man whose name is objected to may be at home fifty miles or more distant; therefore, the revising officer will be entitled to decide on the ex parte statement of the objector, and so the matter will go by default against the respondent. It is quite clear then that the names of many persons may be got off the list by any one deciding to take advantage of their difficulties, or their distance from the place where the court is held. I endorse the suggestion made at the close of the sitting last night by the hon member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain), that the powers of the revising officer at this preliminary sitting shall be limited to the adding of names to the list, and that he shall not have power to strike off. I think that would to some extent overcome the objections now offered to the clause.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The clause under discussion is one of the most important clauses in the whole Bill. Its importance cannot be thoroughly appreciated without careful consideration, not only of clause 15, but of clauses 13, 14, 17. 25 and 39, all of which are intimately connected with it. The importance of this Bill is not sufficiently appreciated by hon. gentlemen opposite, because they take their views from the hon. the First Minister, who, last night, declared that he attached no importance to this clause, and had even some doubts whether it ought not to be dropped altogether. Now I could understand the proposition of the First Minister if it were a proposition that the revising barrister, in the first instance, should have the power himself of creating a voters' list on the basis of the information he is authorised to get under the 12th clause of the Bill. Under that clause, he is authorised by law to procure from the local authorities a certified copy of the assessment roll and a certified copy of the last revised list of voters. He is also authorised by the amendment of the First Minister to procure from the local authorities a certified copy of the voters' lists for the last local election; and in Prince Edward Island he is authorised to procure a certified copy of the poll book at the last election. material the revising officer were authorised to prepare the voters' lists in the first instance, I could understand that proposition, and there should be a final revision held in open court in the several municipalities at which applications can be made to have names put on and off the list. I could understand that proceeding, but I cannot understand the necessity of this preliminary court of revision for the revision of the voters' lists prepared by the revising officer from the data supplied to him by the local authorities. You will find, by reference to the Bill, that from this data the revising officer is authorised himself to prepare the list. After he has prepared the list, he is compelled to procure a sufficient number of copies to be printed and circulated among the local officials. By section 13, copies have to be posted up in the offices of the clerks of the municipality and others, and by clause 14, as amended, two copies are to be sent to every postmaster in the electoral district, who shall post them up and keep them posted up from the time of the first publication to the time of the sitting of the court of revision. I could understand these several clauses if the power of the revising officer stopped there, until it became necessary to make the final revision of the voters' lists. So far he is empowered by this Bill to obtain from the local authorities the material from which he will be enabled to make up the voters' list. He is compelled to publish the list, and if his duties were then limited to a final revision by him of the voters' list so circulated and distributed, giving all parties opportunities of being heard, I could understand this provision. But he is compelled by section 15 to do more than that. On the publication of the list, any person who sees fit to complain of any names upon it is authorised to give notice to the revising officer and to the person complained against of his objection, and by section 15, after the time fixed for the giving of such notice, one week before the day fixed for such preliminary revision, the revising officer is compelled to hold court. Why? What is the object? is compelled to hold court.

Who are bound to attend? The revising officer, under section 15, is bound to hold this court, an open court, a court of record, a court having all the power and authorities vested in it that an ordinary court of record has -he is bound to consider all the complaints made against the voters' lists as prepared by himself. Section 25, you will find, defines what his authorities and powers are to be. He is to have all the power of any court of record in the Province, as to compelling the attendance of witnesses, the production of books and documents, and the taking of evidence under oath, and generally all the power necessary to enable him to carry out all the purposes of the Act. It is nonsense to say that this preliminary court is of no consequence, that it court that is authorised to be held under it, and under clauses is a court at which no evidence is necessary. The revising 17, 25 and 39, this court for the preliminary investigation barrister is bound by all the rules with respect to the acceptance and rejection of evidence and the mode of trial, as fully as if he were a judge of any county court. Section 39 depicts the pewers and authorities with which this court is invested. The revising officer shall have the power to summon witnesses and obtain necessary information to perfect his list, and has power to punish persons summoned, who negleet to attend, as for a contempt of court. Reading sections 25 and 39 in connection with section 15, the hon. gentleman will see that this preliminary court for the revision of voters' lists is a court charged with the authority and power that is vested in a superior court of record in any Province. Any power which can be vested in a superior court of record is vested in this court for the preliminary investigation of the voters' lists. The First Minister wants the House to believe that the revising officer can act upon any letter sent to him by any elector or non-elector. deny that. If the Bill passes in its present shape, the revising officer is a judge, with the same power and rights possessed by a judge, and he can only act according to the rules of evidence in the Province in which the court is held. The 17th section points out the duties the revising officer is to discharge. He has to proceed, after public notice, in a public way to investigate this voters' list, and the evidence must be given in the same way as in an ordinary court. The First Minister wants us to understand that it is not necessary that anyone should attend, that it would be perfect folly for anyone to attend in person, because the power of the revising officer is a purely ministerial power. He is simply to put on the names of any persons who ought to be put on the voters' list. If the First Minister's interpretation is correct, what is the meaning of clause 15, which compels persons to give a notice to the revising officer of those whom they may object to? That indicates that there is some issue to be tried. The only way in which that can be tried is the way the law prescribes, and that is laid down in section 17. Clause 15 presupposes that there will be a court for the trial; otherwise the notice required to be given would be an absurdity. If the revising officer is only bound to hold one court in an electoral district, with a population of perhaps 30,000 individuals, the inevitable result will be that one man in the district can compel everyone else to attend that court under the penalty of having his name struck off. The revising officer is not bound to take evidence as to a man's right to be put on, not even the assessment roll and the voters' list. He can act upon other testimony, and can put names on without any evidence whatever. If you object to their being on and give the necessary notice, the persons objected to must attend this court or the names will be struck off. The effect of this clause is most serious, and I am satisfied that neither the First Minister nor his supporters have realised the gravity of the situa-tion, and the inevitable result which will follow if this clause is carried in its integrity. Now, it is perfectly clear that you can compel the attendance of an elector if you see fit, under penalty of putting his name off the list. He has to travel to the county town, perhaps 30, 50, or 70 miles, in some cases; and if he does not attend, or employs some professional man to attend for him, his name is hable to be struck off the voters' list. There is no provision, even that he can attend by proxy or by attorney. I apprehend that under clause 17, if he wishes his name to remain he must attend himself, and satisfy the revising officer that he has a right to have his name on the veters' list. Now, look at the consequence of that, the trouble, the annoyance, the expense to which the electors of any particular constituency will be put by reason of this preliminary revision. Then there is another point of great consequence. Under this clause 15, and the court that is authorised to be held under it, and under clauses of the preliminary list, is a court of record. It has all the powers of a court of record; it tries the case upon the merits; it investigates the right of a man to be on the voters' list. Now every lawyer knows perfectly well that when a case is tried upon the merits the court cannot try that case again; it has passed beyond the region of discussion unless upon appeal. But we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that this is a court for the preliminary investigation, and that there is another appeal from the judgment of the revising officer who revises the list under the preliminary court of revision. I doubt that. I am strongly of opinion that if complaint is made to the revising officer at the court held for the preliminary revision, and if the case is tried and evidence is gone into on both sides, and judgment given, that concludes any further investigation as to the right to vote or not with respect to that voters' list. Now, if that is so, the effect will be that if a person does not attend at the first court, believing that he has a right to have his name put on at the second court, then if my interpretation of the clause is correct, in that case the man is deprived of his vote altogether; otherwise he has got to attend the preliminary court and the court for the final revision of the voters' list. But even supposing the interpretation of the First Minister is correct, and that he has a right to attend or not, as he likes, at the preliminary court for the investigation of the voters' list in the first instance; and suppose he is correct that the man has a right by law to attend at the second court and to have his right then fully adjudicated, look at the trouble, the expense, and the annoyance to which the electors of the country are likely to be put by being called to attend at two courts when one is quite sufficient. If the First Minister's interpretation is correct, it is clear that every elector in every electoral district in the whole Dominion can be compelled to attend the first court for the preliminary investigation, and again be called upon to attend at the final revision. The revising officer, of his own mere motion, may issue an order and compel them to attend in both cases. I have been unable to discover upon what principle the First Minister can justify the holding of two courts for the revision of the voters' list, even in the first year. What does the clause mean, if my interpretation is not correct? I challenge the First Minister to tell me what other meaning it can have. What are the duties of the revising officer at this first court? The First Minister tells us that all he has got to do is to receive a letter or some communication, and sit in his private office and prepare the voters' list from them. Look at the hon. gentleman's Bill. Is that what this Bill calls for? It calls for a great deal more than that. If the hon. gentleman's view is the view that he wants to prevail with respect to this revision, then let him so mould and modify this clause as to carry out that view. If he leaves this Bill as it stands, then his view cannot be carried out under this clause of the Bill. Now I have said that I could understand the hon. gentleman's proposition if it had been that from the data which the revising officer is to proceed upon under clause 12, namely, a certified copy of the assessment roll, a certified copy of the voters' list, and a certified copy of the old poll book, with such other evidence as the revising officer could gather, that he could prepare a voter's list upon this data in the first instance, and that that list should be the list upon which the final revisions should take place. I can see the simplicity and the inexpensiveness of that, although this puts extraordinary powers into the hands of the revising officers, although those who see fit to complain have a remedy at the court of revision. But then, what is the necessity for this double machinery, for this double-barrelled gun that shoots one way? What is the necessity of complicating the well who the clerk of the revising officer will be, and who his constable will be. We know that in every municipality these officials, appointed by this Government, the creatures of the Government, the hangers-on of this Government, will be canvassing agents for this Government in every municipality, aided and assisted as they will be by the local Conservative association in every one of these contests; and rest assured that no Conservative whose right is in question, or whose right is unquestioned, will be left off that list. They will not require to go to the expense of appealing, but the gentlemen upon that board, when the preparation takes place, will take care that the Liberals who are not represented within that board will be left off, and they will be called upon to incur all this expense, and worry and annoyance, simply to gratify the hon. gentleman's desire to throw impediments and obstacles in the way of the Liberal electoral body getting upon this voters' list. Sir, if the hon. gentleman wanted to act fairly in this matter, and wanted to allow the electors of this country to go upon the voters' list upon the most economical, in the least expensive and least troublesome way, there is a way by which it can be done. If we are bound to have a Dominion franchise, let the revising officer, vested with unlimited power, present the revising officer, desire are expensed. That is all was a size or expense. pare the voters' list and give an appeal. That is all we want. We want plenty of time to file an appeal from the adjudication of the revising officer in order that our rights may be conserved. But if we are going to have a revision, there is only one thing to do: It is in the interests of the people to compel the revising officer to attend in the local municipality, instead of compelling large constituencies, with perhaps 5,000 voters, to dance attendance at the office of the revising officer, perhaps 50 or 60 miles away—it is to compel the revising officer, to whom we propose to pay a handsome salary, to attend in the local municipality where the voters' list is to be prepared, and so that the people may not be obliged to incur enormous expense in making appeals. In the colony of Australia there is an electoral registrar. His powers are not those vested in this revising officer. The head of the office, charged with the administration of that particular branch of the service, sends blank certificates of the right to vote to the different electoral registrars. Any individual who wants his name placed on the list can either go or send to the registrar, satisfy him as to his qualification, and then he has a right to obtain a certificate. In some of the colonies the electoral registrar is bound to leave a blank certificate at the residence of, or send it by mail, post paid, to every individual in the constituency; and that individual fills up the blank, sends it to the revising officer and his name is put on the list, and subsequently upon proper notice being given the revising officer proceeds to revise the list in the manner prescribed by law. If the First Minister would adopt that simple, cheap, convenient system, it is one which would meet with the approbation of the electors. The hon, gentleman if he wants to do right as between the people and the Government must modify this Bill. He must compel the revising officer to hold his court in the municipality in question. The hon, gentleman tells us, why go there; look at the expense and trouble. But if the hon. gentleman is bound to enter upon the dangerous experiment of creating a Dominion voters' list, if he is bound at the end of 18 years to enter upon this experiment, he must enter upon it with true sense of all the consequences that must inevitably follow such an experiment. One of the results is that a large additional expense will be entailed upon the country and upon the candidates of both political parties in order to have the voters' list properly prepared. If, therefore, the hon. gentleman is bound to enter upon an experiment of such a doubtful and dangerous character he machinery in the mode the hon. gentleman proposes? should not allow a few thousand dollars to stand between the There can be but one purpose. Sir, we know perfectly rights of the people and the hopes of the Government. Welliwho this revising officer will be; we know perfectly What does it matter for a few thousand dollars if a few thousand individuals are to be disfranchised, as they certainly will be under this Bill. It is a bagatelie: hon. gentlemen opposite ought not to consider it for a moment. If the First Minister is bound to have the rovising officer prepare a preliminary list, he should compel that officer, although it may cost some additional thousands of dollars, to attend in the local municipalities and revise the list where he will be in possession of local information and will be able to prepare a correct list. Although our appeals have not had much effect on the First Minister, I still hope the hon, gentleman's better judgment will prevail. Hon, gentlemen remind me that the First Minister is not present to hear the suggestion. That is the difficulty, that has been the difficulty throughout this discussion. We discuss these questions on fair and business-like principles; yet the man in charge of the Bill-and there is no member opposite who knows anything about it, if the hon, gentleman knows anything about it himself is almost persistently absenting himself from the floor of the House. How does he know whether reasonable suggestions are made or not? He comes in the House and tells us, after the matter has been discussed for hours: "I cannot receive any suggestions from hon, gentlemen opposite; my Bill is perfect as it is.' The hon, gentleman claims that he can keep out of the House while important suggestions are under discussion and still understand the discussion. He trusts to the hon. member for North Perth, who thinks these clauses do not require discussion. That hon, gentleman is prepared to accept the provisions, however disgraceful they may be. In fact, hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to swallow the Bill holus-bolus. They cheer the First Minister when he moves a clause of this bill—they would equally cheer the First Minister if he were to introduce a Bill to disfranchise the Liberal party of Ontario. The hon. member for North Perth would cheer that proposition. I say it is unfair that the responsible head of the Government should be absent from his place in Parliament while grave and important questions are being discussed, and I hope the people, when they have the opportunity of pronouncing on his conduct, and I hope they will have that opportunity soon, will deal out to the hon, gentleman and his friends the punishment they deserve.

Mr. HESSON. The hon, gentleman has referred to the temporary absence of the leader of the Government. The hon, gentleman, if he considered the time the First Minister spent in this House listening to the debates that take place here, chiefly by hon, gentlemen opposite, would not have made such an insinuation. Hon, gentlemen have discussed this clause until they have tired themselves, and until the House and the country are tired of listening to them. The hon, gentleman has quite forgotten that the leader of his own party is constantly absent; he has quite overlooked the fact that we are obliged to listen to second and third-class individuals. Members on the back benches have come forward and taken up positions on the front benches. No wonder the First Minister is sometimes absent when the leader of the Opposition, who is responsible for this delay, does not think it worth while to remain in the House and listen to the speeches of those who have come to the front and displaced the usual occupants of those benches.

Mr. EDGAR. I am glad we have been entertained by hearing a second or third-class speech from the other side. The hon, gentleman who last spoke complained because the leader of the Opposition was not making a speech every final revision. Surely after taking all the trouble in day. The leader of the Opposition, the hon, gentleman knows very well, has made important speeches on the most important clauses of this Bill, and not one of those speeches has been answered yet. The only objection which I heard offered by the First Minister to the amendment of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), tending towards making the Bill more fair and more workable, was this: That the preliminary list which we are now considering is a very trifling matter; and is not a list of any importance whatever, and therefore the Prime Minister says it is right that the revising officer should hold one meeting in only one place in the whole electoral district. I think I can show the committee that the list provided for by this Bill is not only an important one, but that the hearing at which the list is made is altogether the most important provided for under the Act. How is it made? Take a riding where we have not a judge but a revising officer appointed by the Government, which will be the case in a large number of the electoral districts in Ontario, and a still larger number in Quebec and other Provinces. We will assume that the revising officer is a partisan, that he is desirous to help his party, perhaps honestly and perhaps not honestly, that he is at any rate prejudiced in favor of his party, and is much more willing to accept statements, as he has to accept them under this Bill, and to receive information as he is allowed to do under this Bill, from his political friends, than from any one else as to who shall or who shall not be put on the list. We find him approaching the settlement of the subject in that frame of mind. He has before him the draft list which has been prepared under section 12, and surely under that section the First Minister gave him plenty of discretionary and arbitrary power, without giving him any further such power where he holds the meeting for preliminary revision of the list. At this meeting he has power to correct the list by adding on or striking off names, and on what material? He has evidence for one thing, and then he has "statements" which may be made to him, and he can even do his work on "information." He takes the old list with which he has already dealt, and he finds that he has not had material, when he made that first list, to find out the names of very large classes of voters who under this Act will be entitled to vote. For instance, in Ontario, he had no means of finding out the tenants entitled to vote on rental; because, although the First Minister has made a change in the direction of allowing tenants who appear to be qualified in respect of property valued on the roll at $150, still he has made it absolutely impossible to find out from the assessment roll, or any other official information, who are the tenants which are entitled to be put on the list, irrespective of the value of the property. Then he cannot find from the assessment roll whether income voters have been residents for a year before the first of January previously, and he cannot put them on until he comes to the preliminary revision. He cannot find out who are the wage-carners who are qualified by income in kind as well as ia money, and as to this very large class of voters he can only get his information for the first time at the preliminary revision. He will not find out the name of the landowners' sons whom he has enfranchised, following the example of the Ontario Act, until he holds this preliminary meeting. Then there is another franchise, and a very good one, that of the fishermen who are qualified partly in respect of realty and partly in respect of personalty. He cannot add this class of voters from the assessment roll or the provincial voters' list, so they will have to be dealt with at the preliminary revision, and yet the hon. gentleman says that this meeting is a very unimportant one. On consideration, it seems perfectly clear that this is altogether the most important sitting which will be held in connection with these lists, because surely when that sitting is held, the revising officer is not going to leave all these classes for the final revision. Surely after taking all the trouble in preparing this list, he will not leave all this work for the final revision. Surely he will not hold the preliminary revision for nothing. By section 25 of this Bill, the revising officer at the preliminary revision will have all the powers of a court of record. I assume that he will exercise those powers, that he will receive evidence in a legal hood, and allow the true facts to be brought out. I could not have believed it possible that anyone could have thought of placing such an interpretation as the First Minister has put upon that clause, because by section 25 the revising officer is clothed with the power of a court of record for the purpose of the preliminary revision as well as of the final revision; but still the First Minister has explained that mere statements of fact may be received and acted upon by him-mere letters and memoranda I suppose; and if he receives a letter from his political friends and acquaintances, he will naturally attach more weight to it than he will to anything he receives from some one he does not know or from a political opponent. Then is it not an extraordinary thing to suppose that a good vote which may be put on this list from the assessment roll, may be struck off and destroyed by the revising officer on a mere letter or an ex porte statement without the party complained against being present, not being able to come? The onus is thrown on the voter who is thus treated of going to the trouble and expense of appearing before the final court of revision. But the case is worse than that; not only may the revising offi-cer act on statements, but on information. A statement we might assume to be written, but mere information may be gossip, rumor, or verbal allegation. The fact that these extraordinary and arbitrary powers are in the estimation of the First Minister given to this officer at that preliminary meeting renders it all the more important that the fullest publicity should be given of his proceedings; that his proceedings should not take place at one end of a large county, it may be, but in the midst of the people, where they can have their eyes upon him, and check him, and exercise moral pressure to prevent any impropriety or outrage of that kind. If any person goes to that court and makes a statement or puts in a letter asserting that my vote is bad, because the valuation of my property is not sufficient, the onus is thrown upon me of going to work and obtaining actual evidence at my own expense to contradict that charge. Now, should I, if I live at one end of a county, be called upon to go miles and miles to the other end to do that? Surely if that outrage is to be committed upon me, it should be done at my own door, where I have the opportunity at the least possible expense to rectify it. Now, the first list is made by the revising officer in private, and upon his own information. We have objected, and still strenuously object, to entrusting an officer with powers of that kind at all. Surely that is bad enough. But this revision is set out in the Act to be a public revision. It would be really public in a city or town; the electoral districts which happen to be composed of cities and towns will not suffer. It is only the rural districts that will suffer from the defeat of this amendment; and surely it cannot be that the Government desire to discriminate against the rural districts in favor of cities and towns —to give cities and towns, where Conservative majorities generally prevail, easy opportunities of attending this court, and to make it almost impossible in rural constituencies, where the reverse is gererally the case, to get mistakes rectified. What are these notices for, which are so elaborately provided in this Act? What is the use of the distribution of the lists to members, and to sheriffs, wardens, mayors, clerks of the peace and treasurers, or other corresponding officers, if it is not to give publicity? And how can we get publicity if you hold the court in one particular part of the electoral district? The result is briefly this: That a Conservative vote, by this machinery, can be got on the list with the greatest possible ease, and a Reform vote can be got off with the greatest possible ease, upon statements or information, and any wrongs can only still remain. That clause is passed; but here we have a chance, by passing this amendment, to prevent the evil being doubled and intensified by allowing this preliminary revision to be held in a hole-and-corner way in one corner of the electoral district.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. leader of the Government last night informed us that this preliminary revision was important, in that it was to be the basis of the list, and it was desirable to make it the basis of a good list. Then it should be held with due regard to public convenience and in such a manner as to enable the revising officer to do his work properly, and it cannot be said that the mode provided in the Bill of holding the preliminary court of revision will produce the results that the right hon, gentleman professes to be anxious to obtain. But he stultifies himself later on by saying that it is doubtful whether it is worth while to hold this preliminary revision at all—that he had been advised by his friends that it was not necessary to do so, and that he himself had serious doubts whether it was proper that this preliminary revision should be held.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a mistake; I did not say so.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not refuse to accept the statement of the First Minister; I have, perhaps, misunderstood his remarks. With regard to the preliminary revision, whether the First Minister stated it was a matter of importance or not, it is a very important matter. By section 17 the revising officer shall, on the day and at the time and place appointed, publicly proceed to the revision of the list, basing such revision on the evidence and statements before him and the evidence of the persons who may then be present to give information in support of, or in opposition to, the objection. By clause 25, it is provided that the revising officer shall, for the purpose of the preliminary revision of the first general list of voters, have all the powers of a court of record in the Province. By clause 39, he may summon witnesses to attend and to produce if necessary books, papers or other information, and punish persons for contempt, who, on being subpænaed, refuse to attend. It is claimed by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), and it is to be regretted the First Minister was not in his seat to take notice of the objections used against this clause, that the questions treated in this preliminary court of revision were questions that could not or need not necessarily be raised again. Whatever action was taken by the revising officer on the case of any individual was an action that need not be revised, and the individual aggrieved could not secure a revision afterwards. This being the case, the courts should be held at such times and places as will suit the convenience of the population. One preliminary court of revision in an entire riding will not be at all effectual. It will be held in a place remote from the homes of many of the people, who may be required to attend it, and the result will be a very small minority of the electorate will take enough interest in the matter to incur the expense and be subject to the inconvenience of attending the court. If there is no general attendance of the public, the work of the revising barrister will be imperfectly performed, and the people will be dissatisfied. These preliminary courts of revision should be held at such places as will meet the convenience of the public, and secure an efficient performance of the work. Take such a riding as my own, which the right hon. gentleman has made 50 miles in length and 43 wide in one place, composed of parts of two counties, no part of which has a county seat, and one portion of which has never been associated in municipal affairs with the other portion. It is absurd to expect the inhabitants to cross from one be set right at great expense to the parties, either at the part of the county to the other to attend this preliminary revision or the final revision. The objections court. Take the county of North Brant which is we have to the first secret list made by the revising officer of 70 miles long and in one place a few rods in width, and which comprises portions of three counties. It by the revising officer, for the purpose of attending the preliminary revision of the voters' list in that riding. The hon, gentleman said he adopted the scheme to coax the people to send in their claims by letter, but the Bill provides that the claims must be drawn in a legal manner and couched in legal phraseology. Is there one elector in every hundred who will feel himself competent to draw up his application in the form prescribed in this Bill? the non-resident provision in the Ontario Act, it is difficult to get people to give notice to the township clerk to have their names put on the list, although no special form is required; how much more difficult then will it be to get people to send in their applications under this clause? The hon, gentleman objects to the amendment of my hon, friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) on the score of increased expense and of loss of time to the revising officer. He fears that if these courts are held in the different municipalities it will be impossible, on account of the increased amount of time required to appoint county judges as revising barristers. I do not see that it will take much more time to hold courts in the various municipalities than to have the labor performed at a central court. The only additional time involved would be the time consumed in travelling from one point to another. The work itself will take as much time at one point as it would if the court were held at different points, as converient. If it is proper there should be a court of revision, the work should be done efficiently, and if that work can be done more efficiently by holding courts in several municipalities the hon. gentleman should provide to have them held in the different municipalities. He objects to this motion on the ground of increased expense. Of all men, he is the last who would be supposed to raise an abjection on the ground of expense. The objection we have urged against the whole measure, from the beginning, is that it involves unnecessary expense, but if the Bill is to be worked at all it ought to be worked properly. If the expense necessary for working the Bill is to be incurred at all, let it be made as perfect as possible. Having determined to incur the large amount necessary to work the Bill, we should not halt with a view to save $3,000 or $4,000 and so to impair the efficiency of Every development in the discussion of this Bill shows the utter folly on the part of the right hon. gentleman in tinkering with the provincial franchises. There has not been a successful attempt to show that this Bill was a necessity.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to discuss the Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am discussing the point raised as to the expense, and in connection with that I am pointing out that the Bill is an utter piece of folly, because it entails unnecessary expense in substituting this for the provincial franchises. This Bill is promoted by one man, or perhaps by two men, the First Minister and the member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson). It is a measure that was not asked by the country or by any portion of this House. It may be supported, but it is not urged or supported in debate by any considerable portion of this House. If we make an appeal with regard to any feature of the Bill, to whom do we appeal? Do we appeal to the majority of this House? No, we appeal to Cæsar, we appeal to the leader of this House, who devised the Bill, who drafted it, who introduced it, who urges it, who promotes it. It is not the country's Bill, it is not the Bill of the party on the other side even. Scarcely a man stands up to advocate it. There is no one empowered to allow any modification of the Bill. The right hon, centleman is the Cæsar to whom it is width, and which comprises portions of three counties. It is absent to suppose the inhabitants of North Brant will assemble at one common centre at the same day, as notified by the revising officer, for the purpose of attending the preliminary revision of the voters' list in that riding. The hon, gentleman said he adopted the scheme to coax the people to send in their claims by letter, but the Bill provides that the claims must be drawn in a legal manner and couched in legal phraseology. Is there one elector in every hundred who will feel himself competent to draw up his application in the form prescribed in this Bill? Under

It is wise for us to be guided by the lamp of experience, for us to profit by the experience and example of others. I do not suppose, wise as hon. gentlemen on the other side are, that human wisdom will die with them, or that human wisdom commenced with them. Some of the terms used in this Bill are copied from the English Act, and I call attention to the fact that the preliminary revision of the voters' list in the parent country is conducted in a different manner from that which is proposed in this Bill. The revision of the preliminary voters' lists in England is conducted by officers of the people. The overseers of the poor make the lists, and afterwards the revising officer decides upon appeal from those lists. He is not even appointed until after the preliminary list is arranged. I will read the provision of the English Act.

Mr. McCALLUM. Point it out to the reporter.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think, in the interests of hon. gentleman opposite, this discussion requires that we should give them line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, and, when we have done that, I am afraid very little impression is made upon those hon. gentlemen.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Dispense; taken as read:

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aware that hon, gentleman do not take very much interest in this Bill. They are quite willing to believe that the hon, gentleman who has charge of it knows all about it; they are willing to take his judgment; but we are not, and it is our duty to appeal to the reason of hon, gentlemen opposite, though it seems difficult to reach it. The 12th section of the English Act provides that the overseers of every parish or township shall make up the list of voters between the hours of 10 and 4 o'clock.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon, gentleman is reading clauses that relate to the preparation of the lists instead of the revision.

Mr. CHARLTON. They are quite relevant to the preliminary revision. One thing is related to the other.

Mr. McCALLUM. Let him go on; he must put in the time.

Mr. CHARLTON. Throughout this discussion upon a measure which changes the constitutional foundation of this Government, throughout this discussion of a measure of infinitely greater importance than any that has ever engaged the attention of this Parliament, a measure which every member of this House should consider with a sincere desire to do what is in the interest of this country and what his duty to his constituents requires—I say that throughout this discussion which the Opposition have engaged in, not, surely, from any motive or gain, because they are staying here at their own expense—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, they are not.

No, we appeal to Cæsar, we appeal to the leader of this House, who devised the Bill, who drafted it, who introduced it, who urges it, who promotes it. It is not the country's Bill, it is not the Bill of the party on the other side even. Scarcely a man stands up to advocate it. There is no one empowered to allow any modification of the Bill. The right hon, gentleman is the Cæsar to whom it is have carried on, without any expectation of gain or reward, we have been constantly taunted with an assertion similar to that made a few moments ago, that we are talking against time. Sir, I do not believe that we can point to the record of any parliamentary body in christendom in this century, where any great measure such as this has been discussed, where the discussion has been less irrelevant than the discussion upon this measure has been; and, Sir, in future ages, when the student of history refers to the Hansard of Canada at this time, and reads the discussion upon this great constitutional question which may yet shape the destinies of this Dominion, that student, I venture to say, will look with admiration upon the full and exhaustive discussion of every point at issue in this Bill; and whether hon. gentlemen believe that or not, they are not warranted in taunting the members of the Opposition with speaking against time. We have no such desire, we have no such intention. Whether we succeed in discussing this question pertinently or not, whether our speeches are relevant or not, whether we present our arguments concisely or not, we are laboring to present those arguments and to conduct this discussion in such a way as to influence the opinion of this House and the opinion of this country; and, whether we are succeeding with this House or not, Sir, we are succeeding with this country, and if the hon, gentleman does not believe it I defy him to dissolve this Parliament and appeal to the country; and, great as his majority is to-day, he will come back here with that majority reversed; and if he does not believe it let him try it. Sir, we have no fears of an appeal to the people, but he has. He has a fear of going back to the people; even with his Gerrymander Act, even with the dice loaded as they were in 1882, he dare not appeal to that same constituency again, and so he is now engaged in perfecting the most infamous measure that ever disgraced the Statute Book of this country.

Now, with regard to this preliminary revision. Section reads (the hon. gentleman read section 11). Without 14 reads (the hon. gentleman read section 11). troubling the House further with regard to this Act, these overseers of the poor go on to revise the list, to take off and put on the names, according to the evidence furnished to them; and this revised list, this list revised by the overseers of the poor, the officers of the people, this list under the English Act, which should form the model for our Act, this list made by the officers of the peo-ple and revised by the officers of the people, in a preliminary sense, is the list that is submitted to the revising barristers appointed, not by the Government of the day, but by the courts of the land, and appointed from year to year under restrictions that prevent them from running for any office within eighteen months of the day they were appointed. I say the list prepared in this manner and revised by the officers of the people, is the list that is submitted for final revision, not to an appointee of the Crown, but to an appointee of the judges of the land.

Now, Sir, I wish to refer to the case of one English colony; and I will say in connection with this matter that you can find no colony of the British Empire, you can find no commonwealth that derives its existence from the British Empire, that has a measure such as this upon its Statute Book. You can find no colony or state where the preparation and preliminary revision of the voters' lists, and their final revision, are entrusted to an appointee of the Crown, or an appointee of the Government—not one of all the states and commonwealths at the present time that derive their existence from England. The colony I wish to refer to as an example is New Zealand. By the Statutes of 1866 the preparation of the list in this colony is entrusted to an officer who is appointed by the Governor, but the revision of the list is not entrusted to an appointee of the Government but to an officer or revising barrister appointed by the courts. The Statute of 1875 takes from the Governor even the Mr. Charlton.

power of appointing an officer who shall prepare the list, although the revision of the list was not in the hands of the Governor. It provides that the list shall be formed by the clerks of the municipality, countersigned by the mayor or presiding officer, and revised as before provided by an officer of the court. I repeat that there is no colony found in the British Empire in which such a provision as that contained in this Bill obtains; that in no colony in the British Empire, nor in Great Britain itself, are the rights of the people so trampled upon and tampered with as they are under the provisions of this Bill; that there is no colony in the Empire, except Canada, where the rights of the people are not respected, and where the officers connected with the preparation of the lists are not elected by the people and where they have not a share in the formation of the voters' list, in the mode of registering the voters, and in the control of the election machinery. It is only here in Canada that the Government is so lost to a sense of duty to the people, is so lost to a sense of the duty that devolves upon it as to attempt to take into its hands the entire election machinery by providing that its own officers shall make the list, its own officers shall preside at the preliminary revision of the list, its own officers shall preside at the final revision of the lists, and that the people through their own officers, elected by themselves, shall have no part whatever either in preparing the preliminary list or the final regision of the list. I had other references to turn to, but I will not delay the House with them. This Bill is unique in its provisions. It is a Bill that will place Canada at the lowest point in the scale of the colonies. It is a Bill that will give us the unenviable distinction of being the only British commonwealth that tramples on the rights of the people systematically and with malice prepense, for through the action of the Government it takes the election machinery into its own hands and seeks to secure, through fraud and chicanery, a decision which the honest will of the people would not give. I have nothing more to say. I presume this little amendment, this little boon, requiring that the revision court shall be held in the municipality, in order to facilitate the proper performance of the duty of the revisers, will be denied us by the Cæsar to whom we appeal, and that he will insist on retaining the provision of the Bill, which requires that the people of an entire riding, thousands, perhaps, in number, shall go to one common centre, like the Jews of old to Jerusalem on the Feast of Pentecost, tabernacled and boothed for days before they can get their business attended to.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentlemen has stated that he has been misunderstood as regards the language used by him in respect of this clause. The hon, member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) quoted the hon, gentlemen as having said that he considered this clause unimportant and he doubted whether it should be in the Bill at all. That is what the hon, gentleman now says he did not state. I have Hansard here, and I will read the hon, gentleman's remarks, and will leave it to the committee to say whether our understanding of the words was not justified by the words he actually used. Whether he intended to say something else or not is another question. The hon, gentleman said:

"This is comparatively unimportant and the only doubt I have is as to whether the clause should be in the Bill at all."

I ask the Committee whether any other meaning can be placed on the words used by the hon, gentleman on that occasion. The hon, gentleman further said:

"This clause is only intended for the first settlement of the voters' list under this Act. In the subsequent annual revision it is not provided that there shall be a preliminary revision."

According to the hon. gentleman's own words he considers this section unimportant. I differ from him entirely. This is one of the most important clauses in the whole Bill. The proceedings to be conducted under this section are termed a preliminary revision of the voters' list. They are in no sense a revision of the list, whether preliminary or final. They are simply the completion of the making up of the list, and not the revision of one. A glance at the wording of the section itself, and at the explanations given by the right hon, gentleman, shows that he intends it to be a completion of the making of the list, and not a revision at all. The right hon. gentle-

"In the first place, the revising officer takes the revised assessment roll, or the poll books, or the voters' list, as the case may be. He takes those books as primā facie evidence. He makes out his list, showing every name that the assessment roll shows to have a vote. He takes other such information as he can obtain, in order to add other names. He publishes that list. It goes to every municipality. He says: There are the parties who, on an examination of the assessment roll, have a right to vote. Then he announces that he will hold a court—if a county judge, in his own office, and if a revising officer, in some other place; and he will receive all papers sent in, applications that may be made to be placed on the roll by mail or otherwise, and all objections made to the names appearing on that roll. It is not required that anyone should be present. The practical working of the plan will be this: The political associations of the two parties that govern the country will send in their lists, I have no doubt. Individuals who are interested will send in names or their objections. They need not attend at all. But the revising officer will get all those applications, and all the objections. In the next clause, the 17th clause, it is provided, however, that parties may attend the preliminary revision if they please; but there is no necessity, those documents being sent in being sufficient for the purpose. He takes the applications; he reads them and adds them to his list."

This is what the right hon. gontleman intends to be done

This is what the right hon. gentleman intends to be done at this proceeding, which is mistakably called a preliminary revision. These are exactly the duties which are performed by the Board of Overseers in England, and a part of the original preparation of the lists. The revising officers are not sitting to revise, but to make up the list, according to the explanation of the right hon. gentleman. Whether he correctly interprets the Bill which he is supposed to have drafted, is another question. I do not think he does. I think the wording of the Act has a different meaning from what he intends. Section 15 evidently contemplates that he shall hold a real court of revision. The hon. gentleman says he does not intend that he should do so, but that he is merely to take a mass of applications and statements made by individuals and make up a list roughly from those. But by section 25, he is given all the powers, duties, responsibilities and dignities of a court. By section 55, the revising officer may correct the list on his own knowledge when there have been no objections or complaints. Now, Sir, it appears that the wording of the Act makes this sitting a solemn proceeding, the session of a court. The revising officer may put on or strike off names of his own motion, and the right hon. gentleman says it is not necessary for any person to be present. Now, Sir, it would no doubt be very convenient for the right hon. gentleman and his friends if this House and the public should accept his explanation of this clause, and allow the revising officer in the absence of everybody, to perform his The right hon, gentleman evidently intends the public to understand that they need not be present, and he tells us so in so many words. The revising officer will be present though, armed with all the powers conferred on him by the Act, to do what the right hon, gentleman says he will do, to do practically what he likes, in the absence of the persons interested. I am astonished that the right hon. gentleman should have made a statement which would lead the House and the country to suppose that he did not want them to understand what the powers and the duties of the revising officer would be under this section, that he wanted the people to absent themselves and leave his paid agent alone at the concoction of the list. It is said that there is no reason for holding these sittings in several places for the reasons we have urged, because nobody need be there. I have shown you that everybody does need to be there, that this is the occasion on which the lists are Because it would be too convenient to the people of the really made, that this is the time to get names put on or country. "In England," he says, "this work occupies a very taken off, when the voters' lists are in actual process of concoction, when they are plastic and can be mouldedthat this is the very time, of all others, when the people should be present to see that their interests are protected. There has been no argument against the claim that the sittings should be held in every municipality, if they were to be real courts of revision. That has been granted. The only argument brought forward has been misleading, incorrect and untrue-that the sitting is not importantfor that argument is disposed of by the very words of the Act, and therefore our argument remains unanswerable, that the sittings should be held in so many places as to be convenient of access to everybody in the electoral district. Now, where is the sitting to be held? "If it is held by a county judge, he will hold it in his own office," says the right hon. Premier. If the county judge is appointed in my own constituency, where will the meeting be held? My constituency consists of parts of Elgin and Kent. Which judge will it be? Will my constituents be compelled to go to Chatham, some b0 or 60 miles distant, to look after their rights at this preliminary concoction of the list, or will the people from the extreme west of my riding be compelled to come 50 miles to St. Thomas? My riding, as may be understood from its being part of the work of the Gerrymander Bill, is a rather disconnected affair in its municipal relations, although it is sufficiently compact in shape. The two extreme western townships have not much communication with the others, and the middle township has not much intercourse with the townships on either sides. There is a moderate sized place on the railway where the court might be held, but it is not a place to which people are accustomed to come. The court will probably be held at one end of the riding or the other; but even if it is held in the middle, people will have to come 25 miles at least to look after their rights. How will it be with North Brant, which contains part of three counties? Will the judge of one county revise the list for the whole of North Brant? Will the judge of one county, either of Kent or Elgin, revise the list for the whole of West Elgin, and where will the court be held? These are questions which I do not think the right hon, gentleman can answer; I do not think he has thought about the complications or the inconveniences that will arise under this clause. Then, after saying that there is no reason why this preliminary revision should be held in the different municipalities, he goes on to show why it should. He says that on the occasion of the preparation of the first list, the revising officer will not go around—it will not be necessary. Yet he says:

"This preliminary revision will cost us some money, but it will be well worth the money in order to start with a full, thorough list." Yet he says the revising officer need not go around to the municipalities; it will be quite sufficient for him to sit in one place and take all the applications made to him; but in the second year, when the preliminary revision is not required, what will the revising officer do?

"In the second year, the voters' list having been once settled, the officer will take the voters' list of the year before, and will visit each municipality or other well-known division, and with that list in his hand he will add new voters, and strike off dead voters, or those absent, or those who have lost the franchise, and he will settle the list at once." The hon, gentleman gives away the whole case; if the revising officer is to go around in order to make a rough preliminary revision of the second list, it is infinitely more necessary that he should go around to each municipality in order to make a rough preliminary revision of the first list. He says again:

"All the officer will have to do will be to annually go round, at a time announced and well known to the municipality, to receive applica-tions and objections, and so settle the list."

Why will the hon. gentleman not let him do that now?

short time." In England this work is not done at all by the revising officer. The right hon, gentleman should surely have looked to the English law, where he would find that the revising officer in England does not go around to the municipality to receive applications and objections, as this officer will do. He only sits as a judge to decide on cases, which are not put in to him personally, but to the municipal officers—the overseers. He has nothing to do with trotting around and making up the list. It is simply incorrect to say that this work occupies a short time in England, because this work is not done there at all. Again, as to the necessity of people being present, and as to the notice, I find that clause 15 provides that notice shall be given by the objector or applicant "at least one week before the day fixed for the preliminary revision," and that notice may be given either by depositing it with the revising officer or by mailing it to him; and the same course is to be followed with regard to the person whose name is objected to. How much notice does this provide for? The revising officer may live a long way from the scene of his labors; the revising officer for my constituency may live in Toronto or Halifax so far as the provisions of this Bill are concerned, although of course it is not probable that he will live so far away. Still a letter may take a day or two to reach him, and it may be mailed at a post office where there is only a tri-weekly or a bi-weekly mail. There are scores of voters in my riding who live outside, and these it is proposed to retain,—some at Detroit, some at Toronto, some at various other places. If a notice is addressed to these from an out-of-the way post office in my riding, it will certainly take three days to reach him; so he will have four days out of the week in which to arrange his business and leave to look after his vote, or empower someone else to look after it for him. In spite of the hon. gentleman's statement that he need not go there in person, I say he need, or his vote will be at the mercy of a partisan official. It is not fair that such short notice should be given to parties at a distance. It should be provided that the notice should be mailed in time for the person to receive it a week before the revision. A week's notice is the shortest notice that a person ought to receive that his vote is going to be appealed against. Suppose on the other hand that one person put in 500 appeals against persons living at a distance, and he should be present at the preliminary cooking of the list with evidence and statements to show that these persons were not qualified to vote; what position would they be in? The revising officer would be acting quite within the statute if he simply said: It is all very well, gentlemen; you are offering me evidence, and statements, and deeds, and mortgages, to show that these people are not qualified. I have statements from trustworthy persons that they know these people are qualified, and therefore I will not strike off their names. He is allowed to take, not only evidence, but statements, and the statements are given the same value as the evidence. He may take the statement of anybody he chooses, if he considers him trustworthy, in rebuttal of all the evidence. If those 50 parties are opposed to him, and he had notice of objection against them, he might, on the unsupported statement of anybody he chose to consider trustworthy, knock the whole 50 names off on revision, no matter what evidence might be brought forward as to their qualifications. It is very clear that if there is any necessity for the revising officer to go into the separate municipalities at all, it is on this preliminary revision. It would preliminary revision were held be fairer, if the  $\mathbf{held}$ in each pality, and the final revision in one place. The former is the important one; it is then easy and cheap to get the list corrected; no lawyer is required, and when the final hon, gentleman treats the House to so little consideration as to insist upon this provision being passed, no matter what arguments are brought against it, and without attempting to contradict those arguments. What we are asking is simply that every elector should have within reasonable reach a means of seeing that his name is not improperly struck off the list or another or others improperly put on. If you purposely place in the hands of an individual, who is to hold the great power of deciding whether a name should be on a list or not, the right to decide of his own motion, on the mere uncorroborated statement of any person who may happen to be present, whether it should be on or off, the Government will stand convicted in the mind of every fair person in the country, not only of affording facilities but of arranging these facilities with the object of allowing a partisan revising officer to cook the list in the interests of his

Mr. WELDON. After the remarks of the right hon. gentleman in regard to this clause, I have carefully looked over the Act, and must confess that this preliminary revision appears to me to be in some respects more important than the final revision. The officer has at this preliminary revision all the powers he has at the final revision, but from the final revision there is the right to appeal. By contrasting the 17th with the 25th section, you will find that this power of adding or striking off names is greater in the preliminary than in the final examination. If we contrast the 15th with the 30th section, we will find that the preliminary revision is simply where the revising barrister corrects the list of the preceding year, and then publishes a notice for the final revision. Great difficulties, unless the amendment of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) is adopted, will arise. If the section relating to the final revision is adopted, the officer will have to go to each parish and investigate, whereas it is more important that he should do so in the preliminary revision. The powers of a court of record are given under the construction of the Bill, whether the Bill distinctly creates the court a court of record or not. I take it that the construction would be that it would only have the powers of a court of record. The notice required is the same in the preliminary as in the final revision. The whole scope of the Act shows that the list is to be published in the case of the preliminary revision as in the case of the final revision. If anyone objects to my name, if I do not attend, my name is struck off; but, if I am obliged to attend, I may have witnesses there, and the party objecting may not choose to attend, and the judge may award costs, but, if it is true, as the First Minister says, that the party need not attend, I may write a letter, but the opposite party may attend with witnesses, and the name may be struck off, and the costs may be awarded against me. It will be far better to prevent objections being taken at all at the preliminary revision. If the preliminary revision is held to be conclusive, a difficulty might arise under this Act as to whether an appeal could lie from that revision at all. The taxed costs would, in any case, not probably be equal to the amount of costs to which the party was put, and certainly would not compensate him for the trouble and expense he would be put to. Then an objection may be made in just the same way at the final revision, and the party has to go through the same ordeal again. In one case it will be less expensive, because the judge will hold the investigation in the nan's own neighborhood, while the preliminary revision may be held at any place in the riding which the revising officer sees fit to select. No man who wishes to retain his position on the voters' list could treat with contempt or pass over in silence, a notice served upon revision comes on, the people will be prepared for it. No him. If he absents himself from the court the party object-arguments have been advanced against this contention. The ing to him may appear with his witnesses, and the revising him. If he absents himself from the court the party object-officer may at once take judgment by default and strike his name off the list. If the man has been there himself he could at once have had evidence to meet the primd facie case that his objector may have made out against him. But he is not there, and the result is that judgment is given against him, and not only does he lose his vote under that clause but the revising officer has a right to saddle him with the expense of the unvestigation. Then he has to go to the expense of putting his name on again, and has got to give notice to the revising barrister to that effect. Or put it in the other way; if the objection fails at the preliminary examination, and an objection again made, the result will be that the party has been put to a great deal of needless trou-ble—because we know that sometimes parties are not actuated by the best of motives in endeavoring to get a man's name off the list, and it may be done by malice. We find again that after he has been three or four days away from home at the preliminary revision, no sooner does he get home than he finds another notice that he is objected to on the final revision. Now, under these circumstances, I think it may be fairly urged that this preliminary revision is of equal importance to the final revision. The revising officer is clothed with the same power-in fact, according to the construction put upon the 17th section by the Premier, the revising barrister has more power with regard to the questions of evidence and questions of fact at the first revision, than he has on a final decision, because the 25th section will show that he must be bound by evidence on the final decision. We find that even in this preliminary revision according to the 40th section, it would almost seem necessary that a man would have to attend in order to see that no objection was made to his name, because we find that the revising barristers may dispense with notice at the preliminary revision. A man may come up and say that he objects to John Jones or Thomas Smith being upon the register, and the revising barrister has power to dispense with a notice of that objection, and strikes their names off, and the men are put to all the expense of going before the court of revision in order to get their names put on again. Now if the court were held in their immediate locality it would be a difficult thing to get these men's names put off the list without their knowing something about it. They could attend without any expense or trouble and look after their own names; but if the court is held 50 or 60 miles away from them, and the revising barrister has the power that is given to him in the 40th section, every man's name might be struck off without his knowing anything about it until he saw the list and found it was not on. The first thing they know when they see the preliminary list is that their names are not on it, and these men have got to go to the trouble of employing a lawyer—because I think no man would be safe under this Act unless he employed a lawyer—to get him to give notice and attend at the final court of revision to have their names put on. Now, I say this opens facilities for fraud and injustice which we ought to prevent if possible. After looking carefully at the several sections of this Bill and seeing the powers given to the revising barrister on this preliminary revision, it seems to me that the principle adopted with regard to the final revision ought rather to be adopted at the preliminary revision, the preliminary revision being the most important. I think the revising barrister ought to visit each municipality in order to hold this preliminary revision, and the travelling expenses would not be great. I think that we are bound to give every man entitled to the franchise an opportunity of having his name put on the list, and we ought not to throw obstacles in the way of his exercising that right; therefore, in order to secure justice and fairness, and to prevent expense and loss of time on the part of the electors, it is quite right that the

may be incurred to secure these ends. Now, this is not attacking the principle of the Bill. It is a matter of machinery, and the question is this; is it not more in the interest of the people, more in the interest of the individual voter, more in the interest of the public at large, that at this preliminary examination, even if it does put the general revcnue of the country to a little more expense, should be held in the various localities, and that the revising officer should visit these localities in order to afford the electors greater facilities for having their names put on the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I always liston to the arguments of the hon. gentleman with pleasure, because he addresses himself directly and candidy to the question immediately before the committee, and therein, perhaps, there is a contrast between his course and that of some other hon. members on this measure. With respect to this amendment, I cannot at all accede to it, inasmuch as it would greatly increase expense. It duplicates the expense without securing any corresponding advantage. The hon, gentleman said I was the last man to talk about expense, because this measure was introduced regardless of expense, and therefore the hon, gentleman very logically said, if the Bill is going to be expensive, the expense shall be increased. That is the argument of the hon. gentleman, and like a good many of his other arguments, surrounded though they may be by scriptural quotations—and a great many people can quote scripture for their own purposes-I do not think the argument was strengthened thereby. The object, as I explained last night, of having this preliminary sitting is to make the list as full as possible, to receive from every source and quarter, by every means possible, the names of any persons who by any possibility can claim to have a vote, and at the same time receive any objections as to claims to votes which are decidedly bad. Then the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) quoted from my speech last night, and said I stated that the clau e is unimportant. My opinion was, and I attempted to explain it, that it was comparatively unimportant in relation to the final revision; the revision when the lists are settled finally must be the more important of the two. There is something, perhaps a good deal, in the arguments used by the hon, gentleman who has just spoken in regard to the next clause, that the same objections might be taken twice, and a person might be summoned from a distance by the revising barrister to the place where the central court was held, whereas the objection might as well be tried in the polling district where eventually the final revision will take place. I propose to amend the 17th clause in that direction, so as to prevent the possibility of the objection taken by the hon. gentleman and by others weighing adversely to the interest, pecunivrily or otherwise, of the claimants to votes or to persons urging The great fault it seems to me of objections. the whole line of argument with respect to this Bill, if I may for a moment go out of the the clause is this: That hon, gentlemen opposite hold that of necessity the county judge or revising officer must be a scoundrel; he is going to be a partisan, an unscrupulous partisan; he is going to be false to his oath, which he is compelled under this Bill to take; he can by no possibility do right; and they must treat him as a scoundrel from begining to the end. I think that is a very faulty style of argument. When it was ventured to be hinted in the course of the discussion that there was such a thing as a partis in assessor and a partisan court of revision we heard denunciations that this was an insult to every assessor and every court of revision. Yet hon, gentleman opposite do not hesitate to offer insults to every county judge who may be appointed as revising officer and to any member of the legal profession who may accept such positions. The revisgeneral revenue should bear what additional expense there ling officer will be sworn, as well as is the assessor, and he will commit a great moral sin and a crime as well if he acts as a partisan. However, I will propose, a little in anticipation of the clause before us, the following clause:—

At the day and time and place appointed the revising officer shall proceed to hold the primary revision of the list, and he shall add to such list the names of all claiming the right to be placed on it as voters, and he shall note on the same all objections, either proposed amendments or corrections, and he shall then and there sign the said list so made up by him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That will mean that the officer will not strike out anyone until the final revision of the list?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. He will receive all objections and all claims. He will add all names offered to the roll, and he will note every objection offered, and those lists with those additions will be signed by him; and those are the lists that will go to the different polling divisions where the battle, as to the right to be placed on the register, will be finally fought out.

Mr. WELDON. Do I understand that the revising officer will merely note the objections, and that they will not be taken up till the final revision?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He will note the objections.

Mr. WELDON. Does that preclude any person from making further objections?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will settle that when we come to another clause.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). What then is the object of giving notice to the revising officer, unless the revising officer will deal with the matter at the primary revision? At the final revision the party will have to give the officer notice over again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. We shall have to alter the form of the notice in the schedule, that is all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Does the list for the first revision as proposed include a municipality or electoral district, or is it in polling sub-divisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is provided for in the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. In this case, there is no sense in requiring notice to be given of these objections at the preliminary point, because they have to be taken on the final revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object of this preliminary meeting is to get as many names on the list as possible, and as early as possible, and also if there are any objections sent in that they should be known as early as possible. A party gives notice of objection, it is put on the margin of the list, he marks after the name "objected" and there will be a notice to the party opposite to whose name the word is written, that his right to vote is going to be tested at the final revision. There will be no necessity for the other notice of course, even if he gets this one because he will be informed at once that his vote is to be objected to.

Mr. BLAKE. Then there will be two separate opportunities of objecting—one at the preliminary revision and one at the final. The result of his objecting at the preliminary revision will be simply that his objection is noted and that he will not be required to give any further notice for the final revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAKE. Whereas if he omits objecting at first, he will not give a similar class of notice in order to be able to object at the final revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is my proposition by the amendment.

Sir John A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is, as there is to be a personal notice, whether the notice will not be likely to be more really useful if it is not given with reference to the court at which the objection is to be tried. I think that it would be better that the notice should be given with reference to that court, and at a short period before the court, than it should be given with reference to a court where it is not to be tried, and at a considerable period before that court.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The notice in the schedule will of course have to be alcred, and instead of that form, the notice will be given that it is intended to object to the vote at the final revision in the polling district. If that objection is sent in, and I think it would be well to have it as early as possible, the objection will be noted and the revising officer will know approximately the number of objections and the class of objections.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think so, and for this reason, that as I understand this first list will be a very defective one, because the revising officer will not have the machinery to make anything like a full list at the start. It is most probably with reference to the very names added at the pre-liminary revision, that there will be most dispute at the final revision, and therefore I think it is hardly likely that he will get a reasonable approximation of the number or class of cases he will have to try, by the notice given of the preliminary revision. The class of names put on at the first revision, though numerically large, are probably amongst those as to whom there will be the least question or dispute. Of course the hon. gentleman's statement that the notice which is to be given at this early stage will be distinctly a notice that the vote will be objected to at the final stage, will be a reasonable prevention of misunderstand. ing, but still it strikes me that the notice had better be given with reference to the stage at which the great proportion of the cases will be tried.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events let us try this.

Mr. DAVIES. This section was drawn making the filing of the objections peremptory, and now it is proposed to make it permissive, the word "may" should be inserted instead of "shall."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is right.

Mr. DAVIES. There is no occasion, with the recasting of the sections, to require the revising officer to sit in different localities at all, in view of what the hon gentleman says, I will withdraw that amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Davies) withdrawn.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended that this preliminary revision shall simply be for proposals? It might be worth while to consider whether it would not be reasonable to give some greater degree of latitude with reference to objections. I conceive of a case, for instance, in which, within the week for giving notice, an objection might occur to a man's vote, and it seems to me it would be rather an advantage to permit that objection to be stated and noted at this preliminary revision, although the notice may not have been given. In that case, of course, the regular notice would have to be given before the final revision. There would be on the public list the fact stated that this name had been objected to, and that would give to the opposite party and to the individual himself notice of the objection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That, I think, is the great object of retaining this clause. If any objection was sent in, as a matter of course there would be an entry made on the roll opposite the name objected to. That would be a notice and an early notice.

Mr. BLAKE. My desire was in that sense, to give perhaps some greater facilities for bringing objections than would appear to be given as the clause was originally cast.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How do you propose to give that facility?

Mr. BLAKE. The clause provides that you must give a week's notice that you are going to object to a certain vote. I do not see any object in that. I do not see why, even while attending the court itself, the agent of a party or an individual who chooses to take advantage of this procedure, might not be allowed to object to a string of names. That string of names would be marked, and the only result of attending at the court would be that that string of names would be marked as objected to. That makes as wide as possible the area of those objected to.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. There is a good deal in that, but I do not think there should be verbal objections allowed, because an unscrupulous agent might go before the court and say, I object to all these names.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask whether it is the idea of the First Minister that under these two clauses the revising officer should put on every person who claimed to be put on, or would he have to make a preliminary examination of the claims; in other words, would he have to try the claims in advance?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have provided in the clause to put on all the claims.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He then decides on them at the final revision—that I understand to be his meaning.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to make it read " May at any time before the day fixed for such preliminary revision deposit with or mail to the revising officer," etc. That precludes objecting on the day the court sits for the preliminary revision.

Mr. BLAKE. That quite answers my view with reference to that portion of the revision which involves noting objections to names on the list; but as the hon. gentleman has proposed it, it applies to a clause not merely providing for objections but also for additions, and my opinion is that you should not add without a much longer notice. As I understand it, what the hon gentleman proposes to do is to add names positively, when the proposal is to add them on the primary revision, but with reference to proposals to strike off names he is simply to write opposite them "objected to." I suggest with respect to the proposal to strike off, that as it is not to be disposed of in any shape at this time, there is no reason why there should be any length of notice, and the hon, gentleman agrees with that. But, the act to be performed with reference to additions is entirely different. In the case of additions, it will be necessary to appeal to strike them off, and it is advisable a week's notice should be given, otherwise the day before the revision, a political agent might put on the list 300 names and they might go on at once, and would have to be appealed against in order to strike them off.

Mr. DAVIES. The action of the revising officer will not be in any sense an official action, when he is bound to put on names on application being given. Under the Bili as originally drafted, there was to be a week's notice to be given; but if there is not to be a judicial decision to be given upon the application, but a mere ministerial act, I do not see the necessity of a notice.

Mr. BLAKE. If the proposal of the First Minister is this, that when a representation is made to the revising officer that certain names should be inserted, the officer is simply to put them on the list, without evidence, that to be entrusted with those functions. I think there can be Ž90 would be objectionable to the last degree. I do not propose that at this preliminary revision he is to add the names. If he does so, he will do it on the theory of the 13th clause, namely, on receiving such information as will convince him that they should be put on, and the notice I refer to is to be given by any person with reference to another person or persons to be put on the list. A political agent may send a long list of persons who he claims ought to go on, but surely there must be some sort of evidence that can satisfy the mind of man that there was a prima facie case established, or he would not consent to the application.

Mr. EDGAR. 1 suppose the First Minister means to make this a list of claims, something like that provided for in the English Act. That Act provides that the overseers of the poor in parishes shall make out alphabetical lists of all the persons who have claims to be put on the register, and if there is reasonable doubt with regard to any of those, the words "objected to" will be written opposite their names. That would be the duty in this case of the revising officer.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, of course, if the only result of the proposed addition to this clause was the announcement of a claim, one would not see the necessity of the week's notice. If the effect of a claim at a preliminary revision is that you simply see the old list, not enlarged or diminished, but the words "objected to" are to be marked against the name that is objected to, I should agree that the week's notice would not be necessary for the claim to be put on any more than in the case of a claim that a name should be put off.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must do one of two things. We must either have the original plan by which the revising officer shall have judicial powers under the 17th clause, or he must merely hold his court to receive openly, and to state that he has received by mail or otherwise, claims and objections. There is a good deal to be said, even if the revising officer is merely to have the function of adding the names of claimants and making a note of objections, in favor of giving a week's notice of claims, in order to prevent persons at the last moment handing in all kinds of names on the chance of having them put on the list, right or wrong.

Mr. EDGAR. The notice in the English Act is from the 20th June to the 1st July.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the word "shall" in the 45th line ought to be "may." If you leave it imperative, and the man does not give the notice, it might be held that he could not bring it up on the final revision at all.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon. gentleman has not answered the question of the member for West Durham as to whether the functions of the revising officer are purely ministerial.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Purely ministerial, according to my view.

Mr. CAMERON. Then, no matter how many names are sent in, he would have to put them on without any prima facie case being made out. I am afraid that would cause a great deal of difficulty, because one political party might ask to have any number of names put on, and the other might not go to the expense of having them struck off. I think the revising officer should, at all events, see that a primd facie case is made out. He should have some little discretion. The hon, gentleman will see that, otherwise, those names may have to be all removed again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole argument of hon, gentlemen opposite was that, under this clause, the revising officer should not exercise any judicial functions, that he would be a partisan officer, and therefore ought not no trouble in having the list as full as possible. When the revising officer visits the different polling districts afterwards, objection will be taken to all parties who have not the right to vote.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended, according to the hon, gentleman's present plan, that, although the claim may not be made by the voter himsel?, but may be made by anyone at all on behalf of a large number of persons, all those names are to be put on?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The claim may be made by himself or by anyone on his behalf.

Mr. BLAKE. For instance, John Smith writes a letter to a revising officer claiming that a long list of names shall be put on, not even furnishing his own statement as to his knowledge that they should be added, or giving a statement of their qualification. Upon that, it is to be the imperative duty of the revising officer to add all those persons to the list. You see how different is the position between the second stage and the first stage. In the first stage, you require the revising officer to get information, to satisfy his own mind at any rate, before he puts anyone on, but now you propose that he shall be bound to add anybody that any person says ought to go on. Some one says: I claim that John Smith, Thomas Jones, and to forth, ought to be added to this list, and you say the revising officer shall be bound to add them. It seems to me that he should have, at least, as much information as that which was required in the making of the primary list. You turn him into a strictly ministerial officer to act upon the warning of anybody at this second stage. I do not see the sense of that. The hon, gentleman says that we object to the revising officer as a partisan officer. Of course he may be a partisan at the beginning and at the end, and the hon. gentleman gives him latitude to be a partisan at those two stages, but he says: You are precluded from suggesting that he should have any such power in the middle stage, because you object to his having it at the other two stages.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It amounts to this. I have been trying to please everybody, and now I ought to return to the clause as it was originally.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that is a mistake. I think we achieved a very great improvement in the clause when the hon, gentleman dealt with the objections as he proposes to deal with them. All we are proposing is, that the revising officer should act at this stage upon the same measure of evidence which the hon, gentleman thought twenty minutes ago he should have. Let him add the names upon the same evidence upon which he called it right that he should add the names a while ago; but with reference to objections, let him only note them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will adopt the hon. gentleman's suggestion. I am very glad to think that the put in. revising officer can safely be trusted.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I did not say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If he will allow me to suggest, we will adopt this clause as amended, and then the question now raised can be taken up on the next clause.

Mr. MULOCK. I think this clause requires that the same notice should be given to the person whose name is objected to as to the revising officer. It says that notice shall be given at the same time to the person as to the revising officer. Now it is not possible to comply literally with that direction; it is impossible to deliver the same notice to the revising officer, who may be in one part of the county, and to the person whose name is objected to, who may be in another part of the county at the same time. I suggest that the notice should be given to the person whose name is objected to within seven days, at least, before the sitting of the court. Would it not be better to strike out the words "at the same time" and say, "within at least seven days?"

Mr. WELDON. Put it this way: "Within the same time and in the like form."

Amendment agreed to.

The committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

On section 17.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We had a very interesting discussion on this clause before recess, and I have considered well what has been said on that clause. The amendment I first read made the office of revising barrister, and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) pointed that out clearly. So I have prepared a clause in substitution for this clause, which I shall read to the committee:

On the day and at the time and place appointed, the revising officer shall publicly proceed to the preliminary revision of the list, basing such revision on the evidence and information before him in support of any claims for additions to the voters' list, or of any proposed amendments or corrections, but not including any objection to any vote, which he shall merely note on the list opposite the name objected to; and he shall then and there correct the lists on the said basis to the best, of his judgment and ability, upon such information and evidence, and shall note every objection on the said list as aforesaid.

Mr. BLAKE. I have a suggestion to make to the hon. gentleman. I pointed out that the office of the revising officer was ministerial, and I objected to its being ministerial in the sense in which he made it so. As to the addition, he was bound to do without evidence; as to the objection, he was bound not to do more than mark the objections. My opinion of a purely ministerial office would be that while, with reference to objections, he marked the objections, with reference to additions he marked them as claims for additions. Now, I have this suggestion to make to the hon. gentleman—speaking for myself alone—that it would be a considerable improvement to this clause if we were to provide that in the cases of claims for addition which the revising officer does not think warranted by sufficient evidence, he should have a supplementary list of those persons as claimants for addition, and having dealt with the claims it should then become public that they were claims for addition upon the final revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, I will accept that; I think it is a very good suggestion.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the reason for omitting the words "attesting with his initials claims for additions?"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it is needed now. The list is to be signed.

Mr. EDGAR. There are erasures of additions to be put in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The original idea was one general list, and that he should make corrections on that general list and put his initials opposite. But we have altered the Bill now, and there will be separate and distinct lists.

Mr. EDGAR I should think it would be a great safeguard when the list is gone over. Whenever there is an erasure or interlineation it is always initialed.

Mr. DAVIES. I was going to suggest if he put the names under the heading of "claims to be added," whether it would not be necessary or advisable that the claimant should state the particular qualification on which he bases his claim.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not propose that any man should be marked as a claimant to be added which would not sufficiently state the character of his qualification. It is evidence in support of that claim.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revision is to be based upon evidence and information in support of any claim before him. I amend the clause by inserting the words:

He shall also attest by his initials any additions or changes

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to bring up the question with respect to getting the names of the Indian voters correctly. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of the Indians there will have to be some provision made with respect to them. There are no assessment rolls on the reserves. There are maps showing the separate holdings, in some cases. The First Minister certainly does not contemplate placing in the hands of the Indian agent the power to hand in a list of Indian voters, who are wards of the Gov-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We shall deal with the Indians, who are not on any assessment roll, exactly in the same way as we shall deal with any other voters who are now going to receive the franchise. We shall place them on the voters' list. There are no assessment rolls in Prince Edward Island, yet we shall have to find some means of placing the names of voters on the list. There is no trouble about identifying the Indians who will be enfranchised in a political sense.

Mr. PATERSON. There will be great difficulty in identifying Indians on a reservation. How will electors of a county be able to determine whether Indians are in possession of separate holdings unless there is some map or plan. In municipalities a man has a lot, and you can easily determine the matter with respect to him. In a city a man lives in a certain street and at a certain number; but in regard to Indians on reservations, how are you going to trace the matter out? It seems to me that the thing is different from what it is in Prince Edward Island.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Just as it is in Muskoka and Algoma.

Mr. PATERSON There have been serious differences of opinion as to whether what was right had been done there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They had no revising barrister there.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, the hon. gentleman does admit that there were difficulties there, whatever the machinery they used, and other difficulties may arise under the revising barrister. I think this is a question which demands serious consideration, but if the hon. gentleman thinks that it had better come up on another clause, I will not discuss it now. It is for him to say.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will allow it to stand I will consider it. I would like to have the hon, gentleman also prepare a clause which he thinks will cover it before we get through the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON. I will have an opportunity of considering it, and of putting it in the Bill, if necessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, I cannot prevent the hon. gentleman, and I would not desire to do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The word "preliminary," in the 15th line, will be taken out, in consequence of the alteration of the other clause, and the words "first day of May" substituted for "fifteenth day of February." This clause provides for the division of the electoral district into polling districts.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest whether, in those Provinces where we have the same number in each polling division, I vides that. The question depends on the number, and the 300, it would not be convenient to follow the local divisions. Under the Election Act now, when the local division is inconvenient, the returning officer has power to establish electoral polling divisions, and you are proposing to give exactly the same power to another officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revising officer will visit each one of these polling districts for the purpose of settling the final revision. Afterwards he will sub-divide the district into polling districts, as well as he can come at it. If it should prove, afterwards, under the present system, that another sub-division is required, the returning officer, under the present law, unless it is altered, would have power to rectify the evil.

Mr. MILLS. Which should prevail?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The returning officer has to do it on the eve of the election.

Mr. MILLS. I do not see how you are going to have these two officers exercising exactly the same powers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. First, it must rest with the revising officer, and afterwards, at the time of the election, which may be three, or four, or five years afterwards, the returning officer may act under the provision of the election law and amend the division. That is a matter of continual change, on account of the continual development of the country. That is a very easily understood provision; and if, two years hence, the shifting of the population, the influx of the population, or the outgoing of population, would alter the matter, the returning officer can, under the present law, remodel the division for that election. However, next Session we may have to consider the electoral law generally. This is merely a franchise law; perhaps the attention of the House may be called to the necessity of revising our election law for a new system.

Mr. VAIL. I should like the hon, gentleman to make the date the 1st of April or the 1st of March, if possible. The 1st of May is a very inconvenient time, in the Province of Nova Scotia, because it is just the time our fishermen are away.

Mr. MILLS. There may be 35,000 away.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But he has settled his proliminary list, and he has to sub-divide the municipality into polling divisions. He has nothing to do with fisher. men or anybody else.

Mr. EDGAR. By section 38 the revising officer has the right to change the polling sub-divisions from time to time.

Mr. MILLS. This is a power the returning officer exercises annually.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It may be we shall hereafter deprive the returning officer of that power. When he has the list before him he will be obliged to do it annu-There is no election coming, and the returning officer ought not, perhaps, to have that duty thrown upon him, because he may so sub-divide as to please one party and displease another.

Mr. MILLS. Of course, that can be done by either one or the other, and there is less danger from a judge than from a returning officer. I think it is much safer, where the revising officer is a judge, that the power should rost with him. But in some of the Provinces the number of voters in polling places, for provincial purposes, is the same as the hon, gentleman proposes, and the parties resident in the townships are the most likely parties to make the division. Unless the revising officer saw some good reason for departing from their division, we might provide that, where convenient, he should follow the municipal divisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clause in effect pro-

local division may not be applicable. Of course, the revising officer must be considered to be a man of intelligence, and he will not, of necessity, upset the boundaries. On the contrary, the danger will be, if there is any danger at all, that he will be too much inclined to accept the local divisions. I think we may safely leave it to him.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 19,

Mr. WELDON. How does the hon. gentleman propose to number the polling districts?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Polling district No. 1, polling district No. 2, and so on.

Mr. WELDON. I think that would lead to some confusion. People are more likely to be familiar with the locality than with the mere number, in a county with thirty or forty sub divisions. I would suggest that the township be designated as well as the number. For instance, St. Martin's, No. 1, St. Martin's, No. 2, and so on. I would also suggest that the duplicate of the list should be filed in some public office—in New Brunswick with the secretarytreasurer of the municipality. In Ontario it may be different.

Mr. LISTER. If, after the words "polling districts," the words "in each municipality, parish or township," were put in, this would meet the difficulty, and would not add to the expense.

Mr. EDGAR. In the Province of Ontario we are accustomed to have voters' lists made up separately for each municipality, and to number them accordingly.

Mr. RYKERT. The returning officer does not do this. He sub-divides them.

Mr. EDGAR. I have hardly ever seen that done. Of course, this is made more for the final revision, to facilitate the final revision. It is made to facilitate the final revision, and we are certainly accustomed, in Ontario, at any rate, at the revision of the voting lists, to use the township polling division in each municipality.

Mr. MILLS. It would be in the last degree inconvenient if the revising officer had the power of putting the different parts of the municipality into one division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 18th clause shows he has not that power. It says: "Every city, town, ward, parish, township or other municipal or corresponding division in the electoral district therein."

Mr. MILLS. If we number them, the question is whether they had better be numbered from one up to thirty-five or forty, for the entire division, or whether each municipality should have its polling division numbered separately? we are not to have separate polling divisions in each municipality, and are not going to confuse the parts of a municipality with the parts of another, for the purpose of making a polling division, it would be very desirable to maintain the practice of having separate numbers for each municipality. Every ten years we have a revision of our electoral districts, and there is no reason to suppose that that practice will be abandoned. These electoral districts are mere transitory divisions; the permanent divisions are the municipal ones. A municipality may be in one county in one election and in a wholly different county in the next election, and all the numbers of a polling division will be broken up with the new distribution of seats that takes place every ten years. That would be an undesirable and confusing state of things.

Mr. TROW. It would simplify matters and add nothing to the expense if the polling divisions in each municipality

Sir John A. MACDONALD.

Ontario; and I think it would create confusion there if you were to number the polling divisions by municipalitiestownship No. 1 or 2.

Mr. WELDON. It is not township No. 1 or 2. In the cities it will be every ward. Take the city of St. John. where there are twenty or more polling places. A man will not know where poll No. 1 is, as the polling lists are not required to be posted; but if we were to designate them, say Queen's ward, poll No. 1, and so on, he will know the locality and easily ascertain the polling place at which he is entitled to vote. When the returning officer makes his proposition we will have to do what he proposes. Digby township—which is divided into the townships of Digby and Clare—the polling places could be designated township Digby No. 1, and so on, and township Clare No. 1, and so on. What I want is to attach locality to the number.

Mr. EDGAR. A little confusion occurred in the minds of some hon. gentlemen, from remembering that when an election takes place the returning officer numbers the polling divisions from one, consecutively, over the whole township, and so he will now. But, for the purpose of revising the voters' lists, they have never been numbered that way, in Ontario, at all events. The revision is according to the municipal voters' lists, which are printed for that purpose. It would not be the slightest additional trouble, and, moreover, it would suit the purpose of this list, which is to go to a final revision, and that takes place in each separate municipality. All we want is to add the municipality or parish, to show where the polling division is. If the division was numbered twenty or twenty-five in a certain township, the people there would, of course, know where that was.

Mr. LISTER. If the changes suggested by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), and others, are not adopted, great confusion will be created in Ontario, at any rate. There the revising officers will adopt the municipal boundaries adopted by the municipal authorities, so for as the polling districts are concerned. They are divided by the townships, and numbered, and with those numbers the people of the townships are perfectly familiar. It is very likely that the revising officer will adopt those boundaries. If not, there will be great confusion. Take a county of 30,000 or 40,000 inhabitants; you will have to refer to the voters' lists to show where polling district No. 20 or 30 is; but if the course suggested be adopted, there will be no trouble at all, as the people are familiar with the polling districts throughout the different townships. Even if the exact limits provided by the municipality be not adopted, still it is what the people are accustomed to, and there will be no difficulty if the provisions of the Bill are carried out.

Mr. DAVIES. The suggestions, no doubt, are very proper, as regards those parts of the country which are divided into municipalities, but it would not do for us, for the simple reason that the polling divisions are not coterminus with the township at all. There are thirty townships in my riding, and they take natural boundaries, like rivers and highways.

Mr. LISTER. I understand the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John would suit all the Provinces except Prince Edward Island. We might except Prince Edward Island.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is not a very impor-tant matter. I think the electors may be trusted to find out their number—to get the number of their berth. I move:

Mr. VAIL. In our county the districts number from the local designation attached to such number, in and by the order of the revising barrister, by whom they are established, and such order shall be forthwith, after the making thereof, filed and kept by the revising barrister for the purposes of this Act.

Mr. MULOCK. There cught to be some publication given to that order. It might as well be attached to the list of the polling sub-divisions, and go round with them.

Mr. HICKEY. When the list is published, it is published for the several polling districts.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest that you add these words, "and shall be published in like manner as is required for the publication of the list of voters under section 21." It does not cost any more money, and it does not put the revising officer to any trouble. He makes these polling subdivisions and makes alphabetical lists of the voters in those sub-divisions. Now, they will not know the meaning of the partial list that is given to them unless they know that it is limited to the list of persons who are admitted by this list of voters to be entitled to vote in respect of a certain area of the country. But in order that men shall intelligently understand the meaning of this partial list that is sent to them, they should know what area of land is embraced by this list.

Mr. ABBOTT. Section 21 expressly provides for that, in

Mr. MULOCK. No; I do not think it does. It is not sufficient to tell a man that he is, according to this list, put down as for such and such a sub-division. A man is interested in knowing what division he is placed in. He requires to have an opportunity to correct the list.

Mr. RYKERT. The property is described on the list.

Mr. MULOCK. Supposing any person is looking over a list of 200 names, and he is not only seeking to ascertain whether he is enrolled, but also whether everyone else within certain limits is enrolled, or to ascertain whether certain persons are left off that ought to be enrolled, is it not necessary for him, in the first instance, to know what area is intended to be covered by this thing called a polling district? He cannot tell whether a name is left off that ought to be on or not, unless he knows what territory is included. Now, is there anything in this Bill requiring any publicity to be given to the sub-division?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The 21st section does so. That is the law, as it has always been in Ontario.

Mr. EDGAR. Section 21 only applies to the description of the polling district in which the list is to be posted up, and does not include the description of the other polling districts, even in that municipality or county. But this order of the revising officer-not a long documentwould cover all the polling districts in the county. Section 21 does not provide for that at all; it only gives the voter information of his own polling district, and where the bounds

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He does not care to know about any other but his own.

On section 20,

Mr. DAVIES. I see there will be some difficulty in Prince Edward Island. We have the same polling divisions since 1873. They are well known, and it will create some confusion if they are altered. The 18th section provides that he must divide each township into polling divisions. I would suggest: "In Prince Edward Island polling divisions may comprise parts of townships," as a clause to be added at the end of section 18.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it is necessary, in clause 19, to require that the revising officer shall publish his order showing the polling sub-uivisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would involve the and other persons. We must suppose that candidates will have sufficient intelligence to know where they can obtain information as to the sub-divisions.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Some notice with respect to where the polling sub divisions are should be published. The expense of publishing such information in one or two newspapers circulating in the locality would not amount to very much, and it would convey much information to the public. The east riding of my county is a long distance from the county town, and it surely could not be expected that a person should be compelled to travel forty or fifty miles to the revising officer's office to secure this informa-

Mr. TROW. It will be a very simple matter to give the boundaries of the sub-divisions, from lot so and so to so-and. so, and on certain concession lines. Without that information the people cannot understand the true position.

Mr. MILLS. In the voters' list of Ontario it is stated, at the head of each polling division, what are the limits of such division. I do not know whether that would be applicable to all the Provinces or not, but there can be no difficulty whatever in adopting that principle, so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned. And when the revising officer puts up the list he can indicate the limits of the polling division.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think it would cost 10 cents extra. I have one of the lists for the municipality in my own county, and I find the whole description does not occupy more than three lines.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman wants this before there is a list.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). What is the meaning of the words in the 8th line of the 21st clause, "with the description of the polling districts to which it relates," unless it covers what the hon, gentleman has just described. If you want to find the description of a polling district in any municipality in Ontario you have to take the general voters' list for that municipality. But if this Act is carried into effect you will simply have to write the revising officer one letter, if you wish a copy of the list, while under the present system, in Ontario, you have to write to the different clerks of the municipalities. The system provided for in the Bill seems to me to be better than the one we have been accustomed to.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move the following amendment:-

That the revising officer shall be bound to furnish, to any person applying therefor, a copy of the order, if printed, on the payment of the proper proportion of the cost of said printing, and if not printed, of payment therefor at the rate of 10 cents per folio.

Amendment negatived.

On section 20,

Mr. MILLS. This refers, I suppose, to the final revision. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes, under section 17, to add on the names and mark those objected to as objected to. Should not that same provision be made here, and the names be marked on this list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon, gentleman. I remember that the hon, member for the west riding proposed, also, that there should be appended to the list all applicants whose applications were not accepted. I propose to add to the 48th line after the word "district," the words, "showing the names objected to," and in the 50th line, after the word "officer," the following words: "and shall append thereto the names of the claimants whose claims have not been accepted."

Mr. EDGAR. I very much approve of the amendment printing and sending of the information to the candidates which has been suggested by the hon. First Minister, but I think there should be an addition of these words: "and shall publish the same, as provided by section 13." is no provision made in the Bill, as it has been modified to-day, for the publication and distribution of any copies of the complete lists divided into polling districts. Clause 21 shows that a list of each polling district shall be published in that district, but there is no provision made for distributing this list, after the preliminary revision, at all. By section 13 it is only the rough draft list, prepared by the revising officer, without any special means of information, that is to be published, posted up, and distributed. That is right enough; but it is very much more important that the list, as revised at the preliminary revision, should be distributed, because a great many names, such as those of a large number of tenants, wage-earners, income voters and fishermen, will be on the preliminary list, and I think it is only right that that list should receive, at least, as much publication as has been provided already for the rough draft list. That would be the effect of this amendment, and I hope the First Minister will see his way to accept it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have a clause prepared for the 21st section to that effect.

Mr. EDGAR. If so, I will withdraw my amendment. Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. WELDON. If we stop at the word "officer," then, when we take the sub-sections on pages 13 and 17, they will cover the whole ground.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that all the words after the word "officer," on the 49th line, page 12, be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. To prevent confusion, and for the convenience of the electors, the boundaries of the polling divisions should be described. If easy access be given to the description of these polling divisions each voter will know where to give his vote, and the simplest way would be to adopt the plan followed in many municipalities in Ontario, by placing at the head of the voters' list a description of each polling division. I move that after the word "district," in the 48th line, the words, "also a description of the said polling divisions," be added.

Mr. SPROULE. That is covered in the 21st clause. Amendment negatived.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman proposed, in reply to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), to deal with the subject of the Indian voter. Does the hon. gentleman propose to take up the matter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My idea is, that when we get through the Bill, then the hon. gentleman can prepare his amendment, and he will have an opportunity of moving it. If adopted, we will consider what is the most proper place to insert it, while in committee.

On section 21,

Mr. EDGAR. The charge for these lists ought to be fixed. In the 13th section we have provided that the whole list shall not cost more than 50 cents. If the list for a polling sub-division were made to cost 10 cents, that would be much more than 50 cents for the whole.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Make it not to exceed 10 cents.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is too much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to add to this section a provision that the revising officer shall deliver and then the judge himself or transmit, by registered letter, copies of the list, as follows There are 40 days allowed.

Mr. Edgar.

—to each member of the council of the municipality and to the clerk and treasurer, and to the postmaster, one copy of the list for the municipality; to the sheriff, warden, clerk of the peace, etcetera, one copy relating to the electoral district; and ten copies relating to the electoral district to the members for the House of Commons, and the unsuccessful candidates at the last election.

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister has mentioned the names of municipal officers, of officers of the Local Legislature, and of the municipal councils, as to receive copies of the list. I suppose it is for the purpose of furnishing facilities for the correction of the lists; but, after the list is finally revised, there is not the same reason for furnishing them with it. Now, surely it is of as much consequence that the local representatives should receive the list as the municipal councillors. The cost would be very little, indeed, of sending the list to the members of the Local Legislature.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These parties who are named are local officers. These lists will not be of much value to the provincial members, because the qualification will be different, and the franchise will be different, and it will give them no information. Besides, it will be adding to the cost.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the phraseology in lines 11 and 12 would be improved if the hon. gentleman would strike out "three of such copies shall be posted in conspicuous public places," and make it read, "by causing copies to be posted in three conspicuous public places."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You are quite right; it is better.

Amendments agreed to.

On section 22,

Mr. MILLS. This is for the final revision, which the hon, gentleman told us last night is the important one. It seems to me that the revising officer will require to indicate where and when he will hold his court in each municipality for the purpose of making this revision. It is important that full notice should be given with respect to the time and place of holding the final revision. Notice should be given in the newspapers.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Section 21 provides that copies of the notice shall be posted up in three conspicuous places, and that an advertisement shall also be inserted in a newspaper. So the whole notice does not depend on the newspaper publication. That is only additional. The only difficulty I see is with respect to the wording. I think it might be provided that the publication should be made in the nearest newspaper.

Mr. DAVIES. I move, in amendment:

That if there is no newspaper published in the municipality, then the the notice shall be published in one or more newspapers published in an adjoining municipality.

Amendment negatived.

On section 23,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That clause will have to be amended. I think, as at present, a person might not have one day to appeal at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to strike out the words "nor more than two weeks."

Mr. PATERSON. I would suggest something like 30 days.

Mr. MILLS. There ought to be at least three weeks after notice. In Ontario there are 30 days given for appeal to the county judge from the time of the publication of the list, and then the judge himself may fix any time after 10 days. There are 40 days allowed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would move that the words, "not less than one week nor more than two weeks" be struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "Not less than four weeks nor more than six weeks."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, I would agree to "not less than three weeks" after the publication.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). In a large electoral district, with seven or eight municipalities, your agent or yourself would have to visit every polling sub-division, and you would find it impossible to take one municipality a day. In my riding I am sure there are some municipalities which would require two or three days. I should say that four weeks ought to be the least time allowed for the preparation of the list.

Mr. EDGAR. If it is intended to give three weeks for making appeals it is necessary to put four weeks in the first part of the section, because the person who is to appeal has to give one week's notice, which would leave only two weeks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Make it four weeks.

Mr. DAVIES. That being settled, I would suggest that the word "locality," in the 28th line, be struck out, and the words "parish or county court circuit" be put in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the first part of the clause be amended to read as follows: The day to be fixed, as aforesaid, for such final revision, shall not be less than four weeks after the publication, by posting up of the said lists as aforesaid, and the place shall be in the city, town, township, incorporated village, parish or other known territorial revision; and, in the Province of Prince Edward Island, in the local electoral district which includes such polling district; and in the electoral district in the Province of Nova Scotia, in such places, comprising not less than three polling districts, as the revising officer may think most convenient.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE moved that after the word "so," in line 33, the following words be added: Shall give proper notice for such purpose in the preliminary revision of such lists. This clause provides that a party desiring to object to any person or to amend or correct such list on the final revision shall have the right to do so on giving notice. I think we ought to provide that he shall have previously given notice at the preliminary revision of the list. It is not intended he should give notice twice after giving the notice required for the preliminary revision.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not see any object in having the remainder of the clause, from the 36th line, left in:

"And the day to be fixed in the said notice, as the day for the giving of notice of such objections or claims from any person, shall be not less than one week before the day named for the final revision."

The objection I see to it is this: The day to be fixed by the revising officer on his notice is not to be less than one week before the final revision. Now, we have provided that there are four weeks with reference to him, and suppose the revising officer was to fix as this day a day four weeks ahead. He has no option to fix it at less than a week, but he might require them to give three weeks' notice; the day he might fix might require three weeks' notice.

Mr. WELDON. The intention is that the party shall give at least one week's notice, but he does not fix the day in the notice. I think the language is very inapt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a good deal of verbiage there. It might be simplified in this way:

And any person desiring to object or add to, or in any way amend or correct such list, on the final revision, shall have the right to do so, on giving the same notice and following the same procedure as is provided for in the 16th section as to objections and amendments under the preliminary revision, and the notice of such objections or claims from any person shall serve not less than one week before the day named for final revision.

Mr. EDGAR. I beg to move:

That any person desiring to object to or add to, or in any way amend or correct such list, in the final revision, shall have a right to do so, if he has given proper notice at the preliminary revision, or upon giving such notice and following such procedure as is provided in the 16th section.

Amendment agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONAD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 5th June, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

Mr. EDGAR. I think this is the proper time, before petitions are read at the Table, to draw the attention of the House to one of the petitions which is in order to be read to-day. I will explain why I think so. I am not proposing to deal with the contents of the petition, which has not been read, but I propose to draw the attention of the House to the contents of the petition, as stated by the hon. member for Lincolni (Mr. Rykert), when he presented it the other day; and I am inclined to think this is the proper time to do so, in order that the petition may not be read, if it is one which, under the circumstances, should not be read. It seems to be laid down in Cushing's practice as follows, with respect to the question of presenting petitions:—

"Two courses only are open. Either to allow all the petitions to be presented in the first instance, and upon reading them determine whether they are proper or not to be received, or to determine beforehand and without reading whether they are fit to be received. It might be said in favor of the first course that in no other way as well as by hearing the petition read could the the House determine on its character. But on the other hand it is obvious that if it were the duty of the House to hear all petitions of the House read, in the first, instance that might be offered, its time, and the time of its constituents, might be completely wasted in listening to petitions, upon which it would be impossible to proceed, or which might be made the vehicle of insult and outrage towards the House or its members. In view of the inconveniences by which this course would unavoidably be attended it is the established practice in Parliament to determine beforehand, and without reading a petition in the House, whether it is fit to be received."

If the hon, gentleman had not stated very fully the contents of that petition to the House it would have been impossible for me now to raise this question, but having done so, I think it is the proper time for me to point out the reasons why it should not be read.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps we had better dispose of the other petitions first, and then we will come to that one. I suppose it is the petition of W. A. Milloy.

The remaining petitions having been received,

Mr. SPEAKER. The petition of W. A. Milloy having no signatures on the sheet of the apparent petition is therefore not in order, and cannot be received,

Mr. RYKERT. I move for leave to withdraw that petition. I do so, Sir, because I understand there are not three signatures attached to the original sheet. As it is important that the prayer of that petition should be accepted, I would like to have the opportunity for the same gentleman to re-sign the petition, and to get two or three hundred more to sign it.

Mr. EDGAR. I am in favor of the motion of the hon. gentleman carrying, not only for the reasons he has given, but for others—because I am satisfied that the substance of that petition is not one which the House can entertain, or allow to be read, or receive after it has been read. Nothing can be clearer than that fact as laid down by the text books. I quote now from Cushing:

"The first essential requisite to a petition, so far as its substance is concerned, relates "----

Mr. RYKERT. The hon, gentleman has not the right to discuss the contents of the petition.

Mr. BLAKE. The question is whether it shall be withdrawn or not, and the hon. member has a right to speak on that question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes; I think the hon. gentleman has a right to discuss it.

Mr. EDGAR. I am supporting the motion of the hon. gentleman:

"The first essential requisite to a petition, so far as its substance is concerned, relates to the language in which it is expressed; it should be decorous and proper in itself, and also respectful towards the House to which it is addressed as well as its individual members, and to other co-ordinate bodies and authorities. And a breach of the rule is not only an insult to the legislative body but to the whole constituency, including the petitioners, of which that body is the representative, tending rather to excite ill-feeling than to promote calm deliberation, and admitting of no answer, consistently with parliamentary reform, beyond the simple rejection of the offensive document."

One of the tests which is to be applied to a petition in presenting it to the House, is:

"That when the language of a petition is such that, if spoken by a member in debate, it would be disorderly and unparliamentary, it is improper to be employed in a petition."

There are some instances given, as, for example, where a petition was presented to the English House of Commons, complaining of the great and unnecessary delay in passing the Reform Bill, and declaring that it was impeded by the upholding of corruption in the honorable House, who, upon the most frivolous pretence, wasted the public time. That was held to render it necessary that the petition should be rejected because it was improper to receive it. Now, this petition, as explained by the hon, gentleman who presented it, reflects upon the minority of the House of Commons, because it characterises the Opposition in this House as an unscrupulous Opposition.

Mr. RYKERT. That is true.

An hon. MEMBER. It is not true—every word of it is false.

Mr. EDGAR. It uses language which should not be used across the floor of this House by hon, members, regarding other members, and therefore it is entirely disrespectful to the House, as well as to a portion of the members of this House, that such a petition should be received. More than that: we know that under the rule it is improper to take advantage of the privilege which everybody in this country has of petitioning the House, to make allegations which are improper about either individuals of this House or other important bodies. We know that courts of justice cannot be attacked by petition, that even the social and local standing of individuals cannot be attacked by petition, while this petition, as explained by the hon. gentleman, reflects on a majority of the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, by characterising them as designing and unscrupulous men.

Mr. RYKERT. That is true.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Mr. RYKERT. Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman is equally out of order with the petition when he says that. For these reasons I think it would have to be held that the petition in itself, in addition to the irregularity of signing it, is entirely out of order; and as to the irregularity of signing it, I think the hon. gentleman was quite right in asking to withdraw it on that account. The reason given for that rule is very plain indeed. In Bourinot's book, at page 263, in a note to the statement of that rule of the House, I find the following:—

"The reason of this rule may be understood by referring to a statement of Lord Clarendon. (History of Rebellion, Vol. II, page 367). That, in 1640, 'when a multitude of hands was procured, the petition itself was cut off, and the new one framed, suitable to the designing hand and annexed to the long list of names which were subscribed to the former. By this means many men found their hands subscribed to petitions of which before they had never heard.'"

For that reason I think it is quite right that the petition should be withdrawn.

Mr. RYKERT. In presenting the petition I did not look at it carefully to see whether the names were properly signed or not. Of course, my attention was drawn to it, and I therefore, very properly, I think, took steps to withdraw it. It is unfortunate, however, that the hon. gentleman has objected to the contents of the petition, because I think it is very necessary that the electors outside, who are our masters, should have an opportunity of telling us what they think of us here. However, the rules are such that the truth cannot always be told. I hope the motion will prevail, and I hope to be able to present the petition in another form in a few days, with 200 or 300 names added to it.

Motion agreed to, and petition withdrawn.

SCOTT ACT PETITIONS.

Mr. FOSTER. The motion I wish to make is to strike the name of John Hamilton, of Shelburne, from a petition which was presented to the House on Monday the 1st of June. I have had a letter from Shelburne, and accompanying it, this certificate:

" SHELBURNE, 1st June, 1884.

"I hereby certify that I did not sign or authorise any individual to sign my name to the petition (in favor of the sale of wine and beer) purporting to have come from Shelburne, Dufferin County.

"JOHN HAMILTON."

As Shelburne is not a very large place, and as Mr. Hamilton is an active member of the Scott Act Association, and does not wish to be held as standing sponsor to the prayer of the petition, I think it right that his name should be taken off.

Mr. CASEY. May there not be another John Hamilton in the place?

Mr. SPEAKER. We do not know that there is no other John Hamilton; there may be some other John Hamilton there, and there is no practice to warrant such a motion as this. In England there is a committee before which petitions are referred, and which reports, after making enquiry, that certain names should be struck off for being improperly signed, or signed without authority; but in this case, I think the House has already evidence enough to show that there is no other John Hamilton.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the hon, gentleman's purpose is served by his calling attention to the fact that a Mr. John Hamilton, of Shelburne, whose name is supposed to be on this petition, did not sign it. He is therefore relieved from the responsibility of having signed it; but I do not see how we can strike off a name simply because a person of the same name says he did not sign it.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see how we can strike off the name of John Hamilton, who did sign this petition, at the request of John Hamilton who did not sign it.

Mr. FOSTER. Shelburne is a small place, and he gives me his opinion that there is no other John Hamilton there. I therefore felt it necessary to call the attention of the House to the matter, and the only way in which I could do so was by moving. There are several things about this petition which, to my mind, go to show its worthlessness as an expression of public opinion. After the petition had been signed, some person to whom it has been sent has taken the liberty to interlard remarks all through it in red ink. For instance, before the name of A. Henderson, he has put the word "reverend," and after it, "Church of England, Orangeville." A similar note is made with reference to the name of W. E. McKay; a number are stated to be leading merchants; and another is stated to be a merchant tailor. I find also, column after column, of names in this petition evidently signed by the same hand. There is one column of nineteen names evidently signed by the same hand, with the same kind of ink, and I judge at the same time. But the astonishing thing about these nineteen names is that they are of men who come from five different townships or villages. At the end there are forty or fifty names signed without the least clue to their residence or place of abode. All these things go to show that this petition is not a very valuable exponent of the will or wishes of the people.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman is a little hard to please. He began by objecting because someone had added to the names on the petition something in red ink, and then he objects that at the end there are a number of names without any additions. I think the best way to get rid of Mr. Hamilton's difficulty would be for him to present a petition in favor of the reverse of what this petition prays for, and that he should say, like the police court reports, that it is not the same John Hamilton.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the rule is that a person signing his own name should give his place of residence and his own description.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. In England the other thing is often done.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 24,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that after the word "complaint," in the 43rd line, the following words be added: "To add to, amend or correct the list as on the last clause mentioned."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The revising officer, though he has all the powers of a court of record, can dispose of all those appeals without evidence on oath. It does not necessarily follow he is bound to take evidence at all. This clause states: "And shall hear and dispose of any objection or complaint of which notice shall have been given as aforesaid, hearing the parties making the same if they appear, and any evidence that may be adduced before him in support of or in opposition thereto." Section 25 states this is a court possessed of the powers of a court of record, and the judge has all the powers of a judge of a court of record. He is at liberty to call witnesses and examine them under oath, but, by this section, he can dispose of the objections without calling witnesses at all, and can hear the evidence without its being under oath. I would suggest to add after the word "dispose," in the 42nd line, the words "on evidence," and after the words "opposition thereto," in the 46th line, the words "on oath." An appeal would be wholly useless for the revising officer unless the evidence were taken down in writing and given under oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman's objection is merely hypercritical. Take the formation of any court in the world, you do not say it will be obligatory on the court to take evidence under oath. That is ex necessitate; the two clauses taken together show that the evidence must be on oath. The hon, gentleman says it must be only on oath. He would not allow the Quaker and the Mennonite to give evidence.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). They could give what is equal to an oath. Under section 25, the revising officer has the power to administer the oath, but is not bound to do so.

Mr. CASEY. The First Minister has given his opinion, but other lawyers are as likely to differ from him as the hon, member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). The right hon, gentleman may know that the intent is that the evidence shall be taken under oath, but that is no guide to any person interpreting the clause afterwards. If he finds in the words of the Act liberty to dispense with the oath, he may avail himself of it in spite of the intention. The hon. gentleman says this barrister will be bound to take evidence under oath, as much as the judges of any other court, but they are bound by continuous practice, if not by statute. Evidence would be useless in those courts unless given under oath. The court it is proposed to create here has no precedents. It is something purely anomalous, and different from any other court in existence. The Bill sets the revising officer, who is to be the court himself, free from all the trammels of the ordinary courts. Under clause 40, the whole of the preliminary proceedings are at his mercy. He may dispense with notices, and allow cases to be tried which would be informal even under this Act. "He is not to be bound by strict rules of evidence or forms of procedure." He is expressly set free from following precedents or rules of other courts, or the rules laid down in this Act itself. Under these circumstances, it is simply trifling with the House to tell us that he will be bound to take evidence on oath under this section. Under section 55. he is authorised to strike out names, or add them, and generally to correct the list, upon such information as he may possess and without objections or claims being made. I must support the amendment of my hon, friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron), and, speaking of the matter calmly and deliberately, I have very little doubt that the right hon gentleman will, on mature thought, accept it; because I cannot assume, in justice to him, that it was his intention to allow the revising officer to proceed without sworn evidence in dealing with such an important matter as the vote of a citizen. No matter how small a matter may be at issue in a division court or before a county board, the evidence is taken on oath, and these are matters quite despicable in comparison with this. I have never heard of a court of revision before a county judge deciding any matter in regard the voters' list except on oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In this case, he must do so.

Mr. CASEY. That is the right hon. gentleman's opinion, but his opinion has been so frequently and continuously wrong on questions of law, that we cannot pay any special attention to it. The subsequent sections of the Bill say distinctly that he need not take evidence on oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know the clauses.

Mr. CASEY. If he does it is most extraordinary that the hon, gentleman should speak as he has in regard to them. The 55th section does not mean that the revising officer is to take evidence on oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Move against that clause.

Mr. CASEY. We will discuss that clause when we come to it, but that clause expresses the intention of the Billas much as this one. If the hon, gentleman's intentions are to require that the evidence shall be taken on oath, let him show the sincerity of his intentions by accepting the amendment. If he does not, I shall have to withdraw what I said a few moments ago, that I could not credit him with a deliberate intention to allow these matters to be decided without the sanction of an oath. The inference will be so obvious that we need not go into it. The objection to the word "oath" is very trifling, because it is generally understood that it includes an affirmation on the part of those entitled to affirm. The clause could be easily so arranged as to require precisely the same sanction from a man giving evidence in regard to a vote as in regard to property. That is all we ask. It would be perfectly scandalous if a man's vote could be taken from him on evidence given under any less sanction than is required in the case of goods and chattels.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I will move the amendment which I suggested. I did not for a moment suppose that the hon, gentleman would object to this amendment. He states that the revising officer cannot hear any evidence, except on oath, and cannot adjudicate on any objections unless they are sustained by evidence given on oath. I think otherwise. I think under this clause he can adjudicate without any evidence at all, and certainly without the evidence having the sanction of an oath, at all events there is a doubt about it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see no doubt.

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon, gentleman intends that the revising officer shall hear no evidence except on oath, he should put that beyond any question. There is a question now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Other lawyers take a different view of it, though, perhaps, not of the eminence of the hon. gentleman. I move that, after the word "dispose," in the 42nd line, the words "upon evidence," be inserted, and after the word "thereto," in the 45th line, the words "on oath or affirmation," be inserted.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the hon. Minister's attention to the meaning of this clause with regard to evidence. Would the production of a deed, without its being sworn to, be evidence of a man's title? The man says: "This is my title, and I claim to be the owner." Would not the revising officer be entitled to accept that deed as evidence adduced without the party being sworn? I think that he might. It seems to me that the amendment suggested by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron), cannot do any harm, at least. Then I would ask the hon. gentleman's attention to the statement that he made the other day, that he proposed, in case the revising officer was not a judge, that there should be a re-hearing of the whole case anew; that it would not be simply an appeal, but, that the judge to whom the appeal was made, would be entitled to take evidence anew. I would like to know if I understood the hon, gentleman rightly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said there might be an appeal as to fact as well as to law.

Mr. MILLS. Beyond that, whether in case there was an appeal from the revising officer to the county judge, the latter should take evidence anew, if desired by the parties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said the judge would have original jurisdiction.
Mr. CASEY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A judge in appeal cannot have original jurisdiction.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not speaking about a judge in appeal. I put the question to the First Minister some time ago across the floor of the House, as to whether the appeal to be granted would be a complete appeal, and whether the judge sitting, you may say in appeal, but sitting and reviewing the action of the revising officer, would have original jurisdiction; and the First Minister said yes, and that he would have appellate jurisdiction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh no, I did not say anything like that—certainly not.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I understood from the hon, gentleman—that there was to be a re-hearing of the whole case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never contemplated anything so absurd.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman calls it an absurdity, but it is an absurdity that exists in many courts, and I could give him many instances where an appeal is not simply in the sense of hearing questions of law and reading evidence, taking facts from the notes taken at the original procedure, but beginning the procedure anew, and taking all the evidence anew. The hon gentleman will see that if he is not going to adopt that rule, and if the county judge is to take evidence from the notes of the revising barrister, then it is of immense consequence that the revising barrister should be called upon where necessary to take down the evidence of the witnesses, and that the evidence should be subscribed by the witnesses, that there may be no dispute, and that there may not be an unfair representation of the evidence before the county judge Now, the hon. gentleman does not propose to carry out that intention as we understood him the other day, but intends that it shall be simply an appeal in the ordinary form from the decision of the revising officer. It is therefore of the greatest consequence that the evidence should be taken down with care and subscribed to by the witness, in order that there may not be a colored representation of the evidence, and especially ought it to be so when taken by a man with little practice and without any professional skill. We all know that the revising officer, where he is not a judge, must be a man of very little practice; he must be a man to whom it will be an object to accept the position, and probably a man of inferior legal attainments and of no legal standing. He is not likely, therefore, to have the confidence of the community, and consequently it is very important that the evidence should be thoroughly reliable. We all know the old practice of taking depositions in the Court of Chancery in Ontario, where the Chancellor or the Vice-Chancellor took down the evidence, and read it over to the witness, and, if it was not such as the witness intended it should be, corrections were made, and it was afterwards subscribed to by the witness. It seems to me that is the proper form for preserving the evidence wherever parties may desire it before the revising barrister. I therefore trust that the hon. gentleman will make an amendment, adding the words, "such evidence to be taken down in writing and signed by the witness where either of the parties require the same." I think this is nothing more than an adequate protection to parties whose rights are to be affected, and it is only fair to the county judge before whom the case is to be tried, that the evidence should be accurately presented to him, since he is not to have an opportunity of examining the witnesses himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are drifting again into the unwholesome practice of looking ahead instead of at the clause before the committee. The question is this, whether this clause sufficiently contains the junction—if I may use the word—of the revising barrister, with the evidence taken under oath. I think it is so clear that it Bill. scarcely requires an argument. But I think there is a strong objection to putting these words in. It must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that this revising barrister—if I may refer to the Ontario practice, as others have doneis doing the work of a court of review, in settling the list. This is not a contentious matter, in which proceedings, as well as the right of parties, are brought up hostilely between plaintiff and defendant. The revising officer is to prepare a true list. Now, if we put in words that the evidence that must be taken on oath, or what is equivalent to an oath, in all cases, you will see how completely you choke and obstruct the whole machine. Now, I will give you an instance. To continue the illustration of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), a man is entered as an owner, and opposite his name is written "objected to." He comes before the revising barrister and says: "Here is my deed." Well, the objector, perhaps, withdraws his objection. There is an end of it, and the man's name is passed. But in this case, when the objection is one entered, evidence must be taken on oath, in every case. He sits there, supposed to be an indifferent party, as a judge. 'Every name is called up, and when objection is made the party is again asked: "Do you object?" He says: "Yes, I persist in my objection." He will turn round to the party who is objected to, and say: "What have you to say?" "Here is my deed," he replies. The objector looks at the deed, and the matter is restiled. If in the case of every chiestion there is to be evi settled. If, in the case of every objection there is to be evidence taken, hon, gentlemen will see that it will obstruct and clog the wheels of the whole machine. But, when the objection is once made and persisted in, the party must give evidence—it is before court; the whole tenor of the clause shows that legal evidence must be offered. There is no doubt about that. I cannot accede to the amendment.

Mr. WELDON. The very arguments used by the hon. gentlemen, show the necessity of the amendment. This is not a court of record, although the judge will have like powers. Frequently, in a court, objection is waved as to legal evidence. A deed is produced, and the party says I do not want the deed proved. So, in the case cited for purposes of illustration, the objection made by the party would be withdrawn, and the matter thus settled. The proposed provision with respect to taking evidence under oath is, however, desirable; because we must remember that a great many of the revising officers would be barristers of five years' standing, during which period a lawyer does not gain much experience. It is just as well to make the clause so plain that he who runs may read. With respect to the justices court, that is a court of common law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not a court of common law, but a court of statutory enactment.

Mr. WELDON. With respect to the justices court, we find that when it is a matter outside of the ordinary investigation, the Act provides that the justice shall not issue a warrant until satisfied, not by evidence, but by evidence on oath or on affirmation. This is not an unreasonable amendment to propose.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. First Minister said a few moments ago that this clause and the next clause compelled the revising officer to take evidence upon oath. But when he speke last the hon. gentleman said, if the revising officer were to be compelled to take evidence in all cases on oath, it would be "clogging and obstructing the wheels of the machine." Perhaps it might be so. If this Bill is intended to be a machine; and for a certain purpose, we can easily understand that the requirement of evidence on oath might clog and obstruct the machine. But that is not a reason which should weigh with the House in passing this section. This is the heautiful position occupied by the father of the

He has given expression to two different views within fifteen minutes. "Machine" is a very favorite word with American politicians. I do not know whether it is intended to create, by this Bill, a machine, such as was worked by Boss Tweed in New York; but it is a very significant and peculiar word to use in this connection. The hon, gentleman says we have fallen into the unwholesome practice of looking at the rest of the Bill. I do not think it is an unwholesome practice. If the section is not clear, we must look at other sections in order to endeavor to understand it; it would be a very unwholesome practice to go on with an imperfect knowledge of what the section meant. On the face of this section it simply says that the revising officer shall hear and dispose of any objections or complaints. It does not say how he shall hear or how he shall dispose of them. We have to look for that information elsewhere. In the 40th section it says that the revising officer is not to be bound by strict rules of evidence or forms of procedure. Section 55 says he may make changes without complaint being made, and on any information within his possession. It distinctly says that he need not require evidence. Those sections, taken with the First Minister's last statement, show that our suspicions were correct, and that it is not intended that the revising officer shall take evidence under oath. Consequently, we are bound to return to the suspicion we first entertained, namely, that there was an intentional omission of any obligation to take evidence on oath, and that it was made for some purpose. A statement of the purpose has now been given to us. The omission of the requirement to take evidence under oath is to let the machine work, the hon, gentleman has told us. That is all very well for those who are going to run the machine, but we cannot be expected to look at it in the same light. The hon, First Minister said the revising officer would be "supposed to be sitting as an indifferent person." Who will suppose him to be so sitting? Not the hon gentleman himself. He will never suppose one of his revising officers to be sitting as an indifferent person. He knows where the officer's sympathies will be and how cases of doubt will be decided. The hon gentleman said that a person might object to another man's vote; that the man objected to might produce a deed which would satisfy the objector, and thereupon the case would be settled, and the revising officer would not have to act. Of course, he would not have to act, and, in such a case would not have to take evidence. We only ask that he shall take evidence where he will have to give a decision. He would not be required to take evidence in the supposed case, because there would be no case before him and nothing to be tried and disposed of. And there is nothing in the objection which he evidently makes on the spur of the moment; and when that objection is dropped, the case is dropped. I think the hon gentleman's own speeches have shown clearly the meaning and intention of this clause; and that, I think, against his own will; and now that we do know the object, it is all the more necessary, in the interest of both parties, to contend that the sacred right to vote should be guarded by an oath or its equivalent. Even if the revising officer is a partisan Conservative, he will have his dislikes, his feelings of ill-will to individuals; and where it does not injure the party, he will be ready to gratify these feelings even against Conservatives. When this side of the House comes into power, if they chose to continue such an iniquitous law, if they chose to appoint revising barristers, I would ask hon, gentlemen opposite how they would like to have their right to the franchise left at the mercy of this partisan officer, without the safeguard of taking evidence on oath? I do not ask hon gentlemen literally to put themselves in our places, because I know they are not at all likely to move over to theoretically, and to imagine a Grit revising barrister settleing the franchise of themselves and their friends without taking the evidence on oath. They now complain that Grit assessors are frauds, that they cheat them out of their votes, but not only is the assessor a sworn officer himself, but his work is revised at the first revision—the court of revision —on oath, and it is also revised on oath by the judge at the final revision. But here there is no such safeguard, for we have no revision except this final one, and there the revising officer is not only not compelled to take the evidence on oath, but he need not take evidence at all. He is not compelled to keep a record of the evidence to be used in the case of appeal, and under such circumstances what a farce an appeal will be! This section undoubtedly requires to be altered in the direction of both amendments which have been placed in your hands.

Mr. LISTER. I cannot see why the First Minister, as he has stated that it is intended that the revising officer shall take the evidence under oath, should not accept the amendments proposed. In the English Act I find that the word used is not "evidence," but "proof," which would imply that the proof must be under oath, but that on the other hand the word "evidence" does not necessarily mean that the proof adduced before the revising officer shall be under oath. The English Act provides that the revising officer is to examine upon oath, all persons who come before him, whether they are the persons objecting, or those objected to. I find also that the Ontario Act in providing for appeal against over assessment, provides that certain evidence shall not be required under oath except under certain circumstances, so that the mere fact that the word evidence is used, does not make it imperative on the revising officer that the evidence shall be under oath. Now, when you consider that there is to be an appeal from the revising officer, unless he is the county judge, upon questions of fact, it must strike every person who considers the matter, that it is exceedingly important that the evidence taken at the first revision should be in writing and under oath, unless it is intended to give the judge original jurisdiction. The First Minister says that is not the intention, and that being the case, it is infinitely more important that the evidence should be taken on oath in a matter of this kind, and that it should be fully and properly taken, than in a question as to the rights of individuals regarding property or money, because it affects the right of the individual which no money compensation can make up for. The revising barrister is created a court for the hearing of complaints. The decision of that court is subject to appeal to another tribunal, and when the First Minister says it is not necessary to state in this section that the evidence shall be under oath, although that is intended, it seems to me he has some sinister object in refusing this amendment. If the evidence is to be under oath why not make the section clear to that effect? Why should there be any doubt about it? Why depart from the words of the English law? If the word "evidence" were sufficient to require the revising officer to take the evidence under oath, I submit that the words "under oath" would not have been used in the English statute. They are not there for nothing; they are there for some object; and if it is necessary that these words should be used in the English Act, there is an equal necessity for them to be used in this Act, and I think it would be the grossest oversight on the part of this Parliament to pass an Act and neglect to provide distinctly in so essential a portion as this, what the duties of the revising officer are. We have reason to think that these revising officers will not be particularly favorable to the Liberal party; there is a feeling throughout the country that these gentlemen, whom the hon gentleman himself appoints, will, in some cases, be unduly favorable to the side which has appointed them. Therefore it is the duty of the oath. It merely authorises them to administer an oath. Mr. CASEY.

Government to remove that fear as far as possible. I am not charging these men with wrong-doing; but, under this law, there is a possibility that grievous wrong may be done. and if the Act is to receive that respect which an Act of this kind is expected to receive, it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to place this question beyond all doubt and cavil. If you look at every other Act in which it is intended that witnesses shall be examined on oath, the words are distinctly used that the witnesses shall be examined on oath or that the evidence shall be taken on oath. I do not say that the hon. gentleman is not right; but it is open to cavil and argument; it is open to the revising officer to do perhaps, some great injustice to a person appearing before him. The amendment is a most reasonable one. The First Minister, at the last sitting, evinced a desire to meet the views of the Opposition; and why should he not insert these words and put this question beyond all doubt? He intends to allow an appeal where the revising officer is not a judge of the county court; yet he says the judge is not to have original jurisdiction. He is not to have the right to bring before him the evidence which was brought before the revising officer; he is just to take such evidence as the revising officer thinks proper to take down, be it under oath or not under oath. He has not power to bring the witnesses before him for examination. If there is to be an appeal, and the judge has not power to bring the witnesses before him for examination, then it should be declared that the evidence taken before the revising officer should be in writing and should be taken under oath, then the parties would have an opportunity of examining and cross-examining. This is a very vital amendment, and without it the Act will be very imperfect. I hope the First Minister will reconsider the matter and accept the amend-

Mr. MACMASTER. The question is whether the provisions of the Bill are sufficient to authorise the revising officer to take evidence under oath.

Some hon. MEMBERS. To compel him.

Mr. MACMASTER. Yes, to compel him to take evidence under oath. The hon, gentleman who spoke last would not undertake to say that the interpretation the hon. First Minister placed on this section was wrong; but he thought that for greater precision the words "under oath" should be inserted. If the Bill is so explicit that there can be no reasonable doubt that the revising officer must take the evidence under oath, then it is undesirable to clog it with unnecessary words. It seems to me, on reading the 24th and 25th sections together, that hon, gentlemen opposite are making captious objections against the Bill. The 24th section provides that the revising officer shall hear the parties who make the complaints, and any evidence that may be adduced before him in support of or in opposition thereto; and when we turn to the next section, we find that he is there fully empowered to take evidence under oath.

An hon, MEMBER. He can do as he likes.

Mr. MACMASTER. Hon, gentlemen know perfectly well that if he proceeded improperly he might be compelled by a higher court to do otherwise. But I would refer hon. gentlemen to the terms in which the Ontario statute gives similar powers. The hon, gentleman did not read all the provisions; he only read one or two of them. In the 56th section of the Municipal Act, it is declared that the court of revision, or some member thereof, may administer an oath-it is not shall; it is not made obligatory-may administer an oath to any witness before his evidence is

Mr. LISTER. But for that no person could administer an

Mr. MACMASTER. This is a declaration of the authority of the court of revision to administer an oath, although there is nothing saying that they shall be bound to take the evidence under oath, yet we find a subsequent section in the Ontario Act dispensing with the necessity of doing so. Sub-section 16, of section 56, says:

So that the framers of this statute, which governs in Ontario, clearly intend that the earlier section giving the power to administer the oath, should imply the authority to take the evidence in that way and in no other way; otherwise there would not be a subsequent section in the statute exempting the court from the obligation to hear a party under oath. A good deal has been said about a few remarks of the First Minister as to parties who appear before the revising officer and produce a deed from which it is evident there can be no serious contestation. An occurrence of that kind may take place before a case is actually opened. A man, on the case being called, may produce his deed, the opposite party sees he has a good sound title, and the case is withdrawn. I do not see, according to my views of the construction of the statute, how there can be the slightest doubt under the terms of these two sections, 24 and 25, as to the revising officer being obliged to take evidence under oath, and in no other way, when he proceeds to the trial of a case. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) states he has found some subsequent sections in the Act that seemed to lend countenance to his view, one being to the effect that the revising officer, in the discharge of a summary duty, need not proceed with the ordinary legal strictness as to the rules of evidence, that he shall not be bound by the strict rules of evidence or procedure, but that does not relieve him from hearing evidence under oath, it is only a declaration that he is not bound to proceed with the same strictness as to form, the same particularly as to the rules of evidence, which, as the hon, member for West Elgin must be aware from his long experience at the bar, would be thoroughly impracticable in summary proceedings. This is a matter of legal opinion, and, according to my view, there cannot be any reasonable doubt that under the section as it stands, the revising officer is bound to administer the oath when he proceeds to try the case.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman has confused two entirely distinct questions. The one is where a party may be in power to administer the oath and may require evidence to be taken under oath; the other is whether it is evidence unless taken under oath. It is the latter we have under consideration. The First Minister holds that the section, as it stands, leaves the revising officer no option, that he must take the evidence under oath. It is true he subsequently modified that view, he said it would be highly inconvenient to insist upon any such rule; but I do not think we can understand, after all, that he meant to seriously argue that his first contention was wrong. the contrary, I think he still holds to the view that "evidence" means legal evidence in the sense in which the expression is used in court, and that it could not be admitted unless it was under oath. How are we to understand the word "evidence" in this Bill? Are we to understand that it means sworn testimony and no other? If we look at the different provisions, I do not think we can come to that conclusion. My hon, friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has shown that the word is not used in that sense in the English statute. You find the qualifying word "under oath" used when it is obligatory upon the revising barrister so to take the testimony, and if these words are used in one portion of the statute and omitted in another, you cannot give to the word "evidence" where it not intended, as the Premier now says to require evidence is not qualified the same meaning as where it is qualified. Take the next section, the words "taking evidence under oath before him" are used. Why say "under oath before him", if it is clear that the words "under oath" are not necessary? Now, when we look at the Act relating to summary convictions, 18th section, we find "if the justice is satisfied on the evidence upon oath or affirmation." If the word "evidence" always implies sworn testimony why qualify it by saying "on oath" in the statute? It may be according to the ordinary practice of courts, that evidence is taken in a particular way, but when we use the word evidence in a statute, we do not always mean to use it in a strict sense, and when we qualify it as we have done in parts of this Bill and fail to qualify it in other sections, it is perfectly clear we do not give to the word evidence, with the "restrictive" words applied, the same sense as we give it without them. My hon. friend points out that in this particular statute relating to summary convictions, when you are speaking of evidence before a court you do so not qualified, but when speaking of evidence outside of a court it is qualified. This revising officer is not a court of record; he has some of the functions of a court of record, but what he does is not done in a court of record, and it seems to me there is no intelligible reason for using in a subsequent section the words "and the taking of evidence under oath before him," and using the words "any evidence that may be adduced before him" in the other case. If the qualifying words are required in the one case they are required in the other.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) says this is a matter of legal opinion entirely, and he gives his opinion that this section requires the evidence to be taken under oath. We are not merely discussing whether this section requires that evidence shall be taken under oath, but whether the revising officer is required by it to take evidence at all. This section does not say that he must. The legal opinion of the hon. gentleman goes for a great deal, and he has the good fortune to agree with one of the opinions of the First Minister, who gave two distinct contradictory opinions. The latter said in the first place that this section does require evidence to be taken under oath, and in that he has the hon. member for Glengarry with him. In the second place, about 15 minutes later, he said that to insist upon evidence being taken upon oath would block the wheels of the whole machine. Here we are in a nice box of legal opinions. We have the Premier deciding against himself, and some of his supporters agree with one of his opinions and some with the other, though we have only heard of the one yet. There are many lawyers on that side and we should hear from them on this subject. The member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who is so frequently in consultation with his leader, should tell us which of these opinions he agrees with.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not agree with yours,

Mr. CASEY. I agree with the second of the Premier's opinions, that these sections do not provide for the taking or evidence on oath. The hon, member for Lincoln disagrees with me, so he must disagree with the Premier on that point. There are plenty of other lawyers there who must tell us which horn of the dilemma they choose. When we find a house divided against itself, and a party divided against itself, and the Premier divided against himself in regard to the meaning of this clause, what are we to do? I think we should cast legal opinions to the dogs, and look at the Bill with the aid of common sense.

Mr. RYKERT. Then you are ruled out.

Mr. CASEY. I am gratified by the compliment, as I suppose the hon, gentleman thinks my sense is so uncommon that it cannot be described as common sense. If it is on oath, the vote of everyone is left at the mercy of a partisan lawyer without any safeguard whatever. If the member for Lincoln believes that to be in consonance with the common sense of the country, I hope he will show us where the justice is. His leader has not shown it at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not propose to discuss the legal aspect of this question, but I propose to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that, when the objection was first taken by my hon, friend behind me (Mr. Cameron), the answer of the Premier was distinct and plain, that it was a work of supererogation, that it was quite superfluous, that he was not going to overload this clause by inserting perfectly useless words. That is what he said in the first instance in reference to the amendment, but at a subsequent stage he declared that his objection was of a totally different kind; he stated that he objected to introducing the words because they would seriously clog and retard and interfere with the proper working of the court. There can be no denying that these two lines of objection will not stand. If the language was superfluous it would be mere redundancy, and could in nowise interfere with the working of the clause. But there is another matter which requires more attention than has yet been given to it. If I followed correctly the language of the First Minister, he declared that he did not intend to permit the county court judge, to whom these decisions might finally be referred, to exercise original jurisdiction, in other words, he would be confined entirely to the evidence which was taken on this occasion. If that be the case—and, if I am wrong, I should be very glad to be corrected on that point—then it does appear that my hon, friends are perfectly right in requiring that this evidence should be put on record and taken upon oath, because, if it only is to become the basis of a subsequent appeal, it would be very unreasonable that evidence should appear before the revising officer on which he affirms his decision, which, not being taken down and not being on oath, might not appear before the party to whom it is finally referred. That is a point on which I think the committee might fairly ask for some further information, whatever the legal aspect of the case may be.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the section is sufficiently import ant to justify the whole of the committee in wishing that it should be placed beyond reasonable doubt. The 25th section gives power to the revising officer to take evidence. I should say, if I were asked my opinion, that it meant legal evidence, and, if I was sitting as revising officer, I should require it to be taken on oath. But the administration of this law is to be entrusted, in some instances at any rate, to those who are not accustomed to construing legal evidence, to those who are just commencing their legal career, for instance, to the notaries in the Province of Quebec, and I do not see why we should not make it perfectly clear. It is evident now that there is a difference of opinion. I to some extent agree with my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) as to the legal construction of the clause, but I have heard other hon, gentlemen, who perhaps are more distinguished than my hon, friend, who have a different opinion. Why not put in the words to make it clear? I do not suppose the First Minister thought much about it when it was first mentioned, and he said there were cases in which it would be desirable that the matter should be settled without any evidence at all. That could be done, as the hon, member for Glengarry pointed out, whether these words are put in or not; but, as the law is to be carried out by those who are not accustomed to construe statutes, and who may put different meanings upon it, it may give rise to incalculable trouble and mischief if you leave it in this way.

Mr. MACMASTER. Any anxiety I might have felt as that if a party to the litigation tendered himself as a witto the accuracy of my opinion is entirely dispelled by the ness his evidence cannot be taken unless he is sworn, and Mr. Caser.

circumstance that my opinion is in agreement with that of the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think, however, that my hon friend has such a very high opinion of his own ability that he would pit it against some of the hon. members on the other side who have expressed a different opinion, even when he is backed up by my poor opinion.

Mr. MACMASTER. It is not necessary I should express any opinion on that subject.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think that, before this question is decided——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. When you have done groaning, I will talk. If the revising officer is called upon to discharge his duties in connection with this Act, and swears a number of people when they consider it a question whether he has a right to swear them or not, they might feel annoyed. Now I hold it should be imperative upon him to take evidence under oath. We know that there is likely to be some political spite between parties in different sections, and a man in political sympathy with the revising officer may make complaints against certain parties in order to have them struck off the roll, and the revising officer may hear the evidence under oath of the witnesses whom the objector may bring up, while he may refuse to put those witnesses under oath whom the parties defending may bring up. It is absurd to say the revising barrister shall have the power to say whether he shall swear a man or whether he shall not. Now, the First Minister stated that these proceedings were very much after the mode of the revision court in Ontario. If the hon, gentleman was acquainted with the proceedings of the revision court he would know that in the municipal courts everyone is sworn; they have power to administer the oath if a party claims to be put on or claims to be put off, and the oath is nearly always administered. As the hon, gentleman says this is a mode of the court of revision, the practice should be the same, and the revising officer should be compelled to take evidence under oath if required to do so, the same as in the court of revision. This clause and the other clause are drawn evidently with ambiguity, for the purpose of allowing the revising officer to refuse to take evidence under oath if he is disposed to refuse. I am sorry to find that whenever an amendment is offered defining the power of the revising barrister the First Minister refuses to accept it. The hon, gentleman evidently desires to deave this officer power to do just as he pleases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman says that the court of revision is sworn. Quite true; so will the revising barrister be sworn to perform his duties. The hon, gentleman says the court of revision is compelled to take outh whenever it is demanded. If the hon, gentleman will look at the 16th clause of the municipal law of Ontario he will find that it is not necessary to hear witnesses and proath.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). That is not so with parties tendering themselves. The hon-gentleman will read the whole clause carefully and he will find that when parties—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—

"It shall not be necessary to hear upon oath the complainant or assessor or the party complained against unless where the court deems it necessary or proper."

Mr. CAMERON. Go on.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.—

"Or the evidence of the party is tendered in his own behalf or required by the opposite party."

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman only read one

Mr. CAMERON. The hon, gentleman only read one line; if he had read the whole section he would have found that if a party to the litigation tendered himself as a witness his evidence cannot be taken unless he is sworn, and any person can be compelled to be sworn if it is demanded by the opposite party. That is all we want here. When I made my proposition first the hon, gentleman contended vigorously that under clauses 23 and 42 of this Bill the revising barrister was to take evidence on oath. At a subsequent stage the hon, gentleman declared that to compel the revising barrister to take this evidence on oath was to clog the whole machine.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I did not.

Mr. CAMERON. Did the hon, gentleman not say so? Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Just go on.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly I so understood him. However, I took it for granted that the hon. gentleman adheres to his view that this evidence cannot be taken except upon oath. Now, Sir, that is not the proposition the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) submitted. He went upon the assumption that we argued that the revising barrister had no power to administer the oath. We did not so argue. We admitted that he has the power to administer the oath under clause 25, and we say that having that power he ought to be bound to administer the oath, and ought not to receive any evidence unless he does If our contention is correct the effect will be that the revising officer can swear one side and may not swear the other side—he can swear whoever he pleases. It may be said that is an extreme case; perhaps it is, still, if the hon. gentleman wants to have his Bill logical, he must base it upon logical consequences. He argues that the word evidence implies an oath. I say it does not imply an oath. What is the meaning of evidence? It does not mean an oath at all. It is the matter or the material by which a given proposition is proved. For instance, you take a promissory note that is sued upon, and the note is denied. You say that the promissory note is the evidence. You take a deed and you bring an action of ejectment upon it, you produce the deed as evidence of your title. That deed is not the evidence of your title; you have first to show whether it is a deed or not. You establish that by the oath of witnesses, or in some other way known to the law. Evidence is the matter or material that you use for the purpose of establishing your proposition. That is the technical meaning of the word evidence. Now, Sir, it is laid down by Holthouse in his Law Dictionary:

"In its general sense, ther, evidence may be said to signify any matter which is brought forward for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of any particular fact, or of any point in issue."

It is the matter brought forward, it is not the way to bring the matter forward or the mode or the condition upon which the matter is brought forward. The condition of evidence on oath implies that the man must be sworn. The fact must be established upon oath, and evidence itself is only the material by which to establish the proposition; and that matter cannot be established except subject to the law of the land that it must be established under oath.

"It is called evidence because the point at issue is to be made evidence."

True it is called evidence in the first instance, but it is not evidence unless it is established by oath. The hon. gentleman says that evidence implies evidence taken I challenge him to find any warrant atement. It does not mean that. But hing that it does mean it, what does On his statement. even assuming that it does mean it, what does this Bill say? If hon, gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the Bill they will see that the revising officer can decide matters of controversy without taking a particle of evidence. What does the Bill say? "He shall dispose of any objection and complaint of which notice has been given, after hearing the parties making the same, if they appear before him." It simply required the revising officer to hear the parties; not hear them on oath and take individual. So evidence in itself implies nothing in conevidence, but simply hear statements. It says hearing the nection with an oath. It in no way involves the solemnity parties, and any evidence adduced in support of the proposition. Suppose there is no evidence except the evidence of the parties themselves. The returning officer can hear complaints, and without a tittle of evidence, he can adjudicate. In what position are the parties to the objection to be placed if the revising officer is simply to hear the complainant and respondent without evidence being given on oath? Suppose the parties are dissatisfied and there is an appeal. The hon, gentleman now tolls us that the appeal is to be an appeal in reality. But how can an appeal be taken if there is no evidence, nothing on which to base an appeal? How is there to be an appeal if the revising officer is not bound to take down a tittle of evidence; if he is not bound to swear the parties? The clause says that the revising officer may upon the statement of parties dispose of the case. One party may be dissatisfied and appeal; but there will be no evidence taken down, and, if the evidence is taken down, it is not taken down under the solemnity of an oath. If the hon, gentlemen really desires this Bill to be a proper Bill, that justice and fair play shall be meeted out to both political parties, and that the revising officer shall not do anything but what the law allows him to do, then the hon. gentleman ought, if not in the words I have adopted, in his own words, provide that evidence shall be taken under oath. The hon gentleman said that evidence means evidence under oath. We say it does not. If there is a doubt why should not the hon, gentleman remove it, and leave the matter so plain that there can be no question about it, by providing that the evidence taken shall be evidence on oath. I should be sorry to say that hon. gentlemen opposite are actuated by ulterior motives in this matter; but when a grave question of this kind comes up, and when lawyers declare on their responsibility as members of Parliament and as members of the legal profession that the hon, gentleman's interpretation is not the correct one, surely it is the simplest thing for the hon gentleman to put it beyond doubt. The hon gentleman cannot arrogate to himself all knowledge of law. He is a very wise man no doubt; but his judgments have been overruled by the courts, and it might occur that the hon. gentleman's intrepretation of this clause might not be sustained. Then hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, men eminent in the legal profession, have given an opinion contrary to that of the hon. gentleman. If there is nothing more than a doubt, it should be removed so that no dispute may arise. If there is nothing more than It is the simplest thing in the world to do. But the hon. gentleman is so wedded to his own notions and to his own interpretation that he refuses to accept any amendment offered from this side of the House, except by the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Weldon), who appears to have the ear of the First Minister. The hon, gentleman thinks his Bill is perfect and it does not require amending. Assuming that there is a doubt, the hon. gentleman ought to remove it, and put the Bill in such a form that the evidence adduced under it will be given under oath, and the First Minister should afterwards provide that the evidence be taken in writing so as to have a satisfactory appeal.

Mr. MULOCK. Listening to the arguments on both sides, it seems to me that the quarrel is over form rather than substance, and it is simply necessary to get a set of words to carry out the wishes of the promoter of the Bill and of hon, members on this side of the House. The First Minister says in his opinion the true construction of this clause is that a revising officer must require evidence to be given under oath. Perhaps that is a mistake. We know there are many kinds of evidence besides evidence given under oath. Admissions are received as evidence; documents are received as evidence. There are many kinds of evidence which do not depend on the testimony of any of an oath. The position of parties to an issue of this kind should be the same as that of ordinary litigants. In the case of an ordinary suit it is open to either party to waive points, to make admissions, to take matters to be proved that have not been proved. In the case in question why should we not modify the clause by saying that the oppos ing party might require persons to be sworn? In that case there would be no compulsion except when there was a stand up fight. The looseness that would prevail in a court like this would on the average prevail in nine cases out of ten. The parties would appear in an informal way, unattended by lawyers, and would tell their own stories in a simple way, perhaps without being sworn, and, no individual objecting, the court would be satisfied with the proof of their statements and a decision would be arrived atwhich I hope will be a correct decision. Let us assume the case of there being strict opposition and the parties desiring that everything should be legally proved. In that case, the First Minister would not be acting unreasonably if he gave to the objecting parties the right to require that all witnesses should be sworn, if it were demanded. It is to be remembered that the precedent furnished by the Municipal Act of Ontario does not quite apply in the present case. There is a good deal of laxity in the proof and argument of cases before local courts. And why? Because the courts of revision are composed of local men who know the witnesses, their characters, their positions, who know as much about the subject matter as the parties themselves. Suppose a court of revision was sitting, composed of local men, such as come into the township council. There is not the same necessity for witnesses being sworn before them as there will be under this scheme, because the revising officer will be entirely without local knowledge of the people, their property or their reputation for veracity, and that being the case it certainly ought to be allowed to the objecting party to require the oath to be administered to all witnesses before their evidence is tendered. This would not make it compulsory on the revising officer to insist on an oath where it was not insisted upon by the opposing litigant. I think that an amendment of that kind should be made.

Mr. WELDON. To meet the views of the Premier with regard to documentary evidence, I would suggest that some such words as these might be inserted—that all witnesses produced be examined on oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. member for Huron will find that instead of all the lawyers being with him, he will find that there are none with him. think it is so clear that there can be no doubt about it, that the word "evidence" must mean when this revising officer is holding a court of this kind—that it must be held to be evidence under oath. As to what I said about clogging the wheels, hon, gentlemen knew perfectly well what I meant—the hon, member for Bothwell, and every hon. gentleman knew I meant that it applied, in a matter of this kind, in settling a list of votes where even if the party wishing to withdraw an objection did so somebody else might press it. I contend that in all cases where it would be necessary for the oath to be administered, the word "evidence" in this clause means evidence on oath. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island, the hon, member for St. John, the hon. member for Glengarry, and other hon. gentlemen differ from the member for West Huron-I shall not allude to the tone of his speech—in this respect; they are all opposed to his view of the subject.

Mr. MULOCK. Surely it cannot be argued that nothing is evidence which is not under oath. Take the ordinary admissions of counsel in court; they are treated as binding evidence though not under oath. So are documents handed in by counsel and admitted by the opposite side. I think where it can be clearly shown that the oath is necessary to law into effect.

make it evidence, as it can be in this case, it is unreasonable to entitle the revising officer to adjudicate upon these rights without being compellable to swear witnesses, if the opposite party insists upon it. If that is to be the case, you are appointing an officer who may not fully know how to deal with these matters, who may be lax or unfair, and why not give litigants some guarantee that their rights will be protected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it as the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., does, that the word evidence means legal evidence. If it is oral evidence, it must be on oath. Admissions of course remove all litigation and the question of swearing does not come in. All matters of oral evidence will be taken on oath, but documents may be legal evidence without being on oath.

Mr. WELDON. I do not think that an admission always settles the case. We admit the signature to a note but that does not finish the case.—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. WELDON—within the scope of this Act, I think that county court judges and lawyers of standing probably would take the evidence under oath, but the question is whether the revising officer is bound to do it or not. If the clause were amended in the way I point out, that any witnesses produced shall be examined on oath, I think that would meet all objections.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon, gentleman is mistaken when he says that I was the only lawyer on this side who held that evidence did not imply or mean evidence under oath. On the contrary, I understood my hon, friends who spoke to argue that the word evidence did not mean or imply that i should be evidence on oath. I quite admit that a respectable county court judge, though not compelled, would, as a matter of right, have every witness examined on oath; but what I argue is that the word evidence alone does not compel him to do it; and I doubt if the hon, member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), on his responsibility as a lawyer, will say that the word evidence necessarily implies that; if he does, he will go counter to the law dictionaries.

Amendment (Mr. Cameron, Huron) negatived.

Mr. WELDON. Would the hon gentleman accept my suggestion that any witnesses produced shall be examined on oath?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is in effect what has just been decided.

Mr. WELDON. No, it does not refer to documentary evidence.

Mr. MILLS. I think "evidence" is a much more comprehensive expression than simply "testimony of witnesses." "Evidence" may imply a great many documents which are admitted as a matter of course. There may be records, abstracts of titles, and other documents which might be accepted as evidence, and might be conclusive evidence if taken on oath. Therefore the word "evidence," whether it means taken on oath or not, is a kind of statutory expression; and when you look at the phraseology of the very next section of this Bill, it is very doubtful whether the revising officer would not have discretionary power to hold that the testimony of witnesses might be taken otherwise than on oath. The man who accepts the position of revising officer, no matter how honest he may be, will necessarily be a lawyer of very limited practice; no other could afford to accept it; and the hon, gentleman should aid him as far as possible by leaving no doubtful expression in the clause. I think the suggestion of my hon friend that the testimony of witnesses shall be taken on oath will remove the doubt, and tend to uniformity in carrying the

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon, gentleman, I understand, does not accept that proposition. Whether the evidence is taken on oath or not, it will be of no use in ease of an appeal, unless it is taken down in writing. It is all important, in case of an appeal on a question of fact, that all the facts should be before the court. Therefore I move that the following words be added to this section:

Such evidence shall, if required by either party to the said contestation, be taken down in writing by the revising officer, and signed by the person giving the same.

This does not provide that the revising officer shall be bound to take down the evidence in every case; that would be quite unnecessary, because in the great majority of cases there would be no appeal. I propose also that the evidence shall be signed by the witness, after being read over to him by the revising officer, in order to verify it as correct.

Mr. DAVIES. The necessity for this amendment will depend altogether upon the meaning which is afterwards given by the statute to the appeal. If it is to be an appeal in law pure and simple, a record must be made up of the evidence, so that the Court of Appeal shall understand it. It would not be fair for the revising officer to make and certify a case out of his own head. If it is to be a re-hearing by the Supreme Court, the necessity of my hon. friend's amendment might not exist. Therefore we ought to know what the nature of the appeal is to be—whether it is to be a re-hearing, or an appeal in the ordinary sense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am strongly opposed to this amendment. It would be an endless task if every matter discussed should be taken down at length and put on record. I was looking in Hansard at the question put to me by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I scarcely understood it when he put it to me awhile ago; but the system he proposed is infinitely preferable, that is to say, that the judge going round to each municipality should rather try the ease appealed de novo, and hear the evidence, than that the evidence should be taken in the first place before the revising officer. There is not one in a hundred of these cases tried by the revising barrister which will go to appeal. I would rather accept the proposition of the hon. gentleman, and have the cases on appeal tried as if there had been no proceedings before the revising officer. It would be better to accept that proposition, and when we get further on make a provision to that effect.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My amendment only requires the revising officer to take down evidence in cases in which there is to be an appeal. Still, if the hon. gentleman is going to give the court to which appeal is made the trial of the case, as if it were originally commenced there, I will withdraw my amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONAI.D. Yes; in the sense that he will hear the evidence de novo.

Amendment withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Although this is not exactly relevant just now, I will read the opinion of Blackstone, which has just been handed to me, on evidence:

"Proofs or evidence, for the terms are generally used as synonymous, are written or oral. The former consists of records, deeds, or other writing of public or private description; the latter, the statements of witnesses wno appear before the court and are sworn."

Mr. MILLS. I can refer the hon gentleman to Bouviers Law Dictionary, which gives the definitions of Taylor, Stephens, and a great number of decisions of the English judges, as to the meaning of the word evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Stephens is the last commentator on Blackstone, and I do not think he would controvert the definition of Blackstone.

Mr. MULOCK. I was very glad to hear the observations the First Minister has made in regard to the evidence in appeal cases. I had formed a clear idea, from what occurred in committee on 1st May, that that was the kind of appeal we were going to have. The knowledge that the appeal as guaranteed now by the first Minister, is of the kind indicated in Hansard, will go a long way to remove some objections to the system; not that it is not very objectionable, and we reserve our protests all the same. In the further discussion of the Bill, it does to some extent assist us to know in advance what are to be some of the leading changes in the measure. No doubt, when there are appeals from the revising officer, the county court judge in Ontario and other judges elsewhere will go on circuit in the electoral districts, and at convenient points hear the cases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

On section 25,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that in the first line instead of "the said preliminary revision" the words "the preliminary revision of the first list of voters" be substituted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES. I would draw the attention of the committee to the necessity which exists for the attendance for this final revision of the clerks and assessors.

Mr. MILLS. When the lists are to be made up in the first case, it would be almost impossible for the revising officer to know whose name shall be struck off, on account of death, or expiration of lease, or change of property, etc., unless the assessor and the clerk of the municipality are present. It is better they should be required to attend than to be left to be subpænaed at the expense of either party. In England this information is furnished in the locality where the list was made up in the first instance. If the assessor and the clerk are required, as a matter of course, to attend, the revising officer would be able to make up his list much more correctly, and it would be much less apt to occasion litigious proceedings.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The question arises about the power to summon, except by subjects, those men. It has been to a certain extent decided that the Dominion Parliament has the power to summon anyone in the country, but that is very wide; especially when the person to be summoned is a public officer not appointed by this Government, but by other authority. I do not mean to contravene the power or diminish the power of the Dominion Parliament in that regard, but the hon. gentlemen will see that it might come in conflict with duties imposed by the appointing power. To give an illustration, suppose you were to throw a certain duty upon the clerk of the peace or the sheriff in any Province; supposing the Provincial Legislature to say that, in case any such officer obeyed the order of the Dominion Government or the Act of the Dominion Parliament, ipso_facto, he should cease to be sheriff or clerk of the peace, I fancy he would cease; and the Provincial Legislature might have the power of rendering nugatory any legislation here in that regard. I throw that out as showing that the doctrine that the Dominion Parliament can force officials, provincial or local authorities, to do whatever they want, must be read with great caution. It is provided in Ontario that, at the court held by the county judge to hear appeals, the person having charge of the assessment roll shall appear and produce such roll and such papers as are in his custody so the power is given under a provision of the Provincial Legislature with reference to provincial officers. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will appreciate, I am sure, the point I have taken. Did the hon. member prepare an amendment in this regard?

Mr. DAVIES. No.

Mr. EDGAR. As it is conceded apparently to be a desirable thing to accomplish, and as there may be some doubt as to the power to enforce those duties, I think it would be easy to do it in another way. Under section 39 the revising officer may issue, at his own instance, summonses and may require the production of papers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. EDGAR. It might be well to suggest that the first duty of the revising officer should be to summon the proper officer, I suppose the clerk, who has the custody of the rolls, and make him produce the papers in his possession.

Mr. HICKEY. I submit that this evidence would be of no use to the revising officer from the fact that the only evidence the assessor and the clerk could give would be the assessment roll. They have no papers. The assessment roll is taken, and they have that. Further evidence they could not give. As to the death of any individual on the list, they could give no better evidence than any one else, except as individuals.

Mr. MILLS. I do not agree with the view just expressed. As to our power, I do not think there is much room for doubt. Of course, we can suppose the Local Legislature to provoke a direct conflict in the way suggested, but, in the decision of the Privy Council in regard to the trial of controverted elections, it was settled that, where we have the power to deal with a subject, we have also the power to name the parties for the purpose of carrying our authority into effect. In that case, we declared that the provincial courts should be courts for the trial of controverted elections. They were courts for other purposes, created by the Local Legislature, but, as the power to try controverted elections was vested in this Parliament and was not part of the civil procedure of the country, the Judicial Committee held that it was wholly within the power of this Parliament to designate the parties to carry that into effect, even though we designated them as existing courts. In the same way you could designate a local officer and impose upon him a duty. It is no part of his local duties, it is no part of the functions he derives from the Local Legislature, but is a duty which you impose upon a particular individual, and you have marked out the individual by saying he is the party who shall for the time being hold a certain local office. He derives the power from you. I do not see any difficulty or doubt about the matter, neither can I see any distinction between the principle involved that case and the case involved in the trial of controverted elections. If that be so, when we designate the assessor and the clerk of the municipality as parties who are to discharge certain duties which we impose upon them, we name them as such, and we have just as much power to say they shall discharge those duties as we have to say it should be done by John Smith. We can designate them by their office as well as by particular names. Then the question is, is it convenient or to the public advantage that these parties should be named for that purpose? I think it is. It is true that the assessment roll will afford the revising barrister, from time to time, certain information, but the revising barrister looks at the assessment roll and sees John Smith down as the owner of a particular property, and when he looks at the old voters' list, revised the year before, he finds it is not John Smith but William Jones who is the owner of that property. What he does not know is whether William Jones has ceased to have such an interest in that property as to entitle him to retain his name on the voters' list or put John Smith's on alone. He subpænas the clerk and the assessor, not for the purpose of getting the information that is already on the assess-ment roll, but to get additional information. They are obtains a new assessment roll the names of tenants or Sir John A. Macdonald.

parties that are not, perhaps, able to give him all the information he requires in regard to everybody in the municipality, but they are so well conversant with the municipality that they are able to give him a good deal of additional information, and if, by getting that information, he can put on 20 or 30 names or strike off 20 or 30 names without any litigation and without any contested proceedings, there is a positive gain to the public, for it is no advantage to the public to have the parties who are seeking to amend the voters' list put to a large expense. The money comes out of the community in some form or other, and, if it will save expense and avoid litigious proceedings to any considerable extent, it does seem to me that it is desirable to do so. These are two officers who are often in Ontario employed for years together in discharging the same duties, and are likely to be able to give information which will be of the greatest possible assistance in making the list perfect from year to year. I think, therefore, that there should be a clause providing that the revising officer shall, as a matter of course, subprena these parties to his assistance either at the final revision or at the preliminary revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will not contest at all the point about our power, because I have no doubt that the decision of the Privy Council with respect to election courts settles that point in a very great degree, though I think it is a subject that will be reviewed some day or other. Looking at the municipal Act, I see that, when the county judge goes round to revise the assessment list, the officers having charge of it must be present. That is when the assessment list is to be corrected on appeal from the court of revision. A person objects to the amount of his tax, he appeals, and the assessment roll must be present to be corrected according to the decision of the county court judge. But here that is all done. The revising officer gets the assessment roll after the final revision, after it has been settled. He takes that and takes the names of the persons who have the right to the franchise according to the finally revised assessment roll. He has no discretion. We have settled that. That is to be prima facile evidence, and those persons must be placed upon the roll. He has a certified copy of the assessment roll finally revised before him. He must get that before he can commence his preliminary revision. He must have that and will have that, of course, when he settles down to the final revision, and I do not think there can be any necessity for making it a statutory obligation that either he shall be put to the inconvenience of being present, or that the parties should go to the expense of having him there. I should rather prefer the suggestion of the hon. member for West Ontario Mr. Edgar) when we come to a subsequent clause, that it may be necessary in a particular case—it may be, though I do not see how the case can arise—that he shall be subponaed like any other witness—by a subpona duces tecum. His testimony can be of no more value than that of any other person in the township. Therefore I think it would be unwise to make it obligatory upon him attend at every sitting. It must be at his own expense, because he will not be subpænaed by any particular individual who has to pay for it.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman's attention to this point. The assessment roll, after the first revision every year, is to be furnished the revising officer for the purpose of correcting and revising the lists that have been already made. Now on the new assessment roll there will be the names of a great many tenants not on the old list, and upon that list the names of tenants whose leases will have expired, and the names of those who may require to come off the voters' list. Does the hon. gentleothers upon the old voters' lists shall come off, as a matter of course, if their names do not appear upon the assessment roll?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman is not discussing the subsequent revision?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, we are discussing the first revision now.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, but we are dealing with the question as to who, once for all, shall appear before the revising officer for the purpose of giving information. Unless he throws the list of the previous year aside altogether and makes a new one, I do not see how he is going to make cor rections without special information from the parties in the locality, and I mentioned the clerks and assessors, because they are likely to be the best informed. Either he must begin the whole work anew, starting upon the assessment rolls as the basis, or if he starts upon the existing roll as the basis for his corrections, then he must have some way of knowing who he shall strike off the existing roll and put on the new one.

Mr. EDGAR. I think upon the preliminary revision is the time when this assistance would be most required, because the assessment roll will not furnish the information. The first assessment roll this year will be short of a great deal of information that will be certainly required, and even in subsequent years a great deal of information will not be furnished by that roll because this Parliament has no authority over that roll and we cannot say what it shall show. For instance, the income franchise in Ontario. The roll this year will show an income up to $400. We are giving a franchise to incomes of $300, and the Ontario franchise in future will give it to $250. But all between $300 and $400 will not be put on this list by the revising officer at the preliminary revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. O, yes, they will. A person is assessed according to the value of his property, not according to the franchise.

Mr. EDGAR. I am speaking of the preliminary revision of the first voters' list. Then there is another class that will have to be put on by the revising officer as to whom he cannot obtain the necessary information on the assessment roll—that is, the tenants who qualify in respect to rental but not in respect to the value of property on the assessment roll. Then there is the income franchise people, who are not receiving their pay in money but in time; they will not go on the assessment roll at all. Landowners' sons also will not appear on the first list. The revising officer will have to get that information when he makes his preliminary list, and who but the assessor can give it to him?

Mr. DAVIES. The last line of this clause seems to me unnecessary, where it speaks of the powers of a court of record.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This provides that he shall have the power of a court of record quad forming this list. If we give him court of record powers he has the power of committing for contempt and all that sort of thing. If the hon, gentleman wishes to magnify his office, very well.

Mr. DAVIES. I think it might give rise to doubt. The revising officer has power to summon the witnesses before before him and to administer the oath. If a man refuses to take the oath and sets the court at defiance then the revising officer has power to commit him. Is that the intention?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is necessary in order to carry out the powers of the Act. A court of record has the power of fining—you do not want him to have the power of fining, do you?

Mr. DAVIES. He must have sufficient powers to enable him to carry out his functions; otherwise he will be set at defiance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, I will accept the amendment of the hon, gentleman and strike out all after the words "court of record."

On section 26,

Mr. LANGELIER. According to this section the duty of publishing the list devolves on the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. There should be, however, some provision compelling him to publish in the Official Gazette the notice immediately on its receipt. We have known cases in connection with elections where the notice has not been published until weeks afterwards.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Such delay would be improper; it would be a dereliction of duty, in fact a maladministration of office.

Mr. MULOCK. The committee will see that under this clause lists are binding although there are appeals pending. I can understand the clause having been drafted in this way at the time when it was not contemplated that there would be any extensive system of appeal. Now that we are guaranteed a practicable appeal, it becomes necessary to amend this section. My idea is that, if the appeal is to be of any use, it should be such that it can take place before the list is binding. Under the Ontario Act the clerk of the municipality publishes an advertisement to the effect that the voters' list of his municipality is on deposit at his office where it can be inspected. At the expiration of thirty days, if there is no appeal, the judge certifies the list as a matter of course, and that list so certified to supersedes all prior lists, and there-fore is the list on which voting takes place. If there are appeals to the judge from the list thus adjudicated upon, the judge takes the list before him and amends it in harmony with his judgment. Then he certifies to it, and that list, so amended, becomes the list to be used until a new list similarly prepared is adopted. In the Province of Quebec the practice is somewhat different. There the appeal is to the court of revision, composed of three judges, and the list is binding before those judges have dealt with it. That list prepared by the municipal officer is then handed in to the municipal council, and they bring it into force. They in Quebec to-day discharge the same duties as the revising officer will discharge hereafter. It may go without saying that on general principles we have not any confidence in the revising officer, and we do not want to be bound by his actions until the courts have been given an opportunity to correct his mistakes. The practice in Quebec does not furnish a precedent, because, though the elections take place before the appeal to the final court, yet they do not take place until the list has had the sanction of the municipal council. I have drafted a section which I submit for the First Minister's approval. If adopted it will save two or three other clauses on which there may be considerable discussion. The clause I propose is as follows:-

After the list for a polling district in an electoral district has been so completed, revised, and corrected, it shall be certified in the form contained in the schedule in this Act by the revising officer, and in the event of there being no appeal therefrom, or from any part thereof, the court or judge to which such appeal would lie shall certify such list in duplicate, and in the event of their being an appeal therefrom the court or judge having jurisdiction to hear such appeals, shall determine the same in manner hereinafter provided, and amend and correct said list in accordance with the judgment of such court or judge, and shall forthwith thereafter certify such list in duplicate, and so soon as such list shall be so certified by the court or judge, the revising officer shall forthwith transmit one of the duplicate copies of such list to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery at Ottawa, and shall retain the other duplicate copy in his office for the purpose of this Act, and thereafter and until another list for such polling district in a future year shall have been made, corrected and revised by the revising officer, and certified to by the court or judge in the manner above provided, the list so completed, revised, corrected, and certified to by said court or judge, as the case may be, shall be the list in force for such polling district, to be used at an election of a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and the ersons whose names are entered thereon as voters shall be held to be duly registered voters in and for such electoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Supposing a list is before the revising officer and there is an idea either of this revising being just before the time when Parliament will naturally expire or a suspicion that there is going to be a dissolution and a general election, each party will go in and appeal against the other side and nobody could vote in the constituency.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not the effect of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the provision of the Bill is a reasonable one, that so far as the assessment roll goes it is prima facie evidence that they have a right to Then, of those who are put on afterwards, it will be found I think that the great majority of the appeals will be dismissed, ex necessitate. Therefore, I think it is fair to both sides that the principle that is laid down clearly in the Province of Quebec should be observed, that when an election comes on unexpectedly or otherwise, the roll as filed with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, shall be the list. I think that is fair to both sides, and I must resist the temptation even of getting rid of half a dozen clauses, by accepting the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman's answer to the hon, member for North York is not at all satisfactory. It might be that a large number of appeals might take place; that is barely possible as a supposition, although it is not likely to be realised. Still, if they were proper appeals, that is the best reason in the world why the list should not be used, for the larger the number of appeals the more perpicious would it be to use the list. Now, it is always possible to fall back on the list for the previous year, and there is not likely to be more appeals under that list if it is fairly prepared than there would be under the list of the previous year under the existing law. What reason has the hon. gentleman for his supposing that there will be more appeals for the purpose of frustrating this law than there are for the purpose of frustrating the present law? Experience has shown that the law has not been abused, and why should a man be allowed to vote whose right to vote has been contested, and has not been settled in his favor. If his name is on the previous year he will have the opportunity, but if his name is not on the list he will be in no worse position than if there was a delay in making out the list, or an election was brought on before the list was revised, so as to make it possible to use it. In England, in case an election is contested, if it is decided that a party has not a right to be put on the list, his name is struck off by the judges. If a man's right to be on a list is contested. and has not yet been finally settled, when the trial of the controverted election takes place by the House, it was the duty of the committee to take notice of the decision of the judge and if it was adverse, the name was struck off the voters' list. Either one of two courses should be taken. One course is suggested by the amendment, which would be a reasonable course, which would be no more disadvantageous to the one party than the other, and another would be that you might vote under numbered ballots, and that in case the vote was held to be bad, the party's vote should be struck off, and if it were good, the vote should be allowed. Supposing that in an election in a particular constituency, one party carried by a majority of 20, and you had 50 votes on the roll contested and not disposed of, and 25 of them were disposed of adversely to the party having the majority of 20. Under this law he would still have a seat in Parliament although it was perfectly clear that the majority of legal votes were against him. Mr. Mulock.

held that some names are improperly on the list or some names are improperly excluded? If you will not adopt the amendment of my hon. friend, you ought to provide for voting by numbered ballots, so that the claims or parties might afterwards be decided by the court. The plan proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has been tried already; it has been the law of Ontario for years, and no practical mischief has come from it. Besides it would be a rare thing that more than one or two polling divisions in a riding would be contested. If you make the list for each polling sub-division separate, which appears to be the intention of the Bill as it stands, the list in any polling division, so far as it was not contested, would be the list used. That is the law at present in Ontario. In an electoral district where there are half-a-dozen municipalities, you may have the roll of the present year used in five, and the roll of the last year used in the remaining one. The amendment does not exclude the list in each municipality. but only so far as it has been finally completed. A serious wrong might be done by allowing a list to be used that contained a number of names that parties believed ought not to be there, or omitted a number that they thought ought to be there. Both cases are met by the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I really think this is one of the most objectionable clauses in this whole Bill, so far as the latter part of it is concerned. When the list is completed the revising officer is required by this clause to transmit it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who shall publish it in the Canada Gazette, and the clause goes on to declare that after its publication the list shall apply to and be final in all elections taking place before such appeal has been disposed of or the result communicated to the revising officer. I understand that to mean that the moment the list is published in the Canada Gazette, if an election should take place pending the appeals from the decision of the revising officer, that list is final and conclusive between the parties, no matter what the judgment of the court of appeal might be. To show that that is the intention of this clause, it is provided by the latter part of section 28 that the list so published "shall be binding on any judge or other tribunal appointed for the trial of any petition complaining of an undue election or return of a member to serve in the House of Commons." Assuming that a petition were presented contesting the right of a candidate to a seat in Parliament, to which he had been elected on the list published by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, no judge could question the right of any person whose name was on that list to vote. The consequences might be very grave. Take the first list, which will in all probability be published very shortly before the next general election; suppose there are 50 appeals, and pending those appeals the general election takes place; suppose the court of appeal gives judgment sustaining 40 or perhaps the whole 50 appeals, and holds that they were improporly on the list; suppose the candidate is elected by a small majority-10, 20, or 30; and suppose there is a petition presented against his election on the ground that one or two more than the actual number of his majority ought to be struck off the voters' list; and supposing they should be really struck off by the court of appeal; still, a man elected by that majority might continue to hold his seat, according to this clause, on votes which the court of appeal decided had no right to be on the list, or in consequence of names being improperly left off. No court in this Dominion would have any right to enquire into the question whether or not that candidate was elected by legal votes or not. I say that is not fair; it puts it in the power of one party to commit a serious wrong to another party, and it puts it in the power of a candidate to keep his seat in why should the list be final and conclusive if it is afterwards | Parliament for five years although receiving a minority of the legal votes and no court in this Dominion can interfere with him. I say it is not right. No man should keep his seat in Parliament unless he has the majority of the legal votes. If he has not, there ought to be some power to unseat him. There are two ways of meeting the difficulty -one by the proposition made by the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I do not say that is the best proposition, but it is a mode of dealing with it, that if there is an appeal from the voters' list, that voters' list shall not be used until its validity is pronounced upon by a court of appeal. It is, in fact, the Ontario law that the list shall not be used until after it has been pronounced upon by the highest authority; and in case it is not so pronounced upon before the general election takes place, the returning officer is bound to use the list for the pre-ceding year. There is another way suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell, that all those appealed against should have the right to vote, but that their votes should not be placed with the general ballot box. They should be put in a separate box, in separate envelopes, and should not be counted, except upon a scrutiny, until the court of appeal had given its judgment as to the validity of the votes appealed against. In that way justice could be done to both parties. A man is returned who has a minority of the legal votes, his opponent who has the minority can secure his right by appeal to the court, filing his petition and asking a scrutiny into the validity of the votes Upon that, the ballots in the separate envelopes should be counted, and if it should turn out that the court of appeal decided that a sufficient number of those ballots were good to give him a majority of the votes, they should be counted in his favor. It may be said that would violate the secrecy of the ballot. It would not, because you observe no person's name is struck off except that of the man who has no right to be there; of course you could tell how he voted, but as he is not entitled to a vote he has no right to be there, and secrecy is not violeted. You keep in perfect secrecy the name of every man not appealed against and of every man appealed against where the appeal has not been successful. With that provision in the law you will do justice to the two candidates and do away with the extreme impropriety of allowing a man to sit in Parliament who has a minority of the legal vote. Under the Bill, as it stands, take the case of 50 appeals, the court may decide every one of the appeals to be well founded, and yet, on those illegal votes, one of the candidates may have been declared elected. Take my own county where the majority is only 29; supposing the same majority would be given at the next election, all the revising officer would have to do to defeat me, would be to add 30 names of people who have no right to vote to the list. I appeal against them, but the election takes place pending the appeal; these men all vote against me, and under this Bill I have no remedy. There are 50 perhaps 100 constituencies in the Dominion where the same thing may happen. In every constituency where the majority is less than 100, the same thing might happen. The First Minister ought to direct his attention to this, and so arrange the pro vision that a wrong of that kind could not be perpetrated by either political party. In England before the ballot was adopted and when election cases came before a Committee of the House, the election committee was bound to act on the judgment of the Court of Appeal. If the Court of Appeal struck off a vote the committee was estopped from questioning that. The same provision should prevail here. The election court judge should not be restrained leaves his hands, and he is quite certain to see the candidate and prohibited from enquiring whether or not a vote is several times, and he can go out and see a man, but with good; under this clause he cannot do so. The man that is all this the list will not have been revised as we understand not returned to Parliament may have an absolute majority it. Notwithstanding the joke of the right hon, gentleman, and yet this aggrieved candidate has no redress, he cannot the revision of anything is the correction by some outside appeal to Parliament or the courts; his hands are tied by and higher authority. If the unrevised list may be used at this Bill if he appeals to either.

Mr. LANGELIER. At the time the Bill was introduced. it was not proposed to give the right to appeal except on questions of law, and with the consent of the revising barrister; but after long discussion the right of appeal has been given, even on questions of fast. It the amendment proposed by the hon, member for West York (Mr. Mulock) or something to the same effect is not accepted, the right to appeal will be a dead letter; the door of the stable will be closed after the horse has got out. What would be the use of taking an appeal and incurring serious costs after an election has taken place? It would be perfectly impossible to correct the mistakes or make any use of the corrections made by the judge on the appeal. The list is only good for one year; it cannot be pretended that if the corrections are not used for an immediate election, they will be of any use in a subsequent election. The result will be that after an election takes place just after the list has been made by the revising barrister, it will be made on the list prepared by him, although a hundred appeals may have been taken against such list. We cannot act upon the supposition that the revising barrister is infallible; his infallibility is admitted. It is admitted there should be an appeal; well, that appeal must be of some use or it would be just as well to do away with it. The effect of the amendment would be to put the law as it was under the Consolidated Statutes of Canada—not exactly, perhaps, but for all practical purposes. That law provided that the list to be used should be the last list prepared, which had been deposited for 30 days in the office of the registrar. The list could not be deposited in the office of the registrar as long as there was an appeal pending on it, so that the list used for the election was a perfect list. There is more reason for adopting that course now than there was at that time, because then it was possible to have a scrutiny and to strike out bad votes, but it would be perfeetly useless now to take an appeal after the election, because there is no possibility of knowing for whom an elector has voted. In England, and 1 think in Ontario, the ballots are numbered, so that in case of a scrutiny it is possible to discover for whom an elector has voted, and, if he was not entitled to vote, his vote might be struck off; but we cannot do that under the Dominion election law, and it would be impossible to strike off a bad vote unless some machinery were provided to discover for whom the vote was cast. Unless the appeal is to be perfectly nugatory, either the amendment proposed by the hon, member for North York, or another as suggested by the hon, member for Bothwell should be adopted.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree with the last speaker that now that an appeal is allowed, in cases of law and fact, this provision is inconsistent with the rest of the Bill. The list when it leaves the hands of the revising officer is no further ahead than the present list in Ontario when it leaves the municipal court of revision, because up to that time it has not been revised by anyone except the makers of the list. There are under this Bill cortain processes which are termed preliminary revision and final revision, but they are not really revisions in the ordinary sense, because a revision is a correction by some independent person outside of the original maker of the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Revision is seeing again.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt the revising officer will see it again a good many times. He will probably see the right hon, gentleman or hear from him before the list finally an election while an appeal is in progress, it makes the appeal a farce. It is an insult to the intelligence of the country to say that we may appeal and have the list corrected after the election has been held. I understand that the hon. gentleman said-I was not in at the momentthat, if the amendment were adopted, the Reformers would all be appealing from the list just before the election.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that. I said both parties would do so.

Mr. CASEY. Neither party would appeal against the list on the eve of an election for the purpose of having the list before used, unless it was thought that the list was unfair. Another point is that there is no time limited by this Bill during which the multifarious duties of the revising officer shall be performed. He may take the whole year of 1886 if he chooses. He may be occupied from the 1st of January to the end of December in preparing his first list; then appeals against that list will have to be made in the year after. There is no time limited during which the appeal shall be tried before the judge. The judge may take his own time to try appeals. In the case of a revising barrister, from whom the appeal lies to the county judge, it is probable the appeal will be decided within a reasonable time, because the county judge is not so extremely busy; but where the appeal is from a county court judge to a Superior Court judge, it may sometimes take a whole year. I think I may set it down as very probable that in all cases the revising officer will take at least a month for the preliminary making up of his list, and another six weeks for the notice of the preliminary sittings, for the holding of those sittings, and making the preliminary amendment of the list. After that he will take his own time before he holds his final revision, and this revision will take an indefinite time, proportionate to the number of claims and objections put in. After that he has to give certified copies to the parties concerned. I think, in general, we may take it for granted that at least four or five months will be occupied by the revising officer before the list gets out of his hands, and that another month or two will be occupied in making up and hearing appeals to the judges. In fact, there will be scarcely any year in which, for more than half the year, there will exist a list which has been through all the stages in the hands of the revising officer, and which has been appealed to and rectified by the judge. In other words, for half the time there will be no list which has been regularly revised by an independent authority, and the chances are at least equal that an election appointed for any day you choose in the year would fall upon a day in which either the list for that year was in the hands of the revising officer or in process of appeal from him to the judges. Under these circumstances I say it is absolutely necessary and in the interests of every voter that the last list finally corrected should be used, the last one which has passed through an independent revision and has been really revised and corrected. I can see no good reason for the hon, gentleman refusing to accede to this amendment. It inevitably gives the impression to the country that he does not wish to see justice and fair play done to both classes of voters. He has the reputation of being an excellent tactician, but it is extremely bad tactics to give even his opponents just grounds for believing that he is trying to take an unfair advantage of them-still more, when that impression is shared by his friends, as we have seen it is by articles in the Montreal wrong and incorrect list to be taken to the polls. The Herald, L'Etendard and other Conservative papers. It only argument I can see against going back to the thosis unfortunate for him and his party that he should roughly corrected old list is that considerable time must put scores of his supporters in the position of being necessarily have elapsed since that list was perfected. If the held up to the country as having supported a measure which was intended to give them an unfair advantage. The great majority do not need any advantage. Their enough to desire to take an advantage, they would not care to be placed in the false position in which they are placed by this clause. The hon, gentleman has signally failed in his policy in framing this clause, as he has failed in securing justice for the people at the elections. I could not utter a more crushing denunciation of his policy than this. and the country will re-echo this sentiment.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon gentleman intend to imply an appeal to the higher courts of justice of the Province, and does he intend to imply, as well, an appeal to a county court judge as against the revising barrister?

The committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. EDGAR. While I think the clause as it stands, considering the Bill as we have it now, is entirely indefensible, still I conceive, as the Bill was originally framed and as it nominally stands now, although it is proposed to alter it, there was some argument to be used in favor of this clause. It must be remembered that the Bill as printed provided only for appeals on questions of law. Now the appeals are to be upon questions of fact as well as of law, and that makes a very great difference. I am sure the First Minister would never have thought of proposing this clause if it had been provided that there was to be an appeal on questions of fact. On questions of law appeals would have been comparatively few in number, and they only could have been made if the revising officer reported that there was reasonable ground for the appeal, so that the evil of which we complain would have been very much less indeed from that point of view. Even under those circumstances, however, when it was contemplated that appeals should only be on questions of law, a large concession was made, in section 43, towards the principle we are advocating. It cannot possibly be argued that it is right or defensible that a voters' list should be sent to the returning officer, to be acted upon at elections which does not contain the truest possible record of those entitled to vote. Even when it was only possible to appeal upon questions of law, by section 43 provision was made for a system by which, until the very day of polling, all the results of appeals made on questions of law from the revising officer would be communicated to the returning officer, so that he might amend his list up to the very last moment, and use, so far as he could, the corrected list. That is wide enough, as far as it goes, but it may not go any distance at all. We must assume that it is not the intention of any one to have an improper and incorrect list used at the polls. Let us see, therefore, how it is possible to arrive at a system which will best meet the object everyone must have in view. The system proposed by the amendment is the old system, the one we have been acting upon in the Province of Ontario, and it is also the system that was used in the old Province of Canada. By the Consolidated Statutes of Canada provision was made that the list, after being revised and corrected and appealed upon to the judge should be used, and unless that list was ready you would have to fall back upon the old original lists. That has been the plan always acted upon, and it is certainly infinitely better than this system, which would force a new list has gone so far as to be revised by the revising officer, that implies that a considerable time has elapsed since the voters on the former list were qualified, that conseats are reasonably secure, and even if they were mean siderable changes have occurred, and that the list is somewhat stale. I admit that is an objection, but it is one that we have always had to contend with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In Ontario.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, and in old Canada as well, as the hon. gentleman will see by the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, 1859, chap. 6, sec. 15. Well, what other system can we adopt. One was indicated by the hon, member for Bothwell, which might, perhaps, be carried out very simply. The revising officer, when he has completed the final revision, has to supply to the returning officer the list, so far as it is made out. Let him accompany that list with a statement of the votes which are appealed. The decisions on the appeals would be handed by the judge to the returning officer, appointed by section 43, up to election day, who could amend and correct his list. As to the remaining ones which are appealed but not decided by the day of the vote, nothing could be easier than to provide that those should be numbered against the name of the elector on the poll book, and against the ballot, and those could be reserved, and after the appeals are finished either party could have simply a recount of the votes, just as anybody is entitled to have now. That is a simple and inexpensive process.

An hon. MEMBER. Where is the secrecy of the ballot?

Mr. EDGAR. None of these ballots will be looked at by the judge on the recount, unless the court of appeal had said it was a bad vote, when it would be struck off, and thus the secrecy of the ballot would not be interfered with at all.

An hon, MEMBER. What about the others?

Mr. EDGAR. None would be marked, except the few which were appealed from, and as to which the appeal has not been decided at the time the vote is taken. I cannot see that there would be any practical difficulty in the way, and I certainly think it would prevent bad votes from being polled, while no additional machinery would be required, except this small additional list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the amendment of the hon. member for North York is indefensible, for, as I read it, on one vote being objected to and appealed, the whole list would be hung up.

Mr. MULOCK. Only for that polling sub-division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the way it is to-day in Ontario. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I prefer the Quebec way altogether, where it is provided that in case of appeal when an election comes on the parties whose names are on the list, whose votes have been passed by the court of revision, shall have prima facie the right to vote. The hon. gentleman says there is a mighty alteration, because the appeal is to be in matters of fact as well as in matters of law. I do not see that that makes any difference. The important matters of appeal are matters of law, because they may affect whole classes of voters, whereas matters of fact affect only a single voter. Then I take it that the revising officer is just as good a judge of the simple facts of the case, of whether a man has the qualification or not, as the court above, as he is on the spot and has all the surroundings. Indeed, he is a better judge than the court, which follows afterwards and hears the evidence. I do not think the scope of the Bill being widened has any effect whatever in altering the plan. The object is to get a good list as soon as possible, and the chances of an election happening before the court of appeal had an oppor-tunity of deciding cases is very small, in comparison with the principle involved, in all the cases being hung up by an appeal to the court above. I am altogether opposed to the Ontario, but when the ballots are numbered the people get to believe that their names may be found out, and the dread of that causes them to vote as if they were voting openly. They are afraid of their employer, and they will vote in the way their interests induce them to vote; that is a dread that I know exists in Ontario. So I prefer our system, where the secrecy is absolute; there is no practical fear that it will ever be known which way the voter votes. Therefore, I am against the numbering of ballots, or anything approaching to that. Now, let us take the working out of the first revision of the list under this Bill. The assessment rolls will all be finished by the 1st of January next; on and after the 1st of January the revising officer begins to act; he will get a copy of the assessment roll, and between that date and the 1st of June he will have the list settled. If an election takes place before the 1st of June it will be held on the provincial lists which now exist. If an election takes place after the 1st of June-I think that is the time the list must be finally revised by the revising

Mr. MILLS. No; five weeks after.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then, up to the time the final revision takes place and the list is returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the provincial list will operate. Then the appeal takes place, and it will be settled in the autumn. There may be a casual election by death or resignation—

Mr. EDGAR. Or a general election.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there is any great chance of that. So that practically the list will be settled before there will be a general election. The elections that will take place about the 11th of September, 1887——

Mr. EDGAR. The 17th of September.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, the lists will be settled, I fancy, by that time. The chances of any given election coming off between the time of the final revision of the list by the revising officer and the decision of the appeal are very small. On the other hand, by not adopting this clause you will hang up the voters' list for any given polling district, and you will have to take the list of the year before, and that list must be more imperfect than the list of any given polling district, with two or three votes objected to. Then, again, the chances are greatly in favor of the objections being dismissed after a solemn decision of the court of appeal. I think the consequences of an alteration in this system would be so inconvenient that it is infinitely better to trust to the list as settled by the revising officer than to have the appeal. The cases will be so few, of elections taking place after the revision of the revising officer and before the decision by the court of appeal, that it is scarcely worth while considering the matter; whereas, if we adopted the system proposed by hon, gentlemen opposite we should certainly have a very imperfect list. The consequences of taking the lists of the year before would be much more prejudicial to the electors than was the case when there was a more restricted franchise than there is now. We shall have wage-earners, wage-earners' sons, with a reduced income franchise, fishermen, and a number of other men, who would be excluded by throwing the election on the list of the year before. The chance of having a full and perfect vote of the electors of any given electoral district will be much greater under this system than under the method proposed by the hon. gen-the principle involved, in all the cases being hung up by an appeal to the court above. I am altogether opposed to the Ontario system of numbering the ballots. It has its advantages or it would not be adopted both in England and in smaller number of constituents. When his Bill goes into force, when the roll of 1886 is made up and perfected, do not all of those enfranchised under this measure get on the first list? Who, then, will have his name on the list of 1887 who will not have it on the list of 1886? He tells us that the appeals are principally on questions of law; he does not value appeals on points of fact. Any person who has had any experience in these matters knows that in almost every case the appeal is on a question of fact. What is the subjectmatter of an appeal against the name of a voter on the voters' list. The appellant seeks to prove that he is or is not the owner of a certain property; that he is or is not a resident on a piece of property; that it is of a certain value or is not, and so on. These are questions of fact, and they are practically the only questions that are submitted on appeal. Well, he tells us that in his opinion elections will not be held on lists not confirmed by the county court judge. I say it ought not to be possible that this should happen; but it is possible that every election held between the two Sessions may be held on the list made by the revising officer and not confirmed by any court. The revising officer makes his list on the 1st of June and posts it up; four weeks from that time he can hear appeals; he then confirms his roll, certifies it, and sends it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and that is done practically on the same day by every revising officer in Canada. About the first week of July every revising officer of Canada ought to have his roll in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at Ottawa. The hon. gentleman opposite having it in his power to name the time when the election shall be hold, could have these elections brought on in the second week of July; and not one of these rolls could be confirmed, not one appeal could be adjusted, and we should have members elected to this House on rolls which might be altered to such an extent as to materially affect the result of the elections. We are offered now an appeal to correct the roll after an election is held. The mischief is done, and we have the satisfaction of knowing that it is incurable. When the hon. gentleman told us that we were to have an appeal, a full appeal, what did it mean? It meant an appeal of practical value; it meant that the action of the revising officer would not be binding until it was ratified by the proper court. Now he says that the elections must be held on the lists of the revising officer before his acts have been investi gated. If you read the 28th section you will find it says that in the succeeding year he shall bring in another list which shall supersede every preceding list. Take these two sections together, and I do not care what appeal you may make, it will have no practical effect. I am more than amazed that, at this stage of the discussion, and considering the spirit in which the scheme for appeal has been tendered us, we should now be told it is an illusory form, that cannot be taken advantage of. I protest against such a proposition, and will fight against it as long as I can.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman promised that there should be provided an appeal to a county court judge, both as to law and to fact, where the revising barrister was not himself judge. It is clear that appeal should be provided for at the beginning of the section. The first part of the section says:

"After the lists for the several polling districts have been so completed revised and corrected, they shall be certified, in the form contained in the schedule of this Act, by the revising officer, and kept by him for the purposes of this Act, and a duplicate of each, certified as aforesaid, shall be transmitted forthwith by him to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, at Ottawa."

That is not to be done, according to the statement the hon. gentleman made, unless there is no appeal from the revising officer; but if there is, then the action of the officer is not final. He cannot complete the list; he cannot do what is stated here to be done; that can only be done by the county Mr. MULOCK.

court judge, and it is not until after he has so certified that The hon. gentleman the list can be said to be completed. will see that if he carries the section in this form he is not carrying out his promise to the House. It is clear the list must be completed by the county court judge, as, so far as he is concerned, appeals must be decided before there can be a complete list. The clause further provides "that the persons whose names are entered on said lists as voters shall be held to be duly registered voters in and for such electoral district, subject to correction or amendment by the judgment of the Superior Court on appeal, as hereinafter mentioned." This provision is for the use of the list that is completed, so far as the action of the county court judge is concerned, but not completed, so far as appeals may be made from the decision of the county court judge to the Superior Court. I do not precisely know what the effect would be if the hon, gentleman were to carry this section in this form, but it is pretty clear there could be no question then of appeal from the revising officer to the county court judge. That must be had before the list is completed; the list is not finally revised until that is done, and to carry out that view the judge should have the right, in all cases of appeal, to take the evidence de novo. That would require to come in before any portion of this clause; it is the completion of the revision. Surely the hon, gentleman does not propose to say that he is going to deal with the question of appeal from the revising officer to the county court judge, as from the county court to the Superior Court. But arguing that the hon, gentleman's intention is to carry out in good faith the promise he made to the House, it is still very important to consider, assuming that the list is completed by the county court judge on appeal from the revising officer, this question of appeal to the Superior Court. There may be cases where there would be left off the list persons who claimed the right to vote. As the Bill stands, the hon. gentleman would disfranchise them, although, upon further consideration, these claimants might be held to be legally entitled to have their names inserted on the voters' list. No provision is made for them whatever. In the case of persons who are on, but whose right to remain on is contested, they would have the right to vote although it was subsequently held they were not legally entitled to do so. That is an indefensible proposition. It is impossible to suppose that this Legislature is so wanting in intellectual capability and capacity as not to be able to frame a clause that would meet such a case. I think the proposition of the hon, gentleman is a simple way of meeting the case. Every voters' list that remains is the voters' list in point of law, until superseded by another list com-pleted in itself. If this Legislature declares that a list is of no use until all questions of appeal are finally disposed of, the old list will remain in force. What have we done, under the provisions of this Bill? Our assessment roll is completed in May, and the hon gentleman did not intend it was to be utilised until the succeeding year, under this Bill, as it is framed. In many of the Provinces the rolls are prepared late in the season, and cannot be utilised until the next year. There would be no way of making lists that could come into force immediately after the materials are available, except by adopting different periods in dif-ferent Provinces; but if the hon, gentleman adheres to a fixed period of time, if he can afford to keep off for months, from the list, the names of parties who are shown in the early assessment rolls to be entitled to vote, why such extraordinary haste to bring an imperfect list into operation? The proposition is a simple one, which would carry out this intention easily; but if the hon, gentleman refuses to adopt that, he has the other alternative which we have suggested; let the parties vote by tendered ballots. The hon, gentleman says there is a great aversion to the Ontario system, but where does it exist? Certainly not in Ontario. It did not exist in the hon gentleman's mind when this system of absolute secrecy was proposed here, because I think the fail to see that if this clause is allowed to remain as it is hon, gentleman opposed it. It is an open secret that a majority of the House were opposed to the system of a beolute secrecy at the time; but the Minister of Justice, Mr. Dorion, was strongly in favor of it, and he was premeting the Bill and his view prevailed. Whether that system of absolute secrecy, or the Ontario system, is the best, is not the question. It is not proposed to interfere with that system. It is proposed to vote by a tendered ballot, in the case of all those parties who claim to go upon the roll, and whose right is contested. If you allow those parties to vote under a numbered ballot it is only necessary that the counting of those ballots should be suspended until the decision of the court is had, and then those who are not entitled to vote may be ascertained and struck off, and those who are outitled to vote may be counted, along with those that were counted before. The proposition of the hon, gentleman is to give a vote to men whose right to vote is contested, and to maintain that their votes were properly east, after the court has held that they were not entitled to vote at all. I say that proposition is wholly untenable, and there is no practical necessity for having recourse to such a proceeding, in order to uphold the right of a person entitled to vote. If you had a number of imperfect lists, with a large number of appeals, you might pessibly have the majority of elections in the Dominion carried by voters that the judges of the different courts would subsequently hold were not entitled to be on the register at all. That condition of things would be intolerable. The public opinion of this country would not sustain the authority of a House that was elected by such means, and it is highly inexpedient that any such condition of things should be made possible. I think we are entitled here to the amendment promised by the hon, gentleman, in regard to the appeals from the revising officer to the county court judge. We are entitled, under the understanding had, to hold that the list shall not be considered finally arevised until it is revised by the county judge; and then we have, besides that, this question of appeals raised by the amendment of my hon, friend from North York.

Mr. EDGAR. In my remarks I assumed that the revision would not be complete until, where the revising officer was not a county court judge, it had been revised under the system promised by the First Minister, and it was on the same basis that the hon, gentleman himself made his remarks subsequently. The whole argument was therefore based on the assumption that there would be a final revision by the revising officer, when he was a county court judge, and by the county court judge where he was not. I think it is almost essential that this provision should come in in this clause, or as a new section before it, because the list cannot be spoken of as revised and corrected and in a shape to be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until the county court judge has passed upon it. I do not know whether the First Minister has drafted the clause yet, but I think this is the place where it should go, or it might stand until it can be put in there. Then the evils of the latter part of section 26 would be minimised to the extent the Prime Minister said they would.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think the remarks of the First Minister, a few moments ago, must have been very disappointing to members of the committee, or at least to some of them. I had formed the impression that the difficulty had been pointed out so thoroughly this afternoon that after dinner the First Minister would have been prepared to propose some solution of the difficulty, which, it seems to me, must be apparent to him as well as to other members. Of course, we are proceeding, in a measure, upon what we have understood from the First Minister, that there was to be a larger ground of appeal, and opportunity for appeal, than the wording of this original kill would indicate; but it seems to me that the First Ministen cannot 298 now his promise to the House would be virtually done away with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, virtually, if I understand it ight. What benefit is it to me to be told I have the Yes, virtually, if I understand it aright right to appeal to a Superior Court if I have been defeated by a certain number of illegal wotes placed upon the list by a revising barrister, if there is a provision in this Bill that, notwithstanding I get the verdict of the Superior Court in my favor, and show conclusively that I have had a majority of the legal votes cast at that time, nevertheless there is no remedy, but the seat is held by my opponent for the five years. Virtually, the appeal is wholly wiped out it would be of no more use to me than if a criminal should unfortunately be hanged upon circumstantial or other testimony, and after a time it was found out that the testimony was not correct. If the man's life had been taken from him, finding out that he was not guilty of the crime would do him no good. It may be an extreme illustration, but it answers this case. Here is the contest for the seat to be decided, and, if the First Minister insists upon passing this clause as it is, the question is decided beyond a peradventure the moment the votes are cast that are upon the list improperly. It is the duty of the First Minister and the duty of the committee to find some solution of the difficulty, to find some plan whereby the promise of the First Minister that an effective appeal—for I take it he is not trifling with the committee when he promised it—that some way shall be devised whereby an effective appeal may be secured. I was disappointed in his remarks, because he admitted the possibility that there might be a few names in the polling subdivision put on in error, or otherwise, but he seemed to see greater difficulty in hanging up, as he termed it, the votes of that whole polling sub-division because two or three names were improperly on the list. But the First Minister knows that the fact that there are two or three names in each polling sub-division on a list, that have no right to be on that list-if these names cast their votes in the same direction. they would determine, I would almost say, a majority of the elections of members to serve in this House. If these votes in the polling sub divisions of the various ridings of the Dominion were cast in one way it would have the effect, almost, of electing a majority of the members of this House, while the members so sitting would be in a minority of the legal votes cast at that election. Surely we cannot afford, as a committee, to allow a clause in the Bill to pass that would have that effect. Whether there be difficulties in what has been suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I do not know. I am not sufficient lawyer to determine all fine points, but I can see very clearly that this clause, left as it is, practically nullifies, not only the broader ground of appeal that has been promised by the First Minister, but entirely pullifies the provision given us in the original drafting of the Bill. The First Minister must not forget the fact that it is not possible for us on this side of the House to view the revising barrister with the same degree of confidence that he does. The First Minister seems to think there might be no difficulty, because, possibly, only bye-elections would come on under it. He will not, of course, feel annoyed if we say that under it, with a First Minister so designing, we could see how a general election could be brought on at a period when the vast majority of the seats in the House would be affected by it, and the First Minister would hardly claim it is desirable that such should be left in the hands of the First Minister of the day were that First Minister leading any particular party in this country. A general election might be brought on when a large majority of the members of this House would be affected by the operations of this clause. I again report that it is the boundar duty of the committee to address themselves to devising a clause whereby justice shall be done, whereby the will of the people, as expressed by the legal voters, shall be carried out, and not be thwarted by illegal votes, that may be, by fraud or design, placed upon the election list.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know what the legal effect may be of the words in the last lines, "final and conclusive as to every election for such electoral district," is intended to be. I should like to know from the First Minister whether, in his judgment, the words, "final and conclusive," would debar the party who is defeated from bringing up the question of the validity of those votes on an election petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, it might have the effect of getting off an election petition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, It seems to me it would. There is a very considerable prima facie case that it would do so. Now, nothing could well be more unjust than that a man who had received a majority of the legal votes should be deprived of the seat to which he was entitled, because we have decided that an election should be held on a roll which had not been revised. Then, as to another argument the Prime Minister used, which was that there would be an unusual number of appeals for the purpose of protracting this revision. I think, under the clause he has introduced as to sub-divisions, that would not be very likely to happen. I presume it would be easy enough to introduce the practice we have in Ontario, where each separate municipality is appealed by itself, and if the judge certifies that the municipal list is correct then for that municipality that list is used. In other municipalities, where appeals are lodged, the list of the preceding year may be used. Now, I presume the same thing could be done in the case of these various sub-divisions, and that would greatly minimise the difficulty to which the First Minister was alluding when I came in. There is another consideration which deserves some weight. If you maintain the clause as it now stands, there would always be a special temptation to parties to endeavor to get the list, before the revising officer, made in their favor. The fact that a list should not be used until it had been finally revised on appeal would serve, to some extent, as a check against improper applications or demands to strike off names. But if you allow this clause to stand, politicians on either side will be much more disposed to make a vigorous struggle before the revising officer, prior to the final revision of the list, than otherwise they would do; and there would be probably a worse list and more irregularity caused by that particular temptation than would occur in the ordinary nature of things. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the fact that the list is going to be subject to revision before it can be used in an election, would be a check both on the revising officer and, what is probably more important, on the hot partisans of either side who are endeavoring to gain advantages over each other. Moreover, as a mere matter of justice and common sense, it appears to all impartial persons that the list should be finally revised before it is allowed to be used. Day by day election petitions, of which many of us have had unpleasant experiences, are becoming more expensive and troublesome to members on both sides of the House, and I think it is not desirable that they should be encouraged, as I think they would be certain to be encouraged, if an election is disposed of on an imperfect list; and if it turns out, as I think hon. gentlemen would find it would turn out, those words, "final and conclusive," would, at all events, have to be amended, so that if a man was elected on a list which had not been subject to appeal he might be and would be entitled to bring that question before the courts.

Mr. LISTER. When the Act was first introduced it was duced the decision of the revising barrister was practically intended to give only an appeal on questions of law to a final; he really decided who should sit in this House and Mr. Paterson (Brant).

judge of the Superior Court. Since that time the First Minister has agreed to give an appeal on questions of fact as well as questions of law to the judge of the county court. I could have understood very well the use of this section if the Bill had remained and had been carried out according to the original intention of the First Minister. But I can easily see, in view of the changes to which he has consented, that it will cause very great difficulty, if not great injustice, unless the section is amended in the direction desired by the Opposition. What is the position of the candidate under this Bill? It is quite possible that before the time for finally revising the list, or before the time for determining appeals has expired, an election may take place, and the last revised list may be used, pending those appeals. It is provided that persons on that list who have been appealed against will be entitled to vote at that election, and their votes will be final, to the same extent and in the same manner as if the appeal were not taken against them. We know that many of the constituencies are very close, and if an effort were made, and it is not beyond possibility that such might be made, a sufficient number of improper voters might be placed upon the list to determine the result of elections, against the wish of the duly qualified voters. It is not for this Parliament to recognise, to legalise, such a possible injustice as may take place if this clause were passed. The difficulty can easily be overcome. If those lists were prepared by the local officers, if the revision and preparation of the lists were left in the hands of the people, we would have no reason to apprehend the danger which we might apprehend if this Bill were allowed to pass in its present shape. The people themselves would look after the list; but under this Bill we have an officer of the Government, not only to prepare but to revise those lists. I can only say, without wishing to cast any odium on the revising officer, that it is possible, in his zeal for the party that appointed him, he may overstep the mark and do injustice to the opposite party. It is not just to our selfrespect that this House should place on the Statute Book a measure which may have the effect of doing any injustice to a single individual. The result of the section, as prepared, is this: That while those appeals may be many or few, those votes will be cast, and they may have the effect of electing a man who is not the choice of the qualified electors. This section applies not only to appeals to the judge of a county court but to appeals to the Superior Court. The section might be amended by providing that the voters' list should not be considered final until the time for entering appeals before the judge had expired; that might be within a few days, or two weeks, at the utmost. Or the difficulty might be obviated as suggested by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills): a tendered ballot might be given. A list might be prepared which should contain the names of those whose right to vote had been questioned, and against whose right an appeal might be pending. If it turned out that they had the right, the ballot would be counted; and, in the other event, the reverse would be the case. In that way complete justice would be done, not only to the candidates but to the voters themselves. Section 26, as it at present stands, should not be allowed to become the law. I trust the First Minister will take the matter into consideration, and make some such amendments as have been suggested by hon. gentlemen on this side.

Mr. FAIRBANK. As it is generally considered that this is a question which should be discussed chiefly by legal gentlemen, I would not have risen, but to my mind the position is so outrageous that if the lay members of the House did not speak upon it the very boys on the floor would feel bound to speak. When the Bill was first introduced the decision of the revising barrister was practically final; he really decided who should sit in this House and who should not, and the remaining clauses were in keeping with it. But after long discussion we were granted the right to appeal, and then, of course, this clause became absurd. I do not think hon, gentlemen opposite would be willing to defend the proposition that members for this House should be chosen by men having no vote. In fact, the proposed appeal after an election is too ridiculous to be considered at a country debating school, much less the Parliament of Canada; it is only trifling with the House and with the country; it is an appeal only in name, and if the hon. gentleman does not wish this Bill to bear this stamp of outlawry, to make it a Bill which every good citizen would feel called upon to destroy, wherever he met it, it should be amended in this respect. To pass this Bill, with this clause as it is, in the fifth month of the session of this Parliament, would be, I think, a burlesque on legislation. Perhaps these terms may consider somewhat strong, but I venture to say that they are not a particle stronger than the country will be considered justified if this clause passes. I thought we had heard the last about the extension of the franchise by this Bill, but the First Minister this evening again spoke of the disadvantage to the electorate of a restricted franchise. Does the Bill extend the franchise in Prince Edward Island, in British Columbia, in Manitoba or in New Brunswick? That question has been answered by members from those Provinces. It has been shown, by returns under the official seal, by those who are competent to give them, that in some counties 400, 500 or 700 voters will be struck off the list, under this Bill, men who have voted for years and who are the holders of real estate.

Mr. FOSTER. That has never been shown.

Mr. FAIRBANK. True, it is stated that it extends the franchise to other classes; but even admitting that it does, the total number cut off will be very great. In Quebec, alone, is there no reduction; and it was not in the Bill originally, even as to that Province, but the change was made at the suggestion of hon gentlemen from that Province. The franchise is not extended in Ontario by this Bill; and hon. gentlemen, when they refer to the law of that Province, constantly refer to the old law. Hon. gentlemen understand very well that the next election will virtually be decided before the revising barrister. Under the Act, as it now stands, it is perfectly possible for a general election to be brought on very shortly, after the revising barrister has returned the list, before any appeal can be made what-ever, and if this provision is retained it will create the greatest doubt in many minds whether a general election will not be brought under such circumstances. The proceedings in the House would almost indicate that. We have been refused an amendment to have the evidence before him taken under oath, notwithstanding that his decision is virtually to be final. Even if he acts in good faith, a person may come before him and make any sort of statement he chooses without being subject to the consequences of an oath. As the Bill stands now, with the First Minister's refusal to make this amendment, I consider it to be a worse Bill than it was when it was introduced. If I were leading the Reform party I would say, as a matter of political tactics, by all means pass the Bill as you have it. But I believe we have sometheing higher than party considerations here. I think it is our duty to make this Bill, I will not say respectable—I believe that is impossible—but something approaching it. I do not profess to be a legal gentleman, and perhaps it is just as well, in considering a point of this kind, that my mind is not confused by legal considerations at all. I think, however, I bring to the consideration of it a little of that kind of common sense that the hon. gentle-amended when he says it would be greatly to the benefit of his party to be carried. That is an excess of patriotism that I have not usually found occupying even the most patriotic minds. The whole argument of hon, gentlemen opposite has been based on the supposition that all the elections are going to take place in the short period between the time the revising officer settles his list and the time of the appeal to the court above. This thing is going on from year to year, from day to day, and from month to month, without reference to a general election or a particular election; and the elections that will take place in that short period will be few and insignificant, in comparison with the disadvantage that would exist from throwing the electorate upon the voters' list of the year before. That would disfranchise a great many men, especially of the working classes. However, I am anxious always to weigh the arguments that are used; I must say that I am opposed to this amendment altogether; but after disposing of that, if it is lost, with the permission of the House I would postpone the consideration of the clause for another day, and proceed to the subsequent clauses. I want to consider that, and see if there is any means of meeting the objection, I think almost the causeless objection, of hon. gentlemen opposite; still, I see the objection and the earnestness with which they speak upon it. Two suggestions have been made, one from the other side of the House and one from this side, which I shall consider before we sit again.

Mr. WELDON. This is not a question of detail, but a question of principle. In cases where there is a narrow majority a great injustice might be done; a candidate might be practically elected by persons not entitled to vote.

Again, there is a difficulty in the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) which was pointed out by the Prime Minister, that it might affect the list. We have adopted the principle that the work of the revising barrister shall be referred to the county court judge; then, it seems to me that the election should be postponed until we have got the decision of the judge. It strikes me that the list ought not to be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until the county court judge has passed upon it. In the one case, when the county court judge is the revising officer, he passes upon it first; why should he not in the other case? There ought to be some precaution against the difficulty of persons not entitled to vote controlling an election. We have to look at this as a permanent matter, because it is not confined to the first revision, but will apply to all future lists. It is well known that sometimes after an Act becomes law, some point arises that has escaped attention; it is almost impossible to meet all cases, no matter how carefully you draw a Bill; but we ought to endeavor to do so as far as possible. We ought, if possible, to prevent the possibility of voters being appealed against when an election is about to take place. It seems to me the difficulty might be avoided by providing that the list shall not be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until it has been certified by the county court judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It must be understood that I shall carry out in its integrity the proposition that there shall be an appeal to the county court judge, when he is not himself the revising officer, and all the consequences that must naturally flow from that proposition. The question here, however, is not that. The question is the balance of difficulty—whether, when an election takes place before the judge disposes of the appeal, we should take the chance of a few bad votes slipping in, or disfranchise a number of voters by taking an old and effete list, and this question is weighed, in my mind, with the balance in favor of a full franchise—rather in favor of the first system than man will find pretty prevalent in the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am rather surprised at think, in the direction of the suggestion of the hon. member the hon, gentleman being so anxious to have this Bill for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), to see if we cannot contrive some mode by which the votes objected to can be segregated, in such a manner that they will not interfere with the purity, and correctness of the return. I see great difficulty in doing it, but I shall try my hand at it, and for that reason move to postpone the clause, to have an opportunity of considering it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In any case, I presume the right hon, gentleman is willing that in the case of the revising officer, at any rate, the list shall not be considered final until the county court judge has passed upon it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the point I will consider.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is only one of the points. I thought the hon gentleman was going to concede that, and take into consideration the further point, as to the appeal which might be made from the county court judge to a higher court.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Anybody who has had experience in Ontario elections, and I suppose the same is the case in other Provinces where there are county court judges, knows that county court judges disposed, in former days, of the various appeals made to them in a very short time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When the revising barrister is not a county court judge—and that will occur in a very few instances in Ontario—there will be, as a matter of course, an appeal to the county court judge, and a trial of all objections and of refusals of applications to vote. As the hon, gentleman truly says, he will quickly dispose of them, and the hon, gentleman's chances of an election coming on in the interval are very light. Hon, gentlemen opposite exaggerate, I think, the importance of the clause; still, I see the logic of their arguments, and as the construction of the clause is a little involved, I will ask to postpone consideration until to-morrow. I am, however, opposed to this amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. As a lay man, I must express my gratification at hearing the First Minister assure the House that he wishes to place this clause in the best possible form, and has therefore determined to hold it over for the purpose of consideration. I wish to call his attention to one or two points. He tells us the whole argument on this side seems to be based upon the assumption that the elections will take place between the returns made by the revising barrister and the settlement of appeals before the court. I do not think they will, as a rule; but there may be some that will take place during that interval, and it is but right to guard against any such contingency. Most of the general elections within my recollection have been upon votors' lists several months at least in force. The elections of 1882 were upon the lists of the previous year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That objection will be avoided.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it should be arranged that the voters' list will finally settled before a general election takes place. The hon, gentleman promised us an appeal, but we want it to be arranged in such a way that under no possible circumstances it will fail to give practical results. The Bill-professes to be modelled upon English legislation, but we have departed from the English model in the matter of rolls and preliminary revision. In England, the rells are made by the local officers, and the preliminary investigation takes place before the revising barrister. With regard to appeals, the English provision; 6 Viotoxia, chapter 18, section 66, provides:

Sir John A. Macdonald

"And he it enacted that every judgment or decision of the said court shall be final and conclusive in the case, upon a point of law adjudicated upon, and shall be binding upon every committee of the House of Committee appeinted for the trial of any petition complaining of the under election or return of any member or members to serve in Parliament."

Although the law provides that the voters list certified by the revising barrister shall be taken as the complete list, and that no voter on it shall be deprived of his vote in consequence of an appeal pending before the court, yet the law provides that if that appeal has held his vote to be improper and illegal, that vote shall, by the committee of the House of Commons trying the election case, be thrown out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are no election committees in England now.

Mr. CHARLTON. But there are Election Courts, and the functions and powers exercised are those exercised by the Election Courts, and the Election Courts should have the same power to throw out votes which were found to be illegal votes by the court of appeal that the election committee had.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clause the hon. gentleman is reading is the other way. The final decision shall be binding on the judge or other tribunal trying the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. Shall be binding upon the committee of the House or Election Court trying the election case. All that the Opposition desire is that the lists—although we object to the mode of preparation, yet if they are to be prepared by revising officers, and an appeal is to be given, we ask that it may not be a mockery, but that any vote decided by the Court of Appeal to be an illegal vote shall not be counted in the final result in case of election protest and contest.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose the 28th clause, on the same ground as this, stands over. The concluding part of that clause involves the same point. There will be two points to consider, with regard to this matter of voting by numbered ballot. The one is the case of a judge or revising officer who has put upon the list parties whose right to remain on it is contested, and the case of parties who claim to be put on the list, but whose right is denied. Suits may be pending with regard to both; both should have an equal right to vote, and vote in the same way. Then, whether their votes where counted or not would depend upon the decision of the court. The question arises, with whom should the sealed ballots remain during the pending stage? Should they be transferred to the Court of Chancery or sent to the clerk of the court where the suits are pending, leaving the judge, upon the decision of the case, to report to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the number of votes that should be struck off the list or the number that should be added?

Mr. MULOCK. If the clause stands over, my amendment should stand over and be moved again. I beg to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The numbers of the clauses will have to be changed, but that is done by the law clerk,

Mr. MULOCK. It would be well if the First Minister could, to-morrow, with this proposed section, lay before us the scheme for the appeal. The two are involved together.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see that, but we will see:

Mr. MULOCK. It would help to reconcile us to the cleanse generally. We have not very much confidence in it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon, gentleman and his friends were in the English House of Commons I am afraid they would be called the irreconcileables.

On section 29,

Mr. FLEMING. The time of eight days is not sufficient. The election law requires that the proclamation shall be published at least eight days before the nomination.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have to furnish to the returning officer, not merely a list of the voters, but a description of the polling districts, which is always included in the advertisement, and the returning officer has to advertise that eight days before the nomination.

Mr. RYKERT. Not until after the nomination.

Mr. FLEMING. The proclamation contains the description of the polling sub-divisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Make it twelve days. Mr. FLEMING. That would not be sufficient.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will read: "At least twelve days before the day of nomination." I think you will find that will be time enough. The dragging on of the days of an election is not very pleasant for the candidates on either side. We should have as short a time as convenient for full notification to the electors. This will give the returning officer four days to get out his proclamation. I think that is plenty of time.

Mr. CHARLTON. In some districts, such as Algoma, some of these large, sparsely-settled ridings, that would be insufficient.

Mr. WELDON. I would like to remind the First Minister that the returning officer has only twelve days in which to make his preparations. He has only eight days in which to get the list printed, and send it all over the county to be put up, and it only leaves him four days to have it printed before nomination. In some of the counties of New Brunswick, which are very large, this would not give him time enough.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In an election you do not send one man out to go around the county and stick it up in every polling district, but the sheriff or returning officer will send out copies to men in different districts to post it up. He will take either one man or twenty men, if necessary. He is paid for it; it is always allowed in his accounts.

Mr. TEMPLE. I think twelve days is quite sufficient. My county is the largest one in the Province, and I have done it many a time as sheriff. You do not get the writ on the twelfth day; you do not get it before that; and the returning officer or sheriff goes to work and prepares for it, to have it all ready. He has got four days in which to get it out. I have done it in two days, in the largest county in the Province.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid the First Minister will get into difficulties under this four days provision. I do not see how, in districts such as Algoma and Gaspé, it is possible to comply with the provisions of the law. There can be no objections to extending it to seven or eight days, which would make the thing more workable.

On section 30,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the 3rd line make it 1887 instead of 1886. This is for the second list. Then, in the 13th line, after the word "appointed," I propose to insert "where there are no assessment lists or certified copy or certified copies of the last revised list of voters in such electoral district." That is to meet the case of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. WELDON. A revising officer may, in erasing the name, completely destroy the name, so that a person would not know the reason why it has been erased. After the first list is made up it should be kept intact until it is finally revised at the subsequent revision. I shall therefore move an amendment to provide that, instead of adding names to the previous list or erasing names, the revising officer shall make up a list of names proposed to be added and a list of names: proposed to be struck off, and he shall state, opposite the names, why such action was proposed. I move that at line 29, the following be inserted:—

Make up a list of names of all persons whom it is proposed to add to the list.

Also, at line 39, the following:—

Make up a list of names of persons whom it is proposed to strike off, stating the reasons why such names are proposed to be struck off.

It is very important to know the reason why the names are proposed to be struck off; because in many such cases the person could at once attend at the final revision, if he desired, and have the matter determined. Such action would be in harmony with the principle of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The following words might be inserted: "Noting on the said list the names of any persons who are dead, or who are not, according to the terms of this Act, entitled to vote, and stating the reason in said note."

Mr. MILLS. What I would suggest is, that here there is no provision in this preliminary revision for objecting to any names or suggesting that they should be left off. Does the hon, gentleman intend that the proceeding should be taken as at the final revision——

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is intended.

Mr. MILLS. How are parties on the old list to be taken off, as, for instance, a man whose tenancy has expired, and yet his name may appear on the new roll. There should be some evidence, I think, but if no one takes any interest in the matter the old name would be left on. If he required the attendance of the clerk or the assessor to give information before the list is made up, he would be able to make it more accurate, and no names would have to be added or struck off, except upon application.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For the second list the revising officer has the list of the year before, and the assessment roll of that year, the year subsequent to the year for which the first list was made up. He comes to the name on the voters' list of the previous year, "John Jones, owner." He looks at the assessment roll for that year, and he finds that the name of John Jones is not there; but he would leave the name on, and make a note on it: "Objected to; not on the assessment roll," giving the reason why the name is objected to. That gives notice to everybody, and that vote will have to be substantiated at the final revision.

Mr. MILLS. That is just the point. The revising officer sees that A is down as the tenant of the property for which B was down last year. No one makes application to him. He strikes off B and puts on A. Would it be the duty of the revising officer to note that B's name is objected to because it is not on the new roll?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly. He will not strike it off; he will note it; and he will put A on, that being a new name.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose the name of B is not challenged; will it be his duty to notify B, and summon him, without the application of any other party? Will it be his duty to take stage himself to ascertain the truth before he strikes that name off the voters' list?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not, as regards A. He finds A's name on the assessment roll as tenant, and that is sufficient to establish A's right to vote, and he will put his name on the list, without any suggestion or application.

Mr. MILLS. T.king B's off?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He will not take it off, but will mark it as objected to, and I should think he would strike it off if he found no such name on the assessment roll, and found no person coming to vindicate its right to be on the voters' list.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose that, in the Province of Quebec, where there is no provision for putting the names of wage-earners on the assessment roll, in a constituency the names of 500 people were on the voters' list as wage-earners for the last year? What is to be done in that case?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That was fully discussed on the settlement of the first list. He will take such evidence as he can, and will publish the names of all claimants, as in the first case, marking all objected to, and then proceed with the same evidence as is provided for in the case of the first list.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose no one appears on behalf of those wage-earners; are we legislating to make it the duty of the revising officer to summon those whose names were on the list last year, to show why their names should be continued this year, or is he going to leave their names on, unless some one appears to have their names struck off? we going to make it the duty of this revising officer to make the list as perfect as possible, without some one to urge him to that duty—either to put on or take off names? If so, it seems to me we must alter this clause. I am asking for information, just to see how far the hon. gentleman proposes to go, because it seems to me the completeness of the list will depend on the duties we impose on the revising officer; we cannot depend on the simple interest of the two contending parties who are attacking the voters' list. We ought to make it the duty of the revising officer to make the list as complete as possible, and we have to enquire how far he is to go in looking after those who may be considered a precarious class of voters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it, with respect to voters who are not on the assessment roll, that if they were on the last voters' list he will hold them to have the right to vote, unless some one objects, or unless he has information before him to the contrary.

Mr. MILLS. But so far as wage-earners are concerned? Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no doubt they will be objected to. If they have gone away they will not vote.

Mr. MILLS. They might come back.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD If they come back, unless there is some objection taken by somebody, the fair inference is that they have the right to vote.

Mr. MILLS. Then it will not be the duty of the revising officer to ascertain whether they have the right to vote or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. Mills.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is it intended to make a new list, or only an amendment of the old list in existence? In the Province of Quebec a new list is made every year, but the local officer uses the list already in existence. He does not content himself with adding new names or striking off old names, but makes a complete list, so that when an election comes on it is only necessary to refer to the last list. It would seem, from the wording of this clause, that it is not proposed to make a new list, but simply to add names to or strike out names from the old list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revising officer files one copy of the revised list with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and he keeps the other copy, certified, himself. He sends for the assessment rolls of the municipalities, and from them he makes out the new list and publishes it. The names are to be published without striking any off; then objections are written against the names of those objected to.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman proposes that this revision will be at the beginning of January. In Ontario the assessments begin in February or March, so that the assessment roll the revising officer would have before him would be a roll ten or eleven months old. Under sections 21 and 22 the final revision is said to be the 1st June; now, the second assessment roll will be in the hands of the judges before that. Is it intended that the parties who are entitled to vote on the second roll shall be put on the list, and will it be open to the revising officer to use this roll on the final revision?

Mr. RYKERT. In the cities, the assessments do not take place until August and September, and are not finally revised until the 3rd September, and in the country districts they may be appealed from till the 1st August.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have to the 1st of August to go to the court of revision. Then it will be October or November before the rolls are finally made up. It is advertised for thirty days after the 1st August. brings you to 1st September, to allow the party to appeal. Then the appeal will be tried as the county judge directs, so that it will be pretty nearly the end of the year, in October or November, before the assessment roll made in the spring or summer is finally decided in appeal by the county judge. Then, as regards cities, it is provided that these rolls will not be finally made up till the 31st December. Therefore, in order to embrace the whole electorate, in the urban as well as the rural districts, we have started it from the 1st January. I do not think it would be well for the revising officer to be guided by a roll not finally concluded. If any party can show he has a right to vote, and can prove it, of course his name will be put on, but I do not think the revising officer should be forced to send for an incomplete assessment roll, not finally decided on.

Mr. MILLS. The time for making up the revision is in June; then five weeks are allowed, which would make it some time in July before the final revision under this Act takes place. My hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) is confounding the revision of the voters' list with the revision of the assessment roll, because the latter takes place in May. The court of revision sits in May.

Mr RYKERT. There must be fourteen days' notice to the court of revision given after the 1st May. The court of revision generally meets about the 28th May. Then there is an appeal to the county judge up to the 1st August. Immediately afterwards, if there is no appeal, the clerks make up the voters' lists, which are published for one month, for the electors to give notice of appeal, and afterwards the judge fixes the date of his courts throught the county. The object now is to have a complete list for a whole county. In a county containing a city you cannot have that until the 31st December, so that if you proceeded as my hon. friend from Bothwell wishes, you would have a partial list at one time swid the rest of the list at another.

Mr. FAIRBANK. That revision is the revision of the voters' list, not of the assessment roll, which is finished long before the time the hon. gentleman mentions.

Mr. RYKERT. It cannot be completed until fourteen days after the 1st May, and after that there is a right of appeal on the assessment roll to the county judge to the 1st August.

Mr. FAIRBANK. That does not change the assessment roll, only the voters' list.

Mr. RYKERT. I am talking about both the assessment roll and the voters' list. I have been twenty-five years reeve, and ought to know.

Mr. FAIRBANK. We are talking about the assessment roll, and the hon. gentleman persists in talking about the voters' list.

Mr. RYKERT. The assessment roll is not completed by the 1st June, for they have up to the 1st August to appeal.

Mr. LISTER. There is no appeal from the court of revision on the ground of assessment. The only appeal is in regard to the voters' list.

Mr. RYKERT. There is an appeal from the court of revision to the judge of the county court in regard to any errors of the assessment roll.

Mr. LISTER. That is for the purpose of the voters' list.

Mr. RYKERT. Section 59 of the Assessment Act shows distinctly that there is an appeal to the county judge against the decision of the court of revision. I am surprised that any one who has been in the profession as long as the hon. gentleman, should not know that.

Mr. TROW. The hon, gentleman must be mistaken. The county councils are now in session, and they have to make a final revision of the assessment rolls which are transferred to them by the township councils.

Mr. RYKERT. I am surprised at the ignorance of the hon. gentleman. Does he not know that the county council has nothing whatever to do with the assessment roll for that year, but takes the roll of the preceding year, and upon that equalises the assessment.

Mr. LISTER. There is no occasion for the hon. gentleman to lose his temper.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not lose my temper, but I am surprised at the hon. gentleman's ignorance.

Mr. LISTER. I am not surprised at yours, as far as your social qualifications are concerned.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PLATT. For all practical purposes, the list, as it leaves the court of revision, is as good as when it leaves the hands of the judge, if it is to be prima facie evidence of the right of the person assessed to vote. On the 1st June it could very well be used as prima facie evidence.

Mr. MACMASTER. I am surprised that the proposition of my hon. friend from Lincoln could be, for a moment, doubted, and that hon. gentlemen opposite are not aware of the fact that there is an appeal to the county judge from the proceedings of the municipal court of revision. Not only am I thoroughly certain of that, from having examined the statute, but within the last ten months I conducted a very important case of that character, in which an appeal from the local court of revision, composed of the local council, was made directly to the county judge of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry, regarding the assessment of the Hon. D. A. Macdonald, formerly a member of this House.

Mr. WELDON. I think a similar provision should be inserted here to that in the 12th section, as to this being prima facie evidence. It is desirable to make the section uniform.

Mr. CASEY. This is a point in which the right hon. gentleman should state his intentions. He has changed section 12, referring to the primary formation of the list, so as to make the rolls prima facie evidence. There should be some language inserted in this clause to show that the same rules should be followed in regard to succeeding revisions of the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, of course.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman has not inserted anything in this clause to the same effect as in the 12th section. Then, about the tenants. The hon, gentleman announced his intention to provide that a tenant assessed for $150 or $300, as the case might be, whatever the qualification is for a freeholder, his name should be put primá facie upon the voters' list as being a tenant and paying $20.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What I stated to the committee was this: After a long fight on the clause about tenants, I said that if hon. gentlemen opposite would promise me not to re-open that clause I would add a proviso, that in cases where there was no rent specified in the assessment roll, if it showed that the property was assessed for $150, that would be received as primal facie evidence of the amount of the rent.

On section 32,

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me all these sections, down to the 38th, are, in one sense, unnecessary, as they are re-enacting the same thing that was enacted before. The whole of them might be put in one section.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I put these in the second time so that persons who are not lawyers may not have occasion to look back. It makes the Bill a little longer, but a lay man just looks at them without looking at the previous section. I thought it would be better to have a repetition.

On section 37,

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I desire to call attention to the fact that twelve days is too short a time for the necessary work to be done. The law requires the returning officer to be furnished with the revised list before nomination. The proclamation has to be up eight days before the nomination, and in that proclamation the time and place of holding the polling in each case has to be stated, in the event of a contest. Some of the electoral districts are over one hundred miles in length. The returning officer has to make himself acquainted with the polling districts, so as to ascertain the most convenient places in which to hold the polls. In order to do that it is necessary to summon the township clerk, and his advice in that regard is largely acted upon. It is utterly impossible for the returning officer to get the information and do the posting and other work within four days.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman will see that the duty now thrown on the returning officer will, if he finds the district too large, be performed by the revising officer. He will fix the polling district. No difficulty has been experienced in Ontario, and I have known elections come on very rapidly. As to the posting of the notices, three or four men would be employed, instead of one.

Mr. MILLS. The returning officer has to appoint deputies, who have to be hunted out, and appointed in the polling divisions; and their advice is generally taken with respect to the places of polling. All the work cannot be done in four days.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No arrangement for polling places is made until after nomination; and this is then done by the sheriff.

Mr. WELDON. The reason so little difficulty is experienced in New Brunswick is that the sheriffs are returning officers. It seems to me that four days is a very short time, especially in some counties, where there would be considerable distances to travel.

Mr. WATSON. In my county it would be impossible to get up the notices in that time, as it is 150 miles in length, and a great deal of the travelling has to be done by stage or buck-board.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will make it fifteen days then, which is quite enough. To make it longer would make it only to protract the agony; and if hon, gentlemen are canvassing their constituencies they want to get through with it as soon as possible.

Mr. CASEY. That has nothing to do with the length of the campaign at all. The length of the campaign is fixed by the issue of the writ.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1 think I have made you a very good offer; will you take fifteen days? There are limits to human endurance.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 38,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon, gentlemen will see that this duty of laying out the different polling districts is to be put upon the revising officer instead of the returning officer, which is much better. All the returning officer has to do is simply to put out his proclamation, choose convenient places and select his deputies.

Mr. MILLS. There is still concurrent power. Would it not be well to provide for the repeal of that clause of the Election Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It may be so. I will take a note of that.

Mr. CHARLTON. One great objection to this entire Bill is the amount of confusion it introduces into the elections as between the Provinces and the Dominion. It will also introduce confusion in the matter of the arrangement of the polling districts. I think we might at least avoid that objection to the Bill by providing that the polling districts for Dominion purposes shall be the same as those for provincial purposes. I therefore beg to move that the following be substituted for clause 38:—

That the polling districts fixed for the purposes of provincial elections shall be, in each Province, adopted as the polling districts for the election of members for the House of Commons of Canada,;

Mr. CASEY. I think it would save a great deal of trouble, both to the revising officer and to the returning officer, if this amendment were adopted, because people are familiar with the boundaries of the provincial polling divisions and with the places where the voting usually takes place. The practical question is, whether, in all the Provinces, the same limit of polling divisions is required as is required by this Bill, namely 200 voters; if that is the case, the proposal of the amendment would be a real convenience. I hear it objected to that the boundaries of the electoral districts are different. No doubt they are; but the polling divisions are the same; a certain number are simply taken from one county and added to another; so that no difficulty would arise in that respect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The objection to the amendment is simply this, that the franchises are different, and if the different polling districts are to contain, as near as possible, 200 voters, those in the provincial elections would not be the same as those in the Dominion.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is quite true. But the number would not exceed 200, because the provincial franchises are, in most cases, more liberal than the Dominion. The amendment would certainly secure greater convenience to the public; that confusion as to the boundaries would not exist in the public mind; trouble and expense would be saved to those who have to work out this tranchise; and we should secure uniformity in the boundaries of the polling districts both for Dominion and provincial elections.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. BOWELL. We have not had that in the past.

Mr. CHARLTON. But we would have it in the future.

Mr. BOWELL. In new sections of country, where the settlements are in groups, perhaps eight or ten miles apart, our experience has been that in the last election the polling districts were divided by the returning officer so as to afford the greatest facility for voting; but the year after, when the local elections came on, the local returning officer abolished them. In the township of Carlo, for instance, where there is a large settlement, voters were obliged to go to the north-west corner and poll their votes, and the result was that a large proportion of the voters of that township did not go out, because they would have to travel twelve or fifteen miles. So there is no uniformity now. The arrangement of the polling divisions altogether depends on the whim of the returning officer or the influence brought to hear upon him, whether he is the sheriff or anybody else.

Amendment negatived.

On section 38,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move to strike out the words "may issue, at his own instance," and insert the word "shall."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASEY. I think the clause, "Witness fees and expenses allowed under the tariff of the Superior Court," is rating the expense too high. The cost of a court of revision should be sufficient.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I trust the hon, gentleman will change that. Of course the costs of the Superior Court are double what they are in division court. The witnesses in division court are paid 50 cents a day, and in the Superior Court, $1.25, and, as they are acting in the public interest, they ought to be satisfied with a smaller sum.

Mr. LISTER. If a solictor issues this subposna, it will make up quite a bill of cost, amounting to $20 or $30. Under the Act of the Local Legislature, the tariff is division court costs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the words, "and expenses," be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the revising officer chooses to summon any witness, the expenses incurred by him will be borne by the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fancy he will put that into his account. I propose that the fees to be tendered to the witnesses so summoned shall be those allowed in the Province of Quebec in the Superior Court, in the Province of Ontario in the division courts, and in the other Provinces in the county or district courts.

Mr. MILLS. The revising officer may desire to summon some persons on his own initiative. He ought to have the power to do so, and yet he would be obliged to pay the expenses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will consider that when we come to the money resolution.

Mr. CASEY. Then I infer that witnesses summoned by the revising officer at his own instance will be paid for at the public coat?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid, on consideration, that there will be a great deal of pressure on the judge to summon those at his own instance-who would be brought in the interest of a party.

Mr. CASRY. Penhape this clause might stand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I am almost inclined to ask the committe to go back and strike out the words "may at his own instance," leaving the revising officer obliged to summon witnesses only on the application of the parties.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Hear, hear.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would suggest to the Premier that we have finished the 39 articles in orthodox fashion. The hon. gentleman has been in very close attendance himself, and I think we might reasonably adjourn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 141) respecting administration of justice and other matters in the North-West Territories-(Sir John A. Macdonald)—(from the Senate.)

Bill (No. 142) respecting canned goods—(Mr. Bowell)-(from the Senate.)

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask the committee to return to clause 26. After consideration of this clause, I have thought that on the whole it would be well to adopt the substance of the suggestion of my hon. friend from Bothwell. I propose to strike out of the 29th line the words "and be final and conclusive as to," and to make the tollowing addition to the clause:-

But the ballot of any person, whose name has been included in the certified list of voters and is the subject of an undecided appeal, shall be numbered by the deputy returning officer, and a corresponding number shall be placed opposite his name on the poll book; and upon the counting of the ballots, the ballots so numbered shall be by the deputy returning officer separated from the ordinary ballots and returned to the returning officer separated from the ordinary ballots and returned to the proper officer, sealed up to await the decision of such appeal; and it under such decision the name of any such person shall be struck from the voters' list, and if the election at which such vote has been given has been contested and a scrutiny of votes demanded, the vote given by such person shall be ascertained from his ballot and shall be struck from the poll; and if any person whose name has been excluded from this certified list of voters, and whose exclusion is the subject of an undecided appeal, shall desire to vote, the deputy returning officer shall receive his ballot and shall number the same and the name of the voter in the poll book, and keep separate such ballots as hereinbefore provided, and if upon such appeal, the decision of the revising officer shall be maintained, the vote of such person may be ascertained and struck from the poll book upon a contest and demand of scrutiny as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. MULOCK. According to the General Election Act I think the deputy returning officer is required to seal up two or three words providing that he shall seal them up at the same time and in the same manner as he is required to seal up the other ballots?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the hon. First Minister would do well to accept the suggestion of the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock). It should not be left to the deputy returning officer to carry those ballots away and seal them up in the absence of both parties. He ought to do it in the presence of both parties.

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon, gentleman will see that there is something more than that required. Of course following the analogy of the Election Act, the moment the ballots are counted, they would be sealed up in the presence of the scrutineer while the revising officer was present, but in case there was no contestation of the election, according to the clause as it stands, the election would stand as the ballots were counted. This ought not to be treated as part of the proceedings of a controverted election. It is not a part of the proceedings of a controverted election; it is a part of the preliminary proceedings of an ordinary election, and when it is found that any of those parties who vote are not entitled to vote, the returns should be corrected as a matter of course. Suppose a man is returned, and upon the final decision of the Court of Appeal it is found that 30 of those parties who voted for him should be struck off, they should be struck off, as a matter of course, after the decision is had, and the result of the election amended accordingly, no matter whether it is a controverted election or not. It is a question of the proper counting or enumeration of the result of the election.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Under the law, of course there can be a recount within a certain number of days before the granting of the count. According to the amendment of the First Minister, the contestant would need to get a judgment of the Court of Appeal which occurred between the election and the recount, and there will be all the expense of filing a petition. There is a good deal in what the hon. member for Bothwell has said: it is, after all, but a count of the ballots, and not a part of the controverted election.

Mr. MILLS. If there has been a count, and the question as to the accuracy of the count has not been contested at all, the candidate ought not to be compelled to intervene in order to revise it after decision by the court. The correction of a miscount is a different proceeding, but if the court holds that of those parties who voted 30 or 40 ought not to have voted, it is a mere correction of the count. It is not a recount, it is the striking off from one candidate or the other, or both, the names of those who ought not to be on the list. There is no necessity for the candidate to interfere and be put to the expense of interference.

Mr. ABBOTT. As respects the recount, there ought to be no difficulty. There is a period upon which a candidate can insist upon a recount under the ordinary proceedings of the election law. If it should turn out before that time expires that there has been an error in this way, that persons were put on the list who had no right to be there, this error could be corrected on the recount. It would be very inconvenient and inexpedient that a member who has not been returned should be in an uncertain position after he has occupied his seat, when without his election being contested in any way, his right to occupy the seat may be interfered with any moment, on a return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. MILLS. Certain proceedings must be taken in order to have a recount. Steps must be taken within a particular period of time, and weeks may elapse before a decision is had, and the law should be changed in that respect. But why should the ballots immediately after counting them in the presence the law should be changed in that respect. But why should of the contestants. Would it not be prudent to put in those proceedings be had. The party does not complain of irregular proceedings, he admits his right to have the seat must depend on the validity or invalidity of the votes which are contested, and they could be contested quite as well without any application or interference on his part. You do not add anything to the regularity of the proceedings, or its fairness, or his moral right to have the seat, by calling on him to contest the election. The whole of that proceeding is a part, not of his taking any proceedings, but of the returning officer's act. You say to him, you must make a return, but as soon as votes contested are decided the return must be corrected accordingly, and if it should happen that the man who was returned in the first instance was held not to be elected and the man who had the minority in the first instance is held to have been elected, your returns should be made right. There is no want of diligence on the officer's part, he can do nothing to hasten the proceedings. Everything depends on the promptness with which the Court of Appeal decides the question as to the validity of the votes.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) Suppose the judgment of the Court of Appeal is not given until after the time limited for the presentation of the petition, 30 days, is expired, what is the candidate to do? He has no remedy because the Superior Court has not given judgment in his favor at the proper time. There is another reason. Primarily, if the Court of Appeal decided in favor of the man who was not returned, he is entitled to get the seat. But then he has to file his petition and allege that he is entitled to the seat, because he has the majority of votes. The opposite candidate, the man who got the seat improperly, will say: You are not entitled, because some other irregularity has taken place. We shall be trying on the petition some things that ought not to be tried there at all. You are putting the respondent in the same position as if he were the petitioner. I am not prepared to suggest any way in which the desired end could be reached. Why should not the House amend the writ on the judgment of the Court of Appeal? In England, as the hon, gentleman knows, under the old law, before the ballot was introduced, the committee appointed to try contested elections was bound by the judgment of the court as to the validity of the vote. Why should not Parliament in the same manner amend the return? Parliament ought to be at liberty to amend the return and give the man entitled to it, by the judgment of the court, the seat.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must, of course, see that the man who is the representative should represent really the majority. That is the principle on which we sit here. On the other hand, we have, as much as we can, consistently with that axiom, tried to prevent members, who have been elected and returned, feeling uncertain in their places for a long period. It is of very great importance to the independence of the member himself, and to his usefulness here, that he should feel that he represents his constituents for that Parliament. I have had petitions presented against me, and I have, with those hanging over my head, never felt the same assurance that I truly and really represented the constituency, or could have the same influence in this House, as if I had been assured that I really represented the constituency in Parliament. It is the interest of us all to remove that feeling of uncertainty, which affects the usefulness of every member when a petition is hanging over his head. I am anxious to accept any suggestion on this subject which will meet the difficulty. I do not see why we should insist upon the opening of the ballots when the other party gives it up altogether.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman says, but the judgment of the Court of Appeal may not be given until after the time has expired, and you are bound to present the petition within a limited period.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. BLAKE. In cases where there was a question pending before the Court of Appeal at the time of the election, the time within which a recount could be demanded might be extended, so as to give a short delay from the giving of the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Mr. CAMERON. Why not extend the time when the returning officer is to make his return? There is no use in his making his return until after the Court of Appeal gives its decision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Supposing a member was returned by a very large majority, and there were a certain number of rejected ballots, why should not the other party be allowed to give it up and say he did not want a recount, because, even if all the names should be added, and it should prove that they had voted for him, it could not affect the result of the election? It appears to me that, if the parties really surrender, seeing that they had no chance, we should not insist upon having the matter re-opened for no good purpose whatever. I think you may safely leave that, in view of the activity of the political parties in this country, to the defeated candidate. I think we are raising a practical difficulty which will operate in many cases, and which is of no real value on the whole.

Mr. MILLS. The case the hon, gentleman puts does not meet his proposition now before the committee. If the number of parties whose cases are appealed is not equal to the majority of the candidate who has polled the largest number of votes, there is no object in delay and there is no impropriety in the party being returned, as there is no decision by the Court of Appeal that can alter the apparent result of the election, but, supposing the majority of either candidate is small and that the number of cases in appeal might be quite sufficient to turn the election, the case would stand in a wholly different position. The leader of the Opposition has suggested a way out of the difficulty. The time for asking for recounts might be delayed in all such cases until after the appeals were decided, or, as I suggested in the first instance, these sealed ballots could be sent to the courts in which the appeals are pending, and the result of the count should not be reported to the returning officer until the court had decided.

Mr. BLAKE. I attach more importance than the hon. gentleman seems to do to this question from this point of view. I think it is highly important that there should be as few elections brought on, while yet it is uncertain what the voters list is, as possible. I think we ought to do everything that we can in the way of legislation to minimise the temptation on the part of the party in power to bring on an election at that inconvenient season. a temptation there might be supposing the list, as it stood on the face, were more favorable than it was expected to be after the appeal had been disposed of. It is important to prevent that temptation from being operative by showing that as little gain as possible may result from it. I hope that we are dealing with an entirely exceptional class of cases; I hope, for instance, that such a thing would not be thought of as, in a general election, the Government which had control of the issue of the write, not having regard to the general condition of appeals from the voters' list. I think it would be a very great abuse of power to cause a general election to be had when there was a very considerable number of the voters' lists under appeal pending before the judge, when consequently, in a considerable number of constituencies, it was uncertain who would have the right to vote. But such a thing might happen; and if such a thing did happen, or, if it happened in the case of a bye-election when we know the writ must issue upon the demand of two members, yet still you want to provide for the exceptional cases, and to minimise the inconvenience or possible wrong that may result from it. There are two or three plans which have been suggested; the radical plan would be to postpone the actual return until the decision of the Court of Appeal, and then let the returning officer, with that before him, so attend to the list as that might demand. I cannot conceive of any serious delay, because 1 am quite confident the Court of Appeal would not delay under such circumstances its judgment. I think we may depend upon promptitude being used by the judicial tribunal in a case of that description, when they saw the question of the return and the rights of the people were depending upon it. But if that proposition is not feasible, though I think it feasible, my own suggestion covers the ground and removes any objection on that score. Let everything proceed in its due course, and in that exceptional class of cases enlarge the period in which the right to a recount may be had until the decision of the Court of Appeal itself. Then under these circumstances you give an opportunity, in the least expensive way, of doing that which ought normally to be done before the election, namely, of getting at the majority on each side according to proper voters' lists, and having the return according to that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, that is the great objection; but the point that strikes me most is the inconvenience and uncertainty of the plan. To illustrate my view, I will take the case of the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as an instance. He has been a member of the Government here, and I suppose he hopes to be a member again. Well, suppose, during the course of the Session, there was a change of Government and the members of the Opposition came over here. They have to go to their election; Parliament would be adjourned until they were elected. Well, there is a temptation to put in objections in order to provide against a return. These objections are hung up for a certain time, and there will be, of course, a corresponding delay in the decision of the Court of Appeal. It occurs to me we are threatening every member, having once got his return, with a great uncertainty and great inconvenience, and perhaps cause great ministerial inconvenience by not leaving it as it is now.

Mr. MILLS. You are arguing against your clause altogether.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. MILLS. Yes. The hon. gentleman proposes that certain ballots shall be counted conditionally. Why, if the argument is good for anything, it is good against the clause. The chances are one hundred to one that the decision would not take place within the four or five days allowed for the purpose of a recount, and, unless it did, then the clause would be nugatory, and the hon gentleman's proposition would be good for nothing. If his argument has any value he ought to withdraw his proposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no, because, of course, if the seat was going to be contested, why should the matter hang over? Why should not the matter of review be insisted upon? Why should not the judge in appeal be obliged to go on with the matter if no party is interested?

Mr. BLAKE. My proposal is simply to deal with a recount, and that deals not with the returning officer's action in any shape. Of course, formally a return to the House does not take place, but there is simply a delay until the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Now you put a number of cases. You put the suggestion of a change of Government during the Session, and you put a suggestion of a able number of voters would not arise, except in the event delay in a Minister's election until the recount, and several of an election taking place before the first list under this other improbable contingencies. What we have got to do is to deal with the ordinary case of the matter. Although a formal return is delayed for a very short time by the be excluded; but after the first list has been completed, there suggestion which I make, I maintain that we cannot con- can be no disfranchisement by taking the previous year's template any serious delay by a court of justice under such circumstances. The judgment will be given promptly, the recount will follow promptly upon it, and the result will be ascertained with reasonable despatch.

Mr. DAVIES. If the proposition of the First Minister is accepted, I think the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition ought to be adopted. I want to draw the attention of the First Minister to the proposition itself. I must say that in its entirety it does not commend itself to my mind, and I do not think the members of the committee thoroughly understand it. He proposes in the first place, that those who have succeeded in getting their names upon the revised list, shall have the privilege of voting, even if there is an appeal against the names being there. That part of the proposition is not open to very serious objections. They have a prima facie right to vote, and prima facie they should be allowed to exercise that right. But look at the latter part of the proposition. He proposes that men who have applied to get their names on that list, and which have been ruled out by the revising barrister, shall still by merely making their formal appeal, be allowed to vote at an election and turn the election, and the man who is defeated will have to be put to the expense of contesting it, and of getting those names struck off that ought never to have been there at all. Take any county where 50 men apply to get their names on, and the revising officer says: You have no claim at all. You say they are worthless men, and you have nothing to lose. They appeal, and in the interim, pending the appeal on a point which may be worthless, they put in their votes and turn the election.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole tenor of the discussion on the other side of the House was in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not care from what Province that suggestion came; it does not commend itself to my mind, and I do not accept it.

Mr. BLAKE. The tenor of the discussion yesterday was that the prior year's list in case of appeal should be taken. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) made towards the close of the discussion this proposition, as a suggestion of his own; but the main stress of the discussion was upon the other proposition, a proposition much more in accordance with the views of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was pressed, but not very strongly, that the list of the previous year should be taken. A good many hon, members saw the inconvenience that would arise by excluding a very large number of people, especially wage-earners who cannot be regarded as being so permanently on the list as other parties, they moving about a good deal.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not apprehend at the time that the clause would have the effect that the hon. member for Queen's points out. It will offer very great temptations to fraudulent and improper appeals, which we should avoid as much as possible.

Mr. CASEY. The only inconvenience alluded to yesterday as likely to arise from using the previous year's list was one suggested by the First Minister himself, that if that plan was adopted it might lead to fraudulent appeals for the purpose of having the last list used. The possibility of that has been recognised; but the possibility of inconvenience would be much less under that plan than under the one now suggested. The possibility of disfranchising any consider-Bill was completed, in which case some wage-earners, people having $300 income, and certain classes of tenants, might list. The principle of using the previous year's list when the current year's list is incomplete is already recognised. It is the proper thing to use the previous list when the one for the current year is not complete. The only question is when is it complete? Is it when the revising officer has passed it or when the judge has passed upon it? My contention yesterday was that the list was not a complete one until the judge has corrected the action of the revising officer. The proposition made by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was only an alternative one in case it was decided to use lists while under appeal.

Mr. MILLS. I did not argue the point as to claimants voting, but I suggested it as one of the questions which the hon, gentleman would have to consider in framing the clause. I have roughly sketched out a clause indicating my view, and from it the committee will see my notion as to the best way of accomplishing the object in view. It reads as follows:—

In case of an appeal to a superior court upon the claim of any person to be put upon the voters' list or the right to remain upon such list, such person may vote, but his ballot shall not be counted but shall be sealed up by the deputy returning officer in an envelope, endorsed with the polling division, the election and the number opposite the voter's name upon the poll book, and such ballots shall be forwarded to the court in which such appeal is pending and when the appeal is decided the court shall certify to the returning officer the votes to be added, if any, to the numbers counted for each candidate and the return shall be corrected accordingly, and the court shall also certify the result of the appeal to the revising officer, who shall amend the voters' list so far as may be necessary in accordance with such certificate.

That is what I have in view. If the hon, gentleman were to adopt something like that, he would avoid all expense to the candidates without increasing the expense to the public. If that plan were adopted, it would save a great deal of trouble and get rid of the possibility of fraud in the way spoken of by the hon, member for Queen's.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not agree with my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). The theory on which the First Minister proposes to allow a name on the voters' list to vote in the event of an appeal is that prima facie he has a right to vote, his name being there, and the theory upon which it is urged that a man's name not upon the list, although he appeals to be put on, is that prima facie he has a right to be put on. I agree that a person whose name on the list is appealed against should be allowed to vote in the first instance; and also a man who makes an application to be put on the voters' list, and whose name, if the appeal succeeds, is placed on the voters' list. But the First Minister ought in both cases to guard against fraud in the same way as fraud is guarded against in Ontario. In Ontario you can put in what is called a tendered ballot, but the man putting it in has to pledge his oath as to his qualification, and I think the least we could do, when a man's right to vote has been determined against by the revising officer, is that we should compel him to pledge his oath as to his qualification.

Mr. BOWELL. The tendered ballots are not counted only in cases of contestation.

Mr. CAMERON I know that, but here the hen. gentleman proposes that the votes shall be counted. I think that in such cases we should at least have the guarantee of an oath that the man is acting bond fide.

Mr. BOWELL. If a man tenders his vote under the Ontario law, and his name is not on the roll, he is obliged to take the ordinary oath which states that he is of the required age, that he is a British subject, and that he has the necessary property qualification.

Mr. CAMERON Certainly, and if he takes the oath he is given a tendered ballot, and his vote is not counted except in a scrutiny. Unless you provide for an oath, I am afraid you will find that there will be thousands of people who would appeal against the decision of the Mr. CASEY.

revising officer, simply to put in their votes, and their votes would be counted.

Mr. DAVIES. Even if they took the oath I do not think they should be allowed to vote. I can see a broad distinction between the two classes, one class being those whom the revising officer allows to remain on the list, and who have prima facie the right to vote. But when a man is not allowed on the list at all by the revising officer, although he tenders his oath, he is not a voter at all prima facie, and I think it would be an outrage to count his vote in the first instance. The solution of the whole difficulty seems to me to lie in the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What will the judge do with the ballots?

Mr. DAVIES. They are sent by the deputy returning officer to the Court of Appeal. The court certifies to the returning officer how many are allowed to each candidate, and these are added on, the object of this being that they shall not be counted until the court determine that they have legally a right to vote. To my mind it seems utterly absurd to allow a man to vote—and to count his vote—who has been disallowed in the first instance, and merely appeals against the revising officer.

Mr. CASEY. The more I think of it the more I feel bound to agree with the view that neither those who are appealed against, to be taken off the list, or those who appeal for the purpose of getting on the list, should be actually allowed to vote, and that in both cases they should be allowed to put in tendered ballots, as they can under the Ontario law at present. I do not think the vote of any person whose right to be on the list is still in question should be counted for either candidate, but I think it is quite right that persons whose right to vote is in dispute should put in tendered ballots, which should be counted as soon as the Court of Appeal has settled the question of their right to vote. The Minister of Customs thinks that this would involve a scrutiny under this Bill, as under the Ontario law, but there is this difference: that under the Ontario law no list can be used until all the appeals against it are decided, and there is no means of ascertaining which of the tendered ballots can be used, except on a scrutiny. But in this case the appeal goes on just as if the election did not occur; the validity or invalidity of the vote will be decided as soon as the Court of Appeal has given its judgment, and the returning officer amends his return accordingly.

Mr. FAIRBANK. It seems to me that in this case, as in others, when the lawyers get in, they mix matters up, and the people will have to pay the costs of straightening it out. The object is to have members elected by those who have the right to vote When the voters' list is completed no question arises upon that ground, but we are providing for the contingency of an election before the list is completed. We cannot delay the election, and what are we going to do with those who have not finally been allowed the right to vote? Let them present their tendered vote, which shall not be counted until we know whether it is good or not. If such votes do not amount to enough to affect the election, that would be the last of them; but if they are sufficient to change the result, then they should be counted. As it is now proposed, a number of men are allowed to vote who have not been decided to have that right, it amounts to a contest in every closely contested election, and a man has to go into the contest before he knows whether he is elected or not. But if these votes are placed in the ballot box, in case it is proved they have a right to vote, it will be an entirely different matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see how that will work, because nobody can tell which way these men, who have tendered their votes, but whose votes have not been accepted, will vote, and nobody can tell what effect their votes will have on the election. The difference of opinion is so strong and so radical that I am tempted to go back to my clause. I think that settles the whole thing. The clause as it now stands is simply this: that in the very rare case in which an election shall take place between the time the revising officer has made up his final list and the time the appeal cases are decided, it is very likely that the decision of the revising officer shall be retained. It occurs to me, considering all the difficulties that have been raised by hon, gentlemen opposite, that the simple plan is this: One of two things you must do; either you must declare that no voters' list is complete until the appeals are all decided, or you must adopt the plan proposed in the clause, that the final decision of the revising officer shall be the voters' list for an election that may take place between the time he has made his final revision and the time at which the appeal has been rendered. I think the latter mode is the better, inasmuch as it will not have the effect of excluding a great many new voters, as would be the case if the last year's list was taken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the hon. gentleman consent to provide that in the case of revising officers who are not judges the list should not be used until it had been appealed to the county court judge? I think that would very largely diminish the objections which are entertained to this clause, and it would reduce the number of possible cases to a very small fraction. The objection of my hon. friends is not so much to the county court judge as to depriving them of an appeal from the revising officer who is not a county court judge.

Mr. MILLS. I understood the hon, gentleman to deal with that yesterday. The appeal we are dealing with is the appeal to the Superior Court.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That I asked to be struck out. I thought the hon, gentleman understood that my plan was that in case the revising officer was a judge, there should be no appeal; that, I think, was perfectly understood. The list, as finally made up by the revising officer, who is also a judge, is final for all purposes, and it is only in the few cases where the revising officer would not be a judge that there would be an appeal.

Mr. MILLS. I did not so understand the hon gentleman; neither is that the Bill. It is perfectly clear that this Bill throughout provides for an appeal on questions of law from the county court judge as revising officer, otherwise you could have no uniformity; you might have one law in one county and another law in another county. The Bill provides for an appeal on questions of law from the county court judge to a Superior Court.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; that is struck out all through.

Mr. MILLS. I do not admit that. I am sure no one on this side of the House so understood the hon. gentleman; certainly there was to be an appeal on questions of both law and fact from the revising officer to the county court judge before there was any list, and on questions of law from the county judge to the Superior Court. Otherwise we have been misled—unintentionally, it may be, but certainly misled—as to the position taken by the hon. gentleman. We supposed we were dealing with appeals to the Superior Court judge from the county court judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That never was proposed.

Mr. CASEY. The Bill, as it stands, provides for an appeal from the county court judge on points of law, and when the question of appeals generally came up the hon. gentleman, while he agreed to continue the appeal from the county court judge on points of law only, made the appeal from the barrister, who might be the revising officer, both on points of law and fact; but there was never any hint of his withdrawing the appeal from the decision of the county court judge, who might be the revising officer, which the Bill gives.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I must really despair of coming to any arrangement with hon, gentlemen opposite. The question of appeal was discussed, and hon, gentlemen opposite came to me from the opposite side and stated, if there be an appeal from the revising officer who was not a county judge much of the objection would be removed. It was distinctly understood that in case the revising officer was not a county judge the appeal should be both on matters of fact and law; but in case the revising officer was the county judge, then his decision was final. That is the position I proceeded upon, and upon which the whole discussion proceeded, and I am quite surprised and rather indignant at the attempt to get rid of that.

Mr. MILLS. I do not admit that the hon. gentleman's position is accurate, nor do I admit that that was the representation made by the hon. gentleman, as we all understood him, last evening. He said he had made a proposition that there should be an appeal from the revising officer to the county judge both as to law and fact, and that should be carried out; and he proposed an amendment, and I think the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) crossed the House for the purpose of consulting him as to that amendment, which was wholly distinct from the appeal to the county judge. There is provision for an appeal to the Superior Court on questions of law. Then the appeal on matters of importance is from either the revising officer or the county court judge, as the party may think proper, for the purpose of settling a uniform law for the Dominion. Otherwise one county court judge may interpret the law one way and another judge another way, and there would be no such thing as uniformity at all. If the hon. gentleman means that there should be no appeal from the county court judge all this discussion to-day is irrelevant, and the amendment he proposes is irrelevant.

Mr. WELDON. What I understood the First Minister to mean was that where the revising barrister was a barrister an appeal would be allowed to the county court judge or law and fact, but where he was a county court judge an appeal would be allowed on law to the Superior Court judge. That is important, because questions might arise on law where it would be necessary to have, if possible, a uniform opinion.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not attach the slightest importance to any form of appeal from the revising barrister, be he a county court judge or otherwise, to the Superior Court. When I read the Bill and saw that it offered an appeal on points of law to the Superior Court, I thought that procedure was going to be surrounded with trouble and anxiety and expense, and argued that you should offer to the electorate a remedy of which they could avail themselves. When the simpler plan, an appeal to the ordinary courts, was suggested, it satisfied me on this point. It is useless to offer an appeal that cannot be taken advantage of. If we are satisfied that the county court judge is a proper tribunal to correct the revising officer, surely we must be satisfied that he is a sate person to do directly what we give him an opportunity of doing incorrectly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That was certainly a misunderstanding. In refer heard it mooted or a doubt raised, when I agreed to extend the right of appeal to matters of fact, that in cases where the revising officer was a judge there would be necessity for an appeal. If he is fit to revise the matter, to sit as a Court of Appeal, he is fit to sit as a court in the first instance. It is absurd to have an appeal to the Superior Court, to drag the people, at an enormous expense, to Toronto or Quebec, or wherever the seat of the court may be. That would amount to no appeal, whereas there is a ready protection by having the county court judge either judge altogether ab initio or as judge in appeal. The argument that you want uniformity falls to the ground, because the Superior Court of New Brunswick may decide against the Superior Court in Nova Scotia, and the Superior Court of Quebec may decide against the Superior Court in Toronto. You can have no assurance of uniformity in any way. It is destroying the right of appeal, by making it beyond the power and beyond the purse of most candidates, if they are forced to go to the Superior Courts. However, we have not got to the clause on appeal, and I really think, under the circumstances, I will have to move the 34th clause as it stands.

Mr. CASEY. There will be no difficulty about agreeing on the clause. The right hon gentleman says this proposal has created such a difference of opinion that he proposes to withdraw his amendment. But he need not do that. It is agreed that the object he has in view is a proper one, and there is only a slight difference as to detail. By moving the adoption of the clause as it is he will be getting out of a slight difference of opinion into a very great difference.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In justice to myself, I must repeat what I said on the 28th May. In such cases—that is, where the revising officer is not a judge—there shall be an appeal as to law and to fact.

Mr. ABBOTT. It seems to me that there are some arguments in favor of counting the votes; and I quite agree that we should not abandon the idea of having this amend ment, which seems to be satisfactory to the whole House. Suppose the rule were adopted that the votes should not be counted till the appeal was disposed of, and there were but half a dozen votes to appeal against, while the majority was 200, the return would be delayed uselessly. There is a remedy which is more simple, perhaps, than the remedy proposed in the first instance. It is that proposed by the leader of the Opposition, namely, that the scrutiny of votes should not be exactly a scrutiny, but that the correction of the roll, if correction be needed, should be made on the I understand the right hon, gentleman, the Premier, is disposed to consent to an amendment similar to that which the leader of the Opposition proposed, namely, that there should be a recount, that it should not be necessary to have a contest and cause an expensive petition, and if the decision of the judge will not be received in time for the ordinary recount, then the time fixed by the law should be extended; and that alteration should be made in the election law itself, because there may be some machinery required to carry it out in a proper way. At the same time, I think the object may be served by striking out from this amendment the words which refer to a contest, and declaring that the whole may be corrected on a recount in the usual way in the election law, and if the judge's decision is not rendered in time to correct the roll before the election, the time should be extended. That would be more satisfactory than abstaining from counting the votes until the judge's decision is rendered.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After hearing the remarks of the leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend who has just spoken, I have got the amendment so framed that I hope we shall all agree now:

But the ballot of any person whose name has been included in the certified list of voters, and is the subject of an undecided appeal, shall be numbered by the deputy returning officer, and a corresponding number shall be placed opposite his name on the poll book. And, upon the counting of the ballots, the ballots so numbered shall be, by the deputy returning officer separated, from the ordinary ballots and returned to the proper officer, sealed up, at the same time as other ballots, to await the decision of such appeal. And if, under such decision, the name of any such person shall be struck from the voters' list, the vote given by such person shall be ascertained from his ballot, and shall be struck from the poll upon a recount. And if any person whose name has been excluded from the certified list of voters, and whose exclusion is the subject of an undecided appeal, shall desire to vote the deputy returning officer shall receive his ballot and shall number the same and the name in the poll book, and keep separate such ballots, as hereinbefore provided, and if, upon such appeal, the decision of the revising officer shall be maintained, the vote of such person may be ascertained and struck from the poll upon a recount. And if an appeal respecting the vote of any person placed on the poll book under the provisions hereof be not decided within the delay fixed by the existing election law for recount, such delay shall be extended until six days after the decision of the appeal.

That will provide that there shall be an ordinary recount, and if the judge has not decided in time, then the recount shall be six days after he has given his decision. I think that ought to meet the views of hon, gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIES. I understand this proposition involves the right of the claimant who has been rejected by the revising officer to have his vote counted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; but it is put in a separate ballot, and the judge will decide upon all these cases, and six days after he has decided there will be a recount.

Mr. MULOOK. It is not very different from the system in Prince Edward Island now. In that Province any man can tender his vote, and it has to be received.

Mr. DAVIES. No; it has not be received, unless he swears.

Mr. MULOCK. Swears to what?

Mr. DAVIES. Swears that he has the right to vote.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The man whose name is off the list does not appear to be subject to take the oath.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a franchise Bill and not an election Bill, though it rather infringes on the election law in some respects. There will, no doubt, have to be some machinery adopted in the election law next Session to work this in. I agree with the hon, gentleman that the man who tenders his vote and is not on the list should not be allowed to vote, as a matter of course, unless he takes the oath.

Mr. DAVIES. The anomally which appears to me is that the man who applies to a judge to have his name put on the list, and gives all his evidence and his reasons, and is rejected, and who, therefore, prima facie has no vote, is allowed by this to go in and vote.

Mr. ABBOTT. It is only provisional.

Mr. DAVIES. But it throws upon the candidate the necessity of filing a petition and having a recount to get the vote struck off.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The vote is taken, but as the whole thing has to be surveyed and a recount is a matter of course, there is no final return until that recount has been taken, after the judge has decided for or against the man. I think it is no advantage against either of the candidates when it is understood that the whole thing is hung up till the judge has given his decision.

Mr. DAVIES. Evidently I have not much sympathy on either side of the House, so I shall not press it.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be better, if possible, for the Act to explain itself. If the man whose vote has been rejected is to be required to swear the vote in, the provision could be put in this Bill very simply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It opens another field. You would have to enter into a discussion of the election law. There cannot possibly be any election under this law until after Parliament meets again, so that the election law can be amended.

Mr. CHARLTON. But suppose that point should be then overlooked?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I may trust my hon, friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) not to overlook it.

Mr. MILLS. Under the proposition I suggested it would not be necessary for candidates to demand a recount. The whole thing will be a part of the proceedings on an election, and it seems to me that is the more consistent course to take. If the number of votes in dispute were not sufficient to effect the result, it would simply alter the numbers, and nothing more. If it were sufficient to affect the result of the election, then the returning officer would be called upon to correct the return. I thought I need not provide what should be done with the ballots after the judge had given his decision, but if it were thought necessary to preserve them for any purpose it could be provided that the courts should forward the ballots, after the decision was given, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The adoption of this plan would get rid of the objection of my hon, friend as to allowing those to vote against whom there is a prima facie case. They would not vote, although they deposited their ballots, until the court held that they were entitled to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must disagree with the hon. member for West Elgin, who said the party who claimed the right to vote had not the same right as one whose vote was objected to and whose name was on the previous voters' list. There is no reason in the world why one should have a preference, although he appeared on the previous voters' list.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 28,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have one or two amendments to make to this clause. After the word "revised," in the 40th line, insert "or amended and corrected on appeal." And after the word "revised" in the 41st line, insert the words "and amended or corrected on appeal." And after the word "stead" in the 42nd line And after the word "stead," in the 42nd line, strike out all the words until "those persons," in the 44th line. And after the word "revised," in the 45th line, insert "amended or." That meets the whole thing.

Amendments agreed to.

On section 29,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Last night we inserted fifteen days instead of eight, in the second line. It has been suggested by my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) and there is a great deal in it, that it is quite useless to hang up and keep matters in suspense for fifteen long days, especially when, in such a contingency as I spoke of, it is important to have a return as soon as possible. hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) suggested the insertion of the following words:-

The revising officer shall be bound to furnish the returning officer of each electoral district, within 48 hours after demand by the returning officer therefor, one copy of the list of voters then in force for such district

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 40,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose, after the words "revising officer" to insert the words "or judge."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think it would be exceedingly unwise and dangerous to retain that provision of the clause which provides that the revising officer may dispense with a notice. That is the very foundation of the appeal, and to dispense with it would be much the same as enabling a judge sitting in nisi prius to dispense with a statement of claim or a statement of defence.

the amendment is taken from the English Act.

Mr. CAMERON. I have read the English Act over several times, but I do not recollect that it is the same as this in that respect; but even if it were, I do not think we should adopt such a provision here. I think we should bind these revising officers to the strict letter of the law, and oblige them to take all the proceedings that the law requires. There is also another provision at the end of this clause which I think very objectionable.

Mr. DAVIES. Perhaps we had better settle this first.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, we might strike out the word which provides for dispensing with the notice. As to the latter part of the clause, as this is not a matter of litigation, I think it is well that summary justice should be given, the same as is given in the division courts and other tribunals, when you want to get early decisions and where the strict rules of evidence are not required. needed is that the revising officer should be able to do substantial justice without being confined to the strict rules of evidence.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, these questions which the revising barrister is called upon to settle are very important, and I do not see why he should be in a position to act differently than any other judge. If I recollect aright, the judge in a division court is bound by ordinary legal rules. The only difference is, that having taken legal evidence he can administer either law or equity, or what might be called rude justice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it would be a great mistake to have all the technicalities of a court surrounding him—he would never get through.

Mr. CAMERON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be willing to strike out that portion of the clause dispensing with the strict rules of evidence, but allowing him, on that evidence, to administer justice as he thinks justice demands. It will be giving him too much latitude for safety to allow him to dispense with all forms.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Take the case of a man whose vote is objected to. He produces his deed; the witnesses are in Manitoba or British Columbia, and the other man says: "Prove that deed; I object to it." How is he to prove it? He may say: "I am ready to swear to it." The judge may know his signature, or it may be that the man is in possession; and still, though he produces his title, according to the strict rules of evidence, it would not be allowed.

Mr. CAMERON. That was the case which the right hon. gentleman submitted yesterday, and in which we yielded to him. The hon, gentleman knows perfectly well that you can very easily prove a deed in several different ways. You can prove the man's writing, or you can produce a copy, which would be perfectly good evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Would not the man producing the deed have to prove it by the subscribing witnesses?

Mr. CAMERON. No; he could prove it by the signa-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. CAMERON. But no matter where the witness is, you can prove the signature of the grantor, and that is perfectly good evidence. There is no necessity of calling a witness to prove a deed.

Mr. DAVIES. There is no difficulty about it. A man comes into court and swears: "I am the owner of a piece of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think this portion of land, and this is my deed of that land." That is proof lenough. A witness is not necessary to prove a deed.

Mr. WELDON. Besides that, a deed that is registered, and certified as registered, is evidence in our courts.

Mr. CASEY. The ordinary practice in division courts at present is that a person swears he owns the property; he does not need to produce his deed. His own oath is prima facie evidence of his ownership. Unless some one is prepared to prove that someone else owns the property, there is no possibility of rebutting his testimony, and the thing is proven at once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because the strict rules of evidence are not required.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; the judge sitting in the division court does follow the strict rules of evidence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We want to avoid that.

Mr. CASEY. That is the reason we object to the clause. The rules of evidence are made to secure strict justice. There is no objection to having the strict rules of evidence followed, so long as you allow the proviso my hon. friend has suggested—that the judge may decide, as in the division court, according to law or equity. We want to be bound by strict rules of evidence, but we want substantial justice. Hitherto, in Ontario, whenever a voters' list has been appealed against, the judge has construed the evidence strictly as in any other case that came before him. It is of the utmost importance that a man's vote should be decided on strict evidence, when the ownership of property by no means so sacred to him—a calf or a dog—is decided on those rules. It is not a question of technicalities; it is a question of what should or what should not be admitted in proof. In reality, the rules of evidence are the embodiment of what the best legal minds have considered necessary to get the truth of the case before the judge. With regard to the notices, I do not suppose there would be any objection to allowing the notices to be dispensed with by consent of all parties, as is done, I believe, in other courts. As to forms of procedure, I do not know how far the revising officer should be bound by those, or how much this phrase is supposed to cover. I should be disposed to give him a good deal of latitude in the way of procedure, so long as he stuck strictly to the evidence and did substantial justice on that evidence. But I am quite sure, from the spirit the hon. gentleman has shown in dealing with the other clauses, that it is not his intention to leave him at liberty to admit whatever class of evidence he chooses.

Mr. ABBOTT. I did not understand my hon. friend the Premier to say that he proposes to relax the rules of evidence by this clause. What I did understand, and what I think would be understood, from the clause, by any judge or lawyer having to administer cases in this way, is that those rules, usually regarded as the strict rules of evidence, would not be enforced in such a court. For instance, there is a rule that you shall not ask a leading question, another that you shall confine your question to the point exactly in issue, and a dozen other rules of a similar kind. If these rules are all to be enforced before the revising officer, days might be spent over the discussion whether such a question was relevant or not. We have got rid of that sort of difficulty in Lower Canada, in ordinary matters, by such legislation as this, construing it as I think this must be construed. The judge takes the evidence as it is offered, unless it is clearly irrelevant, and does not allow discussions for hours as to whether a question is a leading question or not. He takes the evidence, without regard to those strict rules, and decides according to justice. I think that is a fair construction of this clause, that in dealing with the matter the judge a lawyer—are fond of adopting, and tries to get at the root its merits, leaving aside all technicalities as to the distinc-Mr. DAVIES.

and marrow of the matter, and renders a decision that does justice to the parties. I think the clause means that. does not relax the taking of the evidence on oath or the force of the evidence taken. It simply relieves the judge from those forms and ceremonies which delay the judge in cases where those strict rules are enforced.

Mr. CASEY. I did not mean that such technicalities as those should be maintained. What I was anxious to attain was simply that the nature of the evidence to be admitted should be of such a kind as is considered good legal evidence in other courts.

Mr. ABBOTT. I think that would be so, under the clause.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, member for Argenteuil says this clause does not relieve the revising officer from the obliga-tion to restrict himself to such evidence. That is a question of legal opinion, but as a layman it does seem to me to relieve him from that obligation, and there are lawyers here who hold the same view. If that clause is not intended to relieve him from that obligation it would be very easy to put that meaning in such words that nobody could misunderstand it. I do not see that there can be any objection to making any such amendment as will make this clause clear. I do not know but that the technicalities the hon. gentleman spoke of might come under the head of forms of procedure. The right hon, gentleman said there would be an appeal, and that we need not be so particular. Now, he has been contending that he never intended to give an appeal from the county court judge, where the latter is the revising officer. So in that case there will be all the more necessity for following the strict rules as to the admissibility of evidence; and even if there were an appeal in all cases, that is no reason why the rule should not be applied so as to limit the necessity for making appeals.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon. member for Argenteuil's interpretation of the clause were correct, and the only interpretation that could be put upon it, I would not object. The hon gentleman is quite correct in saying the revising officer should not be tied down to strict rules of evidence in the cases he has indicated—for instance, with regard to asking leading questions. In law, at the examination in chief, leading questions cannot be put; but the hon, gentleman must recollect that there are other rules beside that. That is not a rule of evidence. It is only the practice, the mode in which evidence is to be given. What I understand is that the revising officer shall not be tied down as to the evidence itself—"He shall not be bound by the strict rules of evidence." That has no relation to what the hon gentleman spoke of. What he spoke of is the mode in which you are to give the evidence, not the evidence itself. Suppose the plaintiff or respondent, instead of giving the best evidence, sees fit to give secondary evidence, the rule is quite clear, that in establishing a proposition you are bound to exhaust the best evidence first; if you do not, you cannot go on with the case at all. As I understand this clause, the plaintiff or respondent is not bound to give the best evidence. A minor, for instance, makes application to be placed on the assessment roll. The question arises. Is he of age? The best evidence that could be given would be that of the father or mother, especially the mother or the register of his birth. Now, instead of giving that evidence you call a neighbor, who says: "I know he is of 21 years of age." That would be the kind of evidence he would be justified in giving under this clause. The revising officer should have no right to take evidence of that kind until he has at first exhausted all means of getting better evidence. We ought not to permit the revising officer to adjudicate on evidence like this on secondary testimony, but shall deal with it summarily, and shall not allow these little on the best testimony that can be submitted. I am desirous quibbles which all lawyers—I may say freely, being myself he should have full power to adjudicate upon every case on tion between equitable and legal rights, but I am not willing he should adjudicate upon my rights, except upon legal or equitable principles—that he should judge it upon evidence that was not the best that could be given.

Mr. MACMASTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite are put-ting a strained interpretation on the clause. The clause provides that the revising officer shall not be bound by the strict rules of evidence, but that he shall determine the case in a summary manner, which, in his judgment, will do justice to all parties. The latter part of the clause imposes on the revising officer the obligation to do justice to all parties. To do that he must hear the evidence properly and decide according to justice. The only reasonable construction that can be put on the words referring to his power to relax the strict rules of evidence is this: Take the case the hon, gentleman put himself. He said it would be improper that secondary evidence should be given, of a man's title to vote, until primary evidence is exhausted. That would be the rule in a court of law, undoubtedly. If we allow the clause to pass the revising officer may say to a farmer, or a mechanic, or a wage-earner, who may be unable to retain a lawyer, and who offers, in the first instance, secondary evidence: I will take your secondary evidence now, and I will see that you have the primary evidence afterwards; but, if not permitted to relax the rule, he might be estopped in the progress of the case, and the applicant would be told: You must give the best evidence at this stage. And the secondary evidence cannot be heard. The voter would be bulldozed by legal technicalities. The result of insisting on adopting the views of hon. gentlemen opposite will be this: We are going to have a serious contestation in this matter, which will be summary; lawyers may be retained, and the poor man, who has a right to vote, and whose right is contested, and who might, by coming before a just judge, have his right to vote decided summarily and speedily, will be compelled to retain a lawyer, because, for sooth, the opposite side may have retained one, who will insist upon the strict rules of procedure being enforced. The rich man will retain his counsel; the poor man, who is unable to retain a counsel, and who knows nothing of the strict rules of evidence, may ask a question which might not be put in a legal way, or at the right time; the opposing counsel objects; the judge will be bound to rule in his favor, and the poor man will be practically crowded out. If this clause is allowed to stand as it is the judge may say to the lawyer: You are perfectly correct, according to the strict rules of evidence, but I am going to allow this voter to ask the questions; he may ask the proper questions later, and I will then settle the whole matter. That will be a fair way of proceeding. That will enable a man who cannot afford to retain a counsel to come into court, feeling confident that, although not armed with the wealth of legal lore, he may put his case before the revising officer in his own way, and get justice. There is another matter. Some objection is made to the retention of the words "form of procedure." In the Province of Quebec I do not think that any cause would be tried if those words were struck out, unless a regular petition was filed contesting the vote and an issue joined and an answer put in.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not object to those words.

Mr. MACMASTER. I think, leaving the clause as it is will greatly facilitate cases coming before the court, and will enable people to come before the revising officer without any fear that their cases will not be disposed of in a common-sense way.

rules of evidence are in opposition to each other. Accord- sary that the judge should know that he may do summary ing to his argument we should remove from the presiding judge of any inferior court the duty of taking legal evidence, and should allow him to take evidence according to the length of his own foot. A great many bugbears have been started about evidence. I was surprised to hear my hon. friends talk about leading questions. According to modern law, nothing is a leading question unless the judge decides it to be so. There is nothing in that whatever. No revising officer, who understood his duty at all, would prevent a leading question being put, unless he saw it was being put for the purpose of misleading the witness, or leading him on to say what he was not willing to say himself. There is no appeal from the majority of most of these judges, and to allow a judge to dispense with those rules of evidence, which are based upon common sense, would be to leave the door open for the committal cf grievous wrongs. Rules of evidence are not what they used to be, and this provision would allow the judge to dispense with primary evidence in all cases, and to allow a witness to say what Jack Smith told Tom Brown, and so on, until we got the story of the three black crows. If you do do not insist upon legal evidence, where there is no appeal, you are simply bound by the fashion, or feeling, or whim, or prejudice, of the judge for the time being; votes may be put on or struck off on what, for the sake of courtesy, might be called evidence, but which would be the morest and the flimsiest hearsay.

Mr. MACMASTER. A judge could do that now.

Mr. DAVIES. No; not if he is bound to hear and determine on the rules of evidence. In that case we would have something like reasonable fair play.

Mr. MACMASTER. The clause only relaxes the strict rules of evidence, not all rules of evidence.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, the strict rules of evidence and the rules of evidence amount to the same thing. The use of the word "strict" does not add to or detract from the construction of the clause. The rules of evidence are plain, are based upon common sense, and are the result of the experience of ages. In modern days they have been simplified, and there are no rules now that would prevent the fairest and the most honest justice being done, even in the case of the most ignorant person.

Mr. MACMASTER. If you have a lawyer engaged in every case.

Mr. MILLS. The words "when he sees fit" are not necessary. We wish to give to the revising officer a certain amount of discretion, but it must be a legal and not an arbitary discretion, and I ask if the hon. gentleman has any objection to strike those words out. The hon. gentleman has consented to strike out the words in reference to dispensing with notice, which are not necessary when you do not require personal notice to be served. The latter part of the clause might be struck out altogether. The words, "he shall not be bound by such strict rules of evidence and forms of procedure," are very objectionable. It may not be necessary that he should be bound by strict forms of procedure, such as those laid down in a court, but when you say he shall not be bound by strict rules of evidence you give to the revising officer any amount of discretion. If the party appears in person and is not conversant with the principles of evidence, and undertakes to submit secondary evidence, the judge has the power to postpone the proceedings, to call his attention to the fact, and to tell him what kind of evidence is required, instead of admitting evidence which, in an ordinary proceeding, would not be evidence at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, in the interest of Mr. DAVIES. I think it would be very unfortunate if the plausibility of my hon. friend prevailed with the comassistance of any kind, and who really, in the majority of cases, have a claim to be put on the roll, I think it is necessariles of evidence are in convention to each other. justice without adherence to the strict rules of evidence. Of course, evidence is evidence, and the revising barrister or the judge know what is evidence, and they will know how far they are to be bound by strict rules of evidence. I propose to add the words "or judge" after the word "officer," in the 17th line. I think we must keep the clause with this

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) I move to strike out the words "strict rules of evidence" and leave the rest of the clause as the hon, gentleman has given it.

Amendment (Mr. Cameron) negatived.

Amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to.

On section 41,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think this clause is not required, and we can well get rid of it.

Mr. MULOCK. The only part that seems to be necessary is that which provides for parties being allowed to appear by deputy. I think they ought to be allowed to appear by agents, solicitors or counsel.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I presume they would have a right to do that, and that portion of the clause might remain.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). How does the hon. gentleman provide for costs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We provide for witnesses' fees. I do not think there ought to be costs.

Mr. MILLS. Then, in case a voter's right to remain on the list was contested, and he would be put to the expense of calling witnesses from long distances, and obliged to appear by council, nothing but the witnesses fees would be taxable?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be all.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 42,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think "subject to the provisio in the next following section" is not necessary. will read the 43rd clause, as proposed to be amemded. The clause, down to the word "him," in the 47th line, remains as it is, and will read hereafter as follows:—

Noting thereon the name of all persons who have been retained on the voters' list, notwithstanding objections, and the names of all persons who have been struck off the voters' list, and of all persons who have appealed to be placed upon the voters' list, and whose application has been refused, and who have respectively appealed from the decision; and the list shall serve and avail according to the provisions of the Act for the election with reference to which it is furnished.

The remainder of the clause remains as it stands.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman has informed us that there is no appeal, except an appeal from the revising officer to the county court judge, and if there is to be no appeal except that particular appeal, there is no coston why the list should not be finally revised and completed. If the county court judge is acting as revising officer the list will be finally completed, but in the case of other revising officers the list might not be an completed. The latter class are those about whose conduct the public will have no confidence; and if there are appeals from those officers to the county court judges it is of the utmost consequence that the list should be completed and finally revised before used in any election. It is in the public interest that the list of the previous year should be used rather than the list on which appeals are had to the county court judge from the revising efficer when they are not complete. The county court judge may not have an opportunity, although he may exercise the greatest diligence, to adjudicate upon the cases before an election is held. I am satisfied that, unless the revising officer, in all cases, shall be a judge, this section is one that will prove exceedingly unsatisfactory to the public. and one that may lead to very serious abuses. It should be amended in the direction of providing that the lists should not be finally settled until questions of appeal from the revising officer to the county court judge are finally disposed of

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Under the law, as the hon. gentleman now lays it down, there is no such thing as an appeal. The hon, gentlemen allows no appeal. If the revising officer is a barrister the judge in the county court revises again. He has original jurisdiction; he possesses precisely the same power as the revising officer himself. He is practically a second revising officer. He is not a judge sitting in appeal; he takes the evidence all over again. He has, moreover, the right to take additional evidence from that which is taken before the revising officer in the first instance. So, in the proper sense there is no appeal. There is what is better than an appeal. The county judge goes to the locality and examines into the rights of the parties all over again, and after hearing all the evidence from both parties, he adjudicates on the case, not by way of appeal, but because he exercises original jurisdiction. If that is so there is no reason why, for all elections that take place after the first one, if the voters' list for the year is not finally completed by the judge the prior list should not be used. The chances are ten thousand to one that the first voters' list will be used at the next general election, which is expected to take place in the early part of 1887. But the hon. gentleman is not in favor of using the previous year's list, because the list will be changed, and names will disappear. It is very difficult to get over this difficulty. I think it can be avoided, by providing that the voter shall take an oath, declaring that the name which appears on the voters' list held the same qualification at the time of voting as at the time of registration. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can work out section 43 without enormous difficulty, and without having the labor and expense and machinery provided by section 26. Of course, there would be an enormous expense incurred by so doing, whereas, if you adopted the proposition of the hon, member for Bothwell, it would put both parties on precisely the same footing, and convenience would be very much better served.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot do that without going back to clause 36.

Mr. CAMERON. That only applies to the first revision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Section 34 applies to the subsequent revisions, and they have been so passed; we cannot go back upon that. Different alternatives were offered to the committee, and the committee deliberately adopted the suggestion which was thrown out by the leader of the Opposition, that it should be done by way of recount, after the final decision of the county judge in appeal. I propose to amend this clause by putting in what was inserted in the previous section: "Noting thereon the names of all persons struck off the voters' list, all persons who have applied to be placed on the voters' list and whose applications have been refused, and who have respectively appealed from his decision."

Mr. MILLS. It is quite true, as the hon. gentleman says, that clauses 34 and 36 would have to be changed in order to adopt this amendment, but the hon. gentleman forgets that at the time his amendment was proposed and discussed we supposed that the appeal spoken of was to the Superior Court. I may say that I went and saw the leader of the Opposition, and his understanding of the matter was precisely the same as that of myself, the hon member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and the hon member for St. John (Mr. Weldon); and I could read what I said on that occasion, First Minister amends the clause, so as to provide that the to show that that was my understanding of it, at all events,

The hon, gentleman will see that it makes all the difference in the world, with regard to this clause, that the appeal is not as we understood it. In the case of appeals to the Superior Court, months might elapse before a decision might be had, and therefore there would be some propriety in saying that the old list would be used, and that you should make these provisions which you have made. But when you propose an appeal from the revising officer to the county judge, which must be completed in a very short time, that list ought to be used, if completed, and if not completed, you can go back to the old list, because that list would not be very old. If you appealed to the Superior Court the old list might be a year and a-half old, but in the old case no such condition of things could exist, because it would only be a question of twenty or thirty days until it was finally disposed of.

Mr. ABBOTT. The hon, gentleman must argue on this point altogether from the practice in the Province of Ontario. I am not able to say what delay there might be, in Ontario, in appealing to a county judge, but in the Province of Quebec, for instance, the appeal must necessarily be to the Superior Court judge—I know of no other to take it—and a Superior Court judge has sometimes three or four counties. I do not think any hon. gentleman would be rash enough to assert that with us, at any rate, a decision could be obtained in twenty or thirty days. I think it is extremely doubtful, in either of the Provinces, that a decision could be relied upon within that time. I may say that I heard the statement of the Premier, and I think there can be no doubt, from his explanation, what kind of appeal he meant, though I agree that my hon. friend misunderstood him, judging by some remarks which he made. Hansard, of 28th May, reporting what the Premier said on that occasion, shows plainly that there could be no misunderstanding as to what he intended. It is said there:

"In such cases it must be that a person other than the judge shall be appointed; but the measure will provide that in such cases, where a revising officer other than the judge is appointed, there shall be an appeal both as to law and fact."

And in the conversations that have taken place across the House, and otherwise, I think it has been understood that there should only be an appeal when the revising officer was not a judge—that there should not be an appeal when the revising officer was a judge. That was my understanding, and I think the understanding of the majority of the members. The clause now before the committee is really only the machinery for carrying into effect sections 26 and 34. These sections provide that a vote shall be taken in a particular way, the votes which are appealed against being retained provisionally, without affecting the return to this House, until there is a recount; and at the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition it was provided that this recount should be suspended antil the question in appeal was arranged. So there could not be any injustice. As to using the previous year's list, I think the consequences would be serious, especially in the case of wage-earners, who are birds of passage, to a large extent. There might be hundreds of those on the last voters' list, of whom there might not be one on the voters' list as revised and corrected by the barrister, and he may have put hundreds of others on that list, not one of whom would be objected to; so that if the hon, gentleman's idea was carried out those workmen whose names were on the previous list, and who had left the country and ceased to have any right to vote, would appear on the list as having the right, while many others would be deprived of the right to vote. I cannot see that there will be any disfranchisement, which hon. gentlemen opposite said would be brought about by this Bill, so great as the disfranchisement might be from using the old voters' lists. That certainly is a great evil that would result from that scheme. There is another evil that would result from the other scheme, of not allowing the vote to be counted as possible. However, we will have them printed.

until the judge had decided the appeal. Suppose only ten or a dozen votes were appealed against, and the election had been carried by a majority of 100, what would be the object of holding back the counting of the votes until the decision of those appeals had been rendered? A man might be kept out of his seat, awaiting a decision of the court, that could have no effect one way or the other. It is said that what the Bill provides for is a very expensive process. It is not expensive; a recount can be obtained at a very small expense, and that is the only process required, to show by the poll books the proper result. All that would be necessary is, that as soon as the polling is over the parties should await the decision of the judge to make the recount, if there is a demand for a recount. Of course, no demand will be made for a recount unless there is a prospect of its altering the result; we must presume that no one will ask for a recount unless he has a reasonable probability of obtaining a right by that recount. In the case of a large majority, with a few votes objected to, I think there would be no demand for a recount. It seems to me that to both of the schemes proposed in opposition to that of the Premier there are strong objections, while to the manner proposed by the Premier I do not see any serious objections at all. I see no other means of arriving at the true result by a simpler means. Section 43 should not be a matter of discussion, as it is nothing more than the machinery to enable sections 26 and 34 to be carried out.

On section 44,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to strike out the words "not less than eight days before the nomination." and substitute, "on demand, within forty eight hours," in the 19th line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK, I think section 44 should come before section 43. Section 44 gives the duty to the returning officer to obtain, at a certain time before the election, from the revising officer, a copy of the list; section 43 provides for the revising officer doing something after he has delivered the list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I have no objection to that.

On section 45,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that that clause shall stand over. In consequence of various discussions on the matter of polls, I am prepared to substitute a clause, which I shall read, in view of 46, 47, 48 and 49.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman going to have those clauses printed? Because it is not easy for hon, gentlemen to understand the full bearing of such important clauses by just hearing them read.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are a simplification of the former clauses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say they are all right.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). They involve very considerable changes, and it will be quite impossible to consider them intelligently at once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They might be adopted provisionally, and then they would be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. MILLS. Have them printed on the Orders of the Day, and we can consider them the first thing on Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are drawn as simply

On section 51.

Mr. CAMERON. There is a question on this clause which is worthy the consideration of the First Minister. I suppose we all desire to get a proper voters' list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON. I think you can get the best voters' list by utilising, as far as possible, the local machinery. In every municipality, at least in Ontario, there is a clerk of the council, who is generally selected for his intelligence and knowledge of the locality, and that official would make the very best to assist the revising barrister to prepare the voters' list. In selecting him as the clerk of the revising barrister the hon. gentleman would be able to avail himself of the knowledge of the local authorities. I do not know what the political leanings of these officials are, but I believe that their selection would result in making a better voters' list than if the revising officer were left to select his own clerk.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am quite of the same opinion. The work will be done efficiently and more thoroughly by the clerk of the municipality than you could hope to have it done by anyone else. It would not be unreasonable to suppose that it would be done more cheaply than if you hired a special person to do it. It is open to no objection, from a political standpoint, because I suppose these officials are divided. They hold their offices for years, and there could not very well be a charge of partisanship against them. For my part, I should look upon the clerk, if he were appointed by the revising barrister, with more dread than upon the revising officer himself. If there was to be any crooked work done I should imagine it would be done in that direction. If we could imagne it possible that any crooked work would be attempted under this Bill it would be likely to be done by the clerk, who is not responsible to the people or even to this Government, but only to the revising barrister. It has been urged, with some force, that a judge or revising barrister could not afford to risk their reputation in doing that which was unfair. But that argument cannot have weight with reference to a clerk, and he may, unfortunately, be subject to political bias to such an extent as to make him perform his work in an unsatisfactory manner. That is an objection that has great weight in my mind, and it might be removed if we were to provide in this Bill that the clerk of the revising officer shall be the clerk of the municipality. I consider that correctness would be gained, fairness would be served and cheapness would be obtained, by such a provision.

Mr. DAWSON. What would be done in case there is no municipality?

Mr. PATERSON. I would provide for that.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). There is one side of this question to which I would like to draw the attention of the committee, as it applies to Ontario-and I presume the same thing may be said of other Provinces, where the municipal clerks are known by other designations. We provide that the assessment roll shall be copied and furnished to the revising officer as the basis upon which these lists are to be made up. It occurs to me that if it were possible to arrange machinery so that the municipal clerk in each of the minor municipalities should be the officials employed under the revising officer for making up these lists, we would have this advantage, that he would be, as the custodian of those rolls already in existence, the officer who would be in charge of them, in whose office they are permanently filed, and who could always give information respecting them. It seems to me that if that officer were so be almost unnecessary to go to the initial expense! Senate.) Sir John A. Macdonald.

of obtaining copies of these assessment rolls. expense would be considerable, as I have found in my municipal experience. Now, when we consider that there are, on an average, five to seven municipalities in each district, and that there are 211 districts, you will see that the copying of those rolls alone must require a very large expenditure. Every time that a revision of a list takes place before the revising barrister or the county judge, if that is gone about with a stranger to these matters as his clerk, it must be done at a disadvantage, without reference to all the other matters in connection with the names upon the assessment roll. The municipal clerk has all that personal knowledge that long experience in handling these rolls gives him. In addition to that, I have never heard any charges made against a township clerk of an attempt to defraud an elector of his right to be placed upon the voters' list. Besides, I do not think that the duties devolving upon a revising barrister's clerk will be sufficient to employ him for even half the time, and if the township clerk did this duty it would come in as a supplement to the ordinary work he does for the municipality, and for a moderate remuneration they would be glad to do it. Then, when the revision of the list is finally made, the familiarity of the clerk with the names upon the roll and the general information his position gives him point to him as in every way the person who ought to be employed as clerk to the revising officer. The duties of a township clerk are, to a large extent, merely clerical, and afford no opportunity for the exercise of political partisanship. In my own riding to day all the township clerks, with the exception of one, are in political sympathy with my opponent. In fact, in the township that has always been solidly Liberal, to which I largely owe my seat in this House, and which has given me a majority of over 250, the clerk of that township, for the last 20 years, has been one of the most pronounced Conservatives in the whole riding. His political antecedents and associations are well known; he makes no attempt to conceal them, and freely exercises his political rights. Although a majority of the council are Liberal, they have faith in his probity and uprightness, and undoubtedly he has always performed his duties in a satisfactory manner. Now, I think this instance shows that the municipal clerks can be fairly trusted to perform impartially the duties of clerk to the revising barrister, and for this and other reasons which I have pointed out, I think we ought to make a provision that they should be so employed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clause had better stand over, for the present.

Committee rose and reported progress.

THE DEATH OF MR. BENSON.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On the occasion of the Orders of the Day being called, it is my painful duty to make the announcement that one of our body has been called to his last home. Mr. Benson, the member for Leeds and Grenville, has been suddenly taken away from us while he was in full health apparently, and acting here with us, energetically performing his duties as a member of Parliament. I think it will be admitted by hon. gentlemen on both sides, that a more estimable person, in style, manner, demeanor, and character, is not to be found among us. Without reference to political feelings, we all must regret his loss; Canada must regret the loss of a man of his standing, education and enterprise in forwarding the industries of the country; we must feel that Canada has lost a worthy son. I cannot say more just now. He was a most particular friend of my own, and I feel that I have suffered a great personal loss. I think Canada has lost a man whom she can ill spare.

Mr. BLAKE. Both sides of the House must concur in the expression of regret and sorrow at the announcement the First Minister has just made. The relations of myself to Mr. Benson were not of the character which he has just described, but I had the honor and pleasure of his assistance, and I am sure all of us, on both sides, feel a sense of personal loss in knowing he is to be no more with us. He was an estimable and respected member of Parliament. He was, I have no doubt, a warm friend to those who had the happiness of being on terms of friendship with him, and to all of us he is one whom we are, indeed, sorry to

TREATMENT OF RIEL IN PRISON.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I draw its attention to a matter which I think it should consider. The following paragraph has appeared in all the newspapers during the past week :-

Regina, N.W.T., 4th.—Riel's life in the jail here is a monotonous one, and admits of no detailed description. He is in good health. He sits in his cellmost of the day with his head bowed, apparently in deep thought. He seems to enjoy his hour's exercise every day, walking up and down, carrying in his right hand the chain weight attached to his

It seems to me to chain a prisoner cannot be justified, except in very rare circumstances indeed. I quite admit there may be circumstances where it may be absolutely necessary to manacle a prisoner; but in this instance, I do not see there is any reason. I do not say the treatment is not justified, but it does not seem to me, from the circumstances we know, justified. I merely call the attention of the Government to it. I am sure the Government will agree with me it would not be justifiable to keep Riel chained or manaeled, or compel him to carry a chain, unless it be absolutely necessary. I hope the Government will make enquiry, and see that the prisoner is not subjected to any more restraint than is necessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My attention was not called to that portion of the paragraph the hon, gentleman has just read. Of course, the prisoner before trial is to be subjected to no greater restraint than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of securing his safe custody. He is now at Regina in custody there, and perhaps, as most of the House know, there is no safe prison there for prisoners charged with or convicted of any offence. The only place at hand is the police station. He is kept there, and, of course, is strictly guarded. I shall at once communicate by telegram to Regina and ascertain the facts; and if there has been any restraint other than mere segregation and being kept in prison, I will ascertain what the reasons are, if there are

FORT MACLEOD RANCHE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. HALL. In the absence of Mr. McCarthy, I beg to move the concurrence of the House in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the Fort McLeod Ranche Telegraph Company. The only amendment of importance is the one changing the time for the completion from one year to two. Under the Bill, the work was to be commenced and completed within one year after July next, but the protraction of the Session has made that impossible, and the Senate has extended the time to two years, a change to which I believe the Government has no objection.

Amendments concurred in.

NORTH-WEST SURVEYS AND CLAIMS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, When were the plans of surveys at Edmonton and Battleford respectively finished? When were they approved? When were they forwarded to the Land Board or Mr. Pearce or the local agent? When were the papers in connection with settlers' claims at Battleford and Edmonton forwarded from head office to the Land Board or Mr. Pearce or the local agent? When was the investigation made? When was the report made? Has it been acted on, and if so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Edmonton was surveyed in 1882; the map thereof was completed in the spring of 1883; approved on the 25th of May, 1883, and the lithographing completed in March, 1884. A copy of that map was sent to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, on the 27th of March, 1884, and by the latter handed to Mr. Pearce. The map of Fort Saskatchewan, a settlement in the neighborhood of Edmonton, was completed in the spring of 1884. It was approved on the 14th of May, 1884; lithographed on the 1st of June, 1884; and copy sent to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands on the 5th of June of the same year. This copy Mr. Pearce obtained. St. Albert, also in the neighborhood of Edmonton, was surveyed in 1882-83. The map was completed about the 1st of January, 1884; was approved on the 2nd of May, 1884; lithographed on the 4th of June, 1884; and a copy forwarded to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands on the following day, but miscarried. Mr. Pearce

Edmonton early in the following August (1884). That portion of Battleford south of the North Saskatchewan River, was surveyed in the summer of 1882. The map was completed in March, 1883, approved in the May following, lithographed in March, 1884, and a copy thereof forwarded to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands on the 27th of March, 1884. This copy was handed to Mr. Pearce and taken with him to Battleford. That portion of Battleford north of the North Saskatchewan, was surveyed in the summer of 1883. The map was completed at Battleford in January, 1884. It was received in Ottawa on the 21st of January, 1884; was approved on the 10th of June, 1884, and lithographed on the 8th of July, 1884. Mr. Pearce, of the Land Board, did not get a copy of this map from the Department, but obtained from the surveyor his working plan and had a tracing made thereof. The papers in connection with settlers' claims at Battleford and Edmonton were forwarded from head office on the 30th of May, 1881, to the Commissioner of Dominion Lards for the use of Mr. Pearce. The investigation of those claims was made in July, August and September, 1884, by Mr. Pearce, of the Land Board. Mr. Pearce made reports in July, August, September and October, 1884, concerning nearly all the claims. Reports, in a few cases, were made subsequent to the above dates, owing to the incomplete nature of the evidence at the time. In possibly a dozen cases sufficient evidence has not yet been filed. The Land Board decided all cases reported on up to the 20th of October, 1884, and the Minister of the Interior, from the 20th October to the 1st of January last. The decisions reached in the cases in the Edmonton agency were communicated to the agent of Dominion lands there, commencing in February, 1885, and since that date as fast as they could be got in shape. The decisions reached regarding claims in the Buttleford agency will be communicated to the local agent there so soon as an agency is established.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Is it proposed to bring down the Order in Council of June, 1883, under which Mr. Russell was charged with certain duties in relation to land claims in North-West Territory?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 1t is.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many pages of those North-West papers, which it is intended to submit to Parliament this Session, have been copied? How many pages remain to be copied? When is it expected that the task of copying will be completed, and the papers submitted?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The number of pages copied, or to be copied, have not been reckoned, but the return will be brought down either to-morrow or next day.

Mr. BLAKF asked, Was an Order in Council passed on the memorand m of the Minister of the Interior, dated 18th October, 1884, on the subject of the settlement of the settlers' claims at Prince Albert, Edmonton and Battleford? What is the date of such Order? Were the papers referred to in the letter of the Department of the Interior to Mr. Walsh, of the 18th October, 1884, forwarded to Mr. Walsh? If so, what date or dates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No Order in Council was passed on the memorandum of the Minister of the Interior dated the 18th of October, 1883, on the subject of the settlement of claims at Prince Albert, Edmonton and Battleford; but the same memorandum was remitted in the tollowing February, and upon it an Order in Council on the subject of the settlement of claims at the places mentioned, was passed. This question, no doubt, refers to the memorandum of the Minister, of the 18th of October, 1883, although 1884 is mentioned. The papers having reference to the claims at Prince Albert were sent to Mr. Pearce on the 12th of December, 1883, and those having reference to Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

telegraphed for another copy, which he received at claims at Edmonton and Battleford, on the 30th of May, Edmonton early in the following August (1884). That 1884.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What was the date of the telegram from Prince Albert of Mr. Pearce to Mr. Burgess, as to the claims of the French half-breeds at St. Laurent brought down? Was that telegram a reply to one from the Department; and if so, will the latter be brought down? What was the date of the letter as to the survey of St. Laurent, from Mr. Hall to Mr. Deville brought down? Was there a reply to that letter? Of what date, and will it be brought down? What was the date of the letter from the Secretary of the Interior to Mr. Pearce on the same subject, brought down? Did the Department communicate with Mr. Pearce as promised therein? At what date? And will the communication be brought down?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The information called for by these questions is embodied in the additional correspondence now being prepared.

Mr. BLAKE asked, At what date were the plans and surveys of St. Laurent settlement received? At what date were they approved? At what date were they forwarded from the Department to the local authorities? Were they forwarded to the Land Board or the local agent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The plans and works of St. Laurent were received on the 15th March, 1879; approved and confirmed, 12th February, 1884; sent to agent, 15th February, 1884; sent to land commissioner, 15th February, 1884.

Mr. BLAKE asked, At what date were the papers at head office relating to the St. Laurent settlers forwarded to the local authorities by head office with a view to investigation? Were they forwarded to the Land Board or to the local agent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There were no papers in the Department bearing upon the claims of the settlers at St. Laurent. The applications of the claimants were made to Mr. Pearce direct. There were memorials upon North-West matters generally, which were of record in the Department, and which had some reference to the subject of claims to land at St. Laurent in common with other places in the Territories. These form part of the returns now in course of preparation.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST—TRIAL OF LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. LISTER) asked, What, if any, steps had been taken for the trial of Louis Riel? If so, what are they? When, and where is the trial to take place? Before what judge is he to be tried? Have counsel for the prosecution been retained? If so, who?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Louis Riel is now in custody at Regina awaiting his trial. That trial will proceed in the ordinary way, and before the ordinary tribunal. Counsel have been retained for the prosecution. They are Mr. Christopher Robinson, Q.C., Mr. Britton Osler, Q.C., Mr. T. Chase Crasgrain of Quebec, and Mr. Scott of Winnipeg. There may, perhaps, be others employed before the trial comes on.

EXTRADITION OF GABRIEL DUMONT.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. LISTER) asked, Have any steps been taken with a view to the extradition of Gabriel Dumont? If so, what has been done towards that end? If no such steps have been taken, is it the intention of the Government to apply for his extradition?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not usual or expedient to warn felous as to what proceedings are going to be taken against them.

CHARLOTTETOWN PUBLIC BUILDING.

Mr. BURPEE (for Mr. Weldon) asked, Has any contract been entered into for the construction of the new Dominion building at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island? If so, who is the contractor? What was the amount of his tender? What is the amount to be paid under the contract? Has the Department of Public Works permitted such contractor to use stone different from that required in the advertisement or specification for tenders?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The contractor is Thomas C. Connor, of Moncton; the amount of contract is $57,397, the amount to be paid on the contract is the amount of the tender; the contract was signed on the 13th April, 1885. The specifications called for "reddish brown sandstone," equal in quality and colour to a sample exhibited at Charlottetown and Ottawa, which was obtained from Cumberland county, N. S. The stone submitted and approved is from John River, N.B., and is quite equal in every respect, if not finer in quality and color, and is therefore in accordance with the specification.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST-REWARDS FOR THE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Whether, if any particular acts of valor on the part of the volunteers be brought under the notice of the Government, it is the intention of the Cabinet to recommend them to the Home Government for the Victoria Cross or some other reward?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is no part of the duty or within the jurisdictiou of the Cabinet, any more than it is within the jurisdiction of the Cabinet in England, to make any such recommendation. It is a military matter, attended to entirely by the military authorities.

SALMON FISHING IN THE HARBOR OF BATHURST.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any rules have been made under which the salmon fishing in the harbor of Bathurst is regulated differently from salmon fishing elsewhere and from the accustomed rights? Whether the present rules prevent proprietors of land on the Harbour of Bathurst from fishing for salmon opposite their own land?

Mr. MoLELAN. From many of the stands in Bathurst harbor interfering with the navigation and the ascent of slamon to the spawning grounds, licenses have been withheld.

RENTAL OF RIVERS AND STREAMS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to bring down and lay before Parliament a return of all correspondence between the Auditor General and the Department of Marine and Fisheries relating to rental of rivers and streams and all correspondence in any way relating to any irregularity or inaccuracy connected with matters of said Department, in accordance with the Order of the House of the 9th March last? If so, when?

Mr. McLELAN. If there be any correspondence between the Auditor General and the Department not already brought down, it will be brought down. There is no correspondence relating to any irregularity in the Department.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to bring down a return, in accordance with the Order of the House of the 9th of March last, showing the dates of deposit in the bank to the credit of the Government of the sums received by the Marine and Fisheries Department on account of rental of rivers and streams; and if so, when? ernment to provide the requisite protection of the fisheries

Mr. McLELAN. The return brought down to the 28th of last month gives all this information in particular. If anything is wanting, and the hon. gentleman will tell me what is omitted, I will supply it.

Mr. McMULLEN. It just requires what I asked for. It does not give dates.

Mr. McLELAN. The return brought down, I think, gives the dates.

Mr. BLAKE. No, it does not. I saw it, and the dates are not there.

NAMES OF PLACES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. TASSE asked, By what authority have the old names of localities in the North-West, names recognised by history and geography, been replaced in many cases by names more or less uncouth and utterly alien to the traditions or to the primitive inhabitants of the country? By what authority have places, most of them along the line of the Pacific Railway, been gifted with the following names: Lorfeden, Nordland, Linkoping, Upsula, Carlstad, Ostersund, Ingolf, Monstrie, Varna, Donnacona, Buckstone, Raith, Hecla, &c.? Is it the intention of the Government to publish a new map and to reinstate the names until recently recognised, and which have been either suppressed or disfigured? Is it the intention of the Government to authorise hereafter only such names as shall have been submitted for its approval, and to adapt the names as far as possible to the localities they represent?

Mr. POPE. The same authority is that usually exercised by men who build railways was the authority that decided in respect to these names. The company have fixed the names of the stations themselves. But in many cases the names of stations such as Swift Current, Medicine Hat, Crowfoot Crossing, and other places, are names that have been known for many years. In the small places, such as here mentioned, of course, I do not know what the names refer to. The attention of the Government had not been called to this matter until my hon. friend put the notice on the paper. I will bring it before the Government, and it will be taken into consideration.

DEPOSITS IN POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the amount of deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks of Canada on May 31st, 1885, subject to payment on demand, and also the amount of deposits subject to notice of withdrawal on the same date?

Mr. CARLING. The amount of deposits on the day mentioned will not be known until the 15th or 16th inst., about a fortnight being necessary to obtain and compile the returns. When they are ready they will be brought down.

REPORT OF NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Has the Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police made his report, as customary, for the year 1884? At what date was it made? At what date did it reach the Minister? Why has it not been presented to Parliament? Is it intended to present it to Parliament this Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report has been received, but the volume has not yet been sent to me. There has been an evident dely in the matter, which I think has been overlooked in the Department. The report is now in galley, and will be laid before the House very soon.

PROTECTION OF THE FISHERIES.

Mr. VAIL asked, Have any steps been taken by the Gov-after the 1st of July next? made with the Imperial Government whereby the assistance and co-operation of Her Majesty's ships of war on the North American station can be relied on?

Mr. McLELAN. This matter is receiving the attention of the Government, and I hope in a few days to be able to submit the fullest information upon the subject.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 46,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In this clause I think it would be well to provide with more particularity as to the time at which the appeal shall be made. If the committee will look at the resolution in amendment it reads thus:

In any case where the revising officer is not also a judge of any court any person or persons who under the foregoing sections shall have made any complaint, objection or application in respect of the list of voters in any polling district, whether such list be the first or any subsequent voters' list, prepared under this Act for such polling district, or any person or persons with reference to whom such complaint, objection or application shall have been made, who shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the revising officer in respect thereof, may give to the said revising officer or his clerk, within seven days after the day of such decision, notice in writing of his intention to appeal from such decision, stating shortly in such notice the decision complained of, and his reason for appealing against it, and shall cause a copy of such decision, stating shortly in such notice the decision complained of, and his reason for appealing against it, and shall cause a copy of such notice to be served upon the party in whose favor such decision was given, either personally or by leaving it at his residence or place of business; and upon producing to the revising officer satisfactory evidence of the service of such notice, he shall forthwith transmit such notice, together with a copy of his own decision, to the judge to be appealed to as hereinafter provided, and shall sign the same as revising officer, and shall deliver to such appellant or his counsel or agent and to the respondent or his counsel or agent if required, a certified copy of such decision. such decision.

The words "within the same delay" shall be inserted—seven days.

Section 47. The judge appealed to shall thereupon appoint a convenient time and place for the hearing of the appeal, which place shall be within the municipality, parish or other local territorial division within which the polling district in which the appeal arises is situate, of which time and place due notice shall be given to the revising officer and to the parties interested, in such manner as the judge shall order. And if, at the time and place so appointed, the appealant does not appear, or appearing withdraws his appeal, the appeal shall be dismissed; but if the appellant appears, and neither the revising officer nor any other party does so, or appearing does not oppose the appeal, the missed; but if the appealant appears, and neither the revising officer nor any other party does so, or appearing does not oppose the appeal, the judge shall maintain the appeal. But if the appeal be opposed by the revising officer or other party (if any) then appearing, the judge shall either immediately, or at such time as he shall then fix for the purpose, and at the same place, proceed to hear and decide upon the said appeal, summarily hearing the parties and receiving such legal evidence as shall be adduced before him, respecting the facts in dispute, but without being bound by any technical rules of procedure; and such decision shall be subject to no further appeal, and if any judgment be rendered in appeal which shall require an alteration in the certified list such judgment shall be forthwith notified, in such manner as the judge shall order to the revising officer. And for the purposes of any such appeal and order to the revising officer. And for the purposes of any such appeal and increspect thereof, the judge shall have all the powers conferred upon the revising officer by section 39 of this Act, with regard to summoning witnesses, obtaining evidence, and punishing the persons summoned before him. And the judge may award costs to or against any party in the case. the case.

I beg to move the adoption of these clauses.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I observe that the appellant is bound in his notice of appeal to give the grounds upon which he proposes to appeal. It strikes me that appeals from the judgments of the revising officer ought to be made as simple as possible. The object is that persons aggrieved by any adjudication of a revising officer may appeal to a judge, where the revising officer is not a judge, without the necessity of employing a lawyer. If the notice compels the appellant to declare that he appeals from a particular decision of the revising officer, without compelling him to Mr. MULOCK. Quite true, but different reasons assign all the reasons therefor, the demands of fair play and there, pertaining to the value of property, and so on. Mr. Vall,

Has any arrangement been justice will be fully met. The hon, gentleman will see that if the appellant is bound to assign reasons for the appeal, he is bound to assign every reason on which he proposes to sustain his appeal before the judge. No object can be gained by compelling a layman, who is perhaps a long distance from the nearest point where he can obtain professional assistance, to set out in his notice the grounds of the appeal. The object of the notice is to show the respondent and the revising officer that an appeal is proposed to be made from the adjudication of the revising officer. Unless the appellant were to secure the services of a solicitor or attorney it would be practically impossible to prepare a notice of an appeal that would hold water. I hope, therefore, the hon. gentleman will omit the words, "and the reasons of appealing against it." In the following line I observe the hon, gentleman only provides two modes for the service of the appeal; either personally, or by leaving it at the residence or business place of the party. Many cases may arise where it would be impossible to serve the notice by either of these methods. Suppose a person lived in the United States for the time being, personal service could not be made. I suggest another mode; that the notice of service be sent by registered letter to the last known post office address of the party. I propose to move in that sense as follows: "Or with his solicitor or agent, or by mailing the same in a registered letter addressed to his last known post office address." In other cases it is provided that notices may be served. Sometimes, as the hon. gentleman is aware, you cannot effect personal service of a writ, and you are obliged to make application to dispense with service. If the hon. gentleman insists upon this mode of ervice, appeals will sometimes be cut off altogether. In the next line it is provided that proof of the service of the notice must be given to the revising officer, and he must be satisfied that notice has been served on the respondent. I am not sure that such is a correct method. It places it in the power of the revising officer to say whether there shall be an appeal or not. Would it not be better that the appellant should satisfy the judge that he has fully complied with the terms of the law? In other cases of appeal the court decides whether it is fully charged with the case. As to the first and second points, I am very strongly of the opinion that some amendment should be made, and that an appellant should not be bound to state the grounds on which he proposes to appeal, that it would be quite sufficient and would meet every emergency if the appellant stated that he proposed to appeal from the decision of the revising officer upon his case. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman should provide for other modes of effecting service than by serving personally or leaving the paper at the place of residence or place of business.

> Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the reasons for appealing, I think that there should be some reason given in the notice, as otherwise you would encourage appeals without reason. It is at any rate a reasonable conclusion that where an appeal against a man's right to vote is made, the party appealing should give some reason for it. In Ontario they state the reasons for appeal, whether the assessment is too high or too low, or that the wrong person is assessed, and so on, and I think we must adhere to that. Of course it would not prevent the judge from taking a patent objection to the vote, of his own mere motion.

> Mr. MULOCK. I think the notice of appeal puts every thing in issue; that is the rule under the Ontario Act today, and the people have got into that form.

> Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, That is not the case under the assessment law, I think.

> Mr. MULOCK. Quite true, but different reasons apply

Mr. MILLS. So far as the appeal from the revising harrister to the county judge is concerned, the hon. gentleman proposes that in all these cases the judge shall have power to take the evidence anew, and therefore it is not necessary to settle the point the same as it would be in an ordinary appeal. It is simply a re-hearing; the judge deals with the case as though the revising officer had not enquired into the matter at all, and under such circumstances. I should think a general notice should be sufficient.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it is important that—speaking on behalf of us all—some protection should be given so that notice of appeal might not be given in a mere fit of temper or disappointment at a ruling. I think there ought to be some reason set out, though I have no objection that there should be a provision added to the clause that it is open to the judge on appeal to hear and decide on other reasons besides those given in the notice.

Mr. DAVIES. I take it that a man might appeal on one ground and yet succeed on another.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. As the notice of appeal is the basis of the right to appeal unless it is complete, the notice of appeal will be lost, and therefore it would be necessary for a man to get a lawyer to put in the reason, as it is an essential part of the notice. My recollection is that under the old Summary Convictions Act we used to have to set out the grounds of appeal, but experience showed that it was injudicious, and I think that clause was repealed.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is very important that some reason should be specified in the notice, because parties may come without knowing what they are expected to prove.

Mr. DAVIES. It will not bind him.

Mr. SPROULE. But it gives him some idea of the nature of the appeal.

Mr. MULOCK. How does the present Act work?

Mr. SPROULE. It very often happens that people are appealed against and come a long distance to the court to find that there is no evidence against them, and that the appeal was a mere matter of form.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Formerly, in the case of appeals, the reasons for appeal had to be set out, but that practice has been abolished in all appeals in our courts. And so in an appeal from the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, all you require to do under our law is to give notice that you propose appealing; your grounds for the appeal are not set out. If that is so in cases in which many difficult and complicated questions arise, it appears to me that there is a great deal stronger reason here, especially as the hon. gentleman desires to make this Bill as economical as possible. As my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) stated, if the hon. gentleman persists in retaining this clause, it will necessarily involve the employment of a lawyer in every case. workingman or a farmer's son be prepared to appeal and assign reasons therefor? He would not know what was meant by reasons. The revising officer raises the issue by his decision; the appellant says, I appeal from your decision. That surely sets out the whole matter before the court. A strong ground is urged by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that here it is really not an appeal at all, but a re-hearing; the judge is to have full power to go into the case de novo as if he were revising officer, and the assigning of reasons for the appeal could serve no purpose except to make the process expensive and complicated for the unfortunate man who finds it necessary to appeal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see that that on sequence will occur at all. The revising officer gives by the Minister of Customs and by the hon. gentleman who his decision, the party is dissatisfied and he appeals. He knows why he is dissatisfied; he knows the reason why he wishes to appeal; and all he has to do is to state that

Mr. CAMERON. Suppose he cannot read or write?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He gets some one to do it for him; he gets any friend. I am quite satisfied that most hon, gentlemen must come to the conclusion that this provision is necessary. As I said before, I have no objection that it should be provided that the judge shall adjudicate upon the appeal for any reasons that may not be assigned in the original notice.

Mr. CAMERON. All the hon. gentleman would require to do in that case would be to say that the party should give one or more of his reasons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At least one reason—we can put it in that way.

Mr. MILLS. If I understand the First Minister rightly, he proposes to leave it discretionary with the judge to say that if the party proposes to proceed upon any other reason than that expressly assigned, he need not investigate the matter, and may throw the whole thing out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I did not say that at all. That is not my intention.

Mr. DAVIES. I suppose the hon, gentleman means by this that there must be a substantial reason for appealing stated in the notice. Suppose, while a man is out of court for a moment, the revising officer strikes his name off. The man wants to appeal; he may give as a reason for being on the list, I own a piece of property; but what reason would he give for appealing against the decision? He must state that the decision is wrong for some reason.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No man would appeal without having some reason.

Mr. BOWELL. Suppose the reason he gives is: I am qualified. Suppose the revising officer says, you are not of age; he says, I am.

Mr. DAVIES. Even a Minister of the Crown can be astray on this matter. No county court judge would receive the appeal.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not suppose it requires anything more than common sense to understand the practice. In my own Province, I have been in the courts repeatedly to look after the voters' list, and I have never employed a lawyer. If a man's name was struck off the list, all I had to do was to appeal to the judge on the ground that he was entitled to vote, giving, as a reason, that he was of age, or owned a piece of property, or some other good reason; and the hon. First Minister proposes that the judge, acting equitably, shall not be confined to one reason. I have never found any difficulty.

Mr. DAVIES. There is a distinction which, perhaps, the hon, gentleman did not see. The reason for appealing must be part of the notice, and without your reason for appealing your whole notice fails.

Mr. SPROULE. If the revising officer struck a man's name off, I take it he would have to give his reason for doing so. If I were looking after a voters' list, and a name was struck off, I would ask: Why are you striking off this name? He would say: He is not the party who owns the property, or he is not of age. I do not suppose the revising officer would be likely to strike a name off without giving his reasons.

has just spoken are not what are known in law as legal reasons. Take the case of an illiterate man who comes before the revising officer and claims the right to vote on some ground or other which he sets out, but he does not produce sufficient evidence, and the revising officer leaves his name off, giving as a reason that the party has not shown that he is qualified. Upon what ground is he to appeal? If he stated the reason truly, it is simply that he did not produce adequate evidence. There may be a lawyer present who tells him that he has good ground to succeed, but he must produce other evidence than that which he produced before the revising officer; is he to be at liberty to produce that evidence before the judge? Clearly, if we are to give the judge the right to hear the case anew, he ought to be at liberty to do so. He is an illiterate man, unacquainted with the law; he does not know what is sufficient legal evidence, and he has failed to produce sufficient legal evidence. The decision of the revising officer may be all right in itself, and yet the party would not have the right to appeal if he is required to assign a reason. Suppose he assigns the reason that the evidence he produced was not held sufficient, the judge may say: But you had no right to succeed on that evidence, and an appeal would not be allowed, although the party might have a good vote and might have been advised to give sufficient evidence to show he had a vote. The First Minister in asking for a reason, is going to place difficulties in the way of the right to appeal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clause provides that the party decided against may, within seven days after that decision, give notice of appeal. Some hon. gentlemen say: Suppose he cannot read or write? Well, he must find some friend who can. That friend will ask him: Why do you appeal? He replies: The revising officer thinks I have not proved my qualification, and he will have to give some reason to support his statement. He has seven days to think over it. A man might be inclined to appeal on the spot, but, on calm second thoughts, if he finds he cannot give a reason, he would be apt to drop it. Then he is in no way, because he has given one reason, to be precluded from assigning other reasons when the case comes before the judge.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the following words be added after "business," in the 12th line:-

Or with his solicitor or agent, or by mailing the same in registered letter addressed to his known post office address.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. People generally have solicitors when they go to have their names put upon the voters' lists, and the solicitor may be retained only to press the claim. It does not follow that his powers are continuous. I will accept that portion of the amendment which states by registered letter, leaving out solicitor or agent.

Mr. DAVIES. The First Minister would do well to accept the whole amendment. The universal practice is to allow service upon the solicitor ad hoc to be service upon the party for whom he is serving

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The solicitor can say I have nothing more to do with it.

Mr. DAVIES. The law would say, if you appear for a man, service upon you is sufficient. It is the universal practice in our courts to make service upon solicitors service upon all parties.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No doubt there is something in what the right honorable gentleman has said, In a transaction like this, a solicitor may be retained simply for the isolated transaction. That is rather a matter for the person who employs the solicitor to decide, but he cannot complain if the opposite party serves the agent he has seen fit to employ. There is perhaps more safety in ser-Mr. MILLS.

attention at once, and he indicates it to his client, whereas in sending it direct through the post office delay may occur. In country places there are not always daily mails. and people do not go to the post office daily, so that a letter might lie a week in the post office and the time expire before the letter was received. The hon. gentleman knows that if you serve a document upon the solicitor and he does not repudiate the service, he is bound by it. If he repudiates the service, the appellant can send the notice through the post office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The result will be, a poor man who happens to employ a lawyer to establish his claim before the revising officer, will be obliged to keep that lawyer when he goes to the court of appeal.

Amendment as amended, agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to strike out certain words, which will make it read thus: "And the revising officer shall forthwith transmit such notice, together with the copy of his own decision, to the judge in appeal," and so on to the end of the clause.

Mr. DAVIES. I think that the revising officer should send something more than his decision, which would be: I strike off John Smith, or, I put on Thomas Brown. He should send his reasons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been contended all along that it should be tried de novo, and that the judge in appeal should have an original as well as an appellate jurisdiction; and in that case there is no ground for him to give his reason.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. Any one who has been engaged in the trial of causes knows how great an assistance it is to a judge in appeal to know the reason for the action of the judge of first instance.

Mr. GEOFFRION. That does not apply here.

Mr. WILSON. While it is perfectly right that there should be every provision for an appeal from the revising officer when he is a barrister of five years' standing, I feel that we are virtually placed in the absolute power of a revising officer who is a judge. Many of the revising officers will be quite as competent and quite as impartial as a judge of a county. Every voter ought to have the opportunity, if he feels aggrieved, to appeal to a higher court. It was originally intended that we should be permitted to appeal in a matter of law, and I think that was quite correct. If we had that right, the dread of an appeal would have a wholesome effect upon the county judge who was trying the question of appeal. If you do not sllow this appeal you will find a judge in one county ruling in one direction, and a judge in another county ruling in an opposite direction. Now, why the First Minister should wish to make that county judge the final resort, I cannot understand. The county judge, when is revising barrister, first makes up the voters' list, then he presides at the primary revision, and still again at the final revision. Now, if you take an appeal from the primary revision to the final revision you appeal to the same person; and do you suppose that the revising barrister is going to change his mind from the time he made his list until the final revision? You virtually do away with this revision altogether, so far as the county judge is concerned, if you do not allow any appeal from him. If the First Minister desires to make his Act perfect, he will grant an appeal from the county judge when he is revising barrister think the First Minister ought to grant an appeal on matters of law, if nothing more, if he still persists in refusing an appeal on matters of fact, so that there may be a previce on a solicitor than in a registered letter. It comes to his cedent to govern revising barristers when they are county judges. I say this Bill will not satisfy the general public unless you allow an appeal from the county judge. It may be thought that I am speaking from a prejudiced point of view, in view of the county judge in my own locality. Be that as it may, I think I have shown sufficient reasons why we ought not to confine the final appeal to the county judge when he is revising barrister. I would just as soon have any lawyer of five years' standing to be the revising barrister, as to have a county judge. I believe they would act with equal impartiality. Does the First Minister pretend to tell me that a man who has always acted with his party, as soon as he happens to be appointed county judge, is going to lay as ide all his party feelings? It is unreasonable, it is unnatural; you need not expect it. The judges are but human, and they will still be inclined to give preference to their own political party. We have heard of unjust judges, and as soon as this Bill becomes law we will have an opportunity of witnessing unjust decisions, and I appeal to the First Minister to know whether it is reasonable and fair to the general public to prevent them appealing from the unjust decisions that are very likely to be given.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought this matter had been fully threshed out on Saturday. However, I can leave the hon. gentleman in the hands of our mutual friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) on this point. The hon. gentleman says the judges are human. Well, that is just what I want them to be. I think that my hon. friend is afraid that the judge in his county will be inhuman. But we will make a compromise. If the hon. gentleman will get the consent of his party, we will appoint another revising officer for his county, and not Judge Hughes. Will that suit the hon. gentleman?

Mr. WILSON. The hon, gentleman must understand that it does not only affect the county of Elgin; I speak for all the counties throughout the Province. I say that every man has an inherent right, if he is dissatisfied with the first revision, if he is dissatisfied with the opinion of one judge, to appeal to some other judge. The hon, gentleman knows that as well as I do. I will not refer to my hon, friend from North York (Mr. Mulock); he has a right to speak for himself. I am speaking for myself, and I say it is only right and fair, whether the First Minister may appoint some other man in my county or not as revising barrister, that he should allow an appeal from his decision. The hon, gentleman may appoint the county judge in my county, if he likes. He can do his worst. He can visit me there again if he likes, as well as he did in the last election; he can gerrymander the constituency once more.

Mr. CHARLTON. The radical defects of this Bill, of course, can only be remedied by dropping it; but if we are to have a Bill at all, and, as the First Minister has shown a considerable disposition the last day or two to make it as fair as we can reasonably expect, it seems to me he will be required to go a step farther in that direction. It strikes me the appeal made by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) is a reasonable appeal. In case the revising barrister who is appointed is not a judge, there is an appeal from his decision—an appeal from the preliminary revision of the roll; and I think the request that there should be an appeal from the decision of the county judge, is also a reasonable one. There are many other cases where the public interest would not be served, and it will appear a little invidious to say that in one case there shall be an appeal from the revising officer's decision and in another case there shall not be an appeal. Before this question is finally decided, the hon, First Minister had better take all the facts bearing on this matter into consid-I believe the Bill will look better and will be a better Bill if there is an appeal from the revising officer, even when he happens to be a county judge.

On section 47,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I incorporate in this clause the suggestion of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) with respect to notice of service.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand that, as a matter of course, the county judge will hold his court in each locality, and that it will not be necessary for an appellant to travel to the county town, perhaps a distance of 50 miles, to satisfy the judge with respect to matters connected with the appeal.

Mr. ABBOTT. Suppose there was only one appeal, the judge went to the locality and witnesses appeared, and it then turned out that there never had been any notice of appeal given, the judge would have gone to all the trouble and expense without achieving any result. I think the original plan is preferable, that proof of service be made with the revising officer. Then the revising officer will return the notice to the judge, after satisfying himself that there was a notice given—and that is all he has to satisfy himself about—and the judge not only fixes a day for the trial but sends notice to both parties, and consequently both parties would be there with their witnesses.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The hon, gentleman evidently does not understand our practice in Ontario or he would not have submitted his objection. Precisely the same difficulty which has been suggested by the hon, gentleman might be urged in regard to every court held in outlying districts. The judge has to attend there at a certain time. There may be only one case, and there may be some flaw in respect to the procedure, and so it cannot be heard. That does not, however, prevent the judge from attending. There is no hardship with respect to witnesses. The judge will have power to allow the parties the costs so incurred.

Mr. ABBOTT. Only on deciding the appeal.

Mr. CAMERON. The balance of convenience is altogether against the proposition of the First Minister. Every appellant would be compelled to travel to the county town, where the judge lives, for the purpose of satisfying him that the appeal had been properly served, and every step taken to make the appeal effective. Let the judge fix his circuit, as he does now, and dispose of the cases in the locality. In Ontario there will be no difficulty, because in nine cases out of ten the division court work does not occupy more than a quarter of a day, and the judge can fix that day or the following day for hearing complaints under this statute. To compel men to travel for no purpose, even to the county town where the judge lives, for the purpose of proving that notice has been given, and to make a second journey, is to cause two sets of costs unnecessarily.

Mr. ABBOTT. Those are excellent arguments for the adoption of the amendment as it stood. Under it there would be no occasion to go to the county town, for the proof of the notice would be settled by the revising officer. In Quebec, if the trial were before a Superior Court judge, very great difficulty would arise. In many cases he would have to go to hear one appeal, for in Quebec there is often not more than one appeal on the voters' lists in a dozen municipalities, and yet he might find that the notice given was insufficient. It would be very much more simple if the revising officer were to receive proof of notice, and if he found there was reasonable proof he would transmit the notice to the judge, who would name a day and place for the hearing. In the interests of the public, this plan is desirable instead of that suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not agree with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). To satisfy the revising officer would give just as much trouble as to satisfy the county judge. I suggest that the amendment proposed by the First Minister be introduced at the commencement of line 28. It would be unnecessary to take up the time of the court in showing that there was a service. Another part deals with the appellant making default, and my experience under the Voters' List Act in Ontario is to this effect: that where these notices of appeal had been given the appeals have been pressed. I am quite satisfied that there has been no abuse of the system in that respect, and I think it would be premature to assume that there would be abuses here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, I will accept your amendment.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am not quite sure if the clause covers the whole ground yet, or whether it applies simply to the class of cases mentioned after the word "but" which begins the sentence. Of course it was intended to apply to the service of all notices, but I doubt if this covers it.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the words: "The judge shall maintain the appeal." Suppose the revising officer does not oppose the appeal, and no other person appears to oppose it, there ought to be primá facie evidence of the right of the appellant to succeed. Yet, according to this provision, by the mere fact of appealing, he would be entitled to have his name put on the voters' list without giving evidence that he was a voter, the judge has no discretion in the matter, and would have to allow his appeal. That is surely not the intention.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the party does not appear, I think he is quite satisfied the prima facie evidence cannot be sustained.

Mr. MILLS. The party has his appeal sustained not on any evidence he produces, but as a matter of course, simply because nobody appears to oppose him. He ought even in appeal to produce sufficient evidence to show prima facie that he has a right to go on the voters' list.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLS. Then it amounts to this: that if a revising officer chooses he may say to 20 men: I will not put your names on this list, but you may appeal; and because he fails to appear against them before the county judge, all of their names go on the voters' list. This facilitates fraud, and is wholly contrary to the whole tenor of the Bill. You say by this Bill that the whole case before the judge is to be heard anew, yet you leave the judge no discretion, such as the revising officer has, to enquire into the right of the parties to go on the list; but because the revising officer does not appear against them—and they may be his political friends—they go on as a matter of course. It appears to me that the proposition is monstrous.

Mr. LISTER. Evidence should be given of a person's right to go on the list; yet there is nothing in the Bill to compel the revising officer to oppose the appeals from his decision. Upon simply appealing, a party has a right to go before the judge, and without any evidence establishing a prima facie case, he is entitled to ask the judge to put his name on the list, and the judge cannot refuse. Unless the First Minister makes it the duty of the revising officer to oppose the appeal, either by notice or in some other way, which will require the person appealing to give some evidence of his right to be placed on the list, surely it is no hardship to say that the person himself shall be sworn, in order to show that he has at least a colorable right. Either do that, or make it compulsory on the revising officer to appear and oppose the appeal. If the First Minister considers the matter for a moment, he will see that a person without being entitled to a vote might get on the roll in a very simple way. If after appealing he appears before the jadge and asks to be placed on the list, the judge must place him there. I think that is not the intention of the Act.

Mr. MULOCK.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course there is no obligation on the revising officer to appear, and perhaps he may not be expected to appear; but the clause says, "if neither the revising officer nor any other party appears."

Mr. LISTER. Any other party may not receive the notice. If you say any other elector, that might get over the difficulty.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think any person should go on the list unless he has prima facte evidence to show his right to go on. If he appeals, he ought to be required to produce evidence to satisfy the judge, no matter whether any party appears against him or not. Otherwise, there might be connivance between the revising officer and certain persons not entitled to go on the list.

Mr. LISTER. In the division court, unless the law expressly provides that where the defendant does not appear a judgment shall be entered by default, the court requires the plaintiff to sustain his claim by some prima facie evidence of his right to recover. This is more than a matter between individuals, it is one in which every person in the electorate riding is interested, and it is reasonable that in such a case evidence should be given. All a person would have to do would be to say to the judge: I ask to be sworn, I own such a lot. It is very simple and will prevent frauds being committed. As it is now, it is quite possible frauds may be committed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To meet the views of hon. members, I propose the following amendment:—

If the appellant appears and neither the revising officer nor any other party has done so, or, on appearing, has not disposed of the appeal, the judge shall maintain the appeal, except in the case of an appeal by a person struck off the list or whose name the revising officer refuses to place thereon, in which cases the judge shall require satisfactory evidence as the right of the appellant to be placed on the voters' list.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The First Minister has adopted my suggestion of the other day so far as to provide that, in this case, the judge shall be bound by the rules of evidence and shall accept only strict legal evidence. I think, in order to make the Bill consistent, he should go back and make the same provisions in regard to the revising officer. Otherwise, the revising officer may decide correctly upon the evidence before him, and the judge may reverse his decision with equal justice upon the evidence before him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 40th clause has been adopted in committee. We will not go back to it now.

Mr. CAMERON. There is no provision that the revising officer shall make the necessary amendment in the roll after the decision of the judge in appeal.

Mr. ABBOTT. The 43rd clause covers that.

Mr. CAMERON. Perhaps it does, but it is not very clear.

Mr. ABBOTT. The substitution of the word "any" for the word "the" would make it clear.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, probably it would.

Amendment to section 43 agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. It is not clear in this present clause, what costs are to be awarded? If the judge is to have the power to award costs, the scale ought to be fixed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been already decided that the only costs shall be the witnesses' fees.

Mr. MULOCK. There ought to be some provision to prevent a case being decided by default, in the absence of the parties concerned, and I would move the following amendment:—

Any elector may appear at any sitting of the revising officer or of the judge in appeal in support of or in opposition to any claim, objection, application or question arising before such revising officer or judge.

It prevents ex parte applications being disposed of. number of persons might apply to be put on, and the application would be simply between them and the county court judge; there would be no one contesting their claim, and the application would wholly be ex parte. In this case each of the great political parties will appoint a representative, and he will prevent any frauds being perpetrated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You had better put it at the end of the clause: "provided always," etc.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would suggest that the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) should add "any person" instead of "any elector." This is the system which has been adopted in the Province of Quebec. Formerly, in the election law of 1875, we had the same enactment as the amendment proposes. This was altered, and the right of appeal was given to any person. We found in many cases there was a good deal of difficulty in inducing an elector to come forward. He was afraid of being saddled with the costs, or of having some trouble in contesting the lists. party who took the trouble to have the corrections made in the election lists, found great difficulty in obtaining the name of an elector to contest the list. The result was that name of an elector to contest the list. the Legislature of Quebec amended the law, and I think the hon, member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) originated the amendment. I do not know how it is in other Provinces. but in the Province of Quebec farmers are generally very much afraid of lawyers and of having to go to court.

Mr. MILLS. I think if the hon, gentleman looks at his Bill he will see that there is no provision for costs in the appeal before the county judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The witnesses' fees.

Mr. MILLS. Parties who are subposned as witnesses, of course, must be paid before they are called upon to obey the summons, and the costs may be awarded against the other party, but there is no provision made for meeting it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would move the following amendment:-

The judge in appeal may award costs to or against any party in the case, which costs shall only be witnesses' fees and the expense of summoning such witnesses, and such costs may be levied on the order of a judge by distrees, as under a warrant of conviction, under statute 32 and 33 Victoria, chap. 31.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to the phrase in the amended clause, "and such decision shall be subject to no further appeal." That seems to me totally unnecessary, and it may give rise to trouble. An appeal is a pure creature of a statute; if you do not give an appeal, it does not exist; so that this language is surplusage. If the intention is to take away the common law jurisdiction of the Superior Courts, it must be expressed in other language.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that may perhaps be necessary, in consequence of some independent jurisdiction of the Superior Court by certiorari or mandamus. It has to be provided that there shall be no further appeal.

Mr. DAVIES. It does not take away the right of the courts above to interfere by prohibition or mandamus. If you wish to take away that right, you must say: "and such decision shall be final."

what my hon. friend says; but I hope the hon. First Minister is not going to deprive the courts of the right to correct any wrongs that may be committed, by issuing a writ of certional fraction of fact only, or upon the admissibility or effect of any evidence or rari or mandamus, or a prohibition, as the case may require. I propose moving a proviso to this section, providing for an appeal on questions of law. I do not think that subject has been threshed out yet; and I think it is a most important point. The hon. gentleman, in his original Bill, proposed that there should be an appeal from the revising officer on questions of law, and on questions of law only. Subsequently he assented to the proposition, which was made on this side of the House, that there should be an appeal from the revising officer, where he was not a county court judge, on questions of fact also; and he stated, as I understood him, that he contemplated no further appeal. I think that is hardly fair. I believe that on naked questions of law there ought to be an appeal to the highest court in the Province in which that appeal arises. The hon, gentleman must remember that this is the first time we have had such a Bill as this, and interpretations upon some of the terms used in the Bill will arise for the first time. For instance, according to his definition, the word "freeholder" means the owner of an estate in freehold, in free and common socage, while, as was argued very fully, there are estates in Canada hold under a different tenure. Questions of the first consequence will arise in the Provinces in connection with the meaning of the word "landholder," as defined in the interpretation clause of this Bill, and it is of great importance that we should have uniformity of decision on these points. We cannot be certain of uniformity of decision throughout the Dominion unless there is an appeal to the Supreme Court; and for my part I prefer doing without the uniformity to incurring the enormous expense of an appeal to the Supreme Court. But as the hon, gentleman proposes to pass the Bill, there will be no uniformity in any Province; each of the 30 or 40 judges in the Province of Ontario may take a different view of the law. We ought to have uniformity in the Provinces at least. The appeal from the revising officer to the county court judge will, in my judgment, dispose of 999 cases out of 1,000-at all events, a very large percentage; both the appellant and the respondent will be perfectly satisfied with the adjudication of the county judge on questions of both law and fact. But, on the other hand, legal questions may arise in some of the Provinces affecting a large class of the electorate, and it may become the interest of either political party to obtain a decision of the very highest court in the Province thereupon. In England, where the revising officer is appointed by the judges with large powers vested in him, the Legislature evidently did not think it wise or judicious in the public interest that there should be no appeal from his adjudication, and they therefore allowed an appeal from him upon naked questions of law; and that appeal is looked upon there as of the first possible consequence. Bretherton, in his work on Voters, says:

"The right to appeal on points of law from the decision of the revising barrister to the court of common pleas is conferred by 6 Victoria, chap. 18, sec. 42. It is one of great importance to the claimant, the objector, or the party whose name has been expunged from the list, enabling any of them, should they feel aggrieved or dissatisfied with the decision of the barrister on any point of law, to have that decision reconsidered by the highest legal authority."

There the revising officers are lawyers, perhaps not of the first rank, but of some professional standing. They get an allowance of 200 gunieas a year for the discharge of these duties, and even with lawyers of the class appointed by judges there, the Legislature thought it proper that an elector should not be bound by their decisions, but that there should, on questions of law, be an appeal from the adjudication of the revising barrister to a higher court. Bretherton further says:

The appeal is only upon the naked legal proposition that may arise before the revising barrister, from his judgment to that of a higher court. The whole tendency of modern legislation upon the subject of appeal is that the adjudication of lower courts should not be conclusive and final. There was a time, not very long ago, when the adjudication in our division courts was conclusive and final, but the Legislature saw fit in certain cases to provide that a litigant in a division court should not be absolutely bound by its decision. So in the adjudication by a magistrate of cases of summary adjudication, the Legislature always thought there should be an appeal from his decision to the court of quarter sessions. So from the judge sitting at nisi prius, there is an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and thence to the Court of Appeal—the Supreme Court and the Privy Council. The whole tendency of modern legislation is that a litigant shall not be bound by the adjudication of a judge of an inferior court or even of a judge of a higher court, but that he shall have his resort to the Supreme Court of the realm. Rights of the first possible consequence are to be investigated by the county judge, and I say that those rights should not be pronounced upon absolutely by either the revising officer or the county court judge, but that there should be an appeal. If men see fit to have their rights investigated, they should have an opportunity of having them investigated before the higher courts in the Province. While I have every faith in the honesty and integrity and ability of our judges to administer the law correctly, I say there is a great safeguard for the public, when a judge of the court below knows, as a matter of fact, that his judgment is a subject for revision. We know that judges are still men subject to all the frailties our common humanity is subject to. I do not say that our judges, when upon the bench, are influenced by political leanings. I trust that we can have this assurance at all events, that when our judges, those who are even taken from the ranks of the profession who have been actively engaged in political struggles, are placed upon the bench, they cease to be politicians. This is the general and perhaps the universal rule. That is the case, in so far as our common humanity will enable them so to act, but if they are human and subject to all the frailties of common humanity, they may be somewhat careless, somewhat indifferent, and they are more apt to be so when they know their decisions are not subject to appeal to a higher court. If you allow the appeal to the very highest court of the realm, from the adjudication of an inferior court, you may rely that the judgments of the latter will be more carefully, more deliberately prepared than if the judge were aware there was no appeal. When he has the judge were aware there was no appeal. nothing to check him, nothing to restrain him, there is nothing to protect the public either against careless or in-different judgments. Apart altogether from mere political proclivities or leanings, if judges are supposed to have any, it is of the first possible consequence to the people that there should be an appeal from the decision of the judges of the lower courts. know that the judge of a county court is a judge of an inferior court; we know that the revising officer will be the judge of a still more inferior court, because there is to be an appeal from him to the county court judge. Therefore, we ought to have an appeal from the revising officer to the court of common pleas, as we have in England. The power of appeal is a check and restraint, and I trust the Government will insist upon its being given. While I go that far, I still believe there will be very few appeals from the decis ion of the county court judge, but the fact that he knows this is an appeal, the fact that the revising officer knows that there is an appeal, will operate as a wholesome restraint upon each in the careful preparation of his decisions. With these views, I would beg to move the following of the lawyers whom he has so long supported—Mr. Cameron (Huron).

amendment, almost in the identical words of the hon. gentleman's original proposition:

That any person or persons who, under the foregoing sections, shall have made complaint, according to the practice therein provided for, in respect of the list of voters in any polling district, with respect to the final revision thereof, whether such list be the first or any subsequent voters' list for the polling district prepared under this Act, or any person or persons with reference to whom such complaint was made, who shall be dissatisfied with the decision on any point of law of the revising officer or the judge in appeal in respect of such complaint, may give to the revising officer or the judge in appeal, within seven days after such decision, notice in writing of his desire to appeal to a superior court from such decision, stating shortly in such notice the decision complained of and his reasons for appealing against it; and if the revising officer, as soon as he conveniently can do so, state, in the form of a special case, the facts established according to his opinion by the evidence, and necessary to be laid before the court above in in the form of a special case, the facts established according to his opinion by the evidence, and necessary to be laid before the court above in order to determine the said point of law, also his own decision on the same, as nearly as may be according to the form and practice provided for the stating and hearing of a special case in the court intended to be appealed to, and he shall then sign the same as revising officer, and shall require the appellant, or his counsel or agent, after reading the same to him, to sign a declaration at the end of such special case in the words, "I appeal from the above decision," after which the revising officer shall endorse the said case with the names of the parties appellant or respondent of there he a respondent or party desiring to maintain the decision. dent, if there be a respondent or party desiring to maintain the decision appealed from, and the number of the polling district, and the name of the electoral district thereby affected, and shall deliver to such appellant, or his counsel or agent, a certified copy of such case, and, also, if required, to the respondent or his counsel or agent.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it would be a great pity to spoil the Bill by allowing such an amendment to pass. The result would be to throw litigation into the hands of those best able to afford it, while the poor man would be unable to carry it on from court to court. There is no force in the hon. gentleman's statement that there would be very few appeals. The whole history of litigation is an argument to the contrary off et. There is scarcely a lawsuit that is not carried from court to court as long as the lawyers can find a man able to furnish the money, and many people forego their rights in equity because there is such an opportunity to carry the lawsuit on. One of the great evils of litigation is the number of openings for appeals. This is throwing it more and more into the hands of the rich, and defrauding the poor man of his rights. In this case it is not money which is involved, but only a vote, and every man wants the same opportunity of putting it on. There should be no opportunity given, where political feeling ran high, for the wealthy to carry on litigation and deprive of their rights those who are as much entitled to them as they are, but have not as much money to expend in defending them. If there is no appeal, the matter will be kept in the hands of the people and out of the hands of the lawyers, and I think the country will be far from endorsing the proposal to have another court of appeal in this matter.

Mr. MILLS. It is very extraordinary that the hon. gentleman did not express such opinions at an earlier period, because he is taking exception to a provision in the Bill as it originally was introduced, and as it was passed at the second reading.

Mr. SPROULE. We did not reach that clause of the Bill. I have expressed my opinion privately in reference to it, and, if it had not been taken out of the Bill, I would have expressed my opinion as I have now.

Mr. MILLS. On the second reading, we were discussing the whole Bill, we were discussing the principles of the Bill, and, if the hon. gentleman will look in Hansard, he will not find any qualification expressed of the support which he gave to the measure. He looks upon the lawyers as a very slippery and unscrupulous lot. It is strange he should have given such earnest support to the hon. gentleman who leads the Government. It is strange that he should have so little confidence in the honesty and fairness

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say anything about their being unscrupulous. I spoke as to their disposition to litigate.

Mr. MILLS. He said it would give an opportunity to the lawyers to pick the electors and that, as long as an elector had any money left, the lawyers would lead him on to these courts. I think this is a necessary provision. I was under the impression until Saturday that the hon. gentleman was going to provide, as a matter of course, for an appeal of this sort to the Superior Court, I did not suppose, when he provided for an appeal from the revising barrister to the county judge, that he intended that to be the only appeal. In fact, my impression was that it ought not to be regarded as an appeal at all, but that it was simply giving to any elector in any constituency where a revising barrister was not a county judge the opportunity of saying:
I will not abide by your decision, but I prefer to have my right investigated by the county judge rather than by the revising barrister. It seems to me that it was not the intention of the First Minister to treat it as a matter of appeal but rather as a part of the original proceedings, as an alternative offered to the voter to go before the county judge to establish his right, instead of leaving it to be disposed of by the revising officer. In addition to that, I understood it was intended on all questions of law to give to the parties who were not satisfied with the interpretation of the county judge the right to appeal to a higher tribunal. I do not suppose that there would be many appeals, but I believe it would be of immense advantage to the electors to feel that, if the county judge gives a decision which they think contrary to law, they will have the opportunity of taking the case before a higher court, where judges of greater ability and more eminence administer justice. There is also this important consideration that, as long as a county judge knows that it is possible to make an appeal from his decision to another tribunal by which that decision may be reversed, he is likely to exercise far more care and give to the question at issue more attention Then supposing he expresses an opinion. one judge interprets the law in one way and another interprets it in another way, there ought to be an appeal to some tribunal which will give the same construction to the law all over the Province at least, and I think there should be a provision, where the higher courts construe the law differently, for taking it at public expense before the Supreme Court, in order to make a uniform law for the whole Dominion. I have looked over the 30th section, for instance, and I cannot say how a judge will construe it, and when I ask the hon. gentleman how he understood it, it seemed to me that he did not hold a uniform opinion during the time he was speaking. One revising officer may honestly construe the law in one way and another in another way. In such a question I think the law ought to be unifo. mly interpreted, and the only way to do this is to give an appeal to a superior court. I am sure that their construction of the law and the care and deliberation which they would give to the case will be very different when such power exists than if no such power exists.

Mr. WILSON. I think my hon. friend from Fast Grey (Mr. Sproule) was not very consistent in his course on the question of appeals. He ought to have considered that the Bill, as we find it this afterneon, allows an appeal from the revising barrister.

Mr. SPROULE. It is to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, not ours.

Mr. WILSON. If it were to meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, it was his duty, if he was opposed to the principle of appeals, to have said so and to have opposed it. He sat very quitely the whole afternoon and allowed a provision for appeal to be passed, yet when we ask that there is to the right to vote. It would be something so repugnant may be an appeal from the judge, when he is revising barrister, to a higher court, my hon. friend says: Oh, no, it will involve heavy costs upon the poor man. If he be poor and if he be unfortunate I say he ought to have just as much opportunity to preserve his rights, as the rich man.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it will be necessary to turn back to section 41. In the proviso that was to be added to section 46, allowing an elector to appear before the court, we struck out of it that part where he was allowed to appear before the court of revision, the First Minister showing that it was not germane to that particular section. I move that the following be added to section 41:

Any elector may, in person or by agent, appear at any sitting of the revising officer in the electorate district in which he is such elector, in support of, or in opposition to, any claim, objection or application arising before the revising barriscer."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 51,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that section 50 shall stand over for the present, and we shall take up section 51.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire at this stage to move an amendment to section 12, that the following words be inserted at the 36th line:

That in the case of an Indian living on a reservation his name shall be entered only on his applying in person to the revising officer, and there shall be given such a description of the separate holding as shall determine its exact location, and the value of the improvements on which he qualifies shall be determined by evidence given under oath, and the post office address of such Indian shall be given on the published list.

With respect to the first provision, it might be considered somewhat exceptional in its nature. It might be said: Why not allow the Indian's name to find its way upon the roll in the same way as does the name of any other person? There is this difficulty: Section 12 provides that the assessment roll and the list of voters prepared by the municipality shall be taken as forming a basis for the action of the revising officer, and as prima facie evidence of the right of the person to be on the voters' list. With respect to the Indians on reservations, we know there are not assessment rolls and voters' lists. There is no enumeration of them that I know of, except a roll upon which the Indian agent pays them their money, and, therefore, we find the circumstances are exceptional from that standpoint. The returning officer being thus debarred from having access to assessment rolls and voters' lists, from the fact that no such list exists on any reservation, how shall he get his information? What would suggest itself to some persons would be that the Indian agent having a list of the Indians upon that reservation for the purpose of paying their interest money or gratuities might be able to furnish the information. But I hold it is something that will not commend itself to the good sense of the committee. I will not at this stage, and only at a future stage if I should find it necessary, say anything as to the peculiar position occupied by the Indians towards the Crown. Upon that point I have very strong views, and I could urge even stronger reasons than I have already presented with respect to the Indians. I will assume at present that it has been settled by the committee that an Indian living on a reservation, with property improved by his own hands to the extent of $150, shall have a vote. It would hardly be a proper or decent thing to contemplate as regards an Indian, a ward of the Crown, superintended by an officer of the Crown, nominated by the Crown, for such official to hand in as an official a list of those who are to become entitled to the rights of citizenship and that we could not contemplate it. Then what shall be done? We have no assessment roll or voters lists with respect to Indians for the guidance of the revising officer, and, if my idea is adopted, it will not be considered a proper thing that the Indian agent should have anything to do with placing the names of the Indians upon the voters' list. It is because they occupy that particular position that the amendment I submit appears to be necessary. Another point I desire to press on the Minister's consideration is this: Some of the more adanced tribes of Indians, who were not original proprietors of the soil of Canada, who came here under treaty with Great Britain and had certain lands given to them, many members if not the whole of the nation desire to maintain their tribal relations, their semiindependence and their position, as they view it, as allies rather than as subjects of the Crown. The First Minister rather than as subjects of the Crown. has himself given us to understand that one of the main reasons why the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act are not more availed of, the strong feeling among the Indians in favor of maintaining their tribal relations—their distinct nationality. I have declared more than once during this discussion that nothing would be more unwise on the part of the Government than to attempt anything in the direction of force. The Indians should be led, and in my view they should assume the responsibilities as well as the privileges of citizenship. They have their rights under treaty, rights which have been secured to them by the Crown, and they are jealous of those rights. The fact that they have not availed themselves of the principle of enfranchisement shows that they value those rights, and I think they would resent anything which would look like this Parliament putting upon them unasked, and by the mere force of will of this Parliament, something they have not asked for or desired. It may be said, if they are placed on the voters' list without their own request, they need not exercise the privilege of voting if they think it will entail any difficulties upon them. But you have passed that stage, which you have not a right to pass without the consent of the Indians, and therefore, in the proposition which you have before you, I have laid down no provision on that point. I have accepted the decision of the committee, that the Indian living on a reservation, with the property qualification by way of improvements, has the right to go on the roll. My motion will not accomplish the exclusion of the Indian from the roll, but will make him a party to the transaction, instead of forcing it upon him as we have done. Here we are at the initial step, not having consulted with the Indian, not having asked the Indian if he desires it, not having the slightest intimation that we are aware of, from the Indian, that there is any desire on his part to be brought within this law, and this motion will enable him to go on the voters' list by his own personal application, in which case he will express his desire to participate in the hopeful. desire to participate in the benefits—if he considers they are benefits—flowing from the Act. Therefore, I think the proposition is a reasonable one, one which will secure accuracy, and one which is of more significance with reference to some of the older bands of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman says the Indians have never intimated a desire on this subject, but he must be making a mistake. He must have overlooked the letter of Dr. Jones which appeared in the Mail some weeks ago, and a letter from another doctor saying that the Indians wished it, and that they were entitled to it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I stated that they expressed no desire to this House. Dr. Jones nor Dr. Oronhyatekha never petitioned this House that I know of, and I question very much that if we knew the views of those who might Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

would not be in the direction they meditated at all, but an amendment of the constitution, providing that the Indians might have representatives selected by themselves, representing themselves on the floor of this House.

Mr. SPROULE. What more advanced Indians could there be than those I have mentioned?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That I think is their desire on the subject, if any desire prevails. The hon. member mentions these gentlemen having written letters, and I am cognisant of the fact that they did, and the letters are written with considerable ability. The two gentlemen who wrote them are men of culture, education and advancement; no doubt they are conversant with the political history of the country, and they would be able, I think, to give intelligent votes. But they themselves, by the course they have pursued, have shown that they want to maintain their independence, their separate existence and relations, even while asking that they should have the right to vote. Has Dr. Jones or Dr. Oronhyatekha proposed that their bands shall come under municipal government and contribute to municipal taxation; do they desire to allow the white people to have a voice in their councils, which they maintain are practically supreme within their own limits? Do they propose an amalgamation in that way? No; they are as anxious to maintain the separate existence of the Indian in the community as are the others. They simply ask that the Indian shall have the right to vote, but they do not ask that the Indian shall have entailed on him the same responsibilities as other citizens, and in that respect I do not think their position is very logical. Having pointed out the difficulties with reference to these Indians, let me consider the application of the first part of my resolution to those Indians who are not advanced, to the uncultured, unlettered, ignorant Indians, to those who have not adopted the ways of civilisation, so to speak, for there are many of them in Ontario and Quebec who have been enfranchised, even leaving the newer Provinces and Territories out-there are Indians in the older Provinces occupying positions which you could hardly call the position of being civilised. Would it be right for the Indian agent who will be over such Indians as these, who will have a more absolute control over them than he can exercise over the more intelligent Indians—would it be right for the Indian agent to hand in a list of these Indians to the revising officer and have them put on the roll—Indians, many of whom may have no names by which they can be identified. There must be provision for meeting such cases.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When we reached the dinner hour, I had dealt with the more advanced bands of In lians who are occupying their lands under somewhat different conditions from some of the other Indians in the country and I was pointing out how I thought the amendment I had to propose would have a beneficial effect on those Indians. I was about to proceed to show that there was an absolute necessity for the amendment with reference to bands of Indians living on reservations who are in a less advanced condition and therefore more likely to be controlled, guided and directed, if not commanded, by the agents of the Government; and I was about to show, from a description that was given to us by one of the strongest supporters of the First Minister in this House, the condition be considered the most fitted by their advancement than of some of the Indians who are given the right to vote by others, to partake of some kind of representation in this this Bill. I will just read the remarks he made, so as to House, if we would not find that the idea in their minds impress on the minds of the committee the necessity there is that there should be an entire absence, as far as it can be secured, of control by the officers of the Government over these Indians in exercising the vote. The hon, member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), at an earlier stage of the debate, while the question of giving the vote to the Indians was under discussion, in replying to the hon. member for Lambton, said:

"If the hon gentleman had been as fair as he professed to be, he would have admitted that the Province of Ontario has given the Indians the right to vote already, and that they have voted time and again. Yet he says the law which allows them to vote is fair in every particular. lar, but it is not fair for this House to pass a law to give them a right to vote. I know something about how the Indians were dealt with. In the election before last, in the Muskoka district, the timber inspector there, who supported Mr. Mowat's candidate, went out among the Indians, and it was currently reported, and I believe correctly, that he bought up all the Indians in the district, collected them all in one place, bought up all the Indians in the district, collected them all in one place, and took them to the polls and got them to vote. After that he took the Indians away, took their dresses from them and put them on the squaws, and took them in, and got them to poll their votes. That was done under the law of Ontario and by the friends of the Ontario Government. But it was rumored that Mr Mowat's timber inspectors did not retain that control over the Indians that they ought to have, and he inserted in his Bill that nice little clause, that any enfranchised Indian receiving any money from the Dominion Government should have no right to vote; but as he could get the votes of the Indians, he was perfectly willing to give them the right to vote.

Apart from what may have been possible for the Indians under Mr. Mowat's Act, which is not a subject of discussion here, we have here a description of what the hon. member heard and believed with reference to the influence exercised over the Indians. If that description be correct, it is seen how absolutely the Indians of that class are under the control of those in authority; and it seems to me a thing that cannot be contemplated by the committee at all. That those who will have the right of voting, perhaps the turning of the election in many constituencies, should be in the position of having their names-it may be unknown and unsought for by them-entered on the voters' list, and on the day of election being marshalled by some official to the polls to cast their votes. No harm could be done to these Indians in requiring that they shall take the trouble of personally requesting the revising officer to put their of the location upon which an Indian qualifies shall be denames on the voters' list. Mind, I am recognising termined by evidence under oath. I do not know that it is the fact that the committee have decided that they have a right to be there. We are dealing with the question how they shall get there. The revising officer, from the assessment rolls he is instructed to get, will have no knowledge of these Indians, as there is no assessment roll among them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail them; therefore, it is not asking very much to the detail the under this Bill for the first time. True, it may be said that some friend will ask for them, and that I am seeking to prevent the Indian having the same privilege; but I hold that the Indian occupies a different position in this respect. Though not being privileged to vote heretofore he has been dwelling in the midst of a free people and knows the process of voting; he knows the machinery by which it is necessary to avail himself of that privilege and I have no doubt he will look after himself in that respect. If the Indian is intelligent enough to have the vote, he ought to know that much; he ought to know that the privilege is one that he must make application for. Therefore, looking at the matter, whether from the standpoint of the intelligent Indian who may view this as a measure forced upon him that he has not asked for, and that may compromise him in his relations with the Crown, or from the standpoint of the less intelligent Indian, there is a necessity, in the interest of the country, in the interest of the electorate, in the interest of what is right and proper in those entitled to the great privilege of casting a vote for those who make the law under which they live, that they should be intelligent enough to know what is conferred upon them, and to rule for Indians which would not apply to white people express the desire for it themselves. Passing to the next point of my proposal, it is that there shall be given such a description of his separate holding as shall determine its exact location. That ought to commend itself to any one who looks at it as being obviously desirable. The clause to which I propose to append this—though I leave that to the discretion of the First Ministe-provides that a farmer's property shall be described by the lot, the concession, and so on—a description which is easily made and understood. You have the peculiarity again that these Indians dwell on reserves, that many of these reserves will probably not be in concessions, in numbered lots, that the Indians dwell upon the reserves promiscuously, and there is no way of determining their location; so that if an Indian's name be put upon the list, and it will be in the Indian tongue, the revising officer will have to give the best description he can, and that description will be totally inadequate for any one to investigate the right of any Indian to be put upon the list, to determine whether he has a holding or not. It seems to me it is desirable, and the Bill itself contemplates it, that there should be such a description of the separate holdings of the Indians who claim to be put on the voters' list, as will enable any one to determine their exact location. In order that this may be accomplished, the First Minister will probably have to get surveys and plans made of the reserves, and some method will have to be devised by which a description such as is contemplated here will be given. It will be no answer to that to say that it will cause expense, for above all things it is necessary, if we are to have a list, that we should have a pure list, and that any safeguard applied to prevent improper names being placed upon the voters' lists among the whites should apply with equal, I will not say greater force, to those who hitherto have not exercised that right at all, who are living separately, in circumstances and conditions peculiar to themselves. If there is absolute necessity for a safeguard in the one case, there is absolute necessity for it in the other. I then propose that the value requisite to make this special provision, because, if I understood the First Minister rightly, evidence with respect to other persons' properties shall also be given under oath; but I have placed this in, so that there might not be any mistake. If the values of grants are to be determined from the testimony perhaps of the agent of the band, then, I think it is nothing but right and proper that the agent, in although used in the earlier part of the clause, I thought it well to place it in this connection. Having made myself understood, I will place this resolution in your hands, not having filled in that it be inserted after a certain word in a certain clause, though I am prepared to do that if left to myself; but I am desirous of giving the First Minister the opportunity he wishes to have, of saying in which part of the Bill it should find place, provided it should meet with the acceptance of the committee.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon, gentleman advances as the reason why the Indians should be compelled to make application before being allowed to vote is, that there are no assessment rolls in their reserves. In many parts of Ontario there are no assessment rolls? In many parts of the Province the white people are in precisely the same position in this regard as the Indians. There are districts where there are no municipalities, where there are no townships laid out, but where there are, nevertheless, settlers entitled to vote and who have hitherto enjoyed the franchise. Why make a placed in very much the same circumstances? The rule The hon. should apply equally, if made to apply at all. gentleman has advanced statements in reference to circumstances reported to have taken place in Muskoka to the prejudice of the Indians, such as that women dressed themselves up like men and voted after the men had voted. In regard to very many elections, stories are brought up. Some singular circumstance may have arisen to give a little color to them, but I treat them all as a general rule as being absolutely absurd, and I think this story, from what I know of the Indians, is exceedingly absurd. I do not believe any number of Indians could be got to do such a thing. The poor people have enough against them without bringing up little ridiculous stories of elections and things of I have been looking over the census of that sort. Indians in Ontario and making a sort of calculation about the number of wild Indians and the number that are settled on reserves. According to the statement in the blue books, according to the census taken by the Indian Department, there are between 15,000 and 16,000 Indians in Ontario altogether. It is not an overestimate to say, that at least 5,000 or 6,000, perhaps 7,000 of these Indians are still wild Indians in the forest, not living on reserves, not having houses, but living the wild life of hunters, so that they would not come under the Act at all. All that would come under the Act would be 7,000 or 8,000, or I shall say 10,000. Let us take 10,000. How many voters would there be in that 10,000? I do not suppose that if all the people who could be called upon to vote in that 10,000 were brought out, there would be one in seven; but supposing there were 1,300 or 1,500, is that going to corrupt the whole electorate in Ontario? It has been estimated here, since the discussion began, that there will be over 350,000 to 400,000 voters in Ontario. Are they all to be corrupted and led astray by giving the franchise to some 1,000 or 1,500 Indians. What a wonderful effect is this going to produce? But it is to the principle I look. Here are Indians that are to a certain extent civilized. They build houses, they live like other people, and surely it is desirable to encourage them, but if this motion carries, difficulty will be thrown in the way. There will be much complication, surveys will have to be made, the Indians will have to take so many oaths, they must apply for the right to vote and all that sort of thing. I do not see that such difference should be made in their regard. A great deal has been said about this being the only instance of Indian enfranchisement, that in the United States Well a few days ago nothing of the sort ever occurred. I was reading up some returns of the United States, and I found that the Indians were enfranchised in some cases.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Living on reserves?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, living on reserves. I find that Mississippi, in a statute of 1829, extended all the immunities and franchises of white persons to Indians and declared them competent witnesses where white men would be so. So that we do not exactly take the initiative in this. It has been tried before and I have never heard that any great evil resulted from it. I would be very glad, as far as I am concerned, to agree with my hon. friend in anything that is at all reasonable, because he for one has always seemed to me to take a warm interest in the advancement of the Indians, but this proposition of his would be so complicated a matter that I cannot give it my support.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course I understood that the hon, member for Brant was going to oppose, and would oppose, the Indian franchise at a subsequent stage of this Bill. When he mentioned, however, that he was going to move an amendment in committee, I said that of course he would have every opportunity of doing so. It is a matter of but little in portance what clause this may be attached to, Mr. Dawson.

so that it does not interfere with the symmetry of the Bill, if it should be adopted. I hope, however, that it will not be adopted. I think the hon, gentleman will see that, if an Indian on a reserve is to have the franchise under the conditions which have already been agreed to in this Act, he should have it unshackled by anything which would draw an invidious distinction between him and his brother of the white race. The moment it is admitted that the red man should be allowed to vote, there should be as little distinction as possible drawn. It would only be a cause of irritation and a mark of inferiority planted upon their brows by an assembly like this, composed altogether of white men. I think that the provision in the Bill which was already adopted after very long discussion, quite sufficiently meets the view of the hon. gentleman without stamping inferiority on the Indian. Under the qualifying clauses, the Indian, as a person having the necessary property or other qualification, has the right to vote. Under the disqualifying clauses, it is provided that Indians in Manitoba, British Columbia, Keewatin and the North-West Territories, and any Indian on any reserve elsewhere in Canada who is not in possession and occupation of a separate and distinct tract of land in such reserve shall not be allowed to vote. The hon, gentleman wants the reserve to be surveyed, laid out in lots, and numbered, I take it, and that the parties living on the reserve should be altogether disqualified until that expensive process is gone through. If the Indian has a distinct and separate tract of land marked off, with his house and improvements upon it, I think that is all that can be required. The Indian is obliged to prove his qualifications, and to prove that he comes within the Act, the same as a white man. He is obliged to go before the revising officer, and, in case the revising officer is not a judge, there will be an appeal from his decision. There is already a difference in the clause as against the Indian compared with the white man. If the white man has a separate and distinct tract of land of which he is the occupant, and that is of a certain value, he has the right to vote. But the Indian in such a case has not the right to vote. The value of the distinct tract of land is not taken into account at all in regard to the Indian. I have regretted in one aspect being induced to put that in the Bill, because it is a mark of distinction between the white man and the Indian. If the white man has a vacant lot and he is the occupant or the owner of that lot, although there are no improvements whatever on it, if it is of the value of $150, he has a vote; but, in consequence of the strong arguments, the strong expression of opinion of many gentlemen on the other side of the House, that, in consequence of the tribal relations, and in consequence of the reserve belonging to the whole tribe and not to any indivi-dual Indian, and because no portion of it was alleged to belong to the individual Indian, the distinction was drawn against the Indian when compared with the franchise of the white man; because it is provided that no Indian is qualified who is not in possession and occupation of a separate and distinct tract of land in such reserve, and whose improvements on such separate tract are not of the value of $150. The land on which he has his house, on which he has his improvements, his cattle, fences and stables, is not to be taken into account at all, and he must have not only a distinct holding but improvements belonging to himself of the value of $150. I think it would be exceedingly unwise, if we are going to give the franchise to the Indians at all, that we should draw any further invidious distinction between the white man and the Indian. It would decidedly be a grievance in the mind of the Indian; he would feel it as such; and I would say to my hon. friend that I am quite sure that this provision will be felt in his own riding to be rather an affront offered by the hon. gentleman to the Indians. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman has any such feeling. I believe, however, that he has an exaggerated opinion in his own mind about the danger of the Indian vote without these checks; but I can assure the hon. gentleman, and I think the majority of the House on both sides will agree with me, that there is a sufficient protection now, and that it would be felt as an annoyance, an insult perhaps, and a grievance to the Indians to have a further distinction drawn against them. I took occasion some time ago to speak on this subject to Mr. Plummer, whom I have no doubt the hon. gentleman knows, a very old officer of the Indian Department, who is highly respected by everyone who knows him, and whom I should be very sorry to see the Department lose, though perhaps we shall have to, for he is an elderly man now. He has been inspector for very many years, and he knows nearly all the reserves in the Province of Ontario. I asked him about this matter, and he wrote me as follows:

-As regards the question of the title under which the Indians hold the lands they occupy. The reserve occupied by the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinté has been sub-divided into lots and concessions, and the Bay of Quinte has been sub-divided into lots and concessions, and each Indian of proper age has been located or allotted by the band in council for at least one lot, averaging from 50 to 150 acres, on which he resides with his family. These several claims have been entered into a book which are recognised and confirmed by the Department. Some of these Indians have been in possession of their lands and homesteade, from father to son, for nearly 100 years, and as they have complied with the regulations of the Department, and the provisions of the soveral Indian Acts, no power can legally dispossess them. The Six Nation Indians hold their lands in the same manner as that of the Mohawks of the Bay of Ouinté and the same may be said of all the other Indians in the Bay of Quinté, and the same may be said of all the other Indians in the Provinces of Untario and Quebec, as well as those of the Lower Provinces. Most of the Indians in the Upper Provinces hold their lands not vinces. Most of the Indians in the Upper Provinces hold their lands not only by right of allotment by the several bands in council, as provided under the 17th section of the Indian Act, but they also hold location titles as provided by the 18th section. All of the Indians here referred to have not only the undisputed right to hold their lands while they live, but the right to devise the same by will, provided it be to a relative not further removed than a second cousin. To all intents and purposes the Indian is the absolute owner of his land (although he cannot sell it), and no nower on each head lawfully disposess him." and no power on earth can lawfully dispossess him.

That is really the situation of these Indians. By a uniform practice amounting to law, from father to son, they do hold their land by a much more than the occupancy that whites are allowed to vote upon. I have received a very interesting letter from Dr. Jones, who is one of the chiefs of the Six Nation Indians, and who is a very intelligent man. He writes me thus:

" HAGEFSVILLE, 30th May, 1885

"Haggssylle, 30th May, 1885

"My Dear Sir John,—I should have written to you some time ago to thank you for making the Indian a 'person' in the Franchise Bill. Other affairs, however, have prevented me from performing my duty.

"I now thank you, on the part of the 'Grand Council of Ontario,' of which body I am secretary, and at the meeting in ceptember last the vice-president, Chief Solomon Jones, introduced the subject, having previously given me notice by the enclored letter, which kindly return to me. The matter was fully, and, I must say, ably, discussed, and the unanimous decision of the council was that the time had arrived when we should insist upon a representation or voice in the Dominion Parliament. I was instructed to take action in the matter, and Mr. Plummer is able to show the nature of my il-as and work. This council was composed of delegates from nearly every reserve in Ontario.

"I now, as head chief, thank you on the part of my own band, the Mississaguas of the Credit, who, in council, have heartily and with cheers approved of the step the Government are taking.

"I now thank you on the part of the memory of my father and on the part of myself, as for many years we advocated and urged this step as the one most likely to elevate the aborigines to a position more approaching the independence of the whites.

"There is not an Indian in this neighborhood, there is not a Conservative, but what approves of the noble stand you have taken in this affair, in spite of the bitter opposition you are meeting with in the House, and I have spoken to several Reformers who also approve of the measure, so that the 'seething excitement' has not reached this part of the Province where the Indians are so well known.

"There is one feature of the debate of a personal character in respect to myself and my band, and a reply to which I think is due by me through you to the House.

"I refer to the remarks made by Mr. Mills on Thursday last, that the payment of a claim urged last year by my band, was made to influence ou amount of interest it bears, and that we are not receiving any bounty or support from the Government more than what we have earned by the sale and surrender of our lands, and far more than this interest do we expend yearly in our local municipal tax and in the purchase of dutiable goods, the revenue upon which goes back to you to support the Dominion Government.

"My band also know perfectly well that even if the vote were not by ballot and nine-tenths of them should vote the Reform ticket, it could by no possibility affect our financial standing with the Government. But as nine-tenths can and do read the newspapers, there is every probabiity that they will come to the conclusion to cast their votes against the party which is not holding meetings from one end of the Province to the other with the express purpose of degrading the character of the Indian in the eyes of the people, and to raise a political excitement to deprive us of our just dues. This is rather a long letter, Sir John, but you have been so accustomed to lengthy harangues in the House upon this subject that I hope the five minutes' views of an Indian will be acceptable and not make you 'dired'. able and not make you 'tired.'

"I am, my dear Sir John,
"Your obedient servant, "KAHKWAQUONABY, M.D., Chief.

"Sir John A. Macdonald,
"K.C.B., &c., &c., &c.,
"Ottawa."

Mr. LISTER. It is not very difficult to see that the gentleman who wrote this letter is a strong supporter of the Conservative party. The letter which the First Minister has read from Mr. Plummer, of the Indian Department, professes to give a legal opinion, but as that gentleman is not a lawyer and probably knows very little about law regulating the holding of real property, we can easily understand how much value that opinion is entitled to. If the Indian tribes are the highly intelligent body that the First Minister would have us believe, I ask him, as I have asked him before in this House, why is it that he does not sever all connection between the Government and the Indian? Why is it that in the face of his own announcement, in the face of the statements made by his followers in this House, that the Indians of this country are the intelligent class he represents them to be—why is it that he does not entrust them with the entire control and management of their own affairs? Why is it that he continues to hold the Indians of this country in a sort of bondage? Why is it that he does not give to these peop'e who are so intelligent, so fit to exercise the franchise, and to exercise it creditably—why is it that he has not given those Indians the lands which he says belongs to them, and over which this Government has no control? How is it, Sir, that the Government of the day continue to be the custodians of the money belonging to the Indian tribes of this country? this money belongs to them, why does this Government continue to keep control of it, and from year to year dole out to them the miserable pittance that the Indians receive. Only five short years ago the First Minister, who has read that letter to-day with such unction, in his report stated that the Indians were not fit to attempt the simplest duties of municipal government, and yet to-day he stands up and tells us that in five short years the Indians, who were then not fit to exercise or enjoy the simplest forms of municipal government, are now so far advanced that they are capable of exercising intelligently the highest privilege of free men. I say that people who look at his statements made then, and the statements he makes to day, will draw their own conclusions as to the motive of the hon, gentleman in introducing this Bill. He knows very well that the Indian tribes of this country are under his thumb to-day through his agents from one end of the country to the other. My hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) his made himself, since this discussion commenced, the particular champion in this country of the Indians, and do we believe the hon. gentleman is animated by purely disinterested motives, or does he hold letters similar to the one which the First Minister has read to-day, assuring him that if the Bill passes the votes of the enfranchised Indians will be cast for him? Sir, it has been pointed out in this House that it is improper to give the Indians a vote in the condition of semi-slavery in which they are living. It was pointed out that the Indians are wards of the Government, that they have not taken upon themselves the rights and liabilities of free men, that they cannot enter into contracts which are binding upon them, that they have no right to dispose of their lands or of the timber or minerals upon them, that they cannot make leases without the consent of the Government, that they have no control of the money in the hands of the Government, that, in a word, they are directly under the influence, control and power of the Government. The proposition to enfranchise Indians under these circumstances is a monstrous one, and one which I believe would never have emanated from any man in Canada except the First Minister. The Indians have never asked for the franchise. The letter we have just heard read, purporting to be from an Indian chief, is the first intimation the House has had that the Indians desire the franchise. The letter itself proves that the man who wrote it is a partisan, and is an assurance to the First Minister that whatever Indian votes may be cast, they will be cast upon his side, and will have the effect of destroying the votes of the free tax-paying citizens of Canada, which is in itself a wrong and injustice on the people. It will have the effect of destroying, to a certain extent, public opinion. If, however, the Indians are sufficiently intelligent to exercise that high right, if they are in a position to be placed on an equality with white people, then it was the duty of the Government to have severed the bonds which bind them to the Government, and in word and deed make them a free people, and place them in a position to exercise the franchise freely, without coercion or influence on the part of the Government or its officers. But to say that the Indians shall have the franchise, when they are existing in a condition such as I have attempted to describe, is a proposition so bad that I do not believe any other public man in the whole of Canada except the First Minister, would have proposed it to a Parliament such as this. I repeat that the Indians have not asked for the franchise. We are proposing to entrust a high privilege on a body of people which they have not sought. You are about to give them something they will not appreciate, which will be little availed of, and which if exercised, will be exercised under the influence of the Government's minions. The Government have displaced Liberal Indian agents and have appointed Conservatives in their places, and we know now the object with which that was done The Indian, though he be enfranchised, is no more a free man than were the slaves in the Southern States, and it would have been just as proper to have given votes to the African slaves of the South as to give it to Indians, in their present condition of bondage. If, however, you are bound to give the vote to the Indians, then every proper precaution should be taken that they will properly exercise that privilege. The Indian pays no taxes and does not contribute in any way to the Government; he pays no taxes to municipalities; he has no responsibilities; the white people have little knowledge as to the Indians locations and know little about them. It is but fair, therefore, that the Bill should provide that they shall exercise the franchise in a proper manner. The Indians live on reserves, and little is known about their lands. Is it not a fair proposition to say to the Indians, that if you want this right you must apply for it, state on what land you live, and state what improvements you possess, before being placed on the voters' list? The First Minister says no such application shall be necessary. In fact, the Indian agent, living on the reserve, controlling the Indians, shall be the man to go to the returning officer and say to him that such and such Indians are entitled to vote. No one knows anything about the matter except the Indian agent, and unless at very great trouble, it will be impossible to verify the statements of Indians asking to be placed upon the voters' list. Is it not a fair proposition to say, when you are giving the Indians what you call a Mr. LISTER.

they shall apply to the revising officer to be placed upon the list, in person. If necessary, let the revising officer himself go to the reserve, so as to give the Indians as little trouble as possible; but if we are going to give the Indians a great privilege, it is but fair to ask that they should apply for it. If an Indian agent desires to act dishonestly he has every opportunity to do so. There is no chance for people outside of the reserve to satisfy themselves as to whether the Indians are entitled to be placed on the roll or not. That is an unfair position to take, that the Indian agent, the Government of the day, from whom the Indians expect every advantage. The Government, if we are to judge by the reports we read, has extended to different tribes of Indians throughout the country favors-because I can call them by no other word -in the shape of seed grain, and so on. These are the men the Government propose to enfranchise, and without giving the white men of the community the opportunity of seeing whether they are entitled to votes or not. We are giving those Indians a privilege. They are different from white men, and they cannot be expected to be dealt with the same as white men. If they were there would be no difficulty about it; we would know on what lands they live. The First Minister decided, however, that the Indian should be equal to the white man, so far as the vote is concerned, but less than the white man in everything else which constitutes manhood in this country. I believe sincerely that the enfranchisement of the Indians will work most disadvantageously to them. Heretofore they have been the wards of the Government, no matter what Government was in power, but the moment you extend the franchise to them you render them liable to all the allurements and degrading influences which can be brought into elections. The moment they vote in a body. that moment you make them the enemies of one portion of the community of this country, if it is proved that the Indians of Canada throw their influence in favor of one party, it must create a feeling of hostility towards them, so far as a large portion of the people are concerned. If you give them the right to vote it must ultimately result in their being put on the same footing as other citizens of the country. The system which we have had in force for years must be abolished, and if the Indians exercise the right of franchise they must assume the rights of citizenship, instead of being taken care of under the parental system which is now in force. It will be the destruction of the system which has been in existence in the past; it will have the effect of wiping out entirely the Indian population of the country, for if we are to believe the First Minister's own reports for years past, the effect of doing that and giving them their property would be that it would be squandered, and we would have a large number of paupers dependent on the Government. I think the amendment of the hon, member for Brant is a reasonable one in every particular, seeing that we have determined to give the Indian the right to vote.

Mr. MULOCK. It is with some feeling of regret that I find that the Indian question has broken out again, with the probability, if it should get into full swing, that it will have a good swing; and if it is possible in any way to find a solution of this question, and to avoid any longer discussion of a question which has been fully discussed already, but upon which, I dare say, a great deal still remains to be said, I think it will be to the general advantage of the committee and the House. Hon. members on this side have pointed out to the committee on several occasions the peculiar relations which the tribal Indian occupies towards the Government, and strong points have been made to the effect that the Indian will not be free, when he is given the franchise, to exercise it as he would wish, that he will be under governmental control through the Indian agents. In great privilege, that if they desire to avail themselves of it order to meet that objection I drafted an amendment, which

I will take the liberty of submitting for the consideration of cussed. Speaking on the first impression, I am in favor of the committee:

Than any person being an agent within the meaning of "the Indian Act of 1880," and who, either directly or indirectly, seeks to induce or compel any person being an Indian or of part Indian blood, and qualified to vote only in respect of personal property forming part of a reserve, as defined by said Act, to vote or refrain from voting at any election of a member of the council, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if found guilty thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $200, and by imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without had labor, and shall not be entitled to hold any office or place of emolument in the appointment of the Governor or of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, for a period of two years from the date of his conviction. of his conviction.

I think it is due to any Government that they should give it clearly to be understood by the agent that he has no authority from the Government to interfere, and the best way to secure neutrality on the part of the agent, or one of the best ways, is to make him punishable, personally, for any breach of duty and to endanger the office which gives him his authority. Some hon members may think that the present law sufficiently meets the case, that his interference would be construed by the courts as undue influence, and that the election in which he so interfered would be voided. But such is not the law. It is necessary to establish agency in order to have undue influence as an element in voiding an election. But the Indian agents, and all agents appointed by this Government, will, of course, be intelligent men; they will be shrewd enough to connect themselves with the candidate, and thus the general election law would not meet their case. By the provision of this amendment it will not necessitate any petition in order to reach the agent, but it provides a summary way, by which any charge against him may be investigated. I think, also, that a provision of this kind incorporated in the Bill will be appreciated by the Indians themselves. It will, I think, help to secure the purity of an election in which they are a factor, and will, to a certain extent, be an answer to that portion of the argument which says that the Indians will be under the agent's control.

Mr. McCALLUM. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MULOCK. Since my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) has asked me whether it is an amendment to the amendment or not, I may say that I intended to move it as a substantive motion, and when I rose it had not occurred to me that an amendment was put in. So, under the circumstances, I suppose I shall have to leave it to some other hon, member to move at a later stage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman was good enough to show me the amendment he intended to move, and to state that he was going away, and therefore he asked me to look over it. I fancy, if the agent exercised undue influence, under the election law, as it stands now, that influence would be held to be undue, most likely. Still, there is, perhaps, a good deal in what the hop. gentleman states, that there might be a difficulty in tracing that the influence used by the agent was in any way used by him as agent of the candidate in whose favor the Indians were solicited to vote. I quite agree that an Indian agent ought not to exercise any of the influence his office gives. My experience of the Department has been, however, that the Indian agent, as a general rule, has no influence; the Indians set themselves against him; they like to show their independence of him. I think the hon. member for Bothwell, who held the office I hold, must know that one of the chief nuisances of the office is that the Indians always kick against the agents, and aiways appeal against them. There is naturally a supposition among those who are not so much behind the scenes as myself that the Indian agent exercises influence over the Indians. He ought not to exercise political influence, I admit; I go with the hon gentleman thus far; and if the hon. gentleman leaves his motion, as he says he will, in the himself in that respect? How is it that the hon. gentleman hands of the Chairman, I will see that it shall be fully dis- has been himself voting for discriminating, if he is in favor of the clause. It ought, however, to be in the election law, and not in this Franchise Act. II) wever, there may be no objections to calm the apprehensions of the hon. gentleman by putting it into this Act; and at the subsequent consolidation of the statutes it can be put in its right place. Without stating that I support the resolution, I must candidly state that my impression just now is in favor of some such clause as that.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not wish to detain the committee any length of time on this question. I listened to the speech of the hon. gentleman, in which he used just the same arguments that I heard him use seven weeks ago. I do not intend to discuss this Indian clause, only I am surprised that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) should have moved the amendment he did. Knowing that he is a fair-minded man, and that he has always taken an interest in the Indians of this country, I do not see why he should take this occasion to discriminate against the red man as against his white brother. The revising officer is sworn to do his duty between man and man, and are we to suppose that he is going to perjure himself. If the hon. gentleman's amendment carried, the revising officer, if it came to his knowledge that an Indian had any amount of property, could not put him on the list, unless the Indian went to him and requested him to do it. That is not the case with the white man, and I do not see why the hon, gentleman should want to discriminate against the red man. Probably he did not see the bearing of his amendment. Further, it has been said by the hon, member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that the Indians do not pay taxes. The Indians do pay taxes on all the dutiable goods they consume, just as much as the white man. Therefore, there is no reason for discriminating against him on that ground. In the county of Haldimand, which adjoins my constituency, there is quite an Indian settlement, and I am satisfied that the revising officer will have no more trouble in placing those Indians on the list than any other portion of the electors. Of course, I cannot speak for the county of Brant; but I hope this amendment will not pass, because it would be an unjust discrimination against these men. If a man has the property qualification he should have a vote. I do not know why this amendment is brought up now, if it is not for obstruction; I do not wish to accuse the hon, member for South Brant of obstruction, but it looks very much like it. The hon. gentleman says you are forcing on the Indian a thing he does not want. I do not see that it does the Indian any harm to put his name on the list; you only treat him in the same way as you do his white brother; but by the hon. gentleman's amendment, it it passes, you will force the Indian to go to the revising officer and demand personally that his name be put upon the list, or otherwise he will be disqualified. That would be the effect of the hon, gentleman's amendment. I do not think the hou. gentleman himself saw the injustice it would do to his red brother by his amendment.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman is very much afraid of wounding the Indian's feelings, of exciting his hostility, of awakening in his mind feelings of resentment towards a certain class of the white population for discriminating against him. What has been the character of all the legislation in this House on the subject of the Indians? Take the case of selling liquor to an Indian. The hon. gentleman may step up to the bar and take his glass of whiskey, but if an Indian chief were to do the same thing the party who sells or gives the liquor to the Indian would be taken up and fined $50. The hon, gentleman has supported that kind of legislation. Does he propose to abolish it? Does he propose to put the Indian on the same fo ting as he holds putting the Indian on the same footing as the white man in his own way? If a white man comes into the possession of property which he has not purchased by his own labor

Mr. McCALLUM. I am in favor of giving the Indian all the rights we have already conceded to him under this Bill, and you are not, at this stage, going to take them away. We have decided to enfranchise the Indians, and by a side wind you want to take his name off the list.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is perfectly willing to give the Indian a vote, to treat him in this particular as a white man, so long as he will vote the Tory ticket; otherwise, he is not so disposed to treat him as a white man, and he is not afraid of offending the Indian by discriminating against him. If you propose to deal with the Indian as an ordinary citizen, to do away with the discrimination that exist between him and the white man, to impose upon him the full responsibilities of citizenship, the hon, gentleman is opposed to that. He wishes to retain him as a ward of the Government, but at the same time he insists upon giving him the electoral franchise. There are several things worthy of consideration besides what the hon, gentleman has said about discrimination. If I remember rightly, the hon. gentleman has, during this discussion, discriminated against the Indians of British Columbia and Manitoba. It is true many of the Indians of British Columbia are, perhaps, more energetic and enterprising than those on this side of the Rocky Mountains, but he has not hesitated a moment to declare that all the Indians of British Columbia shall be disfranchised. They might not be so useful to the Government as the Indians near the capital, and therefore it is not necessary to confer on them the franchise; but as regards the Indians of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who are immediately under the influence of the Government, it is of great consequence they should have the right to vote, as otherwise the existence of the Government might be put in jeopardy. Now, I observe that the First Minister, speaking on this subject, said he did not wish any invidious distinction to be made, and that this amendment would make an invidious distinction between the Indian and the white man. But the hon, gentleman began by making the distinction. He has provided in this very Bill, and in the amendment he proposed himself, that the Indian shall not vote merely for the value of his reservation; that his vote shall depend upon the valuation of the improvements he has put upon the reservation. On that very matter the hon, gentleman has made a distinction between the white man and the Indian. Why? Because he knows the Indian has no such interest in the reservation as the white man has in the property he occupies. He knows, notwithstanding what he read from Mr. Plummer, that the title to the Indian reservation is in the Crown and not in the Indian; and it is on the value of the Indian improvements he proposes to give the Indian the franchise. But most of the improvements upon which the Indians will qualify are improvements made by the Government. Take almost any Indian band in the west: their lands have been divided amongst them; location tickets have been issued by the Superintendent General; houses have been built, not by the Indians but by the Government, out of the Indian funds which have been provided by the sale of these Crown lands reserves for the Indians, and there would practically be no difference between giving the Indian a vote on the value of the land he occupies, and giving him a vote on the value of the improvements which have been made, not by him, but for him, by the Superintendent General.

Mr. McCALLUM. Was it not done out of his own money?

Mr. MILLS. If it be their own money, why are not the one to identify it so as to ascertain its value. That is only a Indians allowed to manage their own affairs? If he is to obtain a vote, why is he not allowed to use his own money being stuffed with names of parties that should not be there Mr. MILLS.

of property which he has not purchased by his own labor and his own industry, and is not competent to look after it, he loses it, and with it loses his vote. The hon. gentleman knows that if the Indian were allowed to control his own property he would not hold it, and would not have a vote. Therefore, he will not allow him to control it, but gives him only nominal possession of it, and allows him to vote on property held by the Crown for him and over which he has no control. The hon. gentleman says it is not fair to put the Indian in a different position from the white man. Why, suppose an Indian rents part of his holding to another Indian, or to a white man, with the consent of the Superintendent General, what does the law provide? That law which the hon, gentleman himself put upon the Statute Book provides that unless the Indian farms what he retains in a satisfactory manner, the rents which are derived from the portion of land he has transferred to a tenant for the time being shall not go to him, but to the band to which he belongs. So that, although the hon. gentleman professes to be so anxious not to wound the feelings of the Indian, and so anxious to protect the interests of the Indian, yet he treats the Indian, so far, as a mere serf to the Government, that he will not allow him to receive the rents of lands he has placed in the hands of a tenant, unless he cultivates well the part he retains for his own use. I observe the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) went on to state that the Indians in the United States were treated as white men.

Mr. DAWSON. I instanced one State.

Mr. MILLS. The Indian in the United States, before he can exercise the right of citizenship, must break with his tribal relations, must ask to have conferred upon him the responsibilities of an ordinary citizen, and when he has done so he is in all respects dealt with precisely as any other member of the community. That is precisely what we have provided in our Indian Act. We say that upon certain conditions he may be emancipated, that he may apply to the Superintendent General, and when he is emancipated and receives his own portion of the reserve or allotment belonging to his band, he then has his own property under his own control, he is liable to taxation, he is capable of entering into a contract, he may sue and be sued—he has, in fact, all the responsibilities of an ordinary citizen; and if he has not the capacity of looking after his own property he must lose it, as any other person would. Such an Indian is entitled to the elective franchise now. There is no objection to his then exercising it; if he shows he has the capacity of managing his own affairs, we say let him be enfranchised, but so long as he is the ward of the Government, under the control of the Government, we say that the franchise should not be conferred upon him. The committee have agreed that it shall. We have the next step in the proposition of my hon. friend. He proposes that before you confer the elective franchise on the Indian, or put his name on the voters' list, he shall apply in person. If he is interested in becoming a voter he will do so; if he is not, the public will derive no advantage, nor will it be a gain to himself to have his name on the list. How is it with the white population? Their names are on the assessment the revising officer takes the name of a white roll; man from the assessment roll. The Indian is not assessed, he pays no taxes, he is not under municipal control, you do not know what his property is worth, and you have not the ordinary means of information in his case. I hold, therefore, he should be obliged, personally, to apply to the revising officer to have his name on the roll, and to give such a description of his property as will enable any one to identify it so as to ascertain its value. That is only a necessary security against fraud, against the voters' roll at all, even under the law as you propose to make it. The First Minister referred to the letter of Mr. Plummer, and it seemed to me a very extraordinary thing that an hon, gentleman who is at the head of the Government, who was for many years Minister of Justice, and who claims, and has asserted again and again, that he is a great constitutional lawyer, should quote the opinion of a man who is not a lawyer at all on the subject of the Indian's title to his property. That is what the hon, gentleman did. He read a letter from Mr. Plummer, assuring the House that the Indians who reside upon certain lands own those lands, that those lands are as much the property of the Indians as the land of a white man is his property. That is not the theory of our law, or the principle upon which we have proceeded. On the contrary, if the Indians abandon their claim to any property it is the Crown that makes the title to any party who purchases. There is no title, or recognition of valid title, so far as the Indians are concerned. But this is a matter of no special consequence in this case. the Indian has a title to his property let it be acknowledged, the same as in the case of a white man. If an Indian is competent to vote he is competent to take care of his own affairs. Give him his property, mark it out for him, acknowledge his right to his property, and let him do with it as he pleases. If he is competent to take care of it he will exercise the franchise, the same as any other member of the community. But you do not deal with him in that way. You say: You shall not be responsible for your debts, you shall not be liable for any contract you may make, you shall not be subject to taxation, you shall not be subject to military service, or to serve on any jury; upon you shall devolve none of the duties of citizenship; and yet this man, who pays no taxes and bears no share of the public burden, is to be called upon to take his share in the government of the nation; the man who is not competent to direct his own affairs, you say, is to be called upon to take part in directing the affairs of the country. I do not wish, nor do the white population of the country, generally, wish to interfere with the Indian bands, or to disturb their domestic concerns. We allow them to manage their own local affairs in their own way, and so long as we do that, and do not do away with the distinction between the Indian and the rest of the population, we have no right to say that distinction shall disappear in this Parliament, but shall be continued in every other relation in life. The hon. gentleman read a letter from an Indian chief, who professed himself a very devoted supporter of the hon. gentleman, and who declared that the Indians of the Mississagua band had a valid claim to the sum of momey the Government had awarded them. The accuracy of this declaration is extremely questionable. I think, in the first place, that the hon, gentleman acted in a highly improper manner in regard to the claim of what is called the Mississagua band. What are the facts? They claimed payment for property said to have been surrendered to the Crown more than sixty years ago, and that the Crown had never accounted for that property. This question was before a Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, as early as 1858. Why did he not deal with it then? Why was it not disposed of at that time? Why was not the Indian claim acknowledged at that time? But there was nothing of that sort done, and now, eighteen or twenty years after the Union, he has recognized the claim of that band to the amount of upwards of $68,000. By what authority did he do that? I say he had no authority for recognising any such claim. If that claim was a valid claim it was a claim against the old Provinces of Ontario and Quebec; it was the business of those two Provinces to acknowledge it, before the hon. gentleman did anything in the matter. He ought to have submitted it to the Governments of those two Provinces, and ought to have had their sanction, before he communicated to the Indians that they would be paid this $68,000. He has the Government the support that is expected, the Superin agreed to pay the Indians that sum. Does he suppose the Governments of Ontario and Quebec will recognise his right to make a charge against those two Provinces for a claim of this sort? I cannot suppose for a moment that he will do so, and I hold in my hand a speech made by the Treasurer of Ontario, last winter, in which he refers to this subject, and in which he says:

"In fact, for upwards of sixty years this claim has remained in abeyance, and now we are presented with a claim of $14,833 in principle and $51,834 in interest, payable to these Indians. Well, I think it is rather extraordinary that we have not heard of this claim before, and then In may say that it was only presented to us a few days before the mening at Ottawa in Outober last. It seems to be a new discovery, and it was recognised by the Government at Ottawa without any communication with the Government of the Breview. with the Governments of the Provinces."

What are we to believe with regard to this? The hon. gentleman says it is a good claim. So far as I can gather, the Governments of the two Provinces say it is not. did the hon, gentleman recognise it at this moment? In my opinion, the introduction of this Franchise Bill shows why he proposed to confer upon the Indians the elective franchise, and before this elective franchise is conferred upon them it is very important to secure their good will, by recognising a claim, upwards of sixty years old, for the sum of nearly $70,000. The hon, gentleman read in that letter that this was a meritorious claim. I am not going into that question. It may or it may not be a meritorious claim, but it is a very old one, and there has been great negligence on the part of the old Government of Canada, which existed before the Union, if this money belonging to the Indians remained in their hands for so long a period unaccounted for. But as to the effect of the recognition of this claim there can be no doubt whatever. The letter the hon, gentlemen read from the Indian chief, and the letter I read to the House a few days ago from another Indian chief, show how the Indians regard the action of the hon, gentleman. The hon, gentleman would have us believe that these Indians are a highly intelligent, a well-informed class of the population, that they are men of public enterprise and public spirit, and that they are, therefore, qualified to exercise the elective franchise, that it will tend to elevate them, and to make them a more self-reliant and more useful class of the population than they have been hitherto. This is a very extraordinary position for the hon. gentleman to take. submitted to us a Bill which disfranchises upwards of 130,000 of the white population of this country, of the men who now possess the elective franchise, and at the same time that he is declaring by his Bill that a large portion of the white population, who now possess the franchise, are not competent to exercise it, he proposes to confer the elective franchise upon an Indian population, that have not shown themselves capable of managing the most ordinary concerns of life. The hon, gentleman has dealt with the Indian population in a very extraordinary way. He at first proposed to embrace the entire Indian population, from Vancouver Island to Halifax, but he found that he could not confer the franchise upon them in the face of public opinion. There was great danger of losing a larger number of white supporters than he would get from the ranks of the red men, and therefore he made his Bill somewhat less extensive; he confined the franchise to those Indians residing within the older Provinces of the Dominion. Sir, are these Indians self-relient men? Do they manage their own affairs? Do they exhibit any of those habits of life which show they are likely to become intelligent and industrious citizens? Not at all. A great majority of them receive, every spring, seed grain and garden seeds, in order that they may produce, in part, the means of subsistence. If these Indian refuse to vote for the amendment they may get less. They are dependent upon the Government, who may distribute as little or as much as they please. If they fail to give to

The First Minister was Mr. PATERSON (Brant). bound to have proposed, if he does not approve of my amendment, some plan whereby the difficulty that I proposed to obviate might be got over in some other way. The only reply he has made is that he does not approve of the amendment, because it draws invidious distinctions between the Indian and the white man. If there are any invidious distinctions existing between them they have been put upon the Statute Book of Canada by the First Minister himself. To say that a proposition that the Indians to whom it is proposed to give the franchise shall be placed upon the voters' list by making a personal application to have it done, to say that it is placing him at a disadvantage, as compared with other classes of the community that are newly enfranchised, such as the wage-earners and others, is absurd. Why, last Session the right hon, gentleman proposed, and placed it on the statute book, that the Indian might make a will, and if the will suited the pleasure of the First Minister, when the Indian died his property would go to the person he willed it to; but if it did not suit the pleasure of the First Minister, then the Indian should be deemed to have died intestate. Is there not an invidious distinction here between the Indians and other classes of the community? He put on the Statute Book that the Indian may not have liquor sold to him or given to him. You may call it invidious, or otherwise, but there is a clear distinction drawn between him and the white man, for the hon, gentleman has not yet ventured to make it a penal offence for any one to sell or give a glass of liquor to a white man. Why, Sir, the Statute Book is full of distinctions crystallised into law by the hon. gentleman himself. In the Indian Act the hon, gentleman says that the very land upon which the Indian shall qualify he cannot dispose of without the consent of the Superintendent General I do not care if he is an educated Indian, the most intelligent Indian on the reserves, he is not at liberty to lease the land that is given to bim. If he be a minister, a lawyer or a doctor, he cannot lease his land, but the Superintendent General may lease it for his benefit. I say that when it is proposed, as this Bill proposes, to give to men so entirely dependent upon the Government a vote, under the control of agents appointed by the Government—I say it is an indecent thing to propose that there should be no remedy, that there shall be nothing to prevent the Indian agent, of his own motion, handing in to the revising officer a list of the Indians placed on the reserves, and to have their names entered on the voters' list. There is nothing to prevent the agent going to the revising officer, and from his payroll giving the names of those Indians, with a description of the holdings that will enable them to vote. You cannot tell who the person is upon the roll; you cannot tell what the Indian's property is upon which he qualifies. Hon, gentlemen opposite say: Oh, it will necessitate the running of surveys, that could not be got through in time for this election. That was one of the great objections which the First Minister saw. If there had to be a survey and a description given of the separate holdings it might necessitate such steps being taken in the way of surveys which would not be completed in time for the Indian to vote in 1887. that is what the Government want the Indian vote forit is, above all things, to vote in 1887, for in that particular year the Government think that, if ever they will need the Indian vote to save them from an outraged people, it will be then. I do not, however, ask that the Government shall not avail themselves of the Indian vote at the next election. My motion does not go so far, but it simply provides that tendent General has it in his power to withhold from the It has been pointed out by the First Minister, by a letter Indians the usual annual contribution, and he therefore from one of the Government's agents, that the Indians have a system of land transfer among themselves; that the trans. fers are recorded in a book; but that book is controlled by the Indian agent and is not open to public access. If electors went to the agent and asked to have access to that book they would be denied. I want that book to be made open, so that a description can be given of the different locations, as is done in the case of white men; because if this is not done, I hold that the Indian vote is in the hands of the Government and will be controlled by them. Am I to be met and told that my proposition shall be voted down because it draws an invidious distinction? Am I to be told that by the First Minister, who has placed Acts on the Statute Book by which the Indian is not allowed to lease his land, make a will, who, if absent from his reserve, in the United States, for five years, forfeits all rights in the land, who has put such Acts on the Statute Book; and yet, forsooth, we have to be told that my proposition is to be voted down, because I have ventured to ask that the Indian shall be allowed free agency in this matter of having his name placed on the voters' list. I ask that the Indian shall not be placed in a position in which the Government can place his name on the roll without his consent, and I am not afraid of what the First Minister suggested, that in my own county the Indians would regard this proposal as an affront, and consider I was drawing invidious distinctions. I have very great doubt whether, in my own county, the Indians will avail themselves of the privilege of voting. I have in my hand a letter written by a gentleman of standing in Haldimand, in which he states distinctly that the Indians spoken to in regard to this matter of giving them the vote said they did not want the vote and would not have it. I believe that will be the case largely, and I have reason to know that they will resent it. But if the Indian agent can go and place their names on the list, without their consent, they will be compromised. And then there might arise an agitation among the white people, setting forth that the Indians, having claimed to be placed on the list of voters, must bear their share of municipal taxation, must contribute to the county rates, and to the cost of the administration of justice; and thus there will be questions raised that should not be raised, and feelings excited that have not been excited before; and that result is not in the interest of the Indians. My motion asks that the Indians shall be consenting parties to having their names placed on the voters' list, and that they themselves shall make a request to the revising officer to be so entered. I do not propose that the Indians shall travel miles in order to enter their names; but the revising officer might, after proper notice, visit the reserves, for the purpose of making up the voters' list. The First Minister says we must not pass this amendment, because it will draw invidious distinctions. That argument is not worthy the attention of the committee. That the Indian property should be described, as the property of white people is described, is surely a fair proposition, and that evidence should be given under oath as to the value of the improvements is surely a fair proposition, and the same remark applies to the suggestion that the post office address should be put in the published list. Hon, gentlemen opposite, when they assume the responsibility of so dealing with the Indians, cannot blame me for not having pointed out the danger involved in proceeding to force on them a measure they do not want. Why do I think they do not want it? Last Session the First Minister introduced an Indian advancement Act, one which had been much enquired about since 1880. It was stated that the reports of the Indian agents went to show that the bands were not sufficiently advanced to have a simple form of municipal government among themselves. Last year the First Minister placed on the there shall be a description given of the Indian holdings. I Statute Book an Act by which the more advanced Indians might avail themselves, with the consent of the Superintendent General, of a simple form of municipal government. The Six Nation Indians, in March last, met and considered whether they should avail themselves of that privilege; and they decided they would not do so at the present time. I would be a recreant to their interest if I did not offer a proposal that would save them from questions arising between the whites and the Indians, by which the relations existing might be disturbed. Is it not possible that the Indians will never ask to be placed on the voters' list. If it be true, that is the strongest reason why their names should not be placed on the voters' list, contrary to their desire, why, in fact, they should be left to exercise their own judgment. And if Dr. Jones, the Credit Indians, or any other Indians, desire to avail themselves of that privilege, and assume all that it involves, voluntarily, all right. I do not oppose that, but I ask that the Indians themselves should be consenting parties.

Mr. McCALLUM. They will be consenting parties before they go to vote.

Mr. PATERSON. No; I tell the hon. gentleman that I believe, with reference to many of these Indians, unless their views have changed, as I knew them, such are their ideas of the peculiar relations which exist between them and the Government of this country that they will not vote, even if their names are put on the list, unless pressure is brought to bear on them. But they are compromised by their names being put there, and I ask that they should not be compromised. If it is simply an act of justice to the Indian, why go a step further, and allow the paid agent of the Government to put the Indian's name on the roll. I object to it; I think the Indians will object to it; I think the good sense of the committee will object to it, and I think my motion should be allowed to prevail.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not intend to delay the committee, but I wish to say a few words upon this question of granting the franchise to the Indian while he retains his tribal relation—not only granting the franchise to him but thrusting it upon him. I hold that the course taken by the Government in connection with the Indian clauses of this Bill is utterly indefensible. The hon. member for Monck says that the objection taken, that the Indian is not a tax-payer, is not a valid objection, because the Indian is a taxpayer by consuming goods subject to duty. I say that in the same sense every white man in the Dominion of Canada, of the full age of 21 years, is entitled to a vote, because he contributes to the revenue in the same way, and by this Bill you are discriminating against the white man and in favor of the Indian. The First Minister says it will not do to make distinctions and differences between Indians and the white men, in connection with the franchise, and that the Indians will consider this an affront. Well, as the hon. member for Brant has pointed out, we do make distinctions and differences in almost every paragraph of the legislation on the Statute Book of this country, relating to Indian affairs. We exempt the Indian from jury service, and from military service; and yet the Indian, living in the tribal relation, not liable to jury duty or military duty, the men of a tribe, of a distinct organisation, a quasi nationality within the bounds of this Dominion, is to have the franchise thrust upon them. Now, what are the antecedents of the Indian, if we treat the question ethnologically. How long is it since the ancestors of the Indians were barbarian. How far removed is he from the condition in which the red men of America were when this country was discovered by the Europeans? How far have they attained the position which men should attain before being entitled to the franchise. Sir, I wish to read one page from Francis Parkman's work on the Jesuits in North America, referring to the treatment of certain Jesuit nary they shall be required to ask that it shall be conferred missionaries by a certain tribe, whose descendants it is proposed to enfranchise.

Mr. MACMASTER. What year?

Mr. CHARLTON. The year 1642.

Mr. MACMASTER. That's a long time ago.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some time ago, I admit, but at that time our ancestors were civilised; they were worthy of being entrusted with the franchise, and not only so, but our ancestors were worthy of that privilege a thousand years ago.

Mr. IVES. How long is it since they burnt witches in Massachusetts?

Mr. CHARLTON. They may have done so, but they did not commit the enormities which were committed by the least barbarous and least cruel of the Indian tribes on this continent not one hundred years ago. This extract refers to the capture of certain Jesuit missionaries by the Mohawk tribe at Three Rivers. (The hon, gentleman here quoted from the work in question.) I do not claim that the Mohawks of to-day would practice the barbarities which were practised, in 1642 on the Jesuit fathers; but I do claim that it may be doubted whether people descended from the Mohawks, who were one of the most advanced of the Indian tribes, have attained that degree of advancement in civilisation which would fit them for the exercise of the franchise, and make them the peer of the Anglo-Saxons, and especially to warrant us in entranchising them against their will. Many of these people are pagans to day; they have their sun dances, their dog feasts, and their medicine feasts, and they indulge in various pagan rites, even in Ontario. The uniform usage in the United States with regard to the Indians is one that we may very well profit by. I believe that so long as the Indian retains his tribal relations he has no right to ask for enfranchisement, and the supposition may reasonably be, that he has no desire for it. Although the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) has referred to the fact that the State of Mississippi admits the evidence of Indians, so far as I know, both by the law of the United States themselves and the law of every State; in that country, where there is universal suffrage, where the negro is enfranchised, the uniform custom is that the Indian, in order to become a citizen of the United States and to have the franchise, must cease to be a member of an Indian tribe, must assume all the duties of citizenship, must hold property in his own name, and must be liable to be sued. I believe that is a proper distinction to make, and I believe, if we enfranchise the Indians in Canada in advance of this surrender of their tribal relations, we shall be going too fast. The fitness of the Indian, or of any descendant of a barbarous tribe of people, for the franchise, should not, in my opinion, be too readily accepted or supposed. The Indian, at least, should be required to ask for the boon which it is proposed to give him. Contrary to the principles of sound policy, it has been decided that the tribal Indians, under certain circumstances, shall be invested with the franchise. What is the next step in this discussion? The next step is the proposition of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who has had us great experience in Indian affairs as any member in this House, who has lived from his boyhood in a riding where a great number of Indians are congregated. It is the motion of that gentleman, urged with an eloquent speech, that if we are to enfranchise the tribal Indians we ought to require them, at least, to ask for that privilege before we invest them with it. I hold that that is a reasonable proposition, and that it is a safeguard both of the rights of the people and of the Indians themselves. It is absurd to decide that the tribal Indians shall be invested with the franchise, and then deny the motion of my hon. friend, that as a prelimiupon them. I hold that the hon. First Minister can do nothing less, in fairness, than to accept that proposal. To insist on thrusting the franchise upon the tribal Indian, without his asking for it, is an absurdity that should not be perpetrated, and that will not be in the interest of either the Indian or the white man.

Mr. DAVIES. I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but when my hon. friend who has just sat down read from the book of the historian, Parkman, a statement of the condition of the Indians in 1642, I thought he had taken the trouble to go very much further back than was necessary. I thought the contemporary records of our own country would enable us to ascertain the exact condition of barbarism in which the Indians live. I take the Free Press of the date of 8th June, 1885—

An hon. MEMBER. That is no authority.

Mr. DAVIES. Nothing is authority for the hon gentleman; but I am sorry to say it is a very sad authority for the unfortunate people, the account of whose murder I shall read. But the same despatch is in the Mail newspaper of this morning, and I suppose they will swear by that as gospel. In a despatch, dated Winnipeg, 8th June, I find the following:—

"A correspondent writing from Frog Lake gives a description of the scene upon arrival there of the Winnipeg Light Infantry on Queen's Birthday. The settlement consisted of the Roman Catholic Mission, a mill, and some eight or nine settlers' houses. The church, parsonage, mill, and every settler's house, were burned and levelled to the ground, and their contents strewn around. In the cellar of the parsonage, and guided there by the terrible smell, one of the most awful sights ever seen was witnessed. Four dead bodies were found huddled together in a corner. Two of the bodies were those of Father Fafard and Father Leflac, and another was that of a lay brother, and a fourth some one unknown. The corpses were horribly mangled. All four heads were charred with fire beyond recognition; the four hearts torn out; wide incisions had been made in the lower part of the stomachs (those who know the Indian method of torture will know for what purpose) and the feet and hands of some were missing. Every body was rotten with corruption, and when taken out of the cellar and laid upon the grass the sight was simply horrible. Strong men of the regiment cried like women."

This is a description, not of what took place in the year 1642, but what took place at the hands of a band of Indians, of the same class as those whom the hon gentleman proposes by this Bill to enfranchise and to put upon a par with the white men of this country. So far as the proposition to enfranchise the Indians is concerned, it is not at present before the House; but I desire, before I sit down, to emphasise the fact that the Opposition were not and are not opposed to the Indian exercising the franchise simply because he is an Indian. The Opposition have formulated the position they take in clear language, that is, that every capable and free citizen in this country, who has arrived at maturity and is a British subject, should, if not disqualified by law, have the right to exercise the franchise. What we opposed and oppose now is the enfranchisement of incapable citizens. What we asserted and assert now is that the right hon. First Minister himself, who now enfranchises these Indians, is the man who has disfranchised them. The hon. gentleman smiles, but since my advent in this House I have heard him declare that the Indians were not sufficiently advanced to be entrusted with the smallest share of municipal government. I have seen him carry into law an Act which describes these Indians as mere children, as wards of the State, incapable of holding any land of their own, incapable of making valid contracts, incapable and unfit to serve on juries, or to bear arms as volunteers, incapable and unfit to do any of those duties which every free citizen should be able and liable to discharge; and he ought to be able to discharge them before he can claim the right to be placed on the list of voters by this Parliament. If Parliament has deliberately declared the Indian to be a child, a ward of the State, and if it has, with the simple one: What prudent restraints should be cast upon that Indian when he is exercising the vote? Now. the amendment submitted by my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) involves three distinct propositions. The question for the committee to consider is: Are all those propositions fair and just? or are any of them unfair and unjust? What are the propositions? The committee is asked to assent, first, to the proposition that the Indian, if he is to have a vote, shall come forward and apply for it himself. What is there unfair or unjust in that? The hon. gentleman will remember that when you come to confer a right upon white citizens you go to the assessment rolls of the parish or municipality, and if there are no parishes or municipalities, as there are not in Prince Edward Island, you go to the poll books of the last election. You have some groundwork, some data to go on. But with the Indians there are no assessment rolls, no poll-book, no voters' lists, no tax-payers' lists. Therefore, we say, instead of going on these reserves and taking these Indians' names, which are not even known to white men, from the Indian agent, let those Indians who claim the right to vote come forward in their own person and demand it. If the Indians are what they are in my part of the country, a low, degraded race, incapable and unfit to exercise the franchise, hon, gentlemen opposite would be afraid to oppose this proposition; but if they are not, if there are any of them intelligent and capable of exercising the franchise, let them come forward and apply to be put on the list. I know what the Indians in the Maritime Provinces are like. I have heard hon, gentlemen here express their opinions about them; I know a dozen of hon. gentlemen who support this measure, but who are ashamed to express their opinions, because they know that the Indians there are a low, degraded race, unfit to exercise the franchise. We are told that in other parts of the Dominion they are as intelligent as the whites, and just as capable of exercising the franchise. Well, if they are, why object to this proposition. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) says there is no harm in putting on the assessment rolls 800 or 900 names, whether they exercise the franchise or not.

Mr. McCALLUM. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman declared that their names should be put on, and that they might exercise the franchise—

Mr. McCALLUM. I never mentioned the words "assessment roll" at all.

Mr. DAVIES. That was a mere slip of the tongue on my part; I meant the voters' list. If the hon, gentleman will permit me, I say he declared that all they wanted was to get the names of the Indian on the voters' list.

Mr. McCALLUM. If the hon, gentleman will allow me-

Mr. DAVIES. I will not allow the hon. gentleman's interruptions. He has deliberately chosen to take a meaning from my words which I did not intend to put on them.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not know what you intended to put; I know what you said.

Mr. DAVIES. I said that the hon, gentleman argued here for some time that there could not be any possible harm in adding a large number of names to the voters' list who never heretofore exercised—

Mr. McCALLUM. I argued nothing of the kind.

he can claim the right to be placed on the list of voters by this Parliament. If Parliament has deliberately declared the Indian to be a child, a ward of the State, and if it has, with said there could be no possible harm in putting a large gross inconsistency, it may be, now declared that he shall have a vote, the question before the committee is the fact, but gave the reason, because, he said, they would Mr. Charlon.

not vote afterwards, if they did not want to. How can he justify placing upon the lists hundreds of these men who never voted before, unless he has some sinister motive, some party motive, some motive not of good to the country, but possibly of gain to the party he follows and worships. That is the only reason. I believe in my heart the reason he wants to get the names on the voters' list is that he believes, and those associated with him believe, and I think the First Minister believes, that the Indian agent will have sufficient influence of a corrupt and sinster kind over the Indian bands, and will be able to compel them to vote in the way the Indian agent wishes, that is, in favor of the Government. I think the fact should be emphasised that the proposition, and the only one made by the hon. member for South Brant, is that, as you have given the Indian the right to vote, you should confine it to those who have the manliness and courage to come forward and ask it. Do not force the right to vote on men who do not want it; do not put hundreds of names on the voters' list of men who do not seek to be put there. It is all nonsense to talk about drawing a distinction between the white and the red man. That argument has been so fully presented that I will not go over it again. Every part of your legislation which has reference to Indians draws a broad distinction between the Indian and the white man. It treats the former as a child, as one not capable of controlling his own affairs. You have declared, time and again, that he is unfit to manage his own affairs, and you now seek to give him a share in the management of ours. The proposition is untenable; but the committee have accepted it, and we now seek to surround it with the safeguard, that the man who has never exercised the franchise and is wholly under the control of the Government agent, should, if he wants the franchise, come forward and ask for it himself. What is the second proposition involved in the amendment? It is, that if he is going to vote on property he will give such a description as will enable you to identify it. There are Indians half civilised, living on reserves granted by the Crown, and if they are going to vote on distinct parts of the reserve, which they claim to occupy, let them define the boundaries, so that a third party can verify the descriptions and find out whether they have the right to vote or not. Is there anything unjust in any one of those propositions? But your proposition simply involves this one broad fact, that an Indian agent, having 200 or 300 or 400 men on a reserve, may come forward himself and put all their unpronounceable names, which are no indication to white men that they occupy locations on the reserve, on the list, without giving any description of their location, so that no white man can identify the lots of those Indians, to find out whether there has been fraud or misrepresentation or not, and those Indians put on the list by the agent himself, controlled by the agent, under the Superintendent General, may and will be induced to vote in favor of the political party that they think will confer extra privileges upon them. The very statement of facts made by the hon. member for Bothwell should open the eyes of hon, gentlemen. The First Minister was not making his proposition in a hurry. He was laying his grounds carefully, for months and months back, before he made it, to curry favor with the Indians, taking steps, which I say are indefensible, with reference to moneys claimed as due them by the Indians, allowing the Indians to receive moneys which certainly he ought not to have allowed them to receive, except with the consent of those parties against whom the moneys are to be charged. And he had not a word to say in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell, when he read from the speech of the Finance Minister of Ontario. I shall read the closing part of that speech, which that hon, gentleman did not read.

Mr. McCALLUM. You may as well give us the whole of it.

Mr. DAVIES. It would be very much better if some hon, gentlemen who interrupt would endeavor to frame some kind of reply to the charge contained in the statement which has been read from the Treasurer of Ontario. That gentleman, after the statement which has been read, went on to say:

"But a few days before that took place, on the 21st October, we find an Order in Council had been passed by the Dominion Government, on the 7th of that month, on the recommendation of Sir John A. Macdonald, directing that this sum should be charged against the Province as a liability and credited to the Indian fund; and more, he directed that the Indians should be notified that the amount had been placed to their credit."

Careful man, prudent man, far-seeing man; he was not simply going to credit the money to the Indians, but he took care to notify the Indians that he had done it. I have done it; I, in my own proper person have appropriated the money, without asking Quebec or Ontario for their assent or consent, and what you get, you owe to me, the great chieftain of the Dominion Government, whom I ask you to vote for in the future, or for those whom I will name to you, the great chieftain whom you have christened "Old To-morrow." The Treasurer of Ontario goes on:

"And they have actually been allowed to draw a portion of the money."

I say this action is most astonishing, particularly when we consider that an arrangement was entered into between the Dominion and the Provinces, some years ago, that no charge should be made by the Dominion or allowed against the Provinces without the concurrence of the Provincial Treasurers. Yet, in defiance of that, we find this charge made against the Province, and to complicate matters, to enhance the difficulties of a settlement, we find the Indiana have been notified that the money has been placed to their credit, and that they have drawn some $6,000. Here is a large amount of public money, which, on the authority of the Finance Minister of Ontario, we learn has been drawn in direct defiance of an arrangement between the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario and the Dominion of Canada, placed to the credit of the Indians, appropriated by the Indians, under the authority and at the request of Sir John A. Macdonald, some months ago. It looks as if it was done to pave the way for this Bill which he has introduced, and to give him an argument to use when he goes before the Indians and asks them to record for him the votes which he, as the great chieftain, by this Bill hopes to confer upon them-nay, not hopes to confer upon them - the votes he is seeking by this Bill to force upon them, against their will. He will not accept the amendment of my hon. friend from Brant, that they shall have the votes only when they wish them. He will not accept the amendment, of my hon. friend from Brant, that they shall have the franchise only when they can show that they occupy a distinct part of the reserve. He will not accept the amendment, that they shall only have the franchise when they can show, on oath, that they are entitled to the vote. But he forces the vote upon them, after paving the way to their good graces and favour, so that, after forcing the vote on them, he may induce them to use it for his own purposes. This is a reasonable, fair and just amendment. There has not been an argument used against its acceptance, and it will present itself, to every thoughtful man in the country who reads it, as based on justice, fair in itself, and one which, if the committee desires only to grant the vote to those Indians who should have them, the committee would accept without reserve. If the committee votes it down in silence, on the other side of the House, it will show that those hon, gentlemen do not desire to confer the vote on the intelligent Indian, on the Indian who has got the status of a free citizen, but to force the vote upon a class of Indians who are not fit to exercise the franchise, and who, they hope, will be made to vote in favor of the party supporting the present Government.

Mr. MACMASTER. We are engaged in discussing a plain business question, as to whether the Indians of the Dominion of Canada, or rather of the old Provinces of the Dominion, have arrived at a stage of advancement which would warrant this Parliament in conferring upon them the right to exercise the franchise, which is exercised by every other man possessing the necessary qualifications throughout the country. I think, if anything could illustrate the extreme poverty of the pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is the fact that the hon. gentleman who last addressed the committee cited instances of alleged cruelties committed by Indians in the North-West, the truth of which has not yet been established—enormities which it is represented they quite recently committed, and which, it may turn out—as I trust, in good time, it will turn out—were never committed at all. But yesterday we were informed that Mrs. Delaney and Mrs. Gowanlock, the two unfortunate ladies who were seized by the Indians in the North-West, had been murdered or subjected to the grossest barbarities. The latest report from the North-West is that these two ladies have been treated kindly by the Indians. We have also heard from the other prisoners, who were supposed to have been murdered, that they have been treated kindly by the Indians in whose custody they were; and that, under circumstances of very great temptation, when the Indians were practically starving, when they were fired upon by our soldiers, in nearly every instance we find the whites were treated with the greatest care. But that argument, even if the atrocities existed, would only avail the hon. gentleman in the event of its being intended to extend the suffrage to the Indians of the North-West Territory to the savage tribes. It is not so intended. It is only to the Indians of the older Provinces.

Mr. CHARLTON. How was it when the Bill was introduced?

Mr. MACMASTER. Does not the hon. gentleman know perfectly well that there is no Bill introduced into this House that goes through in its entirety? Does he suppose that the House of Commons is to abdicate its functions as an advisory body? Does he suppose that every Bill goes through exactly as it is introduced? Nay, does he not know perfectly well that the Bills introduced before this House are submitted to the good sense of the House, and that the Bill which eventuates in an Act is the result of the deliberate wisdom of the House-not merely of one side of the House, not merely of the majority of the House, but of the best opinion of both sides of the House? Does he not know that, during this discussion, he and other hon. gentlemen opposite were invited by the First Minister to make their suggestions? Were they not told that if their suggestions were in keeping with the spirit of the Act, and contributed towards perfecting the measure, they would be adopted? I appeal to the committee whether, whenever those hon. gentlemen made suggestions which would contribute to the perfection of this Bill, they were not adopted by the leader of the Government. The argument of the hon, gentleman could only avail if we were going to extend the franchise to the savage Indians of the North-West. Nothing of the kind is contemplated. The First Minister, one evening, jocularly stated that the franchise would be extended to Strike-him-on the-back and Luckyman, and several of the other Indians in the North-West, who are opposed to the Government like hon. gentlemen opposite; and hon, gentlemen took it seriously, and not only so, but their principal organ, the Globe newspaper, took it seriously, and for weeks, after the First Minister said it was not the intention to extend the franchise to the savage tribes of the North-West, the hon. gentlemen, through their public organs they might have been confronted with the contradiction of the statement—their organs, and notably their leading organ. the Toronto Globe, sent through the length and breadth of the land the statement that it was the proposition of hon, gentlemen on this side to enfranchise the Indians of the North-West, when, in fact, nothing of the kind was the case. But if the hon, gentlemen wished to make an argument against the proposition to enfranchise the Indians existing in a particular state of affairs, they must have something better than the imaginary argument of the hon member from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and much more must they have a better and a more recent argument than the statement of the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who, in attempting to support the amendment of the hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), and to oppose the proposition of the Government, cites from Parkman, with reference to the condition of the Indians in 1642. Well, if there was anything necessary to prove that the hon, gentleman had no case it would be to cite the condition of the Indian in 1642.

Mr. DAVIES. They are the same brothers still.

Mr. MACMASTER. They may be the same brothers still; but will my hon, friend tell this House that the Indian has shown no capacity for development? Does the hon. gentleman forget that Tecumseb, an Indian, was practically a brigadier in the British army, and fought for British rights, the same rights which hon gentlemen opposite are pre-tending to support in this House? Will the hon. member for Brant tell me that the Indian whose name his constituency bears was not a noble specimen of the tribes which we now seek to enfranchise? Will he deny that many Indians residing in his own constituency to-day are the lineal descendants of Joseph Brant, one of the noblest Indians that ever was produced on this continent—a man who, not only in himself, but in his descendants, was well worthy of "the grand old name of gentleman?" The Indians of this country, and some in the United States, although they may not advance so quickly as the white men, although they may not have all the aptitudes for modern civilisation that white men have, though they may have some disadvan-tages incident to their peculiar constitution, are capable of advancement, and are advancing; and I say, Sir, that as white men and as Europeans, as soon as we find them capable of exercising the franchise, we would not be true to ourselves, and we would be unjust to the red men, if we did not extend to them the opportunity of having a voice in the Government of the country of which they are citizens, and which they have always been ready with their blood and valor to defend.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why not give it to the British Columbia Indians?

Mr. MACMASTER. It was contemplated to give it to the Indians of the old Provinces, and I have no doubt that in good time, when the British Columbia Indians show a greater stage of development, they will also receive the tranchise; and as I believe that development, education and culture, together with the possession of property, are the truest test of qualification for the franchise, I have no doubt that in proper time the Indians, and all other classes who are entitled intelligently to have their say in the public affairs of this country, will have the franchise. But why should hon, gentlemen go back to 1642 to cite the condition of the Indian? Is that any parallel to his condition at the present time? Will the hon, gentleman tell me that the Indians in his own county are cutting off thumbs to-day, are lacerating the breasts of women and committing those frightful atrocities, that Indians committed in 1642? If they are not so acting, then it is a false parallel drawn between these men and the Indians of 1642. Has my hon. -though they did not dare to do it in this House, where I friend not read the lessons of history? Does he not know it was more than one hundred years later than that before the trial system against which hon, gentlemen are now inveighing was broken down in one of the most civilised countries of the earth, the north of Scotland-not until 1745, when Cumberland's troops marched through the north of Scotland and broke down the clan system-that not until then did my noble countrymen, having succumbed to the fortunes of war, acquire all the advantages of civilisation, with regard to such matters as are now under discussion. Lord Chatham, with that great foresight that always characterised him, saw in those men susceptibilities for great mental as well as physical development, and at once sought to enlist them in the British army, and to afford them opportunities of empire; and I think time and experience have demonstrated that those men, in many instances, proved themselves to be the strongest members of the British army in more than one country on the face of the earth, and qualified for the most honorable positions. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is not one hundred years since women were burned as witches in Scotland and elsewhere. It is not one hundred years since a Roman Catholic did not dare to own a horse years ago. in Ireland. It is not much over fifty years since a Roman Catholic, even in civilised England, was not entitled to the ordinary rights, the ordinary civil rights, that are now so freely bestowed throughout the whole United Kingdom. My hon friend, in citing from the condition of Indian affairs in 1642, should see at once that the historical allusion has no bearing on this case. Those poor people may have been savages in that year, but he should not forget the development that has since taken place. He should not have forgotten that on many a hard-fought battlefield they were the allies of the British on this continent, they were the supporters of that very power we are now maintaining, and whenever the question of allegiance to the British sovereign was at stake, the Indian was found to be the faithful ally of Great Britain, whenever he was treated fairly. I think it is one of the greatest tributes to the wisdom of our treatment of the Indians that, while our Indians in the North-West, in their day of trouble, have acted with so much leniency and consideration towards their prisoners, we see, in the neighboring country, that where prisoners are taken by the savage tribes, their lives are not safe for a moment. I would say to my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), with regard to the progressive development of the Indian, what the poet said with regard to human progress, and I hope my hon, friend will take note of it:

> "This fine old world of ours is but a child, Yet in the go-cart; Patience! give it time to learn its limbs; There is a hand that guides."

And so there is a hand to guide the affairs of the Indian—but, Mr. Chairman, it is not the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. If hon. gentlemen opposite could keep the Indian in primeval degradation and savagery, in the condition of 1642, they would do it. If hon. gentlemen could possibly extend the franchise to the other Indians in the North-West opposed to the Government, it might possibly suit their purposes better. The object of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and of the hand that guides, and I trust will long guide, is that when the Indians have shown, by progress, by development, by thrift, by culture, that they have acquired—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACMASTER. Hon. gentlemen sneer at the Indians; of course they do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We do not.

Mr. MACMASTER. Hon. gentlemen sneer at the Indians, I repeat. They are not ready to recognise that there has been any building up of the Indians from the place which they occupied in 1642 to the place which they occupy in the constituencies of North Norfolk and Bothwell, and some other constituencies. That is a delicate tribute paid by hon. gentlemen opposite to the condition of the Indians in their own particular constituencies. They have a right to their judgment, and the Indians will have a right to their judgment also. But I was proceeding to say that the hand that guides on this side of the House, the hand that guides in this House and in this country, and the hand that has guided in this country for thirty years, with the exception of some five years, during which period the affairs of this country were misguided, provides: That when the Indians have shown, by progressive development, by the acquisition of habits of industry and thrift, that they have become peaceful citizens and have respectively acquired property in a separate location to the extent of $150, that Indian shall have a vote. You cannot change, in some respects, the conditions of his origin. He is an Indian, though an improved Indian. My own ancestors in the Highlands of Scotland had not escaped from the bonds of savagery 150

Mr. BLAKE. They stole cattle.*

Mr. MACMASTER. I have no doubt my noble ancestors stole cattle and proved their powers in war by going down to the southern country; and no doubt they crossed the channel to where my hon. friend's ancestors were. They proved their prowess by the peculiar methods adopted at the time. But what are we proposing to do here? We say this: The Indians, as a tribe, possess certain property. It is theirs; it is not the property of the Government; it is the property of the Indians themselves.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why, then, do you not let them sell it and handle it?

Mr. MACMASTER. We have had experience in past years on this subject. This is not a new question, and it has been determined that the Indians' property shall be taken care of in a peculiar, particular way, for their special benefit. Do hon, gentlemen say those methods are wrong? No. Those hon, gentlemen cannot make that statement. But what is proposed on this side of the House is this: That when an Indian has shown that he has, within the tribal property, a fixed location, not a vicarious occupation, and when he has placed on that piece of property improvements to the value of $150, and thereby given proof of his thrift and industry, he shall have a vote. For my own part, I am not afraid to go to my county and defend that proposition before my Highland constituents; and no hon, gentleman on this side will have the slightest fear in going before his constituents and defending what is but simple justice to the Indian. The whole question is, whether an Indian, who has given such proof of thrift and industry, in putting improvements on his property to the extent of $150, shall not be entitled to the tranchise? I do not wish to make comparisons; but do we not give to the fishermen of the Lower Provinces the right to vote upon possession of property in nets and certain other property, amounting altogether to $150?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MACMASTER. It may be there is some real estate with it; but the whole is put together, and if the nets, boats and other property are, together, worth $150, the fisherman is entitled to vote.

Mr. KIRK. He must own real estate in fee simple.

Mr. MACMASTER. If an Indian has $150 worth of improvements on a fixed location he should be entitled to vote. Hon, gentlemen opposite want the Indian submitted to indignity, by asking that he shall be compelled to come up to the revising officer and ask to be put on the roll; they want to go even further, and compel the Indian to give proof of his qualification. We must treat fairly the Indian, politically, and if he is entitled to vote, as is a white man, we must give him the vote; and if, having come from the degraded condition which he occupied in 1642, referred to by the hon. member for North Norfolk, the Indian lives peaceably and quietly on his reserve, in a fixed location, which is practically the Indian's, and of which he has a much better tenure than that of a tenant, and has made improvements to the value of $150, he is justly entitled to vote, and I believe the country will sustain his obtain-

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have been accused' most unjustly and unreasonably, on various occasions, of casting reflections on the Highlanders of this country. I need not say that nothing would be further from my desire than to cast any aspersions on a gallant race, among whom, I am happy to say, I numbered then, and I have numbered since, a great many personal friends and excellent supporters. ·Nothing that I have said, I must observe, has at all equalled the reflections thrown on those gallant men by the hon. gentleman, who claims descent from them, and who has told us that 150 years ago the Highlanders were savages, that 150 years ago the grandfather of the hon. gentleman he spoke of so much was a savage. If I had said so the whole vials of wrath of hon. gentlemen opposite would have been poured out, and deputations would have come up from Glengarry. It would have been safer for me to have fallen into the hands of Pie a pot or Big Bear than into the hands of the constituents of the hon, gentleman. The hon, gentleman was good enough to tell us that among other claims the Indians, whom we proposed to enfranchise, had upon us, was this, that they had, in times gone by, been allies of Great Britain on many a field and in many a conflict in this country. He was good enough to tell us that one of Lord Chatham's proudest boasts was that he had converted the so called savage propensities of his Highland ancestors to good use and turned them into some of the most gallant soldiers that Great Britain ever possessed. But he might have told us also that in all Lord Chatham's flights of eloquence there is not one more famous or more deservedly famous than those words in which he rebukes the folly and wickedness of the then British Government in launching their Indian allies upon men who formerly had been British subjects. I recommend the hon. gentleman to study once again the all but dying speech of Lord Chatham, in which he declared that if he had been an American instead of being an Englishman he would never have laid down his arms as long as the savages and foreigners were allied with British subjects in the endeavor to subdue the Americans.

Mr. MACMASTER. The hon, gentleman is doing an injustice to Lord Chatham. He did not quote his words correctly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. His language is on record, and no condemnation could be stronger or more just than that which Lord Chatham launched against Lord North and his colleagues for their gross violation of all propriety, of all sense of Christian honor, when they loosed the savages of the border settlements upon those who had been British subjects, acts condemed equally strongly, as I well know, by many of the U. E. Loyalists, whom those same men had driven to take refuge in this country. I speak of what I know, because I have seen, in the old records which still remain, very strong condemnation of the British Government in making use of Indian modes of warfare and Indian allies to subdue that revolt.

Mr. MACMASTER. We are not justifying those atrocities in order to prove the right of the Indian to vote. Mr. MACMASTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; the hon. gentleman is not justifying the atrocities which were then committed on the revolted colonists of North America. He is occupy. ing himself in justifying an attempt to commit other atrocities in this country, under the goise and color of law, which, in the ideas of all right-minded persons, are even worse, are even likely to produce greater ultimate injuries to this community, than the atrocities condemned by Lord Chatham. But I am glad there are some points in which we can agree with the hon. gentleman. He tells us there is no doubt there is a hand that guides these Indians, and that is the hand of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. We do not doubt that in the least. We know perfectly wellmy hon. friend behind me (Mr. Paterson) will know to his cost, I am afraid, whose is the hand-from whose hand the weapon comes which is destined to strike him out of the place which he has so long and honorably filled in this House. Still, I am inclined to think that, as my hon. friend has already baffled the efforts of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs in another way, he may still prove himself more than a match for all attempts made by Act of Parliament to turn my hon friend out of the Parliament of Canada. Now, what does my hon friend propose by the amendment? And let me say here, again, that there is no member of the Reform party in Canada who objects to Indians, as Indians, exercising the franchise. They are perfectly willing to sustain and support the hon, gentleman in any measure which he chooses to introduce for the purpose of giving votes to Indians who are governed by the same laws, who are subject to the same conditions as their white countrymen. Let every Indian who is willing to submit himself to white laws as unreservedly as the white man have the franchise, if he possesses the proper qualification which is required from the white man in order to give him the franchise. But we object that while, for all other purposes, for all ordinary purposes of life, you treat the Indian as a child, for the purpose of giving votes to the Superintendent General he is to be treated as a fully grown man and as a rational creature. You will not allow an Indian to make a will, to sell a piece of property, to treat of his own affairs, in the way that you permit an ordinary white man; you treat him as a minor, as a ward; you subject him to all manner of restrictions, except only when you want to get his vote in particular localities, for the purpose of discomfiting certain particular members of Parliament or strengthening the seats of other members of Parliament. Those are the conditions on which the Indian becomes a fully grown and rational man, while for all other purposes he remains a child, under the tutelage and protection of the Superintendent General. By the bye, I may call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Glengarry to this fact, that in all his speech, from beginning to end, I did not observe that he said one word on the amendment now before the House. Now, what is that amendment? It simply asks that the Indian should, of his own free will and motion, come forward and ask for a vote. Is that too hard a condition? Is it too much to ask that before the Indian shall vote he shall ask for the right

Mr. MACMASTER. He will do that at the polls.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What petitions have we had from Indians asking for the franchise? There may Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. be a letter or two from particular friends of the Superintendent General, but outside of that we certainly have had no evidence. We have no evidence in the various voluminous reports submitted to us by the Superintendent General, or in the voluminous reports made by his agents at various times, which, so far as they make any allusion to the question at all, go to prove that, in the opinion of the Superintendent General and his officers, the Indians, so far from desiring to have the franchise, are not fit and do not want to be trusted with even the control of their own municipal affairs. What does the amendment propose? It simply asks for two things. First of all, it asks that the Indians who are to be enfranchised should themselves signify their desire to be enfranchised. Well, Sir, is that unreasonable or unfair? Is it not right and proper that those who have never exercised the franchise before, if they are really desirous, as appears to be assumed by the hon. gentleman opposite, of obtaining this privilege, should ask for it. And my hon, friend's amendment also proposes that the particular pieces of property on which they are to obtain a vote should be set off in such a fashion that they may be identified. Now, I speak under correction, but I think that, as a matter of fact, in most of these reserves no division, no survey, has ever been made of the interior portion of the reserves. We have simply set off large tracts of many thousands of acres, and the Indians have, to a great extent, occupied these in common, and although, in process of time, certain small sections may be set off for this man or that, nobody but the Indian agent, or some men of the tribe themselves, can, by any possibility, know what the particular portion of the property is as to which any one of them would qualify. There is great force in another remark which was made here, that knowing as little as we do of these Indians it would be a matter of the extremest difficulty to identify them, in the case, at any rate, of those Indians who are still in a more or less pagan condition, and to decide whether this or that particular man who presented himself was or was not the particular Indian who had been qualified, under the Bill, to receive his franchise. If there is no design on the part of the Government to abuse this provision they would be quite ready to accept the perfectly reasonable proposal of my hon. friend; and if they refuse a proposal so reasonable, if they insist, on their own free will and proper motion, on conferring votes on certain Indians, whether they like it or not, we can only, after all we have seen, draw the conclusion that the Government, in this matter, are not in the slightest degree actuated by any desire to give votes to the Indians, as Indians, but simply are desirous of obtaining control of a certain number of voters who, in a disputed election between whites, may be able to turn the balance. I took occasion, at an earlier stage of this debate, to point out that if it was thought desirable for any reason that the Indians, as Indians, should be represented in this Parliament, and their numbers were sufficient to entitle them to representation, they might obtain it, by simply associating together their various bands and giving them a vote. I did not pretend to say there was anything in their position or in the position of this country which rendered it necessary that that should be done; but I did point out that if the object was to give Indians representation in this House that was the way to give it, and not by giving them a vote, which will be of very little use to them, and will only be used to decide between the votes of white men. Now, it has been denied, again and again, that the First Minister, when this measure was introduced, designed to take power to enfranchise a vastly larger number of Indians than those residing in the older Provinces. Let us see what actually did pass on the subject. In the very earliest part of this debate, as reported in Hansard:

"Mr. M(LLS. What we are anxious to know is, whether the hongentleman proposes to give other than enfranchised Indians votes?

Well, he may have altered his mind since then, as he has in a great many of the details of this Bill; but it is not open for him or his followers to maintain, without contradiction, that when this Bill was originally brought before us the Premier did not intend to include a larger number of Indians than those residing in the older Provinces. It was only when he found that public opinion would not consent to his giving the vote to those other classes of Indians that he withdrew it. It was not, in any respect, because the Bill was so loosely drawn as to include them, but because he tound it necessary in this, as in a great many other cases, to recede from the position he originally intended to take. As my hon, friend remarks, the prowess displayed by Poundmaker, and Pie-a-pot, and Big Bear had probably more to do with inducing him to limit the rights to be granted to the Indians than any argument, I am afraid, that was employed on this side. I repeat, for the last time, that we do not object in the least, if the First Minister sees his way to remove the disabilities under which the Indians now labor, and to put them on the same footing as their white follow-citizens, that all such Indians should receive votes; all we do object to is, that you should treat the Indians for all other purposes as the mere wards of the Superintendent General, but for the purpose of exercising the highest right which white men possess, and for that purpose only, you should treat them as persons who have fully come to their majority, and are capable to understand and form a fair and honest opinion upon questions of the greatest importance, not only to the Indians but to the whole population of Canada.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would not say a word, but the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) misrepresented what I said. As usual, he started by misrepresenting what I did say, by building a man of straw, and then knocked it down. The hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat did not explain this amendment as far as it goes. It requires the Indian to give the whole valuation of his property before he can be put on the voters' list, and yet we do not ask that of the white man. That is what I object to. Hon, gentlement are not satisfied with all they said on the second reading of the Bill, and with all they have said for the last seven weeks; they discussed this Indian question for three weeks; and now, after the House has adopted the principle of enfranchising the Indians, they are trying by a side wind, to prevent the Indians being placed on the voters' list.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has followed his leader in his method of treating this question. He says we try to make an invidious distinction between the Indian and the white man. Who has made the invidious distinction between the Indian and white man? Is it we? Is it not the great "guiding hand," the great Manitou, the great To-morrow? Is there a man on this side who has said that he does not want the Indian treated in the same way as the white man? We have said, and have shown by our votes, that we are willing and anxious to enable the intelligent Indians of Canada to become citizens of the country. But the hon. gentleman, the great "guiding hand," would not allow them to become citizens of Canada. He has refused, time and again, to allow them to become citizens; but, he says, although I will not let them be citizens, I will make them voters; I will allow them to out vote people who are citizens. I will make use of these wards of the Government, who are in the position of children in a go-cart, as the hon. member for Glengarry so neatly expressed it, when polling time comes. The men who, he says, are not fit to be the equals of Canadians in any other respect of citizenship, he is going to make our equals at the polls. That is an insult to us, and it is an insult equally to the Indians. The honmember for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) has told us of the past prowess of the Indians, and said a great many true and

"Mr. MILLS. This will include the Indians in Manitoba and British Columbia?

deserved things of the Indian character; but what is the answer to all that? The answer is, that his leader does not believe the Indian fit to be a citizen. He would not give to him the privileges he gives to the negro, privileges which have always been given to the negro, even when he came here as a fugitive from slavery, bearing all the degradation of slavery. Who are making inviduous distinctions against the Indian? Is it we, who wish to make him a citizen? Or they, who treat him worse than the negro escaped from slavery? It is unfair, unjust, unparliamentary, in view of the facts, to try to stir up prejudice against hon. gentlemen on this side amongst those people whom the right hon. gentleman wishes to have the vote. It is not we who want to keep them in degradation. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McMaster) charged us with the desire to keep the Indians in "perpetual degradation and savagery." Have not Liberal Governments shown themselves as willing to allow Indians to become citizens as any Conservative Government? Have not the Liberal party agreed to the proposition that Indians might become citizens? But what we object to is, not the admission of the Indian to citizenship, but the admission of the Indian, while he is not a citizen, to rights which are the property of citizens and of citizens only. There is another argument. The hon. member for Glengarry says the Indians' property is theirs. It is not the property of any of those individul Indians who are going to vote upon it. Why cannot they sell it, if it is their property? was asked of the hon. gentleman, and he replied: Because the best wisdom of this House has decided that the Indians' property shall be taken care of in a parti-cular way, that it should be in the guardianship of the Government, and managed for him, as the property of other minors is managed. Here is the answer to his own statement. The property is not the Indian's, in the ordinary sense of the word. The tribal Indian is a mere user of the property while he is allowed to use it by the Indian agent. He cannot even hold his location without the consent of the Indian agent, and it comes to this, that the Indian cannot have that location which is to qualify him for a vote, except by consent of the agent of the Superintendent General. The wisdom of the House is acknowledged by the hon, member for Glengarry, which has decided that the Indians are not fit to own property. Now, he tells us that the property is theirs. He knows they cannot sell it; he knows they cannot sell the produce of their farm in the way an ordinary person can, but he seems to think the Indian should have something of value to sell, and now he proposes to give him something to sell, and his leader proposes to give him something to sell, and that something is the franchise. There is progressive development for you! The Indian has got along in the world; but it is certainly a new way to begin by giving him, in the first place, that valuable commodity which is generally supposed to be the last reward of thrift and industry, the highest crown of citizenship, the greatest right of freedom—the franchise. I am surprised to hear such an argument from a gentleman who is generally so clear in his views as the hon. member for Glengarry; but my surprise at his urging that argument is lessened when I find one other extraordinary statement he has made. When I find him telling this House that the Highlanders of Scotland, 150 years ago, the heroes of whom Scott has written in prose and poetry, whose names are household names over the civilised world, the synonyms of heroism, of everything glorious, of valor and remarkable intelligence, were savages, I am astonished at nothing he can say. I have known a great many Scotchmen. I represent a constituency composed almost as largely of Scotchmen as the constituency of Glengarry, and I cannot believe, even on his peculiarly highland constituency, that his ancestors, 150 them made citizens, but without success. My hon friend years ago, were savages. I know what is in them; I know from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) has urged, in defence what they would be, even without the education and privi- of the Premier, what that gentleman has not urged Mr. CASEY.

leges they have at the present day, and I know that they would not be savages in the sense the Indian is a savage. It is an insult to any one having any Scotch blood in his veins to say that the people of that country, 150 years ago, were savages. Did they scalp women and children? Did they murder priests, and cut them into small pieces? Is that the kind of people who inhabited the Highlands 150 years ago? I think not; but that is the kind of savages we are discussing now; and when the hon. gentleman said the Highlanders were savages, we know he was comparing them with the Indians of 1640, with the Indians of old times in Canada. with the Indian of to-day, on the far western plains. The object of the hon, gentleman in making this assertion is not far to seek. He, no doubt, intended to show what the Indian was capable of in the way of development. He said the Indian has not got very far yet, to be sure, but there is no knowing what he may come to. Why, my ancestors. 150 years ago, were savages, says he, yet here am I to-day! One hundred and fifty years from to day the Indian may become a Q.C., a member of Parliament, a representative of a Highland constituency! The argument does seem to have force when put in that way, but the deduction he drew from it did not amount to a great deal. He said the Highlanders were never civilised until their tribal system was broken up by British arms. Does he propose forcibly to break up the tribal system of the Indians? Is he going to send soldiery into the Indian reserves and forcibly break up the Indian tribal system, in order that they may become civilised? I do not think that is his proposal. If not, the argument goes for nothing. At any rate, although the tribal system was not broken up at the time he speaks of, among the Highlanders, the Highlander of that day. who was as independent a man as walked on the face of the earth, possessed the very essence of independence and self-government and was far from being in the same position as the Indian on the reserve. Where was the "guiding hand" that ruled the Highlander of 150 years ago? Where was the guiding hand that Rob Roy submitted to? Was there a General Superintendent of Indian Affairs over the Highlander of 150 years ago? I think, if there had been, the "guiding hand" would have become paralysed before it had guided my hon. friend's ancestors very long. There is no parallel between the cases. The Highlander of that day had everything to qualify him for the franchise, except the education and the training which his descendants now possess. He had the personal independence, the fealty to his chieftain, the intense patriotism, the love of country which fitted him for self-government. Can it be pretended that the tribal Indian has the same qualifications now, even after generations of training? Even my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), with the opinion he holds of his ancestors, will not maintain that. But to come down from these high and lofty topics to consider more closely the position of the Indian, leaving the highflown comparisons that have been indulged in, in what position does the Indian stand to-day? The leader of the House said early in this debate that he is an ally; he does not know whether he is fully a British subject, and therefore liable to military service. Are we going to give votes to all our allies? When England and France were allies the French did not exercise the franchise in England nor the English in France. If he treats them as allies he cannot give them the franchise; if they are not allies, but subjects, they should be citizens.

Mr. SPROULE. If the French allies had been citizens they would have had votes.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; and if our Indian allies became citiword, the word of a Highlander, the representative of a zens they would have votes. We have asked to have in his own favor. He has asserted that when the Premier solemnly told an hon, member that Pie-a-pot and Poundmaker and Big Bear and Strike-him-on-the-back would have votes, and allowed the statement to be put in Hansard, he was making a joke. The hon gentleman has made many a joke on serious subjects. He has treated many of the best interests of the country as a huge joke, but we cannot let him off on a joke on this subject, for did he not propose an amendment to exclude these people, to exclude Poundmaker and Big Bear and Stab him underthe ribs? If the wording of the Bill did not include them, why did he move an amendment to exclude them? He has shown, not only by his statement which is now said to have been a joke, but by the amendment which he certainly moved in earnest, that he intended to include these men, and if they had put off their rebellion until next year we would have had a rebellion of the hon. gentleman's constituents instead of a rebellion of homeless, wandering savages. I notice that hon, gentlemen are groaning. It must be described as a groan to make it parliamentary. No doubt they groan at this exposition of the hon. gentleman's policy. I am sure many of them who are making that peculiar noise are as much disgusted with that policy as I am myself; so, as they are not permitted to express their disgust by word of mouth, they express it by their heels. I am glad to find that it cannot be repressed, and that, if their condemnation cannot find issue by one extremity of the body, it finds expression at the other. The hon member for Glengarry has said further, that it was the greatest tribute to the good management of the Indians, under present auspices, that they had treated their prisoners leniently. It certainly is a point to be scored in favor of those Indians, but it is only under present management that Canadian Indians under British rule have ever taken prisoners at all, or been in a position to treat citizens of Canada otherwise that leniently. After all the talk about the development of the Indian, even in Old Canada, I do not find that those best qualified to speak about his condition think him qualified for the franchise. I have said that the Indians on the Muncey reserve are among the most intelligent in Canada; that individuals among them were as intelligent and well educated as any white men; but I have also said frankly that I did not think them, as a body, in a fit condition to exercise the franchise. I find that the head of a great missionary institution among those Indians, which is subsidised by this Government, endorsed the view I have expressed. At a public meeting of the Methodist Conference in Chatham, I find the following took place, as reported in the Globe:-

"The greatest sensation yet produced during the present Conference was that occasioned by the Rev. Abel Edwards, of Muncey, in his address on the report of Principal Shepherd, of the Mount Elgin Industrial Institute. In the course of his remarks the reverend gentleman denounced, in strong language, the Franchise Bill, as one for which the Indians are neither qualified nor prepared. (Applause.) If enforced, he said, it would work great damage and produce no good results. (Cheers.) If the Government had, 20 years ago, extended the benefits of the common school system to the Indian, and enforced attendance thereat, the Indians might be in a better position to become enfranchised; but now they are not, and the prospects are they will not be for many years to come. He was greeted with prolonged applause throughout his address."

This was at a meeting of the Methodist Conference at Chatham, Ontario, on Saturday last. The report of Mr. Shepherd is not given here, but I judge, from this, that the reverend gentleman's address is in harmony with the tenor of that report. Now, Sir, if the Indians on that, which is one of the most advanced and progressive reserves in the country, who are so far developed as to have an Orange hall, are in this condition, what must be the case amongst other Indians, not so far advanced as they are in politics or education? The calm decision of public 299

"a guiding hand," who is not a citizen, who is a child in a go cart, who has no possibility of giving independent expression of his views, who cannot even have the franchise. unless the right hon, gentleman gives him a location ticket -an Indian, under these circumstances, is not a proper person to be entrusted with the franchise. This is altogether apart from his intelligence. I say if he was as wise as the Premier, as eloquent as the member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), and as scientific as the member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), he would not be fit to have the franchise while he is situated as he is at present. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) asks that more than ordinary efforts should be made to ascertain whether the Indian who is to be put upon the list is really qualified under the terms of this Act. The white man is not in a position to have his vote put on the list by an agent who has control of him; white men cannot be put on in shoals by Indian agents, but the Indians can be. The revising bar-rister's oath, we are told, is a safeguard. What is his oath? To make up the voters' list according to the information in his possession. Will not the instructions of the Indian agent be information? Will not the information sent down to him, perhaps from Ottawa, be that which he will regard as the best kind of information? I say there is every reason for asking for more safeguards in the case of an Indian voter than in the case of a white voter, and for these reasons I am in favor of the amendment of my hon, friend from Brant

Mr. CAMPBELL (Renfrew). I was very sorry to hear my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) speak so disparagingly of our countrymen, and compare them to savage Indians of 150 years ago. He was mistaken. I am sure the Highlanders, for 400 or 500 years past, were not at all what he represented them to be. They were intelligent men, and the hon. gentleman ought to be ashamed to speak of them as he did. What excuse can he make to his constituents in Glengarry, when he returns to them, for what he has said about them to-day?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think the amendment of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) ought to receive the assent of this House. It does not exhibit any party bias or leaning; it does not display the guiding hand of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and consequently we will probably have the opposition of those who follow the Superintendent General in this House. Now, Sir, the Liberal party in this country always endeavor, and have always endeavored, to elevate men, to lift them up, to make them better men, and to do what is best for the country. That has been their policy in the past. That has been the guiding policy of the Liberal party, to elevate the standard of morality, and to do what is best in the interest of the country. Now, Sir, the amendment that is proposed is of such a character that it commands the assent of every patriotic Canadian. It is quite plain that the purport of this Bill is that every tribal Indian located on a reserve is to have the franchise, is to be guided by the Superintendent General, to vote as he desires. I consider this an assumption of a power which no party should attempt to arrogate, in this age of the world. I consider that it is an immoral practice to resort to for the purpose of obtaining power and of securing a perpetuation of power. It matters not to me which party attempted to do a thing like that, I would condemn it; but I do not believe that the Opposition in this House would ever endeavor to keep themselves in power by any such means. The proposition of the hon, member for South Brant gives to the Indians who are possessed of the property qualification, the right to vote when they desire to vote, and imposes upon them the duties of citizens, and it is something that I hope will be upheld by this House. It is more preferable than giving all the Indians living on reserves a right to vote. I politics or education? The calm decision of public say such is a vicious proposition, and ought not to be opinion, no doubt, will be that the Indian who is under sustained by this House. Why, Sir, the idea that a Government is going to create votes, is going to give the franchise to men whom it will force to vote for themselves, in order to keep themselves in power, appears to me to be a most cowardly thing. Although this measure has been long discussed, the full extent of its villany has not yet been disclosed. beginning to see the hidden hand, and great good is going to be done by the able discussion that has taken place, as it will serve to show the country the position which the Government have chosen to take in order to create votes to keep themselves in power. The idea of giving votes to men who are otherwise disqualified, who are not citizens, who cannot make a will without the assent of the Superintendent General, who do not pay taxes, is a preposterous one; and yet hon. gentlemen propose to give these men votes which will offset those of our citizens, an action which is an outrage and which the people will not stand. The observations made by the hon member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) I am here to oppose and resent. I have a noble band of Highland men dwelling in my riding, and they will not be satisfied if I do not resent the idea that their ancestors were savages, like Indians, a few short years ago. I deny it. The Highlanders showed intelligence and culture long anterior to that period; and I cannot understand how the First Minister, who is of Highland blood, should have allowed a prominent supporter to make that remark, without himself rising and correcting the mis-statement. On behalf of the noble Highlanders I represent, I hurl back that accusation as one unworthy of any hon. member of this House, and I will not permit it to be made without resenting it as being an insult to the whole Highland race in Canada. I remember, a few years ago, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) made some statement, mild in comparison with that which the hon. member for Glengarry has made; and what was the result? That statement was published in my own constituency, in the Gaelic language—and it received the assent and support of the First Minister, and I believe of his Minister of the Interior (Sir David Macpherson) also. I do not know but that he is Minister yet—he is not here now; but I am sure after the determined resistance he made to the supposed slight cast by the hon. member for South Huron, he would not have consented to allow such a slander as that pronounced by the hon, member for Glengarry, to have passed without resenting it; and I repeat that I am surprised that the First Minister should have allowed a prominent supporter to have made such a charge against any class of the people of this country without resenting it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the proposition of the hon. member for Brant is a reasonable one. I agree with the First Minister that I am opposed to invidious distinctions. It has been said that the Indians should not be called upon to apply to the revising officer to be placed on the list. It must be remembered that the wage-earner has to make this application, and why should there be an invidious distinction between the Indian and the wage-earner in this respect? Why should the Indian be placed in a better position than the wage-earner? For while the Superintendent General will make application to have the Indians on a certain reservation placed on the voters' list, the wage-earners will have individually to spend their time in order to get their names put on the list. The hon, member for Glengarry stated that suggestions were invited by the First Minister from hon. members on this side of the House with a view to improve the Bill. The question of enfranchising tenant farmers' sons was urged from this side of the House, and was discussed. But the Bill is now almost through committee, and those persons will not be allowed to vote. The sons of manufacturers, who are tenants, are also excluded. Why should such men, who earn their daily go out in defence of the country, be debarred the privilege of the franchise, while tribal Indians on reserves, who pay no taxes, are allowed the right to vote? It is an outrage on the country. Hon gentlemen opposite say there is no evil intent in enfranchising the Indians. There must be some special reasons, and the main reason is that hon. gentlemen opposite expect to obtain a political advantage. The hon, member for Glengarry has let the cat out of the bag. The Indians of the plains are not to be enfranchised. because they are opposed to the Government, while the Indians of the older Provinces, who are given the right to vote, are supposed to be in favor of the Government. If it were thought that they would vote against the Government, no doubt the Bill would yet be amended, and they would be struck out. This Indian clause is also an attempt to strike down some members of this House who have discharged nobly their duty as representatives of the people, who are respected by both sides, whose names will be handed down to future generations, as men who nobly did their duty on the floor of this House. There is no other object in adopting the Indian clause, because the Indians have not asked for it. They are going to be forced into harness; they are to be told, first, that they have votes, and if they do not record their votes they will be looked upon as opponents, and the result will be that they will be drawn up, as a band, and compelled to exercise the franchise in the interest of the Government. I say that the revising barrister provision of this Bill is bad enough; the Indian vote is worse, and the two together are sufficient to condemn the Government that introduced them, in the minds of every independent man in this country. I hope the day is not far distant when the people will open their eyes, when, in place of supporting legislation of this kind and allowing it to go unpunished, legislation which fetters their rights and liberties, they will rise up and condemn it. It is high time that the people woke up to the fact that their rights are being fettered and trampled upon. I say that every man on this side has a right to express his opinion candidly and forcibly on this question, and while we have a single son of a European race twenty-one years of ago, who is not permitted to exercise the franchise, it is a gross insult that you should allow the Indian on the reserve the right to vote, while you deprive the sons of tenant farmers and the sons of tenant manufacturers from exercising their franchise. This shows, on the face of it, that there is an object in view. If the tenant farmers sons could be gathered together on a reserve, in a group where they could be influenced to vote in favor of Government candida'es, they would be enfranchised; but because they cannot be controlled like the Indians, they do not get votes. Mr. Chairman, I could not permit this thing to go through its last stage without entering my solemn protest against it.

Mr. MACMASTER. An attempt has been made by certain hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent my meaning, in the remarks which I made to the House to night. I do not attach very great weight to those statements, because I think I can defend myself before any Highland audience in which I my chance to appear. While I described the state of savagery which existed in byegone years in Scotland, a fact which, historically speaking, cannot be doubted, I also pointed out the progressive development of the people of that country to one of the foremost nations in Europe, and hon, gentlemen cannot deny it. The hon, member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), far from recognising such development in the remark he made, far from recognising that the Highland race to which I belong, and of which I am as proud as any hon, gentlemen in this House or outside of it—far from recognising the great progress they made, and that they are now one of the most cultivated nations on the wages, perform the duties of citizens, and volunteer to earth, producing most eminent men in every walk of life, stig-Mr. Landerkin.

matised them as still possessing the "predatory instincts," practically characterising them by that remark, as possessing the old instincts which they possessed when they were a savage race, and as carrying those instincts down to a later time. I repudiate here, as it has been repudiated elsewhere, the insinuation so made against the Highlanders; and I take it as a displacement of this debate for the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to stand up here and profess to vindicate the Highland character—to say, on behalf of the Highlanders in his constituency, that he dissented from the remark of the member for Glengarry against the Highland race. I made no such charge against the Highlanders. I spoke of the facts of history; I recognised the progress of that race, and I equally enter my dissent against the statement that their acts or conduct are characterised them in their early days.

Mr. CHARLTON. What the hon. gentleman did was to compare the Highlanders of 150 years ago with the Mohawks of 1642.

Some hon, MEMBERS. That is false.

Mr. CHARLTON. He compared them with the savage Mohawks of the seventeenth century.

Mr. MACMASTER. I made no such statement.

Mr. MILLS. What the hon, gentleman did was to refer to a statement of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. The hon, member for North Norfolk had referred to the acts of the Mohawk Indians in 1642, and what the hon, gentleman did was to argue that the Mohawks of to-day were not to be judged by those of 1642. He said: Look at me; my ancestors were savage Highlanders 150 years ago. He described the Highlanders of 150 years ago, and he said if these savages produced such a splendid specimen of a man as the member for Glengarry, what may we expect will be the Mohawks of to-day. The Indians have been progressing for ninety years more than the Highlanders, and if I, in 150 years, have become such a splendid specimen of a man from the Highland race, what may we not expect from the voters of Brantford, whose ancestors committed the depredations in 1642. That was the argument of the hon. gentleman, and if it was more, he was simply arguing that the Highland race were a progressive race; that 150 years ago they were a nation of savages, and to-day they were able to produce such a splendid specimen-

Mr. MACMASTER. I ask the hon. gentleman, across this House, if I made any reference to myself or produced myself as a specimen?

Mr. DAWSON. I think it is unjust to pressupon the hon, member for Glengarry remarks which he says were contrary to what he uttered, or to try to fasten upon him the assertion that he said anything derogatory of the Highlander. He is a Highlander himself, as I am, and speaking of the Highlanders, he spoke in a relative manner. The Mohawks have been run down as savages, but let me read to you what an American writer has said of their nation:

"The Confederacy of the Iroquois, or Five Nations (and which was known as the Confederacy of the Six Nations, after the Tuscaroras were admitted into the Union), might afford the subject of a historical sketch, admitted into the Union), might afford the subject of a historical sketch, in the hands of a master, replete with the deepest interest and curiosity. It was distinguished, from the time of the first discovery of the Hudson down to the war of 1756, for its power, policy, and martial spirit. At the close of the seventeenth century that Confederacy was computed to contain 10,000 fighting men. * * * The Five Nations, during the time of their ascendency and glory, extended their dominion on every side, and levied tribute on distant tribes. They blockaded Quebec for several months, about the year 1660, with 700 warriors. The Mohawks were the terror and scourge of all the New England Indians, and those dwelling west of Connecticut river paid them tribute. They extended their conquest down the Hudson to Manhattan Island, and subdued the Carnase Indians on the west end of Long Island. The Iroquois pushed the conquest to Lake Huron, and fought desparate actions with the Hurons and the Chippewas on the borders of Lake Superior."

They are described, still further, as extending their conquests up through Illinois and the plains of the West on the one side, and to the Atlantic coast and the Carolinas on the other. A race that could do such things cannot be considered a despicable one.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I quite agree with the extract that has been read. Anybody who has read the history of America knows that the Mohawks were the kingly tribe of this continent, and leaving that behind, I admit that they are now the most advanced Indians we have; but advanced as they are now, and warlike and brave as they have been before, the Superintendent General has his hand as firmly characterised by the predatory instincts which may have upon them as upon any other Indian in the land. His Indian law holds them under the same tutelage as any others; so that they cannot lease their own lands, even if they be educated men, sign contracts, or even make a will, but the Superintendent General can annul it, if he sees The ground taken on this side of the House cannot be misunderstood. We say, give the Indians all the rights and liberties, and all the responsibilities of citizenship; but we say: Do not force them upon him—it is not wise. If the Mowak Indians prefers to maintain his connection with the tribes, it is his own choice; he feels happier there; and as long as he remains in that position do not try to force him out of it; and this proposition to force a vote upon him while he is in that position is a proposi-tion which, I believe, he will repudiate; and in his interest, as well as for other reasons of another kind, referring to loss advanced Indians, I have moved the resolution. It is evident, from the First Minister not having suggested any different way of obviating the difficulty, that he does not seem inclined to accept my proposition, and this committee is sufficient to vote it down. But I call his attention to this, that the other night, when I pointed out to him the difficulty of getting the Indians on the lists, and suggested that it would have to be done in a different manner from that adopted for white voters, owing to their having no assessment rolls, and whon I pointed out that the only way to get the information would be through the paid agents of the Government, and that that would be a wrong and indocont thing to do, and asked the First Minister what plan he would propose, he said that he had not given the question consideration, but that he would do so, and asked me if I would put my opinions on paper, that they might be considered. That I have done; but I have been so unfortunate in the expression of my opinions there as not to have met the views of the First Minister. I therefore hold that if he allows this proposition to be voted down he is bound to find some solution of the difficulty that I desire my amendment to obviate, that is, that it would be an improper thing for the revising officer to take his list of voters on an Indian reservation from the Indian agent, under whom the Indians are, and who is under the control of the Superintendent General himself; and the only method I can see is for the revising officer to go down on the reservation and let every Indian who wants to be put on the list come to him and say so, the same as the wage-earner has to do. Some hon, gentlemen ask why I want the information to be given under oath. I want it to be given under oath, not so much because I want the Indian to be put under oath, but because, qualified to exercise the franchise, and if you leave it to the option of the Indian you may secure the most intelligent and advanced of them, and you would not have the evil in our midst that the ignorant, uneducated, semi-civilised Indian, who is possessed of $150 worth of property, shall all at once be elevated to the right of exercising the franchise. Therefore, I think the process of selection should be in the hands of the Indians themselves. I do think it is a reasonable proposition, and one that ought to be accepted by the First Minister. He has given me no reason for refusing to accept it, except the one that it is drawing an invidious distinction; but he will remember that it is not my resolution but the Indian Act that makes the invidious distinction; and if he asks his supporters to vote my amendment down he should devise some plan to obviate the difficulty, else I shall not promise not to try to draft some other proposition to obviate it. But the question ought to be dealt with in some way, for it seems to me that it is not proper to leave with the Indian agent the power to have what Indians he likes put on the list of voters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under the Bill, as it now stands, the Indian and the wage-earner are exactly on the same footing. There is no clause in the Bill stating that the wage-earner must go personally to the revising officer and ask that his vote be put on.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He is not under control.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said they should be put on the same footing; I say they are on the same footing now, and in making a change they will be on a different footing. I take it that under the reading of the Bill the revising officer will put on all those he finds on the assessment roll as having a primá facie right to vote. Those who are not on the roll must come forward and have their names put on, whether they be wage earners or Indians. That is not especially provided in the Act, but it is necessarily intended, and it would be drawing quite a distinction between the wage-earner who happened to be a white man and the wage-earner who happened to be an Indian to say that the latter must come forward personally, when we do not say that in respect to the former. Both stand on exactly the same footing; and as for the agent coming forward and putting on all the names, that is absurd; the agent will not do anything of the kind. And in case anything of that kind should te attempted, I have no objection to its being prevented. I have already said that on first impression I agreed to the motion in amendment, which was suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that the agent who, directly or indirectly, interfered with the Indian voters, would be committing a misdemeanor, punishable by loss of office and fine or imprisonment. I have no objections to preventing the agent, directly or indirectly, interfering with the request of an Indian to put his name on the voters' list, but what I object to is that the Indian must personally come forward and swear to his right to vote when the wage-earner is not put on the same footing.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will see that there is a difference between the two.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You do not recognise the difference in position.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there is a substantial difference.

Mr. MILLS. The white man who owns property has to give a description of the property upon which he qualifies. There is the concession, the number of the lot, and other descriptions. What do you propose to do with the Indian property, in order to describe it with such exactness that it may be identified? You know his name, but the Indian Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. name is unfamiliar; you cannot tell one from another by section 54. I move the following:— Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

name, unless you know the Indian tongue. How will you know whether the Indian on the voters' list owns any property or not? The Indian, in that respect, does not stand in the same position as the Indian who is assessed on income. My impression is, that there will not be any such, perhaps not a dozen, in the entire Dominion. The Indian, the ward of the Government, dependent on it for a large portion of his means of subsistence, is not in the same position as the ordinary wage carner. If the hon. gentleman will meet the case I have mentioned, and give such a description of the property as to enable us to identify it, he will do much more than he is doing now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not going to enter into that discussion again; we have had it ad nauseam. With regard to the hon, gentleman's statement, which is erroneous, that the wage-earner is obliged to go and put in his vote, and that the Indian's name shall be put on the list, whether he likes it or not, there is no such proposition in the Act. They stand in the same position. As to the argument how the land is to be identified, the provision is that the Indian must be in possession and occupation of a separate and distinct tract of land. If the hon, gentleman will look at the original clause giving the franchise he will find that the property must be described in the voters' list by lot, concession, and so forth, or other available description. It must be so described that it can be identified. Those words were put in advisedly, because in large portions of the Dominion there are no lots and concessions, but an available description can always be got, and the revising officers will have to see that such description is given.

Amendment negatived. Yeas, 41; nays, 36.

On section 52,

Mr. LANGELIER. I would suggest that in the Province of Quebec the bailiffs of the Superior Court should be entrusted with these duties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the revising officer, who is responsible for all this work, should have the selection of his own officers, as returning officers have now.

Mr. LANGELIER. Where will the list of the notices of objections be kept? The revising officer might come from a city 60 or 80 miles distant from his district, and it would be exceedingly inconvenient if those interested had to go to his place of residence to see the objections. The notices of objections, or a copy of them, might be kept in the same place in which the list is deposited.

Mr. MILLS. Is it intended that the revising officer shall, until the list is finally revised, have an office within the electoral district? If not, the list ought to be kept at the office of the county judge in the nearest county town.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to go back to clause 51, and amend it in this way:

The revising officer shall appoint as his clerk a person residing in the

Mr. SPROULE. How would it be if it was a judge, and he was attending to two or three electoral districts? In my county there are three electoral districts, and I have no doubt one judge will attend to the three.

Mr. MILLS. Then he would have three clerks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think he should have a clerk in each electoral district.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now we can amend

The revising officer shall keep at his office in the electoral district a list of the notices of objections, etc.

I think that will meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. Amendment agreed to.

On section 55,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This is a very objectionable clause, and I trust the First Minister will strike it out altogether.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the system in England.

Mr. CAMERON. Not to the same extent as this, I

Sir JOHN A. MACDONAND. I think so.

Mr. CAMERON. Whether it is or not, we cught not to have it here. It is an extraordinary clause, and gives the revising officer extraordinary powers. It enables him, without any complaint or notice to the parties to be affected by his proceeding, to strike names off the list, and to change names where the same are incorrectly entered on the list, and generally to correct such list, so far as any information in his possession will enable him to do so, in order to carry out the intention of the Act. It is an extraordinary power to give any individual, that he should, by his own mere motion, without notice of any kind, and without evidence of any kind, so far as this clause is concerned, be enabled to change the whole voters' list. Something might be said, possibly, in favor of leaving him the power to strike off the list the names of dead men.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If they are dead they cannot vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think he even should go that far without some evidence. We have latterly had instances of men and women who were supposed to have been dead, but who, fortunately, turned out not to be dead, and if a revising officer, under the operation of this Act, should have struck their names off, it would have been improperly done. It may be said they might be "personbut they may be personated alive just as well as dead. I believe the chances of fraud by leaving a dead man's name on the list are much less than the chances of fraud by permitting the revising officer to strike a name off without any proof whatever. The revising officer may act in perfect good faith in striking off the name.

Mr. SPROULE. Supposing he attended the dead man's funeral?

Mr. CAMERON. Even then he could not be sure that the man whose funeral he attended was the man whose name was on the list. But you not only enable him to strike off the name of a dead man, but the name of a person who becomes disqualified. Now, how is the revising officer to get information that a person has become disqualified? Even if he had some information, it would be outrageous to strike that man's name off without notice to the man himself. There can be no hardship, no wrong done, because, if the person has become disqualified, it is the business of the political parties to make an application to strike his name off. Upon what evidence could the revising officer act, in order to justify him in striking the name off? The man's name may appear on the assessment roll, and he may have the qualification to vote under the statute, or he may have no right whatever to vote under the statute. So I say that the material which the hon. gentleman authorises the revising officer to act upon will not justify him in striking the name of any person off, for either death or disqualification, without giving notice to the person supposed to be disqualified that he was to be struck off. But officer to correct the list in any way, upon such information | elections must be completed.

as he may have in his possession. He may have information communicated to him by some person, a verbal intimation that a person has become disqualified, or that he has come under some legal disability. There is not one of the three cases in which the hon. gentleman enables the revising officer to act under this clause that I think ought to be here at all. The whole clause ought to be removed from the statute. No harm can be done by striking this clause out and leaving the law just as it stands without the clause. I am strongly opposed to giving the revising officer power to interfere with a man's rights behind his back, and without giving that man an opportunity of showing his claim to have his name remain on the voters' list. I therefore beg to move that section 55 be struck out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This clause was not thought an unnecessary power in England. The revising officer judicially knows the person, and is satisfied, when parties die or are disqualified by loss of their property, that he should correct the list. It comes within his own cognisance. There is, however, at present, unfortunately, in my opinion, a most unwholesome dread and suspicion of the revising officer that does not exist in England; by-and-bye, when members of Parliament become better acquainted with the working of the Act, they will have more confidence in the revising officer, and they will see the advantage of this clause. But I shall not insist upon it; I shall withdraw it. I think it is a good clause, and ought to be here, but perhaps it is just as well, at all events, in the inception of the system, that it should be struck off.

Mr. DAVIES. I am sorry mysolf, personally, that the First Minister has withdrawn the clause. I have my own opinion about it, and I do not agree with all the hon. member for West Huron said in his remarks upon this clause. I think, so far as giving him power, of his own notion, to strike off disqualified persons, that he should not have it, but he must have power to strike off men who are dead. In the English Act the revising officer shall correct a mistake which has been proved to him to have been made on any list, and shall expunge the name of any person whose qualification shall be insufficient, and also the name of any person who shall be proved to him to be dead. I think it is highly improper to allow the list to be encumbered with the names of dead men, voters who may be personated.

Mr. SPROULE. It will be very much better to leave the clause as it is, because if the object of having a revising officer is to obtain a correct voters' list, some discretionary power must be left with such officer, as certain facts respecting a voter's qualification and non-qualification come within his own knowledge.

Mr. MILLS. The whole question is as to what evidence shall be deemed sufficient on which the revising officer can act. The same question involved in this clause is involved in clause 30, and the First Minister should examine into both clauses, in order to determine what the powers and functions of the revising officer are to be.

Section withdrawn.

On section 56,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose to make the date 1st August, 1886.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am afraid the assessment roll will be no use, except the assessment roll of the previous year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Immediately after the 1st of January the revising officer will send for the assessment roll, which is made up to 31st December, as regards cities, and to September or October as regards counties. the hon. gentleman goes further, and enables this revising | That is in Ontario. In August the voters' list for the Mr. LANGELIER. In Quebec, according to the municipal code, the valuation rolls must be made in June and July. Thirty days are allowed for the revision by the municipal council. If the date were placed at 1st September it would be all right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The revising barrister will make up, in the spring of 1886, his preliminary list, taking the list of the previous year. It always must be the list of the year before.

Mr. MILLS. The assessments are generally made in February, in the rural districts, at all events, and they are revised in May and the voters' list made up. It may be that the revising officer, in preparing his preliminary list, will be obliged to use the old assessment roll, but when the list comes to be revised the new roll will be available.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under the words "such other information," he can send for the last roll.

Mr. MILLS. Ithink he ought to have that power, because the chances will be very great.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has that power. I think the 1st of August will be sufficient.

The words "1st day of August, 1836," were substituted for the words "15th day of April, 1887," and the clause, as amended, agreed to.

On section 61,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I desire to move an addition to this section. It is quite clear that under the provisions of this statute a large number of officials are to be appointed. It is of the first possible consequence that those officials should discharge their duties properly, and if they do not they ought to be punished. All the clerks, constables, bailiffs, and other officials, ought to be liable to some severe ponalty in case of a wilful violation of the law. I find that the English Act provides that for any wilful violation of the law committed by any official under it the person aggrieved can exact a penalty not exceeding £100 sterling, and full cost of the suit. I propose to move that every person appointed to any office or position under this Act, or required by this Act to do any matter or thing, shall, for every wilful violation of the Act, or wilful act of commission or omission, forfeit to any person aggrieved the sum of $500, or any less sum which the jury or judge before whom the suit may be tried shall consider just. It is not for every violation of the law that I propose making the official responsible; it is only when he does the thing wilfully, with the full knowledge that he does wrong. You can easily understand how an official appointed under this Act may commit a very serious wrong on an elector or a candidate, who may have no redress unless we provide for it in this law. It is no compensation to the person aggrieved to say that the official is liable under the Election Act. We know that in that Act the punishment is a small fine, which is merely nominal; and these officials, who are given those extraordinary powers by this statute, ought to be made responsible, if they wilfully violate the law, to any person aggrieved thereby.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a returning officer refuses to make a list, under what section would be be fined—under this section, or section 61?

Mr. CAMERON. I do not propose a fine. This is compensation to the person who is injured by what these officials do wilfully, not by mere oversight or mistake.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This 61st clause provides for the specific offence of not furnishing the revising officer with copies of the assessment roll. If the custodian of the assessment roll will not give it, he will be liable to the penalty.

Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. CAMERON. Why make it a fine? Imposing a fine, on many men, is practically no punishment. It is no punishment to a man who has nothing, to pay a fine of a $1,000. I would make it a misdemeanor, penalty of three months' imprisonment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it ought to be a misdemeanor, and I will make it so.

Mr. CAMERON. The party aggrieved should have a chance of getting something if he has been wronged by any act of omission or commission of any officer.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the English law. There the party aggrieved gets a £100, with full costs of the suit, for any wilful act of commission or omission on the part of any of those officials, and in adopting the amendment of the hon. member for West Huron we would follow exactly in the English line.

Mr. LANGELIER. If there was no other punishment than a misdemeanor, it would amount, practically, to very little. In the prosecution of a misdemeanor the public prosecutor has to take the case in hand, and unless he was strongly pushed to it by parties interested he would not be disposed to take up a case of that kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For the offence of omitting to give the copy of the assessment roll, to make it a misdemeanor is quite sufficient.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 62,

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that sections 62 and 63 are adequate to meet the purposes of the Act. It may be all very well for the party who commits an offence against any of the officers; but, supposing the officer himself fails to fulfil his duty, the party ought to have the same remedy that he would have against the returning officer or sheriff at an election. In the Ashby case the parties had the right to vote, but the sheriff was of opinion that they had not, and though their candidate was elected, yet Chief Justice Holt still declared they had a remedy against the sheriff. There ought to be some remedy against a revising officer who wilfully fails to do his duty. He has certain duties and certain ministerial functions, and the revising officer who is not a judge ought to be treated as a ministerial and not as a judicial officer. The greater part of his duties are ministerial, and he ought to be held responsible, as a returning officer is held responsible. I think the English statute relating to revising officers makes a similar provision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I doubt whether the revising officers in England are held liable.

Mr. MILLS. I think so, for all duties they discharge as ministerial officers.

On section 62,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 57th clause provides that all Acts of Parliament respecting elections of members shall apply to this Act, and this clause provides that all offences against this Act shall be punishable in like manner as similar offences against the said Acts.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon, gentleman think a prosecution could lie under such a general provision? I should like to see him prepare an indictment under it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think my hon. friend could prepare one which would hold water. However, we will strike out that section.

Section 62 struck out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now will come the amendment of the member for North York (Mr. Mulock):

Mr. TROW. I would prefer to move it on the third

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I told the hon. member for North York, when he showed it to me, that I thought I would accept it, and he said he would leave it to be moved

Mr. TROW (for Mr. MULOCK) moved the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. It is not germane to the Bill, but should come in an election Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is what I said, but the hon. gentleman was very anxious to have it in the Bill. When the statutes are consolidated next Session-I cannot ask that they shall be consolidated this Session—this clause can be put into the Election Act.

Mr. CASEY. If this clause is accepted, any other employé of the Government should be inserted as well as the Indian agent.

Mr. MILLS. It ought also to refer to persuading an Indian to go on the voters' list.

Mr. DAVIES. This section, as drawn now, only applies to an agent who unsuccessfully seeks to induce, but if he had succeeded in inducing, it would not affect him at all.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think, if the hon. gentleman wants to make the thing effectual, he should make it apply to any officer or any official of the Government. I think I have heard of a gentleman whose name was mentioned tonight—but I will not say it, because I am not positive who, in an Ontario election, used his influence against the Mowat candidate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Distinct objection was taken against the action of the Indian agent from his supposed influence, and this was a distinct clause, prepared by the hon. member for North York, to make agents, whose influence was supposed to be paramount over the Indians, punishable. That was the object of the clause, because they are, under the present law, liable to be indicted for acting improperly or using undue influence.

Mr. MILLS. I believe in most cases the agents are not very popular with the Indians, although at the same time they have great influence with them. I must say that I do not think this clause is of much value, without the adoption of the amendment suggested by the member for North Brant. If that had been adopted this would have been an important supplementary proposition, but standing alone, it is a most delusive proposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then I shall not make any delusive proposition, and I shall withdraw it.

Section 63 agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are several clauses that have been held over, but as it is two o'clock we will not go into them now. In consequence of several amendments that have been made in the Bill, some of the forms in the schedules will have to be altered, and that is being done.

Mr. MILLS. What about the 53rd section. There was no definite statement as to the amount to be paid.

revising officers shall not commence their duties till 1st of January, and I propose that the first thing to be done will be to have an enactment as to what the allowance of those officers shall be. The Government will, next Session, introduce a Bill to settle specifically the allowances to revising officers, clerks and bailiffs.

Mr. MILLS. Is the sum to be paid to the revising officers to be uniform in all cases?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not say that. Several county judges have written me that they will be able to perform these duties in addition to their own duties. I think an officer taking a small constituency, and one having two or three ridings, should not be paid the same allow ance. The county court judges, I believe, could be compelled to do this work as part of their judicial functions, in the same way as it has been decided that provincial courts can be obliged to sit in controverted election cases. As regards county judges, I believe a good many of them are quite willing to perform these duties with a very small addition to their salaries, and these duties can be performed quite easily in connection with their own duties.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman had adopted the rule of making the judicial districts the districts by which the revising officers were to operate, each municipality being in itself a complete unit, then we need not have changed the boundaries of the constituencies, but have adhered to the judicial boundaries, in Ontario, at least. But under this Bill, as it stands, a judge, where a county is divided, can take a whole district. He cannot take part of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been provided in the Bill that a revising officer can be appointed for more than one electoral district, and for fractional parts.

Mr. MILLS. I am satisfied that difficulty will arise.

Mr. TROW. I desire to ask the First Minister the position in which the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) stands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, member for Bothwell said the clause was altogether illusory and the hon, member for Queen's said it was of no value, and some other members made like statements. I said I did not want to introduce an illusory clause.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 2:10 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS:

TUESDAY, 9th June, 1885.

The Speaker took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LOANS FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:-

sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not want to make any arrangement. I think I will be able to ascertain absolutely what it will cost; I think it will cost very little indeed. It would be improper that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the officer should receive an uncertain amount. I therefore propose that the interest on the sums so to be raised by loan not to exceed four per cent. per annum.

Motion agreed to.

FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to say a few words in reference to the letter that was presented to this House last week, in answer to some remarks made by the hon. member for King's N.S. (Mr. Woodworth). It was in reference to some criticism he had made about a petition sent from Meaford against the passing of the Franchise Bill. One of the parties whose attention was attracted to that item in the Hansard, drew up a declaration setting forth that the signatures were made by the parties as represented in the petition, and a letter was read in the House by the hon, member for North Grey (Mr. Allen), purporting to be from one of those parties, but which in reality was from McMillan, who is one of those who carried round the petition for signature. I marked the copy of the Hansard containing that letter, and sent it to Mr. Oliver, who was referred to in it, and asked if the expressions made use of by him as stated, or if he had anything to say about it. In reply, I have received a letter from him dated June 5th, and addressed " I. S. Sproule, Ottawa."

"Dean Sir,—In reply to your question, as written on the margin of the House of Commons Debates, now before me, I beg to say that, in conversation with Mr. McMillan, I said in a jocular way that my vote or signature was as good as Sir John A. Macdonald's, but deny most emphatically having used the language attributed to me in reference to Mr. Woodworth. Had no idea McMillan was going to make an improper use of any remarks made by me. I am not in the habit of applying such offensive expressions towards any person."

That is from the gentleman who is said to have used those expressions; it is from the gentleman that this letter purported to be from, though it was not written by him at all. I have another letter from another gentleman, to whom I sent a copy of the Hansard, and asked for his opinion of it.

"Your favor of the 25th ult. to hand, also copy of Hansard with reference to the petition from Meaford against the Franchise Bill. The most daring lying was practised by James McMillan and James Drummond in circulating this petition. What few Conservatives they got was through misrepresentation. They assured the people that all the wild Indians in Manitoba, the North-West Territory, British Columbia, and Keewatin would have the franchise."

He goes on to say that the two names mentioned on it as Conservatives are not Conservatives and never were, and that two or three Conservatives who are on the petition acknowledged this:

"The only persons I have found out that signed the petition were George Tomlinson Sewell and James Sparling, and I have spoken to them about it. They say it was the misrepresentation about the Indian vote in the North-West, and at the time every person was mad about outrages committed by the Indians at Frog Lake."

This is an explanation, I think, of many of the signatures that have been attached to this petition. As to this McMillan, the man who carried round that petition, he is a man who has always been in the habit of doing that sort of work, and is always ready to do it when he can get a fair day's wages, so long as he can make it tell against the Conservative party. He is a person who is entirely unscrupulous as to his representations, and I can well understand that he was fitted for that very important duty in the interests

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry that this letter, which was unfortunately read the other day, which I said was out of order, as it reflected upon a member of the House, should have gone into Hansard. I think that was the mistake that was made, and I think it lowers the position of this House to have letters of that kind read. I think it would be wise and well if hon. members would discontinue the practice of reading private letters.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. Bowell.

Pacific Railway which I have called attention to on divers occasions. Most of them refer to information which is not in possession of the Government directly, but which they promised to obtain, and which the hon. gentleman no doubt has been pressing the Canadian Pacific Railway to give. Some of them, however, have been passed so long ago that I dare say he has forgotten all about them. For example, on the 5th February, there was an Order of the House for a statement as to the emigrants and immigrants by rail, a monthly statement which the hon. gentleman was in the habit of giving us before the Session was over, and we know that the Session is properly over a long while ago. Then, on the 9th February, an Address was passed for the gross and net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the years 1883-84, divided into three divisions.

Mr. POPE. The answer they gave the Government was that they did not keep their accounts in that way, and it was impossible to furnish the information in that way.

Mr. BLAKE. That is hardly a satisfactory answer to the House. If the Canadian Pacific Railway has placed the Government in a position to give that answer to the House by the shape of the document which we can ask for, then I should be prepared to take action on that document at the earliest convenient moment after it was received. But at the present moment we are in this position: an Address has been passed for that on the 9th February, as it has been passed in former years. Then there was an Address for the transactions between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, in regard to town sites, on the 12th February; and on the same day there was an Order for various statements, three or four different sets of statements, by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and on the same day there was an Order for a statement with reference to land grant bonds, of which the hon. gentleman, some time ago, brought down that part relating to what the Government had done about land grant bonds; but the Address of the House called for information which was in the possession of the company about land grant bonds, and that was not answered. On the 17th of the same month there was an Order for various statements, and another Order for various statements on the 24th. There was an Address for the cost of construction of 1,650 miles west of Winnipeg, and on the 27th April an Address for the stockholders of the Ontario and Quebec Railway, which is said to be distantly connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those are all that I have to direct the hon. gentleman's particular attention to, so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned. I have done so more than once heretofore, and I do so now because we may, I presume, as the Session is getting on a little, perhaps have a resolution about the Canadian Pacific Railway brought down to us in the course of a month or so, and this information would be important in that discussion. Then there are some other returns which I may suggest as important. There was an Address for papers connected with disallowances for the year. There was an Address, on the 6th February, for the High Commissioner's report. There was an Order of the House on the same day for the details of an estimate made by the Deputy Minister of Interior of $58,000,000 as the proceeds of our estate in the North-West. On the 12th there was an Order for petitions and correspondence with the colonisation companies; and on the same day an Order of a like character for petitions and correspondence with the railway companies in the North-West, not including the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. POPE. What is that for?

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows that there are a number of persons formed into railway corporations in Mr. BLAKE. I would ask when we may expect the the East, who sometimes ask him for money, and then for returns to some addresses in connection with the Canadian more money, and it is that class of correspondence I mean, with reference to the West. Then, on the 12th March there was an Order for papers in reference to a speech of the Minister of Public Works on the subject of immigration, and on the same day for papers with reference to the License Act. On the 27th April there was an Order for papers with reference to the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Land Company.

Mr. POPE. I would like the hon. gentleman to send me a list; and perhaps he had better get some one else to write it out for me. With respect to the report of the High Commissioner, I believe it has been brought down. With respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they have been told what we wanted, and they have informed us that the information was in course of preparation.

Mr. BLAKE. If my hon, friend will only press the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as hard as they press him, it will be all done.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend who has just sat down has had a pretty good share of returns this Session, while the sole return I have asked for this Session has not yet been brought down, and I would like to ask the First Minister when we are likely to get it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only answer that I can give to my hon. friend is that I don't know.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears that it is your duty to find

Mr. MILLS. I would like to remind the First Minister that we were promised the correspondence on the subject of the northern boundary of Ontario early in the Session; it has not come down yet. Also, the correspondence with the Ontario Government, with reference to the claims made by the Dominion Government for land on account of the purchase of the Indian title, and also concerning the expenses connected with the subject of the disputed boundaries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would remind the Minister of Customs that time has been up a good while for the savings banks returns, to which I called his attention two or three times.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee,)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we may take up those clauses which were postponed. The first item was the paragraph in section 2, defining the word "farm."

""Farm' means land actually occupied by the owner thereof, and not less in quantity than 20 acres; and a 'farmer' means the owner thereof."

Some objection was taken to this definition, upon the ground that in the vicinity of large towns there were market gardens of less than 20 acres equally valuable with a plot of 20 acres. I think we had better retain the clause, as I see there is a similar provision in the existing Ontario Act and in the new Bill. Of course, I am willing to hear any argument on the point. Five acres of land, while cultivated as a market garden, may be very valuable, but the moment it becomes used for other purposes the value may sink into insignificance. Under all the circumstances, I think it desirable to maintain the words "20 acres."

Mr. MILLS. I do not see there is anything to discuss in reference to the matter. The son of a proprietor of, say 19 acres, will vote, because of the proprietary interest in the property, if the property has sufficient value. This Bill gives every owner of property of a certain value, no matson of the proprietor, no matter whether he is a farmer or a proprietor of real estate, a vote.

Mr. EDGAR. I had an amendment which I was prepared to move, but on considering the arguments put forward by the hon, member for Bothwell, and looking at the subsequent section of the Bill, I do not think it necessary to move it. The son of an owner of real property, not otherwise qualified to vote, is given a vote; and that would apply to a market garden of 10 acres within the city limits. As to counties, sub-section 8 of section 4 gives the son of an owner of real property, other than a farm, a right to vote. So it is of no consequence whether we place the extent of land at 20 acres or 10 acres.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I desire to insert the following, with respect to the qualification as to farmers' sons: "Grandson, stepson, or son-in-law;" also, the following: "Father shall include grandfather, stepfather, and fatherin-law. Mother shall include grandmother, stepmother, and mother-in-law."

Mr. LANGELIER. I call attention to the fact that cases frequently occur in our Province of sons by adoption and fathers by adoption.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, As I understand, the father by adoption can afterwards repudiate that adoption, and not be bound by it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Supposing the case of a farmer having 20 acres, and it is assessed sufficiently to allow himself and one more to vote. Supposing he has a son and a stepson, or a son-in-law, or a grandson, which would be entitled to vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose the son would have it over the others.

Mr. McMULLEN. The son-in-law might be the eldest, and the owner of the property would not have the power to say who should have the vote.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the interpretation of farmers' sons would cover that. If the word "sons" includes stepsons or sons in law, the elder would have the vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be the construction, I suppose, but I do not know if that would be fair, because the daughter might marry a rich old man and cut the others out.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it would be unfair that the son-in-law should vote while the heir of the house would not have a vote.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose the proprietor would practically determine which name would go on the list with his own.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. EDGAR. If it is true that the section giving the qualification to farmers' sons is still unsettled, a few words might be introduced there which would cover the case mentioned by the hon, member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen),

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That section does not stand over, but we have been going back from time to time, without adhering to any technical rules, and it might be amended.

Mr. MILLS. It should apply, not only to farmers' sons but to sons of all owners.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was another point with respect to tenancy. A discussion arose when we were considering the franchise in counties, and I said I would have no objection to a proviso being added to the clause, by which it would be provided that where there was no rental stated on the assessment roll, if the property were assessed at $150, that should be held as prima facie ter whother it is a farm or not, a vote. It also gives the evidence of the right of the tenant to vote. That I am prepared to move. I would ask the consideration of the committee as to whether there should be some provision made under the head of tenancy in cities and towns. There the rental is nearly always a money rental; a rental of any other kind is so rare that the number of such cases would not be appreciable. The reason I bring it up is that what I said before was with reference to counties altogether. Meanwhile. however, we might turn to the franchise for counties.

Mr. MILLS. I am not going to re-open the question further than to say that it would simplify the preparation of the voters list very much if the hon. gentleman, at all events in counties, if not elsewhere, should adopt the rule of taking the assessed value not simply as the prima facie right to vote, but as the actual right to vote, thereby putting tenants, in that respect, on the same footing as owners and occupants.

On section 4, paragraph 4,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the insertion of the following words:-

Provided further, that where, in any revised or final assessment roll, the amount of a tenant's rent is not stated, the fact that the real property in respect of which he is entered on such roll as tenant thereof is assessed at $150, or over that sum, shall be held to be primat facie evidence of his right to be registered as a voter.

Mr. EDGAR. As to making that applicable to towns and cities, surely, if the same proportionate value has been arrived at in this Bill, to fix the qualification as to ownership or occupancy, it would be simple enough to make the same limit prima facie evidence of the tenant's right to vote. If $150 in the country is about equivalent to $300 in towns, it would be quite safe to take the assessed value in the cities and towns as well as in the country. I do not see why this principle cannot be made applicable to cities and towns as well as to the country. It would simplify the trouble of proving the right of tenants to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must say I do not agree with the hon, gentleman. I think in the cities and towns the rental is likely to exceed the simple interest on the assessed value of the property. I would like to hear from other gentlemen acquainted with cities who can speak on that point.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. MILLS. I am satisfied that to take the assessed value of the property would be a better precaution against fraud, and would facilitate the placing of names on the assessment roll. Of course, I except the Province Quebec, because there, I believe, the amount of the rental is marked on the assessment roll; but that is not done anywhere else, and I have never been able to understand why the hon. gentleman desires to take the rent as the basis instead of the actual value in the case of tenants. Without that, how is the revising officer to obtain prima facie evidence for putting the names of tenants on the voters' list? Is he to make personal enquiry in every case? For instance, take the case of an owner of property having about the necessary value: if he found that the tenant was politically opposed to him he might have no objection, on condition that it did not give a vote, to accepting a rent just below the amount necessary to qualify the tenant. That could not happen if the assessed or the actual value of the property were taken.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not suppose that at this stage we should re-open that question. It may be re-opened at a subsequent stage. The reason I asked that the 5th clause should stand over I mentioned at the time. The Act provides that the property qualification shall be, in cities $300, and in towns $200. It has been pressed upon cities $300, and in towns $200. It has been pressed upon stipend. I have no objection that the clause should be reme that there are two towns in the Province of Quebec, Hull opened, with unanimous consent. We might say "police and St. Hyacinthe, which got themselves declared cities, in which a large number of voters, who are now qualified, will be disqualified, if the qualification is raised from $200 to $300. I do not desire that these voters shall be disqualified. because these towns, by a rather misjudged ambition, got themselves declared cities, when 1 do not think either their wealth or their population entitled them to that position. I believe that everywhere else, in all the Provinces, the cities are sufficiently important to justify the distinction in value the Bill provides for. There are two ways of meeting the case of these two places-either by excepting them, and stating that in those two cities the qualification shall be $200, or by providing that all cities of a population under 9,000 shall be considered as if they were towns.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think there is a better way, which is the system adopted in the election law of the Province of Quebec. There, there are different qualifications; one $300 and the other $200. The higher qualification applies only to cities which return one member or more, and the other applies to every other municipality, whether parish, township or town, or even city. If you apply this rule it will be general, and there will be no difficulty whatever.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the case of cities like Hull and St. Hyacinthe, which are cities by Act of Parliament, but still, from their population and position, the value of property there is not greater than if they were towns. The effect of making a distinction between cities and towns in the value of property would disfranchise a great many men in those places. I think the better plan would be to make it a matter of population. I find that these cities are both of them under 9,000, in which case they would be considered for valuation purposes as towns, still we cannot prevent their being cities as they are so by Act of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has maturely considered this, and will propose such an amendment as will be in the public interest.

Mr. CASEY. The suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) is by far the most logical way of getting at what he desires. A limit of population is not as logical a distinction as the distinction between cities that return members and those that do not. There are several cities in Ontario which are over the limit of 9,000 population, and yet in which property is no more valuable than when they only had 9,000 or than it is in other places of 9,000 population. Take St. Thomas, which is a very prosperous city, the value of property there is not at all to be compared with the value of property in London, Toronto or other cities. The best plan would be to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will let this proposition stand, and consider it, and in the meantime the section can be adopted as it is.

Mr. MILLS. In clause 9 we carried a provision disqualifying, amongst others, police magistrates, stipendiary magistrates and recorders. Some of these are not salaried officers, but are only municipal officers.

Mr. VAIL. I pointed out to the First Minister that seven or eight officials were appointed in Digby county last year, and that, though they were called stipendiary magistrates, they received no stipends. Under the Bill they will be deprived of a vote, but I am sure that is not the inten-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. One cannot very well see how a man can be a stipendiary magistrate without a magistrates and stipendiary magistrates, receiving no stipend." It is lucus a non lucendo business, though.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). In Ontario, police magistrates are sometimes appointed without salary at the instance of a municipality, as it is a convenience, where the population is less than 5,000, to have one magistrate to attend to the business, instead of allowing the justices of the peace to carry it out. When this clause was up, the committee was rather in a hurry; but there can be no doubt that it is not desired to disfranchise those officers who receive no salary.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). In some counties of Nova Scotia, stipendiary magistrates are appointed to carry out the Scott Act. If they are to be disfranchised, I am afraid they will refuse to act. There are five in my county.

Mr. VAIL. At the last sitting of the municipal council, county of Digby, certain men of the first position in the county were appointed stipendiary magistrates without salary. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from Inverness, they are to act under the Scott Act.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the difficulty arises out of our legislation here. We give certain powers to certain individuals whom we call stipendiary magistrates, and, in order to give these powers, they have to be appointed under that name, even though they are patriotic enough to act without remuneration. I confess I do not see very well the principle upon which even a stipendiary magistrate who has a stipend is disfranchised, as long as the stipend comes from the locality and not from the Government,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This was in the old law, but I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. After consultation with my friends, I was just about to propose, as I do now, that the words "police magistrates, stipendiary magistrates and recorders" be struck out of the disqualification clause.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 50.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that this clause shall run as follows:-

The appeal shall be:

(1). In the Province of Ontario to the county judge in whose county the polling district where the appeal arises is situated;

(2). In the Province of Quebec, to the judge of the Superior Court resident in or having judicial charge of the judicial district within which is the polling district where the appeal arises;

(3). In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, and Prince Edward Island, to the county judge;

(4). In British Columbia to the county judge, but, in any electoral district which is not included within the jurisdiction of any county judge, then to the Supreme Court, which court shall assign the duty of trying any appeal to any judge of the said court.

There is rather an anomalous state of affairs in British Columbia. That Province some years ago passed an Act appointing county judges, and subsequently they passed an Act adding two judges to their Supreme Court. It was held here, after communication between the Minister of Justice and the Government there, that with the two additional judges of the Supreme Court, there was no necessity for so many county judges. So that there are now two additional judges added to the Supreme Court, but a vote has been passed here which gives a salary to only one county judge. There is one county judge on the mainland at Cariboo or Lillooet, and the judges of the Supreme Court do all the rest of the work. They are situated somewhat like the district judges of the Superior Court in the Province of Quebec. There is a certain number of Supreme Court judges at headquarters in Victoria, and some judges are on the mainland, doing, in fact, circuit or district work. That, I fancy, would be only temporary, because, with the increase of population in the Province, the salaries will be provided person aggrieved the penal sum of $500, or such less sum as the jury or by the central Parliament here for all the county judges. Therefore, I think that at present the appeal in British Columbia should be to the "county judge in any electoral district which is not included in the jurisdiction of any county judge, then to the Supreme Court, which court shall assign the duty of trying any appeal to any judge in the said court." I think that is the best way of meeting the temporary difficulty.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask why the hon. gentleman makes a distinction in the language between Ontario and the other cases in which county judges are now employed? Will it not be better in all cases to provide that it shall be to the county judge having jurisdiction over the polling districts out of which the appeal comes? And if that definition which the hon gentleman has prescribed for Ontario is to remain, it may be necessary to provide that the revising officer shall not make his polling district to be composed of more than one county, or pieces of more than one county; because the hon, gentleman knows that he has changed the townships of Ontario in such a way that some divisions are composed of parts of three counties, and the duty of the revising officer in making polling districts is to make them composed of not more than 200 electors, so that it might be made of parts of two counties, and in that case you would not find any single county judge having jurisdiction over such polling division. Then, as to British Columbia, I think it would be better if the appeal could be arranged to be so that a judge of the Supeme Court who is resident and discharging his duty in the place most contiguous to the electoral district, to appeal on the facts as well as on law; but to appeal away to Victoria from the interior, and then to have the court at Victoria to decide to what judge that appeal should be assigned, and then to have it go back to him, seems to me like a cumbrous method of performing the work. The appeals that come from the Island of Vancouver might, no doubt, be as well disposed of in that way. If all the judges who are resident on the island are in Victoria, there is no difficulty in providing that the appeal shall be to the Supreme Court. If I remember rightly, at the time we discussed the British Columbia judiciary, one judge was to be at New Westminster, one at some point in the interior, and one at Kamloops. Why should you not provide having these stations assigned to them, that it should be that judge of the Supreme Court whose official place was nearest to the electoral district from which the appeal came? Then it would go direct to him instead of going all the way to Victoria and calling upon the Supreme Court judge to assign, and coming back to the mainland again.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In British Columbia there will be no practical difficulty under the present system. The revising officer will just send the appeal to Victoria where the Supreme Court judge will select a local judge. But it so happens, at this moment, that one of the local judges is in ill health, and he would be unwilling to undertake the work. I do not think there would be any difficulty about it. The appeal goes at once to Victoria, and the court will at once assign the judge. Then, with respect to the remark of the hon, gentleman as to the difference between the electoral districts and the counties for judicial purposes in Ontario, I do not think there will be any difficulty as the sub-divisions of the polling districts are by the Act, if I remember aright, confined to the division of the municipality into electoral districts, while each municipality must belong to one judicial county or the other.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex) moved the insertion of the following clause :-

That any person appointed to any office or position under this Act, or required by this Act to do any matter or thing, shall for every wilful malfeasance, or wilful act of omission or commission, forfeit to the judge before whom the case may be tried, or any action brought for the recovery of the above mentioned sum shall consider just to be paid to such party, the amount to be recovered from such party with full costs of suit by action for debt in any court of competent jurisdiction: provided nothing herein stated shall prevent the application of any other remedy, civil or criminal, against any such party.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. The clause which I think stands in the way of the hon. gentleman's plan is clause 15. It says that the revising officer shall hold sittings for the primary revision of the list in such place in the electoral district as shall be deemed most convenient for the purpose. That will stand in the way of a judge who is acting as a revising officer in one part of a riding and another judge acting as revising officer for another part of the riding. The hon. gentleman will see that it treats the electoral district as a unit, and some amendment of the clause would make it possible for the hon. gentleman to carry out his plan, which I think would be much more convenient than this provision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have a memorandum of the verbal errors in consequence of the numerous amendments, but I cannot bring them before the committee now, and I think that meanwhile, the clause will be so amended as to meet the hon. gentleman's views. We cannot go on with the schedules now because the forms are being altered to meet the various amendments which have been made, and besides there is the money clause which will have to go through committee.

Committee rose and reported progress.

DUNDAS AND WATERLOO ROAD—ORDER DIS-CHARGED.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Since the Bill (No. 120) to give effect to an agreement made by the Department of Public Works for the sale and transfer of the Dundas and Waterloo road, was introduced, we have had a communication from the Government of Ontario. They claim that this property forms part of their assets and that therefore we should not dispose of it. The Ontario Government do not affirm the claim, but they submit the question, believing that this property will be found to belong to Ontario and not to the Federal Government. Under these circumstances, and until the matter can be investigated with a view of ascertaining whether the claim of the Ontario Government is well founded, I would move the discharge of the Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Are there any papers to be submitted from the Local Government?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; there is a letter from the Premier of Ontario, and of course that has been acknowledged. It was impossible for me to look into the matter now, but it will be investigated as soon as the House rises.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 105) respecting the Bank of British Columbia,—(Mr. Bowell.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL. I explained the object of this Bill to the House when I moved the second reading. This bank was chartered in England and the charter having expired it was under the authority of the Treasury Board the charter was renewed, retaining its former powers, but bringing it within the meaning and scope of the Banking Act of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon, gentleman would explain generally what provisions of the General Banking Act are not applied to the bank.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex).

Mr. BOWELL. According to the note furnished to me by the Deputy Minister, the exceptions apply only to the management and internal economy of the bank—the opening of the books of subscriptions, the transfer and transmission of shares and the payment thereof; the voting of shareholders; the power of shareholders to regulate the management and administration of the bank, with regard to the remuneration of the president, the qualification of directors, the election of directors, etc.; the calling of general meetings of the board of directors, and their quorum; the general powers so far as the management of the bank is concerned, as the making and enforcing of calls, the statement to be laid before the general meeting of shareholders, the inspection of the books, and the declaring of dividends, except that they cannot declare any dividend exceeding eight per cent, unless the rest equals 20 per cent. of the paid-up capital. These are provided for in the original charter of the bank. Otherwise it comes within the provisions of the Canada Banking Act.

Mr. BLAKE. If I rightly recollect, we had to deal exceptionally in the case of the Bank of British North America when dealing with the banks generally, and are these exceptions on the same general line as those we made when we had to deal with any other exceptional case?

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot say, as I have not looked into that question.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCIAL BANK OF WINDSOR.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 117) respecting the Commercial Bank of Windsor.—(Mr. Bowell.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me this is a pretty strong clause. I do not wish to be understood as assenting to it.

Mr. BOWELL. Let it pass on division.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACTS AMENDMENT.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 31) to amend and consolidate the Civil Service Acts of 1882, 1833, and 1884, be read the second time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the hon, gentleman just state generally what these are?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The first amendment is only a formal one. At page 9, in clause 4, the words "increase of salary of any clerk or employe" are altered to "increase of salary of any clerk, officer or employe."

Mr. BLAKE. What is the difference?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is no difference. The main amendment is this: That any candidate who has presented himself for examination and had failed to pass should be entitled to receive back copies of his papers, if desired, on payment of a fee. I understood from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that it was objectionable such papers should be communicated, that it would be likely to render the duties of the examiners unpleasant; I said I thought that in examinations before the bar, candidates were entitled to such copies. I was mistaken as regards the present system. At present such papers are not returned at the demand of candidates. I consulted with the members of the Civil Service Board, and it was found that in a certain manner it would be objectionable to adopt a system not followed by universities or other bodies. I propose therefore that copies, on the oath of an officer of any Department, in to ask that the House do not concur in this amendment. I

That the House do not concur in the third amendment of the Senate, for the reason that, inasmuch as the practice to allowing candidates to get copies of their examination papers, after such examination, would be unusual and contrary to the rules, adopted in universities and other bodies, where similar examinations are required.

Mr. BLAKE. I recollect when my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) was severely lectured by the Secretary of State when he ventured to make the suggestion that the proposed amendment of the Senate was objectionable. The hon, member for North York has his revenge.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon, member for North York said that never at the bar examinations was such a thing allowed. I said I knew it was allowed, and I ascertained it was allowed, but it is not allowed now. I had no special objection or dislike to the amendment, and I said I did not see any danger in allowing candidates to get back their papers, but to prevent objection and be in accord with the practice of other institutions, I am willing to move that the Senate amendment be not concurred in. There is no revenge to be had, and there is no satisfaction in that revenge.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no more revenge to be had. Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASE BILL.

Mr. POPE moved the second reading of amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 44) respecting infectious or contagious diseases affecting animals.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. POPE. They made an amendment in the other House which I do not think was very necessary, adding after the word "horses" the words "where specially mentioned." I do not think it can do much harm, and it practically makes no difference in the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon friend has ascertained that this practically leaves the measure, so far as horses are concerned, in the same position as it left this House. I had some apprehension that the added words must have some occult meaning, but as the hon. gentleman assures us that there is none, and the Senate asks us to state simply that, where we specially say "horses" we mean horses, we may leave it like the other chips in the porridge,

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I am sorry that the Minister accepts the amendment, which I think is very objectionable in view of the almost unanimous vote of this House to strike out the provision in regard to horses.

Mr. POPE. I think it would be better if that were carried out by the Local Governments, some of which have already made arrangements in regard to it, and I have no doubt the others will follow. We must take the responsibility of quarantine and of prohibiting if there is danger.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend from Oxford seems to think that this makes an alteration in the Bill as it was adopted here, but I understood the Minister to say that it did not.

Mr. POPE. Not the slightest alteration in the world. Amendments concurred in.

reference to any entries produced in a court, will be considered as prima facie evidence in either civil or criminal cases. It is to prevent the carrying outside of the Departments before the courts the original registers or books.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Does the hon. gentleman intend to provide that the contents of books can be proved by either one or the other of the officers named in the Bill, or is an officer bound to make the affiliavit in each case?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It must be by two persons, one to the effect that the entry was made in the ordinary course in such a book, and that the book is in the custody or the control of the officer, and another witness to show that he has examined the copy with the original and that it is a true copy from such book.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Then, in order to establish this piece of evidence from one of the public books, you require to have the evidence of two individuals, the one makes an oath or affidavit that such a book was at the time of the making of the entry one of the ordinary books kept by the officer, that he made the entry, and that the book is still in his custody or control, and the other must be the man who compared the copy with the original. The first must not only have made the entry and have had the book under his control then, but at the time of making the affidavit he must still have the book under his control. But that is not sufficient, for somebody else has to make another affidavit that he has compared the copy with the original entry. Now is that what the hon. gentleman means? Does he mean that in order to establish this piece of evidence he requires two witnesses? Because it is perfectly absurd if he does so. Why should there be any necessity for that? We ought to be able to prove a document, or the entry of a public document, by the certificate of the head of the Department, or the deputy head, that it is a true and correct extract from the book. But under the clause before you, you will never be able to prove the entry in a book by this mode. Suppose, for instance, that the officer is changed from one Department and goes to another. Suppose a clerk in the Department of Finance is transferred to the office of the Secretary of State; he cannot make an affidavit according to sub-section a, because, under that section, the man who makes the affidavit requires to be the same person who originally had control of the book, and he requires still to have control of the book. But when the clerk's position is changed in the Department, he does not control the book, therefore he cannot make this affidavit, because, by the absurd way in which this Bill has been drafted, this official must, before he can make the affidavit, have been in control of the books, they must have been in his hands originally when he made the entry, and the book in which he made the entry must be still under his control at the time he makes the affidavit. If the hon, gentleman will adopt the law of Ontario, where extracts from books in the Crown Lands Department and public officers can be established by a certified copy, certified to be a true copy under the hand of the head of the Department or the Deputy head, he will have a feasible mode of attaining his object. But no person will avail himself of such a mode as this in order to prove an entry in one of the public books. It would be far cheaper and better for him to subpæna the clerk of the Department to produce the original document, than to procure the affidavits required by this section. I believe this Bill originated in the Senate; I do not know who had charge of it, but the Senate must have had little to do when they prepared a Bill of this kind. It is the most absurd Bill I ever saw in my life. In Ontario you can have, not only entries Mr. CHAPLEAU moved second reading of Bill (No. 113) in books, but you can prove documents that are filed in the Department, and you can prove the existence of cerofficers of the Crown. He said: The Bill is to provide tain other documents by producing extracts of them in books, but you can prove documents that are filed in certified to be true extracts by the head of the Department. Now, if the hon, gentleman desires to facilitate the mode of proving documents that have been filed in the public Departments, a copy of the entry, or a copy of the document certified to be a copy of the entry or a copy of the document by the head of the Department, ought to be primá facie evidence in any court. The hon, gentleman knows that, especially in the Department of the Interior, some cheaper mode of proving entries in the public books there, and the existence of documents there than now prevails, ought to be adopted. For instance, we require some particular fact to be proved with reference to lands in the North-West Territories, and instead of being able to prove the entries in the public books, as we can in Ontario, by an extract certified under the hand of the head of the Department or his deputy, we require to send witnesses all the way from Ottawa to produce the original documents and to prove the original entry. Now, this Bill evidently contemplates that entries in books kept by the officers of the Crown shall be proved by two affidavits, one to be made by the officer who made the entry originally and who had charge of the book originally and who has charge of the books still, and one by another officer who proves that the copy is a true copy. The home gentleman will see that that legislation is utterly useless. I dare say the man who had charge of that book ten years ago, in nine cases out of ten, has not charge of it to-day.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That makes no difference.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, it does, under this clause, because sub section a says:

"By the oath or affidavit of an officer of the Crown that such book was at the time of the making of the entry one of the ordinary books kept by such officer and that the entry was made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that such book is in the custody or control of such officer; and ".

It must be the same officer, the book must still be in his custody and control. But if the book passed out of his control, if the officer has gone into another Department, he cannot under this clause make an affidavit as it is required to be made. The hon, gentleman cannot point to any precedent for this.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I understand it is copied from the English law.

Mr. CAMERON. I doubt it. I would like to know what law in England it is copied from.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have the document in my Department, and I know this law has been copied from an English law upon the same subject.

Mr. CAMERON. I have been unable to find any English law to serve as a precedent for this legislation, and I have examined the work of Taylor upon Evidence and several other works, and I have been unable to discover where the hon, gentleman found a precedent for this clause of the Bill. I say that the proper plan is to do as they do in Ontario, and permit extracts from public documents, certified by the head or deputy head, to be primá facie evidence of those extracts. I am satisfied that, if the hon. gentleman desires to reach the object he has in view, he will not reach it by this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like some explanation as to the class of cases and circumstances under which it is expected by this Bill to provide for the admissibility of evidence in civil cases. Of course, the Parliament of Canada, having exclusive authority to legislate on the subject of criminal law, with the exception of the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, everything connected with criminal law belongs exclusively to Canada, and therefore the law of evidence in criminal matters belongs to Canada, and therefore, in so far as by this Bill it is proposed to provide for a Mr. POPE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) to prima facie admissibility of certain proofs of certain doos provide for the fitting representation of Canada at the Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

ments in criminal proceedings, I see no objection to it myself But I fail at the moment to observe what the limits are under which the hon. gentleman proposes effectually to provide for the admissibility of evidence in civil proceedings under this Legislature. In so far as under the laws of Canada affecting civil rights, and it is civil proceedings which are mentioned here I presume, although we may be able to constitute a court under our powers for the better administration of our laws, yet I apprehend that everything else must be governed by provincial authority, and we are not competent to provide for anything affecting the organisation of provincial courts, to alter the laws of evidence as they apply to civil cases. I find great difficulty in consenting to the proposition that we here should alter the laws as to evidence, I should like to know, especially in civil cases. before the hon, gentleman persists in his motion for the second reading, what will be the cases and in what courts it is proposed to apply this measure, because though it appears to be an innocent measure, and it is innocent if it is amended to some extent, I agree with the hon. mem. ber for Huron (Mr. Cameron) that it seems to be unnecessarily precise and limited in its provisions; but if we are able to provide for the prima facie admissibility of one kind of evidence, we must be able to provide for the prima facie or other admissibility of all other kinds of evidence even in matters of civil proceeding over which we may have legislative concern. As to the latter I do not know what the range of those may be according to the hon. gentleman's view; but it may be that this Parliament may have power to originate a court for the better execution of its own laws without having authority to alter the laws of evidence so far as they apply to questions of civil rights.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think there is something in the objection taken by the hon. gentleman. The Court of Claims, proposed to be established during the present Session of Parliament, would have been a court to try civil actions, and in the prosecution of those cases the evidence to be brought, being evidence concerning accounts kept in the different Departments, might have been brought as provided in this Bill. To what extent, having established courts, which we have undoubtedly power to do to adjudicate upon cases of a civil nature, can we at the same time legislate about the procedure for the taking of evidence or make laws affecting evidence in those courts, that is a question to be considered, and there may be something in the objection taken although I do not see if at this moment. I have enquired from my colleague who conducted the measure in the Senate, whether the affidavit of the officer keeping the books at the time the copy of the entry is wanted, and who would have succeeded the officer who had made the entry, was the only affidavit needed. It stands to reason that the officer succeeding the officer who had made the entry should be allowed to make the affidavit that such a book was kept in the Department and kept by such officer. The Bill provides that besides the evidence of the officer keeping the book, another affidavit shall be required from another person stating that he has examined the copy of the entry in the book, and that it is a faithful copy. I presume that the same party may make an affidavit containing both allegations. I ask leave of the House to withdraw my motion, because I should not like to volunteer any opinion immediately on the point as to whether we could regulate the laws of evidence in cases of a civil nature, even if we had the right to provide for a tribunal to adjudicate upon civil matters.

Motion for second reading withdrawn.

COLONIAL AND INDIAN EXHIBITION.

Mr. POPE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) to Colonial and Indian Exhibition to be held in London in the year 1886.

Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the hon. Minister any further information to furnish in respect of the preparations made?

Mr. POPE. Space has been obtained, and the exhibits at Antwerp will soon be brought over. We find that people are much more willing to send their exhibits to the London exhibition than they were to Antwerp, and many who declined to send to the latter have signified their intention of sending goods to London. The space acquired is 54,000 square feet in a very prominent position. As I stated before, the work done for the Antwerp exhibition was also done for the London exhibition, so far as sending exhibits is concerned. That is all that has been done up to this time with respect to the London exhibition. As I explained to the hon. gentleman, that exhibition is going on very well, as I am informed by those attending it, and the number of exhibits far exceeded what we thought we would be able to get in the short space of time at our disposal, considering also that some exhibitors seemed indisposed to exhibit at that place.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is gratifying to know that the Antwerp exhibition is likely to prove a greater success than was hoped for, especially as the work was undertaken on short notice, and there were grave fears for its success. I think it is important that these exhibitions should be made a great success, and as there is ample time to supplement the Antwerp exhibition, and as I am sure Parliament will be glad to vote the money, I trust the Minister will see that every effort is made to make the other exhibition a success. I would not like to say that I have any doubt that the Minister will exercise his full powers in that direction, and I think a little extra effort to bring our country as prominently before the country as possible, is well worth being made.

Mr. POPE. I quite agree with the hon, gentlema, and I think it is important that we should have a first rate exhibition in London and I think we shall have one. I think perhaps we can be a little more economical than we sometimes have been, and still have a good exhibition. Experience ought to teach us something, and without complaining at what was done at former exhibitions, I hope that these two exhibitions will not perhaps cost us more than the one at Paris.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

NAVIGATION OF CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 132) to amend the Act 43 Vic., chap. 29, respecting the navigation of Canadian waters and to enable the Governor in Council to suspend from time to time certain provisions of the said Act, be discharged. He said: I find that a previous Act gives the powers necessary, without passing this Act.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon, gentleman did not know what authority he had with reference to his own Department before now, how in the world is he going to know his authority when he assumes the duties of Acting Minister of the Interior?

Mr. McLELAN. I have acquired that knowledge before becoming Acting Minister. I might say that after examining into the matter with my deputy and the Law Clerk it was ascertained that an Act passed by the late Sir Albert Smith was sufficient for all we required.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 133) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1882. He said: This Act is simply to provide for another class of engineers, called fourth-class engineers, to those already provided for. We find that there are a number of men needed who have not the qualification of the third-class, and that it is important that they should be included. I may say that prior to the Act of 1882, a fourth-class was provided for, but in the latter Act they were omitted.

Mr. BLAKE. Then this simply restores the law to its former condition?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The amendment was in the wrong direction?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, the steamboat inspectors considered that only three classes were necessary, but it has since been found that the fourth class are required.

Bill read the second time, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BLAKE. Is the provision now inserted substantially the same as the law prior to 1882?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes. I wish to add some words to the first clause in the fifth sub-section of the present Act. After the word "steamboat," in the 14th line, the words, "requiring under such Act a certificated engineer." Under the Inspection Act, freight vessels of less than 150 tons, not carrying passengers, are not compelled to have a certificated engineer, and this might shut the fourth-class out.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not suppose it could be construed that a fourth-class engineer should be prevented from acting on a steamboat on which any other person might act as engineer. There can be no harm done, I suppose.

Mr. EDGAR. Would that exclude a fourth-class engineer from acting on the smallest description of vessels.

Mr. McLELAN. I want to provide that it shall be so construed as not to prevent them from acting on such vessels.

Mr. EDGAR. On what classes of vessels will they act?

Mr. McLELAN. Tug-boats, pleasure yachts, and boats carrying freight under 150 tons are not compelled to have certificated engineers.

Mr. EDGAR. Then the only difference between a fourthclass engineer and one who is not an engineer at all is that he is permitted to act as second engineer on these large vessels.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 2,

Mr. McLELAN. I wish to amend this by striking the word "marine" out of the 20th line. That is, to make the service in any steam engine shop sufficient. There are not many marine engine shops in this country, and it is considered sufficient if the engineer serves the required length of time in any steam engine shop.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. BLAKE. Why is section 36 repealed?

Mr. McLELAN. The copy on which I have been working does not contain this section, and I move that it be struck out.

Bill reported,

LIQUOR LICENSE ACT. .

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 134) respecting the Liquor License Act, 1883.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret the hon, gentleman has not specified clearly the portions of the Liquor License Act of 1883 which the court declared to be ultra vires. I could not do so in the motion I submitted; I simply took the general phraseology the hon, gentleman has adopted. A good deal of difficulty and doubt will necessarily arise under the operation of the Bill. For instance, it has been held by some courts in the Dominion, that a portion of the Act of 18:3 supersedes the Act of 1878, especially that portion relating to prosecutions for violations of the law. That question ought to be settled beyond reasonable doubt. Either the clause in the Act of 1883 should be continued or that in the Act of 1878 should be repealed. There are other questions of great gravity which necessarily come up for discussion here. I propose to draw the hon gentleman's attention to one or two. The hon. gentleman has authorised a Board of License Commissioners to enforce the law this year. In Huron, which is a Scott Act county, having adopted the Act by a majority of 1,600, the board undertook to enforce the Act. The hon. gentleman in the Act of 1878 provided that in counties where it was adopted liquor could be sold for certain purposes only, medicinal, art and manufacturing, and only on the certificate of the proper authority. The sale of liquor cannot be effected without a license obtained from the board, and if my memory serves me right the board have the power to license either a druggist or some other vendor. In the Act of 1883, there is a provision, I think section 84, enabling a druggist to sell without license or certificate up to a certain quantity, six ounces, and to sell any quantity alove that with the necessary certificate. • The intention was that in Scott Act counties there should be no liquor sold for medicinal, art or manufacturing purposes except by the druggist where one could be obtained. In the town of Goderich there are four druggists, three of whom applied for a license to sell liquor, under the Temperance Act, but the commissioners refused to give a license to any of them, and licensed instead two tavern keepers, not the best in the county. In the village of Dungannon with a population of 200, licenses were given to two old tavern keepers. In Clinton licenses were given to two tavern keepers; in Seaforth licenses were given to a wholesale whiskey dealer and a tavern keeper. In Exeter, to a wholesale whiskey dealer. Throughout the county of Huron, which has three, four or five druggists in each town and a drugist in every village, the Board of License Commissioners refused to license a single druggist. But on the other hand, they licensed in each case the old tavern keepers. That is simply an outrage in a Scott Act county. If the board have the right to act thus under the law, the hon. gentleman ought to amend the law and confine the sale of intoxicating liquors, in Scott Act counties, to the druggists, where there are druggists in the municipality; if there are none, of course there would be no option but to license somebody else. It is clear, however, that no one contemplated that the people who would be licensed to sell liquor would be tavern keepers. We have a tavern keeper in the town of Goderich, who keeps his tavern away from the business part of the town, Mr. McLelan.

scription on a doctor's certificate could not, if intoxicants were prescribed, get his prescription completed at a druggists, but would have to travel to the docks, a mile distant, to this tavern keeper's place who sells liquor. I trust the hon, gentleman will make some amendment by which outrages of the kind could no longer be perpetrated. I do not suppose that he knew anything about these matters, but the facts are as I have stated. If my memory serves me aright, only two licensed druggists are allowed in towns, two for every 4,000 inhabitants in cities, and one in each other municipality; yet in the village of Dungannon, with only 200 people, there are two men selling liquor. Liquor cannot be obtained except on a medical certificate, but these are obtained by wholesale sometimes. One medical man in my county gave certificates so freely that the hon. gentleman's own Board of License Commissioners had to notify tavern keepers to whom they had given a license that they were not to accept the certificates of this doctor, because liquor instead of being vended by retail under his certificate was being vended by wholesale. I knew of the case of a person who went to this doctor to obtain a pint for medicinal purposes, and he gave him a certificate for a gallon, and it was only when the man went to the liquor vendor that he found out he had the certificate for the larger quantity. This shows the necessity to confine the sale of liquor to the druggists in the locality. There is not so much danger of the law being violated where the vending of liquor is confined to the druggists. They are generally men of respectability, and they have an interest in keeping up that respectability; but, if you allow the ordinary tavern keepers to sell liquor, as they are permitted to do in my own county, it is better to repeal the Scott Act at once and have no liquor license law at all.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to see that the hon member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) is getting some light on this subject, even though at a late date. When the Bill to amend the Canada Temperance Act was before the House, the hon member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) and myself endeavored to get a clause introduced to allow druggists to dispense liquor for medicinal purposes only. I drew attention to the fact that, though there might be one or more druggists in the place, a license might be granted to a tavern keeper or some other person, and the druggist might not be allowed to dispense liquor at all, and I said I thought it better to confine the dispensing to druggists or medical men, and to so amend the law that others should not have the opportunity of selling it. I think the member for West Huron voted against that amendment, giving that power to druggists.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). They have it now.

Mr. SPROULE. No, I do not understand that they have it or will have it. A number of the hon. gentleman's political friends contended that it was impossible for any violation of the law to occur under the Bill then proposed to the House. I contended that it was possible and very probable. Now, the same thing is coming to light that was predicted would come to light, and the same evils have arisen that it was predicted would arise. I think it is very important that such a change should be made. It must be evident that, if the right to sell for medicinal purposes is given to a hotel keeper, he is very likely to violate the law, because he has the opportunity of keeping liquor about the premises; but if it were confined to druggists to dispense in small quantities on the prescription of a physician, it is not so likely that the law will be violated or that any great amount of liquor will be sold other than is required for medicinal purposes.

keeps his tavern away from the business part of the town, so that an individual who went to a druggist to get a pre-has brought under his notice as to the administration of the law in the county of Huron. If these facts are correctly stated, as I have no doubt they are, it appears to me that the First Minister should take action in the matter, and should cause the commissioners to be replaced by persons who will attend to their duties better. Similar complaints, have been made to me, and, although I do not possess the personal knowledge which my hon. friend does, still I have no doubt, from the character of my correspondents, that very grave abuses indeed have taken place; and, as in this large county the Act was passed by a majority vote, I think, of 2,000 strong, it is a very gross outrage that the Act should be so abused as my hon friend has stated. I quite understand that the attention of the Government cannot hitherto have been called to this, but it is now called to it, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to make a note of it, and ought to overhaul or cause to be overhauled the doings of these commissioners.

Mr. FISHER. There are two points in this Bill which I think will have to be discussed before the Bill goes further. One is the enforcement of the Canada Temperance Act by the Boards of License Commissioners appointed under this License Act. In my county, which is a strong temperance county, the License Commissioners are not nearly so much inclined to temperance as is the county. I know they have given licenses for the sale of liquor for medicinal purposes in three out of the five municipalities in the county to hotel keepers, and I am informed that the result is that it will be almost impossible to prevent the sale of liquors in quantities not contemplated by the medical certificate. It is easy to see that, if a hotel keeper is allowed to keep liquor for medicinal purposes, it will be practically impossible to prevent his selling it to his guests. In that way we are practically deprived of the power under the Scott Act to search the house, and to throw the onus of proof on the owner of the liquor, that he has not been selling it for drinking purposes. I think the hon, gentleman from Grey has misunderstood the drift of the remarks of my hon, friend from Huron. The discussion is not as to whether druggists should sell liquor in consequence of their being druggists, but whether these special licenses which are given to one individual in each country municipality for selling liquor for medicinal purposes should be given to people who are inclined to enforce the Scott Act and to act in sympathy with its spirit, or to persons who are likely to try to prevent the Act being carried out. I regret to say that in many instances the commissioners appointed under this Dominion License Act are not in sympathy with the spirit of the Scott Act, and in Scott Act counties, instead of trying to carry out the Scott Act as it was intended to be carried out, they are trying in every way in their power to defeat it. In my own county it happens that the warden, the only member of the Board of Commissioners who is under the control of the people, is a good temperance man, and I know he has done his utmost to have the Act carried out, but unfortunately the other members of the board are not what I can call good temperance men, and the result is what I have described. There is another matter of greater importance still in connection with this Bill. My hon. friend from Huron has alluded to the judgment of the Supreme Court in connection with the Liquor License Act, and I find in that judgment the following:-

"Except also in so far as the clauses of the said Act respectively relate to the carrying into effect of the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878."

These clauses of the Dominion License Act, which are not ultra vires according to the decision of the Supreme Court, are not specified, and it is a little difficult, I think even for a lawyer and certainly for a layman, to find out which clauses are intra vires and which are ultra vires. I am particularly interested in clause 145 of the Dominion License Act. The right hon, gentleman will remember that this clause has already occasioned some little discussion in this House. This took place when the amendments to the Scott Act were before the House and the repeal of this clause was proposed. That Act provided that this 145th clause, which the temperance people feared would create a good deal of confusion in carrying out the Scott Act, should be repealed. In consequence of the fate of that Bill so far, I am not sure whether it will become law. I understand that the other day, when the Bill to which I refer came back from the Senate with some amendments. my hon, friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) asked the Government to name a day when the amendments could be considered, and the Government took no notice, as I am informed, of that request. At the present stage of the Session I suppose it would be rather difficult for this Bil!, being in the hands of a private member, to be reached and carried through the House unless the Government will promise to facilitate its progress in the same way as it was facilitated in its earlier stages. If that Bill becomes law, as I said before—which I am afraid will not be the case—this 145th section will be repealed. But, Sir, I believe that in this Bill of the hon, gentleman we have a very easy method of accomplishing that object, irrespective of the Scott Act Amendment Bill, and if the hon, gentleman will just add a clause to this Bill stating that the 145th clause of the Liquor License Act of 1883 shall be repealed, he will accomplish that object specifically.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That question has already been dealt with during this Session.

Mr. FISHER. It may be that it cannot be done. I have not had sufficient parliamentary experience to know what steps are open for us to take; but if that can be done by addition to this Bill, I would be glad indeed if the right hon, gentleman would take it upon himself to move that addition. I know the other Bill passed through this House repeals the clause to which I refer, although in consequence of other amendments it may not become law. Still, there has been a very decided expression of opinion in this House upon that point, and if there is any way, according to the procedure of this House, by which this clause can be repealed by the present Bill, I think we would be obtaining the result aimed at by the people and approved by a large majority of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This Bill has only the one object of suspending the operation of the Liquor License Act until the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is obtained. That committee has entertained the appeal and it will be disposed of, I presume, in the course of this season. This Bill, which is in effect the resolution introduced by the hon, member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) carries with it the suspension of the Act until it is known what may be the ultimate fate of the measure known as the McCarthy Act. The hon, gentleman suggests that this clause should be more specific in stating what portions of the Liquor License Act shall be suspended. Well, I think it is better to leave it as it is. The answer of the Supreme Court here will speak for itself, but it is better that it should be in general terms in this clause, rather than that we should select from that very short answer and state our idea of what portions that have been suspended. The remarks of the hea. member for Huron about the abuses under this Act, have reached me and have reached my colleagues, for the first time. Any such abuse as he states must be dealt with, but I do not suppose it can be dealt with in this Bill. I never heard before that there could be such a total disregard of the spirit of the Act. The hon gentleman says that a doctor, not a tavern keeper, gave a certificate for a gallon when a pint would do for medicinal purposes. That man must be an allopath, and he is resolved not to give homosopathic doses. With respect to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) that a clause should be introduced repealing a clause in a Bill that has already passed this House, I fear that is impossible. The House have not dealt, and we cannot deal, with that specifically. However, that question will more properly arise when the hon. gentleman carries out his intention of moving an additional clause in committee; and I have no doubt the House will consider the point and will listen to the ruling of the Speaker upon the point, whether it is within our power to repeat in another Act what has been stated in an Act of the same Parliament. I am not at all sure about the point, but certainly we could not act adversly to this clause, and perhaps we may have power in a subsequent Act to repeal an enactment which we have previously adopted. In the meantime I hope the House will read the Bill a second time.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that the clause which my hon. friend very properly introduced, as it is to be a resolution on which a Bill might be based, would be very much improved by some further parliamentary specification of what portions of the Act are to be suspended. But even it it is to remain in its present brief form I think we ought to insert a declaration more pointedly of what the Supreme Court has declared by their short answer—perhaps by a schedule to the Act. It ought not to be a subject of doubt, or of explanation, or of enquiry in any of the numerous courts in which this question may arise. And when you say: We now leave to the judges who are the interpreters of the law—as we have given them what the declaration of the Supreme Court is we have given them a suspensory clause —and it is for them to interpret what that means, and instead of saying "it shall be suspended" it is better to state "is hereby suspended." I want to call the hon, gentleman's attention to the fact that very early in this Session I moved for correspondence with respect to the different License Commissioners and the instructions given them. That return has not been brought down; and yet we are now called upon to consider a suspensory clause. I hope that before we proceed with the measure much further the hon. gentleman will bring down the information so that hon, members can see what is going on as to the administration of the Act and the instructions that have been given. A circular was issued by some of the commissioners, making certain declarations, apparently on the part of the Government, that the Act would be enforced after a certain time; in fact giving a sort of notice to those who wanted licenses to apply and obtain them or certain penalties would be imposed. The hon. First Minister gave notice some time ago of certain amendments which he would move in committee—either the hon, gentleman or the Minister of Inland Revenue gave notice of a long string of amendments.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not.

Mr. BLAKE. We have been otherwise engaged so that these matters have somewhat passed out of our recollection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find I did give notice of amendments, I had quite forgotten the fact.

Mr. BLAKE. We might have some explanation as to those amendments.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen opposite have so absorbed my attention with their able amendments on the Franchise Bill that other matters have been somewhat lost sight of. I quite agree with the hon, gentleman that it would be well to have the question of the judgment of the Supreme Court by way of recital to the Bill before it reference to the Supreme Court in another sense it was a statutory reference, and it was said the decision would be final, unless it was afterwards submitted and adjudicated upon by the Privy Council. The whole question is more in the way of a judgment than of answers to a question. The statute evidently contemplated that it was to be a quasi-judgment, and there was to be an appeal from it. There cannot well be an appeal from a question asked by the Crown for the information of the Crown. We are in some degree in fault in being absolutely ignorant of the reasons which actuated the judges in answering the question as they did. That somewhat hampers us in pointing out in what respect the judgment of the Supreme Court affects the McCarthy Act. However, when we go into Committee of the Whole I will consider this point, and also reconsider the resolution of which I have given notice.

Bill read the second time.

CENTRAL PRISON OF ONTARIO.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 129) to amend the Act respecting the Central Prison for the Province of Ontario. He said: This is a Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice in another place after communicating with the Government of Ontario, and it speaks for itself. It gives power to the provincial authorities to act in the manner signified.

Bill read the second time, considered in committee reported and read the third time and passed.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that Bill (No. 130) respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada be withdrawn and the Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn and Order discharged.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 139) to amend the Act in relation to the Library of Parliament. He said: This measure was very fully discussed on the resolutions on which the Bill is founded, and I shall therefore content myself with moving the second reading

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman will not take the committee stage I shall not object, but I am anxious to have some discussion in committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Bill read the second time.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE FORCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution :

"That it is expedient that the Governor in Council should be empowered from time to time to authorize the Commissioner of the North-West Mounted Police to increase the present number of constables to one thousand men, and to appoint from among them non-commissioned officers of different grades, and to appoint supernumerary constables not to exceed in the whole twenty men, and to employ, not to exceed in the whole, fifty men as scouts; and that such constables and scouts should be paid the same rates of pay as now authorized by Law for the present force.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon gentleman has at no time given any explanation of this measure. It would seem to me that before going into committee something ought to be said upon it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This resolution is in effect to double the force. It will be remembered that this measure was not introduced in consequence of the late outbreak in is passed through committee. Unfortunately, and I think | the North-West-I may say the present outbreak, though I it is unfortunate, the decision was given shortly and with- hope that we will soon be able to speak of it in the past out reasons. Although it was in one sense a constitutional tense. It was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, as it was found that the increased work thrown on the Mounted Police was such that the duties could not be performed. The men were broken up in small detachments scattered over many thousands of miles. They were watching the frontier, and with the perpetual increase of population there came perpetually more harassing duties which it was found to be too much for them to perform. When this force was first formed the country was comparatively unsettled, and the duties of the policemen were principally confined to watching the movements of the Indian tribes, and keeping the peace in the vicinity of the reserves. They performed that duty very efficiently, but still the duty was an easy one in comparison with what is required of them now, as there is a large mixed population and a long frontier for them to guard. Along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and between that line and the boundary, there is now a large and rapidly increasing population, with flocks and herds; there are men with considerable herds of cattle and horses as well. Along that frontier to the south of the line I am sorry to say that there is a regularly organised system by which people cross the line and steal horses especially, and everything which can walk except the bipeds themselves—the owners of the stock. Everything else is fair game to these raiders. I believe there is a very gratifying contrast between the law-abiding condition of our people north of the line and the lawlessness which at all to the necessities which have arisen in our unhappy prevails on the southern frontier, but still our own people are not altogether blameless. There are occasional complaints coming from the American Government of raids or forays across our own line to the United States, and the carrying off of cattle. In consequence, however, of the different system prevailing in Canada from that in the United States, the injury done to the inhabitants south of the border is not at all equal to what we suffer. From the fact that the force employed along the line in the United States is a military force they are altogether helpless, and can do no service unless called out specially in aid of the civil authorities. If cattle or horses are stolen and taken across the line into the United States, they must be followed by the owners, who must go to a magistrate—a western magistrate at that—some of whom have peculiar notions of meum et tuum. and who require to get their fees, and very considerable fees, and are obliged to have a regular trial, with an examination and information on oath, before a magistrate. The cattle in the meantime may disappear, may not be held; and the American military force, although exceedingly anxious to do their duty and to put down this state of things, may see this whole thing go on before their eyes, without being able to do anything unless they are called on by the magistracy to come in aid of the civil law. The consequence is that when there is a raid into Canada, getting back the property is a very difficult and expensive matter, and in a great many cases the pursuit has to be given up, because there is not a ready and efficient means such as we have in the Mounted Police. Our police having military organisation and being armed men, and every police officer being a magistrate, the moment there is any reasonable belief that a herd of cattle, or an animal or animals, come across the line, that have been taken away from their owners, they do not hesitate at once to act, and to act most efficiently; and they restore the stolen property to the owners without any litigation except by the officer in command of the detachment. The Americans have again and again acknowledged the superiority of our system. The force has been very efficient in that regard; but with the increase of population surging up to the line to the south of us, and with the increase of our herds of stock, both of cattle and horses, the duties of the police come to be very harassing, besides the normal duty of acting as policemen in keeping the peace in our portions of the North-West. In consequence of the increasing demand for their services, some years ago the force was increased from 300 to 500; but it is found that it is now quite insufficient, and the police are to a considerable degree demoralised by being scattered in small parties. They are, therefore, not being able to keep up to that habit of drill and discipline which, if they were kept together in large numbers, they would have the advantage of. Besides, it has been found that the duties are so excessively severe that after a very short period of service the men wish to leave the force, that is, the strain on them, physically and otherwise, is so great that they desire to leave the force whenever they can do so legally. The applications for discharge, even though they have to pay a considerable sum of money in making them, are numerous. Their duties are very fatiguing and harassing; they have a great deal of night work in pursuing trails, and following horse thieves and such like, and the men become weary of the force. So much has this been the case that twice the Government have raised the purchase money of the discharge in order to prevent the force becoming altogether depleted by the men leaving just as soon as they become efficient—because they must acquire some experience before they are efficient. Of course, during the late events the purchase of discharge has been inoperative. That this additional force will be required I am satisfied, and we came to that conclusion without referring experience during the last two months. I move that you do now leave the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. It is a very gratifying indication of the growing greatness of the Dominion that the proposition now brought before our consideration should be treated as a minor matter. It is a proposition involving a permanent charge, it capitalised at the rate at which the hon. gentleman proposes by the other resolutions on the paper to raise money, equivalent to about $20,000,000. That we should deal with that as one of the unconsidered trifles that should be disposed of among a number of others to day is a very pleasing proof of our growing greatness and prosperity. Our mounted police at present consists of 500 men. It is proposed to increase the force by 570 men, including 20 supernumeraries and 50 recruits, being an increase of 111 per cent. The expenditure on the Mounted Police for this year is I think about $127,000; the expenditure for the previous year was considerably larger; and I think we may fairly assume about $450,000 to be the normal cost at present prices of 500 men, according to our experience up to to-day. The addition to our expenditure on that scale for the 570 men would amount to $513,000, making a total proposed expenditure on the Mounted Police of very close on $1,000,000 a year, the increase of $513,000 at 4 per cent. being equivalent to about $13,000,000 of capital. The hon, gentleman in the few remarks which he thought were all that were requisite in order to induce the favorable consideration of the House to this proposal, stated that it was not in any sense due to the outbreak in the North-West, and in proof of that statement he referred to the Speech from the Throne, which he said indicated that the proposal was then intended. Well, I think there is a reference to the Mounted Police in the Speech from the Throne, but I do not think it is extremely precise; I think it would be very difficult indeed to apprehend from that reference that it was proposed to more than double the strength of the force. The reference in the Speech is this:

population of the North-West Territories, and one relating to the North-West Mounted Police."

Whether it had to do with drill or discipline or pay, or with the rules of the force, or whether it had to do with more than doubling the strength of the force, were things that were left entirely undefined by this diplomatic reference in the Speech from the Throne. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has accurately stated the fact that it was proposed to increase the North-West Mounted Police before the Session commenced, and that irrespective altogether of circumstances attending the outbreak. That statement makes the proposal all the more alarming, because, if it were thought necessary, for the peace and security of the North-West before the outbreak, to more than double the Mounted Police, we are face to face with the question, what are the proposals, upon the whole, which will be necessary for the country after the outbreak? They may not, I presume they will not, involve any further increase for the Mounted Police, but it is impossible to dissociate from each other the various proposals which are required for securing peace, order and good government in that Territory, in the way, whether of a semi-military, semi-civil force as the Mounted Police, or of our militia, which is a mainly a force also used for the purpose of repression of minor disturbances, and in that sense acts, to a certain extent, in a constabulary or almost civil form. It is impossible to dissociate the consideration of these two questions; they are, in fact, one question; and therefore, if this proposal in its entirety, as it is now presented to us, was a proposal which was to be brought forward entirely irrespective of the outbreak, I repeat the question: What is to be the scheme of the Government on the whole with reference to the North-West, having regard to that not unimportant fact the outbreak? I admit the hon, gentleman has long, too long deferred the consideration of this proposal, but I think, under the circumstances, he might have deferred it a little longer. I think, when it was proposed to more than double the strength of the force, it was the duty of the First Minister, who happens to be the Minister specially charged with the force, to have brought down the annual report, to have given the House and the country the valuable information we will assume, from former reports, this report will contain, of the general operations of the force for the year. And I think that the more, because I well recollect that in 1882, when the hon. gentleman proposed an increase of this force, he depended largely on these reports, and he referred to copious extracts from these very reports as his just vindication for that course. Although we are now past the usual term of Session, although we are at the 9th of June, the report for the Mounted Police is not yet brought down; and a detailed enquiry being made to the hon, gentleman as to when the report was dated, when it reached him, and so forth, he is conveniently ignorant of what these dates are, and he says there has been an oversight in the Department. I wonder how many oversights there have been in the Departments in connection with the North-West? I wonder what oversight there has been which prevented us, in this critical period, when the report of the Mounted Police would have been very interesting reading, if we had it, from having the benefit of the information to be derived from the perusal of the report. He indeed, consoled us, by telling it was in galley, and being in galley we might expect it shortly. The report is in galley, and some of the hon, gentlemen's officers ought to be in the galleys for its being there. The proposal of the Government was no doubt very well considered; the previous proposal was no doubt well considered; it was a thoroughly matured proposal, a propo al which had been deliberated on for a long time, and with respect to which the Government have Mr. BLAKE.

praise? Why it is by the Votes and Proceedings, from which I find that on the 7th April the hon, gentleman put a notice on the paper to increase this force to 800 men with 20 supernumeraries and 20 scouts. That was the matured proposal of the Government which on the 7th April they proposed to submit to Parliament for its adoption. Within a week after that the hon, gentleman brought down another proposal to increase the strength of the force to 1,000 men and 20 supernumeraries and 50 scouts; or an addition of 30,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  times as many scouts, and of 200 men, two-thirds as many men in addition to that which he had proposed a few days before. I think a little explanation was due the House of these two notices; I think, when the hon, gentleman told us on the 7th April that his views on the exigencies of the situation in the North-West, after careful and mature deliberation, were that we required in all 840 men, and when he now asks us to arrange for 1,070 instead, we ought to have had a little explanation upon what the hon, gentleman's earlier and his later, his very little later, estimates were based. What was the ground he took when he decided upon 840 men, and what circumstances occurred to modify his opinion between the 7th April and a few days later, when he brought down the proposal for 1,070 men? We ought to know now upon what ground these figures are based. We must assume, when he made the statement in the Speech from the Throne, which he now tells us had reference to an increase of the Mounted Police, that it had reference to this measure to increase it to 840 men in all, and as that measure continued unchanged from the 29th January, when we met, until the 7th April, when he put the notice on the paper, we want to know what, between that and the 10th or 11th of April, brought about a change in his opinions and led him, in his judgment, to propose an addition of 230 more men, in round numbers, very nearly twice as many as he had proposed in the first instance. When I look at the varying figures and different proposals, when I consider the very short difference of time in which the hon. gentleman's mind was changed, there is, to speak seriously, evidence of haste or evidence of some new and strong and powerful consideration affecting the hon, gentleman's mind, which led him to believe that his proposal of the 7th April was so wholly inadequate that he was obliged to drop it from the notice paper without further consideration and modify that proposal by nearly doubling it. I think another observation is fit to be made in this same connection. I enquired of the hon. gentleman, having seen in the newspapers that recruiting was going on, a little while ago, whether the number recruited was in excess of the number authorised by law, and if so how many. I think he answered me it was about 230 men in excess of the number authorised by law. Now, I am not one of those who are at all disposed, when a great emergency exists, to criticise the conduct of a Government which acts, but acts properly and accurately within the maxim salus populi suprema lex; but at the time the hon. gentleman was making these arrangements, Parliament was in Session, those who had power to give him authority to do this lawfully were here. He had made his proposals, he had laid them on the Table, he had the conduct and control of the business of the House and the Parliament. It was for him to decide what measures it was urgent to bring first before the consideration of Parliament, what legal authorities it was requisite for him to obtain in the interests of the country. He asked us to take no steps in this measure, he did not give us even the opportunity to vote, he did not ask the vote of the House upon it; in fact he made possible no debate or consideration upon it, but having put the notice on the paper, he proceeds coolly to violate the law by enlisting two hundred and thirty men in excess of his lawful authoreached conclusions based upon a careful consideration of rity to send to the North-West and he caused them to go. the exigencies of the situation. How do I prove that? And I think it is a very serious question what the position How am I able to give the hon, gentleman that meed of of those men was—men enlisted without the authority of law and in excess of the powers that the law gave. I say that the hon. gentleman's duty to Parliament and the respect that he ought to owe to Parliament indicated an entirely different course, and that his duty was not to violate the law, not to act in excess of the law unless necessity quired. There was no necessity, because we were here, prepared to listen to the hon gentleman's proposals. We proceeded with other Bills certainly of minor consequence. We passed a Bill, and His Excellency came down and gave the Royal Assent to it, to appoint a gentleman to fill your chair in cases of emergency. That was done, but the enlistment without the authority of law of 230 men was not thought of sufficient consequence to propose to us for legislation, and to invite the three branches of the legislature so to act that the law might not be violated. I say, therefore, that in this respect the hon. gentleman has too long deferred bringing before the House the consideration of this question. When the hon, gentleman does bring it before us, he brings it with explanations extremely inadequate. As far as I could gather, it is a question of flocks and herds, it is a question which the hon. gentleman has put before us of proper protection to the ranches and those who have placed stock upon the ranches in the southern portion of those territories; and a few words upon that subject and upon the difficulties that we have with reference to the people on the border, and the horse thieves and cattle thieves who take the cattle across, and the greater difficulty that our people have in obtaining restoration of their cattle, are deemed sufficient to warrant a proposal for the increase of the annual expenditure of the country by a sum exceeding half a million of dollars. This is the hon, gentleman's explanation; this is the stress of his statement. Surely some further statement was required. Surely, when the hon. gentleman's own proposals a few weeks ago were so much less than those now submitted, some further statement, some further detail, some further explanation, some further calculation and elaboration on this subject were required before the House should be asked to take even this step on this occasion. Turn back to 1882. At that time the force was only 500 men; it is now to be increased to very nearly 1,100; it is now to be very nearly quadrupled, and that in a very few years. What were the statements which, in the year 1882, were made when we were asked to make this increase? On what grounds did the hon. gentleman then propose it? On what grounds did he advocate it? What difficulties were suggested to him, what proposals were made to him, and what were the expectations he held out to the House and to the country as to a further increase or an approaching diminution of this force? The hon, gentleman brought up the subject on the 24th March, 1882, now just three years ago, and he said:

"It is found, however, that its strength is overtaxed. Again and again the commissioner in charge of the force has represented that they are insufficient for the duties demanded of them, especially on the frontier, where, on more than one occasion, there has been great hazard of a collision with large forces of hungry and, therefore, discontented Indians. By a mixture of courage and discretion, these occasions have passed by without collision; yet I need not remind the committee of the continuous danger which exists of collision, and the necessity of endeavoring to avoid it by all means in our power. There seems to be a general consensus of opinion that the strong pressure brought to bear on the Government and on Parliament by the officers in command should result in an increase in the force. So long as the Indians were alone with a few Government officials and persons of a superior class, they were kept under control; but that control is passing away, as it has passed away in the United States, with the influx into the country of persons of all ranks and all degrees of intelligence and morals; and, as in the Western States, there is great danger—happily we have avoided it hitherto,—of collision between the Indians and the white settler going in there and thinking that he can treat these wild sons of the prairie as he would a fellow white man. The commissioner has reported again and again on that point."

Then he proceeds to read, not the report of the commissioner but some other references as to the dangers of collisions with the Indian tribes.

"It is well known, says the hon, gentleman, resuming his own argument, that, while there has been no actual outbreak, while through combined courage and discretion an outbreak has been prevented, yet, I regret to say, on two or three occasions the forces of Indians were so overwhelming and their conduct so threatening to the handful of police that, ex necessitate, they were obliged to yield to the demands, sometimes insolently and arrogantly, with the consciousness of power pressed upon them by the starving Indians surrounding them, of course, the less these facts are known the better, but I take the responsibility of stating, on the part of the Government, that they believe it is absolutely necessary to increase this force."

Then my hon, friend the member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) alluded to the very topic which the hon, gentleman has brought up to-day as the ground for doubling up the force. My hon, friend from Huron said:

"In connection with this, I might say it is quite clear that very great care will have to be taken in granting pasturage lands to the numerous candidates now applying for them. It is a very serious element in consideration of the policy of granting those lands, if a force of troops should be required for the purpose of protecting cattle on the ranches; and I think, for that reason and others, that very considerable care will have to be exercised in granting the numerous applications which are being made for those pasturage lands. I do not in the least degree object to such portions of the country suited to the purpose being applied for, although it is provided that the Government retains the right of retaining portions of the land if found fit for agricultural purposes; but I think it would be an extraordinary course if we should place ranches in the midst of more or less turbulent tribes, who will be more tempted to commit depredations on cattle placed before their eyes than on any other form of property."

The First Minister did not then think the cattle ranch question had much to do with the matter, for he said, in reply to my hon friend:

"I feel very glad to have an opportunity of speaking on those points, although the subject of cattle ranches is not immediately germane to the motion before the committee."

But you have heard how germane it was; you hear how germane it is; because it is the cattle ranches he has brought forward as the principal reason for increasing the force, which was then 300, to about 1,100 men. He went on to discuss the question, and he pointed out his notable scheme for exchanging the Indian's Winchesters for fowling pieces; and, after a while, I took leave to make some suggestions which I think are of very considerable consequence, which were then so regarded, and upon which I think it is absolutely necessary we should now touch, in order that we may understand what is the policy and what is to be the policy of the country with reference to the means that are to be taken for the preservation of peace, order and good government in the North-West. I said:

thus secured are entirely overbalanced by the other changes in circumstances, so that the force requires to be nearly doubled, and here the situation becomes serious. The hon, gentleman says we must nearly double the force. I do not know what that may mean, but it seems to me impossible to set the limits of it. On a former occasion the hon, gentleman has said that we must feed the I idians in order to keep them quiet, and it now turns out that we must keep up the mounted police in order to keep the white men quiet. I do not know how far the proposed operation of the hon, gentleman with these guileless children of the prairies may be successful. He says he think; he will induce them, with his well known powers of persuasion, and there is no doubt he has been able to exert great influence over persons much more astute the the children of the prairies, and some of whom I have the plasure of looking upon at this moment—I say I do not know how far this great power of persuasion may be successful with them. He says he may have convinced them that fowling pieces are necessary, but the observations he has just made indicates that he expects occasions to arise when the Indians may be supposed to pursue the larger portion of mounted policemen, and when that comes I have no doubt the Winchester rifles would be an arm much more satisfactory than that which the hon, gentlemen proposes to present them with. I therefore, do not expect to hear next year of any extensive exchange made of Winchester rifles for the Winchester rifles about double what they are worth. It does seem to me that the proposed changes, which of course, do not involve so large an expense as they otherwise might, because the rate of pay has been very properly reduced—involve a consideration of policy which is to be adopted to have a headquarters, if it is thought necessary—and I do not say it may not be right to place so large a proportion of the force in different and isolated parts, as 350 or 400 men, and to leave only 150 at headquarters for the purpose

the strongest way, the white settlers who are going into that country, that they must take care of themselves to a great extent, and to take care of themselves the exertion of that prudence, restraint, and selfcare of themselves the exertion of that prudence, restraint, and selfcommand ought to be enjoined upon them, and by pursuing a course entirely different from that pursued by the adventurous person who has settled among the Indians, and whose conduct or cruelty has provoked some of the Indian difficulties. While we must give some reasonable protection, and I do not say that the mounted police ought to be disbanded, we have to avoid giving people who are settling in the NorthWest the idea that a very large and continually increasing, expensive force is to be maintained there at the expense of the Dominion. At the earliest moment we ought to adopt some arrangement for the utilisation of local forces, for the organisation of the militia, and for the organisaof local forces, for the organisation of the militia, and for the organisation under, perhaps, a special system of officering, which should give some special advantages, incurring, perhaps, a great expense, but giving a more efficient force, not merely in soldiery purposes, but also in those higher elements to which I have referred, self restraint and moderation in the second of the period of the second o in the use of power. But to control the North-West by a large and extensive force of this kind would be an undertaking which I, for one, would shrink for contemplating.

Sir John A. Macdonald then replied to me:

"I quite agree with my hon. friend in much he has said. Of course a force of 500 men can act as peace officers, serve processes, take prisoners and guard the courts, and do the whole of the work that has been done by the reace officers that are now scattered over the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. 500 men is not too large a force for this purpose. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that eventually that country should be organised under a special system, like a militia force, so as to perform the duty of keeping the peace and, when called upon, to aid the civil power, just as they are in the rest of the Dominion, but at this moment I am afraid that as between the white men and the Indian, the Indian will get the worst of it, perhaps one danger as great as any in connection with the militia is that of the too active interference of the ordinary magi tracy of the country. I might mention one instance of that kind which occurred There was a rumor arrived at Prince Albert that an outbreak of Indians had taken place to the south, and one magistrate gave a requisition there was a rumor arrived at Prince Albert that an outbreak of Indiana had taken place to the south, and one magistrate gave a requisition calling out a newly formed militia company, and they started full varmed to suppress the infant rebellion. They went down, and if they had unfortunately come in contact with the Indians we might have had an Indian war. Luckily, howover, they were met by an officer of the police force, who remonstrated with them, sent them back, and quieted what was only after all an Indian riot * * * * and we must trust very much to the reports of the officers on that subject; and I have every confidence that with this additional force of police, that the country may be reasonably expected to be as quiet for the next ten years as it has been for the last ten years."

Now, you will observe that only three years after that, and before the outbreak, the hon, gentleman decided that the country that he expected would be adequately served for the next ten years by these—and, as I shall show presently, by a lesser force—will require, irrespective of the outbreak, more than double the amount of 500 men which he thought adequate three years ago. I said I would show that the hon, gentleman's contemplation was not a continuance even of a force of 500 men. In answer to my hon, friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), then representing the County of Lambton, the hon. gentleman said:

"I am quite satisfied that the addition to the force will add to the safety and security of the country, and will give greater assurance to those who go to make it their home, and when the settlement of the country, which now promises to be very rapid, takes place necessities for keeping up the force may be removed or at least diminished. Of course, it can very readily be diminished at any time, it being necessary."

So there you see that the hon, gentleman thought he had reached the maximum, and that as the country settled up he would be able to diminish the force and even to disband it altogether. Instead of that, the hon. gentleman's expec tations having been realised as to the settling up of the country, his expectations as to the police force before the! recent outbreak were so far falsified that he requires more than double the force. Then, once again, my hon. friend said, at a subsequent stage of the debate of the 11th April:

"There will be, of course, at Calgary, at Edmonton and at Prince Albert, a certain number of men, but as much as possible they will be concentrated.

" Mr. MACKENZIE. What are they to be sent to Prince Albert for? Surely there is population enough there to maintain order without the police being sent for?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend could only see the Mr. BLAKE.

to any place where there is no police force. It gives them great confidence to have those men stationed near them, but when the country is settled to a greater extent than at present, that necessity will be done away with, and concentration will be carried out."

Here the hon, gentleman contemplating a diminution and not an increase of the force; its concentration as the loca-lity settled up, believing that the local service in each locality would supply the want in the outlying parts at that time requiring a detachment of police. My hon, friend from East York said:

The hon, gentleman must not pay too much attention to representations from well peopled localities. I can recollect very well the difficulty I had in withdrawing the volunteers from Winnipeg. We were threatened with all sorts of calamities if we did so. We did it nevertheless, and no harm came of it. I observed some time ago that at Prince Albert they had men enough to form a volunteer company. I do not know whether there are or not but a company was formed and I not know whether there are or not, but a company was formed, and I cannot think that a community or that size requires the rest of the Dominion to maintain a police force for their protection. I hope the hon. gentleman will reconsider that, for if the force is to be enlarged for the purpose of placing guards at places such as that it is absurd, and an entirely wrong policy. The police force, as I understand it, has to maintain order in outstanding districts where there is not a large resident population, but should have no occupation in populous places like Prince Albert.

Then the right hon, gentleman said:

"It is quite true that where there is a large population as at Prince Albert or any other place they ought to be able to raise and organise a corps of citizen soldiers for the protection of the place, but at present I do not think it would be safe to risk volunteer corps coming into possible collision with the Indians. I think militia forces should be carefully boraled?"

Then the hon, gentleman repeats the statement which he made in a former debate and which I read as to a formidable rising. Now, Sir, I read this in order that the House may see what the purposes were, so short a time ago as 1882, which were expected to be answered by the Mounted Police force in the North-West, and for what purpose it was expected that force would be adequate; and you find it was not the question of protecting the proprietors of ranches from their cattle being stolen, it was the question of protection of the outlying settlements, particularly of dealing with the Indians. You find the statement of the hon, gentleman that 50) would be adequate for the purpose, and that as the population went on, the more the people, the fewer the special force of police that would be required. You find the hon gentleman to day, three years later, coming down to us, having then acknowledged the force of the observations as to the course he ought to take with respect to the settlers in the North West and the organisation of the militia—coming down to us, I say, and telling us that he desires to more than double the force. You do not find that his statement is as to Indians or is as to outlying settlements; it is cattle and not men who require protection now. I adhere to the view which I stated in 1882, and to which the hon. gentleman then gave his assent, that in considering this very large question of our management of the North West Territories we must take into account the absolute necessity of encouraging and stimulating the people of that country to engage in the formation of those local corps to discharge a large part of the business. I am not at all saying, any more than I said in 1882, that the Mounted Police should be disbanded. I am not at all saying that their number should be reduced. I am not even arguing, at this moment, that if you were to take the outbreak into account the hon. gentleman's proposition may not be reasonable one. But he declines to do so, and says: I do not take the outbreak into account; I do not submit it with respect to the outbreak, or with respect to the altered state of circumstances; you have to deal with it irrespective of those facts. I am, therefore, handling it for the moment on his own lines and on his own ground. I am not negativing his proposal; I am merely pointing out to what it leads. I am showing that in 1882 the plan led to an indeficomplaints of settlers when there is even a suggestion of moving any of the police force, he could quite understand the difficulty and the sense of helplessness and defencelessness that comes over settlers when they go attention to the formation of local corps. The hon. gentleman denied that it led to an increase of numbers; he said it led to a diminution of numbers, but he agreed that we ought to take up the formation of local corps. I want to point out that the policy of the formation of local corps, which was assented to formally by the hon, gentleman in 1882, had really been adopted by the Government in 1879, and that it had progressed a certain distance at that time; and I want to point out that, instead of dealing with the North-West in the spirit of the preceding occurrences and in the spirit which he indicated in that debate, he dealt with this subject in an altogether different spirit; and this subject, intimately connected as the two parts of it are—the defence and security of the North-West by local corps and the Mounted Police—does require serious consideration at the hands of the House. I have said that so long ago as 1879 the present Government recognised the necessity of arranging for the formation of local corps in the North-West, with reference to the defence of the settlements largely against the Indians. We have not got a very full account in the official reports of the proceedings that took place when Colonel Osborne Smith, then Deputy Adjutant General of the Militia, on the instructions of the Government, went forward to crrry out their views and organise the corps. But I have secured from the con-temporary literature of the day, from the local newspaper, statements which show the spirit in which the people at that time received those proposals of the Government and the ease with which it was possible, had proper steps been taken, to render them efficient. In the Saskatchewan Herald of the 6th October, 1879, there is a report of a meeting held in the school house at Battleford, to hear from Colonel Osborne Smith his explanation of the scheme for the proposed organisation of frontier companies.

"A meeting was held in the school house on Monday evening to hear from Col. Smith an explanation of the scheme on which the proposed organisation of frontier corps was based. The meeting was opened by the appointment of Col. Richardson as chairman. He then introduced Col. Smith, and requested him to address the meeting.

"Col. Smith said that as commandant of the volunteer forces in Manitoba and the North-West he had been instructed by the Government to preced as fer as Rattleford, to organize comparison of volunteer forces."

Manitoba and the North-West he had been instructed by the Government to proceed as far as Battleford, to organise companies of volunteers on the plan which had been found so effective in the older Provinces for a good many years past; and where the population was too scattered to permit of full corps being organised, to establish the neucleus of companies which could afterwards be filled. The exceptional circumstances of the country might lead to a modification of some of the regulations which prevailed in the East. The general provisions of the Act may be summarised as follows: Volunteers will be required to take the oath of allegiance.''

They will be required to drill not less than 6 nor more than 12 days.

take the oath of allegiance."

"They will be required to drill not less than 6 nor more than 12 days in the year; but the time may be so divided as to be of the least inconvenience, three hours constituting a day's drill. For this they will receive 50 cents a day, with an additional allowance of 75 cents a day in the case of cavalry companies. The arms to be supplied are of the very best kind, and have all been carefully examined and packed, so as to ensure their being served out in good condition. There will also be an abundant supply of ammunition. Both arms and ammunition have been shipped to a central point and can be forwarded to any given place without loss of time. No uniform will be used during the first year."

I call your attention to that statement, because its importance will be found when we consider and read the subsequent reports with respect to the North-West corps. There was a promise of uniform after the first year:

"If called out on active duty they will be paid at a rate to be decided by the Governor General in Council. He would, therefore, leave the matter, for the present, in the hands of Mr. Scott, who would enroll the men and forward the names to him. He would go to St. Laurent, Duck Lake and Prince Albert, where he expected to be able to raise the number of companies now required, namely, two companies of infantry and three of mounted men. He thanked the meeting for assembling to hear him and offered to give any other information that might be required." required.

The chairman said the present meeting reminded him of a similar one that was held at the country town in which he lived at the time of the Trent affair, 20 years ago, when he, amongst others, enrolled his name as a private. He continued with his battalion until 5 years ago, when he was allowed to retire, retaining his rank, having risen from the lowest to the highest position in the battalion to which he belonged; and he was quite willing to begin again by enrolling his name as a private in the company now about to be formed.

"The following resolution was then passed;

"Moved by Mr. Forget, seconded by Mr. Laurie, That it is expedient to form an infantry company at this place, and this meeting pledges itself to aid in the perfecting of such an organisation.

"A vote of thanks was given to Col. Smith and the chairman, and the meeting broke up."

In the same paper, on 17th November, 1879, I find the following :-

"The arms and ammunition for the Battleford volunteer company arrived on the 3rd, and were at once taken charge of by Captain Scott. We are pleased to learn that he has been successful in organising the The feeling of the members is in favor of its being a mounted company. The recting of the members is in two to the being a monater corps, in which case a considerable accession could be had to its ranks, besides which it would be much more effective in the event of its service being required. James McFarlane, our pioneer settler and an ex-volunteer, has been made first lieutenant, and Hugh McKay, chief officer of the Hudson Bay Company at this post, second lieutenant."

In the same paper, 22nd September, 1879, was the following :-

"The visit of Col. W. Osborne Smith, referred to in our telegraphic columns, will probably result in the formation of a company of cavalry or mounted rifles at Prince Albert. Captain Moore offered, some time ago, to organise such a force, in which the men would, at their own expense, uniform themselves in a dress suitable for the plains, if the Government would furnish the arms and pay a nominal sum—say $2 a day—for a man and horse when on duty. Prince Albert has all the material for an excellent corps of this character. The young men are born horsemen, and accustomed to life upon the plains, while there are also several gentlemen of military training and experience fitted to take command, and a fair sprinkling of others who have served in volunteer forces in the Provinces."

In the same paper, on 20th October, 1879, was the follow-

"Col. Smith at Prince Albert.—Enrolment of one infantry and two cavalry companies.—A company formed at Duck Lake.—On the evening of Monday the 6th, a meeting was held at the restaurant, Prince Albert, to meet Lieut. Col. Nothwithstanding the short notice given, but one day, and the disadvantage of a very dark night, a large number assembled, many being present from the most remote parts of the settlement.

"The Lord Bishop of Saskatchewan being voted to the chair, spoke earnestly and forcibly on the necessity of assisting the Government in the measures they were taking to raise a force sufficient to back the civil powers in keeping peace, and paid a warm tribute to Col. Smith's military services, and to the good judgment shown by the Government in choosing him to perform the important work of organisation on which direct to Wianipeg.'

And I find, Sir, in the same paper, on the 15th December, 1879, a report from Prince Albert, on the 8th December, 1879, stating:

"The volunteers mean business, and are drilling most of the time. Capt. Moore's and Capt. Thos. McKay's companies have put in their annual drill during the evenings. The following are the names of the officers of the several volunteer companies:

tne several volunteer companies:
"Troop A, Mounted Riftes.—Uapt., Chas. F. Young; 1st Lieut, Justin D. Wilson; 2nd Lieut., Thos. J. Agnew.
"Troop B, Mounted Riftes.—Capt., H. S. Moore; 1st Lieut., Edward Stanley; 2nd Lieut., Thos. N. Campbell.
"Infantry Company.—Capt., Thos. McKay; 1st Lieut., J. J. Campbell; 2nd Lieut., George Tait."

I find, on the 23rd February 1880, a report in the same paper from Edmonton, dated the 26th January 1880, of a meeting, there of which the report says:

"Then the formation of a volunteer rifle company came under consideration. The proposition was made by Col. Jarvis, and was coincided in by the meeting as a necessary measure of protection against expected Blackfeet and Sioux hostilities next summer. Over 30 names were put down at once.'

Now, Sir, there are the statements I have been able to collect from outside sources, of the mode in which the proposal made by the Government to enroll a force in these localities was received by the people themselves, and the excellent spirit which they displayed as to the call which was made upon them. Turning, now, to official sources, I will take the report of the officer commanding the militia for the year 1879, and I find that he makes this statement:

"Lieut.-Colonel Osborne Smith, C.M.G., Military District No. 10, Manitoba, points out the necessity of increased forces, in consideration of the influx of foreign labor, in view of the large works of railway construction now in progress. This is a very reasonable suggestion, as experience has shown that this may, at any time, be a very disturbing element. His progress in organising mounted and infantry companies in the North-West Territories has been already fully dwelt upon in the control of the Gavernment; expending the report. He states that the action of the Government in extending the report. He states that the action of the Government in extending the militia law to those Territories and Keewatin has been thoroughly appreciated and availed of by the settlers, as far as their yet comparatively sparse numbers would admit. He looks upon the North-West militia spreading with the newly formed settlements as calculated to form an important agent in civilising that vast Territory, and to become a powerful link in the chain of Dominion defences between the two great oceans."

At another part of his report, the officer commanding says:

"In the course of the past summer, accounts were received tending to show that Indians of the North-West Territories were beginning to suffer hunger from the disappearance of the buffalo. It was supposed that necessity might drive them to plunder or steal for their support. that necessity might drive them to plunder or steal for their support. Although the Government had taken precaution to provide a stock of supplies, it was presumed that as the long and severe winter of the prairie district proceeded, marauding parties might cause alarm and trouble among the settlers. It was therefore determined to organise some militia companies round the most populous settlements, to give confidence, and accordingly Lieut.-Colonel Osborne Smith, the Deputy Adjutant-General for Manitoba, was entrusted with that duty, and dispatched to make the necessary arrangements.

"That officer carried out his instructions, and acted with the judgment."

which distinguishes him, in selecting the most important points for the establishment of armed corps, and the general dispositions with regard thereto. His report will be found in full in Appendix No. 1, and I need only draw attention to it, as I think it will be read with interest by all who look towards the importance of that great region in its not distant future. Light-Colonal Ushorne Smith has succeeded in forming the future. Lieut.-Colonel Osborne Smith has succeeded in forming the nucleus of one company of infantry at Battleford, the seat of Govern-ment, under Mr. Scott, the registrar for the North-West Territories, nucleus of one company of infantry at Battleford, the seat of Government, under Mr. Scott, the registrar for the North-West Territories, although the population capable of bearing arms hardly admits of a full company being formed until the winter season, when freighters and hunters will have returned.

"At Duck Lake, between the branches of the Saskatchewan, and a few miles south of Carleton House, a troop of mounted riflemen has been formed, under Mr. Owen Hughes, who is in charge of that important trading post. He feels sure that with the men about his post, the settlers in the neighborhood, and the half-breeds at St. Laurent, he will be able to maintain a thoroughly efficient mounted troop. The Rev. Father André, of the St. Laurent mission station, who exercises an almost unbounded influence over the French-speaking half-breeds in the settlement, corroborates his views. The headquarters of this troop will therefore be at 'Stobart,' Duck Lake.

"On the rorth branch of the Saskatchewan, near the Forks, the main settlement of Prince Albert lies, and here there are more houses and stores now than some six or seven years ago there were in Winnipeg. The enberprise which is apparent bids fair to make this district one of, if not the most important, in the whole of the North-West Territories. The population are most anxious for military protection, in reference to the gradual influx of armed Sioux Indians in search of subsistence. Prince Albert will therefore furnish two troops of mounted riflemen and one company of infantry—the troops under command of Captain Young, lets of the Mastery's 50th Foot, and Coutain Moore, lake of the Antriu

Prince Albert will therefore furnish two troops of mounted riflemen and one company of infantry—the troops under command of Captain Young, late of Her Majesty's 50th Foot, and Captain Moore, late of the Antrim rifle militia; the infantry company under Mr. Thomas McKay, an influential native of the country and agent of the Hulson Bay Company.

"The action of the Government in extending the militia organisation to the North-West Territories is appreciated, and I would recommend its still further extension to other localities, such as among the settlers of the Little Saskatchewan, and others on the western portion of Manitoba. Arms, ammunition and saddlery have been accordingly issued for the equipment of these corps before the setting in of winter; but owing to the deficiency of clothing in store, from causes I have foretold in previous reports, they cannot be supplied with uniforms at present."

Mr. Blakk.

Mr. BLAKE.

There, again, you find allusion to the question of uniforms, to which I have already directed your attention, and which will become more marked as I proceed:

"When orders were issued for the organisation of militia in the North-West, I noticed that the Act did not apply to those Territories; accordingly, an Order in Council was passed, in November, directing proclamation to be made that the entire Militia Act should apply to the North-West Territories and Keewatin. An enormous additional country has thus been added to the militia responsibility, which now extends over the entire Dominion of Canada."

Then the officer commanding proceeds to discuss the question of the Mounted Police and of the existing condition of the country in the light of defence, and he points out:

"If it is desirable to occupy the posts noted besides Fort Ellice, Saskatchewan, Battleford, McLeod, Walsh, Wood Mountain and Souris, each should, if possible, be individually strong enough, at least for self-defence. There are but 350 officers and men of Mounted Police, but there are about 15,000 Indians, of whom 3,000 may be fighting men. They are well armed with repeating rifles, and for the most part mounted.

"Should starvation ensue and the Indians be in despair to provide food for their people, they may become troublesome and aggressive. food for their people, they may become troublesome and aggressive. Therefore, it may become imprudent to have so many small police posts, 150 miles or more apart, without mutual support. A military axiom forbids a force being divided, beyond individual power of self-defence and mutual support. Qu'Appelle should be strong and entrenched; Fort Ellice also. Saskatchewan need only be a small garrison, but also entrenched. Prince Albert will have two mounted and one infantry corps of militia; they should have a place d'armes in entrenched lines. Battleford, the seat of Government, will probably be frequented by Indians clamoring for food, and should, besides its company of infantry militia, as yet not very reliable, have a body of police, with works of defence. Duck Lake and St. Laurent will have their mounted militia troop." defence. troop."

So that, in the views of the officer commanding, you will observe how inextricably interlaced are the questions of the organisation of a militia force for the North-West and the question of the Mounted Police. I find it stated, in the former discussions of 1882, and you find that the officer entrusted with the duty of advising the Government as to what is necessary for the defence of the Territories, when he is discussing the Monnted Police, their numbers, their efficiency, their distribution, points out the necessity of the co-operation of those other ingredients of strength, and referrs to those points to which I have alluded, and to the local militia as ingredients of strength to be taken in connection with the Mounted Police, which it might be advisable to have at one or other of these points. I do not propose, on this occasion, to go outside the lines of the North-West Territories, although I believe I might very fairly deal with the question of the defences of Manitoba and the North-West Territories as one. Colonel Osborne Smith, in his report, says:

"In August I received from you instructions to be prepared to proceed without delay, when telegraphed to, to certain indicated localities, for the purpose of organising, as a precautionary measure, corps of volunteer militia.

"As I have so lately reported fully to you on the steps taken by me in carrying out this duty, there is not, I presume, any necessity that I should embody a synopsis of it in this report."

We have not been favored with this special report, which would be an extremely interesting document. We have not even a synopsis of it here, but simply a reference to it, and so I was obliged to have recourse to the only sources

"It has been satisfactory to find that the action of the Government in extending the militia law to the North-West Territories has been thoroughly appreciated and availed of by the settlers, so far as their comparatively sparse numbers would admit.

"There can, however, be no doubt that in the process of developing these splendid regions of the Dominion that it will be found requisite to extablish as a mean for defense against possible agreeous and for these special tegions of the bolimion that it will be interesting to establish, as a mean for defence against possible aggression, and for the maintenance of law, a proper military force, which, disciplined and bound together by the strict and well recognised rules which govern such a body, would be looked upon with confidence and respect by the volunteer militia, who would supplement its strength should emergency arise.

"If fostered and encouraged in its infancy, the North-West militia, spreading with the newly forming settlement, will form an important agent in civilising that vast territory, and become an important link in the chain of Dominion defences between the two oceans."

Then, in the following year, on the 15th of November, 1880, Colonel Osborne Smith reports:

"On the 6th January last the territorial limits of this district were "On the 6th January last the territorial limits of this district were vastly enlarged by the incorporation of the North-West Territories and the district of Keewatin with the then previously existing area (which consisted solely of the Province of Manitoba), thus extending district No. 10 northerly to the confines of Canada, and easterly and westerly from the boundary between Ontario and Keewatin to the dividing line from the boundary between Untario and Keewatin to the dividing line in the Rocky Mountains, between British Columbia and the North-West Territories. The corps at present existing in the district are as follows (omitting Manitoba):—Two companys mounted rifles, Prince Albert; one company mounted rifles, Duck Lake; one Battleford infantry company; one Prince Albert infantry company."

Then, dealing with the corps in the North-West Territories, the report is as follows:-

"These corps, in consequence of the season, have also received permission to postpone their annual drill until the ensuing spring."

The officer states that the season had been such that the Manitoba corps had received permission to postpone their drill, and the same permission had been given to the corps of the North-West Territories:

"They have been somewhat discouraged in consequence of non-receipt of uniforms. But I ascertain from reports, that they are maintaining their organisation, and in some cases performing voluntary drill. The officer commanding the Battleford company, which the paucity of the population there rendered difficult of formation, reports very encouragingly of his increasing strength and the desire of the company to become proficient. I trust that it will be found practicable, in the early spring, to forward uniforms for these important corps."

Now, you see, so early as the year 1880, the statement made by the Adjutant General that discouragement had already begun in the corps in consequence of there being no uniforms, and a strong expression of the wish that in the ensuing spring of 1880 they might be supplied with uniforms. He goes on:

"Applications for permission to raise corps from 12 different localities have been received and duly forwarded by me to headquarters, and with any prospect of the applications being successful, a number of others could readily be obtained; thus showing that the willingness to bear arms exists in these more recently settled portions of the Dominion as generally as in the older Provinces."

So you see the officer had received and forwarded to headquarters, during 1880, applications from no less than 12 other points in the North-West Territories, that corps should be established at those points, and those applications, so far as we can learn, remained without response. Then, Sir, if you turn to the following years, the report of the Deputy Adjutant-General for 1881 states:

"Corps in the North-West Territories .- The above corps not having "Corps in the North-West Territories.—The above corps not having been able to perform their drills last year, in consequence of the season, received permission to postpone their annual drill until the spring of the present year; but, so far, only one officer, namely, Captain Scott, of the Battleford company, has reported having acted upon this authority, and forwarded an acquittance roll, wherefrom it appears that 26 of all ranks had so drilled last spring. All the corps in the North-West Territories have been selected for drill this year; but not having received any official communication from them on that subject, I am unable to state what progress they are making. I learn, however, from private resources, that some, if not all of them, have been performing more or less drill this season. I may here again draw attention to the circumstance of these corps not having been as yet provided with uniforms, which is anything but encouraging been as yet provided with uniforms, which is anything but encouraging to young soldiers or their corps."

The whole force in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, with arms, was, at that time, only 536 rank and file, with 39 officers, and the authority to drill the whole force had been given in this early year. Then, in the following year, the officer commanding the militia reports:

"There are two districts also, viz., Manitoba and British Columbia, where, in consequence of the expense of living, the staff officers should receive increased pay, as also should all ranks of the militia in those districts when called out to duty."

Col. Osborne Smith had ceased to be Adjutant-General, and Col. Houghton, the Deputy Adjutant-General, states that while the Manitoba troops had been authorised to drill none of the North West corps had been authorised to drill-Prince Albert mounted rifles, two companies; Duck Lake mounted rifles, one company; Prince Albert infantry, one company; and could readily be resuscitated by the commanding officer, and Battleford infantry, one company; a total of 225 officers and men. So that you will observe, that having been authorised to drill in one year, having substantially performed their drill, it having been stated, in two successive years, that there was increasing discouragement in consequence of the non-receipt of uniforms, in the third year there was no authorisation to drill at all. The detailed report of the officer goes on as follows:

"The North-West corps, consisting of three mounted infantry and two infantry companies, have never been inspected since their first organisation in October, 1879. In consequence of not having received any uniforms, they were relieved from drill this year, by an order of the Adjutant-General, dated 10th August."

We now find from the Deputy Adjutant-General why these three corps, which it was so important to establish, which special efforts had been made to establish, which were established with such enthusiasm, were refused permission to drill. It was because they were not supplied with uniforms, and for that reason were relieved from drill by the order of the Adjutant-General, dated 10th August.

"A copy of this letter, including reference to the inspection of arms, was forwarded to each officer commanding a company in the North-West on the 1st September; but, up to the present day, replies have only been received from Captain Scott, commanding the Battleford infantry company, and Captain Hughes, commanding the Duck Lake mounted rifle company, both of whom reported the arms, etc., in their charge as complete and in good order.

"In reference to these corps, I may state it is hardly to be expected they will give up much of their valuable time, and supply their own horses for drilling purposes, or even regard themselves in the light of a horses for drilling purposes, or even regard themselves in the light of a properly organised body of militia, until after they have been furnished with uniforms of some pattern or denomination.'

Then he makes some general remarks, in which he points out the aspect of the North-West:

"Manitoba has so altered since the first organisation of a militia here, that I strongly recommend the reconstruction of the whole force, the necessity for which force cannot but be apparent to all when the immense increase of population of the last three years is taken into consideration."

Then the Major-General commanding makes these observations on that:

"It would seem that of a total established strength of 580-and of The would seem that of a total established strength of 589—and of 450 authorised to drill—only the strength of the Winnipeg Field Battery, 76, actually drilled. It appears clear to me that this district is in an ansatisfactory condition—but without seeing it for myself, and conversing with the officers and others connected with the militia of the district, I do not feel justified in making recommendations for its improvement."

Then, in the next year, the report for the year 1883, Colonel Houghton, dealing with the North-West corps, gives the almost final order, the penultimate order:

"The North-West corps, consisting of three companies of mounted infantry, were relieved from drill until further orders by instructions received from the Adjutant-General, dated 10th August, 1882."

There you see they were relieved from drill, not for the year only, but until further orders, and that it was on account of their not being supplied with uniforms, for they were not to be expected to drill until the uniforms came, and the uniforms not coming, they were not expected to drill at all:

"Surely this western district has a reasonable right to expect that the Government of Canada will deal liberally with it, and afford young men the opportunity of carrying out their most praiseworthy wishes in this respect. In the same connection, I would beg most respectfully to urge the advisability of the reorganisation or, more properly, the organisation, of the new corps, which, although now more than three years enrolled, and shortly afterwards outfitted with arms, ammunition and saddlery, have never since been assembled for drill, in consequence of no uniform having up to the present time been furnished to them. These corps are still in existence, and could be readily resuscitated by their original commanding officers, were they to receive encouragement to

So you see once again pressed upon the attention of the Government the actual condition of these corps, the fact that they would require to be organised, not to be reorganised, but organised, because they had never been supplied with uniforms, and the statement that they were still in existence were they to receive encouragement to do so. This observation is made by the officer commanding the forces:

I commend this to the serious consideration of the Government. * Considering the state of the various corps reported on in this district, it appears to me that it would be desirable that as soon as the 90th Battalion are organised, the whole district should be seen by the general officer commanding.'

Now I come to the report which is brought down this Session, the report for the last year, and I find the Deputy Adjutant-General reports that

"On the 1st July last, all the strength of the active militia in the dis-

"On the 1st July last, all the strength of the active militia in the district was nearly 775 men, that the whole number authorised for drill was 380, and that 'the whole of the remaining corps in this district were relieved from drill."

"I may here state, says he, that since the commencement of the current year, 1884-85, viz, by Gazette of the 13th September last—No. 5 general orders (18)—the three companies of mounted rifles and two companies of infantry in the North-West Territory have been removed from the list of corps of the active militia."

There I have traced the history of these five corps. I have shown you that in 1879 the Government thought it important that they should be organised; I have shown you the military authorities were of the same opinion; I can shown you, by a reference to your votes, that a special sum of money was asked for the emergency, for the extra expense involved in organising them; I have shown you how it came about, with what zeal, ardor, enthusiasm, the people of the localities received the proposal, under what happy omens the five corps were started; I have shown you where the signs of disorganisation came in, and how early; I have shown you the repeated monitions and warnings and notices that the hon. gentleman obtained, from year to year, of these difficulties, and the demand for the uniforms, the lack of which prevented the corps from being drilled; I have shown you that the officer pointed out, once and again, and thrice, the discouragement which they were under, that it was not to be expected that the men would drill unless they got uniforms, and he hoped they would get them; and I have shown you that the answer was not uniforms, but an order releiving them from drill until further orders, and in the end the matter culminated after their having been relieved from drill two or three years, in their being taken out of the list of active militia altogether. While that is so, what is the general report of the officer commanding the district? He points out some difficulties which occurred with reference to different corps of the Manitoba force, and he said:

"In lieu of the four last named companies, I would most respectfully recommend that authority be granted me to organise four other companies as follows, viz. :-

Portage la Prairie	1
Brandon, &c	2
Indian Haad or Broadview	1

"At all these places there is plenty of good material for that purpose, both of trained officers and men, who are only too anxious to receive permission to organise. (Vide my last report above referred to; also, a communication dated 28th April, 1884, and previous communications and enclosures therein referred to)."

I have here to read some portions which apply to Manitoba, but it is because Manitoba and the Territories are mixed by being all in the one military district:

"I have here substituted Portage la Prairie for Regina (from both of which places, however, applications have been received), as the latter, being the headquarters of the Mounted Police, is less in need of pro-

Once again you see the intimate connection between the Mounted Police and the militia force of the country:

"While the former, being now a rapidly growing city, should be entitled to some safeguard against possible incursions of Indians or bands of horse thieves and marauders, with which the country immediately south of the border is well known to be infested, and who might, at any moment, organise successfully a plundering expedition in that direction, without fear of the consequences, owing to the unprotected situation of the settlers in that locality.

"In making this recommendation, I have also in view the advantage which would be derived from the facilities which would thus be afforded for the mobilisation of the whole militia force of the district, Portage la Prairie forming, as it were, a connecting link between Brandon, and Winnipeg, and Broadview or Indian Head (whichever, if not both, were selected), between Brandon and Regina; at any of which points a large force could thus be easily assembled in a very short time, to await the reinforcements from the more distant posts.

reinforcements from the more distant posts.

"I also beg leave to remind you that an application is before you from Mr. S. L. Bedson (see covering letter, dated 1st March, 1884), for authority to raise a corps of mounted rifles in the vicinity of Stony Mountain, of which all the members are in a position to supply their own horses, being composed entirely of young farmers residing in the immediate neighborhood, and who, being all good riders, would onstitute a most reachly and formidable forms exactly such as would be best adapted.

diate neighborhood, and who, being all good riders, would constitute a most useful and formidable force, exactly such as would be bast adapted to this prairie country. They would be only twelve miles distant from Winnipeg and about forty five from Portage la Prairie, so could easily be utilised in either direction.

"I would strongly urge the advisability of giving favorable consideration to Mr. Bedson's letter, above referred to; and I even venture to go further, and suggest, with all respect, that another such corps might be easily, and with the greatest advantage to the force of the district, organised at Portage la Prairie, either instead of or in addition to (I should prefer the latter) the infantry corps already recommended in this report. And when it is taken into consideration that three mounted and two infantry corps have recently been disbanded in the North-West and two infantry corps have recently been disbanded in the North-West Territory, and replaced by Mounted Police."

Once again you see the intimate and inevitable connection between the two questions:

"I have reason to hope that, should my recommendation in this matter meet with the approval and concurrence of the Major-General commanding, the Hon. Minister of Militia may be induced to take a similar view of the matter, and, recognising the invaluable utility of such a force, in the event of any such contingencies arising, at any time, as those previously herein referred to, sanction these organisations last mentioned, and empower me to proceed with the formation of these new corps at as early a date as possible, so as, if they are to be formed at all, they may be in a position to prove their capabilities of enrolment at all, they may be in a position to prove their capabilities of enrolment before the opening of the ensuing drill season."

Then, after a statement of the geographical condition of the country, and the means of communication, he continues:

"Such being the case, what force have we, as at present constituted, to oppose to such intruders?

to oppose to such intruders?

"I answer, on a frontier of 1,260 miles, namely from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, only 400 militiamen, all told, with, perhaps, an equal number of Mounted Police, that could be made available for this purpose within any reasonable time; in the winter season, particularly, when the forces at Battleford, Carlton and Prince Albert, may be fairly considered as out of the field for all practical purposes.

"Since writing my report for 1883 I notice that circumstances occurred which at one time threatened to but too fully verify my forbodings of danger in the near future, even from within ourselves (Vide 2nd paragraph of report, page 58).

"Fortunately, this catastrophe was averted by the excellent management of Major Crozier, Superintendent of Mounted Police, and the steadiness and discipline of the men under his command. I allude, of course, to the Battleford fracas with the Indians in the early part of last summer. Having already, however, reported to you fully with regard summer. Having already, however, reported to you fully with regard to the impressions formed by me when travelling through that section of country last July (see report of 28th July), I must not here repeat my views therein expressed, and which have not since altered."

More than once have I, as persuasively as I could, called upon the Minster of Militia to produce that report of the 28th July, and it is important, now that we are dealing with the question of the defence of this country, with a proposal to expend half a million dollars a year in a force more military than civil, after all, that we should understand the report of the officer as to the condition of the country, as to impressions formed when travelling throughout that country last July, with reference to that very subject of defence; but, for some reason or the other, we cannot get it. In the discussion in this House last Session on the subject of the militia, when the hon. gentleman in Supply was asking for his vote, my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) said this:

"I would ask the hou gentleman if it is the intention to establish any more volunteer battalions in the North-West. There are several towns in Manitoba where there might be good companies organised like to know if it is the intention to furnish them with accoutrements as soon as they are ready to organise."

he Minister of Militia said this:

"The organisation of the volunteer force in Manitoba and the North-West is a very large question. It has been, and still is, engaging the attention of the Department. Under the estimates as they now exist, it would be impossible to get anything like a proper organisation in that district; but the battalion which has just been provided for is the beginning of what I believe will be a proper organisation of the force

My hon, friend from Marquette said:

"I think probably too much of this money is spent in Winnipeg. There are rural towns which might have a company and have their beadquarters in Winnipeg. There is Portage la Prairie, Minnedosa, Rapid City, and also Brandon. It should be distributed more through the Province and not confined to Winnipeg."

As I have said, there was a feeling, obviously, in 1879 and 1880, and I will say throughout, as far as we can judge, except in so far as that feeling was chilled by the action of the Government, in favor of their policy of establishing local corps, and I observe, in the Prince Albert Times of 4th April, 1884, a statement upon that subject:

"We are glad to learn that an officer, who has been for years in command of a battalion of militia, is exerting himself to have one raised in this district. We have no fear of the necessary number of volunteers being forthcoming, if the Government will do its part in supplying the necessary arms and uniforms. We may urge upon them the advisability of doing this with peculiar force just now, where so many disquieting of doing this with peculiar force just now, where so many disquieting rumors are in circulation. It is not only that rumors of expected trouble with the Indians are more rife, but that they must be considered in connection with the recent disturbance at Long Lake and File Hills. It is a pity that the public, whose lives and property are immediately at stake, can not obtain exact and satisfactory information touching the causes exciting and the means taken to suppress these disturbances, were it only to enable us to contradict authoratively the present rather widely-accepted verson. Rumor asserts that the rising at Long Lake, at any rate, was the result of a semi-starvation policy pursued by the worthy Indian commissioner. We sincerely trust that report exaggerates the truth in asserting that, while the Indians are compelled by a parental Government to live on their reserves, they have been in receipt of 2 ounces of pork and 4 of flour, each, per diem. We have failed to ascertain whether the weight is Avoirdupois or Trey—also, if amount was mailed every day from council's office."

Then we find a statement in the Winnipeg Sun of the 25th July, 1884, which is the only information we have had as to Colonel Houghton's tour of inspection—an extract which I will read:

"Colonel Houghton returned last night from a tour of inspection of arms in the Saskatchewan district. As to the corps organised throughout the Territories, they had ceased drilling some time ago, in consequence of the lapse of the three years. The Government in view of the unsettled state of affairs in the Saskatchewan district and the probability of an outbreak among the half-breeds at any time, deemed it wise to collect all the arms, as in the event of an uprising they might be used with great advantage against the whites."

Then I find, in the same paper, of the 15th November, 1884, an account which was given at Ottawa by Mr. White, the controller of the Mounted Police, in an interview as to the North-West. Mr. White said:

"Matters are moving along splendidly, despite the sensational reports that have been put in circulation to the contrary. With regard to the congregating of a large body of the Mounted Police at Prince Albert, he says that this was done to move the men about, and not from any anticipation of trouble in that section of the country. The policy of the Government, he says, has always been to keep the men on the move, that they may get a more thorough knowledge of the country."

Then he alludes to some things in connection with the disturbance, which I do not wish to introduce at present. and he goes on:

"The report that the strength of the Mounted Police is to be raised from 520 to 800 is without authority. He, however, believes that the torce should be increased, as the duties of the police are greater than can be satisfactorily carried out by the present limited number of men. Nothing, however, could be done, until Parliament meets, and he was not prepared to say what recommendation the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs would make to the House in regard to strengthening the force. When he arrived at Regina he was surprised to see, in the Fort MacLeod Gazette, a report of the massacre of Major Crozier and the shooting of Riel. An effort will at once be made to discover the originator of the report, which Capt. White believes he can trace to the right party. The disappearance of the buffalo, he says, has proved a great assistance in inducing the Indians of the North-West to settle on their reserves. While the chase lasted, it was impossible to prevent them from roaming all over the country; and although the extinction of the buffalo has deprived them of what at one time seemed necessary to their existence, he believes that it will greatly assist the Government in bringing them believes that it will greatly assist the Government in bringing them sooner into a state of civilisation."

He does not say in which they may enjoy the franchise.

further explanation from the hon, gentleman as to the course he proposes to take, and the general policy upon which it is based, in addition to his extended reference to the cattle and herds in the southern part of the ranching district of the North-West Territory. On the 23rd of January, 1885, the local paper of Prince Albert made a statement in reference to these volunteers which is important to be read, also:

"Some time has elapsed since our attention was drawn to various remarks, in the papers below, upon the subject of the disbanding of our volunteer militia companies, and although we have never intended to sit remarks, in the papers below, upon the subject of the disbanding of our volunteer militia companies, and although we have never intended to sit down quietly under the unjust and offensive reflections cast upon our people in accounting for this fact, the presence of matter calling more immediately for notice has made our silence of longer duration than we desired. Perhaps, the most frequently repeated explanation of what has been called the disarming of our companies has been grounded upon the suspicion of loyalty while the least offensive one has been the inefficiency of our corps. Now, our answer to any remarks anent the disarming of our companies, is simply to be met by a statement of the fact, that as there were no men enrolled at the time the arms were removed from our settlement, we hardly see in what sense they can be said to have been disarmed. The fact of there being no men enlisted may require some explanation, and as the true one will serve to remove the so freely attributed stigma of disloyalty, we may briefly explain what resulted in this state of things. When the officer who came to the Territories, charged with the formation of these companies, reached Prince Albert, and called for volunteers, so far from finding any want of loyalty and zeal on the part of our settlers, he was offered men enough to form three companies instead of the two he proposed to enrol, and we safely say that had there been a moderate amount of interest taken in thom by the authorities they would have been efficient to-day, and enabled the Government to dispense with a large proportion of the Mounted Police force, which they find necessary to keep ready against contingencies in our neighborhood at present. The officer who represented the Militia Department upon the occasion referred to assured the volunteers, in very graphic language, that as soon, after he returned to Winnipeg, as message could be flashed along the wires to Ottawa, our uniforms Department upon the occasion referred to assured the volunteers, in very graphic language, that as soon, after he returned to Winnipeg, as a message could be fiashed along the wires to Ottawa, our uniforms would be ordered, and no unnecessary delay occur in forwarding them to us. On the faith of this the men began to drill, many of them driving in considerable distances, after their day's work was done, to get instruction. When the time arrived for annual drill the men cheerfully assembled, and although the circumstances of the country necessitated their camping and messing at headquarters, away, from their homes during the course of instruction, and made it very hard for them to leave their work, no allowances could be obtained for themselves or horses. This they submitted to as long as their officers could hold out to them the slightest hope that the Department felt sufficient interest in them to furnish them with uniforms, but when year after year passed, and the companies were left without anything further than a rifle, sword, bayonet and belt, to distinguish them from civilians, it will be easily intelligible to any one in the slightest degree conversant with military matters, how utterly hopeless was the attempt to keep up any military enthusiasm, or to any one in the slightest degree conversant with military matters, how utterly hopeless was the attempt to keep up any military enthusiasm, or loyalty, and offering it as an excuse for removing the Government arms from the settlement, we wish the people below to understand that nothing but neglect on the part of the Milita Department prevents the existence of efficient and loyal companies of volunteers in the Territories to-day. No doubt there is a good deal of dissatisfaction among peoplesome of it, undoubtedly, the result of ample provocation—but, as to loyalty at heart and readiness to do their duty when called upon, we believe that the people of the Territories, taken as a whole, compare very favorably with others, who have not had so much to discourage them in various ways." them in various ways.

I say that the hon. gentleman, in bringing forward, this very important proposal, a proposal which is of such great magnitude in its pecuniary aspect, a proposal which, as I pointed out, in the year 1882, the hon. gentleman agreed required to be considered in connection with the militia or citizen soldiery policy for the North-West-in bringing forward this proposal in view of recent events, and at a time when we are called upon to revise our policy with reference to the North-West, he ought to have brought it forward in a different tone and spirit, with a larger grasp of the subject, with a wider scope of observation, and as part of an entire plan which we could understand, instead of in the limited mode in which he has done it. I say it is not satisfactory. I say that having given us the view, in the year 1882, when he told us that 500 men were all that were then required, that a less number would be required as the country grew, that the time would come for diminishing that number, and, as he says, without reference to this outbreak, being now obliged to reverse that statement altogether, and to propose to more than double the force in three years, nearly quadruple it, compared to what it stood at up to Here you have various statements, which I think require 1882—the hon. gentleman ought to give us more reasons for it. What are the unexpected circumstances? We knew of the ranches then. The hon, member for Huron had pointed out that the ranching mania was in full blast at that time, that there was application after application, some well-known names applying for ranches-here, there and everywhere; all sorts of fortunes were expected out of them, and out of other things in the North-West. There is nothing new as to the increase of population; and as to the condition of the Indians, I have read an extract from the hon. gentleman's speech in 1882, which shows how ominous was the condition at that time. Then it was agreed by the hon, gentleman that it was a good policy to establish local corps in the North-West, which should supplement and cooperate with, and form a junction, at the proper points, with the force for defensive purposes, for the peace, order and good government there. Not merely was that the statement of the hon. gentleman, but I have shown that was the established policy of the Government itself. We know that in 1879 corps were established at places which have lately become notorious, and I have shown how those corps languished and died. It is true the hon, gentleman stated, in answer to somebody, that the arms were removed because there were no men enlisted. Of course, the season of three year's service had expired. Why were there no men enlisted? Why had there been, for years, only a nominal force? I have shown the reason. It is because this force was systematically discouraged, for some reason or other; and so it has happened that the policy of the Government has been, as announced to Parliament by its Acts, between 1879 and 1882, as stated in the debate when last discussed, the increase of the Mounted Police-their policy has been departmentally or executively reversed; and instead of encouraging the formation of local corps, instead of yielding to applications that were made from various points in the district, as I have proved to you by the Deputy Adjudant General, and authorising the formation of more corps, instead of purchasing uniforms, instead of authorising drill to be performed, the applications were neglected, the uniforms were not purchased, the drill was not authorised, and ultimately the corps were gazetted out of the list of the active militia altogether. Now, if it is the intention, as it seems to be the intention, since the North-West corps have been gazetted out, that the North-West is to be defended and protected and regulated, so far as force is concerned, entirely by the Mounted Police, and not by local corps, we ought to know it. As I said, this policy may lead to indefinite expansion of expense. The subject requires to be treated, as I have said, in a more comprehensive manner than the hon. gentleman has adopted. It involves very large considerationsthe expense of half a million dollars or more a year, and it involves still larger considerations of policy. It involves still larger considerations as to how the North-West is to be handled—even as to how it was to be handled before the outbreak, and as to how it is to be handled, considering the present condition of things and the consequences for some years to come, of the events of this winter. I am not making these observations with a view to express any definite opinion as to whether the hon, gentleman's proposition to double the force of mounted police ought to be rejected. I do not think we are in a position to express that opinion. I think that in order to express that opinion, in order to say whether it should be dealt with at all, we require to have some statement from the hon. gentlemen opposite of what their views are, generally, upon these two subjects, which, as I have pointed out, are necessarily and inextricably intermingled. Is it true that the disturbed districts in the remoter parts of the Territory-the districts of Edmonton, Battleford and Prince Albert-are, for the future, to be garrisoned by the Mounted Police? If so, we want more Mounted Police, and that is a reason for that policy; if not, the question arises how far the formation of local his sanction as to the opinion it expressed. Mr. BLAKE.

corps is to be applied, and to what extent it can fairly he applied; and you have got to settle both these questions in some general sense before you can decide the exact amount of corps that you propose to put in motion. Sir, I trust that after what I have said the hon. gentleman will feel disposed to give us that further information to which I have referred before we are asked to make much progress in this matter. We ought to have the Mounted Police report, we ought to have the report of Col. Houghton, to which I have referred, and we ought also to have a statement from the Government of a larger and more comprehensive character, before we are asked to decide how our votes shall be recorded upon the proposition now before us.

Mr. CARON. I regret that I was not in my seat when the hon. gentleman referred to the Department over which I preside. I regret, also, that I am not in the position of having a brief so carefully and elaborately prepared as the brief from which the hon leader of the Opposition has spoken. But I believe, that without a brief and without any previous preparation, except a knowledge of the facts which have come under my notice as Minister of Militia and Defence, I can give, possibly, some information to this House and to the country contradictory of the statements which the hon, gentleman has just made. When the hon. gentleman stood up to-night and spoke of the administration of the Department of Militia, it seemed to me that he was forgetting that on more than one occasion the hon. gentleman, when I appealed to the House and the country, and asked the House to provide the money which was indispensable to keep up a force, a force such as Canada should have keept up, invariably met me with the opposition of himself and his friends to every vote I asked for the purpose of maintaining the militia. I remember well, that at the very outbreak of the disturbances in the North-West, when remembering what had taken place, which the hon. gentleman knew as well as I did, that he had opposed every vote I had applied for, he nevertheless, from his place, as leader of the Opposition, declared that he would hold the Government responsible for the life of every man who should not be provided with all requisites when sent forward to fight the battles of Canada in the North-West. The hon. gentleman at that moment, rising in his seat and appealing to the feelings of the House, and stating that among his friends and family some had been sent up to the North-West, announced that he would hold the Government responsible for any deficiency, although, if any deficiency had occurred, it was because the hon, gentleman and his friends, Session after Session, refused to vote the amount which the Minister of Militia brought down to this House and asked it to vote. I am ready to leave this question to be discussed before the country, and I am ready to leave the people to decide whether the leader of the Opposition, at that time, was following a patriotic course, and whether he was doing his duty by his country in refusing, and in his friends refusing, to sanction the votes required to keep the militia force properly organised. But I take the statements which the hon. gentleman has made to-night, and I find that the hon. gentleman objects to the money which is being expended in maintaining the Winnipeg corps, the 90th Battalion-

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. CARON. I beg the hon, gentleman's pardon, He said that from the reports which had been made the whole money spent in the North-West was being expended upon the Winnipeg corps.

Mr. BLAKE. No. I beg your pardon. I read an extract from the speech of the hon. member for Marquette. I made no such statement as the hon, gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. CARON. The hon, gentleman read an extract from a speech by the hon. member for Marquette, and he gave

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. CARON. He gave his sanction to the opinion expressed by the hon, member for Marquette. The hon. gentleman does not read the speech of any hon, member if he does not wish to give his sanction to that speech. I ask this House whether the money which has been expended upon the Winnipeg corps has not been money well invested in the interests of the country. After the record which has been achieved by those Winnipeg battalions, by the 90th and the other battalions, which have been at the front and which have sustained the brunt of the battle, I ask whether any hon. member, whether any man in the country, will stand up and say that the Department of Militia did not exercise proper judgment in expending money upon those corps, which really were the first battalions we sent to the front and the first to meet the great emergency through which we have just passed. The hon, gentleman has referred to reports which he says have not been brought The hon. gentleman occasionally supposes reports which do not exist; and the hon. gentleman, with his usual confidence in himself, imagining that he is infallible, invariably believes that what he supposes must be right and true. But I tell the hon. gentleman, from my seat in Parliament, and taking my position as Minister of Militia, that when he asked me for those reports I told him that the reports which we have brought down were the only reports we have in the Department. The hon. gentleman did not contradict my statement; he did not refuse to accept it—that we had followed in the North-West exactly the same rules and regulations we apply to every district in the Dominion. I told the hon gentleman that in the North-West we had several companies, three companies, I believe, which had been organised as mounted infantry; that those companies, after an inspection by the inspecting officer, such as is held in every other district, were considered to be so disorganised that the inspecting officer could not allow them to be kept on the roll of the militia force of Canada. The hon. gentleman says they were disorganised through the neglect of the Department of Militia, and because no uniforms were served out to them. I tell the hon. gentleman, although his brief may be a well-prepared brief, that if he cares about going into the facts and ascertaining what is right and what is wrong in reference to his statement, he will find that when those companies were organised the Department of Militia undertook to give to them saddlery and arms, and refused to give them any uniforms. They were formed under that understanding. I will give, the House the reason why the Department refused at that time, to serve out uniforms to newly organised companies. It was not at a time when I was presiding over the Department, but when a colleague of mine, who was more able than I am to preside over the Department, occupied the position, that the companies were organised, and the then Minister refused to serve out uniforms, because, as the hon. gentleman has stated, from a speech of mine, he said the organisation of the militia force in the North-West Territor was a grave question. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask this House, whether it was possible, upon the money voted by Parliament, maintaining, as we are maintaining in the older Provinces, a force of about 40,000, or more precisely, 37,000, to organise, in a territory so great, expansive and vast, that one battalion would be like no battalion at allwhether it was possible for any right-minded man to expect the Department of Militia, upon the vote of Parlia- their country, and their great love for economy, they have ment, to organise a force in the North-West. I stated to vote against those estimates. I want to ask the hon. that the reason why uniforms were not served out to gentleman, when he speaks of uniforms, if I have not, year that force—and it was a good reason—was simply because in that Territory, as recent events have of Militia, come down with estimates, showing the House shown, it became a question to know what kind of that we required 8,000 suits every year, for the force which mounted infantry, and every man who has studied the question will say that it was perfectly useless and destructive of the organisation to have served out uniforms that are used in our infantry and cavalry corps at present. Since the outbreak in the North-West the Department has been called upon to send forward uniforms, and the hon. gentleman himself, with the great care which he took of the volunteers at the front, taking for once upon himself to give advice and not criticism, suggested that we should send up to the men who were fighting our battles some kind of uniform which would be more useful and more available for their purpose than those served out in the different infantry corps, those constituting the organised corps of Canada. Yet, the hon. gentleman not knowing that these companies were organised on the understanding that no uniforms should be sent out, but that arms and saddlery alone would be served out—the hon. gentleman, reckless in his charges, stands up in his place and says that through the negligence of the Department of Militia these companies were disorganised, because they had no uniforms served out to them. I have no doubt the hon, gentleman knows as much about military matters as he knows about everything else, and that is saying a great deal, I admit: but the hon. gentleman knows well that if they had saddles and arms they can go through their drill without having green or scarlet tunics on their backs. It was no question of the organisation of the force, no question of whether they were served with uniforms, but a question of whether the Department knew its duty in giving to the mounted infantry the saddles they required to ride their horses and the arms they required to go through their drill. The hon, gentleman says that in three years several of these companies completely disappeared, because of the neglect of the Department. Sir, they disappeared because in that great western country men move about from one district to another, and the companies organised and composed of a certain number of men one day find that those men have been transferred to some other district, for some reason or other; and still the hon, gentleman believes that the Department of Militia would be justifiable in allowing those saddles and arms and accourrements to be distributed all over that country, and probably, to day, if the Department had not acted judiciously, those articles would have been in the hands of the men who are shooting down our volunteers. Well, Sir, I believe it was the bounden duty of that Department to see that those arms should be returned into the Department, who were responsible for them to the country, and placed in such a position that if required at any moment they would be at the call of the Department, and could be placed in the hands of the men who, in-tead of fighting against the country, were fighting to defend the country. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to some application of Mr. Bedson and others, to organise a c rps. Now, I wish to appeal to every impartial man, whether sitting on your right or on your left, to say whether it was possible for me, with the estimates which were voted by Parliament every year, to organise a force in the North-West. I have stated, as the hon, gentleman stated to-night, that it is a large question; and, Sir, I hope that when the estimates of my Department come down, if I propose to organise the force which I consider to be necessary and indispensable to the country— I hope that hon, gentlemen will not, as in the past, rise in their seats and state that the expenditure of the Department of Militia is so enormous that with their great love for uniforms should be given to our men. Take a corps of we have, the force authorised by Parliament, recognised by the country. I came down year after year, and I told Parliament, not using my own information, except as I acquired it from the men who are known by every hon. gentleman here as those who composed the staff of the Department of Militia, men who have acquired large experience, men who know the requirements of the force, I have stated, year after year, and Session after Session, that we required 8,000 suits a year, and yet these patriotic gentlemen, who find that we should have sent up uniforms to three companies in the Duck Lake and Saskatchewan district, only voted the amount required for 5,000 uniforms.

Mr. BLAKE. How much were we asked to vote?

Mr. CARON. I made my statement year after year and every item was criticised for weeks and weeks; and the press controlled by the hon. gentleman took intense pleasure in stating that they had been able to keep the Minister of Militia before the House on his estimates for weeks and weeks, criticising the items. I say, that no body caring for his country, nobody who has any love for his country, would have incurred the expense of the speeches of these hon gentlemen in criticising items which were absolutely indispensable to make the force efficient, and to make it such as it has been. Yet, I am prepared to say that, even with the adverse votes of these hon, gentlemen, I was able to get up such a force, at the moment when the country called upon that force to come forward, at a period when it was almost impossible, as most people believed, to send a force up to the North-West; at a period when our great highway, the Pacific Railway, was unfinished, still, with all these obstacles in the way, it was possible to organise within the smallest possible time, a force that has done so much for Canada, because it has shown that Canada's sons are deserving of the name of men, who showed themselves ready to go to the front and fight our battles; but I must say, knowing what I say, that it was not due to the hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, if that force went up organised and equipped as it was. The hon. gentleman, the other day, in a speech he made, stated that he would take the earliest possible opportunity, from information he had received, to show that great extravagance had been perpetrated in connection with supplies and in the transport service which enabled our men to go to the front and do their duty. I did not hesitate for one moment-nor would I hesitate to-morrow, even after the speeches of the hon, gentleman-to take the proper steps to enable that force, without any delay, to obey the call of their brilliant commander, General Middleton, who, in his despatches to me, says that at no moment was he delayed by either defect in the transport or defect in the commissariat, and that it was wonderful to him how Canada was able, in that emergency, to organise the force that was sent to the front. Not having been in my place when the hon. gentleman commenced, I do not know whether I have answered all his objections, although I hardly hope that, because he always puts forward so very many. It is disadvantageous to discuss a question of this kind, involving great details, before the papers are brought down; but I believe that when they are brought down it will be established beyond the possibility of doubt-I do not say of discussion-that everything that could be done for the North-West was done. In regard to the three companies that have come under the special protection of the hon. gentleman, I never heard him say anything about them until they were disbanded and their arms and accontrements had all been returned to the Department; but as soon as everything had been done to secure the responsibility of the Department, the hon. gentleman said they should not have been disbanded. I am very sorry that they did not exist, but we were bound to do what the keeping; they were all brought in and put under the control of the Mounted Police. We had no organisation in that vast district. The only officer representing the Department of Militia was Col. Houghton, who was Deputy Adjutant-General at Winnipeg; and hon. gentlemen will understand what an enormous expense would be involved in sending an officer up, starting from Winnipeg and going over the whole of that district, merely to inspect three companies. Those arms which had been collected and placed for safe-keeping in the hands of the Mounted Police were the first arms which had been given to the first men who rose for the purpose of defending that district against the rebellion which had broken out. Therefore, judging, not as the hon gentleman has judged, without any facts, but in the light of experience, I think the course followed by the Department of Militia has turned out to be, so far, successful. Of course, I have the greatest possible respect for the opinion of the hon. gentleman, more especially on military matters, and I am perfectly certain that when he takes the same amount of trouble that he does in other matters, and looks into the papers and studies up the question, if he can find time to study militia questions, he will not be as severe in his criticism as he has been to-night.

Mr. WATSON. I am a little surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. Minister of Militia, especially with regard to something I said two years ago. I believed at that time, and I believe still, that if the Government had spent more money farther west than Winnipeg on the Militia, it would have been better for the Province. I think the Government made a great mistake in not keeping up those three companies that have been spoken of so slightingly, at Duck Lake, Battleford and Prince Albert, I believe that if those three companies had been kept up the trouble in the North-West would not have taken place. Those three companies would have been larger in number than the halfbreed rebels who rose at Duck Lake and took part in the massacre there. The expense the hon. gentleman speaks of, in Col. Houghton going as far west as Prince Albert to inspect those three companies, would have been money well spent, and would have saved the money and blood that have been expended in the late trouble. The remarks I made were with regard to the desire that existed to form some companies in the Province of Manitoba. For instance, in the town of Portage la Prairie, where I reside, for the last four or five years the people have been petitioning the Minister of Militia to have a company of mounted infantry formed in that district. If a few hundred men had been formed into such companies at different parts of the Province, a few years ago, and had been placed at the call of Col. McLeod and Major Walsh, and those gentlemen had received their instructions from the Militia Department, this whole rebellion would have been put down within two or three weeks, and millions of dollars would have been saved to the country. I have some reason to know why the companies at Prince Albert and Duck Lake were disbanded. Some three years ago, when I, along with a few others, were actually trying to form a company of mounted rifles at Portage la Prairie, we were informed by Col. Houghton that the companies had been disbanded and that all they had were rifles and saddlery. And the reason the companies were disbanded was, according to his statement, because the volunteers were dissatisfied with the Government for not paying them for the time they drilled and not furnishing them with uniforms. Of course, that being the case, we wanted to form a good company, but did not wish to receive the rifles, which were claimed to be rusted and out of repair, having lain there a long time, and the saddles were of a very cheap class. The Minister of Militia has stated that Department did at that time. Now, I have only one word more to say before I resume my seat. The arms the hon. gentleman refers to had all been collected for safe- mr. Caron.

The Opposition criticised the estimates for the past year, of his Department. The Opposition were quite justified in criticising the hon. gentleman's estimates. So far mr. Caron.

as I am concerned, I will criticise them in this way: that I believe the money has not been spent in the right direction. It appears the North-West is the only portion of our great Dominion that has been protected by an armed force. That force, in the past, was composed of 300 mounted men, and it speaks well for the Mounted Police that they should have maintained order in that country during the past number of years in which they have had control of it. Instead of having to increase the Mounted Police at this date we ought rather to be able to dispense with a portion of them. If volunteer companies were formed in the Territories, and the money we spend on the Mounted Police was paid to them for two or three weeks drill every year, it would be much cheaper than keeping up a standing corps of Mounted Police. The money that it takes to keep half a dozen mounted policemen would keep a whole company of volunteers, and the volunteers have proved themselves quite as capable of meeting any emergency as the Mounted Police. The Minister of Militia has stated that the Government have kept up 37,000 men in the older Provinces. I think it is a great mistake to spend all the money in keeping up 37,000 men in these Provinces, when little or nothing has been spent in the North-West. The North-West is the only portion of the Dominion which requires protection by an armed force, and certainly the greater portion of the money should be be spent there. I telt very much grieved at the answer I received from the hon. the Minister of Militia, in the earlier part of the Session, at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion. I asked him if it was his intention to furnish arms to volunteer companies who would organise for protection or to go the front. I was answered that the Government were very careful in whose hands they placed arms in Manitoba. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say "hear, hear," but they may live to see the day when they may regret glorying in such statements. The people of that Province are as loyal as any in the Dominion, and the Minister of Militia has stated to night that the volunteers of Winnipeg have stood the brunt of battle; and the volunteers from all over the Province of Manitoba, who have gone to the front, in all, some 1,000 young men, have stood the brunt of battle; and I think it ill becomes any hon. member of this House to sneer at the volunteers of the West. But we may probably expect such things from hon. gentlemen opposite. We find that an hon. gentleman, a member of the Government, the Minister of the Interior, in the Upper House, a few days ago, said he had no doubt, when the papers were brought down about the troubles, that it would be found among Riel's papers that the Farmer's Union had a great deal to do with the recent rebellion. I repudiate any such statement, coming from an hon. member of the Upper House, or from this House. The people of Manitoba are as loyal, and have proved themselves as loyal during the late trouble, as any other citizens of the Dominion. I say, with reference to this Bill before us, that I believe the money intended to be spent in more than doubling the present strength of the force would, a portion of it, be much better spent in maintaining volunteer companies. We have hundreds of young men in Manitoba who have proved themselves willing to go to the front within the last two or three months, although they were not drilled, and I say that a portion of this money spent in the maintenance of an increased Mounted Police force would be much better spent and have a much greater effect in forming a large number of men into a militia company, ready to go into action at any time. I do hope that, whether the Mounted Police are increased or not, the Minister of Militia or the First Minister may see fit to organise volunteer companies all over the Province of Manitoba and the North-West. If there is a Province in the Dominion in which volunteers should be encouraged it is that Province and the Territories. It is the only one where there need exist any fear of the Indians, or, I Osborne Smith, in 1879, when I told him to tell the inhabi-

I might say, from the frontier. We have a frontier of about 100 miles in extent of prairie country. We have been isolated in the past, to a certain extent, from other portions of the Dominion; our Province and the Territories have been under the control of 300 armed men, and little or no arms or ammunition have been kept in the Province for distribution among the settlers for their own defence. The Mounted Police deserve credit for the work they have done in the North-West. It is wonderful, when we consider the struggle that has taken place lately, how 300 men managed to keep these Indians so well under control. This trouble having arisen, and the Government having seen fit to increase the mounted police, I hope the Government will not omit to organise volunteer companies, either mounted or infantry, in Manitoba and the Territories.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. Minister of Militia will not give the House further information, I hope to be able to extract it some other time. I do not propose to trouble the House with further reference to this matter, but wish to say a few words with reference to some things the right hon. gentleman has stated. He has declared that the statements I have made are not justified by the facts; and he said that I had drawn upon my imagination for them, or upon information from outside. Now, the history that I gave to the House of the rise and fall of the five companies of the North West volunteers was extracted from the hon, gentleman's own reports. These were the sources of my informa-tion. It was from these I derived the facts. If those reports are unreliable, if they do not convey to the House and the country the truth, if they do not state the facts accurately, then, of course, I have been inaccurate, but it was because I was guileless enough to believe that the hon. gentleman's reports were correct, and because I supposed that he, at any rate, would accept them as correct. I have shown from those documents the difficulties which those men were beset with. I have shown from the reports, from year to year, of his own officer, to his own Department what their trouble was. I have shown that, in consequence of their not being furnished with uniforms they were not authorised to drill; that they were relieved from drill because the uniforms were not sent out. I have shown what was their discouragement by his own officer, and I have shown the views of his own officer, from year to year, of the necessary results of that discouragement; and what were the reasons the hon. gentleman gave for letting those companies fall into this condition? They were two-fold. First, he said it was true, as I had read in a speech of his, that the organisation of the militia forces of the North-West was a large question. That was one of the reasons why they were allowed to fall into decay. It was a large question, it was too large a question for the hon, gentleman to handle; it was too large a question for him to grapple with.

Mr. CARON. Too large for the vote you gave.

Mr. BLAKE. I will deal with the vote presently. It was too large a question for the hon, gentleman to handle. The Government declared, in the year 1879, that it was their policy to organise forces in the North-West; that these Territories should have a corps wherever there was a population sufficient for it. They told Parliament so. They obtained a small special vote for the initiation of that. They proceeded in that line. They declared it each year, and, without telling Parliament what they were going to do they seem, administratively and executively, to have adopted the opposite policy, of extinguishing the forces in the North-West Territories. It was not the policy announced to Parliament. The hon, gentleman did not say: The result of my consideration of the North-West affairs is that I have decided to reverse the policy which I sent to Col.

tants it was highly important to organise forces in those Territories, and they were organised; but I think now they may be allowed to die out, and I ask Parliament to let them die out. Nothing of that kind said he, but he did it. He says there was another difficulty. Why were they not furnished with uniforms? He says: There was another Minister who preceded him and who discharged the duties of his office with greater ability than he could pretend to. There are some things in which we are inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman, and that is one. He says that his predecessor found that there was a difficulty in those days. He wanted a little time to consider what the proper form of uniform should be in the North-West. It is a peculiar country, where the climate is severe, where it is very hot in the summer, and I am told that it is a little cold in the winter, where the country is a little difficult and the distances may be great, and he wanted to find out what uniform would be the proper one in the North-West; and this practical question, which might have been settled, I should think, by enquiry of those mounted men who have been doing duty under the charge of another Department of the same Government for some years, by enquiry as to the views held in reference to the situation of the troops on the other side of the line in a somewhat similar climate, discharging somewhat similar duties—this was another great branch of the North-West militia question; and it has taken the hon. gentleman and his predecessor from 1879 to 1885 to find how the troops should be clothed. Well, he has had to settle it experimentally and in a hurry, in the middle of a war. He nods assent. Is it not a pity that they did not have a mimic war some years before.

Mr. CARON. Your friends tried to get it up.

Mr. BOWELL. You had it here.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not hear of it; but, if so, it adds to the culpability of the hon gentleman, because with that danger staring him in the face, and being charged with the peace and protection of the country, and believing, as I suppose he did, as he has said so, that the people were trying to get up a war before, still the clothing of the North-West militia is too great a question for him to grapple with. The tailor's question—the question of the cut of the clothes of the men—all these questions were so difficult, and required so much time to solve, that it was necessary that the forces he organised in 1879 should languish and die as an organised force before his great mind could successfully grapple with the question. He says there was another great difficulty—even if I could have grappled with this question, I could not have handled it, any way, because you refused to vote me the money. I am prepared to defend every vote I have given, every speech I have made on the subject of the militia of this country. When the hon gentleman condescends to particulars, as I now challenge him to do, either now, if he wills, or when his departmental estimates are before the House, if he wills, when he wills and where he wills, I challenge him to the speech or to the vote which will justify his statement in this matter. I speak for myself; my friends will speak for themselves; he made a personal attack and a personal charge upon me, and declared that my speeches and my votes were of a character that, he said, no man who loved his country would engage in at such a crisis. He was disorderly in making that statement, but I did not call him to order for it. I repudiate the charge, I hurl it in the hon gentleman's face, I deny it to his teeth. I say the criticisms I have administered to his militia estimates, such as they were, I am prepared to stand by, to reiterate, to defend and to repeat. I say, further, that the defence of the hon. gentleman is-I cannot use the word; I was about to say ignoble, but I understand that that word, from this side of the House, is out of order, so I do not use it—but I say his defence is unworthy of a Government. Here is a Government in I ful Government to stand in, that their defence for not doing Mr. BLAKE.

power with a majority of two to one in Parliament. They bring down the estimates for the public service of the country which they say are adequate to the discharge of that public service. They are bound by their oaths of office, they are bound by their duty to the country, they are bound by the power with which their country has entrusted them, to call upon the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled for such supplies as are necessary to carry on the public business efficiently, for such supplies as are necessary to protect the public peace and secure good order in the land. That is their bounden, their plain, their obvious, their sworn duty. And the hon, gentleman tells me-what? Not that he brought down a large vote, which was rejected; not that he brought down a large vote which, a combination of the Opposition and of his own followers prevented him from carrying. He says: I brought down too small votes because I, the Minister of War, at the head of a force twice as numerous as that opposed to me, was afraid of the criticism of the Opposition. The Minister of War, with all the power, with all the patronage, with all the grandeur of his position, and sustained by forces twice as large as those opposed to him, sustained by drilled and organised battalions, which fill one side of this House, spread over to the other, and almost crowd our feeble force out of the chamber, knowing that his public duty called on him to bring down large estimates to Parliament, abnegated his duty, was false to his oath, was unfaithful to his trust, and brought down small estimates, inadequate to the discharge of his duty, and rendering the country insecure. That is the hongentleman's statement. Now he says: I turn round, I, with my power, I, with my organised battalions, I, with my numerous forces, I, with the control of the Treasury, I, with all in my hand to do what I please, and with my sworn duty to do it, my defence for my abnegation of my duty is that I was afraid of what the Opposition would say. Is it really so? Is it because the Minister of Militia was afraid of the criticism of the Opposition that he did not bring down the necessary estimates? For, Sir, every shilling that the hon, gentleman asked from Parliament had been voted. But with reference to the particular estimate which we are now dealing with—I refer to the estimate for uniforms—unless my memory greatly deceives me, I do not believe that there was a criticism in this Parliament or in the last Parliament hostile to the amount of that vote. On the contrary, unless my memory greatly deceives me, it leads me to the impression that more than once hon. gentlemen on this side of the House-I think I will say my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey), amongst them-have pointed out the necessity of improving the equipment, of improving some portions of the uniform of the volunteers.

Mr. CARON. Buttons.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has a soul above buttons, I observe, looking as straight as I can before me. But I do not think that we discussed the subject of buttons. And I recollect something more, with that memory which the hon. gentleman says is so unfaithful, and which he is so little disposed to trust, I think I recollect a discussion on the subject of head gear, and I think my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Fairbank) pointed out what ought to be done in that way, and I think I recollect my hon. friend from Elgin speaking on the equipments, and calling the hongentleman's attention to that. I think I shall be able, when that challenge to which I referred is met, to show the hon. gentleman-although I speak only for myself-I shall be able to show him that suggestions were made from this side of the House that more should be done in the nature of an equipment for the volunteers than the hon. gentleman himself proposed. But, Sir, if it were as the hon, gentleman has alleged, this is certainly a humiliating position for a power-that which was essential in their view to the interest of the country is, that they were afraid to bring down the necessary vote because they feared the criticism of a weak Opposition—an Opposition that hon, gentlemen jeer at and deride, when it serves their purpose, but which now, it seems, is strong enough, without one word, by the mere fear of words it may perhaps speak, to control the policy of the Administration of the day. Now, the hon gentleman found no difficulty in proposing last year a vote of twenty-nine millions and a-half for the Canadian Pacific Rail-way. He finds no difficulty this year in proposing a vote altering the condition of our securities, and making a further loan of five million dollars. He has found no difficulty in proposing to Parliament an expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, upon the whole, of something over one hundred million dollars, in one way or another. These things did not stagger the hon. gentleman, but he was so afraid of the criticisms of the Opposition that he could not find the money, he could not find it in that brave and gallant heart-which must be brave and gallant, when it belongs to a Minister of Militia-to ask for money for uniforms for five companies in the North-West-three mounted companies and two infantry companies. What a curious sort of difficulty this is. The Government are bold when they want to do a thing. They were not apprehensive of our criticisms when they proposed that you, Sir, should be put in that Chair. They went on. They were not apprehensive of our criticisms when they proposed that we should have two heads to the Library. They went in. They are not apprehensive of our criticism when they propose, in one block, to vote half a million dollars more in permanence for the Mounted Police. But they are so afraid of us that they could not ask for money for the uniforms for the volunteers, so that because there were no uniforms they had to go without drill, and thus the whole thing came to an end. What a curious kind of cowardice this is in the hon. gentleman. It strikes him just when he wants to be struck. When he wants to be afraid of something he is very much afraid, but when he wants to do something he is as bold and as brave as need be. Now, the hon, gentleman has said that I am in the habit of declaring things upon my own imagination, and that what I believe I believe so strongly that I am quite sure it is a fact, although I am contradicted, and that I believe there must be a report of Col. Houghton, and because I believe it, I say it. The hon. gentleman denies it, and he tells me there is no such report.

Mr. CARON. Except the one that appears.

Mr. BLAKE. No such report, except the one that is in the Blue Book, that there is nothing to be brought down. Now, Sir, I know that there is such a report from Col. Houghton—I do not merely believe it, I know it as a positive fact. I aver it to be a fact, and I shall prove it this moment. I read from the report of Col. Houghton himself in this very Blue Book:

"Fortunately this catastrophe was averted by the excellent management of Major Orozier, Superintendent of Mounted Police, and the steadiness and discipline of the men under his command. I allude, of course, to the Battleford fracas with the Indians in the early part of last summer. Having already, however, reported to you fully with regard to the impressions formed by me when travelling through that section of the country last July (see report of 28th July), I must not here repeat my views therein expressed, and which have not since altered."

Now, there is Col. Houghton's own statement, that he made a report on the 28th of July last, to the officer commanding the forces. He does not repeat it, but he declared, I think in the month of November, that this view remained unchanged. These are the reasons why I said I knew there was a report from Col. Houghton, and I think the hon. gentleman should admit that they are good reasons, since he brought that Blue Book down to Parliament. The hon. gentleman has said that I said nothing about the North-West companies while they existed, but that I waited until it was all over. The hon, gentleman is mistaken there again. I said nothing about specific companies, but I have read to-night my statement made in the year 1882, on a debate such as this, with reference to the Mounted Police, as to the importance of creating and encouraging important corps of volunteers in the North-West; and I suggested, so far as from being disposed to unreasonable critisism, that extra expense in the way of pay should be incurred in order to make them efficient. I have read that in the House to-night; therefore the hon. gentleman will see that in the year 1882 I expressed myself at one with the policy of local corps in the North-West, and indicated that it might be necessary that increased expense on an unusual scale should be incurred, in order that that should be done, and of course took the responsibility of tendering the advice to the Government. I am not going to say a word about the conduct of our volunteers, about the hon, gentleman's management of the campaign, about the various other patriotic topics by which he sought to escape from a somewhat difficult position. I am aware that the hon, gentleman says that I do not know much about military matters. We are both lawyers; and I will not dispute the hon, gentleman's superiority in our profession, and certainly not in military matters. But it does not require much knowledge of military matters to understand that particular art which is employed when an hon. gentleman gets into a difficult position and proposes to buat a retreat. There are feigned attacks, diversions, something to draw away the attention of the enemy, something to cheer and encourage one's friends, something to raise a cloud of dust, under which the retreat is made. So the hon. gentleman, with patriotic exultation and an exuberant expression of praise with respect to his own conduct, sought, amid the cheers of his followers, to escape from the question in hand. We are not going to discuss the campaign or the hon, gentleman's conduct of it, or the conduct our volunteers. Neither are we going to discuss the munitions supplied to our volunteers, or the tunics and uniforms supplied to them, or the transport supplied to them, or the hard tack and pork supplied to them. These are not the questions for discussion. I was pointing out that we had a policy with respect to the defence of the North-West, and the maintenance of order there; that that policy consisted of our having two classes of forces in that country, the Mounted Police and the volunteer force; that we had debated the subject of the conjoint action and development of those two forces; that both sides of the House had agreed, myself speaking from the left, as leader of the Opposition, and the First Minister speaking from his place, as leader of the Government, in substance to the proposition that there should be encouragement of the local forces, and they were to discharge an important part of the duty. I was pointing out that that policy had been adopted in form by the Government for two or three years before; and I was pointing out from the Blue Books of the hon. gentleman how that policy had been handled subsequently, and in what it had resulted when the time of stress came. That was pointed out. I pointed out that the question was: What shall be our policy in the future? Has that question yet been settled? Are we going to organise a large volunteer force in the North West? Have we settled the great question of trowsers? Is that great question, like the question of buttons, settled yet, and is the hon. gentleman prepared to decide what uniform shall be worn? If so, you want to handle the subjects together. as the hon, gentleman's own officers have dealt with them. I have read extracts from reports from the hon. gentleman's own officers, containing suggestions as to how to manage in places where there is a small force of police and a company or two of militia, and in other places where there are no police and quite sufficient militia. What is to be the policy of the future? I say these are very important questions,

hon. gentleman's views with respect to the expenditure of What is the militia vote? Small as it may be, what is the militia vote which the hon, gentleman took last year? It was a trifle under a million. For the whole militia force for the whole of Canada there was a trifle under a million of dollars. We are now going to expend on the Mounted Police, after this proposition is adopted, just about $1,000,000, an equal amount to that expended on the whole militia of Canada. The hon, member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), with the shrewd, practical common sense which distinguishes him, pointed out that the Minister could do a great deal, by way of encouraging local corps in the North-West, by expending a fraction of the amount, by expending the interest for one year on the sum he is going to expend annually on the Mounted Police. That is a serious and important question. But the hon, gentleman is not afraid of proposing to expend $1,000,000 a year on the Mounted Police in the North-West; he is not afraid of our criticism. That is all right. It is only when you come to the expense of uniforms for five companies that the hon. gentleman's heart drops into his boots, and instead of being a Minister of Militia he becomes a political poltroon.

Mr. CARON. I have more than admired the various talents of the hon. gentleman. I have admired how he displays that kind feeling, that gentlemanly feeling, for which he is so notorious. But the hon. gentleman appears before us to-night in a new role. He has lectured hon. gentlemen upon courage and bravery, and has talked of poltroonery. I believe the hon, gentleman is the last member of this House who can assume that role. From his past career and from my experience of him, I believe he is the very last member of this House who should stand here and lecture any hon, gentleman upon his courage and bravery. The hon gentleman was evidently carried away by the very few remarks I made for the purpose of conveying information to the hon. gentleman. I meant merely to convey information, nothing else. But the hon gentleman says the policy of the Government has been to extinguish the forces in the North-West, to destroy the companies which were at one time existing. The hon. gentleman forgets that immediately upon the reduction of the forces, in so far as regards those companies which were disorganised, we immediately organised a battalion, which was commanded by Col. Kennedy, who lost his life a short time ago when showing the devotion of Canadians to the British Government. That is a record of the policy of the Government in regard to its extinguishing forces at that time existing in the North-West. We merely collected the arms of companies which did not exist, and organised a battalion, which was the first battalion to go to the front, and which fought the first battle in defence of law and good order. That was the policy of extinguishment and of destruction that the hon, gentleman seems to be so delighted to bring before the House, in the hope that he will induce the House and the country to believe that such as he depicted it was the policy of the Government. It was not a policy of extinguishing or reducing the force, but of having a force that could be relied upon in case of emergency, as the 90th Battalion has proved itself to be, a battalion perfectly equipped and organised, and ready, at a moment's notice, to take the field and fight for the country, as every militia regiment in Canada should it? do. So far as those disorganised companies were concerned, that was the policy followed. Were the Government to blame for collecting arms, which were handed over to the first organisation that was raised in that district when the emergency arose occurred? The hon. member for Marquette Watson) said he had been advocating a policy of giving arms to home guards and other military organisations in the North-West. But the hon, gentleman tried to find fault, because that wish exist. That is what I charge—that is my point. I say we Mr. BLAKE, which he expressed had not been complied with. Well' Mr. Chairman, we could not recognise any other organisa tion than the regular militia force. What authority had I as Minister of Militia, under the statute, to go and distribute the arms of Canada, and to give those arms to any organisation, except those which are recognised by the law of the land. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) came to me, as several others came to me, and said the ranches were unprotected, and some other interest was unprotected; that they required a home guard, and that they required me to arm them to protect those various interests. I told the hon, gentleman that when it comes to the militia force the Department of Militia is supposed to look after the armament and equipment of that force. If any organisation is required for any special purpose, then, it is for the municipal authorities other authorities in that country, take to necessary precautions, so as to procure the arms which they think it proper and right to place in the hands of those men. The hon, gentleman seemed to insinuate that these arms had not been given because we had doubted the loyalty of the men applying for those arms. Well, I can only say that it was not a question of loyalty, it was a question of the Department carrying out the law which organised that Department. It was a question with the Department of doing what it was bound to do, and not going beyond its duty, by giving arms which it had no right or authority to distribute to any force other than the one recognised by that Department. Now, the leader of the Opposition has thrown out challenges. Well, when the time comes, when the papers are brought down, as to any challenges which the hon, gentleman has put forward, notwithstanding the want of bravery on the part of the Minister of Militia, I believe we can meet together upon the same ground, and I am not at all afraid to meet him when that time comes.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not propose to prolong the discussion, but the statement which the hon, gentleman has just now made, with reference to the force in the North-West, is one which should not pass without a word. I have been discussing, Sir, the question of the North-West Territories, the question of the defence, of order, in the North-West Territories, as distinct from Manitoba. You know the extent of the North-West, the comparative inaccessibility and remoteness of many points in these Territories. We are engaged in discussing that question with reference to this proposal to add 500 men to the Mounted Police. I have been arguing, as I did consistently in 1882, as the Government then agreed, as they agreed for three years before, for the formation of local forces in different parts of those remote Territories, where there might be local means advanced and a sufficient aggregation among the people, where you might strike at a moment, and not wait until you organised battalions, which would have to march 200 miles in the depth of winter.

Mr. CARON. We did organise a force.

Mr. BLAKE. What force?

Mr. CARON. The 90th Battalion.

Mr. BLAKE. Where?

Mr. CARON. At Winnipeg. Where would you organise

Mr. BLAKE. I am not talking about the organisation of battalions at Winnipeg, but of the armament of the organisations you had in the North-West.

Mr. CARON. Which had disappeared-which did not

Mr. BLAKE. I know it disappeared; I know it did not had a policy for the organisation of local corps in the North-West at different points. It was a settled policy, an agreed policy, a policy consented to by both sides, and when that organisation has disappeared, I charge its disappearance upon hon. gentlemen opposite. That is the point, and the hon. gentleman now says: Oh, it did not disappear, because I did not reduce the forces. If I allowed the local organisations to disappear it was that I might create additional forces in Winnipeg. That does not answer the question at all. It may have been all right to create that battalion in Winnipeg—I am not questioning the creation of the additional battalion in Winnipeg. I dare say that was a judicious thing to do—I am not discussing it now—I will grant it for the moment, but it has nothing to do with the question of the reversal of policy as to local corps in the North-West. That is what we have to deal with.

Mr. CARON. Allow me to ask the hon, gentleman whether he would have been more successful in keeping men together who were going from one portion of that immense territory to another, thereby completely disorganising these companies. It is not a question of disorganisation, but they disappeared completely. It is not, as the hon, gentleman stated, that they were disorganised because they had no tunics, but because, if they had tunics, there were no men to wear them, and the hon, gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLAKE. Now, the hon. gentleman has made a statement which requires attention. He says that was the reason, and that I know it. I say again that my information is derived from, perhaps, an eminently untrustworthy source. I am beginning to believe so. It is derived from the hon. gentleman's own reports.

Mr. CARON. You have said so before.

Mr. BLAKE. Now, let us see what the cause was, as stated by the hon, gentleman's own reports. In the report for the year 1882 the commanding officer declares:

"The North-West corps, in consequence of not yet having received any uniforms, were relieved from drill this year by order of the Adjutant-General, dated 10th August."

He goes on:

"In reference to these corps, I may state that it is hardly to be expected that they will give up much of their valuable time and supply their own horses for drilling purposes, or even regard themselves in the light of a properly organised body of militia, until after they have been furnished with uniforms of some pattern or denomination."

Then, in the following year, after this report was made, the officer reports again:

"In the same connection, I would beg most respectfully to urge the advisability of the reorganisation, or, more properly, the organisation of the North-West corps, which although now more than three years enrolled and shortly afterwards outfitted with arms, ammunition and saddlery, have never since been assembled for drill, in consequence of no unform having, up to the present time, been furnished to them. Thesecorps are still in existence, and could readily be resuscitated by their original commanding officers were they to receive encouragement to do so."

The Minister of Militia says he knew, and that I knew, that these men, who were scattered all over the country, had all gone, that they had all disappeared; that the arms were there, and the saddles were there, but that the men who enlisted were gone. I find that his own officer tells him that "the corps are still in existence and could readily be resusciated by their original commanding officers were they to receive encouragement to do so." What was the encouragement they got? The encouragement was to disband them. We have the statement in the report of the 1st July last, of the number there is for drill, only 380 out 775; and that statement includes these companies. The officer adds:

"I may here state that since the commencement of the current year, 1884-25, namely, by Gazette of the 13th September last, the three companies of mounted rifles and two companies of infantry in the North-West Territories have been removed from the list of corps of the active militia."

I stated that from an earlier period the growing discouragement was pointed out; that the hon gentleman was told by his officers that it was not expected that the force could go on without being supplied with uniforms; that last year he was told the corps were still in existence and could easily be resuscitated, if only they could be given any encouragement, and that the encouragement he gave was to disband them.

Resolution to be reported.

INSPECTION OF GAS.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 119) further to amend the Acts respecting the inspection of Gas and Gas Meters.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon, gentleman would throw a little light on this, in the absence of his colleague.

Mr. McLELAN. The previous Act required that notice should be given to the manufacturers of gas when the quality of the gas as well as the meters were to be inspected. It was thought unwise to give the manufacturers notice when the quality of the gas was about to be tested as well as the quantity, and this Bill is just to amend the Act so that notice of an intention to inspect the quality of the gas will not be given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The clause I have before me appears rather to provide that the manufacturers should have 24 hours' notice, although I entirely agree with the Minister that it is not desirable that the manufacturers should get notice. I have had a good deal of practical experience of the dexterity of the manufacturers of gas in altering the quality to suit the inspection, and in various ways in playing tricks on the consumer.

Mr. McLELAN. The clause which it is proposed to substitute for that now in the Act provides for notice only of the inspection of the meter and not of the quality of the gas.

Bill read the second time.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 133) further to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1882.—(Mr. McLelan.)

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the report of the Committee of the Whole on resolution in reference to the number of the North-West Mounted Police force, be now received and read a second time.

Mr. BLAKE. Would the hon. gentleman give us some reasons why he proposes to increase the force?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought that I had given explanations why the increase was needed -not at length, certainly, but length is not my prevailing excellence. The hon, member opposite, in his speech, complained that I had confined myself to the question of protecting ranches. Now, I did not say anything about ranches. I spoke about protecting those living near the frontier, protecting their flocks and herds. The ranches are, in the far west, coteing the eastern declivity of the Rocky Mountains. Those have always been protected. I believe there has been very little raiding there, for the very good reason that the companies who own these different ranches employ a strong force of very efficient herdsmen, known in the United States as cowboys, who protect their flocks very well. But the chief scene of raiding is on the southern frontier of the Province of Manitoba, and extending westward until we come to the country of the ranches. There the people are agri-That it is expedient to amend "The Consolidated Inland Revenue Act, 1883," and to make better provision (a) for the marking and storing of goods warehoused; (b) for preventing the sale of unlawfully manufactured spirits or malt; (c) for preventing fraud by the use of packages which have been already used; (d) for the enforcement of penalties; (e) for allowing an abatement of duty on spirits for shrinkage by evaporation, for allowing the Governor in Council to impose an additional duty of five cents en each gallon of spirits, and for prohibiting spirits being entered for consumption before a specified time after manufacture; (f) for the protection of the revenue in relation to compound articles, breweries, tobacco and cigars; (g) for defining the packages and boxes in which tobacco and cigars may be put up; (h) for the same allowing the modification of caution functions and extending westward until we combe to the country of the ranches. There the people are agriculturists, settled on their lands, and they all have horses; cattle and sheep as well, though I do not hear of any adduction of sheep. There is an organised system of forays from the United States into that country. With respect to the frontier of Manitoba, and extending westward until we combe to the country of the country of the ranches. There the people are agriculturists, settled on their lands, and they all have horses; cattle and sheep as well, though I do not hear of samy setulation of sheep. There is an organised system of forays from the United States into that country. With respect to the frontier of Manitoba, and extending westward until to the country of the pose of protecting it. There are certain well known trails from the United States into Canada. They are followed by raiders, to a very considerable extent, and these people carry away cattle. The Dominion Government assume the protection of the frontier, so far as the Mounted Police can do it. These raids are the subject, I will not say of daily, but of weekly or monthly complaint to the American Government. We think we are more sinned against than sinning. The raids come principally from the other side; and without a mounted force, which the Province of Manitoba, I do not think, could well keep up, there is no real, practical protection. Cattle cannot be followed on foot and be recovered.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Have the raids not been wholly west of the boundary of Manitoba-in the Territories, not in the Province?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We use the force to protect the international boundary line as well in the Province of Manitoba as west of the Province. There is a great deal of raiding into Manitoba proper, and a great many complaints arise on both sides. The House will see that it would be putting a strain on the resources of Manitoba to compel that Province to maintain a mounted constabulary for the purpose of preventing those raids. The hon, gentleman said that by my short statement yesterday it would appear that the main object of the police was to protect the herds. I dwelt on that, as it was a new phase, an increasing phase of duty on the part of the Mounted Police. Their duties are increasing daily by the altered and altering circumstances of the country. The police have a very difficult and very dangerous, as well as a delicate, series of duties to perform. Under the Indian treaties certain reserves were set apart for the Indians. It has been only by slow degrees that the Indians were got —they have not all been got there yet-to confine themselves to their reserves and endeavor to live by the agricultural products of the soil. The better Indians, the good Indians, to use a common expression—and I think the majority of them are of that class-have been induced to go to their reserves. It has, however, been accomplished by a series of mingled coaxings and threats. In every Indian band, as in every assembly of white men, there are good and bad people. The bad, the impatient, especially the indolent Indians, those who hang about the different settlements and stores, are very difficult to get upon the reserves. Sometimes indolent Indians will hang around an Indian station or a place where there are stores—sometimes round the Hudson Bay station—they will deliberately settle themseves down and declare that they will starve rather than leave. In such cases the policy has been to keep them on the lowest quantities of food which will sustain nature, in order to compel them to do what the majority of the band have already done-go on the reserves. That policy has been, on the whole, successful. But still there must be a continual, hourly pressure upon the Indians, to hold them upon their reserves. Besides this delicate duty, the duty also devolves upon the police of preventing the Indians breaking into stores, whether they belong to the Government or to the Hudson Bay Company. Whenever there is a small force, hundreds of Indians will come and will break into the stores where supplies are kept. The duty of the police is, therefore, a continuous one, and an increasing one, and the increase in the number of white settlers adds to the difficulty. A white man settling on his farm is apt to be very regardless of the sensibilities and the claims, just or unjust, of the Indians. Settlers, as a rule, take a hostile position against the Indians, just as it has been in the experience of the United States all along the western frontier. The duty of the very objects for which these people have the police is not only to protect the white man against gone to the North-West if they were continually employed the Indian but the Indian against the white man. And, as a permanent force, watching the protection of the coun-Sir John A. MacDonald.

therefore, with this increasing duty and the increasing responsibility involved, the Government ask the House to consent to the increase of the force by 500 men. Recent events have shown that the force is overworked; that they are obliged to watch every reserve, in order to keep the Indians on the reserves. They are apt to get away; they are unwilling to endure restraint, and this can be prevented if there is a good agent on the reserve, and a sufficient force at hand to let them know pretty well that if they will not listen to reason they will be forced to carry out what they have agreed to do. Sometimes there have been outbreaks. These will break out occasionally, especially when the Indians find themselves, in a given locality, in a majority; then they are apt, too apt, to presume on that majority and insist, by threats of personal violence against the agent, on obtaining supplies from the Hudson Bay Company's or Indian stores, all of which are in the locality for the supply of the Indians under different treaties, and to prevent absolute starvation. In that work the Mounted Police are constantly employed, and the annoyance and worry is great. As I said yesterday, the work is so hard that applications are received from men to leave the force. A policeman must be under training for a time, for a year, certainly, before he is of much value. He will not understand his duties; he will not see the way in which the Indians are treated—the way that the system works; and we are very apt, at the end of the first year, to have a good many applications from policemen to retire. We compel them to pay a fee for that purpose; and we have twice, I think, increased the fee, for the purpose of pre-venting the men from going away just at the time that they become useful. But it must be obvious to the House and to common sense that the unwilling officer is not a good officer, and therefore it is important that the work should not be too harassing, too constant. I believe that no soldiers known to the British service, no constabulary known to the British service, either in Ireland or in India, as police, have as much work to do, individually, and collectively, as the force in the North-West; and it would be unwise economy to have that force deficient in number. The Bill to be founded upon the resolution is an empowering one, by which the Government are empowered, if they see it necessary, to increase the force to the extent of 1,000 men. Just now, or until lately, it was 520 men and some scouts, the force authorised by law. Now, with respect to the relations between the militia in the North-West and the police force, their duties are quite different. They have one common duty, of course, when called out. They have the common duty of protecting law and order, and in case of outbreak or rebellion, to put it down and keep order. But there the similarity ceases. The militia men, whether they be in one place or another, must be, to a great extent, if not altogether, a defensive force. They are drilled for that purpose. If there is a threatened danger at Prince Albert the militia there would defend Prince Albert, and so with the militia in other points.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish hon, members would keep order. We cannot hear a word here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope hon, gentlemen will keep quiet, as otherwise it is impossible for me to speak, except with great difficulty. As I was saying, in case of insurrection, of course the militia in the North-West and Manitoba will go to the field readily, as they have done, but they will go into the field to put down a pronounced insurrection, an outbreak, or to defend the locality, just in the same way as the militia in the eastern Provinces have gone there to put down the outbreak. They cannot always be in the field. It would, of course, be destry from individual outbreak, individual assault, individual raids, and so on. The Militia are at home attending to their various duties. If they are summond to meet insurrection or defend their homes they are most efficient for that purpose, but the duty of the policeman is a daily duty. He has got to be employed—I was going to say in 500 different places, but certainly in 100 places, in parties from two to 500; they have to move about day and night; they have to watch the frontier. If there is a suspicion that there is going to be an exodus from any reserve, either to go on the war path or the more peaceable but more dishonest path of stealing their neighbors' cattle, they have to be watched. Stores are scattered all over the country, Hudson Bay stores, Government stores, as well as the stores of the individual trader, who pierces to the far west with the enterprise of the western trader—they have to be protected. There is ceaseless action—ceaseless movement of the police force from station to station, from point to point; they have to be watching continually. I think the House can quite understand that I am not all displeased with the interruption caused by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Orton) coming into the House, who, after performing his duty to the country in a creditable manner, as acknowledged by everybody from the general in command down to the suffering patient in the hospital—he comes here as soon as one duty had ceased, to perform another duty-a duty to the country and those whom he represents in Parliament. I will continue my remarks by stating that we might as well entrust the daily or nightly duty of the Metropolitan or London police to the Horse Guards, or to the troops stationed at Knightsbridge, as to throw on the militia of the country the daily, nightly and hourly duty of protecting life and property, which must be and is the duty of the Mounted Police. As I said before, the Act empowers the Government to increase the force. The hon, gentleman called attention, as perhaps he had a right, to the fact that the first notice I gave was to increase the force to 800 instead of 1,000. Well, it increase the force to 800 instead of 1,000. arose in this way, as he can quite understand. I thought 800 would be sufficient, but on talking it over with my colleagues, and especially considering the threatening condition of affairs, we thought we had better take power to have 1,000 men. If it is found that there is no necessity for 1,000, the number will be 800. When it is found that the force can be reduced, it can be reduced. Fortunately, in one sense, there is no difficulty in reducing the force. Applications for discharge are such that without a long delay the force would melt away, if we would allow the men to have their discharges. I must say one thing in favor of the police. The measure was introduced in 1873 when 150 men were collected—the original measure was for 300 men, and it was increased from 150 up to the number authorized by law. This force, whether it be 300, when there were few whites, and when the thing which had to be done was to keep peace among the Indians—whether it were that number or 500, they have performed their duties well. It is a remarkable thing that for so many years past peace reigned among the Indian tribes, and would have reigned yet, so far as the action of the Indians was concerned, if they were not roused by the outbreak among the half-breeds. If you look across the line to the United States, along the frontier, while we had 300, the Americans had 6,000 men watching the Indians on the northern frontier. We did the some thing, and we succeeded in a greater and better degree with this small and insignificent force, in keeping the peace to the north, than the Americans did, with their enormous force, which experience had taught them was required for the purpose of repressing Indian outbreaks. I think it is proper that I should make that statement with regard to the force. I have not disguised from myself, nor have I from the House, in the remarks I have made on this subject, ever since I have held my present position, that we fuller information than it has heretofore received. The hon-

could not always calculate on that state of things. The Indian nature, savage and wild, is a very uncertain quantity, and if you look at the history of the various wars and insurrections that have arisen in the United States, and the constant outbreaks of savagery that have occurred, you will find that in some cases there is no reason assignable or appreciable by the white mind for them. Having had some little reading on that pointfor it is a very interesting point to any Canadian or American—I have always expressed my apprehension that some time or other, for some cause, or without cause, there might be an unpleasant end to the state of quiet that had hitherto existed in the British North-West. The hon, gentleman stated that while Parliament was sitting we had given notice of a measure, and that we had stated that an increase of the force was to have been asked for, irrespective of the recent outbreak. That is quite true. I felt, and the Government felt, that the force ought to be increased for the purpose of efficiency, and therefore it was settled that the measure should be laid before the House. The men were recruited for this reason: When it was known that there was a very great amount of discontent among these halfbreeds, and indeed when they had risen in arms, and formed themselves into a hostile combination, the officers were instructed that there was no time to be lost, and to recruit men as fast as possible. I was quite well aware that Parliament would assent to the increase. I was quite well aware that the reasons were so overwhelming that when the Government came down and stated, on their responsibility, that the force ought to be increased, the increase would be granted. And it is always well to take men when you can get them. At the time the hon, gentleman asked the question there were some 200 odd more recruited, on the strength of this measure being adopted. You can get plenty of applications to enter the force, but it is difficulty to get men with all the requisites of a good policeman. Besides having a good physique he must have some degree of intelliing a good physique, he must have some degree of intelligence and respectability. He is not merely food for powder, like the soldier, whose physique is the chief requisite, but he must be intelligent, must be educated, to a certain extent, must be able to read and write, to serve a process and to make a report when sent on duty, and I must say that in all these particulars the force has acted very creditably and very well. These are the explanations that I now have to make. The measure enables the Government, if they think 1,000 men are wanted, to increase the force to 1,000, without coming to Parliament for a new authority by another Act. If it is found that the 1,000 men are not wanted, they can keep the force down to a smaller number.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is to be regretted that the hongentleman did not make these explanations in the course of the debate to which they properly belonged, instead of making them on the present occasion. The hon gentleman remarked that his speech was brief, and that therefore he did not define particularly where this raiding took place, which he gave as the justification, if I remember rightly, the sole justification, for this increase. Not unnaturally, as the hon. gentleman spoke of flocks and herds, I assumed that it was where the flocks and herds were, and where we know there has been considerable difficulty in times past. The hon, gentleman says it is not the flocks and herds of the ranches, but those of the inhabitants of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not of the ranches only. Mr. BLAKE. Then it was the flocks and herds of the ranches, but also those of the inhabitants of the country stretching from the limits of the ranche region down to the eastern limit of the Province of Manitoba, in so far as it borders on the United States. The hon. gentleman's statement on that subject is, of course, of high consequence, and it shows the importance of the House being possessed of gentleman has informed us that this raiding is on both sides, and that he has had daily and weekly complaints from the United States Government of raiding from our territories into theirs, and it seems from his statement that this is a large cause of his proposed increase. It is not to prevent our cattle being stolen and carried into the United States territory, but it is to prevent our people going into the States and stealing their cattle and carrying them into our territory. If that be so, I am sorry to hear an account so serious of the lawlessness of our population. If it is so that there have been daily and weekly complaints from the United States Government of incursions from Manitoba and the North-West Territories into the States and territories of the south for felonious purposes of this kind, I really think we ought to have the papers. I think this justification which must be a recorded justification, capable of being produced by giving evidence of these complaints from the United States Government, ought to have been brought down by the hon. gentleman. I think also, inasmuch as he has stated that the question of flocks and herds is only a part of the reason for the increase, and that the ordinary duties of the Mounted Police are also to be considered as having been enlarged, requiring an increase, that it was essential, before | ness of the country, require some special protection, and it he proceeded further with this resolution, that we should have had the report of the force for the year. I do not see that he is treating Parliament with proper respect when, upon an allegation of the increased duties to so numerous a degree, he proposes to proceed with this legislation without giving us the officers' reports; and we have really had no plausible excuse for that report not being laid on the Table. Many reports are laid on the Table in manuscript. It could have been laid on the Table any time since the 29th of January last, and it is secreted from us because he says it is in galley form only, so that we shall not receive it in manuscript or otherwise. Then he says Manitoba is unable to cope with this difficulty—to prevent her citizens engaging in felonious forays into the United States, or United States citizens engaging in felonious forays into Manitob; and it is to ease Manitoba that he proposes this increase. I have no doubt from the condition of things, that there in any locality to organise that force, which, suphave been representations from the Government of Maniplemented in some localities by the Mounted Police, tobs on that subject, that they have shown a very excepminght accomplish the purpose of preventing by display tional condition of things exists there, that they have pointed out it was impossible for them to protect the peace along the border, and that they have requested the hon. gentleman to make some special provision to meet the circumstances of their position. To suppose anything else would be to suppose they had failed in one of the first duties of Government, and they do not seem to be indisposed to apply to the hon, gentleman for what they want. In fact, I have heard the hon. gentleman say they were sometimes rather unreasonably pressing, that the Prime Minister of Manitoba, firm friend though he is of the hon. gentleman, was rather exacting. I recollect at the commencement of the last Session of Parliament, I read extracts from some of the speeches of the Prime Minister of Manitoba with reference to the condition of that country, and its demands on the Government, and the hon, gentleman, in reply, said we must not take all that for actual fact, that Mr. Norquay put his case in the strongest manner, in order, I suppose, to drive the hon. gentleman into a little more vigorous action than he otherwise would take.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He left a margin.

Mr. BLAKE. He left a margin. Well, as Mr. Norquay, to use the statement of the hon. gentleman, is in the habit of more demanding than he expects to be granted, in order that there may be a margin for discount, a margin-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are along the margin.

Mr. BLAKE. They are to be along the margin. Let us Mr. BLAKE.

the complaints of Manitoba are, before taking the serious step the hon, gentleman proposes with reference to an organised Province. The hon gentleman says there are a great many complaints on both sides. It will be all the easier for the evidence of these complaints to be brought down and to see exactly what the emergency is which the hon gentleman proposes to meet. He proposes to deal with that which, speaking from my recollection of his statements yesterday, he did not then deal with the ordinary or what are supposed to be the normal duties of the police. He spoke largely of its duties with reference to the Indians, and he seemed to give that as the basis for his demand to increase the force. pointed out, with perfect propriety, that the duties to be assigned to the police and to the militia were, in many respects, entirely distinct. I must have been very unhappy in the expressions I used, if I failed to convey any other impression. I had no idea whatever, that in that country, other than in our own, we could expect the militia force to perform the ordinary duties of a police force. That country being exceptionally circumstanced as regards the sparseness of the settlements, the presence of Indians, the remoteis obvious what we could not do here we could do much less there. Nobody proposes that the farmers or mechanics of the North West Territory, should be engaged from day to day, from hour to hour, as volunteers in the discharge of police or constabulary duties; but I pointed out that there was admittedly, as there always has been, a necessity for an organised force for protection, in case of local outbreaks or threatenings of local outbreaks, and I read from the reports to show, for instance, that when the force was disorganised and disbanded at Prince Albert, the Mounted Police force was sent there instead. The one was gone; the other substituted. You have this danger there, apart from other dangers, the danger arising from the presence of Indians on the different reserves. You have, presence of Indians on the different reserves. therefore, a special reason for the organisation of a special militia force wherever there is strength enough of strength an outbreak; and anyone who has followed the reports of the recent outbreak cannot fail to see that the display of strength is important with a view to repression. It is plain, from recent events, that the Indian will look to that, will consider that, will see what your defensive preparations are, in what condition they are, how soon and how hard you can strike, and he will be guided very largely, with reference to his rising, by his opinions of the efficiency, the rapidity, the multitude of your preparations in the immediate locality. I say it is of the last consequence that we should consider the whole situation of the North-West as to its defence from the danger of an outbreak, whether by insurrection amongst those not purely savage Indians, or by a rising among the Indians; and it is there that the hon. gentleman has wholly failed, even to-day, to justify his statements of 1882. His statements then were that for 10 years to come he would preserve the peace of the country with the 500 men, the increase he was asking, and that as the population increased the necessity for the force would diminish; and he now tells us that as he has distributed the Indians on reserves—which was going to render them less harmful, less dangerous, less a disturbing element—the danger increased, and the necessity for the police increased, and, as the white population increased, the danger also increased, and therefore the necessity for the police increased. This is not what he said in 1882, when I pointed out that as the population increased, local forces could be established that would diminish the necessity for Mounted Police. The statements see what the condition of things in Manitoba is and what that as the hon, gentleman's operations for the settlement of the Indians go on, as he is putting them on the reserves, the danger increases; the statements that as the white settlers increase in numbers, the number of the Mounted Police must increase, is, from a financial aspect and from other aspects as well, a most alarming and unsatisfactory statement. He says the Mounted Police force has done its duty. Well, that, so far as I know, is a fair statement of the case. I have made no imputation, directly, indirectly, or impliedly, on the conduct of the Mounted Police.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not.

Mr. BLAKE. It would be extremely unreasonable that I should do so, but I recollect such imputations being made from the other side. I recollect the hon, member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), some years ago making a series of the strongest imputations against the Mounted Police. He, of course, had the advantage of local knowledge, the advantage of acquaintance with the people in the territory, he had the duty, the responsibility to a very large extent, as the representative of an important constituency, in a certain sense the representative of a somewhat distinct class, of making a statement of what he believed to be true, and in the discharge of his duty he made statements I am sure the House heard with great pain. I have no information which would enable me to say anything on this subject which would be condemnatory of the Mounted Police, and of course I assume, in the absence of such information, there is no cause for condemnation. I am sure some of the hon. gentleman's observations with reference to the requisitions of the Mounted Police and the care to be taken in selection will hardly be in accord with some former observations and with the reports, which, at a subsequent stage, I will have the pleasure of bringing in contrast with his statements to-day. He has said that peace prevailed amongst the Indians. It is not the first time he has made that statement. I will not enter into a discussion of that to-day, but my reading of the official papers does not lead me to that conclusion. I find very strong statements, from 1879 onwards, which lead to the conclusion that his statement is altogether too rose-colored, and as soon as the report emerges from the galley form, if it be a correct report for the year 1884, he will find my observations confirmed, though I have not the advantage of having seen the report, and, therefore, I speak with respect only to other sources of information which are open to him as well as to myself. The hon. gentleman has said that he justifies the enlistment of this force, this House in session, in advance of the authority, because of the urgency of the case, and his knowledge that the House would approve the Act. I maintain that the hon. gentleman, having this resolution on the paper, or having the capacity to put it on the paper long before, as far as we know, he took the first step to enlist a man, long before, as he has told us, he took the first step to enlist a man, was bound to have prosecuted this resolution and to have obtined the sanction and authority of this House before enlisting men in excess of his authority and in defiance of the law. He says: I was satisfied with regard to the emergency, the anticipations of discontent, and so forth, that Parliament, which was then in session, would ratify my Act. I said yesterday, and I repeat to-day, that I would be the last man to accuse a Minister who, under some pressing necessity, acted in excess of his authority and came down to the Parliament and said: I have my political life in my hands, the safety of my country required me to act, and I call upon you for indem-nification. That is the course a patriotic statesman would take, that is the risk a patriotic statesman would run. But it is a different thing when action is taken sedente parliamento. I say the necessity which justifies that action does not then exist. I say, that, when the authority can be obtained, you have no right to act in defiance of the law, you have no right to exceed the tribes, with their reserves located along the great means of 304

The hon, gentleman has no right to count even upon his majority in this House ratifying what he does in defiance of the law, when this House is sitting. His duty is to invite their attention to his views, to ask them to promote his legislation, to ask them to clothe them with the legal authority to do these things in the interest of the country, which he thinks the good of the country requires. That is his duty, and that call would no doubt be obeyed, but to tell us that he was quite sure that, whatever he did Parliament would ratify, and that, therefore, this Parliament sitting, he acted with perfect confidence in excess of and in defiance of the law, is to make a statement which certainly indicates the hon. gentleman's very great confidence in the submissive character of the majority of this Parliament, but very much less respect for its dignity, its honor and its independence.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not rise to oppose this motion, but I feel that, at a crisis like this, it is well that, before we commit ourselves to a permanent charge upon the country, we should look around and see what it is for and where the necessity exists. I am not going to say one word against the Mounted Police, but there have been a good many statements made about some portions of the Mounted Police that I think should be laid before this House before we undertake to double their number, and to double the charge upon the country. I do not think that the present time is exactly the one to deal with it or discuss it, wore it not that we are now asked to increase very seriously the charge upon the country for this particular branch of the service. I am not going to say that 1,000 men are not required in that country in the west, but I feel that, after the very satisfactory manner in which the campaign in that western country has been conducted and the insurrection put down, this Government, strong in the success of their recent efforts in that region, may ask us, and very likely will ask us, and the tendency of the Government under such circumstances is to ask the country, to increase the charges and place more power in their hands, and necessarily increase to the people of the country the taxation which we are not prepared to increase now, if we can avoid it. I am not going to say anything more about the Mounted Police matter, but, in discussing the numbers of the Mounted Police required in that country, we cannot confine the discussion to the Mounted Police alone. We should have laid before us, when we are asked to increase the liability of this country as we are asked to increase it, the whole treatment of the North-West; we should have the whole Indian policy submitted, and we should have this Parliament asked to advise and consult with the Government, to direct the Government what policy should be pursued with reference to the Indian tribes in that country in the future. I am one of those who believe that the arrangements as to the Indian tribes have been most unfortunate, with regard both to the settlement of that country and the future of the Indians themselves. The right hon, gentleman has described to us the condition of the Indians around these Hudson Bay stations and supply stores, and I presume all around the railway stations in that country. I saw somewhat of it myself last year when I was up there. You could scarcely go to a station west of a certain longitude without finding some of these Indians, with their tepees in the neighborhood, loafing around, seeking charity, and living in idleness and misery, If they are to continue in that way in the future, there is very little hope for them or for the country which contains them, for its peace, its prosperity or its advancement. I think the Government, before asking us to increase the charges for the North-West, should consider it their first duty to lay before this Parliament a policy as to the treatment of the Indian tribes in future. We should know whether these communication which has cost us so much money to establish, whether the Government intends to allow these Indian reserves to be located along these lines; whether these lands are to be tied up, so as to force the settlers to go back from the line of railway, and these poor miserable creatures, seeking charity and living in misery, to remain in the vicinity of these settlers, retarding the growth of the country, keeping people from going in there, and at the same time being a positive injury to the Indians themselves. I feel it is my duty to call attention to the fact that one of the first duties of the Government should be to lay before us some policy as to the treatment of the Indians in the future. I do not suppose that any advice I could give would have much effect, but I suggest that some policy should be adopted in regard to the removal of these Indian tribes from the line of railway, that those bands who have proved to be rebellious and murderous in their character should be removed to the far north. know that, in many cases, it is necessity which has driven the Indians to plunder. There is no fish in the lakes and very little in the rivers in the south, the buffalo are all driven away, the game is all gone; the Indians will not live by work, they cannot live by hunting as they did formerly. Remove them to the north, where the game exists, where the lakes and rivers abound in fish, where they will be free from the track of civilisation, and will not be subject to the evils that civilisation often brings upon these tribes. Before considering this question of the increase of the police force in the North-West, we ought to have some statement of the policy of the Government in regard to them in the future. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but I desire to call attention to the fact that this is the duty of the Government in the present

Mr. CHARLTON. I may say if the Government adopt the policy of moving the Indian tribes to the far north it will be found to be rather a tedious and expensive process. The experience of the United States in removing Indian tribes, such as the Seminoles of Florida, for instance, to the Indian territory west of the Mississippi, shows that in almost every case it has been at an expenditure of a very large sum of money. I think the removal of the Seminoles, only a few hundred Indians, from the everglades of Florida, cost the Government of the United States $12,000,000. am sure it will be found cheaper to pursue the policy that is being pursued in some measure by the Government, of feeding the Indians where they are, rather than attempt their removal to the far north. I think it is doubtful whether, if you remove them to the far north, the necessity of feeding them would be obviated. But I rose more especially to call the First Minister's attention to an expression he used a while ago which I am afraid will not be received in a very good spirit by our volunteers. We have now very nearly completed the suppression of the insurrection in the North-West, and it has been done in a manner so creditable to our volunteer force as to secure for them enconiums from the United States and from abroad. We may congratulate ourselves upon the result of the first trial of our troops in action. It has raised Canada very high in the estimation of the various States as a military country. It has given us confidence in ourselves, as well as in our own ability to cope with difficulties of this kind. I was very sorry to hear this expression fall from the lips of the First Minister, in speaking of the qualities that were required for a member of the Mounted Police force. He said: "He is not merely food for powder, like the soldier, where the only thing required is physique." Now this expression is an unhappy one as applied to our volunteer force, and is a most unjust one, powder, and they possess qualities other than mere physique. I men, and we cannot help that. We cannot drive them back Mr. MITCHELL.

It is a highly intelligent force, a brave force, a force who not only met the dangers of action, but endured great hardships in moving from the eastern Provinces to the west, and endured those hardships in a manner highly creditable to their spirit, to their endurance and to their intelligence. I repeat that I was sorry to hear that expression from the lips of the First Minister with reference to our soldiers, who have acquitted themselves so creditably in every way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I should be very sorry, indeed, to think that any of my remarks could be understood as in any way disparaging to the general intelligence as well as to the patriotism of our volunteers. Our volunteers are much more than mere soldiery. I was drawing a distinction between a purely military force and a police force. In a military force, as arranged by armies in Europe and in the United States, the recruiting officer looks at the man and sees if he has the requisite height and physique, and if he passes the military examination he is taken on as a soldier. I pointed out that in this constabulary other qualities are required. We know perfectly well that our volunteers are not mere soldiery, and are not raised from those ranks which usually, especially in England, form the enlisted soldiery. They are taken from all ranks. We have relatives of the first men in society serving as mere soldiers. They have turned out voluntarily and patriotically, bringing with them all their education and intelligence. There can be no comparison between our militia in Canada, both those who have gone to the front and those who have not gone to the tront—there can be no comparison between them and the enlisted soldiery of the regular standing armies of Europe or America. With respect to our volunteers, I think the Government as fully appreciate their services as the hon, gentleman. I quite agree with the sentiments he has expressed, and before this Session closes the Government will have occasion at a fitting time, not only to pay a just tribute to the services of the officers and soldiers of our active militia now fighting the battles of their country, but of marking in a material way their great sense of the services of those men. My hon, friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) says the Government has come down with an Indian policy. We have no new Indian policy at all. The policy that existed at the time the hon, gentleman was my colleague, exists now. It is simply this: To observe good faith towards the Indians, to treat them kindly, and to treat them firmly. If there has been a fault at all in the administration—I do not speak of the present administration but of all administrations—it is that we have been rather over indulgent to the Indians. But what can we do? We cannot, as Christians, and as men with hearts in our bosoms, allow the vagabond Indian, the pauper Indian, to die before us. Some of those Indians - and it is a peculiarity of their nature-will hang around the stations and will actually allow themselves to die, in the hope that just before the breath leaves their body they will receive some sustenance from the public stores. That sustenance has been given. It has been given very grudgingly, very carefully, very parsimoniously. Men have brought themselves down to the starvation point, believing that we down to the starvation point, believing that we would not allow them to die. Well, what are we do with these Indians? The reserves they now hold are given them by treaty. They are property; we cannot deprive them of those reserves without another treaty. If it has happened that after these reserves have been established near a railway, or another railway comes near them, or a white settlement comes inconveniently near them, why, the railway complains, of course, that the Indians haunt the stations. We cannot because they are something better than mere food for help that. They live on their own property, they are free at the point of the bayonet. If a white settlement comes near an Indian reserve the Indians immediately complain. They will not do as the whites do. The whites have a whole continent before them, and if they choose to go near an Indian reservation it is their business. If they find that an Indian passes at an inconvenient hour of the night and walks off with some of their fowls or property, we cannot help that, we cannot drive the Indian away. We are going to pursue the same policy that has been pursued upon these questions so successfully under the auspices of the British Government, and which has been continued ever since, of giving them a portion of the country. That same policy must be carried out. There is no new policy. We cannot drive the Indians to the north of the Saskatchewan. Why, they are too far north now. If they had been down along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway we would not have had so much trouble as we have had. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the forcible driving of the Indians to the north could not be accomplished without bloodshed, without breach of faith towards the Indians. And what would be the consequence? We would collect an immense army, a nation of hostile Indians to the north of the Saskatchewan, continually threatening our settlements and requiring something like a Chinese wall to keep out the barbarians. There is only one way—patience, patience, patience. We see what patience has done in the older Provinces. Look at the Province of Ontario. The Indian is still an Indian. His color is the same, but he is law-abiding, he is a peaceful man. There is no more danger of leaving property in the vicinity of an Indian settlement than there is in any white settlement in the Province of Ontario. the course of ages-it is a slow process-they will be absorbed in the country. You must treat them, and our children, and our grand-children, and our great grand-children, must treat them in the same way, until, in the course of ages, they are absorbed in the general population.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman has alluded to the relations between the Government and the Indian population of the North-West, and he has discussed the suggestion of the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) of removing those Indians from the reservations in the vicinity of the railway to other portions of the country. I do not think that question is necessarily involved in the consideration of the measure before us. I do not propose to enter into the discussion of the question. The hon. gentleman, however, tells us that we see what the Indians of the older Provinces have become, and what we may expect to make of the Indians of the North-West Territory. I do not know whether the hon, gentleman is referring to what the Indians are, or to what the Government propose to do for the Indians. The hon gentleman has by perseverance and patience attempted to do something for the Indians; but whether it will be to the Indian's advantage I do not suppose it is necessary to discuss on this Bill. But the hon, gentleman has given a rather gloomy picture of some of the Indians of the North-West. He has described them as lazy, improvident, as a class who prefer to steal and plunder rather than work—in fact, as a class who will die sooner than do anything to earn food upon which they are to Whether it is a Christian rule to feed people who are able but unwilling to work, I do not know. There is a Scriptural injunction that those who will not work shall not eat; and I do not know whether the hon, gentleman regards | Parliament to act. The hon, gentleman may be quite right that as a heterodox view of the Indian's position or not. The hon. gentleman's statement with respect to the Indians reminds me of a story told by a literary man of Washington in regard to some of the whites of the south, who were very much like the Indians the hon gentleman has described. He told of a benevolent man, a planter, who was in the habit | of providing a number of lazy fellows with food. At last he of the North-West and Southern Manitoba are of such a became impatient and would do nothing more for them. There was one who was regarded by his neighbors as a nuisance, and he was put into a coffin to be buried alive. While the funeral procession passed him, he asked whether the man was going to be buried. The reply was: "Yes, he would not work; he had become such a nuisance that they were going to bury him." "I will give him a bag of corn if you will let him go," said the gentleman. Thereupon the fellow raised his head, and asked whether the corn was shelled. The gentleman replied, "No." "Then," said the man, "you may go on with the funeral." The hon. gentleman's description of the Indians in the North-West was very much like the description of those lazy fellows of the south. It would be advantageous to the Indians if the industrious were encouraged and those unwilling to work were left to the consequences of their indolence. I have no objection to the First Minister providing such a force as is necessary to keep those Indians in order. I am sufficiently in favor of the theory of the survival of the fittest that, if an Indian is industrious and is disposed to improve his position, I would afford him opportunities to do so that I would not force upon those who would starve sooner than work. But we shall have an opportunity of discussing that feature of the question on a fitting occasion, and I wish to refer for a moment to other observations made by the hon, gentleman. If the population settled along the boundaries of Southern Manitoba and the North-West Territories are cattle stealers on both sides of the border, I can understand how the hon. gentleman would not want to organise such population into a militia force and put arms in their hands. I could understand the exclamation of the Minister of Militia that we do not want to arm the population to shoot down our volunteers; that those are people who rather require to be governed than to assist in governing. But I cannot believe that the population of the North-West and of Southern Manitoba are of that predatory class described by the hon. gentleman. The hon, gentleman must have been misinformed, and certainly before giving my support to a proposition founded upon an assumption of that kind I would like to see the evidence upon which it rests. I would like to see the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of Canada, where the former has called upon the latter to keep their thieves on this side of the border. Daily and weekly correspondence, the hon. gentleman said, has passed with respect to the conduct of these people. The people who reside there are mainly from Ontario and the older Provinces, with a sprinkling from the old country; and I cannot believe they are of that predatory class to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If they are, the sooner we get rid of them the better. If they are, there is something radically wrong in the steps that have been taken by the Minister of Agriculture and by the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has received so much active and persistent support from the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), if the Government and the Company. Can it be that we have only succeeded in securing for that country a population with predatory instincts? The First Minister, before he submitted this proposition, ought to have laid on the Table of the House the astounding information he has given. It is rather extraordinary that the hon, gentleman should have found the population to be of that class, and that he should not have given to the House at an earlier period the information upon which he now asks in asking Parliament to sanction what he has undertaken. But he ought not to have asked Parliament to do so upon a statement casually made, not make it at the introduction he did because of the measure. He now asks the House to carry through this measure because a large number of the people character they require a very large police force to secure obedience to the law and to prevent this country being involved in difficulties with our neighbors south of the border. The hon, gentleman has spoken of the police force being very hard worked in the North-West. They may be fairly actively employed, but I do not know that they have been overworked. We have not heard until now that the force has suffered in consequence of the laboriousness of their duties. At all events, if law and order exist in the North-West even in an ordinary degree it would not require such a large police force as the hon. gentleman proposes by this Bill. At all events, we have not had the evidence before us. It must be an unusual condition of things that would require so large a force for the purpose of preventing thieving and plundering along the borders of the North-West and of Manitoba. I can easily understand how it is important that the Government should have a large force available in an emergency, a moderate police force with a large volunteer force in that country properly sustained, which would form a much stronger force than the Government propose to provide by this measure, and at very much less expense. For it only requires to look into our annual votes in order to satisfy ourselves that one policeman will cost nearly as much as twenty volunteers, and certainly more than a dozen, and surely in an emergency a dozen volunteers are of far more consequence to the country than a single policeman. I say, therefore, it does seem to me, on all the evidence we have as yet had from the Government, that one half the policemen which the hon, gentleman proposed, supplemented when required by a large volunteer force established in the country, would provide much better protection against Indian risings, against the ordinary dangers such as have arisen there during the past three or four months, than the force which the hon. gentleman proposes to raise. Now, so far as the statement of the First Minister goes, this force is mainly required for the purpose of preventing complica-tions arising between Canada and the United States, for the purpose of protecting the American people along the borders of Dakota and Montana from the settlers of Manitoba and the North-West. I say that before we undertake to make such an expensive provision to enable us to discharge our duties to our neighbors, we should have evidence that the wrong has been done. That we have not got. The information which would justify this measure is not yet before the House. It is therefore of the utmost importance that the House and the country should be put in possession of the information which would enable them to know the character of the population that the Minister of Agriculture has secured in the settlement or that country; that the Government itself should justify by the publication of that correspondence, the expenditure which this measure involves. Sir, the hon, gentleman does not seem to me to have at all answered the statements made by the leader of the Opposition. My hon, friend has called the attention of the Government to the fact that the First Minister has undertaken to raise this force without the sanction of law, and The hon. genduring the period Parliament was sitting. tleman says there was an emergency, and that it was in order to meet that emergency that he acted, relying upon the support of Parliament. That would have been the proper thing to do if Parliament had not been in session, and an emergency was present. But the hon, gentleman's action has taken place since the Session of Parliament began, and why then was not Parliament at once informed of the necessities of the position, and why did not the hon. gentleman, at the time such an emergency presented itself, call upon Parliament to give him authority to do what he is now asking Parliament to consent to. Sir, I think before this Bill is carried, and in fact before it proceeds further, the hon gentleman should give us that infor-lincluding many tribes in the neighborhood of Prince Mr. MILLS.

mation, which verbally he has told us is the ground for his present action.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to state that I said that the white population along the border were a parcel of horse thieves. No expression of mine warranted the hon. gentleman in making that statement, or suggesting such a thing for a moment, and I am surprised that the hon, gentleman should have so mis-represented what I stated. I said there were complaints on both sides of the line, but that I believed that though there were sins on our own side, there was much more on the other side—that we were more sinned against than sinning, though I did say that complaints were made that raids came from our own side. But, Sir, those raids can be done by British American Indians as well as by white men. I can only tell the hon, gentleman that though it would be a was e of time to lay them on the Table, I could show imploring petitions made by the citizens on our southern side, imploring that the policemen should come, that their cattle were stolen, and that raids were made upon Petitions were numerous in consequence those raids. But there are complaints not only from the federal authorities of the other side, but from the magistracy and from the men commanding the troops on the other side, who are very good men. Whenever there is a statement that a raid has been made, whether by the Piegans, or the Bloods, or the white desperados who are strewed along the frontier and steal across from one side to the other, and are the terror of the people on both sides, they send the complaints at once, sometimes verbal, sometimes written, sometimes formal and official, and they are attended to. But in no way could any words of mine be tortured to mean that the white population as a whole, on the one side or the other, were a parcel of horse thieves.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Are we to understand that there are complaints from the other side, through the British Minis-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, there have been complaints.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Do you intend to lay them on the Table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know that I do. as they would not really give much information. The practice is with the American Government, whenever a complaint is made, whether of a smuggling transaction, a seizure, or anything of that kind, they do not investigate it, but send it to the British Ambassador and throw the onus of enquiring into it upon the other. The parties probably send it to the Secretary of State; he sends it to the British Ambassador; he sends it to Canada. That is one cause of the complaints being numerous, because they do not investigate them themselves, but forward them to us to look into them.

Mr. ORTON. There is another misinterpretation of the language of the hon. Premier which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed—that is, that he said the Indians, as a body, were a pack of thieves. The First Minister did not say that; he said that there were amongst the Indians some who were lazy and who would steal.

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that, nor did I say the First Minister said so. What I said was that the First Minister spoke of certain parties who would rather starve than

Mr. ORTON. We know that there are amongst the Indians in the North-West some who have remained loyal and true to the Crown, and it would be very wrong indeed that such a report should go abroad. We know that the Blackfeet, the Stoneys, and other tribes remained true,

Albert. I do not think that any misconception should go abread, and I might be excused at feeling a little hurt at such a misinterpretation of our Premier's words. I may say that I do not think the time has come when the Government will be able to retrench or lessen the expenditure in maintaining the Indians of the North-West, I think rather the time has arrived when they will be obliged to increase the expenditure, for a time at any rate. I believe that country can be made in a short time and at a little expense, able to maintain the Indians very easily, and I believe it will be done by making them herdsmen. There is no class of food that can be raised more easily in the North-West, not only on the plains, but in the mountains; in the Touchwood Hills, at Fort Pelly, and along the Saskatchewan, where there are reservations and blocks of timber, cattle could live all the year around, and could be raised very cheaply. I believe that if the Government had large establishments in different portions of that country for raising cattle, they could feed the Indians more cheaply than at present, and they could employ the young Indian lads who have not been used to hunting, in tending and herding the cattle; and if the Government gave them a certain interest in the herd, they would teach the Indians by degrees to support themselves by raising cattle. I believe they would fall into that kind of life more easily than into ploughing or raising grain. I believe the young Indian can be taught any trade. The establishment at Sault Ste. Marie has done a great deal of good in teaching young Indians the ordinary trades, and enabling them like other men to earn their own living. If more money were spent in that way, I believe the Indians of the North-West would soon get into the way of supporting themselves, so that they would cost very little to the country.

Mr. WATSON. I am sure the people of Manitoba will feel grateful to the Premier when they hear that he is about to establish a body of Mounted Police to protect the settlers along the frontier. But I think there is too much stress laid on the fact that a few horses or cattle have been stolen. The discussion on that subject to-day may intimidate some people from settling along the frontier for fear of horse or cattle thieves. I think there are very few instances of horses or cattle having been stolen from the Canadian side of the boundary—not more than two or three in the course of a year; and we know that such things happen in the interior and in the other Provinces. The First Minister truly stated that the Province of Manitoba is not able to maintain a Mounted Police force out of the pittance it gets from the federal authorities, because it has no internal revenue of its own; I suppose a parental hand will continue to guide the affairs of that Province with reference to the resolution before the House. So far as my observations have gone in the North-West, they satisfy me that it is of much more importance for the Government to consider the advisability of forming volunteer forces throughout Manitoba and the Territories than to increase the Mounted Police force. The hon. First Minister has stated, and stated truly, that the Indians get very bold when they are in a majority, and that when there is not a large force available to put down depredation, they commit them, and then retire to their reserves; they make demands on the settlers with which the settlers have to comply, or suffer. Now, I have made the calculation that according to the cost of maintaining the volunteers in the east, a company of volunteers could be sustained in the North-West, at almost the cost of maintaining one policeman; and a company of volunteers would certainly atrike more terror into the Indians than one mounted policeman. Too much cannot be said in praise of the Mounted Police for what they have done in protecting settlers and maintaining law and order throughout the North-West for years past; but if the Government had kept in existence the volunteer companies that were in existence in the North-West, I believe the unfortunate affair that has just taken place would not have happened. We cannot praise too highly However, that is past. the volunteer forces that were organised in Manitoba at a moment's notice and went to the front. The county I have the honor to represent furnished Major Boulton's scouts, who have done as good service in this outbreak as the Mounted Police; in fact, I believe they were more active than any force of Mounted Police in the west. If that company had been organised and drilled they could have gone to the front with a great deal more certainty of doing good service for their country, although they have done everything that could be expected of them; still, it is not fair to call on volunteers who have not drilled or had practice at rifle shooting to go and face such good marksmen as the hunters on the plains of the North-West. I agree with the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that when this matter is before the House the policy of the Government with regard to the Indians should be laid before the House. In my opinion the Indians should be compelled to stay on their reserves; and as there is now little or no game in the North-West that cannot be secured with shotguns. I believe the Indians should be deprived of rifles, and furnished with muzzle-loading shot-guns instead. I believe also that their horses should be taken away from them, and that they should be furnished with oxen instead. If that were done, the Indians would not be so likely to leave their reserves and go about the country as they do now. There is no doubt, judging from the reports in the press, that some of the Indian bands have not been treated as well as they might be. Probably the Government cannot be blamed for that; but through their officials the Indians do not receive the full value of the money spent annually for the purpose of supporting them. For instance, at different times the Indians have been furnished with poor implements, and with provisions which have been stated as unfit even for Indians to eat, although the country has paid the full price for good articles. It is very difficult to keep the Indians on their reserves to cultivate their lands, and it is a very difficult question for the Government to consider how they can keep them quiet and sustain them most cheaply. Instead of spending the enormous amount of money that is spent in maintaining volunteer forces in the east, I think the policy of the Government should be to have as large a body of volunteers as possible in Manitoba and the North-West, the only part of the Dominion that especially requires an armed force. It appears to me that the money that is spent on military matters is spent too much in towns and cities. Of course, the hon. Minister of Militia would not be able to visit the companies, as they would be situated, more than probably, in the remote parts of Manitoba where they would be more effective in cases of emergency; he would not be able to take mess with the officers. Too much money is spent in keeping up an army of officers, and not giving attention to the rank and file. It has always been, ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, the policy of the Opposition to grant better pay to the rank and file, and prevent the Government spending so much money on the officers and on the mess room.

Mr. BOWELL. The officers pay for their own mess.

Mr. WATSON. The officers are better paid than the privates.

Mr. BOWELL. So are you better paid than a laborer.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I am a laborer, and I think I earn all that I receive.

Mr. BOWELL. That is questionable

Mr. BLAKE. And you are better paid than he is.

Mr. BOWELL. You are better paid than I. I never got $600 out of the North-West. I do not wish the hon. gentleman's remarks to go abroad that the officers' mess, either of the volunteer force or the militia, is paid for by the Government.

Mr. WATSON. I do not wish to state that the cost of the officers' mess is paid by the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. But you did say so.

Mr. WATSON. I do not wish to say that, I will take that back; but I say there is too much attention paid to the force in cities and towns, in the more civilised portions of our Provinces, than there should be. More money should be spent where it would be of more service. There is no reason why 2,000 men should not be ready in Manitoba and the North-West, in cases of emergency, to protect that country. The young men of that country have proved themselves during this trouble equal to the emergency. Those men should have had the advantage of being drilled, because petitions were sent in from different points asking that they be organised and have equipment furnished to them, but those appeals were refused. Fortunately very few of the men called into action have lost their lives expect among Boulton's scouts, who, unfortunately for themselves—I do not know whether it was on account of not being drilled—lost a few of their men. I hope the First Minister will take into consideration the advisability of organising the volunteers for the protection of the whole Province in case of emergency.

Resolution concurred in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD introduced Bill (No. 144) to authorise the augmentation of the North-West Mounted Police.

Bill read the first time.

THE CONSOLIDATED IN URANCE ACT OF 1877

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 20) to modify the application of the Consolidated Insurance Act of 1877.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it would be as well to call the attention of the Government and the House generally to the Bill as it now appears, re-printed as amended. It is not my intention to resume the very lengthy discussion which took place in committee on the details; but, at the same time, I think it would be well to understand whether the Government have fully considered the Bill now before us, which is not exactly in accordance, if I understand the matter right, with the intentions of either the Finance Minister or the members of the Government generally. There are two objects, as I understand, which the Government designs to attain in this Bill. First of all, they intend to grant relief to certain friendly societies, which, it was alleged, were in considerable danger of being visited with certain penalties if they proceeded to grant the ordinary benefits to their members, under the existing state of the law. As to that there can be no question, and I have no doubt the House will be unanimous in desiring that these friendly societies should be relieved from any possible consequence to which they might unwillingly expose themselves; but there is another, and rather important consequence, which flows from the Bill now before us, and that is this, that a totally new and distinct class of societies, known as the mutual societies, will, under this Bill, be placed in line, so to speak, with the older societies which have been conducting their affairs on well recog-Mr. WATSON.

received a Government inspection, which prevents the possibility of any of the persons doing business with them losing any portion of their insurance money. I wish it to be distinctly understood that, for my part, I have no objection at all that these various mutual societies should do business with those who chose to do business with them; but I can see, and if I understood rightly the remarks of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance (the latter of whom is unhappily not here), they also see that there is in the Bill, as it now stands, a very considerable danger that these two classes of companies which do business on different principles should be confused together in the public mind; and it did appear to me there was a great deal of force in the contention made by the representatives of the older companies, that a separate measure should be introduced for the purpose of legalising the other companies to do business. This is a Government measure; the Government is responsible, and they will be held of course responsible, for any mischief which may hereafter arise, should the prophecies of the older companies as to these mutual societies be fulfilled. I repeat I do not at all desire to prevent mutual companies from doing business; but the First Minister will understand that there is an Act on the statute book which guarantees to the public that the various insurance companies which are put under the supervision of the Superintendent of insurance companies and which report year to year to him shall have a reserve, which it is his business to examine into and audit, and that this reserve shall be one which will effectually protect all persons doing business with them. I understood that it was not the opinion of any of the parties more immediately charged with the promotion of this measure that the members of the mutual society would be or could be similarly protected, and I think therefore it is unfortunate that. as undoubtedly will be the case if this Bill, as it now stands, becomes law, the two classes of companies should be confounded together in the public mind. No doubt certain precautions have been taken, after long discussion, and certain statements are required to be made in these various policies, but, speaking from a practical standpoint, it appears clearly to me, and I think to most of those who heard the discussion, that one main object of the mutual companies was that they should be brought under this particular Act in order that they might be able to say to the public at large that they were companies making deposits with the Government and affording precisely the same security to the public which the old line companies, as they are called, are able to afford. As far as I can judge, they do not afford that security, and, although I do not desire to prevent them from doing business, I think it would be expedient that the distinction between these two classes of companies should be more clearly defined than it is in the Bill now before us.

Mr. BOWELL. If the Government and the members of the committee and those members of the House who attended the Committee on Banking and Commerce have not made up their minds on this question, it is not because it was not amply discussed. I think I may very properly call this Bill the first lieutenant to the Franchise Bill. Eight long days were occupied in the continuous discussion of this question before that committee, and no other business was allowed to interfere in any way with it. The present Bill makes provision for the protection of those insured in the societies to which the hon gentleman has alluded; they are exempted from the operation of the Insurance Act and of this Bill. The question of having a separate measure to govern this particular class of companies was discussed for some days, and the Finance Minister took decided objection to having a separate Bill placed upon the Statute Book to govern any class of insurance. He desired by this nised principle and which go forth to the country as having Bill to bring these companies within the provisions and operation of the General Insurance Companies Act. In order to prevent, as far as possible, the confounding of this class of companies with what are termed the old line companies, there is a special provision made that upon all the policies, and it is carried so far as to say upon all circulars that the company may issue, no matter of how trivial a character, and in all advertisements published in newspapers, the fact that they are mutual insurance companies, or cooperative life insurance companies, must be placed in bold type upon the face of all these documents; so that every precaution was taken by the committee to prevent the confusion to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. Provision is also made for reserves and for a deposit, and for the increasing of that deposit when the business of the society warrants it. So far as provision could be made to protect the public in dealing with this kind of cooperative insurance companies, it was taken by the committee. In fact, the provisions have been made so stringent by the committee that those who are in favor of this system of insurance have taken very great objection to them. If the committee will look at the provisions of the Bill recognising the right of this class of companies to do business, they will come to the conclusion that provision has been made for the protection, as far as is possible by Act of Parliament, of those who insure in such a company.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it is not quite in order to refer to what passed in the committee, but myself and the Minister of Customs, and all the members of the Government who were present, were outvoted in reference to a number of precautions which we desired to introduce.

Mr. BOWELL. That is true, but we have to deal with the Bill as it is sent to the House by the committee.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not propose to reopen the very lengthened discussion which took place before the committee on this Bill, but I understood that the members of the Government would not consent to the Bill as it left the committee. It seemed to me that the contention made by those who represented the regular insurance companies was a sound contention, and it received the assent of those who acted for the Government in that committee, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs. They said that they did not desire to throw any obstacles in the way of these assessment insurance companies doing business in Canada, but they said that the principle upon which these assessment companies proceeded to do business was an experiment, a doubtful experiment at that, and therefore they should do business in such a way that those whom they solicited to take policies in their companies should know exactly and fairly the principles of the company in which they were taking out the policy, and they contended that it was not fair to place them, as it were, in the same boat with the life insurance companies, under the same Act, because the result would be that a large mass of those who entered into that very important contract, the insurance of their own lives for the benefit of their families, would, in the hurry of business and in the absence of special knowledge in reference to the matter, be unable to make the distinction between the insurance company proper and the insurance company under the new system. They further contended that the old security was an ample security, and that it was unfair that they should go into the same boat with those new companies, and that the latter should have the same Government sanction and approval. What does the Bill do? What evidence had we before the committee? I desire to call attention to the very important statement made by the Superintendent of insurance before that committee. He was examined and cross-examined at length as to his views of the safety of the principle upon which these new assessment companies conducted business, and I find in an insurance do business. I repeat that in the face of the official state-journal, the Budget, published, I think, in Toronto, which seems to have taken a great interest in this matter, that Professor Cherriman is reported to have replied to the following question by Sir Richard Cartwright:

" Are we to understand that, so far as your experience goes, you do not know whether these companies are safe or not?"

Now this is the answer given by the Superintendent of insurance. I regard them, he says, in exactly the same light as the Superintendent of insurance for New York does. He says:

"I regard them in exactly the same light as the Superintendent for New York does. He says he regards them as experiments. I accept that view. I know very well the system of old life insurance companies is undeniably based upon scientific principles, and that it has been tested and proved by long experience. I cannot say with regard to these assessment companies that their principles have been proved by experience. They have not had a long enough experience to enable me to form an opinion whether they will be ultimately pronounced sound, or whether they can be permanent."

Well, I say in view of that statement made by the Superintendent of insurance companies, it does seems curious to me that the Government should allow these new assessment companies to go forth to do business in Canada, stamped with the imprimateur of the Government, with the sanction of the Government, when their own Superintendent of Insurance tells them that the principle upon which they do business is not one which he can recommend, which is purely experimental, and he does not know whether it is sound or not. This is a very serious business for those who insure. The majority of those who insure their lives are men engaged in the worry and hurry of business. They have not time to examine carefully the principles of the company with whom they insure. They imagine, and I do not know but they are right in imagining, that if the Government undertake to license an insurance company, authorising them to do business, the insurer has a right to assume that the Government have satisfied themselves thoroughly that the principles on which the company does business are safe and sound. I know of no more lamentable thing in life than that after a man has insured in a company, his family find, when the man's life drops off, that the company is unsound. Now, by this Bill a foreign insurance comes into Canada makes a deposit with the Government of $50,000, and when it does that it has authority from the Government to transact business. Now, what security has the insurer got? He imagines that he has the same security as when he insures in the old life line, because the Government licenses both companies to do business alongside each other. It has been contended, and I think the contention was reasonable, that when the Government authorised these companies on this untried system, which has been described as an experiment by the Superintendent, that they should ear mark those companies so that the person who insures should know what company he is insured in. The Minister of Customs has stated, and stated correctly, that the committee, in one or two of its amendments, made an attempt to carry that out, and to some extent they have succeeded; but the broad fact remains that they are licensed just the same as any other company, that they are allowed to make a deposit which is in one sense an illusory guarantee, and that they go forth with the same sanction as the old life line companies do, which are bound to hold reserves sufficiently to meet liabilities on every policy they issue. I think myself the contention is not a sound one. I think the Government have made a mistake in mixing the two up together and putting them under the one Act. I think it is calculated to deceive, to allow those who insure in these companies to be deceived as to the character of the company in which they will insure, as to the securities which that company will offer them, and as to the place in which they ment given by their own Superintendent, who was not satisfied that the basis on which these companies proceed was a sound one, it was certainly indefensible for the Gov. ernment to class them with the old safe companies.

On section 3.

Mr. IVES. I would not like to have the impression go abroad that the House is unanimous with reference to this measure, I, for my part, do not believe in this new fangled system of insurance at all. I would go even further than the officer of the Government who has called it a mere experiment, and I would say it is an experiment which is almost certain to result in enriching a few agents who, for the time being, are acting as receivers general to whoever likes to deposit money with them, and who, when the time comes for paying losses, will not be here to pay them. I do not believe there is any sound, scientific or commercial foundation for this kind of insurance. I am perfectly satisfied it will not succeed, that it will result in disaster and loss of the money that is deposited with these companies. Now, my objection to this Bill in the hands of the Government is very similar to that which the last speaker mentioned. If the Government undertakes to supervise the question of insurance at all, as they do the matter of banking, I think they are bound to see that no wild cat insurance companies are permitted to do business here, that the Government's own officer says are merely experimental, until they are perfectly satisfied that every man will be safe who insures with them. Now the Government very properly take charge of banking, but what would be said if they were to permit a system of banking to be introduced here which the Finance Minister himself was bound to say was merely experimental and which was as likely to result in disaster to the people as to result in good? I am quite sure that public sentiment would not sustain the Government in putting their imprimatur upon a system of banking which they and their officer were bound to say was merely experimental. Yet that is what is said of this system of insurance. From what I know of the men who are acting as agents, who are receiving the people's money, and from what happened the other day in Montreal at their meeting, a committee of investigation being already appointed, and from the whole circumstances of the case, I am just as well satisfied as I am that I am standing here, that this new fangled insurance will result in disaster and loss of money to our people; and I protest against the Government sanctioning it, as they seem to do by taking charge of this Bill and providing that these companies doing business here, by their being registered, shall obtain the assistance which Government sanction gives them, and without providing any reasonable and satisfactory safeguard to the public. I believe the whole thing is a mistake, and if anybody at a later stage sees fit to move the three months hoist for this bill, I shall be very happy to vote for it, because I do not look upon this Bill as a Government measure but simply as an Insurance Bill, which is giving recognition to a kind of insurance companies, which the Government themselves called experimental and which experiment, in my opinion, would be

Mr. WELLS. The principal objection which my hon. friends urge against this system of insurance seems to be that it is experimental. Now, it is by no means experimental. The system of assessment assurance is the natural system, and the oldest system which we have. The other is the artificial system. The assessment system of insurance is that which has been adopted by so many societies all over the world, by labor societies of various kinds, by secret societies of all kinds, societies which have lasted hundreds of years. I do not mean to say that it is conducted on exactly the same principles as by the regular assessment companies of the present day, because, as time goes on, improvements are section 5: "The provision contained in clauses 4, 5, 6, 7, Mr. DAYIES, made, and all the improvements which experience has shown to be necessary have in the formation of the later companies been adopted. It is, I repeat, the natural system and the other is the artificial system. Can any system of insurance be reasonable which demands that a person who insures should pay about five times the amount really required to pay a death loss? That seems to be a most unreasonable system. It has been said that the old line high premium system guarantees absolute security to the policy holder. But what is the result? While the assessment system is called experimental the experience of the other system has shown it to be utterly fallacious. Indeed I think I am safe in saying that in the history of no other public companies, except, perhaps, banking companies in the United States, has there been such a frightful loss of money and such failure as in the insurence system on the old plan. I have in my hand a list of a few of the more recent failures. The Guardian Life, Widows and Orphans, North American Life, Universal Life, Reserve Mutual Life, Mutual Protection Life, and New York State Life, all companies conducted according to the old principles, and having reserves of $20,000,000, have recently failed. Then we have another list: American Popular Life, Atlantic Mutual Life, Continental Life, Life Association of America, New Jersey Mutual Life, Security Life, with guaranteed securities amounting to $16,000,000, on which a dividend of 10 cents in the dollar only has been paid. I do not mean to say that these are all the companies that have even recently failed, but these companies are at this very moment in the hands of Receivers in New York city. Yet hon, gentlemen will tell us that this is the only safe system of insurance. I think there has been altogether too much said about the confusion which must follow the two systems working side by side. There is no force whatever in that objection. The companies are always advertising, and there is an insurance controversy always going on over the merits of the two systems. Documents explanatory of both systems of insurance are constantly being issued, illustrating, explaining and extolling the two systems. Insurances, moreover, are not, as a rule, effected by the ignorant classes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think, Mr. Chairman, this discussion is out of order on section 3 of this Bill.

Mr. WELLS. If that is so, the observations of the previous speakers were out of order.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not think that fact can make the remarks of the hon, gentleman in order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The discussion is certainly out of order on this clause.

On section 5,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is satisfactory to see that liberal views are making progress in the minds of members of the Government, and, although it may not practically concern a member on this side, I submit that hon. gentlemen opposite must feel that this is a degradation of the National Policy in every shape and form. The idea that an American shall be permitted to take Canadian money for the purpose of insuring Canadian lives, seems to be entirely out of the regular course.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. We impose special conditions on American companies doing business here, while we do not impose such conditions on Canadian companies. That is carrying out the idea of the National Policy.

Mr. IVES: I object to Americans taking Canadian money and with it protecting their own lives.

Mr. GIROUARD. I desire to add a new section to follow and 8 shall also apply to any company incorporated in Canada carrying on life insurance on the co-operative or assessment plan." I am one of those who do not believe in the assessment plan; but I am willing that those assessment companies should have a fair trial. That was the opinion of the committee; but the opinion was also expressed very strongly that everything should be done to prevent confusion between the old line companies and companies on the new system. I proposed amendments which were adopted by the committee, and among others was one providing that the word "assessment system," shall be on the face of every policy. At the last sitting of the committee the Bill having been considerably amended, so much so that we did not know the numbering of the clause, it was suggested that the amendment I now propose should be made in Committee of the Whole House. I now move it. Its effect will be this: Under clause 5 it is provided that a foreign assessment company shall be subject to the following regula. tions, stated briefly: Death claims shall be the first charge on all moneys received for assessment. No portion of such moneys shall be used for any expense of the administration. A clause shall be printed in colored ink declaring that this association is not required by law to maintain any reserve. Every policy shall contain an absolute promise to pay. These are the conditions which the committee laid down as forming a good safeguard to policy holders. I do not see why, if these resolutions are good as regards foreign assessment companies, they should not be good as regards Canadian assessment companies. I, therefore, move that these conditions which I think were the words he used. are required of foreign assessment companies should also be required of Canadian assessment companies.

action can be brought in the case of death loss against any of the American companies in Canada? When a policy was produced in the committee it was found that one of the prominent conditions was that no action could be brought against the company with respect to losses except in a certain court in New York city. Is any provision made which will give to our courts jurisdiction to enforce the rights of our people with respect to this class of policy?

Mr. WELLS. Our courts have jurisdiction already, and judgments are reported.

Mr. IVES. Is that the case if a man makes a contract in which he agrees that no action shall be taken except in a certain court?

Mr. WELLS. The present policies do not contain any such condition.

Mr. IVES. Would it not be better to make it a condition of their doing business here, that the companies should be amenable to our courts.

Mr. BOWELL. That question was very fully discussed in the committee, and it was put to the committee and lost. Some of the lawyers in the committee, and I think the hon. member for North Victoria, gave it as their opinion as the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Wells) has done now, that they have the power.

Mr. GIROUARD. No doubt they have, and a clause at the back of the policy to the effect that the insured shall be subject only to the jurisdiction of the United States, will be no good.

Mr. IVES. I certainly think it would be a good deal safer to make it a condition of doing business here, that they should be amenable to our courts, than that they should have to trust to litigation either here or in the United States. Supposing a party seeking to recover his claim has to go to New York or some other place to obtain his claim, and when he goes there to seek enforcement of the judgment, he is met with the original objection that the judgment obtained here was contrary to the agreement between the two parties, and consequently it would be null

Mr. BEATY. I regret that such legislation is necessary at all, as it will create confusion to have the assessment companies and the old line companies operating together. But as apparently, some kind of legislation must be had, we should give every consideration and protection to the assured, so that the money invested may bring them a return when the time comes. I shall support the motion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), for that reason.

On sub-section 3,

Mr. BOWELL. I would suggest the addition of these words: "upon such trusts as shall be determined by the Governor in Council."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With reference to that point, so far as we could understand from the evidence of the Superintendent of Insurance, it would be utterly impossible for him in practice to insist on any additional deposit. He said to us—and it is right that the House should know it—that it was quite impossible for him to estimate their liabilities at all, on the system on which they do business, and he did not expect that he would be able to advise the Minister to call upon them to make any additional deposit, unless as a mere arbitrary regulation-mere guess work,

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose he would judge by the extent of business done by the company, and if the amount Mr. IVES. Can any provision be made to insure that an of business was sufficiently great to warrant a recommendation for a further deposit, he would be justified in making such a recommendation.

> Mr. DAVIES. Does the amendment apply only to the additional deposit, or does it apply to the $50,000 as well?

> Mr. BOWELL. The present deposit of $50,000 is, I suppose, governed by the present insurance law; and I think probably the construction put upon this amendment would be that it would apply only to the additional deposit.

> Mr. DAVIES. I do not understand that the provisions of the General Insurance Act enables the Governor in Council to make any declaration as to its appropriation, nor do I understand that it is accessible in any way by a policy holder as security for the payment of his deposit.

> Mr. BOWELL. This sub-section provides for the first deposit being made under the provision of the Consolidated Insurance Act.

> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, this $50,000 is the property of all the parties, all over the States as well as here, who have claims. That appears to result from the nature of the case as applies to mutual companies. You cannot reserve it for the benefit of Canadian policy holders—I think there is no dispute about

> Mr. BOWELL. And that was one of the principal reasons why the committee insisted on making further deposits, in case they should be asked by the Government upon the report of the Insurance Inspector.

> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And these further deposits would be subject to the same conditions as the other—they would not belong specially to Canadian policy holders.

> Mr. DAVIES. That would depend on the direction of the Governor in Council.

> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think not; I think it is in the nature of the case.

Amendment agreed to.

305

On sub-section 4.

Mr. WELLS. Perhaps it might be better to put in the word "legitimate" before the word "death" claim.

Mr. BOWELL. No, I think not; that is a question for the lawyers to determine, and to insert that qualification might give the company the right to declare that every claim they did not wish to meet was not a legitimate one.

On sub-section 8, section 5,

Mr. WELLS. I suggest that these words be added:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to make any person liable in respect of assessments made by any such association after he ceases to be a member thereof.

No doubt that is the law as it is. I do not think any lawyer would say that the effect of this section is to make members liable after they cease to be members; but I know of my own knowledge that it is being used now by agents of rival companies as having that effect. Members are not now liable for assessments after they cease to be members; but I wish to make it perfectly clear that this section does not affect the existing law.

Mr. 1VES. I have very serious objections to that amendment. It is well known that the object of these companies is to get rid of their members after they have failed for a certain number of years, in order to get rid of their obligations; and if the impression were made that the members could not drop out in this way, and escape their obligations, it would have a good effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE. At any rate my hon. friend must be proposing mere surplusage from his point of view. If that is the law now, his amendment is not required; if it is not the law, the amendment makes it the law.

Mr. WELLS. I do not make any new law. I only say that the section shall not be construed to affect the existing law.

Mr. HALL. It was suggested before the committee that members should withdraw on giving notice, and the effect of this amendment would be to enable all those who are intelligent enough to use that method of escaping liability to escape entirely. They are relieved by law at the expiration of their contract.

Mr. BOWELL. Would the effect of the motion not be to relieve every member of the insurance upon lives taken during the time he was a member? If it does, there would be no security at all for those who are left.

Mr. IVES. The hon, gentleman says that is the law now.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not the law so far as Mutual Insurance companies are concerned. A member is responsible for risks taken and losses incurred while he is a member, and he is liable to that extent if he goes out.

Mr. WELLS. He is not liable for all losses that occur while he is in the company.

Mr. DAVIES. Suppose a man sees losses occur to the extent of $20,000 or $30,000 and retires; if he retires before any assessment is levied, he will be relieved of liability by the amendment.

Mr. WELLS. Well, I do not care for the amendment one way or the other.

Mr. IVES. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Customs to the declaration made by the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Wells) that any member can go out without paying up, simply by giving notice. If the bulk of the members left the association, those who have been paying for a lifetime or for a half a lifetime have no recourse except with themselves for the assessments to pay their insurance when they die. That shows in a conclusive manner the objection to the whole system, and is a reason why the Government of Cauada should not give aid or countenance to a system of insurance, which is so costly, and which must necessarily result in disaster.

Mr. EDGAR. I would just emphasise what the hon. gentleman has just said. By sub-section 7, we are told what the securities shall be. The two funds out of which these associations are obliged to pay losses are the death fund, and any moneys realised from assessments to be made for that purpose. But according to sub-section 6 the associations are not required to maintain a reserve, so that the death fund may amount to nothing at all, and the other fund according to the hon gentleman, may amount to nothing either. There is to be no security if people may go out altogether.

Mr. WELLS. If they all go out there are no losses to pay. The death fund of the association is mentioned as distinguished from moneys realised from new assessments. There is always a balance over from every assessment, which is put into the death fund, and if that is not sufficient, they assess.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GIROUARD moved, That the provisions contained in sub-sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, of section 5, shall also apply to any company incorporated in Canada carrying on the business of life insurance upon the coöperative or assessment plan.

Mr. BOWELL. The adoption of that clause will take from the Canadian companies that advantage and protection the hon, member for South Huron is so anxious about. It will place them precisely in the same position as foreign companies. It is for the House to say whether Canadian companies of this character should have any advantages other than those possessed by foreign companies. The amendment placed in my hands by the Superintendent of Insurance is to this effect: He says: "It was expected, on all sides, that Canadian companies were to be allowed to transact their own business in their own way without further conditions than that of making an annual return, and these companies actually supported the Bill on this understanding; that if they had been apprised of these conditions they probably would have appeared before the committee and claimed to be heard in opposition, and that at all events, they should have an op-portunity of being heard; that it is evident there are grounds for stringently regulating the transactions of foreign companies whose management is outside Canada, and which are beyond Canada's control, while such grounds may not exist upon the part of companies existing only among our people." I have read this memo. from the Superintendent of Insurance, he having a more practical knowledge of the operation and the working of the different insurance companies and of the intention of his Department in permitting the provisions of this Bill becoming a part of the General Insurance Act, rather than give an opinion of my own. I am, therefore, of opinion that Canadian companies should have advantages not accorded to foreign companies, for the reason advanced by the Superintendent General, namely, that being in our own country we have greater control over them than we can possibly have over those companies whose headquarters are in foreign lands.

Mr. GIROUARD. The Superint endent says these companies had no opportunity of being heard on this point. Are we to be told that we have no right to make this amendment because these companies have not been heard?

Mr. BOWELL. He says they were given to understand the provisions of the Bill would not apply to them, and consequently they did not appear before the committee.

Mr. GIROUARD. That amounts to the same thingthat the Bill has come from the committee on Banking and Commerce and we have no right to amend it. At the last sitting of the committee on Banking and Commerce I moved this very amendment, but as the Bill had been already much amended and contained many erasures, it was agreed my amendment should be renewed in Committee of the Whole House. The companies had opportunity of being heard then, but they said nothing, and in fact from what I heard from those parties representing assessment companies who were present, they had no objection to this clause. As a matter of fact, whether they had objection or not, we have heard enough during the discussion this afternoon to show that this system, which, according to the Superintendent, is only experimentally, is very dangerous and should be guarded by all restrictions that the House may find necessary for the protection of the policy holders. We have found it necessary to provide, as far as American assessment companies are concerned, that death claims shall be the first charge; that no portion of the money shall be used for any expenses, that a clause shall be printed in different colored ink, in these words: "This association is not required by law to maintain any reserve." If these clauses are necessary for the protection of policy holders holding American policies, I do not see why they are not necessary for the protection of policy holders, when they hold Canadian policies. If these clauses are good as far as American companies are concerned, they are equally as good as far as Canadians are concerned. The hon. Minister says then there will be no difference. There will be a great difference; the deposit of $50,000 is not required from the Canadian companies, but is from the American companies; and really no good reason has been advanced by the hon. the Minister to show that these conditions, which I believe are necessary to prevent confusion in the public mind, and which are held to be good as far as American companies are concerned, should not apply equally to Canadian companies.

Mr. DAVIES. The restrictions in the 5, 6 and 7 subsections which the hon gentleman proposes to apply to Canadian assessment companies, were inserted in the committee for the protection of the policy holders, and I think myself that a large number of those who voted in the committee believed that they applied to all assessment companies. I think the amendment is a proper one.

Mr. IVES. This is not a matter of advantage to the companies, but a matter of protection to the policy holders. If it is necessary to protect our people in the case of foreign companies, it is certainly necessary to protect them in the case of our own companies. If there is any distinction between these companies and the companies on the old line, why should not the distinction be marked on the Canadian policies issued by Canadian companies? Perhaps the Minister of Customs will tell us what advantage Canadian old line companies enjoy over the English or American companies; they have to deposit and comply with the same regulations. I do not see what particular advantage the Canadian old line companies have over the English or Americans, that should justify our giving this extremely new-fangled system superior advantages to swindle the people which the American companies have not.

Mr. HALL. One of the clauses insisted upon by the committee was that no part of the assessment for death losses should be applied to expenses. There could be no better indication of the wisdom of the amendment of the hon, member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) than the fact that a certain society in Montreal had an income of $36,570, out of which they paid for death claims, $4,619, their expenses being $31,951; and the next year their total receipts were $59,790, their death claims had increased to $20,200, and their expenses were $39,590. there, and therefore there would be nothing to give juris-

That is a company that came to grief the other day in Montreal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGH Γ. There is a strong reason, I think, at any rate, that clause 6 should be made applicable to all. I am, myself, in favor of the amendment of my hon, friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). The only guarantee against confusion amongst these companies is the declaration in clause 6, that every application policy and certificate shall have printed thereon the following words :-

This association is not required by law to maintain the reserve which is required of ordinary life insurance companies.

I doubt very much whether in practice that is a sufficient guarantee, but it is the only guarantee we have, and if that is to be forced on American or English companies, there is equal reason why the attention of policy holders should be called to it in the case of these other companies. Every possible attempt will be made by the insurance canvassers, of whom, no doubt, the House has had experience enough, and who are not the most scrupulous people in the world, but are as persistent a class of canvassers as you can find from one end of Canada to the other, to represent that these com panies are just as good as the other companies.

Mr WELLS. A great deal better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend does not go quite as far as one gentleman, who says this is a heaven-directed system for the protection of insurers; but, however this may be, if you do not extend this provision to the Canadian companies, no ordinary man will be able to distinguish between them at all. There is nothing to tell any man insuring what he ought to know, that these companies are conducted on a totally different principle from that laid down for those the Government has taken under its special care. We have had very special and very peculiar legislation on this subject, and there is no doubt that the public are by this time thoroughly aware of the fact that the majority of these old companies are under a rigorous system of Government inspection, and that they put dependence upon them for that very reason. In introducing this measure as it stands, I warn the Government that they positively give a premium to fraudulent canvas-sers—we will not say anything about the companies represented by such respectable persons as my hon friend behind me-to conceal the real facts of the case, and I think it is a reasonable demand that they shall be required to show on the face of the policies that they are not conducted on the same basis as the other companies.

Amendment (Mr. Girouard) agreed to.

Mr. GIROUARD. I doubt very much whether you have jurisdiction in that matter. It seems to me to be a matter of procedure which belongs to the Local Legislature. The action must be taken in the county or district where the insured is residing. We have other modes of suing and I think it should be before any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. IVES. Surely, if we have jurisdiction over the subject of insurance, we have over the mode of carrying it out, and the amendment just carried is as obnoxious to the objection as this one.

Mr. GIROUARD. No. It ought to be any court of competent jurisdiction in the Province.

Mr. WELLS. I propose to move the following:-

No such association shall insert any provision in any certificate or policy preventing an action from being brought thereon in Canada, and if any such provision is so inserted, the same shall be void.

Mr. IVES. My objection to this is that the contract is made in New York, and the policy is issued there, and dated diction to our courts. There is nothing to show that the contract was made here at all, and, whether the amendment would be of any use here or not, it would only remove the difficulty of the man who had to sue at home, and that would be worse than the other amendment. It seems to me that the foreign insurance company ought to agree that, although the contract is made in a foreign country, the holder of the policy here should be entitled to pursue his recourse in our courts, and therefore I cannot accept the amendment of the hon, member.

Mr. WELLS. Surely my hon. friend does not mean to say that if a policy is made in New York to a Canadian policy holder the latter cannot sue in Canada. It has been held to the contrary in this country. Then the only effect would be that, supposing any company put such a provision in the policy, and that is pleaded against the action, the courts would hold that it was void. I go further. My hon. friend, perhaps, does not know that many of the policies made by these American companies are expressly made on the face of them payable old line in New York or elsewhere, so that, if he is going to introduce that amendment at all, he must make it applicable to them all. The policies of the New York Life, the Mutual Life, and other companies, are especially stated to be made in New York.

Mr. ABBOTT. It seems to me there is no difficulty about a suit in Canada which is not covered by either of those amendments. Canvassers for these foreign companies are frequently people who travel about and ask for subscriptions. The company itself may have no office which anybody can find, or to which anyone can have convenient access. It seems to me the chief difficulty about suing any company would be the possession of a domicile, a place where a writ could be served. If it were a condition that the company should name a place, and, as we say in Lower Canada, elect a domicile in the Province, somewhere where the writ could be served, then persons suffering losses might take their remedy in the Province. My impression is that the first amendment moved should have an addition to it, that besides stating that persons may sue within the Province for a remedy upon any policy issued, a place should be named within the Province where the writ could be served. Without that the remedy would be quite illusory.

Mr. IVES. I should much prefer the suggestion of the hon. member, although the remedy would not be quite illusory, because in our Province we could call them in by advertisement and obtain a judgment that way.

Mr. EDGAR. That suggestion is a good one; still I think the clause would be very valuable even if that suggestion were not adopted, because in Ontario there is no difficulty in serving a foreign corporation.

Mr. IVES. Nor in Quebec either.

Mr. DAVIES. I think most of the Provinces have provisions in their procedures to sue foreign corporations. I think that the suggestion of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) should be accepted by the mover of the resolution, and that one should not be compelled to sue in the particular locality where the person dies, but anywhere in the Province.

Mr. ABBOTT. Allow me to refer to the General Insurance Act as it exists. In clause 9 of that Act it is provided that documents are to be filed before license is granted, and among those documents is a power of attorney, which must declare in what place in Canada the head office or chief agency of such company is situated, and it must expressly authorise such attorney to receive process in all suits and proceedings against such company, in any Province of Canada, for any liabilities incurred by the company therein.

Mr. Ivas.

Mr. BOWELL. I would like to suggest to the legal gentlemen in this matter, that that clause already applies to these line companies. I take it for granted that every clause in this Act of which this is a part applies to this company, except those that are specially repealed. However, I would suggest, as this is rather an important amendment, that the hon. member who has moved the amendment should withdraw it for the present, and have it carefully drawn, and move it at the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. IVES. I have no objection.

Amendment, and amendment to the amendment, with drawn.

On section 7,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is such a thing as that within our purview.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I was not present in the committee before which the Bill was so lengthily discussed, but I think we ought to go somewhat farther than this clause provides. A good deal of litigation has arisen in testing the claims of parties, for the reason that in the application certain statements were made that were proven to be untrue. We can easily see how this can be done. People who go around canvassing for applications are very apt to meet with persons as applicants who do not know exactly the meaning of certain questions which they have to answer. The canvasser will very probably say that it does not make much difference whether the application is correctly filled up or not, and with this statement in view the applicant fills up the application. The answers given are, however, made part of the contract, and if it should turn out, afterwards, that there has been some error in the statements, although they have been made in good faith, the representatives of the party will not be able to enforce the claim. We should add the words: "Provided it has not been made fraudulently." Unless the statement, which proves to be an erroneous one, is made fraudulently at the time, the policy should not be voided. Applicants in answering as to their age may make a mistake of a year. The canvasser very probably says that the exact age is not material; nevertheless, it is afterwards made material, and if it should turn out to be erroneous, the representatives of the insurer will not be able to enforce the claim.

Mr. DAVIES I cannot agree with the hon member for Kent. The section goes as far as it can reasonably go. Heretofore misstatements, whether material or immaterial, would void the whole policy. That was unfair and unjust. This section is in the direction of relieving policy holders from that injustice. I cannot, however, go so far as to say that if very material statements should prove false the policy should not be voided. I think it should be voided.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). In the case of fire insurance, for example, the distance of one building from another is frequently erroneously stated, and in some cases the agent has himself drawn out the rough plan. There are many answers given to questions in applications for life insurance, respecting which the parties are not certain, and if the statements are made bond fide, I think the policy should not be voided, although they subsequently prove to be incorrect.

Mr. ABBOTT. I agree with the hon, member for Queen's in his view as to the proposal just made. The contract is one which depends on the representations of the party desiring to be assured. The amount of premiums to be paid depends on the statements made, and they are absolutely the conditions on which the insurance is effected. If an applicant makes a misstatement as to his age, that may have an effect on the amount paid during 20, 30 or 50 years, and if he may make an error in regard to one year he may as regards five years. It is proper that, if the contract be made in error, the policy should be voided, if the misrepresentations or errors are material.

Mr. SPROULE. It very frequently happens that if erroneous statements have been made the companies go on and continue to receive the premiums during ten or fifteen years, and on the death of the insured they bring up the misstatements as a reason why they should not pay the death loss. There ought to be something in the Act that would prevent the company, after a policy has been issued and been in force for some time, from subsequently raising a question as to its validity. After the company have taken every possible means to satisfy themselves as to the truth of a statement, and after the premiums have been paid during some years, they should not be allowed to plead that a misstatement was made and the policy therefore voided.

Mr. DAVIES. The obligation as to good faith should extend to both parties.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I look upon the matter as of more importance than do some hon members, and I will move the amendment I have suggested, on the third reading, and will then be prepared to show that the series of questions put to applicants are such as cannot be answered correctly. I do not think he ought to. I think that it ought to be the duty of the company, if they want to resist a claim of this kind, to show that the statements that were made at the time were made fraudulently, that the party knew that they were fraudulent, and did it for the purpose of getting a policy upon false representations, which he knew were false at the time. I have merely given one of the instances as an illustration, but there are many of the same kind, so that it is almost impossible for the applicant to answer the questions without making mistakes.

Mr. TROW. There is such keen competition between the agents of these companies that in many instances these questions are not answered, but are taken for granted, and I think that the only cases in which a man should forfeit his rights is when he attempts to misrepresent his age for the purpose of benefiting thereby.

Mr. HICKEY. I think the observations of the hon, member for Kent (Mr. Landry) ought to have a great deal of weight with this committee. No doubt there are many candidates for examination who have insufficient knowledge of their own immediate family history. They may possibly be foreigners, coming to this country; their parents or their brothers or sisters may have died since they left, for instance, of consumption, which is a hereditary disease, and the applicant may be in good faith in not knowing of what disease they died. For that reason, I think some consideration should be extended to the applicant. At present the family history is considered very important for or against the candidate, as evidence which he can give himself, apart from the physician's examination. Most of our companies are making the examination more carefully than ever, because they are stating in their policies that after three premiums are paid nothing will invalidate the policy. For instance, the Canada Life makes that provision.

On section 8,

Mr. WELLS. It is perfectly obvious that this clause goes further than the person who drafted it intended. For instance, in the 16th and 20th lines, it includes "any person who transacts any business on behalf of such company," as those coming within the penalty of the 13th section of the Act. I do not think it was ever intended to go as far as those words go, because they would include any proprietor of a newspaper publishing an advertisement, for an unlicensed company or any carpenter putting up a shelf.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The carpenter would not be called upon to print any words in his insurance policy.

Mr. WELLS. But it is not limited in that way. This section has been compiled from two or three sections; it was moved just at the moment the committee was rising, and it was not well considered. Now, what the committee wish is to protect the public, by seeing that the public are sure that it understands it is dealing with a company which does business on the assessment principle. That, I suppose, is the object of the clause. Now, every assessment company sends out thousands of circulars, notices of assessment, etc., to its own members, and is there any object in having the words "assessment system" printed on such documents, or any other documents of that kind that are sent to its own members. I shall move an amendment which, I think, will be accepted by the committee, as it is a reasonable one. I move to insert after the word "Canada," these words:

In every circular or advertisement issued or used in Canada, addressed to its own members, and not showing that the company transacts the business of insurance upon the assessment system.

Some of these companies have enormous stocks of these circulars on hand. The company in which I am interested I know has thousands, I might say millions, of them on hand, and as many of them are pamphlets, they could not be put through the press without tearing them apart.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes, they could.

Mr. WELLS. I do not see any object in putting these words in, in the case of such documents as I have described, sent to the companies' own members, and I do not think any company should be embarrassed or vexed or harassed by a provision of this kind, for no purpose.

Mr. DAVIES. If I heard the amendment aright, it is more extensive than the hon, gentleman who proposed it seems to understand. It might be desirable that papers sent to members themselves should not have the words "assessment system" on them; but the amendment goes further, because it provides that these words should not be on any document, if it could be gathered from the substance of the document that the company carries on business by the assessment system. If carrid, it would compel every man to read every report or document he received, in order to ascertain whether or not the company was conducted on the assessment system. Why does the hon, member want to dispense with that notice?

Mr. WELLS. I frankly say why. These companies have hundreds of thousands of those documents already printed. There is one company that sends to its own members 200,000 of these documents every two months, and it would be utterly out of the question to put a stamp on all of these; it would take the whole time of a man or half a dozen men to do it. This idea of safety is entirely over-estimated. Did anybody ever know an instance in which a person was insured under one system and thought he was insuring under another? I venture to say it would be utterly impossible, with the strife and rivalry existing among insurance companies; and we are only forecasting a grievance which has never arison, and which probably never will arise. To require that a document or report will show on its face that the company is doing business on the assessment system is surely protection enough to the public. My hon, friend says a person may be deceived, because he may have to read through the document. I do not suppose anyone is going to be deceived by a document unless he reads it. I think this provision is only vexatious.

Mr. TROW. I do not think it is imposing any hardship on these companies to require them to stamp these documents in the corner with the words "assessment system." If they have a large surplus of the documents on hand, one man could, in a short time, stamp all they would require for a month.

Mr. EDGAR. If my hon friend is so much in favor of the assessment system, and it has so many advantages, as he says, it should be his earnest desire to have the words "assessment system" put on every document and every policy, and to advertise it in every possible way. I really cannot see why he takes the ground he does.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think the objection the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Wells) takes to the clause is so important as he thinks it is. If the companies have the number of circulars on hand he says, it will not require half a dozen men to stamp them. They can easily be run through a power press with the same rapidity with which they were printed. The only objection, to my mind, is that of expense, and it will not be very large. The very strong opinion expressed in the committee—and I see it prevails in the House—was that all documents of these companies should bear on their face evidence that they are documents of companies conducted on the co-operative plan. I think the clause is sufficient. It makes any officer of an unlicensed company, or any person who transacts business on behalf of such company, liable to the penalty.

Mr. WELLS. By that clause you make any person doing any sort of business for an unlicensed company liable. If a publisher of a newspaper inserts an advertisement for such a company, would you make him liable?

Mr. BOWELL. He is not transacting business on behalf of the company.

Mr. WELLS. It depends on what the court will take "transacting business" to mean. I think he would be.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Insert the word "insurance" before the word "business."

Mr. WELLS. I would suggest that all the words after the word "company," in the 18th line, to the word "company," in the 20th line, be omitted, because this is provided already in the general Insurance Act. I would move to that effect.

Amendment (Mr. Wells) negatived.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) meets the objection, and makes the clause much clearer. I would move that as an amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BEATY. There should also be an amendment to the 21st line by adding the following words:—

And any director, manager, agent or other officer of the company' or any other person transacting business on behalf of the said company' circulating or issuing any policy, or application, or circular, in which the words "assessment system" are not printed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty mentioned in the 13th section of the Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES. Suppose an agent circulates 1,000 copies, is it to be one offence, or more than one?

Mr. BOWELL. That question is before the courts of Ontario, as to whether bribing one man or a dozen is one offence.

Mr. BLAKE. It ought to be made clear.

Mr. DAVIES. It is monstrous that the man who issues one circular should be subject to the same penalty as the man who issues 1,000.

Mr. BOWELL. For each offence, $1,000.

Mr. DAVIES. No; the Act says not exceeding $1,000; it may be $1.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. IVES. I propose to move, as the 10th clause, the following:—

Mr. EDGAR.

In every policy issued by a foreign company licensed under this Act in favor of a resident of Canada, a clause shall be either embodied therein or endorsed thereon to the effect that an action to enforce the obligation of said policy may be validly taken in any court of competent jurisdiction in the Province wherein said policy-holder resides or last resided before his discesse.

Mr. WELLS. Would it not answer to have it declared in the Act instead of embodied in the policies?

Mr. IVES. I do not intend the clause to be annoying, but I think it is better to put it in this way. If it is merely declared in the Act, it will be binding upon those companies only so far as our own courts are concerned, and if you have to go into a foreign court with a judgment obtained in Canada, that judgment will not be binding, because the foreign court will not necessarily recognise the declaration of our own statute. If you provide that the policy itself shall contain that bargain between the insured and the insurer, it must be held to be binding in all foreign courts, upon the company as well as upon the individual. I do not consider it would more than half answer the purpose we have in view if this were simply put into the statute, because it would simply be a law as between the company and the insured in the Dominion of Canada, and nowhere else.

Mr. WELLS. That is not my notion of an action upon a judgment. The only defence, as I understand, that can be raised in such a case, is as to the regularity of the judgment. No defence can be raised to an action of a judgment which might have been raised in the original action.

Mr. HALL. That may be true, but there may be cases where parties would prefer to go to the foreign court direct. The company may have no assets here, and the parties may go to a court of foreign jurisdiction as a first resort.

Mr. WELLS. Then the clause would not apply at all.

Mr. HALL. Certainly it would, if it were embodied in the policy.

Mr. WELLS. The idea is, that they shall not be compelled to sue there. It is only a vexatious amendment.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is a condition in some of the policies that proceedings must be taken in courts of the United States.

Mr. WELLS. No.

Mr. WHITE. There were some policies of that kind read in the committee room.

Mr. WELLS. I have explained half a dozen times that that was in the original policies, which has been expunged.

Mr. WHITE. That was in a very recent policy, and there is no reason why it may not be in a policy again. If a person insured makes a condition that he will only sue in a court in the United States, what value is the statutory declaration here? He has made the contract that he will only sue in the United States.

Mr. WELLS. The amendment which I moved would remove that objection altogether.

Mr. WHITE. It would.

Mr. WELLS. I move it now.

Mr. HALL. That certainly removes one objection, but still it does not give to the assured the benefit we have intended to give him, that is, that he should have his choice of suing here or going to the foreign jurisdiction to sue. The amendment of the hon, member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) would give him both, and both would be none too little.

Mr. WELLS. He has both, under my amendment.

Mr. HALL, I think not.

Mr. WELLS. Then why do you not apply this to the policies of the other companies?

Mr. HALL. Because we have more guarantee in their proposed resolutions respecting the salaries of the judge and

Mr. WELLS. You may think so, but I do not; and I do not think the majority in this House think so. The principle is the same with respect to both forms of companies. If it is a wise provision in regard to foreign assessment companies it is a wise provision in regard to other companies.

Mr. BOWELL. If my hon, friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) will allow that matter to stand, and give notice of it, so that it may be moved on the third reading, I should like it much better. I confess I am not in a position to know what effect that will have upon the whole Bill. particularly as he has another clause which he proposes to move in case this is carried, making all the clauses of the Insurance Act of Canada applicable to this, except where otherwise provided. Although this is an independent Bill of itself, I understand it is an amendment of the General Insurance Act, but extending its provisions still further, in order to bring within its scope this class of companies. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow the matter to stand over until to-moriow, so that we may give it further consideration.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope, under these circumstances, the hon, gentleman will consider how far we have power to mould a specific contract of insurance, as has been proposed by some of the amendments. I think some decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with reference, particularly, to our jurisdiction in the matter of insurance, have been to the effect that the form of contract would rather be prescribed by the Local than the Federal Legislature, although we had incorporated the Act.

Amendment withdrawn, and Bill reported.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 119) further to amend the Acts respecting the inspection of Gas and Gas Meters.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McLELAN. This is a substitute for clause 54 of the Inspection Act, which requires that twenty-four hours' notice should be given to the party when either the quality of gas or the meter are to be inspected; that is, that the manufacturer of the gas shall have twenty-four hours' notice and may be present at the inspection. But it has been found that the manufacturer is by that means enabled to improve the quality of the gas before the inspection is made, and it is proposed to substitute for that clause another, one allowing the manufacturer to be present at the inspection of the gas or of the meter, but only giving him notice in advance of the inspection of the meter, dropping the notice for the inspection of the quality of the gas.

Mr. BLAKE. Have the gas companies petitioned for this?

Mr. McLELAN. I am not aware that they have, but this is supposed to be in the interest of gas consumers.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

COURT OF CLAIMS BILL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When I gave notice of Bill (No. 93) to establish a court of claims for Canada, some three months ago, I thought we would be able to deal with it before this. But inasmuch as the Session has already been protracted, and there is no absolute necessity for passing this measure at the present Session, I move that the Bill be withdrawn and the Order discharged.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the Order for the House to resolve itself into Committee to consider certain weight shall be marked upon them, but that if the manuofficers to be appointed under any Act to establish a court of claims for Canada, be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and Order discharged.

CANNED GOODS.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 142) respecting Canned Goods. He said: will be remembered that last Session a clause relating to canned goods was added to the Weights and Measures Act, specifying that they should have certain weight and be marked in a certain manner. It is proposed to repeal that clause, which was appended to the Weights and Measures Bill, and to provide that canned goods shall have the packer's name or dealer's name stamped upon the package, and that the cans or packages shall specify the nature of the contents, whether they be fresh or dried goods. It is further provided that the Governor in Council, after the Bill is in operation, shall ascertain and determine standard sizes for the various kinds of canned goods, which shall be known by number, so that dealers may sell goods of those standard sizes by numbers. It is also provided that if the dealer or packer marks the weight upon the can, it shall be the proper weight. The Bill is a very short and simple one, and meets the wants of that branch of trade.

Mr. BLAKE. This Bill has come down very recently from the Senate, namely, on the 6th instant. I, therefore, trust the hon, gentleman does not propose to take it through committee this evening, because a little time should be given for the trade to be communicated with. We made a mistake last Session, which we are now attempting to rectify, and we must not act too hurriedly. The hon. gentleman stated, in explaining the Bill, that it provided for standard sizes, and that these shall be settled by the Governor in Council. I find no such provision in the B II.

Mr. McLELAN. I find I was speaking of the Bill as it was sent to the Senate. That clause was struck out.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did I correctly understand the hon. gentleman to say that the date of the packing of the goods shall be placed upon the can?

Mr. MoliELAN. It is provided that any person who places a date, which is proved to be the incorrect date, on the cans, shall be liable to a penalty.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have a letter here from a very large producer of canned goods in the west, objecting to this feature of the Bill, that the label on cans shall be dated, and he has sent me a number of extracts from papers interested in the canned goods trade, in Maryland, New York, California and elsewhere, setting forth the objection of the trade to that provision. He also sends me a list of the standard sizes adopted by the Baltimore Canned Goods Exchange. He represents that to require absolute accuracy as to weight is to ask an impossibility; that, owing to variations of temperature, when the goods are being canned part of the liquor may escape in some cases and the weight may vary half an ounce or more per can. The sizes given for canned goods on the Baltimore Exchange are five numbers, 1, 2, 3, 6 and 10. The size is determined, not by weight, but by the dimensions of the can. Those sizes give the weights within an ounce or two, and it is a much more convenient method of arranging the sizes than to have it absolutely required that the cans shall contain a specified weight of goods. Another objection made to the Bill by this packer is, that the labels, instead of specifying the quantity, should specify the quality of the goods; in fact, that the law should require a standard size of cans and that the labels should specify the quality of the goods. I shall be happy to submit to the Minister the letter and enclosures to which I have referred.

Mr. McLELAN, The Bill does not provide that the facturer or dealer places on the cans a mark representing them to be a certain weight, it must be the correct weight, and if the manufacturer puts on a date, the correct date must be given. The Bill does not compel the manufacturer to give the date or weight.

Bill read the second time.

LAND GRANTS TO NORTH-WEST RAILWAYS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved, That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:-

1. That it is expedient to authorise the Governor in Council to grant to the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company (Limited) Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding three thousand eight hundred acres for each mile of the company's railway, from Medecine Hat to the coal banks on the Hudson River, about 110 miles.

2. That it is expedient to authorise the Governor in Council to grant to the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway Company Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the company's railway, from its commencement, at Winnipeg, to its terminus, at White Water Lake, about 150 miles

3. That it is expedient to authorise the Governor in Council to grant to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company Dominion lands to the extent of six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the

to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company Dominion lands to the extent of six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the company's railway, for the whole distance from Portage La Prairie to the crossing of the south branch of the River Saskatchewan, twenty miles from Prince Albert, about 430 miles.

4. That it is expedient to authorise the Governor in Council to grant to the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company Dominion lands to the extent not exceeding six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the company's railway, from its commencement, near Regina, to the navigable waters of Long Lake.

5. That it is expedient to provide that the said grants shall be free grants, subject only to the payment by the grantees, respectively, of the grants, subject only to the payment by the grantees, respectively, of the cost of survey of the lands and incidental expenses at the rate of 10 cents per acre in cash on the issue of the patent therefor.

The question of building these lines of railway has already been before the House on previous Sessions. The first railway company which is mentioned in these resolutions is the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company (Limited). This railway begins at Medicine Hat, or its neighborhood, and goes to the Hudson River, within a short distance of Fort MacLeod, a distance of 110 miles. The Government had this matter before them at different periods. It was thought very important that these mines, at such a distance in the North-West Territories, might be worked, in order to provide fuel for the railways in the immense territories of the North-West, as well as to the settlers within such a distance from the mines, that the coal could be carried at a sufficiently low rate as to allow them to buy it and use it for their ordinary fuel. The Government tried, in accordance with the true interests of the country, to help the company, as far as possible within their powers, and with the consent of Parliament; but it was found that, after the company had attempted to obtain the necessary funds to build the road, other concessions and facilities should be granted to them, and finally it was decided that, subject to the approval of Parliament, the reserve of lands made by the previous Order in Council should be increased to 3,800 acres per mile, from Medicine Hat to the coal banks of the company. The company are to pay the costs of survey and other expenses at the rate of 10 cents per acre. This reserve is to be the same as by the previous Order in Council, and the increased grant of land shall depend on the line being completed during the month of August next. The provisions of that Order in Council shall remain in force, except as modified hereby. Then there was another Order in Council which determined the location of the line of railway from its junction with the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that this is the amount of land grant recommended in this case. This company has under construction, and approved location, 107 miles. If they get to the end of their charter they will have to build 35 miles more, which would bring them to Fort McLeod, making altogether 142 miles.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the grant for the whole 140 miles? Mr. McLELAN.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the grant is from Medicine Hat to the coal banks on the Hudson River, about 110 miles, but I gave the total mileage besides, which would bring them to Fort McLeod. The second resolution is with reference to the South-Western Colonization Railway Company, and in this case, as in the others, it was found impossible for the company to raise the money necessary for the building of these lines, which were considered of the greatest importance for the opening up of the North-West. This line is south of Winnipeg, in the region south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and is considered a most important railway, as it opens up large sections of country, consisting of beautiful lands, where already a large number of people have settled, but where, necessarily, they would hardly remain if they were without a railway to communicate with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and enable them to export the produce of their fertile lands. The next railway is the Manitoba and North-Western. That railway begins at Portage la Prairie and goes as far as Minnedosa. That portion of the line is already built to the extent of 78 miles, besides 58 under contract, and 75 miles under approved location, with 250 miles further to go to the end of the charter, which would make altogether 453 miles, whilst the Southern Railway, which we have under consideration, has 51 miles under operation, 212 miles under location, with 115 miles more to go to the end of the charter. making 378 altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. The proposed aid is only for 152 miles to the Manitoba South-Western?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The aid to the company is for 150 miles, at 6,400 acres per mile, that distance being the distance to White Water Lake. This is a very important road, and I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen will remember the discussion which took place on this matter in previous Sessions, and will agree that it is one of those railways which, if we aid any roads in the Territories, must receive the aid of Parliament. The third line is the line I alluded to a moment ago, the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. This line has already 73 miles in operation from Portage la Prairie to Minnedosa; the company is now constructing 50 miles more, and has the location approved of 75 miles further; and when all this is completed, it will still have 250 miles to construct, making a total of 453 miles. This railway will run from Minnedosa, in a north-westerly, or rather in a northerly direction, to Prince Albert. It is a very important road, because it opens up a large section of territory north of the line of the Pacific Railway, which, I understand consists of, perhaps not altogether, but to a great extent, very good lands, fit for settlement. There are a number of settlers already along the line, and I have no doubt that when opened up this district will be a favorite resort for settlers. Besides, the road will probably lead to other railways in that district which our successors in twenty or twenty-five years may have to build. The next line is that of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company, which has twently miles located and under construction, and the road will be sixty miles longer, making eighty Though this line is not so long or so miles altogether. important as the others, yet hon, gentlemen must have seen, during recent events, that a railway in that direction would have been a very great advantage. The building of this line will open, at a short distance of twenty miles, a long stretch of navigation, in the region of Long Lake, which will be very important. The grant of land, by the number of miles, is comparatively small; it extends only to Long Lake. I move, therefore, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on these resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. There can be no doubt that the question I the hon, gentleman has brought before us is one of very great, I may say, of very pressing importance; and those who have done me the honor of listening to what I have said on former occasions with reference to the construction of branch railways in the North-West will readily understand that I approach this subject with very great pleasure, at the idea that there is a prospect of some greater results being accomplished in the immediate future than have been accomplished in the last few years in that direction. It has always been my opinion that the rapid and satisfactory development of the North-West necessitates the construction of branch railways, and that it was unfortunate that a number of events should have taken place, with reference to one railway or another, some of which we may have occasion to allude to in the course of the discussion in the committee, which have prevented the more rapid construction of these lines of railway. I do not at all complain of the hon. gentleman's having entered, in the very brief statement he made, into the detail, before we go into the committee. That is highly reasonable, and I have no doubt he will supplement it with still further details whon we get into committee and are called upon to deal with each specific grant; and I shall not, just now, trouble the House with a reference to the particular grants, or with more than a very brief allusion to some points on which I think it reasonable that the Government should have given general explanations before asking you to leave the Chair. You remember, Sir, the varying policies of the Administration with reference to the construction of branch railways. When the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was chartered, and a very large grant of lands, besides a large grant of money, was made to that corporation, we were told by the Government that one of the inducements to the liberal treatment we were asked to accord to that company was that it would itself construct, free of charge to the country, a very large number of branch lines throughout the North-West. The First Minister, in the course of those discussions, I recollect very well, used, I think, the term "herringbone" or "gridiron" system of railways, one or other, which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was to construct, which its interest was to construct, in order to make available the area of its land grant, which was beyond the immediate influence of the main like of that railway; and we were told that we were thus incidentally providing for the construction of branch railways in the North-West as well as for the construction of a main line of railway from Callander to the Pacific Ocean. The original attitude, or the very early attitude, of the Canadian Pacific Railway in this report, so far as their announcements to the country and the Government are concerned, was somewhat in the same direction; because I think the House will not have forgotten that within a very very few months after their incorporation that company announced its intention to build a very great mileage of branch railways through the North-West, amongst others, a line starting from a point not very far removed from Winnipeg-I forget the exact pointpractically pretty nearly upon the pending line, by the Yellow Head pass of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and going, I think, as far as Edmonton. This line, some 600, or 700, or 800 miles long, was one of the lines which the Canadian Pacific Railway located, in a general sense, and in respect to which it invited the Government to reserve the land along each side of that railway, so that the company might have the advantage of the enhancement of value which was to be produced by its construction. That was not the only railway. A line south, also, extending in a south-westward direction, was early announced by the Canadian Pacific Railway as to be by it constructed. However, we know that so far as the development to ever, we know that, so far as the development, to any large extent, of the North-West by branch railways has been concerned, these promises of the Administration, upon the granting of the contract, and these professions of the company after the granting of the contract, have not between the proposal which my hon, friend from Bothwell heen fulfilled, because, though there are some branch railways, small railways, which have been built by the Canadian Pacific Railway, their aggregate mileage—I do not include, of course, the Algoma branch, which is not portinent to this discussion at all—amounts to something like 260 or 270 miles, including the Algoma branch, or 170 or 180 miles without it, and several of them are in directions other than those which were at that time contemplated, and which, although useful enterprises, perhaps, are hardly to be considered as enterprises of the particular character which was to be attributed to those to which I have referred. There was an enterprise which the hon. gentleman is proposing to assist further by these resolutions, which was in existence a very considerable time before the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself was incorporated, the Manitoba and South-Western Colonisation Railway; and after the incorporation of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the latter company seemed to adopt a policy of hostility, so far as I can judge, to the promotion of that enterprise. Both by its attitude towards the corporation of the city of Winnipeg and its attitude with reference to claims as to station grounds, and to claims as to lands reserved, and in various other ways, difficulties were thrown in the way of the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway, which have resulted in very great disappointment and enormous delay in the construction of that work. I believe it has since passed under the practical, in fact, I may say, the formal control of the Canadian Pacific Railway itself, which, in the meantime, engage 1 in the construction of a road tending somewhat in the same direction, and thus also complicating the work of the Mani-toba and South-Western Railway. The result is, we have two roads, not precisely, it is true, on the same line, but passing through the same section of country, and not penetrating that country into which the people had gone many years before, in the full expectation of a railway running through it, and in which great discontent, loss, discomfort and depression have been experienced, from the general result of the policy to which I have referred and the various unfortunate events which have prevented the construction of that road. Hon, gentlemen opposite might, on this occasion, on which they come formally before Parliament, for the first time, to develop a policy of construction by the Government of the day, of branch railways in the North-West, have gone into some review of their previous efforts in this direction and the difficulties which those efforts have met with. I do not say this is the first step hon. gentlemen have taken, apart from that to which I have alluded, with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, towards aiding branch railways in the North-West; because, executively, they have taken steps in the way executively, they have taken steps in the way of granting lands, under the general powers conferred upon them in the Dominion Lands Act.

They have taken the step of selling lands to railways at what was deemed a rate adequate to enable the companies to realise a large margin, and thus to acquire a bonus, in fact, by virtue of the low rates for the lands. But, as I have said, these were executive acts, carried out by the Administration under the general statutes, and we are now face to face, for the first time, with a policy of aid upon which Parliament is expected to pronounce. Hon. gentlemen opposite might fairly have entered into the review of their prior efforts and the results of those efforts, particularly when we remember the notions which, a little while ago, were rather current on the opposite side of the House, as to the magnificent results of the executive action of the Administration in this regard, as to the grand receipts the country was going to obtain from the sale of the lands to railway companies, at

of the Government of which he was a member, and that of the present Administration; when it was pointed out that my hon friend actually proposed to give free to railways something like 6,000 acres of land a mile, in the early settlement of Manitoba and the North-West Territory; when it was pointed out that he profligately proposed to allow the railway companies the opportunity of obtaining the benefit of 6,000 acres of land per mile in order to help the construction of these roads. Hon. gentlemen opposite then thought that was a very bad policy, a policy too liberal, unnecessarily liberal, and they were determined, by a happy combination, at once, as I have said, to fill the Treasury with cash and the country with railways, and upon that enterprise they entered, and in that enterprise they have been since engaged, for some years, and with the general results which the hon. gentleman has depicted to-night, namely, that we have got some 50 or 52 miles of Manitoba and South-Western built, and some 80 miles, I think, of the Manitoba and North-Western built, and there is the end of the account, apart from a small mileage of lines which the Canadian Pacific Railway has itself built, in the way of branch lines. After their efforts to develop the North-West, after the glorious results which they have declared they have obtained in the North-West, after the greatly enhanced value which they say they have given to lands in that country, they propose now to hand over, for the construc-tion of branch lines, 6,400 acres a mile free, and I am sorry to say that the papers which are before me show that some, at any rate, of the corporations to which these grants are to be given, are not sanguine of being able to construct the roads, even with the aid of the grants, although they are larger, in fact, than 6,400 acres a mile, with reference to two corporations, for reasons I will point out when we get to committee, and deal with the particular grants; but, for the moment, waiving that, we have 6,400 acres a mile proposed to be given by a policy adopted in the fall of 1884 and presented to Parliament for its ratification in 1885, when hon, gentlemen told us, a number of years ago, that they would obtain the railways to be constructed and would procure for us, in addition, $1 an acre for the lands. It seems to me that under these circumstances the hon. gentleman might have entered into some detail before he asked you to leave the Chair, some review of the various proposals with reference to the railways, and some detail as to the circumstances which have given rise to a reversion, in fact, to the condemned policy of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The original proposition, I think, was for something, perhaps, even smaller, in some ing of the business; and, under these circumstances, it is cases certainly smaller, than 6,400 acres. I think the original proposal was for 3,840 acres a mile. The first scheme of hon. gentlemen opposite was to sell 3,840 acres a mile to such branch railways as they thought were sufficiently important to justify that sale, at $1 an acre—plus the cost of survey, of course, in all cases—$1 an acre cash: and upon that it was expected that a sufficient margin would be obtained to secure the construction of the railway. That policy was modified, and they decided, upon the request of the railway companies, to increase the sale to 6,400 acres a mile, at $1 an acre, cash, and thus, by the added acreage, to enlarge the margin of profit to be made by the railway company, and so to secure the construction of the railway and this sum in cash to the Treasury. Then another change was in the postponement of the time of payment. After having increased the acreage they were asked to postpone the period of payment, so that the resources of the companies might be made available for the construction of the railway, and the payment might not be exacted before the companies were able to sell to the purchasers; and to that, also, they agreed, as a modification which might be given without danger to the State and with obvious advantages to the companies. And then, an abso- not express one opinion or the other upon that, but I am Mr. BLAKE.

(Mr. Mills) submitted to Parliament, in the last years | lutely free grant is asked of the larger area. It seems to me that these statements that I have made of the various proposals of hon, gentlemen at different times cught, when they now come before Parliament for the first time, for the formal adoption of the policy for aiding railways in the North-West, to have induced a review of their past policies and some explanation of the reason why, at this time of day and in the condition of the North-West as it was in the fall of 1884, the proposals are, in their view, rendered necessary in the interest of the country, which they thought so improper at its earlier and less matured period of development, when my hon. friend from Bothwell submitted to the House. If it be that, by a more liberal policy in the earlier days, we could, many years ago, have secured the construction of branch railways through the North-West, I venture to say that the condition of that country-its material condition, and the state of its people, and the elements of prosperity in that country-would have been very much more developed, very much to the advantage of Canada at large, than that which obtains at the present day. I do not at all disguise the view that, while the construction of these railways is, as I conceive, of the last importance to the Province, my opinion is that they have been, in more than one way, practically thwarted by the course hon, gentlemen have taken. I have referred to the course with reference to the Manitoba South-Western. I refer also to the difficulties which are created by the special conditions under which the great through line was chartered. It is perfectly obvious that one of the elements of prosperity of the interior lines of Manitoba and the North-West must be the terms of connection which they make with the outlet for the through trade. So long as the railways in the North-West were restricted to connection with one line, by which only they could obtain access to the outer world, and which must, therefore, be the arbiter of the rates of freight for the through trade, it is very clear that their prospects must be much more doubtful than they could be if they could make arrangements which would secure to them a share, however little, of the profits derivable from the through trade. If they are connected with one company alone, that company having the right to dictate the terms upon which their traffic shall be taken, the margin of profit upon which this traffic can be carried, or an undue protection of that margin of profit may be extracted on the arrangements—they are not free arrangements, but on the arrangements, so to speak—which shall be effected between the branch railway and the through railway for the handlobvious that prudent men have to rely on the prospects of the local freight, without relying, to any great extent, upon the profits derivable from through freight from the North-West. Another observation of a general character which I think fit to make on this occasion, and which I make with reference to the policy of the Administration, is, that I think it might fairly have been indicated by the Government. who have brought down to-night proposals to assist four railways, and four railways only, whether this is a policy which is applicable in its details to other enterprises of a character equal in importance, or fairly important, which may be projected, or which may have been projected through the North-West. I think it is of very great consequence that there should be some degree of certainty in that matter. I am not quarrelling with the view-there is no use in raising a contest upon it; it would be absurd, in the present condition of the country, and of the arrangements which have been made for the construction of railways, to enter, at this moment, upon a serious contest in reference to it -I am not quarreling with the view that a measure of control should be retained by the Government over the location of the railways. I do assuming, for the moment, that this is a reasonable measure, as it is their obvious policy. Granting them that assumption, it would tend to settle this question more or less if we had a general declaration on the floor of Parliament as to the policy of the Government, as to other lines projected or to be projected in the North-West, with reference to grants of land. We must observe that the proposals of the Government are varied very materially, in one particular which I have already adverted to, in practice, by which, in effect, the area is made larger for two lines, but they vary also in another particular, which deserves attention, and upon which, I think, explanation at this stage of the resolution would have been perfectly fairly to be expected. With reference to one of the roads, and that a road passing through some of the choicest sections of the country, as I understand the proposal of the Government, it is that the grant of land shall be of lands all fairly fit for settlement; and as to the other of his proposals, the grant is not of that character; so that a distinction is made as to one of these Acts from that which exists as to the other. That, I think, is fairly a subject for explanation, inasmuch as it involves, very obviously, a question of policy. I need hardly say that what one of these companies gets all future companies will ask for, and indeed we may expect that those who have applied for and have been given something less than that which this company has got will call for the conditions which this company has got, and will ask why they should be placed in an inferior position to that which this particular company occupies. And so, it seems to me, it was a very questionable policy to make exceptional provisions, that the general provision ought to have ruled, except in so far as the circumstances of some particular locality might operate a difference, which, upon that ground, would render plain and intelligible a variation from that principle. I do not see any such circumstances as justify this variation. Another point which I have mentioned in the debate-I think on the Address—and which I think of very great consequence, is the question of a condition which I do not see in any of the Orders in Council, and which I had hoped to see there: that is, some condition which shall ensure that these agricultural lands shall be open for settlement, at moderate prices, on conditions of actual settlement. Now, the grant which the hon, gentleman proposes to assent to to-night is on no less an acreage than within a tew acres of four millions and a half—as I roughly summed up the figures—alongside and closely adjoining a number of the railways which the Government think most important. Now, if there be one thing with reference to the land policy of the Administration which I think experience has already established we ought to be careful about, it is this question of the land being open to the actual settler, this question of the intending settler knowing the terms and conditions upon which, when he sees land vacant, he would be sure to get it. I need hardly tell hon, gentlemen opposite that our neighbors on the other side of the line have had considerable experience in assisting railways by grants of land; and I suppose I can cite six, eight or ten different provisions in different grants to railway corporations in the United States, designated, more or less perfectly, to protect the principle to which I have referred, the great principle of keeping the land open for the actual settler. Now, I am sorry that in the Orders in Council which were brought down and which indicate the conditions upon which the Government has proposed to confer those lands upon these companies, nothing should be said upon that subject, and I should be relieved to learn from the Government that notwithstanding the absence of such information in the Orders in Council we may hope for some practical proposal yet to be made by which we may look back a little to the change of circumstances which has secure these results. Early in the history of the various taken place since the first policy was adopted. At the time land measures of this Government they established belts, I when the first application was made-which, I think, was think five in number—there may have been six—on each side of the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The fifth bolt was a very wide belt; I think it was as much as 50 miles. They proposed to sell these lands at varying prices, but not upon conditions of settlement, and to sell them at a tenth down and the balance in ten annual instalments; and the result was that a very large area of land was taken up, choice land in the Province of Manitoba was taken up by speculators, who paid 10 cents an acre down, and speculated upon the margin. Others, of course, who bought in the $2 belt paid 20 cents, but for this trifle, this deposit, as you may call it, they obtained a title to the land, which enabled them to lock it up and disabled the settler from obtaining possession. So with reference to other operations which have, from time to time, taken place in the country; so with reference to other lock-ups which have, from time to time, taken place—some of them in connection with the original settlement of the Manitoba troubles, under which quantities of land were alienated under exceptional circumstances, but with unfortunate results as to the future of the country itself. Now, surely it is useful to refer to all these things upon an occasion in which it is proposed to initiate a system of free grants of land in aid of branch railways, in order that we may, if we can, so hedge around these grants, not so as to embarass the railway companies in obtaining substantial profits from the land, but as much as, consistently with accomplishing the object of the grant, if that be at all possible—and I believe it to be quite possible -may result in our telling the settler: Now, here is a railway bolt along the line of railway where you can go, and there are Government sections which you can get free or pre-empt, and if you choose the railway lands you know the maximum price you have got to pay, and you know, if nobody else has entered into possession of that land for actual settlement purposes, you will have the right to enter and take possession and cultivate the soil. What we want is to secure, as far as possible, the early settlement of the country; and I am sure we feel, more than ever we felt before, to-day, that we must hope to secure that by settlement along the lines of railway. It seems to me extremely obvious that that must be our main dependence for a considerable time to come, much more strongly than it has been, in view of the events of this winter. Therefore, the question to which I have alluded has assumed a special degree of importance from these events. Now, Sir, I do not propose to trouble As I have said, I purthe House further at this moment. posely abstain from entering into the consideration of the merits of any one of these grants, of the previous history, of the actual effect of the grant, or of the correspondence which has led up to the grant, thinking it more convenient to do that in committee, where we can have a conversational discussion; but what I have done rather refers to those considerations which I should have thought would have so far directed the attention of the Government as to have induced observations upon them on the motion that you leave the Chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot at all object to the mode or line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman. It is a very important subject, involving the grant of a very large tract of land, and closely connected with the future development and progress of the North-West. The hon. gentleman spoke of a change in the policy of the Government; that at first they had proceeded by executive action, under the general power given to them by the Dominion Lands Act, to sell those lands, and that now they have come to Parliament with a change of policy, in order to assist railways by free grants. Well, that is so. But we must made by Dr. Schultz and the company he got up for the Manitoba and South-Western Railway—at that time everything was coleur de rose; the boom was in full blast, if I may use the expression; everybody thought they were making their fortunes by owning any land. I think it will be admitted that those men who were promoting that railway, who had invested their means in it, and who looked forward to great profits from the construction of the road, might, perhaps, be the best judges of what was necessary and sufficient to help them build that road. At that time lands about Winnipeg and in almost any part of Manitoba, were held at very high prices. An application was made by the South-Western Railway for a sale of land at a minimum price fixed by the statute, which was $1 an acre. The Dominion Act did not fix that as the minimum sum, but it said that land shall be sold at $1 per acre. That was the provision of the original Act. The Government, when they were assured by the company that 6,400 acres would enable them to carry out their scheme, came forward and said: If you think so, we will grant you the land. We could not well say to them, as the hon. gentleman says, that this was profligate extravagance, when the company had said that they would complete the road with 3,840 acres per mile, at $1 per acre. That proposition being made and accepted by the Government, the other roads, following that example, and having confidence in the shrewdness of that company, the South-Western, applied to obtain the same terms, and were quite satisfied that those terms would enable them to build the railways. We all know how much they were disappointed, how completely, when the reaction took place, when the inflation took place, when the bubble burst, it was found The railway comthat this arrangement was unavailing. panies hoped, from time to time, that the position would improve, that the depression would be only temporary, and they still held to their contract with the Government to pay $1 per acre—I am speaking from memory, not having the papers before me. The Government granted those different applications, at the request of the railway companies, they making the application, and the Government did everything they could reasonably be expected to do for the purpose of helping the different roads. But besides the temporary depression that took place in our North-West there has been, as we all know, an unparalleled shrinkage in the value of railway property in America. Never has there been anything like it, and bankruptcy has fallen on many railway enterprises in the United States. The consequence was, and is, to a considerable extent, to this day, that capitalists in Europe look askance upon any proposition to build railways in any portion of America; and a capitalist told me, only last November, that if a railway was proposed to heaven from any portion of North America it would not find investors in England.

M. BLAKE. Perhaps capitalists do not want to go by that line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps not. Then there came another proposal. It was said by the company, with respect to the proposal to take 3,840 acres, at $1 per acre, that the purchase price and selling price did not, under the altered circumstances, give a sufficient margin, and unless larger grants were made that margin of profit would not be sufficient to secure sufficient capital to enable the companies to build the railways. Thus, by degrees, at the request of the railway company, all the time, changes were made to enable them to carry out their schemes and build the road. per mile, at $1 per acre; next, 6,400 acres, at $1 per acre; then it was proposed that the terms of payment should be made more liberal. All those changes have proved ineffec tual, and now the Government, believing, as every hon. member believes, as the Government always did believe, that the Canadian Pacific Railway. It will be remembered Sir John A. Macdonald.

every encouragement must be given to the building of railways, as it is absolutely essential for the development of that great country that railways shall be the common highways, they have come to the conclusion that the land grants must be free. I am not at all sure that all these lines will be built, even with these grants. I think, however, they will be. The railway first mentioned, the North-Western Coal and Navigation line, which is a narrow gauge road, undertaken by Sir Alexander Galt, and some capitalists who have joined with him to open up the coal mines in the Bolly River district—that is cortain to be built. It is, as I have said, a narrow gauge railway, to run 110 miles, and will be completed in August or Septemter, and will be of very great value in bringing down the magnificent coal which that country produces to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and thence to Winnipeg, and, by-andbye, westward, to some extent. I believe the North-Western company's line, which is running from Portage la Prairie to Minnedosa and thence on, is finished for a distance of 78 miles, and has been so for some time. It is intended to complete, this year, 50 miles more. The company will proceed as they are able to raise money. The building of that road is assured. As the papers will show, the arrangement at first was that the company should build 100 miles a year. They found they could not obtain sufficient capital to do that, and so the Government agreed that if the company could build 50 miles a year they will obtain this grant, if Parliament sanctions it. Mr. Andrew Allan, of Montreal, is at the head of it, and he has induced a number of capitalists to take stock and interest themselves in it; the company have spent a large amount of their own money, and it is believed, with this assistance, the road will be built. It is certain to be built at the rate of at least 50 miles a year, and if times become more prosperous and the sale of land is satisfactory, they will push it on at an accelerated speed. The hon, gentleman speaks about the South-Western. That company has certainly been unfortunate in various ways. It got into trouble owing to litigation between different bodies of shareholders, two or three parties, two certainly, and they got up a legal quarrel as to their respective rights, went into court and, as a result, the credit of the company was materially damaged and its progress was retarded, and great discredit was thrown upon it by the litigation. It has now passed substantially under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that company will build it, so soon as they can obtain the necessary capital. The hon, gentleman says that at the time the Government assumed the responsibility of laying their scheme before Parliament, for the grant of subsidies of land and money to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was promised that branch lines would be built, and that the company promised that branch lines would be built. That is quite true; but there is a considerable reservation of land to make up for the 25,000,000 acres of land grants, which are reserved at considerable distances from the railway, inasmuch as the land in the railway belt would be altogether insufficient to make up the 25,000,000 of acres The company, of course, desire to build branch lines, and have published plans, showing the branch lines they were desirous of building; but, of course, they must first build the main line before they build the branch lines. The backbone must be created before the ribs can run from it. It is the interest of the railway company, of course, to have as many branches as possible; not only to build branches themselves, in order to open up their own lands, but to encourage branch lines by other companies. I do not understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Thus the policy changed; first the grant was for 3,840 acres have in any way offered any obstruction to any railway whatever, or acted hostilely in any way whatever. They would be foolish to do so; for, the more lines running and joining them, the more traffic they will get. As regards carriage, that is beyond the control of how stringent the terms of the charter are, and how the carriage is absolutely under the control of the Government of the day, whose duty it will be and they will be liable to the censure of Parliament if they fail in it-to see that the tariff is such, that while affording a reasonable profit to the company it will, at the same time, afford a cheap and efficient mode of transport for the riches of the North-West seeking the markets of the world. The hon, gentleman speaks of the original policy introduced by the Government of which he was a member. We remember that not long ago the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackonzie) said. in Parliament, that he had morely laid before the House an experimental, a tentative proposition, to see how it would be taken. I am quite sure about that, and I have no doubt that Hansard will confirm the truth of my statement. But that Bill of the hon. gentleman was objectionable, upon the ground that it gave any number of people the right to build any number of railways anywhere, with a very remarkable limit, however. Any persons applying for a charter—I forget the number, but fifteen, I think could come and get a charter, and they would have a claim for 6,400 acres per mile for nothing, to a certain meridian, and then 7,000 acres a little further off, and then 12,000 acres per mile when they got up to the Peace River district. There was a remarkable limit in that Bill, especially when we remember the charges which were brought against the Government, and against the Parliament that sanctioned it. for granting a monopoly of railway occupation in that country to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that other lines of country to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that other lines of that land may attain by the fact of a railway running railway were prevented from being established and were to alongside of it. Therefore, there has been no lock-up in any be disallowed. Now, about the question of disallowance, Mr. Speaker, whether it was right or whether it was wrong to put in that provision. It is quite clear that no railway would have been built, for the railways which have got their charters there from the Government, which have got large grants of land at what was considered a nominal price, have been unable to build their roads; and the disallowing 100 paper charters would not have prevented the building of a single road, because, charter or no charter, not one such road would be built. But with respect to the policy of the Government in preventing rivals being built to the Canadian Pacific Railway, at the time that that railway was just chartered, and endeavoring to get the necessary funds to build the road—at the time the company was attempting to induce capitalists from Europe to invest in it, if charters were granted for the purpose of building rival roads in the same direction alongside of it, it would effectually destroy all hope of ever building the main line; and if the main line could not be built as a semi-Government line, supported with the treasure and the lands belonging to the Government, what chance would there be of other roads being built? And that idea was so completely before the mind of the hon. member for Bothwell, and the Government of which he was a member, that one of the clauses in their Bill is this: "That no company shall be chartered under the provisions of this Act for the construction of any railway having the same general direction as the Canadian Pacific Railway." No railway, whatever, if running in the same direction as the Canadian Pacific Railway, could get any grant of land—having the same general direction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any branch thereof. So that no company could get a charter if the company offered to build a railway in the same general direction, east or west, as the main line, or north or south, in the same general direction as any branch; and it was provided further that it must be at a mean distance of forty miles from either the railway or or any branch of it; so that that was a sanction of the general policy adopted by the Government, to prevent the infant enterprise from being strangled shortly after its birth by a number of paper charters. The hon gentleman has stated, among some of the objections he took-and they were quite well put, they were plausible, and they have considerable force—one objection he made to these companies in committee was, that there was no condition about the sale of land to the actual settler. Well, you cannot effect the two things. You have the object of selling the lands at a low price, or the present policy, of giving them at no price—that is, for one purpose: to give the company sufficient credit to raise money on those lands, in the first place, by the pledging of those lands, and afterwards by the selling of them, to enable them to generate sufficient capital to build the road. But to limit it, to keep it at a low price, is giving with one hand and taking away with the other. It is the prospect of these lands being largely increased in value, by the construction of the road, that makes the granting of the land of any value; and by attempting to limit that, so much do you diminish the value of the grant and the chances of the company utilising those lands in the money markets of the world. Then it must be remembered that according to the system which has obtained for some time, under the policy of the Government, the even-numbered sections are homestead sections, and the odd-numbered sections are for sale. They are given to the different railways, but there are always the even-numbered sections, which contain two homesteads and two pre emptions, lying side by side with the land granted to the different railways. So that, in that vast country there is plenty of land, and the best of land in the world, along the different lines of railway, that cannot be taken away from the settlers; and the first actual settler making an entry can have his land, no matter what value way whatever, and there cannot be, so long as the evennumbered sections are kept open to the settlers. The hon. gentleman is quite right, however, in saying that there has been a large quantity of land locked up in the North-West. That was principally owing to the scrip system, which we need not discuss now, but which we all know was forced on Parliament by the circumstances of the country at the time it was first obtained. The half breeds who settled in Manitoba along the Red and Assiniboine Rivers had obtained certain possessory rights from the Hudson Bay Company which had to be acknowledged, and which were acknowledged and paid for by scrip, in the majority of cases; and this scrip got into the hands of land speculators, in their legitimate business. Of course, it is an honest business; but these land purchasers did as every man does, with respect to his property, whether it is personal or real; they held it until they found a market in which they could get their price. That, of course, was perfectly legitimate on their part, but when it assumed the large proportions it did in Manitoba, a large quantity of land scrip being thrown into the market, and that being utilised by the persons who purchased it in paying for land in and around Winnipeg, and at places where there was likely to be a fixed settlement or town, of course greatly retarded the growth of some of those localities, and kept large tracts of land unsettled, which would have been occupied long before if they had been kept open. That has been a disadvantage; but the answer is this, that the immigrant going to the North-West has as good a chance of selection of good soil and climate in one place as in another; and actual settlers going to a country where all is strange to them, if they find the land and climate to suit them, can have no great preference for one place over another, unless they have a relative who has gone before them. So that, taking the country as a whole, there never has been any want of land for any settler from old Canada, Europe or the United States. This is all that occurs to me just now. The hon, gentleman says he will discuss the grants to the various railways in committee, which will be a very proper way of dealing with them, and we shall be exceedingly glad to give him any information in our power on the sub-

Mr. MILLS. Seven or eight years have gone by since a proposition similar, in some respects, to that which the hon. gentleman now submits to the House was laid before Parliament by a former Administration. When I dissented from the observation of the hon. gentleman, that this was not a part of the policy of the former Government, but was merely a tentative measure, I did not mean that the hon. gentleman was not accurately representing the statement made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie); but I did mean to express my dissent from the accuracy of that statement, because that measure was introduced with the full approval of the Government, and received its first and second readings as a measure to which the Government was committed; and it was only abandoned, so far as I know—and I think those hon. gentlemen who were associated with me in the Administration, and who are now present, will support what I say—because we believed the measure could not be carried through the Senate that Session; and it was desirable to allow it to stand over, for that reason, until the opinion of the country was had on the general policy of the Administration. I say this with the most distinct recollection of all the facts connected with the introduction and consideration of that measure in the House. Now, the hon, gentleman has made a statement, on his own responsibility, which is not strictly accurate. He said that the policy of the Government was to prevent any railway being built within 40 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway or any of its branches. Now, Sir, that was not the policy. There was nothing proposed to Parliament from which that inference could be drawn.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I read the clause.

Mr. MILLS. It is true we introduced a Bill which received its second reading. It is true the hon. gentleman did not support it; he did not, I believe, either speak or vote against it; but when the vote on the second reading was taken the hon, gentleman informed us that he would oppose the Bill on the House going into committee upon it; and before I conclude my observations I shall call attention to the views that were expressed by some of the hon, gentleman's colleagues and supporters. Now, that measure was one proposing the free incorporation of railways. It was not similar to the measures which the hon. gentleman has sometimes submitted to this House for the construction of railways in the North-West Territories. It was a measure establishing a general principle. The principle had long been tried and had resulted satisfactorily in the United States; it had been tried in the State of New York and, I believe, in almost all the States along the border. Measures of railway incorporation are not introduced into the State Legislatures; the general principle is recognised, and people are held to invest their money in a railway undertaking on their own responsibility, precisely as in other undertakings; they only give this security to the State, that they are undertaking the work in good faith. They deposit with the Government plans and specifications, estimates of the cost, and a certain percentage of the cost, as a guarantee of good faith. That was precisely the character of the measure I proposed. We proposed, by the 18th section of that Bill:

" No company shall be incorporated under the provisions of this Act for the construction of any railway having the same general direction as the Canadian Pacific Railway, or any branch thereof, at a nearer distance than 40 miles."

That did not tie the hands of Parliament; it did not say that Parliament should not authorise the construction of a railway nearer than that distance; but we said we do not propose to authorise any railway company, under the provisions of this Act, to become organised, to subscribe stock and deposit plans with the Government, and then undertake the construction of their line at a nearer distance than that. That was all that we proposed. The rest was left open, to be the construction of Parliament to the proposed spoliation of western land. It Sir John A. Macdonald.

dealt with by Parliament, from time to time, as it might think proper. Precisely as they deal with railway companies, it was left to Parliament to deal with those companies that might receive charters of incorporation at a nearer distance than that which is specified in this particular section. It is true the Minister who now has charge of railways and canals (Mr. Pope) subsequently expressed the opinion that the principle of this Bill was sound, but the hon. gentleman took a different view. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) expressed himself very strongly against the principle of the Bill or the policy of aiding branch lines of railways or colonisation roads, and similar views were expressed by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), and the hon member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). The hon. gentleman has failed to observe this in the various statements he has made with regard to this Bill, for I believe we have never had any proposition for the incorporation of railways in Manitoba and the North-West Territories where this proposed measure has not been referred to. I believe that it was a proper measure to propose; I believe the circumstances of the North-West country and the Province of Manitoba would be very different to-day had that Bill become law; I believe they would have a much larger population; I believe they would be more compact, that the country would be better settled, and the people, in consequence, more prosperous and contented than they now are. In fact, we would have had railway facilities existing years ago, which do not exist up to this moment. In that measure we proposed to grant to railway companies not more than 6,400 acres per mile, up to the 102nd meridian, and about 7,800 acres west of the 102nd meridian; a larger grant, of course, was proposed towards the Peace River country. It was not a fixed sum that the Government were to give, as a matter of course, to every railway company, but it was a maximum quantity, which was not to be exceeded. We also provided there should be no restriction upon settlement; that no company incorporated under that Act should have power to interfere with the settlement of the country, and that the Government might set apart the moneys they received from the settlers on the sale of lands would be used in paying for the construction of roads, up to $10,000 a mile, and that beyond that the companies would not be entitled to receive anything from the Government, by way of aid, in the construction of these lines. In adopting that proposition we found that the experience of our neighbors across the line had been in favor of colonisation railways. I observed that in the State of Minnesota the increase of population was 27,000 a year and the number of miles of railway built 92; in Iowa the increase of population was 52,000 a year and the number of miles built 180; in Missouri the increase of population was 65,000 a year and the miles of railway built 107; in Illinois the increase of population was 82,000, the miles of railway 166. I found that, in fact, there was a certain relation between the increase of population and the number of miles of railway constructed. Of course, the rate of increase of population, no doubt, would tend to advance with the construction of railways, but the construction of railways at convenient points, and in sections of the country suited for settlement, also facilitates the colonisation and settlement of the country; and I believe the same results would have followed the adoption of a similar policy in our North-West as those which followed the adoption of this policy in the various States of the American Union. Now, when that proposition was made a number of gentlemen opposed it very strongly. Among them was the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He said, on this subject:

would be unjust to the other Provinces to pass an Act like this, which would enable railway speculators and companies to absorb three-fourths of the whole western territory—that territory on which they hoped to construct the great Canadian Pacific road. He yielded to no one in the desire to benefit the North-West. But he certainly could not approve of an Act such as that now before the House. He could not believe in a scheme which would enable speculators to absorb millions of acres of land, with which it was hoped the country might be recouped for the money it was spending in opening up that great country."

The hon, gentleman, in fact, believed that the measure would be successful, that the country would be settled, that the lands would be opened by the companies under its provisions, and that, as a consequence, they would acquire a right in these lands. The hon. gentleman said : We will not do that; we acquired these lands, he said, to recoup us, by their sale, for the $30,000,000 we propose to advance for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon, gentleman seems to have greatly changed his opinions. At that time he thought $30,000,000 was a very large sum to advance in aid of the construction of a trans-continental road, and he seemed to think that it was the bounden duty of the Government not to aid, either in land or money, the construction of any other railway, and to use the money derived from the sale of these lands to recoup all the older Provinces for the burdens they had assumed in advancing $30,000,000 cash towards the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman still entertains these views, and is still opposed to a policy of this sort. If he is, he will oppose the proposition before the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon, gentleman will find out by-and-bye.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Agriculture spoke on that occasion, and he was equally opposed to aid being given to these colonisation companies. He said:

"He had been hitherto, and was now, a strong advocate for building a railway through that country. It would tax the powers of the Dominion to their full extent to build the one railway provided for, under the agreements entered into with British Columbia and Manitoba, and their first efforts must be given to carrying out those agreements. The construction of a Pacific railway was part of the agreement of the union of British Columbia with Canada, and the country was bound, before entering into any large engagement or making any other disposition of public lands in the North-West, to carry out that engagement. The power to build railways to any extent, provided they were 40 miles from each other, was one which should not be placed in the hands of any people without the consent of the Government being obtained to each scheme."

The hon, gentleman did not seem to have confidence in the capitalists who were about to invest their money in those enterprises nor in the people who were supposed to favor the enterprises and to whom the road would be an advantage. He declared that he was opposed to allowing them to judge of the wisdom of the enterprises in which they were engaged, and he insisted that the Government itself should have control over these transactions. He went on to say:

"He could well understand that, if the Government were about to build the Pacific Railway—and he hoped they were, for its construction was in the interests of the country—that assistance should be given in the shape of public lands, but he could not understand why, under the present Bill, Parliament should be deprived of the right of considering each charter and deciding what subsidy should be granted to each road. It was impossible to understand why a different policy should be adopted for the North-West in that regard than that which had been found quite satisfactory in the old Provinces."

In fact, the hon. gentleman was strongly opposed to the principle of the free incorporation of railways. That scheme, which has been tried for so many years in the neighboring Republic, which has prevented log-rolling, which has prevented any attempt to use undue influence in the Legislature, which has left every enterprise of this sort to stand upon its own merits, was one the hon. gentleman did not favor. He preferred one which would compel the railway company seeking incorporation to come to Parliament and fight every other company that might have an interest opposed to the one seeking incorporation. He went on to say:

"He favored the payment of the cost in money, if it were necessary, but that was no reason why they should throw away the public land, instead of endeavoring to recoup themselves from its sale. That was the policy of the late Government, which declared to the House and the country that they were about to give $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acros of land towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

The hon. gentleman expressed precisely the same view as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He said the country is obliged to give $30,000,000 in cash for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and all the remaining land not required to aid in the construction of the road should be retained and sold to settlers, in order to recoup the country for the immense advance for the construction of the one line. Then the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) spoke in opposition to the measure, and declared himself opposed to giving land grants in aid of these colonisation roads. It is true that all the members for Manitoba, at that time, whether they were supporters of the Administration or whether they opposed it, favored the proposition, but the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, and those who had been his collegues and were then his supporters, were opposed to this policy. The hon. member then for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), in speaking on this subject, said:

"He was opposed to the principle of this Bill for two reasons. First, he did not believe that it was in the interest of this country that we should create railway monopolies; he believed that railways were the highways of commerce, and that they should be owned and run by the Government, in the interests of commerce. He thought we already had in this country an example of the evil results of railway monopoly. The companies did not look to the interests of the country, but to their own interests."

And so we find that the policy of aiding colonisation roads by grants of land was opposed by the hon. gentleman and by those who are now supporting him. These hon. gentlemen, when a large and liberal aid was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, told Parliament that that company was receiving a large extent of territory in aid of its line, which would not lie immediately along the line, and that they would have an interest in building railways in various directions through the North-West country, for the purpose of bringing their land into the market, and also for the purpose of bringing traffic to the line they were about to build. In fact, we were assured that they would be able to build hundreds of miles of subsidiary or branch lines in that North-West country without any further aid; and yet we find that the hon, gentleman, in the propositions now before us, proposes, not merely to aid lines in which the company, so far as we know, have no direct interest, but also to aid those which are under the control of the company. The First Minister has told us that the amount proposed to be given in the way of a land grant in aid of the South-Western Railway was not adequate, that the company could not succeed in carrying out its enterprise with the aid the Government proposed to give it. Now, the hon, gentleman comes down with a proposition to give all of these railway companies an extent of territory at least as large as we proposed in 1878. That proposition was pronounced an extravagant proposition, a scheme which would absorb all the lands of the North-West country, which would place them all under the control of railway companies, and the hon. gentleman comes down now with a proposition, after having failed in all the schomes that they have put forward, substantially, in this respect, adopting the scheme of aiding roads that we proposed at that time. I think it would have been well if the Administration had gone farther. We know that a railway company will not build a disadvantageous line if an advantageous one presents itself. If allowed to proceed unhampered, they would be disposed to take that which they believe to be the best route in their own interest; and, if the Government had now adopted the remaining portion of the Bill we proposed in 1878, they would propose a plan that would be more satisfactory than the one now presented.

The hon. gentleman proposes to give aid to certain specified lines, all of which, I believe, have been incorporated. If the hon. gentleman were to leave to railway companies organised the freedom to build lines where they pleased, subject to certain limitations, upon the conditions that were stated in the Bill which was submitted in 1878, they would present a more satisfactory scheme than that which is now submitted. If there was anything that could tend to justify the course suggested by the Bill of 1878 it is what Ministers are proposing at this moment.

Mr. ROYAL. The hon gentleman said that if his Bill had been passed Manitoba and the North-West Territory would be now settled, that greater prosperity would reign all over that country, that very likely each of the farmers there would have a large deposit in the bank; in fact, that the golden era would have dawned upon that country. Well, Sir, I beg to differ from the hon. gentleman's statement. He says that in the States Iowa, Missouri and Illinois—he did not say Kansas, he did not say Dakota—the increase of population has been in proportion to the increase in the construction of railways. That may be quite true; but the hon, gentleman forgets that it may not be safe to draw a parallel from the other side of the line, for the reason that the people there enjoy other institutions and are in a different political condition from ourselves. First, they are independent; and although there are two political parties among them, as there are with us, those parties do not carry on political warfare in the same manner that parties do with us. In the United States, if one party wants to settle the country the other party will not spread abroad advertisements and newspaper articles decrying their country. It is otherwise in Canada. If the Conservative party happens to be in power, and they propose a plan for building a railway in unsettled portions of the country, hon gentlemen opposite, opposed to the Conservative party, by their newspapers and by their organisations, immediately begin to declare that the land is unfit for settlement, that it is no use for a European immigrant to attempt to settle in the North-West, because farming there will not pay. Sir, we have had that experience in Manitoba for the last three years, a most unfortunate experience, and it has done more than anything else to retard the progress of that Province. Now, it may be that the scheme of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was a wonderful scheme, but it does seem extraordinary that the wisdom of Parliament at that time was unable to appreciate it, and, unfortunately, we are still unable to appreciate it to day. I believe that the scheme that the Government now propose to this House is the only one that will tend to develop the interests of Manitoba and the North-West Territory. Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored to show that the policy of the Government has prevented the construction of branch lines. Well, how is it that this very scheme is now proposed at the request of those branch line companies? Do hon, gentlemen opposite suppose that those companies do not look after their own interests? Do they think those companies forget that there is only one trunk line of railway in Manitoba and the North-West Territory? Do they forget that the branch lines will necessarily have to make freight arrangements with the trunk line? They know, as well as we do, that such is the case; and yet, notwithstanding, it must be admitted that the branch lines know their own interests a little better than hon, gentlemen opposite, They come to the Government and say that if the Government are willing to give them 6,000 acres per mile they are ready to construct those branch lines. Sir, it is proposterous to suppose that it is in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway not to encourage the construction of those branch lines. Surely the Government, in adjusting and controlling the traffic rates of the trunk line will see that they are in accordance with common sense, and will not be opposed to Mr. Mills.

the interests of the people. I believe that in this, as well as in many other things, hon. gentlemen opposite have erred a great deal. Now, Sir, the leader of the Opposition, at the beginning of his remarks, asked why these branch lines had not been constructed. Was it because they were afraid of the monoply of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Sir, it is impossible to suppose that these companies were afraid of such a monoply. The reason why they have met with such opposition in carrying out their scheme has been this: The land, which a few years ago was valued at such a high figure, all at once fell down to almost nothing. Why? Because, instead of the political parties having enough patriotism to value the lands in the North-West at their real value, one of the parties placed these lands very high, and assumed that the prospects of the farmer were very good, while, on the other side, the newspapers of the Opposition and the Farmers' Union endeavored to depreciate the value of the lands, to deprcciate the condition of the country, and naturally conveyed an impression to intending immigrants that in coming to the North-West they would come to a desolate country, where hunger and ruin would stare them in the face. Is it any wonder that these gentlemen now say: Why have not these branch line companies built their roads? They must go for an answer to the farmers in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Well, Sir, when the contract was awarded to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company there was, no doubt, a monopoly clause. That monopoly clause was certainly the essence of the contract, and it had to be so, because otherwise no company in the world would have undertaken such a task upon the conditions that the Government offered them. After that charter was passed we saw the hon. gentlemen opposite asking this Government to destray that monopoly, and to break faith with the company. Were hon, gentlemen opposite then acting in good faith? No, Sir; they merely wanted to destroy that clause, which was essential to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was the extent of the patriotism exhibited by hon gentlemen opposite and their friends in Ontario, Manitoba, and in the North-West Territories. Now, Sir, I could not listen to the hon. gentlemen opposite without feeling that the failure to construct these branch lines was not the fault of the Government. It was not the fault of this Government; it was the fault of hon, gentlemen opposite. They, and they alone, have done everything to depreciate the value of the North-West lands, either by their own newspapers or by advertising the Kansas country, or by the Farmers' Union; and you, Mr. Speaker, know as well as I do, that the Farmers' Union is nothing else than a political organisation, the heads of which were friends, intimate friends and inspired friends, of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WATSON. The hon, gentleman said he could not sit still and listen to the statements made on this side of the House. I was a little surprised to hear that statement by the hon, member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). He has further stated that the reason why branch lines of railway could not be built in that country was because there was only one road out of the country, and that controlled by one company; and thus the local companies had to deal with the Canadian Pacific Railway to get an outlet; and that was one of the reasons why they had not been able to build the road with the land grants already received. The hon. gentleman went on to denounce the monopoly, and he also stated that the Opposition had decried the country in the past, and that was one of the reason of its failure. Now, we have not to go far back to find out what that hon, gentleman's opinion was as to why railways were not constructed in Manitoba. I had the honor of introducing a Bill in this House, asking for a chartor to build a railway from Portage la Prairie to the Lake of the Woods. The han gentleman opposed that Bill in the committee—it was not discussed in the House on the ground that (and it must be remembered that the line went from one end of his constituency to the other) it was not worth while building a railway through that part of the country, as that part of the Province was no good. He now rises and states that the Opposition have decried the country, and that is one of the reasons why local companies could not build the roads. I have some knowledge of the reasons why the local companies have not been able to build the railways. The principle reason is that the Government have invariably disallowed charters granted by the Local Legislature. I also recollect that the hon. member for Provencher made statements with respect to the branch lines and the disallowance of local charters. The charter of the Emerson and North-Western Railway was disallowed by this Government, and that line was to run through the hon, gentleman's constituency. That company, which was building the road without a land grant, had graded 15 miles, but they were not allowed to put iron on it, because the charter was disallowed by this Government; and the reason given by the Minister of Justice was that it interfered with the spirit of the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We have been laboring under this difficulty in the North-West, that we have not known whether railway charters granted by the Local Legislature were within the spirit of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract or not. But when the contract was let the First Minister said that Manitoba would have a right to grant railway charters, that they could not check Manitoba, that the rights of the Province would not be interfered with. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) rose and explained different reasons why Manitoba could not be interfered with, and that this Parliament had no right to interfere, except in regard to the territory west of Manitoba. We find, later, that the reasons given for not granting that charter to the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway Company was because it would interfere with clause 15 of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. So the people of Manitoba have, from time to time, been put off with different reasons why they should not build railways detrimental to one grand and great monopoly. I can give the reason why the companies were not able to build the railways with the land grant they were to receive, of 3,400 acres per mile, and why the lands have depreciated in value. It is on account of the monopoly maintained in that country in railways. There is no country, as has been truly said by the hon. member for Provencher, where the people care about building branch lines when those lines have to make terms with the main line, because there is not the same profit from carrying trade on branch lines as there is on through traffic. We all know that, from our experience with respect to railway company's. When the charter was granted by the Local Legislature to the Manitoba and North-Western, it was expected by the people of the Province and of the North-West that the road was to be continued from Portage la Prairie, in a south-easterly direction, and connect with the Emerson and North-Western, the charter for which is disallowed. The Manitoba and North-Western has had an up-hill experience in the building of the road they have built. I am not finding fault with the terms the Government propose to grant to those local roads. The country must have railways; it cannot be developed without them. I am only glad that the Government has seen fit to come down with this liberal proposition, while at the same time I am sorry that it should be necessary to do so to enable the railways to be built. I, with the leader of the Opposition, hold that in these resolutions there should be some mention made of the terms on which the land grants would be received. I believe those grants should be made on conditions of settlement, and only so. In each case it is a large grant, and it is a free grant of land. It can be sold at a price which, while it will amply repay the company, will West, appeared in the columns of that journal from day to 807 place it within the means of settlers to purchase. I suppose this question of disallowance will come up again, and so it is not necessary to occupy much time in discussing it now. As the hon. member for Provencher referred to the railway policy of the late Administration, I may say that they also had a monopoly, that they would not allow roads to be built within a certain distance of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government, however, had it in their power to change their policy at any time. The present Government has not the power, according to the interpretation of some members opposite, to change the policy; they are bound by a solemn contract not to change it for twenty years. At first it was claimed that the Dominion Government had not the power to disallow provincial railway charters; next, charters were disallowed because they were not in the spirit of the contract, and now it is claimed that those charters must be disallowed. If it was not for the disallowance of the local charters, and the fact that there would be no connection, except with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, railways would be built in Manitoba without receiving any land grants whatever. It will pay any company to build a line through a fertile country, such as is Manitoba, when the road can be cheaply built; but when local companies have to make terms with the company that possesses the only outlet, it is not possible that such lines would be built, even with land grants.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, member for Provencher, in opening his remarks, criticising the statements made by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), took the ground that a great difference existed between the causes of the development of the country to the west of the Mississippi and the country in our own North-West, and he urged, as one of the principal differences, the fact that the people in the Western Sates enjoy independence.

Mr. ROYAL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I stated two causes, and I dwelt on the second cause—on the constitution and patriotism of the two parties in the States, compared with the constitution and patriotism of the two parties in this country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman, however, distinctly alluded to the fact that the inhabitants of the Western States of the United States enjoyed independence. Well, Sir, they do not enjoy any greater degree of independence than we do in British North America, and so far as any difference in the two systems of Government exists, I do not believe the American people have any advantage over us. They have not, at any rate, a better Government than ours; it is not recognised by the people of the world, or by the American people themselves, as being in any material respect a better Government. The hon. gentleman went on to say that they had not only the advantage of an independent system of Government, but that the people of the United States had not decried their own country, or the Government, or the character of their country, as a field for immigration. Well, Sir, so far as my knowledge of the United States goes, the people of that country have, in all past times, criticised fully and keenly the policy of that Government. The policy of the Government of the United States, in relation to its public lands, with regard to every feature pertaining to its fiscal system and its land system, have been fully and freely criticised in that country as fully and as freely as kindred topics have been in our own. Sir, there has been no attempt made by the Opposition in this country to decry the North-West. The advantages of the North-West have been more fully set before the people of Canada by the chief organ of the Opposition than by all the organs of the Government party. The Globe newspaper, two or three years ago, under the energetic action of its then news editor, sent to the North-West a correspondent, whose letters, giving a full and favorable description of the Northday, for many weeks, and those letters had more effect in world the advantages of the North-West than all the measures resorted to by those on the Government side.

Upon our shoulders are laid the sins which are attributable to the Government. The difficulty with the North-West is not the criticisms of the Opposition, not that the Opposition has decried that country, but the policy of the Government with regard to the land regulations, the holding of lands at a higher rate than they were held in the United States, the placing of inducements for immigrants to go there on a lower scale than in the United States. While the United States offered him a homestead wherever he could find public land, the homestead grants in the North-West were restricted to only a portion of the public domain, while the whole public domain of the United States was open to the settler. Then, in the North-West the cheapest lands were held at 75 cents per in the United States for acre, higher than lands which were more accessible, and the natural result was, that the immigrant stopped where the cheapest lands were, instead of going on to those lands which possessed no greater fertility and where there were no better markets. Then, lands were granted to colonisation companies at half the price of those same lands to the settler; they were sold on credit instead of cash, and this was another cause for discontent. Then, the Government organised a monopoly in relation to transportation, and placed the whole country in the grasp of an iron monopoly which charged the settler whatever rates it pleased. If the settler had a choice between Dakota, on the one side, and Manitoba and the North-West, on the other, he found, on one side, that there was competition in railway rates, to bring in supplies and take out the produce of his farm, that his agricultural implements could be bought in Dakota free from an import duty of 35 per cent., that his lumber could be bought cheaper, and in consequence of these advantages, resulting from the wise and more liberal policy on the part of the United States, it was natural that the settler should remain in Dakota; and still the fact that he did remain there was charged to the Opposition as one of its sins, when it was directly due to the acts of the Government of this country. The hon, gentleman alleges that the Farmers' Union decried the quality of The hon, gentleman the land in the North-West. The Farmers' Union did nothing of the kind. It is an organisation of the farmers of that country for the purpose of securing their rights, of opposing the monopolies placed upon them, of rectifying the evils under which they labor, of protesting against the outrageous duties imposed on the implements they wish to import. The hon, gentleman alludes to the monopoly clause, and he tells us that without that monopoly clause no company could have been found who would have undertaken the construction of that road. Is that so? Has the hon. gentleman any reason or right to make that assertion? Within four weeks of the time the contract was made public, was there not a company organised and an offer made by a responsible company to build the road without the monopoly clause, and with a less subsidy in land and cash?

Mr. MITCHELL. A bogus offer.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was it a bogus offer that was made, when they placed in the hands of the Receiver General of Canada $600,000 in eash, more than the security which was taken from the Syndicate, after the contract was ratified? If it was a bogus offer, why did not the Government rake in that $1,600,000 of money which was placed in the hands of the Receiver General of the Dominion? Sir, it is an insult to the intelligence of the House and the intelligence of the country to characterise that company as a bogus company. If I had a list of the names of the members of that company I could show that they were men of the greatest weight and respectability. There was that exists for the adoption of the policy the Government Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. Alexander Gibson, from the hon. gentleman's own placing before the people of Canada and the people of the Province, and other gentlemen, who, in their own right, possessed capital and means enough to build that road without aid from the Government, and the hon. gentleman calls them a bogus company.

Mr. MITCHELL. I repeat it.

Mr. CHARLTON. It was not a bogus company, but a bond fide company, able to carry out their offer to the Government, and as an evidence of their ability they made a deposit with the Government of $600,000 more than the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate were required to deposit before the ratification of the contract, and more than they deposited after it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was bogus, all the same, and you know it.

Mr. CHARLTON. If either is a bogus company it is the one which has twice failed to carry out its contract. It is the company which, after contracting to build that road for a subsidy of $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land, and 700 miles of railway built and handed over to them free of cost-after making this contract to build the main line, failed in their conditions and came down to Parliament asking for $30,000,000 more, and they are about to come down and ask for another re-arrangement of terms, and $5,000,000 more. That is the bogus company, and if the Government had, in accordance with their duty, advertised for tenders, and given the contract for the construction of that road to the lowest tender, that contract would have been given to the second syndicate, whose security was put up, and if they had done so the country would have been saved at least $35,000,000, in addition to three millions saved in the cash subsidy and three million acres of land. So much for the assertion that no company could have been found to build that road without the monopoly clause. Sir, a company was found to build that road without a monopoly clause, within one month of the time the contract was laid upon the Table of the House.

So all these difficulties in relation to the North-West which are traceable to the sins of omission and commission on the part of the Government are industri-ously charged by them to the Opposition of the day in this House. The First Minister, in the course of his remarks, informed us that the Government had absolute control over the tariff rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, Sir, they have control, within certain limits. They have control when the earnings of the road amount to more than 10 per cent. of its capital. That is the extent of its control, and how did they proceed to retain their control over that road. When the contract was made the capital of the company was to be $25,000,000. And before this House or the country was consulted the company had been granted permission by the Government to increase that capital four-fold—from $25,000,000 to $100,000,000; or, in other words, the Government made an arrangement by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was to be allowed to increase its net earnings from $2,500,000 to $10,000,000 before the Government could interfere with the freight charges of that company. Was that an honest arrangement? Every man in this House knows that it was not. Every man in this House knows that the increased capital was not to represent bond fide investment, but that perhaps 60 or 70 per cent. would represent water. By means of the manipulation that company was about to engage in, it was to be enabled, on an actual increase of its investment by a comparatively small sum, to declare a net dividend of at least $7,000,000 a year on what was no investment at all, except a fictitious propose with reference to subidising railways is that it is impossible, in the foreign money markets, to borrow money on railway securities at all. I admit that such is the case; and I assert that the hon. gentleman and his Government have been greater sinners than anybody else on this continent in producing this result. This result is due to the fact that the railway corporations of North America, in nine cases out of ten, have been dishonestly managed—that the common stock of these railways, on the average, is at least one-half water, as statistics show was the case one year ago-representing nothing but the stealings of the managers; and the hon, gentleman himself has been help ing to play that game, by permitting a company under his control to water its stock to the extent of six tenths, if not seven-tenths of the whole. For the reason that the Canadian Pacific Railway and all the other railway corporations of North America have been managed in such a way as to create a great issue of common stock in the hands of manipulators, which cost them less than one half of its nominal value, and because of other sins in connection with railway construction in the United States and Canada, the railway securities of this continent will not be touched by the capitalists of Europe.

In regard to the proposed grants, I do not know that any criticism has been made adverse to them. It may be a question whether the grants need be quite as large as they are. I believe the average grants to American railways, under the land grant system of the United States, has been only about 4,800 acres per mile; and it has been admitted that in the great majority of cases the grants have been far in excess of the actual necessities of the roads. It may be that these grants are not too great; it may be that they are; that is a question to be discussed when we get into committee. With regard to the criticisms indulged in with reference to the Colonisation Railway Bill, introduced in 1878, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I wish to say a 1ew words. If you compare that Bill with the measure before the House the comparison will be greatly in favor of the former. That Bill made careful provision against the formation of worthless companies. Any company incorporated under that measure was required to have a capital stock of $12,000 per mile, and before it could commence operations 10 per cent. of that stock had to be paid up. The land grants to be made to such companies-10 sections in the portion of the North-West nearest to Manitoba, and, in Manitoba, 12 sections west of the 102nd meridian, and 20 sections in the Peace River valley—were not excessive; and they were coupled with this condition, that the Government might retain in its own hands the control of those lands, was to sell them itself, and that the maximum sum that any railway company could obtain from the proceeds was $10,000 a mile. Then, with regard to the condition as to restricting the construction of parallel and competing lines, the 18th section of that Act

"No company shall be incorporated under the provisions of this Act for the construction of any railway having the same general direction as the Canadian Pacifi: Railway, or any branch thereof, at a nearer mean distance than 40 miles."

That is, no company could derive from the Government any land grant to the extent of $10,000 a mile for the construction of a line within a mean distance of 40 miles from the main line or any of its branches; but there was nothing in that Act to prohibit any company from constructing a line out of its own resources within 40 miles. It merely provided that the Government would not aid any such line by a land grant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, no; it said no company should be incorporated under that Act.

Mr. CHARLTON. That Act provided for the incorporation of companies receiving Government aid, and it provided that no company should receive Government aid main line or branches, could receive. The Bill of the hon.

that constructed a line within forty miles of the main line or any of its branches.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the most obvious interpretation of the Bill; but there is nothing in that Bill to prevent the granting of a charter for the building of a road anywhere in the North-West without asking for a land grant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite a mistake. Mr. CHARLTON. Then the Bill has a provision prohibiting the construction of lines running parallel with the main line or its branches. An outlet to the south would not be secured by building a line parallel to the south-west. A line which would connect with other lines, and which would secure competition in the North-West, would be one that did not run parallel with the main line or its branches. It would be one running south or southeasterly, while the general course of the main line would be west or north-westerly; so that that Bill offered no obstacle for the construction of any line connecting with any American line, in order to secure competition in rates. The Bill raised no impediment in the way of the construction of lines to the south or the south-east; the Bill raised no impediment to the construction of lines anywhere or in any direction, except that it provided that no line built within 40 miles of the mentioned line or branches could receive, under that Act, Government aid. So much for that provision. That Act is frequently referred to. If the Government of the day had never been guilty of railway legislation more inimical to the interests of the country than that, we would have very little to criticise in their conduct. The Railway Colonization Bill, introduced by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), was a measure which, if it had become law and had been acted upon, would have secured the speedy development of the North-West, without injury to the interests of the country. What has been the case under the operation of that contract, which I hold in my hand, passed in 1881. Compare the restrictions contained in that Bill, with regard to the construction of lines parallel to the Manitoba line or its branches, with the provisions of the Bill incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway. By section 15 of that Bill it is provided:

"That after 20 years from the date hereof no line of railway shall be authorised by the Dominion Parliament to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from any point at or near the Uanadian Pacific Railway, except such lines as shall run south-west or to the westward of south-west, nor to within 15 miles of latitude 49, and in the event of any new Province being established in the North-West Territories, provision shall be made for the continuance of such provisions after such establishment, until the expiration of such period."

There was nothing in that Colonisation Railway. Bill to prohibit the building of any branch line that received aid from the Government beyond 15 miles from the American line. Any branch road built under the provisions of that Act might run to the American line; any company could apply, and there was nothing in the Act to prevent it from securing a charter for building a road from any part of Manitoba to the American line, or to interfere with the securing of railway connection with the Northern Pacific, or any other railway line, or to interfere with the building of any line within 10, 15 or 20 miles of the main Canadian Pacific Railway line, or any branch, except that a line built within 40 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway or branches could not apply for the land grant. The Bill offered no impediment to the development of the North-West, or to the The Bill offered no impedisecuring railway connection with the American lines by roads running to the south or south-west, or to the building of railways anywhere, except that no railway companies applying for charters could receive Government aid in land, which roads, at a distance greater than 40 miles from the member for Bothwell is a Bill which will stand any amount of criticism, if its provisions are fairly stated.

An hon. MEMBER. Why did you not pass it?

Mr. CHARLTON. We are not debating whether it was passed, but we are debating the provisions of the Bill upon its merits, as it has been compared with other measures, and the Bill upon its merits will compare with any Bill this Legislature has passed.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We have wandered a good deal from the general subject before the House, and I do not propose to follow the hon, gentleman in much of the matter to which he has referred. The question as to whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have properly fulfilled their contract, or whether they have failed to do it, in the terms originally arranged, is a matter which will be considered, no doubt, when the question comes up on the railway resolutions, of which notice has been given by the First Minister. The question which seems to me to have come before the House, with some degree of prominence, is: What was the policy of the late Administration with reference to protecting the Canadian Pacific Railway from competition? The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Charlton) takes the ground that the Act introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell, when Minister of the Interior, did not in any way prevent any railway from being built to the boundary. The question as to what was in the contemplation of the Government at that time will, perhaps, better be ascertained from the legislation that actually took place. In 1872 a number of railway charters, some three, I think, were granted to gentlemen for the purpose of building railways to connect the United States with Winnipeg and with the Red River country in our territory; and it is a curious fact that in every one of those Acts, and in the one, for instance, in which Mr. Donald McInnes, of Hamilton, Mr. Donald A. Smith, and Mr. George Stephens, of Montreal, and others, were incorporated to build a railway from the boundary to Winnipeg, the concluding clause is in these words:

"The foregoing sections and provisions of this Act shall have force and effect from and after the day which may be appointed for that purpose by proclamation issued under the Order of the Governor in Council, and not before."

You will find, in no other charters granted by this Parliament for the construction of railways, the power reserved to the Governor in Council to bring the Act into operation; the Act comes into operation by the fact of its passing Parliament; but, in these particular cases, in 1872, when the question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was then in its initial stages, it was felt desirable by Parliament, even at that early stage, that provision should be made to protect the railway from possible competition, and to secure that when it was built the capitalists engaged in constructing it would, at least, have the guarantee of immunity from undue competition. Hon, gentlemen opposite came into office a year after. During the five years they were in office not one of those Acts was brought into operation by the issue of a proclamation under Order of the Governor in Council. Nay, more than that, I have reason to know-from statements of Mr. George Stephen and Mr. Donald Smith—that application was made by those gentlemen to the ex-First Minister (Mr. Mackenzie), who was Minister of Public Works, to bring that Act into operation, and he distinctly refused, upon the ground which he sustained afterwards in the Railway Committee, in 1879, that he would not permit connection of independent lines through that north-western country with the American system, reserving to the Canadian Pacific Railway, then a Government road, being constructed by the Government, although with the presence on the Statute Book of an Act of Parliament to authorise the granting of a charter to a company for its construction, that exclusive right. He was deter-Mr. CHARLTON.

American competition. It was in precise accordance and in complete sympathy with the policy thus acted upon by the Government in their refusal to bring into operation the Acts of incorporation passed in 1872, to connect Manitoba and the North-West with American railways, that the clauses were put into this Bill, introduced by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), to protect the Canadian Pacific Railway from competition, by saying no railways should be chartered under that Act which came within 40 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said that only referred to railways receiving grants from the Government. That is quite true. It was open to Parliament, if Parliament so determined, to grant a charter to any independent company, but if a company was chartered under that Act, which was supposed to be the Act to make provision for the construction of railways through the North-West, beyond and outside the Canadian Pacific Railway, no charter under that Act could possibly be given for the constrction of railways coming into competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With or without subsidy.

Mr. WHITE Certainly, because this charter was for railways to which subsidies were given, but it provided the means, first, for an easy incorporation of railway companies, and next for the subsidising of railway companies. Then the hon gentleman tells us that special care was taken by the Government or by the hon. member who introduced the Bill to secure that the lands which were given should be properly opened for settlement and should continue within the control of the Government. The hon. gentleman has not quite accurately stated the terms of the Act. The Act, it is true, gave the Government the power, if it thought proper, by Order in Council, to substitute a $10,000 subsidy per mile for the subsidy in land, but it gave to the Government the power to do either the one or the other, and everyone knows that, in the estimation in which the lands were held at that time, hon. gentlemen opposite, giving their 50,000,000 acres of land, and retaining that upon the Statute Book, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, if the lands given to the railways could have secured their constructhe feeling tion, was that a good bargain was made for the country. But what further did they do in that Act? So little careful where they for the settlers who might have settled there that they actually provided in the Bill that if a settler happened to find himself settled within what would be the railway belt of some railway company of that kind, his homestead was to be reduced from 160 acres to 80 acres, and if he was an actual settler he was only then to have the right to purchase a pre-emption to the extent of 80 acres, and the pre-emption was abolished altogether within the railway belt, except in the cases I have mentioned. More than that, they provided that if a settler happened to have taken up a lot which turned out to be in the locality where a railway station was to be, and where the probability was that a town or village would arise, he was to be dispossessed of his lot, he was to be driven from his land, and was to be given land elsewhere, and simply paid for the improvements he had made.

Mr. BOWELL. Whether he had effected settlement before the notice was given or not.

Mr. WHITE. Yes; a settler who had actually taken up his lot within the railway belt, if he happened to be in a place which was afterwards set apart for a town or village, was to be sent abroad, and land was to be given to him elsewhere, and he was to be paid for the improvements he had made. That was the carefulness of hon, gentlemen in connection with the settler. There can be no doubt whatever, so far as that measure was concerned, that we would have had substantial grievances in the North-West if it had mined that railway should be protected, if possible, from any | come into force, and we had found settlers who, perhaps, had made substantial improvements and had made homosteads for themselves turned off, because it was the sweet pleasure of the railway company and the Government combined to make a railway station, and consequently a village, where the men's property happened to be. But, after commencing with a great eulogy of this country, of the independent character and the excellence of its Government as compared with that on the other side of the line, the hon. gentleman drifted, as is his wont, into a statement of how much better the people are off on the other side, in Dakota and Minnesota, and how natural it was that people should prefer to be there rather than to remain with us. And he put it on two grounds; first, because of the terrible monopolies imposed upon the people of Manitoba and the North-West by this particular clause of the railway charter, which duty is called the monopoly clause; and secondly, because of the other impositions, referring particularly to the duty upon agricultural implements. As to the latter point, I find that at a meeting of the Board of Trade in the city of Montreal, Mr. Wolferstan Thomas, who will be recognised by hon. gentlemen opposite as a pronounced Liberal, though I will do him the justice to say that he is a gentleman who does not obtrude his politics upon people, who attends to his business as a banker, but who is a very pronounced Liberal, submitted a letter he had received from certain manufacturers of agricultural implements in Canada, in which they say:

"For your information we desire humbly to lay before you the following facts:—Immediately prior to raising the tariff, immense quantities of American implements were rushed into Manitona, in some cases sufficient to supply the country for several years. We, as Canadian manufacturers, are suffering from the undue competition created by this surplus stock, for ever since the raising of the tariff farm implements are cheaper in Manitoba than they are in Ontario."

That is the practical result, and there is not a man who knows anything about Manitoba, who has examined the price list of implements in Manitoba, who does not know that the farmers there have had their implements just as cheap as before the tariff was introduced, in spite of the increase of the tariff, the difference being that the manufacturers of Ontario have been able to secure the market instead of the manfacturers of the Western States. Then the hon, gentleman tells us of the terrible burdens imposed upon the people of the North-West in consequence of the excessive charges of this terrible monopoly as compared with the charges in the United States. Does he know that last year the price of wheat along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was, on an average, 10 cents more than along the line of the Northern Pacific? Does he know that the tariff charges were very much less than they were on the Northern Pacific, and that farmers in Minnesota actually carried their wheat into Manitoba, paid the 15 cents a bushel, and went back with 4 cents a bushel more than they would have had if they had sold it on their own side of the line? Are these the burdens the hon, gentleman tells us the people of the North-West and of Manitoba are laboring under? No; he prefers to send forth from this Parliament, with the responsibility of his position as a member of this House, and with whatever authority may attach to an utterance of an hon. gentleman having a seat in Parliament, to send forth now, at the commencement of this immigration season, when people are coming into the country and when some are in the country, making up their minds whether they will go to our own North-West or to the American North-West, a statement that it is a natural thing for people to go to Minnesota and Dakota, because they were better off, and are under less burdens as to railway monopoly and competition than they are here. The hon, gentleman ought to know, if he does not, that so far as the experience of the Canadian Pacific Railway, up to this time, is concerned, the people of the North-West have suffered nothing from that so-called monopoly understood him to ask me, amongst other gentlemen who clause, while the people of Canada have gained, as the result of it, the construction of the line which to-day connects the Eastern Provinces with those western territories, within a period which, I venture to say, the most sanguine man in Canada, when that charter was given, did not hope would have been realised. We owe that to the wise policy of this Government in acting, not by the exact terms of the charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but within the spirit of that charter, in disallowing Acts which, if they had gone into effect, though I doubt every much if the roads would ever have been built, might, at any rate, have jeopardised the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway in securing the trade of that country over their whole system. As the result of that wise policy we have secured the construction of that railway, and there is not a man in Canada to day, who will for the moment sink his political feeling and remember only the interests of this great country, but will say that it is a matter of which Canadians from one end of the Dominion to the other should be proud, that to day, as the result of the policy of this Government, he can go from Halifax right into the Rocky Mountains, and, before this year is over, on to the Pacific coast, by a railway on Canadian territory, and with the assurance that we have one of the best railways on this North American continent. As to this policy to-day, it is a policy which will increase and develop the resources of the country in the North-West. One of the railways which is referred to here is the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. That is a railway which, if the statements of hon. gentleman were true, ought to have been built. It goes through what is really the very best part of that country. It goes along the line of the old trail, through increasing settlements, a line which was selected by hon. gentlemen opposite for the Canadian Pacific Railway. And yet, with all the advantages of prosperous settlements to be reached by it, with all the advantage of its going through a country that is not excelled by any part of the North-West, and with a subsidy of 6,000 acres per mile, at $1 per acre, the company have not been able to secure capital for the construction of that railway. Surely there has been no question of a monopoly clause to prevent that.

Mr. WATSON. Yes, there has. The Emerson and North-Western Railway was a connection of the Manitoba and North-Western at St. Vincent.

Mr. WHITE. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Emerson and North-Western Railway was a connection, possibly; but the hon. gentleman will not pretend to tell me that a road running through that country to Prince Albert, and ultimately farther westward, does not go through a country that ought to be able to sustain a railway. If the hon, gentleman pretends to say that that road could only be constructed on condition that the trade of that whole country should be made tributary to American railways, to American merchants, forwarders and business men, instead of being tributary to Canadian railways and Canadian business men, he will find no man in Canada, having business interests in the country, who will agree with him. That railway, if built, will develop the most important part of the country, and I think we have reason to congratulate ourselves that the policy which is now proposed, wisely supplementing, as it does, the policy by which the Canadian Pacific Railway has been so successfully carried almost to completion, will secure for that north-western country a prosperity such as none of us, a few years ago, ventured to hope would dawn upon it at so early a date.

Mr. MITCHELL. I regret I was not in the House at the commencement of the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I am not quite sure to what extent he challenged the statements which I appear to have made some years ago, in the discussion of his Bill. But I spoke on the Bill referred to, when it was under discussion here, whether I held the same views to-day that I did then. Sir, I have referred to the report of the speech made by myself on that occasion. I have read it over carefully, and there is not a single statement in that speech, made in 1873, that I am not prepared to-day to endorse, and at the same time to sustain the Bill before the House. Sir, what was the position assumed by the hon, gentleman on that occasion, in introducing his Bill? It was for the wholesale distribution of the lands in the North-West into vast monopolies, nominally for the purpose of building railways, but which, practically, would not have built one. Sir. he endeavored to create the idea that the $10,000 worth of land per mile which he proposed to give would build a railway at that time. Why, Sir, it would not have begun to build railways; it has not begun to build railways to-day, as we have found from experience. The hon, gentleman challenges the statements I made on that occasion, and I answered him in this way:

—"He did not know what the opinions of gentlemen from Ontario and Quebee might be, nor did he care. He had one thing to do, and that was his duty. His duty in this case he conceived to be to call the attention of Parliament to the proposed spoliation of western land. It would tion of Parliament to the proposed spoliation of western land. It would be unjust to the other Provinces to pass an Act like this, which would enable railway speculators and companies to absorb three-fourths of the whole western territory—that territory on which they hoped to construct the great Canadian Pacific road. He yielded to no one in the desire to benefit the North-West, but he certainly could not approve of an Act such as that now before the House. He could not believe in a scheme which would enable speculators to absorb millions of acres of land, with which it was hoped the country might be recouped for the money it was now spending in opening up that great territory. They had a right to expect something better from the Government than that. If the Administration really desired to oven up the country, by all means let Administration really desired to open up the country, by all means let them do so; but why should they, by legislation of this kind, embarrass the resources of the country in a way which could never be retrieved." Then, Sir, I went on to say:

"Let him state the practical objections to the Bill. He believed that under this Bill any number of speculators might, by complying with certain requirements, construct from one to twenty railways, thus absorbing hundreds of thousands of acres of land. When the Grand Trunk Railway Company came, the other day, asking the privilege to connect with several other railways, and when the Canada Southern Railway came asking privileges—what did his hon. friend from Chateauguay say? No man guarded the liberties, rights and privileges more than he, where enormous powers were asked; and when these two railways came before the House, none were more careful of their privileges, or more zealous than his hon friend. He (Mr. Mitchell) was very much pleased to see the great amount of caution the hon. member exhibited in endeavoring to prevent the railway companies getting the powers for general purposes which they sought."

The late member for Chateauguay, Mr. Holton, said, on that occasion :

"Let us give them what is absolutely necessary for the purpose. Whenever they want anything further in the way of legislation let them come and ask it, and if it is right we will give it them."

Now, Sir, the point I make in the matter is this: that while he proposed to give this enormous wholesale grant, extending over the whole territory, giving them at one fell swoop possession of the whole north-western country, which we had bought and paid for with the people's money, I was not opposed, and I never have been opposed, and I am not opposed now, to giving proper and substantial aid to any necessary railway that it is desired to construct in that north-western country. The point taken by the late lamented member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) on the occasion to which I refer was this: that if railway companies come to this Parliament seeking aid, we should consider every application upon its merits, but not give it general powers to absorb other railways, which system has been the curse of this country—and we have an illustration of that in the monster corporation, the Grand Trunk Railway Company. The policy which this House ought to have pursued, the policy which this Government should pursue, is, that whenever applications are made for aid from Mr. MITCHELL.

in this House; take up each of these Bills and discuss them upon the merits; and if the railway is entitled to aid, if the location is satisfactory, and if the railway is to give facilities to the population and a large measure of accommodation to the public, then let us give that company such aid as is necessary. But do not let us do what the hon. member for Bothwell asked us to do by his Bill, and pass a measure to lay the whole country under contribution to a band of railway speculators. Sir, I will read a little more of the speech to which my hon friend has chosen to refer, and which he challenged at the time:

"He should have said to them: 'You are going to make thousands of miles of railway under that Bill, if there is land enough; you are going to let the whole of that territory be absorbed by private speculators. As his hon friend from Marquette had said, two lines of railway were certainly needed."

That gentleman was not the present member for Marquette, but the present Judge Ryan. Is there anything to indicate that my opinions have changed? Is there any portion of the speech which negatives the idea that I have been in favor of rendering aid, all necessary aid, to railways in the North-West. The hon, gentleman nods his head, implying yes. I challenge him to point out in what respect I held opinions then that I do not entertain now, and I will prove to him that my opinions now are consistent with my speech in 1878, and I may say that I will support this measure. The hon, gentleman again shakes his head. I will read some extracts from my speech in that year, and I will ask him to point out any portions of it that are inconsistent with my position to-day:

Well, if application were made to that House for the necessary "Well, if application were male to that House for the necessary thousands of acres for the construction of these roads, he would be ready to give all possible aid; but a Bill like this, which gave power to private speculators to absorb the whole territory, was one of the most outragsons measures he had ever heard come before Parliament. He was astonished that the hon Minister of the Interior should have dared to propound a scheme of this character, so extreme in its powers. A greater injustice to the other parts of the Dominion than the measure proposed no man could conceive. He was not going to take up the time of the House very long in discussing this matter, but he wished to call the attention of hon. members representing the Eastern Provinces of Canada to the increased texation which would be placed upon their districts by the proposed measure. While he approved of money being expended for the opening up and improvement of Manitoba, he was not prepared to give up that magnificent country to private individuals, for party purposes and for party plunder. He would tell hon gentlemen on the other side of the House that while he was prepared to entertain any fair and just claim which might be made, he would not submit to any such scheme of spoliation in the North-West as that which was intended. Throughout the whole Dominion, every scheme should be dealt with on its own merits, and if it was found that the one or two railways referred to by the hon. member for Marquette were really required, he would see willing that the House should grant a charter for the undertakings, besides giving subsidies in money or land to secure them. He would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to consider the proposition he had just made, and then say whether they would take upon themselves the responsibility of this measure when they went back to their constituents next summer. The Minister of the Interior had said, had hon. members on the Opposition side looked unfavorably upon any railway connection with the American Republic; but hon gen thousands of acres for the construction of these roads, he would be ready railway connection with the American Republic; but hon gentlemen opposite had always been anxious, not only to have railway connections with the United States, but to maintain business, social and national relations with those on the other side of the line. His hon, friend had done the members of the Opposition an injustice when he made that statement. If the hon, gentleman would withdraw his Bill, and introduce a special measure giving powers to the two prodes protein of by the statement. If the hon, gentleman would withdraw his Bill, and introduce a special measure, giving powers to the two roads spoken of by the hon. member for Marquette, he would have his (Mr. Mitchell's) support. He would also agree to grant lands outside those lines, but he should certainly endeavor to record his vote against the Bill introduced by the Minister of the Interior. He (Mr. Mitchell) did not want to say one disrespectful word regarding the people of the North-West. He knew some of the difficulties and hardships they had endured in the settlement of that country; but they must not forget that only a few years had elapsed since they owned any part of that territory at all, it having previouely been under the administration of the Hudson Bay Company. They must not forget that the immense territory outside Manitoba was the heritage of the people of the Dominion of Canada at large. If, on the other hand, they looked upon it as the property of Manitoba alone, then do not let them ask Parliament to impose laws on the other Provinces in order that money might be squandered in the construction of pursue, is, that whenever applications are made for aid from the public funds to build a railway, this Parliament should consider each individual case on its merits, and deal with it; do as you are doing with the company under consideration if its to buy the country, then to spend millions in improvements, and then find their lands given away. He wished to call attention to one or two sections of this Bill, which seemed to him as rather of an extraor-dinary character."

I then quoted the sections, and continued:

"That really provided for the giving away of the very lands required for the construction of the Pacific road, and that not more than ninetenths—such was the enormous extent of the provision—should be paid out of the proceeds of land sales till the road was in operation. Now, what did that mean? It meant that those lands were considered of sufficient value to pay for the construction of these roads. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan), speaking of the progress made by railroads in Illiaois, said that the road was finished and paid for while one-half of the lands were left to the credit of the road. Parliament ought not therefore, to give away that valuable land in Manitoba in so reckless a manner."

The hon, member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan) corrected me, and I went on to explain:

"But, if this Bill came into operation, if the hon, gentleman was able to induce this House to pass it, and he (Mr. Mitchell) was afraid that he would, he had seen such a subservient following, all this would be changed. There was in that Bill the germs of the absorption of the whole North-West country, and they would not have a twentieth part left wherewith to build their Pacific Railway. The result would be, that the land having been absorbed, the railway would not be built. What would the Eastern Provinces say to such a measure? Would his hon, friends on the other side say they could justify such a course to their constituents; that their constituents would appreciate a measure like this, committing an act of spoliation over the entire country? Who had contributed to the purchase of that country; who had paid the Hudson Bay Company for it? The people. But they paid the money to have the country opened up and developed, and not to be given away in this wholesale manner. If the lands of the North-West were to be used in building railroads, and he approved of such a policy, then this section of Canada was entitled to a fair share thereof for their local railroads, such, for example, as the Miramichi Valley road. The people of old Canada bought the North-West and were taxed to pay to improve it, and they had a right to appropriate a share of the lands to promote the construction of roads in the East as well as in the West..."

The hon, gentleman has challenged me in regard to the

The hon, gentleman has challenged me in regard to the statements I made seven years ago, when speaking on the subject of North-West railways. He has asked me if I am still of the same opinion to-day as I was then, and he has challenged several other hon, gentlemen in like man-They can speak for themselves. For myself, I tell the hon, gentleman that I am now, as I was then, in favor of the principles contained in this Bill, and for the reasons I gave on that occasion; that I am to day in favor of granting all necessary aid to the development of the North-West; that I was an advocate of the purchase of the country, that I was one of those who aided in securing it, and I have always been ready to give my vote to projects for opening up the North-West. The hon. gentleman should not have challenged my opinion, as stated here, and not have attempted to convey the impression that the sentiments I expressed in that speech were sentiments which would tend to retard the progress of the country, or that I refused to give aid, such as is sought for by the Bill now under consideration. I think I have said sufficient on that point to satisfy the hon, gentleman. I did not intend to be drawn into any discussion on this matter to-night, nor would I have been drawn into it, except for the remarks of the hon, member for Bothwell. But while the remarks of that hon, member were thoroughly respectful and proper, and such as any hon member had a right to use, I must confess that the remarks of another hon. gentleman were not, in my opinion, exactly of the same character. The hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in dealing with this question, has chosen to drag into the discussion of it the whole policy and conduct of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He has chosen to speak of them in a manner—and it is not new to him-that is anything but creditable to a representative in Parliament. It is, perhaps, improprer to refer to what took place on a former occasion, and I am precluded from doing so; but the hon. gentleman's remarks to night, in regard to those gentlemen, were only a little less virulent and a little less reprehensible than were the remarks made by him on an occasion last Session. The hon, gentleman take my letters, I made a visit to the North-West; I never has chosen to assail the conduct of the Government in granting the charter to the present Canadian Pacific Railway Company. He has ventured to assert that another company was prepared to have built the road for less money. Every man in this land knows how that second company was got up; that hon, gentlemen opposite and their friends outside of this House organised and got up that company. For what purpose? They would never have built a mile of the road, and when I challenged it as a bogus company—and I repeat that it was a bogus company—the hon. gentleman has east in my teeth the fact that one of the men associated in that class of men came from my own county, and was, he said, a wealthy and respectable man. He referred to Mr. Alexander Gibson by name. Well, I have the greatest respect for that gentleman; he is one man-I do not know how many more were wealthy and respectable men-who would have tried to have carried out their engagements, but Mr. Gibson was a man of means and honesty, a man who would have tried to carry out any engagement into which he entered—and if they were all men of the energy and standing and means of Mr. Gibson, I would have had more faith in them. But I have reason to know more, perhaps, than hon gentlemen think I know about it; and I have reason to know that that company was got up by that side of the House, and their friends outside of the House, for the very purpose of embarrassing the Government of the day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say, yes. When the hon. gentleman challenges the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a bogus company, he does not know that those gentlemen have spent millions of their own money.

An hon. MEMBER. Where is it?

Mr. MITCHELL. All over the line, extending from here to the Rocky Mountains. The hon gentleman talks about them coming to this Parliament for aid. What is the cause of it? What has compelled them to come? Has it not been that they proceeded with the work in a manner far exceeding the expectations of gentlemen in this House or in the country, both in rapidity and character? Has it not been from the fact that the enterprise has been decried and run down, that their sincerity has been attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite, by their friends outside and the press representing them. Is it not true that they have run down the credit of the country, that they have assailed the character of the North-West, that they have challenged its facilities for settlement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. That they have challenged the value of its lands?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. That they have challenged its future? Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say, yes. I say that their organ, to which the hon, gentleman referred, which they say has done to promote the settlement of that country than all the more Government organs put together, has done so. I do not know how much the Government organs have done, but I can refer to one very recent authority from the Globe, to show how much it has done, not to promote the settlement and character of the North West, but to decry and damage and slander it, and I will read it.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he did not write a series of letters from Dakota, puffing the territory of Dakota as a place for settlement, quite equal and superior to the North-West.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not, and the hon. gentleman can visited the territory of Dakota and I knew nothing about it. I passed through Minnesota to the North-West, and I will let him refer to the pamphet—he will find it in the Library. It is true 1 wrote a series of letters which were subsequently thought worth being thrown together in pamphlet form, as my opinion of the North-West, and I tell him that that pamphlet contained my views of the North-West, and that those views have never been changed, and those views are, that it is one of the finest countries on the continent of America. That is what I said about it. I did not run down Minnesota or Dakota, or the other States; I did not feel that it would be my duty, or that it would be honest to do it. I have a great opinion of Dakota and Minnesota, but I have a much greater opinion of our own North-West Territories. I will read what this paper, which they say has done so much for the country, which has done more than all the organs of the Government put together, has said about the North-West. I know what its power has been. It is a paper which, from its former reputation and standing has exercised a great power, not only on this continent, but on the other, and it is referred to and read and utilised, and extracts quoted from it perhaps more than from any paper in British North America. And yet that paper will put these statements forward, not once but repeatedly, and in a manner which the hon. member for North Norfolk says does so much credit to the country. It is called "The Surprise Policy-Effect of rushing the construction of the Pacific-No settlers beyond Brandon-Not a house to be seen for hundreds of miles-Superiority of the Fleming route." I need not read the whole article, but I will read two short extracts, which will show the animus of

Mr. CHARLTON. Read the whole. No garbled extracts. Mr. MITCHELL. You can read the balance, if you like

"From Moose Jaw to Calgary, 500 miles, the soil was hard clay, and appeared unfit for agricultural purposes. With the exception of those at Medicine Hat, there were no settlers along the line. The experimental farms of the Canadian Pacific Railway looked well, but this was due to entirely exceptional circumstances, chiefly the wet season, the like of which might not occur again for many years. Instead of building the line along with branch roads, so as to settle the old Province of Manitoba, it was rushed on with undue baste by imported labor, chiefly Americans and Mennonites, over this barren waste. Those who were employed on the road, which was constructed at the rate of from three to five miles per day, left as soon as it was built, and the country in these parts is wholly unsettled. This hurried building of the road was generally condemned by all parties in Winnipeg and to the west, irrespective of their political thought. There was no freight traffic on the line, save supplies for the road. The Mounted Police were doing a good work, but there was general dissatisfaction among the Indians, which was daily becoming more intense. All agree that the northern, or Fleming route, which Mr. Mackenzie proposed to follow, would have been of most advantage to the country. For hundreds of miles along the track there is not a house to be seen, and at stations where shops have been erected, they are now empty. Great complaints were being made by settlers in regard to the administration of affairs by the land board." due to entirely exceptional circumstances, chiefly the wet season, the

It is taken from a letter of Sheriff Sweetland, which the Globe parades and quotes from, with a view, I believe, to injure the country.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the date?

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. MITCHELL. August last. The hon. gentleman refers to the fact that the present Canadian Pacific Railway Company was a bogus company. Sir, could a bogus company have done what that company has done in the past five years? Did the most sanguine of us expect, five years ago, that we would be able to start from Halifax and go through British territory and land on the shores of the Pacific. Is there one of us expected that last summer we could have gone, as we did, from the western point of Lake Superior over our own road to the Selkirks? Is there one of us who imagined that to-day, when a crisis arose in the history of the country, which I regret, but which will not, I believe, be an unmixed evil, that we would be able to send our was a desert waste, a section of country most difficult to build a line through, in order to quell that rebellion. And to whom are we indebted for it? Are we indebted alone to the coffers of this country? No, Sir; not alone to that, but to the enterprise and zeal and perseverance and determination of the men who comprise that company, with the aid which a generous public has given to supplement their own means, which enabled them to build a road that is a credit to Canada and the country with which we are connected. I am surprised that the hon, member for Norfolk would dare to call a company of that kind a bogus company—a company which has performed such work, which has done such great public service, which has received the good opinion of the British Government, and, from the great work they have performed, is looked upon as having been the means of cementing the Empire, of strengthening it, and of giving facilities without which she might be in dire distress some day or other. I hope the hon, member will pause before using such language as he has used on this and on former occasions, with reference to the gentlemen composing that company, gentlemen who are honorable in every transaction of their lives, and who have shown an amount of enterprise creditable alike to Canada and themselves, and who are, to-day, as the hon. gentleman knows, largely out of pocket by the enterprise they have now carried nearly to completion.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to one word of explanation. When the hon, gentleman asserted that the second syndicate was a bogus company, I said that if either of these companies could be called a bogus company it was the first, which had failed in the respects I stated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is a little pleasing to find members on the other side of the House rising, at this late day, to take part in public discussion. We have to congratulate ourselves that, at any rate, for one day, Canada has returned to a system of government conducted by open discussions in Parliament, instead of having its measures framed in secret caucus, and forced through Parliament by mere majorities. On this occasion hon, gentlemen opposite find themselves, as too often they find themselves, for their own comfort, in a rather humiliating position; and to-night their defence is the same as it is on all similar occasions. They, of course, are never wrong, never make any mistakes, and always bring forward their propositions at the right time; and if it be pointed out that their proposition is a little late in coming, or that they have failed in their duty in the past, they have the same answer to-night that they have on similar occasions—an answer which may, perhaps, be lacking in absolute accuracy, but which they do not fail to hurl across the floor, and which to them, seems to be a never unfailing answer: Oh, you are unpatriotic; you have decried your country; if the North-West has not been developed as it should be, it is not because the Government have failed in giving proper railway communication; it is because of the unpatriotic course gentlemen opposite, have taken, by their utterances and through their organs. Well, Sir, we have heard that time and again; the country has heard it, but only to treat it as we treat it on this side, with a feeling akin to contempt. The facts are too strong for hon. gentlemen opposite, and when, to-night, they attempt their usual answer, I think, under the circumstances in which we find ourselves, they must be hard driven for an excuse. They blame us that the North-West Territories are not better developed, when we have before us for our consideration some resolutions designed for the benefit of that country; and if the resolutions, in the same direction, which were offered to this Parliament seven or eight years ago, had been carried out at that time, if they had not been burked by hon. gentlemen opposite, but had been carried into effect by them, when troops through a section of country which a short time before they came into power—if we shall have development under this scheme now, what development might we not have had in the North-West under the scheme my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) propounded to this House in 1878. It was on the same line as the present scheme, with this exception, that it was surrounded with safeguards that would cause it to redound more to the interest of the country. Under the system of public grants of land which it contained, it would have resulted in colonisation roads being built throughout the North-West which would have become feeders to a great national highway, the property of the Dominion of Canada, and the profits of which would accrue to the Dominion; but all those advantages have been lost, and years after, when a scheme is propounded to rectify all the negligence hon, gentlemen have displayed during those years, we find ourselves, not in the same circumstances, for the roads to be constructed will be tributary and will be a source of profit to a company that has received resources from this country appalling in their extent. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), it seems to me, was hardly fair in dealing with the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell, when he pointed out that his objection to that scheme was that under it huge colonisation companies would be able to grab immense tracts of territory without building a railway at all. Surely the hon, gentleman must have spoken without knowledge of the provisions of the Bill which my hon, friend from Bothwell proposed to place on the Statute Book. Let me read one of the conditions under which those companies would be incorporated:

"The Governor in Council may, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of any railway to be constructed under the provisions of this Act, reserve every alternate section of ungranted land by odd numbers, to the extent of 10 sections per mile, 5 sections per mile on each side of the line of the railway, exclusive of the sections which, under the Dominion Lands Act, may have been reserved as school sections or may have been allotted to the Hudson's Bay Company; and for any line or part of a line of railway, west of the 102nd meridian of west longitude, 12 sections per mile, and for any line of railway connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway and extending into the Peace River district, 20 sections per mile; and whenever 25 consecutive miles of any portion 20 sections per mile; and whenever 25 consecutive miles of any portion of any railway shall have been completed, equipped and in operation, the Governor in Council may convey to the company the land so reserved, or part thereof, along the said railway, so far as the same is completed, and for each consecutive 10 miles of the remainder of the railway the Governor in Council may, as the same may be completed, convey the lands so reserved along 9 miles thereof to the company."

Yet, with that provision in the Bill, my hon. friend from Northumberland saw the immense danger looming up. The colonisation companies could not get any land until 25 miles of railway were built and equipped; and yet, to make his position good, the hon. gentleman was driven to venture a statement so rash as that. Under the provisions of the Bill of the hon. member for Bothwell there need not be any land given to the company at all. The company had no control of the disposition of any land whatever, for a sub-section of the same section I have read reads thus:

"Should the Governor in Council deem it expedient, instead of conreging lands to the company, the company may be paid the moneys received from the sales of lands on the line of and within 6 miles of such railway, from time to time, until the company shall have received a sum not exceeding $10,000 per mile, after which the company's claims to any further aid from the sale of such lahds shall cesse."

If there was any danger at all, the power was reserved to the Governor in Council, without the consent of the company, to vary the provisions, and give it no land at all, but to sell the lands reserved and give to the company $10,000 a mile, and no more.

Mr. BOWELL. Would that be paid before 25 miles were built, or as it was built?

Mr. PATERSON. After, as I read it.

Mr. BOWELL. I refer to the sub-section. You point out that in one of the sections they shall have the land that not more than 90 per cent. of the value of the actual work done shall be paid out of the proceeds of any of the land sales.

Mr. BOWELL. The question I ask is, whether the Governor in Council, if they adopted the alternative system of giving $10,000 a mile, could not pay it as the work progressed, whether the 25 miles were built or not?

Mr. PATERSON. Ninety per cont. of the work done was to be paid as the work progressed. I should judge so. It was also provided that no agreement made by the Government with any company shall be valid and binding until it shall have laid before the House for one month without being disapproved, unless specially approved by resolution. So that Parliament itsely had the power to declare whether they would approve of any arrangement that might be made with the Government by any company. The Parliament was to be supreme in saying whether it would sanction the contract or not. We cannot, in face of the express declarations of the statute proposed by my hon, friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), hear any more of the danger that we would have colonisation companies grabbing immense tracts of land, while they had not constructed any portion of the railway. That would have been simply impossible, under the provisions of the Act. If that Act had been carried out there would have been general railways constructed throughout that country, lines that were needed by the settlers, lines that were destined to open up the country and facilitate settlement. Who can tell what would have been accomplished in the seven years gone by, while this Government have been bending all their energies—to what? To the building of a great through line, neglecting the opening up of the country, for it is admitted by the very proposition before us that it is impossible to open up that country by the construction of a main line alone. The settlement of the great plains of the North-West require there should be branches running through the country. These would have given the people opportunities of colonising the country, settling upon the lands, they would have kept the settlers closer together than they have been by the steady, rapid construction of one main line, and I hold the introduction of this Bill is an acknowledgment on the part of the Government that this is the only way colonisation can be effected by the Government; yet they have allowed seven years to pass without bringing it into operation, while they have had the mature thought of the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Mills) pointing in the same direction, and a statute on the Statute Book to guide them, if they were unable to produce one for themselves. Now, they propose, what? The lines contemplated by the late Government were colonisation lines, which would be feeders to the main line, and the line would have been a line owned by the Government, the profit of which would go to the Government; but now the profitof the lines will go to the coffers of a company already subsidised by vast sums of money and grants of land. But the question has taken a wide range. The hou member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) gave us to understand it was impossible for him to sit still, but that he must rise to point out how unpatriotic the Opposition had been with reference to the North-West country, and that any failure in the more rapid settlement of the country was due to the speeches of hon, gentlemen on this side, and the arguments or statements that might have appeared in the press. He has shown that that country has not developed as it should have; he knows the people are not there that should be there; he knows that the hon. gentlemen alongside him have been in power, are now in power, charged with the duties of furthering the interests of the country. He recognises the fact that his own friends were in power Mr. PATERSON. If the Government take the alternative which they reserve to themselves, it is provided always be a reason given for the failure, and he has not the courage to lay the failure at the door of those responsible for it. He attempted to lay it upon hon. members on this side, because of their unpatriotic speeches. We have heard enough of that. In the first place, we say to hon. gentlemen opposite that we deny the statements they make -when they make statements with reference to that country being decried by the Opposition. We deny that. I have the right to ask hon gentlemen opposite to come to Why do they rise, day after day, and venture to the proof. say-to make such statements, when they have been challenged for the proof, time and again, and do not offer any proof? Do they think that will redound to their credit? No; when they have been challenged, time and again, to produce proof as to the course they allege hon. gentlemen on this side have followed, let them, for the sake of their own honor, ever after hold their peace.

Mr. MITCHELL. I gave you a proof; I quoted your organ.

Mr. PATERSON. Was that the utterance of hon, gentlemen from this side?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is from your organ.

Mr. PATERSON. Did not the hon gentleman state it was a descriptive letter, written by a certain gentleman and published in the newspaper?

Mr. MITCHELL. Published with display headings.

Mr. PATERSON. When the hon member for Northumberland gave a fair description, I will not say a rosy descrip tion, of some of the States of the neighboring Union, did anyone charge him with running down his own country, or charge the paper that published the letter with that, because they saw fit to give to the public the letter written by that gentleman? He was giving impressions of the country as they were formed by him. Should hon gentlemen opposite charge upon members of this side utterances of this kind in newspapers, if they can find them? We ask them to make good their statements, when they dare to say the course of the Opposition has been unpatriotic, that the Opposition have manifested a desire to retard the progress of the country. They will attempt that task in vain. If I may country. They will attempt that task in vain. be allowed to point to newspaper utterances, if I might be allowed to allude to organs of the party, do you not think I could read utterances from the most recognised organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, in which expressions, stronger than any that have been used by hon. gentlemen opposite, are used, in the direction of praising up some of the States of the Union, and by comparison show our North-West not to be equal to them. Can I not do that? Do hon. gentlemen opposite hold themselves responsible for it? the Toronto Mail say, only a very few months ago? I do not like this; I do not hold that the Conservative party or the members opposite are to be charged with uttering sentiments that are contained in the Toronto Mail. If we are to talk about organs, I suppose the hon gentlemen opposite will not dare to repudiate the Toronto Mail as their organ. It has made the political life of many hon, gentlemen opposite, and they will not dare to repudiate it. What did it say? In its issue of 27th February, 1885, is an article which is rather a mass of contradictions, for it is trying, like my hon. friends opposite, to lay the blame of the failure of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company upon the Opposition, and it tries to work in its censure among that, and yet it has to admit facts, or what it thinks are facts, in reference to it, and so it is rather a jumble, but I will read what it says:

"Thus, the decrease in settlement in these American territories was 39.56 per cent., and in the Canadian North-West 39.92 per cent. Considering the start Minnesota and Dakota have had in the race, and the help they have received from the Opposition in the Dominiou Parliament, and from the anti-immigration patriots in Manitoba, the wonder is not that our North-West should have suffered as much as they, but that it did not suffer more."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. MITCHELL. Are you not reading the wrong extract?

Mr. PATERSON. No.

"The effects of the boom—the headache after the debauch—must also be taken into account as a factor operating temporarily against Manitoba. Then, again, while the frost of September 7, 1883, did some damage throughout the American North-West, in Manitoba it wrought wholesale destruction."

That is from the Toronto Mail. Here is a little frost; it did some little damage in the north-western States, but in Manitoba it wrought wholesale destruction. Can the hon. gentleman point to a statement made in that direction in the article which he read, even from the Globe?

Mr. MITCHELL. The difference is this—in that case I suppose it was true; in the other case it was a lie.

Mr. PATERSON. Now the hon. member is running down his country. He is endorsing the statement that, when these people in Minnesota and Dakota have a frost it will do a little harm, and yet it will work wholesale destruction in our North-West.

Mr. MITCHELL. No one ever denies, I never denied, that there are frosts in the North-West. It is not a paradise, but it is a fine country.

Mr. PATERSON. He has said that this is a truth, that the frost which may work some little harm in Minnesota and Dakota will work wholesale destruction in our land, and I am not prepared to believe it, though the hon. gentleman says so. I believe the frost will affect them in Dakota to as great an extent as in our North-West; at least, I hope so, from a patriotic standpoint; but the hon. gentleman says so; he says that the Mail is correct, that our country is in that unhappy position, that a frost which will do some damage in the north-western States will work wholesale destruction even in Manitoba. Still further:

"And the panic that followed the cry that early frosts would always menace wheat inflicted grave injury on the country, which nothing but a series of good harvests can repair. These, in our opinion, are the true causes of the depression in the North-West. The Government, probably, did commit mistakes."

Is the article true in that respect, I wonder?

"Few men are infallible; but the marvellous energy they have displayed in developing that region, and the care they have taken in securing for the settler fair rates and free competition for his produce, stand out infinitely beyond the sum of their shortcomings. The Globe says, however, that the Ottawa people encouraged speculation, and instances the formation of hundreds of bubble colonisation companies, under the Dominion Land Act. No doubt, the colonisation companies have suffered. Many of them deserve to suffer. Their projectors attempted to make money without for working for it—an offence against the economies which is within a measurable distance of stealing. But the Government is no way responsible for the collapse in that quarter."

Here is the colonisation company. My hon, friends saw great danger in the Bill of the hon, member for Bothwell; they said you would have land grabbed up by speculators without getting money for it. Here is a confession from their chief organ, that this Government chartered colonisation companies that got hold of immense tracts of land for the purposes of speculation, that never proposed to build a mile of railroad, that did not think of such a thing, but got the land for pure speculation; and, after they have chartered them, the chief organ of the Government is kind enough to say they were within a measurable distance of stealing; in other words, they were within a measurable distance of being thieves. Then we go further:

"It is only fair to add, however, that in all probability the Government now in power has taken too sanguine a view of the North-West development. It has been the habit, in making up caculations of future progress, to ignore the fact that Minnes it and Dakota offer to the poorer class of settlers advantages fully equal to those held out by Manitobs; while the western, south-western and southern States present to the well-to-do immigrant, who can afford to choose his climate, an infinite and incomparable variety of attractions."

There is the language of the Mail newspaper. You can do as well, Mr. intending immigrant, if you are a poor man, in Dakota and Minnesota, as you will do in the North-West; but if you are a well-to-do immigrant, take notice of this, says the Toronto Mail, that the western, south-western and southern States present to people of your class an infinite, an incomparable variety of advantages. There is the statement of the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and we have the endorsation of one who was a member of that Government, and who would discharge the duties of one of the Departments of that Government, at all events, quite as efficiently as they are discharged by its present incumbent, and who says that that article is true.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. I did not say that the article was true. What I said was, that the portion of the article referring to the frosts in Manitoba, up to which point the hon. gentleman had read, was true. I am not responsible for the Mail. I am not going to defend the Mail. It is quite able to take care of itself, and its friends in the House are able to defend it. But I do not think it is doing justice to me, when I said that frosts occurred in Manitoba, which extended all over the country, to draw me into defending every statement which appears in the Mail. I did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. PATERSON. I have no desire to draw the hon. gentleman into defending every statement, if he does not desire it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have an organ of my own, as you know.  $\dot{}$

Mr. PATERSON. But it is very natural that I should have referred to the hon. gentleman, when I was reading one article, and as I understood he endorsed it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was; it was very natural for you to misrepresent.

Mr. PATERSON. So eager was he to interrupt me by stating that the article was the truth, while the article he has read from was a lie. I believed he intended to state that the article which I was reading was true, and that he was prepared to endorse every statement in it, and I think that is what every hon. gentleman in the House supposed. I am glad to hear that he does not endorse every statement contained in that article.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask the hon gentleman whether the article says that frosts occur more frequently and more severely in the North-West than in Dakota, or that on that occasion the frost was more severe?

Mr. PATERSON. I read what it says, and hon. gentlemen opposite were quiet and heard what I read. I have no time, in the course of a speech, to go back and explain what it says. I ask, what are we to think of language such as that? I want to ask what you think of gentlemen opposite, who are prepared to rise and put themselves in the ridiculous position of reiterating charges against the Opposition, of decrying the country, and who produce no utterances of members of the Opposition, but, where they find that a correspondent, who is responsible for his own letter, describes what I presume he supposes to be the truth, in reference to the country, proclaim that this is with a view to decry the country, and that the newspaper which publishes the correspondence makes itself responsible for it all. This is not a correspondence, but an editorial of the Mail newspaper, an article written by the gentlemen who control it. We have again this statement. I think it was an article which appeared two or three days afterwards, which preceded an article in the Montreal Gazette, in which the Montreal Gazette said:

"Rumor has been busy for some weeks past with the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company is reported to be seeking further assistance from Parliament, to have incurred a floating liability of a considerable amount, and to have failed to raise a loan in the money market, and it is no longer a secret that these reports are substantially correct."

That was from the Montreal Gazette, to prepare Parliament for the new demand. Two or three days before that there appeared in the Toronto Mail, in the same direction, an article seeking to prepare the public mind for additional aid for the Canadian Pacific Railway, pointing out the reasons which would justify Parliament in doing so, as the writer evidently felt it was a very embarrassing position when the company came the third time to Parliament for aid. We find the following:—

"If our land subsidy of 25,000,000 acres be worth $2 an acre, the Northern Pacific lands must be worth much more. For while the population of the whole territery through which the Oanadian Pacific runs, from Callander to the Pacific, does not, at this hour, exceed 200,000, the smaller and more compact region traversed by the Northern Pacific is comparatively well settled.

If it be said that the mountain section of the Northern Pacific was more costly than the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that in the case of the Canadian Pacific the heavy work on the Pacific slope has been assumed by the Government, the answer is that the Northern Pacific had no rock division, 650 miles long, such as that which stretches in unbroken desolation between Port Arthur and Callander."

There is a description of that country, given by the Mail newspaper-the road was to run through 650 miles of rock, one unbroken, barren desolation-printed in the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have the audacity to rise, time and again, to charge upon gentlemen on this side of the House that they decry their country, but who have always been utterly unable to produce the proof. In that article of the Mail was the justification of every word that ever fell from any hon, gentleman on this side of the House, when it admits that the Government made a mistake by over estimating the value of the land, when it admits they made a mistake by not acting as reasonable men, instead of acting like men who have lost their heads, when they speak of that country. Sir, there never was a time when hon, gentlemen opposite were less justified in making the charges that they have made against us tonight in connection with the North-West, when we are considering proposals to build colonisation roads throughout that country, which hon. gentlemen on this of the House proposed to do in 1878, and which, if unfortunate circumstances had not deprived them of the reins of power, I have no doubt would have existed, to a very large extent, in great portions of that country at the present time, and instead of 200,000 people that the Mail said you had there now, you might have had over a million of people developing that country, these roads feeders to a road owned by the Government, and the proceeds and the profits accruing to the country instead of being lost to it. And now let me just refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which these roads will be tributary. I would like to ask the hon, member for Northumberland one question—I do not know whether he will answer me or not. He stated that the second syndicate that offered to build this road was a bogus syndicate, and he justified that expression when he rose to make his speech, by declaring that he knew a good deal about this thing; he gave us to understand that he was sufficiently in the secrets of the gentlemen who comprised that second syndicate to know that he was warranted in his expression that it was a bogus syndicate. Well, now, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was sufficiently in the confidence of the gentlemen who composed that company to be able to say it was a bogus syndicate. But whether he was or not, hon. gentlemen in this House will not doubt that if the hon. member is not deep in the confidence of the second syndicate, he, at any rate, ought to be deep in the confidence of the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate, from the manner in which he defends them on the floor of this House; and if he is deep in their confidence it would interest this House and this country if he would explain to us how it was that the Government of this country were made to give the bargain they did to the present Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is something this country would like to know-what secret power they had over the Government, that compelled them to their terms, what power they have over them now that makes them, when the company come a second time to demand aid—what power they have over them that has compelled them to give notice, the third time asking that their demand is to be agreed to. The hon. gentleman could interest the country if he would let us into that secrect, and if he would give us to understand how it is that when this Government, a few months before, asked Parliament to sanction a scheme whereby they would build all the roads that were to be built by this syndicate, and do it for $48,500,000. The hon. gentleman is aware of that. The hon, gentleman knows that about eight months before Sir Charles Tupper, in the name of the Queen, signed the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that same Sir Charles Tupper rose in his place in the House, as Minister of Railways, and asked Parliament to sanction a scheme for the country to build that road as a Government work, and gave to us the estimate of the cost of the construction of a portion of the work the syndicate were bound to do as $13,000,000 for the 1,000 miles from Selkirk to Jasper, $15,500,000 for the portion from Jasper to Kamloops, and $20,000,000 for the portion from Selkirk to Lake Nipissing-$48,500,000, the Minister of Railways told us, he could build these portions of the road for, and yet we have been told how that same Minister, who, eight months before, had stated that for $48,500,000 we could build the portions of the work they were to build, entered into a contract whereby the country gave to the company $25,000,000 in cash, 25,000,000 acres of land, agreed to finish 406 miles of road through a Rocky Mountain region, and that when built and handed over, it should be handed over to the company for ever. How the Government agreed further to build 90 miles, from Yale to Kamloops, the expense to be paid out of the public coffers, and when so built and paid for, to hand the work over as a free gift to the company. How they agreed, further, to build 125 miles, from Yale to Port Moody, to cost millions and millions more, to be paid out of the public tracerum. out of the public treasury, and when built and completed, to be handed over for nothing to that company, to be theirs forever. How, in addition, the Government gave the company all those immunities and privileges they enjoy. How it was they placed on the Statute Book of Canada a clause which I venture to say has never before been found on a Statute Book of a free country, that the whole immense country lying in the North-West, the great heritage of the people of Canada, should be locked up and sealed for the use and benefit of that company for twenty years from the date of the contract. How, in addition, the company are exempted from taxation on their lands so long as they hold them, and are exempted, as regards the road bed and rolling stock, for all time, and have privileges and immunities which time would fail me to describe. The people would like to know what power the syndicate had over the Government to cause them to say that although they believed those portions of the road could be built for $48,500,000 they gave them the contract, the details of which I have indicated, signed.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I should like to know what is the question before the House at the present time, and whether the remarks of the hon, gentleman are in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the discussion on the Canadian Pacific Railway contract is not in order.

Mr. PATERSON. Might I ask you, in common fairness, to say that if I have been out of order I have only been out of order in replying to arguments offered by the other side.

Mr. SPEAKER. This discussion has been going on for some time. It was a great pity it was started at all. Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. BOWELL. It is a pity you were stopped in your insinuations. It would be much better for you to make what charges you have to make against the Administration in a bold and manly way, and not make insinuations which I do not think you dare state.

Mr. PATERSON. I thought I was not to blame for that.

Mr. SPEAKER. There will be another opportunity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call the hon. gentleman to order. The hon. gentleman for Brant has made no insinuations. If any hon. member could speak plainly and boldly, that hon. gentleman has done so.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know what the Minister means by insinuations. What does he mean?

Mr. SPEAKER. Address the Chair.

Mr. PATERSON. He has no right to make any such charge. I do not propose to submit to anything of the kind from any Minister. He may be a Minister to-day and not a Minister to-morrow. Governments composed of stronger material have been ejected from office by the voice of the people, and the same thing may happen again. The hon, gentleman must not attempt anything in the way of insult. That will not do.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. PATERSON. I consider it an insult. The answer will be given to him at another time. I cannot, I suppose, go on to speak with reference to what is termed the monopoly clause in that agreement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Discussion on the terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway charter is not strictly in order.

Mr. PATERSON. I thought that, probably, a reply would be allowed, and that I might allude to the matter as involved in a proposition to subsidise railways that will be feeders to the road that has absolute control of the outlet of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The discussion commenced and proceeded for some time. My attention has now been called to it, and it is my duty to enforce the regulations and orders of the House. I cannot allow the discussion to go on. It is not a question of my permission. My attention having been called to it by a member, I have to enforce the

Mr. POPE. I should like the hon. gentleman to go on to the full extent.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not on this question.

Mr. PATERSON. I recognise, Mr. Speaker, that you have a duty to discharge to the House. I was simply going on to deal with one point. There will be another opportunity to do so, of which I shall avail myself. My justification for trespassing on the rules of order is found in the fact that hon, gentlemen opposite had travelled outside the record, and in answering them I was led to speak as I have done.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a personal explanation. The hon, gentleman has referred to myself in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway as its defender on the floor of this House. I am not the defender of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I never have been the defender of the Canadian Pacific Railway, except so far as I felt that justice demanded. I have supported and defended the Canadian Pacific Railway when I felt it was unjustly assailed, and because I believe the company are entitled to the confidence of the country and are doing well the work they have undertaken. I have also been asked to give some information as to how the company did this and obtained the other from the Government. I, like the hon gentleman, am not in the confidence of the Government, and therefore it is out of my power to offer any opinion. If I was to give my opinion, I would say that the Government made concessions to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company because they believed they were men of trust, wealth, ability, enterprise and zeal, and men who have the true interests of the country at heart, and they gave them such concessions as they thought necessary to enable the company to carry out the work they had undertaken.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee).

Mr. BLAKE. The general discussion having now closed, and it having continued longer than I had expected, I may say there are a large number of papers to be discussed in connection with the location. We have not yet dealt with a single application in detail, and I hope the hon. gentleman does not propose to proceed with the committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the committee rise and report progress.

Committee rose and reported progress.

GOVERNMENT LOAN.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed Resolution to authorize the raising by way of loan of such sum or sums of money, as may be required for the purpose of paying the floating indebtedness of the Dominion and for the carrying on of the Public Works authorised by the Parliament of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the Minister of Customs state, in a general way, why he requires this resolution, and in particular is it required on the score of the arrangement which is now being, or has been lately carried out in London, with respect to the exchange of four for five per cents.

Mr. BOWELL. It has nothing to do with that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Last year, as the Minister of Customs knows, the sum of $22,084,000 was authorised to be borrowed by chap. 2 of last year's statutes. Then, in addition to that sum, $25,000,000, in round numbers, was authorised to be borrowed, about $20,000,000 of which appear to have been applicable to the new loan, so far as I understand the terms of the statute. That would make in all $42,000,000, or a little over, which we were authorised to borrow. This $30,000,000 would make $72,000,000 in all, if I am correct. And there were $25,000,000 borrowed last June, I think, or July, so that there would remain apparently the sum of about $47,000,000, if this resolution passes. I desire to know if that is the exact position?

Mr. BOWELL. Not according to the figures given me. By the statement placed in my hands, the present loan is to cover the following expenditures, or those which are likely to take place in a short time: loan and balance of land subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway, $10,776,882; on capital expenditure as provided by the Estimates for 1884-85 and 1885-86, $10,579,663; railway subsidies under 46 Vic., chap. 25, and 47 Vic., chap. 8, $8,870,805; subsidy to the Montreal, St. John and Halifax railway, $170,000 for 15 years, making $2,550,000; ditto from Oxford Station of the Intercolonial Railway to Louisburgh, for 20 years, in all $450,000; estimated expenditure on North-West arising out of the present difficulties and losses which have occurred, and which no doubt to a very large extent will have to be paid, about $4,000,000. Of course that is only an approximate sum. We hope it may be less, but from the expenses which have occurred, it is to be feared that it may be at least that sum, if not more. That makes $36,370,545, less the unborrowed sums under the Statute, of $4,895,182, leaving a balance of $31,962,168. The hon. gentleman, as I understood, made the amount about $47,000,000, including the present loan of $30,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I made the sum total that you had authority to borrow, including these $30,000,000, apparently $72,000,000 altogether.

Mr. BOWELL. I understand you to say that $25,000,000 had been borrowed, which would make about $47,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you get this grant which so far as I can make out from chap. 8, you will have power to borrow. The point to which I want to direct attention is this, that you had the right, as the hon. gentleman will see, under that statute, to borrow $22,000,000 under the ordinary Supply Bill. Then there was a special Act authorising the raising of five millions sterling. cf which apparently three millions were for Canadian Pacific Railway service, and $2,000,000 for redemption of loans, of which it is stated about $1,000,000 was redeemed, and you are authorised to borrow money to replace that. That made available for this year's service, about $20,000,000 in addition to the $22,000,000. Of that $42,000,000, $25,000,000 were borrowed by Sir Leonard Tilley, last June, leaving $17,000,000 apparently available. Now, you propose to take $30,000,000 more, making $47,000,000.

Mr. BOWELL. I have not looked at that statute. Will the hon. gentleman say whether a portion of that sum was not power taken, in case of having to redeem those securities instead of converting and extending them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The phrase is as follows:—

"For the small loans maturing from time to time, within the ten years following the 1st day of January 1882, and which approximate the sum of £2,000,000 sterling, the Government should have the right to redeem the same by one issue of that amount within three years from the date last mentioned; and whereas some of the said small loans have been since redeemed, out of moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue of Canada."

You are allowed to re-borrow it again. In all, so far as I can ascertain, you had the right to borrow £64,000,000 sterling. The point I desire to ascertain is, whether I am correct in supposing that with this $30,000,000 you have the right to borrow in all $47,000,000.

Mr BOWELL: Not as I understand it. The figures placed in my hands indicate that we have under former loan Bill the power to borrow $4,785,000, which in addition to the $30,000,000, would make it in round numbers about $35,000,000. I asked the Department specially to inform me of the amount available under the former loan.

Mr. BLAKE. Does it give the reference to the Statute?

Mr. BOWELL. No; it simply says, less the amounts unborrowed. If hon, gentlemen desire that information before the Bill is finally passed, if they allow the resolution to pass, I will introduce it, and will look closely into the matter and give the House all the information I can obtain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon gentleman will find that I am correct. I do not mean to say that the sum of $47,000,000, looking at the very large amount of our engagements, will be more than we shall require, but it will be as well to ascertain exactly what our position is. The hon gentleman says nothing about floating debt in this memorandum; but I suppose this sum of $36,000,000 includes the floating debt.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no doubt that a number of the items to which I have referred would be covered by the floating debt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the $10,000,000 which forms the hon, gentleman's first item include the $5,000,000 proposed to be granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the $10,579,000 which formed his second item, if I recollect aright, included the subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the sums to be paid on account of public works?

Mr. BOWELL. Principally, to be charged to capital, in the Estimates both of last year and the year to come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that this sum of $8,770,000 represents the various liabilities for railway subsidies of a minor character.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. Under 46 Vict., chap. 25, there are $2,138,000 and $456,000, and under 47 Vict, chap. 9 there are $6,175,600, making a total of $8,770,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wanted to know that, because in the report of the Department of Finance I observe that these railway liabilities are put down at $6,176,400, not including $170,000 and $30,000 per annum guaranteed for fifteen years, and there appeared to be a discrepancy between this statement and that of the hon. gentleman. This $8,770,000 includes extra railway grants?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, but it does not include the $2,250,000 to the Halifax and St. John Short Line Road. I find the item under 47 Vict., chap. 8, very nearly corresponds with the figures the hon. gentleman has given. The $2,000,000 and the half million are under another statement, and may probably not be referred to in that statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The $170,000 and the $30,000 per annum given for the construction of the line of railway to St. John and Halifax, and the line from Oxford Station on the Intercolonial Railway to Sydney or Louisburg-these, I presume, would cover the two other items to which the hon, gentleman referred. What are those two other items for?

Mr. BOWELL. They are provided for under 46 Vict., chap. 25.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Any way we under stand according to the hon. gentleman's statement, that about $36,370,000 is the total sum that will require to be provided for.

Yes, $36,857,000, deducting the Mr. BOWELL. $4,800,000 which we have authority to borrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Even then you will come a little short.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, we shall come short some $2,000,000, but $30,000,000 is all the Finance Minister in his cable from London said he would require. It may be possible that some of the subsidies given under the Acts to which I have referred, to railways, will not have to be paid.

Mr. BLAKE. I am unable to apprehend what the proposition is really before us from the explanations of the Minister of Customs. The Minister has given items amounting in all to $36,370,000, as the amount required, and he points out that he has authority to borrow nearly $5,000,000, making in round numbers $32,000,000, that is wanted. Of those various items, as well as I could understand his explanations, almost everything is yet to pay. The $11,766,000 for the Canadian Pacific Railway, he says, includes $5,000,000 of the new loan covered by the resolution on the table. The $5,766,000 which is the balance of that first item, is that balance still due on the operations of last year?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. BOWELL. It is the balance that will have to be

Mr. BLAKE. The first item that the hon. gentleman has given, the ten and three quarter millions is composed entirely of sums that have yet to be paid.

Mr. BOWELL. Not necessarily. It may be possible some of these have already been advanced out of the temporary loan, and will have to be recouped.

Mr. BLAKE. I hardly think so, because we have yet the sum of $5,000,000, for which there has been no authority at all, to advance yet, and the five and three quarter millions as the amount remaining due to the Canadian Pacific Railway on the subsidy and loan account, but not yet earned, so that it cannot have been paid. Therefore I get the ten and three quarter millions as sums which have to be paid. There is $10,579,000 for capital expenditure the hon. gentleman states of various kinds. Is that on Public Works?

Mr. BOWELL. The capital expenditure for 1885-6, as per Estimates, $4,237,400; in the Supply Bill and Estimates $600,000; 1884.5, to the end of the year, the Estimates are $13,079,000, the expenditure of which however has been $12,000,000, leaving $183,526 to provide for; 1884.5, as per Supply Bill, estimated at $5,558,737 which makes up the $10,579,663.

Mr. BLAKE. These are sums which are all yet to pay.

Mr. BOWELL. I think a portion of them have been paid out of the temporary loan which has been made; otherwise this statement would have said, to pay out of temporary loans which have been made.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the committee, in an important proposal of this kind, ought to have much fuller information than the officers of the Department have supplied the hon. gentleman with. Of course, we realise he is only acting temporarily in the discharge of the duties of an office to which he does not belong, and he is not expected to be so familiar with those things as the Minister who is absent, but we ought to have more than the hon. gentleman is able to give us before being asked to take this step. A very large proportion of this second item, $10,879,000, and of the third item, the subsidies to railways, is altogether yet to pay.

Mr. BOWELL. Some has already been paid.

Mr. BLAKE. What amount?

Mr. BOWELL. I know portions have been paid on appropriations for railways. They have passed the Council and have been paid, no doubt, out of the temporary loan.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, there is the railway of the Minister of Railways, $160,000, and that between Napanee and Tam-

Mr. BOWELL. Whose railway is that?

Mr. BLAKE. What they ordinarily call the Pope Line.

Mr. BOWELL. Not the Napanee and Tamworth.

Mr. BLAKE. I said "and the Napanee and Tamworth." I do not recollect any others. We ought to know how that stands. As far as I can remember from the Railway Subsidy account, there has not been much earned and consequently not much paid. Then you come to the capitalisation of the $170,000 a year and $30,000 a year, which are estimated together capitalised to $2,700,000. It seems a curious kind of husbandry to propose to advance this amount for the money already paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway or the payment of a subsidy which is going to run over fifteen years. I do not think there is any rhyme or reason in suggesting that we ought to borrow the gross sum which is to run over these fifteen years. Surely the hon. gentleman cannot intend to borrow a gross sum that he is going to pay by fifteen annual instalments. It would be very bad economy to borrow this money, and put it by to pay annual instalments for fifteen years, and therefore, I cannot see there is any justification in the hon, gentleman's proposal so far. As to the North West account, the bulk of the four millions is yet to pay; in fact all of it ought to be yet to pay, for the hon. gentleman has not yet brought down the special Bill we were told would be brought down to warrant the payment of the money. We ought to ascertain exactly what proportions of these items of $36,370,000 are really yet to pay, and what proportion has been paid out of the temporary loan. We know the temporary loans are very large, fifteen millions at least, and if $15,000,000 temporary loans require to be met, and if, in addition, the House really requires to provide for $36,000,000 it is obvious, as the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, that $47,000,000 in all is the amount that requires to be provided for. If the great bulk of $36,000,000 is yet to pay, say $33,000,000 or $32,000,000, that with the $15,000,000 floating debt yet to be met makes $47,000,000 to meet, and the House proposes to provide for $47,000,000 with a loan of $30,000,000 and the unexhausted portion of the $4,785,000; or he will be short $11,500,000. I do not mean to say that is an accurate statement; I do not suppose it is, because the cablegram of the Finance Minister would seem to show a different state of things. If he would strike out that $2,250,000 and the $450,000 as we should, if we are reduced to that degree of penury that we cannot pay $30,000 a year out of our current expenses, the most he will want to borrow this year will be the first year's payment. He will not want to borrow for the payments of the years going on, the second, third, and fourth, and so on to the 15 years, and I think therefore we may fairly state an account a little more favorably as to the immediate pressing necessities of the Dominion than the hon, gentleman has stated. It seems to me a very large transaction, upon which the hon, gentleman ought to have received from the officers of the Department he is administering fuller and more detailed information before we were asked to go into committee upon it.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman will observe from the statement I have made that they are not borrowing within some $2,000,000 of the total sum I have given him. Supposing you deduct that, it would leave the $30,000,000, and, with the sum unborrowed, about $5,000,000, about $35,000,000. The total sum, as I have already stated, is $1,962,000 more than we proposed to borrow, and, if the suggestion of the hon, gentleman were carried out to strike off the two items, it would be taking off about three quarters of a million.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman will see how much there is yet to explain.

Mr. BOWELL. I see that. I will endeavor to obtain the information for the hon, gentleman before the Bill comes to the second reading.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will mention how it appears to me we stand, and this may perhaps assist the hon. gentleman a little in the investigation he is making. As I understand our position, it is somewhat thus:—we owe to-day $15,000,000 of floating debt. We propose to advance $5,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway. We owe for subsidies and balance of loan about, $6,000,000. Then the hon. gentleman wants $8,770,000 for these railway matters, and he estimates about $4,000,000 for the North-West, making in all a sum of about $38,770,000, that we require to borrow in order to make us clear, without adding anything for contingencies of any sort. I have not included in that the $2,000,000 or the $450,000 which represent the two annuities, so to speak, of $170,000 and $30,000. If I included the two millions and a half, it would run it up to forty-one millions and a quarter.

Mr. BOWELL. That leaves, deducting the $5,000,000 they have now the right to borrow, $33,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $33,770,000, not including the $5,000,000 the Government propose to grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway and not including the two and a quarter millions and the $450,000. I think that represents the minimum amount we want to borrow, and, if that be the case, I presume that the Finance Minister proposes to borrow $30,000,000, and to renew a part of the floating debt. It would be as well, if the hon. gentleman can obtain the information, that he should be in a position to state to us at the next stage if I am correct in that supposition. Of course, it is true that a portion of that is not immediately due. I do not know, and I would like to know, how much of the $8,770,000 he expects to be called upon to pay.

M. BOWELL. I will try to ascertain that.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that, on a matter of so much consequence, the House is entitled to this information before taking any step at all. Here is an important matter, referring to the public expenses of the country. The hon. gentleman comes down with a proposition to authorise a loan which the Minister of Finance is about to float in England. We have a large floating dobt and a large amount maturing. What the amount of our liabilities is, what amount the Government require, and what amount the Government are now authorised to obtain, no Minister is able to state. It does go a long way towards converting parliamentary proceedings into a farce to come down without any information, and ask the House to vote without any information at all. I am not finding fault with the Minister of Customs for not being familiar with the Department of Finance, but I say that the House of Commons, the representatives of the people of this country, the guardians of the pecuniary interests of the people of this country, so far as their public liabilities are concerned, would be very derolict in their duty if they took the first step in this matter without the information which no Minister is in a position to give at this moment. The Government ought not to press upon the House the consideration of a proposition which they are not in a position to consider, because the Government are not in a position to give the information to which Parliament is entitled. It has a tendency to lower this House in the estimation of the public. What will the people think of a House of Commons which is prepared to support a proposition the merits of which they know nothing about, and which the members of the Government present are unable to explain to the House? That is a humiliation to which the House ought not to be subjected, and the Government ought not to press this matter upon the attention of the House until they are prepared to give to the House the information which the House, as the trustees of the country, ought to have from them.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself it Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman what proportion of this whole amount is intended to be devoted to the payment of the floating debt of the Dominion?

and he estimates about $4,000,000 for the North-West, making in all a sum of about $38,770,000, that we require to borrow in order to make us clear, without adding anything for contingencies of any sort. I have not included in that the

also stated that before the next stage is taken I will endeavor to find out all the information.

Mr. BLAKE. It does seem to me that the House ought to be informed before it is asked to pass the resolution at this stage. The Minister himself acknowledges that. They are cardinal points. The resolution proposes a loan of no less than $30,000,000, a portion of which is to pay off the floating debt of the Dominion, and provide for certain other large expected expenses, some of which are already authorised by Parliament. It is, under the circumstances, putting the cart a little before the horse to ask Parliament to-night to give authority to borrow $5,000,000 to loan the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We have lying on the table for six weeks past resolutions to authorise the loan of that amount to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and we are now asked to take the first step towards making that loan on this general stage. What seems to me material is that in this initiatory step of a transaction of such great magnitude, the House ought to get that information without which this committee stage is a perfect farce. What do we go into committee for? In order to obtain this information with that freedom of discussion which belongs to the committee stage, and having got this information at the first stage, and to be able to study the question and deal with it intelligently at the subsequent stages. The hon, gentleman says at a subsequent stage he will tell us all about it. But then we miss the opportunities to which I have referred. Extra stages are given in matters of this kind because it is felt the public interest requires there should be these extra stages, but there extra stages are perfectly useless if they are to be made mere formal stages, if the information intended to be given to them is postponed to a subsequent period. had better alter our rule and not have an extra stage if we are not to have the benefit of it. The hon, gentleman ought to have given in the first place precisely the amount that it is intended to fund out of the floating debt of the Dominion. My hon, friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has suggested it must be intended, as well as he can make out, to keep a portion of the present floating debt of the Dominion unfunded, to keep it in the shape of a floating debt. Well, we ought to know that. Is the whole amount of floating debt to be funded now or not? Then having learnt what amount of the floating debt is to be funded, we would very much like to know the rest of the transaction. The hon, gentleman has given us an aggregate of $36,370,000. With the exception of the first item and the fourth item, we are unable to tell how much represents floating debt and how much represents obligations yet to be incurred. It is important to know what the character of the obligations is, because it is clear with reference to $2,700,000 that there is no necessity to borrow at this time the bulk of that amount. I think it is equally clear that there is no present necessity to borrow for a considerable portion of the railway subsidies. I think that within the list of railway subsidies which the hon. gentleman is proposing to borrow for-if he intends to borrow for these railway subsidies—there are several of them which I fancy will lapse, several which will not be earned for a considerable time, and it becomes a question of policy whether Parliament should now grant authority to borrow for amounts which may never become due, and which if they do become due will become due probably at a very distant date. Then there is the question of policy with reference to borrowing for the war expenses in the North-West. The hon, gentleman ought to state his view on that subject. If the view of the Government is that the war Mr. Bowell.

would like the hon, gentleman, on this stage as well, to state why it is proposed to borrow at this time at 4 per cent., the Finance Minister having made a little while ago a loan at 31? Why revert to the 4 per cent.? And also will he inform us whether, from his advices from the Finance Minister, what is the prospectus or other preliminary arrangements for the loan and any other information about that loan-of course I do not mean confidential information that would affect the loan itself—but any information which consistently with the public interest he may give us? These are things we ought to have in committee in order that we may intelligently discuss the proposal, and I think it is hardly satisfactory to be told that at a subsequent stage we shall have that information which we ought to have now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman lays down very correctly the general rule that in matters of this kind when we go into committee it is for the purpose of having full discussion. Still, under the special circumstances of the case, and as the Finance Minister requests very strongly that this matter should be expedited in the interest of the loan, I hope the hon. gentleman will consent to this stage under the understanding that before another stage is taken, my hon. friend will give full information.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon, gentleman will agree that at concurrence there shall be the same freedom of discussion as in committee, well and good.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

M. BLAKE. This practice is getting a little too common. When we get that information from the hon. gentleman we shall have to deal with it on the spur of the moment, without that opportunity of testing it -I mean in no offensive sense-and of looking at the public records. Therefore I should not be disposed to accede to the hon. gentleman's request except for one observation, that he had advices from the Finance Minister that the public interest required expedition in this particular case. This is another instance in which we are obliged in the public interest to do something which we ought not to do in consequence of the derelicts of the Government.

M. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman asked why we should revert back to the 4 per cents. It does not follow that because power is taken to borrow at 4 per cent, you will necessarily give 4 per cent. The resolution passed authorising the last loan was in the same words, and we know the loan was placed in the market at  $3\frac{1}{2}$ .

M. BLAKE. I was quite aware of that,

Mr. BOWELL. Then it could not be a reversal back to 4 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. I am aware that the First Minister a few days ago converted twenty-five millions of our fives into fours, and I did not suppose he was going to engage in the see-saw operation of making a three and a half per cent. loan a few months ago, then making a four per cent loan and then a three and a half per cent. I did not impute that to the First Minister. It may be he is going to do so. I assume that he will borrow at four per cent., and I think I will be right.

Mr. BOWELL. That may be very witty, sarcastic and cutting, as no doubt it is intended to be. Loans, I take it for granted, though I have not had much experience in such matters, are regulated in a great measure by the money expenses is to be made by permanent loan, let us understand market of the old country, and there are periods in the that. We know an effort is to be made to meet that by money market of England when a loan can be effected at market of the old country, and there are periods in the some other way than by imposing a permanent debt upon three and a quarter or three and a half per cent. better than the country. All these things are to be considered. Then I a loan at four or four and a half per cent, can be effected at another period. It depends altogether on the state of the market at the time the loan is placed on it whether the rate shall be three and a half, or four, hence the sarcasm of the hon. gentleman has no point, and even if the Finance Minister did effect a loan at 3½ it would not be a "see-saw operation," as the hon. gentleman should know, if he does not.

M. MILLS. The first Minister informs us that the Finance Minister is absent and that this matter is very pressing. It is not a very great while ago that the First Minister told us that, with a High Commissioner in England, it would be unnecessary for the Finance Minister to go to the old country in order to effect loans, and transact other business. Now we have a High Commissioner in England drawing a handsome salary, and we have the Finance Minister absent from Parliament and we are doing work in an unparliamentary way in consequence of his absence.

Resolution to be reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:35 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 11th June, 1885.

The SPRAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC DEBT OF CANADA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the net amount of the public debt of Canada on 31st May, 1885?

Mr. BOWELL. The net debt of Canada on 31st May, 1885, was $191,886,199.60.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the gross amount of the public debt of Canada on 31st May, 1885?

Mr. BOWELL. The gross amount of the public debt of Canada on 31st May, 1885, was $258,711,088.52.

GOVERNMENT NOTES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the amount of Government notes in circulation or in the hands of Canadian banks on 31st May, 1885, and the amount of gold held by the Government of Canada upon that date?

Mr. BOWELL. The Government notes in circulation or in the hands of the Canadian banks amounted to $14,998,315. The amount of specie held was $2,287,767.

FLOATING AND UNFUNDED DEBT OF CANADA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the amount of the floating and unfunded debt of Canada on 31st, May 1885, and a list of temporary loans made by the Government, giving amounts, to whom payable and when payable?

Mr. BOWELL. The floating and unfunded debt of Canada on 31st, May 1885, was $62,214,635.50. The House will remember that upon previous occasions, when similar questions were asked, it was thought advisable, in the interest of the Dominion and in accordance with the wishes of the banks, that such enquiries should not be answered.

Mr. CHARLTON. That merely applied to the rate of interest. The Finance Minister has himself given such statements.

Mr. BLAKE. We have had more than one such statement submitted by the Finance Minister.

GOVERNMENT LOANS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What sum or sums of money, of the loans negotiable by virtue of any Act of Parliament heretofore passed, authorising the Government of Cauada, or the Governor in Council of Canada, to borrow money, remained unborrowed on 31st May 1885, without reference of transactions of the Finance Minister of Canada, since his recent arrival in London?

Mr. BOWELL. Four millions, eight hundred and ninety-five thousand, one hundred and eighty-one dollars and eighty-six cents.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the amount of deposits in the post office savings bank of Canada on 80th, April 1885, subject to payment on demand; and also the amount of deposits subject to notice of withdrawal, on the same date?

Mr. BOWELL. The Post Office Department states that this information cannot be given for three or four days, because the books have not been finally balanced for the month of May. The approximate balance of deposits payable on notice of withdrawal was $14,418,400. Outstanding cheques payable on demand amount to about $8,000,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. What I asked for was a statement up to 30th April. I previously asked for the amount up to 30th May, but I was told that it could not be furnished, and I therefore changed the date.

Mr. BOWELL. The notice I have is up to 30th May.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps the hon, Minister will furnish the information to-morrow.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

THE FIVE PER CENT. LOAN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether any provision is made for the payment of a sinking fund upon the bonds to be given in exchange for the 5 per cent. loan which matures on the 1st of July next?

Mr. BOWELL. The sinking fund remains the same as at present, and there is no additional charge for stamps.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether any commission or allowance (other than the bonus of 1 per cent. offered to parties accepting the exchange) has been paid or agreed to be paid to any persons in connection with the exchange of 5 per cent. bonds for 4 per cents?

Mr. BOWELL. The only expenditure incurred other than the allowance of 1 per cent. is  $\frac{1}{5}$  per cent. to brokers bringing in outstanding parcels.

PROOFS OF ENTRIES IN BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved the second reading of Bill (No. 113) respecting proof of entries in books of accounts kept by officers of the Crown. He said: I propose to amend the Bill slightly in committee, so as to make it read more clearly. The remark was made, the other day, that this legislation would interfere with the rights of the Provinces, by dealing with matters of civil rights and procedure. I propose, however, that the Bill shall be so worded as to apply only to matters over which the Parliament of Canada has authority, and with this safeguard I do not think there should be any objection to it, any more than there was to the Bill, 44 Vic., chap. 28, in which a similar provision is made as to certain proofs and notices, for the purpose of evidence.

Bill read the second time; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS. I think we should have some further explanation with regard to the provisions of this Bill, and what the Government proposes to do under it. As I understand, this provision proposes to take into the hands of this Parliament the control of matters of procedure in civil cases as well as in criminal cases, in courts established by this Parliament. Under the 101st section of the British North America Act, if the Parliament of Canada were dissatisfied with the administration of the laws of Canada in the provincial courts, in addition to the establishment of a general court of appeal for the entire Dominion they might establish courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada. They might establish a bankruptcy court, or one having maritime jurisdiction, for the administration of the federal laws of this country, and where, in the practice prior to the Union, it has been usual to treat matters of procedure as matters of the law itself, as in the case of bankruptcy, it may deal with that subject also. That has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but by the 92nd section of the British North America Act among the matters within the exclusive powers of the Provincial Legislatures are:

"The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance and organisation of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts."

In the United States the circuit and district courts of the Federal Government that are established in the various States follow, in matters of procedure and practice, the procedure and practice adopted by the various States; and it seems, as far as one can gather from the provisions of the British North America Act, that it was intended that a similar practice should prevail in this country, and that everything relating to procedure and practice in civil matters should be regulated by the Provincial Legislatures. It is true, the Act says: "Procedure in civil matters in those courts," but I apprehend, on looking at the 101st section, that it was intended that the same practice should prevail in the federal courts, in so far as they are given original jurisdiction. Provision is made in section 101 for the constitution, maintenance and organisation, by the Parliament of Canada, of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada; but nothing is said in this section, as is said in sub-section 14 of section 92, about regulating matters of procedure. It would, therefore, seem that it was not intended that that power should be conferred on this Parliament.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not think the objection of my hon. friend can hold. If we were providing generally in this Bill for a mode of evidence in civil cases only, I could understand his objection; but he will see that we are limited in this power by 44 Victoria, chapter 28, to which I have referred, to courts established by the Parliament of Canada and such legal proceedings over which the Parliament of Canada has authority.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman will see that section 92, sub-section 14, in addition to giving power to the Provincial Legislatures to establish and maintain provincial courts, gives them also power to regulate procedure in those courts; but in section 101 there is no corresponding power given to the Parliament of Canada to regulate procedure in the courts established under that section. If it is Mr. Chapleau.

necessary to use the expression in the case of provincial courts, why not also in the case of federal courts?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am very much afraid the argument is too fine for me. I see very well that by sub-section 14 of section 92, all matters concerning procedure in provincial courts have to be regulated by legislation coming from another Legislature than this. Section 101 of the Constitutional Act says:

"The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance and organisation of a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

I would add by this Bill, not only for the better administration of the laws of Canada, but that those laws should be on matters which could only be taken cognisance of by this Parliament, and when we provide for certain modes of proving documents that have to be produced in these courts, that is a matter we have a right to regulate. Though section 101 does not say that in the organisation of those courts, the laws of evidence or the procedure should be under the regulation of Parliament, that must necessarily be implied.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill reported.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, &c.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 143) respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilisers. He said: This Bill is to amend the Act passed in 1884 respecting the adulteration of food and drugs. It makes some slight alterations that are found necessary and desirable for the working of the Act. The principal amendment is to subject food and drugs for cattle, and fertilisers for manuring purposes, to the same analysis as food and drugs for human purposes. Fertilisers, in the interests of those who purchase them, should be subject to be analysed and put under the same regulations as articles mentioned in the Act of 1884.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is unfortunate the hon, gentleman should propose to press the second reading of a Bill of this description so shortly after it has come before the House. The Bill has gone through the Senate, and therefore has to go through its final stage here. It affects a number of trades, and some little time should be given to members for receiving communications from those who are interested in the measure, so that we may be able to thoroughly dispose of it and avoid the necessity of further amendment later. If I have persons engaged in any business in my constituency which would be affected by this measure, I deem it my duty to send them a copy of the Bill so as to receive their suggestions, but if the Bill is to go through now that will be entirely impracticable.

Mr. McLELAN. The Bill was before Parliament last year and considerably discussed. It has been before the Senate some time, and I think a knowledge of the amendments proposed has been communicated to all parties interested in the trade. As there is a sum of money to be provided for, we will have, before finally disposing of the Bill, to go into Committee the second time on the resolution, so that I think there is no undue haste in the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. The committee stage is the stage for discussion of this kind. The hon. gentleman says it was discussed last year. It did receive a certain amount of discussion, but it does not seem to have been perfectly understood—witness the present Bill.

power given to the Parliament of Canada to regulate pro- Mr. MILLS. This Bill is one of the class which we cedure in the courts established under that section. If it is have had before us this Session. There was the Sunday Observance Bill, the Factory Bill and this Bill. It seems to me they all involve the same principle. It seems to me this is a matter relating to property and civil rights. You propose to establish certain police regulations; it is the manner in which the property shall be held, owned and disposed of. You have no more right to interfere with a sale of property of this sort, personal property, than with the sale and disposal of land or horses. Fraud, so far as fraud is liable to be committed, is to be prevented, but that is a part of the business of the Local Legislatures, in these matters; they are authorised, under our constitution, to make such penal regulations as may be necessary for the enforcement of their own laws. The penalty attached to the placing of a label falsely representing the weights or contents of a package is a police regulation. It is no portion of the criminal law. It is for the purpose of regulating the transfer of property of a certain kind from one party to another. It is an attempt to protect one party from fraud on the part of another, and a proposition to punish the guilty party for that offence. It is simply a police regulation, and it seems to me that it is not within the jurisdiction of this House, but clearly within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature.

Bill read the second time; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. BLAKE. Why does the hon. gentleman mix up food and fertilisers in the same Act?

Mr. McLELAN. Fertilisers are used to produce food.

Mr. BLAKE. A great many things are used to produce

Mr. McLELAN. We have to manufacture fertilisers and analyse them, and provide that farmers may not be robbed through the purchase of adulterated fertilisers.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not objecting to the principle of the Bill, but I object to mixing up my food with manure.

Mr. McLELAN. There is a connection between the two.

Mr. BLAKE. There are a great many things which are connected with one another in one sense, cause and effect and so forth, which, however, you do not mix together. The hon, gentleman can catch one of the most delicate fishes in the world, the brook trout, with a worm; he eats the trout and rejects the worm. Under these circumstances, I do not think the hon, gentleman has given any ground why we should mix up in the same Bill food and fertilisers. I do not think it is an instance of cleanly legislation.

Mr. DAVIES. I would like the hon. member to state wherein lies the necessity for this Bill. I understand it is subsidiary to the Bill passed last Session, and, so far as I have been able to compare them, the difference is very slight.

Mr. McLELAN. There are several minor differences which are shown in the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain the principle upon which the definition of agricultural fertilisers is based.

Mr. McLELAN, I do not know that there are any particular principles involved. The definition is taken in general terms from the Bill introduced by Mr. Ferguson, of Welland, respecting agricultural fertilisers.

Mr. BLAKE. It is very satisfactory to know that the hon. gentleman has adopted the definition of the hon. mem-ber for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) of the term "agricultural and take out the word "potash." When I passed the draft fertiliser," but I think it would be still more satisfactory if of the Bill about the adulteration of food to my hon. friend the hon, gentleman would explain the grounds upon which that definition is sdopted. It is very important to the general public that there should be a proper definition of agricultural fertilisers, and I think we ought to have some other assurance that this definition is correct, than that of the hon, member for Welland; we ought to have the assurance of the Government who is bringing forward this Bill as to the accuracy of the definition.

Mr. McLELAN. The definition has been submitted to the chief analyst and approved of by him as embracing all that is necessary to have placed in the Bill.

Mr. FISHER. In comparing these two Acts I find the definition is not the same. The definition in the Act now under consideration is that the word includes every substance composed of fertilising manure which is sold at more than $12 per ton, and which contains ammonia or its equivalent of nitrogen.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is twelve instead of ten in the amendment.

Mr. FISHER. It also includes potash instead of only ammonia or its equivalent of nitrogen or phosphoric acid.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The word "twelve" will be changed for ten, and the word "potash" will be taken away.

Mr. BLAKE. Then I understand the definition of the hon, member for Welland is not accepted in its entirety as infallible.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Bill of the hon, member for Welland has been accepted by the Government and there will be some amendments made to it.

Mr. BLAKE. When I asked the Minister to explain the ground of this definition he told me it was the definition of the Bill of the hon, member for Welland. Then I pointed out that it would be more satisfactory if we had some additional ground for that definition, and the hon. gentleman answered that it had been concurred in by the chief analyst. Now, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) points out that the definition in the Bill of the hon, member for Welland, although accepted by the Government, differs from the definition as contained in this Bill.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No, it does not.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, it does.

Mr. McLELAN. It differs as to the value.

Mr. BLAKE. It differs as to the ingredients, too.

Mr. McLELAN. As to only one.

Mr. BLAKE. Now we are told that these definitions are the same, and to have that persisted in, after the hon. member for Brome has read the clause, seems to me a little too much. The definition which the hon, gentleman says is the same is not a definition which declares that a fertiliser. to come within the Act, shall be sold at more than $12 a ton, when the definition in the Government Bill as to value is $10 a ton. The definition in the Act includes all fertilisers containing ammonia, or its equivalent of nitrogen, or potash, or phosphoric acid, and potash is left out altogether in this definition. These definitions therefore are not the same.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is so in the Bill of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman said there would be an amendment to the Bill of the Government.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is what I mean. It is not necessary to split hairs on so small a matter. The Bill of the Government will be amended in this respect and that is he said it must necessarily be read in connection with the Bill which the Government have before the House. Then the hon. member, a little prematurely, asked what was the definition of fertiliser, and he was answered that the definition was the same as the definition in the Government Bill, but I forgot to say that the measure of the Government will be amended by changing the value from twelve to ten, and by taking out the word "potash." I may here mention that fertiliser in the Bill will not include all fertilisers sold. It is intended to ask that all those who want to have a certificate of inspection of commercial fertilisers will be obliged to give to the inspector of the Government a certificate of the manufacturer stating the ingredients of the fertiliser, and those ingredients will have to be of a certain quantity and value, otherwise that fertiliser will not be considered as a commercial fertiliser. Other fertilisers of the same quality might be sold, but not inspected. The Government does not intend to render inspection absolutely necessary, but those commercial fertilisers that will be sold as inspected will have to be of the grade and value mentioned.

Mr. FISHER. The necessity of having a preliminary discussion of the Bill before going into committee is evident. The Minister gave us an explanation which was erroneous. After some difficulty we have obtained an explanation which we can understand from the Secretary of State as regards this particular clause.

Mr. DAVIES. The Adulteration of Food Act was passed last year, and it extended simply to the food and drink of man. This year it is proposed to extend it to the food and drink of cattle as well. Has there been any information obtained by the Minister to lead him to make the change, or is it a mere experiment?

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know that there have been any special representations; but a study of the general question led us to the conclusion that it is desirable to guard against fraud with respect to cattle food.

Mr. DAVIES. Has it been brought to the attention of the Department that cattle food is largely adulterated, or is it proposed to take action to provide against adulteration?

Mr. McLELAN. It has been very frequently stated by parties that cattle food is adulterated; but I do not think any analyses have been made.

Mr. BLAKE. Have any representations been received from authorised bodies, such as agricultural societies, which take an interest in these very essential and important matters; or have representations been received from analysts, because it is possible they might desire to enlarge the scope of their investigations?

Mr. McLELAN. I am informed that agricultural societies do not usually take cognisance of such a matter as this, and that they do not deal with such matters. At all events, we have not had any representation from any agricultural society.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it from the analysts?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon, gentleman knows that for years both agriculturists and every person interested in this important branch of industy have been complaining of two things. First, that a great deal of the commercial or artificial fertilisers—

Mr. BLAKE. We are not talking about fertilisers but about food.

Mr. SPROULE. As one engaged in the selling of cattle I know that complaints are frequently made with respect to cattle food. Take oil cake; it is not what it purports to be, and much of it is practically worthless. In my county farmers constantly complain in regard to it, and many have abandoned the use of such foods, finding them of no value.

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Mr. DAVIES. The only question is whether it is adulterated food.

Mr. SPROULE. In regard to the oil cake, it often happens that the oil has been first abstracted through a process of heat and pressure; and this is sold as pure oil-cake when in reality it is only refuse.

Mr. FARROW. This is a subject of considerable importance to agriculturists. I have had a good deal of experience and have heard many suggestions in regard to it. These suggestions have come from practical agriculturists. They have also come from agricultural societies, both township and county. Our experience in this line is this: We have been using a great many of these foods, such as oil cake and cattle food, and we think they have not been doing the good to our stock that the vendors said they would do. There is a suspicion in the minds of agriculturists-I know it is so in my section of country-that they contain some worthless ingredients, and are not up to the mark. Farmers think it would be a very good thing if the Government would provide proper machinery to have those foods tested, so that a per article shall be supplied, for which very high prices are charged. There is a large industry of this class at Mitchell—I do not say they are turning out an inferior article—and a great many use the food. We have established a great many milk factories throughout our neighborhood. We have an establishment which manufactures over 100 tons of cheese a year. When the milk is carried to the factory the calves have to be fed on different foods, and we use oil cake and the foods mentioned in this Bill. We want to be sure we are buying a good article. That is the kernel of the whole thing. We, being simple agriculturists, cannot test these foods, and we want the Government to see that there is no fraud practised on the farmers. If this Bill will cover the point, the Government will be doing a wise

Mr. BLAKE. I was quite sure that the Minister was wrong when he said this was not a subject with which agricultural societies as a general rule interfered.

Mr. McLELAN. I said they had not taken it up in any communication to the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman said more than that. He said that agricultural societies did not generally deal with such matters. This matter is so vitally connected with agricultural operations, particularly in the Province of Ontario and in some of the other Provinces, I was quite sure those associations would have dealt with the subject if there was a grievance. My own information, derived from the newspapers, is that occasionally cattle foods are sold which do not contain quite so much nutritious element as they should do. With respect to the particular case of oil cake: it may be perhaps a little difficult to ascertain the precise line at which there may be said to be an absence of the nutritious element. Oil cake is the refuse after the oil for commercial purposes has been extracted. Complaints have been made that too much oil is taken out of the oil cake. And there is but little oil left in it. Whether it will be easy to draw the line in that regard, and determine whether enough oil has been left in the cake or not, I am afraid I cannot say, and I am afrad it will puzzle the analyst to determine. Of course, when you put in something else, which is either noxious or not useful and adds to the bulk, that is a different thing.

Mr. SPROULE. If the manufacturer is to take out a certain quantity of oil and no more, then it would be an easy matter for the analyst to determine whether there is the proper proportion.

Mr. BLAKE. Who is to decide?

Mr. SPROULE. The analyst, of course.

Mr. BLAKE. And what is the rate or proportion to be?

Mr. SPROULE. If the Government authorises a certain proportion, it would be easy for the analyst to determine whether the proportion is there or not.

Mr. BLAKE. This Bill makes no provision as to the percentage of oil which should remain, and the other Bill is about fertilisers and not food, and we must not mix them up too much.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The deterioration in the quality of the oil cake is largely due to the fact that recently very much improved methods have been discovered of extracting the oil from linseed, and of course the oil cake depreciates more in quality. And the more successful the manufacturer is in extracting the oil, the more inferior will be the quality of the refuse.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will find that section 19 fixes the limit as to the amount of oil it shall contain.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, as that applies only to compounds in which it may not be possible to be accurate in the ingredients to the last fraction, and therefore a certain limit of variability is fixed. It would not apply in a case of refuse upon the manufacture of linseed oil.

Mr. SPROULE. These cattle foods contain so much of different ingredients, such as corn meal, linseed cake, and so on. Now, if they contain too much of that which is comparatively useless and not enough of the more valuable ingredients, the quantities could be determined, and a percentage of oil could be ascertained as well.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not discussing anything but this question of oil cake, which, as I understand, is the refuse which is left in the operation of extracting the linseed oil, and what the manufacturer does is to extract as much oil as he can out of it. That is his trade, and what is left is sold to the farmers, and you are not going to pass a law that the manufacturer must not take as much oil out as he can. The farmer must know in this particular case that he gets only what the manufacturer is unable to extract, and if the methods of extraction are more perfect, the less oil is left.

Mr. FISHER. The same is true with reference to the refuse from flour. Some years ago bran was of great value as cattle food; but in consequence of the new process of extracting flour, what is left now is of very little value. I think, however, that adulteration by the introduction of buckwheat hulls, or other matter of that kind, could be provided against; but I cannot see how you can limit the quantity of oil to be extracted from the linseed.

In the case of adulterating these Mr. McLELAN. mixtures by buckwheat hulls, plaster of Paris, and other matters of that kind, the provision would apply.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong, when he assumes that there is only the amount of oil lett which cannot be extracted. It can be bought of different qualities, by paying different prices; and the question for the analyst would be, whether the percentage is present that is represented.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). What is known technically as cattle food, is a different preparation altogether from what is called oil cake, and I think it is in the case of those foods that the Bill will be valuable. There has been a great tendency of late years to use condiments or mix-tures containing more or less stimulating ingredients, and these are fed in limited quantities along with other food, in fattening stock. These are capable of very much adultera- likely to be carried into effect, tion, because they are compounded with certain drugs which have a chemical effect on the cattle, and are much more valuable than the coarser ingredients of linseed cake, and other cheaper articles which give it bulk. While of course, the manufacturer will extract all the oil he can out of the linseed, there is no doubt the refuse can be made much less valuable by mixing inferior ingredients with it, and perhaps that kind of adulteration might be looked

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman stated that this has been amended by the omission of that part which prescribes an intimation as to the component parts of the admixture. The trade objected to that, on the score that it involved the revealing of trade secrets, and it was deemed enough to say mixture. We know that a very large portion of these articles are mixtures under any circumstances, and the mere statement as to that class of them which are confessedly mixtures, that they are mixtures, would not reveal the existence of the evil which the Minister desires to avoid. Of course, when an article professes to be some one thing and not a mixture, then the announcement in a conspicuous place that it is a mixture, ought to indicate that it is an adulteration of some kind. I would like also to know whether the legislation we passed last year to require the statement of the component parts of an article was based on any precedent, or was original with ourselves.

Mr. McLELAN. Last year's legislation was our own; this year's legislation is founded on the English system.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the tariff of 1 per cent. been obtained from other legislation, or is it wholly experimental?

Mr. McLELAN. That is the percentage in the American Act on the same subject.

On section 3,

With regard to persons appointed as Mr. CASEY. analysts, I think there should be some limitation to persons possessing a medical degree or some degree in chemistry.

Mr. McLELAN. This is a re-enactment of the old Act.

Mr. CASEY. Whether it is new or old, I think some certificate should be required as to the analyst's knowledge of chemistry.

Mr. McLELAN. The clause provides that they must be persons possessing competent medical, chemical and microscopical knowledge, and that is only ascertained by the certificate they bear.

Mr. CASEY. That leaves the Minister to determine their competency.

Mr. FISHER. Is there any limit or guide as to the number of these analysts who may be appointed? If there is no such limit, I would like the hon. Minister to give us some information.

Mr. McLELAN. The number appointed is only limited by the wants of trade. They are provided in most of the commercial centres where business demands them.

Mr. CASEY. There is no limit in the Bill, but the Minister must surely know how many he intends to appoint.

Mr. McLELAN. There are eight now. It is not proposed at present to increase the number.

On section 6,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask the Minister if he is aware whether any of the municipalities have availed themselves of the provisions of this statute and appointed an inspector.

Mr. McLELAN. None of them have taken action yet. But the matter has been discussed in several of them and is

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Under the provisions of section 5, the Government seem to have the power to appoint their officers to do this duty, and in section 6 the power is given to councils. What object has the Government in taking power to do this, and at the same time giving the power to municipalities? Has the Government deputed any of its officers in the different divisions to perform the duties that are required under this Act?

Mr. McLELAN. The municipalities will appoint the officers.

Mr. PATERSON. I think the provision of the Act requires that the fines and penalties imposed shall go into the public treasury. The city, town, county or village will appoint the inspector. His salary will no doubt depend upon the fees collected. How is the payment of these inspectors to be provided for?

Mr. McLELAN. Section 4 provides that all penalties imposed and recovered by the inspector shall be paid into the revenue of the city, town, county or village, and be distributed in such manner as the council of such city, etc., may direct. No doubt the city or the municipality will therefore arrange to pay him for his services.

Mr. PATERSON. The civic council may appoint a man and declare that he shall have for payment such fees as are imposed, and he might make it troublesome to dealers in order to get all the fees he could. I do not wish to say anything against the Bill, for I believe it is in the right direction, but I merely point out a danger that might arise if the salary of the officer depends upon the collection of

Mr. McLELAN. I presume each municipality will make such regulations as will meet the case. I do not think there is danger of the dealers being harassed under the operations of this Bill. The officer may get a percentage of the fees and penalties with a regular allowance.

Mr. PATERSON. According to sub-section 3, the inspector may prosecute "any persons manufacturing, selling, offering or exposing for sale" adulterated goods. The difficulty is this: The dealer buys the goods in good faith from the wholesale man who has bought them in good faith from the manufacturer. Sub-section 2, of section 23, provides that if the person accused proves he did not know of the article being adulterated and shows that he could not, with reasonable diligence, have acquired that knowledge, he will be only liable for the costs attending the prosecution. I think he should have recourse against the manufacturer for the costs, because the manufacturer could not fail to know in the first instance if the article was adulterated.

Mr. McLELAN. He would have that recourse in common law.

Mr. PATERSON. That would answer the purpose.

Mr. FISHER. There might be some trouble where the official was obliged to proceed immediately against the wholesaler, with whom the retailer had shown the fault to be.

Mr. CASEY. If the goods were imported by the retailer, in good faith, from outside the country, he would have no remedy.

Mr. FISHER. If the retailer imports from abroad, is he not to be responsible for the sale? We cannot get at the manufacturer, and I should suppose the importer from a foreign manufacturer would be held responsible for the adulteration.

Mr. CASEY. I do not know that the importer could always in fairness he held responsible. A punishment could Mr. McLelan.

providing that, when goods manufactured by a person outside of Canada have been shown to be adulterated, notice should be given to all Customs officials that the importation of that article was prohibited for the future.

Mr. FISHER. I emphatically differ with my hon. friend from Elgin. If the importer is allowed to bring in adulterated goods and sell them without being subject to a penalty, he will always be getting goods from the foreigner to the detriment of our own manufacturers.

Mr. McLELAN. I think that is provided for in clauses 20 and 21.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It will not do to put down our own manufacturers at a disadvantage, and I hope the Secretary of State will bring his legal knowledge to bear on this matter so as to prevent any injury being done.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We could not prosecute people outside the country, but I think that a wholesale merchant importing from abroad, who is protected by the certificate of analysis which he receives, will have his remedy against the manufacturer from whom he imports.

Mr. FISHER. Hon, gentlemen opposite have taken the manufacturers of this country under their charge in one sense, and have done a good deal to protect them. Now, here is an opportunity where we can protect our manufacturers in a legitimate manner, an opportunity where protection is absolutely necessary. If we allow a wholesale dealer in this country to import from abroad a manufactured article and sell it, knowing that in doing so he is less liable to prosecution than if he buys the same article from a Canadian manufacturer, the wholesale dealer has an inducement to go abroad for that article, which might be adulterated. I think it is but just to our manufacturers that the wholesale dealer importing from abroad should be put on the same basis as the manufacturer in this country.

Mr. McLELAN. It is the intention of the Government to put that in the Bill. However, it is a matter about which I will have enquiry made, and see that it is put beyond doubt in the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. There is no proviso here at all giving the retailer recourse against anybody. Clause 20 would apply practically, only to the retailer. Supposing a retailer here at Ottawa offered for sale a case which he had purchased from a wholesaler in Montreal. If the Government found that these goods which were in his possession were adulterated, they could be seized, but no penalty could be inflicted upon the wholesaler in Montreal who supplied him with the goods, unless somebody else took action against that wholesaler by having some goods in his possession inspected and proved to be adulterated. Sub-section 2, of clause 23, certainly seems to have absolved that retailer from all penalties when he can show that he did not know the article was adulterated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would ask the Secretary of State what he thinks with reference to sections 20 and 21, whether they are interfered with by the provision in subsection 2 of section 23.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have not taken special care of this Bill, and hence my reticence in speaking about it. But in the Bill of which I have charge, there is a similar clause which I think ought to be dropped altogether, as it would afford no protection. If the retail merchant sells an article at more than $10 a ton which does not contain, at the minimum, the ingredients mentioned in the Act, he cannot plead that he did not know it, because he is obliged to ascertain. He sells it at his own risk, and if he sells it he will be liable to prosecution and fine. In the Bill of which I have charge, before you sell you are obliged to be inflicted upon the fraudulent foreign manufacturer by show to the purchaser the certificate of analysis of the article you are selling, and if the certificate proves to be wrong you are liable to fine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see a difficulty which does not seem to be provided against. An inspector enters a retail store and finds an adulterated article, which he seizes, and certain penalties follow. Then we propose to relieve him from paying the penalty, and that he shall only pay the cost. If that were done, there would be relief to that extent for the retail merchant, but the retail merchant would not be likely to prosecute the wholesale man. Then the wholesale man may contend that he bought the article in good faith from the manufacturer, and perhaps he did, but nevertheless he would have to pay costs. The wholesale man would say to the manufacturer: The article I purchased from you has been proved to be adulterated. I showed I bought it in good faith, but nevertheless, I have to pay costs, and you will either have to pay me the costs or I will have to prosecute you for it. The person from whom he bought, knowing it to be adulterated, would quietly hand in the costs, and so there would be no punishment for adulteration. Here is obviously a difficulty which the Secretary of State does not seem to have provided against.

Mr. McLELAN. I will have the matter considered by legal minds in order to ascertain whether anything additional is required to effect the purpose we all have in view, before the final stage is taken.

On section 9,

Mr. CASEY. A schedule of the articles exempted should have been prepared and appended to the Bill. It is contrary to good practice and exact legislation to pass so many Bills as we do leaving schedules to be adopted by Order in Council. The officers of the Department do not know so much about the business of the country as do members of the House.

Mr. McLELAN. New articles are being constantly brought into use, and the schedule would have to be constantly amended.

Mr. CASEY. Of course specific articles could not be put in, but I think there might be such a classification of articles as would include them all, as, for example, hermetically sealed and opened. I did not object to the frequent amendment of the Bill, though perhaps some one else did; but if so, it arises from putting the Bill through in an imperfect form in the first instance.

On section 11,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That dispenses with giving notice to the person, as the old Act required. What was the reason for dropping it?

Mr. McLELAN. We intend that the local analyst shall not know whose goods he is analysing, and for that reason the notice has been dropped.

On section 12,

Mr. MILLS. This is determining a person's civil rights, not by an ordinary judicial tribunal, but by an irresponsible person.

Mr. CASEY. The chief analyst is appointed to exercise the functions of a judge, with a special scientific knowledge of the case, and I do not see why there should be any reference to the Minister, except to subject the Minister to a great amount of worry and solicitation by persons whose goods are condemned, and to put the Minister in a very invidious position.

Mr. McLELAN. Cases might arise in which the chief the purity of food offered for sale—a court of two grades, analyst on scientific principles might condemn a certain the analyst and the chief analyst. After these chemists article, and subject the offender to very heavy penalties, have analysed the article and decided it to be pure or im-while there might be mitigating circumstances which ought to be considered by the Minister.

Mr. CASEY. The remarks of the hon, gentleman only confirm my opinion as to the objectionable nature of this clause. This Bill provides for the case of certain mitigating circumstances, and there might be others put in the Bill if necessary. It is left in the other clauses of the Bill to the analyst to determine the facts, and to a court to determine whether the mitigating circumstances exist, but here an irresponsible party is empowered to take cognisance of mitigating circumstances not mentioned in the Bill. If there are mitigating circumstances they should not be left to the judgment of a political Minister, who is not himself an expert, but should be made part of the law. It will lead to all sorts of political and personal pressure being brought to bear on him, which if he resists will make him enemies, while, if he gives way to the pressure, he will be doing an injustice. I think this provision should be struck out of the Bill.

Mr. McLELAN. I have no doubt it would contribute to the comfort and ease of the Minister not to have this appeal, but I think it is proper that there should be some final decision or else great hardship might be inflicted.

Mr. CASEY. Two analysts must have found the drug to be adulterated before the Minister can intervene, and how can a Minister who is not a chemist revise that decision? How could the Minister presume to revise his decision as to the purity of the drug? That is absurd—the Minister will not do so; he will simply say, the article being found to be adulterated, whether the penalties of the law should be inflicted on the person who manufactured or sold it.

Mr. DAVIES. I fail to understand the effect of section 12. Section 11 provides that when an analyst has analysed an article and declared it to be adulterated, his certificate may be given in evidence in a court of law on a prosecution for the recovery of the penalty, subject to the right of the party prosecuted to cross-examine him before that court. But by section 12, if an appeal is made to the chief analyst, and the chief analyst makes his decision, which is concurred in by the Minister, that decision is declared to be final, and there is no provision that the certificate of the chief analyst shall be brought in in evidence at all. I would like to know from some of the law advisers of the Government what is to be the effect of that provision.

Mr. BLAKE Perhaps the hon. Minister would state whether this clause is based on any English legislation.

Mr. McLELAN. I am not aware that it was taken from English legislation, but it was adopted by Parliament last Session. I suppose that the certificate of the chief analyst would stand in the same position as the certificate of the other analyst, and would be used in the same way in the prosecution. The word "final" in section 12 I take to mean that process by which the certificate is reached is final.

Mr. DAVIES. There is nothing which makes the certificate itself evidence. The decision may have to be proved otherwise.

Mr. CASEY. I think the question of the hon leader of the Opposition, as to whether this proposal to make the decision of the chief analyst subject to the concurrence of the Minister was derived from English legislation, must have been rather satirical. I think it would be absurd to look into any statute of England, where legislation generally goes on the basis of common sense, for any such provision as this. This is a Bill practically to establish a court to try the purity of food offered for sale—a court of two grades, the analyst and the chief analyst. After these chemists have analysed the article and decided it to be pure or impure, as the case may be, and have given their certificates to the Minister of Inland Revenue, all appearance of common sense vanishes from the Bill, and we are told that the Minister is to revise that decision and find out whether the article is chemically pure or not. Nothing can be more absurd or mischievous than to give a Minister power to cancel a certificate of adulteration made by the chief analyst. That is what he will be asked to do time and again; he will never be asked to cancel a certificate of purity; but when a certificate is given by the chief analyst that so and so's goods are adulterated, and that so and so will become liable to heavy penalties, the Minister is to take into account, as he says himself, the "mitigating circumstances," and by the light of these he is to decide, not whether the man should pay a penalty or not, but whether the article is pure or not. That is to be decided by the mitigating circumstances, and the only reason the Minister gives for this provision is that it was passed last Session. There were a great many bad precedents set by the legislation of last Session, and if this escaped attention at that time, that is no reason why it should escape now. The only effect of this section is to give the Minister power to let off persons who are certified by the two analysts to be liable to the penalty. If the Minister is weak, it will only defeat the ends of justice, and if he is strong, it will go far to defeat the Government. To avoid any such dilemma, I move:

That the words, "if concurred in by the Minister," be struck out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see that in the Act passed last Session, there was a sub-section to the clause providing:

"This section shall not have force or effect until a chief analyst is appointed, to whom an appeal under this section can be made.

That is not found in the present Act. I would take that as an indication that the chief analyst had either been appointed or was to be appointed after the 1st of July, when this comes into effect.

Mr. McLELAN. The chief analyst has been appointed.

Mr. PATERSON. The provision that the decision of the chief analyst, if concurred in by the Minister, shall be final, may give rise, it seems to me, to difficulty. I do not see why the words, "concurred in by the said Minister," should be there. The clause provides that the party proceeded against shall have the right of appealing from the decision of the first analyst to that of the chief analyst. If the two concur, I think the decision should be final, and in that respect this amendment has my support. If they do not concur, there might then be occasion for reference to the Minister.

Mr. DAVIES. That would be very improper. The question is simply whether the article is pure or impure. analyst says it is impure. From that decision you appeal to the chief analyst, and he either affirms or reverses it. In either event, it is not a fact of which the Minister has cognisance, for he is not an analyst. He ought not to have the power of reviewing the decision of the chief analyst. The amendment is a good one. The decision of the chief analyst should not be prejudiced by that of the Minister, who has not the means of knowledge on the subject, and the party against whom a decision may be given should not be allowed to escape through, perhaps, political influ-

Mr. McLELAN. Suppose that the first analyst declares that one of the ingredients is impure. The vendor takes exception to that and appeals to the chief analyst. declares that the ingredient complained of is pure, but that some other ingredient is impure, and the article should therefore be condemned. There is a difference of opinion upon the different ingredients of the article. In that case the Minister would no doubt inform himself on the subject from competent people outside and give his decision. I am every other kind of property. We may say the agriculturist Mr. CASEY.

sure however the daty is not one that the Minister is anxious to have imposed on him, and I have no doubt my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue would be glad to be relieved from it.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES. I suggest to the Minister that, if he intends this section to be workable, the certificate given by the chief analyst should be made evidence, which it is not

Amendment agreed to.

On section 13,

Mr. CASEY. Is it contemplated to publish the names of the persons whose goods have been examined and found to be adulterated?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Mr. CASEY. It is a question whether it would not be a part of the well deserved punishment of those who sell adulterated goods to have their names published, excluding the honestly ignorant retailer who is exempt from the other penalties of the Act, but referring to the wicked and mischievous fabricator of the adulterated goods.

Mr. McLELAN. We might insert "and the names of the vendors."

Mr. MILLS. It has been reported to me that a manufacturer of spice and coffee receives orders for packages of ground coffee at a price named which is less than the actual price of the unground coffee. It is known that chickory or roasted beans or peas must be put into the article, and it is manufactured to supply a demand. People know they are not getting a pure article. Everyone is informed of the fact, and one manufacturer in the city of London told me that, if he were to observe the law, he would have to close his establishment.

Mr. McLELAN. No, he would label it "coffee with bean mixture."

Mr. CASEY. I hope the amendment will exclude the name of anyone innocent of wilful adulteration under the

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Oxford). I hope the Minister will agree to that amendment. The names of innocent parties might be published to the world, and I cannot see that any benefit would accrue to the public from the adoption of such a change.

Mr. McLELAN. I will allow the clause to stand over, in order to see if the views of hon, gentlemen can be met.

Mr. DAVIES. I agree with the member for Elgin that the clause would be worthless unless the public were informed where they could find articles that were not adulterated. The object of the Act is to punish men who adulterate food, but we should be careful in punishing the guilty not to implicate an innocent man.

Mr. FISHER. I do not see how an innocent man can be hurt, because it is only when adulteration is found to exist that a report is made.

Mr. McLELAN. At present the names of the parties who have adulterated foods or drugs are published in the report.

On section 15,

Mr. MILLS. I am not going to detain the committee by arguing the question of jurisdiction, but that question does arise in many of these sections. There is nothing we are doing here to interfere with the manner in which a person shall only sow a particular kind of wheat, that he shall not engage in raising a particular breed of cattle, and that if he does he shall be liable to punishment; or, if he wishes to sell them, he shall bring them into market in a particular way. In all these cases we are interfering with the possession of property, with the manner in which it shall be held and disposed of. Now, I say in all these matters we are interfering with the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures in matters of property and civil rights. I defy any member of the committee to show in what respect the Local Legislatures shall have control over property and civil rights, if we have here power to do what we are undertaking to do in this matter. We are undertaking to say how property shall be held, and the condition on which it shall be offered for sale. We undertake to say whether certain kinds of property or products shall be mixed, and what sort of inspection they shall be subject to. I say these are all outside our jurisdiction. They are not within our functions, they are questions as to the possession of property, the protection of property, and the protection of the civil rights of the community. They are not matters as to the regulation of trade at all. They are not matters regulating commerce, but they are regulating the rights of property, the mode of its transfer, and the civil right of the party with whom the property holder for the time being undertakes to deal. It does seem to me we are wholly outside our jurisdiction; and no matter whether the legislation is wise or unwise, it is legislation that ought not to be undertaken by this Parliament, but by the Local Legislatures.

Mr. DAVIES. I have never been able myself to entertain any clear opinion as to what legislation is within the local jurisdiction or not, since the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Russell vs. The Queen. They based their decision on the right of this Parliament to enact the Scott Act on the ground it was comprised in the words "peace, order and good government of Canada." I think the question is, at any rate, debatable, and at first blush would commend itself to my mind as a matter that would be in the power of this Parliament to legislate upon in the direction of preventing the general adultera-tion of food, and would come within the words "peace, order and good government of Canada," as much as the liquor traffic—I should think so when taken in connection with the sub-section of section 91, Trade and Commerce. There is, of course, a great deal in what my hon, friend from Bothwell says; but since the decision of the Privy Council a wider opening has been given to the powers of this Parliament, and we base them to a large extent upon those words more than we did formerly. It does seem to me that it is for the good government of Canada that we should have the power to legislate against the adulteration of food. Of course, we all agree there is no more important subject than the prevention of the adulteration of food and drink, and it can hardly be contended that the prevention of adulteration is purely a civil right. I think it comes within the power of this Parliament.

Mr. McLELAN. I think when there is a difference of opinion on this question it is our duty in the meantime to see that the people are not being poisoned, and we ought not to wait until this question is settled. The hon member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), has just said that it is a matter of great moment that the food and drink of the people shall not be adulterated. I certainly think it is, and therefore I think we ought to go on and prevent that adulteration.

Mr. MILLS. I would just say in reply to my hon friend from Queen's that the question of jurisdiction arises in every section of the Bill, and I do not think that the rule more than one-fourth. But what I mean is that the article laid down by the Privy Council in The Queen vs. Russell, applies to this case.

Mr. POPE. The hon, gentleman has no right to discuss a constitutional question on the clauses of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I am discussing the question of jurisdiction, and it is pertinent on every clause. Now, in that case, the Privy Council said that the punishment of offences against the law with regard to the sale of liquor might come within the jurisdiction of the Provinces if it could be shown that the Provinces had jurisdiction over the subject matter; but unfortunately the parties who were engaged in arguing the case on behalf of the Provinces, did not seem to know that that would be a subject coming within provincial jurisdiction. If that fact had been shown it is clear from the observations made by the Lords of Council, they would have held that it was within provincial jurisdiction. If I had the case here I could read the particular words used by the Lords of Council to show that that was the view they held, and it was because the parties who appeared on behalf of the Provinces failed to show that the judgment was given as it was—at all events that is a somewhat different case from this. It was a question of police regulation throughout the entire Dominion. This is a question relating to property, it is an attempt to protect the purchaser against fraud on the part of the vendor. The relation between the vendor and purchaser is a civil right. This is not a measure for the preservation of peace and good order and good government, to prevent riots and bloodshed or the disturbance of the peace, but for the purpose of regulating the relations between vendor and purchaser, and is an attempt to protect the purchaser against fraud on the part of the vendor. That, I repeat, is purely a civil right and as such is within the jurisdiction of the Provinces.

On section 17,

Mr. CASEY. I think some provision should be inserted in this clause to provide that not more than a certain proportion of fusil oil should be put in whiskey. I desire to enquire whether the schedule covers all chemical ingredients that are put into whiskey.

Mr. McLELAN. Additions can be made to the schedule. On section 19,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want the Minister to consider this point. The object of the Bill is not absolutely to prevent persons selling articles composed in part of ingredients which lessen the value of what purports to be the main article. Take, for instance, the article of coffee. If chicory or some other foreign substance is found in it, it would be an adulterated article within the meaning of the Act. Well, if a person wanted a twenty cent coffee it would include a certain proportion of chicory, and what is to prevent the manufacturer from putting in a larger quantity and selling it at the same price? I think it might be arranged that there should be certain grades, as I believe there are in England, according to the quantity of the innocent foreign article introduced, and that the purchaser might be secured in not paying for a grade ranking higher than the actual quantity of the admixture would entitle it to rank-whether, in fact, it was an article largely adulterated or slightly adulterated.

Mr. McLELAN. I think section 19, prescribing the limits of variability, would meet the case, as it would provide for different standards. It provides also that where there are not existing standards, they may be prescribed by notice in the Gazette.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It seems to me that the language of the clause would hardly cover what I mean. I can understand that under that clause the Governor in Council might say that coffee must not be adulterated, say shall be so labelled that the purchaser will know that he is buying not only adulterated coffee or confectionery but the amount of the adulteration—the amount of the harmless foreign article which is included in it.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the point would be covered by stipulating that the person selling any of these mixtures should state on each package in what proportion the different ingredients are there.

Mr. WELLS. Suppose they are not in packages?

Mr. CASEY. Of course there would be some difficulty then.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not think that it would be possible to carry out that idea without a great deal of trouble and expense to the dealer, in the way of stamping standards and so on. I think it would be better that such articles should be declared exempt from the Act unless they are labelled mixtures.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That would render the whole clause valueless.

Mr. CASEY. The whole Bill proceeds on the principle that the purchaser has a right to know what he is buying, and if he has that right with regard to simple substances, he surely has the same right to know the ingredients of mixtures. Now, a great majority of the articles sold are mixtures of non-hurtful substances—there are different grades of tea, coffee, and so on. I do not see any difficulty in providing that each package of a mixture should be labelled with a statement of the proportion in which the different articles enter into it. For instance, a pound of 20c. coffee mixture might be labelled three parts coffee, one part chicory. I think one-fourth or one-fifth would be a low enough standard, and it would not give too much work to the Department to make up these grades.

Mr. McLELAN. That would embarrass dealers very greatly. It would lead to endless trouble in labelling all the various grades of goods, although it might be in the interest of the public.

Mr. CASEY. If the grades were established, dealers would have sets of labels, such as coffee mixture No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, and so on. I do not think the amount of trouble to be undergone is any reason for shirking that trouble. If we are going to provide for the inspection of food at all, we must make it thorough, no matter what it costs.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It does seem to me that, without some condition of this kind, the whole usefulness of that part of the Act will be destroyed. It is important that when goods are put on the market the person purchasing them should know whether he is getting value for his money or not. We contemplate saying to the manufacturer: You shall have the opportunity of adulterating your goods, provided the adulteration is not injurious to health; but it reduces the value of the goods, and therefore we make it incumbent upon you, in proportion as you reduce the value, to state on your label the quantity of the foreign ingredient that you have introduced. For instance, if the article is coffee, let the manufacturer be required to label it "coffee mixture, three-fourths pure." If on an analysis it is found to contain more than one fourth of the foreign ingredient, he shall be held to have violated the Act. This seems to me so important that I think an effort should be made to accomplish it; and in this way you will accomplish it without any hardship on the manufacturer, and you will do away with that competition which exists among the manufacturers, and which leads them to reduce the price of the article sold by increasing the quantity of the foreign substance in it. The tendency will also be to induce people to demand a pure article, which will be in the interest of both the trade and the consumer,

Mr. McLELAN. This matter will be considered by the House, and if it is the sense of the House that that should second subsection or not?

Mr. FISHER. Does the House, and if it is the sense of the House that that should second subsection or not?

be adopted, and that it would not be too onerous to the trade to require the exact proportions of foreign substance to be specified, I have no objection to its being added to the Bill.

Mr. KRANZ. I believe that for practical purposes it is not necessary to distinguish the various grades of adulteration; we should only distinguish between pure goods and adulterated goods. We want our people to use pure goods; we want them to give them pure coffee; if they want to adulterate it they can do so for themselves; but if an article is adulterated, it is immaterial to know how far the adulteration has taken place.

Mr. MILLS. If we have power to deal with the subject at all, there can be no possible objection in requiring the quantity of the foreign ingredient to be indicated. For instance, a dealer in the country orders from a manufacturer of coffee so much ground coffee, worth so much; he wants to get an article suited to the demand; he knows that pure coffee cannot be obtained for the price he is willing to pay; he knows beforehand that it is adulterated, but it is important that the public at large should know. There can be no objection therefore that the manufacturers should mark on the packages the quantities in the mixture.

Mr. KRANZ. I think it would be very difficult to find out the extent of the adulteration.

On section 20,

Mr. CASEY. There is a provision in this section which may act harshly on the vendor. Articles of the same nature is rather a wide description. For instance, if a sample of adulterated coffee were found in a store, a strict construction of this clause would allow the excise to seize not only all the coffee adulterated but all the other coffee. The sample is subject to analysis; it may take some time before it will be analysed and in the meantime the vendor will be subject to the seizure.

Mr. McLELAN. We will insert the words " of the same kind and quality."

Mr. DAVIES. There will be some difficulty in carrying that out. The Minister might rather state with other articles of the same nature which belong to another person and which are found in the same place at another time. If a package is seized for analysis it may take some time before it is analysed, and when the excise officer went to seize the balance it might be sold or have been taken away; and to prevent the seizure of other coffee obtained since then, I would suggust that the words "which may have been in the place which at the time when the articles was seized," replace those in the Bill.

Mr. WILSON. How is the officer going to prove that the article was there at the time. It would be very difficult for him to prove that or for the vendor to prove it was not there. This will be thoroughly impracticable. While we are perfectly willing to provide that no article should be adulterated, we ought not to embarrass the trader, and I think we are throwing sufficient difficulties around him already, and ought not to place him in such a position when there is really no necessity for it.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resoved itself into Committee.

On section 22,

Mr. FISHER. Does the Minister intend to include the second sub section or not?

Mr. McLELAN. I propose to leave it in the Bill. I stated to the hon, gentleman before recess that I would get the opinion of the Minister of Justice on certain points raised by gentlemen opposite in connection with this sub. and the expenses of the office. section, and some other clauses.

On section 25,

Mr. FISHER. I think when it is specified that a person knowingly attaches the label, $5 is a very small bottom limit for the penalty.

Mr. McLELAN. It may be $50.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but it may be only $5. It seems to me $50 would not be too much.

Mr. McLELAN, Make it not less than $50 nor more than $200.

Mr. FISHER. I think that would be going a little too far in the other direction.

Mr. McLELAN. I propose that it should be "not exceeding $100 and not less than $20."

Mr. WILSON. I think that is a very large penalty. I think the clause as it stood answered all the purposes of Amendmet agreed to; and committee arose and reported progress.

CULLING AND MEASURING TIMBER.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 2419) to amend the Acts relating to the culling and measuring of timber in Ontario and Quebec.

Motion agreed to; and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McLELAN. In 1877 there was an amendment to the Act regulating the cullers, and provision was made for reducing the number, as it was found that the number was greater than the wants of the trade called for. At that time there were about sixty cullers on the list; that number was reduced, some of them were retired on annuities, and the number was fixed for square timber. It is still found that the number of licensed cullers is greater than the wants of the trade require. There are now 47 cullers, and it is proposed to reduce the number to 33 to be in active service, limiting the number of deal cullers to 12; and also it is proposed to retire certain of them on annuities. It has been found in practice that while some of them earn large amounts, others receive a very small income, owing to the mode in which dealers select their cullers. It is true that every culler who is licensed is compelled to take his turn in the office and to wait till his turn arrives. But merchants sometimes arrange so as to get the man they prefer by giving a small order to the man, for instance, who goes on to-day, and another small order to the man who is on to-morrow, and the day after their man would come on and they would give him a large order. And so it went on, and a few cullers earned a great deal while others earned a comparatively small amount. The average pay to cullers last year was over $800, and it is proposed to regulate their employment and to make a uniform salary of $700. The expenses connected with the office are proposed to be raised from the services performed and from timber fees to be regulated according to Order in Council, based upon the expenses which it is desired to cover. There has been in past years a considerable surplus, in consequence of which the fees were lowered, and it is proposed to give the Governor | the hon. gentleman ought to be prepared to give us figures in Council power to change the fees from time to time in order to meet the expenditure that may be incurred, either in the payment of annuities, or of the salaries of the callers,

Mr. BLAKE. Have any communications been received from the trade in respect to this proposed change?

Mr. McLELAN. The lumber trade is not so much interested, perhaps, in this proposition as the cullers themselves. It is proposed to put them upon a more uniform basis whilst securing equal results.

Mr. BLAKE. No doubt the cullers are interested, but the trade is also, because I well remember when this subject was a burning subject, and when the present Auditor General, who represented a lumber constituency, and my hon. friend from the other riding of Renfrew (Mr. White), and several other hon. members, used to engage in considerable discussion, which culminated in the passing of the Act to which the hon, gentleman has alluded. It cortainly was at that time considered an object of some consequence to the trade. Thb hon, gentleman has stated a plan by which the trade could obtain its favorite cullers from time to time, and he seems to point out some mischiefs which have resulted—that some of the cullers got too much and others too little; and he says it is proposed to regulate their employment by authorising the Governor in Council to provide for a mode in which the work shall be done. Of course, that may be a very important matter, a very serious matter, for the trade. The hon, gentleman proposes to retire a certain number of men who are at present on active service. How is it proposed that the requirements shall be effected? Does he propose to leave it to the Governor in Council to choose the persons who shall be retired? The result will be the addition of a very large sum to the annual charges in regard to which no services are to be rendered by the annuitants, and the charges will have to be increased. This reduction of staff is in consequence of the trade having decayed, and we must take care not to increase too largely the charges on a decaying trade. In that view the trade has a considerable interest in the proposal of the hon, gentleman.

Mr. McLELAN. Not quite so many as I have named will be retired. It is proposed to pay the cullers $700 per annum, whereas last year they received $800. The expenditure last year was not so large.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman's calculations will not work out. Some of the cullers receive barely anything in fees, and these, I suppose, will be retired at $300 a year. Is it intended to pay each culler retained $700 whether he does much work or not?

Mr. McLELAN, Yes.

Mr. MILLS. It is important that the House should know the amount of work performed by these men now, as compared with some years ago, and the number of them employed now, compared with formerly.

Mr. McLELAN. There was very much more work to do a number of years ago than there is now. At that time there were sixty cullers employed. In 1877 the number of square timber cullers was reduced to eighteen, but the number of the whole still remained over forty. It is now proposed to reduce the number to thirty-three, which is due to the reduction of the work required to be done and the circumstance that the trade has changed largely.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the surplus been pretty nearly exhausted?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, and it is under consideration whether the fees should not now be increased.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, if the surplus has been exhausted, showing his whole scheme, and how it will balance the account. We know that a good deal of noise takes place when fees are raised, and quite lately the hon. gentleman has been beset by deputations asking that the canal tolls should be lowered. The same thing may happen if he proposes to raise these other fees.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not think it would be wise to put in the Bill any scheme of fees. It would be better to leave that in the hands of the Governor in Council to arrange as the requirements of the service demands.

Mr. BLAKE. I think so far as the public revenue is concerned it would be well that he should provide that these annuities should be provided out of the fees, and not made a charge on the consolidated revenue. In this way the accounts would have to be stated in a more thorough manner than has yet been done.

Mr. McLELAN. There is one difficulty connected with that, and that is, that though the account may not balance in a particular year, owing to the state of the trade, if two years were taken it might balance.

Mr. MILLS. What we are entitled to expect at the hands of the Government is a general statement, showing what amount has been received in fees, what the diminuation has been, taking a series of years, and what is the probable amount of fees received under existing charges. We have had no estimate upon which an intelligent action, can be taken.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman give us a statement of the expenditures for 1878, 1879 and 1880.

Mr. McLELAN. In 1878 the expenditure was $49,940, in 1879, $44,670, and in 1880, $44,652.

Mr. VAIL. I understood the Minister to say that there are 47 cullers now employed.

Mr. McLELAN. Not quite 47. There will be a reduction in number.

Mr. BLAKE. The deficiency since 1879 has been about $65,000 as well as I can make it out. Can the hon. gentleman say how the account stands to-day, whether we are on the wrong side of the balance sheet or not?

Mr. McLELAN. We are on the wrong side. In 1879, we had a surplus of $50,000, which has gradually gone down until it is exhausted.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite clear that there must be a deficiency of $10,000 or $15,000 now. In 1884 the deficiency was about $11,000, so that it really becomes a serious matter. If the practical result of the hon. gentleman's change is a reduction in the expenditure, that would be so far satisfactory; but I think the state of things which has resulted in a chronic deficiency since the year 1879 is a state of things which renders it absolutely essential that he should give us some forecast of what the ultimate charges are to be. The hon. gentleman knows how long annuitants live, and I am afraid his experiments will hardly be satisfactory. I trust that at the next stage of the measure the hon. gentleman will be prepared to give us some fuller information as to how this scheme of his can be entertained without any serious loss or liability on the part of the public. The danger of making such an arrangement as has been made is pretty well demonstrated by the figures before us, and if we make a readjustment we should see that it is such as will lead in the future to the results which the hon. gentleman has depicted.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the Minister what are the fees of culling staves and deals per hundred now in force.

Mr. BLAKE

Mr. McLELAN. I have not the scale of fees here. will get the information for the hon, gentleman. Committee rose and reported resolution.

AGRICULTURAL FERTILISERS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved the second reading of Bill (No. 122) respecting Agricultural Fertilisers. He said: I think it would be better to ask the House to go into committee before giving explanations, because the Bill is composed of so many little details that it might be more convenient to discuss it in committee. I will explain, however, that the Bill has for its object that every manufacturer and every importer of fertilisers—and by the word "fertilisers" all kinds of agricultural manure are not included, but only fertilisers which I think would be better called in this, as well as in the Act which the House has examined this afternoon, by the appellation of commercial fertilisers, that is to say fertilisers that are in trade—shall transmit to the Minister of Inland Revenue at a certain period of the year, and we say the month of January, and before offering for sale, a sample of such fertiliser, the quantity being 2 lbs., so as to be preserved in the Department for the purpose of comparison with any other sample that might afterwards be transmitted to the Department for comparison and for the different objects of the Bill. That transmission is to be made with an affidavit of the manufacturer or importer stating that the sample which he transmits to the Department is a fair sample of the article manufactured or sold. The second object of the Bill is that no commercial fertiliser be offered for sale unless a certificate of analysis of the same be openly and publicly printed or stamped or labelled on the package or bag or barrel, containing the said fertiliser, and, if the fertiliser is in bulk, that the certificate of analysis of the manufacturer be also delivered with the article when sold or offered for sale. You will see by this that the object at first is not to enforce an inspection, but to guarantee the public that the article which will be sold will be an article of which a sample is preserved under the custody of the authorities. and that the article sold is sold with that certificate testifying to the quality of the article, the correctness of which may always be decided by the analysts of the Department to which it belongs. The Bill goes further and says that, if the manufacturer or the importer or the retailer wishes to have a certificate of inspection from the inspector, he may have it, and then the inspector will attach to the package or the other covering of the fertiliser, not a certificate, but what is called the inspector's tag, that is, a label saying that the fertiliser has been submitted to inspection. That inspection, I must say, does not mean that what the inspector shall deliver on the label given by him will be another certificate of analysis by the Department, but only that the inspector has seen that the fertiliser sold contains, according to the analysis of the fertiliser, a certain quantity of ingredients which are presumed to be necessary to constitute a fertiliser under the terms of the Act, that is, a fertiliser at least of the commercial value of $10 a ton. The inspector shall not furnish that tag or label, or certify an inspection, unless the article he inspects is presumed to contain the quantity of ingredients which are mentioned in clause 11 of the Bill. Clause 12 mentions the penalties that will be imposed upon parties guilty of the following offences: First, offering for sale an articleand we must not forget that it is a fertiliser of a certain value, because the law does not want to prevent the importation of an article of lower value, bringing it nearer to the standard of ordinary manure—offering for sale any fertiliser unless every provision of the Act has been complied with, unless the article which is sold contains the ingredients which are mentioned in these certificates of analysis which the vendor is obliged to give to the purchaser, and that if the seller has asked for an inspector's certificate, the inspector's certificate must be guaranteed by the certificate of analysis, and that the person giving to the inspector the certificate of analysis, whereas the article sold would not have the quantity of ingredients required, will also be exposed to a fine. The other clauses are for those who might force certificates or labels or tags, or who might apply to one quality of fertiliser the certificate belonging to another quality. In a word, the Act is limited to this: First the manufacturer or importer shall be obliged to transmit a sample of his merchandise to the Department of Inland Revenue, there to be submitted to analysis; the party selling a fertiliser is obliged to guarantee to the publie purchasing the product that he sells, by a certificate of analysis that must be attached to the packages sold or given, when it is in bulk, that he must sell an article equivalent in quality to the certificate of analysis he is obliged to give; and, secondly, when anyone has put in trade an article which has been inspected, he may require from an inspector his certificate, and those not complying with the provisions of the law, or complying with it apparently but not really, will be subjected to the penalties mentioned in the Act.

Mr. FISHER. Before this Bill goes into committee, I would like to say a word or two about it. I think the Secretary of State is quite right in saying that the details of the Bill are such it would be better to discuss it in committee than on the second reading. At the same time, there are one or two things I would like to refer to. I think this Bill and that which we have discussed this afternoon with regard the adulteration of food, drugs and agricultural fertilisers are so intimately connected that it is a good thing they have come up on the same day and can be so closely compared. There are some parts of this Bill which I think are unnecessary, in view of the provisions contained in the Bill discussed this afternoon with regard to the penalties to which the Secretary of State has alluded. I find that the penalties under the two Bills, although they apply to the same offence, are not exactly the same, and I do not see why in one a different penalty should be attached to an action average of at least 80 or 85 per cent. The result than that which is attached to the same action in the other. The Secretary of State has explained that the inspector shall obtain a certificate from the manufacturer, informing him, and supposed to inform the public through him, of what are the constituents of the agricultural fertilisers which are inspected, the inspector is then required to affix his tag to the package or sample, and it is suppose thereby he is adding to the information concerning that sample or package, but I find no provision in the Bill which insists upon the inspector obtaining an analysis of the article. I do not therefore see that there is any great advantage to be had in attaching this tag by the inspector. He is simply acting on the information supplied him by the manufacturer or dealer, and is obtaining no other information of his own. It seems to me therefore that this attachment of the tag of the inspector is really adding a fictitious value to the goods, and is perhaps assisting in a fraud more than guarding against a fraud. If in addition to the certificate of the analyst, which must be supplied by the manufacturer, the inspector himself were required to analyse the sample, his certificate or tag would be given a very great additional authority, but, under the present system, I do not see that it is any gain at all to the purchaser. I think, therefore, unless some provision to this effect is inserted, the provision of the Act in regard to adulteration of food and agricultural fertilisers, by which the vendor is obliged to put upon record a statement of the ingredients and the standard to which the article comes up, would be quite sufficient, and just such as much as is really done in this Bill. the House to these points, which are general in their scope, ed, the inspection should be made by a Government officer,

I will allow the motion to proceed and discuss the details of the Bill in committee.

Mr. LANGELIER. I approve entirely of the principle embodied in this Bill, which, if I remember aright, is the Bill that was suggested by the hon, member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) some months ago, but I am afraid the 3rd clause of the Bill will not obtain the object in view, that of securing the sale of fertilisers of the proper strength. I am speaking from something which came under my notice when I was Commissioner of Crown Lands for Quebec. At that time there was a great, I might call it, fever for the manufacture of phosphates. Some very rich mines of phosphate had been found in the townships of Templeton, Portland, Wakefield, and some other townships in the Ottawa Valley. Our exporters of phosphate came to me and asked whether it could not be possible to have an inspection of the phosphate before it was exported, and the reason they gave was that they were being defrauded in England to a large extent. From the information they gave me this was the way they were defrauded at that time, and I suppose the same thing has gone on since. The phosphate was sold here at so much a ton, according to the amount of phosphorous or other tertilising substance it contained, but the phosphate sent to England, sold on those terms, was analysed. It was referred for analysis to a chemist, who was generally quite a scientific man, but of course he only tested the sample which was delivered to him. According to the test those phosphate manufacturers in Canada made here before exporting, the exported phosphate should have given say 80 or 90 per cent, of phosphorous, but the samples analysed in England were found to contain only 50 or 60 per cent. They thought at first there was ignorance or dishonesty on the part of the English analysts, but at last it was discovered that the English purchaser took the precaution to select the very worst samples, and submitted them to the analysts. In every lot of phosphate there are some lumps of inferior description, which would give 40 or 50 per cent. only of phosphorous, whereas the whole lot might contain an of the whole lot being averaged on these inferior samples submitted to the analyst was that our exporters were defrauded to such an extent that they said it was perfeetly impossible for them to compete with exporters from other countries, for instance Spain, unless an inspection was made by the Local Government in this country before the ore was actually exported to England.

Now, in section 3 of this Bill, the same danger is to be feared on the part of our exporters which has been realised in an inverse manner on the part of the foreign purchaser. The section provides that every manufacturer or importer of fertilisers for sale shall transmit to the Minister of Inland Revenue, each year, a fair average sample of the fertiliser manufactured or imported by him. Well, it is left to the manufacturer himself to determine the quality of the sample to be inspected. If in England the importer has been able to defraud our exporters by selecting the very worst sample, it will be very easy for our manufacturers—I do not say they will be dishonest enough to perjure themselves—but there will be great temptation to them to select a sample which will certainly be above the average. Averages are always very dangerous. I am afraid we will not obtain an average oath from the manufacturer, or an oath which will go very much above the average.

The best plan would be to have those phosphates inspected under the same rules which govern the inspection of other articles. I do not say that inspection should be compulsory, but provision should be made that whenever a purchaser of Merely drawing the attention of the Secretary of State and phosphates or of any other fertiliser desires it to be inspectand that the inspection should not be based upon those small samples which the manufacturers deliver once a year to the Minister of Inland Revenue. I agree with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson) that a great deal of fraud is committed against farmers by manufactures of so-called fertilisers, and the inspection is certainly very proper.

Mr. POPE. I am fully in accord with the hon. gentleman as to the frequency of the adulteration of fertilisers, but I cannot agree with him in some other of his remarks. Suppose you have 50 barrels of a fertiliser in a manure. You put that in a heap and divide it into quarters, then you quarter each one of those again. And so you go on until you get a quantity upon which you can make a proper essay. The thing the hon, gentleman speaks of could not happen in England. Now the course usually pursued in this country, the United States and England is this: I am going to send 100 barrels, say, of mineral to market. Following the course I have pointed out I make my essay, I reduce it down by mixing it up in the way I have described until I get it, perhaps, down to a shovel full, and with that I make my essay. This cargo is sent to the furnace or to the parties who buy it, and it goes through exactly the same process again. If the two essays differ 2 per cent, or whatever per cent is agreed upon, then the whole thing has to be gone over again. The one is a check upon the other. I do not know what it is proposed to do here, but if it is really intended to take out a lump here and a lump there, there is no certainty at all, and would not be a reliable

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not want to be considered as charging the English purchasers of phosphate with intent to defraud. I was only repeating the representations that have been made to me; I know nothing personally about it.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). There is no doubt that the question involved in this Bill is one of growing importance to the agriculturists of this country. In the older Provinces especially there will be each year a growing demand for these artificial fertilisers, and we ought to see, if possible, that the farmer receives fair value for the money he pays out for these artificial manures. From the very nature of the trade there are special facilities for adulteration on account of the small proportion, according to bulk, of the elements in the manure that are of special value to the farmer, and it is easy to add to this a larger quantity of an inferior grade. Though it increases the bulk it depreciates the value the manure for agricultural purposes it increases the profits to the manufacturers. The case referred to by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) is a tair illustration of the difficulty. The very circumstances of the business show that the fertilising value of phosphate direct from the mines must fluctuate according to the condition in which it comes from the mines. It does not strictly come within the range of the article spoken of by this Bill, for the reason that, while it is the basis of an agricultural fertiliser, it is not in a condition to be available, because experiments have shown that phosphates, when finely reduced and applied to the soil in their natural condition, are almost of no value. They are simply the basis from which a valuable portion of these artificial manures are produced, but before they are of practical value they require to be treated with sulphuric acid or some other strong preparation to put them in a soluble condition. The percentage of the valuable element in phosphate must vary very much according to the care exercised in taking it from the mine, for the reason that phosphate is found in veins running through rock which is useless for agricultural purposes, and just in proportion as the phosphate is separated from the rock will the analysis be high or low. I believe at present the best samples of phosphate vary from 80 to 83 per cent, of soluble elements. A very large proportion of the output of the mines will not analyse more than 60 or 65 per cent. It is clear that, so far as the farmers are concerned, phosphate analysing 80 per cent. is much more valuable than that analysing only 60 per cent. It seems, however, difficult to establish any basis of inspection for phosphate, except an inspection of each lot shipped. The crude phosphate is mainly shipped to Liverpool, Glasgow and Paris as ballast, it being mixed there with other ingredients and converted into superphosphate and sold to the farmers of the old world. With respect to the practical value of the artificial manures sold to farmers, it is an entirely different branch of the question, and it is involved in the Bill now under consideration. Those fertilisers vary very much in value according to the addition of inferior matter to bring up the bulk and weight. It is a matter of prime importance to the purchaser that they should have a certain fixed standard of valuable elements, which form a very small proportion of the weight of the article, because in a comparatively pure state they would kill growing crops. Only last Session a Bill on this subject, introduced by the hon, member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue), was passed. That Act only went into force on 1st June last, and it made provision that an analysis should be attached to each of the samples of artificial manures manufactured and placed on the market for sale. That is undoubtedly the direction in which we require to go. I desire to ask the Minister whether that Bill has been practically put into operation and whether it has been found effective; or whether the Government have simply assumed the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), forgetting that the Act to which I refer was placed on the Statute Book. I agree with the Minister in charge of the Bill that this is a matter of growing importance to agriculturists; but I should like to know in what respect the Bill of the hon: member for Richelieu, now on the Statute Book, has failed to accomplish the object sought to be attained.

Mr. MASSUE. In answer to the hon, member who has just sat down, I may say that the present Bill is far ahead of the one I proposed last year, because I had no means of asking the Minister to appoint inspectors. The Council of Agriculture of the Province of Quebec would have been very glad to induce the agricultural societies, thereby the farmers, to use for their crops the best of the fertilisers; but having no means of detecting the good from the poor qualities, the council did not dare to induce the farmers in using what it had no means to recommend; but with this Bill I think we will be sure of the qualities of the different kinds of fertilisers, and, in my opinion, the Bill stating that the inspection will be under the control of the Minister of Inland Revenue will be a great help to the farmer in securing a good article for him, and to the manufacturer, in obliging him to be up to the mark.

Bill read the second time; and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FISHER. Some little time ago, after the Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), when I said a few words in support of the principle of the Bill, I received a communication from one of the largest fertiliser manufacturers of this country, known as the Standard Fertiliser Chemical Co., in which they drew attention to several parts of the measure. I examined the Bill pretty carefully with reference to the Bill of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue) last year, and also with some reference to the Bill passed this afternoon. I find, Sir, that these manufacturers have come somewhat to the same conclusion that I had pretty nearly arrived at myself, which was, that the law of last year, and the Bill putting agricultural fertilisers in with human and cattle food, subject to the inspection of the Inland Revenue officers, there was really little necessity for this Bill at all; that the fact that the fertilisers were subject to inspection would almost obviate the necessity of making a new The suggestion is that if the manufacturers of these fertilisers are obliged to put on the package a label stating the qualities and relative proportions of the ingredients of those fertilisers, and are subject to a penalty for the sale of fertilisers which do not contain the ingredients stated in the label, the desired object will be almost attained, especially if the officers of the Crown are given power to prosecute those individuals and to recover from them the penalties which are in this Bill of the Minister of Inland Revenue, called the Bill respecting the adulteration of foods, drugs, and agricultural fertilisers. Perhaps the Bill has already gone too far for the Minister to withdraw it, or to make such other provisions in the other Bill as would obviate the necessity for this measure, and as notwith-standing the disclaimer of the Minister of Agriculture there is no doubt this Bill is a Government measure, we can hardly expect this step to be taken. I understood that though the Bill was introduced by a private member, the First Minister promised to take it under his protection, an announcement of which I was very glad, because I believed then that the Bill was a necessity, and that such a Bill in the hands of a private member could not be carried into law this Session.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Perhaps some people are confusing this Bill with another, which may be called an extension of the Bill with regard to agricultural fertilisers. This Bill is expressly to prevent fraud in the sale of commercial fertilisers, and it provides for that in an ample and complete manner. No man can import or manufacture a fertiliser to be sold at $10 a ton or over without giving an analysis of it, and a sample of it to the Department to which it belongs. Everybody selling these fertilisers is obliged to give to the public a guarantee that a sample of what he sells is sent to the authorities, and that sample must be accompanied by the affidavit of the manufacturer or importer stating that it is a fair sample of what he sells. The second guarantee is that you cannot sell at retail or wholesale, or as a manufacturer, unless you give to the purchaser a statement of what it is composed of. The third guarantee is that if you sell an article which is under the grade that has been given to the public by a certificate of the analysis, if you sell an inferior article, you shall be liable to a fine. The Bill may appear rather rigorous but I do not think it will be found so in practice. When it is known that the proper authorities will be the guardians of the samples which will be analysed, there will be the greatest precaution against trying to defraud the public. I have also received some letters since I have had charge of this Bill, from manufacturers and agriculturalists saying that they feared that the inspection will be compulsory, that they thought it might impose a burden on the retailer, and that the cost of an article selling at $2 a ton might be increased by about $2 a ton, which would be a high percentage on the article sold. I shall proceed to the examination of the different clauses, and I repeat that the Bill is essentially one to prevent frauds by people selling commercial fertilisers.

On section 2,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. After the words "of this Act" strike ont all the other words until the word "they" at the end of the line, and instead of "$12" insert "$10". Also in the fourth and fifth line strike out the words "or potash."

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I would ask the hon.gentleman under what application this reduction in value is made from $12 to $10 a ton. I speak, of course, from my personal knowledge only, but with us in western Ontario it is mostly the high priced super-phosphates that are offered on the would especially apply. That I think would be a great market, for which we pay $30 to $40 per ton. We are not familiar with those low grades which are placed on the market at less than $10 per ton.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The demand was made by myself originally to the hon, member for Welland. I had occasion, when presiding over the Department of Agriculture in Quebec, to have imported some bi-phosphates which are made out of sea-weed, the refuse of fish and bones. These bi-phosphates were commercial fertilisers, and were sold at $10. and I wanted them to be embraced in this Bill. They were good fertilisers, but at the time they were imported, by some accident, they proved unequal to their reputation, and were to a certain extent a failure; and consequently agricultural societies lost faith in commercial fortilisers.

Mr. BAIN. I can understand how desirable it is to bring all these agricultural manures within the range of the Act. Certainly I do not object to the Minister changing the figure from $12 to $10 per ton; I was asking for information. I can understand a manure at $10 a ton being really cheaper to a farmer than another for which he pays $40 a ton, in its effects upon his crops. There is, however, this difficulty. If you apply the same test to both manures that is required of all the manures which are examined by a practical analyst, and which contain a certain proportion of ammonia, or its equivalent of nitrogen, there will be a great deal more of impure ingredients added to the high-priced manure, unless you have some process by which you can reach the manufacturer of it. It ought to be richer in ammonia and its equivalents which really form the value of those manures for growing plants. I think it desirable that the Bill should be brought to apply to as low-priced a manure as is offered to the farmer for those purposes. I believe that in the eastern Provinces there is a large quantity of that manure manufactured from fish or bones and other ingredients which are otherwise of very little value, and I agree with the Minister that it is desirable that all these things should be brought within the range of the Act.

On section 3,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose in the second line to insert the word "January;" in the third line, after the word "year," to add "person offering the said fertiliser for sale; "in the fourth line instead of "one pound," to insert "two pounds;" and in the fifth line after the words in the fifth line after the words. defertiliser, manufactured or imported by him " to insert, , with the certificate of analysis of the same.

Mr. FISHER. Sometimes a manufacturer is asked to make up a special fertiliser by order; and I suppose by the section as amended, he would be obliged when he sent that order to send a jar at the same time to the Department.

Amendments agreed to.

On section 5,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This section, which appears to be a repetition of section 3, is not. During the course of the year, when an offence may be prosecuted, the inspector will have a right to ask for a second sample from the manufacturer.

Mr. FISHER. Since the hon. Minister has amended the third clause, so that a certificate of analysis has to be sent with the sample, it does not seem to be necessary that another sample should be sent, especially as section 3 requires the manufacturer to send a specimen of every kind of manure which he may manufacture. It seems to me the 5th clause is entirely unnecessary, and will only give the officers of the Department work that is not intended, as well as hamper the manufacturers.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is the intention, I dare say, of the Department every year to publish with the analysis a description of the different kinds of soil to which each fertiliser advantage to agriculturists, but I do not think that need be inserted in the Bill.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). If the Department is pleased to furnish that information attached to the analysis of each sample, I have no doubt the proprietors of those manures will take special pleasure in publishing that in circulars for their customers.

Mr. FISHER. I quite agree that that is a desirable thing to be done; but I am afraid that if it is put in the report of the Department of Inland Revenue many farmers will not see it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The intention is to put it on a little card along with the analysis for free distribution to the public.

Mr. CASEY. Why are all these samples to be sent to the chief analyst? I think it would be cheaper to allow them to be analysed by the local analyst.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. As the hon, gentleman will see by section 7, there must be a number of references. When the inspector will give a certificate of inspection, he will give it with a certain number. That number will answer exactly to the number of the sample which has been taken by the inspector and sent to the chief analyst to be analysed. As to having the analysis made by substitutes, I suppose the Department might arrange that.

Mr. CASEY. This clause states positively they will be sent to the Minister of Inland Revenue for submission to the chief analyst.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Submitted to him for analysis, not necessarily analysis by him.

Mr. CASEY. These words mean the chief analyst is to analyse them. If the thing is to be submitted to the chief analyst for analysis, the intent is for an analysis by the chief analyst.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. So much the better.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman gave his opinion a little while ago that it would probably be well to have that analysis made in many cases by local analysts.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said if thought proper it might be done.

Mr. CASEY. This clause does not give that power, and if the hon. gentleman wants to have liberty to have the analysis made by local analysts, the clause must be changed.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The analysis to be of value requires the stamp of some one whose reputation will give that analysis value. I think, on the whole, the chief analyst ought to exercise his own discretion; it should be done under his supervision, and he should be responsible.

On section 6,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. At the end of the first clause I want to add "if it is in bulk, the manufacturers certificate shall be produced, and a copy given to each purchaser," and instead of section 2, I would substitute this: "No fertiliser shall be sold or offered or exposed for sale, unless the certificate of the analyst and a sample of the same shall have been transmitted to the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the provisions of the foregoing sections have been complied with."

Mr. FISHER. That is already in the Bill in the 3rd section. Every manufacturer is to forward a sample, together with the certificate, and it is not necessary to have another section to say that before he sells any he shall do

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This makes it clear. You shall not have the right to sell any of these articles until that has been done, and until you have complied with the foregoing clause. It looks like a repetition, but it is only an affirmation of the thing that is said.

Mr. BLAKE. Why should we re-affirm in one clause what is said in another?

Mr. CASEY. That is affirmed already, and no harm can be done by re-affirming it, but I do not see the necessity.

Mr. BLAKE This Bill ought to be submitted for analysis. It is being adulterated by adding to the bulk without improving the strength.

Amendments agreed to.

On section 7,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I want to propose this amendment in the first line. After the word analysis, strike out the words "if he deems it advisable so to do," and after the word "shall," in the second line, add these words, "shall if requested to do so by the manufacturer or importer or person selling the same."

Mr. FISHER. Does this clause mean that the inspector shall not apply his tag unless requested by the vendor?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. And that when he does so place his tag, it is not necessary to show that any further analysis of the article has taken place, but simply the vendor's certificate?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. In that case, I do not see any good in the following four sections. The Minister stated that the Bill was for the purpose of seeing that a commercial fertiliser was not sold unless it came up to a certain standard. I pointed that we had accomplished, in the Bill respecting the adulteration of food, drugs and agricultural fertilisers. all that this Bill is going to accomplish. We provided that anyone selling an agricultural fertiliser may stamp thereon the ingredients of that fertiliser, and that if he sold it and it was analysed by the public analyst, at the request of anybody, the officers of the Department or anyone interested, and it was proved not to come up to the analysis stamped upon it, he should be subject to a penalty. That is all this Bill provides for, and I cannot see what object there can be in providing the same thing over again. This will practically be an impediment in the way of the manufacturer and the vendor. I am anxious that every safeguard should be given to the farmers to secure that they shall receive due value for their money, but I do not wish to throw unnecessary additional impediments in the way of the manufacturers or the vendors, because whatever expense they are put to will have to be paid by the person who uses the fertiliser.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We have received representations not to force that inspection upon the retailer or the merchant. We do not force it, but there is no doubt that the certificate of inspection will add to the guarantee to the public in a certain measure, because, when that inspection is given, it will be a guarantee to the public that the inspector has taken a sample of the article, has numbered it and sent it to the chief analyst for analysis. I admit that perhaps it does not add so much as if the inspector was himself given the certificate of analysis of the chief analyst; but the expenditure, which my hon. friend is afraid of, would really be too large, if it was a necessity that the analysis should be made of every article sold. The guarantee exists in the fact that the analysis has been made somewhere, and that, if there is any complaint, that analysis, with the comparison of the sample that has been given to the Department, will be the best evidence that the fraud has been committed, if there has been a fraud. I think that, as it is, we are preventing the useless expenditure of money, in case the public would be satisfied that the inspector has not given, as will be seen by clause 11, that certificate of inspection, except when he was convinced that the produce which is sold is one which contains the ingredients which give a certain standard to the fertiliser.

Mr. CASEY. I want to understand more clearly what the inspector's tag is to have upon it. Is it to be a statement, simply, that samples have been taken for analysis, and not that the analysis has been made?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It does not state that the analysis has been made.

Mr. CASEY. Or, if it has been made, what the result is? Mr. CHAPLEAU. It does not state the result.

Mr. CASEY. I do not see that there will be any good in that. I cannot see any force in the hon, gentleman's argument that that certificate will be any safeguard to the public. I admit that it might create a certain impression of safety in the public mind, and I fear that it would. Any official tag of this kind would be taken by the public, who were not thoroughly acquainted with the Act, be a certificate that the fertiliser was all right, and would be accepted by them as a certificate of the genuineness of the article, which it is not, in any degree. I think, instead of providing a safeguard, it would be very apt to mislead the public, and to be the very reverse of a safeguard, to be an injury to them, by making them think the article had been analysed and found satisfactory, when it had not been analysed at all. I do not suppose the Minister had any other intention than to provide all the safeguards possible; but if he wishes to provide a real safeguard for the public, and to give a recommendation of meritorious articles of that kind, he should insist that the sample sent up by the inspectors should be analysed as soon as sent up, and that the result of the analysis should be printed or written on the tag given out by the inspector. I do not see that there would be much more expense in putting that on the tag than in putting something else; and as far as the analysis is concerned, there is no use in our having a chief analyst, and paying him fees, unless we get some work out of him. But even in that case, there is some risk of the public suffering, from the fact that a manufacturer of compounds of this kind cannot be expected to have a perfectly uniform sample throughout the season; and although the sample examined by the chief analyst might be all right, a subsequent sample might be worse, without any corrupt intention on the part of the manufacturer. If a detailed certificate were given as to the goodness of the first sample, the customer might take that as meaning that he had a right to expect the rest as equally good. But there is no safeguard in the mere statement that samples have been sent up for analysis.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There would be this safeguard, at all events, that it would complete the chain of evidence against fraud. And there is the farther protection that the inspector, seeing this is produced, and that it bears the same number as the sample which has been sent off for analysis, it is not to be presumed that after the chief analyst has analysed a fertiliser and having the certificate of the manufacturer, as against his own experience, would allow the inspector to give a certificate to that article, unless the analysis of the chief analyst coincided with the certificate given by the manufacturer. But there is something in my hon, friend's suggestion, and I will see that an amendment is put in the Bill, that immediately after the analysis the inspector shall be supplied with a copy and attach it to his tag.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman does not intend that the inspector shall put the tag on until after the analysis has been made and found satisfactory.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think, after the analysis, the inspector should be informed that he should not give a certificate.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be very likely to mislead the public if there was an official announcement of this character, unless in cases where there has been a satisfactory inspection. If the public find there has been an inspection they will not scrutinise its results very closely. If there is some reason why any certificate should be given before analysis, the tag ought to contain a distinct statement that it is not upon analysis, or that it is not upon inspection—something that would show to the public that it was not intended to do that. When we consider the number of misleading advertisements, and how easily the public is gulled with illusory trade marks, we at once see how valuable such a tag might be in the case of a low grade.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I know that in France very severe laws have been passed against adulteration, and still the manufacturers have been successful in evading them, to some extent. I think that suggestion of my hon friend should be adopted, that is to say, that after a certain standard for certain fertilisers has been given by the chief analyst, the inspector should be supplied with a copy of the analysis, and then a person selling under that certificate would be exposed to the rigors of the law if the article did not contain that certificate.

Mr. BAIN. The protection to the purchasers of manure is the fact that the analysis of the test sample that has been supplied to the Inland Revenue Department is the basis upon which we assume that all these grades shall be tried; and if, at a subsequent date, a farmer purchased a sample of this manure and found that it did not test equivalent to that sample under which he had received a cortificate from the Department, I should think he was open to the penalties provided by this Act. There is another difficulty. This Act applies to manure worth only $10 a ton. Now, the first question a farmer asks is: Will this thing pay? If there is to be an analysis again, if there is to be a supervision of these goods introduced in bulk, and if they are to be sub-divided—and I think it will be found that the great bulk of these manures have to be sub-divided, either into sacks or barrels-it will almost necessitate that each one of these samples will require tags attached to them if the inspection is going to be of value. A dealer may bring in a couple of car loads, perhaps 25 tons, but most men will only purchase in quantities of, say, one ton. The result will be that this inspection and these certificates and tags, to be of value, would need to be applicable to this whole consignment, divided into quantities. Now here is a large field for the dishonest dealer. It is the easiest thing in the world to mix into these agricultural manures a certain quantity of worthless raw material that will add both to the bulk and weight, and until it is applied to the crops and its quality is known, the farmer has no alternative and no redress. I think it is a matter to be considered, before you provide for this inspector's certificate to be attached to the samples, whether it would be worth the cost involved, because if the inspection is made and tags have to be furnished for these articles it will all cost money, and it must be added to the price of the fertiliser. The great protection under this Bill to the purchaser is the fact that the dealer has to furnish to the Department a test sample, which must contain a certain percentage of these valuable ingredients, and a farmer, by preserving the sample he has purchased from the retail agent, and having it analysed again, shows that it does not grade up to that standard could then prose-cute the dealer for fraud—if such be the case. There, it seems to me, is the place where you can catch the dishonest manufacturer.

Mr. FISHER. If that is the view of the hon. Minister, the 3rd section, which provides for sending a sample to the chief analyst for analysis, ought to go a little further, or another section should be added, to the effect that the chief analyst should immediately analyse that and show that it agrees with the certificate of the analyst which the manufacturer himself has had, and then when the inspector is informed of that he will be able immediately, before his own sample has been sent to the inspector, to apply his tag, with the analysis upon it, and thereby give the official stamp. I do not think it is at all wise that the inspector should be allowed to put his tag or official stamp upon a package before he has obtained official recognition of the analysis of that. No doubt, if the tag was attached the majority of farmers would suppose the analysis was a correct one. The manufacturers will have to have constant com-munication with the inspector. That officer will have to constantly visit the manufactories as special compounds are being placed on the market.

Mr. JENKINS. The committee should bear in mind, in discussing this question, that the manufacture of fertilisers is a business largely open to fraud. I have spent many years in testing manures, and my experience has been an unfortunate one. I do not think I have obtained a cent's worth for all the money I have invested. The proposed tag will not be of much value in detecting bad manure. On the contrary, it may be made use of by a manufacturer, if he is inclined to swindle, to help him in doing so, and we should hesitate before we place an additional means of swindling in the hands of the manufacturer. I should be sorry to say that all the manufacturers of fertilisers are swindlers; but, so far as my experience goes, the majority are in great haste to get rich, and are not very particular as to the means, and, as a rule, they endeavor to get rich at the expense of the farmers. We should therefore be very careful before we place any additional means in the hands of the manufacturers to swindle the farmers. I do not see my way clear as regards this tag. It may be detached, and made use of by a manufacturer to get rid of an inferior article at the price of a prime article. It is a very difficult subject, and the farmer will have more protection from the act that an analysis is deposited with the chief analyst, and if the sample sold does not correspond with that analysis, the vendor is open to prosecution. That is sufficient protection to the farmer, and I believe it will be a greater protection than if we applied any tag.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There will not be great temptation to place a tag on an inferior article, because the person doing so will be liable to a fine of $500. The tag will be very useful as a link in the chain of evidence to convict the person who endeavored to defraud the public by selling an inferior article.

Mr. FISHER. Then the tag is a mere voluntary arrangement on the part of the seller?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. FISHER. And the manufacturer has to send a sample to the Department, whether he likes it or not?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

On section 11,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I move that the minimum be reduced to 5 per cent. on soluble phosphoric acid, and that, instead of 10 per cent., 8 per cent. be inserted.

Mr. BAIN. Will that not make the inspection valueless, as regards high-priced manures?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If a man manufactures a high-priced fertiliser, a sample must be sent to the Department, and he must sell according to the analysis; but the inspector shall not be allowed to place his tag and certificate upon any product which shall not come up to the minimum grade.

Mr. FISHER. Has the Department received any information from experts in these matters, as to whether $10 per case of goods that are not subject to inspection. Mr. FISHER.

ton will coincide as a standard of value with the standard of quality fixed in the Bill?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have taken these figures from the hon, gentleman who presented the Bill, but who, I am sorry to say, is not here to-night. We will not, however, ask concurrence before the hon. gentleman has arrived, when a better explanation may be given. I understand, however, from the head of the Department, that he supposes this figure will cover it.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I would suggest that they obtain through the Department some information directly from the experts in these matters, because the Bill will be valueless unless this percentage is fair and equitable as between the farmers and the manufacturer.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I may say that the information from the Department has come from the experience and legislation in over half a dozen of the United States, where the greatest attention has been given to these matters.

Mr. FISHER. There is another point mentioned in the letter from the manufacturing firm to which I have already referred, and that is, as to the necessity of allowing a certain margin, if it should happen, that by reason of age the compound phosphates should become resolved into insoluble phosphoric acid. I think it would be desirable that the date of the analysis should be stated in the certificate of analysis, and that some allowance of that kind should be made, in case the compound reverts to its insoluble form.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have received some information on that point, but it is one that I can leave to the hon. member for Welland, as he is going to submit an amendment, providing for 5 per cent. soluble sulphuric acid against 2 per cent. reverted.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). The margin left is, I am afraid, a very small one.

Mr. CASEY. Some of these manures are not permanent compounds, but will spoil by keeping, and it stands to reason that if they should spoil by keeping they should not be sold as of the same value as before. The manure may retain its value, though it reverts to its insoluble form, which may not be of any great value, unless some new chemical compound is formed.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Finely ground phosphates, which some consider not so valuable, because the soluble phosphate acid does not appear, are, by others, considered very valuable manures, because the effect is produced afterwards, though it is not visible at the time.

Mr. CASEY. The purchaser ought to know that it will only become valuable after it has been in the ground for some time.

On section 12,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. At the fourth line, after the word "package," I wish to add "bag or barrel," and then, in the next line, after the word "inspector," add "to accompany the bill of inspection of such inspector." On the 26th line of the page, after the words "preceding section," I wish to add "or who sells, or offers, or exposes for sale, any fertiliser which does not contain the percentage of constituents mentioned in the manufacturer's certificate accompanying the same."

Mr. CASEY. Is not this covered by the words from the 19th line down to the 24th line.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Bill originally made the inspec tion obligatory; now it is only permissive.

Mr. CASEY. I think the amendment should say: in the

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). It would not apply, in any case, to any of those goods put on the market. We are applying a minimum basis, but a manufacturer furnishes a higher grade to the Department, and he allows the saleable article to be a lower grade. It seems to me the words in the clause are necessary.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If a person sells an article for $40 a ton, I want him to be obliged to give what he says he is giving.

Mr. CASEY. With the Minister's explanation, I agree that the words are necessary; but I think the cases of those who have to submit to inspection are covered by the words used before, and these words are intended to apply to goods not sold at all.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether there is to be any penalty imposed on the manufacturer who adulterates? This clause provides for the person who sells; perhaps it includes the manufacturer.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the manufacturer keeps the article for himself, there is no great danger to anybody. He will have punishment enough.

On section 13,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would propose that the penalty be made $500 instead of $100.

Mr. CASEY. I do not know why a person who attaches a tag to a package it is not meant for should not be placed in the same position as a person who forges or utters a certificate. His crime might be made a misdemeanor, the same as the other, so that the second sub-section might be struck out.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The first sub-section relates to a misdemeanor, because it is forgery of public writings, and we attach the same penalty to it as exists in the cases of forgery of that description. I think the fine provided in the second sub-section is punishment enough for the offence.

Mr. CASEY. Should not imprisonment be added, in case of inability to pay the fine?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think my hon. friend is right, we should add, "and in default of payment, imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months."

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). If all these penalties are to go into the public revenue it strikes me that a farmer who purchases an inferior manure and is defrauded ought to have recourse for damages.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is provided for by common law.

On section 14,

Mr. CASEY. Does the Act permit any person but the inspector to institute a prosecution?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Any person can prosecute when there is a penalty imposed. Any person may be the complainant.

Mr. CASEY. But when the Act specially states that a particular person may prosecute, that would shut out any other person.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would move to strike out the clause. It might look as if we wanted to prevent any other person from prosecuting.

Motion agreed to.

On section 15,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I wish to strike out the words after Council an absolute power to grant the the word "shall" to the word "to," and make the section of any terms and conditions whatever?

read: "All penalties recovered under this Act shall form part of the Consolidated Fund of Canada."

Amendment agreed to.

On section 16,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I propose the following amendment: "All the provisions of the Adulteration of Food Act, of 1884, or, in the event of a repeal thereof, of any Act substituted therefor during the present Session."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FISHER. I hope the Minister will try, on the third reading, to give us the information he promised.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes; and I shall have to find a clause for the prosecution and recovery of the penalties.

Bill reported.

Amendments read the first and second times, and concurred in.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House again resolved itself into Committee to consider certain resolutions (p. 2440) to authorise grants of Dominion lands to certain railways in the North-West.

On resolution 1 (North-Western Coal and Navigation Railway Company),

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I explained yesterday the object of this resolution. I think the papers were laid before the House some time ago, showing the different phases through which the negotiations between that company and the Government went. In the case of that company, as well as the other companies, the terms under which certain arrangements were made between them and the Government for lands in aid of the construction of this line had to be changed, from time to time, until the 17th January, 1885, when an Order in Council was passed, providing that, subject to the approval of Parliament, the reserve of land made by the Order in Council of September, 1884, should be increased to 3,840 acres per mile, from Medicine Hat to the coal lands of the company on Belly River. The company will pay 10 cents per acre for the survey and other incidental expenses. The condition of this grant is that the line will be completed by the month of August next. I understand that this condition will be fulfilled. The railway is being pushed with vigor, and if anything should occur to delay it, it would be only on account of the troubles which have existed in the North-West; but I understand that there is very little chance of any delay taking place. The line is now pushed with great vigor, and will give access to these lands, which promise to give good coal, not only to the railways, but also to the settlers in that neighborhood, and further east and west.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is a matter of regret that the Orders in Council and other papers connected with these various grants should not have been printed and laid on the Table some time ago. The papers themselves have been laid on the Table time enough, but it is obvious that those members who have not had the opportunity of reading the papers in the manuscript form in which they came down, and the number of these is naturally very limited, have not had any means of ascertaining the particulars. I would ask the hon. gentleman one question of a general nature, and applicable to the whole of the resolutions, whether it is proposed, in the Bill to be founded upon these resolutions, that the grants should be stated to be in the terms and conditions in the Order in Council submitted to Parliament in each case, or whether it is intended to give the Governor in Council an absolute power to grant these lands, irrespective

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is to draw the Bill in such a way as to conform to the conditions of the Order in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, the hon. gentleman will observe that the first Orders in Council have been changed.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course; I mean the last orders.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention that it should be so. If there were any reason afterwards to vary those Orders, of course we would have to come to Parlia-

Mr. BLAKE. That answer is quite satisfactory, and is just in accordance with what I should have thought reasonable. This case happens to be one which does not furnish an exposition of so many phases of the different policies of the Government as some of the others which come on later, because, if I rightly understand, the first application in the case of this particular railway was as late as the 13th September, 1883. I may say to the hon, gentleman that I find some difficulty, from the papers in this case, which he will agree with me is rather a special case, both as to the gauge of the railway and as to some other circumstances, I do not find sufficient information to enable me to apprehend whether the land through which this railway passes for the 110 miles is deemed by the Government to be agricultural land. I rather gather that the main object, of course a very important object, which the Government expects to serve by the prosecution of this railway, is the coal supply; and I was anxious to know whether it is the expectation of the Government that agricultural settlements will be formed along the line of this railway, as in the case of the other railways.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the land may be expected to be of the ordinary character of agricultural land in the North- $\mathbf{W}\mathbf{est}$ ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The first application is of 13th September 1883, from Sir Alexander Galt, who refers in that to the letter which, so far as I can judge, is not brought down, of the 22nd of June previous, but who makes a statement of a personal examination of the territory over which is is proposed the line shall pass. In that he states that he had the advantage of Langdon & Sheppard, contractors, with whose names we are familiar, upon the subject of a practical route, and that the firm expressed their willingness to contract for the railway, and their engieeer is now making a thorough examination of the entire route with this view. Then he states:

"The coal from the Lethbridge mines has been thoroughly tested by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and pronounced suitable. Subject to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and pronounced suitable. Subject to the construction of the railway, I have agreed with them for the supply of all the coal they require at Medicine Hat, for $5 per ton."

So that, then, the notion was that this road would be completed by the 1st of September, 1884, and Sir Alexander Galt was able to secure a contract from the Canadian Pacific Railway for 20,000 tons, as a minimum, a year, at a fair price for the company's interests as mine owners. Then, other promises are made:

"The Canadian Pacific Railway also promised every assistance in their power in the construction and working of the line."

So that he secured from the Canadian Pacific Railway their favorable offices for the construction and also the working of the line. Then, Sir A. T. Galt proceeds to say:

"To enable the railway to be built within the next twelve months, which is in every respect to be desired, it is necessary that the funds be provided this winter and the steel rails and ties procured before spring." Mr. BLAKE.

And he points out some of the difficulties in the way of obtaining an incorporation in time to go on with the work, and of the particular method of escaping from those difficulties, with which it is not necessary to trouble the committee. Then he proceeds to point out:

"To enable me, therefore, to obtain the approval of the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company to such an extension of their operations and responsibilities, it has become absolutely necessary to obtain an early decision of the Government as to the assistance they are willing to grant to the undertaking.'

Then, further on :

"The privilege of purchasing 6,400 acres, to be taken from the vacant suitable agricultural land, at $1 per acre, with expense of survey added, subject to such conditions as may be determined by the Government. subject to such conditions as may be determined by the Government. The privilege of immediately selecting as part of the foregoing land the quantity not exceeding 15,000 acres of what are understood to be coal lands, the present land now in occupation of the company, under Order in Council or by departmental authority, to be considered as part of the said 15,000 acres."

He asks, also :

"The free admission of the steel rails and other materials for construction.

And he points out:

"The public grounds upon which I venture to submit this application are—

"That the construction of the railway guarantees to the entire country, as far east Winnipeg, a regular and ample supply of excellent fuel, at a moderate cost, as it can be delivered in Winnipeg at about $10 per ton.

"That it establishes the important fact in relation to the future working of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that its entire consumption of fuel can be provided at the central point of Medicine Hat at the low price of $5 per ton.

"That it affords the important McLeod district railway facilities which cannot be otherwise obtained; and also will bring to the Canadian Pacific Railway the cattle and mining traffic of northern Montana.

"That the development of a large mining industry by the company will

"That the development of a large mining industry by the company will require, on their part, the most strenuous efforts to promote the early settlement of their lards hereby applied for, also of the whole-district.

"That without the railway no sales of public lands on any extensive scale can be effected, and that those conveyed to the company will realise the full price of such lands under the present regulations earlier than in any other mode; if this railway be not completed within two years from the first of September, of this year, this application to be void."

He does say one thing that is rather peculiar:

"I propose that the ordinary agricultural lands should be taken along the line of railway in alternative townships, where found suitable for settlement, and that the surplus be selected from any unappropriated lands south of the Canadian Pacitic Railway belt, and west of Medicine Hat, the operation of the homestead law not to apply to the townships or blocks chosen."

Then, I want to call the attention of the committee, at this stage, to the fact to which I have referred—and it seems to me to be one of considerable importance, in dealing with the application—the fact, namely, that this proposal to grant a concession, not merely of alternate sections on the line of a projected railway, but also of a quantity of land in bulk at the terminus of that railway, a quantity of coal lands. The Order in Council of the 19th of October, 1883, is accompanied by a plan which shows the terminus of the railway at the coal lands, and which shows a comparatively moderate quantity of coal lands, which are already in the possession of the company itself. But they ask for, and this plan shows, a very large block of land, comprising, I think, some 16 sections in all, of coal lands surrounding their township, a parallelogram surrounding their terminus. They, therefore, obtain an immense area of coal lands, and all those which were in the immediate vicinity of the terminus of the railway, which terminus itself was chosen from its being presumably in the centre of vast mines. This initiated an application by Lethbridge and others for certain mining lands, which we discussed some years ago in Parliament, and I then suggested the danger that might arise from an exceptionally large grant of coal area to one individual. Well, these areas, which are larger than those ordinarily granted by the Government, are now to be supplemented by others, making the whole area, I think, something like five times as large as the original grant. I think it is very important, with respect to the future of the country, that we should remember what we are doing when we are dealing with this company, which is at once a mining company and a railway company. We have got to consider whether we are not practically establishing a monopoly in the coal supply, so far as regards a coal supply from that region. The ordinary rules, of course, as to the regulation of freights and fares, do not apply. They furnish no protection whatever in this case, because the protection in shipping by the ordinary rules, as to rates and fares, the power of the Governor in Council to regulate them, and the provision that they will be equal for other persons and goods, under like circumstances, travelling a like distance, do not in the least degree apply to the case of a company which is itself a large owner of mines, as between itself and the public. This company is the mine owner itself and is also the railway owner. It charges itself no frieght for carrying its own coal over its own railway, and therefore you cannot make any arrangement that will protect the public, in the sense that the public may be supplied by other mine owners in the same neighborhood carrying their coal over the railway on as advantageous terms as the coal of this particular company. That is really, to my mind, a very important consideration. We do not want to give the public domain to assist in increasing the value of a coal concession, unless we are able to guarantee to the country at large the prospect that there will be a large development of coal mines by others, and they will have a fair chance at that development. You depress that chance when you combine the mine owner and the railway owner in one hand, and thus accomplish the result I have indicated, namely, that there can be no competition on the part of the outside proprietors of coal areas with the proprietors of the enormous block of land surrounded by the railway, for they, themselves, as owners of the railway, with which they can make their own terms as to the carrying of their own coal, will secure entire control of the market. This is a consideration which, it seems to me, deserves the attention of the Government, and upon which we should have an explanation of their policy. I need hardly repeat my general observations, that I am making no opposition to the grant in aid of any of these railways, not even this one; but this one involve; special considerations, and whether the hon. gentleman may attach more or less weight to that suggestion, it is a matter deserving of attention, as we are making the first concession of this particular character. The first proposition I have, is, therefore, that the owners of a large coal area, and one of the conditions of the grant is a very large enlargement of that coal area, I think amounting to 10,000 additional acres, besides the coal lands of which they are now absolute proprietors-I find the conjunction of the coal mine owner and the owner of the coal railway is, under these circumstances, not an encouragement, but a check upon the development of other coal areas, while competition with coal mining companies is of the last consequence to the future of the North-West. Take, for example, the very statement Sir Alexander Galt makes. He states that coal will be supplied at the contral point, after being carried 110 miles, at $5 per ton. I do not know exactly what the quality of the coal is, how it compares with best heat-producing locomotive coal. It is very gratifying, however, to know that the coal is useful and available, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's engines will be able to burn it profitably; but there are various grades of coal, and I do not know this particular grade. But $5 for coal only 110 miles from the mine is certified. tainly not a very low price, and as that is stated to be a wonderful price, it seems to me all the more important that we should consider what encouragement we are going to give to parties competing to reduce that price to the lowest possible limit. I have on more than one occasion declared Then it was proposed:

that there was no subject that more deserved our attention than the question of dealing with the coal supply of the North-West, and I have ventured to express, in this House, on more than one occasion, the opinion that we should not, by any action of ours, place too large coal areas in one hand, or grant great powers to one corporation. I say, if you look at the coal supply of this continent, and consider what is to be ascertained upon the subject, you will find that the price of coal is, in the first instance, the cost of getting the coal to bank and a very small margin besides. Those are the elements, putting aside questions of combina-tions between coal and transport companies, and I must remind the committee that we are not without the light of experience on this subject, and that the people of the United States have experienced very great difficulty and disadvantage from the great power that enormous corporations in their great coal supply regions have obtained through the aggregated powers of ownership of immense coal areas, and of being the transportation company besides. We know what has been done by the Reading Coal and Iron Company, and other corporation, similarly circumstanced. The price of coal, I say, is to be ascertained by the price of cutting the coal and getting it to bank, and a small fractional sum, a certain number of cents per ton, added; and the price of coal to the consumer, under normal conditions, depends on those figures and the cost of transportation. Those elements, when there are only 110 miles of railway to be traversed, do not seem to me fairly to be met, and there does not seem to be any very great boon conferred on the public by placing the price of this coal at $5 per ton. The price will, of course, be a great deal more elsewhere. By the terms of construction I am sorry to say the cost of the coal will be added to unnecessarily, because the railway is not of the Canadian Pacific Railway gauge, and therefore, when it is proposed to transport coal to other parts of the North-West, every shipment will involve a transfer at the terminus of the company's railway from one set of cars to another. That is a matter very much to be regretted. I do not now blame the Government because they have acceeded to the company's proposition, which is to a narrow gauge road; but in considering the benefits to the North-West, so far as it will be dependent upon this railway and coal supply, it is an unfortunate fact that upon every ton of coul that is to reach the general public over the Canadian Pacific Railway there should be a break of gauge at that terminus, Those considerations demand, I think, some examination before we shall pledge ourselves to the principle of giving very favorable concessions to a coal and railway company, in the shape of coal lands and agricultural lands, without providing some exceptional power, on our own part, to remedy the inevitable monopoly which, I have pointed out, goes with its construction, and securing to the public the benefit of competition in the supply of fuel. Then the Order in Council which was passed first upon this subject was passed upon a memorandum of the Minister of Interior, dated the 8th October, 1880, in which he recited the letter of Sir Alexander Galt, to which I have referred, and the privileges which he asked for. He asks for 15,000 acros of coal lands at the terminus of the road, and:

"That the Government shall forthwith reserve from sale and settlement, to be sold to the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, limited, or to the proposed Alberta Railway and Coal Company, at the time and on the terms and conditions hereinafter stated, 3,840 acres of land per mile, for the whole lenth of the line, from Medicine Hat to the coal banks, the reserve to commence at the point where the line intersects the southerly limit of the Canadian Pacific Railway belt. and to consist of the odd-numbered sections at the disposal of the Government in the townships along the line of railway, for a distance of six miles on each side thereof, &c. And that the Government shall further reserve for the company, forthwith, 10,000 acres of coal lands, in one equilateral block, at the western terminus of the line."

"That upon the completion by the company of the whole of the line, "That upon the completion by the company of the whole of the line, the same being adequately equipped and running, the company be allowed to purchase from the lands reserved for that purpose 3,840 acres per mile of the railway, at the rate of $1 per acre, and the cost of survey (nothwithstanding the provisions of the Order in Council of the 4th June, 1883, fixing the price of such lands at $1 50 per acre) and 10,000 acres, or such less quantity as the company, after examination, may select, of coal lands at the western terminus of the line, at the rate of $10 per acre

Now, I have twice asked the First Minister to bring down that Order in Council of the 4th of June, 1883. I saw it when these papers first came down, and it seemed to me that it was of importance, in considering the policy of the Government, that we should have it; but it has not been supplied. I asked the Minister of Public Works to take note that this Order in Council refers to a general Order in Council of the 4th June, 1883, fixing the lands at $1.50 per acre, and that we should have that Order in Council before proceeding to a further stage of the resolution. Then, Sir, as to the provision of 10,000 acres at the western terminus. The Government was alive, at that time, to the importance of reserving, as far as possible, the mining rights at the terminus, and this is a very praiseworthy precaution on their part, which I am endeavoring to make as effectual as possible. Then, before the patent is issued the lands are to be paid for in cash, at the rates mentioned, that is, $1, and the survey price, and the whole line is to be constructed and equipped within two years from the 1st September, 1883. At that time the Government did not acquiesce that this grant was made without reference to the proposition that it should be a narrow gauge road, because the whole condition of the Order is that the standard of construction shall be the same as that of the Canadian Pacific Railway I think, Sir, it is very unfortunate that it was thought necessary to depart from that gauge, because the question-upon the statement the hon. gentleman made to me just now, that they considered these to be agriculture lands, and that they expected a large settlement in that district of county and along the line of railway-involves, of course, the consideration of the general settlement of the country; and what I have said with reference to the cost of transport of coal, dealing, first of all, with that question, applies, of course, to every pound of grain and every head of cattle that goes out, and every pound of comsumable that comes into that territory over the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or of this railway. And if it were at all possible, even to-day, I beg the Government to take into further consideration whether it is not practicable to arrange that the railway shall be of the same gauge, so that we may have a standard gauge for that part of the country. I very well remember the old battle of the gauges, though I was not then in public life. I remember when we had a national gauge in the Province of Canada, and the Minister of Public Works, I dare say, recollects that in the Parliament of the old Province of Canada, it was thought very important that we should not adopt the American gauge. In fact, it was the inception of the policy which has broken out in late years in other directions - the policy of isolation. I remember the battle of the gauges coming out, later on, in the peninsula, in the Province of Ontario, under the Administration of Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, when he declined to permit a railway to be constructed in the Province of Ontario on the American gauge, because he thought it was not fit. He thought we should keep our own gauge, though that railway was expected to exist by traffic from each side of the line. We know the loss, the harm, the difficulty which arose. recollect the breaking out of the same feud here. I recollect the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and the gauge proposed for that road; and the same difficulties for the 1,920 acres of land per mile, proposed to be surrendered by the with reference to that question of gauge as with reference to the question of steel and iron. Now, we have settled down to the notion that it is of the first consequence that Mr. BLAKE.

there should be uniformity of gauge, and if you are dealing with an important district in the North-West, not merely with reference to coal, but also with reference to agriculture, it is extremely important that we should consider the question of gauge. We, in the Province of Ontario, were question of gauge. We, in the Province of Ontario, were persuaded to adopt the principle of the narrow gauge some few years ago, on the theory of certain enthusiastic railway projectors, who said they were going to give us efficient and cheap lines of railway in that way. It was found that that line of railway was not much cheaper, and, as a practical result, not much cheapness resulted from it, though I am prepared to admit that there are some remarkable instances in the north-western States of the United States of wonderfully cheap railways built on the narrow gauge. But there are also some remarkable instances in those States of very cheap railways built on the standard gauge, in the last two or three years. If the hon, gentleman looks at the reports of certain railways there, he will find that they have been built for $6,000, $7,000, or $9,000 per mile. Now, when we can find ordinary gauge railways built for these figures, I look with very great regret upon the introduction of the principle of breaking gauge in that great country, whose distances are so enormous, whose remotness from the seaboard is one of its main difficulties, and with reference to which, therefore, anything that can block or obstruct transport and increase cost is matter of the extremest moment. An Order in Council was passed on the 19th of October, which gives the right to grant 3,840 acres a mile, at $1 an acre cash, and the cost of survey, as the aid thought of at that time for this railway, the land to be taken from the odd-numbered sections. Then there is a report of the Committee of Council on the 27th of September, 1884:

"The Minister submits that he has received a communication from Sir Alexander Galt, stating that the company have failed to raise the capital necessary for the construction of the railway, and representing that in the present state of the British money market the privilege accorded to them of purchasing 3,840 acres of land per mile, at $1 per acre, and the cost of survey, is no aid to the company in their financial negotiations, but, on the contrary, if accepted, would be a positive burden, inasmuch as the capital necessary to pay for the land would have to be raised in addition to that required for the construction of the railway, and he (Sir Alexander Galt) therefore asks that the company may be allowed to surrender one-half the allotment of land along the line of railway, and that the other half be granted to them at the cost of survey only." "The Minister submits that he has received a communication from Sir that the other half be granted to them at the cost of survey only.

There you have the proposal made, as late as the 27th of September last, not that 3,840 acres should be granted, at $1 per acre, but that one-half of that quantity should be given free:

"The Minister observes that Sir Alexander Galt states that if his application be granted, he will obtain the capital necessary to construct the line; that indeed a considerable portion of the amount has been promised to him by leading capitalists, and he has no doubt he will be able to obtain the balance that the company propose to reduce the gauge of the railway to 3 feet."

There you have a statement, as late as the 27th of September last, by Sir Alexander Galt, that if 1,920 acres are given free he will be able to raise capital, and that indeed a large proportion has been promised. The Minister says:

"The Minister attaches great importance to the opening and working of the coal fields on the Belly River and the cheap transport of their product, which, in his opinion, would tend greatly to reduce the price of fuel to the settlers along the whole length of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

There, you see, the Minister and I are entirely at one, not merely as to the importance of opening up the Lethbridge mine, but the coal fields along the Bow and Belly Rivers. What I am anxious for is, that we should not make such provisions as will prevent competition between this company and other coal mine owners, but that we shall accomplish the result which the Minister looks for. The Minister adds:

enhancement in the value of the laud in the whole district traversed by the railway could not fail to be important.

The Minister's notion, as late as September last, was that he would get as much for the 1,920 acres as would have been got for the whole 3,840 acres, because the 9,120 acres would be worth $2 an acre, and he thinks no pecuniary loss would result from granting 1,920 acres free. Upon that the Minister savs:

"The Minister of the Interior, after giving the question full consideration, recommends that the application of Sir Alexander Galt, on behalf of the Alberta Railway and Coal Company, be granted, and the price of the land be reduced to 10 cents per acre, on the following conditions: That the reserve of land along the line of railway, ordered to be made under the Order in Council above recited, be reduced one-half, viz., to 1,920 acres per mile, for the whole length of the line, from Medicine Hat to the coal banks, a distance of about 110 miles; that the gauge of the railway may be reduced to 3 feet, on condition that the railway and its equipment shall, at all times, be sufficient to afford prompt transport for the passengers and freight of the district; that the sale of land herein recommended to be made to the company shall depend upon the necosrecommended to be made to the company shall depend upon the necessary capital being assured and the line being put under contract, both to the satisfaction of the Government, before the 1st day of December, in default of which the Order to be made upon this recommendation to be null and void."

Mark, Sir, that this Order in Council, made in September, was upon the condition that the capital should be raised and the line put under contract on the 1st of December last. Then an Order, it is not material to read, as to the name of the company to which the grant should be made, was passed. Then, on the 9th of January, 1865, comes another memorandum, which is the present governing Order in Council:

"The Minister submits a statement of the former Order of the 27th of September, 1884, and a communication from the company, of the 27th of October last, attached to this Order, and covering a copy of the contract entered into by the company for the construction of the line, and asking that the grant be increased to 6,400 acres per mile, being an increase of 4,480 acres per mile, on the ground that that quantity has been granted to other companies."

Now, you will observe that this company had asked the Government, in June, to give it 1,920 acres free, in addition to its concession of 10,000 acres of coal lands, and leave to build a narrow gauge railway. That the Government had agreed to that, and that Sir Alexander Galt had said, on behalf of the company, that upon that concession he had the promise to and no doubt would raise the whole of the capital. You may observe that in October the company enclosed to the Government a copy of the contract which they had already made for the execution of the line; so that they had actually arranged, under the Order in Council in June, and actually raised their capital and made their contract for the construction of their line; and having made their arrangements, they then come to the Government and ask the Government -for what? To give them 6,400 acres of land per mile. And on what ground? Not on the ground that they had found themselves disappointed in their expectations, which is the ground the First Minister gave, in answer to my objections the other evening, not on the ground that they found, after trial, that the promises they had made could not be carried out, but on the ground that, although they had found those terms sufficient, although they had raised their capital, although they had entered into the contract, it was right that they should get 6,400 acres per mile, because other companies, quite differently circumstanced, as I shall show you when we come to deal with them, and offering different facilities, were going to get a grant of 6,400 acres per mile. Mark you, that is the ground on which Sir Alexander Galt, on behalf of this North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, asked that open to everybody, that this capital had been raised, that the grant should be increased to him. Because the other companies got more, he asked that his company should get because they found it essential to the construction of their lines; they gave as little as they thought was essential to the construction of those lines. That you find from the and very nearly 200 acres to the mile, which would give Now, the Government gave more to the others papers in connection with the other applications, and from the statement of the First Minister, on the motion to go into committee. He stated that the grant was regulated by this consideration: This is as little as we can get the lines built with, and we have given no more away than was necessary to accomplish the public purpose. That is a very good statement of the case, but it is a statement of the case that does not apply to this grant, this additional grant of 1,920 acres, because, as I have said, and repeat, this company had promised, in June, that they could do the work, and had already done part of the work, and raised the capital necessary, upon the minor grant of 1,920 acres. In October they said they had done it, and they sent the evidence of that to the Goveanment, and they accompanied that with a request for 6,400 acres, because they saw that other companies had got that amount:

"The Committee further asks that of this quantity 1,920 acres per mile be granted on condition that the narrow gauge line now under contract be completed on or before let September next, and that the remainder, 2,560 acres per mile, be reserved for future selection, conditional on the assimilation of the line to the standard gauge within seven years. The Minister observes that the North Western Coal and Navigation Company is the only railway company which has recently succeeded in raising capital for the prosecution of its undertaking and placed the same under contract."

There you see the further proof of my statement, which was sufficiently proved by the letter of Sir Alexander Galt. The Minister states, in his recommendation to the Council, that this company has raised its capital and placed its line under contract, and that he was informed by Sir Alexander Galt that the work of construction was actually in progress -the capital has been raised, the contract had been made: "And that while the company, under the Order in Council granting the land, has until the 1st July, 1886, to complete the line, yet it would be possible, by incurring a large additional expense, to complete and open the same for traffic during the month of August next, and that the company is prepared to incur such additional expense, provided the land grant be increased by 1992 agree very mile as now applied for grant be increased by 1,920 acres per mile, as now applied for

There is the statement. The company had one year more to build their line; they said, however, they were prepared to complete it by August next, but would have to incur large additional expense in doing so, and that if they got 1,920 acres per mile additional they would complete it in that time. That is the only condition proposed for this additional grant of 1,920 acres.

"The completion of this line will not only furnish railway facilities to the district extending from the Canadian Pacific Railway to within about 25 miles of Fort McLeod, a distance of 110 miles, but will also open communication with the coal fields on the Belly River, and if running in August next, will render a large additional supply of fuel for next winter's use along the whole line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as fareast as Winnipeg. The Minister of the Interior is of opinion that to attain these objects it would be reasonable, and in the public interest, to restore to the company the full quantity of 3,840 acres of land per mile granted to it by Order in Council of the 19th October, 1883. That, subject to the approval of Parliament, the quantity of land granted to the company by the Order in Council of the 2'th September last be increased to 3,840 acres per mile, for the whole distance on the Canadian Pacific Railway, at or near Medicine Hat, to the coal fields near the Belly River. That the company shall reimburse to the Government the cost of survey and incidental expenses. " The increase to be dependent upon the line being completed and running during the month of August." "The completion of this line will not only furnish railway facilities to

Therefore, you find That is the Order which was passed. that while the arrangements have been made for the completion of the railway on a grant of 1,920 acres per mile, it it now arranged to pay them another 1,920 acres per mile, in order that the opening of the railway may be expedited a this line was being proceeded with, and I was very much surprised to find it was being proceeded with under terms such as these. The Minister, in September last, says: "I you 220,000, say 216,000 acres of land, which the Minister, in September, valued at $2. That would be $420,000 put in cash, and that is what the Minister has given, according to his own estimates of value, in Septem ber, in order that the railway might be completed a few months earlier than otherwise it might have been. If it be a prudent thing, I must say it does now so strike me. I must, therefore, ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works to give some explanations to the committee of the two main points to which I have referred: first, the junction of the coal and navigation company to the railway company, and the arrangements made to secure to the country the benefit of competition; secondly,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This application of this company was the first of the kind, and the Government thought that the importance of opening up these mining lands, these coal lands, and obtaining a large supply of coal for the railways as well as for the settlers, was a very great advantage, and that the Government should help the company in opening those mines and producing the result which was intended by the building of this road. The hon, gentleman pointed out that from the 1st of June, 1883, to the end of January, 1885, there have been different changes with reference to the land grants and the conditions that were given to this company. That is perfectly correct; these changes have taken place. They have taken place changes have taken place. They have taken with regard to this company as they have regard to all the other companies that are tioned in these resolutions before the committee, and the reason of that is obvious to those who have had time to look over the papers which have been laid before The object was, in the first instance, to the House. encourage the opening of those roads. That has been the constant object of the Government, and, unfortunately, the conditions that were thought, in the beginning, to be sufficient to obtain that result, have failed. The companies have been unable to obtain the capital necessary, and the Government have been called upon to aid them, in order to raise the necessary capital. In the case of this coal company, the North-Western Coal and Navigation Company, there have been changes two or three times. The hon. gentleman shows that, in the second change, we reduced the amount of 3,840 acres to 1,920 acres, the company declaring that, instead of it being a boon to them to purchase these lands it would really be a ruin to them, and that, instead of that, they should have a gift of those lands, on the same footing as we promised lands to other companies, subject to the consent of Parliament. True, that company made arrangements for the building of the road, and the hon, gentleman says the contract was signed and the construction was on the way. I have not the papers here, but I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has quoted those papers correctly. Taking that as a basis, I must say that the question put by the hon. gentleman is a fair one, to know why, when this railway company has already raised the capital, or a certain amount of the capital, to build their road, we were induced to increase the grant from 1,920 acres to 3,840 acres. The amount of land, as the hon. gentlemen will observe, which the company, in the last instance, asked the Government to grant them, was 6,400 acres, the same as the other companies have obtained, subject to the approval of Parliament. The Government did not think they should grant the company 6,400 acres a mile, but they reverted to the first grant of 3,840 acres of land, which had been fixed by a previous Order in Council, but following it with the same condition which had been imposed by the Order in Council of the 27th September, 1884, which gave the land to the company subject to the Several mines will be required to furnish fuel for that coun-Mr. BLAKE.

payment by them of the cost of the survey, and so on, to the extent of 10 cents an acre. The Government thought that, under the circumstances, should they grant this additional amount of 1,920 acres, this might be granted on account of the curtailing of the delay in opening the road. thought that, by reducing the time one year, it was of very great importance to the North West, to the settlers, to all parties, and for the future of that country, to obtain the opening of these mines and the bringing of the coal out on the railway to be sold, as mentioned in the statement made by Sir Alexander Galt, that that should be done as soon as possible. We thought it was of such importance to have this coal brought out in the month of the question of the gauge of the railway; and thirdly, the additional grant given for the inadequate result of expediting its completion a few months.

Importance we have this coal prought out in the month of August this year, instead of waiting another year, that we did not hesitate to decide that we would grant—not the 6,400 acres, but the same amount of land which was fixed by the Order in Council of the 19th October, 1883. I still believe that the Government were right in doing this; though it is a sacrifice of land, in a certain way, it is an investment which was an important one, because this was the first railway of the kind that had obtained money with the aid of lands from the Government. We thought that, the object being not only to open a section of the country, but to open the mines—to bring a large quantity of fuel from them, and furnish that at a comparatively low price, it was a matter of very grave importance; and, besides that, this should be done immediately instead of waiting another year. That is why we granted these lands, and I think the Government were perfectly right in doing so. The hon gentleman seems to be alarmed about the quantity of land which has been granted, and he asks whether it is not to be a monopoly in this case, and if other companies or individuals would be deprived of opening mines and competing for the market there. The hon, gentleman may be sure that the Government have no such intention. The Government gave these privileges, and asks the sanction of Parliament for the purpose—not of giving these people an absolute and exclusive right to the mines there, but in order to begin by opening these lands. The hon. gentleman may have thought 10,000 acres of land at the terminus of the road to be a large area. It is a large area, but it is not too large an area, when you consider that these corporators had to raise the amount of money, not for the purpose of opening up that country for settlement. That was not their object. Their real object was to go to the coal mines and get the coal out. It was a speculation, and a proper one, on their part, and the Government thought they should help that speculation in the interest of the North West, in the interest of the settlers; but nothing prevents any other company obtaining lands in that region. I understand, by the surveys that have been made, that the coal lands extend over a very large area of that Territory. They are not conconfined to this comparatively small area of 10,000 acres, but there are hundreds of thousands of acres of good coal lands, and therefore there will be a healthy competition between the companies. If the hon, gentleman looks at the map he will see that these lands are accessible, not only by this road, but that they can be reached easily from other points on the Pacific Railway. In this case the railway goes 110 miles to Medicine Hat.

There are other points not so far east, but a little more in a north-westerly direction. The road would probably be shorter, and they could obtain an outlet for their mines in that direction. Of course, the hon. gentleman will see that this corporation, being the first in the field, has an advantage over others. And that immense Territory, where expect such a large population, and with the Territories being opened in other directions by these other three railways that are to be opened up, will be in want of coal; the market for coal will be increasing every day, as the population increases, and therefore one mine will not be sufficient.

try, and therefore I do not think there need be any apprehension of a want of healthy competition in the coal trade in the North-West. For the coal lands the Government have charged $10 an acre, and that price was mentioned, if I mistake not, in Parliament, before this Session, and the documents were laid before Parliament. It was well known that that price had been fixed for these lands. I have no doubt that any other company that would apply to the Department of the Interior for coal lands would be treated in the same way as this company has been treated. The hon. gentleman has also spoken of the narrow gauge, and he thinks it is to be regretted that this railway has not the present standard gauge of the country. Well, perhaps it is so, but the building of a narrow gauge road will produce, at all events, for the present, the effect the company designed to obtain in opening up that country. The hon, gentleman says it will be increasing the cost to handle the coal at the junction of the two railways. Well, I suppose the company found that they could not raise sufficient money to build a broad gauge railway, that is, a railway with the present gauge of all the railways in Canada, and they had to limit themselves to a narrow gauge road. But this railway is not, after all, a very long oneonly 110 miles, and when you consider the extent of country, I have no doubt that that exception to the gauge of the other railways in the North-West will be lost sight of when the country is being opened on all sides. I admit, with the hon, gentleman, that the standard gauge of the country for railways should be, as far as possible, adhered to. I think it is in the interests of the country that it should be so, and it will be better that our railways should have that gauge. In the case of two long railways, the South-Western and Manitoba and the North-Western, I think the hon. gentleman will see that the gauge has been adhered to, and that we may expect the benefit of that gauge in respect to these two railways. About the lands on the line of railway, I stated to the hon. gentleman that these lands were considered agricultural more than coal lands, and the reason of the Government believing so was, that if these lands had been really coal lands the company building this railway would not have built a road 110 miles-

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say agricultural more than coal lands; I wanted to know whether they were coal lands.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. But I am explaining that we believe these lands are agricultural rather than coal lands, for the reason that the company, instead of trying to procure their coal nearer to the Pacific Railway, have gone a distance of 110 miles to secure coal for many years past. I repeat that we, as a Government, believe that it is of the greatest importance that in the first attempt to open up these coal lands in the North-West we should give an advantage to the company making that attempt, and put it on such a footing that the coal may be brought out as easily as possible. I do not know whether I have answered all the objections and observations of the hon, gentleman about this road, but I have endeavored to do so. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows that this is not exactly a matter which comes under my special care in the Department of Public Works; nevertheless, I have done my best to answer his questions, and I hope that if he is not perfectly satisfied with my observations he will, at all events, be satisfied that the Government desire to encourage the opening of these mines as soon as possible, in order to benefit the railways as well as the settlers of the North-West.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). I wish to refer to one statetement made by the leader of the Opposition, which, owing to that country being purely a prairie country, have proposed this grant with the notion that coal would might be misleading. He stated that Sir A. T. Galt had come from the Lethbridge mines, and that it is therefore made a contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway for al necessary to build the proposed railway of 110 miles to certain quantity of coal, at $5 per ton. I know nothing of the contract, nor why such a bargain was made, but if it is true, I consider it a pretty soft bargain.

Mr. BLAKE. It is made, and for five years.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is in the interest of the settlers that I rose to my feet, because I know, as a matter of fact, all along the railway you can get coal for $2 a ton, at almost any place as far as Calgary. From Fort MacLeod, over the line of railway south, and through the whole country, I do not know any district where scarcely 20 miles would have to be traversed where a settler could not procure coal with his own cart. I desire to prevent a misleading estimate being placed upon the value of fuel in that country. Why they have come 110 miles, I do not know; but I know that the same coal deposit extends 25 or 30 miles west of Medicine Hat, and borings have since been made by the railway company, I understand, with good results. I know that in the Bow River district there is a belt of coal showing outcrops a mile and a-half or two miles wide and 51 to 7 feet thick, and better coal than at the coal banks.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon, gentleman will be able to inform us the cost of putting coal on bank.

Mr. FERGUSON. I happened to be there during the time of the coal strike in Pennsylvania. I met a representative of the miners, and he said he would be prepared to put coal on bank at Medicine Hat for $1.10 per ton.

Mr. BLAKE. That strikes me as about the figure which I possess. The figures vary a little in Ohio and Ponnsylvania, but that is about the average. The hon. gentleman knows the price at which coal is carried on the Intercolonial to western points, namely, 1 of a cent per ton per mile for the long haul. The short haul is, of course, higher, for the shorter the haul the greater the cost per mile. The ordinary charge on the western line, when there is no strike and when the haul is a comparatively short one, say between the Suspension Bridge and Toronto, is 1 cent per net ton per mile, which is a very high and remunerative rate. Take, then, $1.10 for transportation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Fifty cents.

Mr. BLAKE. I will take the liberal price of 1 cont per ton per mile, which gives $1.10 for transport. The cost of putting coal on bank I place at $1.10 per ton. I add 50 cents for royalty; and that is a very handsome thing, for if 100,000 tons are raised, there will $50,000 per annum simply for being proprietor of the coal lands. The enormous area of coal lands which this company will possess, 12,000 or 15,000 acres, will supply all the north-western country for a long time to come. Hon, gentlemen opposite will be surprised to find the quantity of coal in an acre of land. The company charge $5 per ton to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or 100 per cent. profit. That is a bargain they have made. You may estimate what they are going to charge to settlers from that figure, for Sir Alexander Galt tells us, as an inducement to this arrangement, that the moderate price of $5 has been made by him. At the terms stated, a contract has been made to supply the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with a minimum quantity of 20,000 a year, for five years, for their own consumption. It is, as the hon gentleman has said, a protty soft thing. I do not care for that, for I think the pioneer enterprise should be treated liberally.

Mr. FERGUSON. That was not the point I made. What I wanted to show was the cost at which coal could be produced.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that; but the Government reach the coal. But if you can get coal 25 miles from Medicine Hat, you had better build a broad gauge road over those 25 miles, which will cost us no more, and will give connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. That, I say, will not cost us more, and it will be infinitely better for the North-West. The hon, gentleman has said there is a better seam there than at the Lethbridge mines.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is under the line.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, the Canadian Pacific Railway do not need this supply, and the whole basis on which the grant is asked falls to the ground, and the road now under consideration becomes simply an agricultural railway. I am, however, unable to deal with the matter upon that theory. I have not the hon gentleman's facts, which he has no doubt communicated to hon, gentlemen near him.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have not.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman is too reticent. Suppose the hon, gentleman is not quite correct in his assertion that coal can be got everywhere. We know that a certain quality can be got in many quarters; coal which would serve the settler can be got on his own farm; but as to the high and comparatively high qualities, I am not prepared to say how far they are disseminated. But I hope the hon. gentleman's statement is quite correct. My point, which the Minister of Public Works has not attempted to meet, is as to the necessity of making a special provision to ensure competition, because it is not enough to tell us that another railway can be built. Another railway, I dare say, will be built in other parts of the country; but surely it is better, when we are making so considerable a grant-I believe the hon, gentleman has said it is a prairie country, and a road can therefore very easily be built—to take some step that the conjunctive position of coal miner and railway owner shall not prevent other coal miners in the neighborhood, naturally tributary to the railway, getting their coal transported on terms which will enable them to compete in the market. You will not get competition unless there is the advantage of fair terms offered. If the hon, gentleman's statement is correct, that there is fine coal on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Medicine Hat, there is not very much use in bringing coal from the Lethbridge mines, a distance of 110 miles. If that be so, the whole basis on which this application is made falls to the ground, and it is unnecessary to grant a large area of coal lands to aid the company, and save $400,000. If the statement of the hon. member be true we must alter the proverb about carrying coal to Newcastle, and say, it is like carrying coal to Medicine Hat. This is really a serious subject. In asking assent to this grant on the theory that the coal supplies for particular sections of the country, ay, and as far down as Winnipeg, is to come from the Lethbridge mines, and if it is to be supplied at Winnipeg at the moderate price of $10 a ton, as stated in the memorandum, I think we had better consider whether we cannot get it supplied at Winnipeg a little cheaper. I am anxious, before we get to the subsequent stages of the Bill, that the hon. gentleman should consider whether he will not make arrrangements by which this railway may be used on moderate terms for getting coal from other mines as well as giving us competition. The hon, gentleman misunderstood me when he supposed I asked whether these lands were agricultural or coal lands. I asked him if they were agricultural lands, though I was of the opinion that the company would not haul the coal 110 miles if they could get it at the shorter distance; but the hon. member for Leeds tells us that that is not the company's view; that although there is better coal near the terminus, they do propose to haul it the greater distance. But, being under that impression, which I shared with the advanced a certain portion of the money, should get a Mr. Blake.

Minister of Public Works, I did not ask whether it was coal or agricultural land, but I asked, rather, whether it was agricultural land, as I thought it might be waste land or ranching land, or something of that kind. Well, the hon. gentleman says it was very little to give this additional grant of land. Now, I do not know what the nature of this contract is. It is not laid before us, and as it is annexed to the letter of Sir Alexander Galt, which was submitted to the Government on the 27th of October, I think the hon. gentleman should feel no difficulty in laying it on the Table.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will bring it down.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know that we will be much the wiser when we get that contract, because the curse of these railway arrangements is watered stock, excessive bonds, and enormous costs, which swallow up the advantage to the public of the bonuses they give. The First Minister, when answering me the other day, adverted to the enormous shrinkage of American railway securities, which, of course, re-acted upon the minds of English capitalists with reference to these securities here. There has been that srinkage, but it was not due to the inflation which preceded it, but because there has been that which I can call nothing else than a fraudulent system of making a false nominal capital in the construction of railways in the United States. In the two years preceding the last three years, when the great depression commenced, the increase in the nominal capital in stock and bonds of the railways of the United States was, in round figures, about $2,000,000,000, and a liberal estimate made by experts of the sum of money expended, and which was represented by that $2,000,000,000 was $1,050,000,000, so that there had been spent, wisely or unwisely, $1,050,000,000 of capital stock and bonds representing that $2,000,000,000, or about $2 for every one actually spent, and an unhappy public in the United States, in England, in Belgium, in Germany, very largely, was gulled into taking these figures as representing value and expenditure. The result was that when the period of depression and railway competition came, the period at which the inflated charge could not be maintained, the bottom dropped out of the concern. But if anybody will examine the trunk lines, if he will look at the values even of a large portion of the railway property of the United States, enormously depressed as it is, if he will look at the mileage value to-day, and will ascertain what the roads will cost to build to-day, he will find that in many cases the prices at which they are held, and which are supposed to be ruinous prices, are greater than the actual cost of building them to-day. I make that observation because I think it is a question that we should consider. We have had the same thing introduced here on a small scale in the provincial railways and on an enormous scale in the transcontinental railways. We have given subsidies in Ontario to railway after railway, and though they have largely been built by the municipalities and the Government, yet they have been bonded for amounts which represent more than the whole cost of construction, and the public is taxed to pay tolls on more than the whole cost of construction yearly, although the greater part of the cost of construction was a free gift. I feel, therefore, that it is important for us to consider, on entering on this policy of giving large and liberal grants to these roads in the North West-and I think we ought to give pretty large grants—we should consider what that cost is at the bottom price. We should know, in some measure, what the real value of construction is, that we may see what we are doing for the company and for the public. I do not want that the public should practically pay the cost of building the railway, and that the private corporations should obtain a large profit on the whole cost. We want that those with whom it is a speculation, in a certain sense, who have liberal return on the investment, but that they should not get a large profit on all we gave them as well as upon their own adventure. This road is one presumably over a prairie country, built in a cheap fashion, a narrow gauge fashion, and I take the Minister's estimate of $2 per acre, which I find would approximate nearly $8,000 a mile, taking his valuation of the land, irrespective of the coal lands concession. I do not remember whether the Order in Council fixes the price of the coal lands, but I do remember that the policy of the Government with reference to the coal lands has been limited areas to each person. They feel the importance of some concessions being made in order to give free competition, as far as possible, and therefore this is a very considerable departure from that arrangement. I do not quarrel so much with a pretty large concession of the coal lands, if we had a security that that did not involve a practical monopoly in the conjoint control of the railway

Mr. FERGUSON. You cannot corner the coal lands.

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say not, but you can corner the transport. I shall not protract the discussion just now. am sure that the hon. gentleman will agree that the question is one of very great importance, that it is of an importance, in my opinion, far transcending the area of the grant. I think the question of gauge and the question of the accessibility of the public to the coal supply—unless it is wherever you stick a pick in, as the hon. member for Leeds puts it—are questions of magnitude far exceeding the question of a few thousand acres of land. I shall not to-night renew my suggestion, which is one of general application, as to the condition of the land being open for settlement at a fixed maximum price, although I intend that the discussion shall be renewed on that point at a subsequent stage of the measure.

Mr. FBRGUSON. The land of that region is both good agricultural land and coal land. There are a couple of hundred feet on the surface which is a fair basis for agriculture; but there is such a large area of that agricultural land between there and the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and the water and timber supply are so deficient, that it will be many years before there will be many settlers along that road. Therefore, I think the estimate of $2 an acre not disparaging the value of the land, but because there is a surplus-is entirely too high.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, I only took the Minister's statement, made on the 27th September, 1884. I have no means of knowing the value of the land; but if it be a fact, as the hon. gentleman says, that there is a deficiency in the water supply, if it will be many years before the land will be settled, and if the coal areas are so great, I am afraid Sir Alexander Galt will not make much money out of his enterprise.

Mr. ROSS. I agree entirely with the hon. member for West Durham in opposing the narrow gauge. I think this road should be built on the ordinary gauge, as it is not at all as important for the coal as it is as a colonisation road to open up the country. I think it is as important to the coal people themselves as to the settlers that the road should be of the ordinary gauge, because they will experience a great deal of trouble in transferring the coal from the narrow gauge cars to those of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That country is largely a grazing country, and if the range peo-ple are going to use this road for the shipment of cattle it should be of the ordinary gauge, because they would rather drive their cattle the whole distance to the Pacific Railway than to carry them on this railway and then tranship them. I do not believe in narrow gauges at all, except, perhaps, in a country which is so much broken up that a road of the ordinary gauge would cost very much more and the coal of the Lethbridge mine. My information is that it is not terminus be on the sea-board. But in a prairie country I quite as good; that the Lethbridge, or the Galt coal, for the Government to increase the grant, if necessary, in order to have a wide gauge. With reference to the coal lands, I agree with the hon. member for Leeds, to some extent. There is a difference, however, between the coal at the Lethbridge mines and that at Medicine Hat.

Mr. FERGUSON. The coal in that country seems to be disposed in three belts-one cutting the boundary line south of Fort MacLeod, running along the Belly River to the Lethbridge mines, and cutting the Bow River at Grass Island. That is, except the coal in the pots found in the mountains, the best coal in the North-West. The next best coal is that of the belt running from Medicine Hat to the Red Deer River. The next is the Souris coal, which will not bear transport. The Lethbridge coal is the best coal we have in the west.

Mr. ROSS. I now agree with the hop. gentleman in his description of the coal belts, and also as to the superiority of the Lethbridge coal; its advantage is, that it is more highly bituminised than the coal of Medicine Hat, and that is the reason I suppose why the Pacific Railway Company have made the contract with the Lethbridge mine for its supply. The Medicine Hat coal is good enough for household purposes; but the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have just as good coal as the Lethbridge coal, in my opinion, on their own railway, near Crowfoot; it is of the same quality as the Lethbridge coal; and why this road should be built, merely to get coal out, I do not understand. I also agree with the hon, member for Leeds as to the vast quantities of coal in that country. The whole country is one vast coal bed, and the fact that coal is under a man's section does not add one dollar to the value of the land. There are from 5,000,000 to 15,000,000 tons of coal under one section of land, and we have thousands upon thousands of those sections.

Mr. FERGUSON. And good wheat land, at the same time.

Mr. ROSS. There is no doubt about that. The reason one man's coal section is worth more than another is its proximity to the railway, or the fact that a ravine runs through it, which enables you to get out the coal more easily than you could do on the level I do not anticipate that there will be any difference made in the cost of coal by this road running into the Lethbridge mines, because there is so much coal in the country. If this railway were the only railway running through the coal lands I could see the force of the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham; but as the Canadian Pacific Railway runs through the same seam, and opens up the same coal belt, I do not anticipate any change in the cost of coal to the country or any danger of monopoly. The Medicine Hat mines alone can supply all the coal the country will require for many years to come, except for steam purposes; they have supplied coal to Winnipeg during the past winter at $7 a ton. The man in charge of those mines informed me that it cost about $1.80 a ton to get out the coal, but that they intended to reduce the cost to $1.50, and hoped to ultimately get it below that. At the Lethbridge mines the cost of getting the coal out is $2 a ton, but there were special reasons for the cost; after they opened the mines up more fully, they expected to get it out at $1.50 a ton. With regard to the advisability of having the ordinary guage, I agree with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I have had occasion to give some little consideration to this question of coal in the North-West, but on one question I do not agree with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross). He states his information is that the Crowfoot coal is equal in quality to the coal of the Lethbridge mine. My information is that it is not do not think it is at all necessary. I think it would be better lis the best bituminous coal, or quasi-bituminous coal, yet discovered in the North-West, and that the Lethbridge coal is better than the Medicine Hat coal. All can be used on the railway, but of course only in proportion to the carboniferous qualities. I saw recently in the office of Mr. Van Horne, in Montreal, four samples, one of Pennsylvania or Ohio coal, one of the Galt coal, one of the Crowfoot coal, and one of the Medicine Hat coal, which had all been exposed for several weeks, if not months, to the heat from a radiator in his room, with the view of testing the different qualities of the different coal; and you could tell, from the extent to which the square blocks had cracked, their relative combustible qualities, and there was no doubt that the Medicine Hat coal was not as good as the Crowfoot coal, that the Crowfoot coal was not as good as the Lethbridge or Galt coal, and that the Letbridge coal was not as good as the Eastern coal. As to the diffrence between narrow gauge and the ordinary gauge, I entirely agree with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross). I think it is a mistake that the Galt Company have commenced the construction of a narrow gauge road. It would be much more satisfactory if the Government had required the road to be constructed on the ordinary gauge, even if it had involved the granting of an additional subsidy in the way of land to that company for that purpose. I presume, however, the capitalists interested in the company felt they had to cut their garment according to their cloth, and could only build such a road as their financial resources would enable them to do, supplemented by the Government subsidy. There is no question that an ordinary gauge road would be infinitely more useful to the country. The hon, member for Durham will recollect the discussion which took place some years ago in the Ontario Legislature, when it was decided, with reference to several roads, that a narrow gauge road suited their purpose, and possibly no other could be constructed at the time. Experience has since shown that narrow gauge roads could be widened to the ordinary gauge, and no doubt, in a few years, as the North-West develops, the company will widen the present narrow gauge to the ordinary standard road. However, it is a case of half a loaf better than none at all. I think a narrow gauge road will be of some advantage to the country, though an ordinary gauge road would be of much more advantage to it. But if the resources of the company are only sufficient to build a narrow gauge road, by all means let us have that first, and if the resources of the country, later, justify additional expense, no doubt we will have that road widened to the ordinary gauge.

Mr. SPROULE. It is well that the Government should come to the assistance of parties who are endeavoring to build roads which will be of great importance to the settlers, and no doubt very useful to the country; but from the experience that I have had in connection with narrow-gauge roads, I think it would be a very great mistake for the Government to give one acre of land to assist any company in building a narrow gauge road. No sooner are these roads built than it is found impossible to get up the necessary speed on them; the engine has not sufficient power, and as the gauge does not agree with other roads, everything has to be transhipped, including coal, the handling of which will entail an additional cost of from 50 to 75 cents per ton. To make the road effectual at all, the gauge must be widened the same engines cannot then be used, the rolling stock will have to be transformed and renewed at considerable expense, and the expense of changing, in fact, will be almost equal to half the cost of building the road. It was proposed at one time that a narrow gauge road would be more suitable to our country than a broad gauge, because the grades were heavy and the curves were short; but Mr. Cameron (Victoria).

curves are sharp, the track not having been changed, there is not as much difficulty experienced as was experienced on the old narrow gauge road. Our experience is, that a broad gauge road could have been built for nearly the same money as a narrow gauge one and perform double the service. Everything that has to be transferred from one road to another creates a large additional expense, that must be taken out of the profits of those who use the road.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with the hon. Minister who has charge of the Bill (Sir Hector Langevin) that it is of greater importance that coal should be got and delivered to settlers and to the railways as cheap as possible, and as good as can be had. I do not agree with the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson), who stated that coal at Medicine Hat was as good as that in the Lethbridge coal mine.

Mr. FERGUSON. I did not say so. I am satisfied, from my own observations, as well as the experience of railway men, that it is not as good.

Mr. WATSON. I beg the hon gentleman's pardon. I believe it to be of the greatest importance that the best coal to be found in that country should be procured to the settler as cheap as possible. I agree with the First Minister, as far as he stated that any company that undertakes to get out the coal ought to be encouraged. At the same time, in aiding an enterprise of this kind, we ought to have in view what the possible result will be. Under the present proposal, there is danger of a monopoly of the best coal, that of the Lethbridge mine, being created, by the granting of large grants of land for the construction of a narrow gauge line of railway, of which the mining company shall have sole control, and can impose what rates they please for the carrying of coal to the Canadian Pacific Railway. From information I have from the foreman who works in the Medicine Hat mine the cost of putting out coal at the Medicine Hat mine; is $1.25 per ton. The freight from Medicine Hat to Winnipeg, 660 miles, is $4 per ton. That makes $5.25 a ton for the coal delivered at the railway station in Winnipeg. It costs on an average, 75 cents a ton to deliver it round the city, making $6 in all. price of coal in Winnipeg is from $7 to $7.50 per ton, leaving a net profit of $1 or $1.50 per ton.

Mr. FERGUSON. Last year it was put in the yards by contract at $7.

Mr. WATSON. The quality of the coal delivered in Winnipeg at $7 or $7.50 per ton is about a due proportion to American coal, for which we pay $11 a ton. I believe the Lethbridge coal is much better than Medicine Hat, although we have not had an opportunity to test it yet in the stoves in the West, because most of the coal delivered in the cities and towns has been the Medicine Hat coal. I believe the coal from this Galt mine is very superior coal, superior to that now in use.

Mr. BOWELL. By American coal, I suppose you mean the anthracite or hard coal.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; it is the hard coal. It is sold at $11 per ton, and it is just about as cheap to buy the one as the other. One ton of the American coal is equal to a ton and a-half from Medicine Hat. By being exposed to the air, the Medicine Hat coal pulverises very soon. I think, if this grant is to be made to this railway, the Government ought to reserve certain rights, as to the freight rates, and that any coal tendered by other parties should be carried by this new railway at a certain rate. If not, and coal of the same quality cannot be found within 110 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it will certainly create a monopoly, because no other company can build a competafter the road was built it was found that, on account ing line without receiving a grant. I agree with hon. genof the grades, more powerful engines were required and a tlemen who have spoken against a narrow gauge road. I broader gauge road. The road was widened, and though the believe it is a bad thing to allow any company to build a road on to which you cannot run a car from the main line have framed a tariff, based upon a determination to keep the of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If you are shipping stock, you would not be bothered with the transhipment, for the sake of 110 miles. You would rather drive. The road is, consequently, worthless for carrying stock. If the country is as good as the hon member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) says, for settlement-I have not seen it myself, but he has—we ought to have a broad gauge road, for the narrow gauge road would be of little or no use, because of the transhipment required. My principal objection would be to giving this grant to any company, without reserving restrictions as to the control the Government would have over the road. They should compel it to carry freight for other companies who might wish to open up mines in that country, and should be restricted to say 1 cent a ton per mile, or something of that kind, and any reasonable amount of coal tendered to the company should be freighted within a reasonable time. If that provision was put in, I think it would be very good, and would be in the interests of the whole settlers of the North-West, who wish to receive cheap coal, and it would be in the interest of the Government to make that one of the conditions. But I would much rather see a broad gauge. The cost between a narrow gauge and a broad gauge road is not a great deal on 110 miles, and it would be a road good for all purposes, and if the mines be opened up there, and the coal is so much better than the Medicine Hat coal, a road would have lots of work to do, and would pay in carrying coal, because we can hardly estimate the amount of coal that will be required for consumption in the prairie sections of the West. A broad gauge road should be built, and if the coal is what it it is said to be, and I believe it is, it would pay any company, as a railway enterprise, leaving out the coal interests altogether. I believe there will be roads built in that country, and if that road has the carrying of the coal, and also of the merchandise into the country and the grain out of it, it ought to pay well.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). A monopoly of coal in that country is simply out of the question. Coal is so abundant there, underlying the whole country, certainly from Medicine Hat westward, that it is impossible that at any period of time a monopoly could be established. As to the quality of the Galt coal and the Medicine Hat coal, I have had the opportunity of comparing the analysis of the two coals, and I have arrived at the conclusion, after consulting a person skilled in the business, that the difference of freight, the cost of carriage to the Canadian Pacific Railway, of the Galt coal, a distance of 110 miles from Medicine Hat, or where they are to strike the railway, was hardly equal to the difference in value; in other words, that the Medicine Hat coal, at the price for which it is put on board the cars at Medicine Hat, is as valuable and as cheap as the Galt coal. In other words, the cost of freight was equal to the difference in the quality of the two coals. The cost of freight for 110 miles, and the cost of the construction of the railway, was a very considerable item. Then, when you get to Medicine Hat you must remember it has to be carried on the Canadian Pacific Railway, thence to the point of consumption, Winnipeg or Portage la Prairie, or any other point. The Canadian Pacific Railway has the power, by its control of the rates, to put on a position of equality all the coal dealers or producers in all that country, and I believe they have not only done so, but have graduated their rates in such a way as to put the eastern and western coal producers on an equality at Winnipeg—the eastern coming from Port Arthur, some 400 odd miles, to Winnipeg, and the Medicine Hat or other western producers, with 600 or 700 or 800 miles to carry the coal. They have the power of graduating their rates, so as to put the two competitors for the traffic on an equal basis at a common point, and they | at Montreal, but I think he misapprehended the statement eastern and western men in competition, so that the settlers along the line and the people of Winnipeg should get the coal at the lowest possible rate. Their interest and the interest of the people is the same. Of course, they want to get as high a price as they reasonably can for carrying coal, but they have made a tariff, which carries it at a very reasonable compensation to them, and graduated it so that neither the western producers the eastern producers derive any advantage. The fear of my hon friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson), that the grunting of this subsidy to the Galt company might give them a dangerous monopoly is, I am quite sure, entirley unfounded. There is not only the bituminous coal to be taken into account, but there is also the valuable anthracite coal found in the Rocky Mountains, of far superior quality to the bituminous coal, and useful for certain purposes, where the other cannot be used. This anthracite coal is of a very high quality, equal to the best Pennsylvania anthracite, and will, no doubt, shortly come into general use in the North-West. So I think we need have no fear about the most ample and reasonable cheap coal supplies of the North- $\mathbf{West}.$

Mr. WATSON. The hon, gentleman has exactly stated the reason why I fear this road has a monopoly. He says the Canadian Pacific Railway have power to treat the coal merchants as they see fit. Knowing that we have but one railway in the North-West, and in view of the monopoly given it, I object to giving the same privilege to any other road. The hon, gentleman knows that the owners of this coal mine alongside the Galt mine, with just as good coal, cannot get a cent for it, because they have no railway, except the Canadian Pacific Railway, which charges such rates that you cannot afford to ship it. People who made a rush for coal lands in the North-West some time ago imagined they had a fortune when they got a quarter or half section of coal land, but when they desired to realise they found that it was not worth anything to them. The country is covered with coal, but as it is a question of freight, there is no encouragement for any company in attempting to work a This company will certainly use this road to their own advantage, and we cannot blame them. If it were a private enterprise, receiving no aid from the Government, it might be well enough to let them go on and build a road at their own expense, but the country is building this road, and we ought to see that the people derive some advantage from it. It will be the Galt company who will derive advantage from this road, and not the consumer of coal, and that is the reason why the Government ought to preserve the right to compel this company to carry coal for other companies at a certain rate per mile. When this Government gives a charter to any company to build a railway bridge they provide that other companies shall have running powers over that bridge; and in the same way, when we grant aid to a railway, we should provide that the company be compelled to carry freight at a certain rate.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). The difficulty apprehended by the hon. member for Marquette, I think, is completely covered by the control the Government will have over the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That company being disposed to operate the road in the interests of the people, as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) says, they will necessarily prevent any short line like that putting on exhorbitant rates. But they have power to prevent the Galt road or any other similarly situated road from taking advantage of the public, even on the quality of the coal; for my contention is, notwithstanding the statement as to the relative values of coal by the member for North Victoria, that the coal of the Lethbridge mine is the best. He cited an instance where he saw coal in the railway office of the manager. He saw this specimen, and if I recollect aright—and my own judgment leads me to believe that my recollection of the statement made by the manager is correct—the sample taken from their own pit on the Crowfoot Creek Valley, which I contend is the same coal as the Lethbridge coal, was, in the manager's judgment, equal, and he seemed inclined to give it preference—perhaps because it was his own coal—but I contend it was precisely of the same character and of equal quality with the Lethbridge coal, and that belt of coal now is known to be from 15 to 25 miles wide, where the railway runs across it, and where it can be tapped at every point. So, if the Canadian Pacific Railway is disposed to operate in the interests of the settler in that country for cheap coal, there is no fear to be apprehended from the Galt mine or any other mine.

Mr. WATSON. No; because they have it in their power to charge the Galt mine what they see fit.

Mr. FERGUSON. But they have unlimited control, so that no possible monopoly can exist in coal in that district

Mr. WATSON. It is not on coal; it is on freight.

Mr. TEMPLE. I think it is a great mistake to build narrow gauge roads. I have had some experience building a road down in New Brunswick, and although a narrow gauge was fixed by the engineers, I opposed it myself, as one of the directors of the road. We have now a uniform gauge all over the country, of 4 feet 8½ inches, which, I think, is the proper gauge; and whatever company is building this road, they are making a great mistake in building a narrow gauge road. If it is to be built through a prairie country it will cost very little more to build a broad gauge than a narrow gauge road of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet. The only extra cost there would be is in the iron—the difference between the cost of a 40 or 45-pound rail, which we had at that time, and a 56 or 60-pound rail. That is where the difference of expense comes in, and beyond that the expense will be very trifling. It seems to be the opinion of hon. gentlemen here that this is to be, principally, a coal road, and if you transport this coal down to the Canadian Pacific Railway, on a narrow gauge road, and then tranship it, there will be great loss, both in shrinkage and breakage, sufficient, I believe, to counterbalance, in three or four years' time, all the difference in the expense of building a broad gauge over a narrow gauge road.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Minister of Public Works seems to be almost alone in the defence of the gauge of this road. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) said he had found that the difference in quality between the Medicine Hat coal and the Lethbridge coal was such that it was about equalised by the extra cost of freight from the Lethbridge Mine. May that be about 1 cent a pound?

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not recollect the precise figures. I consulted a gentleman about it, who, after considering it from a business point of view, arrived at the conclusion that the difference in the cost of freight was about equalled by the difference in quality.

Mr. BLAKE. One cent per ton per mile is a pretty high figure, even for a short haul. Under a contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the coal company will receive $3.90 per ton at bank. Hon gentlemen do not suppose that coal worked on Canadian Pacific Railway land at Medicine Hat will cost that sum: it will probably cost $1.10 per ton. So, the difference of cost must be very great, if the contract be at all correct. This question of monopoly comes up immediately on the conflicting statements made. The general consensus of opinion, I think, from those who have spoken, is that the Lethbridge coal is Mr Ferguson (Leeds and Grenville).

the most valuable coal. Of course, if they have an advantage in that particular locality and in that particular vein—I do not speak only of the coal owned by this company—equal to $2 or $3 per ton, it is quite clear that that gives them a command of the market, with respect to the coal in that region, within a similar haul to market.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). At the time the contract was made the Canadian Pacific Railway had not discovered the coal at Medicine Hat.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). There are other circumstances that may mean a good deal.

Mr. BLAKE. I admit that the hon. gentleman's observation means much and may mean more.

Mr. CAMERON. It may be in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway that they should not be bound to one particular mine or one particular source of supply. My information as to the difference in value of the coal was for ordinary domestic use. It was not for railway use, and a coal that may be perfectly good for ordinary domestic use may not be suitable for railway and steam purposes, unless it were mixed with other coal, or the furnaces altered to suit it.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with the hon. gentleman's observa tion. I say his observation means a good deal and may mean a good deal more. The hon, gentleman has also pointed out the great benefactor and providence that can make all these things right; he says the Canadian Pacific Railway can fix it up. Already it has shown its power of regulating the commercial affairs of the North-West, by regulating the cost of coal and provoking a healthy competition between the coal traffic of the East and the West, and it can make arrangements between parties on equal terms. I recollect something of the grinding monopoly that prevailed in Winnipeg and Port Arthur during one winter. I remember the cost of coal in Winnipeg when one firm had the whole supply. The great power which a railway company possesses may not always be exercised so beneficially as the hon, gentleman suggests. That was a proof of the difficulty. I am not so clear as to the hon. gentleman's statements as to the prices -I do not know exactly how it works out; but the practical result is, that coal is sent to Winnipeg from Medicine Hat at $7 per ton, and competes with hard coal at $11 per ton. Sir Alexander Galt states, as one of the great benefits to be derived from the proposed railway, that he will be able to supply coal at Winnipeg at $10 per ton. I do not know whether it would be able to hold the market at that price. It is quite possible that while coal from Medicine Hat is being supplied at $7, Sir Alexander Galt's coal might realise $10, and still hold the market. If that be so, if there is a difference in the value of the coal of from $1 to $1.50, then it is of the greatest consequence that we should see that the railway competition is assured. It is important that we should see that the best domestic coal in the North-West is not practically in the hands of one company. I think the Minister will admit that this is a subject of very great consequence; and I hope, at a further stage of the Bill, we shall have some information upon these points we have been considering, and probably some practical information with respect to the relative values of the coal may be obtained from some of the Departments. If it be a fact that there is almost equally good coal scattered all over the country, the argument that there is no danger of monopoly is a sound argument. But if the Lethbridge coal is worth even $1 per ton more than the general run of coal, it is of great advantage, and it is of the utmost impor-tance that the power of distributing that coal should not rest entirely in the hands of one company, but in the

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have taken a note of the observations of the hon. member for West Durham, and of some other hon, members. I could not be expected to give all the information asked. I will take care to have the information desired furnished, as far as possible, at the next stage of the measure, and I have also taken a note of the papers which the hon. member wishes to have brought down to complete the papers already before the House.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

FRANCHISE PETITIONS.

Mr. McNEILL. I think it is due to myself and to the House that I should say just a word with respect to the petition which has just been read from Wiarton. It will be in the recollection of the House that a short time ago a petition was presented from Wiarton against the Franchise Bill, which petition purported to be signed by a number of Conservatives. At that time I ventured to say that those signatures had been obtained by misrepresentation of a gross kind. I have, since that time, been obliged to go home on pressing private business, and I had an opportunity of learning something with respect to that petition and the manner in which signatures were obtained to it. In the first place, a number of signatures, which profess to be the signatures of Conservatives, were not those of Conservatives. I desire that the House should understand exactly what the feeling of the people up there is with regard to this matter. I think there are some five Conservatives in Wiarton who do not approve altogether of this Bill as it now stands. I think there are five who would like to see the clause with respect to Indians amended in such a way that an Indian who is able to vote should also be liable to be sued. There is not, however, I think, one—perhaps there may be one, but I think not—who objects to the principle of the Bill, the principle that this Dominion Parliament should regulate the franchise for the Dominion. Those gentlemen who have signed the petition which I presented the other day, in order to have their names removed from the original petition, signed it because they say they signed the original petition on the understanding—at all events, they were given to understand so by the gentleman who went round with the petition—that every adult male Indian in the Dominion was to have a vote, irrespec-tive of any property qualification whatever, whereas no white man could vote without a property qualification. Now, Sir, I venture to repeat what I stated on the floor of this House before, that those names were obtained by gross misrepresentation. I say that misrepresentation more gross than that it would be very difficult to imagine. No such proposition, as hon, gentlemen on both sides know perfectly facts speak for themselves much more powerfully than I can well, was ever made. I should be glad if I could stop here, but I am obliged to go a little further. There was a that process which would be necessary in order to inflict document presented to this House by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), which purported to be signed by Conservatives who had signed the original petition, and it was for the purpose of sustaining that petition. Now, I have got to say that the names upon this document were not all names of Conservatives. One gentleman who signed that document refused to sign it as a Conservative at all, though he was requested to do so, and it was then suggested to him—he having refused to sign it as a Conservative—that he should write the word "ditto" after his name, to mislead this honorable House, and lead hon. gentlemen to believe that he signed the document as a Conservative. This gentleman, who is one of the most respectable and respected Reformers in Wiarton, refused to be a party to such gross conduct; he refused to sign the document as a Conservative, or to put the word "ditto" after his name, and he alleges that he wrote the word "Grit" after his name. That is so, of course, but what is opposite to the name now I confess I am unable to say. It looks like two "d's;" at all events, the reporters of Hansard and the reporters of the Globe have had this document, I think, and they assumed that the document was signed by him as a Conservative, through the mark which is now after his name. The persons who obtained this signature have treated it as the signature of a Conservative; they have placed commas under it and after the names following, for the express purpose of leading the House to believe that he signed as a Conservative. I venture to say that a grosser fraud could not be attempted to be palmed off upon this honorable House. But I have to go further. I say that on the original polition there is to be found the name of George Kidd, merchant; and I have to say that Mr. Kidd did not sign that petition at all, that he authorised no one to sign it for him, that he was in ignorance that his name appeared on the petition for days afterwards, that he was informed accidentally that his name appeared upon it, and that he objected to having his name upon it at all. I will read the statutory declaration made by Mr. Kidd with reference to this matter:

"County of Bruce, I, George Kidd, of the village of Wiarton, in the "10 Wit: } county of Bruce, merchant, do solemnly declare:
"1. That I did not sign any petition against or condemnatory of the proposed Franchise Bill now under consideration by the House of Com-

"1. That I did not sign any potution against or condemnator, or the proposed Franchise Bill now under consideration by the House of Commons of Canada.

"2. That some time during the latter part of last month I was informed by a resident of the said village that my name appeared amongst the signatures appended to a certain petition purporting to have been signed by persons residing in the said village against the said Franchise Bill, and I say that up to that time I was quite unaware that my name appeared amongst the said signatures, and I further say that I did not, at any time, either directly or indirectly, or in any manner whatsoever, authorise any one to sign the said petition for me or on my behalf.

"3. That one Alexander A. Campbell, of the said village, druggist's clerk, came to me some time last month and presented the document, read, as I am informed and believe, by Mr. Edgar, M.P., in the flouse of Commons, and negatived the use of fraud or misrepresentation in the obtaining of signatures to the said petition, to me for signature, and said Campbell then said to me that he had been accused of forgery in connection with the obtaining of the said signatures, and asked me to sign the said document, and I declined to do so, telling said Campbell, at the same time, that my name had been placed on said petition without any authority and without my knowledge.

"4. That I never was, at any time, and I am not now, opposed to the passage of the said Bill.

"And I make this solemn declaration, &c.

"GEO. S. KIDD."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say that if it were necessary that I should do so, I am prepared to prove that some signatures were obtained to another petition against the Franchise Bill, from another part of my constituency, by gross misrepresentation also; and that it was endeavored to induce other Conservatives to sign that petition by making use of similar gross misrepresentation. But I do not wish to multiply words upon this subject. The indisputable and disreputable upon the person who has treated the House with such gross contempt the punishment such conduct deserves; but I hope it will be understood, in future, that if anyone is guilty of such conduct the House will resort to such means as will make the recurrence of such conduct in the last degree improbable. I think the right of petition is a most valuable privilege—but, unfortunately, petitions are rapidly falling into disrepute, and it behooves us, as guardians of the public interest, to endeavor, in every way that we can, to surround that valuable privilege with safeguards. I venture to think that if we do not do so the value of that privilege will disappear very soon.

Mr. EDGAR. Rather a broad discussion has been opened up by the observations of the hon, gentleman who has just sat down. As he has referred to me in connection with the presenting of some petitions, I would like to say, with regard to the third and last petition, which has come from the same gentlemen, that I have a letter in my hand which I received yesterday or the day before from Mr. Campbell, of Wiarton, who sent me down the petition originally, about which all this fuss has taken place. Mr. Campbell says that the hon. member for North Bruce was in his county working up this matter himself, and he goes on to say:

I have been told that there are a few names on that said peti-

He refers to the last one—the last recantation of the hon. gentleman's friends-

"who had signed that declaration which I got up, and the names of those parties are respectively E. A. Pennock, John West, and Thomas Vogan. I took the trouble in calling on the above parties, and was astonished to find that they did not knew what they were signing. I asked Mr. Pennock did he know what was written on the petition. He said positively he did not. I then next called on Mr. West, and I have witness to this. He said that he could not tell what was on that paper, but he understood that it was something about Crocker Indians, and I signed it. Lastly I called on Thomas Vogan. I have witness to this. He said he signed it on condition, and if there is no written conditions attached opposite his name, it is valueless. He said I signed it on these conditions. If the heading of your petition says that all Indians in the Province of Quebec and Ontario shall have votes, qualified as white men are, and so soon as they are enfranchised, that they shall be liable for any debt they may contract and separate themselves from the tribe, and are in every respect as white men and not minors, then I will sign your petition."

Now, there is one substantial point arrived at, so far as I can see, and only one, because these gentlemen are as willing to sign one petition as another, apparently, and the point is this: My hon. friend admits that ten Conservatives in the village of Wiarton are not satisfied with the Franchise Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. I have not done anything of the kind.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the hon. gentleman said five of one kind and five of another kind of Conservatives.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not. I can twice say five without meaning ten.

Mr. EDGAR. I beg the hon, gentleman's pardon. Perhaps he only said five of one kind.

Mr. McNEILL. Five.

Mr. EDGAR. There is another fact the hor. gentleman has admitted, that is, that some persons represented they were Conservatives and are now Reformers. I dare say that is the case, as it is in other places besides Wiarton. However, I gave the hon. gentleman the paper he has taken up to his county. He has thoroughly investigated it, and I was very sure when I presented it that it would be investigated. I am very glad that it has been, as I do not wish to present anything to this House that is not genuine; and if any mistakes have been made, I am as glad to have them corrected as the hon. gentleman himself.

hon, gentleman has said, that any person who would obtain must insist on it. Mr. McNEILL.

the name I have referred to on this confirmatory document, and would allow that name to appear as having been signed as a Conservative, when it was signed to that document as a Grit name, and who would also have Mr. Kidd's name placed on the original petition without Mr. Kidd's knowledge, is perfectly capable of writing such a letter as the hon. gentleman has read.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand that the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) can give us something with reference to the way in which Mr. Kidd's name was obtained.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This matter must be thoroughly understood. I know Mr. George Kidd and Mr. Joseph Kidd, two of the most respectable men in Canada. Mr. Kidd has solemnly declared, in a paper which is equivalent to his affidavit, that his name was forged, that he never signed the petition and did not know it was in circulation, and only heard of it accidentally. He also says that this Mr. Campbell, whose letter has just been read, tried to coax him to sign a subsequent petition.

Mr. EDGAR. I believe it is important that this matter should be understood, and I believe the hon, member for South Grey has some information upon it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some few days ago I received a letter from a respectable gentleman living at Wiarton, who has given me the privilege of reading the letter, which will throw some light on this very obscure question. It is very desirable that the House should be placed in possession of the facts, so as to be able to decide whether these gentlemen have been taken in in connection with these petitions. This gentleman says:

"I beg to advise you that the local celebrities who have interested themselves in making light of the petition and alleging fraud as the prime factor in the securing of names, are employes of the Dominion Government, placed in position through Mr. McNeill's influence, and are well paid for their allegiance to the Tory party; and they are straining every nerve to whip the Conservatives, who dared to act for themselves, into line, and have tried to get them to sign another document retracting what they have done."

Further he says:

"One point he will no doubt bring up is the name of George Kid3, by forgery, producing an affidavit from Kidd as evidence. Please note, Kidd is on the petition, not on the declaration that followed it. His name was signed by his book-keeper, to whom Campbell presented it "---

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear me, and you may laugh afterwards. He who laughs last, laughs best-

"and he as sured Campbell he had perfect right and authority to do so, that he signed Kidd's name to other petitions, and he had always recognised it as done by himself."

There is another little matter which it is, perhaps, just as well to understand:

"He may also advance that some so-called Conservatives are Reformers, but entered as Tories on the list. It is not true. There may be one or two of Independent ideas, but they have Conservative leanings, and have always been treated by us as of that persuasion. One man says he signed the petition as a Grit, meaning he was a Grit in being opposed to the Franchise Bill; but he signed the declaration afterwards as a Liberal-Conservative, which he is."

Further on he says:

"They have catechised the signers thoroughly and have tried to so represent the Bill, and the stand they have taken in thinking for themrepresent the Bill, and the stand they have taken in thinking for themselves, that they may have caused one or two weak-kneed individuals to acknowledge themselves "Darwin's missing link" or anything else, if it will please Mr. McNeill; but those who have stamina enough to assert their manhood, have not been workable in his hands, and a general retraction cannot be obtained."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I ask that letter to be Mr. McNEILL. I only wish to say, in reply to what the laid on the Table. I think the House has a right to it, and

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have laid that portion of the letter on the Table that I intend to lay. It is a letter I had authority to read.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The name I am at liberty to give if it is necessary, but I do not think it is necessary. writer says:

"I suppose there will be no need of giving my name. You are aware of that; but do not let a charge of cowardice keep it back."

I have read the clauses which bear on this important matter of the poor innocent Conservatives of Wiarton who were deluded into signing a petition. I was told by another gentleman that anybody who lived within a few miles of an Indian reservation would have no difficulty in getting names to a petition of this kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have only one thing to say more. The right of petition and the protection of Parliament against fraudulent petitions is of the utmost importance to this House. The hon. gentleman has read a letter, and has not given the name; but he has made himself responsible, in some degree, for the respectability of that letter.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, that letter states distinctly that the bookeeper of Mr. Kidd, stated that he had full authority from his master to sign that petition. Mr. Kidd has sworn that he gave no authority, and did not know anything about the petition. Now, Sir, it is necessary to protect the right of petition, and after the statement of the hon, gentleman, it will be my duty to take steps to bring this same bookeeper before the House.

Mr. McNEILL. It has been alleged that the gentlemen who got up this petition, which I presented, were employes of the Government. That is quite untrue, it was a medical gentleman who obtained the signatures.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is he not now in the employ of the Government?

Mr. McNEILL. Not that I know of.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is he not the medical man to the Indians up there? Of course he is.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman has reminded me of a fact which, in itself, was so insignificant that I had forgotten it; and further, that gentleman has frequently expressed his intention of giving up that place, because it was valueless to him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I call on the hon. gentleman to retract his first statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Unless there is a personal explanation, I cannot allow the rules of debate to be transgressed by hon, gentlemen by speaking so often. The House is in full possession of the facts. The hon, gentleman has admitted that he had forgotten the fact.

THE STAFF OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to submit for the consideration of the House a series of resolutions accompanied by certain schedules adopted by the Commissioners of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, providing for the better qualification and arrangement of the salaries and staff of the House.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that on Monday the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions regarding the immigration however, that this resolution should prevail, but I have of Chinamen.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, ETC.—REMUNERATION TO ANALYSTS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following resolution:-

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may cause such remuneration as he deems proper to be paid to the analysts to be appointed under the Bill now before the House, intituled: "An Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilisers;" and such remuneration, whether by fees or salary, or partly in one way and partly in the other, may be paid to such analysts out of any sums voted by Parliament for the numbers of the Act. any sums voted by Parliament for the purposes of the Act.

HARBOR COMMISSIONERS OF THREE RIVERS-GOVERNMENT LOAN.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following resolution:-

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may authorise the raising by way of loan, in the manner prescribed by the Act 35 Vic., chap. 6, as amended by 38 Vic, chap. 4, of a sum of money not exceeding eighty-two thousand dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding four per ceut. per annum, and to advance out of the sum so raised to the Harbor Commissioners of Three Rivers, on their bonds as such, bearing interest at four per centum per annum, and being a first charge on their income from tolls and other revenues, such sum of money as may be required to redeem the outstanding debentures of the commissioners and interest accrued thereon, and for the payments to be made on account of their works now under contract; such advances to be made on account of their works now under contract; such advances to be made under the approval of the Governor in Council, on the report of the Minister of Public Works.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE. Are the papers which were laid on the Table yesterday bearing on the North-West troubles all the papers which the Government intend to submit?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, there are some additional papers being prepared and some daily arriving, which will be laid on the Table as they are ready from time to time.

HEALTH OF THE FINANCE MINISTER.

Mr. McGREEVY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government whether there is any truth in the rumor—and, I am sure, the country will be delighted if it be true—that the Government have information as to the improved health of the Finance Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to say the rumor is true. A successful operation has been performed, and he has been relieved of the stone; and he is most likely to be restored to perfect health.

THIRD READINGS.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House again resolved itself into committee on resolutions (p. 2440) to authorise grants of Dominion lands to railway companies in the North-West.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 2 (Manitoba South-Western Colonication Railway Company). Mr. HESSON. Carried.

Mr. BLAKE. No; not yet. The hon, member for North Perth is very anxious to have this carried without knowing anything about the matter. I would ask whether the hon. member has read any of the papers upon the subject of this railway? I thought not. I agree with the hon. gentleman, arrived at that conclusion from a porusal of the papers, and I think it ought not to be carried without some discussion and without some further information. Of course, the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), who has arrived at the conclusion that this resolution should be carried, does not need any further information, but I think the other members of the committee are entitled to some further information on the subject.

Mr. HESSON. You spoke yesterday for an hour and a-half upon it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman thinks I spoke yesterday upon the subject of the Manitoba South-Western Railway. I was not fortunate enough to convey to the hon. gentleman the subject upon which I was speaking, but he is mistaken. I did not say one word about the Manitoba South-Western Railway, nor did I touch upon the resolution now proposed to the committee.

Mr. HESSON. You spoke generally on the resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I did not speak generally on the resolutions. I spoke upon the resolution which was passed through the committee last night, and upon it alone, and I did not speak upon any other topic embraced in these resolutions.

Mr. McCALLUM. Speak now then.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, I intend to speak now. The original resolutions with reference to the Manitoba South-Western Railway were of a character very different as to dates and circumstances from those one would be led to believe from the statement of the First Minister when he answered me in the general remarks I made upon the occasion of the motion to go into committee. The hon, gentleman stated that the original proposals on the subject of aid to branch railways in the North-West were made at a time when everything was couleur de rose, when the boom was on, when it was supposed that there was a very large profit to be had in lands, and that the difficulties which had supervened since that time and the changed policy of the Government were due to the falling out of the bottom of the boom, to an altered condition of things in that respect. That may be the case with reference to some, or to one, of the branch railway projects in the North-West, but it is certainly not the case with reference to the Manitoba South-Western Railway, because the proposal with reference to it was made as early as December, 1879, and that was anterior to the period at which the boom had been fostered under the impulses of hon. gentlemen. On the 1st December, 1879, I find Mr. Schultz, the present Senator Schultz, applies for the privilege of a land grand of six miles on each side, purchasing it at $1 an acre. At that time, the policy had been inaugurated by hon. gentlemen of the establishment of belts of railway land for 100 miles, I think, on each side of the Pacific Railway; and the fifth belt, being a belt of fifty miles, was on sale at $1 an acre, payable 10 per cent. down, and the balance in nine annual instalments. On the 26th January, 1880, Senator Schultz applies for leave to buy 30,000 acres in belt E, on behalf of the company; but, between the prime meridian and the 14th township, he finds the land had been taken up by those speculators to whom the hon. gentleman's policy at that time gave favorable opportunities of acquiring lands, not under conditions of settlement, by paying a sum of 10c. an acre on account of them, and therefore he points out that he is desirous to select the land in the townships west of the 14th township, and wants to deposit the cash in advance even of the opportunity of selection. On the 19th February, 1880, he asks to buy in belt E, in the two ranges west of the existing survey, and of which survey returns are now being made, and offers at once to deposit $3,000, being the cash instalment on those | Minister—and the Minister of Railwalands; and, on the 28th April, 1880, he asks to be allowed 26th June, report upon it as follows:— Mr. BLAKE.

to buy the 2,500, or if possible, 3,000, acres a mile along the line of the extension chartered that Session, and declares that, when the Government indicates the quantity of land they will allow, the company will show the exact location. That was the condition of things, briefly stated, so far as appears from this correspondence, with reference to the Manitoba South-Western Railway, up to the period at which the Deputy Minister reported to Council upon the general question of what the railway policy of the Government should be in this regard. That report was made on the 22nd June, 1880, and it reports an application made by the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company to buy railway lands near their line at $1 an acre. It reports that the officer has given much consideration to the question. The statement made is:

"The undersigned has given much consideration to the subject of affording direct encouragement to companies willing to undertake the construction of second class or colonisation railways throughout the North-West Territories, by making a sale of lands along the line of such railway, at such a price as would afford a fair margin of profit to the company upon the sale of such land by it on the building of the railway being assessed; and he is of opinion, as regards the application in question, that the terms hereinafter suggested are such as will commend themselves as in the public interest, besides which he is given to understand by Mr. William Bannerman, M.P., acting on behalf of the railway company mentioned, that the same will be acceptable to the company. The undersigned therefore recommends the following to the favorable consideration of the Council:

"1. That the gauge, grades, plans and location of said road shall be submitted for the approval of the Government.

"2 That, upon the Government being satisfied that said company will build the railway, the company may purchase all the railway lands for six miles on each side of the line for a distance of 50 miles along the line at the rail of $1$ per acre for such lands.

"3. The quantity of land which the company will be permitted to purchase, as above, per mile, to be 3,840 acres.

"4. The company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of the company to resimbures the Government the cost of survey of "The undersigned has given much consideration to the subject of chase.

"5. The company to reimburse the Government the cost of survey of the lands purchased by it, the average rate to be obtained by averaging the cost of survey of the several townships on each side of the line of railway for each 50 miles independently.

"6. The company to build such 50 miles of its road within one year after the Canadian Pacific Railway shall have been completed to the proposed point of function of the company's line with the said railway.

proposed point of junction of the company's line with the said railway.

"7. On completion of the 50 miles in accordance with the next preceding paragraph, the company to be allowed to purchase the railway lands within the said belt of six miles for a second stretch of 50 miles along the line."

And so on, on the understanding that 50 miles a year at least shall be completed. The provision is made that the purchase of railway lands along the first 50 miles will commence at the outer limit of the five mile belt along the Canadian Pacific Railway, that is to say, the company will not be allowed to purchase any railway lands in the five mile belt. Then,

"In the event of the company not building a given 50 miles in any one year, the Government to have the right to cancel this agreement so far as relates to the portion of such 50 miles not completed."

Then there is a provision for the case of squatters, and for organisation, and then the officer recommends:

"That the above provision be extended to the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company, also chartered during the recent Session of Parliament. An application of a similar nature to that made on behalf of the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company having been preferred by Dr. Schultz, M.P., as representing the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway Company, the undersigned recommends that the same he dealt with on the same have bereinsfar proposed the only same be dealt with on the same basis hereinafter proposed, the only same be dealt with on the same pasis neremater proposes, and exception being: "(a) That the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway Company will be required to have 50 miles of its road in operation in the course of the year 1881; and "(b) That the sale of lands along this company's line at $1 per acre shall commence from the westerly limit of the Province of Manitoba"

That was the proposal which the officer made and that proposal was submitted by the direction of Council to two Ministers, the Minister of the Interior—the present First Minister—and the Minister of Railways, and they, on the "The undersigned, to whom this subject of sale or disposition of lands in the North-West in aid of colonisation railways has been referred, beg leave to report that they concur in the recommendation of the Deputy Minister of the Interior and submit the same for the favorable consideration of Council."

And upon that, the Council ordered that. Now, the hon. gentleman, alluding to the fact which is now too well known. which he acknowledged to be well known, that the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Company is at present owned and controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway, answered my statement with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's relations to the branch lines of the North-West, by saying that it was quite true that that company did contemplate building branch lines, but that it was also absolutely necessary they should build the main line of their railway before they built the branch lines, and that therefore their operations in the way of branch line building were necessarily deferred. Such was not the statement made upon the occasion of the debate upon the Canadian Pacific Railway; such was not the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself. Their policy was to build branch lines before they had completed their main line through the entire portion of the prairie section up to the Rocky Mountains. On the 4th September, 1881, a meeting of the board of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was held at Winnipeg, and the results of the meeting were published. That was not the earliest statement of theirs, because, even before that, they had made an application to the Government to reserve lands along-I cannot exactly remember the mileage, but I think some 1,200 or 1,500 miles of branch railways which they had projected and had sent in an approximate location of these lines with a view to the reservation of lands, and had indicated their intention to go on with them. On the 4th September, 1881, certain resolutions were reached by the board and were published in the newspapers:

"1. To proceed with line to Calgary.

"2. To build line from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, direct Loca-

'3. South-west branch line, Winnipeg to Pembina Mountains, located. Immediate construction ordered.

Immediate construction ordered.

"4. Branch line resolved on to be called the Assiniboine Branch, leaving main line about 20 miles east of Brandon, going north-west towards Little Saskatchewan, Fort Ellice, Riding Mountain and Touchwood Hills. Location and survey ordered immediately.

"5. Branch line determined to be constructed from Grand Forks of the Qu'Appelle, north-westerly, passing to the southward of Battleford, to be called a Saskatchewan Branch. Resolved to proceed at once with survey and location, with a view to immediate construction.

"6. Also decided to construct a branch to be called the Souris Branch, to commence near Brandon, going south-westerly in the direction of to commence near Brandon, going south-westerly in the direction of Souris River and Turtle Mountain District, to within 24 miles of the international boundary, then westward to the 104th meridian, parallel to boundary; immediate survey and location ordered.

Now, Sir, that was the formal decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as to the immediate operations in the way of constructing branch lines, which it gave to the public on the 4th September, 1881. We are now very nearly arrived at September, 1885, and I point to the fact that the company, at a time when it was not proposed to construct the main line from Callander to the Pacific Ocean in a period short of ten years from the giving of the contract in 1880, were contemplating, and wisely contemplating, if their contemplation was serious, if they really intended what they proposed, the immediate construction of branch lines through the Province of Manitoba to the North-West Territory-I say, Sir, that that policy, if that was their policy, was altered afterwards, and altered upon arrangements made between them and the Administration of the day by which they determined to employ such portion of their resources as were to remain after the purchase of eastern extensions and the application of a lot of money, another transaction to which I will not at present allude-I say to put all their remaining resources into the immediate construction and completion of the main line from ocean to ocean, to the prejudice of the scheme of branch lines. Now the consequence of that policy, and that change of policy, influence resulted in that bonus not being granted? And were extremely serious to the North-West. Numbers of settlers came into that country and located in various parts, upon the strength, first of all, of the original location of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the way of the Yellow Head Pass, and afterwards upon the knowledge that a line pretty much upon that location from the point of junction with a more southerly route of the main line, was projected by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the south of Manitoba, upon the faith of the proposals, the arrangements, the charter for this Manitoba Southern Colonisation Company that we now have before us, and afterwards for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's rival proposal for a south-eastern road of its own. But these expectations which were raised by the Manitoba South-Eastern arrangements, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's proposals, were all, so far as they involved an extended area of branch line construction in the North-West, doomed to disappointment. They were not carried out, and the result was, not merely that the development of the country was checked and thwarted, but that a serious wrong was done to a large number of persons who settled upon the solo ground and expectation of those announced and published policies being carried out in accordance with the announcements, and who found themselves disappointed, who found themselves injured, who found themselves unable to obtain that settlement in their immediate neighborhood which they had expected, and who found it almost hopeless to raise grain upon their farms, because they could not dispose of it, and could not get to market the grain they had. And that was the condition of things which could not but redound unfavorably to the prospects of the country, redound more unfavorably than if there had been no settlement in that particular locality with such results. I have time and again stated to the House that in my opinion the most satisfactory evidence which you can offer to the world and upon which you can hope to get a settlement there is the statement of those who are there as to the results of their going in; and when you find statements made by the settlers of disappointment, of its being useless for them to continue to raise grain, such statements as then were made with reference to that most favorably circumstanced portion of our North-West domain, the southern and south-western part of Manitoba, you find not merely that there is no development, but that there is a check to development which it requires years to get over. Now, I make these observations because Parliament is now for the first time face to face with the proposals made to Parliament for the development of the North West by railways, which has been done hitherto by Executive action, because we have not hitherto had the parliamentary proposals made and submitted for our consideration as legislators. I signalise the unfortunate results which have already taken place from Executive action of one kind or another as indicating the importance of these matters, which are vital to that country, being submitted, upon some intelligible and well considered plan, to the consideration of the people's representatives, a settled policy based upon such plan being adopted here instead of the course being pursued, which was pursued, of Executive action, under wide and general parliamentary powers, and, I regret to say, rash, vacillating, ill-considered, unhappy Executive action, as has been demonstrated from these papers. Now, Sir, we find that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company came out as a rival to the Manitoba South-Western. The hon, gentleman said it was not hostile to the Manitoba South-Western. Does the hon. gentleman remember the history of the bonus that the people of Winnipeg were about to vote to the Manitoba South-Western Railway? Does he remember the sudden visit by a special train from St. Paul of the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the town of Winnipeg to prevent that bonus of $200,000 being granted? Does he remember that their does he remember that that was immediately followed by an application from themselves that they should have that bonus with reference to certain conditions which they intended to fulfil to the people of Winnipeg if they would give $200,000 of their money in addition to their published subsidies, and which otherwise they would not fulfil? There was, I maintain, a condition of marked hostility on the part of that railway company to the Manitoba South-Western, a condition of marked hostility which, followed up, aided and abetted as it was by the Government, resulted in a thwarting of that scheme in those early days when, but for that course, it would have been completed long ago, to the great advantage of the locality which it was particularly designed to serve, and of the whole Province of Manitoba and of Canada at large. I have pointed out to you that, as early as 1879 and 1880, Dr. Schultz, the original applicant and representative of the company, was pressing to be allowed to buy some land. His demand was reasonable. He wanted to buy land on the same terms as the public were allowed to buy it, without any condition of settlement, to the extent of 3,800 acres per mile. He pointed out that speculators were getting in before him, that they were buying the land and paying 10c. per acre down, that the land, the value of which was going to be enhanced by the railway, was being bought up by speculators, and he asked the Government to be allowed to deposit $3,000 to secure the odd sections along the line, so that the company might have the benefit instead of speculators. But he found difficulties and delays in obtaining concessions of this kind, which resulted, of course, in creating difficulties for the company. Then the Government came, in June, 1880, to the general conclusion to which I have already referred. And then commences a correspondence as to the station grounds and as to the timber, and some difficulty existed with respect to the station grounds and the timber to be used for the construction of the railway. On 24th September, 1880, Dr. Schultz writes as to the purchase of railway lands. He says the company will very early be in a position to complete 100 miles west from Winnipeg, and he points out that the quantity will be 2,768,000 acres, and they will be prepared to pay therefor shortly by the close of the current year. That is the close of 1880. He asks whether the Government is in a position to carry out their arrangement. He then, on 27th September, 1880, writes to the Government again with respect to Victoria Park, a property which the railway company desires to acquire some rights over as a station ground and so forth in Winnipeg; and he also mentions that negotiations with a London syndicate, to which he alluded in a former letter, are about being closed. On 24th September, 1880, he applies for liberty to purchase Government lands between Winnipeg and Rock Lake for five miles on each side of the railway; and he states then that the contract has been let, and the company is anxious to complete the purchase at once. On 13th August, 1880, the Minister of Public Works who was then acting Minister of Railways wrote to Dr. Schultz, stating that the letter with map of the location from Winnipeg to Rock Lake was received. He points out that under the Order in Council the location with plans would be required, but he says: "I may say, however, having mentioned the matter to several of my colleagues, I am under the impression that a general description of either of those lines would be acceptable to the Government." Then on October 6th, 1880, the secretary of the company telegraphs to say that a map showing the location will be sent to the Department at the earliest moment; and the Deputy Minister replied on the same day that it was important they should know at once the probable time that the maps would arrive. On October 14th Young says Mr. BLAKE.

of the country are broken and it would take some time to obtain a minute survey. I need hardly say, Mr. Chairman, that the main point to be decided at that time, it appearing that the road was practicable, was, that general location would be acceptable. Upon that the Minister of Public Works has decided that either of the two general lines that were laid down on the map of the territory would be acceptable to the Government. Then Young declares on 4th November, 1880, that a verbal assurance had been given by the Government, he understood in London, to Madison & Co. for the lands, 3,840 acres per mile for that part constructed in Manitoba; that the contract for the construction of 119 miles was made; and he asks whether the double belt is to begin at the western limit of Manitoba. The committee will see that it was arranged from the beginning that the company should get the land grant outside of the western limit of old Manitoba inasmuch as a large portion was to be earned inside Manitoba and it was necessary there should be a double belt in order to enable the company to obtain the land grant for the mileage inside of the portion of the territory and outside the Province; and the secretary asks whether the double belt is to commence at the western limit. All this was going on with the apparent acceptance of the Government of the project, the Government acceeding to the views of the company; but a change took place very soon afterwards, not long after the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was let. Up to a period shortly after the letting of that contract there seems to be no difficulty in regard to the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway Company; but very appeared soon afterwards it that the Canadian Pacific Railway was desirous of crushing out the company in one way or other, and then difficulties occurred, resulting in a postponement, an apparently indefinite postponement, of the work. On 4th November, 1880, the secretary wrote to the Government that the company is now able to go on rapidly, and he sent in evidence the mortgage trust deed to trustees to secure, by a mortgage of the enterprise, the repayment of the bonds which were to be executed for the construction of the road. I may say, however, that a copy of the deed just referred to in this correspondence is not brought down with the papers, and I think it should have been. He also encloses a contract for 119 miles of railway, and he states that the work is going on and that several miles are graded. That is as long ago as 4th November, 1880. He adverts to the fact that passenger and freight stations which were being built in Winnipeg, under arrangements with the municipality, were nearly completed, and arrangements as to the right of way were being pushed. On the following day, 5th November, 1880, Young refers to Dr. Schultz's letter of 24th September, and says the board are now prepared to buy, according to the arrangement of 23rd June, 1880, 3,840 acres per mile for 50 miles and pay $1 per acre cash for it. Then you find almost immediately the first evidence of conflict. In November, 1880, the Crown timber agent writes that conflicts have occurred between the agents of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Manitoba South-Western, each claiming to take timber off the same land, and he wants to know what is to be done to settle the difficulty; and some instructions are given him upon the subject. On 29th November, 1880, the secretary telegraphs to Mr. Dennis that the location and grades will be furnished in a few days, and he asks whether Scoble's report, which had been sent the secretary from Dennis, had been received. On the 27th he asks him to open Scoble's report. That report was sent on 24th December, 1880, by Scoble to Dennis, and it is brought down in the papers. It gave a very full report of the character of the country the exact location will be sent, and the map is in the office traversed upon this location and the practicability of the of the Minister of Railways. He points out that the outlines location he arrived at. On the 14th of December, 1880,

Mr. Young writes to Mr. Dennis, sending the plan of location prepared by Mr. Scoble, and on the 17th January, 1881, Mr. Dennis reports the map of the lands, on which is shown to the east of the limit, between the 23rd and 24th ranges, the lands which would fall to the Manitoba South Western Colonisation Railway at the rate of 3,840 acres per mile, and to the west of the limit, between the 23rd and 24th ranges, the sections which would fall to the company at the rate of 6,000 acres to the mile. He reports that a promise had been made to Dr. Schultz that the sale of 3,840 acres per mile to the company should be considered as for the whole line, and that the company should take the acreage representing the mileage within the Province at some point further west; and he adverts to a letter which he had written, by authority, to Dr. Schultz at the time when Mr. Codd, the company's agent, was going to England to make financial arrangements. He says that the question was then whether the Minister would allow the company to commence at the existing western boundary of the Province of Manitoba, at the rate of 6,000 per mile, and permit them to acquire the additional acreage elsewhere, or whether he would restrict them to the existing arrangement. There you find the actual arrangement of the map showing the Manitoba South-Western land, and we find that such a map was actually issued from the Department. We know that it went to a limited extent into circulation, and having gone into circulation it was recalled, and recalled because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had decided to build a line over this same territory, and they wanted to get hold of these lands, and thus it was that the thwarting process went on. Then, on the 15th March, 1881, the First Minister refers to an Order in Council of 1880 and to an application made by the Manitoba South-Western to increase their acreage to 6,400, and he proposes the cancellation of the former Order in Council, and that the company should be allowed 6,400 acres per mile of their line from Winnipeg to a point in the vicinity of the Roche Percée on the Souris River; that the lands to be sold to the company—the estimated length of the rail-way being 312 miles—comprising in all 1,996,800 acres were to be disposed of in two separate transactions-3.840 acres on the western boundary of the Province to the termination of the railway. The company were to pay one-third of the purchase money in cash, and the balance in two equal instalments, and the order was made accordingly. Then we find that Dr. Schultz asks for the privilege of payment in ten annual instalments, and that it should be doesned necessary to alter the usual conditions of sales by the Government, no greater change would be made than the payment on one-fifth in cash and the remainder in four annual instalments with interest. This he says would leave the company free to push their work rapidly with their present financial arrangements, and enable them to build the road faster. On the 13th June, 1881, an Order in Council was passed reserving some of the lands. In October, 1881, there appears to have been a location for 58 miles laid before the Government. But a difficulty existed in the city of Winnipeg. The location crossed the track of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and that company objected—I am not in a position to say, unreasonably—perhaps it was not unreasonable—I know nothing about it—but, in consequence of the location of the road at the commencement, the whole location was disapproved. An amended location was not in on the 2rd November 1881, and after correspondent to the company of the correspondent to the corresp was put in, on the 3rd November, 1881, and after correspondence and interviews with Mr. William Macdougall, Q.C., as agent of the company, arrangements were made by which at a cost to the company of $100,000, for the work they had uselessly done on the other location, the location was changed, and this location was agreed upon. Now there is the state of things as it existed at that time. Then necessary financial arrangements to enable them to pro-other influences came into play to which the hon. gentleman alluded. He said there was an unhappy dispute on the board-a difficulty which obstructed things. Well, of course, we know something of that, and what was the real reason at the bottom of that difficulty? There were two rival parties wanting to get control of the railway, one being the greater interest, and the other the original promoters or those who were acting in their interest, and there was difficulty about that. Now, as long ago as 1871, according to this return, settlers came into one of the counties in the region which was to be traversed, or partly served, by this railway, and in 1880 they gave a bonus of $100,000 on certain conditions as to location, and there are petitions and prayers for consideration by the ratepayers of that municipality as to what should be done, as there were with reference to another county at a later date. Ultimately it was made plain that the company had been unable to obtain approval of its grant. The location was approved for 58 miles, but they never were able to get a declaration from the Government that the grant was made. They struggled on, and they managed to complete the 58 miles, but finding a dead weight of pressure upon them which they could not get off, finding that they could not get the lands for the further construction of the road approved, finding that they could not make progress, that in fact the greater power was hostile to them and could prevail over them at headquarters, they ultimately sold out, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company acquired control of the enterprise. In the meantime the Canadian Pacific Railway had itself started an enterprise designed to serve—though not exactly in the same line all through, but designed in its prolongation to serve the same country-its south-western branch. On the 8th of May, 1884, the great railway company having got control of the small one, proposals are made for extensions of accommodation, and here we get a condition made with reference to this railway that is not made with reference to any of the other railways and to which I call the particular attention of the committee, as requiring explanation. It is universally conceded, I believe, that the territory of South-Western Manitoba is on the whole, one of the most favorable sections of country in the North-West, and the proposal which was made when the enterprise got into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was that the land grant should consist of lands all fairly fit for settlement. The general Order in Council had not been of that character. The grants to none of the other railways at any time proposed, were of that character. All the grants, so far as I know, have been on the lands as they came in the five mile belt on each side, or the six mile belt, as the case might be. That has been the universal practice also with reference to the United States subsidies to railways, so far as I know. The railway company took the good and the bad, the rough and the smooth; it took its chances with the Government and the country, and that was the policy of the Government with reference to all railways except the Canadian Pacific Railway itself, to whom it had given the right that these lands should be fairly fit for settlement. But so soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had adopted this child, they made the same demand in favor of the infant that they had made for themselves, and that demand the Government conceded that the land grant to them should be exclusively of land fit for settlement, although that proposal is not made with reference to the others. The proposal was made as I have said, on the 8th May, 1884, providing that the time shall be extended for the payment of the 960,000 acres of land which is to be fairly fit for settlement. On the 25th of April, 1884, the new organisation, under the auspices of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, communicates to the Government that they have been unable to make the ceed with the construction of the road, on the existing arrangement, and they ask for a modification with a view to strengthen their financial position, and that instead of paying for the lands in advance the payment shall be postponed until the company are required to give title to settlers or purchasers. In all 960,000 acres, to be paid for as they are sold by the company. On the 30th of April the Government passed an Order in Council agreeing to the condition that the lands shall be paid for by the company as they are sold within the limit of seven years; so that the company would have that period within which to sell its lands and pay the money to the Government. It provides also that the lands should be fairly fit for settlement. The argument of the company was: 58 miles of the road are constructed; they were constructed by the old company without the benefit of a land grant, though with the promise of a land grant; we now require that you will give us 6,400 acres for the whole distance at $1 an acre and the price of survey, and a latitude of payment, and upon these terms we agree to go on. But, subsequently, they declare that a new arrangement will have to be made. On the 27th of September, 1884, Mr. Van Horne, the president of the company, writes that not-withstanding the advantages accorded to them, they found it impossible to procure the necessary means for the construction of the railway; and he says:

"As to the question of modifying the manner in which the Government should assist the company in order to ensure the construction of an additional 100 miles of railway during the next season, the board consider that that result could only be made certain by a free grant of the lands applicable to the line already constructed, and the substitution of a subsidy in money for a grant of land, say in the proportion of $1 per acre, in respect of the road to be constructed."

Their statement is: You must give us a free grant of 6,400 acres a mile for the 58 miles already built, although they were built under no such promise, but under the promise of a sale at $1 an acre, and for the rest you must give us a money bonus of $6,400 a mile for every mile we build. They say:

"This would be much less than the value of the lands themselves: but statements from Canada, disseminated broadcast through the Empire, though probably not here implicitly believed, necessarily destroy their value as a security; and the sum mentioned, which represents less than half the value of the lands, would be more effectual in furthering the construction of the railway than a free grant of the lands themselves. With such a subvention in money the company would undertake to complete the required ICO miles during the season of 1885. But I have further to the required 100 miles during the season of 1885. But I have further to state that if the Government could make a free grant of the whole of the lands, applicable to the entire line constructed and to be constructed, of a quality suitable for settlement, and accessible to railway communication, the company would make a further effort this autumn to raise the necessary funds for proceeding with the railway; and though not sanguine of the result, they would use every means in their power to attain that object."

There is the statement of Mr. Van Horne, the president of the company. He says: We will assure you that we will make a further effort this autumn to raise the necessary funds for proceeding with the railway if you give us 6,400 acres a mile free for the 58 miles already built, and $6,400 in cash per mile for the 100 miles we are to build; but if you will not do that, if you will give us 6,400 acres a mile for what is built as well as for what is to be built, although not sanguine of the result, we shall make an endeavor this fall to go on with the work. Upon that the Minister of the Interior reports, recommending to Council the pro posal. He points out the circumstances that there are many settlers in Southern Manitoba and their condition; he points out the modification of the grant, and he recommends that 6,400 acres per mile of land fairly fit for settlement be given for the whole line; but he also points out, which was no doubt the fact, that Mr. BLAKE.

mile for what is to be built or 9,600 acres per mile for the line still to be constructed. Having so decided, as the Council approved of the proposal of the Minister, on the 7th of October, 1884, Mr. Drinkwater, Secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company writes that Mr. Stephen had left for England, and wanted an investigation of the lands to be made so that it might be ascertained what lands were fairly fit for settlement, and so that lands enough might be taken up. There is an arrangement made, therefore, for an examination of the lands by a board appointed, so that it may be specified what lands belong to the company. I think under these circumstances, when the company itself declares that with 9,600 acres a mile of land fairly fit for settlement along their whole railway, freely given as a subsidy, they will strive, although not sanguine of success, to make arrangements with capitalists in England last fall, when you find the papers disclose that the land was taken up in order to carry out these arrangements, when you find the statement that Mr. Stephen went to England in the fall, and was dealing with this question, it is extraordinary that the Government before coming down this Session to propose this free grant of 9,600 acres a mile for the line to be built, should not have obtained some further evidence of the results of those negotiations last fall. All the evidence we have is the statement of Mr. Van Horne, that they did not succeed. I think we ought to have some other information. We know there have been negotiations, but what they have been we do not know. We know there have been negotiations with the people in that territory for a long time. There was a deputation from the settlers sent to Ottawa, and that deputation met the Minister of Railways and made a proposal that some 25 or 30 miles of the original Manitoba South-Western Railway should be built, and that the rest of the mileage to be constructed should belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway South-Western; and it is reported in the newspapers that Mr. Stephen wrote a letter that he had no objection to that arrangement provided the Canadian Pacific Railway South-Western received a proportion of the land grant, and that he believed the bonus or subsidy could be changed, but about that we have no information. The people of southern Manitoba have been greatly disappointed by the failure of the construction of either of these railways and disappointed by the action of the Government in with-drawing from homestead and pre-emption a vast block of their territory at a moment's notice, and then offering it for sale without conditions of settlement. They have been exposed to many disappointments. I think it is the duty of Parliament when a proposal is made for at length realising those expectations which, since the year 1879, they have been indulging in, at length realising that hope deferred which has made their hearts sick so long-it is the duty of Parliament to ask the Ministry of the day for such proofs as they have, and, if they have not, for the reason why they have not obtained such proofs of the stability and soundness of the present plan, and more particularly when the only evidence the Administration lays before us is the statement of the president of the company that he is not at all sanguine that he will be able to succeed on the proposal under discussion. I ask therefore for information, and shall rejoice to know if the Government has received formal assurances from the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Manitoba and South-Western that they are prepared to succeed. I am not sure about it, because there is one other piece of evidence, and that is the letter of Mr. Stephen, laid on the Table and bearing date 18th March, in which he says, on condition of the Government accedalso points out, which was no doubt the fact, that ing to the large proposals he laid before them the practical result of that operation was to give in that letter, and which the Government did 6,400 miles of land fit for settlement along the not acceed to, the company would be able, he line of railway as a bonus for what had been constructed, believed, to make arrangements for the completion of That is equivalent to 50 per cent, more than 6,400 acres per the Manitoba and South-Western Railway which is so much wanted. Therefore, according to Mr. Stephen's view on the 18th March, they required greater financial backing, some other arrangement than the free grant of land which was proposed in October, 1884, and which is now proposed to us to enable the Canadian Pacific Railway to assure us the Manitoba and South-Western road will be built, because, Mr. Stephen says, if you make this large financial arrange ment proposed, I think I can say the Manitoba and South-Western would be built. That shows that, in his opinion, on the 18th March, it required a greater prop than the hon. gentleman's proposal, and it would not stand alone. very sorry to think not, because the Manitoba and South. Western is not an expensive line to build. It is true it is not an absolutely prairie line, true, if you read the report of Mr. Schofield, there is a good deal of broken land, but, upon the whole, it is not an expensive line to build, and we know how cheap all railway construction and material have been for some time past. We know that the last two years have been the cheapest years for railway construction known in the history of America. Therefore, to say that a free grant of 9,600 acres of land, every acre of it fairly fit for settlement, along the line of the South-Western and Manitoba road, is not sufficient financial backing to enable the railway to be constructed, is something which surprises me to find stated by Mr. Stephen in his letter. We ought to grapple with the question. I am very much disposed to the view that in this question of branch line generally we should have proof that the proposal is adequate to the object in view, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree that the history I have given and the statements I have read of the president of the Manitoba South-Western Road and the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon the prospects are such as to justify me in asking further information on that subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The speech of the hon. gentleman certainly contains an interesting history of the events connected with the commencement of the Manitoba South-Western Railway, and of the various attempts of the Government to aid in its early construction, but I do not see it is particularly relevant to the motion before the Chair, which is to authorise the Government to make particular grants of land to this in common with other railways. The hon, gentleman, however, has made a microthat were laid on the Table. Many things have happened since the first discussion of this subject, since the first communication with the gentlemen of the Manitoba and South-Western Railway Company, which was promoted by Senator Schultz. At that time, in 1879, Senator Schultz made the statement, I believe, that with the assistance given him he could build the road. He was however disappointed, and again and again applications were made to the Government for extended powers, and assistance and aid. Dr. Schultz, no doubt, truly believed he had made arrangements with certain brokers in England, certain money brokers, Mason & Co., and perhaps also in New York, for the construction of the road. As events proved, he was however mistaken in all this. Neither his correspondents in New York nor his correspondents in London could materially help him. He was disappointed in what were, I dare say, his reasonable expectations, that he would receive the necessary funds to proceed with the railway. It is quite true there was at first great difference of opinion as to the character of the northwestern road under that charter. It was known that a great many American speculators took an interest in the line. It was believed, in the old country especially, and believed getting certain grants of land were made in concert with certain railway influences, railway enterprises in the United States, which were hostile to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That conviction was strengthened from the various railways running parallel, through the
