OF THE

DOMINION OF CANADA.

THIRD SESSION-FIFTH PARLIAMENT.

48-49 VICTORIÆ, 1885.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE ELEVENTH DAY OF MAY TO THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF JUNE, 1885.

OTTAWA:
PRINTED BY MACLEAN, ROGER & CO., WELLINGTON STREET.

House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION, FIFTH PARLIAMENT.-48 VIC.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 11th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CHARLES STEELE.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Why was Charles Steele removed from the office of postmaster at Maitland, in the County of Yarmouth, in the Province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. CARLING. He was removed from office because of complaint being received that the office was badly managed, which complaint, on enquiry being made by the Post Office Inspector, appeared to be well founded.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST—DUCK LAKE FIGHT.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. Mulock) asked, Has the Government received any official report from Col. Irvine or Major Crozier, of the Duck Lake fight? If not, has the Government called for such report? If so, when and from whom?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A report has been received from Major Crozier. It is short and imperfect, and further particulars have been demanded. When they have been obtained, all the papers will be submitted.

MANITOBA HALF-BREED MINORS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether on the application of Manitoba half-breed minors and others who were temporarily absent in North-West Territory or elsewhere during the enumeration and allotment, a Government official was directed several years ago to take their claims and evidence? And whether such claims and evidence were taken, the names entered on a supplementary list and the result reported to the Government? And when was such report made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Messrs. Ryan and Machar, who were appointed, in 1875, to make this enumeration, reported in March, 1876, that their work was incomplete; and Mr. Ryan was authorised, by Order in Council of the 14th June, 1876, to take evidence in regard to claims of this sort if offered, either at Swan River, where he was to have his headquarters as stipendiary magistrate, or any other point in the Territories where his duties as magistrate might take him. His authority was by the Order limited to a period of two years. On 9th April, 1875, the agent of Dominion lands at Winnipeg was authorised to take evidence in support of the same class of claims. Messrs. George Newcombe and Augustus Mills, agents of Dominion lands at Emerson and Portage la Prairie, respectively, were similarly authorised on 7th May, 1877.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. Blake) asked, Whether the claims of unenumerated Manitoba half-breed minors and others have been before the Government for several years past, and whether applications have been made to Government for their settlement?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are no unenumerated Manitoba half-breed minors' claims before the Government, with the exception of one or two at Prince Albert, in respect of which the North-West half-breed commission has power to take evidence.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether a report was made to the Minister by the Deputy Minister, recommending a settlement of the claims of unenumerated Manitoba half-breed minors and others in the summer of 1884? And whether action was taken thereon by the Minister in that year?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A report was made in the summer of 1884 by the Deputy of the Minister of the Interior, recommending a settlement of the claims of the Manitoba half-breeds, enumerated upon what is known as the supplementary list, but not as to unenumerated half-breed minors or others. As a matter of fact, there was no information in the Department to justify the assumption that any considerable number of the Manitoba half-breeds had not already been enumerated.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. Blake) asked, Whether on or about April, A. D. 1885, action was taken by Order in Council or Departmental Order, recognising the claims of unenumerated Manitoba half-breed minors and others, and settling them on the basis of orders or scrip for 240 acres or otherwise? And how many claims were recognised?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An Order in Council of 20th April, 1885, providing that the enumerated Manitoba half-breeds, on what is known as the supplementary list, be granted $160 in scrip to heads of families, and $240 in scrip to children of half-breeds, was passed. The Order provides that any claims of the same class not already enumerated shall be proved before the Commissioners of Dominion Lands on or before 1st May, 1886.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether the settlement of the claims of unenumerated Manitoba half-breed minors and others is now proceeding?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The issue of scrip to the enumerated half-breeds of Manitoba whose claims have been proved since the reserve of 1,400,000 acres of land set apart by the Manitoba Act was exhausted, is now proceeding.

SUPERANNUATION OF J. W. PEACHY.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Langeller) asked, Whether J. W. Peachy, Secretary of the Department of Customs, has been superannuated? If so, has it been done at his own request or against his wishes? On what grounds has he been superannuated? If by reason of health, whether the Government intend to add seven years to his period of service, in order to increase his retiring allowance, as they did for E. C. Barber? If the Government do not intend to adopt that course with J. W. Peachy, what is the reason? Who succeds J. W. Peachy in his position?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Peachy, Corresponning Clerk in the Customs Department, has been superannuated. It was not at his own request; it was not, so far as I know, against his wishes; but it was on the ground of disability, he having been deprived of his health by an attack of paralysis thirteen months prior to his superannuation, during which period he was unable to, and did not perform his duties. He was paid his full salary up to the date of his superannuation. It is not the intention of the Government to add seven years to Mr. Peachy's period of service. Mr. Peachy's duties are now performed by a third-class clerk, at a salary of $500 per annum.

RELIEF FOR THE NORTH-WEST SETTLERS.

Mr. WATSON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask for a vote for the relief of the settlers in the North-West who have been driven from their homes and have had their property destroyed by the insurgents?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That subject is under the earnest consideration of the Government.

RAILWAY LINES BETWEEN MONTREAL AND MARITIME PORTS.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) asked, Whether Mr. Light, C.E., has quite recently made a second report to the Government on the comparative advantages of the several lines between Montreal and the maritime ports, with a view to the selection of the shortest and most acceptable line; and whether the Government intend to bring down the said report forthwith?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Light quite recently made a second report. That has been laid on the Table of the Senate and will be printed; when printed it will be laid before this House.

Mr. LESAGE asked, Whether the Government have received the report of Mr. Wicksteed, C.E., on his survey of the valley of the Etchemin River made by order of the Department; and if so, whether it is their intention to bring it down with those already laid before the Senate, and when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That report was laid before the Senate, and is now being printed; when printed it will be laid before the House.

BOOTS FOR THE TORONTO CORPS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Has the Government been informed that boots were served out at Winnipeg or elsewhere to the Toronto corps? Has the Government any information as to what has become of the six hundred pairs of boots sent up to Winnipeg for the Toronto corps?

Mr. CARON. At Lieutenant Colonel Otter's request, boots and trousers were forwarded to Winnipeg. They were shipped from Ottawa on 30th March, by special car. Colonel Otter reached Winnipeg on 7th April. The boots arrived after Colonel Otter had left, and were sent to Qu'Appelle on 10th April. I cannot give any more information about the boots.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—POSTAL AND TRANSPORT SERVICE.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, What amount has been earned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for postal service and what amount for transport service for the Government since the 7th November, 1883? Has any, and if so, what part of these amounts been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and when? Has MR. RINFRET.

any, and if so, what part of these amounts been retained by the Government under the agreements in connection with the guaranty of dividends?

Mr. CARLING. If the hon. gentleman will move for this information it will be brought down.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CHANGE OF ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Was there any correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government, subsequent to the 18th March, 1885, on the subject of the proposal for a change in the arrangements between the company and the Government? Was there any report from the chief engineer in connection with the matter? Was there any report from any Minister on the matter? Was there any Order in Council on the matter? Was any report from any officer of the company laid before the Government? Has the Government the balance sheets prepared by Mr. Miall, but not appended to his letter?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon, gentlemanwill allow this question to stand until to-morrow, it will be answered.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EXPENSES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What were the receipts and expenses of the Intercolonial Railway from the 1st day of July to the 1st day of May, in the years 1884 and 1885 respectively?

Mr. POPE. It is impossible for us to give the receipts for 1885, as they have not yet come in.

Mr. CAMERON. Will you give those for 1884?

Mr. POPE. That would not give you a comparative statement.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, give us the figures for 1884. Will you allow it to stand until to-morrow?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

LOANS BY THE GOVERNMENT,

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What additional sum or sums (if any) have been borrowed by the Government since the 1st day of April to the date of this enquiry, and from whom and for what length of time have they been borrowed?

Mr. BOWELL. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow that question to stand, as I have not the data upon which to give the correct information.

DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST—COMMUNI-CATION WITH THE IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) (for Mr. BLAKE) asked, Whether any communication has taken place between the Canadian and the Imperial Government on the subject of the disturbances in the North-West, with reference to any suggested action by the latter Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that on and after Tuesday next the House shall, for the remainder of the Session, meet at one o'clock in the afternoon of each day.

aid to Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman would make it half-Has past one, it would be more convenient.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). For my own part I have no objection to the motion. I desire, and I think hon. gentlemen on this side desire, that the business of the Session chould be closed at as early a period as possible, and I have - objection to our commencing now an hour or two earlier man ordinarily. I think, however, the First Minister will see that it is very inconvenient to meet at one o'clock, as he knows perfectly well that almost every member of the House lunches at that hour. If he would make it half-past one it would give us an opportunity of having the necessary refreshment before entering on the arduous labors that are now upon Parliament. As we have to remain here until one or two o'clock in the morning, I think if we begin at half-past one in the afternoon we will be putting in a long day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot resist the solicitations of hon gentlemen opposite. I would be the last man in the world to injure their health-

Mr. MILLS. Or deprive them of their meals.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that I had arranged to take my lunch at half-past twelve, but as hon. gentlemen desire it-

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). We are not at home like the hon. gentleman; we live at the hotels.

Sir JOHN. A. MACDONALD. As hon. gentlemen desire it, we will make the hour half past one.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon. gentleman intend to have two sessions a day or only one.

Sir. JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only one.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have heard a good many rumors of a battle having taken place in the North-West, and we would like to know if the Government has any information which has not yet been given to the public.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only information we have got is contained in the published reports—the reports at the command of the press.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the motion before the committee is that of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Macdonald), excepting the Province of Prince Edward Island from the operation of the clause now before the consideration of the committee. I am afraid I cannot yield to that amendment, and for two reasons. In the first place, I am inclined to believe that by the time the qualifications are settled by this committee, the hon. gentleman will find that there are very few, if any, of those who have the franchise in Prince Edward Island, who will not still continue to have it, from the peculiar position of that interesting island. Then, Sir, whether I am correct or not in that opinion, I think this is the wrong time to move the amendment. This amendment excepts Prince Edward Island from the operation of the franchise clause, before we know how the franchise clause will get through the committee. We do not know what the decision of this committee may be as regards the several franchises that are given by that clause. Now, it will be quite clear that we must first settle what the general franchise is which may be adopted for the whole Dominion, and if any portion of excepted, the time to move for such exception is after the general franchise is settled. We must first settle the general franchise over the whole Dominion, and then consider any claims for exception, but until we settle the general system it is quite impossible to consider the exceptions. Then, Sir, the motion, although it is limited to Prince Edward Island, has caused a long discussion in the House which has gone over the whole Bill, and that, I think, has been felt in this discussion in the committee from the beginning. principle of the Bill, the principle that there should be a franchise for the Dominion, passed by the Dominion Parliament, was adopted after two amendments by this House, and according to regular practice we ought to have proceeded to consider clause after clause consecutively, on their own merits, without entering into a general discussion on the whole Bill. From the importance of the Bill and the earnestness of the gentlemen who are on your left, there was no serious objection made to a renewal of the discussion in committee. However, Sir, that must, I should think, according to parliamentary practice, have its limits. At present, I am sorry to say, the question before this House and this country is not the Franchise Bill; the question is whether representative institutions—whether responsible Government-is going to continue in this country or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very glad to have the approbation of both sides of the House on that point. Representative institutions, if we are worthy of them, will be carried out in a proper spirit, in a constitutional spirit. And what is a constitutional spirit? It is this that after the minority of the House have had every opportunity of expressing their views, the will of the majority—the decided opinion of the majority—must prevail. If we might trust the language of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite—certainly, I cannot say of the leaders, except the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—there appears to be a regularly contrived and organised plan of obstruction. There is no doubt about it; gentlemen on the other side have stated so. The hon. member for the North Riding of York (Mr. Mulock) stated so at our last meeting in so many words. Other gentlemen have said they were going to fight out on this subject all summer. Others have told us this Bill could be fought, and it never would pass. Now, Mr. Chairman, that language is quite inconsistent with representative government, and, if acted upon, must destroy representative government—must show that we are unfit for the institutions that we have obtained from the mother country. I think that great latitude ought to be given to an Opposition; I have been in opposition, and I, with those in the same category as myself, have taken strong grounds as to the rights of an Opposition; but there must be an ead to opposition, because, when it is ascertained that all the arguments, all the efforts, all the zeal of the minority in the House, have been insufficient to change the opinion of the majority, then, I think, according to the well understood principle of the British constitution, the minority should yield to the majority. With respect to this particular measure, there can be no doubt of an organisation to oppose the Bill from the beginning. The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) brought down several resolutions—half a dozen or more—against the very first clause—the very first word of the second clause, which is in fact the first clause of the Bill; and so it has been continued, and its object has not been concealed. Now, I do not impugn the motives of these hon. gentlemen; I have no parliamentary right to impugn their motives, and I do not desire to impugn the motives of their course. It may have been in their opinion highly important to oppose, by every legitimate opposition, a measure which they think is not for the benefit the Dominion, or any class in the Dominion, desire to be of the country. I would be the last to attempt in any way to fetter the rights of the minority. I should be very sorry to see in a Canadian Parliament that such a necessity existed as appeared to exist in the minds of Mr. Gladstone's Government when they introduced certain resolutions respecting the clôture. I should be still more sorry to see here the system adopted in the United States Congress, where, on the motion for the previous question, a debate can be summarily cut off by the will of the majority. I should regret deeply to see either course taken in Canada. In England, the course taken by Mr. Gladstone, though an extreme one, is not so dangerous as it would be in this country. In England, there is a conservative feeling—I do not speak in a party sense—in the minds of the people of England and of their representatives in Parliament, against extremes. Both sides in England—those on the right and those on the left of the Speaker-know that only in the most extreme cases would the powers that Mr. Gladstone claimed and succeeded in carrying, be exercised. We are a younger country, we have not got the same steady anchorage that they have in the old country of England, and, whether we on this side continue on this side, or the hon. gentlemen opposite should succeed in ousting us, I am afraid we should not be so conservative. I am afraid that the power of closing a debate in a manner such as is now authorised in England, would be bad for us to enforce. I should be afraid of of the hon, gentlemen opposite; and therefore any suggestion of the kind that has been made to me—and the committee can well understand that in the present state of things, in the impatience of the general public against what seems to them obstruction, all kinds of suggestions have been made to me either to introduce the one system or the other, and to press it upon Parliament—I have steadily resisted, and I design to resist it. I think it is not for the permanent interest of Canada—I think it is not for the permanent interest of any Parliament of Canadathat any Government, until we are an older country and down the gate on the Opposition of the day. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we can only offer such resistance as the majority can offer, by stating that eventually our will must succeed, that the conclusions we have come to must eventually prevail, or all representative government is a farce, or worse than a farce; the end, Sir, is tragedy. Now, Sir, with respect to this measure which is before the House, the discussion which has been continued so long was principally on a mere detail—on the interpretation clause. There is some speciousness in that argument, I must admit, that looking at the Bill as a whole, some definitions were of more importance than merely as definitions; but I have explained, and I pressed on the consideration of the committee, that the definitions being once settled, when we came to the enacting clauses, that was the time to fight out the difference of opinion, if any existed, between the majority and the minority. Had that view been taken, we should have been far on in the progress of the Bill, and the different clauses—with respect to the different franchises, with respect to the mode of registration of voters, with respect to the selection of the proper parties to settle the voters' lists—all these would have been discussed and discussed relevantly to the several propositions; and we should have been spared the painful scene of gentlemen being deprived of their rest, and speaking—avowedly speaking—not for the purpose of advancing or defeating the measure, but simply for the purpose of obstruction. In 1871, when I first introduced this Bill, I had the joint support of the present leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Mr. Mackenzie) on the necessity for an election Bill. Anybody who looks at the debates of that day will see that that was admitted. The again and again given and reiterated with painful reitera-thought it would be well to keep the franchises, as then existing in the several Provinces, as being the proper franchises, and not the franchises which were mentioned in the Bill of 1870. In other words, he thought an election Bill should be passed, but that it should incorporate the various franchises of the four Provinces. That was the opinion of those two gentlemen as to the necessity of an election Bill, an opinion which nobody gainsaid, and which was not gainsaid by any gentleman who had studied constitutional law, except perhaps the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has several times spoken of the measure as being unconstitutional. But the fact that these gentlemen, in 1870, took that line, and at the same time thanked me for having invited both sides of the House to consider the question of the franchise, not in a party sense, destroys the argument which has been used here, more for the purpose of discussion than for the purpose of conviction, that the measure was unconstitutional. I invited at the outset the House as a whole to consider every clause of this Bill, in order to arrive at a reasonable franchise. In the discussion which took place on the motion in amendment, when the Speaker was in the Chair, I took the same line; I invited the Opposition to discuss the several clauses of the franchises as they came up. I failed, however, to succeed in inducing them, for I forget how many days, to pass the my own party; I need not say I should be still more afraid first clause, the interpretation clause. I hope this is not going to go on. The Government desire, and I believe I speak the will and desire of those who oppose us, that the various clauses of the Bill shall be fairly discussed, that there will be give and take in opinion, and that we may arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, or at some conclusion. At all events, it is quite clear that, viewing it as I do, representative institutions are on their trial, to use Prince Albert's expression, here; it is not possible for the majority in this House to yield to the menace, the threat of obstruction of the constitution by the minority, by yielding to the obvious attempt to worry out the patience of the House, perhaps a wiser country, should have the power of shutting the patience of the majority, and the physical strength of some of the majority. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was quite prepared, and am quite prepared, to discuss all the various objections which have been taken to the measure as they arise; I invite hon gentlemen opposite to join with us in trying to reach some common conclusion, or, at all events, if we do not succeed in coming to some common conclusion, that they will come to this conclusion, that they have fully done their duty, that they have called the attention of Parliament, of the public, of those to whom we are responsible, to the alleged defaults of this measure, and having done their duty in this regard, they will not destroy all respect for representative institutions by adopting the course taken continually in the South American republics, where they have a semblance of representative institutions, a semblance of Parliament, but where -in every little South American Congress or Cortes, or whatever they may call it—the minority worries the majority to the utmost extent, and when they cannot do that any more, they rise in arms and issue a pronunciamento. I hope in this House, in this northern clime, men who are accustomed to British institutions, who respect representative institutions, will not use the forms of Parliament which were devised for the purpose of enabling legislation to be made, as the means of obstructing all legislation. I speak with all earnestness, I speak with every desire to put an end to this abnormal state of things. Hon. gentlemen opposite have pressed such a strong view in opposition to this measure and its consequences, that I am willing to give them every credit for conscientious motives, hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in his speech tion, the time has now come to allow the measure to in 1870, said we should have an election Bill at once; he succeed. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, I appeal with some confidence, especially to those older members who know the value, who have studied the value of the British constitution, no longer to continue this policy.

Mr. MILLS. There is one observation made by the hon. gentleman in which I concur; I agree with him that representative institutions in Canada under this Bill, are upon their trial. I say that with all earnestness, and I believe that opinion is shared by every hon, gentleman on this side. We believe if this measure be carried a very serious blow will be struck at representative institutions; we regard it as wholly incompatible with all those principles of representative government which have hitherto prevailed in this country; and we think the course taken by the hon. gentleman in bringing forward this Bill, in endeavoring to press it through this House in such an extraordinary way, at such a late period of the Session bears a very strong resemblance to the course pursued by some political chiefs in some of the South American republics. The hon, gentleman has complained that we have discussed for a very long time the various sections of the interpretation clause. The hon. gentleman himself invited discussion upon that clause. A friend of his moved an amendment in reference to woman suffrage, on the very first portion of the second section of the clause, and we had a discussion upon that subject. That discussion the hon. gentleman himself admits was appropriately taken; there were exactly the same reasons for carrying on the discussion on the subject of the Indian franchise because it was expressed in precisely the same way as was the woman suffrage question in that same clause. is true we have had a great deal of discussion upon this question, but it is equally true that the subject has not been considered in many of its phases, and to a large degree the discussion of which the hon. gentleman complains is due to the persistency with which the second reading of the Bill was forced at an unusual hour upon Parliament. The hon. gentleman introducedhis measure after the House had been in session nearly three months. The hon. gentleman, when he introduced the Bill at an earlier period in a former year, admitted that it was a matter of such vast importance that it would require a whole Session for its consideration, and yet the hon. gentleman, following the practice which has served his purpose for a series of years, failed to bring forward this very important measure until nearly three months had elapsed, and then, before a large number on this side of the House had any opportunity to consider the merits and principles of the Bill, insisted upon a second reading. It is only necessary to look at the published Debates-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House met on the 29th January, and the Bill was introduced on the 19th March.

Mr. MILLS. It is true that he gave notice on the 19th March.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was introduced on the 19th March.

Mr. MILLS. It was several weeks afterwards before the Bill was in our hands. A considerable time had gone by before he moved the second reading, and then he introduced a measure of such vast consequence in an expository speech of less than ten minutes. I hold that we have not, as the hon, gentleman has said, travelled beside the question before us in this discussion. If you look at the two amendments in your hand, you will see that every observation addressed to the Chair from this side of the House was strictly pertinent to one or the other of those two motions. We have the amendment of the hon, member from Prince Edward Island, and we have the general amendment to substitute the Provincial franchises moved by the hon.

one of these motions, or to all of them, is acting strictly within his right. I regard this measure as one of very great importance. It proposes to take from the people of this country the control of the preparation of the voters. lists. It proposes to confer the suffrage upon women, and it proposes to confer the franchise upon every Indian over 21 years of age in any one Province of the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it does not,

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister says no, but the Bill itself will show the House conclusively that it does precisely what I have stated. In not one of these instances did the hon, gentleman submit the question to the people of this country; in not one instance did he ask the popular verdict. If the government of this country is to be carried on according to the well understood wishes of the people as expressed at elections, will anyone tell me what is the conclusion at which the electorate has arrived on any one of the three important propositions involved in the Bill now before us? The hon, gentleman submitted the question of woman suffrage; he told us he was in favor of that, he intimated to us that it was his anxious desire that that motion should be carried, but, as soon as it was discovered that a very considerable number of gentlemen on this side were prepared to vote for that motion, a considerable number of the hon, gentleman's supporters seem to have been instructed to oppose it, and so that portion was struck out. The hon, gentleman has not so readily yielded on this question of the Indian franchise. He seems to think that the intelligent and Christian women of this country are entitled to much less consideration than the tribal Indians who reside on the reservations in the various Provinces. We know that this question of woman suffrage was voted down by the friends of the Government, and there is little reason for doubt that the conclusion at which the majority of the House arrived met with the approval of the promotor of the Bill. The Indian suffrage, we find, is tenaciously adhered to. The public will not fail to observe that, while the one proposition has been readily abandoned, the other proposition has been supported with all the vehemence and all the pertinacity that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House command. I do not regret the course the hon. gentleman has taken. It leaves no doubt on the public mind as to the object of this Bill, it leaves no doubt that, instead of proposing to fight the battle of his Government before the electors of this country, the hon. gentleman proposes that it shall be fought in Parliament, and it is here, where there is no doubt as to the numerical strength which he commands, that he proposes to take advantage of the opportunity, and to load the dice, in order that there may be no doubt, so far as he is concerned, as to what will be the result of the elections which will follow two years hence. It is perfectly clear by this Bill that the First Minister doubts the capacity of all white men in the country to exercise the elective franchise. He says they must give evidence of their fitness to exercise it. He proposes by this clause and by the four or five subsequent clauses that a certain amount of real property shall be held in some form or other by the white man or the colored man in order to entitle him to exercise the elective franchise, but nothing of this sort is required of the Indian. He resides upon his reservation. If there is no ticket of allotment or division of the reservation, under this 6th section of the Bill there is a provision that, if the whole property taken together is worth a sufficient amount to entitle each individual Indian to a vote, he shall have the elective franchise. So, by the provision of the Bill submitted to us, every Indian who is over 21 years of age in Canada will be entitled to the elective franchise. While the question of member for North Norfolk, and we have the third clause itself. All these are before you for consideration, and the hon. gentleman on this side who addresses himself to any ask for the ownership of property in the case of the white man? It is not to the property that the hon. gentleman proposes to give the vote, but he takes that as an evidence of the qualification, of the capacity, of the industry and frugality of the white citizen, to qualify him for the exercise of the franchise. If he is incapable of holding or retaining his property, he is not allowed to exercise the elective franchise, but loses the right to vote when he loses his property. The hon, gentleman has declared over and over again, in his report as Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, that the Indian, if he were given his property, would not retain it six months in the great majority of cases. He knows that in giving the Indian possession of his property, he knows he would cease to be a voter before this Act would come into effect, he knows that he would lose that property by which alone he could be qualified. The hon. gentleman says he has no capacity to take charge of his own affairs, that he is wanting in intellectual capacity, and he therefore acts as trustee to him, he takes charge of his estate, and in consequence gives him a vote on that estate, a vote which he would not have at all if the Government did not interfere and secure the property on his behalf. Now, the hon, gentleman's Bill disfranchises a large number of white men in this country. He cannot give a single instance in the history of England where any portion of the community were disfranchised except for offences against the election law. If a man had been convicted of bribery, if he has been shown to have violated the law, he may be disfranchised. When the Reform Bill was proposed, parties who had proprietary rights in Gaton and Old Sarum, claimed it is a property, they claimed that the Government ought not to take it from them without compensation; and yet the hon, gentleman proposes, without any offence being committed by a large number of the electors, without any wrong being done, and without popular sanction in any way, to disfranchise those people; and he proposes to confer the electoral franchise upon a large number of persons who are notoriously unfit to exercise it; and he proposes to do this without appeal to the country, and without having any sanction given him by the electors. The unemancipated Indian controls no property. The hon, gentleman admits that he is unfit for citizenship. He is not allowed to make a contract, and no contract can be enforced against him. He does not serve upon a jury, he does not serve with the militia, he does not assist in bearing any of the expense of the administration of justice, and yet, while retaining the Indian in his condition of tutelage, in a condition of servitude to the Government, the hon. gentleman proposes to confer the highest franchise known to freemen upon him. The hon. gentleman knows that the Indian is not a citizen; he does not mingle with the rest of the community; he forms a member of a tribe, and they stand apart. They have their own customs and their own regulations and direct their own affairs, to a limited extent, subject to his control and to his interference. And without changing that condition, without emancipating the Indian, without conferring upon him the franchise which the Indian Act authorises him to confer, admitting that he is incapable of being enfranchised, admitting that he would lose what he possesses if he were enfranchised, the hon, gentleman proposes to take an individual who, if left to himself, would be reduced to a condition of penury, and to put in his hands the electoral franchise by which he may control and determine the destiny of this country. Now, Sir, our free institutions rest upon the habits of self-reliance existing amongst our people. It is that self-reliance which renders free institutions not only possible but practically in the large existing amongst the self-reliance which renders free institutions not only possible but practically in the large existing amongst the self-reliance which renders free institutions not only possible but practically in the large existing amongst the self-reliance which renders free institutions not only possible but practically in the self-reliance which renders free institutions of the self-reliance which renders free institutions not only possible but practically in the self-reliance which renders free institutions are self-reliance. ticable in this country. The hon gentleman knows that the mere framing of a free constitution, the wide extension Mr. MILLS.

The hon. gentleman, therefore, proposes to make a man who is without public spirit, who is without any enterprise, who is without any habits of self-reliance, who knows nothing about our institutions, who can neither read nor write, who possesses no property which he can control, a voter, and put into his hands the electoral franchise for the purpose of electing members to sit in this great council of the nation. I say he has no authority for that; I say he is not morally competent to do that thing; I say we are justified in resisting, by all the constitutional means that Parliament places at our disposal, a proposition so monstrous and so unjust in itself. Why, Sir, this measure, in this respect, is nothing less than revolutionary. It is a proposal to change the institutions and the government of this country without the sanction of the people and without the authority of the people. Sir, I admit that if the hon. gentleman chooses to go to the country, if he chooses to make that an issue, if he puts it fairly before the electors, and if he were returned with a majority to support that proposition, then he would be morally competent, as well as having the abstract legal right to deal with the subject. has not done so; he has taken no such course; he has no authority for what he proposes to do. It is an abuse of the power with which he is entrusted; it is a gross violation of his duty as trustee for the people of this country, to undertake to force through Parliament a measure of so extraordinary a character and so unjust as that which is now before us. Sir, it is an insult to the people of this country, it is an insult to those who have been exercising their constitutional right in resisting a measure so grossly unfair, for the hon, gentleman to complain that we are obstructing legislation of this sort. Why, Sir, a burglar might as well complain of the resistance of the man who is defending his own house and seeking to protect his own property from pillage. The hon, gentleman is bringing forward a measure which he dared not submit to the people of this country, which he knows is abhorrent to the vast majority of his own supporters; and if the hon. gentlemen who sit around him discharged their duty as loyal party men, they would reject this measure, they would oppose it as strongly as we do on this side of the House. Sir, the hon. gentleman has told us that property is no evidence of capacity or fitness to vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When? Where?

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman did it in this House; he did it from his seat. He instanced the case of Charles James Fox who, he said, could not manage his own affairs, who was incompetent to manage his own estate, and yet he was one of the greatest statesmen of his age and generation. The hon. gentleman argues in effect that while the Indian is incompetent to take charge of his own property and manage his own affairs, he is competent to take charge of the affairs of the nation. Why, the hon, gentleman attacks the very basis upon which he proposes to establish the electoral franchise. He says: I admit the Indian is incompetent to manage his own affairs, but his incapacity to control his own property is no evidence of unfitness to exercise the electoral franchise. Well, if it is not with the Indian, why is it with the white man? Why does the hon. gentleman put it in his Bill at all? Why does he come to this House and say: I will not allow the white man to vote, unless he possesses property of a certain amount, and yet he says: I will allow the Indian to vote whether he has any property or not, whether he is competent to control property or not; because, forsooth, the possession of property is no evidence of a man's fitness to exercise the electoral franchise. If it is not evidence why put it in his Bill? Why say a man shall have a certain of the franchise, the establishment of popular government amount of property before he shall exercise the electoral in form, will not make a free people. The history of franchise, if property is no evidence of political intelli-Mexico and the South American republics evidence that gence? The hon. gentleman says: Oh, it is necessary to elevate the Indian; we want to confer the electoral franchise upon the Indian in order that we may elevate him. Sir, the hon. gentleman will not elevate the Indian, but he will degrade Parliament. To the ordinary Indian the value of the vote is just the sum it will bring-its mercantile value determines its value to him. The hon, gentleman stands in the position of the patriot who addressed the needy knife-grinder. The hon. gentleman says: He knows the Indian may have a hole in his coat, but he is ready to listen to his pitiful story; he is ready to confer on him the electoral franchise; he is ready to make him a citizen of this Dominion and enable him to cast a vote at elections while he is still a ward of the Government, and under the control of the agents and superintendents of the Indian Department throughout the country. The public will understand this measure. They will understand the motives of the hon. gentleman. They know why this measure is brought forward at this time. They know that if the political outlook was as bright as it was some time ago the hon. gentleman would not have proposed this measure. It is true it has been before Parliament occasionally during the last 18 years; but there has been no such necessity for passing it as there is at the present time. The public, therefore, will certainly understand why that is being done. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) proposed a motion to adopt the electoral franchises of the variious Provinces instead of adopting the electoral franchise suggested by section 3 and subsequent sections. The hon. member for King's, Prince Edward Island, moved an amendment that Prince Edward Island be exempted from the operation of this section. He proposed, in effect, that the Island should retain its provincial franchise. If the hon, gentleman had supported the motion of the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and if that motion were successful, the electoral franchise in Prince Edward Island would be retained. But the hon, gentleman is not satisfied to do that. He is anxious that the Island should retain its own electoral franchise, but he is unwilling that any other Provinces should do so. The hon. gentleman is determined to force on the other Provinces a franchise that he is unwilling Parliament should force on his own Province. The hon, gentleman reminds me of some of those religious sects during the 16th century who complained loudly of persecution, and demanded toleration for themselves, while not willing to grant toleration to any other denomination. So the hon, gentleman says, we want the franchise selected by the people of Prince Edward Island, but we are opposed to other Provinces enjoying the same right. I am so much in favor of the principle of provincial rights in this matter that I will vote for whatever proposition comes first. I will vote for every proposition of this sort. If I cannot procure provincial rights for all the Provinces, I am ready to secure them for as many as I can. I regret the hon member for King's, Prince Edward Island, has not seen proper to deal with other hon. gentlemen as we would have them deal with him. The hon, member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Foster), accused us the other night of obstruc-tion. He declared that we on this side had a right briefly to express our views on public questions; we had a right briefly to state our opposition to this measure; but beyond that we had no right to go. The hon gentleman laid down a number of mutually destructive propositions, and I will read them to the committee. The hon, gentleman said:

"In one sense, Parliament is here to register the opinions of the Government."

In what sense? Is it here to register the opinions of the Government on questions on which public opinion has not been pronounced? Is it here to register the opinions of the Government, and to change the constitution and institutions of this country? Is it here to register the opinions of the platform and hustings. It is because of this public discus-

Government in favor of Indian suffrage and against woman suffrage? The hon, gentleman goes on to say.

"In another sense it is not. If the proposition is that Parliament is simply to shut its eyes and stop its ears and, when the 13 members of the cabinet bring down their measures, to swallow them, without the opportunity of accepting or rejecting them, then Parliament is not here for any such purpose."

If I understand this part of the hon, gentleman's statement, Parliament is free to accept or reject any measure of the Government. It is free to criticise any measure of the Government, and free to oppose it. But he withdraws from this position and again asserts the doctrine of implicit obedience, I suppose, seeing that the Government have opposed the amendments to the Scott Act, which they thought they could do safely in the other Chamber, the hon gentleman will be disposed to follow the Government when that measure comes back to this House. I suppose, seeing that the Government secretly sought to defeat the proposal for woman suffrage, the hon. gentleman will feel himself called on to agree with the Government and oppose woman suffrage. I suppose, as the Government are now pressing so earnestly and obstinately the question of the Indian franchise, the hon gentleman will be prepared to support the Indian franchise, and oppose those who think the Indians who are enfranchised are not qualified to exercise the highest privilege and trust of freemen. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"But if the question is whether Parliament is here to register the opinions of the Government, who are put in power by the majority of the people, and who have the confidence of the people, I say that Parliament is here for that and no other purpose."

This is an extraordinary doctrine. I should like to know what constitutional authorities the hon, gentleman relies upon for such a doctrine. The hon, gentleman gravely asserts that any other theory would be destructive of responsible parliamentary government. I should like to know how the hon, gentleman is free to criticise, to reject a measure, if he is here simply to register the wishes of the Government, because it is supported by a majority. I can subscribe to no such doctrine. I hold that so far from it being a doctrine consistent with parliamentary government, it would be entirely destructive of any such system. What is a political party? It is a number of men, Burke says, that are united together, agreeing in their views on questions of public policy, for the promotion of a common end. That is Burke's definition of party. These hon gentlemen went to the country upon certain questions. They were supported by the country, and their party is bound to support in this House the principles enunciated on platform and hustings. But with respect to new questions, questions that were not before the elections, the rule is wholly different. The hon, gentleman is bound to support the National Policy, as are all those who were elected by the people for that purpose, but he is not more bound than is his leader. He is not bound because his leader supports it, but because the country has sustained himself and his leader on that question, and his leader is as much bound as he is himself. It is not a question of the servility of a number of gentlemen to a leader, but it is a question of the devotion of a number of gentlemen, leader and all, to certain principles to which they have committed themselves and which have been sanctioned by the country. But we are here to oppose their views on this question, and we are here to oppose them as much as they are here to support them. We are here to oppose them by the same authority—the authority of our constituents. We stated our views; they were in accord with the views of the electorate, and so we have seats in this House. We are here to enunciate, explain, and defend them, and make them known here and to the country, as much as are the Government and those who support them are bound to support the views they enunciated on sion that parliamentary government is superior to any other. It is a great school of thought by which intelligence is disseminated among the electors, by which the commen standard of attainment is raised, and by which the country is made more self reliant upon questions relating to public affairs. But this question is a wholly different one. When was public opinion expressed upon this question? I read the other day, in the course of this debate, an extract from a speech of Lord Beaconsfield, upon the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He said that the House of Commons, without the sanction of the country, denied the moral competency-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He did deal with it. Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says he did what? Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He did deal with it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Gladstone did deal with it, but it was after an election was had, and after the country had sustained it. Mr. Gladstone proposed some resolutions, and those resolutions were carried through the House of Commons, but no further step was taken until an election was had. The views expressed by Mr. Disraeli were acquiesced in, an election was had, and then he admitted the moral competence of Parliament, to deal with that question. Did he say that the supporters of the Government were obliged to support thatmeasure? He said a majority were committed to the prin ciple, but beyond that the majority were not called upon to go. I will read the views of Lord Beaconsfield, and we will see what a great difference there is between the views of the hon. member for King's and his leader, and the views of the great leader of the Conservative party of Great Britain at that time. And, be it remembered, this speech was made on the second reading of the Bill, after the election were had, and after a majority of the country had voted in favor of disestablishment:

"I take the fair interpretation of the decision of the country at the general elections to be this, that it was the opinion of the country that the right hon, gentleman should have the opportunity of dealing with the question of the church in Ireland. I do not understand that the country pledged itself to support any narticular measure. No particular measure was then before it; but it declared and decided, in a manner which could not be mistaken, that the right hon, gentleman should have a fair and full opportunity of dealing with the question of the church in Ireland. I cannot, therefore, take this occasion which might otherwise have been a most legitimate one, of preventing the right hon, gentleman from placing his policy before the country, and I shall advise none of those whose conduct I can influence to oppose the motion the right hon, gentleman has just made."

What does that mean? He says it would have been a legi-

What does that mean? He says it would have been a legitimate and proper thing for him to prevent the passage of that measure, if an election had not been had upon it, but an election having been had upon it, the views of the country having been expressed in its favor, he had not a moral right to oppose the measure by all those resources which the rules of Parliament placed at his disposal, as he would have had, if the views of the country had not been taken. Now, Sir, those are very different views from those advanced by the First Minister, and the hon gentlemen behind him. Wby, Sir, what protection have we under our constitutional system against the conduct of an arbitrary and unprincipled Minister, and a servile majority, if the views of these hon. gentlemen are recognised as sound constitutional views? The hon. gentleman might propose the annexation of this country to the United States. He might get a majority of his supporters to support such a measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No fear,

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says, No fear; but I would ask him if there is any man in this House who, if he had been told two years ago that a motion to enfranchise ocean in this country, would be submitted, would not have of this country? When were they asked to say whether indignantly repudiated such a thing. Why, Sir, the descent they were willing or not to enfranchise the widows and Mr. MILLS.

of Avernus is easy; hon gentlemen are going down hill with facility; they are ready to support propositions which they would have indignantly rejected a short time ago, and I say the only protection we have against the abuse of parliamentary authority is that every proposed change in the constitution shall only be made after public sanction has been given at an election. There is no necessity for this haste, no reason for this hurry. What reason has the hon. gentleman given for taking this extraordinary course on this occasion? Why not go to the country on this question, as well as the question of the National Policy? The hon. was not morally competent to deal with that question. He | gentleman was so anxious to obtain the views of the country, so anxious to find out whether the people had changed their minds on that question, that he dissolved Parliament two years before its time, to ascertain the views of the country; and yet the hon gentleman proposes in this matter to carry through a measure vitally affecting our constitution, without any recourse to the people, and without giving them the opportunity of expressing their views on it at all. Sir, if the hon, member for King's, N.B., was right, there was necessity for examining this or any other measure. All he needed was to ascertain the views of the Government to give them his earnest and active support. It is not the exercise of judgment but of implicit obedience which is sought under such a doctrine. The hon, gentleman as a political philosopher, as a disciple of the First Minister, might be anxious to know his views, to make himself conversant with them, but that would be a matter for his own individual pleasure or amusement, because a knowledge of a measure or of its merits would not at all be of any consequence to enable him to do what he says is the bounden duty of the supporters of the Government—simply to register the wishes of the Government on this and every other question. Now, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman's line of discussion suggests the question: To what extent a Government is entitled to the support of a party—how far ought party allegiance to go? I say that when a Government goes to the country upon a question of public policy, and the supporters of that Government go to the country taking the same views as the Administration, they are bound it sustained to give effect to the wishes of the country in that particular. But it does not at all follow that they are bound to support the Government on every other question which may come up, during the five years of its administration. Take the case of Mr. Gladstone, when he carried the United Kingdom with him, in the policy which he initiated in his Midlothian speeches. The country supported those views, and the great majority of those taking the same view were elected. But does that bind Parliament to support Mr. Gladstone's views on the Egyptian war, the war in the Soudan, or the disputed boundaries of Afghanistan? These are questions which have forced themselves on the attention of the Government and the nation, and the members who usually support the Administration are just as free to take that course, which an independent judgment suggests to them as being in the public interests, as any other portion of the community. Sir, upon this question the country was never consulted. I look at the third section of the Bill and I see there no provision that the hon, gentleman explained to the country, no provision as to which the hon. gentleman said, if I am elected I will seek to carry out these views. There was nothing of that sort enunciated; and this is not a question of emergency forcing itself on the attention of the Government, but a question which the hon, gentleman has dangled before Parliament during the last 18 years, and which no one supposed that he would undertake to force upon this House. Sir, there was in this Bill a provision relating to woman all the Indians residing on the reservations, from ocean to suffrage. When was that question submitted to the people spinsters of Canada? At what election question was that made an issue? What opportunity have the members of this House had to consult their constituents on that question? And, again, with regard to the Indian suffrage. Have the views of the people of this country been taken upon that question? Has any hon, gentleman in any election told the people of this country that if he was returned to Parliament he would vote to enfranchise the Indians on their reserves-not to enfranchise them under the Indian Act, not to make them free men, to give them control of their own affairs, but that they might vote at elections, and mark their ballots under the supervision of the deputy returning officers. Why, Sir, we know that more than 90 per cent. of those Indians cannot read or write; they cannot mark their own ballots. We know that the hon. gentleman has charge of these men; we know the class of men they are-I have had personal experience in this matter, we know the kind of men that will be appointed deputy returning officers on the Indian reserves; we know that they will take care how the Indian ballots shall be marked; we know precisely as well what will be done under the provisions of this Bill, as we shall know after the next general election. Sir, I admit that a Government has a right to deal with questions that cannot be foreseen, and that are forced upon its attention. Especially is this true of independent states in their relations with other states; and the Government must act as far as it can upon its own individual judgment, to be sustained by the independent opinion of Parliament itself. But there are various ways in which the opinions of the country are expressed, and which give to the Government, not that satisfactory aid and guidance which it can receive at a general election, but an imperfect aid—by means of the press, by public meetings, and by other means known under our constitution. But in England, when there has been a change in the constitution itself, when the institutions of the country have been altered, when the franchise has been extended or the representation has been changed, a general election has always first been held, and a majority has been returned to Parliament to support the policy that has before been enunciated. This was the case with the Reform Bill of 1832. On two occasions the views of the country were obtained before the question was dealt with; and when Parliament was dissolved the last time it was expressly stated by the King that he was proroguing Parliament with the view to its dissolution, for the purpose of ascertaining whether those who supported the Government were doing so in accordance with the wishes of the country. Now, Sir, that is a wholly different thing from acting contrary to our commission. We are here for the purpose of carrying on the Government under the constitution as it is, not for the purpose of changing the constitution or making it different from what it is; that is no part of our ordinary parliamentary duties. Let us not confound two wholly distinct and independent things. Under the English system of parliamentary government the alteration of the constitution is brought about by the same body which is entrusted with law-making power; but the alteration of the constitution is not made in the way that ordinary legislation is carried on. Ordinary legislation the Government may deal with from time to time as they may think proper; if the country does not approve, the country can change; but when you attack the constitution itself, when you undertake to alter the system of government under which we live, you can never go back to the same people again. You give no opportunity to those who entrusted you with authority of saying whether its approval has been obtained. Sir, we know what is thought of Captain Kidd. He was entrusted with the king's commission, he was authorised under the commission to give protection to the commerce of the nation; but, instead of acting according to his commission he became a pirate, and by the violation of his commission he made war on that commerce that it was his duty under his commission to protect. What is the hon. gentleman doing? Has he been authorised by the people of this country to make changes in the constitution? Not at all. He has been commissioned to legislate under the constitution as it is; and in violation of that trust, he is calling on his sup-porters to change the constitution itself, and to place the power in this country in other hands than those to which it is committed at this moment. That is what the hon, gentleman proposes. It is making war upon our rights; it is making war upon those rights which it is the bounden duty of Parliament to guard; and we are bound, in our duty to our constituents and to this country, to resist by all constitutional means, this attempt at usurpation—this revolutionary act—this proposal to change our constitution and to make it something different from what it is. Sir, let me read, for the benefit of the hon. member for King's, an extract from an essay by Lord Jeffrey on the for King's, an extract from an essay by Lord Jeffrey on the subject of party government:

"One party, that of the rulers or the court, is necessarily formed and disciplined from the permanence of its chief, and the uniformity of the interests it has to maintain;—the party in opposition, therefore, must be marshalled in the same way. When bad men combine, good men must unite—and it would not be less hopeless for a crowd of worthy citizens to take the field without leaders or discipline, against a regular army, than for individual patriots to think of opposing the influence of the Sovereign by their separate and uncombined exertions. As to the lengths they should be permitted to go in support of the common cause, or the extent of which each ought to submit his private opinion to the general sense of his associates, it does not appear to us—though casuists may varnish over dishonor, and purists startle at shadows—either that any man of upright feelings can be often at a loss for a rule of conduct, or that, in point of fact, there has ever been any blameable excess in the maxims upon which the great parties of this country have been generally conducted.

'The leading principle is, that the man should satisfy himself that the party to which he attaches himself means well to the country, and that more substantial good with accrue to the nation from its coming into power, than from the success of any other body of men whose success is at all within the limits of probability. Upon that principle, therefore, he will support that party in all things which he approves—in all things that are indifferent—and even in some things which he partly disapproves, provided they neither touch the honor and vital interests of the country, nor imply any breach of the oddinary rule of morality. Upon the same principle, he will attack not only all that he individually disapproves in the conduct of his adversary, but all that might appear indifferent and tolerable enough to a neutral spectator. If it afford an opportunity to weaken this adversary in the public opinion, and to increase the chance of bringing that party into power from which alone he sincerely believes that any sure or systematic good is to be expected. Farther than this we do not believe that the leaders or respectable followers of any consiberable party intentionally allow themselves to go. Their zeal indeed, and the passions engendered in the course of the conflet, may sometimes hurry them into measures for which an impartial spectator cannot find this apology—but to their own conscience and honor we are persuaded that they generally stand acquitted—and, on the score of duty or morality, that is all that can be required of human beings. For the baser retainers of the party, indeed—those marauders who follow in the rear of every army, not for battle but for booty—who concern themselves in no way about the justice of the quarrel or the fairness of the field—who plunder the dead, and butcher the wounded, and desert the unprosperous, and betray the daring—for those wretches who truly belong to no party, and are a disgrace and drawback up

ment may deal with from time to time as they may think proper; if the country does not approve, the country can change; but when you attack the constitution itself, when you undertake to alter the system of government under which we live, you can never go back to the same people again. You give no opportunity to those who entrusted you with authority of saying whether you are deserving of having continued to you the confidence they once reposed in you. I say, then, that a change in the constitution is made on a different plan and on different principles. It is made under popular sanction after the nation has been consulted, and after than that of the nation. We have been told again and again by hon; gentlemen opposite that this Parliament has the power to pass this Bill, that the constitution authorises us to pass it, and that therefore, because we have the power, we must necessarily have the right. I do not deny that we have the power; I admit that we have the power to pass such a Franchise Act; but I deny that it is at all expedient to deal with the question at this moment. I wholly deny that we are morally competent to pass an Act like this that radically changes our whole constitutional system. Hon, gentlemen opposite have read the clause in the British North America Act to show that the franchise existing under the law of the old Provinces was to continue to be the franchise of Canada until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provided, and they say that is conclusive evidence that it was intended Parliament should otherwise provide. If it were necessary that, by otherwise providing, a Dominion Franchise Act should be made, certainly it was the duty of Parliament otherwise to provide, and Parliament did otherwise provide. Under that law is our present franchise constituted? Under the law of the Provinces? Not at all; under the law of this Dominion. It was under the law of this Dominion, passed in 1874, that our last general election took place, and it was under that law the election in 1878 took place. Let us look for a moment at the law. The 40th election of the Dominion Election Act provides: Subject to the exceptions here and above contained all persons qualified to vote at the election of representatives in the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the several Provinces composing the Dominion of Canada and other, and no others, shall be entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Commons of Canada for the several electoral districts comprised within such Provinces respectively. It is under that authority our elections are held. That is the law of the Parliament of Canada as much as the Bill you have before you would be, if it passed this House and received the sanction of the Governor General. The Provincial franchises are the electoral franchises for this Dominion, in virtue of that law under the authority of this Parliament, and therefore it is a question of expediency and convenience whether this system shall be continued or not. I do not deny that we have the power; I say we have exercised the power, but it does not follow that we are bound to exercise every power we possess. We have the power of taxing commerce out of existence, but it does not follow that it would be wise or expedient to do so. We have the power of legislating that the property of shipping shall be transferred from those who now hold it into other hands without compensation. Would it be wise to exercise that power? We have the power of doing a score of things that would be atrociously unjust. To possess a power and to justify the exercise of it are two wholly distinct things. We have the power of saying that no man over 21 years old shall exercise the franchise, that no man with blue eyes, or that no man with red hair shall have the right to vote, or that the electoral franchise shall be entrusted to persons under 21 years of age. But because we have the power to do these things, it would be preposterous to conclude that we are called upon to exercise them. The basis of the authority of the Government would be destroyed by the very exercise of such powers. This system that we now have has been in force for 18 years; we have had five general elections under it. What abuses have grown up to show that we should change it? I think it is a sound principle in legislation that Parliament ought not to legislate except where necessity can be shown, and upon every one who proposes to alter a law, the burden of proof is to show that the change in the law, is necessary. Who has undertaken this duty in this case? I listened to the expository speech of 8 or 9 minutes of the First Minister, and did not find that he attempted to justify any appointed assessor, and it was afterwards discovered that Mr. MILLS.

provision of the Bill or to discuss the merits of the question at all. He said a few words on the subject of woman suffrage, but not a word about Indian suffrage, not a word about proposing to confer votes upon unenfranchised Indians, residing on reserves and who are wards of the Government. Not a word did he say with regard to the other important features of the Bill, nor did he attempt to justify the measure, or show any necessity for it. He showed no abuse under the existing law as a justification of the change proposed. Two members on that side of the House undertook to justify these changes by a statement which applies rather to another part of the Bill than to that which is now before us, but which is strictly pertinent under the amendment of my hon, friend from North Norfolk. The hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said the change was necessary because the voters' list was improperly prepared by partisan assessors, that, in fact, the elections for municipal councils had degenerated into struggles for the appointment of an assessor. The hon, member for North Perth told us that his friends were successful in this struggle, that the majority of the assessors were on his side, but that they were partisans, that they were guilty of perjury, and were not to be trusted; that they were committing perjury throughout the country. In fact, he was so shocked at the perjury which had been committed in his own county by those who had been entrusted with the preparation of the voters' list, that he says this ought to be taken out of their hands and put into the hands of the fair-minded men whom the Government will appoint. Well, for my part, I would rather trust my case in the hands of those whom he called perjured partisans than in the hands of these fair-minded men whom the Government will appoint.

Mr. HESSON. The hon gentleman is misrepresenting me. I never used the words "perjured partisans" at all. He has no right to misrepresent what I said, and to put in my mouth language not at all implied by anything which I said. What I said is upon the record. I do not wish to waste time by reading it, but I stated that I was perfectly satisfied that the elections were carried in the counties throughout Ontario upon partisan principles, and that the Reform party were responsible for that; that it was made the cry to look after the voters' lists, to see to the voters' lists. How could you do that unless it were done at first by the election of the council, and afterwards by the appointment of the assessors, and then the Court of Revision; and then there is a final appeal to the judge, and I presume that will be the same in the present case.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman knows that the assessor is sworn to do his duty. He represents the assessor as a partisan. He said the conduct of the assessors was so partisan that he desired to see the matter taken out of their hands and out of the hands of the council and put into the hands of the appointee of the Government. What is the inference? Is not the assessor sworn? Did he by his speech intend to imply that the assessor had acted honestly, that he had acted fairly, that he had discharged his duty and prepared a proper list, that his list was not a partisan list, that some names had not been nnfairly left off and some names unfairly put on, contrary to the oath of office which the assessor had taken? If the hon, gentleman's observations did not mean that, they did not mean anything. That is precisely what his observations meant, they could not mean anything else, and I am satisfied that the assessors and the municipal councillors not only in his own county, but in every other county throughout Ontario will appreciate the slander which the hon, gentleman has here spoken against them. I know of but a single case of the character to which the hon, gentleman has referred. In my own constituency, there was a case of Mr. Craig, who was or a supporter of mine but belonged to that class which the hon. gentleman says did not begin this struggle for the control of the voters' lists. But the hon. gentleman should bear in mind that the adoption of the provincial franchise, as proposed by my hon. friend, is more in harmony with the genius of our constitution than the proposal of the First Minister, even though the Bill were made perfectly fair and its partisan features were wiped out. But I know, and every hon. gentleman in this House, whether on this side or on that, knows that, if those partisan features were wiped out, the First Minister would have no interest in pressing this Bill on the attention of Parliament. I say that, under our federal system, the adoption of the provincial franchise is more consistent with our system than this proposal. Under our constitution, we have the principle of representation by population. Is it applied to the whole country as a unit? constitution, Are there to be equal electoral districts? No, it is applied by Provinces. Quebec is to have sixty-five members, and all the other Provinces are to have numbers in proportion to their population according to that of the Province of Quebec. If the proportion is changed in Quebec, and the number is made something less than 65, then a different proportion is to be adopted in the other Provinces, so that the principle of represention by population between the Provinces may be preserved. If the hon, gentleman was right and if his views were sound, it would be necessary to apply the principle to the entire country as a unit and to make the electoral districts equal, to redistribute the seats in the Province of Quebec, to add to the smaller constituencies and reduce the larger constituencies, and so with every other Province of the Dominion. The House has not adopted that view. It has not attempted to deal with this country as a unit. Parliament has so far recognised the principle laid down in this constitution, that the representation by population is representation by population between the Provinces and not as between the constituencies, that the Province is the unit of which Canada is the multiple and Canada is not the unit of which the Provinces are fractions. There is not a word said about uniformity between the Provinces with a view of securing equal electoral divisions. There are some features of our legislation that, it seems to me, have been lost sight of. We have on other matters proceeded on exactly the same lines that we have proceeded here ofore in reference to the elective franchise. In 1873, the First Minister introduced a Controverted Elections Act, and he proposed to create an election court, and he proposed to constitute that court in some instances of the judges who compose the other courts, and he gave as a reason for adopting that course that we had no power to confer jurisdiction upon provincial courts. We took a different view, and in 1874 another Controverted Election Act was adopted, and by that Controverted Election Act the different courts were made election courts. The courts are specified in the Controverted Election Act, which says that the Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas and the Court of Appeals in Ontario shall be election courts for the trial of controverted elections. Some of the judges in Lower Canada took exception to this legislation. They said: You cannot adopt this rule, you cannot confer civil jurisdiction upon these courts; and the case of Vallia against Langlois was taken from the provincial courts to mine for itself who should try these controverted elections, by the people, in the hands of a body in whom 220 about sixty names had been improperly left off in the township. He was prosecuted, and he was obliged to tion upon judges, to confer that duty upon existing provincial courty, but it happens that he was not a friend cial courts, because it was a question that lay wholly within the jurisdiction of Parliament. Now, it is just upon precisely that principle that we have proceeded in adopting the provincial franchises. The question as to who shall vote for members of this House is wholly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. It does not rest with the Local Legislature. The Local Legislature has no power to pass an Act to say who shall be an elector for the election of members of the House of Commons. We say that we have settled that; we said it in the Act; we said that the people in the different Provinces whom the Local Legislatures say shall be electors for the election of members to the Local Legislature, shall also be electors for the election of members to the House of Commons. That is what we have said. It is by virtue of that declaration that the local law has become our law. It is not because it is a local law that it is binding upon us at this moment; it is because we have said that it shall be the law of Canada, and the jurisdiction being vested in us, we have the right to say it. Now, we have a right to say what a town clerk shall do; we have the right to say what an assessor shall do; we have the right to say who shall prepare the voters' lists; we have the right to say that those voters' lists shall be prepared by municipal officers, or any other persons acting in the capacity of municipal officers-not under any power they possess as municipal officers, but under the power we confer upon them, under the duty conferred upon them in the exercise of a power we possess. Now, that being the case, we have the same right to impose the duty upon a clerk that we have to impose a duty upon a judge. Surely no one can contend that we can impose a duty upon a judge of a superior court that would be binding upon him, and we cannot impose a duty upon an ordinary township or municipal clerk that shall be equally binding upon him. Anyone knows that in the one case we act under our authority just as we do in the other; in the one case our authority is just as binding as it is in the other. And why do we choose those officers? We choose them because they are acquainted with the locality, because they are appointed by the people themselves; because, in the preparation of the voters' lists, the people are acting in their own behalf; they are exerting their own authority. We are not putting the matter into the hands of a partisan Government that is interested in the results, but we are putting the matter into the hands of officers who are supposed to belong to neither one party or the other. The rule upon which we act is a rule of conveni-We have adopted this system because it is convenient, because it is better than the system now proposed. If the motion of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is carried, what will happen? That the ordinary mode of preparing a voters' list that prevails now in the Provinces, will be retained, that it will remain in the hands of parties who possess local knowledge; it will remain, as it is in England, in the hands of parties possessing local knowledge. But if this motion is rejected, and if the views of the right hon. gentleman prevail, what will happen? Why, the whole affair, from the first inception to the end, unlike the law in any other Government in the world where Parliamentary government exists, will be in the hands of the Minister whose position may depend upon the conduct of unscrupulous men whom he may appoint. What could be more monstrous than such a proposition? Have they any such plan as that in England? the Privy Council and we have the judgment of the Privy Council upon that case. What did the Lords of the council say? They said: The trial of controverted elections is not an ordinary matter of civil procedure, it is in the hands of the Chief Justice, and that in every other county it is in the hands of the judge who is on the a question lying wholly within the jurisdiction of Parliament, and it was within the power of Parliament to determine for itself who should try these contraverted elections.

both parties are represented. Look at the Australian colonies. In every one there is the recognition of the principle that the Government is an interested party and cannot be entrusted with the appointment of the officers. And yet the right hon, gentleman proposes here—what? Before the last election he had taken into his hands the appointment of returning officers, and before the next election he proposes to assume the appointment of revising officers who shall prepare as well as revise the list. Could a proposition be more monstrous? Yet the right hon. gentleman says parliamentary Government is on its trial in the discussion of this Bill. I agree with him, I say it is on trial. I say every vote given in favor of this Bill is a direct stab at the principle of Parliamentary Government. I say that no friend of Parliamentary Government, no man who is not opposed to our system of Government, can support this measure. It is utterly impossible for Parliamentary Government to endure with the adoption of such a measure. Why, Sir, look at the condition of things. Here you propose to enfranchise some 50,000 Indians who will command some 10,000 votes in the next election—all to be thrown on one side. Everyone knows that not more than two per cent. of them will be given in any other way than for the Administration for the time being. That is the position of things. You have only to look at the vote polled at the last election to see what that result must be, if that result were alone to operate. Sir, I admit that in my opinion, it will not have the disastrous effect that the Minister intends; I admit that his scheme will not succeed to as large an extent as he anticipates. I believe that there is a moral sense in the Conservative party of this country, no less than in the Reform party, that will revolt at such a proceeding. The hon, gentleman may bring his supporters in this House to accept such a proposition, but he will find that he cannot discipline the fair-minded men outside of Parliament to support this measure. It is so monstrous that if it were adopted, it is perfectly obvious that it would be impossible that Parliamentary Government could be maintained in this country; and it is perfectly obvious that it would be the duty of the majority of the electors of this country to consider what is prudent in resisting such a measure, to consider whether they were bound to obey this as an ordinary law. The member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) declared that it was right and proper to bring forward this Birl, although the country had not been consulted, because, he said, we carried the Act of Confederation without an appeal to the country. Well, sir, we did did that. I think it was a great misfortune, I think it was one of the most serious blows ever aimed at Parliamentary Government in this country. Every body knows that the union is wanting in those elements of cohesion that it would have possessed, had this measure been supported by the people of the different Provinces, had their sanction been given to it before it became law. But I was rather surprised to hear such a proposition defended by the hon. member from Montreal Centre. Why, Sir, this was the way the union between Great Britain and Ireland was carried, without an appeal to the country, and without popular sanction. Was there a single leading man among the Liberal statesmen of that day who supported that proposition? Did Gratton, Plunket, Curran support it? There was not a distinguished Irishman or statesman whose name has come down to us, who did not denounce that measure; not one who did not declare that it was a gross violation of the powers of the parliamentary majority to pass such a measure, Mr. Plunkett declared they were there not to create Legislatures but to make laws, and that no one was bound to obey such a measure. It has no other authority than that of force, and has no other support than that of bayonets. Was it a wise act? Has the result shown that it was a wise act on the part of those who carried that measure without the sanction of the nation? Everyone knows that Ireland has been a discontented member of the union from that day to this, and that until home Mr. Malls.

rule is granted, Ireland will never cordially support a union; that until home rule is granted there will be discontent; that the present Legislative Union, carried by fraud, carried by the influence of the Crown and by an ambitious and servile Government, has produced one of the greatest misfortunes that has ever affected and afficted the United Kingdom. It is rather extraordinary to find the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) justifying the course that was then taken, by declaring it was right and proper for the Government to carry this measure without popular sanction. Let me for a moment consider this question, consider the changes that have taken place in the constitution of England. There have been reforms carried from time to time; sometimes a large stride has been taken, sometimes a shorter one; but it has never gone back upon the constitutional reforms which have been effected. Each step taken has been forward and has only served as a basis for another step forward. But the hon, gentleman who leads the present Government in this House has been trying to unsettle everything. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) in 1874 went to the country upon this question. The hon. gentleman claimed that the Provincial franchises should be adopted; that the local circumstances of the different Provinces were such as to make it desirable to adopt that system. He pointed out that the municipal machinery under the control of the Local Government made it highly convenient to adopt that course, and highly inconvenient to adopt any other course. The Liberal party were returned to power by an overwhelming majority. That measure, as a consequence of an appeal to the country, was put upon the Statute Book. It has been there now for eleven years. The hon gentleman opposite proposes to take it off; he proposes to do what was never done in Englandto go back on the Parliamentary record. And by what authority? Who has sanctioned the change; Who has authorised it? Has the hon, gentleman appealed to the country? Have the people reconsidered their conclusions and decided to alter them? Not at all. So far as we know, public opinion now sanctions what was settled in 1874. Public opinion may differ from us on other questions, but not in regard to this question. I ask hon. members from Quebec who support the Government whether the electors of that Province are not satisfied with the Quebec franchise as they have it; whether they are not favorable to leaving any alteration in that franchise to the Local Government? Quebec does not want this Bill; it does not want the representatives of Ontario and the other Provinces to vote them a franchise different from that which they have adopted for themselves. The Ontario meetings tell precisely the same story. They leave no doubt in the mind of any hon. member who looks into the question that at this moment, whether public opinion agrees with the Government's fiscal policy or their policy respecting public expenditure, public opinion does not agree with them in regard to this Bill. That opinion is expressed scarcely less by Conservatives than by Reformers. There is not a gentleman on this side who has not received numerous letters from Conservatives declaring opposition to the Bill. There is not a gentleman opposite who has not had similar. communications.

Mr. HESSON. I deny it. Produce your letters from Conservatives and lay them on the Table of the House. I challenge you to do it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman's challenge amounts to very little. There are gentlemen around me who have received such letters.

Mr. HESSON. Why should Conservatives write to you?

Mr. MILLS. Because some of them are my constituents:
I suppose the hon. gentleman has no Reformers in his constituency.

Mr. HESSON. Yes, I have.

Mr. MILLS. I think the hon. gentleman will find he has more at this time than he ever had before. constitution provides that the Province of Quebec shall return 65 representatives to this House. By whom are they to be returned? By the whole electorate. Who is to say who those electors shall be? Is it for this Parliament to determine, or should we leave it to the Province of Quebec or to the representatives of that Province to determine? theory that we are self-governed.

Mr. McCALLUM. Quebec is represented in this House.

Mr. MILLS. But it may be voted down.

Mr. McCALLUM. We shall see.

Mr. MILLS. This Parliament may, under the present Bill, decide upon an elective franchise to which the people of the Province are opposed. In regard to Prince Edward Island the Bill proposed is one which its representatives do not approve. An hon member from the island has asked that the island be exempted from the operation of that franchise. What does that mean? Does it not mean that by this Bill the island will not be allowed to determine who within it, shall exercise the electoral franchise. This matter ought to be left where it now is. Some hon, gentlemen have attacked the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) because he alluded to the constitution of the United States in this particular. Those hon, gentlemen forget that some six or seven years ago they had very great admiration for the Congress of the United States. They ridiculed the political economy of Gladstone, Bright, Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote, and appealed to General Butler and other eminent lights in the Congress of the United States. Whenever the question of the tariff is before this Henry them. ever the question of the tariff is before this House, they appeal to the extraordinary wisdom and sagacity of the men of superior information who represent the United States in Congress. But when we undertake to make any illustrations from the Constitution of the United States, they at once accuse the hon. member of American proclivities. The people of the United States were at one time colonists of Great Britain. They stood in relation to the mother country in much the same position as we stand at this moment. They became independent. The powers which the Imperial Government itself had exercised passed, by the fortunes of war, to the Congress of the United States. And the States were left in possession of the powers which belonged to the provincial establishments; and in the adopting of that constitution they provided that:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures."

But with regard to the times and places of elections they make the following provisions:

"The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now the time and place is under the control of Congress. It is left to the State Legislatures, subject to the supervision of Congress. Congress may interfere, but with regard to the qualifications of the voters, Congress has no power to make a different rule. Now, our constitution is not the same as the United States

What statesman of England does not carefully study the system of government existing elswhere—does not watch the operation of the various measures adopted in other countries? He would be unworthy the name of statesman who would fail to profit by the experience of others, and we would be unworthy of the name of statesmen in this country, if we refused to profit by the experience of the great and powerful neighbor that exists beside us. In some Our whole system of Government is thus based upon the respects our constitution resembles theirs, and to that extent it is our business and our duty to carefully observe the working of their institutions, and profit by them to the utmost extent possible. We find, Sir, that our whole system is based on the ground of Provincial representation. Take the representation in the Senate. It is true, the Crown has the appointment of the Senators, but the number to be appointed from the different Provinces is limited and prescribed. The Maritime Provinces, which are spoken of as one great division, have twenty-four Senators; Quebec, the second great division, has twenty-four; and Ontario, the third great division, is represented by the same number. So we find that this federal feature of our constitution is preserved, the autonomy of the Provinces is kept in view, not merely for Provincial purposes, but for Provincial representation in both branches of Parliament. Mr. Chairman, if you look at the clause before the committee, you will see that it provides certain qualifications for electors in towns and cities. Now, where do you go to find what a town or a city is? Why, Sir, to the law giving a charter to the town or city, and passed by the Provincial Legislature. In one Province a town may be 1,000 inhabitants, and in another it may be 5,000, so that the qualifications of electors in two places, both of which are called towns, and two places containg different populations, may be wholly different. And therefore, the hon. gentleman has not even in this Bill taken it out from the provincial influence, and given it a purely Dominion character. If we look at the Manitoba Act of 1870, we find there a Provincial Franchise and a franchise for the Dominion, proposed by the leader of the Government. Was that the franchise existing in any other Province of the Dominion? Not at all. He could not give such a franchise to Manitoba. He admitted that the circumstances of the population were different, and, that being the case, he was compelled to adopt a different franchise. He could not say that the electors should be on the assessor's roll for a certain sum, because there was no assessor's roll. He could not say that the property should be of a certain value, because the property was of compara ively little value. He was compelled to adopt wholly different qualifications, and if representation were given to the territories to-morrow, hon. gentlemen on that side of the House know right well that he could not apply to the territorial divisions of the North-West the franchise which the hon. gentleman is adopting in this Bill, to apply to the different Provinces of the Dominion. Sir, the hon, gentleman has undertaken to adopt the principle of uniformity, but to my mind that is rather a pretext than a reason for this Bill. I do not apprehend that the hon. gentleman is so much of a doctrinaire, so much of a theorist, that he would be prepared to create great inconvenience and expense to this country, merely for the purpose of adopting the same franchise in the different Provinces of the Dominion. The hon, gentleman has always taken a much more practical view of politics, and if we wish to know the constitution in that particular, but we have practically by an Act of this Parliament adopted the same rule, and we have undertaken to give effect in practice to exactly the same principles as are there laid down. An experience of one hundred years and upwards we had a legislative union. We know that union was been shown the midden of the course than adopted the size of the course the size of the size of the c has shown the wisdom of the course they adopted there, given a single Government; that the intention was to adopt and an experience of eighteen years has shown the wisdom uniform laws for the United Province of Canada. But what of the course we have adopted. Sir, we have a right to was the result in practice? Practically you had a double profit by the experience of others. British statesmen do Government. You had an Attorney General for Lower Canada and another for Upper Canada; you had a Solicitor General for Lower Canada and another for Upper Canada —a double set of officers, each responsible to its own Province. You adopted the theory, and you carried resolutions through the Legislature adopting the principle, of double majority, but the differences did not end there. You have but to look at the great volumes of the Consolidated Statutes of old Canada to see that you had one volume of consolidated laws operating over the entire Province equally, another large volume operating only in the Province of Lower Canada, and another equally large operating exclusively in the Province of Upper Canada. This shows that the experience from 1841 to 1866 proved conclusively that you could not establish in ordinary legislation the principle of uniformity. How, then, are you going to adopt and work satisfactorily the principle of uniformity for general elections? There is only one ground of uniformity that can be taken, and that is manhood suffrage. The moment you go away from that you under take to base the qualifications on something which is not under the control of this Government. Real property you do not control-how much shall be held, in whom it shall be invested, what shall be the interest of tenant and what the interest of occupant—all these questions upon which you base the right of the franchise is not under your control, but in the control of another Government. Why, Sir, it is preposterous to establish a franchise of our own, independently of the Provinces, and to undertake to base that franchise on property which is wholly under the control of the Provinces. If we want to deal logically and consistently with this question, there is but one basis, and that is manhood suffrage. The hon. gentleman has one class of voters whose property he does control, that is the Indians. He will not allow them to hold their property, he says they are incapable of managing or controlling it; and yet he proposes to enfranchise this class whose property he controls and he will not allow them to hold the property by which they are to be qualified. Sir, this principle of uniformity, for which the hon. gentleman contends, and which he makes the pretext for proposing a measure in the interest of his party, is one that has led to arbitrary government wherever it has been adopted. The principle of uniformity is a principle that is inconsistent with free institutions. We have only to look at France after the revolution of 1798. What was the ideal that all her statemen had in view, whether they belonged to the Girondists or to the more radical republicans? They were all worshippers of uniformity, all advocates of symmetry; and what was the result there? The result was that the revolution, like Saturn, devoured its own children. They carried but that principle until they separated the Church from the State and eliminated religion from the universe. Those attempts at symmetry led to arbitrary government, and to the overturning of those principles with which the advocates of the revolution themselves started out. What the hon, gentleman proposes here, is not to advance Parliamentary Government, but to restrain it. He proposes not to increase the liberties of the people—not to increase the free action of the people in political matters—but a measure for the purpose of controlling their action. I listened to the Conservative views expressed by the hon, member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) and the hon member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont). I do not agree with them as to the extent to which the franchise might be safely entrusted to the people of this country; but, Sir, I admire their consistency, and the enlightened sentiments which they expressed. Those hon. gentlemen are ardent lovers of liberty. If they oppose the extension of the franchise in their own Province, if they were afraid to extend that franchise to the extent of manhood suffrage, it was because they were more anxious to subserve substantial freedom than they were to adopt an ideal of Mr. MILLS.

absolute perfectibility and absolute uniformity. Sir, I have no doubt that the great majority of the representatives from the Province of Quebec in this House entertain the same views, and it is greatly to be regretted that these hon. gentlemen have not the courage of their convictions. It is greatly to be regretted that those gentlemen who hold to the federal principle and are anxious for its maintenance—anxious for the rights of the Provinces and for the continuance of the control the people have over the representation of this country-do not act in accordance with their convictions and cordially support the propositions of hon, gentlemen on this side of the House. So far as I have been able to gather, during the past two years in this House, the great majority of those who support the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Secretary of State agree with us in our views of the constitution and in our policy with regard to it, and sympathise with us on those questions of constitutional law which have arisen between the hon. First Minister and the Opposition in this House. Holding those views, and entertaining those sympathies which they do with us, it is a misfortune for this country that these hon, gentlemen do not act with us and support us. I cannot but regard every other question as a question of minor importance—as a question of indifference—compared with the important constitutional questions which the hon. First Minister has put in issue during the past few years. The hon. First Minister has made war upon the Government of the Provinces; he has sought to destroy their influence and their autonomy; he has sought to put an end to Parliamentary Government in the Provinces; he has done this deliberately; he has declared over and over again that he is in favor of legislative union, and opposed to the principle on which our constitution is based. Does the hon, gentleman dony that?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order in discussing that question on this amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I am discussing the amendment of my hon. friend, I am pointing out why the amendment should be adopted. I say this measure is an attack on the federal system of the Government—the most serious attack that has yet been made. The hon. gentleman attacked that system when he disallowed the Streams Bill, and when he opposed the Controverted Elections Act of 1874, and the Privy Council said he was wrong. The hon. gentleman attacked that principle when he proposed the Licence Bill, and he is attacking it in proposing this Franchise Bill; and I tell my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec that this is a life and death struggle in upholding this constitution. I tell them that the hon. gentleman is making war upon the vital principle of this constitution. I tell them that if the hon. gentleman succeeds, unless the public opinion of this country politically destroys him, he will have destroyed the constitution.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. MILLS. No, the hon. gentleman must not cry carried. The Honorable First Minister has forced this question into committee before we had an opportunity of discussing the principles of the Bill on its second reading, and he must expect that these principles will be discussed in the committee on the details. We are fighting here, Sir, for Parliamentary Government, we are resisting the hon. gentleman's attempt to introduce the South American system of Government in preference to the English system of Parliamentary Government. That is the issue between us, and it is a question of whether the hon. gentleman shall succeed in introducing such a system as Santa Anna introduced into Mexico, or whether we shall retain the system we have. The question is a serious one, and let hon. gentlemen not under-estimate its importance. Let me call the attention of the House to an observation made by a great thinker and public man of the United States upon the system of free government. I hold in my hands an essay on free institutions and Government by Senator Calhoun. I do not subscribe to his views as to State rights; I think they are altogether erroneous; but he has been pronounced by Mr. Mill, the greatest political thinker that the United States has produced, and his views on this subject are of great importance and well worthy of the serious consideration of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House; because the question we have now before us, is whether we are to continue our system of Parliamentary Government, or whether the majority in the House, for the time being, is to take control of the constitution and to so alter and amend it as to perpetuate themselves in office. Hon. gentlemen will remember, in the history of England, that after the death of Anne, when the house of Brunswick came to the throne, a Parliament that was elected for three years, changed the law and continued its existence for seven years. No one has ever undertaken to defend that measure upon any other ground than this, that it was a measure of extreme State necessity, forced upon the Government and Parliament for the time being by the intrigues of traitors and revolutionists. The hon, gentleman is proposing here a change in our constitution, without the sanction of the people, not less radical and far more dangerous than that which was proposed by Sir Robert Walpole at the period to which I referred. He is doing this in the interest of the party; he is doing this because it is possible—may I go farther and say, because it is highly probable—that the current of public opinion is running strongly in a direction contrary to his wishes, and this measure is for the purpose, not of securing uniformity

--that is the pretext—but for the purpose of securing the hon, gentleman in his position of First Minister of Canada. Now, let me call the attention of the House to the views of Mr. Calhoun, to whom I referred a short time ago. He savs:

"A broader position may, indeed be taken, viz.: That there is a tendency, in constitutional Governments of every form, to degenerate into their respective absolute forms; and, in all absolute Governments, into that of the monarchical form. But the tendency is much stronger in constitutional governments of the democratic form to degenerate into their respective absolute forms, than in either of the others; because, among other reasons, the distinction between the constitutional and absolute forms of our aristocratical and monarchical Governments, is far more strongly marked than in democratic Governments. The effect of this is, to make the different orders or classes in an aristocracy, or monarchy, far more jealous and watchful of encroachment on their respective rights; and more resolute and persevering in resisting attempts to concentrate powers in any one class or order. On the contract, the line between the two forms, in popular Governments, is so imperfectly understood, that honest and sincere friends of the constitutional form not unfrequently, instead of jealously watching and arresting their tendency to degenerate into their absolute forms, not only regard it with approbation, but employ all their powers to add to its strength and to increase its impetus, in the vain hope of making the Government more perfect and popular. The numerical majority, perhaps, should usually be one of the elements of a constitutional democracy; but to make it the sole element, in order to perfect the constitution and make the Government more popular is one of the greatest and most fatal of political errors."

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. MILLS. When the House rose, I was referring to the views of a distinguished statesman on the subject of the comparative merits as a means of promoting human liberty and human progress of the federal and consolidated forms of Government. I shall read an extract from a speech from the same writer, on the same subject. He says:

"In reviewing the ground over which I have passed, it will be apparent that the question in controversy involves that most deeply important of all political questions, whether ours is a federal or a consolidated Government—a question, on the decision of which depends, as I solemnly believe, the liberty of the people, their happiness, and the place which we are destined to hold in the moral and intellectual scale of nations.

Never was there a controversy in which more important consequences were involved; not excepting Persia and Greece—decided by the battles of Marathon, Platea and Salamis—which gave ascendancy to the genius of Europe over that of Asia, and which, in its consequences, has continued to effect the destiny of so large a portion of the world even to this day. There are often close analogies between events, apparently very remote, which are strikingly illustrated in this case. In the great contest between Greece and Persia, between European and Asiatic policy and civilisation, the very question between the federal and consolidated form of Government was involved. The Asiatic Governments, from the remotest time, with some exceptions on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, have been based on the principle of consolidation, which considers the whole community at but a unit, and consolidates its powers in a central point. The opposite principle has prevailed in Europe—Greece, throughout all her States, was based on a federal system. All were united in one common but loose bond, and the Governments of the several States partook, for the most part, of a conflex organisation, which distributed political powers among different members of the community. The same principles prevailed in ancient Italy; and, if we turn to the Teutonic race, our great ancestors, the race which occupies the first place in power, civilisation and science, and which possesses the largest and fairest part of Europe—we will find that their Governments were based upon federal organisation, as has been clearly illustrated by a recent and able writer on the British constitution (Mr. Palgrave) from whose works I take the following extracts."

Mr. Calhoun then reads from the able work of Mr. Palgrave the following extract:—

"In this manner the first establishment of the Teutonic States was effected. There were assemblies of septs, clans and tribes; they were confederated hosts and armies, led on by princes, magistrates and chieftains; each of whom was originally independent, and each of whom lost a portion of his pristine independence in proportion as he and his compeers became united under the supremacy of a sovereign, who was superinduced upon the State, first as a military commander, and afterwards as a king. Yet, notwithstanding his political connection, each member of the State continued to retain a considerable portion of the rights of sovereignty. Every ancient Teutonic monarchy must be considered as a federation; it is not a unit, of which the smaller bodies politic therein contained are the fractions, but they are integers, and the State is the multiple which results from them. Dukedoms and counties, burghs and baronies, towns and townships, and shires, form the kingdom; all, in a certain degree, strangers to each other, and separate in jurisdiction though all obedient to the supreme executive authority. This general description, though not always strictly applicable in terms, is always so substantially and in effect; and hence it becomes necessary to discard the language which has been very generally employed in treating of the English constitution. It has been supposed that the kingdom was reduced into a regular and gradual subordination of Government, and that the various legal districts of which it is composed, arose from the divisions and sub-divisions of the country. But this hypothesis, which tends greatly to perplex our history, cannot be supported by fact; and, instead of viewing the constitution as a whole, and then proceeding to its parts, we must examine it systematically, and assume that the supreme authorities of the State were created by the concentration of the powers originally belonging to the members and corporations of which it is composed."

It will be seen from this statement that the English Government itself had certain federal features, and anyone who has carefully studied the growth of British institutions and the British constitution knows that the practice of treating all the great documents of the constitution as not within the control of Parliament, as not subject to be altered or abolished by Parliament, has been uniform, and they are as much regarded as above the ordinary action of Parliament as our Federal Act is recognised as being above the action of this Parliament. It is because of this fact that the English Parliament has been careful not to alter the constitution without popular sanction. It has been dealt with in a way wholly different from that which has been adopted in regard to ordinary legislation, and it is in recognition of this principle that I have contended here to-day that a measure like this, altering our institutions, altering the basis upon which representation in Parliament rests, ought not to be undertaken, ought not to be dealt with without popular sanction. I have said before in this debate that the representative system of Government is in a great degree a system of forbearance. It is never the course of a Government acting upon sound constitutional principles to press their power to the utmost. They have always exercised towards the Opposition a very great degree of forbearance. The recent Representation Bill in the House of Commons in England, although it was carried through the House of Commons not only by a large majority but without any dissent, was rejected in the House of Lords, although it was well known that the country was decidedly in its favor, although this was so much felt to be the case, that no one ventured to oppose it. Even men like Lord Randolph Churchill and Sir Stafford Northcote, who, months before, had expressed themselves in opposition to the extension of the franchise in counties, after the second reading had been defeated in the House of Lords, declared that they were in favor of the extension of the franchise, but said the Bill was not only to be used for the extension of the franchise but for the purpose of altering the constituencies and unduly increasing the strength of the Liberal party, and as a matter of protection and in order to protect the rights of their party, and for no other purpose, the House of Lords exercised its power and defeated the second reading of the Bill. What was done by the Government? The Government had an overwhelming majority in the House and in the country in their favor. Public indignation was excited to such an extent, that it was only necessary for Mr. Gladstone to have said that he would insist upon an alteration of the constitution of the House of Lords, and the whole country would have followed him.

Mr. McNEILL. No.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. MILLS. One hon. gentleman says no. I think he is the only one in this country who would say no. Anyone who knows the course of English public affairs knows that that is true.

Mr. McNEILL. No, certainly not.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I differ with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McNEILL. I differ with you.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman can express his opinion when he comes to make his speech; he will allow me now to state my view. I say that public opinion in England would have sustained Mr. Gladstone if he had taken a position antagonistic to the House of Lords.

Mr. BOWELL. It would have done nothing of the

Mr. MILLS. Did he do so. No, he agreed to a conference with Lord Salisbury, and they agreed; so that the plan of redistribution became a matter of treaty or compact between the leaders of the two parties, the one having an overwhelming majority in the House of Commons so great that there was no division when that Bill was read the third time, and yet Mr. Gladstone agreed with Lord Salisbury as to the plan upon which the seats in Parliament should be distributed. That was a matter of compact or arrangement. Why? Because it was felt that it would not be proper for the Government to use to the utmost the power they possessed in order, as Lord Salisbury expressed the opinion, to increase the strength of the Liberal party in the House to an extent beyond that to which it would be properly entitled in proportion to its strength in the country. An agreement was come to between the leaders of the two parties, and an assurance was given that the power of the majority would not be abused for the purpose of promoting the interest of that party against the minority. Has the hon, gentleman given any such assurance here? We say that the object of this measure is to unduly increase the strength of the Tory party in Parliament, and to take out of the hands of the people that control which they have over the voters' lists and put it into the hands of the majority. It is not representation in regard to the strength of parties, but a representation by which the Tory party is to have a majority in this House, whether it is supported by a majority of the voters in the country or not. There is a violation of every principle of Parliamentary Government in the measure now before us, and what assurance have we that this will not be abused most seriously, not only by carrying the Indian is the use standing there and talking in that manner?

clause but by the character of the men who are to be appointed revising barristers? Has the leader of the Government approached the leader of the Opposition as Mr. Gladstone approached Lord Salisbury? It is true, the measure has not been defeated in the Senate, because the Government has a majority in both Houses, but Mr. Gladstone was supported by the nation.

Mr. McNEILL. No.

Mr. MILLS. The nation was overwhelmingly in favor of Mr. Gladstone's Bill, so much so that Lord Salisbury declared himself in favor of the extension of the franchise which twelve months before he was opposed to. We are exercising our rights here as the House of Lords did in England. Our rights are as much secured to us as the rights of a second chamber under the constitution itself, and the hon, gentleman knows that we have not abused the power which we possessed and which is our constitutional right. We have confined ourselves to a strict discussion of this question. We have pointed out its objectionable features and have sought to point them out to the country, and how are we met by the press of hon, gentlemen opposite? The organ of the Minister of Customs himself has not ventured to state the facts in regard to this

Mr. BOWELL. What paper? I did not know that I had an organ.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is reputed to have one.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not occupy the position towards any journal that you do towards the London Advertiser.

Mr. MILLS. It is well known that the hon. gentleman, for many years while a member of this House, was connected with the Belleville Intelligencer.

Mr. BOWELL. No, Sir, I was not.

Mr. MILLS. Was either the editor or controlled the

Mr. BOWELL. Neither the one nor the other. There is just as much truth in the assertion you have made now with reference to my connection with the Belleville Intelligencer, as there is in nineteen-twentieths of what you have said in the three hours' speech you have been making.

Mr. MILLS. Well, then, even if that be so, there is no doubt whatever with regard to the hon, gentleman's position on that paper.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, if you are to be judge of what constitutes the truth.

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that the hon. gentleman had a present connection with the paper, that he was now controlling it; I said that the hon gentleman, when he came into this House, and for a long time afterwards, was the editor of that paper—at all events, he was reputed to be so; and when that paper was receiving advertisements from the Government, we know the hon. gentleman's seat was vacated, and we know his leader stated that he had vacated his seat under the Independence of Parliament

Mr. BOWELL. I challenged you and your party to contest it, and you did not dare do it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman, then, challenged his

Mr. BOWELL. I had nothing to do with the leader.

Mr. MILLS. No, he had not; but the leader did have something to say with regard to the report.

Mr. BOWELL. No; these  $62\frac{1}{4}$  cents I received was while you were in power. You know it very well, and what

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman received $600. I look at the Toronto Mail, and what does it say? It says that Mr. Laird, when Minister of the Interior, that I, with other members of the Government, supported the enfranchisement of the Indians. Well, Sir, we did favor the enfranchisement of the Indians, but we did not favor giving them votes; yet that is the impression the newspaper seeks to make upon the public mind. It conceals the fact that the enfranchisement proposed was giving the Indian the right of citizenship, and the power to make contracts for himself. It was to give him the rights of one who had obtained his majority, instead of one who was in the position of a minor. I find exactly the same representation in the Hamitton Spectator and the London Free Press. Now, if these gentlemen had a good cause, would it be necessary to misrepresent the issue between the parties in this House? And, yet, that is precisely what is done in every Tory paper that I have examined in the Province of Ontario. The only Conservative paper published in English, where a different view is presented, that has yet come under my notice, is the Montreal Gazette, where, I think it was one Friday, an article was published which fairly represents the issue between the parties. But not in any other Tory paper that I have seen is this the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has not the Herald done it?

Mr. MILLS. I thought the hon, gentleman claimed to be Independent. My impression was that the Montreal Herald claimed to stand evenly between the parties.

Mr. MITCHELL. So it does, but with a strong leaning to Conservatism, I am afraid.

Mr. MILLS. 1 think there is a strong leaning that way, and that the bias is so great, I would hardly be willing to accept the Herald as independent, and as holding the balance evenly between the Opposition and the Government. Now, the hon member for Kings, Nova Scotia, (Mr. Foster), in discussing the question of a uniform franchise said: have we no federal rights? And he declared that provincial rights, so called, were a hydra-headed monster, that it was a disintegrating principle, that would lead to the destruction of our union if it were at all recognised. Now, I do not admit that contention at all; on the contrary, I hold that the chief element of strength in the union is the autonomy of Provinces, and the extent to which the federal principle is recognised. We had a legislative union between Upper and Lower Canada, and everyone conversant with the history of that union, knows the results. Instead of binding the Provinces more strongly together, they grew more and more antagonistic to each other. The majority of one Province was arrayed against the majority of the other, and it was only by Confederation that we escaped dissolution by revolutionary means. The hon. gentleman said the Opposition were wrong in referring to the provision of the American constitution, in which the State franchise is adopted for congressional representation. The hon. gentleman said the adoption of that franchise was under circumstances wholly different from those which prevail under our system of Government; and that, under the American system, this provision of the franchise is embraced in the State constitutions. Sir, that is not the case. There was not a State constitution that had this principle embraced within it at the time the federal constitution was adopted. The State constitutions were charters that the Provinces had received from the Crown. They had power to fix the franchise by legislative Act. It was an Act within the competence of the State Legislature, when this provision of the constitution was adopted. It was a reasonable provision, based upon the fact that the local ciracted upon during the eighteen years that our union has been in existence. The hon, gentleman said we were advocates of State rights. Sir, we are not advocates of State rights in the sense in which that expression was used by the old Democratic party. We are simply contending that, under the constitution, each Province has its rights that ought not to be interfered with by this Government, and that the people of each Province, under this provision of the constitution relating to representation in Parliament, should be allowed to decide for themselves who shall possess, within their limits, the electoral franchise. The Secretary of State said, in reference to this question:

"Is it worthy of our Parliament, is it according to the dignity, which this Parliament should possess, to allow the smallest Legislature of the smallest Province, not only to dictate, but to judge at its will and sole caprice, so as to give direction to the general politics of the country by its representation in the general Pacliament."

Now I say it is not beneath the dignity of this Parliament that that should be done. Who is to determine the electoral franchise? I say that primarily it ought to be determined by those who possess the franchise at an election, whether it be for members of the Local Legislature or of this House, before any change is made in the franchise, because the opinion of all the people at a general election should be taken; whether that opinion is expressed in the Legislature or in this House, it is the opinion of the people of that Province. When you propose a general franchise, you propose to take from the Province the absolute power to decide who shall be entrusted with the electoral franchise within its limits, and you put it under the control of a majority of this House. The whole representative body of Prince Edward Island may favor manhood suffrage, and if it is introduced here it may be voted down. Now, are not they the best judges of who, in that Province, shall exercise the electoral franchise? I say they are. I say it is the people who are represented in the local legislature who are best qualified to make a wise choice. The same thing may be said of every other Province. I do not know what the people of Quebec require; I am not acquainted with the circumstances of the population, but I say they are the best judges of what is necessary to qualify, in their Province, for the exercise of the electoral franchise. If you bring the question here, you take it out of the control of the sixty-five representatives of Quebec, and you put it under the control of the 210 members of this House. Every representative of Quebec might vote for one franchise, and might fail to obtain it against the will of the majority here. I say, therefore, it is right and proper that the question as to who shall exercise the electoral franchise in Quebec should be left to the people of that Pro vince to determine, in accordance with the spirit and intent of our constitutional system. And the same thing is true of every other Province of the Dominion, and it is neither wise nor proper, nor in the public interest to take from the Provinces the power to decide this question. The hon member for West York (Mr. Wallace) said he could not accept Mowat's Act relating to the franchise, and that it would disfranchise at least 500 voters in his own county. I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman has greatly exaggerated the fact. I do not believe it will disfranchise any such number. When the Ontario Government went to the country in 1883 both parties declared themselves in favour of extending the electoral franchise. Both committed themselves to that Why? Because they knew public opinion pointed in that direction. The elections took place, and the Franchise Bill passed through the Legislature as a result of those elections. Did any member propose to restrict the franchise; did the leader of the Opposition take such action? Not at all. He proposed to go further and adopt manhood suffrage, and thereby confer the franchise on a cumstances of the population differed, and that the people of each State knew what franchise was best suited to their circumstances. That is precisely the principle that we have elect members for this Parliament as well as for the Local Legislature. They decided not merely that the present should be the electoral qualification for voters at provincial elections, but also for elections to the House of Commons. They knew what the provision of the law of 1874 was. They knew that an extension of the franchise must extend to the House of Commons as well as to the Local Legislature. The people decided that the extension should take place. With respect to the statement of the hon. member for West York, as to 500 voters being disfranchised in his constituency by the Mowat Bill, I am satisfied that not a dozen voters are disfranchised. The principle of that Bill is that there shall be one vote for one man, and that a man shall vote in the constituency where he resides and nowhere else. Why should a man holding $100,000 worth of property in one constituency have one vote, while a man holding $10,000 worth of property in ten constituencies should have ten votes. If it is not intended to give representation to wealth, then one vote only should be given to one man, or else a vote should be given for so many dollars worth of property. There is no middle principle. Either you have representation of property, as of a banking institution, or you have representation of persons. a man of ability and influence should exercise those qualifications upon other members of the community and not by having additional votes because he happens to possess half a dozen properties in as many constituencies. Under the old law if a man had ten village lots worth $200 each, in 1en different constituencies, he had ten votes; but if he had $100,000 worth of property in one constituency he had only one vote. And yet hon, gentlemen opposite have contended that a law containing such anomalies ought to be perpetuated. There is nothing to prevent an amendment being made to the present Ontario law, retaining that system if it were thought that the principle is a wise one. There has been no necessity shown for the Bill now before the House, neither by the first Minister nor by any hon, gentleman opposite. No one has shown that the present law has worked unsatisfactorily, that any wrong has been done under it, that any class of the community has suffered injustice in consequence of it. The hon gentleman has propounded a measure which is revolutionary in its character, a measure destructive of the principle of Parliamentary Government, a measure which is an act of legislation in the interests of a party and not for the purpose of correcting any defect in our constitutional system. The hon. gentleman first proposed to give certain classes of women votes. He did not, however, undertake to show the necessity of it, or that it was demanded by the women themselves, or as to how many would be enfranchised under it. Take, again, the Indian clause. Here we had a most extraordinary change proposed in our constitutional system, and yet the hon. gentleman did not say a word as to the number of Indians who would be enfranchised, nothing with respect to their intelligence, as to how many could read and write and as to the number who took newspapers. He said nothing to show that those people were demanding the franchise, or that they would be benefited if it were conferred upon them. We know the contrary. It is a proposal to enfranchise a large number of persons who are wards of the State, who are under the hon. gentleman's own personal control, who will be directly influenced by his agents and deputies; and yet there was not a word said to show that those people were demanding the suffrage or that they were qualified to exercise it. All the information which it is usual for a Minister to give under such circumstances was withheld. An attack was made upon the propriety of making property a test of the qualification of a voter; and yet notwithstanding that attack, made for the purpose of defending the pro-Mr. Mills.

possible to support such a Bill without deliberately intending to change our whole constitutional system. It is impossible to regard those who support such a proposition as other than hostile to our present system of parliamentary Government. There is a motto of the Crown, "God and my right," and that is the motto of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in opposing this monstrous proposition. We propose, Sir, to stand up for the higher law. We propose to stand up in this House for that which is right. We propose to defend the rights and liberties of the people of this country against an attempt to overturn them by the provisions of this Bill. We propose to retain to the people of Canada the right to control the elective franchise for themselves, instead of putting it in the hands of a Minister, who is resolved to keep himself in power no matter what may be the views of the people of this country. Sir, I dare say that the hon. gentlemen who represent the Province of Quebec in this House, will remember the story of Francois Hertel, the hero of the Long Sault; how he with eighteen others, held at bay several hundred Indians, who had resolved to exterminate the French race on the St. St. Lawrence. They will remember how that small band of heroes-for they were such, no less than those who fought at Thermopyle—how they held those savages at bay for weeks together, and by the sacrifice of their lives defended the lives and liberties of the people of Quebec. The question of whether there should be a French system or a French race in Canada was decided at the Long Sault by Frangois Hertel and those who manfully fought with him. We are here to day in a fight not less significant. We are here to day in a battle upon which issues quite as important hang. are here to-day seeking to defend the maintenance of British Government in this country, as against the South American system which the hon. gentleman proposes to introduce. We are here to day to decide whether the people of this country shall continue to be governed under the British system, or whether they will put their liberties and rights into the hands of an ambitious Minister, to determine in the future as he may think best. That is the issue. We are here as the guardians of the people's rights and liberties. We are here to do our whole duty and nothing but our duty. We are here to inform the people of this country as to the true character of this measure, and I have no doubt as to the conslusion to which they will come. I do not believe they are ready to take sides with the burglar against the bell-man. I do not believe that those who are being warned of the danger which threatens them are indignant with the watchman who tells them of the danger, rather than with the enemy who is seeking to destroy that which they hold dear. Sir, the hon, gentleman told the House this afternoon that he had no one to complain of among the leaders on this side, except myself—that they had all acted quite fairly and legitimately except me. Well, Sir, I was somewhat at a loss to know what egregious offence I had committed. I had said very little on the Bill. I had discussed the propriety of a postponement, I think for about half an hour; I had discussed the importance of an adjournment at, I think, eight or nine u'clock in the morning. What did the hon. gentleman do? If I offended I am quite ready to justify the act. I have done nothing I regret. I have done nothing of which I am satisfied my constituents or the country will complain. I am here to do my duty and my whole duty, and there is nothing the hon. gentleman can say, whether it be offensive or otherwise, which will hinder me in the smallest degree from discharging those duties which I believe my constituents and the country require at my hand. I am satisfied corruption wins not more than honesty, and I have not the slightest fear whether the hon. gentleman will succeed or fail—and I believe he will fail, because he ought to position to give Indians votes, we find that is the basis of the Bill with respect to all other voters. In my opinion it is imbut little for the malevolence or the threats of hon. gentlemen. I am satisfied the country will sustain us in resisting to the utmost a measure which was properly characterised by the leader on this side as an infamous measure.

Mr. RYKERT. As I understand, Mr. Chairman, there are three propositions before this committee: A proposition by the First Minister that there shall be a certain franchise for cities and towns, an amendment made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that we shall adopt the franchise of the several provinces, and an amendment of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Macdonald), that we shall make an exception in the case of that island, and leave the franchise of that Province as it is at present. As I understand parliamentary practice, it is not usual, when the House is in committee to discuss anything except simply the clause under consideration. But, Sir, that rule has been relaxed to a very great extent on this occasion. I am not sorry for it, because it enables hon, gentlemen opposite to discuss the question as frequently as they like. They have been able to repeat their speeches over and over again, to repeat them worse than in the first place, and yet they are not satisfied,—they still desire to go on and speak, no matter how obstructive they may appear. Now the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) occupied the time of this committee for something like three hours. Two hours and three quarters of that speech were occupied in quoting passages from the Encyclopædia Britannica; a portion in speaking of the history of the United States and its institutions, a large portion devoted to giving us the history of the different franchises in the several States, a large number of extracts from Bancroft and other writers, and a long dissertation about the advantages of universal suffrage, and, Sir, what was left of the speech was a little loud-mouthed ranting against the present Government, and charges against the Administration and their supporters of violating the principles of the constitution and sacrificing the privileges and rights of the people. That is the sum and substance of that speech. In other words, strip off the Yankeeism and nothing whatever is left of it. Now, Sir, the Opposition cannot at all complain of the course we have adopted during this debate. We have allowed those gentlemen to read the speeches they prepared in the Library; we have made no objection to that, although it is contrary to Parliamentary usage. We have allowed hon, gentlemen to read their speeches, to send them in to the reporters, to send copies to their own papers and periodicals to be printed. We have allowed the utmost latitude in this debate. We have allowed them to degrade all Parliamentary rules, by their reckless assertions, by charges which no honorable men should make on the floor of any House of Parliament. We have allowed these hon. gentlemen, I say, the utmost latitude; we have allowed them to discuss this question day after day and night after night for a period of about three weeks; yet they are not satisfied. They say the country has not yet been informed upon the measure, and the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) tells us that they have only entered on the threshhold of this measure, and that they intend to keep it up for a great length of time. Well, Sir, to that we have no objection, so long as they can satisfy the country that they are acting in the right way; but, Sir, I will warn those hon. gentlemen that they must recollect that this debating for a series of three or four weeks upon a question that does not require more than a day or two of discussion on different points, will involve an expenditure of a large amount of money. They must recollect that there have been 350 odd speeches made by forty-nine members of Parliament at a cost to this country of some $60,000 or $70,000 extra. While they complain of the large amount of money to be had been adopted, the consequence would have been that have no doubt he will fail in the country, for our aims are expended in preparing the voters' lists and paying the our country's, our God's and truth of his power, and I care officers to be appointed under this Act, they must officers to be appointed under this Act, they must remember that they are causing, by this useless debate, a cost to the country larger than the preparation of all the voters' lists will cost in the first year. I am one of those who freely admits that the Parliamentary minority have the right to be respected; that they have their rights equally well with the majority in Parliament. We have conceded to them their rights, and have not endeavored to infringe on them; but I must tell these hon. gentlemen that they must conform to the rules of Parliament, to constitutional rules, and allow the majority to govern, so long as that majority expresses the will of the people; and the best proof I can give that we do express the will of the people is, that twice we have had the verdict of the people in our favor. Therefore it must be assumed that the majority in this House fairly represents the feelings of the people; and so long as they do that, according to the usages of constitutional Government, they have a right to have their will obeyed and enforced, so long as they keep within constitutional bounds; and it makes no difference whether we remain here until next December or not, the majority on this side of the House, feeling that they are representing the views of the people from one end of the country to the other, are determined to see this Bill carried, no matter what the consequences to the Opposition may be. Hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House have made appeals to the passions and prejudices of the different classes of electors throughout the country. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) strongly appealed to the Lower Canadians to vote down this Bill, for fear that they might some day have woman suffrage forced upon them, and at the same time we find the hon. gentleman and his friends voting for woman suffrage and endeavoring to force it upon them whether they will or not. That is a specimen of the consistency of these hon, gentlemen. Now, Sir, the principle of this Bill has been admitted on the second reading, and hon. gentlemen opposite have an opportunity to discuss it in all its details. They could, as the right hon. First Minister said this afternoon, offer suggestions to this side of the House, and, if they were found satisfactory, they would receive favourable consideration at his hands. The hon. First Minister has not laid down a cast-iron theory, so far as the different clauses are concerned. The principle of the Bill has been adopted by a large majority of this House, and yet hon. gentlemen stand up night after night and speak on the general principle of it. If they are determined to meet this question fairly and squarely and to discuss the Bill on its merits, there will be no difficulty whatever in the way of their placing their views before the Government, and, no doubt about those views receiving full consideration at the hands of the Government. Those hon, gentlemen have shown their inconsistency all through the debate. They argue in favor of Provincial franchises; they say it is an infringement upon Provincial rights to endeavor to have a uniform franchise in all the Provinces; and while making that statement what do we find them doing? We find them deliberately, for a party purpose, advocating female suffrage when they know it is not recognised by the different Provinces; and I venture to assert that this fight in this Parliament does not come from the several Provinces of the Dominion. The whole fight comes from Ontario; there is hardly a speaker who is not an Ontario member; and these gentlemen seem determined, whether this House desires it or not, that the franchise adopted in Ontario shall be the franchise for the Dominion Parliament in the Province of Ontario. But see how inconsistent they are; while they ask us to adopt a provincial franchise for Ontario which does not recognise female suffrage, they stand up in this Legislature and argue for 48 hours that we should have female suffrage. If they had carried that resolution the other night and female suffrage

we should have been compelled to have our voters' lists different from the Provincial voters' lists; and yet they tell us that they desire to have provincial franchises adopted by this Legislature. But, says the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), we are prepared to accept the franchise as it now exists in Ontario, no matter how it may be changed in the future. Is that a correct principle? you once adopt the provincial franchises, and recognize the principle that the Local Legislatures have the right to fix the franchises, then we must accept, from time to time, whatever franchises they choose to adopt. But these hon. gentlemen say, we will will meet you half way; adopt the franchise that now exists, no matter what it will be in the future. Well, Sir, we have the past record of these hon. gentlemen. We can see exactly what course they pursued in 1874. While they were strong advocates of provincial rights, they were willing then to interfere with the franchise of Prince Edward Island. I recollect well what a cry there was in this Legislature at that time, and how the Hon. Mr. Laird was abused for introducing a clause in the Bill then, before the House, by which a number of people in Prince Edward Island should be disfranchised. They were willing then to accept the franchise which was the basis of the election of members for the Upper House in Prince Edward Island, and at the same time to force on the other Provinces their provincial franchises. Another very important feature of this debate, which shows the inconsistency of hon, gentlemen opposite, is the manner in which they advocated manhood suffrage. There is hardly a gentleman from Ontario, who has spoken in this debate, who has not spoken in favor of manhood suffrage. If they are sincere in that, knowing that their own party in the Provincial Legislature refused manhood suffrage, how is it possible to adopt the provincial franchise, and to have man-hood suffrage for this Parliament? That shows exactly how consistent these hon, gentlemen are, and how desirous they are to protect provincial interests. But we know that these hon, gentlemen have a record so far as the provincial franchise is concerned. I recollect that the leader of the Opposition, when making his famous Aurora speech, declared in favor of compulsory voting. He has never still protests that we have not the power. It is just relinquished that view; and this shows distinctly, if we place ourselves at the mercy of Ontario, what we shall be brought to. Within the last few days, we find the Globe, the organ of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, advocating the same thing. We find in the paper of the 10th this statement:

as a stigma for neglect of duty unless one of several recognised pleas of justification is at the proper time entered. This should be done for the purpose of emphasising the idea that in a self governing country it is a duty to vote." "The names of the voters who had failed to vote should be struck off

That is one of those other views of the organ and of the party, and those views are in accord with the views of the leader of the Opposition which were dealt with so unmercifully by the same organ in 1874; but, as I say, if we adopt the provincial franchises, we must subject ourselves to those periodical changes which will be made according to the whims and impulses of gentlemen on the other side. We have had on this occasion as on former ones, hon. gentlemen of the Opposition prophecying what will be the result if this measure be passed. The hon. member for Queen's P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), who usually is good tempered and shows a considerable amount of good feeling towards members of this side, waxed wroth and warned us, if we pass ed this Bill, what the consequences would be. I wondered whether it was the warning that he received a short time ago from his own county that made him so angry; I wondered whether the recent return of my hon, friend (Mr. Jenkins) from Queen's County, P.E.I., by a large majority, was the reason why he treated us to so much abuse, and prophesied we were going to be defeated. No doubt the hon. He admits in one breath that we have the right, while sied we were going to be defeated. No doubt the hon. Mr. RYKERT.

gentleman feels somewhat chagrined at the position he occupies, and some excuse may be made for his uttering these prophesies. But he is not the only prophet; the poet of that party, the hon. gentleman who lately received his seat by the grace of Mr. Mowat, I mean the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), although on the female franchise question he did not know where he stood, although after speaking two hours on this question, he could not make up his mind what position he would take, but said he wanted first to see how the feeling was on this side,—he also indulged in prophecy couched in the following language:

"I do not believe any hon. gentlemen can go back and face their constituents successfully after doing that. I believe that the indignation of the constituents who will be left out, will be so great that the member will suffer the consequence of the Act."

If that be so, what is the use of all this debate? Why not allow the verdict to go by default? Why not allow the Bill to pass, if we are to be condemned by the electors at the polls? But hon, gentlemen opposite know better. They know right well that we are acting in the interests of the people, that we are not betraying their trust; and that, as in 1879 and in 1882, the verdict will again be granted in our favour should we go to the polls. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) said:

"I warn them they will be brought face to face with the people whose rights they are surrendering and violating."

We have also prophetic utterances from the organ of the party on the 6th of May, when it said:

"Let the Franchise Bill pass, with its Indian voters' clause and its lawyer-made voters' clause, and the Tory conspirators will soon learn that Canada is too hot a place for them."

Why not let the Bill pass if we are going to be condemned at the polls? Why not let the condemnation come? Let the Bill pass with all its iniquitous revising barristers and Indian clauses. But, no; they know better. Hon gentlemen opposite have repeatedly declared in their speeches, that we are invading provincial rights by passing this Act. Three or four of the gentlemen who have last spoken have declared that we have the power to pass this Act, while the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) as well to place upon record what is the law on that subject, as determined by the founders of our constitution, to show how inconsistent these gentlemen are in their speeches, to show how various are the views they have expressed in Parliament upon that question, in order that the electors may see exactly the position we occupy in this country. The hon, member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who no doubt is a high constitutional authority, and who can talk as much and say as little as any person in or out of Parliament, declared boldly that we have not the power to pass this Bill. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) says he thinks we have a technical right to pass the Bill, but he believes we have no right to infringe on the rights of the Provinces. In his speech he made this observa-

"Hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is the right of this Parliament to pass this measure. No one on this side of the House has denied that Parliament possesses the legal and technical right."

And yet the hon, gentleman goes on to say we are infringing upon provincial rights. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) says :

"No one has contended that it is not within the power of this Government to enact such a law. No, no one has disputed it. It must be admitted by everyone that it is within the power of every Parliament to regulate the franchise to elect members to that Parliament."

Then he goes on to say:

"We contend that it is not within the spirit of the constitution to have two separate bodies of electors, one for the Provinces and one for the Dominion."

tional authority, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), seems to have made up his mind positively on the question, and his decided opinion is that we have not the power. He said:

"I believe that the power of regulating the franchise is rightly vested in the Province. I believe that the people in their Local Legislature are the parties who have the right to regulate the franchise, and that is one of their civil rights which may fairly be said to be under the control of the Local Legislature."

There we have the different opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will, therefore, in order to set the matter at rest, place upon record the views of one of the founders of our constitution, a gentleman whose opinions are recognised by hon, gentlemen opposite as undoubted authority, a gentleman who on constitutional questions was looked upon as a very high authority. I refer to the Hon. George Brown. His opinion will settle the question, I believe, so far as this debate is concerned. I hope these legal luminaries who are so apt to place their views on record before the House on legal questions will see, so far as this Bill is concerned, that we have the right to pass it, whether there be necessity for it or not. The Hon. George Brown said:

"It has also been objected that though the resolutions provided that existing Parliaments of Canada shall establish the electoral divisions for the first organization of the Federal Parliament, they do not determine in whose hands the duty of distributing any additional members is to be voted. No doubt on this head need exist. The Federal Parliament will, of course, have power to regulate all arrangements for the election of its new members."

So that those who knew best what the Act really meant declared that this Parliament has the right to regulate its own franchise. Then we find that, in regard to a measure affecting the franchise which was introduced in 1869, the organ of the party used this language, showing that the Reform party was of opinion that the Dominion franchise should be settled by this Parliament and that we should not be dependent on the uncertain franchises of the Provinces.

"The Provinces moreover are constantly altering their assessment laws and it would hardly do to pass a new election law for the Dominion every time the mode of assessment changes in the Provinces. A way out every time the mode of assessment changes in the Frovinces. A way out of the difficulty might be found in accepting the franchise as adopted (not to be changed) in the different Provinces as the franchise of the Dominion, but that would be at the expense of uniformity. If we intend to avoid the inconsistencies in the United States [how does the honmember for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) like that?] and to have the same conditions confer the Dominion franchise on all parts of the Dominion, we cannot leave the qualification or regulation of voters to the Provinces."

So you will see that, at that time, it was fully understood and conceded that, sooner or later, they must have the franchise fixed and determined by this Parliament. Then we recollect that, when the Bill was introduced in 1870, to regulate the franchise, the leader of the Opposition who spoke long upon that question, who discussed the Bill in all its details, said not a word against this Parliament, fixing its own franchise. Those who were then in Parliament will recollect that a motion was made in 1870 by Mr. Ferguson, seconded by Mr. Drew, that the franchises of the several Provinces should be the franchise recognised by the Dominion. That resolution received no favor at the hands of the The leader of the Opposition did not speak in favor of it, did not recognise it; on the contrary it was lost without a division, or, as we call it, "lost on a division," the House not being divided upon it. Then, on April 22nd, 1874, the leader of the Opposition, speaking upon this subject said:

"He denied that in passing the Bill, Government were abandoning the power of regulating the franchise. The House had not exercised that franchise for many years, and if it turned out that the Province abused that power, the House had the power of taking it into their own hands."

Our justification for passing this Act is that Ontario has abused its powers and has usurped a power which have spoken so much about our violating the provin- at that time. A few nights ago he spoke two or three cial rights, and violating the trust of the people, I propose, though I know it is distasteful to my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), to bring these gentlemen face to face with their own record, and to show that the Reform party in this Province has studiously and systematically, since 1866, opposed the extension of the franchise, opposed the rights of the lower orders, as they call them, opposed the rights of the people, opposed the rights of the poor man, and sought to keep the franchise limited to property, and to keep it as high as possible. I am sorry I am obliged to annoy the hon. member for South Brant, by bringing him face to face with his record, but I cannot help I shall first take the year 1866. In the old Parliament of Canada, an effort was made to reduce the franchise in cities from $600 to $500. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, made a very strong appeal to the House in favor of that reduction, but every leading Reformer in that Parliament voted that the franchise should be kept at $600. But the hon, member was rather tenacious of his opinion. He was a member of the first Conservative Government of the Province of Ontario, and I had the pleasure of supporting him during the whole time he was in that legislature. The very first act he did, in 1868, was to reduce the franchise in cities to $500, in towns to $300, and in villages and townships to $200.

Mr. CARLING. $400 in cities.

Mr. RYKERT. No, $500 first. In 1868, he reduced it in cities to $500; the following year he followed that up by reducing it to $400, $300 and $200; but something very remarkable took place during the course of that debate. An hon, gentleman who then occupied a seat in that House for the County of Welland, who was rather democratic in his views, as these gentlemen then supposed, moved that the franchise be reduced in townships from $200 to $100. One would suppose, after hearing the speech of the leader of the Opposition and the views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question, that the hon. the leader of the Opposition would have voted for that, but we find that he and my genial friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) voted against that proposition as an invasion upon the rights of the people. My hon, friend from South Perth will recollect that very well. Mr. Blake, 1 beg his pardon, the leader of the Opposition, was very indignant at that time. He used this language:

"He thought the member for Victoria (Mr. Cockburn) had let the cat out of the bag. The real difficulty was not that persons were prevented by the election law from voting who ought to vote, but that the system of assessment was defective. People were anxious, on the one hand, to vote, but were anxious, on the other hand, to pay a very small tax. The hon, gentleman said that, in the new townships, they did not care to be assessed at more than $1 per acre; because, in that case, when the county council came to equalise the assessment, injustice would be done them. The result of this feeling was that a nefarious system of sham and mock assessment was carried on in the country. The assessments were ridiculously small—a state of things degrading to the morals of the country. It might be that in a very few cases, in townships and villages, there might be a man intelligent enough to exercise the franchise, who was the owner of a lot and house on which he resided, really worth no more than $200—but this must be a God-forsaken part of the country, and the domicile must be of a peculiar description." "He thought the member for Victoria (Mr. Cockburn) had let the cat country, and the domicile must be of a peculiar description.

That was the opinion of the leader of the Opposition then. He thought it must be a God-forsaken part of the country where the franchise should be reduced lower than $200, and where a man would not have property worth that to vote upon. We find also that my hon. friend from South Perth, on that occasion, made a somewhat short speech, but to the point, as usual. He said:

"He thought the franchise low enough, but particularly in the rura districts.'

That is the way he is reported in his organ of December 4th, 1868. He wanted to keep it up to $200. Then a motion was made in favor of female suffrage, and I would direct it had no right to usurp. Since these gentlemen the attention of the Opposition to the views of their leader hours, and it would take half-a-dozen Philadelphia lawyers to tell how he was going to vote on that question. know how he did vote. He voted by leaving the Chamber. He would not vote on the question of female suffrage. a motion made by Mr. Coyne, then member for Peel, in favor of female suffrage, the present leader of the Opposition

"He hoped the sober sense of the House, of the country and of the fair sex would be arrayed, as he believed it was, against the proposition." Thus, so far as the franchise was concerned, he was not liberal enough to grant it to females or to a man with property only worth $100. Then, on the 4th December, 1868, when the same Bill was under discussion, the leader of the Opposition used this language:

"He thought if hon. gentlemen had acted wisely they would have kept up the franchise in cities to $500. Had they done so we would not have seen hon. gentlemen urging this downward course which this reaction sought."

So you will see that, while to-day they profess to be favorable to granting the franchise to a large body of the electors, they have systematically opposed a reduction of the franchise. I think I can satisfy the House that every reduction of the franchise that has been granted by the Reform party, was at the instance of the Conservative party, and only when the Reform party was driven into the last ditch. Now, Sir, we find that the organ of the party, at that time, had the same view upon this question. On the 27th November, 1868, we find this language:

"If he (Hon. J. S. Macdonald) would take the trouble to enquire as to the practical effect of his $400 real estate franchise in Toronto, where it will include nearly all but the very poorest tenements, he would be able to see that he is entranchising in this city alone, hundreds of persons who are, to say the least, no more worthy to be enfranchised than the class he resolutely excludes."

So that the House will see the organ was not favorable to giving the franchise to even the $400 men. On the 11th December, 1868, it goes on to say:

"If there is any danger of our drifting to universal suffrage, that danger will be enhanced by a persistence in the palpable injustice of enfranchising nearly every householder and rejusing to enfranchise anybody else no matter how worthy or thrifty. There are many persons who do not in the least favor universal suffrage, who still hold that it would, in cities at all events, be no worse than the present franchise."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have seen over and over again, that the Reform party has claimed credit for the introduction of the income franchise. I am not accustomed to boast of what I have done in Parliament, but I assert that the first person who proposed the income franchise was the individual now addressing you. In 1868 I introduced a Bill into the Ontario Legislature, recognising the principle of the income franchise, and declaring at the same time that it should be extended to all university men, so that education should be represented as well as money. That did not meet with the favor of the House. Upon that occasion, in endeavoring to induce the House to accept the more liberal view, I made use of this language, as quoted by the Globe:

"For his own part, he would prefer that this matter be left over until a more comprehensive scheme could be adopted, by means of which not only those enjoying an income should have the right lo vote, but also, that university men and others, who really take an interest in everything affecting the welfare and prosperity of this country should have some voice in choosing their representatives."

The House was not willing to accept the income franchise, and at the instance of the then member for Welland (Mr. Currie) the income franchise was struck out of the Bill. Those gentlemen came into power in December, 1871; they remained in power for a number of years, but they granted no extension of the franchise. In 1874, I introduced into the Ontario Parliament a Bill giving the franchise to men enjoying an income, and that Bill was taken up by the Government and passed just as I introduced it. While hon, gentlemen opposite claim credit for having been in favor of an income franchise, I can show that I was the one who first proposed it in the Local Legislature. Now, that Now, I point this out to show the House that while the Mr. RYKERT.

clause relating to the income franchise was encumbered by a clause requiring the payment of taxes by the 14th day of December. In 1877, Mr. Meredith tried to remove that feature of that franchise. There were hundreds of persons who would like to enjoy the franchise, but were not prepared to pay the taxes, because, at that time in Ontario, as well as at present, any persons having an income under $400 were exempt from taxation; but they could not be placed upon the voters' list unless they were willing to be assessed and pay taxes. In 1877 Mr. Meredith moved that that obnoxious clause should be repealed, but his motion was rejected at the instance of the Mowat Government. In the year 1877 an agitation was got up in the Local Legislature of Ontario to give farmers' sons the franchise. Now, hon, gentlemen opposite claim that they are the champions of the farmer's son franchise. I have before me a quotation from their own organ, denouncing the franchise being extended to farmers' sons, and pointing out that they might just as well give it to the sons of mechanics and merchants as to farmers. On the 8th January, 1877, the organ said:

"If the farmer's son is to have a vote, why not anybody's son? If the farmer's son is to be enfranchised—who remains for convenience under the family roof—why is not the storekeeper's son, or the mechanic's son, or any other son for that matter, who follows the same laudable and political line of conduct to be disfranchised?"

It proceeds:

"And as every male person is the son of somebody, the real point to be decided is, what is there between giving a particular person a vote because he is a farmer's son and giving every male person a vote because he is the son of somebody not a farmer? In other words, what stands between the proposal and what is called, perhaps not very correctly, but popularly, universal suffrage?"

Now, Sir, in order to justify the legislature in not giving the franchise to farmers' sons, the organ quoted from Mr. Bright

"Mr. Bright has always opposed 'fancy franchises' as merely colorable attempts to give manhood suffrage to those who did not dare to advocate it openly and honestly. Pretty hard that,"

Now you will see that the farmer's sons franchise when first proposed in Ontario, was strongly opposed by the party organ. I have several articles before me in which it takes the sameview, one of February, 1877, in which it says:

"But we have never heard yet a sufficient reason given why the farmer's son should be expressly selected for the enjoyment of the privilege while the son of nobody else is to be allowed to share it.

"But it is a bogus qualification nevertheless, a mere blind to hide manhood suffrage from view.
"It would be better to do in a direct manner what is thus sought to be attained in a circumlocutory fashion by this Bill. But then public opinion in this country certainly does not favor manhood suffrage or any departure from the old lines of the constitution."

Then it grew violent and a few days afterwards went on to say:

"We cannot, however, but reiterate that all which has been stated in its favor has not removed one objection to the measure which we have entertained. We still think that it is based on a wrong principle, that it is invidious, and by its very nature, can only be characterised as a piece of class legislation. We have never been able to see, nor has any of the supporters of the measure attempted to show, the reason for one man who is called a farmer, and who is possessed of twenty acres, having accorded to his son who works with him, and who may have the prospect of one day succeeding him, a vote in the election of municipal office-bearers and members of Parliament, while another man with ten cares which with the help of a grown up son he callivates as a market acres, which with the help of a grown up son he cultivates as a market garden, and from which he raises three or four times more produce, should be denied the same privilege or honour, whichever it may be should be denied the same privilege or honour, whichever it may be supposed to be."

"All over Ontario there is a large population of handicraftsmen who are socially, intellectually, and pecuniarily quite equal to the farmers among whom they live, and whose necessities they supply. These men are often, as far as their sons are concerned, exactly in the same position as their neighbours, the farmers. The tailor, the shoemaker, the grocer, the carpenter, and the blacksmith, to mention no others, have often one or more grown-up sons working with them on the same deliberately formed understanding as in the case of the farmers, that these sons shall succeed to the business when their fathers are laid aside either by stekness or death. Everyone who knows anything of the rural life of our country knows that as a class these young mechanics are equal to that class enfranchised by this measure."

organ strongly opposed the farmer's son franchise, it was not favorable to enfranchising any others. I shall show that when we proposed giving a franchise to mechanics' sons they opposed it in the most bitter terms. Now, we find that the Conservative party in the House advocated the suffrage being given to mechanics' and merchants' sons, and the organ delivered itself in this style:

"On what principle, either in the 'British stake in the country' theory or the Democratic idea of human brotherhood and equality, are the merchants, mechanics and others to be regarded as specially entitled to vote? Only in exceptional cases is the young man whose father happens to be a merchant, tradesman, mechanic or professional man a virtual though not finally acknowledged partner in his parent's business, keeping it up for the common benefit of the family, and while there are, doubtless, good reasons for extending the franchise to include many of the young men in cities and towns at present debarred from it, the proposition to make the sons of merchants, mechanics and others a privileged caste, and to endow them with the suffrage by reason of their fathers' vocation, is altogether too absurd and untenable."

Mr. Meredith in January 1883 moved this resolution:

"That this House is of opinion that instice to large and important portions of the community demands a liberal extension of the franchise, particuliarly in the direction of conferring on the sons of mechanics, and others not now entrusted with the tranchise, the same privileges as are now conferred on farmers' sons."

One would suppose that this being a very liberal measure it would have been received with favor by Mr. Mowat. But instead of replying to it himself, he put up Mr. Cascaden, M. P. for West Elgin. He said:

"It was, however, a question in which they should hasten slowly, for once it was extended they could not recede—they could not contract it—however evidently desirable it might be."

So you see that so far as the franchise was concerned, the Reformers steadily opposed it. Recollect, too, that was in the face of a resolution of the Reform convention of Janu. ary, 1883, which declared that there should be a liberal extension of the franchise, and that the people should be consulted upon it. Upon that occasion a number of persons, though not the leading members of the party, discussed the question of the franchise, and two minor members of the party moved and seconded a resolution to this effect:

"That this convention rejoices in the successful operation of these extensions of the franchise, which have from time to time been placed on the Statute Book, records its opinion that a further extension should form a plank in the platform of the Reform Party at the ensuing elections, and expresses its hopes that the popular voice will endorse the proposal and will return a liberal majority, authorized to accomplish this reform."

We see that Mr. Mowat refused to extend the franchise up to that time. In January, 1883, Mr. Meredith moved again to strike out the clause imposing a tax upon income. That was voted down. He moved another motion, to reduce the income franchise from $400 to $300. That was also voted down. But Mr. Mowat, finding that he was acting against the will of the people, knowing that the desire was that the franchise should be extended, on the following day had the following resolution moved by Mr. Fraser:

"That the Liberal party of this Province stands pledged to extend the franchise; that if this House should now legislate to extend the franchise, any law passed for that purpose could not be brought into operation in time for the coming general election; that any corsiderable extension of the franchise is especially a subject upon which the people ought to be consulted; that the approaching general election will afford an opportunity for so consulting and ascertaining the wishes of the people; but the Hause, meanwhile, does not hesitate to affirm its opinion that no such extension of the franchise will prove satisfactory which does not, with proper checks and sateguards, give the right to vote to all classes who can fairly and reasonably claim to be endowed therewith."

That was carried, because he felt that public opinion was with the motion of Mr. Meredith, and although he had voted that motion down, he was compelled to put up Mr. Fraser to move the motion I have read. During the elections of 1883, only once did Mr. Mowat speak about the franchise. When attending a meeting in West Toronto, he said he had no decided views on the subject; Mr. Mere-but he, Mr. Mowat, did not choose to take that position. So up to the general elections, Mr. Mowat had no idea of extending the franchise. Then we find that the Dominion Parliament met upon the 17th January, 1884; the Franchise Bill was promised by the Government in a Speech from the Throne, and the Globe on the 18th January, said:

"It is promised that the Franchise Bill of last Session will be again introduced."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I rise to a point of Order. There is no desire on this side to prevent the hon. gentleman from reading; but I remember that, only the other day, the hon. gentleman quoted parliamentary authorities with a great deal of zeal to prevent an hon. member from reading an extract. During the three-quarters of an hour the hon. gentleman has already spoken, not more than five minutes have been occupied by expressing his own sentiments. I am pleased to hear the extracts; I only wish to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this point.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have not seen the hon. gentleman reading his speech. I noticed that he read one or two extracts.

Mr. RYKERT. The only difference is that I exercised discretion. I know that discretion is not possible with hon. gentlemen opposite. I read from an authority which laid down that, whem members read extracts, discretion must be used. I have felt that I can use discretion, and that while quotations of three or four lines are in order, extracts are not in order when they reach three or four chapters. That rule you applied, Mr. Chairman, the other day, when an hon, member was reading eight or ten pages on female suffrage. I, however, have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to hear these extracts read.

Mr. PATERSON. I do.

Mr. RYKERT. Hon, gentlemen opposite do not like to be brought face to face with the records of their party. There is not any position taken by the hon, gentlemen opposite but we can confront them with their speeches made on former occasions. When the great tariff question was under discussion in Parliament in 1879, we cited the opinions and speeches of the members for North Norfolk and South Brant to prove that we were justified in adopting the National Policy, and quoted their speeches of 1876 in answer to their argument in opposition thereto. We showed by their speeches that they had turned political somersaults. In fact, whenever they advance any arguments on any question in this House, all we have to do is to turn up former speeches in Parliament to answer them.

Mr. PATERSON. That is the hon. gentleman's own remark, not an extract.

When interrupted I was quoting an Mr. RYKERT. authority which will be recognised. On the 24th January, 1884, the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, forced by the leader of this Government, who had declared, upon the 17th January, that he would introduce a Franchise Bill, announced in the Speech from the Throne the extension of the franchise. The words were:

"In this connexion I invite your attention to the expediency of further extending the already liberal Franchise which prevails in this Province."

Upon that occasion neither the mover nor the seconder of the Address spoke a word in favor of that clause, in fact it was entirely ignored; and even the Globe, which anticipated the Speech, said nothing about the franchise. Notwithstanding the promises made in the speech, the Session of 1884 passed without the Ontario Government introducing any Bill increasing the franchise in accordance with the promises made before the elections. Then we came down to 1885, the present Session. This Parliament met on the 29th January, and the Speech from the Throne promised an dith was able to say specifically what he had to propose; extension of the franchise. The Ontario Government finding they were driven into a corner were compelled to do They saw something towards redeeming their pledge. that the First Minister of the Dominion was determined to go on with the Franchise Bill; then those hon. gentlemen thought they must have a new Franchise Bill, and on the 5th of March, something like six weeks after the Ontario Legislature met, the Bill was introduced; it was read the second time on the 24th of March, and was passed on the 28th of March. So those hon, gentlemen were actually forced to adopt not only an extension of the franchise, so far as property was concerned, but they were compelled to reduce the income franchise and to adopt other liberal clauses which had been advocated year after year by the Conservative party in Ontario. We find to-day that Mowatt's Bill, instead of placing the franchise at $400, has reduced it to $300; and subsequently in the Legislature it was reduced to $250. I think I have satisfactorily shown, by the record of the Reform party in this Dominion, that they have systematically opposed the extension of the franchise. We find that they never conceded one inch, until they were driven into the last ditch by the Conservative party. Now these hon. gentlemen have been discussing this Bill day after day and night after night, they have been declaring that it should not be passed because the people have not had time to consider it, that its contents are not known to the people. Well, Sir, we had a similar Bill introduced in 1869. That Bill is almost precisely similar to this, with the exception of the revising barrister clause. That Bill provided that there should be commissioners instead of revising barristers. The leader of the Opposition at that time strongly favoured that Bill, as mentioned by the First Minister to-day. On the 11th March, 1870, the leader of the Opposition said:

"The House must feel gratified at the full statement made by the hon. mover of the Bill, and also at the mode taken to discuss its provisions, as well as with the announcement that it was the intention of the Government to receive with consideration any suggestions which might be offered."

That Bill was fully discussed, it went to a second reading, it went into committee and was discussed in all its details. The Globe newspaper and other Reform papers, published an analysis of the Bill, giving all its leading features, and if the Globe had any circulation in the country the people must have been informed on the details of that measure. Yet we find hon. gentlemen still declaring unhesitatingly that the country do not know anything about the Bill; that the people are entirely ignorant of it; that the people have not had time to consider it. On the 20th May, 1869, the Globe referred to the details of the measure, pointed out its leading features and said it was similar to the Bill of the preceeding Session, which was identical with the Bill of to day, except as to the clause providing for revising barristers. The Giobe said:

"The Premier's Bill proposes a franchise which, though a little complicated, and not altogether consistent, is on the whole liberal. It proposes a freehold franchise of $200 in counties, $400 in cities and $300 in towns. A tenant franchise of $20 in counties and $30 in cities, and an income franchise of $400. The income franchise is an excellent feature of the Bill,"

Now, Sir, that Bill was introduced again sometime early in 1883. On April 16th, the Globe referred to it as a measure similar to the one introduced in 1870. When the Bill was before Parliament for a certain time the leader of the Government withdrew it, stating that he withdrew the Bill, and that it would now go before the country to be submitted next Session. Parliament was not taken by surprise, and hon gentlemen must have known the principles of the Bill, for, as the hon. member for Brome said a few nights ago, he had thoroughly discussed the measure before his constituents, and had come back for the purpose of opposing the Bill. The hon member for West Lambton made a similar statement; he said the Bill was the Bill which was introduced at that time by Mr. Laird. Mr. RYKERT.

before the country for some time, that it was understood by the people, and yet hon, gentlemen say the Bill should not be passed because the people have not had an opportunity of considering it. Now, on the 19th January, 1884, at the opening of Parliament, to show that the Bill was fully discussed, Mr. Blake said:

"At the opening of last Session I pointed out what I thought was the true need with reference to the Franchise Bill. I don't intend to repeat those words to-day. The Bill has been before the House and country. It has not received the advantage of vindication by its proposer."

Then he found fault with the First Minister for not entering into the details of the measure, and said he recognised the fact that the Bill was fully understood by the country. He then goes on further to make some remarks which show that the leader of the Opposition was a little at fault—that he is troubled with a treacherous memory. He spoke about the Bill of 1883, that Bill having a clause providing for revising barristers, precisely as the Bill of the present time, but on the 19th January, 1884, he said:

"At the time I spoke I did not know and could not know that the Bill would contain so objectionable or unheard of a provision as it is proposed to have in it, which proposal I hope will not be carried out, of the appointment of revising barrister."

Now, in January 1884, he noticed that clause of the Bill, although he never noticed the previous Bill, and although, as I have shown you, he discussed that Bill in all its details, and said it was well known to the country, and yet I should like to know if the Bill introduced to the House was not understood by that hon. gentleman. Now, in order to show that the hon gentleman was mistaken, I refer you to page 594 of the Hansard of January 1883, where you will find that the First Minister referred particularly to the clause providing for the revising barristers, and upon the 25th January, the Globe newspaper said:

"Sir John a. Macdonald has introduced the Franchise Bill. It is not his practice to introduce in the early days of the Session any measure to which he attaches any importance. This is almost exactly the same Bill as last Session. One of the most objectionable features of the Bill is that which provides for a revising barrister.

Still the leader of the Opposition says he knew nothing about it—that it took him by surprise. Now, this Bill has been denounced to a very great extent, but we recollect, as I said a few minutes ago, that the same Bill was introduced in 1870, and that on that occasion the leader of the Opposition declared that they were all agreed as to the necessity of an Election Act, and although he might oppose some of the details, he had no idea of opposing a second reading of the Bill. The Globe of the 16th April said:

"It will be noticed that the conferring of the franchise upon unmarried women is the only liberal feature of the Bill. As to this feature, it is, we are pleased to say, a truly liberal measure, but we shall be very much surprised if the majority of the present House do not take the opportunity of eliminating a proposition which seems really out of place and it a surproposition. amid its surroundings."

These gentlemen say that the Bill is an obnoxious Bill, and still you find the the same Bill approved by the leader of the Opposition. Now, I think this House must have come to the conclusion, after listening to this debate for someting like three weeks, that the sole object of the opposition to this Bill is that there is a clause in it relating to the revising barrister. If that clause were eliminated from the Bill now, hon. gentlemen opposite would allow it to pass without a single word of opposition, although it is true hon. gentlemen have for fifty-seven hours fought upon the one word Indian. Would it not be well now to bring my hon. friend from Brant face to face with his own record on that question. I think it has already been published abroad, and no doubt the hon, gentleman has seen it, that the hon, member for South Brant and other gentlemen on that side who are now so strongly opposed to the enfranchisement of the Indians, were strongly in favor of it in 1876. I have in my hand

I am not Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One moment. opposed to Indian enfranchisement -I desire it.

Mr. RYKERT. It is a very hard to tell where the hon. gentleman stands. His speech on this Bill was condemnatory of the principle of enfranchising the Indian.

Mr. PATERSON. No, no.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes, every line of it; and when brought face to face with his record we see that he would not enfranchise one Indian. The hon. member for Elgin also denounced it in unmeasured terms. These hon. gentlemen said: Why enfranchise Pie-a-Pot and Poundmaker and the others, when they knew that the Bill did not refer to the Territories at all? They knew that very well, but they thought to make a little capital out of it, a little by-play out of the remarks of the First Minister, because the First Minister in answer to some questions, in a jocular manner said yes. Was there a single hon, gentleman who raised his voice to say one word on behalf of the poor Indian-not a word until they were driven into a corner, and brought face to face with their record. Now it has gone to the country that this Government has endeavored to enfranchise the Indian, who is placed in the same position as the white man.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. RYKERT. Yes, the Act says so.

Mr. PATERSON. That is what we proposed and voted for and the hon, gentleman voted down.

Mr. RYKERT. Well, we shall see. I know that it is most unpalatable to these hon, gentlemen to be brought face to face with their own record. The Bill says:

"Person means a male person including an Indian."

Section 3 says:

"Every person shall, upon and after the first day of November, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, be entitled to be registered on the lists of voters."

Then it goes on to provide that he must be of the full age of 21 years, that he must be a British subject by birth or naturalisation, that he must be the owner of real property or a tenant, or have an income, and so on; and the Indian must have the same franchise and the same qualification as the white man. What were these gentlemen in favor of three years ago? They were in favor of enfranchising the Chinese and granting them every privilege that the white man enjoys; yet they say now he is no better than an Indian, and the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) says the Indian is no better than a negro. They were then in favor of the poor Chinese being included, and now they want to exclude the poor Indian. They say that they were not in favor of excluding the Indian who had the same qualifications as the white man. Well, what does this Bill say but that a person means an Indian, and that he must have the qualification required by law. Suppose the tribal Indians, as they call them, had a vote, would that be wrong? Who owns their property? Who owns the property of the Tuscorora Indians? Do the Indians, or does the Government? The Indians own that property, and no law of the land can take it from them. They have as much right to it as the hon, member for South Brant has to his; and if they have that property, which they work, and enjoy the benefits of, why should they not have the same rights as white men? What did the hon, member for South Brant say in 1875?

"Mr. Paterson desired to impress upon the hon. Minister of the Interior, the necessity that existed for the revision and codification of the Indian laws, and also with respect to the desirability of the enfranchisement of the Indians."

In 1876, the Bill I have before me was introduced, and it is a member to become eufranchised, and whenever such Indian has been assigned by the band a suitable allotment of land for that purpose, the local agent shall report such action of the band, and the name of the applicant to the Superintendent General; whereupon the said Superintendent General, if satisfied that the proposed allotment of land is equitable, shall authorized some competent person to report whether is equitable, shall authorized some competent person to report whether the applicant is an Indian who, from the degree of civilization to which he or she has attained, and the character for integrity, morality and sobriety which he or she bears, appears to be qualified to become a pro-prietor of land in fee simple; and upon the favorable report of such person, the Superintendent General may grant such Indian a location ticket as a probationary Indian, for the land allotted to him or her by the band.

"88. Every such Indian shall, before the issue of the letters patent mentioned in the next preceding section, declare to the Superintendent General the name and surname by which he or she wishes to be enfran-General the name and surname by which he or she wishes to be enfranchised and thereafter known, and on his or her receiving such letters patent, in such name and surname, he or she shall be held to be also enfranchised, and he or she shall thereafter be known by such name or surname, and if such Indian be a married man his wife and minor unmarried children also shall be held to be enfranchised; and from the date of such letters patent the provisions of this Act and of any Act or law making any distinction between the legal rights, privileges, disabilities and liabilities of Indians and those of Her Majesty's other subjects shall cease to apply to any Indian.

Now, the hon. First Minister declared that when we came to the enfranchising clauses he would have clauses with respect to the Indians; but, whether he does or not, the fact stares us in the face, that the Indian who has the frugality and the industry to cultivate a piece of property, and works that property, and who chooses to take advantage of this Act, can claim the right of suffrage and nothing further; and the hon. member for South Brant strongly appealed to this House, years ago, that Indians should be relieved from the tutelage and the bondage under which

Mr. PATERSON. Does the hon. gentleman understand the Bill to be what he said now—that only Indians who are assessed and have the same responsibilities as white men, are to have votes?

Mr. RYKERT. I understand by this Bill that a person means an Indian, or a white man, or a negro, and that that person must be an owner, tenant or an occupant or have an

Mr. PATERSON. Must be assessed for it; the hon. gentleman said assessed twice.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon, gentleman has not read the Bill. In fact, I would judge that most hon. gentlemen opposite had not read the Bill-from the erratic manner in which they have discussed the question, and the absurd and reckless statements they have made—as they seem to know nothing at all about the Bill. The hon, gentleman also said, in 1880:

"Then the Bill does not provide for the enfranchisemant of the Indians, for according to them the rights, opportunities and privileges of citizens is, I think, the only solution of the Indian question, more especially the only solution which affects the more advanced tribes, on whose behalf and with respect to whose circumstances, I am more particularly acquainted. Any change that has been made in the law is only in the direction of still more firmly fastening the shackles of tutelage upon them—a change tending to keep the Indians in their present condition. I speak on behalf of 3,000 Indians—'?

That is, the Indians of Tuskarora, the same as are going to be enfranchised by this Bill-

Mr. PATERSON. You are not enfranchising them.

Mr. RYKERT. And are going to have the right to vote and the same privileges as white men.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

they then existed.

"--3,000 Indians, among whom six missionaries have been laboring for the past thirty years, and who have twelve public schools and an industrial institute. In that band there never has been but one enfranchised under the Act of 1868, and that Indian was unable to get the land to which he was entitled; he petitioned to be restored to his former has these clauses:

"86. Whenever any Indian man, or unmarried woman, of the full age of twenty-one years, obtains the consent of the band of which he or she it too of the whites and the Indians, and the solution of the Indians.

problem can only be found in wiping out the distinction which exists between the races, in giving the red man all the liberties and rights enjoyed by the white man, and entailing upon him all the responsibilities which attach to those rights and privileges."

Therefore, if the Indian be located upon a piece of land worth the proper value, why should he not be enfranchised?

Mr. PATERSON. He has not the responsibility.

Mr. RYKERT. What responsibility has he got? He has to work his land the same as everybody else, and he does exactly what the hon. member for South Brant does, consumes tea and coffee and sugar, and uses all the other necessaries of life, on which he pays duty.

Mr. PATERSON. So does my boy of eighteen who has not a vote.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not suppose he cares very much. So hon. gentlemen will see that the view taken by these gentlemen was that the Indian should be enfranchised. The hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) who was very strong on the point, said:

"I think Indians who are equal to whites in intelligence, who are superior to many whites in wealth, and who are full grown citizens of the Dominion, should not be placed in a worse condition than the

So that you will see that hon, gentlemen opposite who for the last three or four weeks have been discussing the Indian question, and especially the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who devoted an hour and a-half to the Indian franchise, took the same position that the Government occupy to-day in favor of enfranchising the Indians so long as he came within the definition of the word person. These hon. gentlemen have made a great deal of argument against the revising barrister clause. I am not going to discuss the merits of that clause while we are in committee, discussing another branch of the Bill, and I do not wish to violate the rules of debate, but I simply wish to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of their own views on this question. I want to show that these same gentlemen who complain so loudly of this clause are the very ones who, a few years ago, when the First Minister proposed to appoint three commissioners, advocated it. They were, moreover, in favor of having placed in the hands of the registrar of the county, the sheriff and county attorney, or other county officials this power; these officials to be paid in the same manner as the revising barrister. In the Bill of 1869 introduced by the First Minister he appointed three commissioners from whom there was to be an appeal to the county judge. At that time the organ of the party strongly advocated that the registrar of the county or the county attorney should be appointed. The leader of the Opposition was not quite so decided on that point, he preferred having the revising barrister. In 1870 he said:

"The way to remedy the system was not the way proposed by the mover of the Bill, but the proper mode was to adopt the English system of revising barristers, who were appointed by the judges Another plan which he propose I was to appoint some one of the persons, who for the time being, he found filling the county offices, but then the hon mover said we had no jurisdiction over the county officers. He asserted there was no difficulty in the House declaring that men, who at the time, would be found filling particular offices should discharge particular functions, and should be liable to penalties if they did not discharge them."

The Globe also declared in favor of the revising barrister, but, in the event of his not being appointed, thought it was advisable that the registrar of the county, or the county attorney, or the sheriff, should be appointed. Hon. gentlemen opposite say this Bill interferes with provincial rights. Was there anything said about provincial rights in 1870? Not one word. Though it was the same Bill, the same clauses, everything identical, except the clause providing commissioner; instead of revising barrister; not one voice down as he delivered it, it will be seen that he deliberately was raised on behalf of provincial rights. Again they say, this Bill is not asked for by the public. The best argument the House, although it was but little more than seven weeks in reply to that statement is the instance quoted by the hon. I before it was actually distributed to the House. Let us Mr. RYKERT.

member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). He referred to the Bill extending the franchise in Great Britain, which was introduced lately by Mr. Gladstone. Were any petitions sent to the British House of Commens asking for that Bill? Did Mr. Gladstone consult the people? No; although this Bill was most revolutionary in its character, extending the privileges granted to the people, making the franchise still lower than it was, Mr. Gladstone had it passed through the House without consulting the people, and not one word was said about the people not asking for it. Was Mr. Mowat's Bill, passed a few days ago, ever discussed before the people or asked for by the people? Did the hou, member for South Brant, in stumping the country during the last election ever say a word about extending the franchise? Or, if he did, did he say in what direction he wanted it to be extended? I followed hon, gentlemen throughout many contests, and did not hear them say a word about it. Mr. Mowat was not asked to pass the Bill. True, the Reform party, driven to it by the Conservative party, had to acknowledge it as a plank in their platform, but although Mr. Mowat placed it as a plank in his platform, as laid down by the Lieutenant Governor, he did not endorse it in Parliament, and allowed a whole Session to pass without saying a word about it. Can the hon. gentlemen opposite point to a single voter who having had a vote in 1882 or 1878 will not also have a vote in 1887 under this Bill? They cannot point to one. Yet they say we have no right to speak for the people, we who are commissioned to speak for the people by two mandates given us by large majorities in 1878 and in 1882. These hon. gentlemen, some time ago, thought it necessary, when a former Bill was passed through Parliament, to call for meetings throughout the country. That Bill was passed without consulting the people. When they went before the people did they discuss the measure? No; in 1882, when they went to the people on the Canadian Pacific Railway measure, they would not discuss it; but they went off on a side issue and talked about invading the rights of the Province, the Rivers and Streams Bill, the Boundary Award—these were the questions they discussed, and not the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. So it will be at the next election. This Bill will pass, and what will be the result? Hon. gentlemen opposite will go off on some other side wind; they will draw some other red herring across the trail, but they will not meet the people fairly. Now they say, this Bill is being hurried through Parliament. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said this Bill was introduced only three months after the House met. That statement is about as correct as any other statement he has made, and is on a par with the reckless, random statements that hon, gentlemen opposite generally make. They want it to go forth to the country that this House did nothing the first three months of the Session, so that the people will say the Government was wasting time, and three or four weeks more wasted by the Opposition would not make very much difference. What is the fact? The Bill was introduced the 19th of March.

Mr. VAIL. Ten days short of three months.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon, gentleman is six weeks out of his calculation again, just about as near as he can count. I have from the Clerk of the House a statement showing that the Bill was distributed the 27th of March, not two months after the House met, yet the hon. member for Bothwell deliberately says it was not brought down until three months after the House opened. I believe that when the Hansard report comes down to-morrow, the hon. member for Bothwell will correct that statement; but if it comes compare that with what Mr. Mowat did of whom hon. gen- statement of 15,000, and, adding that to the 55,309, we have Mr. Mowat's Parliament was in Session six weeks before his Bill was introduced. His Parliament met on the 28th of January, and on the 5th of March the Bill was read the first time. It was not printed until the 20th, it was read the second time on the 24th, and passed on the 28th; and this was a Bill more revolutionary in its character than any previous Franchise Bill—a Bill which enfranchised the Indians and extended the franchise almost in every direction. Mr. Mowat went one better than the First Minister. The hon. gentleman was determined to go one better than the First Minister. He saw what the First Minister's Bill was, the same as the previous Session, he sits down, draws his Bill, almost all the clauses drawn in such a way as to go one better than the First Minister. This Bill had been before Parliament and had been discussed before the people as the member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) said. But one member, the hon. member for Brant, admitted that he had never heard of the Bill before. A newspaper man, a man who knows so much of what is going on in the country, says he knew nothing about the Bill. That shows what reliance can be placed on this gentleman who cannot keep a faithful record of the affairs of the country. Hon gentlemen say the Bill is going to be too expensive. Although that is somewhat out of the record, I will simply say that the estimates made by hon, gentlemen in regard to that are something like their estimates a few years ago in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. One hon, gentleman said it would cost $500,000. Another said it would cost $715,000. When the question of the revising barrister is under discussion, I shall take the liberty to give my view of what the cost really is, but I repeat what I said before, that the cost in the first year of the revising barrister and his clerk and his constable will not be as much as what hon, gentlemen have cost the country by the unreasonable obstruction which they have exhibited in regard to this Bill, nor as much as it has cost to publish all the absurd returns which they have asked for—some 700 or 800. These gentlemen are never at home unless they are reckless in assertion. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated a few nights ago that, if this Bill passed, there would be 150,000 men disfranchised in the Province of Ontario, and in order to show that, he went into an estimate. The member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) went 25,000 better. The next night he said there would be 150,000 disfranchised. Let us come to statements, how regardless they are of the facts, how economical of the truth, in fact, they kick it around in every direction. According to the last official return, there were in the Province of Ontario only 472,411 persons of the age of land, it does not come into operation till next January. According to the law in force to-day in the Province of Ontario, the franchise is $400 in cities, $300 in towns, $200 in townships and villages, and $400 income. The total number of persons enfranchised under that law to-day, is 417,112, so that there are only 55,309 persons in the Province of Ontario above twenty one years of age who had not the franchise, including lunatics, criminals, insane, deaf, dumb and blind. Yet the hon. gentleman says this Bill will di-franchis. 125,000 people. How is it going to do that? The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) will say: Oh, but some of you vote twice. On his own estimate, according to his 222 tlemen opposite are so fond of talking. We find that 70,309 against 150,000 or 125,000, the number given by the Mr. Mowat's Parliament was in Session six weeks before member for West Elgin and the member for West Huron respectively, and this is assuming that not one additional person will be enfranchised under this Act. You see how reckless they are. There are not, from the age of 21 years up to 99 years, more than 55,309 who have not votes to-day in the Province of Ontario, and of the voters 286,000 voted in 1883, at the last general election, and the votes unpolled were 120,153. When they deliberately told the House and the country that 150,000 men will be disfranchised by this Bill, they were talking what they know is not correct, they were making random and reckless statements for political purposes, for the purpose of casting some obloquy and some disgrace upon the First Minister, and getting the people to stir up meetings and arouse a feeling in the country against the Bill. I assert that not a gentleman on that side of the House can point to a single person in the Province of Ontario, who, to-day, has a vote who will be disfranchised by this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear. Not one.

Mr. RYKERT. When we go back to render an account of our stewardship, there will not be one who had a vote for us before who will not have a vote on that occasion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And a great many more.

Mr. RYKERT. And a great many more, as I shall show presently. These gentlemen must have a little shame when they look at the record they have made in this House. In analysing this Bill I take my own constituency. I have taken the trouble since last Friday to have all the assessment rolls of my constituency sent to this House, in order to see the effect of this Bill and of Mr. Mowat't Bill on my county. In the first place, Mr. Mowat's Bill will deprive of their votes 269 non-resident freehold voters, who have exercised the franchise for twenty-five or thirty years. I myself have voted in the county of Welland for nearly thirty years, and I am cut off from that; but, while they adopt that principle, viz., that non residents shall not vote as far as parliamentary elections are concerned, in municipal elections it is different. I voted ten times in one day in ten different places. That shows that, while they are willing to allow that for municipal purposes, they are not willing to allow it for parliamentary purposes. I should like to know why I should have the privilege of voting in the city of St. Catharines in six wards for eighteen the record. It may surprise the hon gentlemen when I tell aldermen, and in the township of Grantham for four counthem the results from the official documents, but I want to cillors and a reeve, and in the township of Niagara show how reckless these gentlemen are in their random in my own county, and in the village of Merritton, and yet, when it comes to a parliamentary election, where my responsibilities are greater than in municipal affairs, I can only vote where I live, and not where I have the largest amount of property. There are in my own county twenty-one years and upwards. Let us turn to the record of the Ontario Government, and see how many persons are enfranchised to-day in that Province without Mr. Mowat's Bill, there are in that county of Lincoln, outside of the city of St. Catharines, only 49 new Bill, because, mark you, that is not now the law of the persons who are assessed for an amount under $200. Today there are only 49 persons who will gain the franchise by Mr. Mowat's Bill. I am assuming that they are only assessed for $100, but they are assessed under $200, so that while I lose 269 of non-residents, I gain 49 as voters having $100 and upwards. Now, we will take the city of St. Catharines, this shows the fact that every person assessed for property in the Province of Ontario—unless, as the leader of the Opposition says, he lives in a God forsaken part of the country—is assessed for $200. There is hardly anyone living with a roof over his head at all, who is not worth $200. Hon. gentlemen know, in canvassing the country, that every elector tries to be assessed for an amount sufficient to give first statement, there were 15,000 who voted twice. him a vote. Now, take the city of St. Catharines, with a Subsequently, he said there were 7,500. I will take his franchise of $400. I find there are only twenty nine persons assessed between $300 and $400, and only twenty-six persons between $200 and $300, who will be entitled to vote. only gain under the Mowat Bill in the city of St. Catharines with its population of 10,000, will be twenty-six. This Bill also recognises the principle recognised years ago in the old Parliament of Canada, of what is called "tenancy franchise." Although some objection has been taken to some of the details of that section, the principle of tenant franchise is fully recognised. In Mr. Mowat's Bill a man must have property worth a certain amount, but in the present Bill a person representing a piece of property, no matter how small or how large, if he pays $2 a month, can have a vote. I would like to know where there is a tenant who pays less than $2 a month? We come now to the income franchise. In the Province of Ontario there is a large number of persons with salaries of $400, who, at the present time, claim exemption and will not be assessed. They do not appear upon the voters' lists because they are not assessed, and the courts have determined that no man can be placed upon the list after the assessment roll is revised, for income, unless he is assessed. So that, in the Province of Ontario, a man must be assessed for $400 before he can Under this Bill a man need not be have a vote. assessed for anything, he has only to have an income of $400, so there is the advantage under this Bill. In the Province of Ontario he must pay taxes and be placed upon the assessment roll, so that in these two respects this Bill is far better than the other. I have been struck with the fact, during this discussion, that some hon. gentlemen, particularly the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), have exhibited a great deal of anxiety for Nova Scotia, and have pointed out that this Bill is going to disfranchise large numbers in that Province. Well, I find that on the 7th May, 1885, the Halifax Chronicle, a good Grit organ, as I understand, denounced the Franchise Bill in almost as strong terms as the hon. gentlemen in this House. That paper says this:

"The difference between the proposed franchise and those now in operation are more in name than in reality. Very few of the young men who would be entitled to vote under the Dominion Act as having an income of $300 a year, would not possess $300 personal property entitling them to vote in this Province. We believe the two lists which we require to be made up, if the Dominion Bill becomes law, will, if fairly made up, be nearly identical."

I quote that as an answer to those hon, gentlemen who say this Bill is going to work great injustice in Nova Scotia. Now, the principal difference between this Bill and the Local Bill of Ontario is this: In the Local Legislature the assessment rolls are the guide, and every one knows that in townships particularly, men are assessed as low as possible, and still have the right to vote, in order to evade the taxation imposed by the county council. Hon. gentlemen who know anything about municipal affairs in Ontario, know that the rolls are equalised by the county council, and therefore in rural municipalities and towns not separated from the county, property is assessed as low as possible in order that the owners may reduce the county taxation. But in this Bill the revising barrister, or the judge, takes the actual value of the property; he does not take the assessed value at all, so that where the assessed value is $100 in the municipality, the actual value might be $250, and in cities where the value is assessed at $200, the actual value may be $400. In this Bill the revising barrister states the actual value, irrespective of the assessed value, the voter under this law not being liable to pay any taxes. Now I have briefly pointed ont the inconsistencies of hon, gentlemen in opposing this Bill. I think they have manifested a disposition to obstruct legislation in reference to this Bill. Anyone who will examine the Hansard will see that these hon, gentlemen have occupied something like 400 or 500 pages in the discussion of a measure that might have been discussed in 15 pages; and they have done so, I been made from various sources. Mr. RYKERT.

not for the purpose of defending provincial rights, but with a view of obstructing this Bill so that the Government will be forced to withdraw it. The First Minister has declared that this Bill shall become law this present Session, and his supporters believe he is right. The House has affirmed the principle on the second reading by a large majority, and we would be false to our trust, and to the position we occupy as representatives of the people, if we were to allow the Opposition, simply because we might be inconvenienced by sitting here three or four months, to obstruct the Bill and prevent the legislation being carried through. Mr. Chairman, I support this Bill because I believe that we ought to have a uniform franchise that cannot be interfered with or altered by the Local Legislatures. As I have pointed out, the Local Legislature of Ontario has unjustly and unfairly disfranchised thousands of people who have heretofore enjoyed the privilege of the franchise and who voted for us in 1882, who when we go back for re-election will have no right to pass judgment on our action. For example, non-resident voters at the last election will have no right to pass judgment on our actions because they are disfranchised, and judgment will be passed upon us by a different set of men. That is not a just course to pursue. We have no guarantee that the franchise will not be altered by Mr. Mowat before the next general election; that there will not be compulsory voting, that woman suffrage will not be granted, that manhood suffrage will not be granted. Knowing all these facts, and what are the views of members of this House on these three important questions, manhood suffrage, woman suffrage and compulsory voting, and having strong views on these questions, are we to place ourselves in the hands of politicians like Oliver Mowat, who has shown his determination to fight against the interests of the Dominion? I feel as the leader of the Opposition felt in 1871, that there should be no entangling alliance between Ontario and the Dominion. The hon. member for West Durham, when leader of the Opposition in the Local House in 1871, said:

"As citizens of Ontario we are called upon to frame our own policy with reference to our Provincial rights and interests and to conduct our own affairs; and we deprecate, nay more, we protest most strongly against any interference on the part of any Government with our perfect freedom of action."

Again said Mr. Blake:

"Their position was this, that the Local Government should be perfectly independent of the Central Government and should neither be entangled by alliance nor embarrassed by hostility."

Those are true and sound principles. If they are adhered to, then I say that the Local Legislature of Ontario will occupy its true position. I am in favor of an entirely different franchise for the Provincial as compared with Dominion elections. We are sent here to advocate measures entirely different to those coming before the Local Legislature. When we have narrow-minded men who hold that local matters are paramount, when a Local Legislature arraigns itself as the Ontario Legislature has done against the interests of the Dominion, we have a right to fortify ourselves and protect ourselves, and take care not to place ourselves in the hands of such politicians as at the present time control the Legislature of Ontario.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not rise to engage in further discussion as to the amendment I placed in your hands some days ago and which is still before the House. I rise for the purpose of referring to one or two points made by the Premier, when you, Mr. Chairman, first took the Chair this afternoon. We have great satisfaction in the declaraation made by that hon, gentleman that he has resisted the demands of his followers, that the cloture should be applied.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that. said nothing about my followers. I said that demands had

Mr. CHARLTON. They were not made from this side of the House; and if they were not made by the hon. gentleman's followers, I do not know by whom they could have been made. The reason for such a suggestion does not exist. The application of the cloture in England was after vexatious opposition by a mere faction, blocking the wheels of legislation. No mere faction in this House opposes this measure; but a great party, representing the vast majority of the people of Canada to day, oppose a measure which the people do not want; and for that reason there is no justification for the cloture or for that gag-law, the so-called application for the previous question, which obtains in the United States House of Representatives. I rise to refer more particularly to the charge made by the hon. gentleman, that members on this side of the House had been guilty of organised obstruction. In my opinion this Bill has been discussed properly and temperately, except on one or two occasions when the House insisted on sitting past two o'clock. As to the speeches on this side of the House, we have a very fair specimen in the excellent speech delivered by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) this afternoon. Of course, some may have been somewhat diffuse. Some hon. gentlemen may not have spoken with that terseness, with that degree of parliamentary skill which old parliamentarians may possess; but all of those hon. gentlemen have addressed themselves to the discussion with a sincere desire to present their views to this House and the country. The hon, gentleman asserted that but for this obstruction the discussion would not have been kept up the week before last, and the painful scene enacted, by which members were deprived of their rest. During the week before last, the first attempt made at the Monday Session, and continued until 10 o'clock Tuesday night was against the protest of the Opposition. The Opposition demanded an adjournment at 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning. an adjournment at 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning. That adjournment was refused by the Government majority. We were not obstructing the proceedings at that time. The discussion was conducted in a proper manner till two o'clock, when we were entitled to an adjournment. When the House met on Thursday, an adjournment was asked at 4 o'clock on Friday morning, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), speaking for the Opposition, said, we would take a vote on the Indian clause and adjourn. That suggestion was declined, and we continued to sit through the entire day of Friday. We continued to discuss the question until Saturday morning at 1 o'clock. At that time the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) suggested that the House should take a vote on the Indian clause, pass all the sub-sections of the interpretation clauses, and adjourn. The hon. Minister of Public Works rose, and in some heat and with some warmth, refused to accede to that proposition, and the House continued to sit till Saturday at midnight, against our protest. The obstruction was against our protest. On Thursday evening the supporters of the Government came into this House supplied with pillows and bedding, and gave us notice that they intended to encamp on the field of battle. came here with a declaration that they would wear the Opposition out, and we knew it was their intention to sit here until Saturday midnight, and so far as obstruction being practised by the Opposition, such was not the case. When two o'clock arrived we refused to proceed further with the discussion of the question, and we gave notice of our desire to adjourn, as it was perfectly proper for us to do. The hon. First Minister informed us that the minority should yield to the majority. When should they yield? Should they yield upon demand, or has the minority a right to insist on a free and full discussion by members of this House? An hon. gentleman says, yield "ere long." We will probably yield ere long. We will probably delay "ere long," as the First Minister sometimes does. But we have a right as a minority to debate every measure laid before this House and to give it full discussion; and it is a fault which has characterised this House that many important measures have been permitted to pass without receiving proper discussion. Many important measures have gone on our Statute Books without that consideration which they should have received from this House. Now a measure of the importance of the one which is before the House at this time, is one deserving of full discussion. It was introduced, Sir, at a time when full discussion was hardly possible. The second reading of this Bill was taken just twelve days short of three months of the time the House assembled. That Bill was introduced at a late period of the Session as we all know, and when the consideration of that Bill was taken up we had many important measures to take into consideration. We had, for instance the terms of the re-adjustment with Manitoba; we had the Pacific Railway resolutions to consider; we had a number of Government measures with regard to the Inland Revenue Department; we had the Supply, and we all know that the Estimates cannot possibly be put through this House in less than two or three weeks, with anything like proper discussion; we had the Bill to modify the application of the Consolidated Insurance Act of 1877; we had another Bill to provide for the distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors; we had a Bill providing for the establishment of a court of claims; we had a Bill respecting real property in the North-West Territories; a Bill regarding the salaries of the Judges and other officers to be appointed under the Court of Claims Bill; we had a measure with regard to restricting and regulating the immigration of the Chinese; we had a Bill to provide for the fitting representation of Canada at the Colonial and Indian Exhibition to be held in London; we had an Act respecting the Revised Statutes; we had a Bill to provide for the better preservation of the peace in the vicinity of public works; we had an Act with regard to liquor licenses, and we had an Act with regard to the North-West Mounted Police. These are a few of the important measures which were before this House when this Bill received its second reading. This Bill was not introduced at the proper time. There is no use arguing before the House that the Bill now under consideration was introduced at as early a stage of the Session as it ought to have been introduced; and it is a measure, if the evident expectation of the hon, gentleman in introducing this measure has been met, which would not have received full consideration. It would have gone through the House, as the Gerrymander Act of 1882 did-against the protest of the minority, but without that full consideration of its details which it deserved. Now, all measures deserve full consideration, and especially a measure of the great importance of the measure now before the House. I take the liberty of reading one clause from Lieber on Civil Liberty and Self Government, with regard to the degree of discussion which public measures should receive. He says:

"An election which takes place to pass judgment on a series of acts of a person, or to decide on the adoption or rejection of a fundamental law can have no value whatever, if the following conditions are not law can have no value whatever, it the following conditions are not fulfilled:

"The question must have been fairly before the people for a period sufficiently long to discuss the matter fairly, and under circumstances to allow a free discussion. Neither the police restrictions of Government nor the riotous procedures of mobs, nor the tyranny of associations ought to prevent the formation of a well sifted and duly modified public opinion. The liberty of the press, therefore, is a conditio sine quanum. If this be not the case, a mere general opinion of the moment, a panic on the one hand or a maddened gratitude, for real or imaginary benefits, of a multitude excited for the day or a period, may hastily and unrighteously settle the fate of generations to come, and passion, fear or vain-glory may decide that which ought to be settled by the largest and freest interchange of opinions and the broadest reciprocal modification of interests. It requires time for a great subject to present itself in all the aspects in which it ought to be viewed and examined, and for a great public opinion to form itself,—the more time the vaster the subject. All the laws regulating the formation of opinion in the individual apply with greater force to the formation of public opinion.

"All elections must be superintended by election judges and officers independent of the executive or any other organized or unorganized power of Government."

Now, Sir, we have in the discussion upon and the attempt is whether we shall have a free unbiased expression of the to pass upon this Bill a violation of that first principle demanding a full discussion and a careful sifting and weighing of the features of the Bill. We have in this Bill another measure which is in antagonism to that feature which requires that the Government should not have anything to do with the election officers, or the machinery which is to decide the question. We are told that we must yield to the majority. Well, Sir, does the dictum of a majority always make a thing right? Supposing a majority of this House should solemnly resolve at this moment that it was now three o'clock in the morning, would that make it three o'clock? Supposing that a majority in this House should resolve that Darwin's theory of evolution was right, would that settle the question? Supposing a majority of this House should determine the question of eternal punishment-would that settle it? I remember reading of a convention of pilgrims fathers in Massachusetts, who decided, by resolution, First, that the Saints of God should inherit the earth, and they passed a second resolution declaring that they were the Saints of God. I do not suppose that that settled the question, although a majority decided that that was the case. Here a majority are inclined to resolve that they should stay in power, and secondly, they would resolve that as they intend to stay in power, they should take the power of manipulating the voters' lists so that they should be able to do so. That is the decision which the majority are about to arrive at. The hon. gentleman told us this afternoon that their conclusions must prevail or else there will be a tragedy. I do not know to what the hon. gentleman refers, or what the character of this tragedy will be. I am at a loss to understand. I hope he has no violent designs against the Opposition; I hope we are not to be punished for our contumacy in this matter, by the condign wrath of the First Minister and his followers. Now, Sir, this measure has not been understood by this country; it has not been understood by this House.

Mr. RYKERT. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. This measure is not understood to-day by a majority of this House. The hon. member for Lincoln does not himself understand it.

Mr. RYKERT. Speak for your own side.

Mr. CHARLTON. The country is just at this moment fairly arousing itself as to the character of this measure. We hold that this measure is one of such importance that it should not be passed hastily. We hold that the opinions of the great mass of the people of Canada should be obtained upon this measure—the people who are to be affected by this measure, whose interests are at stake in this matter-a measure which will affect their interest not only this year but for all years to come, which will affect not only this generation, but all generations who may live in future in this Dominion,—we hold that this measure should be taken into consideration by the people of Canada, and that some authoritative expression of their opinion should be furnished to their representatives in this House, before a measure of this importance should pass. We believe on this side that although in a minority here, we represent the great majority of people, with regard to this measure.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Yes, yes; no, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. We believe that we are standing here the champions of the people, the advocates of the people's rights, in resisting an attempt to perpetrate on this country a great wrong. We believe that the assertion of the hon. gentleman is correct, that representative institutions are on trial. The question is whether the defendants, the party in power, who are shortly to be arraigned before Mr. CHARLTON.

opinion, a declaration of the will of the people of this country, or whether the Government in power shall snatch a verdict by means of an improper manipulation of the voters' liets, as it is proposed to do by this Bill. I cannot say that the hon. gentleman's speech this afternoon was anything but Parliamentary and moderate in its tone and spirit. The hon. gentleman, in that speech, indicated a desire to make concessions. Well, Sir, unfortunately this is a matter where the very principle at stake is a principle on which no concession can be made. We stand on the principle that any attempt to take the fixing of the franchises from the Provincial Governments, that have enjoyed and exercised that power for eighteen years, and through five general elections, and have exercised it in a manner that has been, in the highest degree, satisfactory to the people of the various Provinces—we hold, I say, that any attempt to take that power from the Provinces, and to exercise it by the Dominion, is an infringement of a principle that we cannot permit if we can help it; and, consequently, at the very threshold, we stand face to face with a principle that prevents us from offering or accepting any concessions in this matter. We neet that issue in the resolution in your hands, and the issue presented in that resolution is one that does not admit of compromise or concession. For that reason, Sir, we cannot accept the assertion that the discussion of this great and momentous measure has been obstructive. It is our duty as an Opposition to discuss this measure fully, and we intend to discharge that duty. Now, I may, perhaps, refer to one or two personal matters in the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). He asserts that I took broad ground in favor of universal suffrage. I did nothing of the kind. I took the ground that if the Dominion Government were to adopt a uniform franchise, they would be compelled to accept universal suffrage—that nothing else would be acceptable to the people of this country, because we could not consistently adopt a franchise that was less liberal in its character than the most liberal franchise in any of the Provinces. Then the hon. gentleman speaks about Yankeeism, in respect of my having made quotations from the American Constitution. Well, I pointed out that a great nation, which has grown to be a power with 56,000,000 inhabitants, originated the federal system of government; that it was the system we copied, that the Australian colonies were just adopting it, that it was likely to become very wide-spread in the world, and that, inasmuch as we had copied the institutions of that country, it was only proper that we should examine into their working, and should endeavor to learn the lesson that has been taught by the hundred years' experience of that nation. I pointed out that the United States had adopted that very system of suffrage that we have had in this country for eighteen years, that it had worked well there, and that no public man had raised his voice against it; and I think the example I quoted ought to have weight with the hon. gentleman opposite, who has not been above copying from that country. With regard to the implied charge of Yankeeism, I have this to say: I have been a resident of this country for thirty-five years; I came here a boy; and I am a British subject by birth. But leaving all personal questions to one side, if I were an annexationist, which I am not, and if I desired to see the institutions of this country changed, I would ask no better means to secure that result than to have hon gentlemen who are now in power, stay in power for five or six years longer. The men who are involving this country in inextricable difficulties, who are driving this country into debt, who are violating the very principles of responsible Government—these are the men to drive the country into the people of this country—whether these defendants in annexation, if that result is to be produced, and not the that trial shall be permitted to pack the jury. The question gentlemen on this side. The hon, gentleman said I addressed myself to the French Canadians and warned them, and then voted for female suffrage. Sir, I did address myself to the French Canadians, and warned them that if they allowed this Bill to be passed, the very thing I voted for, as well as universal suffrage and perhaps other objectionable things would be forced on Quebec, and that if they wished to avoid universal suffrage or female suffrage, it behoved them to keep in their own hands the power they possessed, and not throw down the barrier that prevented the other Provinces from forcing upon them a suffrage they do not desire. Then the hon, gentleman says Ontario demands that her suffrage shall be forced on the Dominion. Ontario demands nothing of the kind. Ontario demands that her suffrage shall be respected in the Province of Ontario, and that every other Province shall have the liberty that Ontario demands of fixing the suffrage to suit the wishes of its own people. That is what we demand. We have no desire or expectation that the suffrage of Ontario shall be accepted in any Province except Ontario. Then, the hon. gentleman says no person shall be disfranchised in Ontario who has a vote to-day, and that the Bill passed by the Ontario Legislature last Session will not come into force until the 1st of January next. When does this Bill come into force?—on the 1st of January following. In making the assertion he did, the hon. gentleman sought to create a false impression. The Bill now under consideration, when it comes into operation, will supplant the Bill lately passed and then in operation in Ontario and will disfranchise scores of thousands of people who will then be enfranchised by the Ontario Act. So much for the points made by the hon, gentleman. I rose just to refer to a few statements made by the hon. First Minister, and chiefly to the charge that the Opposition have obstructed legislation, which I

Mr. McCRANEY. I did not intend on this occasion to say a word; but I feel that I owe a deep responsibility to my constituents and to myself to say something on this question. I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln, and I must confess that I have been somewhat surprised at some of the statements he has made. The hon gentleman referred to the Franchise Bill that is now before the House, and to the Franchise Bill which has been passed recently in the Ontario Legislature, and drew a comparison between the two, and I think was very unfair in that comparison. He stated there would be none or very few distranchised under this Bill. He stated also that there were only some 50,000 persons over twentyone years of age in this Province who were not already enfranchised. I do not understand, for my part, how the hon, gentleman could come to any such conclusion. I find th t, practically, under the Ontario Act, when it comes into force, we will have manhood suffrage. I know of no class of persons that will not be enfranchised if they are earning $250 per annum. Let me read some few clauses of the Ontario Act.

"Firstly.—Every male person entered on the revised assessment roll upon which the voters' list to be used at the election is based for any city, town, incorporated village or township, for real property of the value hereinafter mentioned, and being at the time of the final revision and correction of said assessment roll, and also at the time of the election, a resident of and domiciled within the Electoral District for which he claims to vote.

(2) Such person must (subject to the provisions hereinafter contained) have been rated on such assessment roll as the owner, tenant or occupant of real property of the actual value of not less than the following:—

In cities and towns, two hundred dollars;
In incorporated villages and townships, one hundred dollars: "Firstly.—Every male person entered on the revised assessment roll

In incorporated villages and townships, one hundred dollars:

(3) Where any real property is owned or occupied jointly by two or more persons, and is rated at an amount sufficient, if equally divided between them, to give a qualification to each, then each of them shall be deemed rated within this Act, otherwise none of them shall be deemed so rated.

Secondly.—Every male person who is residing at the time of the election in the local municipality in which he tenders his vote and has resided therein continuously since the completion of the last revised assessment roll of the municipality, and derives an 'ncome from som' trade, occupation, calling, office or profession of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars annually, and has been "ssessed for such income in and by the assessment roll of the municipality upon which the voters' list used at the election is based.

Thirdly .- Every male person entered on the last evised assessment roll as a wage-earner who is residing at the time of the election in the local municipality in which he tenders his vote, and has resided therein continuously since the completion of the last revised assessment roll of the municipality, and who has during the twelve months next prior to being so entered, derived or earned wages or income from some trade, occupation, calling, office, or profession of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars.

(2) In estimating or ascertaining the amount of wages or income so carned or derived by any person so entered as a wage-earner in the assessment roll of a municipality, not being a city, town or village, the fair value of any board or lodging furnished or given to or received or had by such person as or in lieu of wages or as part thereof shall be considered or included.

So that any person who is earning, any farm laborer who is earning $150 a year with his board, will be entitled to a vote. Practically this means manhood suffrage. I will also, with your permission, Sir, read the speech of the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill in the Local House, the hon. Mr. Fraser. He said :-

"I say that this Bill is going far towards conferring the franchise upon every resident in the Province who is twenty-one years of age. The broadest basis of all is that which is included in the word house-holder. Hereafter if this Bill becomes law every man who is a tenant, every man who occupies a separate dwelling house, even though it only every man who occupies a separate dwelling house, even though it only be a part of one house, so long as it has a separate entrance, no matter who occupies it, whether as a tenant, occupant or owner, no matter what its value may be, will hereafter, provided that it is his residence in the sense in which this Act requires, have the right to vote. Now, hon, gentlemen on both sides of this House, will see what a vast advance that is on the law as it stands to-day. The Act now provides that no man can vote unless he has $400 worth of property in cities, $300 worth in towns, and $200 worth in incorporated villages and townships. Hereafter there will be no question of rental at all. Hereafter there will be required nothing of a voter except that he rates as a householder. Well. after there will be no question of rental at all. Hereafter there will be required nothing of a voter except that he rates as a householder. Well, then, next to that the broadest basis, I think, is that which gives the right to vote to every man who has $300 by way of income or wages. Heretofore the right to vote was limited to an income of $400 and then it could only be exercised by those who were so assessed who paid the taxes to which they were liable to being assessed. So in these two features we have extended the franchise so as to make it almost early to manhood. almost equal to manhood suffrage. It would be extremely hard to find any class in this country who, under one or other of these broad provisions of which I am speaking, will not have the qualifications necessary to entitle them to vote at parliamentary elections. But we are extending the franchise in other directions. Hereafter every man who is assessed for $200 in cities and towns, whether as owner, tenant or occupant, will be entitled to vote, and in incorporated villages and townships the assessed value will be reduced to $100. The farmer's sons franchise will be no longer known by that name, but by the name of the landholder's franchise. We have broadened the basis, until not only the sons, but the grand-sons and owners, shall have the right not only the sons, but the grand-sons and owners, shall have the right to vote; in other words, we intend putting a premium on mothers-in-law in this country. But we propose to give a vote, also, to the sons of those who are tenants. Hitherto the franchise has been confined to the sons of farmers who owned the land. By this Bill we propose to give to the son of a farmer, even though his father is not the owner of the land, provided the father is occupying a separate dwelling. In all the municipalities, the franchise will be of the same character. That its test that the son granden or the sonial law examples. That is to say, that the son, grandson, or the son-in-law, or any man who is assessed for $400 in cities or towns, or $200 in incorporated vilwho is assessed for page in cines or towns, or page in another lages, will be entitled to vote with him on that property. Hon, gentlemen will see that this is a very extensive addition to the franchise, because hitherto a farmer's son could only vote provided he appeared because hitherto a farmer's son could not vote unless the farm was as joint owner. In other words he could not vote unless the farm was assessed for $400, and then only one son could vote. Two sons could vote on a farm assessed for $600, three on a farm assessed for $800, and a farm had to be assessed for $1,000 to allow four to vote. This Bill will extend to every son of every father, who either owns, or who occupies land as a tenant, because it will be difficult to find any man who is not assessed for $200 upon his farm, and it will be equally difficult to find any respectable family occupying a house which is not assessed for $100 in villages, and $200 in cities and towns."

It appears to me, in comparing this Act with the one now before the House, that there are a vast number of persons who will be disfranchised by this measure. During the greater portion of my life I have been connected with the laboring class; and I have employed, and have to day in my employ, a large number of laboring men; and, after looking into the matter carefully, I can say that not more than one-fifth of those men will be enfranchised under this Bill, while they will all be enfranchised under the Act passed last Session in the Province of Ontario. We feel vince. I am speaking now as an Ontario man. The leader of the Government stated this afternoon that the question was whether the representative institutions of our country were to continue or not. We claim that this is a blow at our representative institutions; that the voters' lists for the Province of Ontario have been used ever since Confederation, and there has been no fault found with them, and we claim that there is no system upon which you can obtain a voters' list that is as fair as the present system. We believe that our municipal institutions in Ontario are superior, or at any rate are equal, to any muricipal system in the world. The member for West York (Mr. Wallace) stated a few evenings ago, in reply to a remark which I made, that, if the Tory assessors were as evenings unfair as the Reform assessors, I ought to go in with him and pass this law. That is not my experience, and I have had considerable experience in reference to the matter. While I believe there is a certain amount of unfairness on the part of some assessors under the present system, it is not to the extent that hon, gentlemen suppose. The hon. gentleman may, perhaps, be a stronger partizan than I am, which I believe he is, but I have found the assessors, whether Conservative or Reform, usually, at any rate, moderately fair in their assessments; and, rather than see this Bill become law, I would see every assessor a Conservative in the constituency I represent, because, I believe there would be more fairness, and less danger of dishonest actions on the part, especially, of the revising officer. Under this Bill, the revising officer has the full control of the voters' lists, and is acting under instructions from the First Minister. What is to prevent the First Minister, or those who have charge of the appointment of the revising officer, saying to him: I want John Smith to come from this county, and I want Mr. Jones to come from that county, and I want the hon, member for East Durham to stay at home, and the hon, member for Huron need not apply, and so on all the way through the chapter? I think this on all the way through the chapter? I think this Bill is, without exception, the most unfair and the most dishonorable that has ever been brought before this The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), spoke about the Indian clause. Either he did not understand the Bill or I do not understand it. I understand that this Bill enfranchises tribal Indians in the Provinces, Indians who are subject to the control of the agent, who have no deed for their property, who cannot buy and sell, who cannot sue and be sued. If an Indian owns his property, if he has a deed of his property, and that property is seperate from any other property, if he can buy and sell property, and can buy and sell anything else, and can sue and be sued, or ccan be drafted as a militiman, then an Indian has as much right to vote as a white man. But that is not the way in which I understand this Bill. I have made out a list of various industries of the Province of Ontario, and while am not prepared to say that the statement made by hon, gentlemen who spoke the other evening is correct or is not correct, I am quite satisfied that a large percentage of the men who are referred to in this list will be disqualified. Hon, gentlemen will bear in mind that the difference between $250 for the wage-earners, and an income of $400, is a large amount, and that difference will exclude a large number of persons who, under the wage earners clause in the provincial Act, would be enfranchised. I find that of the following classes nearly one-third will be disenfranchised under this Bill:

that this Act is an infringement upon the rights of our Prc- I am certain that so far as my own knowledge goes of many of the above classes—and I have a number of men belonging to some of those classes in my employ-a large proportion of them will be disfranchised under this Bill—I believe one-third.

Mr. RYKERT. How much do you pay them a day?

Mr. McCRANEY. I pay my men as much wages as other employers of labor; I have as good men as other men have; I have men who have remained with me longer perhaps than they would remain with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). Now, Sir, I consider that in the whole history of Canada this is the worst Bill that has ever been brought before Parliament; and I believe hon. gentlemen will find that the people of this country will speak out in such a manner as will, perhaps, surprise some of them. A few days ago a meeting was held in the city of Toronto, and resolutions were passed condemning this Bill. I am told that quite a large number of Conservatives are signing petitions against the Bill. I have several letters myself stating that certain Conservatives are strongly opposed to this Bill. For the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite I will read this resolution passed at the Toronto meeting:

"That this meeting denounces the proposal of the Dominion Govern-ment to establish a separate franchise for elections to the House of Commons:

"1. Because it is entirely unnecessary, in view of the fact that the provincial votors' lists have been always used with complete success for Dominion elections ever since Confederation.

"2. It will cause an enormous additional expense to the country to prepare and keep up a separate set of voters' lists every year in every remaininglify.

"3. Each Province is the best judge of the qualifications for parliamentary voters to elect its members to the House of Commons.

"4. That the proposed qualification for Dominion voters is entirely different from the qualification of the voters for the Provincial Legislature, and will create confusion and annoyance in every polling subdivision.

'5. In British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, where they now have manhood suffrage, a large number will be disfranchised.

"6. In Ontario the qualification as it now stands embraces a great "6. In Ontario the qualification as it now stands embraces a great number of persons whom it is proposed to exclude from the right to vote at the Dominion elections. In cities and towns owners and occupants of property worth $200 have votes, but the proposed Act will prevent them from voting unless they have property worth $300. In counties a man can now qualify on property worth $100—it is proposed to deprive him of a vote unless he has $150 worth. All who have an income of $250 can vote now; but it is proposed to exclude all who have not an income of $400. Every householder can now vote, no matter what his house is worth, but he will be excluded by the present Act, unless he can show the value required above.

house is worth, but he will be excluded by the present Act, unless he can show the value required above.

"7. The Province of Ontario does not wish to dictate what shall be the qualification for voters in other Provinces, and she will not submit to have the rest of the Dominion dictate what shall be the qualification of voters within Outario.

"And this meeting earnestly protests against the disfranchisement of the large and intelligent body of electors who have been granted the franchise by the recent Act of the Ontario Legislature."

Now, I want to show the House what the people think about giving the franchise to Indians. I think it is a great outrage to give the franchise to Indians who are now in open rebellion against the Government of this country, whilst you refuse it to the young men, to our noble volunteers, who are fighting in defence of their country.

Mr. RYKERT. Will the hon, gentleman state what section of the Bill gives a vote to the Indians of the North-West Territories?

Mr. McCRANEY. If the hon, gentleman will read the Bill he will find out:

"1. That the Indians have not expressed any desire to become enfranchised.

"2. That they are minors in the eyes of the law.

"3. That they are wards of the Crown.

"4. That they are declared by law to be incapable of managing their own affairs.

"5. That they are entirely under the control of the Government agents, through whom they receive their annuities from the Crown.

"6. That they do not share in the responsibilities of municipal or federal government.

"7. That they are not liable for assessment or municipal taxation.

Mr. McCraney.

"8. That they are not qualified to serve as jurors, or liable for

"8. That they are not qualified to serve as jurors, or liable for service in the militia.

"9. That they have no interest, beyond the receipt of their annuities, in the government of the country.

"10. And that they can, by severing their tribal relations, and conforming to the provisions of the Indian Act of 1880, assume the duties of citizenship by accepting the responsibilities attached to the rights and privileges enjoyed by the whites, and thus secure the benefit of the franchise:

"Therefore, this meeting heartly endorses the means that have been taken by the Liberal party in the House of Commons to expose the full meaning of this measure, which, if it became law, could not, in its result, but be fraught with most serious consequences to the progress, peace and permanency of this Dominion."

Those are the opinions that are expressed throughout the country, and hon, gentlemen opposite will find they are more largely entertained than they are aware of. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) spoke in regard to assessments, remarking that assessments were frequently lower than the actual value. I know of my own knowledge that in towns and villages the assessment is frequently above the actual cash value; and so the hon. gentleman's argument is of very little value.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it in townships?

Mr. McCRANEY. I am not so well acquainted with the assessments in townships, but I believe they are about the actual cash value of the property. I look upon this Act as one of the most hateful ever submitted to Parliament. I desire to express my strongest dissent from its provisions, and I feel that this is a measure striking below the belt, that it is a measure intended to centralise the whole Conservative power of the country in one man, and in doing so, to secure control of the elections.

Mr. DAWSON. There has been a good deal said to-night about Indian enfranchisement, and all sorts of topics, and as the discussion has taken such a wide range, I suppose I shall be at liberty to refer back to what has occurred. This question of Indian enfranchisement is not understood, or at least it has been alluded to by hon. gentlemen who should understand it, and especially by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as if they did not understand it. Enfranchisement, as set out in the Indian Act, simply relates to Indians on reserves, and does not apply to Indians outside of reserves; and it provides that an Indian shall be considered enfranchised when he becomes possessed of a lot of land in his own right within the reserve, and has gone through certain forms. But this enfranchisement has nothing to do with voting. If the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell had passed it would have disfranchised the Indians who are now enfranchised. The Indians of the older Provinces, who are living outside of reserves like other people and who now vote, would, if that motion had carried, have been obliged to again go on reserves and acquire land before they could exercise the franchise. I point this out to show that some hon, gentlemen who have spoken do not exactly understand what is meant by enfranchisement under the Indian Act.

Mr. DAVIES. How many are outside of Indian reserves?

Mr. DAWSON. Not a great many; a few in all our villages and towns throughout the Dominion. I could give the number in my constituency of those who live outside the reserves. Another point to which I desire to call attention is this, that the Act, as regards Indians, contains nothing new. The same thing occurs in the Confederation Act, which in section 41 provides:

"That until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides at any election for a member of the House of Commons for the district of Algoma, in addition to persons qualified by the law of the Province of Canada to vote, every male British subject of the age of twenty-one years, or upwards, being a householder, shall have a vote."

An hon. MEMBER. This Bill cannot affect that.

Mr. DAWSON. A householder is to have a vote. The holder, and all this Bill gives him is the right to vote if qualified like other people. I repeat it is plainly said in the Confederation Act that every person of twentyone years and upwards, and being a householder, in the district of Algoma, shall have a vote at elections there. There are no exceptions made, and that is in a district covering one half of the territory of Ontario. Some hon. members have said, and more particularly the member for Bothwell, that we have been exceedingly liberal about extending the franchise to Indians. That hon. gentleman said it would enfranchise 50,000, 10,000 of whom would vote, but he is alone in that opinion. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. McCraney) has spoken very strongly on this subject, saying that it was monstrous to give Indians votes. At the same time he quoted from the Ontario Act to show how it extended the franchise and how very liberal its provisions were as compared with those of the Bill now before the House. What is the effect of that Act? It goes quite as far in giving the franchise to Indians as this Dominion Bill does. Such is the effect of the Ontario Act, which is esteemed by the Opposition as such a perfect measure. In order that the House may understand how the Legislature of Ontario deals with this matter in its election law, I will read from the revised statutes the clause relating to Indians all over the Province of Ontario. The old law of Ontario says this:

"All Indians or persons with part Indian blood who have been duly enfranchised, and all Indians or persons with part Indian blood who do not reside among Indians, though they participate in the annuities, interest moneys and rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, subject to the same qualifications in other respects, and to the same provisions as other persons in the electoral districts."

That law was interpreted and supposed to mean that all Indians outside of reservations and living as other people do, were at liberty to vote like other people, and also that all enfranchised Indians within the reservations were at liberty to vote. In 1882 a new election law was passed in Ontario, and it provided that all Indians might vote who did not receive interest moneys or annuities from the Government. This provision was made, notwithstanding that the annuity was something which no Government had the slightest influence over, and was money which was received from his lands, and therefore, although it has been spoken of in this House as a gratuity or a gift to these people, it is not a gift in any sense, but a payment to which they are justly entitled, a payment confirmed to them by treaty, and a payment over which no Government can exercise the slightest influence. Now, what are the provisions in the last Bill passed by the Ontario Legislature. It says:

"Where there is a voters' list, all Indians, or persons with part Indian blood, who have been duly enfranchised, and all Indians or persons with part Indian blood who do not reside among Indians, though they participate in the annuities, interest, moneys and rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, subject to the same qualifications in other respects, and to the same provisions and restrictions as other persons in the electoral districts.

and to the same provisions and restrictions as other persons in the electoral districts.

"But the Indians or persons with part Indian blood who are entitled to vote where there is no voters' list, shall be only the following, namely:—All Indians, or persons with part Indian blood, who have been duly enfranchised, and all unenfranchised Indians or persons with part Indian blood who do not participate in the annuities, interests, moneys or rents of a tribe, band or body of Indians, and do not reside among Indians, subject to the same qualifications in other respects and to the same provisions and restrictions as other persons in the same electoral districts."

That, in fact, enfranchises all Indians who are qualified as other people are, or, in other words, all Indians who live like white people. Now, all Indians pay taxes to the Dominion Government. I saw a calculation not long ago by a gentleman who takes an interest in Indian matters, showing that the indirect taxes which the Indians pay are greater on the average than those paid by white men. Before now we have seen Indians in Parliament, and they have not shown themselves to be inferior to other men. I believe that at one time a large portion of the Legislature of Manitoba was Confederation Act gives the Indian a vote if he is a house- composed of Indians, and they did not show any inferiority to their white neighbors. In my opinion, the Ontario Act | had upon it by this House. We heard the same cry in the does not differ very materially from the Bill now before us, and on the whole, I think that the Bill is quite as liberal as the former Ontario Act, though the Act lately passed by Ontario extends the franchise a little further. It looks much as if the Ontario Government had this Bill before them and that they wished to go a step further than the Dominion Government were willing to go. I am strongly of opinion that the Dominion Parliament should regulate the franchise for the election of its own members. I heard some hon, members on the Opposition side almost agree that the Dominion Parliament should fix the franchise, if they made it suitable to the different Provinces. Probably there is a great deal of truth in that, and instead of having a uniform franchise we might make a franchise adapted to the different Provinces; but, at any rate, I think it is highly injudicious that the Provinces should regulate the franchise for the election of members to this House. I heard an hon member the other night state his views very eloquently and clearly, and he seemed to think that the last Ontario Act was a very proper one, where it provides that residence should be a condition to a person voting who has property in different electoral districts. I think there are circumstances where that might act very harshly. Take the case of my own district. There are there a great many absentee proprietors, if you may call them so; that part of the country is divided into two separate districts, and I think it would be very hard that people, who, perhaps during the winter season live in some other part of the country, should not be allowed to record their votes where they have their property; and yet the Ontario Act would not allow them to do so. I think there are some other cases in which this provincial legislation for Dominion purposes would not be very desirable. Take one instance. Clause 19 of this Act provides for a case in which a gentleman was unseated and disqualified by the courts of the country, and yet by a clause of this very election Act, which we are called upon to adopt as a law for the Dominion-by that very Act the decision of the court is overruled. The court declared the gentleman to be ur seated, and the Legislature of Ontario steps in and ceclares that he was legally elected, and shall take his seat in Parliament. It goes so far as to say:

"This Act may be pleaded as a bar and discharge to any petition or action pending or which may be filed or brought against the said gentleman for any matter, cause or thing mentioned in this Act, and shall also be a discharge of any judgment, decree or order for any such penalty as is mentioned in the next preceding section, with any costs in such judgment."

Here, the law of Ontario, which we are called upon to adopt, and which these hon gentlemen admire so much, upsets a judgment of a court under the law of the land, and declares a gentleman qualified to sit in the Legislature whom the courts have declared not to be qualified. Are we to adopt a law of that kind as the law of the Dominion? If we adopt it in one of its parts we must adopt it in all, and I do not think that is desirable. Now, the hon, member for Bothwell has expressed himself in the most unmeasured terms about the Indians being incapable of exercising the franchise, and in speaking he took a very wide sweep, and referred to the Mexican and South American Republics. It is curious that it did not occur to him, when he was so speaking, that the Indians of that region showed capacity for great development, and that, at the time of the invasion of the Spaniards, they were very far advanced in civilisation; they showed that they were capable of being civilised and capable of self-government; in fact, they were equal to the people who conquered them, except in the use of firearms. If the Indians are not equal to the white man, whose fault is it? I think the white man has a great deal to answer for in cornection with the degradation in which the Indians are kept. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says this question winter of 1881-82, when some resolutions were being passed with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway; we were dared to go to the country and see whether the people would sanction those resolutions. The Government went to the country, and what was the result? We all know they were sustained; and I have no doubt, if they went to the country on this Bill, and it was thoroughly understood by the people, they would be in like manner sustaired. The hon. member for Bothwell speaks very fluently about an arbitrary Minister and a servile majority. He might apply the same remark to minorities. I think it is not becoming in a member of this House to apply these terms to those on the opposite side of the House. Members on one side, I presume, have their ideas, and are quite as independent as on the one side as on the other side; and for an hon. memb r to express himself in that manner, in the heat of discussion -I suppose that must account for it—is, to say the least, highly improper. The hon, gentleman went on to compare the present position with that of the Greeks before the battle of Marathon. He went over the whole wide world, and back into remote history. I think there is another battle of much older date than the battle of Marathon, and it is told of in a very philosophic strain, from which even the hon member for Bothwell might have gained a great deal of knowledge; that is the battle of the frogs and mice. But supposing the Act, instead of including Indians, had said "excluding Indians and Chinamen," what would then have been the course of the Opposition? They would have said to the supporters of the Government: Oh, you are excluding the Indians, who are well qualified to vote; here you are bringing forward an Act which shows that you have no sympathy for the Indians; and those troubles in the North-West have been caused by your want of sympathy for them, and future trouble may arise from the Indians seeing that the Government of this country has declared that they are aliens and has placed, them by this Act, in such a position that they cannot exercise the franchise or possess the same rights as white men. That is what we should have heard from the Opposition, if the Indians had been excluded from the operation of the Act; we should have heard loud lamentations about the cruelty of excluding them. I only rose to say a few words on this subject, and I shall no longer detain the House.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) I certainly do not intend to apologise to the House for speaking on this question to-night, although perhaps under different circumstances I might have done so. When I listened to my hon. friend opposite, who hails from Lincoln, I had considerable doubt of the nature of the resolution before the Chair. I remember, on a previous occasion in this debate, we were reminded that it was sonfined to clause 3, and some of our friends on this side were somewhat summarily called to order when they wandered a little away from that subject. I should like to ask where that hon. gentleman travelled this evening. Why, he gave us the history of legislation in Ontario ever since Confederation. We were treated to the usual stock of extracts, which my hon. friend is so notable for collecting, displaying, as he remarked, the inconsistency of hon. gentlemen on this side, notably the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Tr. w.) These gentlemen are perfectly able to take care of themselves and their constituencies, but I wondered, when he began to discuss the revising barristers section, where it came under clause 3, and concluded he had some how or other widened out very considerably the argument. I should have, at the same time, been very sorry if some one had called the hon, gentleman to order, because it was very pleasant to hear an hon. gentleman on that side rise and express his opinion in any form on this Bill. The hon, the should be placed before the electors before any decision is First Minister said this afternoon that representative insti-Mr. DAWson.

tutions were on trial here; I think they are, but I wonder if the systematic attempt, not to use a disrespectful word to hon, gentlemen opposite, by which they persistently refuse to discuss the features of the Bill, show their idea of representative institutions. I wonder if that was the mode in which representative institutions were established in this House. It seemed to me that if the hon. gentleman's argument was worth anything it lay in the direction that the minority were entirely to give up their views and sentiments in reference to any measure, the majority believed was in the political interests of their party, and tamely having that measure thrust upon them, whether they liked it or not. If I understand representative institutions at all, the power we have here is delegated by the people; we are sent here by the people for the purpose of voicing their sentiments, not for the purpose of sitting down quietly, accepting any measure that may be presented to the House by the majority, without discussing it on its merits. How many gentlemen opposite have attempted to discuss this question on its merits? During the famous three days discussion, when they broke out from their silence and on Saturday night discussed the issues before the House, I venture to say that there is not one of those gentlemen who spoke that evening who would not gladly recall the words he then uttered. I believe representative institutions are on their trial on this occasion, because I believe the first element involved in them is that we should have a full and free opportunity of discussing the questions before the House. So far as my opinions are concerned, I do not regard this measure with any favor. The circumstances under which the hon. First Minister introduced that question to us this afternoon were not calculated to strengthen our respect for the mode in which hon gentlemen opposite have handled the question. The hon gentleman now suggests it is time to discuss the measure in a calm, dispassionate manner, and was willing to accept any suggestions that would make the measure perfect, and shadowed forth, as I understood him, some serious changes he proposes to introduce. How different that ground is to the ground he took up at the commencement of the debate. When the measure was first brought down we were told distinctly that it would be a measure to establish a uniform suffrage throughout the Dominion, that we were to have equitable representation through all parts of the Dominion, and that no longer the system of Provinces selecting their representatives under their own systems should obtain. Another distinguished feature of this measure, the woman franchise clause was abandoned by the First Minister, without a word of protest. He made no attempt to defend it, but left it to the tender mercies of his own followers. How did he deal with the next important section, the one more directly affecting Ontario? I refer to the Indian question. Was the same freedom granted to his followers in that matter? No, Sir. It was something remarkable, in connection with that whole discussion, to witness the persistent attempt being made by certain members in discussing that question to cover up the issues involved in the discussion of the particular word "Indian." There is another point in connection with this, to which I would like to call the attention of the committee. At first the leader of the House told us that all Indians were to be enfranchised if they came under the qualification clause. After a while, when this matter was turned over, and I suppose troubles began to spread in the North West, the Government saw it was not desirable that the Indians who are in open rebellion should be entitled to vote, and the Indians in the North-West, Manitoba and British Columbia were excluded from the op ration of this Bill. It was somewhat strange that out of the Indians that remained to be enfranchised, as this Bill calls it, over one-half are fresident in Ontario, and a large portion are scattered in little bands on reserves in various feature there crops up the inference that one prime object of this Bill is to reach, in certain connections, certain members of the Opposition in Ontario who otherwise could not be readily defeated. We have been told by the hon. member for Lincoln and the hon, member for Algoma that this was an enfranchisement of the Indians, and that if the amendment of the hon, member for Bothwell had carried it would disfranchise all the Indians. All I have to say is, that in turning to the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) I find it reads:

"That after the word (Indian) the following words be added: who has been enfranchised under the Indian Act and has had conferred upon him the same social capacities as other persons who are qualified to vote in this country"

I give my hon, friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) credit for having the welfare of the Indian at heart, but it was not the intention of this Act to bestow upon the Indian the qualifications of citizenship in the ordinary sense of the word. He is simply to vote under the occupancy clause, by which it is not necessary that he should have any control over the portion of the reserve on which he is located, excepting that he must live in a bark hut, or a tepee, or any kind of residence which enables him to occupy a piece of ground, which the revising barrister may be satisfied is worth $150. It is not enfranchising the Indians. It is simply creating a number of voting machines. We do not enfranchise a Chinaman or a negro, or any other man, white or black, mixed or colored, unless he has qualified himself for the duties of citizenship, by taking all the responsibilities attached to it. Other men can be sued for their debts, but you cannot reach the Indian under the ordinary contracts. He is as much a minor as a child, and is absolutely under the control of the Government of the day. When we remember that more than half the Indians in the older Provinces of the Dominion are located in the Province of Ontario, on reserves which are within the bounds of existing constituencies, it is easy to see the reasons for introducing this iniquitous measure. It is a gross wrong to the electorate of those ridings. The Indians have nothing in common with the rest of the people, politically, socially or industrially. In any of those counties there is more than enough of an Indian vote to swamp the free choice of the people of the riding, and thus a great injustice is being done to the people. Hon, gentlemen say they are anxious to elevate the Indian. So are we; but will they tell us how giving him an opportunity once in five years to deposit a ballot which, in half the cases, he will not be able to deposit for himself, without the instructions to voters who cannot read or write, will have that effect? He is still under the control of the Government of the day as much as ever. Yet they pretend to say this is enfranchising the Indian. I say it gives him no rights of citizenship whatever. He takes no responsibilities with it. It does not enable him to go out into social life and take any of the various positions that are open to every citizen. He is still an Indian on his tribal reserve, and except for the opportunity of having his ballot marked for him once in five years, he is no nearer elevation than he was before. Sir, I despair of the Indian ever being elevated if these are the elevating influences that are to surround him. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the other night, had the independence to express his opinion with reference to the quality of the Indian vote in his riding. He said one thing, which I think expresses more than anything else the feeling he had in reference to the power involved in that and one or two other clauses of this Bill. He said he wanted the leader of the Government to remain the leader of this House for many years to come, but he must say that if the Liberal party came to control the affairs of this country, and had the power conferred upon them by this Bill, he would dislike to have that applied to sections of the other Provinces. In connection with this his own county if he were a candidate. Sir, could there be a more emphatic condemnation of this Bill? Yet they call this elevating the Indian to a position of citizenship, and giving him equal rights and privileges with the rest of the electorate of this Dominion.

Mr. HESSON. Give us something fresh. We have had that already four times from you.

Mr. BAIN. Hon. gentlemen opposite will need to hear it four times more before they can understand it. If my hon, friend will get up and say this is placing the Indian in a position of citizenship, the same as he and I occupy, then I will abandon any attempt to make him understand this question. But he knows right well, and the leader of the Government knows right well, that the Indian's hands will be tied ment knows right well, that the Indian's hands will be tied, and they do not expect that he will exercise the Franchise freely and independently. Sir, if intelligence should regulate the adjustment of the franchise I would ask the leader of the Government how it was that he so readily abandoned the principle of giving the franchise to women who represent property, and who show that they have the intelligence to take care of it, while he is yet so tenacious of giving the Indian a vote, when he dare not trust him with control of his own property? Is not that a proof that on this occasion intelligence does not count, and that something else made the right hon. gentleman so tenacious of the Indian vote and so easy to abandon woman suffrage. There is another feature in this Bill which shows that, after all, it does not secure a uniformity of franchise in this Dominion. I refer to Prince Edward Island, and while the hon. gentleman declined to give it the concession that its members asked for, he hoped yet to broaden out the Bill so as to qualify nearly all the people there who now exercise the suffrage. Now, Sir, I think that if the members of some of the other Provinces would speak out honestly they would rise up and object to having what, in former years, has been the parliamentary qualification of the Province of Ontario obtruded upon their Province, just as our friends from Prince Edward Island have objected to the franchise of the other Provinces being imposed upon their Province. One of the hon. members for King's, P. E. I., has shown his independence by placing an amendment in your hands that proposes to retain manhood suffrage. The provision he proposes to insert would certainly be unique if it was placed in the Bill providing for a uniform franchise in this Dominion. It is nothing less than this, that in that clause which recites the qualification in cities and towns for the various electoral districts in this Dominion, after the words "every person shall," and then the definition follows, he proposes to insert "except in the Province of Prince Edward Island." Now, if this Bill had met their approbation would these gentlemen have asked that that particular clause should be inserted in it? I confess that I felt a little amused at the report that Hansard has given of the hon, gentleman's remarks on moving this amendment. He is reported as saying that it was absurd to think that the various Legislatures should have power to fix the franchise of the various electoral divisions that elect representatives to this House; and he went on to say that in their island they had had manhood suffrage for twenty-five or thirty years, both with respect to the Local Legislature and with respect to this House, and that it had worked well. Yet, while in one breath he said it was absurd that the Provinces should fix the qualification for the election of members to this House, in the very next breath he says: We have a qualification different from what is proposed to be established for members of this House, and which, if he carries his amendment, will be retained, and he tells us it has worked admirably in his Province. I say there is no gentleman in this House, if he spoke the honest sentiments of his heart, who would not get up and re-echo the statement that the provincial franchises in the various I shall not be entitled to vote. It seems to trouble that hon, Mr. BAIN.

Provinces had worked satisfactorily, both as respects the election of members for the Provincial Legislatures and as respects the election of members for the House of Commons. I venture to prophesy that if the Government refuse, and the leader of the Government has indicated that he will refuse, to concede to Prince Edward Island the right to have its own franchise, we shall not find the mover of the amendment to the amendment continuing his opposition to the Government Bill. He will quietly accept the situation and support the Government, although they have perpetrated this gross outrage upon the Province. It must be remembered that values vary in the different Provinces, and that $300 will not represent the same voting power in the Maritime Provinces as in British Columbia or the North-West, so there will not be uniformity. The hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) had a peculiar dread of the Ontario Legislature and seems to imagine that nothing should be allowed in their charge. He undertook to tell the House that the Opposition wished the Ontario franchise to be imposed on the rest of the Dominion. But if the leader of the Government copied his Franchise Bill from any Province he copied the cast-off franchise of the Province of Ontario, which he now proposes to use as a mould in which all the rest of the Dominion is to be run. We, on this side of the House, do not propose to impose the Ontario franchise on the other Provinces at all. But we say that in all the Provinces they should pursue the same course which they have pursued satisfactorily for the life-time of this Confederationleave the various Provinces to work out their own local destinies and regulate their own franchises as they see fit. The leader of the House is not only attempting to impose the franchise of one Province on the rest, but he is attempting to resist the steps in advance which have been taken by the Province of Ontario in the matter of the franchise. His own friends in Ontario, represented by Mr. Meredith and his followers, are ultra-Librals in this matter. They do not, like this Government, propose to exclude all the wage earners of the people below $400 income from the right to have a vote. I remember when hon, gentlemen were extremely soliticious about the wage-earners and the workingmen of the Dominion. But, when it comes to the question of who shall control the destinies of the country, we find them going back to the old proposition that no man with an income of less than $400 a year should be entitled to a vote, a provision which has been left far behind by the Legislature of Ontario. I wish to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if they are true to the traditions and associations of their own political party in Ontario they will step out further in this matter of the franchise, as Mr. Meredith and his followers have declared themselves in favor of manhood suffrage, as applied to provincial legislation. I say, if there is one case more than another where manhood suffrage should be applied it is not in the case of the Provinces, where they deal with local rights and the rights of property, and when they have direct taxation, but in the case of this Dominion, where our taxes are indirect, and where every man who wears clothes, consumes groceries, or, for that matter, smokes cigars or drinks liquor, contributes to the taxation. We found that the hon. member for Lincoln, with that modesty which characterises him, said that he did not wish to blow his own trumpet, but that so far back as 1868 he had advocated this income franchise, and that two or three years afterwards he introduced a Bill which the Ontario Government of the day adopted, and it became law. I would point out to him that this Dominion has made immense strides within the past fifteen years, and that the hon. gentleman, perhaps, owing to his associations since that time, has not maintained his progressive instincts, because we find him now supporting a proposition that unless a man earns $100 a year income he gentleman very much that the Local Legislature of Ontario have devoted themselves to the management of their provincial affairs and the maintenance of their provincial rights. I would ask him if it was not their bounden duty to take charge of provincial affairs and to resist the encroachments of the Federal Government, or of any other Government which attempted to encroach upon their rights. ment which attempted to encroach upon their rights. I think the history of the last few years shows that their resistance has been just and equitable, and that there has been an unfair attempt on the part of the Federal Government to encroach on the rights of the Province of Ontario; and I say the leader of the Provincial Government would have been false to the interests of his Province if he had not taken every justifiable means to prevent the Dominion from overriding provincial rights. I fear that the result which was demonstrated so often, that the Province was right and that the leader of this House was wrong, is one reason why that hon, gentleman has displayed such a dislike to the Province of Ontario and its Government, and is determined that on no opportunity shall that Province have anything to say or do in vindication of its rights, where it is possible to avoid it. I say distinctly and advisedly that the action of the right hon, gentleman and his associates has done more to place the Province of Ontario in antagonism to the rest of the Dominion, that his unjust and illegal demand have done more to cultivate a feeling of dislike towards Confederation, and towards the Government now administering the affairs of the Dominion in the Province of Ontario, than anything else. I say this is only natural, and I should despise the man who was a citizen of that Province who would not stand up for the rights of his own Province against the federal authority, because I say that just in proportion as they preserve those provincial rights shall we strengthen this Dominion; and it is the best guarantee of the perpetuity of this Dominion that while we are Provinces of the Confederation each Province shall have absolute and distinct control of its own affairs. With regard to the propositions before this House, so far as my own Province is concerned, I say that no unbiased man can come to any other conclusion than that the Ontario franchise is the more liberal one. Any unbiassed individual looking at the two can only come to this conclusion, that for taking in the largest number of citizens and spreading abroad, as far as possible, the right to vote, the Ontario Act is far ahead of the Bill now proposed. All we ask is that we be allowed to administer our local affairs according to our own peculiarities. While I do not dispute, and no hon. gentleman on this side has disputed, the right of the Government to fix a uniform franchise for this Dominion, I say their action will plunge the various Provinces into many inconveniences, aside from the question of expense. The hon, member for Lincoln says we have caused more expense by this debate than the Bill will cost in one year; but the result will show differently. I never knew the class from whom the revising barristers will be taken to work for small fees if they can get better, and I do not understand that the right hon. leader of the House is going to ask his friends, to whom those positions will be given, to work for a paltry pittance. Those gentlemen are going to have extraordinary powers conferred upon them, which will make it utterly impossibly for anybody who is not in their favor to have his name placed on the voters' list. They are to have autocratic power; they are to say who shall and who shall not be on the lists, and there is no provision for an appeal; they are the final court of resort. Yet that is the mode in which hon, gentle-

That arbitrary provision in this Bill makes Government. it such an intolerable measure that I feel that I would be false to the best interest-not of the Opposition of the day, because that is a small matter, in view of the changes in political parties—but to the interests of the people of this whole Dominion, did I not protest against any such scheme as this being carried out. It is deliberately designed to take from the people a right that belongs to them, in which the Government step beyond the ordinary ground that the majority of a deliberative body are entitled to occupy. The provisions of this Bill are of a nature that make it a gross infringement on the liberties and rights of the people of this country; and are we to be told that we are to sit quietly here and submit, without raising a voice against it? I do not so understand my legislative duties, and I am satisfied that my people at home will not so regard them. The principles involved in this Bill, while they may bring a temporary success to the Government of the day, are grossly unjust to the people, and have in them the elements that will one day work destruction and ruin to our representative institutions.

Mr. FAIRBANK. In the remarks of the hon. First Minister, this afternoon-remarks that we have not often been favored with in this discussion—doubt was expressed as to whether we were in earnest. Had I the ability or the power, I should not leave that question in any doubt, so far as I am concerned. I think, Sir, our earnestness has been to a considerable extent tested already. During the week before last it was put to the test of work day and night; there was no let-up; applications for adjournments were refused; on one occasion, some ten days ago, we saw those who evidently believed they had nothing to do, provide themselves with pillows, saying to us very distinctly: Go on, we will test your bottom. That test has been made, to some extent, and I trust that gentlemen opposite are satisfied with it. We have been charged, during this discussion, with designedly intending to destroy the health of the First Minister. That has been emphatically repudiated; for my part, I most emphatically deny it. I believe there are a number of undertakings on hand which it is very desirable the Prime Minister should carry out. This charge is reiterated in the Mail, under the head "Be Ready, Steady:" "The attempt to ruin Sir John A. Macdonald's health in Parliament has been accompanied with the same systematic attempt to ruin his public reputation in the Grit press." Those charges may have some weight with those who were not in this Chamber at any time during this debate, but they will have little weight with those on the floor or in the gallery, who witnessed the proceedings. They must have noticed that at an early hour the Prime Minister wound up the legislative clock, put his seal on his supporters lips, and went to, I hope, comfortable rest. Certainly, he did not experience the fatigues others did. We have been reminded of our responsibility. But it is quite possible we have a pretty distinct idea of our own responsibility. The question involved is not a question of money alone, although considerable money is involved in it. Speaking for myself, it would be a very important question indeed that would place me on my feet after one o'clock in the morning to address any committee on business questions. But we consider it to be of much more value, touching principles which our people value higher than even questions of considerable amounts of money, and I believe the question before us is one which "can only escape condemnation by avoiding observation." believe it is our intention to do our duty in this respect, neither men opposite propose to work out free institutions. The hon, member for Lincoln knows very well how that provision will operate in many counties I could name; and, I fear, if the truth were known about this Bill, that that is duty. We were glad that one member on the other side, the one of its recommendations to the supporters of the hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), obtained permission from the First Minister to address the House. He spoke at some length of what they were going to allow. We have had illustrations of that in days gone by. We have seen attempts to cripple this debate; on one occasion we saw nearly the entire front rank hunting up authorities by which we could be kept more clearly to the finest point under consideration. The hon, member for Lincoln said that Ontario was assuming too much importance in this matter. Any one can see that this is at the bottom of the whole measure, for I believe if we could eliminate from this question the antipathy to the Mowat Administration vou would take a very large element out of the Act. If Mr. Mowat would only resign or leave the country and surrender to hon. gentlemen opposite the Government he manages, one great cause of disturbance and irritation and discontent would be removed from the Ministerial benches. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) gave as a reason for this measure that the Provinces might pass new franchises. Further on, he said that Ontario had passed an Act which disfranchised non-resident property holders. Of course, that was incorrect; Ontario did not disfranchise them, but limited them in effect to one vote where they reside. I shall not follow that hon, gentleman, who went back as far as 1866, but will refer simply to his contention that the people thoroughly understood the Bill; on the contrary, I believe that not one person in a thousand in this Dominion knew anything about the franchise Bill at the beginning of this discussion. He said the statements we were making with regard to the expense were as exaggerated as those we had made with reference to the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, that may come back to the hon, gentleman before long. If the expenses under this Bill are indicated as clearly as were the estimates of the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I fancy our predictions will not fall far short of the mark. In discussing the Ontario Act the hon. gentleman ignored a large number to whom it gives the franchise under the provision of householders and wage-earners. I propose to address my remarks to the question of the provincial franchise as against the franchise proposed by this Bill. Certainly, the constitution gave the Dominion Parliament the authority to choose what franchise it would have. But whether it gave them the right under existing circumstances is another question, In 1874, under Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, after the people had received notice and their support had been asked, the measure was carried under which we are now acting. In first submitting this to the people, Mr. Mackenzie acted like himself and like the party he led; in declining, first, to submit it to the people, the present action is like the party opposite. It is not urged that the measure which was then drawn by Mr. Dorion, a gentleman who possesses the respect of everyone, has not given satisfaction. It is true that the member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated that the 13 members of the Government would be disfranchised under the Ontario law. It was news for us, that the 13 ministers were all from Ontario, and it is not the case in a single instance that one of those members will be disfranchised. The system which we have pursued in the past is not a new one on this continent, but has been adopted by the United States under circumstances as identical with ours as it is possible for a republican form of Government to be with that under which we live. I believe we might well consider their experience in this regard, and I shall not be debarred from the consideration by the sneers which have been made in reference to the speech of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who said of the hon. member for North Norfolk:

"The hon. gentleman can never stand up in this House, he can never speak on any subject, he can never deal with any branch of the public affairs of this country, without dragging in the United States, without Mr. FAIRBANK.

dragging in the practice of the United States, without dragging in all the great and glorious beauties of the constitution, without holding up to us as models the great men of the United States, as if we had not men in our empire, and especially in our own country, whose example is worthy of being followed, as a bright shining light to guide us in the way we should go."

Sir, there are great men in the empire. Great names who never sneer at the great men of that country; that work is left for small men. The great men of England are proud of their kinsmen in the United States, and rejoice in the assistance they have given to the advancement of civilisation; they rejoice in the additions they have made to the sum of human freedom. The question of the franchise is not a new one with them. our grandfathers were young their ablest men had given their best thought to it, and had decided it, and the result has proved that they decided it wisely. I mention no unknown name when I refer to Col. Alex. Hamilton, one of the brightest intellects this hemisphere has produced, one whom the United States desires to claim as all her own, although he was a West Indian by birth. His remarks read as if they were written during these debates. In relation to the action of the founders of their institutions, Hamilton said:

"To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been to the convention. * * * It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established, or which may be established by the State itself."

Of these measures Bancroft has said:

"They disturb no more than was needed for the success of their work."

In those two lines there is a lesson of wisdom that we would do well to follow. Those gentlemen who are in earnest in desiring to perpetuate Confederation would do well to take those words to heart, and in the action of this Parliament disturb as little as possible the autonomy of the Provinces. "A State," said Ellsworth, "is the best judge of the circumstances and temper of its own people." Is not that equally true of us? Can we have a better maxim to go by? Are not the Provinces the best judges of their own circumstances, their own wants and peculiarities? After careful deliberation that convention came to their decision and embodied it in the second article of the constitution:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected by the people of the several States, and the qualification in each State shall be the qualification recognised for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Why the most numerous branch? Because, in dealing with national matters they were dealing with matters which applied to the greatest number of people; in dealing with local matters they were dealing with property mainly; and their revenue, like ours, being derived from Customs and Excise, it was very proper that it should have the most extended franchise. They carefully avoided the error which we seem to be about to commit, of curtailing the franchise in many of the Provinces—in some regards, in every one of them—because there is not a single Province in the Dominion, as the Bill stands now, in which a considerable number of voters will not be disfranchised.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Yes; there is British Columbia. Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Nova Scotia.

Mr. FAIRBANK. There is not a single Province in which this Bill does not disfranchise many.

Mr. BAKER. I take objection to the word "considerable," more particularly.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I do not attempt to say to what extent this Bill will disfranchise people in the Pacific Province, but I believe it disfranchises in that Province to almost as great as an extent as it does in any Province, and there is certainly one class of persons in that Province which I know must be disfranchised to a large extent, and that is the miners. In the constitution of the United States there was a disfranchisement of no one. Any person who had a vote in any State retained it in the nation. Said Mr. Wilson:

"It would be very hard and disagreeable for the same persons, at the same time, to vote for representatives in the State Legislature and to be excluded from a vote for those in the National Legislatures."

Is not that equally applicable to us? Trace it through, from beginning to end, and you cannot find a point in it that is not applicable to us. If the slurs of the hon, member for Montreal Centre and the talk about Yankeeism by the hon. member for Lincoln constitute statemanship, then I do not know what it means. The proposition is that many people should have a vote in provincial matters but have nothing to do with national affairs, beyond paying taxes. It resembles the treatment some children receive when told: You can sit at the table when we have no company, but when we have you must stand behind the door and wait. That was not the way the Americans have bound their people to the nation, and the history of the last twenty-five years has shown the wisdom of their action, as there is no nation whose citizens are more attached to their country than are the Americans, not even the English or the German. Would it not be wise on our part to follow their example? Is it not Would it desirable to give our citizens votes, and in no case to deprive them of the power of voting, which they have previously possessed? The American system has withstood severe test. It has stood the test of the country containing millions bondmen. It has stood the test of receiving an immense of body of people who were untrained in the art of civil government. But the foundation was laid broad enough and abiding enough to serve their own people, and all that came to them from across the sea. It served for the homes of hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It served as the home of millions of the race from which the member from Montreal Centre came, and yet the member for Montreal Centre sneers at reference to that nation. I do not think that when the American fathers decided those constitutional matters they were influenced by any questions as to the result of the next election. They were statesmen and patriots in the true sense. Some time ago the Mail newspaper remarked editorially that it did not want to hurt anybody's feelings, but "really the Opposition did not count." I do not want to hurt anybody's feelings, but the sneers of the member for Montreal Centre and the "Yankeeism" of the member for Lincoln do not count. We have reason to be thankful for the remarks made by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), and when he came down from his high pinnacle and condescended to discuss the question with this plebeian Opposition we were pleased. Discussing manhood suffrage he said:

"Neither Ontario nor Quebec have for one moment thought of adopting, but which Ontario, at the last session of its Legislature, voted down by a considerable majority."

If no one had thought of it who were the minority. With respect to the Ontario Act, it is practically manhood suffrage with the assessment roll for registration. It is true that the Government stepped just one step short of it. How long they will leave that step untaken I do not know, but I suspect not very long. The hon. member for Montreal Centre goes on to favor us with the character of those not included in this Bill. He says.

"Sir, I can say to those people, and to the people of Canada generally, that if we have not in this Bill what is commonly known as manhood suffcage, we have, at all events, that which gives a vote to everyone who deserves to be called a man in this country."

Those who are left out are not worthy of being called men. He goes on to say:

"Is it possible that you can go lower than the person who earns $300 n the country and $400 in the city, per annum? Why, Mr. Chairman, know must be disfranchised to a large extent, and that is the miners. In the constitution of the United States there to be registered under this system."

Of course, there was a little mistake there, but probably he did not read the Bill. But why should he read it, when he was simply told that it had to pass, when the decree was registered in caucus, and it was not necessary, even for a legal gentleman, to read the Bill, and therefore he fell into the error of making the qualification $300 instead of $400. He says, further:

"We are giving here the vote to every deserving man in the country, to every man who has succeeded in showing, by his industry, his activity and his energy, that he is worthy of being recognised as a man in the eyes of the law of the land."

Who are these men who are not deserving men, who are not worthy of being recognised as men in the eyes of the law. They are all those freeholders in the cities and towns in the Province of Ontario who own property valued between $200 and $300, and those in villages and townships who own real property between $100 and $150. I am prepared to discontinue my remarks if there is any intention of adjourning.

Mr. BOWELL. Better not cut it in two, because we could not follow you to-morrow.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I am prepared to go on, if hon. gentlemen say so.

An hon. MEMBER. How long will it be?

Mr. FAIRBANK. If the sun gets up before I get down, it will not be my fault.

Mr. BOWELL. So much the worse for the sun, I suppose.

An hon. MEMBER. The sun has further to go than you have.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we had better rise and report progress, and I move accordingly.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the House adjourns I wish to ask the First Minister if there is any further information from General Middleton.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have no further information. I suppose the hon, gentleman has seen that the wires are down, but it is believed that they will be put up during the night, and that we will hear to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is stated—I do not know whether on authority or not—that some further regiments have been put under orders to be ready to go to the front. Can the Minister tell us whether that is the case or not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot speak exactly, but I believe the Minister of Militia has warned one or two regiments to be ready.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at two e'clock a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 12th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock. PRAYERS.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.—(Sir John A. Macdonald).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FAIRBANK. When the House adjourned at two o'clock this morning it necessarily cut my line of argument. I am therefore forced to proceed to splice the line. I do not propose a long splice, but I shall have to ask hon. gentlemen to sit quietly on deck while I make the splice. As you may remember, I had the hon. member for Montreal Centre in tow, and I shall have to make the splice sufficiently strong to continue towing him, not so much on account of the size of the vessel as on account of the shallow water I found him in. I was proceeding to review his description of the persons who would be disfranchised by this Bill, and it is not necessary to repeat the description he then gave. He alluded to them as people who were not entitled to be called men, or recognised in the eyes of the law. I was proceeding to point out who those parties were, and had called attention to the fact that in the Province of Ontario they included all those assessed for real property in cities and towns between $200 and $300; that if they were assessed for $200 they would have a vote under the Mowat Bill, and if of value of less than $300 they would not have a vote under the Bill before us, and hence they came within the class who were not entitled to consideration under the law. In villages and townships those rated between $100 and $150 come within that class, and householders who, although owning their property, do not appear on the assessment roll to the extent of $300, or is of that value in towns and cities. If, however, they are tenants of that property, no matter what its value is, if they pay a rental of $20 a year, they would be entitled to vote, and therefore this class also belonged to those who, according to the hon. member for Montreal Centre, are not entitled to consideration under the law. Again, in the matter of income; all that class of persons whose income is between $250 and $400 come within this class. Then we come to an immense class-the entire class of wage-earners, whose wages amount to over $250 a year—all such, under the Mowat Act, are entitled to the franchise. I believe there is a very prevalent mistake on this point — that wage-earners are to be included under the income provisions of this Now, Sir, I do not profess to be an expert in these things; I have not studied law, but I understand from those who have that the income franchise does not include the wage-earner. I believe that to be the correct view of it—certainly it was so considered by Mr. Mowat and his Government, and I believe this House is prepared to regard him as pretty good authority on law, including constitu-tional law, at the present time. They evidently considered that income did not include the wage-earners, and hence they have given the franchise to all wage-earners of $250; they have inserted a special clause, providing for wage-earners, and under that term an immense number are enfranchised who are excluded by this Bill, and who, according to the member for Montreal Centre, are not "entitled to consideration under the law." There are tens of thousands of the people in Ontario who will be disfranchised by this Bill; and I call the attention of the hon, member for Lincoln to the fact, so that he may think it advisable thoroughly to revise his figures of last night. In as the sum of $1.25 a day. If a man receiving that wage Quebec the disfranchisement is less than in Ontario. Those, works every day in the year he is just cut off; his wages Mr. FAIRBANK.

in cities or towns, forming a part of a county, and who are assessed between $200 and $300, are excluded, and, according to the hon. gentleman, are not entitled to consideration under the law. Now, Sir, I was anxious to test the effect of the Ontario law and this law in the Province of Ontario, and I made an experiment, taking a certain class of men, twenty-five men who are employed in concerns in which I am interested. I could decide from my own knowledge of their position. I found that under the Ontario Act every one of these were enfranchised—every man of them had a vote; some of them had it on two grounds, but all had a vote under the clause which provides for the wage-earner. About half of them would also have had a vote under the householders clause, which embraces, as I remarked last night, 95 per cent. of the married men in the Province of Ontario. Under the Bill before you there are three of these twenty-five of whom I am not quite certain, as I do not know exactly their position—whether they are occupying their own property or are tenants. But eighteen I know would be disfranchised, and four would have a vote out of the twenty-five under this Bill. I submit this to the member for Lincoln as a reason for revising his figures; and I may say that there is not one of those twenty-five men who, by industry, sobriety, obedience to the law and readiness to defend the law, is not the peer of any member in this House. Now, I shall, perhaps, be asked: Are not some of these men so circumstanced that they could be given the franchise? That is not the point; the question is, does the law give it to them. Some of them are so circumstanced that their employer could give them the franchise, as some of them are householders without paying rent, some have their dwellings on leased land which does not pay a rental equal to $20 a year. That is the condition of some of these men, and so they are cut off. I do not profess to be as familiar as the members from British Columbia are with the condition of their people; but I shall be much surprised to learn if, they having manhood suffrage, this Bill does not cut off an immense number, particularly of those who are engaged with drill and blast in opening the vaults where nature has concealed her treasures—I refer to the miners. From New Brunswick I have seen an official statement from one county which shows that 500 are disfranchised there of those who hold the franchise as their fathers and grandfathers did. In Nova Scotia the disfranchisement is less, but shipowners there are disfranchised. We have to remember that in these two Provinces personal property is recognised. This Bill does not provide for personal property. Hence, those who may have been in the habit of exercising their rights as voters since they came of age, and their fathers before them, are to be disfranchised. There are thousands and tens of thousands in Ontario and in every other Province who will be disfranchised by this Bill, and who, consequently, under the law as laid down by the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), are not entitled to be recognised as men. In Ontario and other Provinces there are huadreds, I do not know but thousands, of the young men who are now in the field under arms who will be disfranchised, and tens of thousands more who are ready to take the field if necessary. The member for Montreal Centre, I presume, is an excellent authority on law, but I do not think much of his arithmetic. For instance, he states that every man earning $1 a day will be enfranchised. I did not know that they had a peculiar kind of year in his section, but it is a long year in Ontario that has 400 working days in it. Even supposing the Bill did include the wage earners, the sum is a fixture at $400. The Bill might be amended to include them; we are dealing with it as it now stands and as it came from the hands of its framers. Perhaps no rate of wages is so common all over the country would amount to $391; and the man who works for $1.00 a day would, of course, be cut off. Yet, Sir, this is the kind of information that is given to the public. In the Mail of a day or two ago, under the heading, "Will They Define It?" the writer, speaking of a member in this House, asks:

"Was he justified in hinting that the people of Ontario would become traitors if Sir John enfranchised more of the workmen of Ontario?"

When the Bill proposes to disfranchise tens of thousands, this leading paper has the cheek to ask a question of that kind. When the gentlemen occupying seats in this House return to their constituents and stand before hundreds and thousands of those who enjoyed the franchise up to this time, but whom this Bill cuts off, or who would enjoy it but for this Bill, if they never blushed before, I think that fact will bring the blush of shame to their cheeks. I have not referred to Prince Edward Island, where every man who pays his road tax is entitled to vote. The member for Montreal Centre provided for that in his own mind. He said:

"I am pleased to find that the hon, gentleman who has just made the sub-amendment is likely to carry it in this House, and that in the Island of Prince Edward the franchise that has existed there for so many years is likely to be maintained."

Fortunate Island! What a pity it is we do not all live on an island! We should all be exempt from this Bill; I could then gladly vote for it. What deep heartrending regrets must have stolen over that member when he heard the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday that he could not consent to that exception. But I suppose he will still support the measure. The member for Montreal Centre closed his remarks with an apology to the Province of Quebec, and stated to them, by way of consolation, that their Local Government would not be interfered with. I hope, Sir, they will make the most of this consolation. I shall now cut the tow line and let the member for Montreal Centre go. Mr. Chairman, how changed is the measure now before us, even though we are only on section 3, from what it was when it came to us. As that beautiful craft came sailing in, we saw a fair spinster and a charming widow standing on the deck; the "heathen Chinee" was in the cabin, and the banded Indian was concealed in the hold. Sir, we have quickly disposed of the ladies; we have kicked them on shore; the "heathen Chince" we have strangled; the banded Indian we have dragged from his concealment, and those of them that were of no immediate use, we have put on shore, but we will retain those in the old Provinces. We will particularly retain those that may be useful in scalping the member for Bothwell and the member for Brant. We have been surprised, from time to time, at the silence on the Ministerial benches upon these points. I have read in an old volume I was taught to respect, but which is sometimes neglected, the sentence: "Brayeth the wild ass when he hath grass, or loweth the ox when he hath fodder." view of this silence, one is forced to enquire: Is this Bill so friendless that it has no one to defend it? Is it despised in the House of its friends? In well regulated courts, when a criminal is found to have no one to plead his case, the judge appoints some one to defend him. It would seem to be necessary to do so in this case. In the absence of defence from the Ministerial benches, we are forced to seek it elsewhere; and the next best authority we have is their organs. There are some people who do not read the Mail. It is a mistake. There is lots of fun in it; it aids digestion; I have tried it. I will give you an example, taken from a recent number, in defence of this measure. It says, referring to those who oppose the measure:

"They encouraged the dynamitish propagandism in every form. They had friendly words for the Nihilists. They adopted the doctrines of Henry George regarding the confiscation of land. They encouraged disaffected Nova Scotians to rebel. They encouraged British Columbia to secede. They incited the Maritoba settlers to rebel.

It is the intention of the Grit party to break up the Confederation if they cannot rule it."

Then the writer proceeds to give advice to the Minister. He expresses some doubts as to whether the Minister will receive it or not; I have more serious doubts than he. He advises a dissolution and proceeds to say:

"We should force through all the necessary measures, sacrificing everything not essential to public business, and drag these Grit traitors and treason mongers to the foot of the polls, which the people of Canada would speedily convert into a gallows. That would teach them a lesson in loyalty as understood by the people of Canada, and especially by the people of Ontario."

The writer of that article is only joking. He does not mean to erect a gallows; he is not going into the hanging business. He is not ignorant of the story of Haaman and Mordecai; he is not going to stand the chance of the parties getting mixed at the gallows. He is not going to take the chance of the people enquiring who it is that defend the public treasury and who do not, who invade the people's liberties and who defend them. He asks in the same number: "What will they say at the front?"

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think you are going very far from the question before the House. You are not citing matters relevant to the question.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I understand you, Mr. Chairman, to rule that these articles are not relevant. You and I, Sir, exactly agree. I should have said this article in the Mail was not relevant to the question at all, but hon, gentlemen opposite would not have accepted my decision. I hope they will accept that of the Deputy Speaker. I shall, in obedience to your ruling, have nothing more to do with the Mail as an authority on this question, and proceed at once to show that from the beginning of this discussion to the present, there has been no attempt whatever show dissatisfaction with the existing law. The has been no call for a change. The present system has stood the test of eighteen years successfully. From this side of the House the charge has been made and repeated that the object of this measure was to gain political advantage. That charge has not yet been denied. If it be denied, I should like to hear stated the ground of 'the denial. I believe this change is contrary to the wishes of the people. If you would eliminate from the question all consideration of party advantage, I do not believe one man out of a hundred in the whole Dominion will approve of it. Let us apply to it the test, whether it comes under that class of subjects with which the Dominion can deal better than the Provinces, because in the Confederation that rule should hold. Those things the Provinces can do best should be reserved to them to attend to. We have in the Dominion serious disadvantages to deal with, vastly greater than those the American States had to contend against. They were a compact succession of Provinces along the Atlantic coast, closely connected, not even a mountain range separating them, while our territory stretches from ocean to ocean with long gaps of "unbroken desolation intervening." Under any circumstances Canada is a difficult country to govern, and these geographical difficulties which cannot be overcome, add immensly to the difficulty. Each Province has its local history, its local preju-It is exceeddices, its local business and interests. difficult to weld them into uniformity. tends to block the advance of views in relation to the franchise, and will anyone contend that the disposition to extend the franchise is not growing? Any one who has examined the Ontario franchise must come to the conclusion that it is manhood suffrage, with the assessment roll as a registration. In fact, the opposition to it was based on the ground that it did not go far enough, and that opposition came from those who entertain the political views to hon, gentlemen opposite. If this Bill passes in its present form, and is enforced as it is possible to enforce it, it will cause a loss of a class of citizens to Canada that we do not wish to lose, and that cannot be replaced by immigration machinery. The principles underlying this measure are of far greater importance than any mere party considerations. It strikes deeper than we can afford to go. Once it was a proud privilege to say: I am a Roman citizen; and it should be a proud privilege to say: I am a Canadian citizen; but if this Bill is put in force, that will be deprived of half its value. Party feeling is sufficiently intense in Canada, but no measure has been passed in the last thirty years which will tend to produce so intense a party feeling as this. I believe it will even create personal hatred, that it will invade church relations, business relations, and social relations, and will inflict irreparable injury upon Canada. It is claimed that, the measure having gone so far, it is difficult to withdraw it. We were told yesterday, in the mild speech of the First Minister, that representative government was on trial. We glory in our representative government, but whom does it represent? It represents the people of Canada. We claim that the people of Canada do not want this measure, and we are willing to rest our political existence on this fact, we throw down our challenge to submit it to the people. If they sanction it, our mouths The feeling prevails that the measure are forever closed. cannot be dropped without a sacrifice of dignity, but it would give the Government a claim to patriotism if they would withraw it. I should be glad to see this measure dipped in carbolic acid, sprinkled with chloride of lime, and burnt upon the altar of the Dominion in atonement for pursued.

Mr. PLATT. When the First Minister rose at the opening of the House yesterday, I cherished the hope that he was about to reveal to the House that he had realised the situation and was prepared to remove this Bill from the Orders, or place it in such a position that it would relieve the strain on those who have claim d the right and performed the duty of discussing it fairly; but the careful precision with which the hon, gentleman's statement was given to the House, soon showed that he had some object in view other than that which I have indicated. Before he had proceeded very far, his remarks led me to the conclusion that he wished to relieve himself and, to a certain extent, his followers, from a threatened consure. He had not talked very long before he referred to the word "clôture," and he took occasion to relieve himself from the censure of having suggested it by stating to the House that he had resisted the suggestions that had been made in that direction. I am very glad, for the credit of the country, that the Premier has relieved himself of the possibility of being accused of having intended to apply so odious and disgusting a measure to the people of this country, but he took occasion later in the day to relieve his followers also from the censure of having suggested it. He told the House that such a course had been suggested, and that he had resisted it, but later he said that he would not say that it was his followers who had suggested it. He did not tell us who had; he did not tell us that the people of this country had suggested the application of the clôture, or that it had come from anyone outside of this House. We know that, in the corridors, we have heard the word cloture floating in the air, and I am very glad that the Prime Minister has stated that there is no intention on his part to adopt such a means here. I am also glad that he has relieved his followers from the imputation of suggesting such an odious measure in this free country as the "clôture" or the "previous question." The people of the country would not submit to it. The opposition which this measure is receiving is not the opposition of a faction. It is the opposition of a small enter my protest against the manner in which discussion number of men, to be sure, but they represent as near as has been conducted. Public discussion is of very little use may be one-half the people of this country. The fact that where one side do all the talking, as has been the case with they hold diametrically opposite views upon this question this debate. We have met with no opposition, and the argument of the country of Mr. FAIBBANK.

to the views of hon, gentlemen opposite, is the reason why this discussion has been prolonged to so unusual a length. This opposition arises from a firm conviction that our duty to the people is to continue this discussion, even at the hazard of being accused of obstruction, until the Government realise the fact that a majority of the people of this country look upon this measure as unnecessary and The last speaker has given us one reason why there is no necessity for applying any of the gag-laws that have been attempted in other countries. In this country the policy of arbitration to settle disputes, is decidedly popular. We know that if this discussion were carried out to such a length as to produce a dead lock in this House, so that it would be impossible for either the Government or the Opposition to yield, we could submit the matter to arbitration, and the people of this country would be the natural arbitrators to whom we could appeal. If we cannot succeed in any other way let us adopt this suggestion and appeal to the people to decide for us. Now, the discussion, instead of being narrowed by the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, has been very considerably widened, and has taken a wider scope since the right hon. gentleman addressed the House. He, in fact, reopened the question. It almost seemed to me, from his remarks, that he wished the discussion to go on, and to take a still wider scope. Now, there is another remark of the right hon. gentleman to which I wish to enter my earnest protest, and that is that the discussion on this side of the House is the result of the sins of the people, and I recommend that course to be an organised obstruction. I presume I know as much of that matter as the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House; and I challenge them to look at the history of this debate and say if, on a single occasion during the first twelve hours of any sitting, there was the least attempt on our part to drag it to an unseemly length, or to bring in irrelevant matter. After the fatigue we endured in keeping up a legitimate debate, and after fatigue had rendered us unable to continue it, the only constitutional means we had at our command was to prolong the discussion until we could get an adjournment of the House, in order to refresh ourselves and renew a legitimate discussion; and I repeat that that cannot be called, in any sense, the result of an organised obstruction. We have succeeded in our designs thus far, and we have, from time to time, succeeded in getting an adjournment of the House, which, bear in mind, was denied us at the first. We heard the order given from hon. gentlemen opposite that there should be no adjournment of the House until such and such vote were had, that we were to sit from day to day until this measure became law. These threats were hurled across the House after the last caucus of the Government party. But we were not the men that our constituents took us to be when they sent us to Parliament if we were to yield to those threats, and allow half-a-dozen of the principal clauses of this measure to be passed at any single session of the House. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), in his short and pithy address of a few nights ago, with a great deal of preci-ion, went over the arguments that have been adduced in favor of the Bill. He seemed to think that the arguments which he recapitulated on that occasion were sufficient to convince every member of this House of the unnecessary length to which the debate was extended. At the commencement of his speech, however, he used these words:

"I desire, before the debate reaches its termination, that my protest shall be recorded against the manner in which this discussion has been conducted, against the length of time that it has occupied, and against the heavy expense imposed on the people."

Now, I, in common with that hon. gentleman, desire to ments we have adduced have remained unanswered. Seven or eight hon, gentlemen on this side of the House have spoken consecutively, and no attempt has been made to reply to them. That weakens the debate, and, to a great extent, prevents us from receiving that benefit from discussion which usually is derived from it. I agree with the hon, gentleman also in condemning the expense to which the country is subjected by this measure. He seems to desire to curtail the expense by curtailing the length of this discussion, while we of the Opposition wish to curtail the expense by preventing a measure being forced on the country, the result of which will cost an enormous sum of money to the people. It has been pointed out that if this Bill is carried the cost of it in one year will be greater, indeed, than the cost of this entire Session of Parliament. It must be borne in mind that if this Bill becomes law, that expense will be continued from year to year, and if, at a single Session of Parliament, we can prevent its becoming law, we shall have saved the country a great sum of money. The hon, gentleman said still further:

"I think, Sir, that this discussion has been useless, unnecessary and unstatesmanlike."

Now, I cannot agree that the discussion has been useless. Has it been useless because the hon, gentlemen who support this Bill have no other duty to perform than to record the wishes and the decrees of the Government? Is it because Ephraim is joined to his idols, and that we may as well let him alone? If that be the opinion of the hon. gentleman when he used that expression, so far as he himself is concerned, he is correct in saying this discussion was useless. He said, further, that this discussion was unnecessary. The explanations made have shown that it was not unnecessary. On the contrary, it was necessary in order to obtain a true understanding of this Bill. It is said this discussion is unstatesmanlike. It is so only in so far as it has been limited to one side of the House. To the objection that this measure is being brought before the country at a time when the people were not asking or expecting it, and at an unreasonable period of the Session, the hon. gentleman replies that the measure has been three times introduced, that there has been ample time afforded to discuss its principles, and that a large number of members came to this Session with their opinions largely formed upon the question. Those hon, members who so came were members who came to register the opinions of the Government. Even the First Minister had not his opinions thoroughly ripened at the opening of the Session. The hon. gentleman had not the same opinion as to the view which would be held by the House on the woman suffrage question three or four months ago as he has to-day, otherwise he would not have inserted it in his Bill. The hon. gentleman says:

"I support the measure because Parliament has a right to say who shall elect its members."

That has been said by every hon, gentleman opposite who has spoken and has not been denied by any one on this side. It is a stock argument without force. The hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) did not deny the right of Parliament to construct its own electorate; but he urged that it was inexpedient and we were not obliged to do all we have power to do. We have power to disfranchise nine-tenths of the people, but it is not expedient to do so. The hon, gentleman says further:

"I support it, secondly, because I believe the measure which was adopted in 1867 was adopted as a temporary measure, that it was never designed by those who framed the constitution that the provincial franchises, or the franchises which might exist, from time to time, in the various Provinces of this Dominion, should form the franchise by which members of this Parliament should be elected; that the reasons which led to its adoption then have long ceased to exist and that therefore the system itself should be abandoned."

Although it is said this is a mere temporary measure it has any one Province of this Dominion, to sit in judgment on continued 18 years. During that period there has been no desire for change expressed. The hon, gentleman further says:

"I support this measure, thirdly, because I believe that the present system is lacking in the essential elements of certainty, stability and permanence, and the important element of uniformity, and therefore it should not be continued."

Who wants stability? Is it intended that the measure should be unchangeable? Is there to be no advancement? The present system is not stable, because it was not the wish of the people that it should be stable, because we are constantly advancing in this age. The hon gentleman says that the opinions of this side of the House are that the proposed measure is unnecessary, that the present system is working well and that no change is demanded. If those three assertions can be substantiated, the strongest reasons have been brought forward why this Bill must be set aside. The hon gentleman says that these are weak arguments; but I maintain they have all possible force to show why it is necessary and desirable that this Bill should be withdrawn. If this Bill is unnecessary, if the present system is working well, there is no reason for seeking to force this measure upon Parliament and the country. The hon gentleman went on to say:

"If an evil exists are we to wait until its consequences are proved to be so disastrous that public indignation forces us to adopt remedial measures."

I answer no; but I ask where does the evil exist? The hongentleman has not attempted to show the evil, and yet we are asked to remove an imaginary evil and adopt a real evil. The hon. gentleman said further:

"I feel, when a reform measure is presented to this House, if the principles upon which it is based are sound, if they are just and equitable and right, if the changes which are proposed will improve the existing state of things, if the system which it is proposed to introduce is an improvement on the system which now exists, it is the duty of Parliament, under such circumstances, to adopt that measure without delay." There is not an hon. member who does not heartily agree with the hon. gentleman in that expression. If a Reform measure is founded on principles of justice and right, then it becomes the duty of Parliament to adopt that measure without delay. But the hon, gentleman deals in generalities and in unmeaning platitudes. The hon, gentleman holds that this Franchise Bill is based upon principles of justice and equity. Such is not the fact, and the hon. gentleman has taken that for granted because the Bill was introduced by the hon. First Minister. Because it is the view of the Government of this country, he assumes that the Bill is based on principles of righteousness, justice and equity, and that there is no question about the matter. I am glad to say that a difference of opinion exists in this country on that question. I believe the majority of the people of this country think that neither of these virtues, neither of these attributes of righteousness and justice, to which the hon. gentleman alludes, have even cast a shadow on the measure which is now before the House. I believe it is looked upon, from one end of the country to the other, to be a measure just such as has been described by gentlemen on this side, and I ask hon. gentlemen if it is fair, if it in keeping with the true principles of parliamentary government that when we are face to face with an expression of public opinion, such as has already reached this House, we should attempt to force this measure through Parliament. The hon gentleman, like a Daniel come to judgment, not only finds fault with the action of the Legislature of his own Province, with regard to the franchise, but he refers to the Province of Ontario and the other Provinces, he looks abroad over the whole Dominion to see where wrongs are to be righted in every Province. He tells the people of Ontario and New Brunswick that they do not know how to construct their own franchise. Now, Sir, I do not think it well becomes an hon. gentleman, coming from the doings and sayings of the people of some other Province. I take it, Sir, that this attack on provincial rights -for I think it is nothing less-goes further and that it becomes an absolute insult to the people of the Province so attacked. If a popular franchise does not exist in the Province of New Brunswick, who are to blame for it? Are we in this House at fault? No, it is the people of New Brunswick, and are they not sufficiently interested in the welfare of their own Province to adopt a franchise which is best suited for themselves? Hon, gentlemen may say that the Parliament or the Government of that Province are at fault, but they are the representatives of the people of that Province just as the Legislature or the Government of Ontario represent the people of Ontario, and I say that anything that is said against the recent Act passed in that Province is an insult to the people of Ontario. Have the people of that Province ever asked us to take part in this Parliament in the conduct of their own affairs? No; the people believe they are competent to do themselves and they do not ask us to interfere. T 80 have the power to arrange the franchise for own Province, and if the recent Act is not what it should be, the people of that Province will find it out and they will remedy the evil by the repeal or amendment of the Act through their own representatives. The hon, member for Lincoln, who seems to have Mowat on the brain whenever he speaks, has characterised that Bill in the most odious terms. But why does he not go to the people of Ontario, who have the power to say that the Bill shall be changed, and that their wrongs, if they have wrongs, shall be made right. But whether or not it is that the hon, gentleman's influence is declining in that Province, or that he thinks he has a better chance here to say harsh words against the Premier of that Province, I do not know, but instead of exerting his influence in favor of a just and righteous franchise Bill he comes here where he has no right to deal with provincial affairs, and he speaks of Mr. Mowat in a manner insulting to the people of the Province from which he comes. The hon, member for Westmoreland says:

"Then, Sir, another important feature of the present system is its uncertain and unchanging character, the constituencies which elected us may before another election may be entirely swept away."

Well, Sir, that is a very strange theory to be proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. We know that fortunately it is not in the power of the Provinces to sweep away constituencies, but unfortunately it is in the power of this Parliament and Government, and if the hon. gentleman for Westmoreland had had a seat in this House, in 1882, he would have had a chance to see that under a measure proposed in this House it would not be impossible that before another election some of us would find that our constituencies had been swept away. He says further:

"I for one, Sir, feel that the present system is not calculated to preserve that harmony, but that it is calculated eventually to promote provincial discord and provincial strife."

And now I take issue with the hon, gentleman in that part of his remarks. I believe that the present system has been conducive to provincial harmony, and that the principle which is now sought to be forced on the people of this country will be productive of provincial discord and strife. He goes on to state, that under the existing system, members may be sent from the different Provinces, with particular parties, largely in a majority, by reason of franchise adopted to that end, and that therefore we may have parties in this House divided by provincial lines instead of on lines of public policy. Now, the very principle of our federal system is that we should have federal representation, and that the party which is in the majority in one Province should have the largest representation in this Parliament, and so on with the other Provinces. The reason why provincial discord will be produced by the measure now Mr. Platt.

before us is, that it is not a measure of permanency. Before long we may have, and I believe we will have, in one Province or another, a strong feeling in favor of manhood suffrage or of woman's franchise. The feeling in favor of these measures in a particular Province, will find expression in this Parliament, and the result may be attempts to force the views and wishes of one Province on the other Provinces in the matter of the franchise; that is the manner in which strife and discord will be most likely to arise, and more strife and discord on this subject of the franchise than has existed from Confederation down to the present time. He says:

"In one Province, where one party has a large majority in the Local Legislature, an Act may be passed adopting a franchise which will give that party a large representation for that Province in this Parliament; in another Province, where another party may have a large majority in the Local House, a different franchise may be adopted, with a corresponding result; what have we then?"

I wish hon. members on both sides to listen to that remark; I am not sure that there is not something in it, and if there be anything in it so far as the Local Legislatures are concerned, what is likely to take place under the measure before us here? Is not the same thing being attempted in this Parliament? Here is an attempt made by a Government having a large majority in Parliament, to secure the adoption of a franchise that would give them more than their fair share of representation in this Chamber. Now, I do not think there is anything more in the remarks of the hon, member for Westmoreland to which I need address myself. The hon member for Prince County, P. E. I., (Mr. Hackett) followed him a few days later, and I wish to make a few remarks concerning his address in the same manner in which I have reviewed the rather admirable address of the hon. member for Westmoreland. The hon. member for Prince says:

"It is of vital importance that this Parliament especially should not be subject to the whims and fancies of the Local Legislatures, and that we should take out of the hands of the Local Legislatures the right to fix the franchise for the election of membars to the Dominion Parliament."

He strongly supports the principle of this Bill, that this Parliament should use the right of constructing its own electorate. Then, he says:

"Another reason why I support the Bill is that it provides for the registration of voters in all the Provinces of this Dominion."

That is another principle of the Bill he supports.

"Now, Sir, I ask what reason or right has this Parliament to provide for registration for the election of members to this House? If we want voters' lists, is it not the duty of this House to pay the expense of providing those voters' lists?"

That seems one of the strongest reasons the hon. gentleman gives for supporting this Bill—the fact that this Government will have to pay for the construction of the voters' lists in Prince Edward Island; for the sake of getting that small pittance from the Canadians, as I suppose he would term them, he is willing to forego the privileges and to sacrifice the franchise, which he says the people of his Province hold most near and dear to themselves. First, he says, he is in favor of the principle of this Bill, and a moment afterwards he expresses the hope that the principle of the Bill will not be applied to his own Province. Then he says:

" Another reason why I support this Bill is, that it extends the franchise in most of the other Provinces."

I daresay most of the other Provinces will be thankful to the hon, gentleman for making that discovery. Although supporting this Bill, he goes on to say:

"For the last twenty-five or thirty years we have had in the Province, Prince Edward Island, a system of manhood suffrage. Every man in that Province, twenty-one years of age, and a British subject, having paid a certain poll tax and performed a certain amount of statute labor, is entitled to a vote. That system has become very popular in the Province of Prince Edward Island; the people there have become very much attached to it; they have made great progress under it, and they are very tenacious of their rights in that direction. There is no privilege of right that they cherish so dearly as the right of exercising this franchise."

But notwithstanding that they so highly prize and cherish that right, this hon. gentleman seems willing to sacrifice it for the paltry gain of a few dollars out of the Dominion treasury for the construction of voters' lists in Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman then proceeds to pass judgment on fellow members. He tells us of an outrage that was sought to be perpetrated upon Prince Edward Island by an Act passed in 1874, which he says deserved condemnation because it sought to apply a different rule to Prince Edward Island from that applied to the other Provinces, and he says that at that time the hon. First Minister, to his honor and credit, stood up and defended the rights of the people of Prince Edward Island. Does the hon. First Minister stand up to-day to defend the rights of Prince Edward Island in the same serse? And what has the hon. member for Prince to say, who then condemned what he is asking to have done now? The hon. gentleman made an unprovoked attack on the hon, member for Prince (Mr. Yeo) who sits near me, and endeavored to arouse religious prejudices against that hon gentleman, who has done nothing to provoke such an attack, who has deservedly obtained the respect of both sides of this House, and who during his long parliamentary career has proved himself a strong and true friend of the Province from which he comes. The hon, gentleman then proceeds to give credit to an hon. Senator who, he said, in 1874 stood up nobly in defiance of his party in defence of the rights of Prince Edward Island. But what does the hon, member for Prince do? Is he standing up in defence of the liberties that are held dear by the people of Prince Edward Island? No; he is supporting hon, gentlemen who are seeking to oppress and tyrannise over the people of Prince Edward Island. The hon, gentleman then says:

"What will hon, gentlemen opposite say to that? How does it correspond with their idea of provincial rights, that this Parliament, that the Government of 1874, led by the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), should, by an Act of Parliament, endeavor to coerce Prince Edward Island into the expenditure of a large amount of money in the preparation of voters' lists to return members to this Parliament?"

Does not this Bill coerce every Province in the Dominion into the expenditure of a large amount of money in the preparation of voters' lists? The hon, gentleman can condemn the Act of 1874, which coerced only one Province, which placed one Province in the same position as the others with regard to the expense of preparing but one set of voters' lists, but with strange inconsistency he can support this measure which coerces every Province. The hon, gentleman, then speaking of the revising barrister clause which was in force in Prince Edward Island, and which was similar to the Bill now before us, said:

"The people tried it for two or three years; it worked well enough, but it cost a large amount of money; it was too expensive a plaything for them and they repealed it."

Will not this system be an expensive one as well? Will it not prove too expensive to the people of Prince Edward Island? Will they not seek to have it repealed? The present Bill will impose restrictions and penalties upon the people of Prince Edward Island far in excess of any which the Government measure in 1874 imposed, and which the hon. member for Prince Edward Island so strongly condemns. At the close the hon. gentleman becomes pathetic, having spoken so long in defence of this measure, he is afraid to see it applied to his own Province. He said: "I hope that the House will support the amendment of my hon. friend and exclude Prince Edward Island from the operation of this clause." (The disfranchising clause.) He then whispered across the floor to the Government: "We think it only proper that this Parliament should have the control of its own electorate;" but he added:

"We think that Prince Edward Island, under its peculiar circumstances, being apart, almost from the rest of the Dominion, shut out for a large portion of the year from the mainland by almost impassable barriers of ice. Having no floating population, being pretty well filled up, there would be no danger at all in continuing to it the manhood suffrage so long enjoyed by its people. While I favor manhood suffrage in Prince Edward Island, I think it would hardly be right to apply to the whole country."

That is an example of—I will not say impertinence, but of an hon, gentleman extending his judgment too far. He thinks manhood suffrage is a good thing for Prince Edward Island. Let him think so and fight to maintain it there, but he has no right to express the opinion that it would not work well for the rest of the Dominion. The rest of the Dominion must have a Franchise Bill forced on it, whether it likes it or not, but Prince Edward Island must be allowed to have a law of its own. The hon gentleman says his Province stands in the peculiar position because it is an island. Well, with all my heart, I shall support the amendment of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), for several reasons. First, because it is right that the Provinces should have the right of saying to whom the franchise should be given. Then he moved that Prince Edward Island should have that right; but by-and-bye there will be two Prince Edward Islands. Merely judging the question from that geographical point, which the hon member for Prince, P. E. I. (Mr. Hackett), raised I may say that the county of Prince Edward, Ontario, will, by-and-bye, when the Murray Canal will be dug, will be also an island, and be entitled on that ground to regulate its own franchise. The hon, gentleman has argued so far in favor of uniformity, in favor of this Parliament saying who shall be the electors. He says:

"I support this Bill again, because it very materially extends the franchise to the different people of the different Provinces; although it restricts it, in a small degree, in the Province from which I come."

He is willing that this Bill, because it extends the franchise in the other Provinces, should apply to Prince Edward Island, although it restricts the franchise there; but repenting of this adhesion to the principle of uniformity, he goes on to say:

"I hope this House will support the amendment of my hon. friend, which would retain the present franchise in Prince Edward Island, and then I think no harm can come of it."

Then he thinks no harm can come of it. Of course not, so long as Prince Edward Island is exempted. Leave me, he says, outside, and I will assist in passing the measure for the other Provinces. He adds:

"An exception made in favor of Prince Edward Island can scarcely be called a breach of uniformity, as that Island, on account of its insular position, is, for a large portion of the year, separate from the rest of the Dominion by the ice in the Straits of Northumberland. Therefore I trust that the Government will accede to the proposition of my hontriend. I can assure those who will vote for this amendment that they will be long remembered and long revered and respected by the people of Prince Edward Island. There is no privilege they cherish so dearly as the privilege of exercising manhood suffrage. The man who will continue that privilege to them will be held in the highest esteem by them for all time; and the man who, as in the case of the Hon. David Laird, attempts to rob them of their franchise will always be execrated by them."

The First Minister has thus received his sentence. He has said the Government could not grant the request made by hon. gentlemen. What is the answer of the hon. gentleman? Those, he says, who deny that franchise will be eternally execrated by them. What about us? We will receive the unanimious support, no doubt, of the people of Prince Edward Island, for we will, taking the ground we do, support the proposition of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald); and doing so, we are to be held in eternal grateful remembrance, while those opposed to us will receive the eternal execration of the people of that Island. The hon. gentleman goes further; and this is the first time I remember having heard a man read his own death warrant. He supports the Government here; he is going to assist the Government in depriving the people of their rights and privileges; and he therefore expects to receive the eternal execration of the people who sent him to this House. He says that, to the credit of the hon. Senator of Prince Edward Island (Senator Haythorne), when the measure of 1874 came before the Senate, he rose superior to his party feelings and stood out like a man for the Province he represented. the hon. gentleman follow that noble example? Will he rise above party feelings? Will he, when he reads the amendment of my hon, friend from North Norfolk, which is a far better amendment than that moved by the hon. member for King's, which gives the same glorious privilege to all the Provinces, support that amendment and give to all the Provinces the justice which he demands for his own? Will he support that measure of justice which he demands for his own Province, or will he fold his arms and sacrifice the interests of those who sent him to Parliament? I fear that the last of the clauses which I have read will indicate that the hon. gentleman will do the latter. Why does he not rise in his might, like the hon. Senator whom he has praised, and burst the chains and fetters which bind him to his party, and, when he sees they are determined to force an obnoxious measure upon the people of his Province, why does he not stand redeemed and disenthralled and, as the immortal Curran would say, by the genius of self-emancipation? I have spoken to this amendment, because it involves the question of provincial rights. I think it may be fairly considered in connection with the claims made for Prince Edward Island. What those hon. gentlemen claim for that Province we claim for every Province in this Dominion, and, if their proposition be voted down, they are in duty bound to stand up manfully and support the Opposition and the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have heard it repeated that this is our own franchise. do not know how Ministers may use that pronoun "our," but, if the First Minister spoke for himself and his colleagues, I think the Bill will meet what he wants and will create, a franchise for the Ministry. If the members of this House want a franchise of their own, they have one to day, because the provincial franchises were adopted by an Act of this Legislature. They speak of uniformity, but that means that the people of any one Province may be placed in a position to have forced upon them, at any time. the opinions and the prejudices of other Provinces. In the attempts to get uniformity you are paying altogether too dear for the whistle. If there is anything wrong in the provincial franchises the people of the Provinces must be held responsible, and they have the power to remedy it. This measure is annecessary, uncalled for, and unjust. As to the expense, it must be borne in mind that this is not a Bill to be used only at election times. It is an annual expense for the preparation of these voters' lists, and involves five revisions for every general election under our Act. If, therefore, the cost of each year be estimated at the moderate amount of $400,000, each election will cost $2,000,000. There is no justification for that, as we already have lists which are prepared without any cost to the people, as represented in this Parliament. This discussion has given rise to a stronger argument in favor of manhood suffrage than any discussion which has ever taken place in this House. The very idea of a Dominion franchise gives us the idea of manhood suffrage. If we are to have uniformity at all, the only way in which it can be reached is manhood suffrage, and that fact will force itself upon the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House to such an extent that, before another year comes round, the opinion will be so largely entertained that an effort will be made to amend this Franchise Bill by giving us manhood suffrage, there is where I see the danger of provincial discord. If the Province of Quebec is not as far the force of the majority the smaller Province will have to yield. It would be far better to retain our present easily worked and satisfactory system, and to leave the present Bill until the people demand it. In justification of the continued discussion which has been going on in this House, I will read the following extract from Bailey's "Political Representation":

"The peculiar advantages of oral discussion are that, from the number and variety of minds, simultaneously handling the subject, it is rapidly turned on all sides and scrutinised in every part; and, secondly that a state of clear-sightedness is produced in the understanding, which is seldom to be purposely created, and is only the occasional visitant of the closet. In the process of debate, the doubt which hung over the mind clears away, the information wanting and searched for in vain is supplied, the absurdity before unnoticed is made palpable, the fond conceit blown up by some partial experience melts into air, the attention is animated and the perception sharpened by the alternate exposition and reply, attack and defence."

1 say that we should have alternate exposition and reply; we should have alternate attack and defence.

"It can hardly be questioned that if a number of men with adequate information come together and freely discuss a subject to the best of their ability, they will arrive at a truer conclusion than the same men could attain in the same time by any other means."

We have here the very strongest opinions expressed by this writer in favor of discussion. Now, Sir, as to the manner in which the people should be brought to an understanding of the provisions of this Bill, I wish to quote an expression of Hume:

"In all cases it must be advantageous to know what is most perfect in the kind, that we may be able to bring any real constitution or form of government as near it as possible, by such gentle alterations and innovations as may not give too great disturbance to society."

The author then goes on to say:

"If we narrowly examine the subject, we shall find that the condition required for the introduction of a measure, whether of abolition or positive innovation, may be comprised in two; 1st. That the measure shall be for the public good. 2nd. That the majority of the people shall have a clear and steady conviction that it is so."

Now, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they believe that the majority of the people of this country have a clear and steady conviction that this measure is in the public interest. I say we have no evidence that such is the case.

"The latter condition, indeed, is more than is absolutely required in all cases. To justify the introduction of some measures the negative condition might be alone sufficient; namely, that the majority of the people should be exempt from any preposession against them. In laying down the second condition, therefore, in its positive form, we assume less than would probably be conceded. Either the absence of all obstacles in the way of introducing a measure is implied in these two conditions or, if there are, the absence of which is not implied, they cannot be obstacles of much resisting force. It is, for example, implied in the conviction of the majority as to the expediency of any proposed alteration that their feelings and prejudices, if they ever were, are no longer arrayed in opposition to it."

Now, Sir, we know from the opposition this measure is receiving in this House, and from the excitement it has caused outside the House, that a large number of people have feelings and prejudices against this measure.

"It is also implied in the conviction the people at large entertain of the expediency of a measure that they no longer regard it, if they ever did, as inimical to their interests.

This statement of the matter, again, brings round to our view with more vividness, and in ampler magnitude, the importance of publicly discussing, incessantly repeating, and intropidly urging, all great principles and measures of policy; certain as we are that a true knowledge of the measures will continually spread, and animated, as we cannot fail to be, by the consideration that all which is required to enable them to pass into laws, is that general conviction of their utility which public discussion will sooner or later inevitably establish."

in this House to such an extent that, before another year comes round, the opinion will be so largely entertained that an effort will be made to amend this Fianchise Bill by giving us manhood suffrage, there is where I see the danger of provincial discord. If the Province of Quebec is not as far advanced as the other Provinces in regard to that question, what danger threatens that Province? One Province will be en given us, and because no reasons have been given us, and because no reasons have been given us, and because no reasons have been given in favor of this measure, the country is becoming be trying to force its opinion on another Province, and by Mr. Platt.

justifies us in continuing the discussion on this Bill. I have petitions in my desk, which I shall present at the proper time, signed numerously by men of both parties, people who believe this is not a necessary measure, who know that they have never asked for it, who believe that our present system works well; and they desire that this Bill may not become law. I believe that every hon. member on this side of the House can say the same, who has received petitions at all; he will find the names of Conservatives amongst the signers. Therefore, I judge that a large portion of the people of this country see no necessity for this measure, and think we are justified in opposing it at every stage.

Mr. GIGAULT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few remarks in answer to a statement which has been made in this House with regard to Sir George Etienne Cartier. It has been rightly said that that statesman, for whose memory we have a great deal of respect, had admitted the principle of a franchise law, which was presented in this House in 1870. But that statesman, whose energy was well known, would certainly never have consented to withdraw that measure if he had been convinced that it was necessary and indispensable to the proper working of the Government. He showed deference towards the opinion of the representatives, and he acted wisely, because eighteen years have elapsed since the establishment of Confederation, and these eighteen years have proved that no inconveniences and no abuses have resulted from the electoral system which is in force to-day. Besides, Mr. Chairman, if we read the measure which was supported by Sir the principle that property ought to be the basis of the qualification of voters? Is it to be supposed that Sir George Etienne Cartier ever intended to drag the women into the electoral contests? Is it to be supposed that he ever intended to introduce into families a new element of discord, by giving the right to vote to the sons of owners who are living under the paternal roof? Is it to be supposed that that man would ever have consented to clothe the revisers with the arbitary powers which are conferred upom them by the law which is now under our consideration? Is it to be supposed that he would have put the whole electorate of Canada at the mercy of one man? No, Mr. Chairman; I do not believe it, and the measure of 1870 proves that I am right in making this supposition, because that measure did not enfrarchise the women nor the sons of farmers living under the paternal roof; it did not give the right of voting to Indians who are not emancipated, to people who are not allowed to manage their own business, and who, under the new law, will be allowed to take part in the most important administration—the administration of public affairs. The motion which was made within a few days by the hon, member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Macdonald), fully justifies the position which I have taken with regard to the Franchise Bill. This Bill has hardly been introduced, it has hardly been submitted to the country, and already there has been a clashing of interest and a state of uneasiness and discontent. The motion of the hon member for King's, P.E.I., who has given his support to the measure which we are now considering, shows that in Prince Edward Island people are not ready to submit, without grumbling, to the measure which the Dominion Parliament wishes to impose on that Province. That motion shows clearly that in a country like ours, which is composed of Provinces which are dissimilar in habits, customs, institutions and nationalities, we should not look for uniformity in legislation, and especially as regards the electoral franchise. Mr. Speaker, when I opposed this measure I did not think that a motion would be made so soon, which would give so much force to the object stand, and which they use to send to Parliament men of tions I have made to this Bill. If we desire to see this Confederation remain powerful and solid, we must grant the other Provinces as many powers as it is possible to give them. The Dominion Parliament must only interfere with the legislation which affects each Province when the Provincial Parliament has no right to enact laws which specially concern that Province. Otherwise, if we use all the powers which we have, if we attempt to rule everything, we will bring to life again a state of things which existed before 1867. Before that time, a part of the country tried to rule another section of the country, and to enact believe it is inimical to their interests. For these reasons I laws which were not in harmony with the character of the people for whom they were destined. The result was a state of uneasiness and trouble, which had led us into political anarchy and which rendered government almost impossible. Is it that same state of things which is sought to be revived? Is it intended to do away with this spirit of contentment which exists in Canada since 1867? The moment we wander away from the federal system we are sure to give rise to clashing and discontent, such as have been manifested by the motion of the hon. member for King's, P.E.1. Mr. Chairman, the citizen should be governed for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of his ruler. When we are legislating we must seek to pro-cure advantages or to prevent misfortunes on the commu-nity. I wonder what benefit is going to result to the community from the legislation which will probably be adopted by this Parliament. The electors will certainly not reap any benefit from it. On the contrary, in order to carry out this law we will impose on the people a burden of $100,000 or $500,000. Such is the great advantage which will George Etienne Cartier, we find that it is the condemnation result to society from this electoral law. Not satisfied of the Bill which is now before the House. Is it to be supposed that Sir George Etienne Cartier would have abandoned the property of the transfer of the property of the transfer of the property of the vincial Legislatures from a power which they have exercised until this day, and which has been recognised as belonging to them, both by the constitution and by the law of 1874, in order to crown this policy, in order to substitute for a system which works well a system which is unknown and which has not been submitted to the crucial test of experience, we are to saddle our population with an additional burden of half a million. The United States have maintained the most powerful and the most solid Republic that ever existed in the world; but in order to obtain this result, each State was allowed to govern itself according to its own notions, to pass laws which were in harmony with the character of the inhabitants of each territory. The American public men have understood that the mode of determining the qualification of voters, not only for State elections but also for Congressional elections, ought to be left with the local Government of each State; and it is this policy which has contributed to maintain this harmony which has made the Republic one of the most powerful in the world. A member of this House has pretended that we had no need to consult the constitutions and legislations of other countries, that we have here prominent statesmen, to whom we ought to give our full and entire confidence. Indeed, I admit the ability and knowledge of the leaders of both political parties in this country, but I am not ready to admit that they have, between them, the monopoly of wisdom. In order to guide ourselves in our legislation we would do well to profit by the knowledge and experience which have been acquired in other countries. In France the pernicious influence of that centralisation policy which is sought to be introduced here has been felt. I was recently asking a French Conservative how it was that the policy of the last Government in France, which is so arbitrary, so unjust, so tyrannical, was always approved of by the people at each election. The first cause, he answered is, in the cities, universal suffrage, which gives to a nost of persons an electoral right, whose responsibility they do not under-

The second cause is centralisation, and bad principles. the great number of public officials whom the Government have under their control. These Government agents, and the candidates to public offices, prefer their personal interest to public interest, which causes the French electorate to lose that character of independence which is so necessary to give a sound judgment on the measures and policy of a Government. On that question I will take the liberty of quoting Pontalis, the author of a work on electoral laws and habits. This distinguished writer, after having studied the position in which France happens to be, and after having shown the difficulty of electing candidates who are hostile to the Government, gives the cause and reason of that state of things. He says:

"On this ground, the contest is so unequal and so perilous that at first sight it seems impossible to attempt it. The moment it is the Governsight it seems impossible to attempt it. The moment it is the Government who are openly fighting the electoral battles, they have in their hands a marvellous weapon which ensures victory to all the candidates in favor of whom they use it—it is the weapon of centralisation. In the face of universal suffrage, which is deprived of the most elementary means of education and deprived of training, to a certain extent, centralisation is the instrument which puts almost the whole country under the dependency of the Government. 'I have too much power. I suffer from it, and france is suffering from it with me, said, one day, from the tribune, a great citizen, General Cavaignac, who felt preoccupied with the authority which he held in the Republic. Of course, from time to time we hear about decentralisation, but up to this day this decentralisation has only resulted in increasing, in each Department, the powers of the wardens to whom the Ministers confer a part of their powers; it has only resulted in tightening the centralisation of all the Commons of the only resulted in tightening the centralisation of all the Commons of the Empire, by fixing it in place, so as to render its power more irresistible."

And further on this author adds:

"At the first call made in favor of the Government candidate, whoever fills a public office, no matter how low nor how high his functions may be, no matter how foreign to political parties these functions may be, by their nature, has his post assigned to him to cut the way to all candidatures. The passing of all routes is thus stopped * * * "

Such is the unfortunate state of things which prevails in If the electorate has lost its independence, if the bad causes can always succeed, if the Conservative party is always beaten in France, of late years, at all the elections which have taken place, this is due, as that author says, to centralisation and to the fact that the municipal authorities have been deprived of the powers which they formerly had; it is because the powers of the commons have been concentrated into the hands of Government officers. Is it to be desired that this state of things should be sought to be established here? No, Mr. Chairman; and it seems to me that we ought to reflect seriously before inaugurating here a state of things which has produced such deplorable results in other countries. Unfortunately, in the country of which I have just spoken, the Conservative party, before 1879, did something towards establishing that policy of centralisation, and to-day they are reaping the fruits of what they have sown; they are going from defeat to defeat; and this result is the disastrous consequence of a policy which they them-selves have tried to inaugurate. The Radicals of 1879 have continued that policy of centralisation, by depriving the Provinces of privileges which they had enjoyed until then. In 1800 they substituted to the directories of the Departments the wardens who are appointed by the Government. These corrupt men said: In order to maintain ourselves in power we must necessarily corrupt the people by the exercise of patronage; we must cover up the country with public officials. The great number of Government agents and candidates to public offices will deprive the electorate from its independent character, and then it will be easier for us to escape from a condemnation. Unfortunately, they have Unfortunately, to-day, it does succeeded. not seem possible that good principles may prevail again in that country, where the source of legislation has been defiled by the corruption of the electorate. And we know what impurities have run out of that source, especially since 1871. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this measure because I Edward Island. As is well known to hon. members on both Mr. GIGAULT.

Government. I will readily believe that the Ministers will not use that weapon, that they will not take advantage of the arbitrary powers which are put into their hands by this legislation; but the men who are to-day on the Treasury benches may be superseded, sooner or later, by men who might be fanatical and unjust, and it is then that we will see the disastrous consequences of the legislation which we are about to adopt. These men may use this weapon to tyrannise over our population, to paralyse public opinion and to prevent any resistance against abuse of powers. This is a state of things which we ought to avoid. are misfortunes from which we should guard our country, And if there is one thing under constitutional rule which we should be anxious to keep, it is the independence of our electorate, which should be free from all undue influence on the part of the Government. I have heard several times here the Conservatives of Ontario denouncing the Mowat Government for having endeavored to establish administrative centralisation, this same kind of centralisation whose principle is consecrated in the measure we are now con-The Mowat Government was denounced for having deprived the municipal authorities of the power of granting licenses to liquor dealers, and for having conferred that power on Government agents. It has been stated that great injustice had been the result, and that the Mowat Government used that power to promote the interest of their party. Well, if these men wish to be logical, since they condemn administrative centralisation in Ontario, they ought, for the same reason, to oppose, ia this House, a measure which has the same defect. Besides, this centralisation was condemned by the First Minister himself in 1883, in connection with the license law, which enacts that the majority of the commissioners will be completely independent from any governmental influence. One is the warden of the county and the other is an officer of the Local Government. Well, Mr. Chairman, if it is dangerous to leave the granting of licenses in the hands of Government agents it is ten times more dangerous to charge them with the duty of preparing the voters' lists. As I said at the beginning of my speech, if we desire to see this Confederation of ours remain great and prosperous, we must remain faithful to the federative system; and it is by being faithful to this idea that we will avoid all causes of uneasiness and discontent. It seems to me that a part of the centralising character of this measure might have been removed from it, by having the voters' lists prepared by the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities. I may be told that the Dominion Government have no control over the municipal officers. Neither had they, in 1883, when they decided to appoint the wardens as commissioners, and left the granting of licenses in the hands of the latter. It is just, and it is in the interest of society, not to deprive the people, for that reason, from all control over the preparation of the voters' lists. The preparation of these lists should be left to the secretary-treasurers, and then the lists should be revised by a superior authority. If we take this course we will have a law about similar to that which exists in England, where the lists are prepared by officers who are absolutely independent of the Government. It is the officers of the local authorities who prepare these lists, and these lists are revised, not by Government agents, but by revisers who are appointed by judges. Besides, this is the principle which is followed by all countries whose electoral laws we have been studying, and it is that principle which I would like to have carried out in the legislation with which we are dealing to-day.

Mr. McINTYRE. Before the vote is taken on this section I wish to say a few words in reference to the manner in which it is going to affect the franchise in Prince think it is a dangerous weapon in the hands of a sides of this House, we have in Prince Edward Island two sets of franchises, one for the Legislative Council and one for the Assembly. The franchise for the Legislative Council is that each elector shall hold freehold property to the value of £100, or $324, or a leasehold interest to the same amount. This entitles him to vote for a candidate for the Legislative Council. The eandidate requires no publication. qualification. For the Assembly we have what is known as manhood suffrage. Each elector who is 21 years of age or over, and who has performed his statute labor, or paid $1 in lieu thereof, has a right to vote. On the production of a receipt showing that the labor has been performed, or the money paid, he is entitled to vote. This system has been in force in Prince Edward Island for the last thirty years, and has given the greatest possible satisfaction to all classes. It is a franchise of which the people of Prince Edward Island are extremely jealous, and I am sure that they will be very much grieved to see that there is an attempt made in this House to deprive them of the privilege they have enjoyed, and for which they fought thirty or forty years ago. I wish to refer, for a moment, to a few of the classes who are going to be affected by this Bill—who are going to be completely disfranchised. There is that large and intelligent class—which is known to every hop gentleman in this House—the is known to every hon, gentleman in this House—the teachers. Under this Bill, teachers of public schools will be disfranchised, for the reason that they depend on their income for a vote. Indeed, there are few, if any, teachers outside the city of Charlottetown, who receive an income of $100, and the most of them do not receive over half that amount. That large and intelligent class will be disfranchised by this Bill. There is an equally large class known as clerks in stores, young men who have no property, who are unmarried and pay no rent. Most of those young men do not receive the amount of $400 which entitles them to a vote under this Bill. They will, therefore, form another large and intelligent class who will be disfranchised. Then, again, we have young men who are learning trades. These have no qualifications under this Bill, and will be disfranchised. There are men servants in families, and laborers who are dependent on their incomes. They will also be deprived of the power of voting which they for-merly had. I observe that a fisherman who has boat and tackle to the value of $150 is entitled to vote; but there is no provision under which his sons will be allowed to vote. Each and every one performing statute labor formerly had a right to vote. It is a rather lamentable state of affairs when the young men of the Island, and in fact some of the older ones, are going to be entirely disfranchised, and a new class is going to be introduced, namely Indians. In fact, under this Bill the Indian is the coming man and young white men will have to take a back scat. So far as the amandment of my colleague is concerned. I think he would have done much better had he accepted the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that amendment which has for its object to leave the provincial franchise to each Province, and the hon. gentleman would have secured all he desired, because in singling out one Province the hon. gentleman is likely to arouse a certain amount of opposition from both sides of the House. I shall vote for the amendment of the hon. gentleman, and also for the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk. I wish to refer for a moment to a speech made by the hon. member for Prince County (Mr. Hackett), a few evenings ago. The hon. gentleman took occasion to refer to the election law of 1874, and he stated that the clause referring to the franchise in Prince Edward Island was introduced for the purpose of disfranchising a large body of the people, I refer to the Catholics. I believe that statement is utterly incorrect. I will read the clause, which that hon. gentleman_took good care not to read, because it explains itself. We had no Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) I believe I am speak-registration at that time, nevertheless there was a clear and ing distinctly enough to be understood. Those who are distinct qualification. Every farmer knows who is the owner of 50 or 100 acres in that Province, and there is no difficulty. The Act provided for a registration. It was well known at that time that the Local Government of the day, which was a Conservative Government, was about to introduce a registration list. The clause in question reads

"In the several electoral districts in the Province of Prince Edward "In the several electoral districts in the Province of Prince Edward Island, all persons qualified to vote for the election of members of the Legislative Council of that Province, under the law in force in that Province at the passing of this Act, shall henceforth be the electors qualified to vote for the election of a member or members of the House of Commons of Canada; but whenever the Legislature of that Province shall have provided for the registration of voters and for the making of lists of qualified voters for the election of members for the House of Assembly of the said Province, and when lists of voters shall have been Assembly of the said Province, and when lists of voters shall have been made and prepared, then the persons qualified to vote under such provisions for the election of a member or members of the House of Assembly of that Province, shall be entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Commons of Canada for the several electoral districts in the said Province; and all lists of voters so made and prepared and which, according to the laws then in force, would be used in the said several electoral districts, if the election were that of a representative or representatives to the House of Assembly for the said Province, shall be the list of voters which shall be used at the election of members of the House of Commons to be thereafter held under the provisions of this Act."

This clause was of a merely temporary character, and was inserted only to make provision until the Local Legislature passed a Registration Act, which they did the very next Session. So, whatever difficulty was caused by inserting this clause, was completely removed by the Act of the Local Legislature. This clause would never have been inserted had it not been known that the Local Legislature was about to pass a Registration Act. This was a merely temporary clause, and whether it was thrown out by the Senate or not, made no difference in regard to the Island. How very different is the present position. In this Bill we have no provision of a temporary nature, and the onus is not thrown on the Local Government. If it were, we would be very glad of it. But the present Bill is final, and, being so, will remain on the Statute Book of Canada. So far as there being any intention to disqualify any section or denomination in Prince Edward Island by the clause I have read, the charge is utterly unfounded. There was no such intention at any time, and there was no reason to do so, because the Government of that day were largely indebted for their election to the very denomination to which the hon, gentleman alluded. The Opposition, indeed, are largely indebted to-day for their seats to the same class. The hon, gentleman also made allusion to revising barristers. Probably the hon. gentleman has very good reasons for approving that provision of the Bill. He is not, however, alone in this House in that I hope the Government will come to some arrangement so as to retain the franchise at present existing in Prince Edward Island. If not, they will have committed a grievous act of injustice against those people who had in former times underwent a very severe struggle in order to obtain the enfranchisement of so large a body of the people.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Macdonald, King's P.E.I.) negatived. Yeas, 51; Nays, 72.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I have an additional motion to make in amendment to the main motion, and I shall read it, in order that its nature may be understood:

That all the words after "that" in the amendment, be struck out, in order to add the words: That clause number three be amended by inserting after the words "every person shall" at the beginning of the same, the words: "except in the Province of Quebec."

Now, that the nature of the amendment is known-trying to make noise will not prevent me from speaking. I believe they hear me well enough; my voice is strong enough to be understood, and I am going to continue in the same key. I wish to make a preliminary remark on this discussion, which may seem to have been a little too lengthy; but if it has been lengthy, this is due to the position taken by the Government. When I speak of the Government, I mean the leader of the Government, who is responsible, being the first promoter of the mode of discussion which has been followed. Hon, members on this side of the House have been charged with having been too long in their remarks, with having endeavored to obstruct legislation. The least that can be said of this attack is that it is unfair; and I may say here that if the discussion has been protracted it is due, to a large extent, to the position taken by the Government, and especially by the First Minister, who told us that he would pass the measure and force it upon us de die in diem, without leaving off. For my part, and I speak for myself only, I will never submit to any threat, to any violence, to any oppression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) As I said, we have resisted the pressure which has been brought to bear against us, and I rise again to say that I will oppose it to the bitter end. It has been attempted to wring a vote from us through length of time, by exhausting our physical strength; there was an attempt to starve us out, so to speak, but our opponents were mistaken; and if it is intended to starve us out, I believe that will be another mistake. We can perfectly well discuss the Bill as gentlemen ought to do, but not during unreasonable hours, like we did a few days ago, but during proper hours. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us consider the subject of the debate. The object of this Bill is to deprive the Province of Quebec from a right which it possesses; and I hope that the hon. members from that Province will break the silence which they have observed until now, saving two or three honor able exceptions, which I cannot help noticing with praise. But it seems to me that the other members who support the Government have observed a forced silence. Never since I am a member—and this is my fourth Parliament—have I witnessed such a silence, such crouching, as I witness now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) The best proof of what I state is that the shots take effect. The best proof is the yells I hear from the other side of the House.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). In French.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) If the hon, member for Montmagny, instead of doing like the bird in the fable, instead of repeating what he hears, like a parrot, would himself answer the objections which have been raised against the Bill, he would do better than he does by making obstruction. But, on the other hand, if there has been obstruction, I am glad to notice—and I do not know whether a watch-word has been given—that for some time past these noises, this cock-crowing, which we were wont to hear, has ceased. But if it is intended to renew them I believe these gentlemen who are accustomed to it, who are sheep-like, will not gain much, and, for my part, it does not make a bit of difference to me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question. Speak to the amendment.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Well, Mr. Chairman, I was saying, when I was interrupted, that I was in hopes that the members from the Province of Quebec, on so important a question, which concerns them directly, and with regard to which they will be called to account by the electors at the next election, and even before, because it is the custom to go before one's Mr. Casgrain.

constituents after the Session, to give an account of one's parliamentary conduct—I say, I believe that they will have to explain the vote which they are going to give to-day. It is true the vote will not be recorded to-day, but it will be recorded ultimately, and that record will tell who supported the amendment and who opposed it. I said that a more unpopular measure in the Province of Quebec could not be brought down; and I here declare that if I had a bad wish to make to the Government, it would be to have that measure passed, which would be the crown-ing point of a host of other measures which are now before Parliament and which will go further than anything else towards destroying the prestige with which the First Minister has been surrounded up to this day. Now, taking public sentiment in the Province of Quebec for a basis, I openly declare that I am happy to find, even in the ranks of the Conservative party, the real expression of the sentiments of that Province, as given a moment ago by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault). That hon. member has explained in firm, calm and moderate language the position he has taken, and I completely endorse what he has said. I should like to hear from the other side of the House a reply which would be an answer to the arguments he has brought forward. His arguments appear to me to be incontrovertible. Will they be answered on the other side? I do not know; but if the obstinate silence which has been kept until now is persisted in, it is quite clear that hon. gentlemen will not try to answer them, or will refuse to answer them. I was struck-I am still struck-with the enormity of the cost which this change of system will involve. Taking, for the five years, the minimum of the costs of the preparation of the lists at $300,000 for each year, for the counties, you will have $1,500,000 of expenses, merely to have the voters' list for a new Parliament. I say this expense is entirely out of proportion to the resources of the country. I do not even add the ordinary expenses of the whole number of general elections which will take place, and which will necessitate another expense of $300,000 to $400,000. So that, if we reckon up the bye-elections, we have an amount of nearly $2,000,000. I say this is out of proportion with the resources of the country. Now, why should we change the present system? Is there any advantage whatever to do this? The only advantage is that which the Government hopes to get out of this law. There is no other for the Province of Quebec, nor for the other Provinces in Canada. As to the clause concerning qualification, a mechanic, a school teacher, a good citizen, will be deprived of their right of voting, and an Indian, who will happen to own a small property, worth $300 or $400 will be brought forward and put alongside of the civilised and reasonable man who has a direct interest in the State. Our population is going to revolt against such a proposition, and I believe that it has a perfect right to do so. Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we would only give to the people of the country time enough to express their opinion we would receive, before long, a host of petitions against this Bill. The more it is known in some Provinces the more it is unpopular. And if the discussion is prolonged for some time yet, I am sure that the Province of Quebec—as the Province of Ontario has already done-will not fail to send in its protestation against the Bill which is now submitted to us. Perhaps before the end of this Parliament we will have occasion to receive a host of petitions, which will express the views of the people on this question; but still, if the people cannot be warned and informed in proper time on the true bearing of this law, at least during vacation, I have no doubt, that a host of petitions will be sent to the new Parliament, asking vince of Quebec, and I can foresee that the effect of this precedent will also apply to the Province of Quebec. I am afraid of the weakness of the members from the Province of Quebec, who are going to give up our last safety plank. I see, by the example which I have had under my eyes, that they are going to sacrifice the Province of Quebec. Nevertheless, as far as I can protest in my own name, and on behalf of the electors of the Province which I have the honor to represent, I protest, with all my might, against this Bill, and I specially call the attention of the French Canadian Ministers who represent the Province of Quebec in the Cabinet, to this Bill; I entreat them to examine carefully the bearing of the vote they are going to give on this question, before they continue to support this Bill. I entreat them, for the sake of their personal interests and for the sake of the interests of the Province. The vote they are about to give will be a vote which will be a reproach to them hereafter, and which will always be on their conscience. But, in spite of my humble efforts, I believe that I will not be able to persuade them to retrace their steps. I know that it is difficult to give up a settled purpose, but whatever may be the result I shall have fulfilled a duty, and 1 am proud of fulfilling a solemn, grave and important duty towards my fellow citizens. I do not wish to be charged with taking advantage of the indulgence of the House by prolonging this debate beyond the ordinary limits, but I desire to enter here my most emphatic protest against this Bill. Many members on this side of the House have given the reasons why the Bill ought not to be adopted. I do not wish to recall a host of arguments which have been used, and which should have induced the Government not to persist in this Bill. I will simply say that one of the strongest objections is that which relates to the Government officers, who are called revising officers, and who have the control of the voters' list, while we have the municipal officers who, in good faith, legally, without any prejudices nor any preconceived ideas, prepare voters' lists which give full justice to the Province of Quebec. Consequently, I do not think that it will be beneficial to the Province of Quebec to change its franchise. On the contrary, we have the greatest possible interest to keep the present system, and I desire that it should be maintained, until there are abuses of such a serious character as to necessitate a change. Until now, not a single case has been pointed out in this House which would show that the system led to abuses. On the contrary, it has been asserted, and the fact was not denied by the other side of the House, that the system has worked perfectly well until now. I trust that we may expect that this Bill will not pass; but, on the other hand, if it passes it seems to me that it is a mental abberation on the part of the Government to insist on the adoption of such a Bill. With these few remarks I leave the amendment in your hands, and I hope it will meet with the assent of the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to embrace the privilege which has been kindly conceded to members of the House, to make a few remarks upon the amendment which has just been moved, and in doing so I shall endeavor to speak pointedly to the quession under discussion. The First Minister yesterday charged members on this side of the House with obstructing the passage of the Bill. He seemed to have formed some misconception of this matter. Taking the First Minister's own definition of the latitude that pertains to a minority, I claim that we are quite within that limit. He says there should be full and ample time given to a minority to discuss the question in all its features. Sir, that is all we want, all we ask. He says after that full and ample time has been afforded for discussing a measure, and after the minority have availed them-

Bill in its principle and details has been that a number of them-not the whole of them, though everyone has a perfect right to express his opinion on this Bill-but some members of the Opposition have expressed themselves with reference to the principles of the Bill, some addressing themselves to the discussion of a particular clause, and others may perhaps do so yet. While the Bill itself is objectionable in its principle, the clauses that we hold to be very objectionable, to be, in fact, almost dangerous in their nature, require ample discussion before the Bill becomes law, and so that we do confine ourselves within the limits laid down by the First Minister. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite have found it necessary to charge us with a desire to destroy parliamentary institutions, and have stigmatised the course which has been taken by the Opposition in this debate as one which tends to bring parliamentary discussion and responsible government into disrepute. I do not think we are amenable to that charge. As an instance, showing the unfounded nature of the charge, let me bring a circumstance to your notice. On May 2nd, I find the following editorial in the Mail newspaper—and I hope you will not look so sternly at me, Mr. Chairman, because it is not very long.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hope it is relevant.

Mr. PATERSON. It is pertinent, as you will see. On the 2nd May the Mail said: (The hon. gentleman then quoted from the Toronto Mail, of the 2nd May.) Now, that is the plan followed by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first place, the correspondent of the Mail sends to that newspaper a statement which is incorrect. I listened to the hon. leader of the Opposition criticising this Bill, and I noticed that he read largely from the Indian Act; but I do not think it can be truly said that he read that Act from beginning to end, with the other Acts amending it. Therefore, an incorrect statement is sent out: an editorial is based upon it, and it is given to us as true. Now, it must be within the knowlege of the members of this House, though some people in the country might be deceived by the editorial, that when it was charged by the hon, leader of the Opposition, when he spoke at the very introduction of this

Mr. CHAIRMAN, Order. I think the hon gentleman is going beyond the record, when he is discussing what has taken place before. The question now is, the third clause of the Bill, Mr. Charlton's amendment, which has been read over and over again, and the amendment which Mr. Casgrain has just put into my hands; and the discussion of subjects outside of these is, I think, irregular.

Mr. PATERSON. I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman; but I think you will admit that, in closely replying to the arguments used by the hon. First Minister on these same propositions, I am quite within my limit.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question is not whether the time of the House has been delayed or not. It is the question of these amendments.

Mr. PATERSON. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that you will not find it necessary to attempt to restrain me beyond what I consider proper bounds if I convince you that I am within my rights.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. PATERSON. I feel that I am entitled to refer to this matter, and I think that the sense of the House and of the hon. First Minister himself would be against the statements he made on precisely the same motions on which I am speaking now being considered in order-proceeding with the quiet hearing and the pleased hearing we gave him cussing a measure, and after the minority have availed them-selves of the opportunity which is afforded them, the will of the majority must prevail. And so it will in this case. All that in the speeches made and the course pursued by the that the Opposition are doing-those who are opposed to this Opposition they have endeavored to obstruct this Bill, and the same charge might be made against him. Sir, that is not my motive or intention, and that will not be my act. I am here to speak to the amendments in your hands, and incidentally I may have occasion to refer to the sub-amendment. Now, speaking of the course of the Opposition, and having reference to the remarks I am about to make, I would challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to point out how they can be considered factious or obstructive when I am addressing myself closely, as the other members of the Opposition have done, to the principles involved. Sir, the charge is as foundationless as was the charge made against the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, I think, spoke only a little over an hour altogether on that occasion. I think I have a right to allude to that charge, and I allude to it as an answer to the statements made by the other side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I admire the spirit of fair play of the hon member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), coming back from his ranches, where he has been enjoying himself

Mr. IVES. I rise to Order. You have ruled that the hon, gentleman is not following the rules of the House. I merely called his attention to the ruling of the Chairman, and now he proposes to read me a lecture which I shall not submit to. There is no pertinency or relevancy in it.

Mr. PATERSON. I think there is a pertinency in referring to an impertinent interruption. The Chair is able to maintain order without suggestions from the hon. member for Richmond and, Wolfe. The hon. gentleman came back here yesterday, and he heard the hon. member for Lincoln travelling over the whole history of the Local House, from 1867 to 1878, and there never was a word of exception taken. I am speaking in precisely the same line as was taken by the hon. the First Minister himself. While there is no member who respects the Chair more than I do, and while I will endeavor to confine myself closely within the proper limit, the hon. First Minister, I am sure, will not contend that I should not be allowed to touch on the ground which he has covered himself. I am within the rules of debate when I refer to charges which have been made against myself, and which may be made against me when I sit down, that I have endeavored to obstruct the business of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. PATERSON. If the idea of hou, gentlemen is to break the thread of a discourse that might prove very interesting and instructive to them——

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Question.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, would you kindly give me an idea of the words I should use and the sentiments which you want me to express, before I finish the sentence I was about to make. It is quite impossible, of course, to proceed if we are to be hampered in that way; it cannot be done. The hon. First Minister assured us that there was to be an opportunity given for full and ample discussion. He discussed the principle and the details of the Bill. The hon. member for Lincoln did the same.

Mr. RYKERT. No, I did not.

Mr. PATERSON. If I had spoken before on this amendment, there might be some justification in hon. members calling me to order in the summary manner in which they are disposed to do it, but I submit, under the circumstances, latitude greater than I desire to take, having been allowed to others, that it is not a very fair thing that they should avail themselves of points of order, which they really fail to maintain. Now, a resolution you have in your hands, proposes that the provincial franchises shall be retained for the Mr. Paterson (Brant).

Dominion elections, and, in discussing that proposition, we have been told that we are injuring representative institutions—that if a course like that is permitted, responsible government is at an end. The hon. First Minister took that line, the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), took that line. Sir, responsible government is not thus easily destroyed. In order to maintain responsible government in this country, the hon. First Minister was quite right in turning, as he told us, a deaf ear to those of his supporters—for I suppose it was his supporters, it certainly was not gentlemen on this side—who intimated the desire that the clôture of some kind or other, English or American, should be applied to us. There is no danger of parliamentary institutions being brought into disrepute by this debate. The safety of responsible government in this Canada of ours rests on the good, sound, common sense of the people. If an Act is before the House that is a wise Act, an Act in the interests of the people, designed for the general good of the people, and if a party in the House, a minority, were to set themselves to prevent its passage by resisting it at every stage, such a course would be fatal to the minority. There is where the safeguard of responsible government and Parliamentary institutions rests; it rests in the fact that the people will not countenance, will not support or endorse the course of men who would offer obstruction to a measure that is in the public interest and designed for the public weal; and the people will be the judge of that. Therefore, the First Minister is safe; he need not tremble for responsible government, and the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), need not vex his righteous soul with reference to that point, because responsible government is safe in the hands of the people. If the policy which has been pursued by the Opposition were, and I deny it is, one of obstruction to a measure designed in the interests of the country, such a policy would be fatal to us, individually, and as a party, and the remedy lies in the hands of the First Minister. If the Government and their supporters believe the charges they make, let them apply the remedy that is in their own hands; let them dissolve the House and appeal to the people. Let them say: We wanted to pass a Franchise Bill, and the Opposition took occasion to debate it, clause by clause; they objected to it in principle and in detail; for days and hours they continued to debate it, though we made them sit up three days and nights continuously to wear them out. That is the course the Government should take. Will they dare to take it? Will they, as their organ advised, dissolve the House? Then, when the people pronounced on the question, we would willingly accept their decision, because they are the final arbiters. They say they should not be asked to dissolve the House. I tell you it is my fixed opinion that this is a more important question upon which to appeal to the people at the polls than the reason assigned for the premature appeal to the people in 1882, namely, that a few millions of dollars were waiting investment in this country to know what the National Policy was going to be. Is this not a more important question, when the whole control of the people, as far as election lists are concerned, is to be taken out of their hands and placed in the hands of irresponsible men, nominees of the Crown, not even responsible to the power who appointed them, with power given them to strike off or put on any name they please? A Bill which proposes to give a vote to the untutored savages of the West as well as those who are bound down under the Government of the day in the older Provinces? Is not the enlargement of the voting power to these people a question of more vital interest to the people than to ask them whether they should pronounce again on the National Policy, so that a few millions of money might come to be invested in the country, but which never came in. There is every reason—if we had any reason in 1882—why this question should be submitted to the people. If our course be as hon, gentlemen say, if as they claim as they would feign claim, though not openly, this Bill is all that is good and fair and decent in the public interest, then let them appeal to the people to send them back and justify responsible government and secure the safety and permanence of parliamentary institutions. No; the charge does not lie. I think one great reason why the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should pass is this, that if it prevails, this Bill will be disposed of virtually, and we will be enabled to proceed to the transaction of the public business of the country which is imperatively demanding attention at our hands. That leads me to look at the present condition of the country; for looking at that, I can give you a very strong reason why the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk should prevail. On this point allow me to bring into the discussion the views of the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not often read extracts, but as the minority seemed to be blamed by the majority for urging the Government to drop this measure and proceed to public business, let me read some of the views of the friends of the Government outside. On April 28, the organ of the Government said:

"The illness of the Finance Minister, the preoccupation of the Premier, and the absorption of the Department of Militia. make it obvious that it will be wise to get parliamentary business finished, to drop what cannot be carried, and then to prorogue. The public have really ceased to take interest in parliamentary proceedings; and though these are not intended for public amusement, the lack of interest in them ought to render winding up easy. The Opposition may take objections; but the Opposition in times like this does not count. Indeed it is probable that there does exist a decent degree of pride and enthusiasm in our troops among the Opposition; and that the rank and file are willing to act generously towards the Government. The country would respond to generosity much more readily than to hostile criticism just now. And in any case criticism is almost useless since it can find no echoes in the press. The newspapers that published speeches now would be doomed press. The newspapers that published speeches now would be doomed Thus both the Government and the Opposition seem to have the same interest in a prorogation; and it is to be hoped that business will be pushed, and the Ministers left free to devote themselves to the serious duties of the situation.

These are serious duties the Ministry have to attend to and it is desirable Parliament should be prorogued in order to do that business. If the amendment of my hon, friend from Norfolk were to prevail, one Bill that is not demanded by the public, and is not in the interest of the country would be disposed of, and we would be able to proceed to other business. On glancing at the Order paper, further reasons will be seen why this amendment should prevail. Supposing it did prevail, and that the reason was that the amount of business that had to be done. I had the curiosity to take up the journals of 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition, and being in Opposition of course behaved themselves with the same noble conduct that distinguishes them as a Government majority. Anything they may have done in Opposition certainly would not be called obstruction or delay of public business; there could be no objection taken to the course they pursued. Therefore, I looked up their record, in order that I might influence hon, gentlemen opposite in coming to a determination as to the amount of business to be done and the time it would take us to discharge it even if we were not troubled with the consideration of this Bill, as we would not be if the amendment of my hon, friend were carried. I found that, in 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in Opposition, we were in committee on the Estimates twenty days, apart from the days spent in debate on motions in amendment to Committee of Supply. This House has been in Committee of Supply three days. In that case seventeen days more are necessary for us to be in Supply, taking our precedent from the course of hon. gentlemen opposite when they thought it was necessary, and who will say it is not necessary now, when the Esti-1878. Then we have to concur in the Estimates, and I think I shall not be extravagant if I say that we ought to take three days in doing that. Then we have the Manitoba better terms, arranging terms with one Province of this Dominion, which will bring up a discussion that is very important, and may introduce the financial condition of many other Provinces that are even now asking for additional grants. I think it would not be unreasonable to say that three days would be required to do anything like justice to those resolutions. They would have to be adopted first, to be formed in a Bill which would have to pass its first, second and third readings, and to be considered clause by clause in Committee. We are still in Committee of Ways and Means. No concurrence has yet been taken in matters affecting the whole industries of the country. It would not be unreasonable to suppose that two days would elapse before we could finish the business of the Committee of Ways and Then there is the Insolvency Bill. I think I shall be quite within the mark if I say that we ought to take three days in discussing that Bill, putting it through all its various readings, and settling a matter which is of the deepest interest to the mercantile people of this country, on which great diversity of opinion prevailed in the committee, and on which a similar diversity of opinion will prevail in this House. I do not think I am beyond the mark in saying that three days should be given to the discussion of that measure.

An hon. MEMBER. Six days.

Mr. PATERSON. No one would charge upon this House anything like a desire to obstruct public business if it took six days to discuss this measure, but I have only put down three days. Then we have the Insurance Act. We know the diversity of opinion that exists in regard to that measure, but I have ventured to put down only one day for that Government measure, and I think the House will agree that I have not estimated too much in that case. there are the resolutions respecting the Court of Claims, and the first, second and third reading of the Bill to be founded on them, and the consideration in the committee. I have put down only one day for that. Then there is the Bill in regard to the North-West Mounted Police, enlarging the force, which may bring up the whole question of the North-West. Who will say that one day will be too much to give to that subject. Then there is the Chinese Bill. An expensive commission was sent out last year to enquire into that matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. PATERSON. I am speaking to the question. I am giving my reasons why the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk should pass, and the hon. gentleman is not following me closely, or he would see how pertinent my remarks are. In a measure of the magnitude of the Chinese question, which required many weeks to decide in the neighboring republic, I think I am very reasonable in limiting the discussion here to two days. Then we have the representation of Canada at the International Exhibition in London. Who will say that we should not have one day to discuss that? Certainly we should have a proper exhibition before the assembled colonies and the Indian Empire, and we require a certain amount of time to discuss that matter. Then there is the Bill for the Consolidation of the Statutes, with all the lawyers in the House anxious to speak in reference to it, and in regard to these two large volumes that are before us now. Will not two days be reasonable for the consideration of that matter? Then we have the Act suspending the operation of the McCarthy License Act, a question which has thrown the whole country into confusion, but I have only put down one day for considering that matter. Then we have the Library of Parliament, where mates embrace millions and millions more than they did in we are putting in an extra head and changing the whole programme; but I put down only one day for that. Then there are the Canadian Pacific Railway resolutions, which are so important in their nature that it would not be a waste of time, in the interests of this country, if ten days of this House were given to debating that question, when the Company has come back, for the third time, for a re-arrangement of the terms that we made with them and of the bargain which we supposed was final.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. PATERSON. Again I say that hon. gentlemen are not following the thread of my argument, which is perfectly partition to the question before the Chair. There are pertinent to the question before the Chair. many other Acts which hon gentlemen have to consider. There are six notices of motion by members of the Government, the resolutions for which have not yet been taken, but, leaving them out altogether, I find that there would be forty-eight days consumed in the business which I have enumerated. I am within the sense of the House when I ask whether the House should not take that time to discharge its duty in regard to these matters. You have but forty-three days from now to the 1st July, giving every day to the Government, for we will not sit on Sabbath. You have on your paper business that cannot be done satisfactorily, receiving the attention which it ought to receive at the hands of Parliament, and finished before the 10th or 15th July, even if you do not go into a discussion of the more important matters before the House, even if the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk should prevail and should relieve us from further consideration of this question. I think I have shown that there is business enough on the paper to demand the attention of the House, even on every day except Sundays, even if this amendment should prevail. Sir, I have another reason to offer why the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Chariton) should prevail, and that is, I believe that the people of the country desire to retain the provincial franchises as the basis for an election to the Dominion House. Why do I say so? I think so because there has been no demand from any quarter, from any Province, from any municipality, from any of the people of this land, from any individual in the land, so far as I know, asking to have the present state of things changed. If there are any, hon, gentlemen opposite ought to know it, and it will be something new for them to rise and give it to the committee. We find that no section of the press has asked for it, which is the great mouth of the people. There have been no petitions presented, there have been no requests from any direction, not only from any Province, or from any municipality, but from any individual, asking for it. Has there been any indication of the popular will on the other hand? Yes. I believe there is not an independent political paper in Canada to-day, that I know of, that does not say that this Bill is not demanded, that this Bill is not in the interests of the country, that this Bill ought not to become law. I say it ought not to pass, either, because hon. members in this House have not been able to defend this Bill. Neither in the House, nor in the country, nor in the press, have they been able to defend the Bill, or the provisions of their Bill. Any hon. gentlemen opposite who have risen to speak in reference to this Bill, have spoken aside from the question, have not confined themselves to the question, as I am doing at the present time. And their press has not dared to defend it, and whenever their press have attempted a defence of the Bill, they have misstated its provisions, and have not stated what the Bill really is, and their defence has been no defence. They have misstated the effects of the Indian clause, they have misstated the revising barristers provision, and the clauses that pertain to that. There has been no defence of the Bill, Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

press of hon. gentlemen opposite. And petitions are before the House demanding that it shall not become law; meetings are being held, and the people pronounce against it. Yet in face of all that, hon. gentleman, with their organ advising them to drop useless measures, and go on with the 48 days' business before us, outside of this Bill—hon. gentlemen are disposed to vote down the proposition, I suppose, of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), which, if it prevails, will render this Bill unnecessary. For 18 years we have been working under the old system. In 18 years, so far as I am aware, there has never been one single complaint heard in this House or out of the House, in reference to it working unequally, with reference to it doing any injury to any of the people of the country. Under the law, as it has been in the years past, hon. members opposite, as well as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, find themselves in their seats as members of Parliament. The only pretension they give is that we have a right to regulate our own franchise. Granted; and we have done it. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out, in the clearest manner yester-day, how this Parliament, recognising its rights, had declared its rights, and had placed on the Statute Book its willing reference to this matter. Parliament has maintained its rights, and therefore the only argument we have heard-if argument it may be called-that we have a right to do it, was most effectually disposed of by my hon. friend. Now, Sir, we have been blamed because we do not come down to what they call the enacting clauses. Minister blamed us yesterday, and other members have done so, as having spent too much time discussing the interpretation clauses, saying that if we had come down to the enacting clauses and discussed them there, we might arrive at conclusions. Now, what were the facts with reference to that? We discussed the whole woman question on the interpretation clause at the request of the leader of the Government, and yet he found fault with us immediately afterwards because we discussed the Indian question on precisely the first interpretation clause. But more than that: In the very section of the interpretation clause on which we were discussing the Indian question, and for which we were rebuked for discussing the Indian question in the improper place, what did the First Minister do? It was on that very same section of the interpreta-tion clause that the First Minister dealt with the whole Chinese question, for it was in there that he put in the words "excluding the Chinese." Such is the consistency of hon. gentlemen opposite. They undertake to lecture us for bringing on the discussion at improper places, and yet the very same gentlemen settle the whole Chinese question in precisely the same sub-section of the interpretation clause and on the previous one they settled the woman question. Now you can see how captious the objections are that we do not discuss these questions in their proper places. But hon. gentlemen say: If you go on, as you get further down, we will listen to the arguments that have to be advanced. On this point I see the right hon. gentleman is reported in his organ, the Ottawa Citizen—for I have not seen the Hansard of yesterday—as saying what I did not exactly understand him to say. I understood him to say that it could perhaps, be give and take when we got done; that he could meet the views of hon. members on this side of the House. But I see the Citizen reports the hon. gentleman as saying:

"If the Government and those who supported the Government desired that every clause of the Bill should be fully and fairly discussed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and that there should be a give and take in settling the details of the Bill—."

really is, and their defence has been no defence. They have misstated the effects of the Indian clause, they have misstated the revising barristers provision, and the clauses that pertain to that. There has been no defence of the Bill, properly so called, made either in this House or by the

We will have a little give and take on this matter. I do not | Indians of the plains. That may be so; but I do not so know, from past procedure in Parliament, whether we would be warranted in anticipating much of the "give" on their part unless we had something a little more definite with reference to what it was to be. I am afraid their division with us would be something like the division of the man who was all the time quarrelling with his family, and who, who was all the time quarrening with his family, and who, one day, surprised his neighbors by saying that the quarrel had ceased, and that he had settled the matter satisfactorily now, because he had divided the house with his family. They asked him: How he had managed that? "O!" he says, "I gave the family the outside of the house, and I took the inside." Now I think that is shout the way how gentlemen expected would do in this give about the way hon, gentlemen opposite would do in this give and take business. They would be willing to take the inside of the House and give us the outside—give it to us willingly, there is no doubt about that; because they understand that the Bill will do that for them, and that is the design of it. They mean to get us out. We have succeeded in getting back here in spite of them, under very difficult circumstances—many members of the Opposition; and now they design to make it still more difficult; they design by their Bill to secure for themselves almost the entire representation in this House for the Conservative party. Sir, we want something a little more definite about that give and take, before we could have very much faith in their offer. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read you a comment from the Montreal Gazette with reference to the Bill before the House. I propose to answer that, and in the answers I shall give, you will see our reasons why the motion of the hon, member for North Norfolk should prevail. The Montreal Gazette, I quote the article from another paper-but no doubt it is correctly given—says:

"There are three principal objections urged by the Opposition against the measure: first, that it enfranchises the Indians of the plains; secondly, that it contracts the suffrage, taking the country over; thirdly, that it gives over absolutely the preparation of the voters' lists to the henchmen of the Government of the day; and we are bound to say that, if these objections were well taken, the measure would deserve to be rejected by Parliament."

As to the first question: That it enfranchises the Indians of the plains, if it is true, what will hon. gentlemen do with the definite statement made from his place by the First Minister when he said the Bill would enfranchise the Indians of the plains; when he said, in answer to a direct question put to him, that it would enfranchise Poundmaker and Big Bear. I ask hon, gentlemen opposite, if it is not true, how was it that the First Minister, in reply to a direct question I put to him on Monday last as to whether it would enfranchise the tribal Indians, he replied, to the amazement of many of his followers, that it did if they had the same property qualifications. It is a mere technicality to say that the North-West is not represented in this House. The North-West is to be represented. events, the Indians on the plains of Manitoba, dwelling on their reserves, ignorant and besotted as they are described by many, are, under the provisions of this Bill, enfranchised—that is, if you may so degrade the word; they are given the same privilege as the white man who has the responsibilities of manhood upon him. If the First Minister has subsequently, when he found himself sorely pressed, announced that he would exempt British Columbia and Manitoba from the operations of this Bill when he came to the clauses, that statement proves that under the Bill they are not exempt. They are there, and the Montreal Gazette can make up its mind that the Bill gives the vote to Indians on the plain. This statement has been made by the First Minister; hon. gentlemen opposite have heard it from his own lips; they can read it in Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has given a chalunderstand it. I understand that what was done in relation to the interpretation clauses was to make a declaration in regard to the Indian that he was a person; but the House has yet to declare when it comes to the section dealing with the question whether they will enfranchise the Indians of the plains. If they enfranchise the Indians of the plains or anywhere else unless qualified as white men are qualified either by intelligence or property it will meet with my hostility, and I do not believe this House will do it.

I am very glad to hear it but Mr. PATERSON. the hon, gentleman did not catch the statement I had made. My statement was that they were enfranchised under the Bill as drawn. With the great influence of the hon. gentleman and his independent position, and with the influence of supporters of the Government who may hesitate to accept such a proposition now that it has been pointed out may lead to some change; but the very fact that any exemption needs to be put into the Bill shows it is not there.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PATERSON. If hon, members utter tones of derision they are deriding the explicit statements of the leader of the Government. We now come to the next That it contracts the suffrage, taking the country over. That has been abundantly proved by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. No one can controvert the statement. Does any one deny that this Bill contracts the franchise in British Columbia, where there is manhood suffrage, or in Prince Edward Island, when members who support the Government are moving and supporting an amendment declaring that the Act does injustice to them? The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) and other speakers have abundantly proved that in Ontario it will not give the suffrage to thousands who are enfranchised under the Act passed by the Mowat Government. In Nova Scotia I am told it will contract the franchise. In New Brunswick it is claimed that the Bill will contract it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON. It is very well for hon. gentlemen to say no, but let them rise and show in what particulars our statements are wrong. In the Province of Quebec the franchise is not contracted. With respect to the third proposition, which runs as follows: That it gives over absolutely the preparation of the voters' lists to the henchmen of the Government of the day. I do not use the term "henchmen;" I do not know what the connection may be. No one can deny that the clause with respect to revising barristers hands over the power to make and revise the lists to nominees of the Government. I have conclusively proved the truth of the three propositions set out in the Gazette, and therefore I am justified in opposing this Bill, for the editor himself says that we are bound to say that, if those objections are well taken, the measure deserves to be rejected by Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny that the Bill as drawn, without considering amendments that may have been suggested in caucus, will enfranchise tribal Indians. They cannot deny that the suffrage is contracted in Ontario, that it is contracted in Prince Edward Island, in British Columbia, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswich, and in Manitoba if they can. Until they do maintain their case we hold that our case has been proved by the statements and facts which have been elicited by hon, gentlemen on this side. With regard to the revising barrister, I would like to see a man on that side bold enough to say that the control of the list is not handed over to these gentlemen. Their newspapers, which do not feel the same responsibility that is felt by members of Parliament, may say so, but I do not lenge that no hon, gentleman can deny that the decision of think any hon, member will venture upon such a statement. this House as regards this Bill has been to enfranchise the I do not know what changes may be made, but changes have been promised, because the Opposition in this House stood up for the rights of the people and pointed out to the amazement of hon. gentlemen opposite, what the provisions of the Bill are, but we have had only one amendment of those which have been promised, thus far. There may be an amendment with reference to the revising barristers, but we do not know what it is to be, we are discussing the Bill as it is now, we have no such amendment before us, and I repeat is any hon. gentleman here bold enough to say that the control of the voters' lists will not be handed over absolutely to the gentlemen who are appointed revising barristers? I say that a more shameless provision never was found in any Bill. Hon, gentlemen talk about English practice and precedents, but can you mention any English statesman who would so far forget himself and the duty he owes to his country as to introduce a Bill into Parliament to give to the nominee of a Government the control which is given by this Bill to the revising barrister? These hon gentlemen say in their papers that it is the same system that is in force in England, but hon gentlemen do not say so here, because they know that it is not the same system. They know that the revising barristers in England are not appointed as it is proposed to appoint them here, and have not the power entrusted to them so absolutely as these men will have it if the Bill passes. Mr. Chairman, have you thought that the gentleman who rose last night and attempted a defence of this Bill—I refer to the hon, member for Lincoln—could be appointed a revising barrister under the provisions of this Bill.

Mr CHAIRMAN. I do not think that is the clause we are discussing.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. How does it come under the clause or the amendment?

Mr. PATERSON. It comes under the amendment, because if this amendment prevails the revising barrister clause would be wiped out.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON. Besides, Sir, I am only following the line of argument adopted by the hon. member for Lincoln, and so I cannot be out of order—it is impossible. I am alluding to his argument with reference to this clause, I am speaking to the same motion, and I say that it must have struck you, Mr. Chairman, that under the provisions of this Bill, that gentleman being a barrister of over five years' standing, could have himself appointed as revising barrister for Lincoln, could fix up the rolls for himself, could then resign his office, and could run as a member of Parliament. The rolls might be fixed up by himself; no one could appeal against them; and that any man should support and defend such a proposition in connection with the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk, is something very difficult of comprehension. Shall it be said that it would be a shameless thing for a man to do anything of that kind? Granted; but how much more shameless would it be than that a member of Parliament should sit here and use his power along with the power of others, before a general election came on, to have Reform townships thrown off his riding and Conservative townships thrown in, in order to make his seat secure. I say there is a danger that, under this Bill, any hon. gentleman who is a barrister of over five years' standing might himself be appointed to that position, might make up the lists, might then resign, and be elected as a member of this House on those lists.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman will see that we are not discussing the Bill as a whole, but the third clause, and that the revising barrister does not come up under that clause.

Mr. Paterson (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON. There is the amendment.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Yes, there is the amendment, but the revising barrister is not discussed in the amendment, and I hope that the hon. gentleman will observe that I have so ruled.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think, Sir, you have ruled as to whether the amendment affects the revising barrister clause or not. If the amendment of the hon, member for Norfolk carries, change must necessarily be made, and the revising barrister clause must go out with the others, so it is certainly in order to discuss that provision in connection with an amendment which proposes to substitute something else for it.

Mr. MILLS. The amendment of the hon, member for Norfolk is a proposition to adopt generally the provincial franchise, instead of the third clause of the Bill, and one of the provisions of the provincial law relates to the way in which the voters' lists are prepared. I think it is quite open to my hon, friend in arguing this question to argue that you should get rid of this objectionable feature, the revising barrister, by the adoption of the amendment. It is an argument to show why the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Under the provincial franchise we hold courts of revision whose functions are somewhat the same as those of the revising barrister, and it will be impossible to discuss this question of a provincial franchise without having to refer to the revising barrister, who is the chief functionary under this Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It seems to me that the question of the provincial franchises has nothing to do with the manner in which the lists are prepared. It has simply to do with the question of the qualification of voters under a provincial franchise. The third clause of this Bill declares what shall be the basis of the franchise in cities and towns. It is moved in amendment that the provincial franchises—that is to say, the qualifications under the provincial franchises—shall be substituted for these qualifications. That is all.

Mr. CASEY. No, no.

Mr. WHITE. That is all, as I understand it. The question therefore as to how those provincial franchises are to be embodied in voters' lists does not come up under the amendment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call attention to the fact that on a precisely similar amendment—unless I misunderstood it—the hon. member for Lincoln undoubtedly adopted a line of argument which would fully justify the reply of the hon, member for Brant.

Mr. RYKERT. Not at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I so understood it and others beside me understood the same. I have not Hansard, or I think, Mr. Chairman, I could convince you, on that question. No doubt you have not been as able as some of us to follow closely the intricacies of this discussion, but when Hansard comes, I think you will find that the hon. member for Lincoln took a great deal more latitude than the hon, member for Brant has taken.

Mr. CASEY. In answer to the objection of the hon. member for Cardwell, I would say that the amendment says that all persons qualified to vote shall be qualified and enrolled under this Act. Now, no person is qualified in any Province where there is a voters' list until his name is on the list and it has been revised with his name on. I think, therefore, the whole machinery of making the voters' lists comes up on this amendment.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). If you say we are all out of order in this discussion, I am perfectly satisfied to take invite discussion, I will go on.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I am ready to hear discussion.

Mr. LANDRY. Then, I think the hon. member on this side of the House has taken the proper stand. The amendment proposed by the hon, member for North Norfolk is in precisely the same words as the law at present. It has been copied from the Act of 1874. What it says is that all persons qualified to vote for members for the Legislative Assembly shall be those who vote for members of the House of Commons. How are we to arrive at who the persons How are we to get the evidence? qualified are? amendment should be adopted, cannot we establish our own tribunal for the purpose of ascertaining who are qualified? Cannot we say who shall be the tribunal to determine those who are qualified to vote, either revising barristers or muni-You may adopt the cipal councils. or anybody you like? lists in the Province of Quebec or in the Province of New Brunswick, but that is not adopting the tribunal. the law of 1874, and you will find that, in the same paragraph that contains the words of the amendment, it says:

"And all lists of voters made and prepared, and which would, according to the laws in force in the said several Provinces, be used if the election were that of a representative or representatives to the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the Province in which the election is held, shall be the lists of voters."

It was thought necessary to say what list should be used, and in this amendment nothing is said about the lists. It simply says that we shall take the qualifications in the different Provinces. If we adopted it, I claim that we could still say what tribunal shall establish, who possess those qualifications; and in view of that, it is entirely improper to discuss now the provisions of this Bill which refer to the tribunal which shall establish what persons shall vote.

Mr. RYKERT. Hon. gentlemen opposite have entirely misunderstood my argument of yesterday. In all their speeches, hon. gentlemen have complained that the revising barristers would cause a great deal of expense. In reply to that, I stated that they had always been in favor of revising barristers, and I quoted extracts from speeches to show that they had. I said nothing more nor less than that.

Mr. MILLS. In reply to what the hon. member for Kent, N.B., has said, I hold that the adoption of the amendment does necessarily imply the adoption of the voters' lists and the machinery of the Provinces. How is it possible to say that the party who is qualified under the law of the Province to exercise the franchise shall be qualified under this law unless you adopt all the machinery that the Province provides? Suppose you adopt the revising barristers under this Bill, and they came to a different conclusion from that of the provincial authorities; you would have two voters' lists different from each other. If you adopt the amendment, which provides for adopting the qualifications that prevail in the different Provinces, you adopt the lists of the Provinces. Therefore, under that clause, you have the whole question brought up as to the revising barristers, and it is an argument in favor of that policy that by the adoption of it you adopt the local machinery and save the cost of this operation.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely it will be admitted that we are discussing the qualification under the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The qualification of voters in the Province of Ontario, for example, under the present law, is entirely based upon the assessment roll; if a person's name is on the assessment roll, he is qualified, otherwise he cannot be qualified. When we are discussing that we discuss the assessment roll as against the other machinery provided in this Act for making the lists of voters. It different from the assessment roll, and how we can discuss | a qualified voter on the register.

your ruling and to sit down; but if I understood you to the qualifications without bringing that into the discussion I fail to see. This very clause 3 provides that a person to be entitled to vote must be registered on the lists of voters for any electoral district; and in the interpretation clause, which we have passed, we find that "lists of voters means the lists of registered voters to be prepared and revised under the provisions of this Act in each year." If there is anything that it is plain on the face of this section is to be discussed, it is the creation of that voters' list, and that can only be done by discussing the mode of revision provided by this law.

> Mr. TROW. Custom should, in a great measure, govern your ruling. Members have often travelled out of the record in this debate, and you have to take their conduct into consideration in ruling upon others. The hon member for Lincoln last night travelled all over creation and part of the States. No one can deny that he invariably travels all over the world.

> Mr. BOWELL. I think any one reading this amendment must come to the conclusion that your ruling is strictly correct.

Mr. CASEY. He has not ruled yet.

Mr. BOWELL. I understood that he had ruled. However, I am ready to admit with the hon, member that nearly every speaker has travelled beyond the record; but as I understand, if the amendment to the amendment be carried, it exempts the Province of Quebec from the operation of this law so far as the qualifications for voters are concerned. If you adopt the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk, it substitutes the qualifications for voters in the different Provinces for the qualifications which are contained in the clause under discussion, and nothing more. We will suppose, for argument sake, that this motion is carried, and that clause No. 3 is striken out of the Bill. That clause provides what will be the qualifications of voters in towns and cities of the Dominion. Strike it out and substitute the amendment which says:

"That all the words in section 3 be struck out and the following substituted in place thereof: Subject to the exceptions herein contained, all persons qualified to vote at the election of representatives in the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly of the several Provinces comprising the Dominion of Canada, and no others, shall be entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Commons of Canada for the several electoral districts comprised within such Provinces respectively."

That affirms the qualification for the voters in each of the Provinces, as it exists at present in towns and cities, and nothing more. It has nothing whatever to do with, nor does it refer even incidentally to, the mode in which the lists hereafter may be made up. The hon, member for West Octavio (Markov) West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) says a person is not qualified to vote unless he is on the assessment roll. That is true, but he must be qualified under the law in regard to property and age and to being a British subject and in other respects before he can be placed on the assessment roll, so that the assessment roll is only evidence that the man whose name is entered upon it has all the qualifications necessary to enable him to vote. If improperly placed on that roll he can be taken off it; if it be shown that he cast an illegal vote he can be struck off in the scrutiny. I am of opinion that all that should be strictly discussed is the qualification of voters in the cities.

Mr. WELDON. The qualification is composed of two things: first of a certain amount of property, and then of the fact that the name is recorded on the assessment roll. A man must have the qualification before he can be assessed; and for the purpose of ascertaining the qualification, we have to ascertain whether he has a certain amount of property and whether he is assessed. His qualification is proposed in this new law to base the lists on something | is that he is not only an owner of property, but that he is

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). After the voters' lists are made up, and a gentleman has managed, somehow or other, to get his name on the roll, who is not entitled to vote, through his not being a British subject, or through his being an alien, or not being of age, or from other cause, is put to his oath, his vote then can be rejected. Therefore the evidence is not the list but the qualification.

Mr. WELDON. If he is on the register, he is entitled to vote; that is not the place to test the qualification.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend says that is not the place to test the qualification. True, that is not the place the law has provided to test the qualification; but if when a man goes to vote, knowing that he is not entitled to vote, and the test is put to him, he cannot take the oath without perjuring himself, and therefore does not take it.

Mr. LANDRY. By the oath he swears he is a qualified voter, 21 years of age, and a British subject, and a resident, He must swear to the three things, if called on.

Mr. WELDON. He has got to have the qualification showing where he resides, and that he is the person named on the register. If not on the register he cannot vote.

Mr. DAVIES. The proposition is that this debate shall be confined simply to the qualification of those who have a vote. That clearly confines it in much narrower bounds than even the original proposition before the House. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has already pointed out, that by the propositions already submitted in the 3rd clause, every person shall be entitled to be registered on the list of voters if he possesses certain qualifications. What is the list? You have already passed a clause defining what that is. "The list to be prepared and revised under the provisions of this Act." In discussing the 3rd clause we must discuss therefore in what manner the lists are to be prepared and revised under the provisions of the Act. To determine whether a man can vote or not we must ascertain in what manner the list of voters is to be made up. The amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk deals with all persons qualified to vote. one can be qualified to vote unless he be on the list of voters. It is essential to be on the list of voters as to be possessed of the qualifications.

Mr. LANDRY. You may be on the list and cannot vote.

Mr. DAVIES. Unless he is on the list he cannot vote. What we must discuss is the system of putting him on the list, whether that system put in force by the Provincial Legislatures is cheaper than the one proposed. It is necessary therefore for him, before he can give an intelligent vote, to contrast the one with the other, and, if he comes to the conclusion, as he was pointing out to the House, that this system was much more extravagant than the local system, he will vote for the local on that ground alone.

Mr. MULOCK. It surely cannot be contended at this stage of the debate that any kon. gentleman could be out of order by referring, incidentally at least, to the revising officer, because there seems to have been no limit to the latitude allowed previous speakers. Yesterday, the First Minister was permitted to have as much latitude as he desired, and I think my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) was in no way controlled. If I remember rightly, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) also dealt with some matters that did not relate to the franchise in cities and towns. I think that yesterday we discussed the whole question of Indian franchise over again, and that was considered in order.

Mr. LANDRY. That is no good reason why there should be disorder to-day.

I do not think that hon. gentlemen on one side should be allowed a latitude which is not given to treat before you left the Chair at six o'clock. In doing so, those on the other side.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any reason to complain of my not having allowed every latitude to any remarks which could be at all considered as having a bearing upon the question before the House. have given that latitude from the commencement of this debate, and I have never raised a question of order in regard to any incidental reference to the revising barrister provisions, but, when the hon. gentleman took that up as the main question before the House and discussed it in that way, I think it was out of order, and therefore I have called the attention of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) to the fact that the question is not whether the persons on the lists to vote for the Provincial Legislature should be those who should be entitled to vote at the Dominion elections, but as to "all persons who are qualified to vote," not all persons who are on the lists. It does not raise the question as to the lists. Of course, the question of the manner of preparing the lists for the Local Legislatures has been fully discussed, but I think hon. members ought to consider what is the amendment mainly before the House, and should refer incidentally to other matters, but not as if they were the main questions before the committee. I thought the hon, member for Brant was addressing himself to this rather as if it were the main motion than as an incidental question arising out of the motion before the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is unfortunate that I was unable to let you see that I was alluding to the revising barrister incidentally. I was not proposing to discuss the revising barrister clause at all, but was only alluding to it incidentally and endeavoring to point out how it bore on the clause under consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. PATERSON. Time is precious, so I will speak up to six o'clock. It is something admirable to witness hon. gentlemen, who listen for one whole hour to a gentleman on one side of the subject, continually taking points of order when a gentleman on the other side is speaking.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PATERSON. I feel that gentlemen who act in such a way deserve to be enlightened and to have information given to them. That is what such gallant and chivalrous conduct demands. I hope they will continue to maintain the proprieties of debate and will call me to order at every possible opportunity. In this way they may become educated as to the bearing of clause 3. There is a difference of opinion between the learned gentlemen from New Brunswick as to how this clause affects their lists, and that is a question which should be discussed, because, when lawyers do not agree, it can hardly be expected that laymen will. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has not spoken except on a point of Order, but I should like to hear him speak on this subject to see if he could keep in order. think that, at this late period of the Session, every minute we have is valuable, and when, after hon. gentlemen have consumed 20 minutes of valuable time in arguing a point of order, they want to make it six o'clock at five minutes before six, that manifests a desire to waste time which should be reprehended.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I shall have to trespass on the patience of the committee for a short time only, while I allude to one or two other points which I was unable to I will endeavor to conform to what you have laid down as the proper subjects that may be discussed. I desire to say a few words with reference to the Indian question; as the Indian is to be included in this word "person," and as such be entitled to be registered on the voters' list, it is pertinent that we should enquire in what condition he is found. In the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) last night on this question, I find a justification for the lengthened debate that has taken place upon that subject on the interpretation clause. It appeared from the remarks of the hon, gentleman, that while we thought that question had been thoroughly discussed a week ago last Monday, we find that the hon. gentleman's mind is still in the dark as to the difference that exists between the person Indian, and the other persons that are mentioned in the Bill. My hon, friend from Lincoln also referred to some remarks of mine with reference to my advocacy of the enfranchisement of the Indians in the year 1880, and in 1876. Perhaps he was away when I went fully into that explanation of my position, which, I think, satisfied most hon gentlemen opposite that we occupy precisely the same position now, with reference to the matter, that we have always done. It must be clear now, that in the Bill before us, the names of Indians that it is proposed to enter upon the voters' lists, are not the names of those who are in the same position as the hon, member for Lincoln thought, and are not in the same position as their white brethren. 'The proposition in the Bill is that the word "person" shall include an Indian, and that being so, we would find that under section 3, he would be entitled to be ranked on the list of voters. Now, if that referred to the enfranchised Indians, the House would agree with it. No one pretends to deny that the Indian who is enfranchised, and in the same position as other citizens of this country, should not have the same rights. The Bill under consideration, however, does not enfranchise the Indian; it is impossible for the Bill to enfranchise the Indian. If the Indian's name be entered upon the list of voters under the operations of this Bill, he is not thereby enfranchised, he does not thereby assume the responsibilities of other citizens. The Indian will be on the list of voters, but he will be there in a state of tutelage, a ward of the Government, his actions controlled by the Government, unable to make any contract on his own account, and unable to deal with his own property without the direction and supervision of the Superintendent General, not liable to the duties that devolve upon other classes of citizens; he will simply have his name entered upon the list of voters and be entitled to vote while he maintains his tribal relation, while he is still under the operation of the Indian Act, while he is still the ward of the Government. The clauses of the Indian Act have been read by different members of this House, and every one of those clauses declare that in almost all his actions he is subject to the control and will of the Superintendent General; and therefore, I hold, Sir, that Indians in that position are not entitled to have their names entered upon the list of voters. The Indian can only be enfranchised under the operations of the machinery provided in the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act, and whenever he is thus enfranchised he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of other citizens of this country, including the right to vote. The distinctions between him and other citizens are then wiped out, and until they are wiped out, and until he has assumed those responsibilities, it is an injustice and an inequality to give him a vote. But my hon friend from Lincoln says that the Indian pays his share of taxes by way of customs and excise revenues that are collected in this country on the goods he consumes and the clothes he wears. Granted; but, as I said to him last night, the son of the hon. member for Lincoln, my son, your son, the sons of all the whitemen wear clothes on which duties are paid, they consume goods on which taxes are levied, they contribute as much—in the vast majority of cases, they contribute more—to the revenues of this country than the unenfranchised Indian. Who will deny that the young men of this country over 18 years of age do not contribute more to the revenue of this country than the Indian. Yet this Bill proposes to give to the unenfranchised Indian who is a minor in the eye of the law, who is a ward of the Government, whom you cannot sue, who assumes none of the responsibilities of citizenship, the right to have his name put upon the voters' list, and to exercise the franchise; but your son, and my son, and the sons of all the freemen of this country, under 21 years of age, may not be entered on that list. Your boy, Sir, 18 years of age, and the boy of every other man contributing to the revenues, is subject to the Government laying its hand upon him and saying: We want you to march to the front to defend the life and property of the citizens of this Dominion. When he is over 18 years of age he is subject to military duty, and though he contributes to the revenue of this country he is denied the franchise. Sir, if there is any effect in the argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite that the enfranchised Indian, while continuing his tribal relations, and in a state of subjection to the Government, is to be permitted to vote, I say there is no reasonable ground upon which you can stand and deny that vote to the young men over 18 years of age in this country, who pay more taxes than the unenfranchised Indian, who are liable to military duty, when the older members of the community are exempted; and yet the Bill does not propose to give the franchise to them. I suppose a proposition to that effect would be voted down by the hon, member for Lincoln, and at the same time he proposes to give a vote to unenfranchised Indians who have not so much control of their actions as have young men of 18 years of age. You cannot bind youths without the consent of their parents; but in the vast majority of cases they are allowed to make what arrangements they can with their employers, to draw their own pay, and spend their own money, and control their own actions, and such young men who have been educated in our public institutions, who are the first to volunteer in defence of the country, who read the newspapers and study political history, are not to be allowed to vote; but the unenfranchised Indians under the control of the Government to a greater degree than the boy is under the control of the father, unable to read or write, who, in many cases, take the position that they are not subjects but aliens, are to be given the franchise. These are questions that must suggest themselves to members of the committee. I desire to repeat that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House desire to see the Indian enfranchised. That is the only solution of the matter, but I agree with the First Minister that it does not do to force measures on the Indians, to declare that the unenfranchised Indians shall be enfranchised, shall have their own property and look out for themselves. That would not be a wise course when they have been so long in a state of tutelage. But there should be votes given to them under the operation of the enfranchising clauses of the Indian Act, and I would be glad to assist the First Minister in such a measure, which only could be carried by amendments to the Indian Act. But this Bill gives Indians the right to vote, and still leaves them in a state of tutelage and dependence upon the Government. In respect to clause 3, members of the committee cannot have failed to observe that in the history of Parliament we have had questions of assessment rolls and assessments, and voters' lists, brought before the House for the first time. It is not to be wondered at that so many of us require so much information and discussion in order to enable us to rightly understand them. and all the freemen in this country, take them at 18 years of age, pay their taxes to the general Government. They assessment and the qualifications, not in one Province, but in all the Provinces of the Dominion. I do not yet understand the system in vogue in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and even with respect to other Provinces. When a question of this kind is discussed it is absolutely necessary that members should understand how the voters' lists are made up in every Province. The committee will therefore see there is a vast field of information with which members have to make themselves acquainted. We are now being simply trained in the matter; the question was never before Parliament at any previous time. When this Bill becomes law, when the will of the majority shall prevail, as prevail it will, after there has been reasonable and full discussion, the difficulty has not been wiped out. Every single year, for days and days, if not weeks and weeks, the attention of this House will be occupied in discussing this measure. It cannot be supposed that if the Dominion franchise is adopted and Parliament settles the matter this year, it will remain settled for all time to come. It will be quite open to every hon, member, and hon, members will avail themselves of the privilege, to propose amendments. Can it be supposed that the indomitable member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who has given notice of an amendment to adopt manhood suffrage, will not bring up, at subsequent Sessions, amendments embodying that principle, if he should fail to secure its incorporation into this Bill? Will not the First Minister, having failed to incorporate the ladies franchise into this Bill, bring up the question again? It may be that this very Chinese question, decided in this Bill, may again be brought up, and there may be a revulsion of feeling with respect to it; and any member is at liberty to bring it up as to who shall or who shall not vote, and having done so we may depend upon it that it will be discussed warmly in this House. So with your Indian proposition and your property qualification. Who will say that on some future occasion a man who believes that $250 is a high enough income franchise, will not introduce an amendment to that effect. So it must be seen that such amendments will come up, that they will be dealt with by this House, and consume the time of this House, for days if not for weeks. That is one of the certainties of the passage of this Bill and the fixing of the franchise as it is proposed. I wish to refer to the question of expense, as to which you have ruled that it is in order in the present discussion. My hon. friend from Lincoln doubted the figures which have been given with reference to the expense of this Bill, and he said that the discussion which had taken place on this Bill—the time wasted, I think he said—by the members of the Opposition, would cost the country more than one year's preparation of the voters' lists under this Act. I differ from the hon. gentleman. It is true there is some expense, but not as much as hon. gentlemen want to make the House believe. If members of the Opposition are here discussing this Bill at length, they are discussing it at the expense of their own pockets. I presume they will draw no more sessional allowance if they spend six months here than if they spend three. The officers of the House, the messengers and the vast bodies of the employes will not draw one dollar more salary if we remain here six months in the year than if we remain here three. Where, then, is the additional expense? It is not coming out of the country. There is, I suppose, a little additional sum for gas, and there will be some addition for printing, but what will be the amount? Will the hon, member for Lincoln give us the figures?

Mr. RYKERT. In due time.

Mr. PATERSON. When the hon. gentleman undertakes to say that the extra expense which the country is being put to on account of the two weeks the Opposition have been discussing the Bill comes to more than the total cost of the machinery required by this Act for a year, he should be able to give us an estimate now. Members of the Oppo-Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

sition are staying here at as great financial loss as hon. gentlemen opposite; but what do we care for that? have engaged to discharge our duties as members of Parliament, and there is no fixed time by law as to when our labors shall be completed here. Do we hear any grumbling or complaining that we do not get enough for our work? We might fairly grumble at the Ministry keeping the House sitting tor a total of only some sixty odd hours for several weeks at the beginning of the Session, and keeping us fifty-six hours in one continuous session on this Bill, but we do not complain or whine about it. Our business affairs demand our attention at home, and if the Ministry had brought down their measures at the proper time, we might have been at home attending to our business, But we do not complain. A majority of the House voted down the proposition that this Bill was brought in too late for a full and fair discussion of its provisions, and they declared by their vote that it was brought down in ample time, and that ample time would be given. Why, then, not give us ample time? The discussion was needed not only by the people of this country, but by the members of this House, as shown by the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln; and why, then, say that we are pursuing a policy of obstruction. We feel it our duty to remain here and discuss this Bill, as we will feel it our duty in regard to all other measures which are brought before us, and we do not stay here with a view of obstructing this Bill, or discussing it or any other Bill further than the public interests demand. How can a Bill which is not understood by hon, gentlemen in this House be understood by the people of this country, until more light is let in upon it? How can this Bill be understood by a large number of the people of the country, who take their information from one set of political organs, none of which have stated fairly and correctly the issues at stake in this Bill. Some of them declare that the Indian clause means the giving a vote to Indians who are in the same condition as white men, a statement which is absolutely incorrect, not to say untrue, and still you will find that stated in the ministerial They say that the revising barrister is the same as under the English system, which is not true, and hon. gentlemen know it. So that we must either speak with tones loud enough to be heard from this House, or wait until the attention of these people who are restricted to one source of information is drawn to the provisions of this Bill by discussion with their neighbors, or until they see a copy of the Bill, as hundreds of them are now sending in requests for copies of the Bill, that they may see it for themselves. The people have a right to see and understand this Bill, which is subverting the electoral system and introducing a new system in the place of the one that has worked so long and so successfully in the Provinces. The assessor in Ontario is sworn to do his duty, and besides there is the appeal to the court of revision, the members of which are directly responsible to the people, as they are members of the municipal councils; and if they do not do justice the people have the remedy in their own hands, and can exercise it within twelve months. Besides, there is provision for an appeal to the county judge. The elector lays his case before him, and if his case is good his name is entered on the list. That is the provision we have in Ontario. Who will say it is not a wise provision, or that under it the reople have not the whole control of the voters' lists in their hands? But who will say that under this Bill the people have any control over the lists at all, when the provision is that there shall be one man, nominated by the Government of the day, practically a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, who will make the list up from such sources as he pleases, and having made it, will revise it, and from his revision there will be no appeal on points of fact? If he does any injustice, the people have no remedy, because he is to be appointed for life, and they have no control over him at all. Tell me that is a measure that | the revising barristers. What more ?-200 bailiffs to serve ought to be introduced into a free Parliament! Tell me that is a Bill that has had ample discussion in the course of two weeks, when every man in this House and the constituents of every man in this House are so vitally interested in it! Tell me that we are obstructionists in discussing it for two weeks, when we have the statement of the First Minister, that a whole Session would be required to do justice to it! Hon. gentlemen must understand that we have a duty to perform to our constituents, and with a sense of that duty weighing upon our minds we intend to discharge it. We do not desire to tyrannise over the majority; we recognise the fact that the majority should rule in a country where representative institutions prevail; but the majority have no right to use the power placed in their hands by the electors, to take away from the people the liberty they have of pronouncing on their conduct, and fortify themselves more securely in their seats. The Bill is the more reprehensible when we find that there seems to be an intent on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, by means of it, not only to strengthen themselves in their seats, but also to strike at the safety of the seats of men who oppose them. A seat or two in this House is nothing; it matters not to a constituency what particular man may represent them in this House; we may have such an idea of our ability as we choose, but the country has before got along without us, and no man is so valuable that the country cannot do without him. If the principle embodied in the Bill is a righteous or just principle, then enact the law, no matter what man falls or what man is elected; but it does matter to the people of this country to take away their right to determine freely in the future, as they have done in the past, who shall be the men to elect their representatives. We think we discover in the provisions of this Bill, I shall not say a design, but something that will produce the effect I have pointed Now, having shown that the hon. member for Lincoln has overrated the expense of this debate, allow me to call your attention to the matter of expense in connection with this Bill. It has been estimated variously by gentlemen on this side; hon. gentlemen opposite have given us no estimate, and therefore we have to fall back on the estimates made on this side. And in this connection I would say that we have the satisfaction, at any rate, of feeling that if the expenditure under this Bill is reduced below half a million dollars a year, it will be due to the thorough discussion it is receiving at the hands of the members of the Opposition in this House. How many officers will be appointed under this Bill? Some gentleman told us that we shall not need to have 211 revising barristers -that one can do the work of more than one constituency. We do not know how that will be; but the hon. Minister who has the charge of the measure made a remark the other day which leads me to believe that it is the intention to have a revising officer in each riding. When he was asked if it was the intention to make the county court judges revising barristers, he said something like this: "We will endeavor to make the county judges barristers where we can, but gentlemen must remember that there are only some 40 judges in Ontario and some 92 constituencies." What was the inference from that remark, but that there are not judges enough to give one to each riding, and therefore he would appoint revising officers outside of the judges. Therefore, I judge that his idea is that there must be one for each riding—not 211, because there are some double constituencies, but something in the neighborhood of 200 revising officers, 200 more lawyers saddled on this country—unheard of, almost undreamed of. The country is satiated now with office holders, and with lawyers in positions. If the number is any less than 200 it will be due to the full and fair discussion of this measure by the Opposition. What then?-200 clerks, in addition to the notices-600 sure; and if you have 200 constables, 800 in all, and the travelling expenses of all these officers in addition. Sir, is the estimate made on this side of the House a large one—that the salaries of 600 or 800 officials, their travelling expenses, and the printing connected with this business, will amount to half a million dollars a year? What does it mean? Is there not in the matter of expense alone a reason why the amendment of the hon. member of North Norfolk should prevail? If it prevails, what will it cost the country to get up these lists? Not one single cent, because the expenses of the municipalities are had in reference to their lists, and they will have to be had whether this Bill passes or not. What is the expense of a general election in this country? Is it not about $120,000? I think so. After every five years a Parliament has lasted the country is put to an expense of $120,000, in order that a new election may be held, and in order that a new House of representatives may be chosen; but pass this Bill and what will be the cost? Five years at $500,000 a year—$2,500,000 added to the $120,000. The cost of a Dominion election without the Bill is $120,000, with the Bill it will be $2,620,000.

An hon, MEMBER, No.

Mr. PATERSON. You will have to answer it on the platform if you do not answer it here. You will have to meet these facts before the electors. If the cost will be less it will be due to the efforts of the Opposition in pointing out the nature of the Bill and enforcing economy upon the Government. What does this $500,000 a year, capitalised at 4 per cent., mean? It is equivalent to an addition to the public debt of $12,500,000. This House will, if my figure be correct, by the passage of this Bill, by voting down the proposition of the hon. member for North Norfolk, cost this country some $12,500,000, for it is equivalent to voting that large addition to the public debt. It is time the committee should hesitate; it is not too late yet. I want to give an idea, by comparison, what an amount is involved in this measure. As far as I am concerned, the people shall know what it costs the country to have the views of the minority in this House voted down. No better idea can be had of the vast amount of money added to the public debt, virtually by the passage of this measure, than by a comparison of the total earnings of the wage-earners of the different cities in this country. For that reason I took the census returns for 1881, showing the wages earned by the different classes, comprising skilled labor and other labor, in all 167 different kinds, including the men who work in saw mills, ship-yards, the employes in factories, and all that are employed in manufacturing, and what is the result? It would take the combined earnings of all the wage-earners of the city of Kingston, under the head, I have spoken of, thirty-three years to make the amount that will virtually be added to the public debt if the Bill should pass. It will take the entire earnings of all the mechanics, artisans and employés in saw mills in this city twelve and three quarter years to make up the amount; it will take ten years of the entire wages of all these classes of the city of London to wipe out the debt you propose to add to this Bill; it will take five and a half years of the entire wages of these classes in the great manufacturing city of Hamilton to wipe it out; it will take three and one-third years of the entire earnings of the vast army of workmen, amounting to 12,708 in the great city of Toronto, to wipe it out, and yet there is to be a debt put upon these men, in order to pay the interest on which they will have to toil and sweat—for the sake of what? For the sake of disfranchising many of themselves. Let us go to our sister Provinces. In the great city of Montreal, with its immense army of 22,132 workmen, it will take one year five and a-half months of their entire earnings to cover this debt; it will take thirteen and three-quarter years of the entire earnings of all these classes in the city of Halifax to come up to the amount involved in this Bill; it will take seventeen years of the entire earnings of the same people in the city of St. John to meet this heavy charge. In the Province of Prince Edward Island it will take fifteen and a-half years of the total earnings of all these classes in order to get the inestimable privilege of having this Bill, that is going, politically, to cut off the heads of many of the men who will have to pay for it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I want to read the hon, gentleman a decision in the English House of Commons as to the right of a man to weary the House with repetition. Mr. Speaker Brand ruled: "I have to suggest to the hon. member that he is drawing too much on the indulgence of the House in repeating observations which he has made more than once."

Mr. PATERSON. I did not look up what Mr. Speaker Brand said, but I knew the Chairman of the committee, who is now presiding, had ruled decisively the other night that the question of expense could be gone into, and he was quite sufficient authority for me; but I understand now he prefers the decision of Mr. Speaker Brand to his own.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have ruled that the hon, gentleman is repeating what he has said before in this House. That has nothing to do with previous decisions.

Mr. PATERSON, I would ask you to read the rule which prohibits a member from repeating what he has said.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have read the rule, according to English practice, the rule laid down by Mr. Speaker Brand, that the Speaker occasionally appeals to hon. gentlemen not to weary the House:

"Mr. Whalley, in making a personal application, was exceeding due limits, amid cries of order. Mr. Speaker reminded the hon. member that he was exceeding the bounds of personal explanation. The hon. member continuing, and renewed cries of order being raised, Mr. Speaker: 'I have to suggest to the hon. member that he is drawing too much on the indulgence of the House in repeating observations which he has made more than once.'"

Mr. PATERSON. What proceedings were before the House at that time? Was the House in committee? Was it on a motion to adjourn? Or what was the motion?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Whether in committee or not, the hon. gentleman is exceeding the rules.

Mr. PATERSON. I had not finished my observations, but I will bring them to a close now.

Mr. FISHER. I feel called upon to say a few words on the motion before the Chair. I, to-day, voted in favor of the motion to exempt the Island of Prince Edward from the operation of this Bill, believing it to be wise and right that the provincial franchises should be adopted in place of the new franchise proposed by this Bill, and I now feel bound to support the motion of my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), to exempt the Province of Quebec-my own Province—from the operation of this Bill. In that Province we have a more restricted franchise than that now proposed, but it is not principally on that account that I support the amendment. I am not going to quarrel with the extension of the franchise, if that extension were proposed in the Provincial Parliament, which I believe is the right body to deal with the question. If the extension proposed by this Bill were proposed in the Local Legislature of Quebec I would advocate it, but finding that it is to be forced upon that Province by the majority of this House, in which the Province of Quebec is not represented in sufficient numbers to hold its own, I consider it my duty to oppose the over-riding of the desires of the Province from which I come. Propositions have been made in the Local Legislature of that Province to extend the franchise, Local Government there, have brought the financial con-Mr. Paterson (Brant).

and I believe they have generally emanated from my own political friends in that Legislature and have been voted down by the successors of the Secretary of State in the Government of that Province. Knowing the position which the Secretary of State and his friends have taken on this subject, I expect that, if they are true to their traditions, they will support the proposition of my hon. friend from L'Islet. It may by some be considered that I am inconsistent in supporting this motion when it is known that I am in favor of extending the franchise in that Province, but it is very different to have this extension forced upon the Province by the majority of this House, who do not come from that Province, and to have it adopted in the House which rules the Province and is composed altogether of members who truly represent it. Hon, gentlemen opposite have said that they represent the Province of Quebec as much as members of the Local Legislature. That I deny. I do not believe that, in this House, where the voice of any one Province must be more or less merged in that of the other Provinces, it is possible for the comparatively small number from any one Province to be able to represent and enforce the views of that Province so truly and energetically as they can be enforced in the Local Legislature. I contend that this law should not apply to the Province of Quebec, chiefly on the ground that in that Province, up to the present time, the holding of real estate has been the basis of the electoral qualification, while under this Bill a vote is given to farmers' sons who do not own any real estate, to people earning a certain income, and to fishermen holding personal property. This is making a radical change in the franchise of the Province of Quebec. Referring to the fishermen's qualification, I cannot refrain from wondering why, if personal property in boats and fishing tackle is to qualify a voter, other personal property, such as that of the mechanic in his tools, or of a person owning horses and carriages for hire, should not also qualify. When this thin end of the wedge is once entered I believe it must of necessity follow that personal property in other things besides fishing tackle and fishing boats will, within a short time, be given the franchise. This is creating specially a revolution in the Province of Quebec, because in that Province, at the present time, there is no such a thing as qualification on personal property. Now, there is another reason why Quebec should be exempted from the operation of this Bill. We are especially jealous of our municipal institutions. We believe that in the Province of Quebec we have a first rate municipal code, with local government in each municipality. Hon, gentlemen opposite who come from Ontario have decried the municipal institutions of their Province, and have given an account of them which I do not like to believe. Now, Sir, I am proud of the municipal institutions of my own Province, and I am glad to believe that they are worthy of the high trust which they possess in controlling the voters' lists. I am glad to know that in our municipal councillors and assessors we have men to whom we can safely confide the management of the electoral lists, and I think it is a great injustice to take away that duty from the municipalities, as is proposed by this Bill. Moreover, if you impose this Bill upon the Province of Quebec you impose a heavy tax upon the municipalities of that Province, and you impose upon the electorate a burden which they can ill afford to bear in the present state of the Dominion finances and in the present financial condition of that Province. I say, advisedly, the financial condition of that Province, because I regret to say that, just as hon gentlemen opposite, representing the Tory party of this country, have brought the finances of this Dominion to their present deplorable condition, so also their colleagues and friends, who have for years back controlled the destines of the Province of Quebec, the Tory dition of that Province to such a pass that it is even worse than the position of the Dominion finances. Now, Sir, I believe this double list of voters which this Bill is going to impose upon the Provinces is a feature that will be especially obnoxious to the people of the Province of Quebec. In that Province there are a large number of independent electors, who do not allow the wire-pullers of their respective parties to arrange how they shall vote, nor to say who shall be put upon the list and who shall not. I have been told by some hon, gentlemen opposite that in some of the Provinces, for instance, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, probably the local tranchise will be assimilated with the Dominion franchise, so that there will, in time, be only one voters' list. But if hon, gentlemen opposite think that the Province of Quebec is going to do that they are very much mistaken. The Province of Quebec has peculiar institutions to which it is wedded, and which it defends with great tenacity. I believe that no greater strain can be put upon this Confederacy than to impose such a Bill as this upon the Province of Quebec, where it will, to so large an extent, interfere with our municipal institutions. There is another reason why it is especially important that this Bill should not apply to that Province. I pointed out the other night, what I believe in my inmost heart to be true, that if this Dominion franchise is made uniform over the whole Dominion it will be but very few years before we shall have manhood suffrage; within a few years, indeed, if this Bill becomes law, we shall see uniform suffrage become universal suffrage. Now, universal suffrage is particularly obnoxious to the people of the Province of Quebec. I believe those who oppose it in that Province stand upon fair ground when they say that in that Province the education of a very large number of people is not sufficiently advanced to justify the introduction of universal suffrage. Universal suffrage is obnoxious to them, also, for the reason that they have hitherto based their suffrage on the possession of real estate. Indeed, it has almost become, so to speak, a part of their religion, that the suffrage should be based upon the possession of real estate, and I believe that is the great reason why the people of that Province are so much opposed to manhood suffrage. Sir, I believe most sincerely that if this Bill becomes law it will lead, within a very few years, to universal suffrage all over the Dominion. When that time comes the Province of Quebec will have to accept universal suffrage for its Dominion elections. If hon gentlemen opposite, coming from Quebec, will consider these points, and are prepared to go that length, which I say is a necessary conclusion, if hon. gentlemen opposite vote down this proposition, let them vote with their eyes open and seeing what is to come. But if hon, gentlemen opposite do not desire this result to come about, then I call on them, as well as hon, members on this side of the House, from the Province of Quebec, to support the amendment of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), and I sincerely trust that the Government which controls the majority of this House will not refuse this amendment, but that it will pass triumphantly.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Casgrain) negatived: yeas, 44; nays, 71.

Mr. WELDON. I beg to move the following amend-

That the following words be inserted in section 3: This clause shall not apply to the Province of New Brunswick, but the laws respecting the election of members from that Province to the Dominion Parliament shall be such as are now, or shall be, from time to time, provided by the Legislature of that Province for the election of members of the House of Assembly. of Assembly.

I move this amendment because I feel that as regards New Brunswick two leading principles of franchise legislation have been violated by the proposals of the Bill now before the House. The first is the question of assessment, and the pointed out that as regards the city and county of St. John, and also Portland, there are special circumstances, and that persons who hold long leases at nominal rents, on which valuable property has been placed, will be prevented from having an opportunity of being placed upon the assessment list and entitled to vote. The reason I ask that New Brunswick be excluded from the provision of this clause is, first, with respect to the assessment; and second, with respect to personal property. By the operation of this Bill a tenant at $20 a year will have a right to vote, while a person deriving an income from Government stock or municipal bonds will not be entitled to a voice in the representation of the country. If the principle of property is that upon which we are to base representation, surely personal property has an equal right to have a voice in the control of the country with real property. Take the position in which many of our people are placed -those who are engaged in the shipping trade. Among the boat-owners on the river St. John are a large number of people who, by the law of New Brunswick, would be entitled to vote, though they would not under this law. These boats are generally owned by farmers, or by young men who cannot qualify as farmers' sons, but who, accumulating a little money, put it into this class of property, which makes a larger return than real property. There are vessels of different kinds, some carrying cargoes to the United States, and I think if the basis of the franchise is to be property these men should have the right to vote. We have a personal property franchise in our Province, and in addition to that the person must be assessed on his property, and thus be in a position to contribute to the revenues of the country. I think it will not be disputed that taxation is the basis of representation, and that the principle on which a man is enfranchised is that, as he contributes to the revenues of the country, he should have a voice in choosing those who shall have the disposition of those revenues. That is one of the first principles adopted in the mother country, and it was upon that principle that the New England States separated from Great Britain. The system we have adopted in New Brunswick has worked well, and it is very inexpensive, the principle being, that if a man's name is on the assessment roll -and it is the duty of the assessor to see that he is placed on the roll—he shall have the right to vote. In the municipal elections we went further, and required that a man's taxes should be paid. But this does not apply to parliamentary elections. One result of this Bill will be, to a large extent, to disfranchise those who are entitled to vote on personal property. An hon. gentleman on the other side misunderstood me when he stated that I considered this Bill unconstitutional. I think it is clear, from the British North America Act, that this Parliament has the power to pass such a Bill; but I pointed out that it was not granted as a primary power, but was given, just as the veto power was given, as a check on the legislation of the Provinces, for the purpose of preserving the federal union intact and preserving harmony in all its parts. The question is not a question of legal rights, but of policy, and it seems to me that as no cogent reason has been given why so important a change should be made it would be unwise and impolitic, at this moment and at this stage of the Session, to bring forward a measure which so seriously affects the rights of the people of the Provinces. Heretofore, in the Provinces, the tendency has been not to restrict the franchise—as will be the case under this Bill, if it passes—but as different classes became more educated and intelligent, as education became more diffused, to do as they have done in the mother country-introduce new classes into the franchise - new colleges of electors. The principle of uniformity is destroyed at once by providing that a man in a city has not the same qualification as a man in a county. The representative of a county has the same rights and privileges as the representative of a city in next is the question of personal property. I have already this House; and yet we say in this very Bill that a man in a city cannot have a vote unless he has $300 worth of real estate, while his neighbor across the boundary line has the same privilege on a property worth $150. Thus the principle of uniformity itself is destroyed; but, for the sake of a theoretical principle of uniformity, persons who have the right to vote for members in the Dominion Parliament, and who will still have the right to vote for the members of their Local Legislatures, we are going to deprive of that right. I say that any Government that brings forward a Bill that will have that effect is bound to give a special reason for it, showing that it is necessary, either in the public interest or because the present system, which has worked without a jar for eighteen years, is fraught with danger When this Parliament chose to to the Dominion. change the mode of carrying on the elections, it acted upon a principle entirely different from the principle involved in the franchise. It did not interfere with any liberty, but was simply adopting additional safeguards for the protection of the electors, and in order to secure an honest and fair vote, so that each elector would be able to exercise his privilege without being subject to bribery or other corrupt influences. But this measure touches the status of the individual; it destroys his right; and I contend that to destroy the right of any individual is not a thing to be lightly regarded; but if it is considered advisable to take away that right it must be shown that it is done upon some strong principle of public policy or because the continuance of that right is fraught with danger to the community. It is for these reasons that I press my amendment. I put it forward because I feel, so far as our Province is concerned, that this Bill is a complete revolution; that it destroys the principle on which we have acted for over a quarter of a century, a principle which I believe is sound, that taxation is the basis of representation, and that property, no matter whether it is real or personal, whether it is in land or ships, or anything else, entitles the owner of that property, if he has the amount required by law, to a voice in the election of members to this House. That right will be taken away by this Bill. The men who own our ships—the wooden boats which ply up and down our rivers, or the vessels which sail along our coasts—will be deprived of that right. The Maritime Provinces are dependent, to a great extent, upon their shipping, and it is our duty to see that it is protected. If the owner of a vessel is entitled to vote on other grounds, that is aside from the question; we have to consider his case, irrespective of any other right he has; and I say that a man who owns a ship of 1,200 or 1,500 tons, worth perhaps $50,000 or $70,000, should have a voice in the representation of the country by virtue of that property. In the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island a large amount of capital is invested in property of that kind, and it is unfair that that property should not be represented on the floor of this Parliament. It is by the laws of this Parliament that ship-owners have to look for the protection of their vessels; and, therefore, I take the ground that a person owning personal property should have the right to the franchise equally with the man who owns 20 or 100 acres of land. By means of the assessment we can ascertain exactly who are entitled to vote. There may be defects in the assessment; a party may be rated too low, but I think a man is seldom rated too high; if he is, he takes care to rectify that error. If a man is anxious to have a vote he will see that he is placed upon the assessment roll and has sufficient qualification to enable him to vote. If, by neglect of the assessors, he is assessed at a lower rate than he is fairly and justly entitled to be assessed, and is thus deprived of his vote, he has an opportunity to rectify the error, and the result is that not only does he get the advantage of his vote but the municipality gets the benefit of the increased assessment he has to pay. Now, so far as this Bill is concerned, Mr. WELDON.

that while the assessment roll may be taken as prima facie evidence the party is not bound to take it. The elector has no interest in seeing that his name is put on the voters' list, nor has the country, because in the assessment list the country gets the benefit of the tax the elector is bound to pay in order to have a vote.

Mr. KING. I took occasion, some days ago, to point out that this measure, if it became law, was calculated to disfranchise a large number of my constituents, and stated that I would apply at the proper quarters for official documents that would give the facts. I have done so, and have now a statement which I obtained from the treasurer of the county I have the honor to represent. I asked him to go through the voters' lists carefully, and to send me a s atement showing the number of persons who were assessed on real estate in that county for less than $150 and more than $100. I have that list before me, and according to it there will be, in the ten parishes in my county, 427 persons disfranchised who, to-day, have the right to vote on real property qualification, under the law that exists in New Brunswick. The following are the particulars: In New Brunswick, 13; Cambridge, 10; Canning, 34; Chipman, 65; Gagetown, 41; Hempstead, 10; Johnston, 20; Petersville, 58; Waterboro', 35; Wickham, 32. It is claimed that the assessment rolls in the Province of New Brunswick do not actually represent the value of real estate. That is an imputation no man has a right to make against the revising officers or assessor, who are gentlemen selected by the people, sworn to do their duty, and thoroughly posted with regard to the values of property in the several districts; and, besides, there is a check even upon them—that of the board of valuators. Then we have the assessors who make valuations for the assessment for parish purposes, and who, if they err at all, err in assessing property too high. On the whole, I think the valuation put on real estate in the county I represent will be quite as near the mark as any that could be put upon it by the persons who will be appointed to fill the positions of revising officers—barristers of five years' standing. We have barristers of twenty-five years' standing in that county, and I am quite sure no solitary individual, if they were appointed, would say they were at all qualified to value property in that county, compared with the men selected by the people them selves. I called attention, on a former occasion, to another feature of this Bill with which the hon. member for St. John had dealt at length. He pointed out that in New Brunswick we have what is known as personal qualification, under which a large number of vessel owners and other owners of personal property have the right to vote. I asked the secretary treasurer of my county to give me a list of those who were thus qualified, so as to arrive at the number who will be disfranchised under this Bill, in which there is no such qualification. In the parish of Cambridge, alone, there will be 31 persons disfranchised, the owners of vessels ranging from 75 to 100 tons, vessels engaged in coasting service and in transport on inland waters; in Canning the number of this class that will be disfranchised is 9; in Chipman, 2; in Gagetown, 11; in Hempstead, 17; in Johnston, 7; in Petersville, 9; in Waterborough, 7; in Wickham, 5; total, 98. It might be said that these people have farms or other qualifications. I know the most of them, and I am satisfied nearly all have no qualification other than their interest in vessels property, and if they are to be deprived of their privilege of voting because personal property qualification is not recognised in this Bill, I know of no other means by which they can obtain that right. The men leave their homes generally about the 1st April, and are absent till navigation closes, so that they could not be included, as some there is no provision of that sort at all. It simply provides of them might otherwise be, under the heading of farmers' sons. I would not so much object to this measure if any complaints had arisen in my Province in regard to the working of the present law, but I have never heard of any. It is true that while this law disfranchises a large number of voters in New Brunswick it will give the right to some who have not that right to-day; but is it fair to disfranchise one individual and supply his place with another? I am very glad that there is an enlargement of the franchise, but I do not think it is necessary to come here for that. The present Government of New Brunswick are willing to extend the franchise to farmers' sons and tenants, and others in that Province who have not at present the right to vote; and if they have been prevented from giving that right, it is due to the opposition in one branch of that Legislature, of gentlemen holding the same political opinions as hon. gentlemen opposite. The First Minister is not entitled to all the credit for having introduced the woman suffrage proposition, because the local Premier of New Brunswick, last winter, carried that through one branch of that Legislature, and it is possible that next year it may become law in that Province. If there were no other reason than that of cost I would oppose this measure. The people of my county are not disposed to submit to a tax of at least $2,000 a year or $10,000 for each election of a member to this House under this Bill. They will still have to prepare the list for local purposes, in addition to this new burden. It may be said that this Government pays the cost, but though that may go down with some counties, it will not go down with the people whom I represent, who know that they pay a large share of any expenditure by this Government. I am anxious to go back to the same constituency which has hitherto returned me, and I want hon, gentlemen opposite to return to the constituences which elected them. I want the hon, member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) to go back to the same county which rejected a worthy representative and accepted him in his place. If any county in New Brunswick has been benefited by the National Policy it is the county in which that hon, gentleman resides. I think gentlemen on this side are entitled to as much credit for any amendments which may be made to this Bill as those who have sat still during this discussion. If the hon, gentleman goes back to that constituency I want him to go back to the vesselowners and farmers of that county who elected him, and not to the town of Moneton, to appeal to the operatives in the sugar refineries and in the cotton mills, who are to be entitled to vote under this Bill, who are to be placed on the list as tenants, paying what?—$20 a year house rent. There is no great interest in the country involved in that. They can get up and leave, if times are not prosperous, while the farmers and vessel-owners and others who voted for him have to stay. These are the men whom I want to see retain the franchise. I have no objection to the extension of the franchise, but I do not want the other classes to be struck off the list and their places supplied by people who have not one-half the interest in the country that they have. Hon. members from my own Province and the other Maritime Provinces have for some time been calling the attention of the Government to the importance of securing free trade relations with the United States, and to other matters of a similar character. Now, the people who are proposed to be enfranchished by this Bill, with the exception of farmers' sons, are opposed to any such policy; they are people whose interests are bound up with the National Policy instead of with the interests of the Province. When an election comes around again I want to see the right to vote remain in the hands of the people who will vote for securing free trade relations with the United States, and for the interests of our Province. Hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps, may see some advantage in this measure for themselves that may outweigh any other consideration; if fifty years, the people of New Brunswick had not any so, it is possible that they may have to assist the majority privileges at all. He was one of the oldest men, one of the

of this House in making this Bill the law of the land. expect myself that it will become law, but I cannot allow it to pass without entering my protest against these people being disfranchised.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is well known to hon. gentlemen that several days ago I gave notice of a motion for testing a very important principle connected with this Bill; and at an early stage of this debate, as soon as the right opportunity arrives, I propose submitting that motion for the consideration of the House, and at that time I shall briefly state the reasons which have induced me to support the proposed amendment to the Bill under consideration. But I now rise simply for the purpose of explaining why 1 vote against excepting New Brunswick from the operation of this Bill. It is not that I approve of the Bill, though, as I have stated before, I approve of the principle of a franchise Bill emanating from this House rather than from the Local Legislatures. I hope, before this Bill gets through this committee, that this committee will, after the arguments which may be adduced, and after they have had time for reflection, see the propriety of introducing an element in this Bill which will remove a great many of the objectionable features which it possesses, and will adopt a principle that will extend to almost every man of intelligence, and of the age of 21, the right to vote, based upon manhood taxation suffrage. I shall not discuss that at the present time, but I simply rise to justify to this House and the country the vote I am now going to give against the amendment of the hon. member for the county of St. John (Mr. Weldon). I do it because I propose, at an early stage of this Bill, to introduce the amendment to which I referred, which, I think, will remove the objectionable features of this Bill, and simplify its character, especially the cost of working it, and make it more satisfactory.

Mr. GILLMOR. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is no doubt sincere in preferring a Dominion to a provincial franchise. But I would be pleased if a gentleman possessing his talents had given some reasons for that opinion. With me it is a very important question.

Mr. MITCHELL. At an early stage in the discussion of this Bill the hon. gentleman will remember I gave my reasons at length, and he will find them in the Hansard.

Mr. GILLMOR. I do remember that my hon. friend spoke, but if those are all the reasons he could give for the change they failed to convince me. My hon friend was not in the House the other night when I made a few remarks. The article in the paper of which he is proprietor was to me very gratifying. I was acquainted with my hon. friend twenty-five years ago. A generation has grown up since he and I first met. I have seen him at times when I thought he was not himself, but that article, written by himself, carried me back to twenty-five years ago, and I thought he was the same man again, influenced by justice and by liberal and noble sentiments. Not perfect, but as a man I have always admired his outspoken and liberal views. That article was well worthy of consideration and worthy of the source from which it emanated. Now, with regard to this question. There is no necessity for this change. I hope to hear, before this amendment is disposed of, some arguments in its favor from those who come from New Brunswick, if any arguments there be. We are not very numerous here, but I shall want to hear some definite arguments for this change. If a man is convinced, he ought to be able to advance arguments that will have some weight to those who are anxious to hear arguments. The change contemplated in this Bill is very important. As my hon friend from Northumberland knows, we had a great battle in New Brunswick to obtain popular rights. He knows that, for ablest men who fought for those privileges, when we had arrived at that time of life when we could take part in public affairs. He knows that for fifty years the Legislature of New Brunswick had no control over the Crown lands of that country; he knows that commissioners were sent out from England that were not responsible to the people, and that for fifty years after Parliament was established they could not sell an acre of Crown land. He knows that delegation after delegation was sent home to England to try to get concessions. He knows that for a long time we contended for municipal powers to regulate our own local affairs, and that was another matter of twenty-five years' contest. These battles have been fought out, and now we possess a measure of self-government and a right to control our own affairs. Since we came into Confederation one right after another has been taken away; and here is a proposal to take from the people the rights which they fought for and which they now possess. Now, I think that be ore hon, members from New Brunswick vote to take away the right of making the voters' lists from the Provincial Government, they ought to give some reasons for it. The local authorities are better qualified than any other class of men can be to prepare the voters' lists. No one has denied the constitutional right of this Parliament to make the change proposed; but it is the expediency of this change we are discussing. A charter was asked for building a railway bridge across the falls at St. John. It was an important matter, and consent was granted, and constitutionally so. But yet it would have been constitutional if the power had been withheld, although the people would have been deprived of the right to build the bridge, which was in the public interest. It is more in accordance with the spirit of the constitution that the franchises should be left with the people of the different Provinces rather than brought under the power of this Parliament. Although the United States have had an experience of 100 years, they have not found it to be in the general interest to change their system, and it is held that the autonomy of the different States is thus preserved. This is another right hon, gentlemen opposite are taking away from the Provinces, and it is calculated, more than anything else, to create discord and cause the people to regret that they gave their interests into the hands of this Parliament. I have heard no complaint made about the working of our municipal institutions. The voters' lists could not be more simple and less expensive. I have never heard of a man being improperly put on the voters' list intentionally, or left off. Those revisers entertain various views with respect to local and Dominion politics; but we do not trouble about that circumstance. If the revisers do not do their duty they are removed. No difficulty occurs with the existing system. The very reverse will be found to be the case with respect to the proposed system. The revising barrister may be a stranger, and he will go about ascertaining the value of property and fixing the list of those entitled to vote. It will be a very objectionable system. The change is revolutionary in its character, and it deals with the dearest rights of the people of the Province. New Brunswick has sixteen members in this House, ten on one side and six on the other—one has been removed by death—and this great revolution respecting the Province will be carried by a majority of two or three men. Without wishing to point out to them their duty, it is evident that a serious responsibility attaches to them. Unless the very best reasons are given for the change, unless there is some evil to be remedied, we should hesitate before we make this change, to the Indian enfranchisement and to the revising barrister. I do not know what the change will be, as to the number of I do not believe that in my county, or in any other county people who will be placed on the lists. Our qualifications of New Brunswick, where the people have fought the battle for electors are very simple—$100 of real estate, $400 for municipal institutions, they want irresponsible men to change that for a most intricate and difficult system to say who shall and who shall not vote. If these men do Mr. GILLMOR.

understand. The present Bill makes the qualifications $300 in cities and towns. It requires $100 under our local law; and so, instead of extending the franchise, it will be reducing it very much. Again, $20 rental per annum, that will increase the number of voters; $300, the party being a bond fide occupant. There is great chance of a difference of opinion taking place on that point. Another qualification is $400 income from real property in cities. In counties it will be $150 worth of real propety—that is to say, $50 more than the provincial qualification. Farmers' sons and sons-in-law are to be enfranchised. I do not object to that, but the sons of artisans, fishermens' sons, merchants' sons are equally entitled and there are other difficult qualifications in the Bill. By a revising barrister, whether intentionally or otherwise, injustice will be done. I most sincerely and honestly oppose the change proposed, not from party feelings at all, although I am not different from other men in having party prejudices, but because I believe it is one of the most infamous measures ever introduced into a Parliament. It is revolutionary; it is calculated to produce discord, and to give a party advantage—and that is the moving motive that prompted it, for it has been shown that there is no necessity whatever for it. With respect to the franchise, I may say that I am inclined to favor a very extended franchise. It is the spirit of the age in which we live to extend the franchise. I never yet could understand why there should be such a gulf fixed between the man who happens to have $100 worth of real estate and the man who has not $100 worth. I cannot understand why such a gulf should be fixed between the men who have property and the men who have not property in this country. We have only to look abroad to see that the hope country. We have only to look abroad to see that the hope for the future advancement and progress and greatness of this country does not depend on the money, does not depend on the wealthy men of the country, on the land-owners of the country alone, but upon the young men, with their strong right arms, their energy, their force, their ability to make the country great. We are forced to vote on this question, upon which I should like to consult my constituents, whose opinion upon the matter of manhood suffrage, for instance, I do not know. It is not fair to this Parliament or this country to bring in a measure of such importance as this, and drive it through at the rate at which it has been attempted to put through this measure, and without that consideration which ought to be given to it. after all our consideration, it is only the consideration of 210 men. We have 5,000,000 of people in this country who ought to be consulted on this measure, and who ought to have an opportunity of discussing a measure of so much importance. Some hon, gentlemen may know by intuition the opinions of their constituents, but for my part I do not know what they want until I consult them, and I am delicate about making important changes without knowing their wishes. Should we adopt this Bill we are not going back to the same constituents who sent us here, for I know that in my own county, and in many others in New Brunswick, a large number of people who formerly had votes will be disfranchised. The hon. member for Queen's states that this Bill would reduce his voters' list 500; he may be correct. I think not so great a number in proportion would be disfranchised in my county. I do not think this measure will increase the votes of fishermen to any extent. It will disfranchise those who own $400 of personal property in vessels, and there are few who have $100 of real estate who have not $150; it will not change the vote of fishermen. I am opposed to this Bill on every principle. I am opposed to the Indian enfranchisement and to the revising barrister.

wrong, to whom are they responsible? Would they be responsible to the electors of Charlotte? By no means. To the Province of New Brunswick? By no means. Even this Parliament unless both branches are agreed cannot remedy the evils that may arise; they have not the power, for these men will be fixtures. This is a retrograde step. We have fought for responsibility, and now the Confederation is proposing to put on us irresponsible men, men we cannot reach, and we have had enough of irresponsible officials in New Brunswick, through family compacts, and so on. If hon, gentlemen from the Province of New Brunswick intend to support this Bill their duty is, first, to convince themselves that their Province wants it, and having satisfied themselves on that point, they would be justified in voting for it. For my part, I am justified in voting against it, because I do not want it, and I do not believe the people want it.

Mr. BURNS. It is refreshing to hear hon. gentlemen say that an attempt has been made to drive the Bill through the House. It seems to me that we have discussed this measure—and I mean by that that the House as a body has discussed the measure at great length indeed. Ever since the 21st of April the House has been in committee on this Bill, and it has been more than discussed. It has appeared to those who have listened on this side that no serious attempt was made by hon. gentlemen on the other side to discuss the measure, but that a serious attempt was made to burk the passage of it in its entirety. Had they been desirous for a measure of this kind, had they been solicitous for what I consider the best interests of the Dominion, they would have reserved all their speaking powers-all the words they have used and wasted-until such time as we came to what we might call the details of the Bill. But, Sir, that they did not do. They set out with what—I think we can truthfully say—was a policy of obstruction, an avowed policy of obstruction. That policy was shown clearly by the fact that hour after hour, day after day and night after night, hon. gentlemen on the other side treated us-not to a discussion on the merits of the Bill, but to matters totally irrelevant thereto. But I rise, not for the purpose of entering into any general argument with regard to the provisions of the Bill. The House, by a solemn vote, assented to the principles of the Bill, and now we are in committee to discuss its details and provisions. I rise to address myself to the observations made by the gentlemen from my own Province, and to treat of the resolution moved by the hon, member for St. John. I rise for the purpose of taking issue with the statement made by him, by the hon member for Queen's, and by the hon member for Charlotte. I rise for the purpose of stating that in my opinion the effect of this Bill would not be in any way to restrict the franchise in New Brunswick, but largely to extend it, and it is because it will extend the franchise in New Brunswick that I purpose giving my vote in support The hon, gentleman from St. John stated that under the provisions of this Bill a large class of people will be disfranchised. He made particular allusion to those who own property in ships, property in wood boats on the river St. John, and other holders of personal property. To my mird-and I have carefully considered the whole question—that class of persons will not be disfranchised. Under the provisions of the Bill, any person in the receipt of $400 a year, any person earning that amount, no matter from what calling or source, will be entitled to vote, under this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BURNS. I say, Sir, that is my reading of the Bill, and I think my reading is the same as the reading of it by, at all events, all those on this side who give their support to the measure, and all on this side do give their support to the measure.

Mr. MILLS. Supposing he made no profit?

Mr. BURNS. It is not necessary that he should make a profit; it is only necessary that he should earn that sum in order to entitle him to vote. Had hon, gentlemen reserved that question until we came to discuss the particular part of the measure bearing upon it, they would be enlightened on that score; but they have not chosen to do so. They have chosen to obstruct the passage of the measure, and to my mind they have done so because they are afraid of an extension of the franchise. The very best proof I can give of that, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, is that the hon, member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) knows that in his constituency, which is a large fishing constituency, a large number of fishermen would be enfranchised under the operation of this Bill. Is the hon, gentleman afraid to meet the votes of the fishermen when he goes back?

Mr. GILLMOR. I got two out of every three of them, and I expect to get them if I want them.

Mr. BURNS. If the hon, gentleman got two out of every three of them, he should respect the confidence they reposed in him, by not opposing a measure which will enfranchise a larger number of them. I can speak from personal knowledge, so far as the Province of New Brunswick is concerned, but more particularly with regard to the county I have the honor to represent. There, I know as a matter of fact, a very large number will be enfranchised. I have carefully gone through the list of voters for that county, which I have now before me, name by name—and I am familiar with the name of almost every man in the county-and I fail to find the name of one who will be disfranchised under the operation of this Bill, while I know of hundreds who will be enfranchised under it. Therefore, I can only come to the conclusion that hon, gentlemen opposite are afraid of what they call a new constituency. They would be satisfied to get here at any time, but they are afraid, if this Bill becomes law, that the number of voters will be so increased that there will be greater danger of their being left at home. I feel no such danger. I feel confident, in going back to my constituency, that the greater the number of voters the greater my majority will be. I prefer, Sir, that this Dominion should regulate its own franchise; and because I prefer that, I shall support this measure. Hon. gentlemen opposite have c'aim ad that while it is constitutional to pass this measure it is inexpedient to do so, because, as they say, we should go back to the electorate and ask them for an expression of opinion thereon. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if the Government of the Province of Ontario or the Government of the Province of New Brunswick thought it advisable or necessary to go back to their constituents before bringing in a Franchise Bill during the last Sessions of the Legislatures in those Provinces. No, Sir, they did not. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare that the members of this House should be sent here under the provincial franchises. I am not of that opinion. I believe this House should deal with its own composition, and not leave it to the Provincial Legislatures to declare what qualifications shall be necessary for voters to send representatives here. I do not think that is in accordance with the dignity of the Parliament of Canada. I do not think it is in accordance with the safety and independence of Parliament, that it should be in any way at the mercy or under the control of the Local Legislatures, no matter how well disposed they may be. The hon. gentleman for Charlotte made the statement, which I took down at the time, that all those who voted on income to the extent of $400 a year would be disfranchised.

Mr. GILLMOR. On personal property, I said.

Mr. BURNS. Well, for my purpose it is the same thing whether it is income or personal property. Is the hon.

gentleman serious in saying that? Does he mean to convey to this House the impression that those who vote on $400 worth of personal property in his county have no other means of subsistence—have no incomes, that they are not householders, occupants, tenants, merchants, ship-owners, fishermen, farmers, or anything else? He also stated that all those who voted on $100 of real estate would be disfranchised. Was the hon. gentleman serious in making that statement? Those statements are quite in keeping with other reckless statements hon, gentlemen opposite have made. I do not think they seriously consider, sometimes, what they are going to say, but simply aim at expressing themselves in some way that will convey to their constituents the idea that their liberties will be very much trampled upon by the operation of the Bill. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have, time after time, taunted those on this side with sitting in silence, and not discussing the Bill. It is fresh in the minds of hon, members of this committee that after a week of debating—I cannot call it debating, but after a week of reading reports and documents—after a week of lost time, one Saturday evening arrived—and I think those hon. gentlemen have a lively recollection of what occurred on that evening—a few speeches were made by members of this side, and they demolished all the arguments hon. gentlemen opposite We, on this side, are content to wait and perfect the measure; we do not desire unnecessarily to occupy the time of the House; we are prepared to wait until we reach those stages of the Bill under which it is proper for us to express our opinions, and we then express those opinions in a fearless and independent manner. We do what I think hon. gentlemen opposite should do, endeavor to perfect the Bill and make it workable, and to give the Dominion a franchise under which it can work.

Mr. BURPEE. I wish to make a strong and solemn protest against this Bill. I prefer the franchise of New Brunswick referred to in the amendment before you, Mr. Chairman, to the franchise indicated in this measure. I prefer it for a good many reasons, which I will endeavor to state in as few words as I can. In the first place, it is simple; it is inex. pensive; it is the franchise chosen by the people of the Province. It is a franchise that has given universal satisfaction in that Province, and they have never asked for any other. To give you an idea, Mr. Chairman, of how they make up the voters' lists, and to show the House the simplicity and the fairness and the honesty of it, I will state briefly how it is done. In the first place, the county council appoint three valuators for the county. These valuators value the property in the whole county. The different parishes send two members each to the county municipality, and these three valuators are appointed by the whole municipality, so that the valuation in the whole county may be uniform, and that no parish can adopt a valuation different from another. These valuators go through the county every third year. Then assessors are appointed for each parish, who go through each parish every year and value the property. According to the law of New Brunswick, the municipality also appoints two revising officers, and these two appoint a third. They are bound, by law, to check the assessors' lists, to take from them the people who have not property enough to enable them to vote. In New Brunswick a man is entitled to vote who has $100 worth of real estate, in contrast with this proposed Bill, which proposes to make it $150. New Brunswick gives a vote also to a man who has $400 worth of personal property, or personal property and real estate combined; and as there is no personal property qualification in this Bill, in those two classes alone a large number of persons will be disfranchised. The hon. member Mr. Burns.

differently. I believe it will disfranchise a very large number, principally of the two classes to which I have referred. This Bill readjusts and decreases the franchise. In the towns, some small tenants will be enfranchised, and in the factory towns there will be quite a number of this class, which is the only additional class that will be enfranchised under this law. In fact, this Bill will take the franchise from the bone and sinew of the country and give it to the floating population, who are the tenants in small towns and in the factory towns; it will give, practically, to the owners of factories, the parties through whom this Government are seeking to control the country, the control of the voting power, at the expense of the bone and sinew of the country. It is a revolutionary measure, a measure which I cannot characterise in fit terms. If I were to read to you some letters I have received this day, you would, Sir, declare that the language by which the writers characterise the principles of this Bill to be out of order. I assure you, that instead of obstructing the business of the House, by calling the attention of this House and the country to the objectionable features of this Bill, hon gentlemen on this side have not done their duty; they have not sufficiently educated the country with regard to its defects, and every day proves that more and more plainly. The only great merit claimed for this Bill in the first discussion was that it would make a uniform franchise for the whole Dominion. I do not think it will. It will fail to make a uniform franchise. Make the figures supposed to represent the value of the property qualification exactly the same in the different Provinces, scattered, as they are, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with so many different circumstances, conditions and values. It will not only fail to make it uniform but it will increase the friction between these different Provinces. The more latitude you give to the Provinces to do do their local business in their own way, the less friction you will have; and the stronger you endeavor to bind them together by Acts of Parliament the more friction you will have. Under this Bill the voters' list is to be made up by an officer appointed by this Government, who is not obliged to take the assessors' list for a foundation, who may put on or take off any names he thinks proper, who is not amenable to any person for having done what he thinks proper. There is no appeal on matters of fact, and though there is said to be an appeal on points of law, it can only take place with the consent of the man whose decision is to be appealed against. I regret to see the misstatement in some of the Government papers in New Brunswick-some which are said to be organs of the Government, some of which are controlled by members of this House, some of whom are contributors to them that there is an appeal in matters of fact as well as in matters of law. I am sorry to see these misstatements reiterated, because some people will believe them. The appeal, even if it be allowed, will be so expensive that not one man in five hundred will take advantage of it. In fact, there is no appeal at all. You can suppose a Province in which there is not a member supporting the Government. Who is to appoint the revising barrister? Some outsider, perhaps, from some other Province, and you can imagine the friction that will be occasioned by this line of action. I know of several counties that have not a barrister of five years' standing qualified for the position, and in which there are no resident judges. According to the interpretation of the Prime Minister, the Government will have to send a revising barrister from another county, and the man most likely to be sent is a red-hot partisan, and you may imagine the amount of indignation that will be occasioned by these appointments. I will vote for the amendment to the amendment, and if that fails I will vote for the amendment. I believe that every Province should have the privilege of electing its own delegates in its own way. If we had a legislative union this measure would be for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) claimed that he prefers this way. If we had a legislative union this measure would be Bill to the New Brunswick franchise. I read the law very a necessity, but this is a federal union, and my strongest objection to the measure is that it is a direct blow at the federal union of the different Provinces. I believe this measure is sapping and mining the foundation upon which this Confederation rests. If this line of legislation is continued, no Acts of Parliament will bind these Provinces together very long. It has been asserted, and it has not been contradicted, that the Premier is not a federal unionist, but is in favor of a legislative union. I have not heard him say so in so many words, but the line of conduct followed by the party he leads certainly leads me to that concluison. Ever since we came into the Union we have been drifting in that direction. Laws have been continually made in this House that entrenched, little by little, upon the rights of the Provinces. I know that a different construction was put upon Dominion rivers, and upon railways. Formerly, a Dominion river was a river dividing two provinces, or dividing a Province from a State; but that has been changed, and at present the Dominion takes charge of every stream and every river. Formerly, a Dominion railway was construed to be a railway that united two or more Provinces, but now the Dominion has taken charge of nearly all the railways. Acts dealing with purely local railways have been disallowed. Unconstitutional Acts regulating and licensing the liquor traffic have been passed, and so, from one thing to another, the Dominion has gone on encroaching upon provincial rights. This measure now before us appears to be an advanced measure—an advanced entrenchment—from which, I suppose, a last attack will be made upon provincial autonomy. I do think that the smaller Provinces are in danger. I will not say anything about Quebec. They are numerous enough in Quebec to take care of themselves, but I do believe that the only safety of the smaller Provinces is in keeping up the federal union. The Quebec people may take care of themselves, but if they assist the right hon. Premier gradually to encroach upon the rights of the Provinces, the time will come when Quebec will rue her present course. I am mistaken if she does not before long awake to the fact that she has gone so far in that direction that it will be impossible to recede. For instance, take this Bill. The Premier has told us very plainly that he was in favor of female franchise. We are informed that the members from the Province of Quebec are against female suffrage almost unanimously. ask the representatives from Quebec how long it will be, if the Premier remains in power and carries out his policy, before woman suffrage will be made the law of the land. It will not be long. There are other ways in which their privileges will be encroached upon, and I ask you, gentlemen, in your own interests, to assist the smaller Provinces in resisting this encroachment upon their rights. I say it is a privilege, according to the federal constitution, for each Province to elect its own delegates, in its own way, to represent its own interests. For the last eighteen years the Provinces have enjoyed that privilege, and it has worked satisfactorily. There has been no good reason shown for changing it. I know of no reason in the world why it should be changed, excepting it be for party purposes. Now, I say that if that is the only reason it is not a good reason. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) made a serious charge of obstruction against this side of the House. He says we have obstructed the business of this House. Sir, the facts of the case contradict that assertion. What are the facts? This Bill did not receive its second reading until the 16th day of last month, after we had been in session for nearly three months, and when we ought to have been ready to wind up the affairs of the Session and go home. Then it was thrown in upon us, with only a few minutes' explanation; in fact, with no explanation at all. We were not told what the provisions of the Bill were. I say deliberately that I did several days' debate, and it is my opinion that three-fourths of the members of this House did not know the full extent of the provisions of the Bill until after several days debate. During those three days, upon which we discussed the merits of the Bill upon the second reading, I ask you if we had fair play. During one or two nights were we not kept here until six o'clock in the morning, and on other days until hours long past midnight? It was impossible for any hon, gentleman on this side to be heard. The noise, the cat-calls, the songs and the revelry of all description indulged in by supporters of the Government made it impossible for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to discuss this matter intelligently, and yet we are accused of obstruction. Sir, I ask you if that accusation is in accordance with the facts. Instead of being confined to three days in discussing the second reading of the Bill we should have had a week. On the fourth day we were limited in our discussion, for upon the motion to go into committee it was ruled that we could not discuss the merits of the Bill. The second week we went into committee. What is a committee for, either in England or here? It is where we are to deliberate as to the particular sections of a Bill, where we ask questions and ascertain the real meaning of the words contained in the several sections. Was that discussion afforded? No. After twelve o'clock on the first day it was impossible to hear anything; discussion was entirely dropped. On the second night the tactics were changed. Hon. gentlemen came here with pillows, with beds, and they said they were going to sleep. Some hon. gentlemen brought lunches with them and said they were going to eat and sleep and let us talk till we were tired. Was it possible for us to discuss the details and obtain explana-tions when our remarks were being drowned by cat-calls, cock-crowing, songs and revelry, during the first few days? After that hon. gentlemen opposite went to sleep. Is that obstructing? If so, it is all behind the Government. It is unfair to educate the people by the press that the Opposition have been obstructing the business of the House. I say we have not. The Premier himself declared that it would take a whole Session to satisfactorily discuss a Bill of this description. He told us, however, that this was the old Bill, with a few amendments. But when we came to look at it we found it was not the old Bill. Was the tribal Indian in the old Bill? No. It was a new provision. It is true that in the second week of the discussion, in answer to almost defiant speeches from this side, a few hon. gentlemen opposite spoke. But they did not explain anything. The hon. member for Algoma explained that he knew nothing about the Bill; he demonstrated that fact most conclusively, because he gave a construction with regard to Indians which the Premier said was not in the Bill. We have been badly and unfairly treated in accusations having been thrown across the floor which were contrary to the facts. The hon, member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), who is generally fair-minded and always voluble, poured out a volume of speech that was overwhelming; it was a perfect torrent of words—a blizzard of words. I really was alarmed for the safety of the hon. gentleman, as he was so much in earnest. He, like the hon. member for Algoma, proved that be knew nothing about the Bill, and he had to be put right by the leader of the Government. Then the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) rose. He is always calm, deliberate, and grammatically correct and he made a long speech evidently. grammatically correct, and he made a long speech, evidently timed by the clock, so as to allow the Premier to speak and him alone that night, which only terminated a few minutes hefore twelve, and he again proved that he knew nothing about the Bill; that he had been out of the House, though not, perhaps, asleep. I need not refer to other hon, members, because even the Secretary of State, on the very first day or two of the debate, proved that he did not understand the not know what the provisions of the Bill were until after Bill. He explained it in a way different from its provisions. I hope, therefore, hon. gentlemen opposite will not charge us with obstructing this Bill. Unless there is a change, three weeks longer will be occupied in getting this measure into their heads. We were not allowed sufficient time at the second reading; I had not then an opportunity of speaking upon the general principals of the Bill, and I shall have to protest against every section, and especially to affirm this amendment which refers to my Province; and I know that if this Bill passes a wave of indignation will sweep over that Province, such as never swept over it before, and there is quite enough indignation there already.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). When I heard hon. gentlemen from the Province of New Brunswick, previous to the last Speaker, address the Chair on this Bill, I was rather disposed to compliment them on the general tone they had adopted, and on the fact that their speeches were a contrast —without being egotistical, as coming from the same Province myself—to those of many hon, gentlemen from the other Provinces, who spoke on that side of the House, and to say that they had been eminently fair in the discussion of this Bill. I say this in the presence of hon. gentlemen on this side representing that Province; but I do not know but the last speaker has taken a little from the sincerity with which I would have uttered that remark. If he had proceeded throughout his speech as he did for the first half or three-quarters of an hour, and if he had not concluded his remarks as he did, I would have been in a position to have uttered this sentiment with more sincerity than I am able to do, after listening to his speech. But it does seem to me strange that the hon. gentleman should conclude his speech by excluding everybody on this side from those who knew anything about this Bill, and by saying that for the last three or four weeks hon. gentlemen opposite had been there might be some difference of opinion. If hon. gentlementing members on this side, including members men are not engaged in obstruction, if it is their purpose to of the Government, as to the provision of this Bill. amend the Bill and submit to the majority, if they are it is enlightenment it is really a source of the not simply obstructing it to such an extent, either to make greatest inconsistency with their action with regard to the different sections of the Bill, and if it is enlightenment I must confess that I must be even more ignorant than they say, for I certainly cannot understand that kind of enlightenment. If it were necessary, their speeches could be taken up, and it could be shown that their inconsistencies and contradictions in the course of the debate were so great that there could not be a great deal of enlightenment, because one member uttered one thing and the next something entirely different, and so on through the whole discussion. Now, a few days ago some hon. gentlemen from the other side—I will not mention them, because there were too many of them, though not all of them-found fault with the hon. member for King's, P. E. I.; they said that he was entirely inconsistent, and they asked him why he did not adopt the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk, which included what he was asking for, and did the same work as his amendment. Since then we have found two more amendments, moved by these hon. gentlemen who found fault with him. They allow their colleagues and friends, those who are in sympathy and harmony with them in opposing this Bill, to go back and move similar sub-amendments as the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, with whom they found fault. I made an exception of the hon. gentleman for New Brunswick, and I do yet. I say that those gentlemen, with the exception of the hon. member for Sunbury, who did not devote himself entirely to the principles of the measure, discussed in a fair spirit; and the only fault I can find with them is, that they have too great confidence in the utterances of gentlemen on that side, and that they look with too much suspicion on anything that comes from this side. Some of them admitted, on the second reading of the Bill, that they did not know anything about it; they said that we spoke little upon the measure, but they swallowed and I venture to say there is not a Province in the Dominion Mr. BURPEE.

everything that was said by speakers on that side, some of whom pronounced the Bill to be an outrageous measure. They do not use their own judgment; and, not knowing anything about the measure, as some of them admitted, they still have implicit confidence in all they are told by their leaders and colleagues, and they use the same strong words in discussing the Bill. They say it is outrageous, tyrannical, revolutionary, and they describe it by a number of other words, with which they are very familiar, but which I cannot pretend to repeat; they have swallowed all that; they repeat all these words as being absolutely true, but without advancing any argument to show that they are true. Where is the revolutionary character of this measure? How long have we been discussing it since we came to the third section. I have not kept time, but it is a long time; and what have we been discussing? We have been discussing just one clause, as to who shall be entitled to vote, who shall be put on the register, and that having reference to a person being at the full age of twenty-one years, if he be not otherwise disqualified by this Act, or some other Act of the Dominion. Now, it appears to me that if there had been no intention of obstruction—this is my candid opinion-if there only had been a desire on the part of these hon. gentlemen to perfect this Bill, to make it as perfect as it could be, to offer such amendments as they sincerely believed would have the effect of amending it, in the way of making it more perfect, they would have said: Let that go; surely we cannot say that twenty-one years of age is not the right age. Then they would come to the next part of the clause, that he must be a British subject, by birth or naturalisation, and they would say: Is that reasonable, and if it is, let that go. Then he must be the owner of real property of the value of $300; and as to that the Government abandon it, or obstructing it in such a way that it cannot be passed at all, if that is not the object, why not let those things which are not objectionable pass, and when they come to the others, discuss them in a reasonable and rational way. Why not, if $300 is too high, say so; or, if they think it is too low, let them say so, and offer amendments accordingly, and let the majority decide whether their amendments shall be accepted. In that case we, on this side, or at all events I, myself, would come to the conclusion that it was a reasonable and legitimate discussion, a proper discussion, one which tended to enlighten the members of the House, and that they were trying to make the Bill perfect. But nothing of that kind has been done, and here we have been on a section as to whether these persons shall be twenty-one years of age, whether they shall have the other necessary qualifications—we have been kept here for three days or more.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. LANDRY. Well, I have not kept the time, but it is a long time, at any rate, and some hon, members beside me say it is three days.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes it is.

Mr. LANDRY. The hon. member for Bothwell says no, and I do not know whether he means that I have overstated the time or not.

Mr. MILLS. What I say is, that we propose to adopt the provincial franchises. That has been the subject under discussion, and the hon. gentleman knows that if we adopt the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk we which has not, as one of the qualifications of a voter, that he must be twenty-one years of age, that he must not be otherwise disqualified from voting, and therefore I say, why should not hon, gentlemen let that pass. That is my view, at any rate, and hon. gentlemen can have theirs. I have alluded to this matter and to the course of hon. gentlemen opposite, as a reason why I think this is a system of obstruction. But why are they ashamed to acknowledge that it is a system of obstruction. I wish to speak frankly and candidly, and I say that if I were on the other side of the House, if I had declared as loudly as they have declared that this Bill is an outrage, that it is an attempt at tyranny, that it is a revolutionary measure, and if I thought that, although myself and my friends were in a minority in this House, we represented the views of the majority of the people in that matter, if I were using every means to prevent the Bill from passing, even if it kept this Parliament sitting here for six or even nine months, I would admit at once that it was obstruction; that we would take every opportunity to oppose it, that we would not allow one clause, one line or one word to pass, without obstructing it.

What for? For the purpose of killing it. I would stand or fall on it, and I would let the country know and believe that that was our object. I would not pretend that I was not obstructing it; I would not pretend that I was acting so simply for the purpose of making the measure better, of perfecting the measure, of enlightening the people or the House, and making the country understand it. I would simply say that I had convinced myself that it was an outrageous and a revolutionary measure.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDRY. I say that I would say that, after being convinced of it—after being convinced that, though being in a minority, I still represented the sentiments of the country and, believing that as I do, I am going to throw myself on that sentiment in the country, and I will obstruct this Bill in every way I know how. I would not be ashamed of it; if I was obstructing it I would say so; that is the difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and me. Perhaps their course is better; I do not say anything as to that. Perhaps it is letter to say, as they do: We want this thing to go on—we want legitimate and fair discussion of this measure. What does that mean? Does it mean two or three or four months? I do not know. There are partisans on both sides of this House, no doubt. There are partisans on that side strong enough to believe what they say, and there are strong partisans on this side, perhaps; but there is a sentiment in this country that is not controlled by partisans, and I believe that sentiment will come to the conclusion that the system pursued on the other side is obstruction. Hon, gentlemen may deny it, but it is not their denial that will be accepted; it is by their acts and their conduct that they will be judged. So far as New Brunswick is concerned, I think hon. gentlemen have discussed fairly the case of that Province, and have endeavored to show that New Brunswick is going to suffer under this Bill. I give them credit for sincerity, but I think they have done that, not from studying the Bill, but from hearing the incessant cry that it is so-saying that so many clever men will know, or they would not assert it, and therefore they believe it. What does the Bill do, in the matter of New Brunswick, to make is so revolutionary and to make it so objectionable? It does much to extend the franchise-is there any harm in that? Hon gentlemen say it is something outrageous, and the last speaker said it would be so resisted by the people that the Conservatives would not come back to the Parliament of Canada again. That should be all the better for them, and for the country, if they represent public sentiment. All this only goes to show what I said a little while ago, that they look with too much suspicion at what comes from this side of the House. If this same measure had come from the leader of the Government of New Brunswick there would not have been a word said against it. Look at the Bill as it passed the Lower House in New Brunswick. It would not only change the franchise for the election of members to the Legislature of New Brunswick, but the franchise for the election of members to this House also; yet these hon, gentlemen did not say a word against it. There is a little difference between that measure and this as to property; but what does it signify whether the property qualification is $40 or $50, higher or lower? It is not sufficient to say that it is a revolutionary measure; it is a small matter whether the property qualification should be $100 or $150. That Bill also provides for a revising barrister—not exactly in the same words as are used in this Bill, and not precisely with the same machinery, but the revising barrister is the tribunal of last resort, and he is an appointee of the Government, to be removed for cause only.

An hon. MEMBER. Not during pleasure.

Mr. LANDRY. Yes; during pleasure and for cause. Let the hon, gentleman read the measure again, and he will find those very words. The revising barrister is, there, not to be removed by another party but the party that appointed him. Now, if a Bill of this kind passed in this House can be used for a party purpose, surely a similar measure passed by another House can be used for a party purpose in the same way. Therefore, my hon. friends from the Province of New Brunswick would not have made that objection against the Bill if it had been proposed by some one else, but he simply does so because it was proposed on this side of the House. Another argument used by the last speaker, as well as by a large number of others, is that we ought to give to the different Provinces all the latitude we can give them. I do not agree with that idea of making these different Provinces feel that is their interest to be separate and isolated from the rest of the Dominion, and that they are not to work in harmony with the rest of the Dominion. We should teach the different Provinces that there is a community of interest and sentiment among them, that we are here representing the whole Dominion—I, representing a constituency in New Brunswick, feeling that I also represent British Columbia, and a gentleman from British Columbia, feeling that he also represents New Brunswick, we should teach the lesson that we represent a nation, a Dominion; we should teach them, by our legislation and by our speeches here, and on the hustings, that we belong to a great nationality, or to what is to be a great nationality in the future, and that their representatives come here in the interest of everybody in the country, not seeking for the interests of the particular part of the country they represent, against the interests of every other part of the country. And when we come here, representing the whole Dominion, as we do, and a question of this kind comes before the House, is it not better that the peeple should be taught that it is safe in the hands of their representatives—that the franchise of the Province of Nova Scotia is perfectly safe in the hands of the representatives who come from the Province of Ontario, and that the franchise of the Province of Quebec is safe in the hands of the representatives of the other Provinces, in conjunction with their own representatives, than to teach them the reverse? Is it not better to do that than to say: Don't trust the people of Nova Scotiawith the franchise of Ontario; they are hostile to you and will be inimical to your interests? Do not let us teach them that. Let us teach them that we are here on an equal footing —that our interests are identical. If there be some different circumstances which require to be treated in a different way from the rest, let us have proper regard to them; but let the case be placed before Parliament as before fairminded men. I speak of the country as a whole, and I say let us teach the people that the interests of one part of this Dominion are safe in the hands of the representatives of another part; and when you teach the people a lesson like that, you do something of much greater importance, even, than to pass a Franchise Bill. There is no better educator than legislation; the people learn from their representatives, from the speeches they make, and from their legislation-I was going to say more than in any other way; they look up to them and pay respect to whatever opinions they express; and their representatives ought to so conduct themselves that the people will have faith in their actions and in their sincerity to serve them. In view of these considerations, is it not much better for this Dominion to have its own franchise, that is not subject to interference by another Legislature, which may be to-day a Liberal and to morrow a Conservative Legislature? We should have the control of the franchise and make use of it in a legitimate way, not hostilely to British Columbia, or to Ontario, or to Quebec, or to Nova Scotia, or to New Brunswick, but friendly to every body. I think that is the sentiment to inculcate in the minds of the people, and not that, if Quebec only lets go what she has, she will go to the wall; that she is jealous of her rights—that was a soft spot, and they took advantage of it-and if Quebec once let this right go, Ontario would get the whole, and the people of Ontario are so hostile to the people of Quebec that if they once get a chance, if they once get a warranty to do it, they will drive the people of Quebec to the wall. It seems to me that is not a proper utterance to make in this Parliament. The proper position to take is to say that the Province of Ontario will take no advantage, will never make use of that greater strength it is possessed of for the purpose of driving the Province of Quebec, or any other Province, to the wall. Let us feel that our lot is being thrown in together and that we will deal with it in that way. That is the proper education, it seems to me, that should be given to these different Provinces, and for that reason we ought to have control of our franchise. There is nothing more calculated to create discord and animosity between Provinces than for one to feel that another has a high franchise—than, for instance, New Brunswick to feel that she sends representatives here on a high franchise, while a neighboring Province sends representatives on a low franchise.

Mr. MILLS. That is her own concern.

Mr. LANDRY. Suppose the next day New Brunswick says: We will try to equalise with our neighbors, and we will lower our franchise down to theirs; and the other Province says: We will raise ours. The one comes down to day and the other goes up to morrow. Do you pretend that we are here to say we do not know what are the concerns of the different Provinces? I would be ashamed to admit that I do not represent New Brunswick here as much as I would in the Local Legislature. I feel that I represent it more, because this is a more important Parliament. I would be loath to think I do not represent New Brunswick quite as much here as I would in the Local Legislature, in matters that pertain to us-I do not mean in matters that pertain to the Provinces. In matters that belong to them, in the matter of electing their own members for their own Houses, I would not have anything to say here; but in the election of members for this House I would be loath to admit that I do not know as much about that as they do. I do not mean to say that I would not take lessons from what they have done or what they say, but I would do so for the purpose of trying to equalise with the other Provinces on as equal a level as we possibly could, always remembering that if any one Province or section could show any exceptional circumstances I would have proper regard in legislating for those exceptional circumstances. I do not believe in forcing a strict, rigid measure for every body. It may be said that I have dealt in his seat. If he cannot get the First Minister in his place in generalities and not in details, but I do not think this is he should go to his office or to his room. Mr. Landry (Kent).

the proper place to deal in details. The only details are the details of twenty one years of age, and of naturalised British subjects, so far as this clause is concerned. If, by-and-bye, there should be an amendment, making a $300 basis, or $250, or $500, and it is necessary to discuss it, we can then discuss it; but there is no necessity now, that we should enter into every detail of the Bill. I would not have spoken at this time only I know that hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken have friends in New Brunswick; I know that they represent a large and respectable body there—I do not wish to disparage them or belittle their position in any way, or the great interest they represent—and when they spoke of this measure as such an outrageous one I felt called upon to reply. I admit these hon. gentlemen represent a large and influential and highly intelligent party, but while they do that I think it is only right, when they make utterances in this entirely one-sided manner, and their friends make it their business to publish those utterances, that they should not be published without our showing that there are two views in this House, and that when they say it is an outrageous and revolutionary measure they are not justified in so describing it by any fair comparison with any electoral measure in New Brunswick. Some of their leaders, however, have been talking about the iniquities of this Bill so long these hon, gentle-men have ultimately become convinced that, if not entirely convinced themselves, it would be a good thing to try and convince the country that the measure is of this nature, and thus, in any case, they would benefit by it. There is nothing in this Bill to justify the language used by those hon. gentlemen in its regard; and for my part I am ready to take the full responsibility of it, and discuss it at the hustings, when the time comes.

Mr. IRVINE. The hon gentleman who has just taken his seat has delivered his second lecture, having delivered his first on last Saturday, and I confess he stood a little higher in my estimation before than he does now, after having given these two lectures. The lecture he has just given was a very good one, and this is the proper place to offer it, but the audience to which he ought to deliver it was not present. Before attempting again to deliver a lecture on the unity of the various members of the Confederacy -and I quite agree he can do the subject justice-he should wait until the First Minister is in his seat. Before we formed part of the Confederacy we knew something of the bickerings and troubles that existed in old Canada, and had not the slighest intention of sharing in those troubles, trials and bickerings; we had not the slighest intention, when we entered the Union, to throw fuel upon the fire which had been kindled many years ago. The hon gentleman must know, as well as every hon, gentleman on the opposite side of the House, with some of whom I have conversed upon this very subject, the real motive of this Bill. When I conversed with the hon gentleman, as two hon, gentlemen would with one another, in reference to a uniform franchise, I stated I had no objection to it, if it was thought necessary to promote the satisfactory working out of our federal principle. He said: Do you not see the point? It is the old feud between the Mowat Government and the Federal Government; it is the old quarrel of supremacy; it is an attempt to take the control from the local authorities and place it in the Federal Parliament. It is a fight of revenge. Now, it is rather too bad that the Maritime Provinces, who have always been a law-abiding and peace-loving people, should be brought into a quarrel that concerns these two parties. We have no desire to interfere in the petty fends between Mr. Mowat and the First Minister. As I stated, the hon gentleman delivered a lecture, but he should have waited until the First Minister was

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will not interrupt. We all got a fair hearing, and on this New Brunswick question we are conducting this discussion on argument, and I hope the hon. gentleman will be listened to patiently, as we were.

Mr. IRVINE. I thank the hon. gentleman for his interference. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) accused the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) of misrepresenting this question, in regard to the county of Charlotte, and said that he was afraid to have the franchise widened for fear that he would not get his proportion of votes at the next election. I do not understand the hon. gentleman's logic. I think my hon. friend from Charlotte differs from the hon. gentleman in this respect, that while the member for Charlotte wishes to have the sole control vested in the local authorities, the member for Gloucester is willing to transfer that jurisdiction to the Federal Parliament. He wishes to transfer the fixing of the franchise for New Brunswick to the British Columbians, the Nova Scotians, the Ontarians and the Quebecers. We want to keep it in the hands of our own people. I cannot say that this Franchise Bill is an old friend of mine, but I can recognise it as a very old acquaintance. I have been acquainted with it for three years, but I think older parliamentarians, who have been in the House since 1867, have had a longer acquaintance with it than I have. It made its first appearance in the very first Session of the very first Parliament of the Union, and has been a regular visitor since. It strikes me as exceedingly strange why, if it was a necessity then, as a part of the machinery required to work out the Union, it was not taken up when the people came from the various Provinces that formed the Confederacy, free of prejudice and partisanship, and when the First Minister was in the prime of life. I can only account for its not having been passed then by the fact that the hon. gentlemen who formed the first and the second and the third Parliament who were men sent by independent constituencies to maintain their independent position in this Parliament, were really indcpendent, and that the hon. gentleman had not then the servile following of which he boasts to-day. They were men whom he could not handle, men who respected their rights, and who could not be trampled upon. In order to trace the history of the measure, I will quote a few words from the speech made by the hon. member for South Wellington a few days ago. (Extract quoted.) It was stated by the hon member for Westmoreland that the franchise was not fixed by law. the section under which the franchise is fixed in the several Provinces I will read. (The hon gentleman read section 40 of the Dominion Elections Act, 1874.) These were the views that the Liberal Government held, and they are the views I hold now. I believe that the people are the best judges of how the whole work should be done; therefore, I believe in retaining the present system, that has worked so well for eighteen years. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) harped a great deal upon the expense the Opposition were putting this country to in discussing this measure. Whenever the Government want anything done of a doubtful character, or of a doubtful meaning, they generally choose the hon. member for Lincoln, and there is no one can do it with a better grace then he can. He stated, in glowing terms, that we were putting this country to a great expense. I beg to say that, so far as I am concerned, I believe I am paying my own expenses. I believe my time here, and the time of the hon. gentlemen of this House, and of the messengers and reporters - of all who are paid by salary-whether we remain a longer or a shorter time, does not make any difference in the expenses of the country. I believe that all the additional expense involved is merely the printing of what we say, and I am sure, so far much grace does the charge of obstruction come from supporters of the Government, when that Government kept us here during the first month of the Session, and only kept Parliament sitting sixty-five hours. Were they economising time then? Surely, if they expected this Bill should be passed at this Session, would it not have been brought down earlier? It is stated here that the First Minister said, a few years ago, that to pass this Franchise Bill was the work of a Session. If he made that statement, that to pass this Bill would be the work of a Session, with what grace does the hon, member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry) stand up and attempt to lecture this House upon obstruction? After that right hon, gentleman had made so many abortive attempts to pass a Franchise Bill, and was then obliged to withdraw it, what does he mean by bringing down this measure, after three months of the Session, minus twelve days, have passed, and expect us to pass it? After the Government and their supporters had frittered away many days of the Session, then they attempt to pass this measure, in face of the fact that all the important business of the Session still remains unattended to. It is contemptible—I use the word unhesitatingly, as the only one that describes their conduct. Besides that, if they had any respect for themselves, or the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House or the feelings of the people of this country. of the House, or the feelings of the people of this country, the blood of whose sons redden the snows of the North West, they would have taken another opportunity to introduce this Bill. The First Minister must have known, when he said it would take a Session to pass this Bill, that it was not an easy matter to carry through; he must have known that there was a great deal of bickering and bitterness between the Ontario Government and the Federal Government; he must have known the bitter feeling this Bill would excite; he must have known that the men whom he was going to injure by this Bill would fight to the death. I would call them poltroons if they did not. If I were Paterson of Brant-excuse me for mentioning his name-if I were that hon, gentleman, before I would allow a Bill of that kind to pass I would die in my tracks. This is a measure that we have great difficulty in understanding. It is one of a very peculiar character. It is one some of the clauses of which have been very summarily dealt with. When I look at the summary manner in which the First Minister disposed of the clauses enfranchising women, I am astonished. We heard the hon. gentleman state in this House that he was in favor of enfranchising the women; that it was only a question of time. He said: This will not

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE. I am discussing the clause respecting the enfranchisement of women, and I say it was summarily disposed of.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE. I really think, Mr. Chairman, you should name some hon. members.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Hon. gentlemen will keep order.

Mr. KIRK. Who is obstructing now?

no one can do it with a better grace then he can. He stated, in glowing terms, that we were putting this country to a great expense. I beg to say that, so far as I am concerned, I believe I am paying my own expenses. I believe my time here, and the time of the hon. gentlemen of this House, and of the messengers and reporters—of all who are paid by salary—whether we remain a longer or a shorter time, does not make any difference in the expenses of the country. I believe that all the additional expense involved is merely the printing of what we say, and I am sure, so far as I am personally concerned, I care very little whether it is printed or not; I do not care a rap about it. With how summary manner. I confess that the provisions of the Bill have been rather imperfectly understood. There are some clauses that I frankly confess I am unable to understand. remember a long time was spent on the Indian clause. was a little surprised that a week ago last Saturday, after so much had been said on that clause, there was such a misunderstanding between hon. members who ought to understand it. I heard many speeches, but I was unable to understand the clause, knowing but very little of the Indian character and of the Indian laws; of course, I knew the Indians were under the control and supervision of the federal authorities.

Another hon. MEMBER. He is tight.

Mr. IRVINE. I think men who are tight should be somewhere else. I do not think the Chamber is a place for maudlin drunkards. I stated, a week ago last Saturday, that the Indian question was not perfectly understood; perhaps it was better understood by other hon. gentlemen than by myself; but up to that day we had not a very correct knowledge of what was in the Bill. A prominent lawyer stated that while he did not know what changes were intended, the Bill as printed gave the right to vote to every Indian on the reservations in the old Provinces. That was denied by some hon. gentlemen opposite. I would refer for a moment to the speech of the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry). His speech of last Saturday did him very little credit. He very severely reprimanded hon, gentlemen on this side of the House, and it turned out that the hon gentleman had misunderstood the clause of the Bill under consideration. In that respect his remarks were similar to those of the hon, member for Algoma, the hon, member for East Grey and the hon, member for King's, N.B.

Mr. LABROSSE. Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. gentleman does not confine his remarks to the question which is before the Committee.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I thirk the hon. gentleman has a right to reply to the observations of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. IRVINE. For the sake of brevity I will deal with those four gentlemen collectively, and not individually. They stated very distinctly that the Bill was not intended to give the right to vote to Indians, on the reservations who were not enfranchised according to law. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) explained what enfranchisement of the Indians meant: that he severed his tribal relations, received his portion of the reserve, and assumed the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. Several hon. gentlemen on that side denied that it was the intention to give these tribal Indians a vote; but when the hon. member for Brant asked the First Minister, he distinctly contradicted them, and he said it was the intention to give these tribal Indians a vote. Now, this is a serious matter; and if any hon, gentleman had stated to me that there was a man in Canada so lost to a sense of honor, or honesty, or propriety, as, under cover of a Bill like this, to give the right to vote to these tribal Indians on reservations, I would not have believed it. If it took a whole week to drill this idea into the craniums of hon. gentlemen -if I may use that expression-and if they had to go to the First Minister for an explanation, when may we expect that all the other clauses of the Bill will be drilled into their heads? Certainly, it will take fully the time which the First Minister declared a few years ago would be required to pass a Franchise Bill, and that is a whole Session. Still, when we had been here three months, minus ten days, they will rush this Bill through, and leave other measures to be unattended to. But they are a very patri-Mr. IRVINE.

people to believe they are doing the work of this country, when gentlemen are wearied and anxious to go home, they bring down this Bill, and put up one gentleman and another to lecture us on this side as to our duty, as to the need of unity, and as to the need of our being brethren united to build up this great country. They wish us to build up the country, but they want to tie our hands behind our backs. Does the hon, member for Kent (Mr. Landry) not think this is a revolutionary measure? If there is another word in the English vocabulary which might be used to describe it I would use it; but to introduce a measure of this kind, to take the place of a system which has been in use so long, is nothing less than revolutionary—it is something serious to contemplate. And this is done at a time when there is a feeling of partisanship existing between the Tories and the Liberals of this country, and between the different members of the Confederacy, at the time when we have a war on our hands, when our sons are in the North-West trying to quell a rebellion, which some people think is the result of carelessness, and-

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. IRVINE. There is one point I wish to speak of particularly, and I will not waste any words. If there is anything which I would feel disposed to fight for it would be to retain every vestige of the power which properly belongs to New Brunswick. With some hon gentlemen it may be Ontario, Ontario; but with me it is New Brunswick, New Brunswick, first, last and forever, and sooner than have any of her rights taken away from her I would see a great gulf across our boundaries to keep us from passing to you, or you to us. One reason I am in favor of provincial franchise is, that I believe that we are the best qualified to do our own business and regulate our own franchise. Another very strong reason is, that many years ago we had to fight for our rights, for responsible government, the right to appoint those who would do our business for us; and now, when we come here to this Federal Parliament they propose to give away our liberty of appointing these officers and to take the power of appointing officers themselves, without saying by your leave, to appoint men without any recommendation and without any power to remove them. That is going back to the old family compact system. Another reason I am in favor of provincial franchise is, that for eighteen years our electoral lists have been prepared without expense to the Federal Government, and there never has been a word of complaint about that system. Surely, in introducing a system entirely different, it was necessary for the First Minister, in presenting the Bill, to have shown the House that the old system had been faulty, and had not answered its purpose. But it is singular that though this is called a uniform franchise we are not going to have a uniform franchise at all. We have a franchise for fishermen, another for tenants, another for farmers, another for laboring men, and so on. It is a mongrel franchise, a fancy franchise, as some hon, gentlemen called it. As I stated before, I can see no impropriety in having a uniform franchise, but to have such a franchise we will have to abandon everything else and adopt manhood suffrage. I can see no other suffrage that will be uniform throughout this Dominion. I am not very much opposed to that. I would rather give a worthy young man of twenty-one years of age a vote than I would to an old miser who has great wealth. I believe in intelligence and moral worth more than in property as a qualification for the franchise. I believe that no matter how much property a man has he should not have more than one vote to elect representatives to this Parliament. I believe that every intelligent and moral young man who is twenty-one years of age ought to be considered as trustworthy as the wealthiest man in the country. It is otic set of men. After being here for two months, leading the said that there are two reasons why this Bill should become law. I think there are two reasons, but neither of them habits of the right hon gentleman, the First Minister, in are such as would induce me to vote for the Bill. first is-although I believe it will never become law-that it was the intention of the promoters of the Bill to give the suffrage to a number of friendly Indians in the older Provinces who are supported and cared for by the Government. to enable them to vote for the party that cares for them. What can be more reasonable than that the Indian, with his native instinct, if I may say so, will vote for the person who takes care of his property, who advises him in everything, who does not give him power to buy or sell, or to dispose of his property, either in life or in death? I object to that part of the Bill. There is another part that is not in my interest or in the interest of the country; that is, the provisions under which this Government will appoint revising barristers or persons to prepare the electoral lists, and to revise those lists. The power the Government will have over those officers would be an advantage to the Government; I do not know how far that advantage would go; it would depend on the character of those officers; but I would hesitate to give them such power. I saw, with pain and regret, that before the last election they took a similar power; they were not satisfied that the sheriffs or registrars should be the returning officers, and one of the returning officers returned a gentleman to this House who had no right to be here, and who sat here for two years; and the returning officer received a gold watch for that. I think here will be more gold watches after these revising barristers are appointed. I am opposed to that provision of the Bill; I think it is the living principle of the Bill; in fact, I think it is the head and the tail and the middle. It has an ugly look, to me. I do not like these revising barristers; I do not like to take out of the hands of the people the proparation of the voters' lists, and to place it in the hands of a creature of the Government, and I protest against that provision. If hon. members opposite, instead of lecturing hon. gentlemen on this side, would throw some light upon some of these obscure parts of the Bill and assist us in this difficult matter, we might get through with this measure. Another provision of the Bill which I do not like is the difference which it makes between the cities and the rural districts. I have the honor to represent a farming constituency, and I cannot say that there is that difference between the New Brunswick franchise and the franchise this Bill contemplates in my constituency as there is in some other constituencies. I think the difference, perhaps, is greater in cities than in the rural districts. But there is a principle, of course, which we have always contended against in New Brunswick. The farming population always contended against enfranchising the laboring classes in the cities, on the ground that there is a considerable floating population. I am not, however, against enlarging the franchise to any class, but rather like the view, though I cannot say I am very decided on that point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have listened with very considerable attention to the arguments, pro and con, on this question of the New Brunswick franchise. I am perfectly certain of one thing, that the great majority of members of this House, hailing from other Provinces, had, before this discussion, very little idea indeed of the alterations proposed to be made in the constituencies of the Province of New Brunswick. It is very remarkable that, during a discussion affecting the constituencies of those Provinces, not only has the Minister who is in charge of this Act been absent during the whole of this discussion, but during the greater part of the time the only remaining Minister in the Cabinet from New Brunswick, now in Canada, I believe, has not been here either, nor has he or the First Minister vouchsafed one single word of explanation to us on this side, Queen's (Mr. King) are correct, more than compensate for or to his own followers, as to the effect the introduction of the loss of votes in two or three constituencies. And when 228 these matters, I am tolerably well convinced that, although he may have supplied two or three of the leading ideas for the formation of this Bill, he has not bestowed half a dozen hours' serious consideration upon its details; and, more particularly, has not bestowed any consideration at all on the way in which it will affect the constituencies of the smaller Provinces in this Dominion. It is in the recollection of the members of the committee that when the First Minister introduced the Bill, he gave us the most meagre possible explanation of its details. Now, on any occasion, when a measure of this kind, involving, as my hon. friend behind me has truly said, great constitutional changes, is introduced, it has always been hitherto customary for the hon.gentleman in charge of the Bill to explain with reasonable fullness and minuteness what effect this measure would produce in the various Provinces affected by its provisions. That has always been done. That is done, as anybody who pays the least attention to the debates in the House of Commons knows, by English statesmen, whom the hon. gentlemen profess to set before them as authorities, when they have occasion to introduce measures of a similar character. Now, what is the consequence in this instance? Hon. gentlemen, as I have said, have discussed this measure, so far, very fairly on both sides. I did not see any hon. gentleman on the other side attempt, in the least, to meet the arguments of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King), with respect to the effect, the extraordinary effect, which the substitution of this particular measure for the Act now in force in New Brunswick would create in his own constituency. I took particular note of that hon. gentleman's remarks, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to the extraordinary results of the measure. That hon, gentleman, at his last election, was returned by about 1,100 votes, against 800 or 900 votes; in other words, about 2,000 votes were cast. My hon, friend showed in detail—from authentic official information—that of those 2,000 votes nearly 25 per cent., 420 votes, would be disfranchised by the operation of a single clause of this Bill. He also showed that a very considerable number of the remainder of his votes would be disfranchised by another clause of this Bill. The total number I do not exactly recollect, but it amounts, practically, to this: that about one-third of my hon. friend's constituency would, according to the official documents, be disfranchised if the measure now before you becomes law in its present shape. If that is at all a fair representation of the way in which this measure would affect the other sixteen or seventeen constituencies in New Brunswick, then I do not believe that a measure working such important changes was ever before introduced into a House of Commons of any country enjoying representative institutions without full and particular explanations, none of which have been given to us from the Ministerial benches, from the time this measure was introduced up to the present moment. Now, I cannot say, I have no means of knowing, how far the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) may have been correct in his view of the operation of this measure in his own particular constituency. If I followed his argument correctly, his idea was that, in his particular constituency, as many, or perhaps more, would secure a vote under this measure, in consequence, I think, of the vote bestowed upon fishermen possessing a certain amount of real property and a certain amount of personal property, as would lose it. That may be the case in that constituency; but, according to the census returns, there are only 1,854 fishermen in all New Brunswick. If those returns be correct—as to which I express no opinion-if all those fishermen were enfranchised, it would not, if the statements made by my hon. friend from this measure would have in that Province. Knowing the we remember that a great number of these fishermen are sure to have votes, whether or no, we can judge for ourselves how vast a change is to be worked in this particular Province, if this measure becomes law. My point is, that it was the bounden duty of the First Minister, and of his colleagues from New Brunswick at any rate, to have placed this fact before the House, and to have called the attention of the House forcibly to these results. It is not fair to the House, it is not fair to the country, and least of all is it fair to those whose seats are going to be so largely affected, that important facts like these should be kept in the dark. I believe most firmly that the whole information that we have received to-night on the subject of the New Brunswick franchise would be entirely new information to the First Minister, if he had been here to get it; and I can only hope that his colleague, who has set a most excellent example of patient attention, the Minister of Public Works, will call his attention to the enormous effect which apparently will be produced in New Brunswick by the introduction of these franchises in preference to the franchise they at present enjoy, and I have no doubt that, at another time, my hon. friends, who have argued this question so well and so clearly, will call the attention of the House to the matter, and will cause the votes of all the New Brunswick members, at all events, to be put on formal record in a matter of such importance to the Province.

Mr. WALLACE (Albert). There will not be 250 altered. It is absurd.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, the hon. gentleman did not choose to refute the statements of the hon. member for Queen's, which were given in great detail, parish by parish, on the authority, I understood, of the gentleman who prepared those rolls, the secretary-treasurer of the county, an official, I suppose, exercising something like the functions of the assessors in Ontario. I call again the attention of the committee to the fact that, though hon. gentlemen opposite, speaking in regard to their own counties, may have held, perhaps rightly, that similar results would not be produced in their case, it has not been attempted to impugn or contradict these statements; and if they be true, and if they afford the slightest indication of the general effect of this measure upon New Brunswick, it is, as regards that Province, one of the largest measures of disfranchisement ever introduced into Parliament. know, there is no use denying so plain and patent a fact, that from various causes a great many persons in the Maritime Provinces are seriously discontented with the practical working out of Confederation. It is no secret; I am very sorry for it; because, being one of those who contributed in a small degree towards the bringing about of this Confederation, I desire, as earnestly as any man opposite can desire, to see the Confederation become a success; and therefore it is with very sincere sorrow that I say that no one can deny that in many important respects Confederation has been very far, up to the present moment, from bringing to the people of the Maritime Provinces that prosperity which we hoped and desired it should impart to them. There can be no doubt whatever, although it is largely due, I have no doubt, to questions over which the Government has no control, that the condition of those Provinces, as to their trade, as to their population, as to their future prospects, is far from being what we would desire. I will not at this moment go further than to point out how deeply that feeling has worked, from various causes, in the larger Maritime Provinces. But, assuming that it exists, and we know only too well that it does exist among a great number of the people, I ask the committee, can anything be conceived which is more likely to exasperate these people, to embitter existing relations, and to put a dangerous strain on the amicable relations which ought to exist between us and these comparatively distant Provinces, than by a measure of this kind, somewhat hastily conceived, somewhat carelessly con-Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

sidered, to take away from a great number of these people the right of exercising the franchise in the election of people to the Dominion Parliament. I do not see the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in his place, but I may say that, whatever I may think of the question in the abstract, I entertain no doubt whatever of these two propositions: First of all, that if you have a uniform suffrage for the whole Dominion that suffrage will become a manhood suffrage in a very short time. I entertain no doubt whatever that that will be the inevitable result of introducing a uniform suffrage. In the next place, although, as I have said more than once, for my own part, I prefer the system we now have, of allowing each Province to regulate its own franchise, still, Sir, I say that as between the project introduced by the First Minister and the amendment proposed to be introduced by the hon member for Northumberland, I think that there can be no doubt that the latter project is infinitely the more logical and infinitely the more acceptable to the great bulk of the population. Now, one hon. gentleman—I think it was the member for Kent, N. B. (Mr. Landry), whom we always like to hear speak on this or any other question—one hon gentleman drew an argument from the conduct of the Provincial Legislatures, and his argument was this: Because we relegated, about eleven or twelve years ago, the care of the franchise to the Provincial Legislatures, and because, in the discharge of their ordinary duties, those Provincial Legislatures have, from time to time, enlarged the borders of the franchise, therefore, he said, we might safely and properly do precisely the same thing; that there was no occasion for us to appeal to the people on such questions. Now, Sir, that is a mere technical plea; that is an evasion of the real issue. To all intents and purposes we are now proposing to make a great constitutional change. You must look, in these things, to the spirit as well as to the letter of our constitution. When, in 1864-65, we determined to create a federal union in opposition to a legislative union, we, from that time, bound ourselves to carry out the compact between the several Provinces on a federal basis; and although it may have been well—perhaps it was well; until now I rather thought myself that it was well—to have a reserved power, a reserved right, in the hands of this Parliament, in order to prevent any of the Provinces from exercising the power which we left with them in a manner calculated to diminish, largely, the number of persons whom we represent here, still it was not our intention to exercise that power needlessly. The onus lies clearly on those who propose to make the innovation, to show its necessity, to show its expediency, to show that there is a demand for it. They are not called upon to do this thing; this is wholly and entirely a voluntary act on their part. No man can say, they cannot pretend to say themselves, that they believe that a Parliament cannot be elected now which truly represents the wishes of the nation. The argument has always been dinned into our ears, on every conceivable occasion, that we, on this side of the House, are a set of factious partisans, because we will not obey the will nor recognise the well-understood wishes of the majority of the people. That is their argument. They declare that they do represent the wishes of the majority. Well, Sir, so far as my own Province is concerned, they may technically do so, but after the Act of 1882, I deny that they do, in reality, represent a fair majority of the Province of Ontario. But however that may be, I deny that they are justified in assuming that a Parliament cannot be elected now which will fairly represent the wishes of a majority of the people of Canada, and that being so, and admitted by themselves to be so, I say that they are utterly without excuse at this time in disturbing this at all. The people from whom they took their mandate expressed no wish on the matter-or, at any rate, have had no opportunity of saying whether they wish the present system to be disturbed. Now, there can be no doubt whatever that this measure, unless the amendment of my hon friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) prevails, will, to a great extent, subvert the federative basis and substitute for it a legislative basis. It will also have the other result, which some of us deprecate, and which others of us may think a great step in advance—the result of very greatly widening the basis of representation. Now, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) spoke, and spoke well, of the desirability of all the members of this House remembering that, besides the Provinces which they represent, they also represent the Dominion of Canada, and to a very considerable extent I agree with that sentiment. But, Sir, in remembering that, it ought to be recollected that we are bound to preserve the federal character of the present Confederation. We ought to remember now that we do not form a perfectly homogeneous body. If all these Provinces were alike; if all these Provinces were inhabited by men of the same race; if they had the same interests; if they were, in one word, a perfectly homogeneous body, then 1 could understand that a great deal might be said for this and many other measures of a similar character. But, Sir, there is no use whatever in our blinking the well-known fact, patent to every man who has ever paid the slightest attention to the constitution of the Canadian Confederation, that far from being a homogeneous body we are a body not only widely separated in a geographical sense but a body having widely diverse interests in many points; that in addition to those diverse interests there are diverse tastes, diverse sentiments, diverse prejudices, among large portions of our people. Now, I recollect having heard, over and over again, the present First Minister—and I think I have heard the Minister of Public Works and other public men of notepoint out that real statesmanship consists, not in ignoring but in recognising these differences; that real statesmanship would lead you to pay a careful regard to the prejudices, if you choose to call them so, at any rate, the sentiments and tastes, the habits and customs, of those various races who compose the present Confederation of Canada. If you look abroad, all the world over, you will see that some of the greatest misfortunes that have ever befallen nations, situated as we are, have arisen from the attempt to force a legislative union on countries inhabited by men having different habits and modes of thought. Why, Sir, we need go no further than to our own mother country to see the result of attempting to govern countries inhabited by different races in precisely the same way. I need not remind the members of this committee that two or three years ago, we, travelling, peradventure, a little outside of our legitimate bounds, ten-dered our advice to the mother country practically to dissolve her legislative union and attempt a Confederation very much like our own, and having regard to the different habits and modes of thought, as I have said, of the various races who compose it. I advise that precisely the same thing should be done here, that precisely the same care should be exercised, lest we, with good intentions, perhaps, but lest we unwittingly adopt a uniform system, not merely in this matter, because this is very apt to be the stepping stone to uniformity in a good many other ways which we do not at present foresee, that we should abstain from attempting to obtain a pedantic uniformity, to quote the words of the First Minister, and that we should rather recognise, in the fullest and most extensive way we can, the indefeasible right of every Province to regulate her own affairs, and, among other things, to regulate the franchise, on which

hon, gentlemen have got the technical right to do this thing. What I do dispute is that it is expedient or wise, more particularly at this juncture; because, without going into detail to endeavor to ascertain the exact cost of this measure -although here again I may remark that it was the bounden duty of the Ministers, and more particularly of the First Minister in charge of the Bill, to have given us, at all events, an approximate estimate of what the cost of this thing will be-I say at this particular time it is inexpelient, and undesirable, to add to our already swellen expenditure the large sum which, at the lowest computation, will be necessary to put this measure into effect. Then there is another consideration which I think hon, gentledanger—there is no use in disguising it—that if this kind of thing be pressed too far, if it be made patent to a large portion of the population of the Dominion that one party is determined, by fair means or foul, to perpetuate its ascendency on the floor of Parliament, you may succeed, not in perpetuating that ascendency, but in practically dividing the Provinces of Canada into two hostile camps. That is a danger which statesmen ought to regard. Hon. gentlemen may say what they please or think what they please, but they know right well, in their secret hearts, that the Opposition do in certain Provinces represent a full moiety, and it may be more than a moiety, of the total population. It is not wise that that moiety in any Province, more particularly in large and important Provinces, should be led to consider that the design of the present Government and party in power is to deal unfairly with them, because this measure, on the face of it, appears to place a power in the hands of the Government which, unless they were endowed with superhuman excellencies they would be almost certain to abuse. I say, for that reason alone, if there was no other, this measure, as it stands, ought and must receive the utmost opposition of every genuine patriot, of every real lover of his country. I am not, at this late hour of the night, especially as there will be other opportunities, going to discuss this matter further, although I think I might justly do so on this clause. All I want to say is this: I want to enter my protest against the introduction of the legislative principle, which this is in reality, and the uprooting of the federative principle on which our constitution is based. These measures, I repeat again, must be judged, not according to the mere letter of an Act of Parliament, but according to the spirit of the constitution under which we live; and it is because I believe that this particular measure is in direct and utter opposition to the spirit of, not only Confederation, but of all confederative union, that I, for one will oppose it to the very utmost of my power.

dissolve her legislative union and attempt a Confederation very much like our own, and having regard to the different habits and modes of thought, as I have said, of the various races who compose it. I advise that precisely the same thing should be done here, that precisely the same care should be exercised, lest we, with good intentions, perhaps, but lest we unwittingly adopt a uniform system, not merely in this matter, because this is very apt to be the stepping stone to uniformity in a good many other ways which we do not at present foresee, that we should abstain from attempting to obtain a pedantic uniformity, to quote the words of the First Minister, and that we should rather recognise, in the fullest and most extensive way we can, the indefeasible right of every Province to regulate the franchise, on which among other things, to regulate the franchise, on which she shall have on the floor of this Parliament. This is, I say, the sensible, practical way of dealing with this very intricate question. Theoretically, something may be said for this Bill. I am not prepared to deny that the not suppose, if a man as wise as Solomon, were to rise on this side and spend an hour in giving most cogent and comprehensive arguments for the passage of this measure, we would find any hon. gentleman opposite who would admit afterwards that any reason had been given. For my own part, I have, on one or two occasions, given some reasons why I am in favor of this measure. think hon, members from my own Province have done the same. I am quite willing, in this House or before the country, to leave the opinions which had been stated by hon. gentlemen on this side from New Brunswick and hon. gentlemen on that side from New Brunswick—to see those statements go to the country and be judged by the country, as to which have the most reason or as to which have the most cogency of argument. I am in favor of this Franchise Bill, and therefore against the proposition in the amendment to the amendment, because, as I said before, it is within the power and the constitutional right of this Parliament to pass such a measure. When hon, gentlemen rise and say that in passing a measure which we have a perfectly constitutional right to pass we are making a revolutionary change in the constitution of the country, they are saying something which it is beyond my power to understand and saying something which I cannot admit to be true. I am in favor, also, of the passage of this measure, which this Parliament has a perfectly constitutional right to pass, because I want to see a uniform franchise basis for the election of members for the House of Commons. I think that is a fair reason for any hon, gentleman to give. I think it is fair for hon, gentleman opposite to accept that as something, at least, in the way of a reason. Hon gentlemen have said to night that you cannot have a uniform franchise, and that you do not have one under the provisions of this Bill. I think they mistake uniformity for something else. They say: You give a labor franchise, an income franchise, a tenancy franchise, and therefore the franchise is not uniform. I do not understand that to be what we mean by a uniform franchise. What I mean by a uniform franchise, when I use the term, is this: That in every Province which makes up this Dominion, every class in each Province will, as compared with a similar class in every other Province, have similar right of franchise. have not that uniform franchise to-day, because there are different qualifications in almost every Province of the Dominion. What I am in favor of is, that in every Province of the Dominion there shall be an equal basis of suffrage, so that we may get at a uniform franchise. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite may not believe that that is a good reason; they may get up and say that no reason has been given at all; but, to me, that is a reason, and I am willing to trust the case to the public on that, as one reason why I shall vote for the Bill. Now, to except the Province of New Brunswick from the measure which is before us, to give it a franchise which we have not given to Prince Edward Island, and which we do not propose in the Bill to give to any other Province, is to destroy that uniformity, and so to take away one of the reasons for which I support the Bill. I am in favor of this Bill, in the third place, looking to my own Province particularly, because I believe it will largely increase the number of electors in that Province. Now, a gentleman gets up on the other side, and says he does not think it will. I, from my basis of observation, from the knowlege I have of my own and some other constituencies, and from conversations I have had with other gentlemen representing other constituencies, come to the conclusion, and I cannot get rid of the conclusion, that this Bil will, when put into operation, largely increase the franchise and the exercise of the right of the st ffrage, and I am prepared to go to a very considerable length towards increasing the number of the ment of this country. The hon, member for Queen's, N.B., has given a calculation. It is a remarkable calculation. I am not in a position to say that it is not correct, or that it is, simply because I have not the documents from which he has formed his conclusions; but I say, when a gentleman rises in this House, and tells us that out of a total of about 2,000 voters in his county one-fifth of those electors are voting on a real property qualification of more than $100 and less than $150, I say it is a most wonderful thing to say about any county. I cannot say that about my own county.

An hon. MEMBER. He did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to misrepresent him. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says he did not say that. The hon, member for Huron said he did. I took it down, and I have it here. The hon. member for Queen's said that it would, on property qualification alone, disfranchis 432 voters. Am I right?

Mr. KING. Four hundred and twenty, and some odd.

Mr. FOSTER. We will take that; the difference is not much; it will disfranchise 420 on a real property qualification alone. Now, I say that is an extraordinary statement to make. I do not say that it is not true, but, if true, the county he represents must be an extraordinary county, and I do not think it can be taken as a rule upon which the hon. member for Huron could found a conclusion which will hold for the whole Province of New Brunswick. And I am strengthened in that, not only from my own experience, but from the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester. He said that in his county—and he had evidence on which to base that conclusion—he thought it would not disqualify any, or scarcely any, of those who at present voted, while it would add a large number to the present electorate. Why does not the hon, member for Huron take the county of Gloucester upon which to make his generalisation, and why does he simply take the one county, which, if what is stated about it is true—and I do not say it is not—must be a most exceptional county. So I say I am in favor of this franchise because I am in favor of going as far as I possibly can in enfranchising persons, and making them citizens of our country, so that the basis on which the Government of the country rests may be as broad as it can be, compatible with safety, order and good government; and I will go as far in that line as I possibly can. The hon, member for Queen's did not take into account some other facts. If it be that under the present assessment there are 420 out of the 2,000 voters who are voting on a real property qualification of more than $100 and less than $150 of assessed value there is this fact to be taken into account, that the difference in the two is, that in the present law we have the assessed value and that in the Bill before the House we have the actual value, and I do not care what the hon, gentleman says as to what the assessors are supposed to do, I go by the common experience in New Brunswick—and I think I will be borne out by hon, gentlemen representing counties there—that the actual value and the assessed value are not the same. And it may be, when the hon gentleman comes under the revising officer to have the list arranged for voting for this House, he will find out, when the actual value is placed, that a great many of those 420 will be rated on real property of actual value sufficient to give them a vote. The hon, gentleman has not taken into account the fact that we are giving farmers' sons the franchise; that there are a good many farmers in his own county whose sons do not vote now, but who will be allowed to vote when the Bill comes into operation. He may set that off as an enlargement of the franchise, which will, to a certain extent, compensate for any who may be ber ift of the franchise—if there be such—by the Bill. electorate who shall take part in the legislation and govern- | Then there is a tenancy and an occupation clause, and mechanics' sons and the like will also add largely to the general roll of enfranchised persons and, therefore, to the voters. Now, Sir, when you take these things into consideration, and also take into consideration that it is quite possible that if hon. gentlemen, with the same diligence and ability they have hitherto shown, apply themselves, when they come to the details of the Bill, they may, by the force of their reason and their logic, shed such light on the subject that some of these details may be changed, and that more liberal provisions than are printed in the Bill may be found in the Bill as it is passed; for the leader of the Government, the promoter of the Bill, gave these hon. gentlemen as calm and courteous an invitation as the promoter of any Bill could, to sit down and reason with him as to what should be the ultimate character of the Bill-to stop their obstruction and go to work on the real clauses of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes; he is listening to the reasoning to-

Mr. FOSTER. I am in favor of the Bill for another reason, and that is, it takes no power from the Provincial Legislatures which they are at present holding. The Provincial Legislatures at present hold certain powers. One of those powers is to regulate their own franchise. does not propose to interfere with that power, and if not with that power, with what other power does it interfere? It cannot be shown that there is a single power possessed by the Legislature of any Province that the Bill interferes within the slightest degree. They are allowed to fix their own franchises; we are taking our franchise. Have not we fixed our franchise already? Upon what basis of franchise are members elected to this House? Is it on a basis fixed by the Provincial Legislature, irrespective of this Parliament? I think not. I think we took the power and exercised it, and stated what should be the franchise for election for this House; and in 1874 that power was embodied in the Statute Book. And in passing this measure we are going outside of no lines that were not gone out of in fixing the franchise as it at present exists. Let me call the attention of the hon. member for Queen's to one argument he used, which was not quite logical. He was very much concerned that my hon, triend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) should go back to the very same constituency which elected him—to the very same electorate which gave him his commission. Now, Sir, what happened? This very year the Provincial Government brought in a measure, and carried it through, as far as they had power to carry it—it was not their fault that it did not become lawwhich would have materially altered the electorate of Westmoreland, and my hon. friend would then have gone back to an electorate that was not the same as that which sent h m here. Now, if there is any pertinency in that argument it is one of the strongest arguments why this Parliament should take the matter into its own hands. so that we be not obliged to go back to a constituency that may be altered in any way the Local Legislature may choose to alter it. Now, Sir, the hon member for Huron went beyond the record a little, in his desire to exaggerate the sweeping character of this measure in the Province of New Brunswick. He made the calculation that Queen's, N.B., had 2,000 electors. He read that 420 would be disfranchised on one basis, and that 32, or about that number, would be disfranchised on another basis, making a total of some 450; and then he leaped to the conclusionand his argument thereafter was based upon it—that onethird of the electorate of Queen's would be disfranchised; and, reasoning from that, one-third of the electorate of the Province of New Brunswick. Now 420 and 30 make 450, which is less than 25 per cent. of the whole number of which is less than 25 per cent. of the whole number of voters, and when he leaps from that to one-third he leaps to exaggeration, to which the hon, gentleman is prone, and which detracts from arguments which would otherwise have greater force with the country. In a in favor of this Bill, in the next place, because it provide for a fair vot rs' list, and so for a fair expression of the people's voice.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. "Hear, hear," says the hon. member for Bothwell, and he is almost always "there." Now, I protest against what has been a too prevalent sentiment indulged in by hon, gentlemen opposite; whether they believe it or not I am not here to say; if they do, they have a perfect right to, and I am not blaming them for it; but I say it is not the best kind of a sentiment, either for the government of this country or for promoting the confidence of the people of this country in the Government. They go upon the assumption that the moment the Government appoint any person for any object, that moment he becomes the servile tool and instrument of the Government—that, being appointed and paid by the Government, he cannot act fairly and squarely, but must become, perforce, a dishonest man, and therefore suspicion should dog his every footstep and be cast upon every one of his actions. Now, I dissent from that. I believe men can be as honest men under an appointment and a salary as they can be in trade, in their social relations or in their political relations. I hold that the inducements which are offered to men in trade, in society, and in political relations, to make them swerve from the right path, are greater than the inducements offered to a man who is appointed, for instance, as a revising barrister, who is appointed for life, during good behavior, and can only be removed from that office on an address from the House of Commons. A man so appointed and so paid can be in a position to act far more fairly and independently than almost any man of business in the country; and I entirely dissent from that idea, which is altogether too prevalent in the country, and which is made too much of in this House, that men are to become objects of suspicion and must, perforce, become servile tools of a Government from whom they hold their appointment and from whom they receive their pay. If that was the case, the same suspicion would dog the footsteps of every judge in the land, for every judge in the land is an appointee of the Government, and occupies his position during good behavior. So I say it is not to be reasoned upon—and I will not reason upon it, or base my action on this Bill upon such reasoning—that the revising barrister must become a dishonest man the moment he gets the voters' list in his hands. So I am in favor of this measure, because it takes no power from the people, because it assumes no power for the Dominion which the Dominion has not already assumed, and has power to assume, and because provision has been made for a fair voters' list and consequently for a fair expression of the voice of the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have gone through the modus operandi of getting a voters' list arranged in one of the counties of New Brunswick, and one of the strong points they made was that it was posted up in every parish, so that the people could read it and know whether their names were on it or not. If you look through the provisions of this Bill you will find that every care is taken that all the possible publicity shall be given to the making up of the voters' lists, so that there will not be a man in a polling district who will not be advertised as to whether his rights have been served in the matter or not. All these precautions are to be taken in order that the voters' lists shall be made in a manner to secure the rights of every citizen. Now, Sir, hon, gentlemen opposite have been declaring in favor of the position taken by my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He must be a wider suffrage. If I were in favor of a wider suffrage, and if I felt that in present circumstances it was not possible to get an affirmative vote upon that proposition, and here was a proposition which I was satisfied in my mind, if carried out, would pave the way to that wider suffrage to which I was attached, it would certainly not be a ground for me to oppose the Bill; it would rather be a ground for me to put forth the best effort I could to have it carried, and thus bring the accomplishment of the wider suffrage, of which I was in favor, a little nearer to its completion. It is stated that there is a great deal of discontent in the Maritime Provinces. That hobby horse of discontent must always be mounted and ridden by hon, gentle nen opposite when they have an object to gain. When the hon, member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) wanted to defeat this legislation, he threatened that Ontario would not remain loyal very long if it were passed; so when the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) wants to put his great spike into this gun which he professes to think is directed against his side of the House, he immediately rides out the hobby of discontent, great discontent in the Maritime Provinces since Confederationunhappily and unfortunately so, to his great pain and sorrow of heart, for had he not a part in the establishment of this Confederation? And is not every father solicitous for the welfare of his children? The hon, gentleman is pained, but not so much pained as to prevent his coming out and talking of this discontent, as he calls it, and giving it a wider place than it occupies in reality, and setting up here, in the councils of the country and before the world, that thing which, in the Maritime Provinces themselves, hides its head, and is not a prevalent sentiment by any means. About the time of Confederation two hostile camps were formed, some in favor of and some against Confederation, and a strong, a long and a fierce battle was fought over that question. The hon, member for St. John will bear me out in saying that so keen was the contest that it became almost impossible for any one who chose to take strong sides to become convinced or to acknowledge that he was wrong; and the anti-Confederates of that time are the anti-Confederates of to day, and they will remain so, a great many of them, until they will have been removed by a higher power. But to say that in the Maritime Provinces Confederation has been disastrous; that discontent has been widespread; that there is any considerable feeling which shows itself in the practical carrying out of that discontent with Confederation, says what is not consistent with the facts; and that is shown by this potent argument, that there is not a man in the Maritime Provinces who has run, or is willing to run, for a constituency, carrying in his hand the flag of dismemberment of the Union, and of taking Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick out of the Union. The best evidence that can be given of that, other than that which I have just mentioned, is what took place in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly this year. Hon. gentlemen who are conversant with that know what I mean, and it is not necessary for me further to mention it here. I have stated these things because of the remarks that were made by gentlemen from New Brunswick, and especially by the hon. member for West Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), who tried to make it appear that New Brunswick would be largely disfranchised by this Bill. If I believed that New Brunswick would be disfranchised to a third or a quarter of its voters I should be very careful as to how I supported this measure. I do not believe it, and therefore it does not weigh with me. On the contrary, I believe that the electorate will be broadened, that more men in the Province of New Brunswick will take their places as citizens and take their share in the election of members to this Parliament, under this Bill, when it becomes law, than under the present franchise. The hon. gentleman said the First Minister should have been in his seat to hear this astounding information, the Mr. Fester.

"Have just made a general attack and carried the whole settlement. The men behaved splendidly. The rebels in full flight. Sorry to asy law on to got kiel. While I was reconnoitering this morning Mr. Ashley and have not got kiel. While I was reconnoitering this morning Mr. Ashley can be disfranchised to a third or a quarter of its voters I should be disfranchised to a third or a quarter of its voters I should be ont believe it, and therefore it does not weigh with me. On the contrary, I believe that the electorate will be broadened, that more men in the Province of New Brunswick who were heavily fired on. I so pressed on until I saw my chance and ordered a general advance. The men responded nobly, splendidly be the prisoners, galloped with a flag of truce and hauded me a letter from Riel, saying, 'If you massacre our families I shall massacre the prisoners.' I sent answer that if he would put his women and children in one place and let me know where it was, not a shot should be fired on them. I then returned to camp, and pushed on my advance parties, who were heavily fired on. I so pressed on until I saw my chance the prisoners, galloped with a flag of truce and hauded me a letter from Riel, saying, 'If you massacr New Brunswick, and especially by the hon. member for new information which was given by the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King). I am afraid the hon. member for West Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not in his seat either, for if he had been, at a certain time, he would have heard the member for Queen's give almost the same identical information, a night or two ago here, that he gave to-night, and I have no doubt it has been conned over and largely pondered on by hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick and others who have this Bill at heart.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the right hon. gentleman received any further information about the expedition in the North-West, and more particularly about the steamer Northcote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; we have not heard any more news. She is supposed to be down the river, most likely making progress towards Prince Albert.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved-

That the Seventh Report of the Committee of both Houses on the printing of Parliament be adopted.

He said: This report contains a recommendation for the printing of certain documents, and requests an appropriation of $20,000 towards the continuation of the printing, as it is voted at this period every year. Of course, if it is not all required it will not be used.

Motion agreed to.

ASCENSION DAY-ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved-

That when this House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned till Friday next, at half-past one o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CARON. I desire to read an important telegram which I received this morning about five o'clock, from Major General Middleton, conveying news which I know will be welcomed by the House and the country:

" BATOCHE'S HOUSE, 11th, via CLARKE'S CROSSING, 12th..

it is dense we will let you know. Yours, etc. (Signed) Louis David Riel.' On the envelope he had written as follows: 'I do not like war, and if you do not retreat and refuse an interview, the question remains the same concerning the prisoners'

"Gur loss, I am afraid, heavy, but not so heavy as might be expected. As yet, I find it is five killed and ten wounded.

"Killed—Oapt. French, commanding scouts; Lieut. Fitch, 10th Grenadiers; Capt. Brown, Boulton's scouts; M. M. Kippen, surveyors' scouts; Private Wheeler, 30th battalion.

"Wounded—Lieut. Garden, surveyors' scouts; Lieut. Laidlaw, 10th; Major F. Dawson, 10th (slightly); Sergt.-Major Watson, 90th (slight, in ankle); Sergt. Jakes, 90th (in hand); Private Young, 90th (flesh wound in thigh); Private W. Cook, 10th (shot in arm); Bugler M. Gaughan, 10th (in finger); Private Barber (slight wound in head); Private J. W. Quigley (flesh wound in arm); Private J. Marshall, 10th (flesh wound in calf); Private W. Wildon, 10th (slight, across back); Private V. Barton, Midland (thigh and groin, seriously); Corporal Helliwell (mid-shoulder).

"This is all I know at present. Prisoners all released and safe in my eassp. Among them: Jackson, white man, who was Riel's secretary, but who is mad and rather dangerous."

I also beg to read another telegram which I received shortly after, giving some information in reference to the Northcote:

"Steamer Northcots and another coming up river with Company 'O' School of Infantry, and some police, and will cut off retreat of rebels. Rebel loss is believed to be very severe, but as yet unknown. Wounded breed brought in is Ambroise Jobin, member of Riel's council."

CIVIL SERVICE ACTS AMENDMENT.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 31) to amend and consolidate the Civil Service Acts of 1882, 1883 and 1884, be read the first time. He said: The amendment is only this. That a candidate, after having passed his examination, shall have the right, on paying a certain fee, to have a copy of his

Mr. MILLS. On what terms? What is the fee?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The fee to be fixed by Order in Council.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not object at all to this Bill going through without the usual forms, but I believe the rules of the House require that Bills amended in the Senate should remain on the Table of the House two days. The distinguished leader of the Opposition, last year, on a Bill in which I was interested, took occasion to point out the propriety of the two days rule being followed. That was a proper suggestion, and I think we had better adhere to it in the future.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I was informed by the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill in the Senate that the amendment was but of little importance, or I would not have asked that it should go through now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not object to the Bill going through to-day, only I thought it would be well to follow the rule, so as to avoid difficulties in the future.

Mr. MILLS. It would be well, instead of leaving the cost to be fixed by Order in Council, that it should be fixed by this House. We are constantly divesting ourselves of our legislative functions and handing them over to the Governor in Council, and I think this is a course we should avoid following.

Mr. MULOCK. What good purpose is to be served by allowing candidates to obtain copies of the examination păpers?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. A suggestion was made that candidates who complained of the result of their examinations

Governor in Council. It was not to be presumed that a heavy fee will be charged.

Mr. BLAKE. If copies of the papers are to be handed to those who have not passed, the object of those who ask for the papers will, no doubt, be to scrutinise them and appeal to the public on the merits of the answers. I have endeavored, as far as I could, without success, to insure a more satisfactory method of examination than that which the hon. gentleman proposes. Those who have had some experience in examinations know that frequently unreasonable complaints are made, and if it is intended that unsuccessful candidates should have the right to get back their answers, I am afraid the hor, gentleman is going to create for himself much trouble.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not think there will be any difficulty or danger. The thing is a matter of course, and I am surprised the hon, gentleman takes exception to it. These candidates have a right to get copies of their answers and should not be refused copies when they ask for them.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think it is a matter of right. I am not aware of such a practice prevailing in any institution where young men are examined. I think the Secretary of State will find that if he yields to this amendment he is going to make a lot of trouble for the board. The only object an unsuccessful candidate can have in securing copes of his answers must be to enable him to sit in judgment on the finding of the examiners. That is not a desirable state of affairs to bring about. The examiners' judgment is firel. These candidates wil. appeal to the examiners or endea or to appeal to some higher body, and the Government may be flooded with petition at om unsuccossful candidates, their petitions being fortified with copies of their answers, on which the Government will be asked to sit in judgment. Thus, attempts will be made to weaken the Act by making the reports of the examiners not final. How does the Secretary of State make out that an unsuccessful candidate has a right to get a copy of his papers? Is it the rule, in any public institution where young men are examined, that the unsuccessful candidates should have copies of their papers?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. At the bar examinations in Quebec, if a candidate asks for a copy of his answers, he has the right to have it, and he should have it.

Mr. MULOCK. That may be the rule of the bar in the Province of Quebec, but it is not the rule in examinations conducted for the bar in Ontario, nor in connection with any public system of examination in the Province of Ontario. There is not a precedent at all to be found in the Province of Ontario for such a course being adopted. It must tend to unsettle the finding of the examiners. It is putting a weapon in the hands of the candidates, with which to question the findings of the examiners. There is no right about it, and I think it is an unwise procedure. I submit that these amendments are not of the formal character that might be passed at once; but, that the proper way to deal with them is, to have the Bill with the amendments placed on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not want to force this, if the hon. gentleman wants to keep up the discussion which has been gone over three or four times, to the loss of the time of the country, and wearying the patience of hon. members. If he wants to begin over again, it is his right, and I will leave the amendment on the paper. I stated that it was an amendment of no consequence, and that, if it was not a matter of right, it should be a matter of right. If the hon, gentleman objects, I do not care at all. The matter will come on, I suppose, when the Franchise Bill is over. The hon, gentleman has been all might like to have copies of their papers, and that copies Franchise Bill is over. The hon, gentleman has been all should be furnished them, the fee to be fixed by the the time fighting for the candidates, for the young men who are submitted to such tyrannical or arbitrary treatment. If now he turns his back upon that, and says they should not have a copy of their answers, he is entitled to contradict himself again in the House, and he may take forty-eight hours to do it.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not intending to contradict myself, but I say that this point has never been under discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. These amendments will be put upon the paper, unless there is unanimous consent.

Mr. MITCHELL. And follow out the rule always. We will have no more Grand Trunk fiascoes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That when the House adjourns on Friday next, it stand adjourned until Saturday following at 1:30 p.m., and that Government measures shall have precedence after Routine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suggest to the First Minister that he would lose nothing whatever, and probably save a good deal of inconvenience to members of the House, if he made that from half-past one to six. We know that between half-past eight and twelve practically nothing can be done, or will be done, on Saturday night.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon, gentleman has had a great deal of experience in Saturday nights, and I think his experience is, as mine is, that in those three hours practically nothing is done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As we are getting older, we are getting wiser, and I have no doubt that we shall make good use of the time between six and twelve.

Sir RlCHARD CARTWRIGHT, I doubt that very much,

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I rise to a question of privilege. I see in the 6'loles of yesterday a report of a speech made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in which he refers to myself. I was not in the House when he made his remarks, and the Hansard report of his statement is not at all in accordance with that which appeared in the Globe, which I must say is most incorrect and unjust towards me. It speaks in this article of my having maligned not only the assessors of the municipalities but the municipal councillors. I can say that, of what I have stated with regard to the assessors, I do not wish to retract or modify one word. I have made no assertion whatever with reference to the municipal councillors. They are a body of gentlemen for whom I have the highest respect. I do not think there is any portion of the community of Canada whose labors are so patriotic, so disinterested as the municipal councillors of this country, because they work very largely without any remuneration whatever, and perform their duties to the satisfaction of the people. The remarks that I made in reference to the assessors had no reference whatever to the municipal councillors, because we know that the assessors are as independent of the councils as the Auditor-General is of the Government of Canada. I will read the report as it appears in the Globe of yesterday. The hon. member for Bothwell is thus reported:

"The member for West York (Mr. Wallace) had declared that partisanship was shown by the assessors and municipal councillors in Ontario, in fact that those officers were perjured partisans, and that so gross and outrageous had been their conduct that it was necessary that the Government should place it beyond their power longer to deal with the lists of voters in elections for this Parliament."

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Now, what I did say is reported correctly in the Hansard, as follows:

"My own experience is that, when you get a lot of Grit assessors in your riding, you cannot have confidence that a fair result is reached, and that those who are entitled to be on the assessment roll and on the voters' list are placed there. Our experience in the West Riding of York, where we have had Grit assessors, is that we have each year to appeal against the assessment, and to get 40 to 50 names added to the voters' list which were left off by the assessors.

"Mr. McCRANEY. What about Tory assessors?

"Mr. WALLACE. If hon. gentlemen opposite have no more confidence in the Tory assessors than I have in the Grit assessors they will vote for this Bill and try to make it law."

I further stated casually a day or two afterwards that the Grit assessors very often performed their duties in a perfunctory manner, that their principal duty was to assess property, that very frequently farmers' sons, tenants', and others' names were left off, which did not affect the collection of the taxes, which was the principal object the assessors had in view. I do not wish to say more than to characterise this assertion made in the Globe newspaper with regard to myself as entirely untrue.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES. I propose to say a few words on the justice of the proposition contained in the amendment of the hon. member for St. John County (Mr. Weldon), to exempt the Province of New Brunswick from the operations of this Bill. It will be generally admitted by those who listened to the debate, as conducted by members on both sides, that it was an essentially practical debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. An example to all the rest.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes, it was a good example to all the rest, not only upon the Franchise Bill, but upon any other proposition that may come before the House. I will venture to say that no proposition on this Bill has been maintained with stronger arguments than those which were advanced by hon, gentlemen who sit around me, with reference to the proposition under discussion, and I regret very much that the First Minister, who has charge of the Bill, was not in his place to hear those arguments. If his public duties prohibit his presence here, I wish very much he could have placed the Bill in charge of some hon. gentleman who would have listened to those arguments, and been in a position to accede to them. I listened, myself, as one who was desirous of forming a fair and honest opinion as to whether this proposition should be acceded to. I came to the conclusion that the statements made and the arguments advanced were so cogent that they ought to be acceded to. No reply of a special character was vouchsafed to those arguments. Some general remarks were made—powerful in themselves —in support of the general proposition contained in the Bill, but there was a disposition on the part of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) and Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), who took up the cudgels on behalf of the present Bill, to evade the particular arguments advanced by my hon friends from Queen's, N B. (Mr. King) and Sunbury (Mr. Burpee). Now, the hon. member for Queen's produced a list of his electors, and showed how many there were in his district.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Was the hon, gentleman in when I spoke?

Mr. DAVIES. Not all the time.

Mr. LANDRY. Half the time?

Mr. DAVIES. I was here half the time.

Mr. LANDRY. No, not a third of the time.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member from Queen's (Mr. King) produced a list of the electors in his district, and showed on what their right to the electoral franchise was based, that it was not based entirely upon the possession of freehold property, but it was based, also, upon the possession of a certain amount of personal property. He advanced these two propositions: First, that the value of the real property which gave a man the right to vote, had been increased from $100 to $150, and that increase would disfranchise a certain number of electors, and he gave the number; secondly, that a large number of electors voted upon a personal property qualification, and that this Bill would disfranchise every one of them. The hon, gentleman went on further to say, that the mere possession of real property might be a fair test in some parts of the Dominion, but in other parts of the Dominion it was not a fair test, because in New Brunswick, for instance, the peculiar habits and business of the people led them to invest their money, not in real property, but in boats, barges, and small schooners that navigate and carry on trade on the St. John River. Now these two propositions were not answered by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), who spoke last when the Committee rose at two o'clock this morning, dwelt some time upon the fact that no discontent existed in the Maritime Provinces at all; that there was no such thing as discontent; if it did lurk in any secret place there was no man of any political or social position in the Province who would have the courage, or the manliness, to express his discontent in public. The hon, gentleman said so in almost those words, some of my hon. friends behind me took note of his remarks and, all of them expressed themselves as possessing knowledge that those remarks were not consistent with the facts. I will only recall to the attention of the Committee the fact that some few months ago-

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon, gentleman wishes to make words which I did not utter, and put them into my mouth, and upon them to base an argument, he is at perfect liberty to do so; but I warn him to day that that is his course, and it is more ingenious than ingenuous.

Mr. DAVIES. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that it is the hon, gentleman's constant practice, when he is challenged with a statement made by him of an important character, to deny the correctness of the statement. He has done that half a dozen times since this debate on the Franchise Bill began. If the hon. gentleman is prepared to withdraw his statement that discontent does not exist and dare not show itself in the Maritime Provinces, I shan pass on from it. But the hon, gentleman most certainly made that statement, and made it in the most solemn and emphatic manner that he was capable of. I will recall to the hon, gentleman's attention the fact that in the metropolitan city of his own Province, within the last six months, several meetings of malcontents, or discontents, were held, and these meetings embraced the leading merchants of St. John, and only did they feel discontent with the existing state of matters, but they formally expressed that discontent in resolutions which were thrown broadcast over the Dominion. When the hon, gentleman stated that no public man who gave expression to discontent with the existing political system of the Dominion, could hold up his head in Canada, I would remind him that in the metropolitan city of New Brunswick, a gentleman whom he a short time ago designated as a rebel-and the expression is now in the Hansard—was elected in the city of St. John to represent that city in the Local Legislature, by a very large majority, by a majority very largely in excess.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you read that in the Hansard?

Mr. DAVIES. Of the majority by which the Finance Minister was elected.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the hon, gentleman to read that in the Hansard.

Mr. DAVIES. On the 2nd May, the hon gentleman, in addressing the House, said:

"Who is it that countenanced secession in the city of St. John?

"Some hon. MEMBERS. The Tories.

"Mr. FOSTER. Is it? Then my bon. friend who sits for the county of St. John countenances secession, but of course he is not a Tory. In the city of St. John one of the political friends of the member for West Ontario is the only man, I am thankful to say, in the Province of New Brunswick, who runs an annexation sheet. He favors secession."

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has misstated my position. He has deliberately put into my mouth words that I did not use.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated that-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen are afraid to hear me. I will take an opportunity later on.

Mr. DAVIES. I am not going to continue the debate.

Mr. CASEY. I must ask you, Mr. Chairman, to keep order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman who has raised the point of order has been himself guilty of a breach of order. He has been guilty of the breach of one of the best known rules, that even he, with his short experience of Parliament, should have known. He has stated that the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), has been guilty of deliberately putting into his mouth words which had not been uttered. That is to say that the hon, member of whom I am speaking, knowingly made a talse statement; that he deliberately put into his mouth words which he did not say—that he told a lie. I leave the hon, member for Queen's to defend himself as to the facts; I am speaking as to the point of order. On the point of order I say that language is utterly inadmissable and the hon, member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), must withdraw that statement before we proceed any further. I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman behind me was out of order in making that statement; but before he can be called upon to withdraw that statement, the hon member for Queen's, P. E. I., must withdraw the statement, that it was the habit of the hon member behind me to make statements and then deny them.

Mr. CASEY. We are at present considering the point of order with respect to the hon. member for King's, N.B., and we can take up the other point of order if hon. gentlemen desire it without the interference of the Premier. After we have settled this point of order, it will be quite open to them to take up the other point of order. I ask your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I have taken.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is out of order, in stating, as he has done, that the hon. member put words into his mouth which he did not use; at the same time I think the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., had provoked it by the language he himself had used.

Mr. CASEY. Withdraw.

Mr. FOSTER. I cheerfully withdraw those words, if they are objectionable, being sorry, at the same time, to have to withdraw the truth.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hope the hon. member for Queen's will do the same.

Mr. DAVIES. What is the expression I have to withdraw?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That the hon. member is in the habit of making statements and then denying that he made them.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman has said half a dozen times during the Session that he had not made use of certain language, although-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIES. If I did not make the statement, I cannot withdraw it. I say and I repeat, and if I am not in order I will withdraw it, that the hon. gentleman, not once but half a dozen times this Session, denied that he made statements which, on reference to the records of the House, it appears he did make.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, member for Queen's said that the hon, gentleman (Mr. Foster) was in the habit of making statements and afterwards denying them.

Mr. DAVIES. I made that statement and I repeat it now. I am in the judgment of the House as to whether the charge made by me is not correct; as to whether the hon, gentleman has not time and again done so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think hon, gentlemen are bound to accept the hon, gentleman's explanation. I hat is what he now says.

Mr. DAVIES. I have read from Hansard what the hon. gentleman said: That an hon gentleman who is a political associate of the member for West Ontario countenances secession; that in the city of St. John, one of the political friends of the member for West Ontario is the only man in the Province of New Brunswick who runs an annexation sheet, that he favors secession. The hon, gentleman cooly stands up and says that such is the satisfaction of the people of the Maritime Provinces with the existing state of affairs, that no man who values his public position dare express discontent with it. I have disproved that statement by one of the most prominent men in his own Province, and out of his own mouth. If further evidence is required, I ask hon members to read the reports of the meetings held in St. John in November and December, attended by the principal merchants, in which language was used expressive, not only of discontent, but of a feeling that that discontent was based upon the political injustice from which they were suffering, and calling on members of this House to remove those grievances and the injustice which caused the discontent. I do not want to take up time with matter; but I wish to call attention to points made with record to this amendment. What position do with regard to this amendment. What position do we occupy? We are now discussing whether any Province shall be exempted from the general operation of the Bill. We have had an amendment with respect to Prince Edward Island, before the House, and it has been voted down. What is the effect of the Bill on that Province? It has been said, not by opponents of the Government who might be accused of political exaggeration in making statements, but by supporters of the Government, by members who follow them on almost all occasions, that the effect of the Bill will be to disfranchise a very large number of electors. I heard the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Townshend) express a sentiment the other night, which I hope was entertained by others around him, that if the clause would have the effect of disfranchising a large class of persons, he would oppose it. We have proved that it will disfranchise a large class in Prince Edward Island who, for thirty years have exercised the franchise, and who, by consent of both parties, have exercised that right fairly and well, and these are now being disfranchised by this Bill. I Dominion, you will have a uniform franchise, not in the Mr. DAVIES.

ask that hon, gentleman, therefore, to give effect to his declaration, for no hon, gentleman has dared to deny that it is true that the effect of this Bill will be to disfranchise a large number in Prince Edward Island. We next come to New Brunswick. The hon, member for Queen's, N.B., says the Bill will disfranchise 400 electors in his own constituency. Why should we single out those 400 and say: Heretofore you have exercised the franchise, but we will prevent you exercising it hereafter. Can the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), justify it? That hon, gentleman argued at some length that the House had a constitutional right to pass such a Bill. He was only flogging a dead horse in using that argument. We have admitted from the inception of the debate that the legal and technical right to pass this Bill is vested in this Parliament; but we did deny what the hon. gentleman knows we deny, that it was expedient or just to exercise that right. We told him that the onus of proving that the time had come to exercise that right lay upon him, and he would not accept that onus, and could not justify the exercise, except on special grounds, of that legal right. Is that any satisfaction to the 400 electors who are being disfranchised in Queen's County alone to tell them that we have the constitutional right to do this We have the constitutional right to do many things. If we find that to exercise that right brings with it injustice, disqualification and disfranchisement, we are not justified in exercising that right. The exercise of such a right is tyranny. The hon. gentleman sneered at those who said this Bill was a revolutionary measure, and he laid down the proposition that because it was constitutional it could not be revolutionary. When did the hon, gentleman make that A number of measures are perfectly constitudiscovery? tional in themselves, and yet they may be revolutionary in their effects. If you transfer from one set of men the exercise of the franchise and give it to another body of men, the effect is a political revolution, more or less. If you admit to the exercise of the franchise a large mass of those who are incompetent to exercise it, and so swamp existing constituencies, as we say you are doing in the case of the tribal Indians, that amounts to a political revolution; to the transfer of the power of the people from those who have heretofore exercised it to another class-I say it amounts to a political revolution whether you have the constitutional right to exercise that power or not. The question which is before this committee, the question to which it should bend its mind is not the abstract question of constitutional rights, but whether or not the proposition before the committee is based on justice, fair play and equity. The hon, gentleman said he supported the Bill because it proposes a uniform franchise. Uniform it is in one sense—uniform on paper, but diverse in its application. The hon, gentleman knows that in the Maritime Provinces a large class exist who have invested their money in personal property and that the same class do not exist in Ontario, and to base the exercise of the franchise on one particular kind of property, and exclude a large class of people who have chosen to invest their money in other species of property, is not justice or fair play. It is not creating uniformity over the Dominion but diversity. The man who possesses a barge floating down the St. John river and carrying lumber to market, possesses just as much property in the country as the man who owns a ten acre field near Toronto, Brockville or London. The possession of a field does not augur more intelligence or more aptitude for the possession of the franchise than the ownership of the barge, and when you find statesmen framing what they call a uniform franchise for the Dominion, unless you recognise the fact that we are not a homogeneous people, that there are people engaged in various occupations, trades, and callings, unless you recognise the practical vocations of life as they exist in the broad sense of the term, but one which will be uniform on its face, while in reality it will be diverse, unfair, and unjust. The hon. gentlemen said he supported this franchise because it was uniform, but let him answer that point. Does it create that uniformity which is based on justice, excluding as it does those 400 men residing in the county of Queen's, because they do not own real property. Is uniformity to be carried out? The First Minister declared that while he was going to admit the Indians of one portion of the Dominion to the franchise, he would exclude those of another portion. Are not the Indians of British Columbia as well qualified and better qualified from their education and habits to exercise the franchise than many of those who are to be admitted? Why, then, are they to be excluded. If the principle of uniformity is to be the governing principle of the Bill why should you not apply it in that case? The hon, gentleman knows that the principle has been exploded and given up long ago. I ask him, when he claims that this Bill should be more uniform, can he, dare he, does he justify the admission of the Indians of his own Province to the exercise of the franchise? dare him to do it. He is a practical man, he has lived most of his life there, and he knows that the Indians of that Province are unfit to exercise that franchise, unfit from their manner of life, their educational position and their whole training, unfit from their gross ignorance. The hon, gentleman knows it, his constituents know it, every man in this House from that Province knows it, and he dare not defend it in this country. Why should the hundreds of Indians from New Brunswick, who are known to be incapable of ever exercising the franchise be included while hundreds of ablebodied, well educated men, possessing a large amount of personal property, and who have exercised the franchise for years past should be disfranchised. Is that fair or just? I say this Bill is unjust in those it admits, and ten times more unjust in those it excludes. I say you take away the rights from the people of New Brunswick which they have enjoyed for half a century, and you confer those rights on Indians, who never have claimed them, who have never enjoyed them, and whom you admit are unfit to enjoy them. You call in a class who are unfit to manage their own affairs, and you call them in to assist in managing yours. Is there any justice in that? You admit that the Indians are not capable of managing their own affairs, and you take them under your wardship and control, and the argument seems to be that because they are unfit to manage their own affairs you call them in to assist in managing yours. I would like to hear hon gentlemen from the Province of New Brunswick justifying that proposition. You heard the remarks of one of the most experienced parliamentarians from that Province. He told you that the Indians were totally unfit in that Province to exercise the franchise; still you admit them while you exclude a large number of those who have heretofore enjoyed the franchise, because, forsooth, they possess personal and not real property. How, on what principle, is this justified? On the most extraordinary argument ever advanced in this Parliament in my hearing—on the law of compensation. Where do the hon. gentlemen get that law, as applied to the politics of this country? Looking at the Bill all through, the hon. gentleman says: It is true you disfranchise a lot of men whom he dare not say are incapable of exercising the franchise, but on the other hand you confer the franchise on another class, whom he will not say are fit for the franchise, but fair minded and independent member in the House and in the law of compensation comes in, and as a matter of fact the total number of voters remains the same. Why, Sir, the argument is childish. We will next have advanced in men, and among those who follow blindly after the Governfavor of this Bill the law of averages, which is trotted out so often here in financial matters. The hon, gentleman general principles, because he is very fond of general prinknows in his secret soul that the argument of the law of ciples: but when he came out boldly in defence of that pro-

the disfranchisement of a large number of people who are fit for the franchise, and the enfranchisement of another The argument is class who are incapable of exercising it. perfectly absurd. Then the hon, gentleman went so far as to say that he supported the Bill because the enlarged franchise was consistent with good government. That was a pretty and well rounded phrase, but it meant nothing, because the hon, gentleman failed to show that those who were to be brought within the scope of the new Bill were fit to exercise the franchise, that the introduction of the Indians would be the means by which better government would be obtained, and because he also failed to show that the exclusion of those from the franchise who have heretofore enjoyed it, would be conducive to good government. It is no use to indulge in generalisations of this kind, unless you show in detail that the argument is a sound one. But when the hon. gentleman closed his remarks I was prepared almost for anything. He is the first gentleman I have heard from the Maritime Provinces who has defended the revising barrister clause. Does he think that the object which we ought to have in view—the attainment of good government—is to be facilitated by making the appointment of the revising barrister a political appointment? Does he think it either justice or fair play, or that good government will result from vesting in the Government for the time being the appointment of the men who are to arrange the voters' lists from which members of this House will be elected? The hon, gentleman knows that the result must be bad in every sense. He knows that politics run so high in this country, that the several representatives from the several Provinces will insist upon the appointment of revising barristers who will advance the interests of their own party in the several constituencies. He knows that is the reason why the Bill is being supported so strongly by one party, and so fiercely opposed by this side. He knows it means political annihilation for large numbers of the members on this side, not because they have lost the confidence of their constituents, not because the majority who returned them before is not prepared to return them again, but because political machinery is to be arranged, so that when they cannot be defeated by the voice of the people, they are to be defeated by the pulling of the political wires. The hon, gentleman knows that these revising barristers are to be at the beck and call of the Government, and he knows that the very amount of money to be paid to them will be dependent on the way they please their masters. There is no provision in the Bill fixing the salaries they are to receive; they are to be dependent on the whim of the Governor in Council; but the political party that appoints them is to reward them according to their merit-according to the way in which they turn out the lists. The hon. gentleman knows that the Bill he defends has met with condemnation from one end of this Dominion to the other; he knows that there is not an impartial man who defends it; he knows that the results will be that not the people, but appointees of the Government for the time being, will elect men to Parliament; and he knows that these very men whose appointment he defends are not to be removable except by an address from the very Parliament they elect. I believe there are large numbers on that side of the House who see the injustice of that provision, and who are prepared to amend it; but when such men as the hon. member for King's get up and defend it, they weaken the hands of every ment. I did not wonder that he defended the Bill on those compensation is trifling with the House as a justification for position, which has not been defended by any independent member of this House, I gave him up. But I look forward in the hope that that clause will yet be amended in the at the next election. proper direction. Why, Sir, this is not a faction on this of an Independent mem side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that the turn of the political wheel must come, and that the Liberal party of this country must rule some day. I would like to know how they would like to have applied to them this rule that they are laying down and applying to us. I would like to know how the hon, member for King's would like a revising barrister to be appointed by his opponents to prepare the lists on which he should be elected? Put yourself in his place, is a very good motto when you want to judge whether a certain action is fair or not. When he has the wire in his own hands the hon, gentleman is quite satisfied, but he would not be so well pleased if it was in the hands of his opponents. I say that proposition is unjust and indefensible, and I look forward in the hope and belief that before this debate closes, its unjustness will become apparent to the majority of the House, and that it will to some extent at least be amended.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) told us last night that he did not believe that even if as wise a man as Solomon were to address this side of the House, he would make us believe that this Bill was a good Bill. Well, Sir, for once I have some reason to agree with the hon. gentlemad, for that eventuality has occurred. At the very time the hon, gentleman was speaking we had arguments addressed to us by an individual of the description he mentioned, and those arguments did not seem to convince this side of the House very much of the goodness of the Bill. Notwith-standing that the wisdom of Solomon was expended upon us, we cling to the opinions we formerly held of the Bill, and this hon, gentleman did not appear to know much more of political necessities of Canada than Solomon did himself. Solomon was a very wise man, but he did not know much of Canadian politics. The hon. member for King's is a wise man; yet he did not show much more knowledge of Canadian politics than would Solomon if he had been present. He did not even show much knowledge of the wants and views of his own Province. He said the Bill would be acceptable in his Province and that this particular clause would largely increase the franchise there; but the array of figures shown to us by the hon. member for Queen's proved that the Bill would disfranchise a great many in that Province. I sympathise with the people of New Brunswick because the Bill seems likely to have the same effect there as it will in Ontario, in the way of dis-franchising a large number of people. It will be more oppressive, however, in New Brunswick than in Ontario. It happens that the late Ontario franchise under which we were elected is practically the same as that in the Bill; tut in New Brunswick the provincial qualifications appear to be so different that a large number of the very constituents of the members now sitting for that Province will be disfranchised under the Bill. A large number of the constituents of the hon. member for King's will be disfranchised. What he will say to them I do not know. He smiles at the suggestion, and I suppose he can smile in safety, because these people will not have votes at the next election, and he does not feel any necessity of securing their good will, because they will have no power to wreak political vengeance on the man who has disfranchised them. The hon gentleman came here as an Independent member, and he still claims to be such. Yet he has on two occasions treated us to theories as to the duties of members occasions treated us to theories as to the duties of members supporting the Government, which one would suppose could only come from the mouth of a strict Government supporter. He told us it is the duty of such members to support the Government on all measures which they consider of vital importance during the five years of their reign, and let the people judge of their action at the next election. That is scarcely the language of an Independent member of Parliament. The Independent members from New Brunswick do not all adopt that tone, for the hon, member for King's is not the only Independent member from that Province. Another gentleman claims the title quite as strongly as that hon. gentleman, and it seems to me more justly. I wish to cite the opinion of one Independent member against that of the other as to the effect this clause will have upon that Province and upon the Dominion generally. One of the leading papers of the Province of Quebec and of the Dominion is known to express the views of the other Independent member from New Brunswick. I refer to the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) whose views are known to be expressed in the Herald of Montreal. That hon, gentleman does not mince matters when he speaks through the press, and 1 do not think he will mince matters when he will speak to the House. It is not his way to mince matters. In the Herald issue of Thursday last, he says:

"The true standing ground for him, for any party leader who has faith in the people, is manhood sufrage, and anything short of this is a delusion and a snare. If he must declare his present opposition to this principle, so equitable, so broad, so well calculated to bind the people together, let him wait until he has heard the popular demand for the application of the principle rising higher and higher, as he certainly will within the next twelve months; and if he needs inspiration, he will Mr. DAVIES.

"It is hard to understand why the Premier will persist in forcing his Franchise Bill upon Parliament. He must see that there is no hearty sympathy with it in any quarter. The Opposition to a man are against it. This, perhaps, might be expected under party Government. But the Government's supporters are also against it—but the other Independent member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), is in favor of it. Two Provinces claim to be exempted from its operation. Some Provinces will not have one class of new voters and other Provinces reject another class or those whom Sir John would enfranchise. The Government have been obliged to submit to radical changes already, and others are imminent. It has seldom happened that a strong Government has encountered such strenuous opposition—from whom? From all sides. The time of introducing the measure, the determination to push it through regardless of consequences, as well as the provisions of the Bill itself, are all against sound party and public policy and out of har-Bill itself, are all against sound party and public policy and out of harmony with skilful leadership. If it is a party advantage that is looked for in Ontario, it is just possible that to gain this the Premier may imperil the cohesion of his party as a whole; and where would the party rean in this event?" gain in this event?

I will skip a part of the remarks that follow, which are apt and relevant, but too long to quote in extenso. He goes on

"He cannot be unaware of the extreme character of the demand he has made on their party fealty. Probably no leader ever had more devoted followers; certainly no party leader ever consulted his supporters less or treated them in a more autocratic fashion. But there is a point beyond which no leader can count upon his followers following."

This gentleman, who was at one time a colleague of the right hon. the First Minister, and who is one of the most important and influential members from New Brunswick to-day who is an independent man, says there is a point beyond which the Premier cannot count on his followers following him, but it appears the point has not yet been reached when the Independent member from King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), may not be counted on to follow.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Turn over the next leaf and read the editorial of the 13th.

Mr. CASEY. I shall look at that editorial. I do not know what is in it, and I am reading what applies to my argument.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would like to know what the views of the Independent members of the Province of New Brunswick have to do with this question which is before the House.

Mr. CASEY. It appears the point has been reached when the right hon, gentleman's late colleague cannot follow him, but that point has not been reached in the case of the Independent member for King's (Mr. Foster). The hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) goes on to say.

"At any rate, if Sir John is as actute as his admirers would have us to believe, he will not further attempt to impose upon the public this enormous mass of patchwork which is called a Franchise Bill, in place of the genuine political clothing that is the birthright of every freeman. Our advice to Sir John is to withdraw his Bill, coupling with its retirement the amendment that the franchise of the future must be manhood. ment the amendment that the franchise of the future must be manhood

These are the manly words of a manly man, who utters them frankly. Though I have had occasion to oppose the hon, gentleman, and will probably have occasion to do so again, I must say that he is never chary of speaking out in the House his opinions and ideas. Whatever other faults he may have, he speaks out frankly what he wishes to be laid before the House. The hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), made a suggestion which I hope will be followed. Following up the hint given by the Mail, he says he is quite willing that our arguments and the arguments of his side should go to the country side by side. I hope the hon, gentleman's hint will be taken. I hope the House will be dissolved and the opinion of the country taken on this matter. Let our arguments and others go before the people and let the people judge. That is the desire clearly expressed on this side of the House, but I am afraid it is far from being that of the other side.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Weldon) negatived. Yeas, 36; nays, 74.

Mr. VAIL. The proposition contained in the motion in your hands is so reasonable, and the franchise of the Province of Nova Scotia is so simple and so satisfactory to the people of that Province, that I hope after a short explanation of the Act now in force in that Province, that I shall be more fortunate in the amendment which I am about to move than my friends from Quebec and New Brunswick have been in theirs in the same direction. With the exception of a few remarks which I made on the second reading, I have been an attentive listener to all that has been said on the subject of the elective franchise and the Bill now before the House. I have listened with a desire to hear something said in explanation of this Bill by either the Government or some of their supporters which would justify me in voting for it; but the only reasons I have heard from that side of the House in favor of this measure have been, first, that we had the power to pass this Bill under the British North America Act, and, secondly, that a uniform franchise is desirable. I fail to see that, for either of these reasons or for both, this House would be justified in making so wide a departure as this Bill proposes from the law of 1874, which has worked so satisfactorily. If it could be shown that this law would give us a more independent vote, would return more intelligent representatives to this House, or would be more satisfactory to the Dominion at large, those reasons would be sufficient to induce, at all events, a fair consideration of this measure. But it is not a question of the power to pass the Bill, but whether it is expedient to pass it, whether it will result in benefit to the Dominion at large, and, until that is shown, I do not see why this House should be called upon to remain here six weeks after the usual time of prorogation had passed to en able the Government to place this Bill on the Statute Book. I know that some hon, members on the other side will say that, if this Bill is not crystallised into law this Session, it cannot come into force for the general election of 1887. Well, we have run five elections since Confederation under the present provincial franchises, and no complaint has been made or good reason given, why we should now pass a Bill to enable the electors of the Dominion to vote upon the same franchise in all the Provinces. The House met on the 29th January, and until the 19th March we were farmers' sons, if living on a farm of sufficient value to give left in doubt as to whether this Bill would be submitted a vote as co-owner; the son of any owner of real property, to the House or not.

read for the first time, but it was not really before the House until the 16th April, twelve days less than three months after the House had met. If the First Minister had been desirous of putting this House in possession of full information in regard to the Bill, what it contained, and what changes, if any, he proposed to make in it, he would, considering all that he had said in reference to its importance in former Sessions, have spent at least two hours in giving to the House full details in connection with it. He would have pointed out that the Bill was an important one, that it would probably disfranchise some men while it would enfranchise a few others. He would have stated that his only object in bringing this Bill before the House was that we might have a law that would be satisfactory and fair to all parties and classes in this Dominion. He would have said in addition to that: I know that the Opposition may, perhaps, think that this Bill has been framed with a desire to strengthen the hands of the Government, but I assure them that my only desire is to make it perfect, and to give the two great parties an equal chance under it, and, if they can make any suggestions in regard to any clause of it which will be fair and just and will improve the Bill, I shall be very happy to receive their suggestions and act upon them as far as I possibly can. If that had been done, the First Minister would have only done his duty and he would have convinced the house that he was desirous of doing what was fair and right, and would have culisted the sympathies of the Opposition from that time; and I think I am safe in saying, that the Opposition would have given a fair and candid expression of opinion on this subject, and we would have assisted in every possible way to make the Bill perfect. I do not intend to speak very long, as I do not like to repeat myself or others, but I must ask the indulgence of the house while I compare the Nova Scotia Act passed last Session with this Bill, and point out where the two differ. Our Nova Scotia Act is a very simple one. Hitherto our franchise has been $150 of real estate, and $300 of personal estate, or $300 of real and personal estate combined. This franchise was simple and plain to everybody, and has been working well. I do not mean to say that an Act of that kind is ever so perfect that certain changes are not from time to time necessary, to bring in those who are not but ought to be covered by it. Last Session a new Bill was introduced in the Legislature of Nova Scotia. And as I have heard a great many gentleman opposite say that they could not expect fair play when a Liberal Government was in power in any of the Provinces. I am glad to be able to say that, although we have a Liberal Government in Nova Scotia, I am informed that the Premier of that Province, before he submitted his Franchise Bill, telegraphed to the Premier of the Dominion to inform him that he intended to submit a Franchise Bill, and to ask him if he desired to make any suggestions, in order that an arrangement might be made between them which would be satisfactory to both Governments. Now, I think that goes very far to show that the Local Government, although it is a Liberal Government, had no desire to take an undue advantage of the Government here, and had no desire to enfranchise anybody who ought not to vote for members for this house. They had no desire to pass an Act that would give the liberals a party advantage. I have here a summary which shows the difference between the Local Act and the present Dominion Bill. In the present Bill, the following persons will have the right to vote: Owners of real property of the value of $150; tenants paying monthly, $2; quarterly, $6; half yearly, $12; yearly, $20; occupants of real property of the value of $150; a resident, who derives an income from some mode, calling, office or profession, or from some investment or charge on real property, of not less than $400 per annum; On the 19th March it was other than a farmer, and who has been a resident continuously with the father or mother after the death of the father; then there is the fisherman who is entitled to vote, provided his personal property, or the real estate he holds, amounts to $150, but no fisherman is allowed to vote unless he has real estate. If the fisherman had been allowed to vote on personal property alone, it might have been of some advantage to him, but now he must have real estate of some value, if it is only five dollars.

Mr. KIRK. He has personal property in his boats.

Mr. VAIL. That is about all the personal property a fisherman has in many cases. Under the Nova Scotia law the franchise is given to the owner of real property of the value of $150, which is the same as the Dominion Act; also, personal property of the value of $300. Now I will here point out to the House where a difference exists between the present Bill and the Nova Scotia Act. A great many people are on the list in Nova Scotia, who are the owners of $300 and over of personal property. Notwithstanding that those people may own $50,000 of personal property in the Dominion, unless they own real estate, or unless they come under the occupation clause, or the tenant clause, or some clause of that kind, they cannot vote. think my hon friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Kinney) will agree with me that there are a great many people in Nova Scotia who have property in various investments, and are now entitled to vote under that $300 personal property qualification, who will be entirely cut off by this Bill.

Mr. KINNEY. The hon, member forgets that there is an income clause which will cover them.

Mr. VAIL. Not at all. They are not comprised in the income clause. They do not come in under the definition of the income clause. Last night the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) stated that any man who earned $400 per annum in the Dominion at the present time would be entitled to vote under this clause. That is not so. A man may earn $600 as a day laborer, but unless he occupies a room, or a building, he cannot vote.

Mr. KINNEY. O no, not a bit of it.

Mr. VAIL. He must be a tenant of real property, and pay a monthly or yearly rent.

Mr. RYKERT. Not for income.

Mr. VAIL. I am not speaking of the income voter. I am speaking of a day laborer who will not be allowed to vote under the income clause. I may be mistaken, but that is as I understand the Bill. Now, a large number of people who own personal property in our Province, would be disfranchised. This is very unfair, for it really enfranchises the man who occupies a room twelve feet square, provided he pays $2 a month, or $20 a year, although he may not be worth a dollar in the world outside the effects he has in that small room. It is ridiculous to give such a man a vote, while you refuse it to men who may have ten thousand dollars or more of personal property. I am free to admit that in some respects this Bill reaches a few people in Nova Scotia that the local Act last year, does not reach, and I can very well understand why this class is brought in. The class who will be brought in under the tenant clause of $20 a year, are largely found in mining districts. At the mines it is a very common thing to pay workmen so much per day or so much per ton, as the case may be, for the coal raised, and to allow the workmen to live, rent free, in a house owned by the proprietors of the mine. What will be the effect? The $20 rent will be added to his wages for the year; it will be paid by the owner of the mine, and the miner will be enfranchised under this Bill. I do not think it will apply to many people in the other counties; but it will have the effect I have stated in the mining counties of Nova Scotia.

Mr. TUPPER. Hear, hear. Mr. Vall.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) says, "hear, hear." No doubt it will suit him, as it will add a considerable number of electors in his county. But I do not know why any members elected under a particular franchise should be unwilling to go back to their counties and seek re-election upon the same franchise under which they were elected at the last general election. I desire to go back to the same electors as in 1882, and that is the proper way of testing as to whether, in the opinion of the people the conduct of the Government has been satisfactory. The best evidence that the Government have lost the confidence of the people is the fact that they are pressing this measure; they do not intend, if they can help it, to go back to the people who elected them in 1882, and that is the explanation of this Bill being here to-day. They hope that by enfranchising Indians and a certain number of men in cities and towns who have not had the vote before to gain a verdict of the people and be returned to power for another five years. I do not pretend to say that I am in favor of universal suffrage; I would prefer a property qualification; but I believe, if we have to choose between the Bill now before the House, a complicated, expensive, unworkable Bill, and universal suffrage, I would prefer universal suffrage, and give every man who pays taxes and contributes to the revenue a right to vote. we are driven to that as a last resort in preference to this Bill, I shall vote for the proposition of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). By adopting that amendment we shall get clear of a very objectionable feature of this Bill, and that is the expense that will be incurred in connection with revising barristers, clerks and constables. That is one of the best reasons why hon. gentlemen opposite should pause before they agree to pass a Bill of this kind. I ask hon, gentlemen to consider what they are doing, and especially to consider the financial state of the country. Surely the expenses are being piled up from year to year with sufficient rapidity without having $300,000 or $400,000 annually added? There is no reason for doing so. The present franchises have worked satisfactorily. If they have not, let hon, gentlemen opposite take more time and perfect this Bill, and see if we cannot get a fair vote of the people without incurring the expense proposed. Hon, gentlemen opposite have stated that the leaders on this side are in favor of a uniform franchise. The best answer to that is, that the Government led by the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) passed the Act adopting provincial franchises; they had the power to make a uniform franchise, but they did not do so. Much has been said about the powers given by the British North America Act to this Parliament to deal with this question. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) properly said that no one disputed the right of this House to deal with it. But I do not see that because we have the power, that is a sufficient excuse for dealing with it at the present time. It has been stated that Local Legislatures in fixing the franchise consider what effect it will have on Dominion elections. I do not believe this is true. They make a franchise for the election for the Local House and do not consider Dominion elections for a moment. The Act of 1874 merely adopts the franchises of the Local Legislatures from time to time. Those Legislatures have no desire, so far as I know, to interfere with the elections of members of the House of Commons. The hon, member for Kent stated last night that the Local Legislatures were not in so favorable a position to know what should be the franchise for elections for the House of Commons as are members of this House. ask this question: Is it unreasonable to suppose that the 38 men who represent the people in the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, together with 21 Legislative Councillors, are not in a better position to judge as to what the franchise of Nova Scotia should be, than a majority of the 21 members who represent that Province in this House. To day six or seven of those members are opposed to the present Government, and to the Bill now before the House. The 14 men who support the Government are in favor of this Bill; and those 14 will actually force upon the 7 members and on the Province of Nova Scotia a franchise which, for all we know, may not be at all suited to the circumstances of the people of that Province for electing members to this House. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tapper) has given an excellent reason why he is not the very best judge as to who should be entrusted with the franchise in Nova Scotia. He has said "hear, hear," to the statement that this law would give miners a vote and increase the voters in Pictou county. Is that an unbiassed opinion, when he is in favor of a law which increases the number of voters in his own county, when he knows that if there is any class of people in Nova Scotia who are in favor of the present Government, it is the miners of that Province? He knows that every one of those men would have voted for him before, and he knows that they will vote for him at the next election.

Mr. TUPPER. Yes, the National Policy.

Mr. VAIL. Yes, they have been led astray by the National Policy; they have been led to believe that the National Policy has given them better prices for their coal and that the Government are doing all they can to favor the miners of Nova Scotia, though they refuse to buy one ton of Nova Scotia coal to heat these or any other buildings, and buy American coal exclusively. I was going on to say that the Nova Scotia Bill gives every person a vote who is in possession of real property of the value of $150. Then every person in the possession of real and personal property together of the value of $300; then the son of every owner or tenant; then the son of every widow-so you see it covers very nearly all those who are enfranchised under the Dominion law. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not so wedded to the Nova Scotia Bill that I would be disposed to object very much to the provisions of this Bill, provided that it did not bring in the Indians, and provided we were given a fair show with regard to the revisers. Our revisers have hitherto been appointed by the municipalities. They both appoint the assessors and revisers. revisors take the assessment roll, and from that as essment roll the revision is made up. They are required to post the roll as in the other Provinces at a certain time, and if any person is wrongfully assessed he has the right of appeal to the revisers court. They receive information, they examine the assessment roll, they are well acquainted with the whole country, and they know the value of the property, so that they are in a good position to say whether a party should be put on or struck off the roll. Every man is given a vote who has a right to vote, and it must be shown very clearly that a man has no right to vote before he is struck off. Now, Mr. Chairman, under this Bill as it was first brought down, the revising officer was not only to revise the list, but he was to make the list in the first instance. The revision of the list would not be worth anything because he made the list in the first place. He was only required to go to the assessment roll for such information as he imagined he required, and then he was to hold his revision court and his decisions were, I may say, final. Now, every-body knows that it is a very rare thing, except in the city of Halifax, to make the appeal really worth anything. At first only appeals in law were to be allowed, but it has now been stated. but it has now been stated by some gentlemen on that side, and I believe it has been agreed, that the appeal shall be allowed in matters of fact as well as in matters of law. But that is not worth anything in consideration of the fact that member for Lincoln read from the Halifax Chronicle the other night, I think it would be pardonable for me to quote from the article to which he referred. He stated that, as this was an Opposition paper, it was a matter of great importance that that paper should have stated that there was very little difference between the Dominion Act and the Act lately introduced in Nova Scotia. If the hon, gentleman had read the whole article-

Mr. RYKERT. I read the whole.-

Mr. VAIL. I think he would have seen plainly what was the opinion of the Chronicle on the subject of this Bill. (The hon, gentleman here read an editorial article from the paper in question.) If the hon. member for Lincoln had read the whole of that article, he would have given us a correct idea of the editor's opinion on this subject; but as he only read a portion it was calculated to deceive the

Mr. RYKERT. Would the hon. gentleman allow me a minute? I simply read that portion of the article in order to show that the Bill would not disfranchise any of the people of Nova Scotia, in reply to an assertion by the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman emphasised strongly that this was the organ of the Opposition, and he put forward the article to show that the franchise under this Bill was more favorable than the provincial franchise. The hon, gentleman, if he thinks the opinion of newspaper editors so important, might have gone a little farther and read from the Morning Herald, of Halifax, which is a Government paper. That paper, before I suppose it got the hint that it was bound to sustain the Bill, said on April 18,

"We have always expressed disapproval of Sir John Macdonald's Franchiss Bill. It may be true as alleged that the people of Quebec are not yet in a condition to justify the abolition of property qualification, but it is not true of the people of Nova Scotia. If the condition of the two Provinces is widely different, why a similate the franchise law. The suffrage will only be uniform in name and not at all in fact, if applied to such different conditions of society."

That is the opinion of the Government organ in Nova Scotia. The franchises are so widely different in the different Provinces that it is impossible, except in name, to have a uniform franchise, even if this measure is passed. Now, a word with regard to what the hon, member for Kent (Mr. Landry) said last night in reference to members of this House being representatives of the whole Dominion. My hon. friend was very patriotic—I am sorry he is not in his seat; he did not know why a member, though elected for a New Brunswick constituency, should be a representative of New Brunswick any more than a representative of British Columbia or Manitoba; because, he said, we were all sitting here as members for the Dominion. One would suppose that ours was a legislative union, and not divided up into Provinces. Why, the whole of this Confederation is made up of Provinces; each Province is allowed so many members, and we come here as the representatives of the several Provinces. Each Province is, by a well established rule, allowed so many members in the Government. I do not pretend to say that a member of the Government should confine his attention to one particular Province, with a desire to get any undue advantage for his own Province; he is to all intents and purposes a member of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, and as such should transact all business in connection with the Government; but he is nevertheless a representative in the Cabinet of the particular Province he comes from, and I venture to say that not a question comes before the Governthat is not worth anything in consideration of the fact that it will always be attended with trouble and expense, and will consequently be of no advantage whatever to the people. I light of its effect on his own Province. The hon member do not very often read from newspapers, but as the hon for Kent said it was nonsense for people to talk about the rights of the several Provinces being violated in this House, and that there was no disposition on the part of the representatives from any Province to ask for more than they were willing to concede to other Provinces. What have we seen in this House? Have we not seen the members for Quebec voting for something for their Province, and directly afterwards voting against extending the same right to Nova Scotia? Have we not seen during this very debate members from Prince Edward Island voting to compel every other Province of the Dominion to accept this law and then moving in favor of Prince Edward Island being exempted from it? Have we not seen them voting against allowing New Brunswick and Quebec the same privilege that they ask for their own Province? Do we not see that those people are considering this question entirely from a provincial standpoint? The people of the Province of Quebec are very tenacious of their rights; they are determined that their autonomy shall be preserved as far as possible; and when this Confederation was formed, the whole basis of representation for the several Provinces of the Dominion was that Quebec should have 65 members forever, and the other Provinces proportionate numbers. If this Dominion is to be a federal union, it must be based upon representation of the Provinces in this way; if it is to be a legislative union, I can understand that provincial lines may be broken down, that the autonomy of the Provinces may be destroyed, and that we may sit here as the representatives of different counties in the Dominion of Canada and not as representatives of different Provinces. Therefore, I take exception to the argument of the hon. member for Kent, because it is contrary to the system under which the government of this country is carried on. In regard to this Bill, you are actually forcing upon the different Provinces a franchise which is distasteful to a large portion of the people, merely because you have the power to do it. It is better to leave the Provincial Legislature to fix the franchise which they know to be most suitable to their particular Province. This can be done without expense, and it leaves the responsibility in the hands of the people. If we are to have responsible government carried out in a way that will be satisfactory to the people of this Dominion, we must allow the people to govern themselves. And I am satisfied if the Government will accept the amendment I have proposed and allow Nova Scotia to elect her members under the provincial franchise that was passed last year, it will be much more satisfactory to the whole Province than this Bill, which, I know, will disfranchise a good many people, notwithstanding it may enfranchise a few who are not so well entitled to the franchise as those who will be deprived of it. It is a very serious matter to disfranchise anybody. The right to vote is a privilege inherent in every citizen in a free country; every young man looks forward to the time when he shall be able to exercise the rights of a citizen. If the law be left as it is in the Province, it will be more satisfactory to the people at large. Considering the position the Government occupy, considering they went to the country before the expiration of their last term, considering the law that was passed making new lines in Ontario in regard to the electoral districts, it would only be a liberal act on their part to let this matter stand as it is at present, until after the next general election. Then, after the country has been informed upon this matter, it could be re-introduced and the Bill be made perfect, which it is far from being at present. It is unfair, it is unjust to undertake to force a Bill of this kind through the House in order to obtain a party advantage at the polls. Supposing my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), when at the head of the Government, had undertaken to pass a measure of this description, what would have been said by hon. gentlemen opposite? A howl would have gone up from them which we would not have heard the last of for ten years. They it took away the right of voting on personal property. Mr. VAIL.

would have carried on the debate for six months before allowing a Bill of this kind to pass. I believe in doing justice to all parties. The Liberal Government, which was led by the hon, member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) took a manly course. They went to the people without passing any Election Act to strengthen their position, and said: Our course has been such that we have a right to claim a renewal of your confidence for the next five years; we are not disposed to make changes in the tariff that we know will, in the end, be injurious to the country, for the sake of getting a temporary advantage and holding power a few years longer; we are determined to stand or fall on the principles we have enun-We were defeated; did we complain? No; we accepted the defeat. We said, we have done our duty; the country has condemned our policy, but the time will very soon come when the people will see and acknowledge their The time has come now, and the Government acknowledges that the time has come by putting that Bill on the Table and asking the House to endorse it. They ask the House to pass that Bill so that they may have an undue advantage at the polls, and for no other reason.

Mr. TUPPER. After the two speeches the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has made upon this question, two speeches grossly inconsistent with each other, and after the very able speech of the hon, member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) in which he dealt with this question upon high ground, it will not be necessary for me to occupy much of the time of the House in order to show that this Bill will be received in Nova Scotia with the greatest satisfaction, from one end of the Province to the other. I say that advisedly. Not only is the principle of this Bill acceptable to the Liberal Conservative party of Nova Scotia and to my friends, to whom the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) specially alluded, but it is, from their own admission, acceptable to the Liberal press, the Grit press of Nova Scotia, and to the Grit party there, if I may claim the utterances of the paper from which the extract was read by the hon, member for Digby as the utterances of that party—and I take it the Chronicle occupies such a position in Nova Scotia in regard to the Liberal party so called, the Grit party, and that it really speaks with more authority than does the hon. gentleman. The authority than does the hon. gentleman. The hon, gentleman read sufficient to show this House that the Liberal party in Nova Scotia admitted, are forced to concede, that this Bill will broaden the franchise to a greater degree than the Bill passed last Session in the Local Legislature. That admission also came from the hon. gentleman's own mouth. He went further than the Chronicle; he stated that the miners, a large and important class in that Province, were to enjoy this high privilege of voting, of expressing their opinions on public questions, questions which affect their interest so closely. I wish to point out to the committee a curious change that has taken place during this very debate in the mind of the member for Digby. Before that article in the Chronicle was written the hon. member, on the 21st April, rose in this House and condemned this Bill because it restricted the franchise. used this language:

"In the Province of Nova Scotia we have a simple franchise which is easily understood: $150 worth of real estate, or $300 of personal property, or $300 or real estate and personal property combined, entitles a man to vote; and that is the whole franchise of Nova Scotia as it stands at present. Now, this Bill, if it is carried through the House, will deprive a considerable number of voters in Nova Scotia of the right to vote for members of this House."

Now either the hon. gentleman did not entertain the view that it would restrict the franchise or he has been educated sufficiently by this article to know that it does not.

Mr. VAIL. Will my hon. friend read on what I did say. I pointed out that it restricted the franchise, inasmuch as I have not time to read the whole Mr. TUPPER. speech. It is in the Hansard, but I may mention that the whole of it has been repeated to-day with certain inconsist-encies which I will point out. What I was about to say was, either the hon. gentleman has not sufficiently studied the Bill or has been whipped into line by this article, because I find at this stage he comes under the taunts that have been thrown across the floor of the House by hon. gentlemen opposite, that sufficient study of the Bill has not been made, since by studying this important question again he has actually confused two clauses of the Bill. He stated here in Parliament, at this late stage of the debate, that the occupancy clause and the income clause went together, and that the income availed no man anything unless he was an owner of real estate. That is a sad admission to come from the hon. member for Digby, but that admission, together with the others, makes it unnecessary for me to do more than point to the paper which he read as showing that there is an extension of the franchise, which that organ hails with pleasure, in an article of the 9th May, 1885. They go on to show in this article that we have dealt with a class not included in the Bill of the Local Legislature, the fishermen, so far as regards their nets and tackle, and the occupants. The hon. member for Digby added another class, the mining class, and he might have gone further and shown that a large proportion of the mechanics throughout that Province will enjoy the same privilege as the miners. The mining class in Nova Scotia is one of the most important portions of the artisan or working classes. They earned on the average, during the last year, over $2 a day. These men are intelligent. They are not such men as he insinuated to-day, who could be deluded by political agents or by any party to a greater extent than other men. He insinuated to-day that we had deluded those men in connection with the National Policy and had made them believe that it would benefit them and the Province, and I judge that his conclusion, in opposing their admission to the franchise, was that therefore they should not be permitted to vote, because they would still record their votes in fa or of that policy and in favor of myself as a representative of the County of Pictou. That is a novel reason why any class in the community should be deprived of the franchi e, and I am afraid that, under the broadest franchise in Canada to-day, there would be very few voters if all who approved of the National Policy were to be disfranchised. The hon, gentleman quoted a small extract from the Halifax Herald to show that that paper, being in the interests of the Conservative party of Nova Scotia, opposed the Franchise Bill, but he knows that the only ground on which that paper has disapproved of this Bill is that it does not go far enough. That paper, like the hon. gentleman, if I can take what he has said to-day as his real opinion, prefers universal suffrage to the legislation proposed by this Bill, and it would have been only candid for the hon. member, who read a lesson to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), for not reading the whole article which he quoted, to have read some of the articles in that paper in which they say explicitly that their opposition is grounded on the fact that this Bill does not grant universal suffrage. It is apparent to most hon, gentlemen that this Bill has extended the franchise to such an extent that the number of people excluded from its operations will be very few indeed. Some years ago, the present leader of the Opposition, when occupying a position in the Local Legislature of Ontario, made a speech in reference to a Bill which proposed to reduce the property qualification in townships and villages from $500 to $200. A motion was made to still further reduce it to $100, and my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island and all of us from Nova Scotia can take heart in reading certain language used by the hon, gentleman on that occasion. He said:

"No one could be more disposed than he was to say that, while we are adopting the property qualification as a necessary ingredient in the right to the franchise, we should see that the property qualification was not raised so high as to prevent those who had a substantial stake in the country in the property they held from exercising the franchise; but we should remember, with reference to this branch of legislation, that, while it was easy to go down, it was impossible to go up. A step in the direction of that which the hon. member for Middlesex proposed to take was a step practically irrevocable. When once they reduced the franchise, they would not find any man, or at least any number of men, bold enough to propose to raise it. It might be that, in a very few cases in townships and villages, there might be a man intelligent enough to exercise the franchise who was the owner of a lot and house in which he resided worth no more than $200, but this must be a God-forsaken part of the country, and the domicile must be of a peculiar description."

No one will say that there is any God-forsaken part of Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia.

"The hon. memher for Middlesex said he would like to give the franchise to every man whose name was upon the roll. That was what we were coming to if, without cause shown, we were going to reduce the property qualification one-half. He thought, if hon gentlemen opposite had acted wisely, they would have kept up the franchise in cities to $500. If they had done so, we would not have found the hon. gentleman now urging this downward course."

No doubt the hon, gentleman has changed his opinion upon that subject, and is not so averse to the broadening of the franchise as he then was, but that is language used by an hon. gentleman of as great weight then as now, and we cannot be charged with doing such outrageous things if our Bill has gone no further than the hon. gentleman said it should go at that time. I do not know that it has been mentioned in this debate, that, just as the Chronicle, the organ in Nova Scotia, a year or two ago, so the Globe, the organ in Ontario, a year or two after that speech of the hon. gentleman, stated that this Parliament should proceed to regulate its own franchise and to make one franchise for theDominion of Canada. therefore fail to understand this extraordinary excitement that has been worked up, not in the country, though an effort has been made in that direction, but in one corner of this House. I fail also to understand this indignation and excitement, occause, it seems to me, that we are not making a jump from the provisions in the British North America Act, to which allusion has so often been made. We have come gradually down to the position we are taking to-day in fixing a uniform franchise for the Dominion, because I find that Parliament has already legislated and fixed upon a qualification for the members of this House. It has regulated the mode of those elections. We know that open voting prevails in one Province of this Dominion; why, then, do hon. gentlemen not say that in the Province of Manitoba, which says not only who shall vote, but how people shall vote-why do they not come forward and say that in Manitoba, Dominion elections shall be by open voting?—as that is the mode which prevails in the local elections in that Province. But in the Dominion elections the Dominion law lays down a different mode of procedure, and dictates to the proud people of Manitoba how they shall record their votes. We also find that by the Dominion law, parties are disfranchised in the different Provinces, judges for instance. We find also that this Parliament already has enfranchised a particular class in the Province of Nova Scotia, the Intercolonial Railway officials. Now, on the passage of these different provisions, I can find no record of a debate of this character. I think it singular that this storm should burst so suddenly upon us; but there may have been storms on the passage of these various Acts, which have passed away and are now forgotten, as I believe this storm will pass away and be forgotten in a few years hence. I take it, we are only now going, step by step, in the direction contemplated by the British North America Act. We have taken many steps, and have regulated the mode of our elections, and have said who shall be representatives in this Chamber, and we are further enlarging the provision already in this Act, in regard to how the lists shall be made up. Now, in regard to the appointment of revisers' we know that as this Bill broadens the franchise in so many Provinces, and goes far beyond the assessors' list, once you admit the principle of the Bill to be correct, and once you admit the qualifications for voters to be correct, you must of necessity make a provision for revisers, or some other parties, to prepare the lists. It is impossible to take the assessment list, because that list will not contain the names of voters to be enfranchised by this Bill. Therefore you have your choice. Will you delegate to the municipalities the right to appoint special officers? I say the preparation of such a list, as is contemplated by this Act, is not within the duties of local municipalities. take it that, if this Parliament chooses to leave these matters to the municipalities, it has power to do so; but I, for one, do not see any reason why we should not appoint our own officers in this connection, as well as in connection with any other legislation passed by this House. I also find another objection on the score of expense. Well, when the Ballot Act was introduced there was an additional expense caused by the change from open voting. Will any hon gentleman deny that an additional expense was incurred by the introduction of the ballot system? Because more machinery was necessary, and when you have more machinery you have more expenses. Once having admitted the general principle to be right, that it was in the interests of the country to adopt a ballot system in place of open voting, no man will stoop to the argument that the fact that it would entail additional expense was sufficient reason for not adopting the change. I think that argument is puerile, and it exactly applies to the question of expense under this Bill.

Mr. VAIL. My hon: friend, in pointing out my inconsistencies, referred to a speech I made a few days ago. This is what I said, and I think it fully bears out what I said to-day:

"In the Province of Nova Scotia we have a simple franchise which is easily understood; $150 worth of real estate or $300 of personal property, or $300 of real estate and personal property combined, entitles a man to vote; and that is the whole franchise of Nova Scotia, as it stands at present. Now, this Bill, if it is carried through the House, will deprive a considerable number of voters in Nova Scotia of the right to vote for members of this House. The measure is largely based upon the principle of the ownership of real estate. It is not intended to give any man a vote who possesses personal property only, no matter how much it may amount to."

That is all I said with reference to the Bill, and it is just in accordance with what I said to-day.

Mr. KIRK. I desire to say a few words in favor of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and several other hon, gentlemen who have spoken on the opposite side of the House have taken up a great deal of time in discussing the constitutionality of this measure, in affirming the right of this Parliament to pass a Franchise Bill. I think it was altogether unnecessary for them to do so, because that right is admitted by both parties in this House. The fact that Parliament has this right is shown by the legislation in which this Parliament undertook to regulate the franchise of the different Provinces years ago, especially the franchise of Nova Scotia. In 1871 the Novia Scotia Legislature enacted a law by which all railway Customs, and many other officials of the Dominion were disfranchised, as well as officials of the Local Government. This Government undertook to say by Act of Parlia ment that those electors who were so disfranchised should have the right to vote for members of this Parliament. By that Act the Dominion Parliament showed its power to deal with the electoral franchise. The action of the Nova Scotia Government was similar to action previously taken by the Ontario and Quebec Legislatures. The pretension with respect to uniform franchise goes to the winds. While we admit the right of this Parliament to pass the proposed Bill, we deny the expediency of doing so. The local franchises which have existed so long without any complaints being made by any Province should still prevail. The hon, member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), says this Bill will be hailed with great satisfaction by the Liberals of Nova Scotia; that the Grit press hail with pleasure this Bill because it enlarges the franchise. The hon, member said the Morning Chronicle admitted that this Bill gave a more liberal franchise than the Bill passed by the Nova Scotia Legislature. I admit that the Chronicle says it would like to see the Provincial Franchise Bill more liberal but it did not say that this Bill under discussion is a more liberal Bill than the one passed in the Nova Scotia Legislature. I desire to show that this Bill restricts the franchise as compared with the local law of Nova Scotia. The local law gives a vote to every owner of real estate to the value of $150, also to every man owning personal property to the value of $300, or to anyone owning personal and real estate amounting to $300. This Bill gives a vote to an owner of real estate to the value of $150, but it does not take personal property into account. Under this Bill fishermen will be disfranchised to a large extent. Take a fisherman who owns a small farm to the value of not more than $150 or $200. He is allowed to come in with his boat and tackle but he is not allowed to count in any other personal property. Therefore his sons will not have votes. A fisherman may own a small vessel worth $1,000. That cannot count for his sons or for himself under the present Bill. Under the Nova Scotia law if a fisherman owns such a vessel it will give a vote to himself and to his three sons, if he has that number. It has been said that the income from the vessel would give the fisherman the right to vote. I do not see that it is so. Suppose the fisherman sent the vessel to sea with captain and crew and there were no profits received, how would the case stand? He would have no vote on that account under this Bill. But under the Nova Scotia law he and his sons would have votes if the vessel did not earn a dollar. Take again the franchise in cities. Under the Nova Scotia law every man having $150 worth of property has a vote; but under this Bill he must own property to the value of $300. In towns, a merchant may own a small store and have sufficient real estate to give him a vote. He may have two sons, and a stock of goods worth $1,000. Under the Nova Scotia law he and his two sons would have votes. Under this Bill the trader only would have a vote. I say, in view of these facts, this Bill does not enlarge the franchise. It is said that this Bill gives a vote on income. In Nova Scotia we have no income tax; how then can the reviser ascertain the amount of income earned by the people? The revising officer must travel round in order to obtain that knowledge. If that is to be the case the expense will be very great. Hon. members have talked about $500,000 as the probable expense of making out the voters' lists annually; but if the revising barristers have to travel over every county to ascertain the amount of income received by the people, it will take double that amount to pay their expenses. It will require $1,000,000 per annum to pay the expenses of making out the lists. Then it was said that any man owning a vessel would be entitled to vote under this clause. I maintain that the clause does not read so. It reads:

"Derives an income from some trade, office, calling, or profession, or from some investment or charge on real property in Canada."

He cannot have a vote if his income is on personal property instead of real property.

Mr. KINNEY. Yes, he can.

Mr. KIRK. I think not; the investment must be a charge on real property.

Mr. KINNEY. An investment of any kind.

Well, I am not a lawyer, nor is the gentle-Mr. KIRK. man who contradicts me.

Does the hon gentleman mean to say Mr. DAVIES. that any investment will give a man a vote?

Mr. KINNEY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. Money invested in a savings bank?

Mr. KINNEY. I say that under this clause as it reads, a man who did not hold real estate at all might still have a

Mr. DAVIES. Under what word in the clause would you bring in a man owning a ship?

Mr. KINNEY. I do not say anything about a ship, but I say that there can be a vote on personal as well as real property.

Mr. KIRK. I am arguing as to the men having ships, and I say that a man may have $400 income from investment in a vessel, and under the Bill he would not have a vote, because the money must be invested in the particular way described in the Bill. The hon. member for Pictou said that the franchise under this Bill would largely increase the votes of the miners of Nova Scotia. I deny that it does. I say that the law of Nova Scotia passed last year is more liberal to the miners of Nova Scotia than the present Bill, and for this reason. The Nova Scotia law gives a vote to any man who is in occupation of property worth $150. Now it is a very poor house indeed, in the coal regions of Nova Scotia which is not worth $150, and if he is in possession of such a house for one year, even if he does not pay one dollar rent, he is entitled to a vote. Under this Bill, however, he must pay $20 a year rent, and he must, I suppose, satisfy the revising officer that he has paid the rent, by producing the land-lord's receipt. Now, I ask if a man who occupies a house worth $150 is not better entitled to a vote, and if he does not obtain it on easier terms than the man who actually pays $20 a year rent; and who must be prepared on election day at the polls to swear that the rent was actually paid? The franchise of the farmers is also restricted in this Bill, and I do not think there is a single class in Nova Scotia as to which the franchise is more liberal in this Bill than the local law, unless it is in the matter of income, and even as to that the difficulty of obtaining the amount of income would be so great that the law would be entirely a dead letter. One hon, gentleman said that this Bill would enfranchise a great many teachers in Nova Scotia. I dare say there are some teachers in towns and cities who receive larger salaries than $400, but the teachers in country places do not receive anything like that amount, and so they would not be enfranchised. Still in that particular case—the income voters—and in that case alone, is this Bill more Bill restricts the franchise in some respects, it is proposed to make it up in others—to make it up by the enfranchisement of the Indian. For the first time in the history of this or any other country the Indians are to be enfranchised. I need say nothing at all about the conditions of the Indians of Nova Scotia, for there is no man here who knows anything about them, who does not know that they are uneducated, illiterate and ignorant, and that they are not a desirable class to enfranchise. Besides, they are under the direct control of the Government, and will feel in duty bound to vote for the Government under any circumstances. I maintain that under this Bill all the Indians on a reservation will be entitled to vote, if the reservation as a whole is of sufficient value to give them votes. Then, Sir, we are to have the voters' lists made up by the nominee of the Government. At the present time, in our Province, they are made up by the municipal councils, who are elected by the people, free from political influence, because in our Province we have I cannot see why, unless the Government want to control the no political strife in running our municipal elections. If those hon, gentlemen on the other side wish to make a noise I will wait till they are through.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Hon. gentlemen will please keep

Mr. KIRK. The voters' list is made up from the assessment roll. A board of four assessors are appointed by the municipal council, and one or more members of the board travel through the district, see the property, and take an inventory of the property, and then the four meet and value it.

Mr. DAVIES. I think we might take the sense of the House, Mr. Chairman, as to these noisy interruptions. The hon, gentleman speaks very seldom, and it is very unfair and ungenerous in those who do not wish to hear him to give him this treatment.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Hon. gentlemen will please keep order.

Mr. KIRK. These hon, gentlemen talk about obstructing the business of the House. I wonder who are the obstructionists. I was proceeding to say that the board of assessors value the property irrespective altogether of the right of the owners to vote. Before they proceed to their work they are sworn to value the property at its actual cash value. From the assessment roll made up in this way the reviser's list is made up by three appointed by the municipal council also, and that list is made up irrespective of political influences. I have scarcely ever heard of any trouble in regard to political influence being brought to bear on the revisers; they are allowed to act according to their best judgment without interference from any person; and these men are appointed, so far as I know, from both sides of politics, so that there is no liability of any difficulty arising from a political cause. The fact that when the Franchise Bill was amended in the Nova Scotia Legislature last Session, and fully discussed by members on both sides of the House, not one solitary word was said against the principle on which these lists were made up by any hon. gentleman in that House, ought to be pretty good evidence that the people of Nova Scotia are satisfied with the system of making up the electoral lists. But this system is to be changed. We are to have the making of the electoral lists placed in the hands of a nominee of the Government, who may base his valuations on the assessment roll or may value the property just as he pleases, and place whom he pleases on the list or leave off whom he pleases. The revising barrister sits in but one place in the electoral district. In my county he will probably sit in the town of Guysboro, the shire town of the county. There is more than one polling district in that county which is 80 miles from Guysboro', and I would like to know if any elector in liberal than the present Nova Scotia franchise. But if the that county will go to the trouble of travelling 80 miles in order to see that his name is on the list, even though he knows he is left off; and we do not know how many names will be left off, either accidentally or purposely. Why should the Government ask to have their own nominee do this work, unless they want to be in a position to control entirely the electoral lists and elect whom they please to this House? On that ground I object to this Bill. I believe the electoral lists should be kept away from the control of the Government as much as possible; I think the Government should not want to interfere or to assume any advantage over the Opposition. I oppose this measure also on the ground of expense. At present the electoral lists cost the Government nothing; they are made ready to hand, and made as fairly and as well as it is possible for a revising barrister to make them; and why not use those lists? Why want to change a system which has given such universal satisfaction to the people of this Dominion?

whole affair. I believe that is the main object the Government have in view in pressing this Bill through the House; they wish to get control of the electors of this country. This Bill, to my mind, has a wrong title. I stead of its being entitled "A Bill respecting the Electoral Franchise," it should be entitled "A Bill to elect Tory members to Parliament," because that is just what it is and what it will be, and for these reasons I oppose it, and shall vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail).

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I should apologise for trespassing upon the time of the Honse, only that I desire to make a few observations relative to the remarks made by my hon, friend from Nova Scotia. I do not regret that the electoral franchises of the different Provinces have been separately submitted to this House, because the contrast which the discussion has shown to the committee proves conclusively that the discussion relative to the smaller Provinces is much more moderately conducted than when the franchise of Ontario is under consideration. My hon. friend from Guysboro still maintains that the franchise of Nova Scotia is not extended by this Bill. The Morning Chronicle, the organ of the Liberal party in its issue of the 7th instant admits that it is an extension of the franchise in Nova Scotia even beyond the franchise provided in the Bill lately introduced into the Local Legislature. But what I desire to call particular attention to is the very strong feeling that exists in this House on the franchise. My hon friend from Kent, N.B., referred to the irritation that existed in language both forcible and suggestive. I have seen in the London Advertiser of the 5th of May:

"The Reformers of the House of Commons, in their gallant struggle will have the sympathy of all fair-minded men. Sir John, insolent and defiant, paraded his brute strength, and boasted of his power. Were he allowed, he would crush the Reform party out of existence as ruthlessly as he would take the life of a snake. But he has been made to whine. He has felt that there is force of brains that can be used against the force of numbers. The Reformers can compel the withdrawal of the diabolical measure, and they will do so."

Such language used by the organs of a great political party in this Dominion is calculated to create a great deal of mischief. Such appeals to the prejudices of the people have been the cause of the rebellion in the North-West Territories, and if these appeals continue to be made to the prejudices of the Province of Ontario, I fear we will have a rebellion nearer home. Not only has the Advertiser appealed to the prejudices of the people of Ontario, but I find in the Toronto Globe of 2nd May the following passage:-

"It is hard to say what the next few hours will bring forth. The indignation of the people is rising. The gallant band at Ottawa will not be left without support. They have the sympathy of every respectable man in the country, Conservative as well as Liberal. Public opinion would support the sending to Ottawa of a delegation of five thousand citizens entrusted with the duty of preventing, by any constitutional means, the injustice now sought to be perpetrated.

Such appeals if made to our people in the Maritime Provinces would, I fear, end in a rupture of the Dominion, but it appears to have been the practice of the past in the older Provinces of Canada to make similar appeals. They have been in the past the cause of dead locks resulting in the impossibility of governing Canada during the union of Upper and Lower Canada, and I fear that unless these appeals made to the prejudice of the people are thwarted by the representatives of the people in the Dominion Parliament, the existence of Confederation will not be any more lasting. The reason why I am glad that the franchises of the several Provinces should be submitted for the consideration of this House is simply because there is a variation which is rather refreshing. I find the Bill under consideration is discussed from the point of view of each one's constituency from which every member in this House should discuss it. Before the question of the franclise to the several Provinces, apart from the whole Dominion, was admitted, Mr. KIRK.

in this Dominion, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia. If there were no other why we should have a franchise absolutely, within the control of the Dominion Parliament, the evidence is in the irritation that existed in this House during the discussion on this measure. Each representative holds his own peculiar views as to who should be and who should not be disenfranchised, who should and who should not have a vote in his own constituency. While we differ as to the qualifica-tion necessary, I think we should, as sensible men, agree that this Dominion should have the control of its own franchise. I would say that for the municipal council every intelligent British subject over 21 years of age, who is subjected to taxation by the municipal councils, should have a vote for members of the municipal councils; for the same reason, I should say every person who is directly or indirectly taxed by the Local Legislature ought to have a voice in returning representatives to the Local Legislature; and for the same reason I should consider it but proper and just that every person who is taxed by the Dominion Parliament, who is over 21 years of age, and is a British subject, ought to have a voice in returning representatives to this Parliament. But whether we differ on that subject or not, we ought all to agree that this House should have full control of the franchises for the Dominion Parliament. My hon, friend from Digby (Mr. Vail) has compared the Franchise Bill lately passed by the Local Legislature, during the last Session of Parliament, with the Franchise Bill which is now under our consideration. I submit that is hardly a fair comparison. He should have compared with this Franchise Bill, the franchise under which members of Parliament from Nova Scotia were returned in 1882 to the House of Commons. If he compares the measure now before the House with the Franchise Bill of 1882, under which we were returned from the several counties of Nova Scotia to this Parliament, he will find that this Bill gives a very largely extended franchise to that Province. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that in my own county it will extend the franchise to at least 750 people, as compared with the election law of 1882. My hon, friend from Digby said that the members of this House should go back to the same electors as returned them. I would ask how is it possible for us, who were returned on the electoral franchise of 1882, one very different from that now existing in Nova Scotia, to go back to the same electors? The hon, gentleman must know that the franchise is now very materially extended from what it was in 1882, and even now we cannot be sure that we will have to go back to the electors that are at present entitled, under a very anomalous Bill, to return members from Nova Scotia. I have only a few words more to add in reference to some comments made on my former speech by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. on the 5th instant, the hon. member said I had stated that the object of the Bill was not to secure uniformity at all. (See Debates, page 1812.) I cannot conceive how he could have gathered that from my remarks. I will read the words which I used. (See Debates, page 1684.) I listened also with a great deal of attention and patience to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) who referred to my argument on the right of this Parliament to pass the Franchise Bill, but said we had also the power to say that no man over 21 years of age or with blue eyes or red hair should have the right to vote, but that we were not called upon to exercise that power. I think I can show, from his own philosophical reasoning, that we should adopt a franchise for the Dominion Parliament. The Local Legislatures have also power to say that no man over 21 years old or with blue eyes or red hair shall vote. It has been repeatedly stated by hon, gentlemen opposite that this is I fancied that there were only seven constituencies a great political war between two great political generals, the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of the Dominion. Let us suppose that the Premier of Ontario passed a law which would only give votes to philosophers. Does not my hon. friend from Bothwell know that such philosophers would only vote for Grit members for the House of Commons. and that would unquestionably annihilate the Conservative vote from Ontario? It would be a most dangerous thing to permit any legislature, without our knowledge or consent, to so frame a franchise as to keep out of this Parliament all representatives who were not in accord with them. The franchise should have a uniform basis if possible, with a voters' list on which the names of all those who are entitled to vote should be placed, and no others. The present Bill provides an excellent franchise. It is true that the agitation against a revising barrister reached the far distant county of Inverness, and I hold in my hand a petition in reference to it, and, as petitions have been presented against the Franchise Bill, I think this is an appropriate time for me to present this one.

"We, the undersigned warden and councillors of the municipality of Inverness, beg respectfully to recommend to our Dominion representative and to the Government of Canada the appointment to office of revising barrister for this municipality under the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885, of John L. McDougall, of Mabov, Esq., barrister."

This petition is signed by sixteen municipal councillors, by every Grit municipal councillor in Inverness. except one, and I believe by nearly every municipal councillor who was present in council on the 5th instant. The reason for the recommendation is evi-The council would not be in session again until some time in January next, and no other opportunity would present itself to its members to send a recommendation to their representative in the Dominion Parliament. They therefore took this course to recommend a person for the revisal of the electoral lists in the same way as they recommend revisers for the local lists in Nova Scotia, and I think, if there is any evidence required, this furnishes ample proof that, in the country of Inverness, the principle of having a Dominion franchise under the control of this Government has been approved of. The person who is recommended was, at the last general election, a very strong opponent of mine. He is a person of considerable ability, and exercises a good deal of influence. He has been recommended by the municipal council, and although an opponent of mine, I do not see any reason why, if this Bill becomes law, I should not recommend him to the favorable consideration of the Government. I have a good deal of confidence in him; I have a similar amount of confidence in every lawyer in the shire town which I have the honor to represent, who has been in practice for five years; and I believe that when under oath, they would prepare an honest circural list. I am astonished to hear hon gentlemen from the Province of Ontario say that they have so little faith in the honesty of purpose of the legal profession of that great Province. From the way they talk one would almost believe that there is not an honest man in the legal profession of Ontario; but from my personal acquaintance with hon, gentlemen from Ontario, on both sides of the House, who are lawyers, I do not think they are as bad as they represent each other to be.

Mr. BLAKE. An hon. member has alluded to a speech I made years ago, in the Legislature of Ontario, which obliges me to say one word. The observations I addressed to the Legislature of Ontario on that occasion were specially directed to a proposed franchise based upon property, but not at all with regard to what the proper considerations for a franchise ought to be. As long ago as 1874, I publicly proposed, in reference to a franchise based upon property, the adoption, first of all, of a household suffrage, entirely irrespective of value; secondly, that of a farmers' son's franchise, in respect of which farmers' sons had themselves no interest in the property; and thirdly, I wish to say that upon the same occasion, now eleven years ago. I stated my own view that the true basis of a suffrage was not upon property at all, but that it was that which I stated in my speech on the second reading of this Bil:—citizenship, residence, and intelligence.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Vail) negatived. Yeas, 67; nays, 39.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think it is possible to provide an uniform franchise for the Dominion unless by a different method from that proposed by the Bill. I do not see that it would be possible to have any sort of uniform suffrage for the Dominion, unless the suggestion embodied in the notice of motion of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is adopted, namely, that of universal suffrage. I contend that nothing short of universal suffrage will provide an uniform franchise for the Dominion. It has been pointed out that the principle of uniformity is already broken, in that we have Indian suffrage in some Provinces, while in others, the same class of Indians, namely, residents on reserves, are not to be allowed to vote. It has been pointed out that we have, under this Bill, a special fancy franchise for the fishermen of the eastern Provinces. which does not apply at all to Ontario, and to only a small extent to some parts of the province of Quebec; which will not apply at all to Manitoba, and which will have very little application to British Columbia. We are, then, already far away from the principle of an uniform franchise I contend, therefore, that the question before us is not so much whether we should have an uniform franchise for the Dominion, which this Bill does not give, as whether we should have the particular franchise proposed in this Bill. It is worthy of discussion, however, whether we should even attempt to provide an uniform franchise for all the Provinces. It is admitted on all hands, it has been stated ad nauseam, that we have power to create a Dominion Franchise. As I recollect the wording of the constitution, it does not say that such Franchise should necessarily be an uniform one; but that this House should have the right to settle the franchise upon which members of the House of Commons should be elected. As the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has pointed out, we have already done that. It is part of the statute law of Canada, that whatever franchise should be adopted from time to time by each Province should be the franchise on which the representatives to the House of Commons from that Province should be elected. Therefore, at the present time by a statutory provision, and under the constitutional provision to which I have referred, the Dominion Franchise is that of each Province individually, and every person who is enfranchised by the Act of the Provincial Legislature has become, ever since 1874, a voter at elections for members of this House. We have to consider therefore, not primarily whether such and such persons or classes should be enfranchised, but whether any of those who already possess the franchise should loose it. The proposal before us is one to disfranchise a number of people who already possess the right to vote, and to give that power to others who do not now possess it. The question is much graver than it would be if we were now in the early days of Confederation and a franchise Bill were proposed. It is a much graver act to take away the franchise from people who already enjoy it than to settle who shall possess it when the question of the basis of the franchise first comes before Parliament. It was never contemplated, when that provision was placed in our constitution, that a step of this sort should be taken. It was contemplated that the Dominion should take some steps to say who should be voters at Dominion elections; but it was never contemplated that this House should restrict the Provincial franchises already existing. No such precedent can be found in either English or Canadian practice. We, on this side of the sentative government has been so fully developed as to House, have urged that the people should be consulted before such an important change is made. We have been answered that Mr. Gladstone effected a sweeping change in the franchise in Great Britain without consulting the people, and that Mr. Mowat did the same thing in Ontario. But in each case no restriction of the franchise resulted from the measure adopted. I am aware that point has been disputed, but I will prove it later on. The Mowat Government went to the people with the extension of the franchise as a plank of their platform, in 1883, The people returned that Government to power, in spite of thousands of arguments sent out from this capital, which the pockets of contractors supplied; but, in spite of the golden arguments, and the precious documents supplied by those individuals, the people returned the Mowat Government to power, largely, no doubt, on the ground that they proposed to extend the franchise. They carried out that pledge. The franchise has been extended; and it involved an extension of the franchise for elections to this House. It is now proposed, without an appeal being made to the people, to take away from the people whom the Mowat Act has enfranchised the franchise they now legally possess, for Dominion elections. Such a proposal is a constitutional revolution, or rather an unconstitutional change in the constitution. It might more properly be called a coup d'état. It is a proposal to place the whole basis of the franchise and the machinery of registra-tion in the hands of the Government. If that is not a revolution in the constitution, a coup d'état and a usurpation of power, by violent means, I do not know what proceedings could be described by such language. It is an attack, not only on the rights of the Provinces, but on the principles of representative and constitutional government on which our whole parliamentary system is based. I say, Sir, it is utterly inconsistent with any conception of representative institutions, it is utterly inconsistent with the idea of representing the people at all, that the right to say who shall be represented, who shall be the voters, shall be assumed by the Government-I do not say merely by this Government, but whatever Government is in power. It would just be as absurd, as unconstitutional and as unjust, to enact that a Reform Government who might be in power should say who were to be the electors for this House, as to say that the present Government should have that power. And, Sir, I must repeat the warning which has already been given to their confrères by some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who have chosen to act independently in this matter, the warning, namely, that they must look to the future and see how they would like this Bill, if it were in the power of every Grit candidate in Ontario, or any other Province, to say who should make up the voters' list for that constituency—if it was in the power of that candidate to take the position of revising officer, make up the list himself for that constituency, and then resign that office and present himself to those electors he had created by his own fiat. Hon. members, when they look forward to that prospect, will be able to realise our position, and how we feel at the prospect of our opponents in each riding in the Dominion being able to make up the jury list which is to try our case -able to make up the list of electors to whom we have to present ourselves, and to decide in advance in every riding, except in those in which there is an overwhelming Reform majority, who shall be the member in that particular riding. We are charged with obstructing a Bill of this character, as if it were a discredit to us. We are told that the minority have no right to resist the majority. I do not know where they get those principles of constitutional government. They do not come from British practice, from Canadian practice or from the practice of the United States. I do not know in what other countries the science of repre-

afford a wholesome precedent, but in these three countries they can find no precedent for the assertion that the minority should never seek to hinder the will of the majority from becoming law. There is no precedent for that assertion in the text books or proceedings of any Legislative Assembly. There is no justification for that assertion, either in common sense, logic, or fair play. For what purpose are the rules of parliamentary debate arranged? For the express and declared purpose of protecting the minority from the tyranny of the majority. If the majority were able to say, at any time; "there is no use discussing this question any further; our minds are made up, and we may as well vote now and we will vote now "-representative government would becomes a farce. It would become merely what the independent member from King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) would make it, according to his own statement, a machine for the registering of those acts which the Government have already decided upon, and which the Government, forsooth, say should become law. I say that the forms of parliamentary debate have been expressly arranged to allow the minority to protest, to hinder and delay the progress of measures through the House, until those measures have been fully discussed, until the country has had time to pronounce on those measures, until, in fact, it has been ascertained beyond doubt that the Government does represent the will of the country with regard to those particular measures. There are cases, undoubtedly, in which obstruction would be mere factiousness. have seen instances of that sort here. We have seen them in the British House of Commons. But to say that if we had systematically obstructed this Bill from the first moment in which it was proposed, our obstruction would have been factious, is to say that for which there is no justification in constitutional precedent or plain common sense. It is a matter of fact, known to every hon. gentleman, that, with the exception of those occasions on which they insisted on keeping the House sitting at hours when discussion was impossible, this Bill has been discussed—not obstructed, but discussed—but I say that even if we had decided to systematically obstruct, by every means which the forms of parliamentary debate allowed to us, at each stage of this Bill, we would have had ample justification, in the nature of the Bill itself, and the public feeling existing with regard to it throughout the country. When the Government proposes to do that which will destroy representative institutions, which will disfranchise those who sent them and us here, when they propose to make free discussion in future Parliaments an impossibility, I say it would be justifiable for us to use every legal and parliamentary means to prevent that measure becoming law. I do not say we will do that; I do not say it will be necessary. We have great hopes yet that amendments such as have been made or may yet be made in the Bill may make it something tolerable, but I say if we were forced to adopt that course, we would be justified by British constitutional precedent and by public opinion in this Dominion at large. Let these hon, gentlemen go back to the people whom the Bill proposes to disfranchise. Let them say that the Grits are obstructing the will of the majority, are putting representative institutions on their trial, are making parliamentary institutions a farce-tell them that-

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear.

The hon, member for Inverness says "hear, hear," and to do him justice he has occupied as much time as any Grit in the House. But I say, tell the people who are going to be disfranchised that we are obstructing this Bill, and they will say: We honor you for it. They will say: Those men are fighting for the rights and liberties of the people, for the existing law, and we do not care whether they are retarding the will of the majority--whether they are preventing a tyrannical majority from carrying their measures or not; we honor and respect them, and if the franchise is left to us, we will vote for them at the next election. I hope hon gentlemen will use that cry in every riding in the Dominion where the franchise is going to be restricted. I hope they will make every elector in those ridings believe that we have been using every effort to prevent the passage of an Act which will deprive them of the franchise which they now enjoy. I say we have not obstructed this Bill. We have only talked loosely and largely, at times when discussion was really impossible, but I am quite willing that they should make every elector in the Province of Ontario believe, if they choose, that we have obstructed the Bill, and I am willing to take the consequences. I should infinitely rather be published throughout the length and breadth of the Province as one who assisted in obstructing this tyrannical and corrupt measure, than have it known through my riding that I had sat, as the vast majority of those on the other side have sat, silent, dumb dogs, sent here to guard the interests of their constituents, and so far neglecting their duty as to sit still, without a word of explanation or defence, and see the franchise of their constituents taken from them by this Bill. We are willing to take the risk of being charged with obstruction. Are hon gentlemen opposite all willing to take the risk of unpatriotic silence?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. 1 except my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron). He has done more than most supporters of the Government towards the discussion of this Bill; he is a man who, evidently, wishes to enlighten us on tho subject; but we have had no light from those gentlemen in front of me. If there is any desence for this Bill we have not had it from them. We have had to look to their organs for the line of defence which they wished to be taken. They say that we are in darkness—that we do not understand the provisions of the measure. Why do they not explain them to us? Why do they not show us the beauties of the Bill? Because they feel that there are no beauties in it, and that their safest policy is "least said soonest mended." We have not had two explanations from hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken that have agreed with each other. The hon, member for King's, N.B (Mr. Foster) said that he was in favor of the Bill because it largely extended the franchise, and that he was "in favor of going as far as he could towards enfranchising the citizens in the Dominion." Suppose that is his position on the franchise question; where would it lead him? It would lead him to oppose the application of this Bill to the Province of New Brunswick, to the Province of Ontario, to the Province of Prince Edward Island and to the Province of British Columbia - in all of which Provinces it greatly restricts the franchise. An hon, gentleman asks me if he will do it. I doubt it very much. I doubt if he will oppose a single item or clause in this Bill. I have no doubt he regards it as the pink of perfection—as going just as far and no farther than a Bill ought to go, in extending the franchise. I have already pointed out that another member from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Northumberland, has, through his newspaper, expressed ideas the very opposite of those of the hon member for King's, and has declared that this Bill does not go nearly far enough; that he advocates manhood suffrage, and that he thinks it is bad policy on the part of the Premier to force such a Bill as this upon his unwilling supporters. There we have two supporters of the Government who have given their views; and have they enlightened us on the Bill? Not at all. They have taken opposite lines. Other gentlemen have spoken, and not two of them have taken the same line in regard to the Bill. Each has found a different reason for supporting it, drawn from some real or fancied necessity of his own particular Province. Now, it is very doubtful if we should accept the proposition of the hon, member for Northumberland to extend the franchise to every citizen over twenty-one years of age. There is some room for doubt as to whether we should adopt even an extension of the franchise without consulting the existing electors. I am quite prepared to express my opinion upon it when the proper time comes. But when a proposal is brought forward to take the franchise from those who already have it. I can have no hesitation in saying that it is unconstitutional, un-British, un-French, unfair, to adopt it, without consulting those from whom we are proposing to take the franchise, as to whether they are willing to part with it or not. I repeat, then, what I said this afternoon, that the Government should take the advice of the Mail newspaper; let them go to the country and ask the advice of the people on this measure, as they profess to have the majority of the people with them. We are willing to submit to that arbitration. Whatever the people may think of their general policy we believe that we have a majority of the people with us against this Bill, and we believe it from the bottom of our hearts. One thing has become quite manifest from this discussion, that in the attempt to enforce a uniform franchise throughout the Dominion it is impossible to suit every Province. Some of the Conservatives from Quebec have complained that this Bill is too liberal; the Reformers of Ontario have complained that it is too restrictive; both parties from Prince Edward Island have complained that it is too restrictive; British Columbia we have not heard from yet. The Bill is opposed in Quebec because it seems likely to lead to manhood suffrage; it is opposed in Ontario because it does not go far enough in the direction of manhood suffragebecause the views of the Conservatives of Ontario, as expressed by their votes in the Local House in favor of manhood suffrage for that Province, have not been carried out in the Bill; it is opposed by both parties from Prince Edward Island, because manhood suffrage there is to be abolished by it. Does not all this show what we have contended from the beginning, that it is impossible to adopt an uniform franchise which will be satisfactory to all the Provinces of the Dominion? Each Province has its own peculiarities, which make variations in the franchise absolutely necessary in order to secure fair play between the different Provinces. The right hon. Premier has recognised this; he has recognised that it would not be proper to allow the tribal Indians in the North-West or in British Columbia to vote, but he says it is proper to allow the Indians in the older Provinces to vote, because he thinks they are sufficiently intelligent to do so. He says himself that we require a different franchise in the different Provinces with regard to the Indians. The same is true with regard to other classes. You cannot apply the same rule to all the

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, Sir, I was concluding my remarks on the general question of provincial franchises versus a franchise for the whole Dominion. I pointed out that there were great differences of sentiment and taste and prejudice among the different Provinces as to what the franchise should be. I pointed out that no amount of legislation, no length of experience of a so-called uniform franchise, would do away with these differences of taste and feeling with regard to the franchise, and that we would consequently, if we attempted to have a franchise of that sort at all, be compelled to tinker it continually at the demand of one Province or another. I wish to speak now more particularly of the Province of Ontario.

There is no doubt whatever that this clause, so far as it applies to that Province, is a disfranchising clause, and that the Bill, as a whole, is a disfranchising Bill, as regards Ontario. I made some statements on Friday night, to which the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) replied. I entered into some details of comparison of the Ontario Act with this Bill, and gave figures to support my contention. The hon, member for Lincoln also gave figures in his speech, which appeared to damage my conclusions rather seriously, but I claim to be able to show that his figures and mine are not in reality inconsistent. I ask the indulgence of the committee if I go on to elaborate my own figures before disposing of the hon. gentleman's calculations, and I do so with the understanding that I shall, later on, show that, notwithstanding the calculations made by the hon. gentleman, the figures which I gave Friday evening are substantially correct, and that very little change need be made in them, in view of the calculations to which he has called attention. With regard to the first comparison, that between the qualification clauses of the two measures, it has been urged by the Ministerial press, particularly by the Mail, whose arguments have been copied by the local papers very extensively, that the Dominion Bill is really more liberal than the provincial Act. The Mail of Monday last stated that the Dominion Bill would enfranchise at least 10,000 or more workingmen who were refused the franchise by the Ontario Act. This has been repeated time and again, and I am sorry I have not a copy of one of the papers at hand, that I might show you how absurd the contrast is between the statement and the facts; but as I suppose most members of the House have seen the articles in question, I shall go on to give the answers to those assertions, without troubling myself to quote in detail the assertions themselves. In what respect is the proposed Dominion Act more liberal than the other? Is it in respect of owners of real estate? I think not. The Dominion Bill requires $300 worth of property in towns and $'50 worth in townships, as a qualificat on of owners of real estate, while the Ontario Act only requires $2:0 worth in towns and $100 worth in townships. In regards to tenants, the Dominion Bill has adopted a peculiar and rather fanciful plan, by making the qualification epend upon the rental instead of upon the actual value of the property. The tenant who pays $2 per month $6 per quarter, $12 per half year, or $20 per year, has the right to vote, without regard to the value of the property upon which he pays that rent. It has been pointed out already that this peculiar provision seems likely to put great power in the hands of owners of a large number of tenement houses in cities. There are a great many capitalists who own a number of shabby tenement houses, so shabby that they are hardly fit for habitation, in many instances, and yet I do not know where you can get tene ments in large towns, however poor the lodging, for less than $2 a month or $20 a year. This franchise appears to go to the length of extreme liberality with respect to tenants, as compared with its liberality to owners of real estate. It will certainly admit a class of voters much lower in the scale of intelligence and political education than those admitted under the franchise as owners of real estate. I do not know why there should be this inconsistency. Still, it does not go quite so far in admitting all classes of householders as the Ontario Act. Dealing still with the comparison with regard to real estate qualification, the qualification required for occupants and tenants in real estate in the Ontario Act is the same as that required for owners—$200 in cities and towns and $100 in townships I do not see that there is the least reason for arguing here that the Dominion Bill is more liberal than the Ontario franchise. My friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has urged that the reduction in qualification will make very little difference in the number of persons admitted to the would be naturally supposed that a lawyer of such eminence franchise, in his county. He tells us that since would have drawn the clause so as to carry out his intention. Mr. CASEY.

Friday last he had all the assessment rolls of his constituency sent to him here, in order that he might see the effect of this Bill and that of Mr. Mowat's Act in his county. That is rather an extraordinary statement. I was not aware that the assessors or township clerks, or whoever should now be in possession of the assessment rolls, would furnish those rolls-

Mr. RYKERT. I have copies of the assessment roll in my county, of the last twenty years, which I get and pay for annually.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon, gentleman has had copies sent down since Friday last?

Mr. RYKERT. I have copies which I paid for.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has taken a very wise precaution in having copies of these lists. He has been able to get them, no doubt, much more cheaply than he would be able to get copies of the voters' lists under the proposed Dominion Act, unless he were a sitting member or a defeated candidate. I am sure he has not had to pay 6 cents for every ten names on the copies of the assessment rolls which he has obtained. These rolls show, he says, that only forty-nine persons in the county of Lincoln, outside of the city of St. Catharines, were assessed for an amount under $200, and that, therefore, only forty-nine who would not have the franchise under this proposed measure, now hold it under the Mowat Act, as owners of real estate. Of course, I cannot dispute his figures, not having seen the rolls. If that be the case, either the assessors in Lincoln must be in the habit of valuing property much higher than the assessors in other counties, or else the county itself must be in a most extraordinarily prosperous condition, composed of none but comfortable farmers. I have always thought that my own county was fairly rich, but I find that in my riding there are ninety-five persons qualified as municipal voters by holding properties between $100 and $200 who were not qualified to vote at the Ontario elections under the former franchise, which was practically the same as the present Dominion Act, but who now have provincial and Dominion votes by Mr. Mowat's late Act, which they will lose if this Bill is passed. In the township of York, one of the richest townships in Ontario-if not in the whole Dominion—I find there were 105 males in the same position out of 3,000 voters. I admit that the percentage is not very heavy, but it shows that the abnormally low proportion found by the member for Lincoln, in his county, does not exist in other counties equally well settled. The hon, gentleman is mistaken in saying that only those fortynine, to whom he referred, would gain votes under Mr. Mowat's Act. He has forgotten that there are a large number of persons of the wage-earner class who do not appear on the assessment roll at all, but are entitled to votes by that Act. So his deductions from those figures lose all their force. As to the income franchise, the amount demanded by this Bill is $400 a year, which is to consist of income derived from a "trade, calling, office or profession," and gentlemen of considerable legal knowledge say it is very uncertain whether this would include the wage-earner even if he earned $400 or over. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems to feel certain that it would not, and other lawyers to whom I have spoken have varied in their opinion; but I have yet to find a single lawyer assert his opinion that it certainly would include the wage-earner. On a former occasion the Premier interpreted similar words in a former Bill in such a manner as not to include the wage-earner; and, in the absence of any explanation from him on this occasion, we are entitled to suppose that this is his intention still. Of course, his intention is not binding on courts of law, but it and probably the average judge or revising officer would interpret this clause as the hon. gentleman intends it to be interpreted, so as to exclude the wage-earner from qualification under the income franchise. Mr. Mowat, at all events, whose legal knowlege and acumen will not be disputed, was not satisfied that the ordinary wording of an income franchise clause would include the wage-earning classes, because he has put in a separate clause to bring them in beyond the shadow of a doubt. Even if it were held that wages and income were synonymous terms, and that $400 wages would qualify for a vote in the same way as that amount of income, the qualification, under the Ontario Act, is very much lower. That Act gives the franchise for $250 of income or wages, while this Bill requires $400 income, without saying anything about the wage-earner. Although the attempt has been made in the newspapers to represent this Bill as more liberal than the Ontario Act, probably in the hope that people would compare the new Dominion Bill with the old Ontario Act instead of with the present one, I do not believe any one in this House will risk his reputation by making such a contention. There is another class dealt with in the Bill, which is one of the most important in the country. I refer to the sons of farmers and other landholders. This Act makes provision for each of those classes separately, while the Ontario Act treats the sons of all landholders under one heading, defining landholders so as to include both farmers and other owners and occupiers of land or houses.. Under the Dominion Bill only as many sons can be qualified as the property in question would qualify if the father and the sons were joint owners. Thus, in townships, property of the value of $300 would qualify the father and one son, $450 would qualify the father and two sons, and so on. Under the Ontario Act, all the sons of landholders are qualified, without regard to the value of the property. If a landholder has over twenty acres of land of the full value of $100 in townships, or land under twenty acres, or house property, worth $400 in cities or $200 in townships, he may qualify as large a family of sons on that property as Providence has blessed him with. Landowner, too, is so defined as to bring sons of occupants as well as owners within the provision. To make this quite clear I must read the two clauses of the Act:

"Fifthly—Every landholder's son, who is resident at the time of the election of the local municipality in which he tenders his vote, and has resided therein with and in the residence or dwelling of the landholder whose son he is for twelve months next prior to the return by the assessors of the assessment roll," and so on, is qualified. Now landholder is defined in the interpretation clause as meaning:

"Any person who, being the owner of and residing and domiciled upon real property of at least twenty acres in extent, or of at least an actual value in cities and towns of $400, and in townships and incorporated villages of $200, is, in the last revised assessment roll of the municipality where such property is situate—" and so on. Now, it will be clearly seen that these two clauses taken together offer a more liberal franchise for the sons of landowners than is offered by this Bill. Not only does the property required for the qualification of the father himself qualify all his sons, but the sons of tenants are qualified as well. Now, we come to another clause, which carries this enfranchisement principle much farther. Under the Ontario Act all householders, without regard to the value of the dwelling, are qualified to vote; and it is especially provided in this clause that "dwelling house" may mean part of a dwelling house, occupied as a separate dwelling, so that if three or four families live in the same house and have their separate holdings, although each may occupy only one room, each one of these heads of families has the franchise; but there is no such provision in this Bill. In the Mowat Act there is a general clause, including all heads poor they may be, but is this Bill there is instead a special bid made for the fishermen of the Maritime The Ontario Act gives the franchise to Provinces. all householders, while this Bill gives a fancy franchise to a certain class of householders only, whose support it is desired to obtain. Now, we come to the resident and non-resident voters. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), said:

"There are in my own county 269 people disfranchised by reason of their being non-resident."

I did not know the hon, gentleman was an Irishman before. He says here that there are 269 people living in his county who do not live there. His meaning, probably, was that 269 people living outside his county, but having votes in his county, are disfranchised, as he calls it, by the Ontario Act. Now, I maintain that these 269 parties, to whom the hon member for Lincoln refers, and others in the same position throughout the country, are not disfranchised by Mr. Mowat's Act. Disfranchising means depriving a person of his vote. These persons are not deprived of their votes, for the hon. gentleman has not pretended that, although they cannot vote in his county, they are prevented from voting where they live. They are only deprived of a surplus vote; they are only deprived of exercising a double, or treble, or quadruple electoral power. Is a man to have two votes simply because his property happens to be differently situated, geographically, from that of his neighbors? I must repeat what I think will commend itself to every impartial mind, that the principle of representation is the representation of individuals; that we are not seeking to represent town lots, or farm lands, or dwelling houses, or tenements, or mills or factories; we are seeking to represent the persons who own these things. Property qualification is merely required as a test, showing the stake in the country, as the saying is, of the persons who own these properties or occupy them. Therefore, once a person is shown to be qualified by the possession of property, or by an income, he is entitled to vote. Then you are done with him as a voter. Once you have established the fact that he has a right to vote, give him his vote, and let him take that vote where he lives. If he cannot qualify where he lives, I would not object to his voting in any one riding in which he has a qualification. But let him have a vote in one specified place, preferably where he lives, and let him have no more votes. Why should a person who owns $1,000 worth of property, scattered through five ridings, have five votes, while a person who has $5,000 worth in one riding has only one vote? Why this law enables a man to buy the right of out voting his neighbor. I say that taking away the plurality vote from these persons is not disfranchising them but enfranchising their neighbors, for it restores to the neighbors of these people, and other citizens around them, the electoral power which had been taken away from them in the first place, by giving it, in undue proportion, to these holders of plural votes. Suppose that there were, as the member for Lincoln says, 269 persons living outside his county who voted in that county, it is reasonable to assume that these people have votes at home also. They vote in their own county, and their votes counterbalance 269 votes of their neighbors. Not content with that, they go over to the county of the hon. member for Lincoln and outvote 269 persons in his county, and it is possibly by such means as this that the hon, gentleman sits here to-day, by receiving the votes of non-residents, of people who are not his neighbors, who have no interest in his county, except that they hold a bit of land there, or are qualified in some such way. The hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace) appears to be of the opinion that if the 400 odd voters living outside his riding, but having votes in his riding, were deprived of their votes in his riding, he would have a poor chance of returning here. But it speaks of families, no matter how ill for a representative to be so anxious to have the votes of outsiders to outvote those who live in his own riding, and who have an intimate knowledge of him. The hon, member for Lincoln compared this with the case of voting for municipal purposes. He said: "If it was fair to let a man vote in every municipality where he held property, it was fair to give him a parliamentary vote also wherever he had property." I do not see it. The chief object of municipal government is to raise taxes and to expend them for the benefit of the property in the municipality in the carrying out of certain improvements. It is quite rational that a man should have a vote for municipal purposes whereever he has property, because a municipality is, to a great extent, a joint-stock institution. The case is extremely different in regard to parliamentary elections, where we do not deal with the property of the voter, but only with the individual; and I am surprised that the member for Lincoln should have drawn such a comparison. The only clause in this Bill that is more liberal than the Ontario Act is that respecting Indians. The Ontario Bill is liberal enough, for it provides that all enfranchised Indians, that is to say, all Indians who have been made citizens in the manner prescribed by the Indian Act, and some Indians who are not enfranchised, but are living off reserves and carrying on business like white people, shall have votes. This Bill goes even further. It will admit the same classes and all Indians who are not citizens, tribal Indians who are not citizens in any sense of the term. By the admission of a new class to the franchise you impair the electoral power of those who formerly exercised it. It is worth while noticing to what extent this will occur, more especially in a case like this, where people who are not citizens are to be allowed to exercise the franchise, to the detriment of those who are citizens. According to the census of 1881 there were 15,325 Indians in Ontario. Taking that number to represent 3,000 families and reckoning two votes to a family, father and one son, there will be about 6,000 Indian votes which will offset the votes of 6,000 citizens who now possess the franchise. These Indians will be admitted to the franchise without having citizenship. To that we object. We have stated our willingness and desire for years past that every facility should be afforded Indians to become citizens. Let Indians acquire property, become citizens, and then give them the right to vote. Why should we treat the Indians worse than the negroes? Let us give them an equal chance and they will become as good, probably better, citizens than the negroes.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you refuse the Indian a vote when he has property the same as a white man?

Mr. CASEY. I would not. The Ontario Act gives Indians votes when they have property, the same as white men. This Bill, however, proposes to give Indians votes when they live on the reserve, have no right to sell, and have no right to any property, except to live on it.

Mr. SPROULE. The Indian must have some property qualification. He owns the land.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the hon, gentlemen understands the Bill better than the First Minister, but that right hon, gentleman stated that the law was intended to extend to tribal Indians living on reserves. We know that tribal Indians are incapable of holding property under the law, are incapable of suing and being sued; yet it is proposed to give them the franchise.

Mr. SPROULE. The Indian pays taxes and owns the land.

Mr. CASEY. Indians on reserves are not taxed or assessed and can not individually own land. Indians like of the attack of the Indians like of the Mr. White, the member of the Ontario Assembly, and others, have distinguished themselves; in fact, most of them are quite as capable of distinguishing themselves as majority is gone very far away.

Mr. CASEY.

are most white men, if they are given the opportunity. It is worth noticing how the Indians are distributed in Ontario. By far the largest number are in the constituency of Algoma, the hon. member for which has shown such solicitude to have Indians given the vote. The number of Indians there is 4,678, which will represent over 1,800 votes. It is not at all probable that those Indians, living so completely under the control of the Government, will vote against a friend of the Government. It is quite probable that the hon. member for Algoma will be even more secure in his seat than at present.

Mr. SPROULE. How many have votes now?

Mr. CASEY. I do not think there are any.

Mr. SPROULE. Oh, yes.

Mr. CASEY. I understood from the hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) there were not any.

Mr. SPROULE. The timber agent of the Mowat Government brought them up by dozens last summer, and they voted all right.

Mr. CASEY. A considerable number may, perhaps, be entitled to vote under the Ontario Act, but I do not know what proportion. In Essex there are 137 Indians-a small number, and I believe a good many of them do vote there. In Bothwell there are 785, and I do not think any of these, or very few, have votes. This would give an addition to the electorate of Bothwell of something over 300 votes, at the rate we have been calculating. It is a very peculiar coincidence that it is proposed to add those voters to a constituency in which the hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) only obtained a majority of 12, according to the return, at least, at the last election. It does seem almost as if it were a continuation of the attempt to get rid of that hon, gentleman, which failed so disastrously in the case of the gerrymander, and that finding it impossible to dislodge him by that means, it is their intention to enroll the Indians, and thus drive him out of the constituency. It is possible that this attempt may turn out to be a mistake, like the other, and that the Indians may divide themselves on political grounds as other voters do; but the intention is evidently a political one. In West Elgin there are 273 Indians.

Mr. SPROULE. That is what kills you.

Mr. CASEY. I shall not go into the calculation in that riding, because it does not much matter there if the whole of them had votes. In North Bruce there are 760, nearly the same number as in Bothwell. But there is this difference, that whereas in Bothwell a prominent member of the Opposition got in by a bare majority, in North Bruce a supporter of the Government (Mr. McNeil) got in by the narrow majority of 88; and it is highly probable that the votes of the male Indians of those 760 may be the salvation of that amiable gentleman at the next general election. It is possible he may come back without them, but I think the Government are acting wisely by making it as sure as possible that he will come back, by giving him the help of the 300 sound Indian supporters, who will probably take the same view of the questions of the day as the Government does. In South Middlesex there are 1,429. They will not do much harm there either, except that they might reduce very nearly to a tie the handsome majority obtained by my hon. friend who represents that riding. Now, we come to South Brant, where there are 2,650 Indians, representing in all over 1,000 votes. Here, again, is the case of a prominent member of the Opposition, whose ruin was attempted by the Gerrymander Bill, who escaped that attack, and who is now being subjected to the attack of the Indian vote. His majority at the last election was 176, and it is quite clear that if these Indians vote as the Government hopes and expects, that

Mr. SPROULE. How do you make 1,000 votes out of 2,756 Indians?

Mr. CASEY. I calculate that about two-fifths of the number will have votes. I explained the calculation when

Mr. BOWELL, The ordinary calculation is about onefifth.

Mr. CASEY. But, as I explained, it is different in the case of the Indians, because it is reasonable to expect that in every family of five there will be at least two votes, the father and one adult son, because they will be living all together on the reserve and will qualify on the reserve; whereas, in the case of the unfortunate white man, you can only qualify as many as can be qualified on the joint ownership principle. Every adult Indian will practically have a vote. In the county of Haldimand, where the present representative (Mr. Thompson) had 126 majority, there are 437 Indians. It is possible that this is a coincidence, that it is undesigned, but it is possible that the Indians may be the means of turning the scale in that county. In Muskoka the gallant gentleman who is now at the front (Mr. O'Brien) had the tremendous majority of three, but if this Bill passes he will have the additional assistance, at the next general election, of the adult males out of 390 Indian skirmishers. In West Northumberland, where the Conservative majority was 80 there are 190 Indians; in West Peterborough, where the Conservative majority was 160, there are 147 Indians; in East Hastings, where the sitting member (Mr. White) had a majority of 53, there are 855 Indians. In North Renfrew, where the Conservative majority was 23, there are 518 Indians, and in Cornwall there are 247. It will be noticed that in all these places it is a very strange coincidence—perhaps it is only a coincidence—but it is a strange fact that they are so located that they will either render unsafe the seats of opponents of the Government or make sure of the election of supporters of the Government. The probable effect will be to make five or six seats safe for the Government, and two or three seats very unsafe for the Opposition. If it is a coincidence, it is a strange one. It is strange that Providence has induced, or that former treaties have caused the Indians, with the greatest foresight-

Mr. BOWELL. It is well to have Providence on your side.

Mr. CASEY. Especially when you make a providence of your own and call him a revising barrister.

Mr. BOWELL. Don't be irreverent.

Mr. CASEY. But whether it is the result of Providence or not, the fact remains that the Indians are so distributed that their enfranchisement will have the effect I have mentioned, and that with the assistance of their providencethe revising barrister-and the Indians, the strength of the Government will be greatly increased.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I have just come in, and did not hear what the hon. gentleman said about East Hastings. How many Indians did he say there were in that riding?

Mr. CASEY. Eight hundred and fifty-five, according to the census. I do not know what changes have been made in the boundaries since 1831.

Mr. WHITE. You do not think they will all be voters?

Mr. CASEY. No; I have explained the basis, and it appears to be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. WHITE. There will be about 100 voters.

Mr. CASEY. No; on the basis I have explained, there will be over 300. A great deal will depend on the revising officer -on a Tory providence. I wish now to go into some details as to the number of persons who will be disfranchised the census returns of the different classes of industrics of 1881, but I regret that these returns are not as useful as they might have been, for the reason that they jumble up employers and employed in the same industry. I will have to submit to this defect and make such allowance as may be fair, in order to get at the correct result. I find that in all Ontario, in 1881, there were 78,132 laborers, none of whom, I believe I am justified in asserting, will be qualified under the $400 income clause, but all of whom are qualified under the $250 wage-earners' clause in the Ontario Act; because it will be seen, on reference to the returns of the Ontario Bureau of Industries, that the unskilled laborer throughout the Province is getting almost invariably over $250 and under $400. I think it is a very liberal allowance to suppose that one-third of these laborers may be qualified as landowners or tenants or occupants under the Dominion Bill, leaving two-thirds who are qualified under the Ontario Act but disqualified under this Act. I shall go on in the same way to notice some of the larger classes, because I do not wish to take up the time of the House by referring to them all. There are 17,126 carpenters and joiners, of whom about one-half would be qualified under the Ontario Act and not under the Dominion Act; and therefore 8,000 carpenters and joiners are, in all probability, qualified under the Ontario Act who will not be under the Dominion Act.

Mr. WHITE. Go on and prove that they will not be.

Mr. CASEY. I have already stated the reasons on which I based that supposition, and it is only a supposition-

Mr. WHITE. Oh, it is a supposition?

Mr. CASEY. And I think if gentlemen will not listen to what I say they should not call for explanations that have been already given. Then there are 12,474 commercial clerks. of whom I think it is highly probable that one-third, or about 4,000, are getting under $400 a year—I have taken that figure after consulting some business men. Then, of farmers' sons there were 71,642 in Ontario when the census was taken. Judging from the number in my own county, more than one-half of those who now possess the franchise under the Ontario Act will be disqualified under this. In West Eigin the total number of farmers' sons in 1881-in those townships which then composed West Elgin-was 755, and the total number on the last voters' list under the joint ownership franchise was 313, less than half. But to make it absolutely sure, we will say one-third, say 24,000 in all, in the Province, who are qualified under the Ontario Act and not under the Dominion Act. Of railway employees I calculate that 2,500 would be qualified under the Ontario and not under the Dominion Act. Another very large class are the blacksmiths, who number 10,030, of whom I estimate that probably 6,000 would be qualified as wageearners under the Ontario Act, and not under the Dominion Act. These are the largest classes; I will not go into detail as to the smaller classes. Now, I have made a second calculation in regard to these, and have made up a list of the number in each of these classes who might be qualified in some other way than on income under both Acts. I find that the total number of these industrial classes I have mentioned, according to the census-I have not taken note of the smaller cases—is 167,850, of whom I estimate that 44,000 in all would be qualified otherwise than on income or as wageearners or farmers' sons under this Act, leaving 123,000 odd who would, in all probability, be qualified as wage earners or landholders' sons under the Ontario Act and not under the Dominion Act. As these 123,000 persons are now qualified under the Ontario Act, and will cease to be qualified if this Act passes, that will amount to the disfranchising of 123,000 persons in the industrial classes alone. But it is not only amongst the industrial classes that this disfranchisement will take place. The abolition of the household clause, which is in by this Act in the Province of Ontario. I have gone through | the Ontario Act, will disfranchise large numbers; and so with several other classes, which I will not refer to in detail. As I said, there is only one enfranchised class to set against this, that is the Indians, whose enfranchisement will reduce the electoral power of the remaining white voters. I shall now call attention to the criticisms of the hon. member for Lincoln, which I laid before the House in the rough, and which I have now given more in detal. He said it is quite impossible there could be 125,000 people, or anything like it, disfranchised by this Bill, because there were only 472,411 male persons in Ontario, of twenty-one years and upwards, in 1881, and that the voters' lists for the whole Province in 1883 footed up 417,112, so that only 55,309 male persons in Ontario had not the right to vote. He is willing, however, to add 15,000 to this number for holders of plural votes. I must draw attention to the extreme weakness of this criticism. He takes the census of 1881 for the number of adult males in the country, but takes the voters' lists of two years later for the number of voters. I had not access to that list when I made up my figures.

Mr. RYKERT. You say one-half left the country.

Mr. CASEY. We have plenty time to discuss that yet, and the hon, gentleman should not be so ready to invite attention to it. It is sadly true that many have left but it is not the pleasantest subject for hon, gentlemen on that side, and they had better leave it alone. In 1882 there were 389,000 voters on the list at the time of the Dominion election.

Mr. RYKERT. There were 1,000 more than that.

Mr. CASEY. Well, I will call it 390,000, to suit the hon. gentleman. Taking the 472,000 adult males who were in the country in 1881, and adding to that the ordinary percentage of natural increase for the year, 12 per cent., we find there were, in all probability, 479,000 adult males in the Province, in 1882, when this voters' list was made up. If you subtract the 390,000, you have already 89,000 a larger result than the hon. gentleman made up. But it is utterly unfair to subtract the number of names on the voters' lists from the number of adult males, because the total number of names on the voters' lists does not represent the number of persons enjoying the franchise. What we want to get at is the number of persons enjoying the franchise compared with the number of adults in the country. Then we come to the class to which the hon. gentleman referred—those who left the country and whose names still remain on the lists. No doubt a large number left after they were put on the voters' list. Taking these along with those who died since the voters' list was made up, and before it was used, we can assume an average of 100 in each riding. There is that number in the large ridings of East and West Elgin, and there must be more than 100 in other larger ridings; and, on the whole, the average would be a little more than 100. This will make about 10,000 in the whole Province. Then we come to the largest deduction of all. Everybody knows that in the voters' lists in every township in Ontario the names of some persons appear very frequently. The large farmers, or the farmers who rent land at some distance from their own homesteads, for grazing and other purposes, the names of such appear several times on the voters' lists, even in the same township. I took three or four townships in the county I represent, in which the repeaters were marked, and I found the average number was about 8 per cent. of the total vote in those townships. In towns, where persons own property in several wards, the proportion will be larger; in England it is put at 15 per cent. We may assume the deduction to be made from the total number of names on the voters' lists, on account of repeaters, would be from 8 to 10 per cent. Allowing 8 per cent., we have a deduction of 31,000 to make, or allowing 10 per cent., which is more likely the average, we have a deduction of 39,000 to make. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Rykert) was willing to allow 15,000 for plural votes. Adding these deductions together, we have a Mr. Casey.

total of 56,000 to take from the total number of names on the voters' lists, at 8 per cent., or a total deduction of 64,000 at 10 per cent. Subtracting these totals from 390,000, the number of names on the voters' lists in Ontario at the last general election, we have, in the one case, 334,000, and in the next, 326,000, as the actual number of persons represented by the 390,000 names in the list of 1882. Subtract this from the total number of males, as shown in the census, with the natural increase of 1½ per cent. added making 479,000, and you find a margin of 146,000 in the one case, and in the other, of 153,000, as the difference between the number of persons possessing a vote and the actual number of males twenty-one years of age and over.

Mr. RYKERT. Make it 200,000, in round numbers.

Mr. CASEY. No; I will not, because I am bound by some slight desire to keep near the facts. I am not quite so free in my estimates on this question as some hon. gentlemen may be, because I am bound down by the very careful calculations which I have made, and I do not want to stultify them. My former estimate, in which, to some extent, I was guessing, was that from 123,000 to 125,000 would be disqualified by this Bill who were now qualified in Ontario. The other system of calculation introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln and which I have just carried out and corrected, leads me to the conclusion that at least 145,000 persons who were adult males in 1882 were not then voters under the Ontario law, which was practically the same as the law which is now proposed here. On the other hand, Mr. Mowat's Act practically provides for universal suffrage. I do not know a single adult male in my riding, who is not a pauper, a lunatic or a criminal, who will not be enfranchised under that Bill.

Mr. RYKERT. You do not mean to say there are any lunatics there?

Mr. WHITE. No; they have left; they are not there now.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, the hon. genteman was there once, but he has not been there for some time. The poorest laborer in any county that I know of is earning, either in cash or in cash and board combined, at least $250 a year. The average wages of farm laborers last year were $264, without board, and $175 with board, whereas the lowest amount with board, which would qualify them to vote under Mr. Mowat's Bill, would be about $159. Farm laborers, therefore, throughout Ontario, are qualified. I do not know any class of laborers who receive lower pay than farm laborers, and no sort of mechanics are paid as low as laborers. I think every laborer in good health is corning $250.5. laborer in good health is earning $250 a year or its equivalent; or, if not, the chances are 99 in 100 that he has a habitation of his own which will qualify him, or that he owns a little lot to the value of $100, or that he will come in in some other way. So that we have practically universal suffrage under Mr. Mowat's Act. But I do not ask the House to go so far. I will knock off 200 persons in each riding as not being qualified under Mr. Mowat's Act, which will amount to less than 20,000 for the Province; but I am willing to call it 20,000. If you deduct 20,000 adult males—and that is a grossly exaggerated estimate—from the 145,000, you arrive at exactly the figure which I mentioned on Friday night, and which the hon. member for Lincoln attacked. At least 125,000 persons who now have the vote in Ontario will be disfranchised by this Bill. If you add to the number of voters who possessed the franchise formerly, viz.: 334,000, those who now have the franchise under Mr. Mowat's Bill, 125,000, you have a total of 359,000, as the total number of persons who would have had the franchise in 1882 under the Mowat Act. You find too that the second part of my estimate on that occasion is surpassed by the facts, which show that it is not almost one in four, but almost one in three, of the present electorate of Ontario, that will be disfranchised by this Bill. It is a very serious thing to disfranchise people.

Mr. WHITE. You are mistaken.

Mr. CASEY. Order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WHITE. I have a right to say you are mistaken:

Mr. CASEY. We have put up with a great deal of interruption from that hop gentleman, because we do not look upon him as subject to the ordinary rule of parliamentary behavior. I have put up with it for three-quarters of an hour, but now I insist that he be called to order.

Mr. WHITE. You have told us this eighteen times, and we cannot put up with it forever.

Mr. CASEY. Almost one in three will be disfranchised by this Bill in Ontario.

Mr. WHITE. That is nineteen times.

Mr. CASEY. It is a very serious thing to take the franchise from anybody. It is a revolutionary thing to take it away from one-third of the electorate, without giving them an opportunity of expressing their opinion in reference to it. It hon, gentlemen opposite were capable of appreciating the argument, if they were capable of appreciating even the figures of the member for Lincoln, who admitted that 55,000 persons were disfranchised, they would not dare to go back to their constituents after this Session and confess that they had voted for such a Bill as this. Perhaps they may shelter themselves under the conviction that it does not matter what the disfranchised ones think about it, as they will have lost their votes any way, but I remind them that these men have friends and relations and respectors among even the Conservative electorate of the country, and I do not think the case can be better put than in the words used to me by a Conservative gentleman in this House, that the people of the country have such a sense of British fair play that any Bill of this kind which appears likely to operate unfairly to one class of the community will do them infinitely more harm, among the independent voters of Ontario, than all the good the revising barrister can do them. They will not dare to defend this Bill in the House. Not one in ten of them will speak on it. They will not defend it in the country, except in a good Conservative neighborhood. If they have the audacity, or what might be called outside of these walls the cheek, to tell the people that this Bill, which disfranchises one in three of the electorate, is a liberal Bill, they will have more cheek than I give them credit for; but the people of the country are beginning to understand it, and those who think they are getting a great party advantage will discover that fair play is the best play, that honesty is the best policy, and that they will lose more than they can possibly gain by introducing an unjust and tyrannical policy of this kind. Let them take warning from the utterances of the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in his paper. He has been a colleague of the members of the present Government, and is now their consistent supporter; but if they pay attention to what he has told them they will see that this is not only unjust and unfair, but a gross blunder in party policy. beg to move:

That all the words after "that," in the motion, be left out, and the following words inserted before the word "every," in the first line of section 3:

None of the provisions in the following sections of this Act, in reference to the qualification of voters, shall apply to the Province of Ontario, but in that Province the persons entitled to be registered as voters under this Act, and, when so registered, to vote at any election, shall be such persons as are, at the time of such registration, entitled to vote at an election of a member to serve in the Legislative Assembly of that Province, and no others.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The clause the committee is considering is one of vast importance, and we have now the amendment of the hon. member of West Elgin (Mr. Casey), which proposes that the franchise be allowed to remain under the control of the Province of Ontario. I may just. premise my observations with a few remarks addressed to the hon. gentlemen, who show a disposition to annov me. During the time I have sat in this House I have never interrupted a gentleman while speaking, and I do not expect that hon, gentlemen opposite will give me anything but fair play. This is a question that the people are anxious about, because, by this clause, we propose to take away from them the rights they have enjoyed since Confederation; you propose to insult the people who have been allowed to prepare the voters' lists ever since Confederation, and I will not sit silent while the people of that Province are being insulted by this measure. I stand here in the interests of the people. To day I had the honor of presenting a petition from the people in my riding, and I observed among the names many gentlemen who opposed me at the last election, which fact encourages me to persist in my opposition to this measure. Sir, if hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to be factious, and to obstruct this discussion in this House, is it not an evidence that they are bound to prevent a knowledge of the history of this outrageous measure from becoming known to the people of this country, by free, ample and full discussion? Now, Sir, if this Bill passes it strikes a death blow at representative institutions in this country. This measure was never before the country for discussion. I have run four elections during my short life, and I never heard a word said about this measure; I never heard a single murmur from the people that the basis on which the voters' lists have been prepared was unjust or unfair. measure is a direct insult to the farmers of this country, who, generally, have the preparation of these lists. the Government desire fair play in this matter let them appeal to the country to ascertain if the people want this measure. Let them adopt the course that was pursued by Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone enunciated his policy in his Midlothian speech, and Mr. Mowat did the same before his election; and if the Government desired fair play, like these two distinguished gentlemen, they would allow this Bill to pass over and allow the people to pronounce upon it, and say whether they prefer a Dominion franchise, or whether they prefer to make the franchise for themselves. Why, Sir, is there any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House who is satisfied with the condition of things in this country now? Look at the meetings held in New Brunswick; look at the Legislature of Nova Scotia; look at the North-West; look every where, and what do you find? Discontent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am speaking of an historical fact. I say this is an inopportune time to press this measure. This is a revolutionary measure, and while we have a revolution going on, when blood is being spilt, when the young men of our country are being sacrificed to this evil spirit—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would ask the hon. gentleman to confine his remarks to the motion before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Just what I will do, Sir, and nothing else. I am very much obliged to you for telling me that, and you must have known perfectly well I would have done nothing else. Now, this measure proposes to disfranchise, in my own Province, a very large number of people, and can I sit idly by while it is being passed through? Am I to allow a measure to go through that strikes at the liberty of the people who sent me here to represent them, without lifting up my voice against it? I have been looking over this matter, and I will give you a little idea of the number of people who will be disfranchised if this measure becomes law. Why, Sir, the idea of a Government endeavoring, at this crisis in the history of our country, to place a revolutionary measure like this upon the Statute Book, is an assumption of power which shows a disregard of the wishes of the people of this country. The time is inopportune for this measure. It is not a fit time to introduce this measure. Sir, I say it is a cowardly thing to do; it is cowardly to press this measure through, which the people have not discussed and do not understand.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I must inform the hon gentleman that he has no right to attribute unworthy motives to members of this House,

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not spoken of motives; I am speaking of the actions of the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill. I say the Act is a cowardly Act.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I call the hon, gentleman to order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If there are any stronger terms by which I could designate this Act I would use them. I would, if I could, select any other words that would meet your wishes, Mr. Chairman, and parliamentary rules and practice. I say the Bill is an iniquitous Bill. The Bill is an outrage against the will of the people. The Government are endeavoring to obtain absolute power in the different constituencies of Canada, as was the case in Britain years ago, before the passage of the Reform Bill. Look at the condition of things in England at that time. And yet we are endeavoring, at this noonday of the nineteenth century, to bring about a despotism in Canada such as existed in Britain at the time I have mentioned. Boroughs were held by different people, who determined who should be elected. The Duke of Wellington, on one occasion, wrote to the electors: "Mr. Peel is the nominee to be elected for Clonmel." That was the power held by individuals before the passing of the Reform Bill. The First Minister and those who support him are trying to introduce similar despotic power into this country, and to say that the people must submit to their doctrine with passive obedience. It is a monstrous thing, in this age, to ask the people to go back to the doctrines that are now obsolete. We have no evidence that the people are dissatisfied with the existing state of things. We have the voters' lists under the control of the people. The people elect their councillors, who elect the township clerk. The Council appoint the assessors who prepare the rolls. The clerk records the roll. It is afterwards revised, and if a man's name is omitted it can be inserted. If the assessors do not discharge their duty they will be dismissed by the council. We have been told they do act unfairly. If that be so, the council is responsible for the unfairness, and the assessors will be dismissed. there is a court of revision, and no matter how poor the man may be, his name will be inserted if omitted. The list is afterwards published. If anything goes wrong an appeal is made to the judge and a remedy is applied. By this Bill it is proposed to disregard the people in every way. It is not proposed to take the assessment roll as a basis for the roll to be prepared by the revising officer. We are insulting, by this measure, the whole people of the country. The people are told to yield a passive obedience. A young sprig of a lawyer will prepare the roll; he will place on it whom he pleases. There is no appeal. No petitions have been sent in, asking for this measure. The people do not want it. Let the people manage their own affairs. If we want to promote harmony between the different Provinces let them manage these matters. This Bill is a vote of non-confidence in the people, and it shows the Government are afraid to face the people, unless they obtain control of the voter's lists and appoint Bill. Mr. Landerkin.

a duck of a revising barrister, who will say: Mr. White is to represent Cardwell, and Mr. Bowell North Hastings, and so on. A comparison of the Ontario system and that proposed shows the advantages of the former, not only as regards cost, but as regards the merits of the system. the one case the roll is prepared by a young sprig of a lawyer, one who has been five years in the profession. Under the other system the roll is prepared by tried and honored officials, who have the confidence of the people, and under that system there are safeguards for the rights of the people. Any man of common sense and fair play would resent the adoption of such a system as is proposed by the Bill. I cannot understand how it is, that in a free Parliament and free country, at this day, a measure so iniquitous, that strikes at the will of the people, should be seriously proposed and attempted to be passed through this House, with every obstruction thrown in the way of free discussion. Another important matter to the people, and one in which the people are greatly interested, is the expense. Under the proposed system you will have double the expense of the present system—yes, tenfold the expense. I made an estimate of what it would cost in my riding to carry out this Bill, and I find that it would be $3,500 or $40,00.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Give us the calculation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Capitalise that sum at 5 per cent., and it would represent $70,000, or enough to pay off one-third of all the railway debts of the riding I represent. In over three years the cost of this Bill would pay the whole of our railway bonuses. Would it not be better to pay off our railway debts with that money, instead of sending a dainty duck of a lawyer to make out the lists—

An hon. MEMBER. Yes; you are the old drake.

Mr. LANDERKIN—to make out the lists, which are now made out at a cost to this House of, perhaps, not more than $500 or $600. This is something at which the people will be astonished—that any Government who were honored with the confidence of the people would propose, by a measure of this kind, to so disregard the best interests of the people, and squander their money, and for what purpose? Not for the benefit of the people, not for building railways or other public works, but to give some hungry officials some of the money which has been wrung out of the pockets of the poor people of this country. It is for that purpose and for another purpose—for the purpose of trying to perpetuate the reign of a party in power, who are afraid to go to the polls on their record and to the same electorate who sent them here. I say a party who seek to perpetuate themselves in power—

Mr. RYKERT. Would not that be the best thing for the country?

Mr. LANDERKIN. I say that the cost of this Bill for one year would pay off one-third of the railway debt for which we have been taxed so heavily in our riding. We had no Government to build us railways; the Government here gave us no aid; we have never received any public money from them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Stick to the subject.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am talking about the Franchise Bill and nothing else. I say it is but natural that the people of my county will think that that money will be better spent in paying off our railway debt than in sending up a dainty duck of a lawyer to prepare their lists, for the purpose of perpetuating any party in power, no matter what party. Now, I examined the rolls in South Grey, and I find, Sir, that in that riding 155 people will be disfranchised by this Bill.

Mr. RYKERT. One hundred and fifty-five thousand, did you say?

Mr. LANDERKIN: Yes, sir; 155 who are now on the list.

Mr. RYKERT. You cannot tell all that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Cannot I? You do not want to tell. You want the Bill to pass. You want to get a revising officer and get somebody else on the Welland Canal.

Mr. RYKERT. I want to get a Grit, and I would drown him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I believe you would.

Mr. FERGUSON. You could not do that; it would be contrary to sanitary regulations.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We have two classes of voters on the list, those who vote for members of the Legislature and those who vote for members of the municipal council—the latter being assessed under $200. Now, in the Bill passed last year by the Legislature of Ontario, all those assessed for $100 will have a vote, but the present Bill requires them to be assessed for $150, and 155 people in South Grey will be disfranchised in that way. This is contracting the franchise of the people, and it is adding to their expenses. There may be some objection to the law as it was passed last Session in the Legislature of Ontario. There are a good many provisions in it which, when fully considered and discussed, will meet the wishes of all right thinking men, no matter of what party. There are several wise and useful provisions in it. Under the Ontario Bill the non-resident vote is abolished. Does anybody say that is bad?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes,

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, we will attend to them presently. In that Bill the vote is not given to the property, but to the man. Property is only an evidence of qualification. Does anybody say that is bad?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You say that is bad?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; address the Chair.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is one vote for one man, and does any hon. gentleman say that is bad?

Mr. RYKERT. Yes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Some hon, gentlemen over there would say anything. Under that Bill the rule is not representation according to property, but according to population. Does not that meet the views of all the people of this country? Yes, of course. There was a consensus of opinion on this subject—that representation should not be based on property but on population. Suppose there were $1,000 of assessment in five counties to one person, that man could give five votes, but a gentleman owning $1,000 worth of property in one county would only have one vote. Is that right?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes; that is all right.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then a non-resident cannot vote. Is that right?

An hon. MEMBER. No; that is all wrong.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not wonder at the hon member for Lincoln saying it was wrong. That was the system which created more bribery and corruption than anything else, and consequently the hon, member for Lincoln says it is not right to strike a blow at bribery and corruption.

An hon. MEMBER. It would hurt a good many of you Grits.

Mr. RYKERT. What about "Come along John; give us a big push now?"

Mr. LANDERKIN. Under this system there may be some hardships; probably there will be. For instance, a candidate who does not live in the riding he represents cannot vote for himself, some of them say, and a fearful whine is raised about this—what a tyrant is Mr. Mowat. It is a singular thing that in this great country they cannot find a local candidate in the different ridings; and if a candidate is elected for a riding that he does not reside in, he can well afford to labor under some disabilities.

Mr. WALLACE (York). What about the member for Wheeler and the member for West Durham?

Mr. LANDERKIN. My observations apply to one side of the House as well as to the other. I am not speaking for one side of the House more than for the other. If gentlemen become candidates in ridings where they do not live, it may be due to some great qualities they possess; but if they have those qualities they might be willing to labor under some disabilities, more particularly when that clause in the Bill strikes the greatest blow at bribery, corruption and personation that could be struck by any franchise Bill, and is one of the greatest boons, in the way of establishing purity in elections, that we have. Now, Sir, there are some gentlemen in this House who are elected to support the Government and who believe that it is their duty to support every measure the Government introduces.

Mr. FERGUSON. Some think it is their duty to oppose them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think that is a dangerous doctrine to which this House should not lend its assent. The Premier says he draws his inspiration from Britain. The member for King's says we are here for the purpose of registering the decrees of the Government.

Mr. RYKERT. I have heard that six times to-day.

Mr. FERGUSON. And six times contradicted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, you must have line upon line, and precept upon precept, and then it will do you very little good. The doctrine laid down by the hon member for King's is a singular doctrine, and if you knew the kind of gentlemen who are sitting behind the Government, you would not be surprised at their carrying that doctrine out. They dare not say anything about these measures; they would get into trouble; the Ministers would make it hot for them—would write to their constituents. And yet these gentlemen come here and bodly announce to this House that their object is to register the decrees of the Government, whatever those decrees may be. There may be a sense in which that is right. If these questions were discussed before the people and were laid down on a platform, and they subscribed to that platform, it would be right; but if they are honest men they will not subscribe to a platform of that kind on other grounds. Now, Sir, Mr. Gilbert, the author of "Iolanthe"—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Io-who?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is that the gentlemen who proposed to enfranchise the Chinese in Montreal? I will reply to you again; I will take up the Chinese question and discuss that; I will talk to you about that presently. Mr. Gilbert, in his "Iolanthe," made use of the following:—

"When in this House, M.P.'s divide,
If they've a brain and cerebellum, too,
They've got to leave those brains outside,
And vote just as their leaders tell'em to;
But then the prospect of a lot
Of Tory members in proximity,
All thinking for themselves, is what
No man can face with equanimity."

That is just the way with those gentlemen over there. If the Government have any Bill to put through the House, they have not the equanimity to discuss that Bill, but they must vote for it. I think that doctrine strikes a blow at representative institutions; it is destructive of the principles on which representative government is based. I think it is a doctrine that will be received by the people of the country with astonishment and alarm, that members on that side of the House come here to register the Bills the Government propose to the House, and are obliged to assent to them without discussion. Now, this Bill is very different from the Bill that was introduced last year; yet the Government say they are not taking the country by surprise. I have the Bill of last year in my drawer.

Mr. RYKERT. Leave it there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I want to show you that the Bill they introduced last year and the Bill they introduced this year, are very different Bills. In the Bill of 1884 we find that the interpretation clause says:

"' Person' means a male person, married or unmarried, or a female person unmarried, or a widow; and the pronoun he and its inflexions, include either sex."

Do you find any reference to the Indian in that, as in the Bill of 1885? Is this not taking the country by surprise? Is this not changing the whole system of the franchise? Is this not proposing to give the franchise to persons who are not citizens in the strict sense of the term, who are wards, who are receiving annuities from the Government, and are under the control of the Superintendent General, the Premier of this country? Now, if the hon gentleman from Montreal will give me his question, I will deal with it.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Sit down and take a rest.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I like to see gentlemen, when they have got a question, have the courage to ask it. I do not see why it is that the Government are bound to obstruct the debate upon this question, to prevent us putting our views upon record. We condemn the Bill because we consider it to be a violation of the principle of fair play, because it is not British, because it is one that any gentleman imbued with the spirit of fair play cannot support. It is a revolutionary measure in every sense. It changes the basis upon which the voters' lists are made, and in that respect, it is a direct insult to the people. The Government say to the people: You are incompetent, although you have had large municipal experience in making out the voters' liste, and we will tax the people of the country to the tune of $500,000 a year for the purpose of having those lists prepared by nominees of our own, by men who, as the hon. member for Cumberland said, will fix the lists, and no doubt they will do their best to fix them in the way best calculated to keep the Government in power. How much more manly, how much more British, would it not be for the Government to appeal to the country on their record than to go to the people on the strength of their revising barristers, who, they expect, will cover a multitude of sins, by leaving off the lists objectionable voters and putting on voters who will support the Government? Do they suppose the Conservative party are made of putty? Do they suppose that the rank and file of the party are going to subscribe to anything of the kind? I have more faith in the Conservative party than to believe that they will. Any gentleman who has ever played cricket, that noble, British game, will be astonished at a player trying to take a dishonorable advantage of an opponent. I wonder at a proposition of this kind being made in this British Parliament. What do the Government propose to do? They propose to disfranchise, in my riding, according to their property qualification, 155 people; but of course I do not know how many the revising barrister will refuse. But no doubt the gentleman who will oppose me will be able to tell those who will have a vote and those who will be struck off the list. I would be untrue to Premier stated about giving the Indians votes? Mr. Landerkin.

Canada, that I love so well, were I to allow a measure of this kind to become law, without indignantly protesting against its passage. Under this clause the property qualification in towns and cities is to be $300, in townships $200. In Ontario it is $200 and $100, a difference of $100 in each case. How many will that disfranchise? It may, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Tassé), be the means of your losing your seat, unless, of course, you are provided with a revising barrister, who will see that the lists are properly fixed. This clause brings up the principle of manhood suffrage, in favor of which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has given notice of motion. The law in Ontario almost amounts to manhood suffrage, and I believe the principle of manhood suffrage is very much to be preferred to this principle. Under this system you disfranchise many people who now have votes, many who, perhaps, have voted for years, who felt they had an interest in the country, and you deprive them of their right. A revolutionary spirit is abroad in this country. Where is it going to end? You give a vote to tenants of real property who pay $2 monthly or $6 quarterly. The Mowat Bill gives a vote to all who are rated on the assessment roll at $200 in cities and towns or $100 in villages and townships. Then, in this Bill there is no reference to the wage-earners, the workingmen of this country, unless they get $400 a year. In Ontario it is $250. That virtually gives the franchise to every workingman in Ontario, but at $400 a great many will be deprived of their votes. You, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Curran), have a few workingmen in your constituency, and are you to sit idly by while they are dis-franchised, when, under the provincial law of Ontario, they have a right to vote, feeling that they are free citizens, having an interest in the glory and renown of this country. Now, about the Indian. The Government propose to give the franchise to the Indian. The hon member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asked the First Minister for Some information as to the true meaning and intent of this Bill in that regard. I find from the Hansard what was there asked and answered:

"Mr. MILLS. What we are anxious to know is, whether the hon. gentleman proposes to give other than enfranchised Indians votes?

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

"Mr. MILLS. Indians residing on a reservation?

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; if they have the necessary property qualification.

"Mr. MILLS. An Indian who cannot make a contract for himself, who can neither buy nor sell anything without the consent of the Superintendent General—an Indian who is not enfranchised?

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whether he is enfranchised or not. "Mr. MILLS. This will include the Indians in Manitoba and British Columbia?

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

"Mr. MILLS. Poundmaker and Big Bear?

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes?

"Mr. MILLS. So that they can go from a scalping party to the polls?"

You see that the Premier proposed to give the franchise to the wild tribal Indians all through the country, and, if there is to be a change made in the Bill the country will be pleased to know that the effort which has been made by the Opposition has resulted in that change. If those who have scalping knives in their hands now were to have the ballot placed in their hands, and this has been prevented by the labors of the Opposition, our time here has not been misspent, our opposition has not been obstruction, but our labors have resulted in something which will prove a great boon, not only to the present but to the future welfare of this country. It appears that some hon, gentlemen did not think that such was the intention of the Act. The Premier has so explained it. He introduced the Bill and ought to know about it.

Mr. RYKERT. Will the hon gentleman read what the

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have just read it.

Mr. RYKERT. Read it a little further. Act fairly to the Premier.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have read all I have to read.

Mr. RYKERT. Read from bottom of column 1, page 1487.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Not just now.

Mr. RYKERT. You will not act fairly. Try and be fair, if you can.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for Lincoln should be the last man in the House to accuse anyone of being unfair. I have read the extract. I will show him what I have read from, if he will come over here. I have read all I had on the paper I had.

Mr. RYKERT. Read the whole of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not got it. How can I read it when I have not got it? He should not accuse me of being unfair without knowing what I have got. You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RYKERT. Read the other side of your paper.

Mr. LANDERKIN. There is nothing on the other side of my paper. It would be just as well if you would consider what you say before you accuse me of being unfair.

Mr. RYKERT. Will you allow me to read what the Hansard says?

Mr. LANDERKIN. You can, when I have done. I have read all I have, and then he accuses me because I do not read what I have not. That is about in keeping with the whole thing.

Mr. RYKERT. What have you got?

Mr. LANDERKIN. They charge us with obstructing this Bill because we are desirous to discuss it. We would as much like to be at home as they would, but we are bound, in the interests of our country, to stay here and discuss this Bill until we have it fairly understood by the people of this country. We do not desire to prolong this discussion. We have no object to serve, except to have it well understood by the people, so that they may know the nature of the legislation proposed by the Government and supported by hon, gentlemen behind them. There are many more clauses of this Bill, and I may have occasion to speak on some of them when we reach them, especially when we come to that clause which proposes to strike a blow at the liberty of the people, in the person of a revising barrister. I have not discussed that to-night because it has been ruled that we should not discuss the revising barrister on this clause, although it seems to me that everything pertaining to the making up of the lists would come under the question of the provincial franchise, and I should think it was clearly within the competency of a member to discuss it at this stage. However, as I am a staunch believer in parliamentary procedure, as I believe in adhering strictly to the rules of Parliament, and to the rules of order enunciated by the Chair, I will not refer to that now, but may speak upon it at a subsequent period. I would just say, in conclusion, that I oppose this Bill because it is wrong; I oppose this Bill because I believe it strikes a blow at the liberties of the people of this country; I oppose this Bill because it is un British; I oppose this Bill because I think it is an attempt to bolster up the party in power, who are afraid to go to the people on the record of their parliamentary legislation.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman would not allow me to read what the Premier stated when he was speaking on the Indian question to this House. Now, in order to give the antidote to the poison the hon, gentleman has placed member for Lincoln himself, believes that the Prime before the country, I will read an extract from the speech of the Premier. I have no doubt the hon, gentleman read from some fly sheet emanating from the Globe office. This is what the Premier stated, as I find it on page 1487 of the Hansard:

"I am sorry that the proposal to put in one word in this clause should excite the blatant indignation of hon. gentlemen, and move them to make such an exhibition of themselves in discussing the question of whether or not an Indian is a person. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, and the hon. member for Algoma, in his admirable and well-informed speech, has told us that many of these Indians are respectable, educated and worthy persons in every respect, and he knows perfectly well that the Bill can in no way apply to the savage nomads of the North-West. It is only designed to give a vote to those Indians who have the ostensible evidences of property which the white man can show—have houses, furniture, and civilised appliances of a certain value."

Now, the hon. member knew right well that the Premier did not intend to apply it to the savages of the North-West, and could not possibly so apply it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would the hon. member for Lincoln have the kindness to read what he said just before, and see if not more than twelve days elapsed between what he said then and what he said afterwards.

Mr. RYKERT. That shows how correct the hon. gentleman is. There were not over fifteen minutes between the two remarks.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it and see.

Mr. RYKERT. On page 1484 of the Hansard, on the same afternoon, I find the following:-

" Mr. MILLS. I rise to ask the hon, gentleman how we are to understand the word Indian  $\ref{eq:condition}$

And there is a little of what I call by-play on the part of the Premier, for he answered this:

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it, read it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Give it to me and I will read it.

Mr. RYKERT. I wish the hon, member would take his medicine quietly. The hon, gentleman has read exactly as it appears in the Hansard, at page 1484. I do not deny the correctness of what he has read, as taken from the Hansard. Those words appear here, but I say that the Premier was not in earnest when he made these remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RYKERT. I would like the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to keep quiet, if he possibly can.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Who gave you authority to say that? Did the First Minister give you authority to say that?

Mr. RYKERT. I believe the hon. gentleman now interrupting me is the gentleman who speaks upon both sides of every question. After the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) spoke; and immediately after that the hon. member for Bothwell made some remarks, extending over about 2 inches of the Hansard, and then the Premier delivered the observations I have read to this House. The hon. member for Bothwell must have known that he could not apply it to the North-West Territories, because they have no representation, and he must have known that the Premier could not have intended his observations to convey the idea that persons living in the North-West Territories could have a vote. He knew that right well. And the same afternoon, four or five minutes afterwards, the Premier made the remarks I have read. So I say it would have been much fairer for the hon, gentleman to have quoted the whole than only a part.

Mr. MILLS. I do not admit for a moment that any hon. gentleman on either side of the House, except the hon.

Minister did not mean precisely what he said when he answered the various questions which I put to him. He has never resiled from that position, substantially, from that hour to this. Now, I used some words that are not in the Hansard, but they appear in some of the newspapers. What I said, when I put the question with regard to the North-West Territories, was this: "So that when the North-West Territories are represented on the floor of this House, Poundmaker and Big Bear will be included." These are the words I used, and those are the words that appear in many newspapers. They were made with special reference to a former discussion in this House, where we had before us the question with regard to the representation of those Territories. The First Minister answered, in reply to that question, "Yes;" and the same answer with regard to the further question that was put to him. Now, when he saw what might be the probable effect of his observations upon the country, when he saw the profound impression that his observations made upon his own followers in this House, then the First Minister was disposed to resile from the position he had taken, and said that he did not intend to include the nomads of the plain. Nobody said he included the nomads of the plain. All those Indians are located upon reservations, and do not belong to the nomadic class of which the First Minister spoke. Then, the question was, whether he intended to include the Indians of Manitoba, and he said: "Yes;" British Columbia? "Yes;" he intended to represent all these. We know that the Indians of Manitoba are not a whit more civilised, except those who may reside on St. Peter's reservation, than the Indians of the North-West Territories. And the First Minister has, in a period more recent than the time he made the observation which has just been read, declared that he had not in view British Columbia and Manitoba when he made his provisions in the Bill. He makes no exception of any Province; and when he saw the probable consequence of his course, and knew what the feeling of the British Columbia members was on the question of the representation of Indians, and when he knew what would be the probable effect of giving representation to the Indians in Manitoba, then the First Minister was disposed to eat his own words, to give up the doctrine of uniformity, and to confine Indian representation to an attempt to swamp certain constituencies in the Province of Ontario. That is the position of the First Minister. The hon, gentleman may undertake to question it, but I say now he would be acting quite as worthily the part of a leader in this House, or of a statesman, in giving to the Indians of British Columbia and Manitoba representation, as to give it to some of the Indian tribes that he proposes to have represented in this House. What is the difference between the Indians on St. Peter's reservation, in Manitoba, and the Indians upon any reservation in Untario? The hon, gentleman knows that the representation of the Indians, by the provision of this Bill, is not to be confined to Indians who are enfranchised, and living like white men, but to Indians who reside on reservations; and if the reservation value is sufficient to give a vote to every Indian upon it, then such Indian will receive a vote. That is the position taken by the First Minister, and from that position he has refused to recede; and in reply to my hon, friend from South Brant, in contradiction of what was said by the hon, member for Algoma, the First Minister declared that, so far as the old Provinces are concerned, that was his intention and to that intention he has so far adhered.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, member for Lincoln referred us to page 1487, and read a small portion of the remarks made by the Premier. He then challenged the hon, member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to continue reading, but he took good care not to read what was said on page 1484. I will supply the deficiency. (The hon, gentleman Mr. Lianderkin.

here read from page 1484 of the official reports.) The only attempt to modify the Premier's expressions in this respect is the flimsy excuse set up that the Indian of the North-West will not have a vote. Certainly he will not; neither will the white man, until there is representation granted the North-West; but the Indians in Manitoba, the reserva-tion Indians in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, will have votes. The Premier has distinctly affirmed that they will, and the only Indians excepted from that assertion are the nomadic tribes of the plains of the North-West Territories, where there are no representative institutions. The discussion on this Bill distinctly proves that the purpose of the Government is to give, in any place where any British subject in the Dominion has a vote, the right to vote to Indians who are not enfranchised, who are not citizens, who are not paying taxes, who retain their tribal relations, who are barbarians, if need be. And when the North-West Territories are granted representation in this House, then the nomadic Indians of the North-West Territories also will have votes, under this Bill. They are only excluded from voting so long as those Territories are not given representation in Parliament. The hon. member for Lincoln, and those who side with him in this House, have met with very little success in explaining away this damning feature of this

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to say that some remarks of the hon, member for South Grey are entirely unfair and misleading. First, I will refer to the allusion he has made to the nature of the revising barristers that may be appointed. I may say, in general, in reference to the remarks of the Opposition on this point, that they all appear to harp on the same string; they argue from the entirely illogical and unfair basis that every barrister of five years' standing, and every judge who may be appointed to discharge the duties of a barrister, is either a scoundrel or a rogue. The hon. member waxed eloquent over that part of it, when he said that it was a direct insult to the farmers, and to the people generally, of this country, to say that the power would be taken out of their hands. Is it not a greater insult to the county court judge of Grey, a part of which the hon. member represents, and the barristers of that county of five years' standing, to say that they are invariably either tools or rogues, who, when sworn to do their duty, are not fit to be trusted? Which is the greater insult? I think it is a disgrace to this House to throw out such an insinuation towards the judges of this country who have discharged their duties so faithfully and satisfactorily to the people of this country, and also to the revising barristers, because only men who have five years' professional standing are eligible to be appointed, under this Bill. I assume that human nature is not so depraved; that we have honest men in the country, men who respect their oath sufficiently to do their duty fairly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). They are not under oath in the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand that they have to take oath to do their duty faithfully.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon, member should read the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. That is a remark which the members of the Opposition invariably hurl across the floor of the House—that the members who support the Government have not read the Bill. The hon, member for North Brant has said it, and the hon, members for South Brant and South Grey have said it, and they appeared to think that it was very smart to say: "I venture to say that the hon, gentlemen have not read the Bill."

Mr. PATERSON. It is in the schedule.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon, gentleman, who has consumed hours after hours in this debate, will keep his temper for a moment and stop howling, I should like to proceed. The hon, gentleman from South Grey says it is an insult to the electors of his county to say that 155 of them, who have been voting in the past, shall be cut off by this Bill. He has overlooked, or is disingenuous enough not to say that there has never been one in his county who voted on an assessment of $150.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I stated that under the present Onterio Act, which comes in force, I presume, next winter, they will have the right to vote.

Mr. SPROULE. You did not say a word about when it comes in force.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I said that under the Ontario Act, where the assessment is $100, everyone of these 155 would have a vote.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman's statement was that these people would be cut off, and that it is an insult to the electorate of South Grey.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I say it is.

Mr. SPROULE. He went on to say that they would be cut off by this Act, because they had been voting under the law of Ontario. When have they voted under a franchise of $150 or $100? There has never been such a vote cast in the county of Grey. And if it was cut down by the Mowat Act to $100, I say this is the first time we have heard of it. Now, with reference to the hon. gentleman's calculation about expense: He first calculated that it would cost $7,000 for revising barristers each year, and he says, if he capitalised that amount, it would represent $70,000 capital, or about one-third of the railway indebtedness of the county of Grey.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I said, of my own riding.

Mr. SPROULE. A short time ago I saw some of the speeches sent out to that county, showing that by his own calculations the additional amount which would be paid owing to the grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway, would be no less than $150,000 in the south riding of Grey. He overlooks the fact that the county of Grey is indebted, besides that amount of $300,000, to one railway, with the exception of a little which has been paid—that it is indebted to another railway a large amount, and according to his own calculations that he made a short time ago in this House, the county of Grey, outside of what he said about the Canadian Pacific Railway's indebtedness, was indebted for railways no less than $750,000. He says the cost of the revising barrister represents one-third of the railway indebtedness of the county, which is about as near correct as the calculations of the hon. gentleman usually are. Now, I wish to make a remark with reference to a statement made by the hon, member for North Grey on this question. He spoke of 700 Indians in his own county, who were to be enfranchised. Now, where are those Indians?

Mr. ALLEN. I said my country—I did not say county.

Mr. SPROULE. I took it from Hansard, and it stands there to his record, but when the papers began to criticise it, it may be convenient——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a point of order. The hon, gentleman said he did not say county but country, so the hon, member is bound to take his statement. He must not persist in putting words in his mouth which he says he did not use.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon, gentleman is getting peevish. He wants to philosophise.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the hon. gentleman's point of order.

Mr. MILLS. Will the hon, gentleman take his seat.

Mr. CHARLTON. Sit down.

Mr. MILLS. My point of order is the one I have already taken. The hon. member for North Grey says he used the word country and not county, and the hon. gentleman persists in accusing him of falsehood, which he has no right to do.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the point of order?

Mr. MILLS. That is the point of order, Mr. Chairman; and I ask for your ruling.

Mr. HESSON. He is quoting from Hansard.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Curran). The hon, gentleman is obliged to accept the explanation.

Mr. SPROULE. If hon, gentlemen had not been so peevish, if they had given me time to finish the sentence, I was going on to say that I would accept his correction, but that the undeniable statement was standing to his record; that the papers had criticised it, and that now it might be convenient to change it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to order.

Mr. SPROULE. These hon. gentlemen are very peevish.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, gentleman reiterates the charge of falsehood in refusing to take back the words, and in saying that it is convenient now to change what he says is on record against him.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman said it might be convenient; he did not make the assertion. I was careful to notice his words.

Mr. RYKERT. Always wrong.

Mr. SPROULE. These hon, gentlemen will not sit quietly, for this happens to touch them. I accept the hon, gentleman's statement that he said "700 Indians in my own country." What does that mean? The hon, member for West Elgin says there are something like 20,000 Indians in the country.

Mr. RYKERT. 90,000.

Mr. SPROULE. If he refers to the country, I say a great many people in the county of Grey understood that it referred to his constituency. I found out, as far as I could get the information, that there were about 100 Indians, and out of that number the probability is that there would not be twenty votes. This, however, is only on a par with the calculations, or, I might say, with the exaggerations, which are used with regard to this Bill. The hon member for South Grey waxes very eloquent, very earnest, very angry. He talked loudly and boister-ously; he used hard names and insinuations against the supporters of the Government, because he said they were there registering the decrees of the Government. He went on to say that parliamentary usage would not allow him to make use of stronger language. Judging from his looks at the time, he felt much like the old man who used to be a great swearer, and who was going up hill one day with a load of pumpkins. The hill one day with a load of pumpkins. The boys pulled the end board out of his waggon, and the pumpkins all rolled down hill. He looked on in silent amazement, and some of his friends standing near, and knowing how he usually expressed himself, said: Why don't you swear? He replied that he could not do justice to the occasion. The hon, gentleman says that he was sorry to say parliamentary rules bound him, or else likely we would have had a tirade of another kind of language from what we have been treated to. It reminded me much of the last clause of a text which was given out once by a preacher of a certain nationality. There are a certain class of people in this country who are in the habit of using the pronoun immediately after the noun, and this gentleman belonged to that nationality. He endeavored to preach a sermon, and the text was: "The devil goeth about lik a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour." This gentleman endeavored to divide his text into four heads. "First," he said, "We shall endeavor to ascertain who the devil he was. Secondly, we shall enquire into his geographical position—where the devil he was going; thirdly, who the devil he was seeking; and fourthly and lastly, we shall endeavor to solve the question, which has never yet been solved, what the devil he was roaring about."

It appears to me that the wrath and indignation of the hon. gentleman was worked up out of nothing-that there was no justifiable reason for it. But he had to obey the mandate that was given out; he had to use so much time; he had only spoken seven times before, and he had to speak again, and he had to create an appearance of honesty and of a disposition to do something in the interests of his constituents and his country. So he must work himself into a state of wrath, he must compel the Chairman to call him to order time after time, in the course of his speech. Still, if you examine that speech and the arguments he was using, you could not see what he was roaring about—what he was using such harsh names about. Was it on account of the fact that the judge of the county of Grey, who is likely to be the revising barrister, is going to be a rogue, a dishonest man, that he would not do justice to the two parties. Was it because of the host of respectable men who have been barristers for five years, and who are likely to be appointed as revising barristers in this country. Did that entitle him to display the indignation which he displayed in his remarks to night? Was it with reference to the number of electors that he says will be cut off in his constituency—155, as he says. I say, emphatically, and I have gone over the list, that I have no doubt that if the Bill passes, and it will pass, if a vote is taken in the south riding of Grey there will be found to be more voters in it than there are to-day. I will stake my reputation in this House upon that statement, and I have no doubt I will have the opportunity of drawing the hon. gentleman's attention to this statement at some future time in his own constituency. But it is used for the purpose of getting up indignation among the people, for the purpose of getting them to send petitions down here, so that we can see that there are petitions coming in from the country-something like those we have heard about in Toronto that are being signed at the rate of 15 cents a hundred names, and are sent down here to show the great indignation of the people against the Bill. The hon. gentleman says: Submit this measure to the people; but I would like to ask if Mr. Mowat submitted his measure to the people.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, it was never heard of in the county of Grey, that I know of; and I think that measure is as revolutionary in its nature as this. It was taken up in the Local Legislature, and the gentlemen opposing it carried on their opposition to it in a manly, straightforward way. Where they believed it was not right the protested against it, but they did not display that unseemly conduct which we have seen in this House for several weeks past, and which has been used for the only purpose of annoying the Government and causing delay by open obstruction. They protested against the measure and let it pass; they did not ask Mr. Mowat to submit it to the people. With reference to the Indian question, it seems to be necessary for these hon. gentlemen to endevor to explain themselves away on that question time and again. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) got up and read so much of the Hansard as suited his purpose. And although the Premier, in answer to the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), stated that the Bill would only enfranchise those Indians who had the proper qualification under the Bill, the hon, gentleman did not refer to that in his reference to the Indian question. The hon. member for Norfolk says we know very well the Indians cannot vote in the North-West; and yet, in the same breath, he says: Did not the Premier say that Poundmaker and Big Bear were to vote? How much knowledge of geography does the hon. gentleman display when he says: We know that the Indians in the North-West Territories cannot vote; and yet he says these men can vote. He knows that these men are in the North-West Territories, and it was never intended that they were to vote unless they settled down like white men and acquired the same qualifications. When an Indian is in that position he is entitled to a vote, and not till then. The hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) says these Indians do not pay taxes, and therefore ought not to vote. What taxes? Municipal taxes. Well, we are not talking about municipal government; it is Mr. Mowat who has to deal with that subject; and yet the hon. gentleman tells us, almost in the same breath that Mr. Mowat has enfranchised these Indians. We are not regulating the franchise according to those who pay municipal taxes; we are regulating the franchise for the Dominion of Canada, and the taxes these Indians pay to the Dominion of Canada are the taxes they pay on the dutiable goods they consume, the same as any other man in this country; and if they have the property qualification required by the Act, and are endeavoring to get along, why should they not have the same right as the white man to say who shall make the laws which affect them for their weal or woe? To my mind, if there is one thing more than another that will tend to elevate the Indian from the savage state he is in, and to raise him to the same level as the white man, it is to give him the same responsibilities and privileges; and this Bill will go a long way towards it. I think the Government has been doing wrong in making the enfranchisement of the Indian so strict and so difficult as they have done in the Indian Act; and I am glad this Bill goes further, and enfranchises the Indians under a new principle that is much fairer to them, and will be likely to do them a great deal of good. Now, I only got up to say that in the county of Grey every elector who voted during the last election, unless he has disposed of his property since or has gone out of his tenancy, or in some other way has become deprived of what he then possessed, will have a vote undis this law, when it comes in force. I think it is an insult to the judges of this country and to the men who are eligible as revising barristers to assume that every man who is appointed to one of those positions will be so dishonest that he will not do fairly between the parties. These gentlemen would be showing greater respect if they assumed that there was some honesty in human nature, and that these men are not rogues until they are proved to be rogues. It is time enough to hurl maledictions against these men when they have shown that they are unable to discharge their duties fairly between the parties, and not till then. I do not regard this provision in the same light as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that it is an insult to the municipal officers of this country, because we say that the municipal assessment roll shall be taken as the basis of the franchise, and appoint other parties than the municipal officers to make up the lists. I do not think it is an insult to them, and they will not recognise it in that light. When the measure comes into force the people will be able to appreciate the great amount of nonsense which has been talked in this House, and the useless debate which has been carried on, night after night and week after week, by the Opposition, in reference to this measure. A few years of trial of this measure will convince the people of the insincerity of the Opposition or their great want of intelligence in this debate.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to say a few words by way of explanation in reference to statements made by my hon, friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). If I understand parliamentary rules, when a gentleman denies a statement, unless the member who makes the accusation can prove the contrary, that denial is accepted. I am sorry that my hon, friend from East Grey has not accepted my statement as true.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to relieve the hon. gentleman's mind. I accepted his statement long ago.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). In a parliamentary sense.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I find that the report of my speech on the Indian question in the Hansard states that I said: "My county." That report is incorrect; I said: "My country," and I then spoke in reference to the Saugeen Peninsula, in the county of Bruce. I think the hon, gentleman will remember that I spoke of the small majority a member would have in North Bruce, and said that the franchise provided by this Bill would certainly give those Indians the control of that riding, so that the representative here will be the representative of the Indians, and not of the white people of that county. That is the statement I made; I made no correction of my speech in the Hansard, and the mistake has gone. But in reference to the franchise, I believe that, as we understood the Act of Confederation, it was intended that each Province should send its representatives to this Parliament to transact the business of the different Provinces, independent of any control over the voters lists by the Parliament of Canada. The way the country understands, the way the farmers understand the Confederation Act, is that they should send their members independently, that they are the parties who should make out the voters' lists, without any meddling on our part. I believe that the great majority of my county, on both sides of politics, will stand up and declare that the franchise should be left as it is, and the voters' lists be made up by the municipalities. They will protest against so enormous an expense being imposed upon the people as will be by the present Government, under the revising barrister clause; they will refuse to accept any such measure; and if we went to the country to-morrow on this measure I am sure those in favor of it would be elected to stay at home.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Lincoln stated that the conversation that took place between the hon. First Minister and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was only by play. I do not think it was so intended by the First Minister. After that debate had gone on twenty-four hours, and after the First Minister had made that statement, I am credited in Hansard with putting the following question to the First Minister: "I understood that the First Minister stated that the word 'Indian' in this Bill, would include those living on reserves; while the hon member for Algoma says it means halfbreeds; and, as the First Minister is present, I would like to ask him for an explanation on that point." The First Minister replied: "An Indian is certainly not a half-breed, and a half-breed is not an Indian." I then asked: "Is it the intention to enfranchise the Indians living on the reserves, who do not pay taxes to the municipality, but are the wards of the Government?" And the right hon. gentie man said: "I answered that question last night." The answer to which he referred was given in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who asked: "This will include Indians in Manitoba and British Columbia?" And the First Minister answered: "Yes." So that I think the hon. member for Lincoln is not correct in trying to make the meaning of the words: enfranchised Indians living on reserves in Manitoba.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to address the House shortly to offer a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). He charged the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) with having cast a slur on the county judges, in charging them, as revising barristers, with a possibility of doing anything improper. In the first place, the judges are not mentioned in the Bill at all. The Bill simply refers to revising officers.

Mr. SPROULE. The right hon. the First Minister, in answer to a question across the House, said that, wherever available, there would be revising officers. They are available in almost every county in Ontario.

Mr. MILLS. There are forty judges, while we have ninety constituencies.

Mr. SPROULE. Those forty judges would be used.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are dealing with the Bill before us, and it distinctly states revising officers. A few evenings ago an hon. gentleman on the opposite side remarked he would not trust any Grit assessor. The hon. member for Lincoln said: "Neither would I, from my experience, trust a Grit assessor." If that is his experience with regard to Grit assessors, I would like to know on what grounds he can reasonably expect us to accept Tory assessors, because, virtually, revising officers will be Tory assessors, and they will have full power to say who shall and who shall not vote. They will also be vested with the power of deciding whether a property is of sufficient value to enable the holder to vote on it. If the revising barrister chooses to say that a property which is assessed at $250 is not worth over $150. the owner of that property will not be put on the roll.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) I understood the hon, gentleman to say that the judges were not mentioned in the Act. On page 9 he will find that judges may be appointed. It is only right I should draw the hon, gentleman's attention to that fact, before he goes on making use of the term "Tory assessors."

Mr. McMULLEN. The Act distinctly provides that revising officers shall be appointed. They are called revising officers, but the Government reserve to themselves the right of saying whether they shall appoint judges or not. They do not say judges shall be appointed, but they simply mention, by way of courtesy, perhaps, to the judges, that in cases where they are eligible the Government reserve the right of saying whether they shall appoint them or not. If they use the word "shall" instead of the word "may," it might be inconvenient, for there might be judges who would not make as acceptable officers as barristers would, and therefore the Government reserve the right of appointing or not appointing judges, according as political exigencies demand. The hon. member from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) took the opportunity to belittle the remarks, and the manner in which they were delivered, of my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). He related a story in regard to a sermon, and he tried to get a laugh about that. As far as loud talking is concerned, I think the member for East Grey can compete with any member of this House. He reminds me of the story I once heard myself of an Indian who was once going through a bush, and he came across, and it was the first time he had ever seen, a cow bell, and he lifted it up and gave it a rattle, and he looked at it, and he said: "You are a long tongued, empty-headed beggar." I do not apply the story any further, but I think the hon, gentleman showed very little courtesy to his professional neighbor who represents a different constituency in the same county. He also gave a story in regard to the pumpkin. I have often heard that story, and I dare say every member in this House has heard it. There was once a cute lawyer who put a question to a man to test his ability to give evidence in court: "Who made you?" The answer was: "Moses, I suppose." The witness Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to address the House shortly asked that he might ask the lawyer a question, and he said on this question, but before proceeding to refer to it 1 wish yes. "Who made you?" "Aaron, I suppose," "Well," said would think the darned critter would have wandered in here?" We have heard the story of the pumpkin, but no one would imagine that one of the pumpkins would have rolled in here. I do not say it did, but it looks like it. Mr. Mowat is charged with not having brought this question of the franchise before the Province of Ontario before he introduced it into the Local House. That is not correct. I had an opportunity before of addressing this House on that question, and drawing the atttention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that Mr. Mowat discussed that question at a convention held in Toronto before the last general election. A number of resolutions were adopted at that convention, including a resolution in reference to the franchise, and when he went to the country that was one of the planks of his platform, and he has since carried out that extension of the franchise. I desire to draw the attention of the hon. member for Lincoln to the fact that, in a reference he made to some remarks of mine, he did not quote my utterances correctly. I was not present at the time, but I find that he said:

"'But,' says the hon. member for North Wellington, 'we are prepared to accept the franchise as it now exists in Ontario, no matter how it may be changed in the future."

That is an incorrect quotation. I am not prepared to say that the hon, gentleman intended to quote me incorrectly. but I did not utter those words, and the hon. gentleman must have had his Hansard before him, and had he read from Hansard he would have seen that these were not my words. The words I used were:

"For my part, I would be willing to accept an amendment which would provide that, if we do adopt the provincial franchise at the present time, the Provinces would not have the power to alter that franchise by any restrictive measure without concurrent action on the part of this House."

In quoting from any speech, hon, members should be careful not to misquote. I also desire to correct another statement of the hon. gentleman. He made a great many quotations from the Globe newspaper of many years ago, on the question of income tranchise, and he attempted to prove that the Globe was opposed to income franchise. He said:

"So you will see that while to-day they profess to be favorable to granting the franchise to a large body of the electors, they have systematically opposed a reduction of the franchise. I think I can satisfy the House that every reduction of the franchise that has been granted by the Reform party was at the instance of the Conservative party, and only when the Reform party was driven into the last ditch. Now, Sir, we find that the organ of the party, at that time, had the same view upon this question. On the 27th November, 1868, we find this language:

"If he (Mr. Sandfield Macdonald) would take the trouble to enquire as to the practical effect of his $400 real estate franchise in Toronto, where it will include nearly all but the very poorest tenements, he would be able to see that he is enfranchising, in this city alone, hundreds of persons who are, to say the least, no more worthy to be enfranchised than the class he resolutely excludes."

He does not quote the whole passage, but simply what suits himself. He garbles the quotation. I will give you the whole clause from the Globe:

"While announcing a reduction of the franchise in cities, so as to include tenants assessed for real property to the amount $400, Mr. Attorney-General Macdonald declared most distinctly that he would not assent to any franchise based upon income or salary."

This is the portion which he quotes:

"If he would take the trouble to enquire as to the practical effect of his $400 real estate franchise in Toronto, where it will include nearly all but the very poorest class of tenements, he would be able to see that he is enfranchising, in this city alone, hundreds of persons who are, to say the least, no more worthy to be enfranchised than the class he so resolutely excludes.'

Then, allow me to give the balanco:

"Than those who would be admitted by a franchise based upon a moderate income, say $400 or $500 a year. The clerks, salesmen, teachers, mechanics and others, who are in receipt of such income and yet are deprived of the franchise because they are not householders, are as independet and intelligent as any other class of voters in the city. What can be the secret of Mr. Macdonald's hostility to an income franchise?" Mr. McMullen.

the man, "we understand that Aaron made a calf, but who It is just the very reverse of what the hon, gentleman quoted. In order to make a point, he garbles one little sentence that suits him and quotes it to the House and says nothing about the rest. I sent over yesterday a messenger of the House to ask the hon. gentleman kindly to favor me with the Hansard report of 1868; and he sent back word by the messenger that he had taken it down to his house after he made his speech, so I could not get it. I suppose the hon. gentleman felt that, perhaps, if it feel into the hands of some persons it might be made to tell tales that would not be creditable to him, and so to protect himself against my correcting him, he kept the book, and it has not been seen by anybody but himself. But I happened to go into the Library to hunt up the Globe, and I have now quoted from the Globe to show that he garbled the passage and made it the very opposite.

> Mr. RYKERT. The hon, gentleman has said that I stated I had carried it home. I said nothing of the kind.

> Mr. McMULLEN. The boy came back and told me you said it was at your house.

> Mr. RYKERT. The page came and asked me if I had the scrap book of 1868, and I told him I had it in my library. He did not say a word about the Hansard.

Mr. McMULLEN. I told the page to ask the hon. gentleman what I have said, and I have no doubt he did ask him, because the hon. gentleman is too well posted to be ignorant of the fact that there was no Hansard in 1868. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln stated to the House that he was the first man who introduced the income tranchise in the Ontario Legislature, which was in 1868, and I do not find that the hon, gentleman introduced any Bill that year with regard to the franchise, although, perhaps, I may have overlooked it. The first man who introduced the subject into the Legislature was a gentleman named Perry, who introduced a resolution with regard to the income franchise. The hon. gentleman has stated that it was only when the Grit party were driven into the last ditch that they ever accepted any extension of the franchise. What was the vote on that occasion? Every Conservative of the House voted against that extension, but two, and the Refermers voted for it. And if you go over all his speech, you will find that nine out of ten of the hon. gentleman's statements are garbled statements for a purpose. Now, Sir, I hold that when you take away from the people the rights they have in any constituency, of saying who shall vote, you are striking at the principles of British liberty. We have had a Franchise Act in force ever since Confederation, and there is not the slightest evidence of any necessity for a change. No fault has been found, no petition has been sent in and no remonstrances have been made. It appears that hon, gentlemen think that at the next general election they are going to accomplish a good deal by means of this measure, and that they are going to get the inside track of their political opponents, but I am inclined to think that the people of this country will give them as supprise the people of this country will give them a surprise in that respect. If I know anything of the feeling of the people they are not favorable to a system that will put under the control of any lawyer, no matter how respectable, the power of saying who shall vote and who shall not. I do not wish to disparage lawyers. They are a necessary—I was going to say, evil—they are a necessary class, and occupy a prominent position. At the same time, it is well known that the electors in rural districts have no particular love for lawyers; and you will find that, when you subject the people to the necessity of holding their right to vote at the will of a revising officer, a strong feeling of resentment will prevail throughout the country. I hold that this measure is unwise, from a financial point. Hon, gentlemen opposite have endeavored to show that the expense will not be so much as we have claimed it would be. The hon. member for Lincoln undertook to show that the expense incurred by the members of this House in discussing this measure was more than the expense of the revising officers would be for the first year. Now, I deny that any member of this House will get more than his ordinary sessional allowance if he remains here for the purpose of discussing this Bill. I do not think a single servant of this House, that the Clerk of the House, or the Hansard reporters, will get any more, by reason of the pro-longation of this Session. Now, the people will be called upon to submit to a great expense under the operations of this Act. Once you fix the salary of a revising officer for the first year, and of his clerk and bailiff, and you will have great difficulty in keeping it down to that point. If you were fixing it at a very low sum you might possibly be able to prevent an increase, but where you fix a sum which will be necessary in order to discharge the duty the first year, you will find afterwards great difficulty in reducing it. Not only that, but revising officer will exercise a very desireable influence to cultivate. He will, no doubt, be a desireable man to be on good terms with, and, no doubt, the candidates, particularly the Conservative candidate, will feel it his duty to see him recouped for the very valuable services he is likely to render. There will be a Conservative association in every constituency, aided by a Government allowance; the revising officer will be ex officio the president of that association, or will discharge that duty. His ear will be open to receive suggestions with regard to changes to take place; and, as has already been stated by the hon. member for South Grey, where an opportunity occurs for erasing the name of a Reform voter, without exciting particular alarm, the chances are that that name will not be found on the list when the day of voting comes; and where there is a Conservative that it is desireable to have on the list, you will often find, I have no doubt, the name, in some peculiar way that no one can explain, or nobody is aware of but those who are in the secrets, will be on the list on polling day. I contend that in this way the duties of the revising barrister can be made very valuable to a member who is running for the constituency. In some constituencies, possibly, the revising officer may discharge his duty in a spirt of fairness, where there can be nothing accomplished, where it will not be possible by any act of his to materially affect a large majority; but where the numbers are very close in a constituency, and a few votes added to or taken from the list would be of vital importance, I have no doubt there will be quite a number of Reform votes missing on polling day. Hon. gentlemen may feel a little reluctant, as they have expressed it, to remain here for the purpose of discussing this measure; but I believe they are doing more in the direction of securing their seats at the next general election by pressing and urging this Bill through than they possibly could do if they went home. I am quite sure they believe so, and that if they get this law through they will be benefited very materially. They feel that it will be the best organisation they have ever had in this Dominion, and I have no doubt they will find it of great value. It, at least, will place the Conservative party in this position, that they can rest on their oars, and there will be no necessity for hunting up the voters' list and seeing that their friends are on, of looking after the different polling sub-divisions, and seeing that the names of their friends are on the list. The revising officer will look after that. But the poor Reformer will have to do all the hunting up and coaxing, and if they make an appeal the probability will be that they will have their trouble for their pains and accomplish nothing. You may say that we are making an unnecessary fuss about this; but our experience in the past has been that when hon. gentlemen opposite make up their minds to do anything which will benefit in the past has been that when hon agentlemen opposite make up their minds to do anything which will benefit in the past has been that when hon agentlemen opposite make up their minds to do anything which will benefit in the probability will be that they will have their trouble for their trouble for their circles. Since my last evening despatch to you I have ascertained some particulars of our victory, which was most complete. I have myself counted twelve half-breeds on the field, and we have four wounded breeds in hospital and two Sioux. Among the wounded breeds in hospital and two Sioux. Among the wounded breeds in hospital and Gabriel Dumont left as soon as they saw us getting well in, but cannot ascertain for certain on which side of the river he is but think must themselves they generally do it well. When they made up their minds, in 1882, to arrange the constituencies of this Dominion, particularly in Ontario, they did it well. It gave them some members in this House who probably would not otherwise have had the honor of sitting here. But some of the constituencies did not do what was expected of them, and as they would like to persuade them on a future occasion that they ought to do. Under this Franchise Bill, when it passes, there may be found some constituencies, after all, which will not come up to hon. members' expectations, notwithstanding the voters' lists have been carefully prepared, and numbers added to them who would not otherwise have been entitled to vote, and others omitted who should vote. After all, the people will feel an inherent sense of honor, and will not permit themselves to be led round to accomplish the ends which hen, gentlemen have in view in placing this law on the While we may differ in this House on poli-Statute Book. tical issues, and as to the course which we think ought to be pursued in the government of this country, if there is one thing above another with which we ought to deal fairly, honestly and openly, it is in going to the country for the purpose of obtaining the verdict of the people. I say a jury, free from any restriction, is the one before which we should desire to appear. As to-morrow is a holiday, and it is now midnight, I suppose it is the desire of the committee that the Speaker take the Chair.

Committee rose and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 15th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

Mr. TROW. This Bill, which has been under discussion for several days, the Franchise Bill, has created, apparently, great excitement throughout the country. I do not know how many copies have been issued, but I know numbers of letters are received daily by members, from people on the other side of politics, stating they are most anxious to ascertain the contents of the Bill, and that not a single copy could be got for love or money during the past two weeks. I move that authority be given to the Government Printer to furnish 5,000 additional copies of the Franchise Bill for the use of members.

Mr. SPEAKER. That motion will go to the Printing Committee without being put.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CARON. I desire to read to the House a full report, at least, a more lengthened report, of the battle at Batoche which I have received from the General, and which, I think, will be of interest to the House:

"14th MAY, 1885.

"To Hon A. P. Caron,

be this side. The extraordinary skill displayed making rifle pits at the be this side. The extraordinary skill displayed making rifle pits at the exact proper points, and the number of them, is very remarkable, and had we advanced rashly or heedlessly I believe we might have been destroyed. As I told you, I reconnoitted to my right front with all my mounted men yesterday morning, with a view to withdrawing as many of their men from my left attack, which was the key of position, and on my return to camp forced on my left, and then advanced the whole line with a cheer and a dash worthy of the soldiers of any army. The effect was remarkable. The enemy in front of our left was forced back from pit to pit, and those in the strongest pit, facing east, found them turned and our men behind them: then commenced a saure our neglet and they pit to pit, and those in the strongest pit, facing east, found them turned and our men behind them; then commenced a sauve qui peut and they fied, leaving blankets, coats, hats, boots, trousers, and even guns, in their pits. The conduct of troops was beyond praise, the Midland and 10th Regiments vieing with each other, well supported by the 90th and flanked by the mounted portion of troops. The artillery and gatling also assisted in the attack with good effect.

"When all behaved so well, it might appear inviduous to mention particular names; still, there are always some who, by good luck, are brought prominently before the eye of the commanding officer, and these names I shall submit to you later on. My staff cave me every assistance.

names I shall submit to you later on. My staff gave me every assistance, and were most energetic and zealous. The medical arrangements under Brigade Surgeon Orton, were, as usual, most excellent and efficiently and were most energetic and zealous. The medical arrangements under Brigade Surgeon Orton, were, as usual, most excellent and efficiently carried out. I have to regret the death of three officers, as well as two soldiers, but they died nobly and well. I found no want of ammunition among the enemy or food, in spite of what has been said to the contrary, and we found large quantities of powder and shot. Nearly the whole of the rebels' families were left, and are encamped close to the river bank. They were terribly frightened, but I have reassured them and protected them. There is a report that Gabriel Dumont is killed, but I do not believe it, though I think it likely he is wounded. One of the killed has been recognized as Donald Ross. one of the council. Yesterday evening, just as the action was finished, the Northcote and Marquis steamers arrived up, the latter having twenty-five police on board It appears that the Northcote had a hard time of it, as the rebels fired at it very heavily, and though it was well fortified, the rebels managed to wound two men slightly. The Northcote got on a shoal for a short time, but managed to keep the enemy off and to get off themselves. Finding that, owing to the barges alongside, they could not go up stream again, they decided to run down to the Hudson Bay crossing, get rid of them, and return. At the crossing they found the other steamer, and came up together. This morning I sent out a letter addressed to Riel, as follows:—

""BATOCHE, 11th May.

" BATOCHE, 11th May. "'Mr. RIEL,—I am ready to receive you and your council and to protect you until your case has been decided upon by the Dominion Government.

"I cannot, of course, be certain, but I am inclined to think the complete smash of the rebels will have pretty well broken the back of the plete smash of the rebells will have pretty well broken the back of the rebellion; at any rate it will, I trust, have dispelled the idea that half-breeds and Indians can withstand the attack of resolute whites, properly led, and will tend to remove the unaccountable scare that seems to have entered into the minds of so many in the North-West, as regards the prowess and powers of fighting of the Indians and breeds. There is not a sign of the enemy on either side of the river for miles.

FRANCHISE BILL PETITIONS.

Mr. CHARLTON. It has always been known that parliamentary bodies have treated petitions with respect and decency. The only exception that I remember, as to any English-speaking body, was when the United States House of Representatives refused to receive petitions asking for the abolition of slavery. Some petitions which were presented here to-day were greeted with derisive shouts and cries of "fifteen cents a hundred," and one gentleman to my left, when, in a petition presented by the hon, member for Wentabout Christian politicians and other fanatics. Whatever may be our opinion in reference to the Franchise Bill, there is certainly a great deal of excitement in regard to it, and the excitement is increasing, and if the citizens of Canada choose to petition Parliament on the subject, their petitions should be received with politeness and deterence.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. A Bill of this importance cannot receive, at the hands of any member of this House, too much I all our legislation having been in the direction of giving the Mr. CARON.

consideration. It is highly desirable, in the interests of the freedom and the rights of the citizens of this Dominion, that we should carefully consider its several provisions. Hon, gentlemen opposite have expressed surprise at the course that we have considered it our duty to pursue in the discussion of this measure. While we have been criticising it and pointing out the several features we consider objectionable, they have sat still, and turned a deaf ear, and have not endeavored, except in a few instances, to justify the peculiar provisions of the Bill. We claim that, before a Bill of this kind is passed, it is highly desirable that there should be shown to exist some necessity for it, either by petitions on the part of the people or by some evidence that the people are dissatisfied with the law that has now been in force in this Dominion for so many years. The fact that no such evidence has been presented shows that the Government has some sinister motive in view in insisting upon the passage of this Bill. We claim that the Government has a personal and party object to gain by pressing this measure at this time. Some hon, members opposite have characterised the reasonable criticism that we have made on this side as obstruction, and as an attempt to waste the time of the House. Now, we claim that there are, outside this House, certain individuals who have voluntarily, and in an independent way, expressed their opinion of this Bill; we claim that men who have been associated with the Conservative party for many years, men of an independent mind, men who appreciate British liberty and British rights, have plainly expressed themselves as opposed to this measure. I would take the liberty of reading a letter that has been written by Mr. D. B. Read, of Toronto, a lawyer of good standing, a man who has been recognised for years as a prominent Conservative, who, I believe, is a Queen's counsellor, high up in his profession, and is respected, I have no doubt, by every Conservative in this House, and by the First Minister himself. (The hon member here read the letter condemnatory of the Franchise Bill). That of itself is very strong evidence that the feeling is not altogether confined to Reformers. That is evidence of a fair-minded, honest man, who has given this subject long and impartial consideration, who has clearly expressed his views with respect to the evil results of the office of revising barrister. It is a just cause of complaint on our part that a law of this one-sided kind, which will give one party absolute power to control the entire votes of the Dominion, is a dangerous and pernicious law. It is wrong, unwise and unjust, and reflects upon the party now in power, that they, having such a large majority in this House, are afraid to appeal to the people on fair and equal terms, and have their conduct judged by the grand jury of the country, without endeavoring first to pack the jury. They appear determined to have the advantage in every case. It is to be regretted that hon, gentlemen opposite have no more idea of political honesty and fair play than to attempt to place the Reformers in a disadvantageous position by this Act. It is our right and worth, the highly respectable name of Dr. Laing was our duty to oppose the passage of such a law. There has mentioned as one of the signers, made an insulting remark not been a moment lost in criticising this Bill. It is our about Christian politicians and other fauatics. Whatever duty to offer criticism. The hon, member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), said that if we were prepared to offer suggestions no doubt they would be received. During three weeks we have been offering suggestions and pointing out serious objections to the measure; but our objections and suggestions have not been acted upon. We are quite willing to assume the responsibility of criticising this Bill from day to day, and when compelled to go to the country, with all the odds against us that this Bill will give, we can honestly claim that we endeavored to prevent the evils of this Bill. The revising barrister is one of the most objectionable features of this measure. It is contrary to all legislation that has taken place in this country for twenty years, people a fuller right to govern themselves. Instead of retrograde legislation such as this, should have granted the people more privileges and rights than they already possess. It is absolutely necessary in a new country like ours, that members representing constituencies should come here untrammelled by legislation, should come here by the free will of the people. constituencies this Bill will have the effect of enabling revising barristers to act as partisans. Under our present election law the value of property is fixed for assessment purposes. Under this Bill it will be fixed simply for the purpose of Dominion elections. The revising barrister will be able to sit down quietly and consider whether a certain man's property is worth $150, he can claim the right to say that it is not worth that amount, if such a decision should suit his convenience as a party politician. say in all cases this will be done and that all the appointments are going to be of such ultra-partisans as would experience that power. But it is dangerous to place that power in anyone's hands. The present system of preparing voters' lists has worked admirably. No evidence has been produced to show the necessity of the change; and it is imprudent to appoint one man in 20,000 in every district clothed with the power to say who shall vote. I say that is an injustice that I believe our people will not willingly submit to. I say that to place the honest and industrious yeomanry of this country, who, from day to day are fighting the battles of life, and struggling with the difficulties they have to encounter in this country, those men who are in an impoverished condition—to place them in a position in which they may be dictated to by some aristocrat, some kid gloved gentleman, who will tell them that he will not allow them the privilege of voting, that their little homestead is not worth $150, that their position in life or the value of their property is not such that he could place them on the voters' list—I say no man has a right to be placed in that position.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings.) Do you think any revising barrister would do that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, plenty of them.

Mr. WHITE. Not a bit of it; they would not be guilty of such a thing.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon, gentleman says they would not be guilty of such a thing, but past experience has told us that extreme politicians will do strange things betimes, and I say that there is no necessity for empowering them to do it. I say it is in direct opposition to British liberty and rights, and that the laboring classes should not be placed in a position to be dictated to, or their rights taken away from them.

Mr. WHITE. You know that nothing of the kind could ever happen.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order, order.

Mr. WHITE. I am perfectly in order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Get up on your feet

Mr. McMULLEN. This thing is going to lead, if it leads to anything at all, to manhood suffrage. I am not prepared to say that I would oppose any such measure. I would prefer a thousand times a well regulated manhood suffrage, with registration and residence as a condition, rather than the Act we are now asked to accept, and I believe this Act will lead in that direction. I believe the members who are now in this House, and who are opposed to any extension of the franchise in that direction, should take warning in time, for, in my humble opinion, if the people wake up to the fact that their rights and privileges are going to be seriously interfered with under this law, you will find an agitation for manhood suffrage promoter of the Bill accepted them in a spirit of fairness years. before many The question of expense has been pointedly brought before the notice of hon. gentlemen by members on this side. We have endeavoyed to show that the Bill is extremely objectionable in the present financial condition of the country, that the amount necessary to defray the cost of the inauguration of this system should not be expended under present circumstances. With the very extended territory we have got to develop, the people of this country feel very seriously the burthen of taxation at this moment. It is bearing very heavily on the laboring classes of this Dominion, and year by year we are adding to our responsibilities. Hon, gentlemen opposite have, during the last six years, added something like $80,000,000 to the responsibilities of the Dominion, and I say that, in the face of this increase, it is highly imprudent to countenance the increase which will result from the introduction of this Act. Of course, the question of expense has been pooh-poohed by some hon, gentlemen opposite. The hon, member for Lincoln rather belittled the named act. belittled the remarks of hon. gentlemen on this side, on this question. He tried to show that the increase cost of the protracted session of Parliament, which is now being held, would more than over-balance the expense incurred by putting this statute into operation. Now I venture to predict that not much less than about $400,000 will be sufficient to put this system into operation. I hold that when you approach revising barristers, if they are to be appointed, and even if you approach county judges, and ask them to perform the necessary duties which will devolve on them, under the operation of this Act, when you consider the fact that they have got to hold two distinct investigations of the rolls, that they have got to hold revising meetings in each township of the riding, you will find that when you ask them to perform those duties for a sum less than $500 or $1,000 a piece, you will have little hope of getting men who are disposed to discharge those duties efficiently. You may possibly secure the service of some political partisan for less money. I believe there are some men so imbued with extreme political ideas that they would willingly devote themselves to that work almost for nothing, for the sake of getting an opportunity of victimising their political opponents, by striking them off the lists, and thereby showing once in their lives how far their political feelings would go, if they had an opportunity.

Mr. WHITE. You could not find a revising barrister in the Province who would do it-not one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then if no revising barristers would do it, I would say that no gentleman so absolutely devoted to his party as my hou. friend from Hastings is, will be appointed.

Mr. WHITE. No revising barrister would do it, any-

Mr. McMULLEN. It is singular that we should find a unanimous adoption of this Act by hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding that some years ago they took a very different view. When the hon, member for East York introduced his Act in 1874, some hon. gentlemen opposite took occasion to compliment him on the fairness of that statute—some who are not now in this House. The First Minister himself complimented him so far as to say that he would support the second reading of that measure, and would do what he could for the purpose of perfecting it in committee. Well, he went on and made several suggestions in order to perfect that measure. His suggestions in some cases were accepted, as were also the suggestions made by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). Several other hon, gentlemen made suggestions as to features which were supposed to be objectionable, and the and fair play. I admit that the present Leader of the Government made some suggestions which were not accepted, and because the Government of that day were not prepared to adopt every suggestion while offered, he flew into a passion and quite lost himself in making some remarks with regard to the Bill. He said this: (The hon. gentleman quoted the remarks of Sir Jonn A. Macdonald on the Bill in question). Now, Sir, what have we had since this Bill was introduced. Have we not made suggestions night after night, and has one been accepted? Have we not endeavored to show hon. gentlemen on the other side and the leader of the Government some very objectionable features. I myself pointed out one $5,000; if it were scattered over ten different ridings, he case, in which persons could become tenants of property only for the purpose of giving them votes, and I pointed out cases which had actually transpired under my own observation, during my last election; and notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that I pointed out that this Bill leaves room for these very things to occur again, the hon. gentleman has not paid the slightest heed to those suggestions and under the Bill, if it passes in the present shapeand we have got that particular clause-we will have a repitition of those unfortunate occurrences in the future. Now, I say if he was disposed to accept suggestions, to perfect this Bill, as he ought to be where there are objections of that kind and where there are proofs brought forward to show that there is just ground for those apprehensions, I think in all fairness he should accept them or suggest something to get over the difficulty.

The question of expense is a very important one, and I ask is it wise, in the face of the increased expenses of this Dominion from year to year, that we should incur this additional burden of $400,000 for this measure, if there is absolutely no necessity for it. I say this measure is brought forward in the interest of a party, and it is unfair that the Conservative party should organise a Dominion Conserva-tive Association to be paid out of the resources of the Dominion. Every man in this Dominion, whether he is a Reformer or a Conservative, will have to contribute his mite to maintain that association. In every constituency the revising officer will, no doubt, have his ear open to suggestions from all sides; no doubt there will be an association in each sub-division, to make suggestions to him, and he will reserve the right to put on the list and to put off whom he pleases. I maintain that this law will give him the power after the lists have been completed, after all the examinations have been made, after all the evidence has been taken, to strike any name he chooses off the list before he returns it. It is unfair, unjust and unwise that our people should be placed in this position. The hon member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), made some remarks with regard to an Act passed by the hon. Attorney-General of Ontario; and he said there was some feeling between the leader of this House and that hon, gentleman. The electors of this country have nothing to do with that. It is to be deplored, if a personal feud between men occupying those conspicuous positions, is to be the cause of the people's rights and privileges being interfered with; and if the people are to be subjected to the payment of $400,000 a year for a new election law, because the leader of this House is not disposed to accept the law of Ontario, because it has been passed by political opponents of his own. If Mr. Mowat has placed on the Statute Book an election law which is satisfactory to the people, it is unwise to take away from the Local Legislature the regulation of the franchise. The exercise of the franchise is dear to the people of this country. This Bill is going to deprive a certain percentage of the people of Ontario of the right to the franchise which they enjoy under the Mowat Act; and it is an acknowledged principle in all free institutions, that once you grant a man the right of the franchise it is improper and unwise to deprive him of that right after-Mr. MoMullen.

wards. The hon, member for Lincoln endeavored to prove that a number of the residents of his constituency—some 267-would be deprived of the franchise by the Mowat Act. I am sorry the hon gentleman is not here, but I challenge the correctness of that statement. I venture to say that there is not one single individual in his constituency who had the franchise under the previous Act, who will not have it under the present Ontario Act. Because Mr. Mowat has deemed it his duty to prevent a man duplicating his vote from poll to poll, that is no reason for saying that that man will be deprived of the franchise. Take, for instance, a man in the city of St. Catharines, who owns a property worth would be entitled to vote ten times; but under the present Ontario Act he is only entitled to vote once, and I say that is right. No man has a right to go from constituency to constituency to record his vote, simply because, for the time being, he happens to be the owner of property in the different constituencies. If you follow out the principle, there are men who might be enfranchised in twenty different constituencies. I hold that is not fair; it is an injustice to the poorer classes. The poor man who lives in his cot, if it is all he owns, holds his right to the franchise as dear as the man who lives in his castle and spends his thousands every year. Mr. Mowat is protecting the rights of the poor man.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a man had his property in one riding and lived with his brother in another, how would he be qualified?

Mr. McMULLEN. I shall take the opportunity afterwads of answering my friend. I do not consider the question of such vital importance as to cause me to drop the thread of my address to answer it. Now, Sir, the desire for a uniform franchise, which will place all men on an equal footing, appears to be the potent argument in favor of the Bill now before the House. The hon. First Minister presented the measure to the House backed up with the declara-tion that he is anxious that a uniform franchise should be established under which members should be elected to this House. Now, I believe it is impossible to establish throughout this Dominion a uniform franchise, and on the very face of the Bill it appears that it is not uniform, because in one Province it permits a man to vote upon chattels, while in another Province a man can only vote on real estate. In the Maritime Provinces, fishermen are to be entitled to vote, provided they possess real estate and fishing tackle of the value, in all, of $150. I do not think the hon gentleman has been so cautious to guard against the rights of the fishermen as to clothe the revising officers with all the powers they are to possess, or he would not have drawn the clause relative to the fishermen so loosely as he has done. He says the fishermen are to be allowed to vote if they have real estate and fishing tackle combined worth $150; he does not say if they have real estate without the fishing material, or the fishing material without the real estate of that value; but they have to be the possessors of both, and they have to be fishermen. Perhaps when he comes to that clause, he may insert the word "or" instead of the word "and," and in that way amend that peculiar provision. However, it is very singular that he should have required fishermen to have both real estate and fishing tackle, to the value of $150, or more, before he would be allowed the privilege of exercising the franchise. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), referred to the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), and tried to show that, notwithstanding the criticisms of the latter, the voters' lists would be fair and just. Hon gentlemen opposite seek to entrench themselves behind the feeling that the lists, whether fair or not, will, at any rate, be in their interest; they feel they are doing more good to themselves, while sitting here day after day, in the way of securing their returns at the next elections, than they could if at home; they feel they will be able to sit in their easy chairs and trust implicitly in the revising officers, while the Reform candidates will have to make determined efforts to have their rights respected and use all their powers of persuasion to coax the revising officers to do what is fair. In all the time a Reform Government was in power, I defy hon, gentlemen opposite to point to an act of this kind; I defy them to show that, under any Reform Administration, an attempt was ever made to legislate opponents out of existence. I would consider myself humiliated to be compelled to follow a party or leader disposed to do an act of that kind, and I am glad to say that the Reformers, to their credit and honor, have never been party to so truckling a business. How different has been the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1882, by the redistribution of seats in Ontario, they sought to politically behead my hon friend in front of me (Mr. Charlton) and others, but they failed in their purpose. To-day they hope by enfranchising the Indians, to accomplish something more in that direction. The measure they are now trying to they are now trying to measure direction. Parliament is one of the through disgraceful entactments that has ever blackened the pages of the history of our Dominion. It is a disgrace to the party attempting to pass it. The country will rise in indignation against it. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, then why not let it become law? Because we intend that the people shall fully realise its hollowness and iniquity. The party in power have a political record that would justify our coming to the conclusion that they would pass this or any other law which would have the effect of keeping them in power. Beginning with the double shuffle and coming down to the Franchise Bill, we can point to enactments and transactions, year after year, which stand out like mile-stones along their political course, marking their political disgrace, this last measure indicating their lowest descent, and in point of corrupting, capping the climax of all their previous acts. We, on this side are only doing our duty in showing up plainly and pointedly the evils of this measure; we intend to keep it up; we intend to educate the people; we intend to open their eyes with regard to the iniquity of this Act; and we hope to be able to show that the people are not blinded to all sense of honor, but will be aroused to a proper sense of justice, which they will show at the polls when the opportunity is given them to record their verdict on this attempt to shackle the free expression of public opinion. It is an impossibility to give an equalised Dominion franchise such as this Bill demands. While you cannot place all property on an equal footing, while you cannot give an equal value to all property, you cannot equalise the franchise. Until you can say that a house of certain dimensions in Ottawa is worth the same as a similar house in Winnipeg or Victoria, you cannot make an equal franchise. To show the injustice that can be practised by the revising officer we will begin with him from the time he is appointed supposing this Act to the time he is appointed supposing this Act to be passed. His first duty, on being appointed, is to assess the entire riding. He is not supposed to take the assessment roll, as an indispensable necessity, but simply as an aid, to arrive at what he believes to be the value of property in the riding. He makes the assessment of the entire riding. Then he constitutes himself municipal clerk. Instead of, as the assessor now has to do, making the return of the assessment roll to the municipal clerk and making a solemn declaration as to his faithful and exact performance of the duties of assessor, he makes a return to himself. He himself is the municipal clerk, and as such makes out the roll and puts several numbers of that roll in the different places. He does this without further obligation than that the statute binds him to do it. Under the present law, the before the Revision Court that the necessary duties have been performed by him, before the court can sit. There is nothing of that kind to be done by the revising officer. He is to put up the list from place to place, and therefore he discharges the duty of municipal clerk. The next duty he discharges is that of the municipal council. The men who have the confidence of the people, who are elected to perform municipal duties, who are well posted in regard to the value of property in each ward, who have had experience as residents of the municipality, are not to be consulted in reference to the matter, and any assessment of the value of property made by them is not to be taken into account by the revising officer, who therefore consti-Next, he constitutes tutes himself the municipal council. The revising officer discharges that duty also. He sits as judge, he listens to argument or not as it suits him, he is not compelled to listen to evidence as to irregularities, and he can decide whether parties shall be heard or not. He has all power, and can accept or refuse evidence as he thinks proper. I am not going to say that in all cases this will be done. I believe that there are respectable, decent, honest Conservative barristers that perhaps would discharge the duty. I can vouch for it that in my own town, and in my own riding, there are men who, I believe, are honest enough to discharge the duties faithfully, and who would not lend themselves to anything wrong, but, while I admit that, I know that we have men who would do the very opposite if they had the chance; and that is where the evil is. Is it the right-minded men who will be chosen? I think, in a constituency that is very nearly balanced, if they can possibly get a man ready to lend himself to a criticism of the voters' list with a view to strike down the number of Reformers and increase the number of Conservatives, he will be found a pliant tool and he will be appointed to perform that daty. If the county judges were appointed, a great deal of the evil would be got over. We have two county judges in my constituency and, although they are Conservatives, I am not prepared to say they would do anything improper. Still, it is an injustice to the electorate to clothe any judge with the power of doing an improper act if he chooses. We cannot reiterate the fact too often that this is taking out of the hands of the people a power which has been vested in them through their council, and placing it in the pocket of one man to exercise as he pleases. The people ought not to submit to it, and I hope, when they have the opportunity, they will back us up in the course we are taking.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Are not the assessors clothed with power? Do not they do wrong?

Mr. McMULLEN. We have had assessors that have done wrong.

Mr. WHITE. They are clothed with power.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon, gentleman will permit me, I will answer him. They have to appear before the municipal council, and those upon whom an attempt is made to perpetrate a wrong have two chances to get the wrong righted; first, before the municipal council, which is seeking for the suffrages of the people, and, in the next place, if he does not get it done before the council, he can get it done before the county judge.

Mr. WHITE. That is just the way this will be.

binds him to do it. Under the present law, the Mr. McMULLEN. But here we have no such recourse. clerk of the municipality has to make a declaration I defy the hon. gentleman to show there is any such recourse. The revising officer embodies in himself the powers of the municipal council and the judge, and he has the power to refuse to take evidence and can do right or wrong as he chooses. If an appeal is made to the judge under the present law, he must hear and determine it This Bill does not declare that the revising officer has to do anything of the kind. He may receive the evidence or not as he pleases, and afterwards he can strike a name off or put a name on just as he pleases, and there is no appeal trom his decision. That is unfair; it is retrograde legislation, striking at the rights and privileges of the people and depriving them of a privilege they have possessed for years. If you take the whole course that has to be pursued in revising the voters' list and in the election of a member, I would like hon, gentlemen opposite to point out a single feature of the entire procedure that gives the slightest evidence of justice or shows the slightest mark of consideration to the Reform party of this Dominion. From the appointment of the revising officer when this law comes into force, to the time when the return is made to the clerk here, everything has a one-sidedness about it that is unfair and unjust. Of course the revising officer will appoint his own returning officer and his own clerk, and in everything we shall have to submit to the injustice of meeting our opponents on unequal terms. If the judges of the land had the power to appoint these men, we would not object to it so much; but they have not that power; the Government retain that power themselves, and no doubt they will avail themselves of it to the advantage of their own candidates. Now, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) has stated that no Bill had ever been discussed so fully in this House as the Franchise Bill, and he could not understand why in the world hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were kicking up such a fuss about it. Well, it is very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to try to shield themselves with such a pretence. But I think if that hon. gentleman sat on this side of the House, and a Liberal Government were to bring in a Bill of this kind, we would hear his voice very loud and very long in condemnation of it, and I am sure the whole Conservative party would oppose it with as much tenacity as we are doing. I am glad to think that we cannot be charged with ever having made an effort to put upon the Statute Book an Act of this kind, that we cannot be charged with ever having attempted to behead our opponents in the unscrupulous way in which hon, gentlemen opposite are endeavoring to behead us by this Bill. I would commend to the attention of the First Minister the cartoon of Grip last week; and I think that who ever will look at the position there occupied by the First Minister, with his revising officer on one side, and the Indian on the other, and fair Canada, with her hands tied behind her back, will say that is a fair picture of the position the First Minister will occupy when this measure becomes law. I have only to say that if we have got eventually to go to the people under the operations of this Act, I do not think hon gentlemen opposite will find that it is going to help them as much as they expect. But if they are right in their anticipations, and if, by means of this measure, they succeed in returning to power, and in diminishing the numbers of the Opposition in this House, we will at least have the satisfaction of having done our duty in attempting to prevent, by fair criticism and discussion, the passage of such an iniquitous measure.

Mr. SMALL. The hon gentleman who has just taken his seat has paraded, with a great flourish of trumpets, the fame of Mr. D. B. Read, of Toronto, as a Conservative. I do not wish to be uncharitable towards the writer of that letter, but I must say that he is not so strong a party man as is the hon gentleman himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless I greatly mis—as this involves, so important and far-reaching in its consetake, that gentleman was president of the Conservative quences, amounts to an usurpation of power, without the Mr. McMullen.

Association of Toronto, or a gentleman of that name, not many years ago.

Mr. SMALL. A good many years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think he was also a candidate for the representation of one of the Torontos in the Local House. If I am in error on that point I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. McCALLUM. You used to be a Conservative, and now we find you over on that side.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If my hon, friend were aware of the facts he would know that when I was first elected to Parliament, I was elected by a very large Liberal, as well as a very large Conservative, vote. I took my seat here, and held my seat here, as independent a man as any man well could be. From the first time of my connection with Lennox, to the present time of my connection with South Huron, I have never failed to have the support of a large proportion of the best men of both parties.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon, gentleman was turned out of his first constituency because he left his party.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon, friend may recollect that a gentleman who ought to be in his place here to-day, the First Minister, had to leave his constituency of Kingston at the same time.

Mr. LISTER. This is a subject so deeply interesting to the electors of the Province of Ontario, that it is not necessary for me to offer an apology for addressing the House. We have been charged over and again by hon. gentlemen opposite, with having adopted a policy of obstruction for the purpose of preventing the passage of this Bill. I deny the charge, but I say that even it were true, it would be perfectly justifiable under the circumstances. If we have accomplished nothing else in the discussion of this Bill, we have, at least, shown up its defects and deformities, and succeeded in arousing public sentiment throughout the country to the dangers which threaten our free institutions. I feel that this Bill is so objectionable that it is necessary on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, to iterate and reiterate our objections to the iniquities of this Bill. obstruction pure and simple would be justifiable under the circumstances, for a more scandalous measure has never been presented to any legislative body acknowledging free institutions and responsible government. I need only quote from the independent press, which usually cordially supports hon, gentlemen opposite, to justify my statements. call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to an article in the Montreal Post, an influential and independent journal. (Quotation from article read.) If we have succeeded in doing nothing more we have awakened public interest in this measure. Within the last two weeks meetings have been held from one extremity of Ontario to the other, denouncing the provisions of this Bill, and petitions have been forwarded from almost every constituency in Ontario-

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LISTER —presented not only by members on this side of the House, but by hon, gentlemen opposite, protesting in the most emphatic manner against the passage of this Bill. I have asked frequently, who have demanded the passage of this Bill? When was it ever submitted to the people, considered by them and by the press? The first intimation was the production of this Bill, although as late as two years ago general elections took place. At that time it was never referred to by the First Minister or by the Conservative party. I hold that such a radical change as this involves, so important and far-reaching in its consequences, amounts to an usurpation of power, without the Government having asked the approval of the people on it. In view of these facts, it is the duty of the Opposition to oppose the Bill as strenuously as possible, and hon, gentlemen on this side would be false to their duty if they failed to stand up and protest solemnly and repeatedly against the passage of a Bill which, I am sorry to say, I can only characterise by the word, infamous. The measure proposes to disfranchise thousands and thousands of persons in my Province. I say that advisedly, and it is a statement that cannot be successfully contradicted.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I contradict it.

Mr. LISTER. I say tens of thousands of persons who possess votes under the Ontario Act will be disfranchised by this Bill. Hon, gentlemen opposite have not given the subject that consideration it deserves. They have been too apt in this case as in others, to accept the statement of the First Minister as to the provisions of the Bill, believing that a Bill introduced by him would be a fair and just Bill. Let me consider its provisions and compare them with the provisions of the Mowat Act. While the Ontario Act provides that every person coming real property to the value of $200 in cities and towns and $100 in townships and incorporated villages shall be entitled to the franchise, this Bill places the qualification at $300 for cities and $150 for townships and villages.

Mr. WHITE. One is the assessed value and the other is the real value.

Mr. LISTER. I suppose the assessors, who are required to take an oath, assess property fairly. As regards tenants, this Bill provides that a tenant at a rental of $2.00 monthly, $6.00 quarterly, $12.60 half-yearly or $20.00 yearly, in any municipality, and has been in possession at least one year before the first day of November, and has paid one year's rent at the rate aforesaid, shall have the franchise. Ontario Act provides that a male person rated on the assessment roll as tenant of property of the actual value in cities and towns of not less than $200, and in townships and incorporated villages at $100, shall have the franchise. section of the Bill is a most objectionable one. It is a fancy franchise; it opens the door to all sorts of fraud on the part of the voter, and it is in every sense of the word an objectionable franchise. (The hon, gentleman here quoted the provisions of the Bill and the Ontario Act respectively, as to voters as owners, tenants, occupants, and income voters) Whon my hon. friend speaks about his being rated about the actual value of the assessment he shows that he does not understand the matter, because the assessment roll is not final and conclusive at all, as a man cannot only appeal against his assessment to the Court of Revision, but directly to the judge of the County Court, if he chooses.

Mr. WHITE. Is the hon, gentleman quoting from the Mowat Act as it passed, or as it was introduced. Mr. Mowat's Act was much improved, and so will this be.

Mr. LISTER. I am quoting from Mr. Mowat's Act as it became law.

Mr. WHITE. This Bill has not become law.

Mr. LISTER. I understand that.

Mr. WHITE. You may find it different.

Mr. LISTER. With regard to income voters we know that there are a very large number of people consisting of school teachers and clerks in offices of various kinds, and wage-earners, whose incomes do not amount to $400 a year, while under the provisions of this Act these people will be debarred from voting. I think it is safe to say that in the Province of Ontario two-thirds of the school teachers do not receive incomes amounting to $400 a year, and I suppose there is not a laborer in the whole Province who earns wages to that amount. There are a large number of clerks in stores and offices, intelligent and well educated young men, eminently fit to exercise the franchise discreetly, all of whose interests are in this country, and when it is necessary to call on men to defend the country they are the first to spring to arms. Under this Bill you disfranchise every one of these men, unless they have property entitling them to vote, while at the same time you propose to enfranchise the Indian who has no property whatever, who is the ward of the Government, who can make no contract, who is uneducated, and who is under the control of the Government and its agents. I say that under such a provision you are doing the gravest injustice to a large portion of the community who are entitled to the highest consideration at the hands of Parliament. (The hon. gentleman then read the provisions of the Bill and of the Ontario Act respectively, as to the franchise for owners' sons.) Now, Sir, while you propose under the Dominion Act to enfranchise the sons of farmers, under the Provincial Act the son of every landowner is enfranchised whether he be a farmer or not, or whether he lives in a town, city, village or in the country. In that way you cut off from the electorate a very large number of intelligent young men fitted in an eminent degree for the franchise.

Mr. SPROULE. Read the first part of section seven, and you will see that you are entirely mistaken.

Mr. LISTER. That relates to the Indians.

Mr. SPROULE. No, to the sons of owners of real property.

Mr. LISTER. Under the Dominion Bill he must be:

"The son of a farmer or any owner of real property and not otherwise qualified to vote, and resident with his father (or mother) for one year before the first of November, as well as at the time of the election, if the value of the property on which the father is qualified to vote is sufficient if equally divided amongst them as co-owners to qualify as voters under the Act; otherwise the right to be registered as a voter and to vote in respect of such property shall belong only to the father. Occasional absence of not more than four months in the year shall not disqualify a son as such voter."

Under the Ontario Act he must be:

"Duly entered and named in the assessment roll as a landholder's son, resident at the time of the election in the local municipality in which he tenders his vote, and has resided in the dwelling of his father for twelve months prior to the return by the assessors of the roll on which the voters' list used at the election is based. Temporary absence, not exceeding in the whole six months in the year, shall not operate to disentitle a landholder's son to vote under this section."

Under the Dominion Act the property must be of sufficient value, if divided up amongst the owner and his sons, to entitle each to a vote; in the Ontario Act there is no such provision.

Mr. SPROULE Oh, yes there is.

Mr LISTER. No, there is not. If a man is assessed for property worth $300 and his sons are living with him, those sons are entitled to be placed on the assessment roll and to vote.

Mr. WHITE. Only one son.

Mr. LISTER. Under the Dominion Act, the First Minister has intimated, he intends to exclude the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West, but every tribal Indian residing in every other portion of the Dominion will be entitled to exercise the franchise; while under the Act of Mr. Mowat if the Indian possesses the qualifications the white man possesses, does not reside on the reserve, and is not under the control of the Dominion Government or its agents, that man is entitled to vote. The two Acts will not bear comparison. The Ontario Act is wider in its scope, is infinitely more generous, and enfranchises a much larger class of people who are thoroughly fitted to exercise the franchise, than the Bill of the First Minister. But why has the First Minister thought proper to introduce this measure? I ask if there has been any public opinion expressed in its favor; I ask if the Province of Ontario or any other portion of the Dominion has requested or petitioned that a Bill of this kind should be introduced into Parliament.

Mr. FARROW. How many times have you asked that? About 50 times.

Mr. LISTER. I do not know what constituency you represent, but you are very insolent. A little good breeding would be a good thing for you.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. LISTER. I say there is no public opinion in favor of this Bill, and I quote from The Week, a newspaper published in the city of Toronto, which is thoroughly independent, and whenever it can consistently support the hon. First Minister, it does so. (The hon. gentleman read the article referred to.) That article is taken from the paper of a great admirer of the First Minister, a man who never hesitates to applaud and approve of the acts of the First Minister, when those acts can, by any possibility, be entitled to approval. It is the language of a man who has no political end to serve and no object in misstating the facts of the case, and it is a powerful arraignment of the First Minister and the Bill before the House.

Mr. FARROW. I ask the hon. gentleman what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. LISTER. I am quoting from a paper that, I have no doubt, you never saw, The Week newspaper.

Mr. FARROW. I think I saw that article in the Globe.

Mr. LISTER. It is a very good article whether it is Grit or Tory. It is from the pen of Mr. Goldwin Smith, and Mr. Goldwin Smith is a personal and political friend of your chief.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. Does the hon. gentleman deny that he is a political friend of his?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I do deny it with all my heart.

Mr. LISTER. All I can say about it is that Mr. Goldwin Smith took the stump for the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. DAVIES. He has changed his politics.

Mr. LISTER. It is a strange man who will not change his politics under these circumstances. Public opinion from one end of this Dominion to the other is opposed to this Bill. Public meetings have been and are being held protesting against this measure; petitions have been and are being sent from the country protesting against it; the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) himself, 10 years ago, protested against such a measure; no portion of the people have petitioned for the Bill; every portion of the press, except the out-and-out Conservative press, are opposed to it, and the out and-out Conservative press give it a most The Act is an usurpation of the people's feeble support. rights; it is an Act unparalleled in the history of constitutional government in England; it inflicts a serious wound on the representative institutions of this country, and hon, gentlemen who become a party to the passing of this Act merely for the purpose of gaining a party victory, are doing an act which will ultimately inflict serious injury on the commonwealth of Canada. The people of our country are a source of all power; it is from them we get the right to sit in this House, to legislate for them, and it is our bounden duty to acknowledge their mastership; yet, it is proposed by this Bill to take away from the people that power which every free people and free country ought to have, the right to attempt to explain what the particular reason is for passing Mr. Lister.

prepare their own voters' lists. It is contemplated by this Bill to deprive them of this right, and to place it in the hands of individuals against whose decision there is to be no appeal; it is proposed to put in the power of one man to say who shall be on the list and who shall not. The question whether such men, men in that position, will act honestly or dishonestly is not the issue. If you could get a man who was perfection itself, you might convey to him the powers with which you propose to invest the revising barrister; but as there was only one man who was ever perfect, and it is not likely there will be another, it is a dangerous thing to place in the hands of frail mortals this power. It is a revolutionary measure which would be well worthy of some South American or Central American Republic, at the hands of the usurper, but in a free Parliament like this, it is hardly conceivable that the leader of the Government would introduce such a measure, one which cannot fail to meet with the condemnation of the people, one which even the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite throughout the country do not approve of, and the more they know its provisions the more they will see in it to condemn. Hon, gentlemen opposite are very anxious to be returned to their seats, but they must not forget that throughout the country the people generally, even their own friends, will not look on this measure with the same self interest, but will look upon it as dispassionate men having no end in view but the good of their country, and that Bill cannot be fairly submitted to them and its provisions explained without its meeting their disapproval. It is proposed to place in the hands of these irresponsible men, the revising barristers, the power to say who shall be voters and who shall not. My hon. and very esteemed friend from the county of Monck (Mr. McCallum) says these men will do what is right. I would take my hon, friend's word for almost anything in the world, but in this matter he is deceived when he makes a statement of that kind. Without saying anything to reflect on the profession to which I have the reflect on the profession to which I have the honor to belong, I must admit that in it there are men who are so eaten up by partyism that they would not hesitate to do injustice to an opponent. Men of standing in the profession will not take the position of revising barrister; it will not be in the best but in the worst and most unscrupulous portions of the bar that men will be found to accept positions under this Act. Is it fair that the right of deciding who shall exercise the franchise should be given to such men? Is it fair that they should have the power of excluding from the lists men who may be fairly and justly entitled to vote? Yet this is the proposition which the Government submit to us. We are told it is the intention of the Government to modify the Bill very radically. We hear that outside, we hear it whispered in the lobby and and in the corridors, but we have had no such intimation from men authorised to make such a statement, and I say that the Bill in its present form is a monster of iniquity, an encroachment on the rights of the people, and that the Canadian people do not possess the spirit I believe them to possess, if they will quietly submit to it. I to-day received a letter from a gentleman who takes no great interest in politics, and who says that in the county from which he writes, he never saw such excitement as exists there now since the rebellion of 1837. Hon, gentlemen may laugh, but this Bill has stirred up a feeling of indignation throughout the country, and they are blind it they cannot see it. Why is it sought to press this measure at present? Hon, gentlemen opposite have never given any reason. The leader of the Government said a Bill of this kind would take the time of a whole Session for proper discussion, yet without any cause, without any demand having been made for the measure, he brings it down at the last hour of the Session. Will some hon. gentleman opposite this Bill now? Although they have attempted to discuss its provisions, they have evaded its real issue; they have neglected from the time it was introduced. or four weeks ago, to give some why it should be introduced now, three or four weeks valid resson or why should it become law without consulting the people and obtaining their sanction. No. reason has been made public for this course. Goldwin Smith says the object is to give the party in power a party advantage. That may be so, and there may be several reasons in addition. It is certainly not for the good of the country. The effect of the Bill will be to add seriously to the difficulty and expense of the people. Some say it is to divert the attention of the people from what is going on in the North-West. Perhaps that may be the reason, or it may not be. Others say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is about to ask Parliament to advance it a further large sum of money, and that, in the discussion which this Bill causes, the demands of that corporation may be granted without the attention of the public being called to them. I think the real cause is an intention on the part of the First Minister, so far as it is in his power, to perpetuate the rule of the Conservativo party in Canada. I think it indicates on the part of the Government the intention to bring on an election in a short time. In 1882, an election was brought on after the Gerrymander Act, and in 1872 an election was brought on after the transaction between the Government and Sir Hugh Allan, and we have reason to expect now, in 1885, that it is the intention of the party to further control, if they possibly can, the electorate of the country, so as to secure the return of their friends. If it is considered imperative that a Dominion franchise should be fixed by this Parliament, is it necessary to appoint revising barristers under the form proposed in this Bill? Hon. gentlemen have said that the local officers are not under the control of the Dominion Government, but, under this Bill, the municipal officers of Ontario are compelled to furnish to the revising officer the assessment rolls and voters' lists of the several municipalities throughout the Province. If they can enforce obedience to that provision, have they not the same power to enforce obedience to any other demands they may make as to the preparation of these lists? In England, the revising barrister only sits for the purpose of revising the lists made by the local authorities, and those revising barristers are appointed by the judges. You could find no party in England who would be base enough to take into their own hands the preparation of those lists as this Bill proposes to do. I suppose the dominant party there has the same power as the dominant party here, and no doubt it would be a great advantage to them to have these officers under their power, but the party in power in England shrank from taking this into their own hands. If it is necessary to have revising officers, it would be safer and better to follow the English pattern and have them appointed by the judi-In that case should we not have a guarantee that the men appointed would not be partisans. The appointments there are made each year and not for life, and therefore we should also have a guarantee that, if these officers did not perform their duties properly, honestly and imparti ally, they would be removed. Is not the present proposal a menace to the people of this country, is it not a dangerous power which you are giving to these men, which it will be hard to remove when once it is introduced? I hope, for the sake of the people, that no such power will be taken by the Government, but that, when we come to the revising barrister clause, the Government will yield and will consent that, if they are bound to have revising barristers, they shall be appointed by the judges. That would wipe out one of the most objectionable features of this Bill. I can only repeat that, so far as the revising barrister clause putting such a power into the hands of any man, except with some sinister motive in view. The hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), the other evening, gave the House to understand that the Indians were to vote, provided they had the same qualification as a white man. His statement is entirely misleading. That is neither the wording nor the intention of the Act. The Act, in language as broad as can be used, includes all Indians living upon reservations. Why, Sir, is it possible that the First Minister would think of giving the Indians a vote in view of the position they occupy towards the Government? Only three years ago he distinctly stated that the Indians were not sufficiently advanced, even for municipal institutions, on their own reserves, and yet within so short a time the Indian has become so civilised that the Government proposes to give him a vote! Any one who has lived near these Indian reservations, who is at all familiar with the habits and customs of the Indians, will agree with me in saying that, while there are a few who are intelligent, the vast majority of the Indians are not fitted to exercise the franchise. But if the right hon, gentleman thinks that the franchise ought to be extended to them, he is bound to enfranchise them entirely, he is bound to sever the last link that binds them to the Government, and to destroy all the influence that the Government may have over them. Personally, if it is thought right that the Indian should be enfranchised, I would not raise my voice against it, provided you placed upon him all the responsibilities that rest upon other citizens of this country. If he is sufficiently intelligent to exercise the franchise, the highest privilege of a citizen, he is intelligent enough to have control of his property, and to assume the duties and responsibilities of other citizens; but I say it is a monstrous thing to give him the right to vote until he does assume the responsibilities of other citizens, and while he still remains in a position of tutelage and dependence upon the Government. Sir, the only interence tha can be drawn from such a proposal is that the Government hope, by the power they can exercise over the Indians, so to twist them and bend them that they will vote for the Government candidate. Does it redound to the credit of any party, or of any man, who would seek to keep himself in power by such means? It has been said that this proposition, without elevating the Indians, will debase the electorate of the country, and in that view I fully concur. I can scarcely believe that the Government are serious in their intention of forcing a Bill through Parliament with a provision so infamous and so repugnant to the feelings of every man, Conservative or Reformer, who looks at it from a non-partisan standpoint.

Mr. SPROULE. It is in the Ontario Act.

Mr. LISTER. Only when they are living off their reserves and hold property; but this Act includes Indians living on their reserves. The 6,000 acres of land will be so assessed that the 600 Indians, who are occupants of that land, will be given a vote by the revising barrister. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), in his remarks the other evening, took occasion to say: (The hon. gentleman read an extract from Mr. Tupper's speech, page 1883 of the Hansard, in reference to uniform franchise.) Now, the hon. gentleman is-1 will not say deliberately-misleading the House. The question of saying how an election shall take place is a different question altogether from that of fixing the franchise. There is no doubt at all as to the right of this Parliament to fix the franchise and to say how elections shall take place. But because this Parliament has the right to say in what manner a man shall vote, surely that does not include the right to say what man shall vote and what man shall not vote. It is a matter of no consequence is concerned, it is a dangerous power to put in the hands of how a man votes, whether openly or by ballot, but any man, and no Government would for a moment think of it is of vast consequence to say who shall vote.

I have attempted to point out how voters' lists will be prepared. This Parliament has the power to appoint an officer to obtain information and prepare these lists. They have undoubtedly the power to appoint revising barristers. But it is unwise and inexpedient that they should exercise that power. If it is necessary to appoint an officer for the purpose of preparing those lists he should be appointed by a power which is free from this Parliament, not by this Parliament. The result of appointing by this Parliament will be that a man may be appointed who is a partisan and willing to act so as to prevent Reformers exercising the franchise. Hon gentlemen opposite have attempted to have the country believe that by the discussion of this important question large sums of money are being daily lost to the country. So far as monetary loss is concerned, it comes out of the pockets of hon. members of this House. They may not go home with so much in their pockets as they would under other circumstances; but the country loses nothing whatever in dollars and cents by the discussion now taking place. Hon. members receive $1,000 whether the Session is a month or six months; the officers of the House are paid by the year, and there is no additional expense entailed on the House by the discussion of this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. What about printing the Hansard?

Mr. LISTER. As to printing the Hansard, I will inform the hon. gentleman that the cost for the first year under this Bill he is supporting so vigorously would print Hansard for 15 or 20 years.

Mr. SPROULE. But you said there was no extra expense.

Mr. LISTER. The First Minister took occasion the other day to make a speech on this Bill and wound up by stating that Parliament was becoming a farce and might end in a tragedy. What kind of tragedy is it going to be? Is it going to be the hon. gentleman's physical or political extinction, or are we going to be forcibly ejected from this House? I do not understand very well what he means by tragedy. At all events, we are prepared to take upon ourselves the full responsibility of what we are doing, and we are thoroughly convinced that, when the proper time comes, the country will thoroughly and completely approve of the stand we have taken in this House. Canadians must view the future of the country with great misgiving and concern. Insatiate lust of power has induced the leader of the Government to utilise the most dangerous weapons of parliamentary corruption and intrigue in order to keep himself in power. Lavish corruption and the indiscriminate distribution of gifts are doing fearful work; the distribution of patronage and place, timber limits, coal limits, and colonisation companies lands has dealt a blow at the political morality of the people. Undoubtedly this state of things is the proximate cause of the revolution in the North-West. Our public debt is increasing by fearful leaps and bounds. Our annual expenditure is to be increased by this iniquitous measure. Can infamy go farther? I believe when the time comes the people will say it cannot, and that other and better men shall take the place of these hon, gentlemen who now form the Government of the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Some time since I placed before the committee certain reasons which in my estimation were sufficient to convince us that the present franchises should be retained. I wish now to address myself to the consideration of the question as to whether Ontario itself should not have the privilege of retaining its present franchise. There is an evident desire on the part of all the Provinces, and that desire has been manifested in this committee, to retain the franchise they now possess. A motion for the retention of the franchise in the case of one of the Provinces was made by a supporter of the Government, I allude to Prince

Mr. Lester.

Edward Island. We may assume that this desire to retain those franchises is a universal one, or we would not have seen a supporter of the Government from Prince Edward Island moving the retention of the present franchise in that Province. British Columbia, it is true, has not made a request to retain its franchise. I presume it is not because representatives love Rome less but that they the love Cosar more; their allegiance to the Government is so great that they lose sight of the interest of their Province in the servility with which they serve the party in power here. But the evidence is unmistakable, that were this question submitted to the people of the various Provinces as to whether they would retain the franchise they now possess or not, the decision of the vast majority in every Province would be in favor of the retention of the provincial franchises; that no change should be made, that the Government of the Dominion should not assume the power assumed by this Bill, which for 18 years has remained in the hands of the Provinces.

I proceed in the case of Ontario to urge certain reasons why no change should be made in this matter, why the motion now before the committee should prevail, why Ontario should be premitted to retain its own provincial franchise. We have exercised that right for 18 years, almost long enough to give us an indisputable title. We have exercised that right through five different general elections, and I venture to say that there is not an elector in Ontario who is not satisfied with the present state of things, and there has been no expression of public opinion in that Province or indeed in any other Province that would warrant the Government in taking the steps proposed. On the contrary, Sir, the great majority of the people of the Province of Ontario are thoroughly satisfied with the present condition of affairs, and are thoroughly averse to the change which is proposed to be made. This is evidenced by the petitions which have been pouring into the House, by the condition of public sentiment throughout the Province, by the marked hostility evinced towards this measure by the Liberal press and the Independent press without exception in the Province of Ontario, and is also evidenced very markedly in supineness and half-heartedness that characterise the advocacy of this measure on the part of the Government press of Ontario.

These are general reasons of course—reasons which apply as well to the other Provinces of the Dominion as to Ontario, and I shall proceed to urge the special reasons which apply to the Province of Ontario. In the first place, I state broadly that this Government is hostile to the Government of the Province of Ontario, which is the choice of the people of Ontario, and so much so that they would not stop short of the adoption of any measure or means which would lead to the downfall of that Government. That hostility has been evinced in various ways and in the most unmistakable manner. The British North America Act clearly defines the powers which are reserved to the Provinces, and this hostility has been clearly evinced in the attempts which have been made to infringe on the constitutional rights and safeguards of the Province of Ontario. Sub section 9, of section 92, of that Act defines the powers of the Provinces with regard to the different kinds of licenses, and yet, Sir, the Dominion Government in its hostility to Ontario superseded that right, exceeded its powers, and after an abortive attempt lasting two years, was at last compelled by a decision of the Supreme Court to cease its attacks upon the integrity of Ontario in that matter. The provisions of the British North America Act with regard to property and civil rights seemed to be explicit and unmistakable, and yet in the case of an escheat to the Crown the Dominion Government again attempted to invade the jurisdiction of the Provinces in a matter of civil rights, and again in the Mercer escheat case the decision was against them, the Judicial right belonged to Ontario. I have no doubt that the law officers of the Crown here, understood as well before that attempt upon the rights of the Province were made as they did after, what was the purport and meaning of the section of the constitutional Act referring to these matters. Another clause defines the power of the Provinces over timber and streams.

Mr. SPROULE. What has that to do with the Franchise Bill?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am giving reasons showing that this Government is hostile in its purports and intents to the Province of Ontario, and showing, therefore, that Ontario should retain all her safeguards for the preservation of her rights. But in this particular, as in the others, Ontario was only able to get her rights when they were attempted to be invaded by the Dominion Government, by a decision of the Privy Council. We have a special illustration of the hostility of the Dominion Government to the Province of Ontario in its conduct in the matter of the boundary award. After a long and manful struggle on the part of Mr. Mowat, the rights of Ontario were finally secured to her in this as in the other instances, through an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. We had evidence of the unscrupulous character of the machinations of some parties connected with the Government in the attempt to expel the Government of Ontario from power, a year ago last Session, and this case points clearly and unmistakeably to the fact that Ontario as a great Province, having an autonomy of her own, having rights guaranteed by the British North America Act, should act with circumspection in respect to the powers which pertain to her, and for these reasons it behooves Ontario, her iterests impel her in a manner altogether greater than the other Provinces, to retain the control of the franchise with reference to the election of her representatives to this Parliament. The Bill recently passed in the Legislature of Ontario largely extended the franchise in that Province, and that franchise is now much more liberal in its provisions than the one before the House. It cannot be said that it is too liberal to meet with the approval of any portion of the population of Ontario, because the Opposition in the Ontario House of Assembly, the supporters of this Government, went so far as to move in favor of universal suffrage, in place of the franchise adopted by that House, which is itself practically universal suffrage. As the Ontario Bill will be in operation a year before this one, the effect of the passage of this measure would be to debar thousands from voting for members of this House who have the privilege of voting for members of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Such has been proved to be the case from the Bill. If you make a comparison between the two measures it is estimated that 100,000 people will be disfranchised, possessing the qualification under the Ontario Now, what-will be the reflection of disfranchised provincial voters, who are permitted to exercise the right of freemen with regard to the election of representatives to their Provincial Assembly and are denied the exercise of that very right with regard to the men who are to represent them in the same manner in the Dominion Parliament? It will not tend to increase the feeling of loyalty to this Government—that feeling of loyalty that we require to build up if we are to create a nationality in Canada. will have a contrary tendency. It will have a tendency to sow the seeds of bitterness and party strife; it will have a direct tendency to create a feeling of deep-seated hostility towards the institutions of this Dominion. If there were no other reasons that could be urged against the Bill, that reason itself should have potency enough to deter us from passing this measure. Why, Sir, we have in this Dominion we have the evidences on all hands that we are not a thoroughly homogeneous people, that these Provinces are not thoroughly assimilated, and the policy of a wise Government would be not to widen those breaches, not to increase that feeling of discontent, but to adopt conciliatory measures, to endeavor to attach all classes in the Dominion to the institutions of the country, and to give them a sense that they were being dealt with in a spirit of justice and fair play. Now, Sir, this Bill will cause a discrimination that will give rise to dissatisfaction with this federal union—first, in disfranchising those who have a provincial franchise, and, in the second place, in taking away from the people's officers the preparation of the lists, a privilege which they have enjoyed for eighteen years. How is it done? The municipal council elected by the people has its own machinery for making the voters' lists. The assessor makes up the assessment roll, and from that the municipal clerk prepares the voters' list, which contains the name of every man who has the proper qualification to vote; that list is published, and if any person deems himself unjustly treated, he may put in his claim before the Court of Revision, and if he fails to receive justice to the court of the court indeed. tice there, he may appeal to the county judge. That machinery was worked smoothly and well, and has done substantial justice in every case; it is under the control of the people themselves, and they can change it any time if it does not work to their satisfaction, For that we propose to substitute a machinery that is entirely independent of the people; we propose to take from the township council elected by the people the functions they now enjoy, and hand them over to an appointee of the Government, who is in no way amenable to the people. Now, I ask if any civilised state in Christendom can be pointed out where the registration of voters is provided for in a manner so subversive of all the rights of the people, and so much at variance with all the principles of justice. In England, the voters' lists are prepared by overseers of the poor, who are elected at municipal elections. [The hon. gentleman read the provisions of the English law bearing on this point] These revising officers are appointed annually in England, not by the Government, but by the courts of the land, and you must see there is a vast difference between the system in force in England and the system proposed by this Bill. In England, as in Ontario at present, officers elected by the people prepare the voters' lists, and in England, as in Ontario at present, the lists, after being prepared are subject to revision, which revision is made in Ontario by the courts and in England by officers appointed by the judges. The machinery for the revision and preparation of the voters' lists is substantially the same in England as in Ontario. From England, I will pass to some of England's colonies.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is the hon gentleman going to discuss the details?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am merely pointing out the most cogent of all reasons why the people of Ontario should desire to retain the power of fixing the franchise, and I am pointing out that the mode provided by this Bill is an infraction of all the rules provided in the election laws of other states. There is not another commonwealth under the face of heaven that has such a provision.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That provision is not under discussion.

will have a contrary tendency. It will have a tendency to sow the seeds of bitterness and party strife; it will have a direct tendency to create a feeling of deep-seated hostility towards the institutions of this Dominion. If there were no other reasons that could be urged against the Bill, that reason itself should have potency enough to deter us from passing this measure. Why, Sir, we have in this Dominion at the present time the evidences on all hands of discontent, of Petty Sessions appoints collectors for each police district liberties of the people may be infringed upon, in order that who makes the rolls. These lists are posted on the court the condition of things now existing, which is satisfactory house and other public places one month and fourteen days; to all the people of Ontario, may be changed; not for the appeals for removal or for the insertion of names may be made, not to an appointee of the Government, but to a judicial officer, the clerk of the Court of Petty Sessions. In Victoria, the electoral registrars are appointed by the Governor in Council; and they are to make out the lists of electors, have them printed, and provisions are made for inspection and publication. Although the electoral registrars are the appointees of the Governor in Council, the Court of Revision is the Court of Petty Sessions, so that the revision, both in the case of New South Wales and Victoria, is made by the judicial officers of the Province. If we turn to the republic to the south of us and examine the laws of the different States of the Union, we will not find an instance where the officers having control of the registration of voters, are not officials elected by the people themselves and amenable to the people. may be permitted to allude briefly to the provisions in several of the States. In the State of New York, a board of inspectors is elected as inspectors of elections and which They meet to make the is also to be a registration board. lists and to correct the lists, and their proceedings are open to all the electors; the lists are filed with the town clerk for inspection, and in case any elector appears before the court and makes oath that another is not entitled to vote, the word "challenge" is written opposite the name pro-tested against, and when this person appears at the poll he is challenged and obliged to prove his right to exercise the franchise. In the State of Michigan, the aldermen, in cities, form boards of registration; in the rural districts, the supervisor, the township clerk and the treasurer of the township compose the registration board; they form the lists, and after the lists are made out, sessions are held, the lists are posted, and appeals are heard. The whole proceedings, as in the State of New York, are open. In the State of Wisconsin, there are inspectors of elections, elected by the people, three for each polling place. They are authorised to act as a board of registration. Open courts are held, voters are heard before them, the utmost publicity is given to all their proceedings, and the utmost facility given to a voter to get his name put on the list. In the State of Iowa, the township trustees and the clerk, with the registrars elected by the people, hold open courts, revise the lists, and hear evidence as to putting on or striking off names. In Oregon judges are appointed by the County Court, three in number for each district, to revise the lists. In Illinois the County Board appoints electors, as judges of elections, in each election district, the supervisor, assessor and collector, to be appointed judges for the district in which they reside. These judges see to the registration of voters, and hold open courts where the lists are publicly revised and corrections made. These are all the cases I shall allude to with regard to the law of registration. In the case of England, the Australian colonies and the American States I have quoted, the lists are made and revised either by the officers of the people or the judiciary, and, in no commonwealth under the face of heaven, whether under British rule or not, is so flagrant an infringement to the rights of the people perpetrated or tolerated as that proposed in the Bill under consideration. Another reason why this Bill will be sure to create dissatisfaction in Ontario is that it largely increases the public expense, that it creates a full regiment of officials. Under the provisions of this Bill, 844 persons can be appointed, and $500,000 a year will in all probability be added to the public expense. In return for that, is the country to have any increased safeguard for its security, any better law, any law more in consonance with the wishes and the genius of the people? No; this great expense is to be incurred and this regiment of officials is to be appointed in order that the previous year. Mr. CHARLTON.

purpose of securing the existing liberties of the people of Ontario or the Dominion, but in order to make it more probable that the party now in power, which fears to go back to the constituents which sent it here, may retain power. Another reason why this measure will create dissatisfaction with the federal union is that it will create confusion and difficulty, and will baffle and annoy the ordinary elector. A large proportion of the electors in Ontario have sufficient difficulty now to comprehend the machinery for registration, revision and appeal. in addition to the present machinery, you compel the elector to appear before the revising barrister, the confusion and annoyance will be such as to create an intense feeling of dissatisfaction with this Bill and with the Government which placed it on the Statute Book. Another reason why these provincial franchises should not be interfered with is one which I must reaffirm, that the Provinces are component parts of this Dominion, that they have a distinct autonomy, which is proved by the fact that the Dominion Government has come into collision with at least one Province on matters of constitutional law and jurisdiction, that we have had litigations between the Dominion Government and Ontario to settle the respective jurisdictions, that these questions have been carried on appeal to the highest court in the British realm, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that the autonomy and constitutional rights of the Province has been affirmed on six different appeals. These Provinces, through their delegates, formed this Union, and they are represented in this Union only by the members of this House of Commons. They have no representation in the Senate, no power over the Administration or the executive of this country, and the House of Commons is consequently the only bond of union between these Provinces and the Union. Is it not reasonable to say that they shall select these representatives? No man will deny it. The members of this House should be selected, and are selected, by the different Provinces, and, if they select their representatives, is it unreasonable for them to demand the power of designating by whom they should be selected? When we are the representatives of the Provinces, is it not a violation of the abstract principles of justice and right for us to interfere with the right of those Provinces to decide who shall select their representatives in this House? In the constitutional convention which formed this Dominion, the Provinces, through their delegates, arranged the basis of representation. It was not arranged by this House, but it is a part of the organic law of this Dominion. The British North America Act provides that the basis of representation shall be population, that the Province of Quebec shall have an unalterable number of 65 representatives, and that, at every decennial census, the representation of the other Provinces shall be adjusted upon that basis. This House has no power to change this basis of representation. This is a provincial right guaranteed by the organic law of this land. We cannot nominate the members of this House of Commons. Great as is the power of the Governor in Council, they cannot nominate the members of this House of Commons. Those members can be elected only in one way, by the expression of the wishes of the inhabitants of the Provinces.

Mr. MILLS. We elected Tupper here.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am reminded by my hon. friend from Bothwell that we elected the hon, member for Cumberland here, but it was not in the ordinary course.

Mr. DAVIES. We elected the member for King's the

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Provinces have the right to choose their representatives, I hold that it follows as a matter of course, as a natural corollary that they shall have the right to designate who shall make the choice. A good deal has been said about obstruction.

Mr. McCALLUM. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Monek says "Hear, hear." He requested me to sit down almost before I had got up, and I promised my hon. friend that I would sit down some time, and I intend to do so. With regard to this question of obstruction. Not very long ago the British House of Commons adopted a system of cloture, but we had the declaration of the First Minister the other day that he did not propose so great an infraction of the rules of discussion. Mr: Forster, a member of the British House of Commons, in reference to this matter said: (The hon. gentleman read from "Forster-Political Presentments," pp. 5, 6, 7, 14 and 15.)

Now, Sir, with regard to the measure under the consideration of this House, I hold that, although a considerable degree of discussion has been indulged in upon this Bill, there has not been enough discussion to apprise, even members on the Government side of the House of the real character of this Bill. I hold that, long as this measure has been under discussion, at least one-half the members of this House are not yet thoroughly conversant with it. This measure is only now arousing the attention of the country. Demands are coming upon us by the thousand, that the passage of this Bill should be delayed in order that the people, who are ignorant of the character of the provisions of this measure, may examine them for themselves. This measure requires ample discussion; it requires a greater amount of discussion than it has as yet received, and weeks would be insufficient to arouse the country to the character of this measure, or even to impress the majority of this House with the real meaning and scope of its provisions. I have shown, in a former discussion upon another clause of this Bill, that, in the country to the south of us, the individual States control the franchise and although that franchise is now uniform, it was not uniform when those States had the control of the franchise given to them. There can be no doubt that we shall ultimately have a uniform franchise here in the same sense as they have a uniform franchise in the United States. We shall have universal suffrage in all the Provinces. But I hold that we should leave the Provinces themselves to decide how soon they will reach universal suffrage, how rapidly they will change the conditions of the franchise as now existing. I pointed out the other day that in the United States the people voted for a President and members of the House of Representatives; that each State elected its own representatives as members of the United States Senate, each State having two members of that body; that the privileges and powers of the States of the American union far exceed those of the Provinces in our Federal union, and that the States had civil and criminal jurisdiction, that the judiciary of the United States consisted of the Supreme Court and the circuit courts and their jurisdiction was a limited one; and I will point out what that jurisdiction is, in order to show how much greater in that country is the power of the component parts of the confederation than is the power of the Provinces under our own system. Article three, section 2, of the constitution United States says:

Mr. McCALLUM. I think the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid hon. gentlemen are opposed to listening to arguments.

What has the constitution of the Mr. McCALLUM. United States to do with the Franchise Bill?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am pointing out that while it is proposed to take away from the Provinces some part of the small power they possess, there is great disparity between the powers possessed by the Provinces of the Dominion and the States of the Union.

Mr. McCALLUM. I submit the hon, geutleman is out of order. He is giving us a lecture on the constitution of the United States. He invariably does so and he draws his inspiration from the great country over the line. But what has that to do with the Franchise Bill?

The hon, member for North Norfolk is perfectly in order. He is pointing cut the difference between the powers of the Provinces and those of the States of the Union. Hon, zentlemen opposite themselves always allude to the United States when advocating the National Policy.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman always draws his inspiration from the United States.

Mr. MILLS. You do.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is you who do-you, and the hon. member for North Norfolk. He never rises in the House without giving us a lecture on the United States. It is a very nice document, but we do not want to hear lectures upon it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member goes to the United States for his coal and for his National Policy.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I submit that the hon. member for North Norfolk is perfectly in order. He has laid down a proposition, and he is seeking to fortify it by authorities which he may find in the United States, Great Britain, or any other portion of the world.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. member is perfectly in order in drawing an illustration; but he must do it in such a way and at such length as not to weary the patience of the House. If it is done openly and avowedly to take up time, which I think I may assume is the case, it is not allowable, and the patience of the House is to be considered in these matters. I think the hon, gentleman is in order in making the illustration.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have always pleasure, so far as I am concerned, in being able to thank you for your impartiality, Mr. Chairman. I was about to read the clause, as follows:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority; in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction: to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign States, citizens or subjects."

In all matters of civil and criminal jurisdiction the courts of the different States are supreme, except so far as they are limited by the clause I have read. What I desire to point out is, that the powers pertaining to our Provinces are limited and trivial compared with those enjoyed by the States of the American Union. It is a very convenient thing for hon, gentlemen opposite to talk about Yankeeism. It is the part of wisdom in a public man to learn from the lessons of experience, from whatever source they may come, from any nation or people, in any age or epoch, and to say that we would not profit by the experience of the great nation at our doors with the very system which we are now about to abrogate, or to benefit from the salutary results derived from its institutions in fostering the prosperity and growth of that country—I say it would be fatuity on our part not to gather lessons from the history of that country, or of England, or France, or of any other christian, or any other barbarian country for that matter, on the face of the globe.

Now, I pass to the Australian colonies. I have here a summary from the London Times of a plan for the federation of the Australasian colonies, and I think we may draw from the features of that plan some useful lessons, showing how carefully the doctrine of provincial autonomy and provincial rights is looked after, and how much more prominent they are than in our own country. The mode of constituting the federal council is described as follows:

"On the federal council each Crown colony is to be represented by one member and each other colony by two. But at the request of the colonial Legislatures Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, increase humber of representatives for each colony. As to the mode of appointing a representative, and as to the tenure of his office, the Legislature of each colony is empowered to make what ever provision it thinks fit."

It will thus be seen how entirely the tenure of office and the mode of election and other matters of that kind are left in the hands of the provinces, or colonies.

Mr. PAINT. They are not confederated yet.

Mr. CHARLTON. We are talking about the proposed plan of confederation as I said. Some of the proposed powers pertaining to the federal council are as follows:—

"With regard to the matters that are to be subject to the legislative authority of the council, they include (1) the relations of Australasia with the islands of the Pacific; (2) the prevention of the influx of criminals; (3) the fisheries in Australasian waters beyond territorial limits; (4) the service of civil process of the courts of any colony within Her Majesty's possessions in Australasia out of the jurisdiction of the colony in which it is issued; (5) the enforcement of judgments of courts of law of any colony beyond the limits of the colony; (6) the enforcement of criminal process beyond the limits of the colony in which it is issued, and the extradition of offenders (including deserters of wives and children and deserters from the Imperial or colonial naval or military forces; (7) the custody of offenders on board ships belonging to Her Majesty's colonial governments beyond territorial limits; (8) any matter which at the request of the Legislatures of the colonies Her Majesty by Order in Council shall think fit to refer to the council."

I do not know that it is necessary to give the full list of the powers partaining to this council, as the clauses I have read will indicate their scope and drift. There are other powers and provisions which are thus explicitly granted:

"Moreover, the Governor of any two or more colonies may, on the address of the Legislatures, refer for the determination of the council any questions relating to them or their relations with one another. A special obligation attaches to the first three matters, namely, the relations with Australasia with the Pacific islands, the influx of criminals, and the fisheries. Every Bill in respect of these is to be reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, unless it has been previously approved by the Queen through one of her principal Secretaries of State."

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think it is hardly in order for the hon. gentleman to read these provisions in all their details.

Mr. CHARLTON. These colonies are about to form a union, and it is necessary for us to know, in the light of our own experience and the experience of other countries, what course these colonies are about to take in regard to matters which have a bearing on the Bill we are now discussing.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think that it is in order, or that it is relevant, to read these particulars as to a scheme which has not been adopted.

Mr. PAINT. No; that is it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The scheme has substantially been adopted, it has gone through—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. The scheme is going through the House of Lords and its passage is a mere matter of form. I was about to point out what the provisions of the scheme are with regard to—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to drop the subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did you rule?

Mr. CHARLTON. Do I understand that you rule that I man who has interrupted me cannot read the provisions of that scheme, which I consider discussed fifty or sixty times.

a matter of the utmost importance in elucidating clearly the principles which underlie this Bill. If so, I shall be sorry, as it is essential to what I intended saying that I should be permitted to make this statement.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. My ruling is that an incidental reference to a matter of that kind is permissible, but to refer to the whole matter in detail I think would not be in order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I purpose passing over nine-tenths of it, as I felt in approaching the subject that it would be trespassing on the patience of the House to read it all. But if, as you say, you will permit an incidental reference to its provisions that will be sufficient.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. I shall not read the provisions, but I shall only make some comments upon them. The acts of the council are to prevail over the colonies, and the council has to make representations to Her Majesty—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). What has that to do with the franchise of Ontario?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Under my ruling the hon. gentleman cannot go into the details of the scheme, but he may refer to its chief features as an illustration.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was referring to the chief features of the scheme, and I was nearly through, but of course it is impossible to tell what they are without hearing a statement of them. The scheme makes an arrangement with regard to expenditure; the provincial council has not power to levy taxes; the expenditure is to be apportioned among the provinces, and it is to be a voluntary charge. In this scheme there is an unlimited reservation of State rights; the council has no power to impose taxes, to enforce treaties, or to enforce its own laws. The colonies may, at any time, withdraw from the Confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon, gentlemen would rather have an appeal to the House than to allow me three minutes to conclude, we shall take it. I do not think I am treated with any fairness by the majority in this House.

Mr. BOWELL. What does it matter? He has to waste so much time, and he might as well do it in this way.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not wasting time. I purposely abridged my remarks. I am standing here in my right as a representative of a riding in this Dominion, and I am discussing a measure that I believe to be a detestable measure. I feel warmly on this matter. I have taken a scheme prepared by other of Her Majesty's colonies to illustrate my argument. I shall conclude by saying that we are taking from the Provinces a right that the Australian scheme leaves with the Provinces. That scheme preserves State rights, and any Province can retire from that Confederation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is what I wanted to state; and now I am through with regard to the Australian matter, and it simply illustrates that in no other British commonwealth would the amount of restriction of provincial rights and provincial autonomy be tolerated that this Bill proposes to impose on the Provinces of this Dominion.

Mr. PAINT. The hon, gentleman has discussed this five

*Mr. CHARLTON. Well, if I choose, I will discuss it seven or eight times more. I do not think the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me would understand it if it was discussed fifty or sixty times.

Mr. PAINT. I do not understand any Yankeeisms.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, with regard to the charge of Yankeeism, it is frequently hurled across the floor of this House. I have a word to say about that. I happen to be a British subject by birth. I have lived thirty-five years in this Dominion. I have served in this House since the year 1872. I have always, in my capacity as a member of this House, and a citizen of this Dominion, sought to promote its interests. I spurn and repudiate and spit upon that exhibition of paltry malignant prejudice that is made by hon, gentlemen who get up the cry of Yankee. Sir, is it impossible for a person born in the United States to live in Canada and be a loyal citizen? Is he to be denied the rights and privileges that belong to a citizen of this country? Is he to be taunted time after time by this miserable, petty spitefulness on the part of hon, gentlemen opposite? The leader of the Government himself has not been above that appeal to popular prejudice. In the United States to-day there are 1,000,000 Canadians, among them are men who are filling positions of every rank, and I venture to say that not one of them has been reminded of his nationality in an offensive manner, no matter how narrow his prejudices may be as a Canadian. In that country, where the population is made homogeneous, all men are welcomed, and when a man casts in his lot with the people of the United States, it matters not what his place of birth may have been. After he becomes a citizen of that country he is received with open arms, ant is given all the privileges and enjoyments, all the rights and immunities that belong to an American citizen. Here, Sir, it is different. A man may come here from the United States, and he is a Yankee if he should live here for half a century; he cannot be a Canadian. It a man comes from Ireland he is a Paddy; he cannot be a Canadian; it cannot be forgotten what his nationality is; he must be reminded that in this blue-blooded country he cannot be considered a citizen of the Dominion of Canada, desiring to participate in the rights and duties of a citizen. Sir, the child that is adopted in the family is considered and treated as a member of the family; the citizen who is adopted in the State is considered and treated as a member of the State. In the United States three years' residence is all that is required for naturalisation; in Canada, after having lived here 35 years, after having all my interests in this country, after having labored in the interest of the country. to-day, if I say anything that does not happen to meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite, if I alluded to anything in the history or the laws of the United States, by way of illustration, how I am answered? Not by a refutation of the argument; no, but by allusion to the fact that I may have been born in the United States. Sir, I did not choose the place of my birth; I was not responsible for it; I was not consulted; I do not even remember the circumstance; and I disclaim all responsibility for the circumstance of having been born in that country. I came here in boyhood; I cast my lot in this country, and while God spares my life I intend to fight for the salvation of the country. I am fighting for its salvation to-day, against a measure calculated to rob the people of their rights. Now, I shall be pleased to have the taunt about Yankee thrown across the floor again; I will reply to it, and occupy the time a little

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You have a right to talk about Americans, but you must let Irishmen alone.

Mr. McCALLUM. Whom does the hon. gentleman allude to when he talks about gentlemen on this side calling Yankee? It is a term I never use; but I say that he and speaks of his loyalty, and all that, I question that very much. I have reason to question the hon, gentleman's loyalty, when he talks of the volunteers of this country—he knows what I refer to-when he comes here to flaunt his loyalty; and when we are bored here, hour after hour, by hon, gentlemen opposite wasting the time and money of the country by obstruction, I, for one, won't stand it. I am bound to tell hon, gentlemen what I know when they come and flaunt their loyalty in our faces.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, gentleman says he is bound to tell us what he knows, and he did not tell us what he knows. Now, this little episode with regard to nationality has developed this fact, that no American can have fair play from hon, gentlemen on the opposite side of this Chamber. It has developed the fact that in the case of any man of American birth, if they can injure him, by appeals to popular prejudice, they are not above doing it, from the First Minister down to the lowest man in the ranks. I resent these insinuations. I affirm that I am loyal to this country and its institutions; I am a citizen of this country, and a subject of the British Empire by birth. I derive my descent from an old English family; whose family lineage can be traced back for 800 years, and I take pride in the fact that I am of English descent. I take pride in the fact that my blood is pure Northumbrian blood; and I resent, repudiate and deny any insinuation made by hon, gentlemen on the other side of this House, that I am not loyal to the institutions of this country or that I do not wish this country well.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. When you left the Chair, Sir, after six o'clock, I was in the midst of a defense against the charge of having been born in the United States, a charge that I do not deny. I, of course, was a passive agent in the matter; I could not very well help myzelf. But I find, on looking at our parliamentary companion, that some other hon, gentlemen are in the same difficulty. I was under the impression that the Minister of Railways was born in that country; the hon, member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), I believe, is an American by birth; one of the members of the Senate, formerly a member of this House (Mr. Plumb), is an American by birth. I think that the party of hon gentleman opposite, some years ago, introduced an American by the name of Anson Green Phelps Dodge, naturalised him after a residence of 12 months, and elected him to a seat in this House, and when the Pacific scandal was under discussion, sent to New York for him to vote. I believe the Minister of Railways has recently been spending large sums of money to build a road in the United States, and has just returned from a trip there.

Mr. POPE. Not a dollar of public money.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe that an American named Howard, in charge of our Gatling guns, who went out to our North-West Territories to teach our men how to use them, is doing good service there, but it is likely that were he to remain in Canada thirty-six years he would be reproached by the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) and the hon, member from Nova Scotia, with having been born in the United States.

Mr. McCALLUM. 1 found no fault with the hon, gentleman for having been born in the United States.

Mr. MILLS. Why did you allude to it.

Mr. McCALLUM. I did not allude to the fact that he two or three others on the opposite side of the House draw was born in the United States, but I said he drew all his their inspiration from the United States, and when he inspirations from that country. I am glad to hear the expressions of the hon. gentleman to night, because I am always glad to have my opinion corrected, if wrong.

Mr. CHARLTON. Last Session, Sir, it will be in your recollection that when a substantial amount was being voted to the Canadian Pacific Railway my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon) moved an amendment, debarring that company from spending any of our public money in the construction of railways in the United States; but that amendment was voted down, hon. gentlemen opposite in a body voting against it, and that company has spent millions of our money in the United States. I think this whole cry of Yankeeism is one that hon, gentlemen opposite ought to be ashamed of. I have referred to the constitution of the United States as illustrating the principle of federal compact. There is not a man of prominence in England to day who dees not speak in the highest terms of the American constitution and American public men. The present Premier of England pronounced it one of the most remarkable of all human productions in the shape of organic laws. If we take that broad, comprehensive view of public affairs, which every man with breadth of mind should take, we are bound to give the constitution of that great nation its due weight in a discussion of this kind. There are existing in the world to-day about 90,000,000 English-speaking people. In all their leading interests they have common interests; they belong to a common stock; they have common institutions; they all have institutions derived from that great hive of nations, England. It is unworthy of reasonable, intelligent men, in this Legislative Assembly, this House of Commons, to appeal to these narrow, contracted, bitter prejudices, that exist amongst the most ignorant of men, by raising this cry of Yankeeism, levelled at me or any other man who may attempt to illustrate an argument by pertinent illustrations, drawn from history and the polity of that country. Of all federal compacts in existence, this federal compact in Canada takes the lead in a centralising tendency, a tendency to centralise in the Dominion Government the powers and privileges that are in the possession of the component parts of Confedera-The Provinces in this Dominion have less of State right, less of all that pertains to provincial autonomy, even without this Franchise Bill, than the Provinces of any federation in existence. This Bill, with its clause with reference to revising the voters lists, is one which, should it pass, will be unique in legislation; it is a measure of a character that would not be introduced into any civilised Legislature, whether it be Anglo-Saxon, or French, or Italian, or Teutonic. There is no Legislature in christendom that would accept this Bill or seriously consider such provisions as it contains. I have pointed out to you, in the case of England and in the case of the Australian colonies, and in the case of the numerous States of the American Union, that there is not one case where any provisions analogous to those contained in this Bill, with reference to the making and revision of the voters' lists, obtain. I have pointed out that in England the officers are elected by the people who form the lists; I have pointed out that in New South Wales the officers who form the lists are appointed by the court; I have pointed out that in every State of the American Union officers elected by the people form the registration board, and that the whole machinery of registration and revision in all these countries is directly under the control of the people and of the courts. There is not an instance, except Canada, should this Bill become law, where the Government appoint officers to form the lists, and revise the lists, and to fix the lists. I have two very brief quotations to make, from a work on political ethics, by the celebrated writer, Lieber. This quotation refers to what constitutes the duty of a party in power with reference to the principles of justice. He says, on page 442; Mr. CHARLTON.

"The moment that justice is sacrificed to party interest, the party or respective individual becomes factious: for justice being the grand object of the law, of the constitution, of the State itself, the party sets itself above these, and makes itself its own object, while a party can have any sensible meaning only in that it is formed for the public good. In denying justice the party becomes factious."

Now, if the party in power to-day has introduced a Bill which denies justice to the people of this country, that party, great as it is, and not the party represented by hon. gentlemen on this side, becomes factious. With reference to public opinion and the necessity for consulting public opinion, and the necessity for being governed and guided by public opinion, the same author says:

"Nevertheless, real public opinion is carefully and respectfully to be consulted, for the two reasons, first, that there is a very great chance that, if it be settled, and, of course, touching a subject on which there can exist any public opinion, it is upon the main correct, and if not, that there is, at any rate, much to be learned from it; secondly, that it is the greatest, mightiest of all powers, and therefore not to be slighted."

Has there been any pressure of public opinion demanding this measure, asking that this power should be wrested from the Provinces and exercised by the Dominion Government? I deny that there has been any such pressure or manifestation of public opinion, or that the Government is consulting public opinion in the course it is taking. The same author, in another work on civil liberty, lays down the principles which should govern an election, which are diametrically opposed to those which the Government are adopting:

"All elections must be superintended by election judges, or officers independent of the executive, or any organised or unorganised power in connection with the Government."

Is this the condition the Government are to observe under this Bill? No; the elections are to be superintended by officers appointed by this Government, for the purpose of saying who shall vote, and of so arranging the voters' list as to give the Government the power, if these gentlemen will obey their wishes, of influencing the elections in a greater or less extent by a manipulation of the voters' list. We, alone, of all commonwealths that exist under English law and English institutions, are capable of such violence to representative institutions as is contemplated by this Bill. Hasty legislation is always to be deprecated, and measures of this great public importance should be weighed carefully and passed with deliberation after full discussion. A constitutional change of this kind should not even be thought of by a Government without good and sufficient reasons. No such reason exists to-day or has existed since Confederation for the change proposed by this Bill. There is no necessity for it, and the Government, in making it, lay themselves open to the suspicion that they are actuated by motives other than those which should actuate a Government which desired to act for the good of the people. Such action should be deliberate and cautious. You can scarcely point to a State inhabited by people speaking the English language where constitutional changes are not made with caution and submitted to the people, as our constitution should have been submitted to the people. There is no reason why we should act precipitately in the matter, except one. There is no present necessity for this change. We have lived under the existing institutions for eighteen years, and we could live for eighteen years more under them without sacrificing any public interest. The only reason, for the present action is that, if the Bill is not put through this Session, then the manipulation of the voters' list cannot be made in time for another election. But for that reason, the change could be made as well next year, or the year following, or ten years hence, as to-day. It is one of those changes that can be made at our leisure, that can be made with caution and deliberation, and ought not be made hastily, and there is no reason for adopting any other course, except that the Government intend to take possession of the electoral machinery of this country and reap an unfair advantage from this Bill at the next general election. This is a constitutional this change continues to exist. It is a change reaching this change continues to exist. It is a change reaching through this generation and to future generations, and any Government that, for the sake of a momentary advantage at the coming election, will be governed by that consideration alone, is a Government recreant to its trust to the people. We have shown in Canada, in the arrangement of our organic laws, a singular and reprehensible disregard of public opinion. Our present constitution ought to have been submitted to the people, and if it had been there might not have a visted in Nove and, if it had been, there might not have existed in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the dissatisfaction that now exists. There is a feeling in all the Provinces that the mode in which this constitution was adopted, without the judgment of the people being passed upon it, was a grave mistake. This very clause 41, under which power is taken by the Government to-day to pass this Bill, is one that ought to have been submitted to the people of Canada. We have not yet acted under that section, so that there is yet time to take the sense of the people upon it, as it ought to have been taken in regard to all the provisions of our constitution. What is the course pursued in other countries? The measure now under consideration in the House of Lords from the Australian colonies is not to be of force until it is approved by the different colonies, and no Province will come into that Confederation until it has adopted the provisions of that Act, in the same manner as the people of the Canadian Provinces ought to have adopted the British North America Act. The constitution of the United States was adopted in 1787 but was not acted upon by the States until 1789. It was referred to the different States and ratified by each State, and the time taken for ratification extended over two years. So, with regard to the constitution of the various States, wherever a constitution is framed it is submitted to the people of the State, and unless a majority of the people ratify it the constitution dies. It must have the approval of the people, the source of power. Our constitution ought to have had their approval, and this provision should have the approval of the people before it becomes the law of the land. There is abundance of time to ascertain the wishes of the people of Canada in regard to this measure. No advantage will be sacrificed by delay, except that which the Government expect to obtain by undue manipulation of the electoral machinery in the year 1887. This Bill is supported by many members on the other side of the House who will never see these halls again; not that their ridings will not return Government supporters, but that many of these men-and my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. White) is probably one of them-will go back to their constituencies in bad odor, from the fact that they have supported a bad measure; and, though their constituencies may be faithful to the Government, they will return other men than those who have supported a bad and an unfair measure. The gain that many members of this House expect to reap from this measure they will not reap from it, personally; their party may reap an advantage, but many of themselves will be left at home, where they deserve to be left, as a punishment for their betrayal of the interest of their Province and of the interests of the people. Sir, I repeat that this Bill is likely to engender hostile feelings towards this Government. We have enough dissatisfaction, we have enough disloyalty to the Dominion Government in Canada already. The foundations of this Government have not been laid as broadly and as deeply as we might wish, and a measure which is calculated to foment and increase the feeling of dissatisfaction and hostility that exist in some quarters to-day is a measure that ought not to receive the sanction of this House. I claim that this is a measure which will change, reaching far beyond mere party interest, one largely increase the public expenses, at a time when we are that will affect this Dominion, not only for the next general election, but for all the elections to come, that measure that, in the case of the Province of Quebec, is will affect the interests of the country just so long as likely to provoke the bitterest hostility, when the people come to realise the character of the measure in so far as it concerns that Province, and when they come to realise that the barriers that have been raised around them to protect them from the interference of the other Provinces in their domestic affairs are broken down. Sir, hon, gentlemen opposite are risking the future of the Dominion in this Bill; they are risking it by doing violence to the principles on which it reposes; they are risking the future of this Dominion by passing a measure that places in their hands unjust powers, that they intend to use unjustly, for the purpose of keeping themselves in power; they are risking the future of this Dominion by involving this country in half a million dollars additional expense at a time when we are sure to have a deficit. They are endangering the future of this Dominion for selfish party purposes, for the purpose of maintaining themselves in power, because they dare not appeal to the constituency that sent them here, they dare not appeal to the constituency that has twice given them a majority, once in 1878 and once in 1882. Not daring to appeal to that constituency again, not daring to trust the electors who have twice given them a verdict of confidence, they have introduced a measure for the purpose of packing the public jury, when they appear before it to answer, as defendants, to the charges made against them by the Opposition of to-day.

Mr. McCALLUM. I would not trouble the House only for the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Charlton). He said, before six o'clock, that I had kept something back. I stated then that if I did keep something back I must always be allowed to state my convictions. I have known the hon, gentleman for a long time. He gave us a great lecture on his loyalty and on his ancestry. I have nothing to do with that. He spoke of his loyalty, but I will say to you here that if there is a disloyal man in Canada he is found in the ranks of hon, gentlemen opposite. I ask that hon, gentleman now, when he boasts of his loyalty, if he did not write some letters to the American papers, at a certain time when there was a great crisis going on in this country, in 1866? I hold in my hand here some complimentary remarks that the hon. gentleman made on the volunteers of this country at that time, and I hope the House will bear with me while I read them, and then the hon. gentleman can deny it, if he says it is not true. It was written by Mr. John Charlton, who is now, I believe, the member for North Norfolk:

"Your correspondent happened to be in Paris, C.W., on the 19th inst. (June, 1866); heard music, saw flags, civilians, military, &c.; enquired what was going on; found that volunteer pic-nic was in progress, and concluded to stay and see the show.

gress, and concluded to stay and see the show.

"Six companies of volunteers, numbering about 300 men, in the Canadian uniform of black coats, with ridiculously short tails, and dark grey pants, excessively large in the rear, just below the waist band, were the guests in whose honor the spread was made.

"The grounds where the tables were spread, and the stand for the speakers and music erected, were in the beautiful valley of Grand River, just below the Bufalo and Lake Huron bridge. The day was all that could be desired, sunshine and a fresh, bracing breeze, contributing to the enjoyment of the crowd of hilarious and self-satisfied Cannacks. Cannucks.

officers, complimenting Canada on her loyalty, progress and self-sacrificing devotion to British connection, and the volunteers on their soldierly qualities, patriotism, courage, virtue, fighting, height, weight, &c, the chairman introduced the Rev. Wm. Ryerson, ex-M.P.P., who made a speech by way of grace before dinner. The speech of the Rev. gentleman was a very fine specimen of buncombe and bombast, and contained not a solitary acknowledgment to the United States for faithfully performing treaty obligations, and all the duties on international comity, in suppressing the contemplated Fenian invasion. The crowd who stood open-mouthed, imbibing the sentiments of the venerable oracle, was informed that Canada had the finest volunteer force in the world, who had just gained a great victory, by repulsing and driving back the Fenian hordes, which a professedly friendly nation had permitted to attack them; that their institutions were immeasurably superior to the ultra-democracy of the United States, and that Canada was to become, through the agency of Confederation, one of the greatest powers of the earth; had demonstrated to the world and all mankind her ability to take care of all Fenian hordes, and with the assistance of Britannia,—that Goliath among the nations—to repulse and drive back, in ignominy and disgrace, if need be, that greatest nation in all creation which they had for a neighbor.

"After the speech of the Rev gentleman, the volunteers partock of the repast provided for them by the ladies of Paris, which I presume was a bountiful one, though I did not inspect the tables.

"Dinner over, speaking became the order of the day, and the clergymen of Paris, in rotation, ventilated their sentiments. The Rev. gentlemen are good on buncombe; one, however, the Rev. Mr. Robertson, and get off a few sensible ideas, which refreshingly varied the monotony of clap-trap and self-laudation. He had the hardihood to assert that it would not be improper to enquire whether Ireland did not labor under grievance and to doub " After reading the order, and what I took to be an address from the held and the fact that a State church was forced upon an unwilling people was just the thing.

"In all the speeches made, I did not notice a word of acknowledgement for the course taken by the United States. All the changes were wrung on the repulsion of the Fenians; the fact that they gained one victory, and left without being repulsed, was not mentioned.

"The self-glorification and elation over the glorious demonstration of power and patriotism made by Canada, certainly appeared, to an on-looker, like wasting a good deal of powder on a small amount of game; and the studious avoidance of any allusion to the United States, except in tones of insult and disparagement, by the small fry who figured as orators on the occasion, is, I presume, an indication of the tone of public men and of the press in Canada, who will now attempt to counteract annexationist tendencies by misrepresenting the United States and sowing the seeds of bitterness and hostility in the minds of the people. Perhaps they may succeed, for the masses in Canada are not remarkable for intelligence."

Mr. TROW What connection has that with the Franchica.

Mr. TROW. What connection has that with the Franchise Bill?

Mr. McCALLUM. I was very glad to hear from the hon. member to-night that he was loyal to the core. I never charged him with disloyalty, and never with Yankenism. This charge was brought against him in his own county. He snatched the paper away and tore it into atoms, but the pieces were taken care of afterwards; and I have read it from print. If hon, gentlemen do not believe it, I have photographs here. They were sent to me. I never listened to greater nonsense than I have heard on this question before the House. We have been here three weeks and have Obstruction has been practised by hon. done nothing. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. McCALLUM. I say yes, and I know what I am talking about. Hon. gentlemen opposite say the measure is revolutionary, yet we are not proposing to do anything more than we have power to do. All that talk is made because we will not allow Oliver Mowat and the local Ontario to say who shall elect members to this House. Although I do not perhaps approve of all that is in the Bill, yet it is an improvement on the franchise we have had in each of the Provinces. When this Bill is passed we shall have a franchise of our own. Hon gentlemen opposite speak of the Franchise Bill passed by the Local Legislature of Ontario last Session. How did that come about? Having seen the proposed Dominion Franchise Bill the Ontario Government determined, to use a sporting phrase, to adopt that and go one better. They put the tranchise a little lower, and they thought by that to catch the votes of the workingmen. But from an examination of the Bill before this House I honestly believe it will prove as liberal a measure Mr. McCallum.

as the Ontario Act, and even more so. But that is not what hon, gentlemen opposite want. They want to talk against time, and they have done so for three weeks. Is there any member of the Government who can tell me the cost of the time so spent to the country, and for which cost the Opposition are responsible. Can the Minister of Militia tell me that? I venture to say it will be quite an item, and I want to hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for it, because they are responsible and cannot get out of the responsibility. What is their duty? It is to criticise reasonably, to enter their protest and to vote against the Bill. That is their course, if they are sensible men; I always thought them sensible hitherto, but I question it, since their actions of the last three weeks. They have been acting, if the expression is a parliamentary one, like madmen. They think they know more than the whole people of the Dominion. They tell us that petitions are coming in. I know the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) presented a petition from Monck to-day. I sent for it. I think the much-defeated member for West Ontario should have been satisfied with his experience of the people of Monck, for they would not accept him.

Mr. MILLS. They did accept him, and he sat here.

Mr. McCALLUM. Only for a short time, and they put him out soon afterwards and sent him about his business. I looked at that petition. It has evidently been hawked about five municipalities, and it has 60 signatures, among them my opponent at the last election, a namesake, because the Reformers thought if they could not defeat me in Monck by my hon, friend from West Ontario they perhaps might do so by getting a namesake and confusing the names. I say there are 60 names on the petition; I know every name on it, and I think there is one Conservative among them, and I question very much whether that signature is not a forgery. His name is down in pencil, and it does not look like his signature. I know him very well. If he did sign, it was under a misapprehension, and I am sure he will not vote for any Grit. If this is the kind of petitions to be presented, let them go ahead. We have had such petitions presented Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to raise the wind before this; they are trying to raise the wind now. They do not seem to understand what a ridiculous figure they are making. They are wasting the people's money and they will be held responsible for every dollar expended on the discussion of this measure. The people of the country will hold them responsible. It is, of course, a difficult matter for members on this side to keep quiet, but we did keep quiet for three weeks, and listened to the most nonsensical arguments ever addressed to any assembly in the world. I would not have risen at this time if the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had not boasted so much of his loyalty, and said as much as that I wanted to accuse him of disloyalty. I did nothing of the kind; but when he flaunted in my face that I was keeping something back, I could not help replying that I had kept nothing back but what I am willing to give to the House.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has done me the honor to refer to me in rather a pointed way. The hon, member, as we all know, sits for a constituency which has been twice gerrymandered to enable him to carry it. When I first had the pleasure of meeting that hon, gentleman in that constituency he had been elected by a majority of about 300 four years before, and he beat me, a stranger, by only 5 votes. Before the next election came on he had the constituency gerry-dered again to suit him, a constituency which he had carried by 300 majority, a constituency in which he lived himself. He had it gerrymandered when I ran against him the second time

Mr. McCALLUM. The people would not have you.

Mr. EDGAR. And in spite of that gerrymander, I beat the hon. member by forty-two votes. So the hon. gentleman has beaten me in a gerrymandered constituency. But, before the last general election the hon. gentleman, in order to save himself, had to get not only his constitutency gerrymandered but had to get paid a very extravagant price for an old tug-boat on the canal. Everyone must have seen that since I presented the petition to-day the hon. gentleman has been in a state of the wildest excitement. He has been interrupting hon. gentlemen on this side every five minutes. He has never been quiet since that petition was presented, since I told him that there were Conservative names upon it. If I am correctly informed by the hon. gentleman who was a candidate against him at the last election, and who sent me those petitions—and I never knew they were being signed—he gave me the names, and the number of Conservatives on those petitions is far more than enough to turn the election against my hon. friend. The hon, gentleman says that all the disloyal men in this country are to be found on this side of the House.

Mr. McCALLUM. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. Let me mention one test to the hon. gentleman. I tell him that one of the finest of the regiments that have gone to the front is the Queen's Own, of Toronto, and I can tell him, from my own knowledge of the rank and file of that splendid regiment, that the majority of them are Reformers. I tell him also that of the nineteen officers who are at the front twelve are strong Reformers. There is a test which the hon, gentleman can take, and he can take any test he likes, as to the loyalty of the Reform party to the Dominion of Canada. But he is mistaken if he thinks because we are to be loyal to the Dominion we are to be loyal both to the sovereign, his ox and his ass; because we are loyal to the sovereign we are not to be loyal to the dictates of anybody of men who happen to advise the sovereign for the time being, and if they introduce measures destructive to the constitution, or destructive of the rights and liberties of the people, we would be recreant to our duty if we did not point that out, and if we did not point out, as we do, to the leader of this Government, that this Bill, if it passed, would be the greatest strain on the Constitution to which it has ever been subjected. Individually, I will not be prevented from saying that from my place in the House, by any $10 a night, peripatetic, professonal trramp in this House. I was lectured the other day by the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster) as to my loyalty to Confederation, and I would like to say this: that eighteen years ago, at least, I was working in the ranks of my party in Ontario, to bring about Confederation, and that I have heartily and earnestly tried to support it ever since. I would like to know where the hon. member for King's was then?

Mr. FOSTER. How long ago?

Mr. EDGAR. Until 1882 the hon, gentleman never appeared on the political horizon—he was not known; and since that time how has he become known? How has his loyalty to his party and his country been displayed? Why, Sir, we all know that he crawled into Parliament over the prostrate form of an honest, staunch Conservative, that he was elected on the Independent cry by Reform votes, and that he came here to support no party and to advocate the great cause of temperance. Well, Sir, we all know what a beautiful mess he has made of the cause of temperance in the McCarthy Act, and how magnificently he has shown his independence since he came into this House, for the leader of the Government has not a more servile—no, I shall not say servile, Mr. Chairman, since you shake your head—I will say more devoted or loud-mouthed supporter than the hon member for King's; and I am sure the country will feel that he has earned his reward, if he calmly sinks into the position of inspector of insurance.

Mr. BEATY. There is no doubt of the importance of the measure which is before the committee, and if there is any objection of an outside character to be made to it it is that the Government have not introduced and pressed it to a conclusion long before this, in former Sessions of this Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to make a personal explanation, and perhaps it will come in more appropriately now than after the hon. gentleman has made his remarks. I wish to refer, Sir, to the election dodger which has come out at the call of the last trump—which has been resurrected and brought forth with great pomp and circumstance by the hon. member for Monck. In 1872 I had connection with politics for the first time. In 1872 I contested North Norfolk and defeated the then member, Mr. Aquila Walsh. The article which the hon. gentleman has read to-night was read on that occasion at the hustings. It was brought out by a gentleman living in Norfolk county, and it was expected that it would produce a great sensation and result in my defeat. It is true, I tore up the article. When the gentleman who read it came down from the hustings and passed me, I asked him if that was my letter. He said it was. I said as the thing came out I would tear it, and I tore it in two places. The fragments were appropriated, and I believe the hon. gentleman has them, and perhaps he had better exhibit them to you.

Mr. McCALLUM. Do you deny it?

Mr. CHARLTON. It consisted of an article written in pencil and without date or signature. I requested the man who read it to prove it was my letter, and he failed. That gentleman was shown a letter by one of my friends with the signature turned in, and he was asked if he knew the writing, if he could identify it as Mr. Charlton's handwriting, and he said: "No, he could not." He turned up the signature and asked what he thought of his ability to identify my handwriting. The article the hon, gentleman has read is written in pencil, without date or signature, if it is the one I saw. He is welcome to all the capital he can make by producing that old election canard, which produced no effect then, which flew back like a boomerang on those who attempted to use the slander against me, and it will produce no effect to-day. If the hon, gentleman will put it in your hands, Mr. Chairman, I will leave it to your judgment to say whether it is in any sense a letter, and any expert in handwriting can identify it, if he chooses, as my handwriting. I think it is beneath the character of the hon. gentleman, with whom I have had many intimate business relations for many years, to introduce this old slander, which has been lying buried for thirteen years, for the purpose of trying to injure me in this House.

Mr. McCALLUM. I rise to a personal explanation. I ask the hon, gentleman to deny it, but he did not say that he did not write it. I do not say it is any gentleman's letter, but it is for him to say that it is not his. I hold in my hand a certificate which I will read:

"We, the undersigned, do hereby certify, that having attended a meeting attended by Mr. Charlton, last evening, at the school house, in the German settlement, in the township of Middleton, we heard him make the acknowledgment of having written the astonishing manuscript which was read by Col. Tisdale on the hustings, on Saturday last, ridiculing the volunteers assembled in Paris in 1866, on their way home from resisting the Fenian raid, and imputing ignorance to the masses of the people generally, in Canada.

"(Signed)

H. H. MARTER,
"R. STODDART.

"JAMES WHITESIDE, Magistrates."

That is my authority. Of course, if the hon. gentleman will deny that, it is all right.

Mr. CHARLTON. On the day following the publication of that statement it was followed by an affidavit of forty-five men, who attended the meeting, certifying that it was

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has not denied it. He cannot deny it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I must ask hon. gentlemen to return to the subject of discussion.

Mr. BEATY I was about to say that if the Government should be charged with anything in connection with this matter, it should be that they have neglected so long to bring in this measure and press it into law. Seventeen years have elapsed since Confederation was established, and this, the last measure necessary to complete Confederation, so to speak, has not yet been enacted. There is no doubt whatever that it is a primary idea of constitutional liberty in free countries that Parliament should regulate the qualifications of those who elect their representatives; and in this country, under our system, the superior power should regulate that matter, and not the inferior power. The Confederation Act we have received from the Imperial Parliament, with the consent, of course, of the Provinces and of the Dominion; and that Act distinctly provides—it is not denied, but it has been admitted through this debate by both sides—that this Parliament has the constitutional right to regulate the franchise and to fix the qualifications of voters. Now, for the last two or three weeks we have heard all kinds of subjects discussed in connection with this matter. Not since I have been in Parliament have I heard so many subjects discussed in reference to one. This Bill has been described as a Bill to strangle the Liberal party, as a Bill to choke them off, as a Bill to keep the Tory party in power, as a Bill to deprive the Provinces of the rights they possess, as a Bill to deprive the electors of their rights. We have had indictment after indictment and count after count made against this Bill, in the strongest language that it was possible to use without exceeding parliamentary propriety, and in some instances, I think, exceeding it very largely. I have noted down, occasionally as I heard them, a few of the epithets used by hon, gentlemen opposite to characterise this Bill, which I will read. It has been described as an outrageous Bill, an infamous Bill, a fraud, rascally, iniquitous, cowardly, monstrous, unfair, unjust, dishonest, disgraceful. There were a great many more, but these are all I recollect. Now, I think this is not the way to discuss questions of so much importance as hon. gentlemen, in their inflamed speeches, would have us believe. A question of this importance to the country should be discussed in a calmer, more reasonable manner, and with a view to enlighten both the House and the country in reference to it, and during the few moments I purpose speaking on this resolution concerning Ontario I wish to bring back the discussion to the real question, so far as I can. For the purpose of doing that, I will, with the permission of the committee, read just two sections from the Confederation Act, and from the Act of 1874, relating to elections, which is now in force. The 41st section of the Confederation Act says:

"Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union, relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces. The voters, at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating seats of members, and the execution of new writs, in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces." several Provinces."

Then, a large part of that was repealed by the Act of 1873, which was again repealed by the Act of 1874, the 133rd section of which makes this provision:

Mr. CHARLTON.

"The Act passed by the Parliament of Canada in the thirty-sixth year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled: 'An Act to make temporary provision for the election of Members to serve in the House of Commons,' is hereby repealed, except only as to the elections held, rights acquired or liabilities incurred before the coming into force of this Act; and no enactment or provision contained in any Act of the Legislature of the late Province of Canada, or any of the Provinces now composing the Dominion of Canada, respecting the elections of members of the elective House of the Legislature of any such Province, shall apply to any election of a member or members of the House of Commons, held after the passing of this Act, except only such enactment and provisions as may be in force in such Province at the time of such last mentioned election, relating to the qualification of electors and the formation of voters' lists, and which will apply, for like purposes, to the election of members of the House of Commons, as provided in this Act."

Now, the point to which I wish to call attention is this. "The Act passed by the Parliament of Canada in the thirty-sixth year of

Now, the point to which I wish to call attention is this:

The Confederation Act gives authority to this Parliament to be elected, until this Parliament should otherwise order, on the basis of the qualifications existing in the different Provinces. That provision was largely repealed in 1873, but the Act of 1873 having been itself repealed, I will not now do more than allude to it; but the Act of 1874, which was passed during the administration of the hon member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), took charge of all the items which belonged to the Provinces under the Act of Confederation-all those items constituting the parliamentary system -except the two items, the qualification of voters and the formation of the voters' lists. Now, we have heard the claim made here, repeated and reiterated during the last two or three weeks, that the rights of the Provinces were infringed upon by our legislating on this question. If the rights of the Provinces are infringed upon by this Franchise Bill, what was the kind of legislation enacted in the Act of 1874? Did not that interfere with the rights of the Provinces in the same manner and to the same degree as this proposed legislation will? Out of the fourteen items contained in that Confederation Act, in reference to the parliamentary system and elections, every one was taken away by the Act of 1874, when hon gentlemen opposite held the reins of power, except two, the qualifications of voters and the making of voters' lists. Hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, did not recognise the rights of the Provinces in reference to this matter. They said this Parliament has the power, this Parliament exercises the power, and if it exercised it in reference to twelve items out of fourteen, why should it not exercise it in reference to the other two? The contention, therefore, that any of the rights of the Provinces are taken away by this Bill is simply a contention that has no base to rest on, and that has been ignored by the action of the Opposition themselves. It ought to be emphasised, for the benefit of those who may think that, because of the constant assertion of the fact that the Provinces have rights in reference to this question, that the Provinces have no rights whatever in respect to it. If this Parliament, and if the English Parliament, with the consent of this Parliament, have tolerated provincial legislation in this matter for convenience sake, for the sake of expediting the operation of Confederation, for the sake of temporary advantages, that is no evidence for deducing the conclusion that the Provinces have rights over which this Parliament has no power. If this question of legislative or provincial rights has any force whatever, it is simply from the view of expediency. expediency prevail for a longer period than it has already prevailed? That is the only question. I submit it should not; I submit that it has prevailed too long already, and I submit that this Parliament should have taken possession of this, as they did of the dozen other items of machinery, and dispose of it, as they did those, long since. Why should there be any cry for provincial rights in this connection? If I were to make any demand in this connection in Parliament it would be on behalf of the municipalities. I (should go down to the bottom; if any inferior power whatever to Parliament has the right to fix the qualifications of voters for members of this House I should go to the municipalities and ask them to settle for themselves the qualifications of those who should elect members to this House. The argument that it should be given to them is just as forcible, just as expedient and just as valid as the argument that the Provinces should have it. There is one great fact which has been already mentioned, and which ought to be urged strongly, that the variety of qualifications which exist in the different Provinces is a strong reason why the present system should not be continued. We have in Prince Edward Island, and practically in British Columbia, what is called manhood suffrage; we have in the other Provinces largely a property qualification, in some greater, in some less, but all based on the property idea. If this House is to adopt a provincial franchise the question would naturally arise which of these provincial franchises should be adopted. One hon, gentleman would urge the adoption of manhood suffrage, another manhood taxation suffrage, another residence, age, and intelligence, as the basis of the suffrage, and so on; others insisting that there should be a large property qualification, others that it should not be so large, but that it should simply recognise the principle of property, making that the basis of qualification, simply giving the guarantee to the country that the man who votes has at least some interest in the country. A variety of franchises is therefore a reason why this legislation should be uniform, but nobody pretends it should be made uniform in a mathematical sense. It is simply a practical uniformity, a uniformity of classes; that is to say, the one class in Ontario and the same class in Prince Edward Island shall have the vote on the same These classes should be made uniform all over the Dominion. For the purpose of this question, we should not talk about the Provinces as such. We have nothing to do with the Provinces here in this connection, and they have nothing to do with us. In the past we have simply adopted the provincial franchises existing in the several Provinces for temporary purposes, until this Parliament, as the Confederation Act expresses it, "directed otherwise." This direction otherwise should have come sooner, but it is better late than never. We had better now bring into operation all the measures that the Confederation Act declared this Parliament should legislate upon for the purpose of harmonising the divided Provinces and bringing them all into one working whole. It has been urged very strongly, from the view of the Province of Ontario, that the Conservative party in the Local House, under the leadership of Mr. Meredith, voted for manhood suffrage in Ontario, and that therefore the Conservative party in this House have no right to adopt another line of qualification. There is no argument whatever in that. If I were in the Legislative Assembly of Ontario I might say that for the purpose of that House manhood suffrage was the proper franchise to adopt, though I am not disposed to say I believe that a property qualification, as regards our Parliament, or the Legislatures of the Provinces, or the municipalities, is of the first importance; it has the effect of ballasting men, of giving firmness and decision to their judgment, of making them consider what they propose to do, as what they decide will affect their property as well as the property of others. It does not matter how much a man owns. One man may own only $1,000 worth and another $100,000 worth, and yet to the one of $1,000 worth may be of greater importance than is the $100,000 worth to the other. The other might lose $50,000 of his $100,000 and yet be a comparatively wealthy man, but the one man losing his $1,000 would lose all he has. Therefore, the basis being a property qualification, that has an influence upon the mind of the voter, and gives him the motive to vote for his own best interests as a pro-perty man, and consequently for the best interests of the country at large. The opposition to this measure should consolidated by legislation, but should be consolidated and not be based, as it appears to be, on the provincial idea. is somewhat inexplicable to me that gentlemen elected to this House should have the provincial idea so much on the brain. I have as strong a conviction as any gentleman in the Opposition that we should maintain, not only the rights of this Parliament, but the rights of the Provincial Legislatures, of the municipalities, and of the individual electors; but as a member of this Honse, representing a constituency for the Dominion and not for a Province, I am not a provincial, I am not a man devoted to parish politics or municipal affairs, or one looking solely to individual rights, except as they affect the Dominion at large; and, when you look at these things in the general interest, you must take in the individual, the muncipality and the Province. It is difficult to reason with hon, gentlemen who seem to be possessed of the provincial idea so largely. I do not think we have heard one hon, gentleman speak on the other side during the whole of this three weeks' debate, who has not constantly iterated and reiterated the idea that we are infringing upon provincial rights. We should not look upon it in that light. We have nothing to do with the Provinces as such, except to leave them alone. We simply have to maintain the rights of this Parliament, of this Dominion, which are given to us by the constitution of the country, and to let the provincial and municipal rights alone. The Opposition idea is in direct contravention of the spirit which is shown in the enthusiasm of our volunteers in the North-West. Do they go to fight for a Province or for a municipality? No; they go to fight for the one flag of the whole country, as nationals and not as provincials, and that is the idea which we ought to cultivate, and this little contest and conflict in the North-West, the occurrence of which and the bloodshed which has followed it, I regret, will impress upon the young men of this country, more than all the arguments that can be used in this House, that this country is one, that it is truly confederated, that it has an authority and a nationality and a power here in this centre which must be respected and maintained. The Opposition idea presented to us in the war of words of the last few weeks is not the spirit which prompted the fathers of Confederation, which made the leaders of the Government of that day and the leaders of the Opposition bury the tomahawk and come together to build up a nationality under this Confederation. If they had brought to the consideration of those matters simply the provincial idea or the municipal or parish idea, would there have been a Confederation on this continent such as that of which we are so proud? It was because they rose above this provincialism, because they were men of national patriotism, that they so united. They possessed a large idea and a broader view, and went for building up a nationality from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which to-day has been cemented in the blood of brave men from almost all the Provinces. This is the idea which we should entertain in this House. We should not let it go forth that we are a combination of provincials. On the other hand, we should be a combination of national men, desiring to promote a national patriotism, not confined to one Province or parish, but extending the whole country over. This national idea which we ought to express in this Franchise Bill has been expressed in our great railway, which was prompted by the wisest patriotism and the broadest views in relation to the prosperity and magnificence of Canada. I do not think there is any opening country, with the history we have, which has the same advantages to present to the world. Who would have thought, eighteen years ago, that to-day we should be almost at the completion of a national highway, leading our people from the eastern to the western ends of the Dominion, for the purpose of protecting the one flag which covers this country. That national highway was prompted by the idea that this people should not be only confederated in the statute or confederated in community of feeling and interest and in harmony of spirit, the same design which prompted those who first developed the idea of our Confederation. I suppose there is not a gentleman in this House who, five years ago, would have prophesied that, in four or five months from the present time, we could go from the Atlantic to the Pacific on a railway, without changing cars, eating, drinking and sleeping the whole way, if we choose.

Mr. FOSTER. Not drinking.

Mr. BEATY. Water. The hon, gentleman can put a stick in it if he likes. This national idea as against the provincial has been manifested in the National Policy, which was designed to accomplish the same end. All these views which have manifested themselves in the legislation of this Parliament have negatived the provincial idea, have shown that we are getting out of that. It was one of the aims of Confederation to lift us above provincialism and place us on the vantage ground of nationality, and I think it has accomplished that result. One other argument which has been pressed upon us has been that we should get down to the people. What does that mean? According to the Opposition argument, it means simply that we should let the people do what they have hitherto done by courts of revision, appeals to the county judge, and other processes, to settle the voters' lists. But that does not go down to the people in reality, so long as you have Provincial Legislatures to fix the qualifications of the voters; we say that the qualification, as it is fixed by the different Provinces, does not go down to the people in the true sense. If we are to go out of this Parliament at all to fix the qualification of the voters, we should go down to the people and get them, in their municipal councils, to establish the qualification. If I were opposed to this House exercising the legitimate power which the Confederation Act has given to it, the authority with which it has been clothed to fix the qualification of voters to elect members of this House, I should go to the municipalities. What right have the Provinces to touch the matter at all? They have no right; they are not recognised in the matter, except as a temporary expedient; and if we go to the people to regulate the matter, we should go to the municipalities and allow the municipal councils to fix the qualification of voters. And yet we do not find hon, gentlemen opposite asking that this should be done. They simply say: Let the Provinces settle the matter. Now, suppose the Province of Ontario should adopt this Bill next Session; suppose it should change its mind, as it has done so often, and say: We will adopt this Bill, which was submitted to the Parliament of Canada in 1885; would hon, gentlemen opposite say then that we should not adopt it? Would they say it was infamous, outrageous, scandalous, and all those other hard words, if adopted by Mr. Mowat, the Little Premier—always vigilant, always watchful for the interests of his Province, in the sense of provincial rights; fighting for it, belligerent for it, at every opportunity that present itself-more so than, I think, he ought to be; yet he is vigilant and active for the purpose of maintaining what he claims to be provincial rights. Now, if he should adopt this Bill, would hon. gentlemen opposite say that we should not adopt it? No. not one of them, I should judge, from the manner in which they act in this House, would, for a moment, say that the Little Premier should not adopt that Bill. It would then be a good Bill; it would then be a righteous Bill; it would be going down to the people; it would be the people's Bill; and therefore it should be adopted by this House. And yet we have no guarantee, observe, in this House, the country has no guarantee, that it shall not be adopted by the Ontario Legislature, or by the Quebec Legislature, or by the Legislature of any other Province. Members will be elected to this House upon this very basis. Now, this Bill is designed, as I understand, to give a people's voters' list, and not a party voters' list. Hon, gentlemen opposite gentlemen say that we get the true work in courts Mr. Braty.

make a strong point of this. They say the Bill is going to strangle the Liberal party, that it is going to destroy the Liberal party. Well, if the Liberal party can be strangled and destroyed by such a Bill it must be a very weak party; it is not as strong as I am accustomed to regard it. I think the Liberal party has a strength, as any party may have, if it adopts a rational and reasonable policy; but if the Liberal party continues the tardy tactics that we have seen in this House for the last week, the country will become disgusted, as I know it has become disgusted already. Let me illustrate. When I went out of this House to-day, and was going down the street, a laboring man, apparently, came up to me. I had no notion who he was, and I suppose he had no notion who I was. He said to me: "How ridiculous that Opposition is making itself." "Why," I said, "that is a very mild word to use in reference to the matter. You have not been attending upon Parliament or you would use stronger language." Now, that illustrates the feeling that exists all over the country, wherever you go. Of course, there are exceptions among these little coteries of the Opposition, where these printed petitions are signed. Hon. members opposite talk about the excitement. Where is the excitement? Is there any excitement in this country? All the excitement there is is in this House, where we have heard these inflammatory speeches, this strong language that has been uttered with all the vehemence possible by hon. gentlemen opposite. But where is the excitement outside? Is there excitement in the streets of this city? This is a city of some intelligence; the people here know something of their rights, and are able to judge of these matters. But I have not seen any excitement. Even the galleries have not been excited very much.

Mr. MULOCK. They are not excited now.

Mr. BEATY. I propose to reason with the people, not to declaim, not to raise disloyal cries. The galleries have been cleared from night to night by the dull eloquence of hon. gentlemen opposite, and so it goes on. We have no excitement on the streets of this city, there are no bayonets fixed, no one proposes to shed blood in reference to this matter; and so it is all over the country. Hon. gentlemen have worked themselves into a sort of frenzy in reference to this matter, and they believe that because their imagina. tions are heated the people of this country are also excited. On the contrary, they are taking the matter very coolly. Now, I submit that this Franchise Bill is designed to secure a people's voters' list, as against the idea of a party voters' list; and all possible precautions will be taken to accom-plish that end. There is no reason in the world why it should be otherwise. Now, what is the great point of this Bill as a people's Bill. It enlarges the Franchise. "O no," say hon. gentlemen, "it does not." Now let us consider the matter. If we take the 120,000 people in Prince Edward Island, and the 30,000 white people in British Columbia—in all 150,000 people—where manhood suffrage prevails, out of the 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 in the Dominion, does this Bill not enlarge the franchise on the whole? Does it not enlarge the franchise in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Manitoba? Have we not heard hon, members from each of these Provinces distinctly affirming, one after another, that this Bill would widen the basis of the franchise in their respective Provinces? Now, if that is so, is this not a people's Bill? It does not enlarge the franchise merely for the Conservative electors, but it enlarges it as well for the Liberal electors. There can be no distinction in this respect. It cannot be made a party machine, cannot be made a party instrument, for the purpose of giving votes to Tories and taking away votes from Liberals. That is impossible, in the nature of things, and will be impossible under the operation of this Bill. Hon.

of revision—sometimes it may be absolutely controlled by Liberal members, and sometimes by Tory members-Grit members on the one hand, and Tory members on the other. The municipalities are controlled sometimes by Tories and sometimes by Grits. There is no use in saying they do not do their best. I know they do. In all the counties in which I have been interested, and in the city where I have a substantial interest, I know how the machinery works, and that both sides try to do their best to make their votes the more numerous. Let them do so. So they can and will do under this Bill. But the machinery provided by this Bill will be adapted to give the votes to as large a number of persons as the Bill itself will authorise and qualify, The point to determine, then, is as to the qualification, and that brings us back to clause 3. We do not need to go and rake up the constitutions of all the nations of the world and bring them here; but we require to look at the qualification mentioned in the clause of the Bill. This Bill will place classes in each Province on the same footing as those in other Provinces. That is equality, uniformity, unifica-tion. I have been told that I was a legislative unionist. So I was; but I am now a confederationist. I propose to carry out the constitution. I do not propose to fight for the Provinces against the Dominion, or for the Dominion against the Provinces; but to give the Confederation, as a whole, its rights and the Provinces their rights. At the present time, if a man leaves Prince Edward Island and removes to Ontario he may feel wronged by the fact that while he was a resident of the island he could vote for a member of Parliament, whereas in Ontario he would have no vote. Under this Bill a man who has a vote in one Province may, on removing to another Province, have a vote in that Province. That secures uniformity and tends to nationalise the people everywhere; and it promotes the sentiment of equal rights to all. This Bill may produce discontent if it should turn out that it disfranchised people in Prince Edward Island who now have votes. I do not believe that a single man who has a vote to day will be deprived of his vote by this Bill, if it should pass in its present form, when the elections of 1887 come round. The action of Parliament should be in the direction of teaching —and all legislation has power to teach the masses—that they are represented individually in this Parliament, not provincially. What Province has sent us here? Not one.

Mr. MILLS. The constitution says so.

Mr. BEATY. It says that each Province shall send a certain number of representatives. That is all; but they come here representing constituencies, representing the people of constituencies, and the idea should be encouraged that the people are represented in this Parliament as individual voters, not because they belong to a Province. The idea should be emphasised and impressed that the people are represented in this Parliament. That is the view I take in regard to my own position. I do not represent Ontario. What right have I to say I represent Ontario? Ontario has not sent me here, or sent any hon. members.

Mr. MILLS. It has sent ninety-two members.

Mr. BEATY. It has not sent the member for Bothwell.

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. BEATY. Not as a Province. The individual constituencies, the individual voters, have sent members. I represent the constituency of West Toronto, and I think I can say, and I do say it sometimes to my constituents, that I represent one of the most, if not the most intelligent, constituency in Canada.

Mr. LANDRY. We all say that.

We have heard of petitions coming up from different parts of the country in regard to this Bill. I ask hon, gentlemen opposite this question: Have complaints come up from any of the Provinces? If provincial rights have been threatened and endangered by reason of this Bill, which was introduced three years ago, where are the protests from the Legislatures of the Provinces, which have met three times since the Bill was introduced, protesting against the invasion of the rights of the Provinces? It is for the Provinces to say something in regard to this matter. Where is the Government or the Executive Council of a Province that has said anything in regard to this matter? Not even, since hon, gentlemen opposite have aroused this excitement, and inflamed the country by vehement addresses, has one Executive Council, which could have met in an hour or two, protested against this Bill as an infringement of provincial rights. How can it, then, be claimed that the Provinces are complaining that provincial rights have been destroyed. Where is the claim from any of the seven Provinces comprising the Confederation that their rights have been invaded and taken away? Hon, gentlemen must answer this question. They must be obliged to say that no Executive Council, no Legislative Assembly of any Province, during the three years which this Bill has been before the House, have protested that their rights were going to be infringed upon and endangered by the action of this Government and a majority of this Parliament. Dominion representation should be based on Dominion legislation. It cannot be denied legally or constitutionally. This Bill proposes to carry out that idea. It takes power to the Dominion Parliament to establish a central authority and give to this Parliament a Dominion representation. That is the true idea. We are sometimes charged on this side as Conservatives or Tories—as they are pleased to call us—although I do not think I am a Tory, in the old sense of the idea.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh yes, you are.

Mr. BEATY. I think I am a conservative Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BEATY. I think I am just as conservative a Liberal as the hon. member for Bothwell, though I do not think I am as revolutionary a Liberal as he is.

Mr. MILLS. You are supporting a revolutionary

Mr. BEATY. I go back to the Confederation Act, and I hold that anything which Parliament orders strictly within the line of that constitution is not revolutionary. The Conservatives do not fear the people; they were always willing to go to the people-always willing to let the people be heard. If there is any idea strong in the minds of our party it is that we do not fear the people, because our motio is to do justice to all and to maintain all the rights of the people. That has been demonstrated since Confederation by the length of time the Conservative party have been in power. The people have not been blind. We have no idea of telking to the people as if they were dull and stupid, as if they did not understand their own interests, as if they had to be looked after at every stage of our legisla-tion, in a paternal fashion. That is not my idea; I am one of the people myself, and I believe the people are as inde-pendent as I am, that they have as strong rights as I possoss, that they understand those rights, that they will exercise them, and that if the people's rights are endangered or destroyed the people will turn on those who endangered or destroyed them.

Mr. MULOCK. No doubt about that.

Mr. BEATY. But they don't do it. It was said in 1878 that the people's interests and rights were being destroyed Mr. BEATY. If the hon, gentleman is to be taken as a and endangered, but the people returned by a large majority sample of the intelligence of his constituency, I admit it. the party who did not fear them. In 1882 they returned them again, notwithstanding the loud cries about the tariff, the national railway, and the Administration—

An hon. MEMBER. And the gerrymander.

Mr. BEATY. And the gerrymander, and all the rest of We believe in this great national work. We believe in building up a nation on this continent, on this territory, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as fertile a territory as is open to the world to-day; we believe that we should give those constitutional rights and liberties in the highest degree, which no people enjoy equally with us to-day. That is the idea. The people see that the Conservative party and Government are with the instincts of the people, that they are in sympathy with them, that they want to carry out the ideas of the people, that they want to lay the foundations of this nation broad and wide, and the people know that the men who will do that are those who belong to the Conservative party. Now, I refer to the idea that this resolution does not affect the Provinces as such. In 1874 the Bill of the hon, gentleman for East York took away, out of the fourteen items of the machinery which constituted electoral representation to this Parliament—they took away twelve, leaving only two. Yet the Opposition of that time did not raise a howl, such as we hear now, as to the infamy that was perpretated, or as to taking away or destroying the liberties of the people, or that the Provinces would ultimately secede from the Confederation. took all but two items out of those which were given to the Provinces for the time being as a temporary expedienttaking them away in the effort to build up a national edifice, which the Opposition began, and which, I believe, was the only work of a national character which they ever attempted. Now there is one thing in connection with this question which is very strong and conclusive against this idea of provincialism, and that is that the right and power to legislate in this matter is in the Dominion Parliament. That has not been denied—it is admitted; and that being the case, it is the duty, the obligation imposed on the Dominion Parliament, to legislate on the subject. While it may be said that this party has neglected its duty, inasmuch as it did not so legislate when it was in power so long, it is better to do it now than neglect it altogether—better late than never; so that the charge of neglect of duty is the only one which can be hurled against them in this connection. The obligation rests with this Parliament, and not with the Provincial Legislatures any more than with the municipalities, or any power inferior to this Parliament. That is an idea which, I think, will commend itself to the intelligent masses of this country: that while this Parliament has neglected its duty on both sides, and when both parties were in power, it now remains for them to do what should have been done long ago, instead of standing up in a strong, concerted phalanx against this measure, and saying: So far as we can, we will present physical resistance to it from beginning to end, and prevent it being carried into law and administered in any shape or Now, the bugbear or hobgoblin of this whole measure is the revising barrister, as presented by hon. gentlemen opposite; and when I have heard this feature of the Bill presented in the style in which it has been presented, even by gentlemen of the profession, from the Opposition benches, I have been simply astonished at their conception of their own profession. When I hear the member for of their own profession. When I hear the member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) whom I have always believed and am willing to regard as a very respectable, able and eloquent representative of the profession, talking in the manner he has done, with other gentlemen on that side, with reference to members of his own profession—stating that they are not to be tolerated in connection with this simple matter, that they are liable to sell themselves, liable to perjure themselves—that they are not only liable, but will do it, and that they cannot help doing it—that because they receive the appointment, it may be from this side of the House, they will destroy their reputation, and repudiate the principles of honor that characterise every respectable practitioner, I am astonished; for I think the people will admit that there is not a profession to be so trusted in money matters as the legal profession. If the people at large trust them with their money and their property, do you suppose they will not trust them with their rights in this matter? I think they will; I think there are more outside of the profession who will trust them, if there are any within the profession who, I was going to say from their own feelings and instincts, are not able to trust the members of that profession which is so noble and just, and which does so much for the country at large, not only in the courts but in the Legislatures and in this Parliament. I did feel, I must say, some indignation that hon. gentlemen opposite should characterise the profession as utterly incapable, dishonest and corrupt, in a matter of this kind, and that members of the professon themselves were casting this stigma upon it. Now, if an hon. gentleman from the Opposition, or any one outside of this House, should suspect any person who should be appointed to this office next year or the year after, and should say that such a man has betrayed his trust and become corrupt, that is a case for inquiry; but to recklessly slander a whole profession in connection with this matter is certainly not the way to commend the common sense arguments which they wish us to believe they have used, to people who are accustomed to take common sense views of things. Now, the idea is presented, in a sort of argumentative way, that the courts of revision are honest. I do not deny it; I think they are practically honest, though there are occasionally those whose zeal distheir honesty, who notable and are carry out those principles themselves which they think right. But to say that the members of the legal profession, who are to be appointed to this position to exercise judicial functions, are any more to be charged with corruption and dishonesty because they are the appointees of the Government than are the judges of the land, the Superior Court judges, who to day have the trial of controverted elections, is simply to distinguish things that do not differ, and to try to find an argument when no argument is to be found. Gentlemen of the Opposition are prone in the press sometimes, and sometimes out of it, to charge judges who carry on election trials, some of them, with partiality and even with dishonesty; and if they charge those hon, gentlemen who occupy those elevated positions in the country, from their capacity and their legal education, and not at the whim or caprice of any Government or party, and who are there for life, during good behavior, having a fixed salary—if they charge them with dishonesty, will they not charge the lesser lights of the profession, who may be appointed to do this work throughout the country? And yet the one might be done just as well as the other. There is no reason for charging any gentleman who might be appointed to this position with dishonesty; if he does a dishonest act he will be found out, and receive punishment from this side of the House as well as from that side, as such a man would deserve. Now, if the judges are appointed from the legal profession to try controverted elections, to decide who should be members of this House, why cannot members of the legal profession decide who shall be voters?

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon, gentleman oppose the trial of controverted elections by the judges?

simple matter, that they are liable to sell themselves, Mr. MILLS. Well, will he tell us where the difference liable to become corrupted, liable to commit dishonest acts, is, between this Legislature authorising the provincial courts to try controverted elections and this Legislature authorising the adoption of the provincial lists as the basis of our hon gentlemen opposite, with their petty parish politics, electoral franchise?

Mr. BEATY. I will tell the hon, gentleman the difference. The judges are not provincial judges; they are appointed by the Dominion Government and paid by it—

Mr. MILLS. They are provincial judges.

Mr. BEATY—and that is all that is proposed by this Bill -to appoint judges where they exist in the different counties, and where they do not exist to appoint members of the legal prefession, or quasi judges, if you please, to perform judicial functions. Now, I say this system is the system of all systems which can be adopted in this country to procure safety to the people, to maintain their rights and to guarantee that they shall not be infringed upon by any local coterie whatever; but that a man in open court, with counsel on both sides, with the public before him, with public opinion behind him, will do his duty, animated by that principle of equity, justice and conscience, which has ever animated the judiciary of this country, whether high or low, in whatever position they may occupy. I say that this system of appointing judges and leading members of the profession, revising barristers, for the purpose of making voters' lists, is the very thing that will make these lists the people's voters' lists and that will protect the people in their rights. I am quite willing to trust this duty in the hand of any hon, gentleman opposite who has been a member of the legal profession for five years, confident that he will do justice, confident that he will act impartially and righteously in the matter.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman, if possible, state any other constitutionally governed country where this system that he approves of is in force?

Mr. BEATY. I think it is practised in England. Who are the revising officers selected from in England? Are they not selected from the legal profession?

Mr. MILLS. They are selected by the judges. But who appoints ours?

Mr. BEATY. No matter who appoints them, who appoints the judges? Are they not appointed from the party, because of their party proclivities, because of their party services and party distinction? Certainly they are. Does any man mean to say that because a gentleman, as Solicitor General or Attorney General, has rendered great services, he cannot be entrusted with the administration of matters pertaining to property and civil rights. I simply say that this is the purest, the safest, the most competent tribunal, that could possibly be selected by any country for the purpose of accomplishing this duty. We have heard a great deal said about the terrible expense that this is going to inflict upon the country. It is characteristic of men who can see nothing in favor of one party but everything in favor of another. Hon, gentlemen opposite remind me of that description, that a greater man than I used, in reference to a greater man than any of them, who, he said, was a "sophistical rhetorician, mebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity." Hon. gentlemen opposite are inebriated by hearing one another talk; their imaginations become heated; they do not take things coolly, and see them as they are, and hence they go to work and say: Oh, this expense will ruin the country, this will cost half a million dollars a year. I do not know that any of them went below half a million, but one went to $784,000. What are the facts? Has any Government or Administration ever been carried on without expense? Should a Government, on the ground of expense, not do its duty? Would the ground of expense be any reason for not sending volunteers from the east to suppress the rebellion in the the rights and liberties of the people are in question? Yet see everything through the light of expense. With their partisan patriotism, they talk of this country as if a few dollars would settle the question one way or the other. That is not the view to take of the matter; we view it in a broader light. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) asked how much this franchise debate was going to cost the country. From the manner in which the Opposition are carrying on this debate, I would say that it is costing the country more than the revising barristers will cost the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us the items.

Mr. BEATY. I probably will, I will say the hon. gentleman has probably cost the country more than he is worth, anyhow. I do not object to discuss

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us the items - what the increased expense will be.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will get them when the Supplementary Estimates come down.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we will get them before this Bill passes.

Mr. McMULLEN. When hon. gentlemen make statements of that kind, they should give us the items.

Mr. BEATY. Hon. gentlemen opposite remind me of an elector in Ontario, at the last elections, who, when he had gone home very late, was asked by his wife to explain. "Oh!" said he, "I have been singing Ontario, Ontario." "I know," she replied "where you have been; you have been on a tear-io." Hon. gentlemen opposite have been singing the tune, only to a more monotonous refrain. I do not object to it. It is the price of liberty, and if we are to have liberty we must pay for it. I say if this Bill is to be discussed until midsummer hon, gentlemen discussing it, if it cost the country a $1,000,000, I do not object; I pay my share of taxation and am willing to pay my share of this; if it be necessary for the purpose of maintaining the rights of the people and the rights of Parliament, let it go on until Christmas. The party tactics of the Opposition have, it seems to me, cost the country as much as this Bill can possibly cost it. If this Bill is necessary to maintain liberty, a national representation in this Dominion Parliament, why talk of the little expense in connection with it. Everything necessary to legislation and the administration of the law must be attended to and must entail expense. Now, these extravagant estimates of hon, gentlemen opposite cannot be let go unchallenged. There is no doubt whatever that the revising officer can do all the work he has to do in ten days, in any county in Canada. How much would that cost all through? I hold that the revising officer in Toronto does his work in two or three days.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you mean riding or county?

Mr. BEATY. Each election riding, certainly. Say it will cost $20 a day; and he has more, I am sorry to say, than our judges get in Ontario or in Quebec or the other Provinces; and I charge the Government with neglect in not giving the judges of the land a greater salary than they do—that they only possess the salary to-day which they had twenty or thirty years ago, when living, as everyone knows, in cities in this country did not cost more than one-half what it does to-day. The Government should bring down a Bill, and no one in this House should object to an expenditure which would place the judiciary on a proper footing as to salaries, any more than he should object to this, because these functionaries have interests so directly, closely and strongly affecting the people, that they should be kept in a position to do their duty freely, west? Is any consideration to be given to expense when impartially and without any difficulty whatever. I estimate that the total cost will not exceed, for the 211 ridings, from $75,000 to $100,000 a year. Ten days, at $20 a day, in the 211 ridings—and I say this for the hon member for Wellington-would make $42,200. Ten days of a clerk, at $5, would make $10,550. Ten days of a bailiff, at $2, would make $4,220. Two copyists for lists, ten days at $2 each, would make $8,440. This would amount to $65,410. Add $10,000 for printing, and contingencies of that character, and you have $75,000. I have no objection, if you like, to add $25,000, more and make it $100,000, for I think the result will well pay the cost, and the expense will be nothing in proportion to the advantages to be reaped by the country and by this Parliament from this national Bill giving a Dominion representation by Dominion legislation. I do not propose to enter upon the items of the Bill, because they will come up in their order. I have only followed the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite in the discussion of this matter. They have been ruled to be in order over and over again, and as I take it that ruling must be correct, I have availed myself of the privilege in committee of dealing with these points, which hon. gentlemen have dealt with so largely, so elaborately and so imaginatively during the last two or three weeks. It has been urged by a peculiar line of argument that hon. gentlemen, or at least one hon. gentleman on this side of the House, said we were here to register the decrees of the Government. He said that was so in a sense, and so I say. I endorse that idea. This Parliament was elected distinctly on a national basis, in reference to national questions, in reference, even, to Imperial questions. The maintenance of the Empire was a question, the unity of the Empire was a question, the consolidation of the Empire, in a sense, was a question, not its disintegration, not the secession of the colonies. That is not the idea which we on this side entertain as a party in relation to the Empire. We look upon it as a broad question, covering the destinies of the Anglo-Saxon race and of the people at large who are under the sway of the sceptre of Queen Victoria, the destinies of all people in all the colonies as well as those who cluster around the Throne in London or in England. It is therefore a national question. The party was elected to present to this country a nationality on this northern part of the continent, with its five millions of people now, and in ten years perhaps with its ten millions, and in a few years more with its twenty millions; and, as the United States have progressed in 100 years, until now they have their fifty millions, so we will increase in the same way. It is in that view, as a great part of the Empire, that we have been elected here to maintain the unity of the Empire; and, when I hear gentlemen talking now in regard to the federation of the Empire, I wonder what they mean. Have we not now the unity of the Empire? What did we see in the Soudan, when volunteers went from Australia, from England, Ireland and Scotland, from Canada and from the different parts of the Empire, for the defence of the flag? Is that not sufficient to show the unity of the Empire? This idea of the federation of the Empire must, therefore, have relation to something else than its unity. We are elected as a party to produce national results and national legislation. That is the idea. We have done it in reference to our National Policy, in reference to our national highway, and in relation to national matters generally, and we are doing it now with reference to the same ideas and objects, in order to make a national representation, by giving a qualification to such voters as this Parliament deems proper to possess the highest right of a free man, in the exercise of which this country has shown such wisdom, by sending a majority to this Parliament to promote national measures and national prosperity.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. After the thunder we had in the chise will demand that the same rights should be early part of the evening, it is hardly to be expected that extended to their voters in Dominion elections, and the committee will listen with patience to quiet, commonthus Quebec may find herself, against her will, compelled Mr. Beaty.

sense gentlemen like the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) and myself. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his address to night. We have got what we always get from him, a plain, common sense, gentlemanly, quiet view of the question. You never get it presented in any other light by the member for West Toronto. However, like all the other gentlemen who have preceded him on that side of the House he deals most delightfully in generalities and bears are the state of the House of the generalities, and keeps away from the specific point so strenuously objected to by gentlemen on this side of the House, and which I say fully justify the long list of adjec-tives he read to the House to-night. At the outset, he charges gentlemen on this side of the House with questioning the power of the Dominion Parliament to enact a Dominion franchise. I think he overstated the case there. If he had listened to the statements of hon. gentlemen on this side, as I have listened to them, I do not think he would have come to that conclusion As far as I am concerned, I have never once denied the power of this Parliament to enact a Dominion franchise. In fact, this Parliament has already legislated in that direction and passed a Dominion Franchise Act. But, while such is the case, gentlemen on this side, while not denying the power of this Parliament to pass a Dominion Franchise Bill, have declared that the use of that power under present circumstances, is inexpedient; and, in confirmation of their view, I need only point to the fact that gentlemen opposite, after Confederation, held office for six years without once attempting to enact a Dominion franchise, except by introducing measures into this House and throwing them out again. More than that; the right hon, gentleman who leads the Government declared that the enactment of such a statute would require a whole Session to itself. They did what was wisest under the circumstances; they took the franchise which they found had worked so well up to that time, and adopted it as the franchise for the Dominion, and an experience of eighteen years has proved the wisdom of their course. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) advances, as one of his arguments for a Dominion franchise, the variety that obtains in the franchises of the different Provinces. Now, that is just the ground that we take why the provincial franchise should be retained—the variety of the franchises in the different Provinces, the difficulty of reconciling the different franchises, of saying that one franchise instead of another shall be adopted. In Prince Edward Island, for example, they have manhood suffrage; in other Provinces there are provincial qualifications, and there would be great difficulty in reconciling the views of the people of the different Provinces. If you take the Province of Quebec, for example, Edward Island, for we learn from statements made by hon, members from that Province that the people are very much opposed to female suffrage. But that question has taken a strong hold in Ontario, as well as in other Provinces, and it is a question that, sooner or later, this House will have to face; and it may be that the pressure of public opinion in the other Provinces may compel Quebec, against her will, if we are to have a Dominion franchise, to accept female suffrage as a part of that franchise. Again, we learn from the representatives of the Province of Quebec that the people of that Province are opposed to manhood suffrage. That is another question that is gaining rapidly in the other Provinces. In the Province of Ontario the leader of the Opposition made a motion in its favor, at the last Session of the Legislature, and it was supported by his party; and I have no doubt that in the Province of Ontario universal suffrage will be the law of the land before many years have passed over. Now, we can easily understand how the Provinces that possess manhood suffrage as a provincial fran-

So, taking the views to accept manhood suffrage. of the people of the different Provinces into consideration, as I believe we are bound to do in all legislation, it would be wiser for us to retain the provincial franchises. The hoft. member for West Toronto made a statement that surprised me. He said we had nothing to do with the Provinces but to let them alone, and therefore we ought to ignore the provincial franchises. Well, if those are his honest sentiments, this is the side of the House he ought to be on. Have we not struggled for years and years in defence of that principle? For years the Province of Ontario has been engaged in a struggle against the Dominion Government to retain its provincial rights, and it has only been able to wrench them from the grasp of the Dominion Government as the shepherd wrenches the lamb from the wolf. The money of the Province has been frittered away, and has been expended to pay the legal expenses of defending her and even her soil against the Dominion Government. Then, again, the hon. gentleman says: Suppose Mr. Mowat had introduced and carried a Bill like these, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would have to be satisfied with it. Well, Sir, it is needless to answer any such supposition, because it is supposing the impossible. From all we know of Mr. Mowat, such a Bill as this could never have emanated from him. In connection with the revising barristers, the hon, gentleman accuses us of throwing a slur on the legal profession. I have never heard that done. We are proud to believe that amongst the legal profession you will find, in proportion to their numbers, as many honest and upright gentlemen as you will find in any other profession in the courtry. But unfortunately they are not all of that description. We believe that it is not from these honest lawyers that the revising barristers will be chosen, but they will be chosen for their fitness, for the work which it is intended they shall perform, and that is the reason why we object to this clause. If we can have the list prepared in some such way as it is prepared now, so that we can have an appeal to the county judge, as is now allowed in some of the Provinces, and if we can get the pernicious Indian clause struck out of this Bill, I, for one, will cease to oppose the Bill. While regretting that this enormous expense should be incurred, I should content myself with protesting and voting against it, and let the matter go. But we have no evidence that the Government intend to accede to any such He owns three brick yards, and runs an extensive business. modifications. The Bill is before us, and we have to discuss it as we find it. The hon gentleman tells us that the revising barristers will most likely be honest and upright men. Well, suppose they are. Is it right, even on that supposition, that such an unlimited power should be entrusted to any class of men, no matter how honest? Now, I do not mean to cast any slur upon the judges of the land. We know we are blessed with upright judges; but from all of them there is a right of appeal. As the Bill is drawn, there is no appeal from the revising barrister, unless he pleases to allow one on questions of law. One of the objections to the present Bill is that in almost every Province it will disfranchise large numbers of persons, and those among the most intelligent classes. In comparing the Bill with the Ontario Act, one of the large classes that will be disfranchised are the sons of landowners. Under this Bill it is provided that persons holding property shall enjoy the franchise. If the owner's son is interested in the business he may not exercise the franchise, because there is no provision to give it to him. Under the Ontario Act it is provided that property-holders' sons, and even grandsons, sons-in-law and step-sons shall be enfranchised, if the property is of sufficient value. All these people will, therefore, be disfranchised by the present Bill. It has been objected that the people of Ontario do not at present enjoy those rights because the provincial Act will not come into operation till the end of this year. That objection, however, is a frivolous one, as the new voters' lists will not be available till then. Another perform any of the acts of citizenship, except under class that will be disfranchised are the school teachers. From the report of the Minister of education of last year, I find there are 2,553 teachers in Ontario. Under this Bill their qualification is $400 a year. The average salary of male teachers, in rural sections, I find to be $394; so a very large number of them will be disfranchised. Another class that will be disfranchised are wage-earners, of whom we have a large class in Ontario. Some, no doubt, are immigrants, intending to make this country their home; they are men hired out as laborers among farmers and in other callings, who earn $250 a year. That embraces 99 out of every 100 of the farm laborers in Ontario. There is provision made that board, lodging and other advantages shall be counted in; so that under the Ontario Act almost every such individual is entitled to the franchise Now, Sir, I want to draw particular attention to this matter. These wage-earners in Ontario are composed very largely of farmers' sons, who are not too proud to hire out and work for their neighbors, as many of their fathers did before them. They begin their life in that way, in order to gather something together to give themselves a start, and they take a manly and honorable way of making a start in life. I have had many such working for me. They are not ignorant young men; they are men who, in their father's house, have had the advantage of a good public school education, the advantage of reading the public papers, because there is scarcely a house in Ontario where these are not taken, and where politics are not discussed. They have had all the advantages which the institutions of Ontario present-and she is well supplied with public institutions for that purpose -for gathering information and knowledge, and I am happy to say that they generally avail themselves of them. I have found it nothing unusual to have these young men, whom I have had in my employ, hurrying through their work on an evening, in order to take part in those literary institutions they have in the country—it may be in reading either their own compositions or the essays of others, or debating the public questions which come up in these institutions for discussion. Still, if this Bill becomes law, these men would be disfranchised under it. About twelve months ago I was travelling on the railway, and I met the reeve of one of the wealthy municipalities of the west, a As labor was scarce a year ago last summer, I asked him if he did not find it difficult to procure laborers for his brick yards, as he required many of them. He said: "No, I do not; I make it a point, wherever I can get them-and I generally succeed in getting as many as I want-to employ farmers' sons." He told me, as many others have told me, that these were the best possible men he could get for any employment He put it this way: "I find that one of them is just worth two imported laborers. They are the men who give the most satisfaction; they take an interest in their work; and they are men who can go to their father's houses on a holiday, dress themselves in a good suit of clothes, and take their father's horse and carriage, enjoy their holiday, and then go back to the brick yard the next day." These are the men this Bill aims at; and if it becomes law they must be disfranchised. These are becomes law they must be disfranchised. some of the reasons why we prefer the franchise which obtains in Ontario, and why we oppose the passing of a Dominion franchise. Now, Sir, I wish just to ask who it is that this Bill proposes shall take the place of these voters. This is a most astonishing feature in the Bill—that these intelligent classes shall be disfranchised, and that their places shall be taken by the Indians, those who are the wards of the Government, who cannot either speak or write the languages in which politics are discussed, who know nothing about our institutions or politics, who are dependent on the Government, from their cradle to their grave, who cannot the control of the Government, who are unacquainted with the usages of citizenship, who pay no taxes, who contribute nothing to the revenue—this Bill proposes that these people shall take the place of the intelligent gentlemen who will be disfranchised by it. Yet, we are accused of obstruction because we protest against anything so unjust and absurd. I ask if we are not justified in using every legitimate means in preventing the rassage, or securing the amendment of a Bill so monstrous as this. The hon, member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) makes light of the question of expense. He differs most materially from the estimate which hon, gentlemen on this side have made of the probable expense of carrying out this Act. He sets it down at $100,000. Well, Sir, all I have to say is this, that he is very moderate in his estimate. But he only takes the sum which this Government will have to pay out, and even then, I believe, he has not estimated one-fourth of it. There are other expenses which have to be considered as well as the money this Government pays. There is all the trouble and expense to the people, and if you look at the Act you will find that the lower assessed people, those who are the poorest, are those upon whom these expenses are likely to come. The men who have to travel a long distance in order to secure their right to the franchise, the men who are least able to pay for it, are those who will be encumbered with these expenses. But, Sir, I hold, and I think it is capable of proof, that the hon. gentleman was far below the mark in his estimate of what the actual cost will be. But, suppose he was right, unless some great good was going to be secured, some great advantage which has never yet been shown, will be secured, unless more than a mere fanciful uniformity is going to be secured, is this House justified in incurring such an expense at the present time? There is not a man in the House who, if he looks at the position in which we are placed, with regard to our financial affairs, at the present time, at the character of the people who pay this expense, but must come to the conclusion that this House is not justified in incurring any such expenditure. But. Sir. there are other features which are far worse than the expenditure. That is a matter which might be got over. Heavy as it is, heavy as it is likely to be, that matter might be got over. It may be that the Act may sometime or other be repealed, or that the country may become more wealthy and more able to bear the expense, but there are other features of it which connot be estimated by any money expenditure. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite have noticed it as much as I have, but I have notice I that for years past you can scarcely take up a public periodical without finding instances recorded of men forfeiting the confidence that has been reposed in them and taking the funds belonging to institutions that have been entrusted to them, and using them for their own special purposes. Some of them leave the country and others land where all such men ought to land. We are surprised at it; but is there anything surprising in it when men occupying the highest positions in the country are guilty of such acts as this, such acts as the infamous gerrymander, such acts as the Pacific scandal, where a great public trust was sold by the men to whom it was committed, in order to get funds to corrupt the electors? Is that different from men lower down in the scale appropriating that which does not belong to them? This question is one that cannot be estimated by dollars and cents; it is a great moral question. So long as a man, who debauches public opinion, who teaches that there is nothing higher in public life than party, who teaches that any measure, no matter how unjust or howmean it is in its provisions—that anything a party may do to get funds to secure the elections, that everything is right which tends to continue the party in power—so long as such a man or a party act on such principles, is it anything surprising that men in a lower scale should take the lesson from them? its answer in the statement of it. Look at the Con-Mr. ARMSTRONG.

The moral aspect of this measure is worse for the country than any money losses that is going to be entailed by it. do not intend to take up the time of the House any longer at this time. I merely wished to enter my protest against the passage of this Bill, with these features in it, and to give the reasons why the provincial franchise in Ontario should be continued, and I think it would be wise to apply the same principle to every other Province in the Dominion.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) favored the House at some length with his views as to the duties of this Parliament. He ventured to give his opinion as to the relative powers and duties of the Local Legislatures and of the cominion Parliament. He began his address by announcing that he was not a parish or municipal politician, but that he was in favor of protecting the rights of every part of our constitutional system, and that we had nothing to do with the Provinces, except to leave their rights alone; and having very fully amplified that position, he concluded his argument by saying that that was the true position. I agree with the words he uttered, that it is the duty of this Parliament to leave the rights of the Provinces alone; but I am sorry to say that I cannot judge him altogether by his words. I think it is right to see how far the hon, gentleman believes in those utterances by referring to some of his own acts. He says we should leave the Provinces in the full enjoyment of their rights. Has he ever done so? He publicly announced himself, years ago, as opposed to the federal system; he was in favor of one central Government for the whole of Canada; a legislative union at one time was the only system of government for Canada that met with his approval. He appears to have got new light in the abstract; but what has been his record? What was his action in regard to some conflicts that have taken place between the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario, a large and important portion of which he represents in this House? It is not long since he appeared on a public platform and endorsed the action of this Government in seeking to abstract from the Province of Ontario a large portion of its territory, which has since been declared its property by the highest tribunal known to us; neither was he above taking his place on a public platform and endorsing the action of this Government in disallowing what is generally known as the Streams Bill; and it is within the knowledge of every member of this House that there was no more faithful supporter of the McCarthy Act in this Chamber than the hon. member for West Toronto. What did these measures mean; were they not directly aimed at interfering with the rights of the Provinces? The hon, gentleman, by his voice and vote, endeavored to strip the Provinces of their constitutional rights-rights that, both before and since, have been determined as theirs, and yet to-day he tells us that he is the true exponent of the functions of this Parliament-that he alone gives the true explanation of the relative duties and obligations and powers of the various Provinces, when he says they must be left in the enjoyment of their rights. Who cares for a defender who, with his lips, asserts one thing, and with his vote and influence acts otherwise? The hon. gentleman announced a curious proposition. He says that he measures the duty of this Parliament by its power—that it is in the power of this Parliament to declare its franchise, and that being in its power, this Parliament is bound to exercise that power—that because it has the power it has the corresponding obligation; and he defends this legislation on the ground that it is not a matter of discretion whether this Parliament shall exercise the power that is now being invoked or not-that it cannot shrink from this duty, because it has the constitutional power to do what is asked for. Now, we need not press that argument, for it carries federation Act and see the powers that are vested in this Parliament. Ever since Confederation Parliament has been legislating, according as the conditions of the people demanded; but, if we adopt the reasoning of the hon. member for West Toronto and apply it as he desires it should be applied, we are bound every day to do what we have the power to do. We have the power by one Act to repeal every Act of Parliament that was passed by this Dominion. The inference to be drawn from the principle laid down by the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) is that therefore we should do this absurd and ridiculous act. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has left the House, for there are other matters to which I would like to refer, but which I will abstain from referring to during his absence. Public opinion, he said, was against the action of the Opposition, and the evidence he gives of that is that a laboring man, whom he did not know and who did not know him, told him that the way the Opposition were going on was ridiculous. Probably that laborer was a man of the dandelion brigade. The hon. gentleman asked where is the excitement in country against the measure? There is none, he says, in this city. Well, while I think there is a great deal in Ottawa to be proud of, Ottawa is not Canada. Canada possesses many millions of people, and of all the places that are apt to be under governmental influence Ottawa is the principle one. The hon gentleman said he knew something of municipal machinery. I have no doubt he does; he has had a good deal to do with municipal machinery, and municipal machinery has had a good deal to do with him. Probably his intimate acquaintance with the machine has had something to do with his being able to stand up here to-day. The hon, gentleman spoke highly of his constituency, but I think he shows very little gratitude towards it when he asks to have the power taken from it which it now possesses. He said he represents one of the most intelligent constituencies in Canada. I do not think, however, we can draw from that the inference he wishes us to draw. I remember the story of the man who said he had married the daughter of a celebrated philosopher. "I am sorry," replied the other, "you have not married the philosophy." The spirit of conservatism, according to the hon. gentleman, is to conserve all rights; and imbued with this spirit, he launched out into a panegyric of the revising officer, who is to be the great preserver of rights. How has the hon. gentleman shown his desire to preserve rights while in this House? Where was his vote when the Gerrymandering Bill was forced through Parliament? What stand did he take in the attempt to rob Ontario of a certain portion of her territory? Can he justify his connection with the McCarthy Act? Until the hon, gentleman can clear his reputation of these stains he can hardly expect to have much weight attached to his words when he says it is the great party of conservatism who preserve the rights of the people. The hon, gentleman says the Opposition have characterised the legal profession as unscrupulous and corrupt. I challenge him or any of his friends to name any hon. gentleman on this side who has made any such a charge. It speaks very little for the intelligence of the hon. gentleman if he cannot discriminate between criticism of a measure and criticism of the imperfect machinery for carrying it out. If we do not choose willingly to place unlimited power in the hands of any set of men, why should he complain? If this power is to be given to the revising officers, from whom is is to be taken away? Why is he so anxious to take the power from the municipal officers? Whatever criticism he can direct against us as objecting to the new tribunal we can direct against him as objecting to the existing tribunal. He occupies some vantage ground in reference to this matter. He says he is intimately acquainted with the machinery of the municipal system, and argues from that standpoint that the machinery should be taken from the country would derive any benefit from this expenditure; the municipal bodies. If he is proceeding upon good he did not direct a single argument to show what good was evidence, it is rather a reflection upon that municipal system of which, until recently, he formed a considerable part. When I asked him if he could name any constitutionally governed country in which such a system prevailed as was sought to be imposed upon Canada, he cited England, and stated that there revising officers were appointed to do the duties that are to be done by the revising officers here; but when he was asked who appointed the revising officers in England, he declined to answer that question. Was that candid? He knew he was misrepresenting the position in England, and he branched out into generalities, and asked whether we did not appoint lawyers to be judges. The position of a judge is entirely different from that of a revising barrister. A judge is chosen, not to do the will of a particular next but to administer the law between individuals party, but to administer the law between individuals. In the appointment of a judge the Government has no temptation to make an unwise appointment, as it knows that the best appointment it can make will best serve its interests, and we therefore have always, in the choice of judges, a guarantee, from interest alone, that the Government will make the best possible choice; but when it comes to the revising officers, the case is entirely different. The revising officer is chosen by the Government to do a certain work, in which the Government is directly interested, and the revising officer does not cease on his appointment to be an ordinary citizen, taking his share in all the political affairs of the country. How different is the case of a judge. Do we know of any judge who, during the period of his occupying the bench, has degraded it by embarking in trade, commerce or politics? All these things are left aside, and in this country up to the present time every judge has attempted to wear his ermine unsullied. But the revising officer will still be free to take his share in the political struggles of the country, he will still be one of the competitors in the race of life with his fellowmen. The two positions are absolutely incomparable, and it is to be regretted that the hon, member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) has not yet been able to see the distinction between the two classes of men. I am glad to see that the hon, member has returned to the Chamber. He has made a discovery that no other man in Canada has made, unless it may be the person who conceived this measure. There is no member on his own side of the House who, in private conversation, defends the scheme for the appointment of the revising officer, there is not one but tells us that that scheme must be amended. One may say that the time may come when the Grits will be in power and he would be extremely loath to leave such power in their hands. Others say the scheme is not right, and it is wrong to leave so much power in the hands of one man. There is not a newspaper that has defended the scheme fairly and candidly. The whole independent press of Canada has denounced it. The leading press in the city of Toronto has denounced it. Members of the Conservative party have openly denounced it on the floor of this House. The Opposition have denounced it. No individual member has defended it in its antienty until it cannot to the let of the defended it in its entirety, until it came to the lot of the hon. member for West Toronto to speak, and he made the grand discovery that the scheme was the best, the most competent and the purest tribunal that could be found.

Mr. BEATY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. He still endorses it. He goes on to speak of the matter of costs. He tells us that this scheme, at best, will not cost more than $75,0000, but in order to make it even money he says $100,000. Well, I know ne is a gentleman who deals in large figures, and a few thousands, more or less, is of little consequence to him; but they may be of some consequence to the people who have to pay this money. The hon, gentleman, however, did not attempt to show that to flow from this measure. He indulged in some wide generalities about Great Britain and the glorious constitution, etc. He is certainly a giant with a most vivid imagination. I suppose, from his willingness to throw away this $100,000, the people can obtain all the money they wish. The bon. gentleman made a trip to England last year, and visited the people there, who he considered to be unsophisticated people, the hardy toilers in Plymouth.

Mr. BEATY. After I told them what Canada was, a gentleman at the dinner table said: "Let us all go to Canada."

Mr. MULOCK. It appears, then, that this hon. gentleman's speech was made after dinner, and I suppose that accounts for the character of his remarks. Now, let us see what the hon. gentleman said to the people of Plymouth at this banquet. Speaking of the North-West, he said:

"There are mines of gold, of silver, of copper and precious stones. All you have to do is to go and pick them up. The gold lies there in the beds of the rivers, shining in the gladness of the noon-day sun, and all you have to do is to pick it up and put it in your pocket."

What a beautiful view! How literally correct!

Mr. BEATY. It is literally correct.

Mr. MULOCK. This Sinbad reminds us now of a beautiful picture. Why is it that these Plymouth people are not all in Canada to-day? How reliable this gentleman's evidence must be! How founded upon fact! How sound his judgment! How well he may boast that he represents one of the most intelligent constituencies in Canada! Now, Mr. Chairman, I object to this Bill, because it interferes with the rights we have heretofore enjoyed. I have heard hon, gentlemen say that this Bill would not disfranchise any people, to any extent, in the older Provinces. Now, let us compare the franchise of this Bill with franchise of the Province of Ontario. result of that comparison, I find that this Bill will disfranchise a large number of people in the Province of Ontario. The Dominion Bill requires that a person must possess real estate to the value of $300 in cities and towns to have a vote, while the provincial Act declares that $200 worth of real estate in cities and towns shall entitle a person to vote. There are not as manypeople owning property worth $300 as $200, and therefore you disfranchise all those who own less than $300. Under the local Act it is provided that any person who is a householder shall be entitled to vote; and by householder is meant any person who is resident in a city or town, and who bond fide occupies a dwelling for his use. That is a very wide provision. There is no such provision in the present Bill, and therefore all persons who do not pay the amount of rental mentioned in clause 3 will be disfranchised. Hon, gentlemen opposite claim that by this Bill the Dominion controls its own franchise. The Bill declares that persons in a town shall vote on a certain qualification and persons in villages and townships under a different qualification. But who is to declare what is a town and what is a village? Certainly not this Parliament. So, after this House has established the rates of qualification for the various communities there still remains in the Local Legislatures the power of entirely upsetting your calculations by saying that this town hereafter shall be a village, this village a town, and so on. Who has control of the franchise, then? This shows clearly that this Parliament, if it adopted this Bill would establish a franchise of an arbitrary character, and one that would not prove to bear equally on the people of the different Provinces. 2,010, and at St. Jean Baptiste, a population of 5,574; these The Dominion census of 1881 gives a list of cities, towns three last being villages, and all of them having a popula-Mr. MULOCK.

and villages, with their populations, and the figures show how absolutely impossible it is for Parliament, on the lines indicated by this Bill, to establish a just franchise. It appears there are thirty seven cities and towns in Canada that he knows of some hidden mine in this country where having a population each of 5,000 and upwards. In the various Provinces no regular system has been adhered to; in some of the Provinces we have towns with simitown of Plymouth. As a native Canadian he addressed the lar populations to villages in other Provinces. I will show this by the following list taken from the census: Nova Scotia who work honestly for a living, who give a day's work for a day's pay. Well, the hon. gentleman told them about Canada, and I have no doubt he spread discontent amongst many of 3,403; New Glasgow, town, 2,595; Mill Village, village, 3,340. New Brunswick—St. George, town, 3,412; St. Andrews, town, 2,128; St. Stephens, town, 2,338; Milltown, town, 1,664; Upper Mills, town, 318. Quebec—Schoolbred, village, 369; Escuminac, village, 229; Gaspé, village, 324; Rimouski, town, 1,417; Fraserville, town, 2,291; Cacouna, village, 648; Kamouraska, village, 771; Bien Village, village, 1,020; Lauzon, village, 3,560; Lotbinière, village, 2,000; Plessisville, village, 774; Larochelle, village, 370; Nicolet, town, 3,710; St. Ours, village, 808; Iberville, town, 1,847; Varennes, town, 1,788; Longueuil, town, 2,355; Beauharnois, town, 1,499; Lavaltrie, village, 1,385; Berthier, town, 2,150; St. John Baptiste, village, now I believe a town, 5,732; Terrebonne, town, 1,398; L'Orignal, village, 853; Morrisburg, village, 1,719; Prescott, town, 2,995; Merrickville, village, 1,819; Richmond, village, 1,639; Arnarior, village, 2,147; Garden Island, village, 1,639; Arnarior, village, 2,147; Garden Island, village, 1,639; Arnprior, village, 2,147; Garden Island, village, 495; Bath, village, 546; Fergus, village, 1733. Now, if any man analyses these figures he will find some very curious results. I will not turn over all the combinations, but I would just invite the attention of the hon. member for East Hastings, who asks if he could not get it all from the census himself-I ask him if he thinks it right that a town having a smaller population than a village should require a larger qualification for its inhabitants than is required for the inhabitants of a village. For example, take the town of Marshall, in Nova Scotia, which has a population of 1,077, according to the census of 1881. The owner of real estate in that town, in order to have a vote, must have his real estate valued at the sum of $300. If, on the the other hand, you take the village of Arnprior, in Ontario, which has a population of 2,147, a resident of Arnprior holding property worth $200 will, under this Bill, have a vote, and yet the owner of the property in Marshall will not have a vote, unless his property is worth $100 more. On what principle is that done? You are endeavoring to apply, an arbitrary system to a very complex system of affairs. So we may take Milltown, which has a population of 1,664. Each of the inhabitants of Milltown must be the owner of property worth $300 in order to have a vote, whilst, if the Legislature were to choose to cancel the Act of incorporation, and make that place a village, a far greater number would have a vote. These facts simply convince me that the scheme adopted is not a just one, under all the circumstances existing in the Dominion. Take some other towns in the Province of Quebec. Take the town of Rimouski, with a population of 1,417, and St. Ours, with a population of 808, and so on. There are many villages in the Province having populations in excess of the population of those towns, and yet because they are called villages the franchise is lower than if they were towns. Yet hon, gentlemen are declaring that this Bill is worthy of support, because it gives the Dominion Parliament control over its own franchise. We find it full of absurdities at this stage. Take the converse case. Take, for instance, a town of which I know something—Newmarket, which had a population, according to the census of 1881, of 2,006. If we take Milltown village, N.B., it had a population at that time of 2,240. Lotbinière, in the Province of Quebec, had a population of tion in excess of the population of Newmarket at that time. Now, any one owning property in any one of these villages. to the value of $200, under this Bill, would be entitled to a vote; but the unfortunate resident of Newmarket cannot have a vote if he owns property worth less than $300. You are endeavoring to provide a scheme applicable to various Provinces; and you forget, when you use the words cities, towns, and incorporated villages, that you refer to institu-tions existing simply by the will of the Local Legislatures. I object to this scheme, then, not for that reason alone, but I do object to it for the reason, which must have impressed itself on the minds of hon. gentlemen, that the scheme is an iucomplete one. Not only is it incomplete, but, in my opinion, it cannot, on the present lines, be made more complete. I fail to see how you can provide an equitable and just scheme for all the electors of Canada, from ocean to ocean, basing that scheme simply on property. It may be considered a general scheme in the abstract. The honmember for West Toronto boasted of it as a general scheme. Well, it is a general scheme, but there is too much of the scheme about it; and taking it as it is offered to us, I submit that the Bill does not offer a scheme that can be general and fair in its application to all the people. The conditions of our people between the two oceans are so varied and different that it is almost impossible, by any such arbitrary system as this, to establish what can be considered a just scheme. Now, there is an attempt to deal with a certain set—as, for instance, the fishermen. I have no objection to the fishermen having credit for their boats and fishing appliances, in order to enfranchise them; on the contrary, I entirely approve of that portion of the measure. But it is idle to call this a general scheme, when that feature must necessarily be local in its application. The trouble has been that there is an attempt in this particular instance to legislate for a class only, and the framer of this Bill seemed to forget that there were other classes whose whole wealth, or the principal portion of it, were invested in the implements with which they earn their daily bread. Take the Province of Ontario, and when you go back from the shores of Lake Ontario and the other waters of that Province, there are no fishermen. It is idle to tell the inlanders of Ontario that they can get votes on their fishing nets or boats, for they have neither one nor the other. If the equipments used for the purpose of earning a living are to be valued, why is there nothing of that kind with regard to landsmen the people of my Province, the people of the great towns, or the young men in the back districts, many of whom invest a considerable portion of their capital in chattel property? One man owns a horse and cart; he may be merely a lodger in a house; why is he not entitled to have his horse and cart valued as well as the fisherman to have his boat? Why is not the mechanics' kit of tools, taken into consideration? You talk of a general scheme, which is not within the reach of the majority of the people; it is boasted of because it is general on paper. But it is limited in its application. In the neighborhood of the Lake of the Woods and in the Rocky Mountains there are considerable mining interests, the owners of which have been entirely overlooked by this Bill. Apart from the evidence furnished by the hon. member for West Toronto, where is the evidence of public opinion in support of this Bill? Outside of the interested evidence of those who advocate it, the only evidence is the evidence of one unknown man. What evidence have we that the public are against this measure? Day after day, we find the time of this House largely taken up with the presentation of petitions against it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Oh, dear, dear.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for East Hastings seems to attach very little importance to that mode of expressing public opinion; but it is probable, when he examines the petitions that come from East Hastings—

Mr. WHITE. Let them come; East Hastings is all right.

Mr. MULOCK—he will have reason to feel that he has under valued that expression of opinion. He will find on the petitions the names of a good many gentlemen who helped to place him where he is to-day, and it will be time enough for him to belittle them after that. Have there been any public meetings in favor of this measure?

Mr. COCHRANE. There were two at Brockville, and they had to adjourn.

Mr. MULOCK. In favor of this measure?
Mr. COCHRANE. In opposition to it.

Mr. MULOCK. That was not the fate of any meetings called against the measure. I have seen accounts in the public press of rousing meetings, at which strong resolutions have been carried, denouncing the measure; and in one of the papers I saw a letter from a prominent Conservative who had attended one of these meetings, and who afterwards, being asked by a number of his Conservative friends why he had done so, answered them all collectively by writing a letter to the newspaper, setting forth why he condemned this measure; and when he came to the question of the revising officer he stated that language failed to enable him to express his disapproval of that provision of the Bill. I would also call your attention to some of the utterances of the press, and in doing so I will not refer to any newspaper which is, so far as I know, a supporter of the Liberal party. I have only two or three cuttings that I have picked up during the last few days. The Montreal Herald is controlled and, I presume, owned by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), an able supporter of this Government, and one who, unlike the hon, member for King's (Mr. Foster), does not undertake to endorse everything that the Government may choose to submit. That paper deals with this measure and with the queston of the day in its issue of the 2nd of May, 1885. (The hon. gentleman read the extract.) I will read an extract from the Newmarket Era, of the 8th of May, 1885; it is a thoroughly independent journal, and in its preceding issue it spoke approvingly of the Franchise Bill. (The hon. gentleman read the extract.) In that article you have temperate language and with it a condemnation of this measure. Then, if we take some of the Toronto papers that are independent in character, we find they are of the same tenor. Take the Toronto Telegram, an independent journal; perhaps the hon, member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) will admit it is an independent journal, with strong leanings towards the Conservative party. The Telegram, on the 7th, said; (The hon, gentleman read an extract from an editorial of the Telegram published on the 7th). That is the opinion of an absolutely independent journal, with the exception that if it has any leanings at all they are Conservative. Then I can give you the evidence of the Toronto World; perhaps the hon. gentleman for West Toronto will not discredit that paper. It is a newspaper that, at the general elections of 1882, supported the Conservative party in the city of Toronto and throughout the country, and continues to give it much liberal support. Its article is as follows: (The hon. gentleman then read an article from the World). The rest of the article deals with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and approves of the policy of the Government in dealing with that railway. You will observe that the last article I read purports to give the opinion of the independent press of Canada. The last quotation with which I will trouble the committee is from the Week, of 14th May, 1885, a journal which is independent in its politics:

"A statesman must be at a loss for practical subjects of legislation when he goes out of his way to abolish an anomaly which is not also an evil. It cannot be said that the anomalies of the franchise in the different Provinces were evils; not a word of complaint respecting them had been heard. It is probable that, if their history were examined, they would be found to be not merely accidental but adjustments in some measure to social or economical peculiarities. When the question is put, each Province seems to wish to remain as it is, and Tory delegations give a party assent to equalisation only on condition that their own Province shall be left out. To bring on a political crisis with a military crisis already in existence, merely for the sake of forcing on everybody a uniformity which nobody desires, was surely not the part of a statesman. Unfortunately the measure cannot be called purposeless; the longer the discussion lasts the more clearly it appears that there was an object, and that the object was, under color of regulating the franchise, to perpetuate the ascendency of the party now in power. The proposal to enfranchise the Indians speaks for itself: these poor pensioners of the commonwealth must needs vote with the meal bag, which is in the hands of the agents of the Government, and more than one constituency might probably be strangled by their vote. The aim of the finale suffrage clause was revealed by Sir John A. Macdonald himself when he told a deputation that the Conservative party in England was a unit in favor of the measure. The Conservative party in England is not yet by any means a unit in favor of the measure, but the managers have recently taken it up in the hope of party gain, believing that the women would vote Tory under clerical influence, and Lord Beaconsfield, from the same motive, used to support it by his silent vote and his clandestine influence, though he never ventured to support it in a speech. That, however, which bears most distinctly the mark of a sinister policy is the provision for the appointment of revising barristers to draw up the list of voters and decide upon the title to vote, which has called forth widespread and most reasonable indignation. The revising barristers are General in Council; there is to be no appeal from their decision except with their own consent, nor any means practically of getting rid of them so long as they continue to serve the interests of the party by the head of which they are appointed. In England the revising barrister; are appointed by the judges, and hold their offices only for one year. The patro age of course will be exercised on the strict party principle, and ill-omened names are already heard. We have seen enough to be convinced that such nominees would shrink at a pinch from no disregard of electoral rights, and that the more unscruplous the service they rendered the surer would be their reward. If the Canadian people submit to such treatment they will show themselves bad guardians of their freedom; but their minds have been so perverted by party influence that there is no saying what they may do with their birthright if party calls for the sacrifice. In the United States there would be always a hope of reversal in the Senate, and at present there would be the certainty of a presidential veto on iniquity; but our Senate is a registration office and our president is a figure-head."

Hon, gentlemen defend this measure on various grounds General in Council; there is to be no appeal from their decision except

Hon. gentlemen defend this measure on various grounds. They have not vouchsafed to elaborate their arguments to any extent, but one of those advanced feebly in support of the measure is, that Parliament ought to control the franchise on which it is brought together. What is the object of our representative system? Not merely to elect a Parliament. The highest object of the system is not that so many hon gentlemen shall meet together and, as one hon gentleman has just been doing, amuse themselves by playing ball. The object is that the will of the people may find its way to the Statute Books of the country. Parliament is but an instrument for executing the will of the people, and if hon. gentlemen contend that the Parliament of Canada should control every bit of the machinery whereby it is brought together, much more should they say that Parliament should afterwards control every measure that is placed upon the Statute Book; and yet it does not do so.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). This Parliament has a right to disallow every local Bill passed. This Government has, at all events.

Mr. MULOCK. I was not referring to the local legislation.

Mr. McLELAN. He does not know what he is referring

Mr. WHITE. He is pretty well muddled, anyway.

Mr. MULOCK. If Parliament should control the machinery by which it is brought together, much more should it control the legislation which it enacts, but most of the laws are carried out by persons not amenable to this Parliament at all, except indirectly. Take the criminal law of the country. This Parliament declares what is a crime, but who carries out the law? It is true the judges are appointed Mr. Mulock.

prosecutors; they provide, by their legislation, for the empanelling of jurors, they appoint the magistrates, they can declare whether or not juries shall be used in criminal cases, and when the law is finally declared, when a man's rights are finally ascertained, the Local Legislatures, through their agents, put the law into execution. You may declare it a crime for a man to commit murder, but it is the Local Legislature that provides for hanging him. If it is so important that you should control the machinery that brings you together, why not carry the reasoning to its logical conclusion, and control every bit of legislation this Parliament enacts? There is no disguising the fact that there is an object in the Bill, and that object has been plainly stated in the articles from which I have quoted. One Province alone is specially aimed at—there is no disguising that fact,—and that Province is Ontario. Why is Ontario singled out for attack? Is it that she has defended herself successfully, in the courts and at the polls, against the Dominion Government for some years? Is it that she does not possess sufficient intelligence to enable her to control the franchise? Is it that her people have not the stake in the country that would justify their being entrusted with the franchise? What is the reason that this legislation is brought on at this time? There is but one object, and it would be well at this stage if hon, gentlemen would throw off the mask and tell us plainly, what we all know by inference, that there is but one object in this measure, and that is to control the elections, and especially to control those in the Province of Ontario. If intelligence, if education, if wealth, ought be factors in determining who should control the franchise, where does Ontario stand in that respect? If the Government pass this Bill we shall have a double system of franchises.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Since Ontario has been a Province she has had two franchises, one for the municipal council and one for the two Legislatures.

Mr. MULOCK. True, but both arranged by the same man in the same way and at the same time. At present we have a simple machinery in the Province of Ontario, whereby any person possessed of property qualification can have himself enrolled. The public have been educated in that direction, and they understand it. Our people understand what to do if their names are left off the roll, and they know where to go to put in an appeal. But here it is proposed to introduce another system, an embarrassing system, which it would take more than a Philadelphia lawyer to understand. Now, Mr. Chairman, who are to benefit by this Bill? The Dominion Government are to benefit by it, of course, but there is another class that are to benefit by it, namely, the revising barristers. The revising officers appointed will, no doubt, be persons who have claims on the Government for political services. I admitthat proper political services should be properly remunerated; but a good many political services are unfortunately of a character that tend to demoralise the country. Such services are rendered by people who fasten themselves upon the country like parasites and eat out its vitals. Is it in the public interest that we should have 633 of such officers? The hon, member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) said that in addition to revising officers, clerks and constables, there would be copyists; so I suppose there will be an army of 1,000 men appointed after the passage of this Bill. No one has attempted to justify this expenditure. In the course of the debate the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) informed this House that in Quebec there had been only forty appeals from the voters' list within a period of four years. The Secretary of State said that the reason why, in the Province of Quebec, up to the present time, so few appeals from the voters' list had taken place, was because of by this Government, but the rest of the machinery is in the appeals from the voters' list had taken place, was because of hands of the Provinces. The Provinces appoint the Crown the expense involved. (The hon. member read a quotation from the Secretary of State's speech page 1173, Hansard). Under the present system an appeal can be made almost without expense; but under this Bill the appeal must be to the Superior Court, and a barrister must be engaged. If, under the present law, errors are not corrected on account of the cost involved, how are the errors, and more than errors. which will arise under the proposed system, to be corrected? Why is the present Bill forced upon the House? The Government say: This is not a want of confidence in the municipal system, for we have the utmost confidence in the officers who carry out the municipal laws. The Government cannot escape from the position in which they have placed themselves. If they take the power from the municipal officers, who have enjoyed it for so many years, a power incapable of being abused, they do it, either because they declare that the municipal authorities have, up to the present time, shown themselves unworthy custodians of that power, or because they have not been sufficiently pliant to the powers that be. They may choose between two alternatives, but they cannot escape the inference which must be drawn from their action. They are not drawing that power from the municipalities because they have been unfaithful, but because the municipal officers have been faithful and trustworthy, another tribunal is to be provided. The hon member for East Grey made a request to this House. I refer to Hansard, page 1852, where, speaking of the revising officers, he said

"It is time enough to hurl malediction against these men when they have shown that they are unable to discharge their duties fairly between the parties, and not till then. I do not regard this provision in the same light as the hon. member for South Grey, that it is an insult to the municipal officers of this country."

That, Sir, was a very cool request, that we shall allow this measure to go through with all its defects, and after the power has been transferred from the people to these officers we shall then, when they have shown themselves unworthy of that power, find fault with them. It will be rather late then. We cannot recall the power. They may abuse it, but is that the time to object? Would it not be a case of locking the stable after the horse is stolen? That is not the time to be careful of your property and your rights. Surely we are doing what is best and wisest, by seeing that the system is a safe one, rather than suffer under the mistakes or the unjust acts of such officers. Hon. gentlemen complain that part of the debate conducted by this side of the House at a certain stage was of an obstructive character. I do not take that view of it at all. Have any of us heard any complaint from the people of Canada against the defenders of Battleford, on the ground of obstruction? The only men who could so charge them would be Poundmaker and his gang. Has anybody charged Captain Dickens and his gallant band at Fort Pitt with obstruction? The only persons who could do so would be Big Bear and his band. We are entitled to defend the liberties of the people on the floor of this House, and we are but doing our duty in taking this course. I trust that now the debate has taken a calm and temperate form, and all bitterness appears to have passed away, that if any such measure is adopted it will be only such a one as will meet with the general approval of those who desire to see the representative system of government on a thorough, safe, and stable basis.

Mr. HICKEY. The hon, member who has just taken his seat labored very hard to set aside the effects of the speech of the hon, member for West Toronto—a speech which will be like a beacon light to the country as compared with the Opposition speeches on this subject. The arguments which he set forth are unanswerable, and I think they have been so regarded by the country before they were announced, because I believe he only voiced the views of the country in his remarks. The member for North York let his own heart out of the difficulty when he said there must be some special object in this Bill, and then said that it must be specially aimed at Ontario. He did not tell the House how it was aimed at the Province of Ontario, or that the Province of Ontario is singled out in the way that this amendment asks to have it singled out The whole of the provisions of this Bill extend to the Province of Ontario as to the other Provinces, and not otherwise. Why it should be singled out is not clear. The only foundation for such a suggestion is the fact that so many of these hon, gentlemen coming from that Province have made this Bill a bugbear, and so regarded it, without entering on the question, as they would have upon another Bill, and giving it that fair and candid consideration which otherwise they would have done. He mentions the subject of education in this matter-that it would embarrass some of the Provinces, hinting specially at Ontario, by being kept back by other Provinces which were not so advanced. He went on to say that some of the difficulties of this measure would be that it would be establishing two franchises, and the people would not understand them. That is rather a severe criticism on the advancement of education which he was speaking about just before. I think the people are apt to conceive what their rights are, that they are determined to have them, that they will pursue them, and that we need not fear the people in that respect, because they will quite readily understand this question, just as well as hon. gentlemen in this House. The country is highly intelligent throughout, and the newspapers circulate in every direction. Then, of course, the skeleton they put in the trunk of this Bill is the revising officer. Now, what are the facts in relation to this matter? The revising officer is to take the assessment roll and the votors' list last prepared. That assessment roll comes from the hands of the court of revision. It has been advertised, and it goes to the hands of the county judge, if necessary, if anybody wishes to appeal. It is almost a perfect document in itself. The revising officer has to take that assessment roll as prima facie evidence to support the list. He prepares the list and advertises it; again it goes to the people, and they can appeal to put on names or take them off. Every one can see it when it is published. He holds a court and perfecting the list it is hen published in the Canada Gazette, and here is another appeal to a superior court. Why, Sir, if there is anything about the Bill which makes it more needful to the people, it is the fact of the revising officer and the position he is required to take in it, because there are three different stages of the voters' list in this Bill, in which the people may protect themselves—looking at the list, and seeing if there are any imperfections in it, and having them corrected at different stages. A man can appear there, as at any other court, and see that his rights are properly protected; and there is no man, no matter how basely he may be depicted in this House, who would lend himself to do a wrong, especially under such circumstances. What would be the effect of it? There is no man who could do wrong in that position and prosper. The Opposition speak as if it would be an advantage to the Government to appoint the worst possible men in the profession to do their dirty work for them; but honesty is the best policy—and that is why the Conservative party are in power to-day; they have done what they could to build up the country, and the country has trusted them. That is the whole of the question regarding the revising officer. He cannot possibly do a wrong; if he does, the person against whom he does wrong has three opportunities to obtain justice, so that there is no possibility of any person being injured under the Act unless he wilfully neglects his own duty. The hon, member for North York quoted from several newspapers, among them the Montreal Herald. I happened to read the article lock; and the writer being strongly in favor of manhood suffrage, suggests that as a means of solving the whole difficulty. After what the hon member for North York read, the article goes on to accuse the Opposition of obstruction, and of having forgotten their duty to the public in that respect. The subject of petitions has been brought up. What do they amount to? Nothing whatever. Hon, gentlemen here have protested very strongly against this measure; they have pressed their people in the country and through the press to petition against this Bill, to get up meetings, etc., and the whole thing has been a perfect fizzle, so far. To-day two petitions were presented from my county, and out of a polling division of 200 electors comes a petition with thirty names, all of them of Grits. There is only one man in the whole number whom I would be doubtful of at all, but he is an innocent man, and may have been induced to sign the the article goes on to accuse the Opposition of obstruction, an innocent man, and may have been induced to sign the petition. I do not despise petitions; I think they are right in principle; but when gentlemen get up here and insult the intelligence of this House by telling us of indignation meetings and petitions against this Bill, it paralyses the respect one might have for those gentlemen. Does not the country well know that no Government measure can be introduced into this Parliament that hose gentlemen opposite would support? During the two Sessions that I have been in this House everything the Government has brought forward has been contested by the Opposition. So what does all this agitation amount to? It amounts to this, that hon gentlemen are attempting to back up the position—the regretted position, I believe—that they took against this Bill, and are asking the country to sympathise with them, so that they may let themselves down easy. Hon. gentlemen objected to the Bill because it provided for a class of fishermen. The Bill attempts to meet the fishermen in a very tair way. We have not many fishermen in the Province of Ontario, but down by the sea there are large numbers of those people, who spend their lives in one of the great interests of this country, and there is every reason why they should be given an opportunity to vote for their representatives. He asks: Why not take in mechanics' tools, and make them part of the assessment? He asks: Why not take in This Bill does not propose to establish manhood suffrage in this country; it does not intend to give votes to men who may be here to-day doing a job and in the United States to-morrow, but to settled classes in the community. If hon, gentlemen had pointed out any special class who have not been provided for in this Bill I am sure the Government would be glad to extend the franchise to that class. The hon, gentleman gave us some figures from the census returns with regard to towns and cities, and showed that it would be impossible to apply this Bill to those conditions. Well, if that difficulty exists in this Bill the same difficulty will be found in the provincial Act. If we have a franchise for towns and cities, everybody agrees that it should be different from that in the country. Then, hon, gentlemen opposite contend very strongly that if they should, why not carry the principle further, as the hon. member for West Toronto said, and give the right to the municipal council; and if you give them the power to make the tranchise for this Parliament, why not let them have the right to fix the boundaries of our electoral districts? Why not give them the control of the courts that try our election cases as well? The thing becomes ridiculous, if you follow it up. If this Parliament has the chise. Mr. Mowat, after having been driven to the wall by right to fix the boundaries of the electoral districts it the people last year, yielded and gave the franchise to the certainly should have the right to fix the qualifications of those who vote in them, as well as to supply the machinery for the elections. Then, the hon, member for North York said that he was satisfied that in the cities and towns, Mr. HICKEY.

fact when this Bill comes to be put in force, because there will be no house and lot in the city of Toronto, for instance, that will not be worth $300; besides, any person paying a rent of $2 a month will be entitled to the franchise, so that every individual who is worthy of the franchise, even in the city of Toronto, will have it, and I do not believe any appreciable number of persons will be deprived of votes. This same gentleman had the audacity to assert that no supporter of the Government had attempted to defend the revising officer. Why, there has not been a member who spoke upon the Bill on this side who did not defend the position of the revising officer. Yet, hon, gentlemen opposite will coolly tell the House that no supporter of the Government in this House or in conversation with them has attempted to defend the revising officer. Such a statement is unfair to those with whom the conversations were had, and is unfair, as far as this House is concerned. That hon, gentleman speaks of the county court judges and the revising officers being two very different classes of men. The Government, he says, would appoint a very respectable lawyer to be judge, because he was going to be outside their jurisdiction, but they would naturally appoint unscrupulous men to be revising barristers for their own purposes. Well, as I said, honesty is the best policy, and the policy of the Conservative Government fully answers that way of putting the case. He said the hon, member for West Toronto lost his character, so far as his being a defender of the people's rights are concerned, when, in 1882, he supported the wenderful gerrymandering Act, and consequently could no longer be regarded as a supporter of the people's rights. It is evident hon, gentlemen denounce here as wrong and infamous what, in the Province of Ontario, they look upon as most virtuous and highly intelligent. Not a member of the Reform party found fault with the gerrymandering Act of Mr. Mowat in 1874, nor with his gerrymandering Act of last Session. What is the case in the city of Toronto? Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that no man should have more than one vote, and they disfranchise non-residents on that ground, yet their own politicians in the Province gave to every voter in the city of Toronto two votes. They have done this for the purpose of stealing a member from the Conservative party in that city. Consistency is a jewel, and I hope hon gentlemen opposite will say less on that point hereafter. It they have any regard for themselves they will. The hon member for Prince Edward county (Mr. Platt), the other evening, said that half the population was opposed to this Bill. There is no doubt, in my mind, that every Grit in Ontario may be opposed to it, because hon, gentlemen on the front benches opposite are opposed to it, and they are opposed to it because it comes from the Government. The hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) found some little fault, in criticising the $2 a month tenancy voter; he thought it would be better to make the value of the house the basis, because a man might live in a hovel and pay $2 a month. That is what he calls looking after the interests of the poor man; the poor man should not have a vote because he cannot pay more than $2 a month. We have heard a great deal lately of having the franchise extended to every individual, and hon, gentlemen opposite have been posing as great defenders of this, declaring what a wrong it would be to take away the right of the franchise. Have not the Conservatives in Ontario been fighting, ever since the farmers' sons franchise has been established, to have the merchants and mechanics' sons entrusted with the fransons of merchants and mechanics, but he did not yield until forced to do so by the pressure of the Opposition, and the appearance of the Bill we are now discussing. The mechanics' sons and the owners' sons will not thank especially in his own city, a great many people the Ontario Government for this tardy justice done would be disfranchised. That will not appear to be the them. Hon, gentlemen opposite say that the man is the voter and not the property. I ask: Why have the property qualification? They would disfranchise the non-resident voter, yet, still they have property as the standard of qualification. If property is the standard of qualification, there is no reason why a non-resident should not have his vote where he has property, or otherwise a great many men would not have a vote, because they happen to live away from their property a part of the year. The Indian question has been made a great deal of. Well, the Indian has his franchise, under the Local Government Bill, while he lives off the reserve. He may be just as intelligent, have all the fine sentiments pictured in the Globe of the Indian, and live on the reserve, but shall not have a vote. Why he should not is not clear. He is living in his own municipality, it is true, and holds territory of his own, not the Government's. If he were worth $10,000 personal property and still lived on the reserve he could not have a vote, according to the Ontario Act. This is manifestly But how are we to lift the Indian from the position he occupies unless we take him by the hand and treat him as a white man, when he deserves the treatment. Hon, gentlemen opposite find fault with the franchise being given to Indians, because they say he will vote for the Government or its friends. Well, he may. Does the hon. member for Bothwell, or the hon, member for South Brant, or any other member, do otherwise than vote for his friends? There are several Indians in the constituency of the hon. member for Bothwell who may possibly give him their votes. A great deal has been said about the expense which will result from this measure. The estimate of the hon. member for West Toronto of $75,000 to $100,000 will, I believe, be much more than sufficient. It is well known that the Provinces have no more money than they can make good use of. Why, then, should they not have adopted manhood suffrage and so saved expense? They can take advantage of this Bill, if it proves useful, as no doubt it will, and so save expense to that extent. It is not correct to say that any rights will be taken away from the people by this Bill. They will perform their duties as they did before. There is no pleasure to a municipal council, or to a judge, or to the people, in having to make the voters' list, and if a revising barrister should not be trusted, surely men who are less responsible, and who know they go out of office this year or the next, may be tempted to do more for the sake of party than a man who has a position, and will do right for honor's sake, especially when his action is before the whole world. If men are bound to do wrong they will do it in any case. We have been challenged to go back to the country on this Bill. I object to that, for this reason, that if we went back we would not have so many of the Opposition to contend with in another Parliament. The same sort of threat was given in 1882. Before the last general election these hon gentlemen said the National Policy was a failure, that the Government had bamboozled the people, and that if they appealed to the country that policy would be set aside; but no sooner did the leader of the Government propose to appeal to the country than they began to whine because they would be put to the expense of another election. If the Premier to-day accepted the challenge to go to the country, the next day there would be a whine in the newspapers that more expense was to be caused, and if the Government did appeal to the country on this Bill, they would be sustained by as large a majority as they have now. Hon. gentlemen have referred to letters which they received from Conservatives in opposition to this Bill. It is very strange that we on this side, who are Conservatives, have received no such letters. They say that the question has not been talked about in the country. I dishonest of the hon. gentleman to say that this measure was not understood and looked forward to by the people. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) said this was an inopportune time to bring this Bill forward, because we have trouble in the North-West. It is true that we have trouble in the North-West, but how, in such a case, can the Opposition spring like a wild cat at the throat of the Government, and threaten us with a small rebellion here? It is unfair, unpatriotic, unmanly. Some of them have been almost in arms. They have said that this Bill shall not pass. Even to-day we have had a repetition of that, and it ill-becomes them to indulge in this sort of disloyal talk in this House, when we have these troubles in the North-West. No doubt, they would like to saddle the responsibility for all that trouble upon the Government; but I have no doubt that, when the time comes, the Government will be able to show that they have done their duty there.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wish to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, that you have summarily stopped discussion when the subject of the North-West has been mentioned. I do not object to the hon. gentleman's mentioning it, but I call your attention to it now, so that he may be fully answered from this side of the House.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is the hon, gentleman rising to a point of order?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; he is speaking in reference to the North-West troubles.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. There is no point of order.

Mr. HICKEY. I am only replying to a statement made by an hon, gentleman made on that side. I have no doubt that he objects to have it put squarely before the country. The hon, member for South Grey also quoted the remark of the Duke of Wellington in reference to the election for Clonmel. If that was despotism, we have the same sort of despotism in this country. When Mr. Blake named Mr. Edgar as the nominee to be elected in West Ontario there was as much despotism as could possibly to used under any possible Bill arranging the franchise so liberally as this Bill proposes. But that is the kind of criticism which they give to this Bill, a criticism unfair in every respect. They say that the people should have their way. The people have had their way, they have elected us to support the Government on the principles they have enunciated to the country, and until the majority of this House turns against the Government, they will be entitled to carry such measures as the majority back them up in. It comes with a bad grace from hon. gentlemen opposite to threaten the Government with rebellion because a small minority in this House cannot rule. They say the provision in regard to the revising barrister, and, in fact, the whole Bill, is designed to keep the Government in power. The people will judge of that, and when the people understand the Bill, they will be quite satisfied with it, and, I have no doubt that it will keep the Government in power, with or without the Bill they will be kept in power. Sometimes hon, gentlemen have objected to the criticism that they have obstructed the business of the House, and when the member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Landry), put them in the position they occupy before the country, the member for East Elgin said he was willing to accept the responsibility.

Mr. WILSON. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HICKEY. I said the member for East Elgin.

Mr. WILSON. I represent East Elgin.

Conservatives, have received no such letters. They say that the question has not been talked about in the country. I know that, in my county, it was talked about from the time it was introduced; and the people only wondered why the Premier did not proceed with it before. It is idle and Conservative Party for the last twenty years. All we ask is that the record of the past shall be the record of the future, and the country will have nothing to regret, but will go on in its grand and glorious march to perfection, and will be the envy of the rest of the world. The true reason why hon gentlemen make such a dead set upon this Bill is that they know that, in 1887, this Parliament must appeal again to the electors, that they have no policy of their own, and no principles but obstruction and opposition, and that they would like the people to understand that this "infamous," "nefarious" and "rascally" Bill will be the reason for their defeat at the next election. That is the sole object of the Opposition. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that we were afraid to appeal to the same constituency that elected us. Well, that is what we have been afraid of, and that is the great necessity for this Bill. We fear that we shall not be able to appeal, in the future, to the same constituency that elected us. If the Provinces have a right to limit the franchise—although we have had a very liberal extension of the franchise, it is true, in Ontario, and I do not complain of that—but if the Provinces are allowed to limit the franchise they might restrict it so as to defeat the intentions and objects of the Government and its legislation here. But when we have a franchise of our own we will then know to whom we are to appeal, and I think that is the great necessity for this Bill. The objection has been made that the Bill has been brought down too late. Well, it is late, and so far as our interests are concerned, we are sorry it was not brought in years ago. But it is not so late that it should not be passed through, and if hon gentlemen had shown any fairness in criticising it, the Bill would have been through before this; but they are making it late, and intend to make it still later. I believe the Bill, on the whole, is a step in the right direction. It is another link that is needed to bind the Provinces together, another platform on which the different Provinces will stand together. The men of every Province will stand on the same footing, with reference to the franchise; and after what we have heard in this House, we know that we need a link such as this to bind these Provinces more closely together in the interests of the great Dominion.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I congratulate the House, the committee and the country on the determination, sudden though it is, that has seized our hon. friends opposite, at last, to take part in this debate. I think it is evident that, much as they may disparage the petitions that have been presented here, much as they disguise the feeling that has been aroused in the country since the full measure of the iniquity of this Bill has become known, the very fact of their rising now and attempting its defence is the best evidence that an impression is being made on the country. I welcome with satisfaction this evidence that the time we have spent here in discussing this Bill has been well [spent, and that hon, gentlemen opposite begin to feel the necessity of saying something on its behalf. They have stood like dumb-driven cattle long enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMERON. I am proud to know that at last we have compelled them to speak. They expected heretofore that, with their majority, they were going to shove this Bill through by brute force, but they now realise that the country is awakened to the full measure of the iniquity of this Bill, that they can no longer afford to sit silent and allow the Bili to remain undefended. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Hickey) was kind enough to say that the extension of the franchise in the Province of Ontario by the Local Legislature at its last Session was a very liberal one. Now, if that was a liberal one, what can they say of the franchise proposed in this Bill? The Ontario Act ment in favor of the Bill. The hon gentleman, I think, gives a vote to every one earning $250 a year, while this Mr. HICKEY.

Bill only gives it to those earning $400 a year. Where, then, is the liberality of this Bill, as compared with the Ontario Act? If it is a liberal measure to give the franchise to the son of every land-holder in the Province of Ontario, as the recently adopted provincial Act allows, I want to know where the liberality of this Bill comes in, when it restricts the franchise to the sons of land-owners only, and that in proportion as each one's share is valued at $400 or over? The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that the Ontario franchise only gave a vote to every land-owner when the land was valued over $400. But we have only to refer to the provisions of the Ontario Act, in order to show the decided difference in this respect between the two franchises. (The hon. gentleman read the defining clause of the Ontario Act, showing that the Ontario franchise is to all the sons of "land-holders of $400 in value, and followed by reading the same clauses in the Bill under discussion which confines the franchise to the sons of "land-owners" in proportion as the holding exceeds by $400 a minimum of that amount.) Continuing he remarked: It appears evident, from what has been stated by hon, gentlemen opposite, when they have ventured to take part in this discussion, that they feel they cannot relieve themselves of the responsibility that attaches to them for the recent occurrences in the North-West. If the hon. member for Dundas, or any other hon. gentleman opposite, chooses to introduce these questions into the discussion they must take the consequences. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hickey) adverted to the fact that the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was here by the grace of the leader of the Opposition. If it is becoming to make a reference of that kind to an honmember who occupies a seat in this House by the same right that any other hon. member occupies his seat, I want to know by the grace of whose power it was Sir George E. Cartier occupied his seat here at one time-whether it is not a fact that the present leader of the rebellion in the North-West did not withdraw from Provencher in order that Sir George Cartier might take his seat here? I do not want these references by hon. gentlemen opposite to go unchallenged. Is it not true that the right hon, gentleman who now leads this House sought and obtained a seat in British Columbia when an Ontario constituency refused him What right, then, have hon. gentlemen opposite to make references to hon. members on this side, who have secured their right to sit in this House by the free will of the people.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I wish to correct a statement just made. The Premier did not seek a seat in British Columbia. It was spontaneously offered to him.

An hon. MEMBER. I would also state there was no necessity for a member of Parliament resigning his seat and taking office under the Local Government in order to leave the seat vacant, as was the case in West Ontario.

Mr. BOWELL. Consequently there was no purchase.

Mr. CAMERON. Hon. gentlemen opposite are drawing fine distinctions.

Mr. HICKEY. I only gave an illustration as to what the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) calls despotism. If in one case it was despotism, it was in the other. was not despotism in the latter case it was not in the former.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon, gentleman will see how vulnerable his side of the House is on this point. It does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to say anything as to the position of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Elgar), as he has as clear a right as any hon. member who sits in this House. We have heard to-night, it is capable. He differs, however, from some hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, as to the Indian clause. He says: Why not a vote to the Indian, who lives on a reservation and may be worth $10,000, and still who has not a vote. No gentleman on this side has taken the position that an Indian should not have a vote when he becomes enfranchised, but we do object that the Indian who is placed in a position entirely different from the white man, who must have a property qualification, should have a vote. In my locality there is a large number of Indians, and as, thanks to the gerrymander, they do not affect my riding, I can speak free from any personal consideration, and I say, from my knowledge of the locality, that if this Bill was accompanied by the enfranchisement of the Indian, by his acquisition of property in his own right, the whole locality would welcome the Bill, because they wish to see that property sub-divided, and the fact that it is not sub-divided and is now largely unproductive is a drawback to the whole neighborhood. It is a serious source of irritation that there should be so many thousands of acres, in one of the best counties of the west, where there is no municipal organisation, where taxes cannot be collected for the purpose of making roads, where any municipal powers whatever cannot be exercised, simply because it still lies in the hands of the Crown. As the ordinary hour for adjournment has arrived, I am quite willing to discontinue speak-

Mr. JENKINS. Before the House rises, I wish to ask if it is parliamentary for an hon. member to stigmatise members on this side as dumb, driven cattle. If it is parliamentary, all I can say is that it is the language of a low, untruthful person.

Mr. EDGAR. It is a quotation from the poet Longfellow:

"Be not like dumb, driven cattle, Be a hero in the strife."

Mr. BOWELL. It is a great pleasure that it is not a quotation from the poet Edgar.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think I may be allowed to say that my hon friend did not say that hon members were dumb, driven cattle, but simply used that quotation from the poet as an illustration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON I think the best proof of it is the fact that the Chairman would have called him to order, if he had applied that term to them.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at two o'clock a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SATURDAY, 16th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRESENTATION OF A PETITION.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg leave to present a petition, setting forth that hitherto the Provinces have——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. It is irregular for an hon. member to read a petition when he is presenting it. If he wishes to have it read, the Clerk will read it.

Mr. MULOCK. He has a right-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. He has a right to read the prayer of the petition, and, if he wishes to have the petition read, the Clerk will read it at the Table.

Mr. MULOCK. He has a right-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; Chair, chair.

Mr. MULOCK. I am in order. I am under the impression that the rules of the House entitle an hon. member who presents a petition to state briefly the material allegations contained in it.

An hon, MEMBER. What rule?

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know what rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the petition if it is asked for.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps, Sir, you will record your ruling, and quote the authority afterwards, according to custom.

Mr. SPROULE. The rule is that:

"Every member offering to present a petition to the House shall endorse his name thereupon, and confine himself to a statement of the parties from whom it comes, the number of signatures attached to it, and the material allegations it contains."

Mr. BLAKE. It is rule 85.

Mr. SPEAKER. Rule 86 says:

"Every petition not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House, and which, according to the rules or practice of this House can be received, is brought to the Table by direction of the Speaker, who cannot allow any debate, or any member to speak upon or in relation to such petition; but it may be read by the Clerk at the Table, if required; or if it complain of some present personal grievance, requiring an immediate remedy, the matter contained therein may be brought into immediate discussion."

Mr. BLAKE. I would also call your attention to rule 85, which says:

"Every member offering to present a petition to the House shall endorse his name thereupon, and confine himself to a statement of the parties from whom it comes, the number of signatures attached to it, and the material allegations it contains."

It is consequently in order for my hon, friend to state the material allegations of the petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is quite true, but the hon, member for North Norfolk was reading the petition from the beginning.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yesterday a petition was read on its presentation. The statement of the material allegations is the prayer of the petition, and, if a further statement is required, it is the practice to have it read by the Clerk. That has always been the practice.

Mr. BLAKE. The rule says the member shall state the material allegations.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the material allegations are the prayer.

Mr. CHARLTON. The petition contains five material allegations, the prayer is that the Bill entitled the Franchise Bill be not passed. I present the petition with the request that the Clerk be permitted to read it.

The Clerk Assistant read the petition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 85th rule says:

Then the 86th rule says:

"Every petition not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House and which according to the rules or practice of this House can be received, is brought to the Table by direction of the Speaker, who cannot allow any debate or any member to speak upon it or in relation to said petition; but it may be read by the Clerk at the Table if required."

Our practice is that the petition is presented on the responsibility of the member, and then the next day it is brought up, and if there is nothing in it which should prevent its being received, it is received, but the member is not allowed to speak upon it, nor is any other member allowed to speak upon it, but he may then at the time of the receipt, ask that it may be read. That, I think, is the meaning of these two rules taken together.

Mr. BLAKE. It is of little consequence whether the view of the First Minister be correct or not, if the view which I expressed a few moments ago be correct. I have never yet heard, in any court of law or equity, or in the high court of Parliament, that the allegations of a peti-tion were the prayer. I understand the allegations of a petition to be the statements of facts or opinion which are contained in the body of the petition, and that the prayer of the petition is entirely different. The prayer is the consequence of the allegations of the petition, and is the view of the petitioners of what the House should do or abstain from doing. I have always understood, up till today, that it was within the competence of a member, under the 85th rule, to state, upon his responsibility, the material allegations that are contained in the petition; but I think that a member presenting a petition is, under the 85th rule, entitled to state to the House in the act of presentation, what the material allegations of that petition are, as distinguished from its prayer. If so, then the House is possessed at the time of presentation of the allegations, and it becomes of less consequence at what period the House shall become possessed of those allegathe other source, namely, the reading tions from at the Table. But your views upon the subject differ from that of the hon, gentleman opposite and from my own, and you may rule in favor of his view or in favor of mine, or, perhaps, against both of us, but, if it be decided that a petition can only be read by the Clerk on the day following its presentation, it becomes still more material that we should consider what the true meaning and effect of this 85th rule is, and whether a member is to be entirely precluded from communicating to the House what the material allegations of the petition are, as distinguished from its prayer.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the reading of the material allegations of the petition means that everything that is alleged in the petition is material, and may be read by the member presenting it, it would evidently bring before the House difficulties that cannot be surmounted. A petition may contain allegations that should not be received at all by the House. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) may not agree with me; he nods to me that I am altogether wrong, but his opinion is not equivalent to an authority. According to the general rules of the House a petition cannot be presented, if it contains objectionable matter. According to precedents, the material allegations, that is, the main object of the petition, can be mentioned when it is presented, but our rule requires that the petition cannot be received and read to the House the same day it is presented, so that time may be allowed for its examination to see if there are material objections to its being read. There might be slanderous allegations in the petition, and if the Clerk is obliged de plano to read the petition when it is presented, the House might be obliged to listen to libellous and slanderous petitions. I say that a member, in presenting a petition, is allowed to state its material allegation and to state the prayer of the petition. It is then laid on the Table and examined, and if afterwards the member desires it to be read, it can be read, if examination has shown that it contains nothing objectionable.

Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. BLAKE. My experience in this House is a little longer than that of the hon. gentleman and I will say that, although, as a general rule, members have confined themselves to reading the prayer of the petition, I have not infrequently heard members state, without objection at all, the material allegations of a petition.

Mr. CASEY. The Secretary of State objects to my word on this point. I think on this point I might reasonably be considered a better authority than the hon. gentleman. He is now in his second Session in this House, and I am now in my fourteenth Session. I think I should know as much, if not more, of the practice in this House than the hon. gentleman. My recollection is that members have mentioned the material allegations of the petition, and their right has never been questioned.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon gentleman said he has been here fourteen years. He might be here thirty years, and I would not take his dictum, either as to precedent or as to reason.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The difficulty probably arises in this way: The practice of the House has been for a member to say: I beg to present a petition for so and so—praying for some object. But very frequently the member has stated some of the leading points of the petition, though it is not the habit of members. I have frequently seen that done. On the other hand, I have no recollection of a petition being read at the moment it was presented, except on a special motion being made that this petition be now read and received; otherwise, the reading was always left until two days afterward, when the Speaker has taken cognisance of the petition, and is able to say to the House whether the petition should be read or not.

Mr. BLAKE. I concur with every word the hon. Minister of Public Works has said. Not infrequently a member has stated the material allegations of a petition, which he has done on his own responsibility. The act of reading the petition is done subsequently, and is the formal act of the House. But we must deal with the statements made by myself and by another very active hon. member of this House for many years as to whether our practice has been to allow a member to state the material allegations of a petition. I say that is in accordance with the rule and with our practice.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The meaning of the rule cannot be as stated, and I have not yet heard any answer to what I have said. Although some of the material allegations of a petition were allegations which could not be read, which was against the dignity of the House, yet, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman, a member would have a right to read or have read those allegations, although they were in direct conflict with the privileges and dignity and honor of members of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman said that if my view is correct a member would have a right to read the material allegations of a petition. I say he would. The rule says he has a right to read the material allegations. That does not compromise the dignity of this House. On the day when the House comes to act on the petition and to decide whether it should be read and received, the House acts; but as an hon member may make statements on his own responsibility, so he may state those allegations on his responsibility, and the House will not be in the slightest degree compromised, for it is not the act of the House but the act of an hon member.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. According to my view of the rules, the reading of the allegations of a petition might lead to the inconvenience and abuse I have mentioned. A member must confine himself to state what the material allegations of the pettion are, and that does not mean that he shall read every allegation of the petition, but simply confine himself to the statement as to what the main object of the petition is,

Mr. MILLS. The whole question is what are the material allegations of a petition. They are the facts set out in the petition. The prayer is not an allegation, but is something asked for, based on the material allegations. When the Secretary of State says it is not right for a member to read all the material allegations, or to state them all, he is laying down a proposition which is contradicted by the rule. The rule is that he has that right. The whole question is what are the material allegations? They are, in general terms, the facts set out in the petition; and if there is anything immaterial which does not fall within the rule, a member shall be restricted from stating it. But the material allegations, whatever they may be, and however numerous, may be stated by the member presenting the petition in order that the House may be placed in possession of the facts and know something of the character of the petition. Otherwise, the House would be kept in the dark until the petition was read at the Table.

Mr. MULOCK. It is clear that the rule is not a mere formal rule but contemplates that a member presenting the petition shall state something as to its nature for the information of the House. If the member presenting the petition were to be confined to reading the prayer alone, it would afford no possible information to the House. That being the case, it seems right for the proper construing of this rule that a member shall state for the information of the House the material allegations contained in the petition, which must necessarily be statements of fact, the prayer being simply a conclusion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Whenever there is any doubt about the construing of a rule, it must be construed according to the practice of Parliament. I find the rule lays down that a member shall state the material allegations of the petition. But in Bourinot's book I find it stated:

"Then the members who have any such documents to present will rise, and after briefly stating the purport of the document in accordance with the rule, they will send it to the Table, where it is taken charge of by one of the clerks."

I find in May:

"While a member may state the purport and material allegations of a petition, he is not at liberty to read the whole or greater part of the petition himself; but if he desires that the petition shall be read, the proper course is to request it to be formally read by the Clerk at the Table."

Yesterday the hon. member for Middlesex read almost the whole of a petitition he presented, and I thought the hon, member for North Norfolk was about to do the same thing, when I called his attention to the fact, that if he wanted the petition read, it must be sent to the Table, and that he should state the prayer. I might change that to "purport," and he should state the purport briefly; and as the hon, member for West Durham has said, he should state it without reading, and should make himself acquainted with the allegations so as to be able to state the purport briefly to the House, and if the hon. member wants the petition to be read it should be read by the Clerk at the Table. Two days afterwards the petition will come up for the formal reading and receiving, and that perhaps is the correct time to read it. But the practice and usage of Parliament has been that if a member wants to have the House put in possession of the ficts of the petition, he asks to have it read at the time it is presented. In accordance with that practice, if an hon, member wishes the petition read he must send it to the Clerk, asking to have it read, so that the House will be put in possession of the facts and allegations before the two days subsequently when it will be formally read and received.

Mr. EDGAR. I have presented a petition which I want read.

The petition was read accordingly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must be excused for calling your attention to the fact that one portion of the question submitted to you has not yet been decided. You have stated that a member may, after giving the material allegation of the petition, ask that the petition be read. That is one matter by itself. But is it the privilege of a member to have it read without the consent of the House, for, if so, I must say that after 28 years' experience in Parliament, this is the first time it has been done within my experience. What is the result? The result is that the petition will first be read on the mere will of the member, and then it will be read the second time in the usual way, if a member asks it. I must ask you, Mr. Speaker, to be kind enough to state the rule by which a member can have a petition read in this way by his own free will, and then have it read the second time at the Table.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We may have even something worse than the case which has been pointed out by the hon. Minister who has just sat down. If a member has a right to ask the Clerk to read a petition, it might contain allegations which were slanderous, libellous, or dishonorable to the dignity of this House—not merely untruthful, which might be a frequent occurrence in certain petitions presented to the House—and still the petition would be read. Then it would be read the second time, which should not be done without reason. But the result would be still worse, if the petition was objectionable; then we would have the petition read by an officer of the House, and two days afterwards you might say the petition should not be read, and still the petition would have been read by the chief officer of the House.

Mr. EDGAR. You held, Mr. Speaker, when this question was raised by me that it would not be allowable that a member should read anything but the prayer of the petition, and that being the case, it seemed to me that that was the only way in which the substance, the material allegations, of the petition could reach the House. But since you have decided that the petition may be read, I am sure that the good sense and taste of hon. members will prevent them from asking that petitions should be read at this stage, except under extraordinary circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is the right of an hon. member to ask to have the petition read, though, of course, if the House refuses its consent, it cannot be read. Our rule is exactly the same as the English rule. The English rule is:

"That every such petition, not containing matter in breach of the privileges of the House, and which, according to the rules or usual practice of this House, can be received, be brought to the Table, by the direction of the Speaker, who shall not allow any debate, or any member to speak upon or in relation to such petition; but it may be read by the Clerk at the Table if required."

Now, the same words are used in our own rules—"it may be read by the Clerk at the Table if required"—and the practice in the English House of Commons is, if a member wishes it read, to move that it should be read. That is what the practice has been—that the member who brings in the petition may ask that it may be read, but, of course, when there is any opposition to it, he must make a formal motion.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would like to ask a question as to the usual practice in England. Supposing the petition contained matters which are slanderous, or other matters constituting a breach of the privileges of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not to be read in any case.
Mr. CHAPLEAU. But how can you know it?

Mr. SPEAKER. The member who presents it presents it on his own responsibility.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The rule says:

"Every petition not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House, and which according to the rules or practice of this House can be received"—— and so on. But if it ruled that a petition can, as a matter right, be read if required, and if it contains matter which is a breach of our rules, it would be read by the officer of the House without anybody having time to call attention to it, nobody having seen it.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). It is within the recollection of the great majority of hon. members of this House that during this Session a petition was presented to the House, and the member presenting it asked that it might be read and the Clerk read it, and after having read it the Chief Clerk of the House ascertained that it was informal and reported that fact to yourself, and then you decided that the petition could not be received. This illustrates what my hon friend the Secretary of State has said. I quite agree with what he says that it appears to me that a petition should not be read except by the consent of the House first, and the hon. member who presents it and endorses it is made responsible for what is contained. But there is this difficulty, that supposing an hon. member endorses the petition and it is found that it could not be received by the House—that would certainly be a great inconvenience.

Mr. BLAKE. The question becomes complicated by the view you have taken as to the different readings of petitions. I am not prepared to differ from your conclusion upon the English practice, but it seems to me to involve some sources of inconvenience. I do not apprehend the inconvenience which the Secretary of State mentions. I understand that this reading may take place at the request of a member; but, as you have lately stated, if the House objects on a formal motion that it be not read, this involves no reception of the petition by the House, but a reading in order that the House may learn what the allegations of the petition are—not the reading which takes place when a petition is received.

Mr. SPEAKER. With a view to receive.

Mr. BLAKE. A reading in order that yourself and the House may be informed of the substance of the petition, and if it turns out to be one which cannot be received, according to the rules of the House, you would at once say the petition cannot be received and the matter would be ended. Therefore I do not understand that the difficulty is created. But if we consider the question of convenience, it would perhaps be served by a somewhat more liberal interpretation of the rule than even now you appear disposed to fix. I do not know what you mean by the expression purport; but if a member is allowed to state briefly from memory what the material allegations of the petition are, I presume -unless there was some very special case, in which he desired the House to hear the petition—there would be no proposal that the petition should be read by the Clerk. I do not understand that there would be an absolute right that the petition should be read; but if it were objected to, a motion might be made to that effect; but it would be a very inconvenient thing, to have a motion and perhaps a division upon it. The practice, which the hon. Minister of Public Works and myself agree has been pursued so long, is a good practice. According to that practice a member may state briefly the material allegations of the petition; if he wants it read at the Table, he should say, I want this petition read; and I think the House would allow that to be done, unless in the case of a number of petitions of the same character, when I think the House might decline, as to be read. If there was an abuse of the practice, the House would have it in its power to stop that abuse by declining to receive the petitions, and I presume the reading of those petitions approved of by you might take place at length when the short title is read at the Table. It seems to me our practice is a convenient practice; there has never been any difficulty about it until to-day, and I think we had better adhere to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps on the whole this discussion has been a useful one, because it will enable us to settle what the practice has been. The ordinary practice has been what my hon. friend opposite and the hon. Minister of Public Works have said, and it has not caused any inconvenience. The practice has been uniform. I can speak after forty years' parliamentary experience, and the general practice has been for a member merely to state the prayer. Sometimes he states shortly the material allegations; but he cannot read the petition, or get it by heart; but he cannot read the petition, or get it by heart; but he can state shortly the material allegations leading up of necessity to the prayer. He does that on his own responsibility. If he reads anything that is improper, or slanderous, or libellous, or contrary to the privileges of Parliament, the voice of Parliament and your voice, Mr. Speaker, would at once check him. Then, sometimes as the hon member for West Durben truly sometimes, as the hon member for West Durham truly says, a member states the material allegations, and having stated them. I think that statement will convince the House whether or not it is proper under the special circumstances of the case to have the petition read at once. If the House assents it is read; if the House dissents, or any one member, I take it, dissents, it must be postponed. I have known many instances in my experience in which an hon. member has pursued that course. He states that the petition is very important to the interests involved, and requests that it should be received at once to save time; and if the material allegations he makes are of sufficient importance to allow it to be read, it can be received at once without waiting for the two days. That has been the practice, and it might be well to continue it. However, it is well that this question should have been brought up and settled.

Mr. BLAKE. There is only one point on which I differ from the hon, gentleman. I quite agree with him that there have been cases in which petitions have been read and received at once, but that has always been on a motion, and always by the unanimous consent of the House. For example, motions of that kind have been made with respect to important private Bills, and I have never known any hon. member to be prevented by the voice of any member from having such petitions read at once. Of course that reading will not take place if you decide that the petition is one contrary to the privileges of the House. The reading which you have been speaking of is the quasi general right of the member, and is not the act of the House; it is simply the machinery by which the House thinks fit, on the suggestion of a member, to become possessed more fully of the facts of the petition in the special case, and the House is no more committed to the reception of the petition by that act than when the member states the material allegations of the petition in his place.

absolute right that the petition should be read; but if it were objected to, a motion might be made to that effect; but it would be a very inconvenient thing, to have a motion and perhaps a division upon it. The practice, which the hon. Minister of Public Works and myself agree has been pursued so long, is a good practice. According to that practice a member presenting it, or can it be read, as a matter of right, by the Clerk of the House, at the request of a member? I say no. Not only can it not be received, but it cannot be read. In certain cases, the House may have allowed petitions concerning unopposed questions to be read at once by the Clerk, but it was an exception to the rule. It cannot be the case with the petitions now in question. These petitions are presented on subjects which are under discussion, and on which one side of the House differs from the other side. This is the point I raised, and I think it has been well raised. I do not think a member has a right, at his mere request, to exact that the petition should be read by the Clerk of the House at any moment when he presents it. I would be very sorry if it was made the rule of the House that a member might call for the reading of a petition when he presented it, and that, as a matter of right, it should be read by the Clerk.

CAPTURE OF RIEL.

Mr. CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to read a telegram received from General Middleton, confirming the capture of Riel:

"CLARK'S CROSSING, 15th.

"Riel my prisoner.

"FREDERICK MIDDLETON."

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex.) Before the committee rose, at two o'clock this morning, I was addressing myself to the remarks of the hon. member for Dundas on some points with which he had dealt. In doing so, I referred to the fact that the petitions presented to the House against the Bill had had the effect of opening the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite and inducing a discussion of the question by hon, gentlemen opposite to a greater degree than had previously taken place. In this connection I made use of the quotation, "like dumb, driven cattle." Although your ruling, Sir, supported me as to the quotation, I wish to say I had no desire whatever to make it in any sense personal to any hon. gentleman opposite. Its applicability was to the particular circumstance, and I should be very sorry that any hon. gentleman opposite should take it in any other sense than that in which it was intended. There are many things that can be said in debate, under the rules of the House, but which it is not always advisable to say, as there are Bills that can be introduced in this House, the present among that number, which it is not expedient to pass. I make this explanation in justice to myself, personally; I like to see courtesy observed between the two sides of the House, and if I have been the cause in the slightest degree of disturbing that good feeling which I desire should prevail, it is but right that I should make whatever explanation is becoming and necessary to remove any doubt as to my intention. I referred this morning to the Indian franchise, as affecting the Province of Ontario, and practically as affecting the whole country. If, as hon. gentlemen opposite admit, the Ontario Indian franchise recently adopted is one acceptable to this House, we should embody that franchise, as far as it affects the Indians, in the present Bill; if we cannot arrive here at a definite determination as to what the provisions of this clause affecting the Indians should be, let us take up the Ontario franchise and settle the question definitely. I was charged with not admitting that the unenfranchised Indians were allowed a vote under the Mowat Act. At that particular juncture, I was dealing with a particular class of the Indians, with particular tribes of Indians, with those Indians who are located in my own immediate neighborhood, and with whose circumstances I am best acquainted with; I said, with reference to these living on their reserves, the unenfranchised Indians, that they certainly should not have the right to vote; but at the same time I emphasised the proposition that the enfranchised Indian, no matter what his other relations to the State might be, should undoubtedly have the same rights should not have the same right as a white settler. The that the cost of submitting a case to the Superior Court will Indian on the reserve occupies the land in common; it is his only in a remote degree; he cannot dispose of it; he cannot acquire any direct title to it whatever, unless with the sanction of the Indian Department, and on the breaking up of his tribal relations. Still he is an occupant, and as such can claim the right to be placed on the voters' list. That is exceedingly distasteful to those who live in the immediate vicinity of an Indian reserve. The Indians on those reservations pay no taxes to the municipality and assume none of the obligations of citizenship. Is it fair, then, that they should have the right to vote? The hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) stated last night that one good reason why the Indian should vote was that he knew who his friends were. I presume that is the case, and that it is the moving impulse with hon gentlemen in their determination that the Indian, whether enfranchised or unenfranchised, shall have the vote. Originally it was proposed that the Indians of the entire Dominion should have this right, but it is now limited to the older Provinces, because, I suppose, the relations between the Government and Poundmaker and similar chiefs in the North-West have since become strained, and the Superintendent General imagines they have some doubt as to who their friends really are. The hon. member for Dundas candidly admitted that the recent Ontario Franchise Act very largely increased the electorate. In the discussion of the New Brunswick franchise, the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns), urged the adoption of the present Bill for the reason that it would materially broaden their franchise, and when the hon member for Digby (Mr. Vail) made some remarks leading to the same conclusion in regard to his Province, they were received with enthusiasm by hon. gentlemen opposite as an admission that the franchise in Nova Scotia would be extended by this measure. The admission of the hon, member for Dundas that the Ontario Franchise Act is a material extension is for the same cause a reason why that franchise should be adopted and engrafted on this Bill. It has been urged that we have developed obstructive tendencies in this debate. A similar Bill to the present was introduced in the English House of Commons by Mr. Gladstone on the 5th February, 1884; on the 28th February the Prime Minister made his explanations, and the Bill was discussed, according to the custom in the British Parliament, at the first reading; a number of amendments were moved and a long debate took place; that Bill passed through committee only on the 26th June in the same year. Consequently, that measure which did not make such sweeping changes in the electorate as this Bill does, took four months to pass through the House of Commons alone. Does not that offer the strongest justification for the ample discussion that hon, gentlemen on this side are determined to secure for this measure? Now the hon, member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) also dealt last night with the question of the revising barrister, and I suppose on that point, he spoke with some knowledge of the intentions of the Government. We were told that the assessment rolls were to be prima facie evidence. Very well, that is one of the few concessions which have been wrested from the other side of the House since this discussion began.

Mr. BOWELL. You never let us get far enough to make any concession.

Mr. CAMERON. We were assured by the hon. gentleman that the assessment roll, as it comes from the hands of the county judge, is an almost perfect document, and we were assured, also, that there is to be another appeal after publication in the Gazette. Now let us see what value there is in this appeal. (The hon. gentleman read sections 46 and 47 of the Bill.) The appeal is simply on a point of 46 and 47 of the Bill.) as white men, but the Indian who still lives on his reserve law, and it must be to a superior court, and we all know be so great that only a rich man will be able to prosecute an appeal. Now we were told by the hon member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) that the revising barrister was to be of a man of very high character, one whose word would be as good as his bond. But what authority has he for saying that the revising barrister, in all cases, will be a gentleman of the high character that the hon. gentleman so poetically described? Clause 11 states that the revising officer may be a judge or a barrister of five years' standing. But it does not positively provide that he shall be either. It is not absolutely necessary that he should be either. The truth is that the clause is so worded as to leave a loophole so that any man could be appointed revising officer. In section 40 of the Franchise Bill introduced in 1870 it was provided that the Governor in Council shall from time to time appoint a revising barrister or judge, and so on. The adoption of the amendment now before the committee would have the effect of materially broadening the franchise in Ontario. It has been shown that a large number of the wage-earning class will be disfranchised if this Bill passes in its present form. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) in the course of his remarks proceeded on the assumption that this Bill was to prove the coping stone of our confedera-tion system. We have proceeded a good many years without it, and that successfully, and I warn hon. gentlemen of the seriousness and gravity of the situation they are precipitating. I repeat what has been urged before, that unnecessary interference with the franchises of the Provinces, at a time when so many other difficulties lie in the way of the success of the Confederation, is very unjustifiable, especially when such a measure, so far from being called for, is protested against by public meetings and petitions. It is particularly unjustifiable to press such a measure when, under ordinary circumstances, we should be leaving for our homes, and when, even without this measure, other business which imperatively demands our attention would occupy our time a month, or possibly six weeks or two months, from the present day. Now, did the hon, gentleman assume this to be the last measure of Confederation, because he felt that our federal system was likely, as a result of this legislation, to travel back to the condition of things which existed in the old family compact days? Whether that was his intention or not, the details which have already developed with reference to the purpose of this measure clearly show what the intention is, and what powers are intended to be given by it to the Ministry of the day and their officers. The fact that the franchise will be considerably contracted, so far as Ontario and some other Provinces are concerned, and that many who possess votes for the Local Legislature will not have the franchise to this House, must produce a great deal of irritation, especially when the franchises in Ontario and others of the Provinces have been gradually travelling in the direction of manhood suffrage. The argument as to the rights of this Parliament to pass such a Bill was referred to again last night, but I do not think there has been any contention against that argument on this side of the House, because that principle has been conceded by the legislation of 1874. The fact that hon. gentlemen still bring up this argument would seem to show either that they consider it the best reply that they can make to the position taken on this side, or that they have realised that it is not the question under consideration at all. But if we have only reached that point, after three weeks discussion, how can we expect the full discussion which the First Minister considered necessary when he said that an entire Session ought to be devoted to a Bill of the kind. It was urged that the variety of franchises in the different Provinces was a reason why the present state of affairs should not continue, on the ground that it would create confusion in the minds of the electors. I would Mr. CAMERON (Mildlesex).

like to know what confusion would be created in the mind of an elector of Ontario, by his knowledge that the franchise in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia was different from his own? What difference does it make to the elector in the Province of New Brunswick to know that there is a wage-earner's franchise in the Province of Ontario? far from this producing confusion the great danger of confusion will be from the existence of two different franchises in the same Province, which is going to be a source of great trouble, annoyance, and irritation, and result in a great many mistakes. How can a man who works from seven o'clock in the morning till six at night, or later, understand the complications of this franchise, when after all the discussion we have had in this House we have not reached unanimity as to the full effect of its provisions. From the point of view of the voter there is a decided objection to the adoption of a uniform franchise for the Dominion, because it will lead to a great deal of confusion in the minds of the electors. Another reason given for the adoption of this franchise was that it recognised the principle of property. In the Province of Ontario the principle of property is still adhered to, and that argument does not apply there. But whether it applies or not, I hold that we departed from the principle of real property when we gave an income franchise. I think the principle on which we ought to proceed is that which will give every intelligent man who contributes to the revenue of the Dominion, the right to a voice in its affairs. It must be recognised by this time that a very large fraction of the electors in the Province of Ontario who have the franchise under the Provincial Act, will be disfranchised by this Act. It was shown the other night that there are over 2,000 teachers in that Province whose average salary does not reach the minimum of \$400, which under this Act secures the right to vote. I stood up in defence of the rights of that class of the community when another clause of this Bill was under discussion. The Ontario Act, in giving that class the right to vote, has recognised the claims of one of the most intelligent classes in the community; and, if only on account of that particular class, I would enter mv strong protest against this Bill and support the amendment now before the Chair. Among wage-earners there are many farmers' sons, who are often employed away from home for four or five months in the winter, and return home when the farm work begins in the spring. They are disfranchised under the farmers' sons clause for two reasons -because they are away from home over four months in the year, and because the holding of the parent may not be a freehold, and may not be of the value to entitle them These very men who are thus disfranchised to vote. are the men who will have the destiny of this country in their hands in a few years, and we should not fail to educate them in their political duties as early in their career as possible, by bringing within the influences that the exercise of the franchise exerts. Now, we must not lose sight of the fact that we have already a Dominion franchise; we have passed an Act and existed under it for ten years or more, which says that the provincial franchises for the time being shall be the Dominion franchise. Now is the first time we have heard any objection taken to that system, or that there is a single in dividual in the community who takes exception to it. system ample provision is made for the protection of the minority in every constituency in the preparation of the voters' lists. I ask if the protection at present enjoyed by the voter is not greater than what is provided in this Bill. In the Province of Ontario, as has already been pointed out, the assessment roll, prepared under the direction of the municipal council, is made the basis of the voters' list. In this clause under discussion, property of various kinds is made the basis of the franchise. The assessment roll affords facilities by which the actual value of that property can be more readily ascertained than it can possibly be by the machinery provided in this Bill. The municipal council which is elected by the ratepayers of the municipality, is bound to do justice by them, and the council appoints an assessor who is sworn to assess the property within a particular fraction of its value, with the view to the collection of rates upon it. Every individual in the municipality, whose name appears on the assessment roll, has a direct interest in seeing, not only that he is properly assessed, but that his neighbor is properly assessed as well. If a ratepayer finds that he has been assessed too low or too high, he has the right to appeal to the county judge, who hears the evidence in a sum-ary way and determines on the evidence the value of the property. All these precautions are a direct incentive to the officers who are charged with the duty of preparing the assessment roll and the voters' lists, to do their duty properly. There is no such restraining influence provided in this Bill in the case of the revising officer, for the whole arrangement of the voters' lists is under his control, and he may give the vote to or take it from whom he likes independent of any control. another feature of the Ontario law wor  $\mathbf{worth}$ tioning, and that is if a man is unjustly left off the list the municipality has to pay the cost of the appeal, since the fault was theirs; but under this Bill the appeal on a question of law is to be taken by an individual, and no matter whether successful or not, he has to pay the costs. Under clause 55, the revising officer has the right to strike off the names, of his own motion, of persons who have died or become disqualified. You can understand how wide a latitude this will give him.

Mr. SPROULE. You think he will not respect his oath?

Mr. CAMERON. The best security is not the promise of the individual, but his bond. Do you throw doubt on a man's word when you take his note? Or when you go to a notary and get the obligations between him and you set in writing? Human nature is frail, and a man is apt to consider his duties in the direction of his interest.

Mr. SPROULE. The judges are in the same position.

Mr. CAMERON They have nothing to do with the Government. True they are appointed by the Government, but not for a special purpose in which the Government is directly interested, as in the control of the electoral lists. If the oath implies as much as hon. gentlemen opposite say, why is it that the revising barrister in England is appointed by the judges instead of by the dovernment, and from year to year instead of during good behaviour.
The purpose is distinctly stated in a work which I have beside me, which says that the Legislature and the Goernment recognise the imperative necessity for keeping the electoral lists out of the hands of the Government of the day. It has been urged that, although the revising barristers in England were appointed by the judges, the judges themselves were politicians before their appointment. That applies less in England than it does here, for many of the judges there have not been politicians, and have not occupied seats in either Houses of Parliament before their appointment. The Bill of 1870, introduced into this House, provided for the appointment of a board of registration which was to make the preliminary voters' lists, and those were to be practically the lists for all time, subject to revision by the county judge, or, in the case of Nova Scotia, by a revising barrister. At that time there were no county judges in Nova Scotia, and there was therefore some reason for that provision, but now there are county judges there, and the same ground does not exist. Under that Bill the judge or the revising barrister was to go on circuit, and hold open House of Commons occupied four months in discussing a court for the decision of appeals in regard to the voters' list. similar Bill. The hon. member for Lincoln the other night

Why has it been found necessery to make such a material change in the provisions of this Act? It will be practically impossible for the county court judges to discharge the duties that are imposed upon them under this Bill. Their other duties will practically preclude their performing this duty. It has been generally claimed in this discussion that it will cost at least $400,000 a year to run the machinery of this Bill, and the statement has not been successfully refuted. Now, the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Hackett), very recently, in discussing the questions of registration and the appointment of revising barristers, stated that the Province of Prince Edward Island adopted that system some years ago, but had abandoned it on account of the expense. He stated that it cost $12,000 a year, in the six constituencies of his Province. Now, I understood from the hon, gentleman that the machinery was much like the machinery that is provided by this Bill, and if it cost $12,000 a year in the six constituencies of his Province, we may fairly assume that for the 211 constituencies of the Dominion, this Bill will cost $422,000 a year to pay the expenses of its operation. In addition to that there are a number of incidental expenses that will crop up, such as the pre-paration of the voters' lists, the transmitting of the voters' lists, travelling expenses, and such like, which will run the expense up to within a very small fraction of the largest sum which has been mentioned on this side of the House as the probable expense to the country of the adoption of this system. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the arguments of the hon. member for West Toronto, in the direction of a legislative union, as opposed to the federal principle in our constitution, are arguments that cannot be accepted by this House. When he defended the real property qualification clause, he defended a proposition that was entirely abandoned by a colleague of his own in the Ontario Legislature. It will be recollected that in the Ontario Legislature, when the present provincial franchise was under discussion, the Conservative minority voted in favor of manhood suffrage pure and simple; and in the discussion that took place, Mr. Clarke, who is a colleague of the hon. gentleman as representing West Toronto in the Local Legislature, stated that he was not afraid to build on the rock of manhood suffrage. That hon, members in the Local House said he was not afraid of passing a measure in favor of manhood suffrage; that at one time he believed a property qualification, meant something, but now it meant nothing. Undoubtedly this franchise measure should have been submitted to the people. If that principle is not maintained it is quite possible that the most radical changes may be introduced and carried by Parliament. It is true we have two Chambers and the Crown, which possesses a veto power over all Acts, but that veto has not been exercised for many years. In the mother country it has not been exercised since 1707, when Queen Anne vetoed the Scotland Militia Bill. The principle for which I am contending is recognised in the mother country, and all proposed constitutional changes are submitted to the electors before an attempt is made to pass them into law. The whole tendency of constitutional changes has been in the direction of contracting the power of the Crown and more fully recognising the rights of the people to control the actions of Parliament.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order. The hon. gentleman must keep to the question

Mr. CAMERON. I was following in the line of the hon. member for Bothwell; but I will attempt to confine myself more closely to the question. I shall deal for a moment with the protest which has been made from the other side against what has been termed the protracted discussion on this question. Now, Sir, the English protested against the expense to the country of this protracted Session, but he was quite willing to incur the additional expense—not yearly but for all time—which would be involved in the passage of this Bill. He protested in the strongest language, and with a vehemence that almost indicated a personal interest in the matter, against the expense which the country was being put to by this discussion. Now, Sir, what is that expense? The indemnity of members, or the expense of the officers of this House, or the running of any of the Departments of the House, do not depend on the length of the Session. It is true the gas bill and the paper bill for the printing of Hansard may be larger, but these items will appear very small against the expense which will be assumed by the passage of this Bill. If there is a reason to appeal to the community as against the course of the Opposition, in increasing the gas bill and the printing bill of Hansard, how much stronger reason have we for appealing to the country against a permanent charge on the country of $400,000 a year?

Mr. SPROULE. You forget the expense to members by the loss of time.

Mr. CAMERON. I quite recognise that every hon. member, without exception, sacrifices a good deal by remaining here, but I can only hope that that sacrifice will be recognised in our personal relations with our constituents. At the same time we come here to discharge our duties fairly and justly, and I recognise that the matter of time is not to be an element in the discharge of those duties.

Mr. BOWELL. Time is not the essence of this contract.

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon. gentleman appeals to us on the question of the time devoted to this discussion, I say to him that if he will appeal to his own leaders, and insist on their submitting measures in good time—measures which members on this side will insist on discussing, whether they are submitted on the first, or the sixtieth, or the ninetieth day of the Session—I say if those measures are brought in in good time, and the early part of the Session is not wasted, as it was this year and last, we will be quite prepared to facilitate the business of the House, as we are always disposed to do. A thorough understanding of that principle will make it unnecessary for the hon. member for Grey in future to make the remark to which I have alluded.

Mr. SPROULE. If it takes one month to discuss the first clause of this Bill, how long will it take Parliament to discuss forty Bills?

Mr. BOWELL. That is too hard a problem; give him something easier.

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon, gentleman shows the same lack of acquaintance with the other clauses of the Bill that he displayed with reference to the clauses we have just discussed, I say we are justified in remiaing here a much longer time than there is any probability of remaining. The hon, gentleman disputed my proposition that anybody but a judge or a barrister of five years standing could be appointed revising officer under this clause, but I think I have proved that any man is eligible under the clause which I quoted.

Mr. SPROULE. You stated it, but you did not prove it.

Mr. CAMERON. I think I proved it to the satisfaction of other members in the House, but I despair of proving it to the hon. gentleman. I do not believe there is another hon. gentleman on either sides who has any doubt on the subject.

Mr. SPROULE. We have no doubt about it, because we believe that what you say cannot be done.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the hon. gentleman only the hands of the Government. That being the case, I hold speaks for himself, and not for those who are in accord that the provincial franchises should be adhered to, and if Mr. Cameron (Middlesex).

with him in political matters. It has been urged that we should make efforts to become a homogeneous people, and it is claimed that this Bill will tend to promote that desirable aim, and that as different Provinces we are to move forward in the march of progress as one consolidated whole. I like to see these fancy pictures drawn, but we must come down to every day practical affairs; we must discuss the question whether the clause under discussion is preferable to that proposed in the amendment. The remarks of many hon. gentlemen who usually ally themselves with hon, gentlemen opposite clearly indicate that our homogeneous existence is not going to be furthered by the passing of this clause. When this Bill comes to be put into operation, I believe the result will be the very reverse; I believe that such an amount of dissatisfaction will exist in the different Provinces, as will very materially affect our homogeneous existence in the future. I should like to see the country progress in the direction hon. gentlemen indicate when they use that word. As one of those who welcomed the Confederation of the Provinces as an assurance that we were to grow up as a nationality with British instincts and with a love for monarchical institutions on the American continent, I should like to see that homogeneous existence brought about; but when I see the disposition of hon. gentlemen opposite to trample on the rights of the different Provinces, I am led to despair of the success of that homogeneous existence which I had fondly hoped to see attained. In more than one of the Provinces, this Bill, when put into practical operation, will be assumed as another attempt to deprive those Provinces of their rights. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if those disputes which have taken place between the Provincial and the Dominion Government were not invariably the result of legislation at the instigation of the dominant party in the Dominion against the interests of the Provinces. There was no justification for challenging the right of the Provinces to pass a License Act. It was a gratuitous interference with the rights of the different Provinces, like many other acts of the hon. First Minister; and instead of a feeling of confidence in this Legislature growing in the different Provinces, it is lessening as the result of the policy that has been pursued for many years past.

Mr. HICKEY. That is your opinion only.

How is it that not in Ontario only, but in the Province of Quebec, the question of provincial rights is a burning question. Now, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) the other day exhibited a petition from the municipal council of the constituency he represents, favoring the appointment of a particular individual as revising barrister under this Act. He was kind enough to inform us that it was signed by a great many of his political opponents, and that it was in favor of a gentle-man who was also an active worker against him. Now, I ask if in these facts there does not lie a very serious reason against adopting the principle proposed to be embodied in this Bill. That hon, gentleman without perceiving it, gave away his case when he said the gentleman in whose interest he presented the petition is politically opposed to him. What is the result? Let us assume that the gentleman in whose interest the petition was signed, is appointed. Will the hon. gentleman say he has strength and courage enough to favor the appointment of a man politically opposed to him unless he feels that he will derive some personal advantage from it? If there is to be any advantage resulting from the appointment of a political opponent, is not that which we contend as being a vicious and vexatious principle of this Bill admitted by that very fact? I hold that it is. The petition which the hon. gentleman has read indicates clearly that the purpose of this Bill decidedly is to put the electoral franchise practically into the hands of the Government. That being the case, I hold

I must confine myself more particulary to the clause under discussion I will say that so far as the Province of Ontario is concerned her franchise should be adhered to. The majority of the people of Ontario have determined that it is the one they prefer. It was submitted to them at the elections of 1883, and the Government will be doing a grievous wrong to the people of Ontario, if they do not embody this amendment in the Bill. I desire for a moment to refer to the election law of 1874, by which the franchises of the different Provinces were adopted by the Dominion as the Dominion franchise. When that law was under discussion, hon. gentlemen on both sides gave their general adhesion to the principle then being recognised. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recollect that, owing to the want of any registration facilities in the Province of Prince Edward Island, the Government then proposed to make a change with regard to that Province which involved the acceptance of the franchise which there existed for the election of legislative councillors instead of manhood suffrage. Gentlemen opposite, who were then in Opposition, stood up manfully in favor of the larger franchise as against the more restricted one, although gentlemen on this side urged that it was but a temporary expedient that would be abandoned when Prince Edward Island provided machinery by which every vote, under manhood suffrage, would be registered. That being the case, hon. gentlemen opposite are bound by their record to support the position taken by the Opposition in favor of the provincial franchise. I find on reference to the debates of 1874, that the Hon. J. H. Cameron, then member for Cardwell supported the Bill, that the hon. member for North Huron, who was then a member of this House as he is to-day, is reported to have approved of the Bill generally. We ought to adopt the franchise of the Province of Ontario as the Dominion franchise for that Province. The hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) claimed that the franchise now proposed was more liberal than that adopted in the Provincial Legislature. The hon, member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) made an admission to the contrary. They can be left to settle that between themselves, but I believe the hon, member for Dundas has made the more correct statement of the two. The hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) took exception to the provision in the Ontario Act which deprives an elector of more than one vote, but I hold that that is the correct system. It is known that not more than 50 per cent, of the names on the list are usually recorded now, and that is largely caused by the repetition of names on the electoral roll. If persons are entitled to more than one vote because they have property in different municipalities, they should have votes proportioned to the amount of property they own. The Ontario Act in that respect has made the franchise more symmetrical than this Bill proposes to do. In England it has been estimated that the repeating franchise was equal to  $10\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the entire electorate, and I do not think it is less in Ontario, taking the cities and the rural districts together. The Ofitario Act has given votes to the wage-earner, the land-holder's son, and the man with an income of \$250 a year, who previously had not votes as such. I therefore say that the Ontario Act makes the foundation of our country broader and deeper, and appeals to justice and right in the same manner and from the same motive as the Prime Minister in England appealed to the Parliament of that country, in relation to his recent Franchise Bill. Reverting again to the Indian clause, I wish to remark that the operation of the ballot system among the Indians will be little better than a farce. If secrecy is an essential to the principle of the ballot, what secrecy is secured in the case of the Indian vote? If it is impossible to operate the ballot successfully in any country where intelligence does not prevail, I ask you what prospect is there of secrecy being maintained, and the principle of the ballot successfully recognised, when the Indian will not be capable even of marking his own ballot? I say we are departing from one of the principles which underlies the ballot system. I repeat what has been said in this House more than once, that we, on this side, are quite willing to give the Indian the franchise if the Government will impose upon him the same responsibilities which are exacted of the white voter. I desire to read an article from the Toronto News. Its position has been defined so recently that it is not necessary for me to indicate what its relations are to either of the political parties in this country. But that journal, with others, has discussed the Franchise Bill, and its article on Monday last I will read. (The hon. gentleman read the article in question.) Such is the opinion of one independent journalist in this country, a journalist who I think has proved his independence by the fact that both parties in this House—and perfectly justly—disowned any connection with him, or any responsibility for his views. Now, Sir, if all these expressions of opinion, if all the correspondence which members on this side are receiving indicate the unpopularity and offensiveness, and the general discredit with which this Bill is received, we ought to refrain from going further than the adoption of the amendment now before you. I say that the Bill is objectionable for every reason which has been urged against it. It is objectionable from every point of fair play, and I say that hon. gentlemen who are so fond of referring to British institutions as the moving impulse in everything they do, cannot, in the whole history of British institutions, within the last century, find any measure which has so many scandalous provisions involved in it, as the one now under discussion. I say that their reverence for British institutions must be of a much less marked character than their pretentions, if they will persist in defending this Bill with so many offensive one-sided and objectionable features. The general sive, one-sided and objectionable features. The general character of this Bill is foreign to that principle of fair play which is a characteristic of the Canadian people, as well as of those from whose loins we have sprung, and I can say of this as could with equal for ce be said of another Bill which was a matter of comparative recent legislation in this House, the Gerrymander Act:

"You may alter and change this Bill as you will, The taint of the Tory will hang 'round it still."

It is far better that hon, gentleman should withdraw a Bill which has met with so determined opposition in the country, and if they are bound to have a Franchise Bill for the Dominion, let them make one which will have some elements of fairness about it. I appeal to hon, gentlemen opposite, on the ground of patriotism, to refrain from placing a measure on the Statute Book which will be referred to with odium by the generations which will succeed us. Our position here, as custodians of the popular will, as those who have been trusted by our constituents with the most sacred political rights which can be entrusted to men, should consider the position very carefully before we make such a marked alteration as is proposed here. We should hesitate, if we wish to secure that endorsement of our conduct that was secured by an American statesman who died not long ago, in these lines:

"His statecraft was the golden rule,
His right of vote a sacred trust,
Clear over threat and ridicule,
All heard his challenge, 'is it just?',"

That is our position to-day. We ask in the name of the people of Ontario and of the Dominion whom we represent here. Is this just? We do not ask it as between party and party. We say let party sink, let it be evanescent as an hour, but let our country still exist. A Bill such as this, that practically places in the hands of one man the representation of each constituency of this Dominion, is the most severe stab at popular institutions that has been attempted in this country, or in any country, within the last one hundred years. I say, Sir, that the only hope of a community under such circumstances is the uprising of the popular will. The only hope under these circumstances is the rising wave of indignation which is gathering strength, and I pray hon gentlemen opposite, for the consideration that ought to be shown to popular institutions, not to ignore that wave of popular opinion as persistently as they have hitherto done. We have, Sir, in the history of our mother country in the past, examples of the dangers which are produced by misgovernment and mislegislation: we have in its history the evidences of the evil results which follow, because it invariably happens that when the populace has to resent unjust legislation, whether it came as in the past from the Crown, or as at present from the Crown representatives, they have invariably gone further than was just, right or judicious. I say that the danger which threatens us from that very circumstance is the reason why I appeal, with all the warmth of which I am capable, against passing a Bill which has not only the objection that public opinion does not demand it, but the objection that, wherever public opinion has been expressed, it has been expressed most determinedly in opposition to it. These are the reasons why I prefer in the first place that this Bill should not, in its entirety, be passed; these are the reasons why, in the event of that course not being adopted, I favor the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to leave the Provincial franchises as they are; these are the reasons which, if that amendment should not prevail, induce me to support the proposition which leaves to the Province of Ontario the franchise it now possesses. But if the amendment should not prevail, I hope that the promised amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) will receive recognition. I will be glad if better counsels should prevail among hon, gentlemen opposite. I should be prepared to see their existence as the dominant political party for a great many years under any circumstances rather than see this Bill passed, even if it should ring their death knell. We should be capable of placing the country before party. Feeling strongly as I do, I have the hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will stay their hands before they insist on the passage of this measure in its present objectionable shape.

Mr. WILSON. Judging by the treatment which has been given to the amendments which have been already introduced in favor of the exemption of some of the Provinces from the operation of this Act, I am inclined to think that very likely the Province of Ontario will share the same fate. However, I feel that it is my duty, as it is my pleasure, to use this opportunity of expressing my strong opinion that the provincial franchise, which has worked so well and given such general satisfaction in the Province of Ontario for a number of years, should be allowed to remain, and that the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) ought to prevail. I have had an opportunity of watching the working of that franchise for a number of years, and I tell the Government that if they would consult the electors, the municipalities, and those whose duty it is to look after the preparation of the lists, they would agree with me that it would be in the interest of the Province of Ontario to be allowed to continue to use the lists that we have been using for the last sixteen or eighteen years. During the last few days we have had some expression of the wishes of the people, by means of the numerous petitions which have been presented to this House, and the Government who are here for the purpose of carrying out the will of those who elected them ought to consider their wishes as expressed in those petitions. If they treat them with indifference the electorate will, of course, have an with indifference the electorate will, of course, have an always the advanced party in favor of the extension of the opportunity of saying to them whether they should longer franchise, yet, among those who voted against that Bill was Mr. CAMEBON (Middlesex).

remain in the position they now occupy. On a previous occasion I asked hon, gentlemen opposite to show wherein any necessity existed for pressing upon the country this measure at the present time. I called on them to point out a single reason why, after a four months' session, we should be compelled to stay here, day in and day out, discussing a measure of this description, when no necessity has been shown for it. I received on that occasion no reply. True, we have been told—and we have not pretended to deny it—that the Dominion has the power to pass a Franchise Act. The Dominion may possess that right and power; it possesses many rights and powers which it has not hereto-fore exercised. Why is it necessary that it should exercise this right when heretofore it has not exercised any such right or authority? There must be some reason why the Government is pressing this right at present. Where is the necessity for pressing it? We cannot find it from the arguments of those who have spoken on the other side. I have not heard a single hon, gentleman opposite, who spoke in this debate, point out clearly any wrong, hardship or injustice existing through the use of the provincial franchises. What necessity, therefore, is there to introduce this measure, for which no demand has been made? There must be some hidden reason; there must be something behind all this. Will the Government explain what that something is? Hon. gentlemen opposite may be in the secret, but we are not. Probably the Government feel that on account of the course they have taken, and of the acts they have done, it would not be safe for them to appeal to the country on the same franchise as before. They appealed to the country before and their course was endorsed. Are they afraid now? If their measures are, as they say, all good, if they are administering our affairs for the benefit of the commonwealth, why should they be afraid to appeal to the same jury as before? True, they did not appeal before to the same jury as on the previous occasion; true, they arranged it a little, and now it may be that they deem it necessary to so arrange the franchise that they may be able to come back to this House, not with the free expression of the people, but with the dwarfed expression of the people, an expression carefully prepared by themselves. We hear hon, gentlemen opposite say that the Reform party has never been in favor of the extension of the franchise. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) said it was only when driven by the Conservative party that the Reform party extended the franchise. I propose to show how unfair is that statement. The hon. gentleman is always ready to make an assertion, but he is not always competent to prove its correctness. I believe I can prove that the Reform party have always been in favor of all the advancement and all the reform this country now happily is enjoying. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) was very liberal with quotations, and he always contrived to read them so as to make them appear to the best advantage on his side; some would say they were more or less garbled and did not convey fully the whole truth. In referring to the income franchise, he contended that he was the first to introduce a measure of that description in the Local Legislature, and that the Government of the day took his measure up. I wish to examine into the truthfulness or untruthfulness of that assertion. That measure was introduced in the Local Legislature by the Hon. Mr. McKellar, and more than a month after that time the hon. member for Lincoln introduced his Bill, which never received a second reading. The hon, member claimed that he was the first to introduce a measure in relation to the income franchise. That was not correct, for early in the year 1869 Mr. Boyd introduced a Franchise Bill, and the hon, member for Lincoln was among those who voted against it. He has stated that the Conservative party are

Mr. M. C. Cameron—I mean the member, who was then in the Local Legislature and is now Judge Cameron. not my hon, friend from Huron, because, if he had been there, he would have voted on the other side. I find also, that the present Postmaster General voted for the six months' hoist of that measure, and he had a brother in the Legislature who, true to the instructs of Toryism, true to the desire of opposing the rights of those who had to earn a living by their daily work, also voted against that Franchise Bill. On the other hand, all of the Reformers are recorded on the other side.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), in addressing this House the other day, claimed that the Reform party had never advocated an extension of the franchise, unless they were driven into the last ditch by the Conservative party. I will read what the hon. gentle man said on that occasion, as I find it in Hansard, of the 11th May. (The hon. gentleman read an extract from Mr. Rykert's speech). Well, I have gone through the record of the Conservative party, and I cannot find a single instance where they were the advocates of that principle; but, on the contrary, that they withheld it, as far as they could. The hon. gentleman says that in 1868 he introduced a Franchise Bill into the Local Legislature; and, that again, in 1874, he introduced a Bill, giving the franchise to men enjoying an income, which Bill was taken up and passed by the Government. Well, Sir, I find by the Journals of the Legislative Assembly, 1868-69, that an Act respecting the election of members of the Legislative Assembly, by the Attorney General, Sandfield Macdonald, on the 9th of November, 1868. It went on, and on the 8th of December the Bill was brought up for its third reading, and a division took place. You will remember that he stated that when Mr. Coyne, the member for Peel, introduced a measure granting the franchise to females, the leader of the Opposition had not the courage to remain in his seat and record his vote, pro or con. We will see what this courageous hon. member did on the occasion of the third reading of the Bill. (The hon. member read from the Journals of the Ontario Assembly). We find a vote took place, and every member of the Reform party voted in favor of that income franchise, and we find that all the Conservative members who voted at all voted against the income franchise on that occasion. True, I do not see the name of my hon friend from Lincoln. He found it convenient not to record his vote, yet he stated that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, had not the courage of his convictions in reference to female franchise; while the hon. member for Lincoln, on that occasion, either had not the courage of his convictions or else left, so as not to be compelled to record his vote. The hon gentleman stated the other night that in 1874 he introduced a measstated the other night that in 1874 he introduced a meas-ure in the Provincial Legislature in the direction of granting Bill, by not making a provision of that kind, will deprive franchise on income. Well, we find in the Journals of the Legislative Assembly, 1874, that on the 4th February Bill (No. 17), an Act to extend the Electoral Franchise, was introduced by the hon. Mr. McKellar, and on the 6th of the 18th of March we find that Bill (No. 136), entitled An Act to amend the Franchise, was introduced. On the third reading of Mr. McKellar's Bill Mr. Rykert moved an amendment that the Bill be recommitted, with instructions to the committee to amend the first section by adding a provision that no person assessed for income should be entitled to vote at a parliamentary election unless he had paid all taxes imposed friend of the workingman, why should he hesion him on account of such income. Yet the hon, member tate to incorporate such a provision in his Bill? for Lincoln has posed here as the champion of the income | Does he feel that he has no confidence in them, as he has franchise, and as having been in favor of relieving those who were assessed for income from being disqualified to vote if their income tax had not been paid. I will read to the House what the hon, gentleman said.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question.

Mr. WILSON. I bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman, and I will not quote the full language of the hon. member; but I will simply state that the hon. member was opposed to an extension of the franchise. I find that that hon, gentleman and some other members of this House have stated that there is danger in leaving the franchise in the hands of the Local Legislatures, lest they might abuse the trust. In the same number of Hansard this hon, gentleman went so far as to say: (The hon, member here quoted from the official Debates). I would ask that hon, gentleman if he can put his finger upon a single instance in which the Province of Ontario has usurped any of the rights, privileges or prerogatives of this House. I say that the Province of Ontario has never attempted to encroach upon the rights and prerogatives of this Parliament, and while I would hold sacred the rights and privileges of the Local Legislature, I would be equally willing to defend the rights of this Parliament. The hon. member for West York took objection to that provision of the local Act which prevents a non-resi-My opinion is, that as we are extenddent from voting. ing the franchise as far as we can in the direction of manhood suffrage, the measure brought in by the Local Legislature is a just one. I do not think that a man who has $10,000 worth of property in a number of different ridings should have a greater amount of influence in the legislation of the country than the man who has $50,000 worth of property in one county. I believe the true principle is one vote for one man, under all circumstances, and that the small property which is owned by a poor man is just as valuable to him and just as sacred as the large amount of property owned by the rich man, and I say that the principle adopted by the Local Legislature is the true and correct principle. Some hon, gentlemen have said that if the Bill is so unpopular as we on this side assert, why not let the Bill pass, and go to the country, if our desire is to defeat hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, that is a sordid motive upon which to act. It is not the principle which ought to influence the wishes and feelings of any hon. gentleman in this House. We are not here merely to try and oust hon. gentlemen opposite, or to get ourselves in power. We have a higher duty to perform. We are here to try to purge our legislation of evil and wrong-doing, and it is our bounden duty to do so, whether it facilitates our coming into office or our remaining where we are. It is our bounden duty to oppose wrong wherever we find it, and we have no difficulty in finding much of it in this House. If we compare the relative merits of the Ontario franchise and the one which is proposed in this Bill, we find that the Ontario franchise is much more liberal and deals out far greater justice to the people than this measure does. Take. 100,000 or more people of that class of a voice in the govern ment of the country, and I ask, as we have been advocating an extension of the franchise, as we have all felt that property, as the basis of representation, should no longer exist to as great an extent as heretofore, as we have recognised the principle of the income franchise, is it not unreasonable to favor a Bill which will disfranchise all those honest and industrious laborers. Can the First Minister any longer appeal to the country and say that he is the friend of the workingman. If the hon, gentleman is a heretofore felt he had no confidence in others? If he has confidence in them he should show his liberality and carry out his intention by amending the Bill so as to extend the franchise to the honest and industrious laborer, who is just as much entitled to it as a man who occupies a house rented at a very small sum? Many of these laborers, receiving perhaps only $200 or $250 and their board, can give a more intelligent vote at the polls than householders who pay $2 a month rent. Some hon gentlemen opposite have said that the assessors are prone to undervalue property. My experience has been quite the contrary. Any man who is appointed to that position and who takes an oath to faithfully fulfil the duties imposed on him is not very likely to assess property far below its real value. But hon, gentlemen opposite have given that as one reason why we should have the revising barrister, because, as the hon. member for Lincoln said, if the property were assessed too low, the revising barrister, as its valuation would not be used for assessment purposes or for the collection of taxes, would place it at a higher figure. That is giving us some of the motives of this Bill. The revising barrister is going to be a very convenient person. In cities, where the qualification is $300, one man, whose property is assessed up to $300, will have the right to vote, but another man, who may perhaps be obnoxious to the revising barrister, or be opposed to the Government of the day, may find his property undervalued, and he will be turned away. Whatever the faults of the assessors may be, it is a dangerous and vicious principle to place a man in a position to enfranchise one and disfranchise another, merely for the purpose of pleasing the Government of the day. I believe that part of the Bill should not for a moment receive the consideration of this House. I can hardly understand some hon. gentlemen opposite speaking about Ontario having set itself against the Dominion. I do not know what that had to do with the question, but I find it recorded here in Hansard. Now, it comes with ill-grace, I must say, from hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, to speak in that way, unless they have a desire to humiliate the First He has no doubt too vivid a recollec-Minister. tion of his struggles with the Province of Ontario, and the result of those struggles; and I imagine that it is not very cheering consolation to him to have any of his followers in this House probe those old sores. I think an order ought to be issued in caucus that no reference ought to be made to the Province of Ontario setting itself against the Dominion Government. All that the Province of Ontario has done has been to contend for its just rights, and I think that not only the Province of Ontario, but every Province in the Dominion, ought to contend, inch by inch, for its just rights, and not allow this Government to encroach upon the rights and prerogatives of its Legislature; because, if this encroachment continues in the future as it has been in the past, we shall find some of these Provinces clamoring for separation from this Confederation, and that, I Therefore, I think, we all ought seriously to deplore. hope that in the future we shall hear nothing more in reference to the Province of Ontario taking any course hostle to the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, if this measure be all that the Government declares it to be, if it is a just measure, and one desired by the people at the present time, if it is intended to remove abuses which have existed for a number of years, as hon. gentlemen opposite assert abuses have existed, I will ask you to point out any of the newspaper organs of hon. gentlemen opposite in which you can find a true and tull account of the various provisions of this Bill and the meaning of them. If it was such a good Bill, and one likely to meet with the approval of the people, would the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite hesitate for a moment to print the Bill, so that every elector taking any of these papers might have an opportunity of seeing he is going to take to himself the right to say that every the Bill just as it is, and knowing its full effect? man must pay his rent or else must be debarred from giv-

But what do we find? When they refer to the. Indian enfranchisement do they tell the whole truth? I hold that any newspaper which deliberately, by any means, misleads the public, is equally guilty as if it had told a deliberate falsehood; and therefore I say that if the measure be what hon, gentlemen opposite say it is and what their press pretends it is, they should have no hesitation in giving it publication, so that every one may have an opportunity of ascertaing what the clauses of the Bill are. you point out to me, Sir, any newspaper that supports hon. gentlemen opposite which has printed in full the clause relating to the revising barristers? Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is similar to the English Act, but they know very well that the clause providing for revising barristers in this Bill is a very different thing from the revising barrister provision in the English Act. What object can hon. members have in making such comparisons, unless it be for the purpose of trying to mislead the public? What are those revising barristers to do, under this Bill? They are to prepare the rolls, and they are clothed for this purpose with almost unlimited power. What can be thought of any Government that will take to themselves, through their officials, as these revising barristers will be, the power of selecting the men who will have the right to vote and of striking off those who, they think, should not have that right, and thus control the elections to suit themselves. I say this is an unheard of Act. The Premier, the other day, said that constitutional government was on its trial. I think he is going to give it a severe trial; if he persists in forcing this Bill through in its present condition he will strike a blow at the constitution, the result of which no one can foresee. We know full well the object of this measure. Its object is plainly evident on the face of it, and that is that the Government may be enabled so to prepare the rolls as to ensure, as closely as it can be ensured by such merns, their return to power. They evidently fear that unless they do something of this kind their return to office is extremely problematical. To pretend that a measure which wrests the control of the elections from the people and places it in the hands of irresponsible revising barristers is a just measure is an absurdity. No one can fully appreciate what is just, right and fair, who can advocate carrying such a principle into effect, and then claim that in so doing they are acting as responsible advisors of the Crown. I could hardly believe that such a thing would be advocated by anybody had I not seen the Bill. As the right hon gentleman, the First Minister, poises as the friend of the poor man, I would like to draw his attention to one section of this third clause, the 4th sub-section, that in reference to tenancy:

the 4th sub-section, that in reference to tenancy:

"4. Is the tenant of real property within any such city or town or part of a city or town, at a monthly rental of at least two dollars, or at a quarterly rental of at least six dollars, or at a half-yearly rental of at least twelve dollars, or at an annual rental of at least twenty dollars, and has been in possession thereof as such tenant for at least one year next before the first day of November, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, or in any subsequent year, and has really and bona fide paid one year's rent for such property at not less than the rate aforesaid; Provided that the year's rent so required to be paid to entitle such tenant to vote shall be the year's rent up to the last yearly, half-yearly, quarterly or monthly day of payment, as the case may be, which shall have occurred next before the first day of November in each of the said years respectively; and provided also, that a change of tenancy during the year next before the said first day of November in any such year shall not deprive the tenant of the right to vote in respect of such real property if such change is without any inter nission of time, and the several tenancies are such as would entitle the tenant to vote had such tenant been in possession under either of them, as such tenant, for the year next before the said first day of November in any such year."

What do we find here? A convenient clause, a clause, no doubt, it is intended the revising barrister may make good use of. It would hardly have struck me that the First Minister was going to act in the future as an agent for collecting rents. It does strike me that, through his barristers,

What will this lead to? Suppose I should be a landlord, having a number of tenants, some of whom I know would vote for me and others would not, would I not be in a position to say to a tenant: I want your vote; you have not paid your taxes, but if you vote all right your taxes will be paid, your rent will be paid; but if you do not vote all right I will have you sworn when you come up to record your vote. Here you have a provision to compel the poor, unfortunate, industrious laboring man, who may have met with difficulty and is unable to meet his rent, to vote in the way his landlord desires him to vote. An industrious, hard working man may, from circumstances over which he has no control, such as sickness, be unable to pay his rent when it is due. Is it right that, because a man is sick or unable to get work in consequence of the hard times, he should be told that, therefore, he must not vote for a member of the Dominion Parliament, though he might cast his vote for the member for the Local Legislature? This shows the true intent of this Bill. However it may be concealed, the real intention is not to extend the franchise as hon. gentlemen claim, but to deprive the poor, industrious, honest sons of toil of the opportunity of recording their vote. Although I have not a very great deal of confidence in the spontaneous action of hon. gentlemen opposite in a matter of this kind, I believe many of them will agree with me that it is unfair, because a man happens to be born to toil and has to contend with difficulties from the day of his birth to his death, that he should be deprived of having as much voice in the administration of affairs as the man who has been born in easy circumstances and who has floated through life with any amount of means at his disposal. It would be very easy for us to show many other inconsistencies in a Bill of this description, but I think that all who have heard this Bill discussed will agree with me that, before it can possibly become law, many very serious and important changes ought to be made in it. This Bill, from beginning to end, is one of injustice to the electorate of the Dominion of Canada. Take whatever Province you like. Go to British Columbia, and I will ask you if many of the electors there will not, by this Bill, be deprived of a right which they have hitherto enjoyed? But, on the other hand, the Indians of British Columbia will be enfranchised, and perhaps the Chinamen also.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I hope the Indians will be enfranchised.

Mr. WILSON. We know that in Prince Edward Island this Bill will disfranchise a very considerable number of the electors, and I cannot, for the life of me, understand how the hon, members from that island can sit quietly in their seats when they know that a large number of the intelligent, upright and honest electors of that Province are going to be deprived of a right which they have hitherto exercised. For my part, as one of the members for Ontario, I believe that we would be recreant to our duty if we do not oppose a measure of this kind, that will inflict an injustice upon many and extend justice to none. For these reasons, I shall vote in favor of the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey).

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) As the hon member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wilson) has spoken of Prince Edward Island, I would ask permission briefly to reply to his remarks. There is no doubt that the hon gentlemen of the Opposition are carrying on this debate to its present unprecedented length for the purpose of arousing a feeling in the country against this measure. I am compelled to believe it has not affected the country to the extent hon, gentlemen would have this House believe. If there is any Province of this Dominion that should be affected by the lengthened debate that has taken place on the question of the franchise it is Prince Edward Island.

An election took place there yesterday, to fill a vacancy in the Legislative Council of the Province, and I hold in my hand a telegram I have just received, announcing the result of that election. It reads as follows:—

" CHARLOTTETOWN, 16th May, 1885.

"Bowers defeated by 154 majority in constituency, where thirty months ago, a Grit was elected by 200 majority, and notwithstanding the probable loss of manhood suffrage and the rebellion, both of which were charged against the Conservative candidate."

I think this goes very far to show that this protracted debate has not had the effect of converting the people of that Province to the views of the Opposition. Notwithstanding the position of the question as regards the island at this stage of the Bill, I yet trust that before the Bill is passed the House will see fit to grant concessions to that Province.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I happened to be absent when the House dealt with the amendment which was moved the other day by the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain), and whose object was to substitute for the provision of the Bill which we are now considering the local franchise of the Province of Quebec, as far as that Province is concerned. It is hardly necessary for me to say that if I had been here I should have voted for the amendment, but I hope I shall have an opportunity to vote for it before the Bill is adopted. It may be thought that, being a member from the Province of Quebec, I do not feel interested in the amendment which is now under discussion, and whose object is to regulate the franchise as regards the Province of Ontario. Mr. Chairman, I consider that this amendment is just as interesting to Quebec as it is to Ontario, because it is contending for a principle which is just as important for the Province of Quebec, for British Columbia, for Prince Edward Island, for New Brunswick and for Manitoba, as it is for the Province of Ontario-that is, the principle of local franchises. I have already had occasion to address the House on the Bill which is now before us. Since then I have followed the debates with great attention while I was here, and when I was away I took the trouble to read the Hansard, to see what would be said by hon. gentlemen opposite. It does not take much time to read what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to this Bill. We have attended a discussion, the like of which has never been heard, either in this Parliament or in any other, I think, on such an important There has certainly not been any discussion on that question by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government and their friends do not think, or do not seem to think, that this measure is important enough to be worth the trouble of discussing it. Long discussions have taken place since the beginning of the Session on questions which were almost insignificant, when compared to that which is now before us, and in which the gentlemen opposite have taken part. But how is it that they do not say anything on this Bill? The reason is very simple: They have nothing to say. Not long ago I was in Quebec, and I had occasion to speak to a great many persons on the subject of this Bill. The long debate which is taking place on this Bill begins to draw the attention of the people, which has heretofore been concentrated on the affairs of the North-West. Well, Mr. Chairman, when the provisions of this Bill are made known to those who enquire, there is only one voice to condemn it; there is but one voice to condemn, especially, the abominable system of official revisers. I have not heard one discordant voice on that point. I spoke to Liberals and I spoke to Conservatives, who have been Conservatives all their lifetime, and all agree to condemn this Bill. The Conservatives are even more afraid of it than the Liberals. There are the principle that the Dominion Parliament has a right to regulate the franchises for the different Provinces, the Province of Quebec may prepare to submit to whatever franchise the majority from the Province of Ontario and other Provinces may see fit to force upon it. Now, it is not necessary to be a great prophet to predict that before long we will have universal suffrage in the We know that manhood suffrage exists in Prince Edward Island; it also exists in British Columbia; it almost exists in Manitoba, and we know that during the last Session of the Ontario Parliament the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mercdith, proposed universal suffrage, and that all the Tories in Ontario voted for that motion. On the Liberal side the motion was rejected, but it was made a question of expediency, a question of time, and it was given to understand that it would come to that. Therefore, we may expect to see the majority of the Provinces of the Dominion pronouncing in favor of universal suffrage; consequently, those of the hon, gentlemen from the Province of Quebec who vote for the principle that the Dominion Parliament should establish a uniform franchise for all the Provinces are voting beforehand for universal suffrage. For my part, that would not frighten me, but I believe it ought to frighten those who denounced me when, in the Quebec Legislature, I proposed amendments which were far from involving universal suffrage. I was denounced, not only in the House, but also in the Conservative press of that Province. Well, Mr. Chairman, the same gentlemen who have denounced me at that time are preparing to vote a measure which will throw open the door, not only to manhood suffrage, but also to womanhood suffrage. Now, what are the reasons which were given in favor of this Bill since I had occasion to address this House? I must declare that there was hardly anything said, but the only reason which was given was that which had already been given, and that is, that the Act of British North America gives to the Dominion Parliament the right of regulating its own franchise. I have already said that on this side of the House nobody had ever questioned that fact. Besides, has not this point been settled? In 1874 this Parliament was called upon to settle that question. A Bill was introduced by Mr. Mackenzie's Government, and it was supported by the then Minister of Justice, who is now Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, Hon. Mr. Dorion. It will not be without interest to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of what they said at that time, or what was said by those who had a right to speak for them. On this side of the House there has been no change of opinion; what is upheld by the discussion which is now going on is just what was upheld by the Liberals in 1874; but I notice an extraordinary change among the hon. gentlemen opposite, a change, not in the language, because they do not speak, but a change in the vote. In 1874 the Bill of the Mackenzie Government proposed to adopt, for the Dominion elections, the franchise of each of the Provinces. Well, was there any opposition to that provision of the law? I have taken the trouble to read the debates which took place at that time, and I have them in a newspaper whose orthodoxy will not be questioned by hon, gentlemen opposite. I take them from the Mail's report. I find in it that two of the hon. gentlemen opposite, one who is still here and another who is not, have pronounced on that question. The hon. First Minister has never varied in his opinions; we know he is a supporter of legislative union, and he has been consistent with himself. When Confederation was established he would have desired to have legislative union of the Provinces, and when this Bill was introduced, in 1874, he at once explained his views on the question; he regretted that a uniform franchise had not been adopted for the whole Dominion. Here are the words which he used:

"He was strongly in favor of a property qualification, and was of opinion that people who contributed to the public revenue should possess the franchise."

Mr. Langelier.

It will be noticed that the First Minister has altered his opinion. Thus, in 1874, the right of suffage was to be given only to those who had property, and to-day he admits that those who have no property should have the right of suffrage:

"The principle upon which the franchise should be based should be as wide, as liberal, and as generous as was consistent with maintenance, of the principle. He claimed that the franchise should be in all Provinces as equal as possible, so that all classes in the various Provinces would be placed upon the same footing. He held that a constitutional principle in this respect should be adopted, which could be tampered with as little as possible. The House by this Bill would be forcing upon the Local Legislatures the onus of saying what should be the franchise for this House, and by doing this they were abnegating their own functions. For these reasons he was opposed to this portion of the Bill, and was of opinion that they should decide upon their own franchise. He believed the franchise he included in his Bill was liberal enough, and would have included all that should have the right to vote."

So we find that the hon. First Minister held the same views in 1874 that he holds to-day, namely, that it was expedient to establish a uniform franchise for all the Provinces. But did his party agree with him in 1874? It will be remembered that, at that time, his party was left perfectly free, and there was not even a vote taken. The present First Minister, then leader of the Opposition, felt so well that the majority of the House was favorable to the principle under which each Province was to keep its own right of franchise, such as it existed, that he did not venture to challenge a vote. No doubt he had good reasons not to do so, for the leading Conservatives pronounced against him. I may mention, among others, Mr. Hillyard Cameron, a distinguished man, who held a prominent position in his party. He was a man who had a right to speak on behalf of the Conservative party, and when I quote his opinion I am quoting the opinion of the Tory party, for Mr. Cameron was a Tory of the old stamp; he was representing the county of Cardwell. Here is what he said:

"Mr. J. H. Cameron (Cardwell) said he agreed with a great deal that had fallen from the hon member for South Bruce with regard to the uniformity of the franchise."

The then member for South Bruce is to-day the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and he made a very able speech in favor of the maintenance of the special franchises of the Provinces, and his opinion has not changed; it has remained the same on this point:

"He believed and agreed that the adoption of the course proposed would assist greatly in securing the affections of the electors of the Provinces for the confederate election in a much greater degree than would be the case if they were to deal with them in a separate and harsh manner."

Now, he opposed ballot voting. But, as we see, he was quite in favor of the Government Bill, and gave for it a reason which was never given before to my knowledge. According to him, it was a means of securing the affections of the Provinces by giving them the franchise which they had among themselves. He said it would be a means to secure their affections to the state of things which existed, and to make them interested in the federal elections. Now, I find another member who then occupied, and who now occupies, a high position in the Conservative party, and who pronounced in the same way; it is the Speaker who so worthily and so fairly presides over the proceedings of this House:

"Mr. Kirkpatrick thought the matter should receive the greatest attention at the hands of the House. He was of opinion that, on the whole, the proposal of the Minister of Justice, with regard to the fran chise, was the best that could be adopted. He thought, if minors and felons were allowed to vote, that women should not be prohibited from voting."

As we see, the present Speaker of this House pronounced in favor of the principle which we are upholding to-day, and consequently against the principle which is sought to be brought to prevail in the Bill which we are now discussing. I still find another member, the member for West Huron (Mr. Farrow), who pronounced in favor of the franchises of the Provinces. I do not know whether he will vote in the same way or not to-day:

"Mr. Farrow was in favor of the Bill as a whole, although with some of its details he did not exactly coincide."

Therefore, he approved of the Bill as a whole, and in particular that part of the Bill which proposed to maintain the various provincial franchises. I find a still stronger authority among those who pronounced themselves in 1874, and it is that of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. He expressed himself in the following terms, and he seems to have completely forgotten it since that time:

"Mr. Caron, who spoke in French, agreed with the Minister of Justice, who had expounded his views with such clearness. The Bill involved questions of the greatest moment to the future of the people of this Dominion."

It will be remarked that the Minister of Justice was the Hon. Sir A. A. Dorion, who proposed a distinct franchise for each Province; that is, to maintain the local franchises:

"The ballot had been adopted by the most civilised nations and the farthest advanced in political science, and had been found to work well."

Mr. CARON. The ballot?

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Let the hon. Minister keep his temper. I am just coming to the most ticklish point for him:

"As to the franchise, he was in favor of the system they had enjoyed hitherto. He did not approve of abolishing the nomination day. He thought it enabled the people to discuss the political questions of the day with advantage to themselves."

As will be seen, there is not a word of dissent on the principle of the Bill. The most important point of the Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice was, above all, the local franchise. The hon. Minister of Militia did not think it proper to differ; on the contrary, he gave it his general approval.

Mr. CARON. (Translation.) I do not think that there is a general approval. Where are the words of approbation?

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) But there are no words of disapprobation.

Mr. CARON. (Translation.) That is quite different.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) There are words of disapprobation on all that the Minister of Militia did not approve; he condemned two or three principles in the Bill and he points them out. He approved the rest and he points it out in a general way. Thus, if I approved the Bill in a general manner it would not be necessary for me to say that I approve such or such a clause of it; I would merely state that there are three or four points of which I do not approve.

Mr. CARON. (Translation.) The hon. member does not consider this question from the same point of view as the Minister of Militia. The hon. member thinks that all that which he disapproves is approved by those who do not hold the same opinion as he does. I simply said what I thought on this question, and I did not at all approve of the measure, such as it was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Dorion.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Then the words of the hon. Minister are not reported right; because the report says that he gave a general approbation to the Bill. If that report had been made by the Globe it might, perhaps, be questioned, but it is that of the Mail, and it cannot be questioned. That report says:

"Mr. Caron, who spoke in French, agreed with the Minister of Justice, who had expounded his views with such clearness."

We find that he approved of it in a general way. He took exception to the two or three points on which he did not agree with the Minister of Justice; but, when in a Bill, one takes the trouble of condemning one clause or two and manifested their intention of forcing it through. Well, if of approving the remainder in a general way, I do not see how it can be said that the object was to condemn the Bill, which contained very important things, because it will be admitted that the nomination was an insignificant thing, so to speak, when compared to the franchise. Well, the hon. Minister of Militia, who took the trouble to take exception, who has even pronounced a condemnation on the question of public nomination, said nothing at all about the franchise. Therefore, I have a right to say that that part of the Bill was covered by the general approbation which he gave at the beginning of his speech. Now, on the Bill, such as it was introduced in the House in 1874, there was an exception made with regard to Prince Edward Island, an exception which at that time was rejected by the Senate. It was au unfortunate exception, and for my part I would not be ready to defend it. There was given a reason which may have been good or bad, for all I know; but the Bill merely introduced for Prince Edward Island the franchise which had existed for the elections to the Legislative Council. On that point many supporters of the Government criticised that provision, and it was finally put aside. Thus we see that the universal sentiment, in 1874, save a few exceptions, which were so few that they are only an evidence that the unanimity of opinion which existed at that time was to the effect that it was better to leave to each Province the local franchise which had existed until then; that is to say, to have the same voters for both local and federal elections. It was also the opinion of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). He expressed that opinion in a newspaper, which was quoted the other day in this House. But hon, gentlemen opposite change their opinions with wonderful facility; they have certain opinions during a certain time, but they change the moment they have no more need of them. When I was denounced in 1874, I was less advanced than they were, only my ideas have not changed, but theirs are quite different from what they were then. I am now wondering if this is not a reason for me to pay a great deal less attention to their denunciations than I did at that time, for in the future I might say that the opinions of these gentlemen will change the moment they have no more need of them. On our side of the House we uphold whatever opinions we believe to be just, fair and equitable, but hon. gentlemen opposite uphold the opinions which they believe to be useful to them for the time being. I said a moment ago that in 1874 the unanimous sentiment, not only of the House, but also of the country, was in favor of having for Dominion elections the same franchise as for the provincial elections. What has happened since that time, that this system should be changed? Was there any of these expressions of opinion which were imposed by circumstances, and to which Parliament ought not to resist? I find nothing of the kind; on the contrary, I think I may affirm, without fear of being contradicted, that every time the hon First Minister—and that has happened often-has tried to introduce a Franchise Bill, proposing a uniform franchise for all the Provinces, he has been universally blamed by the Conservative press of the Province of Quebec. I think I may say that not an article has been published in a Conservative paper, either this year or during preceding years, in favor of a uniform franchise, but dozens of articles might be quoted from Conservative and Liberal papers of this year and of the preceding years which have pronounced against this uniform franchise. So much for the Province of Quebec. But in the other Provinces were there any of these expressions of public opinion which are irresistible, and before which a Parliament must give way. I have never heard of any. I do not believe that the press, even the Conservative press, has ever pronounced in favor of a uniform franchise before this Bill was introduced, and even before the Government had there was nothing in the public which has compelled the Government to introduce this Bill, what is the reason why it was introduced? Mr. Chairman, things must be stated as they are. This Bill is forced upon the majority of the Government by the Ontario Tories; the Tories from the other Provinces, or the Conservatives from the other Provinces, if it sounds better, do not want it. We have just heard one of the most devoted—not to use a stronger expression-servants of the Government declaring that he had not changed his mind; he tried the other day to press the adoption, in favor of Prince Edward Island, of the local franchise of that Province; he has not succeeded, but he has just declared that he had not lost all hopes; this thing seems to him of such great importance that he hopes that the Government will change their decision and will finally consent to leave to Prince Edward Island that to which it attaches so much of importance, the local franchise which it has enjoyed until now. The hon member understands very well the use which will be made against him of the present Bill; he has not forgotten the use which was made against the Liberal party of that unfortunate clause of the Bill of 1874, which was to give a special franchise to Prince Edward Island. Dr. Tupper tried to stir up religious prejudices with respect to that clause; he contended that that clause was destined to prevent the Catholics of Prince Edward Island from voting. I would like to see him in the ranks of the Opposition to-day. Would he say that the present Bill is for the purpose of preventing the Catholics of Prince Edward Island from voting? For the present Bill will establish just the same franchise which was proposed in 1874, and which was rejected. Therefore, if we except the Tories from Ontario, nobody wants this Bill to pass. To be convinced of that, all that is necessary is to speak about it outside of this House. There is not one Conservative, if we except those from Ontario, who is in favor of this Bill; every body would prefer to leave things as they were in 1867. All this is in view, not of a uniform franchise, but in view of having these famous revisers, who will revise nothing but who will do everything in the first instance. It is very well understood that if it was intended to maintain the local franchises which exist in each Province there would be no necessity of ascertaining who are the electors for the Dominion Parliament. Now, what is wanted by the Tories from Ontario is that no electors should be made except those who will send to Parliament only Tories, and Tories of the old stamp, Tories who will be absolutely hostile to the Province of Quebec. Besides, Mr. Chairman, I am not the only one to say so, and the thing is perfectly known by the friends of the Government outside of this House; the friends of the Government who are not all obliged to go through the same door do not hesitate to say that they deeply regret the introduction of the Bill. All those who have a little sagacity, those who can see a little further than their nose, as is commonly said, understand perfectly well what is the object of this Bill. It is to cause a Tory majority to be elected in the Province of Ontario, such a compact majority as to make it possible to dispense with the majority from the Province of Quebec. That is the object, and in order to do that the revising barrister is needed. It is intended to adopt the following system: It is intended to have in every county a man who will say who will be the person who must be sent to the House; it is intended to arrive at a system whose result will be to have only one elector in each county, and this elector will probably be a man who will be able to do all the work, all the unclean work of the Government,

Mr. CARON. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) It is well known that there are men who are not to be stopped by an oath, and good care will be taken to appoint that class of men, so Mr. LANGELIER.

*200 a house which is worth $400. It will be said to him: Why, how could you, without perjuring yourself, make such and good care will be taken to appoint that class of men, so Mr. LANGELIER.

as to have on the voters' lists only puppets, and all the Government will have to do in election time will be to pull the strings. That is to say, that through hypocrisy it is intended to come to this: That nobody but Tory members will have a chance to be sent to Parliament. Such is the object in view. And to come to that it is proposed to have a uniform franchise; because, otherwise there would be no chance of appointing revising barristers, such as are intended to be appointed. Now, there has been an attempt to justify the appointment of these revising barristers, and, Mr. Chairman, although the clause we are now discussing only relates to the city franchises, the appointment of revising barristers is essentially connected with it; because, in reality, it is perfectly useless to say who are those who will be qualified. As to those who can read between the lines, all they have to do is to examine clauses 3 and 4. What do these clauses say? Those who are posted on political events and who know how the Conservative party deals with patronage will understand that these revising barristers will only give a vote to those whom they will know beforehand as being ready to vote for the Tory candidates. This is what clause 4 says. Apparently, the trouble is taken to state what will be the qualifications of the electors; but in reality these qualifications will depend on the judgment of the revising barrister; they will depend on the question whether the revising barrister will be willing or not to find these qualifications. As I said a moment ago, the appointment of the revising barristers is of the highest importance. An attempt was made to justify the appointment of the revising barristers for the preparation of the voters' lists, by contending that this institution exists in England. Well, such a statement as that is an insult to the good sense of the public. There is no analogy between the two. They did not quite dare to call them revising barristers, but they call them revising officers. In England it is perfectly well known that the revising barrister does not participate in any way in the preparation of the lists; the electoral list is not prepared by them. The valuation of the property and the preparation of the lists are made by the overseers in the counties, and in the towns by the clerk of the town. It is about the same thing as that which takes place here. What do the revising barristers do? They simply revise the electoral lists which have been prepared by the local or municipal authorities. We have no objection to that. Moreover, in England it was found so important to secure the independence of these revising barristers that they are not appointed by the Government; they are appointed by judges, and they are not even always appointed by the same judge. So great was the precaution taken on this point that it has been enacted that these officers would be appointed by the senior judge of the Assizes, and it is well known that it is not always the same judge who holds the Assizes. And yet these revising barristers do not exercise half of the duties which will be exercised by our revising officers here; because, as I said, the revising barristers in England are only charged with the duty of revising the work done by the local authorities. What will be the duties of the revising barrister here? As I said, it will be the manufacturing of electors, and nothing else. He will be charged with the duty of making the valuation of properties. Here is a lawyer, who is going to take a trip in the country, and unless he is ready to go through his oath as a gymnast goes through a paper disk in a circus, he must go from one house to another, valuating the properties, as the municipal assessors do. But even if he is a man to whom his oath may give a few scruples, he will have means of putting himself above scruples; all he will have to do will be to take information from unsworn Tories, and by that means he may value at

I have enquired of so-and-so—an individual who will not deal with a good Tory he will take his gross income; if it the Conservative party—who valued that house at $200. He will not even take the trouble of taking his information from a man who will be sworn. Mr. Chairman, these revising barristers are the absolute upturning of all our electoral system. There is no use in concealing the object of their appointment. It is to allow only those who are willing to vote for the Government to give their votes, and perhaps the attempt may succeed; but appearances must be saved, and whenever the thing is tried, people will be sure of the result beforehand. It is the upturning of our constitutional system. What is the system of our constitutional system. What is the system of our constitution? It is a very wise system, which has given good results. It consists in this: The members must reflect the opinions and the interests of their constituencies. How can that be so? It is so when they are elected in a regular manner. It is when those who vote for them act in a regular manner, under a general law, according to which no fraud can be committed, and who then vote according to their conscience. Why have we such severe laws on electoral corruption, laws which prohibit treating, undue influence, etc.? What is the object of these laws? It is to maintain the constitutional principle which I have just mentioned. If it was allowed to buy all the electors of a county, this electorate would not send to the House a member who would represent their opinions, but they would send a man representing the opinions of whoever bought them. Our laws prohibit treating, because it is intended that there should be no appeal made to the greediness of the electors. If treating was allowed, the man who would be elected would not represent the true opinion of the free electors, but he drink and food. What is the object of our laws against undue influence? All the judges who have dealt with this question have been unanimous on that point, because it is considered as very important to respect the conscience of the electors. Indeed, if those who are in a position to control the votes of the electors were allowed to make them vote by threatening them, the elected candidates would not at all represent the opinions and the interests of their electoral division; they would represent whoever was in a position to influence them, and we see what precaution was taken, and wisely taken, to ensure the respect of this to the House must be sent there to represent the true opinion and the true interest of the electoral division which he is supposed to represent. With the system which is sought to be established to day, all this will be put aside. If this Bill comes into force, and if it is carried out as intended by those who have inspired it, the members who who will not find the means to put only Tory majorities on the lists in a great number of counties. I admit that in counties where there are Liberal majorities of 400 or 500 votes, it would be rather hard to convert them into Tory majorities; but take a county where the majority is 50, and the revising barrister must be very awkward if he does not succeed in converting that majority of 50 into a minority of 50. There are only 100 votes to change, and if there are 60 polling places in a county, this will make a change of two votes in each polling place. A revising barrister whose conscience will be somewhat elastic will very easily find a reason for saying that the property of an individual has been assessed too high by the municipal assessors, and he will deprive him of the right to vote. It will be still easier has not been a single speech against time; the object of as regards the valuation of income. Thus, when he has to every speech delivered was to show the defects of the Bill.

be sworn, but who will be a good Tory, a good canvasser of is a Liberal, he will say that it is the net income which must be taken, and in that manner he will manage to put on the electoral list only those people whom he will wish to put there. Such is the object in view. Now, before concluding, I deem it my duty to say a word about a charge which was brought against the members of the Opposition, I see by the Conservative papers, not only the English papers but also the French papers, that they do not say a word to defend the present Bill; but they carry out the principle, that when people have a bad cause, the best plan is to abuse the lawyer of the opposite party. At the present time the Conservative papers seem to have a cause which is not defensible; and how do they proceed? They abuse the lawyer of the opposite party. We are charged with obstruction. But, Mr. Chairman, have they a right to charge us with obstruction because we are discussing a measure like this? The hon. First Minister has stated, on a previous occasion—and I believe that his authority will be accepted by hon gentlemen opposite, as it cannot be pretended that he spoke without knowing what he was saying-he has already stated, when he introduced a measure of this kind, that it was a measure which would take a whole Session, and I believe he was right. Perhaps it was expected that this measure would be passed hurriedly, without any discussion, because it was known that it could not stand discussion; but, is it to be supposed that this lengthy, and perhaps very tedious and very tiresome discussion for hon, gentlemen opposite, is a pleasure to us? I believe that if there are people for whom it is burdensome to stay here, they are found rather in the Opposition than on the Government side. Why do we undertake an exhaustive discussion of this Bill? It is because it is a Bill of the would represent the electors whom he had furnished with highest importance; we consider that we would be drink and food. What is the object of our laws against recreant to our duty, as representatives of the people, if we allowed this measure to be passed without discussing it. The discussion which has taken place has not been useless. Suppose we had discussed this Bill during ten hours, as the Secretary of State wished to allow us to discuss it, could we, during a ten hours' discussion, have found in that Bill what was in it, and what hon, gentlemen were compelled to admit was to be found in it, the right of voting given to Poundmaker, to Pie-a pot and to all the other Indians? These people claim the right of scalping their enemies, but it was intended to give them the great constitutional principle, that the member who is sent right of voting besides. Without the discussion which took to the House must be sent there to represent the true place, that clause would have been adopted, and all those Indians, who are to-day killing our volunteers in the North-West, would have been allowed to vote. It will be admitted that it was well worth a fortnight's discussion to make hon. gentlemen opposite understand that the Bill such as it was proposed and such as it was sought to be passed, gave the will be sent to the House will, in fact, represent only the right of voting to the North-West Indians. Well, if that opinion of the revising barrister, because there will was struck out of the Bill, is it due to hon gentlemen only be on the voters' lists those whom the revisiong barristers shall have deemed proper to put on, swallow that, the same as the rest; the trouble of gilding and it will be a very awkward revising barrister, the pill was not even taken to make them swallow it. Again, who will not find the manner to put only Town majorities on. was struck out of the Bill, is it due to hon gentlemen opposite? Not at all; these gentlemen were there to I say that we have made no obstruction, and when long quotations were made it was because we were compelled to sit for two or three days in succession, and during hours at which it is impossible to have serious discussion. It must be admitted that until the hour when a serious discussion should end we have always discussed seriously; we have not spoken against time; but when it was intended to keep us until six o'clock in the morning, and even during fifty-seven consecutive hours, it could not be expected that we should discuss seriously. It would have been taking this side of the House for a pack of fools, to expect a serious discussion under the circumstances. Since we are sitting until a rea-

The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) has pointed out in the Bill a defect which had not yet been discovered, and a very serious defect. It is that the Bill, such as it is now framed, will have the result of depriving of their votes people who have not paid their rent. It is a thing which was never seen until now in any Province of the Dominion where the franchise is based on property. The moment an individual has a property which is assessed high enough to allow him to vote he ought to exercise that right, no matter whether he has paid his rent or not. And who will generally suffer from this provision of the law? It will not be the rich men, but it will be the poor men. Well, there was not one of the hon, gentlemen opposite who had yet discovered that. I say it is only through a lengthy and exhaustive discussion that we may come to discover all the disastrous consequences of that Bill. I admit that the discussion would not be so long if hon. gentlemen opposite took part in it, but as we are alone to discuss we are obliged to find both the objections and answers on this side of the House. We intend to discuss this Bill just as if it had been introduced at a proper stage of the Session; but it was introduced at a time when the Session should have been virtually ended; it was delayed till the last moment, in order to avoid discussion. If the Bill had been introduced during the early days of the Session, and if we could have discussed it during the first month or during the first two months of the Session, the idea would never have occurred to any one to make obstruction. Well, has that discussion, which would then have been a regular and legitimate discussion, become irregular and illegitimate because the Government was pleased to press the adoption of that important measure when the Session is about to end? Surely such an absurd statement will not be made. We are discussing this measure as, I believe, the Opposition ought to discuss all the other measures of the Government, if they were introduced at the beginning of the Session. This will be a lesson for the future. This is my first Session in this House, but I have noticed one thing before to-day, and it is, that all the most important measures, which naturally ought to be Government measures, are never introduced during the first two months of the Session. The first reading takes place before that time, but none of them are discussed. It is only the moment the members are preparing to leave for home that these Bills are introduced, in order to stop the discussion. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Liberal members, far from acting contrary to their duty, by discussing this Bill as they do, are doing their duty, and they would be remiss in their most sacred duty if they did not do it. We are sacrificing all at this moment to our public duties by staying here, but it is a duty which we will fulfil to the last. I am not speaking on behalf of the Opposition, but as a single member, who may be allowed to have opinions which are not compromising to anybody. I say that when at this stage of the Session a Bill is introduced, the object of which was a cowardly attempt to decimate the Liberal party, I say that if the members of the Opposition allowed this Bill to pass without discussing it, such a cowardly course on their part would make them worthy of the contempt of the country at large, and I, for my part, would despise them if they did not defend themselves against such a Bill. What is the intention of the Government? They intend to use the strength of their majority to pass the Bill. And we, who are in the Opposition, could we have the foolishness, the stupidity, to let this Bill pass without using the means which are afforded to us by the constitution to oppose it? I say that it would be absurd if it was not cowardly. Even if we were not able to discuss it seriously—and I maintain that we have always discussed seriously—even if we had Mr. LANGBLIER.

not fear the consequences for the Province of Quebec, and if I only looked to the interests of my party I would vote with both hands in favor of this Bill, because there is no measure which is more unpopular in the Province of Quebec, and the hon. members opposite who belong to the Province of Quebec will have to defend it on the hustings. They will have to defend the right of suffrage in favor of those who have an income and who have no property, a principle which they formerly condemned. I repeat it, if I only looked to the interests of my party in the Province of Quebec I would say that I would ask for no better chance. But we must look to the general interests of the Dominion, and as we have in Ontario friends whom it is proposed to annihilate, I say that it would be cowardice on the part of the Liberal members from the other Provinces, did they not do all in their power to come to their aid. Therefore, we will discuss this Bill; we will not perhaps prevent its being passed, but we will discuss it long enough to leave it no excuse before the public. We will put it so clearly before the public that if it produces disastrous consequences we will not be blamed for them, but, on the contrary, the electors will bear us testimony that, for our part, we have done our duty, and our conscience is clear on that

Mr. TROW. I may say that the Bill before the House has created a great deal of excitement throughout the Dominion, judging by the numerously attended meetings which have been held in cities and towns in the Dominion, the strong resolutions which have been passed, as well as the petitions which have been sent to this House, signed by thousands of people, condemning the measure now under discussion. To my mind, at least, the matter is one which has taken hold of the community, and they are of the opinion that the measure is one that is out of place, undesirable, and besides that there is not sufficient time to have a proper discussion of the measure. The First Minister stated that it would take three months at least, or a whole Session, to analyse and ventilate a Bill of such importance. We were here for many weeks at the outset of the Session, and very little public business was brought before us, the result was that a great deal of valuable time has been lost, and now, when we should be near the close of an ordinary Session, we are called upon to discuss a measure which affects the whole Dominion. I know that in Ontario, at least—and I presume in the other Provinces—there are a great many people who now enjoy the franchise who will be deprived of it if this Bill becomes law. I do not think that any Administration is justified in taking from any voter a right which he formerly enjoyed, and I know that in my own county there must be hundreds who will be deprived of the franchise by this Bill who, under the local franchise, had that privilege. We have not heard of any petitions being presented in favor of this Bill, nor of any meetings asking that the Government should make such a change. Any ordinary measure would unquestionably pass the House without much opposition. It is necessary for an Opposition in the House to ventilate measures, and, if possible, amend them, and an Opposition discharging those duties is just as essential as a Government. The Government of the day are certainly under a debt of gratitude to the members of the Opposition, and more particularly to the leader of the Opposition, for the way in which their crude measures have been analysed and perfected by him. Hon, gentlemen can call to mind many measures in previous Sessions which were introduced by the Government, and which the courts pronounced unconstitutional, and there are certainly many measures which would have been unconstitutional but for the supervision of discussed for the sole purpose of endeavoring to defeat this the leader of the Opposition. The present system in the Bill, whose object is to decimate the Liberal party in the Province of Ontario works admirably. The assessors, as a Province of Ontario, we would have been justified. I do rule, are men of standing in the community, thoroughly conversant with the business they undertake to perform, residents of the municipality, many of them, for a quarter of a century, and they are men who are selected on account of their qualifications for their position. They do their work in such a way as to do full justice to all parties concerned, to give satisfaction to the council which employs them and to the whole community. The hon member for North Perthwho I am sorry to say is not in his place - made the astounding statement that the assessors were not reliable in his county, but were placed in their offices for political purposes. That hon, gentleman is certainly in error. He stated that the municipal councils were, as a rule, political partisans, and that these assessors were appointed on account of their political proclivities. I may mention one instance to show that that is not the case in the county of Perth. In the town ship of Downie I have had five or six different contests, during the last twelve years, and I have received from 140 to 150 majority in that municipality. The council of that municipality have always had a majority of Conservatives in their membership. They have always had a Tory assessor and a Tory clerk, and notwithstanding that fact my majority at the last election was 149, showing conclusively that they are not partisans or elected for their political proclivities.

Mr. BOWELL. That they are honest men.

Mr. TROW. I do not pretend to say that, but I say that politics does not rule in that municipality; because, as a matter of course, if the Reformers in that township give me a majority of 150 they could get positions in the council if they felt inclined to do so, but I know that Reformers are not anxious to get the position for that purpose. There are several municipalities in Perth which give me majorities, who, by their possession of the books and papers, would be able to do wrong, if they felt inclined to do so; but I believe that the assessors of that county, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for North Perth, do their duty honestly and uprightly. I am astonished at the statement of the hon, gentleman, that all the officials are dishonest and are political partisans. The hop, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) tried to make it appear that the expense of the revising barristers would not be a very large sum. I am not prepared to make an cs imate, but I have no doubt it will amount to from $300,000 to $400,000 per annum. We will place it at $300,000, and it is so much money wasted. The work will not be done in such a business-like manner. The present system works so well and is carried out without expense to the Dominion Government, that I am astonished the Government should entertain the idea of employing other officials when officials are already employed by the local municipalities without any expense to the Dominion Government. The present system, I repeat, works well; it has been working well for eighteen years, and has given great satisfaction to the community. There are no complaints, no petitions, presented against it. With respect to the revising barristers, I am not aware of any barristers in any section of the country who would be competent to value indiscriminately lands through municipalities. To do so in one riding, comprising fourteen or fifteen municipalities, would occupy his attention more than twelve months. Such men, I think, as a rule, are most incompetent to examine and report upon the value of real estate, or even personal property. The question arises as to how the expenses will be paid. Suppose the dispute arises at a remote end of a township. Generally speaking, a revising barrister will live in the county town, and the property requiring his consideration may be situated 50, 80 or 100 miles distant. The result of an investigation would be that large expenses would be involved, and I should like to know who would be responsible for them—the Dominion Government, the municipality or individuals complained of? One great!

evil of this Bill is the want of appeal from the revising barrister. The principal objection I have to the revising barrister is that there is no appeal from his decision. If he thinks proper, he can allow an appeal; but it is not to be expected that a man will allow an appeal against his own judgment, and the result will be that there will be no appeal. Under the present system there is an appeal to the county judge, and the county judges, as a rule, are men of standing in the community; they are considered to be unpurchasable; the people have every confidence in them, and I do not see why revising barristers should be appointed to take their places. I have listened with a great deal of attention to various speeches which have been delievered on this Franchise Bill. It is true, the discussion has, in a great measure, been confined to the Opposition. A few gentlemen on the opposite side have taken little part in it, but none of them apparently understood the purport of the measure, because the hon. First Minister had to state that the interpretation they placed on it was entirely wrong. The First Minister himself, on introducting the Bill, was rather limited to time in his explanations of it, occupying 84 minutes; consequently his supporters were at a loss as to what the true interpretation of the Bill was. After some days of discussion the hon. Finst Minister apparently lost his temper; he came into the House somewhat confused, and made great complaint against the members of the Opposition. He said they had combined together, not merely to occupy valuable time, but purposely to make a dead set upon him—they wished to kill him; that he was 71 years of age. He made great lamentation—pity the sorrows of a poor old man. Now, I would like to know what object the Opposition had. I know there is not a member of the Opposition who does not respect the hon. First Minister, and I do not know how they could injure his health in the course they were taking, because he was in his room three-fourths of each night asleep; he did not remain in the House more than three or four hours out of fifty-seven hours consecutively; one hon, gentleman says he was only here five hours out of fifty-seven. He should have been here to give explanations, because there was no other member of the Government, apparently, who was able to explain the measure as thoroughly as himself. The Hon. Minister of Public Works has certainly stuck to the ship, and I believe he will stick to it if it sinks, as I have no doubt it will before long. I give him credit for tenacity of purpose and a desire to do his duty.

Mr. MILLS. He is a Grit.

Mr. CHARLTON. He ought to be a Clear Grit.

Mr. TROW. I object to the passing of this Bill, because it deprives hundreds of young men who are conversant with the history of the country of the franchise, while it gives the franchise to the untutored, uncultivated Indian. I have travelled a good deal and seen a great number of Indian tribes, but in no treaty ever submitted to this House have I seen the signature of a single chief. It has always been their mark instead of their signature, whether in Ontario or in any other Province, or in the North-West or Manitoba.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I will show the hon, gentleman some signatures in the handwriting of the chiefs themselves.

Mr. MILLS. Are they going to have the franchise?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I hope they will; I would be very glad for them to have it.

Mr. TROW. It is proposed to give the right of the franchise, the dearest right we possess, to men who traffic in their wives' and daughters' virtue. They are described in the report of the agent of the First Minister as lazy, worthless, untrustworthy.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. There are lazy people in all classes.

Mr. TROW. These people are not taxed; they are fed and clothed in a great measure by the Government; they are wards of the Government. The result is, that every Indian who gets a right to the franchise will cast his vote in support of the Government of the day. You could not expect anything else. They will vote just as a son would be naturally inclined to vote in the same way as his father, because he is under his care and protection. This Bill has, no doubt, been in incubation for fifteen or twenty years, and it is now submitted because another election is approaching within two years. It is designed for the purpose of striking at certain members of the Opposition, among others my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) and my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). They are members who take an interest in the discussion in the House, who have done their duty in committees and in debate, and in this respect are useful to the Government, even if they are in Opposition. This Bill is also intended to strengthen the Government supporters, for in many ridings represented by Conservatives, who were elected by trifling majorities, this Indian vote, it is expected, will make their position more secure; and hon. gentlemen opposite who are in this position are somewhat callous, and are opposed to the Bill being withdrawn simply because they are interested. I have every confidence that the First Minister, when he sees, as he cannot help but seeing, the extraordinary excitement which this objectionable measure has aroused throughout the country, will see fit to withdraw it. Petitions have been presented here from all parts of the country, signed, many of them, by large numbers of Conservatives in the different ridings. I, myself, presented one from the village of Milverton, in my riding, which was signed by many of the most ultra-Conservatives of the place. This Bill cannot fail to result in a great injury to the Government, if carried, because the people are aroused to its unfairness and iniquity. It is much more objectionable than the Gerrymandering Bill, and that was had enough in all conscience, but hon, gentlemen opposite never appeal to the country without first taking the precaution to secure some undue advantage to themselves. In 1872 the Conservative party obtained $360,000 from Sir Hugh Allan to carry on the elections; in 1878, when the country was suffering under commercial depression, they managed to secure an undue advantage by raising the cry of the National Policy; in 1882, before going to the people, not-withstanding they had nearly 70 of a majority, passed the Gerrymander Act. By that Act I was handicapped at the start by 38 of a minority, when, if the county had not been interfered with, I would have had 200 of a majority at the outset. The hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) was also handicapped by a minority of 100 by the same means, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had to start 100 votes behind his usual calcu-The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) is uneasy, but we can excuse his uneasiness, in view of the petition sent from his riding, signed by 35 of his supporters, which would considerably reduce his majority of 15. hope the Government will reconsider this measure, which is so objectionable to the whole community, and decide to withdraw it, and allow legislative business to be proceeded with at once; and, according to the hon. member for Brant. it will take thirty or forty days to get through with the necessary and legitimate business of the Session.

Mr. MILLS. I have no intention to punish hon gentlemen on that side; I only regret they should have insisted on endeavoring to punish us. They kept the House in session fifty-seven hours in one continuous sitting, and voted down any proposition to adjourn.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not true.

Mr. MILLS. I say it is true, and I say further that in a Session, and the succeeding Session it may disfranchise matter of this kind the hon. gentleman's word is not to be 125,000 more. And so you may go on with the same contaken.

Mr. Trow.

Mr. BOWELL. The only difference is this: You moved the resolution for the amendment, but refused to let it be put.

Mr. MILLS. The hon gentleman knows that before I undertook to speak I asked the First Minister whether he would consent to the motion being put, and if so, I was prepared to forego my observations. He replied: Certainly not. Hon. gentlemen opposite sought to destroy the health of hon, gentlemen on this side by keeping the committee in sitting for that period, and then endeavored to make it appear that we were seeking to injure the health of the leader of the House, although that hon, gentleman did not feel called upon to attend the sittings of the committee at all. You have in your hauds, Sir, two very important amendments, the one moved by the hon. member for North Norfolk and the other by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I purpose making a few observations upon both. We know this Bill has been prepared for a political purpose. This Bill, it is rumored, is to be passed because the hon. Minister who leads the House is anxious to emancipate himself from the hon. gentlemen who follow the Minister of Public Works. It is said that the orange colors and Quebec blue do not blend well together, and that it is highly desirable that the Tory party in the Province of Ontario should be strengthened, in order that it may emancipate itself from the influence of those who follow the hon. Minister of Public Works. Sir, we know that there is a great deal of foundation for that observation. We know, for instance, the zeal, the devotion of the Minister of Public Works, to a superloyal Protestant party, and we know that the hon. gentleman may tolerate, but he does that with a great deal of difficulty, those who entertain the opinions of my hon, friend the Minister of Public Works. Now, Sir, the Bill before us has a provision specially intended to put the Orange party on that side of the House, and to transfer the Bleu party to this side of the House, and to exclude those who entertain what are known as Reform political opinions from the representative body altogether. It is felt that as long as we occupy a position in this House the hon, gentleman cannot secure for himself that personal independence that he feels it most desirable that he should possess. He chafes under the yoke that my hon, friend the Minister of Public Works has so long put upon his neck. He wears it with ill-grace. He feels that it is one in which he cannot get on satisfactorily; and, by a species of constitutional assassination, applied to members on this side of the House, and by a little independence shown towards hon, gentlemen who follow the Minister of Public Works on that side of the. House, he hopes to change the political complexion of Parliament, and then there will be far less embarrassment in catching Riel, if that condition of things prevailed, than there are under the existing circumstances. Now, I wish to call your attention to some provisions of this section of the Bill. In the Province of Ontario we see that this Bill proposes to increase the electoral franchise and to disfranchise a larger number of people who possess the electoral franchise in that Province under the provincial Act. By this section the owner of property in a town or city must be assessed for at least $300 before he can vote; by the law now in force in the Province of Ontario he need be assessed but for $200, and in rural districts and incorporated villages for about $100. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has made a calculation—and having followed him in his observations I am inclined to think his calculation is not beside the mark-that the number of persons who would be disfranchised was about 125,000; and I think there would be at least that many. Now, Sir, if this House may disfranchise 125,000 this Session, it may, with equal constitutional propriety; disfranchise 125,000 more next Session, and the succeeding Session it may disfranchise stitutional propriety and disfranchise, each year, a like number, until you would leave the electoral privileges in the hands of a mere handful of the population, and, if you can, do away with the electoral system altogether. It is perfectly competent for us to pass an Act to declare that the electoral franchise shall be confined to a few inhabitants in every town and village in the country. We might do that without violating any law, although we would certainly violate the principles of our constitution. We might declare that a number of persons named in the Bill should be the only persons who should have a right to vote for the election of members of Parliament, and we have just as much power, and your Bill would be, in point of law, just as binding, if we did that, as for us to carry this Bill through Parliament. They have discussed the constitutionality of this, using the word constitutional in the sense of ultra vires. There are two senses in which we may use the word unconstitutional. An Act of Parliament may be unconstitutional as being ultra vires; but it may be unconstitutional as being a departure from the practice and principles which are recognised as constitutional principles. It is in this sense that this is an unconstitutional proceeding. In every instance, the English Parliament, when asked to deal with a question of this kind, has first submitted the question to the country at elections, and obtained the sanction of the country to proceed with the measure before Parliament was asked to pass it. I might mention cases in which that has been done. Some hon, members have said that the measure recently carried through the Imperial Parliament was not sanctioned by the country during the elections of 1880. That is a mistake. Every one who has read the interesting discussion that took place on the extension of the franchise to bouseholders in counties, between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe, in 1879, in the Contemporary or Fortnightly Review, will remember that Mr. Gladstone committed himself strongly in favor of legislation on this subject. But he did not rest content with that discussion. He expressed his views in Parliament and upon the hustings, and during the Midlothian campaign he addressed the country on the subject:

"He said he ought to have mentioned the extension of county representation. It was most unreasonable that the very class of men who, if they resided within the limits of the parliamentary boroughs, were deemed competent, and had shown themselves competent, to exercise the franchise, if they happened to live within the district of a county, were denied the suffrage, and were excluded from all direct influence upon the policy of the Government of the country. This, if not the very first question, was one that should occupy the early attention of the Parliament about to be elected."

Mr. Gladstone clearly expressed the opinion that it was the duty of the Government to deal with the question of the extension of the franchise and confer the privilege of voting upon householders in counties as it was at that time enjoyed by householders in boroughs. The that time enjoyed by householders in boroughs. same principle, observed in 1831, 1857, 1868 and 1874, was again followed in 1880, and the proposed changes received the sanction of the country before they were approved by Parliament. It is true this Parliament may legislate on any subject within its limits; at all events, with regard to the ordinary legislation that does not affect our constitutional system. If Parliament makes a mistake, it may correct it through popular representation after the next election. But if you alter the basis of representation and change the electorate body you put the remedy out of the power of the people, without a revolution. I hold that so long as the majority of the people support hon. gentlemen opposite, the Government ought to remain in their hands; but when public opinion changes, when it accepts the views held on this side of the House, it is our business to see that the representation of the country remains in such a condition that it is highly probable the majority of the people will be able to secure a majority of the representatives in Parbe able to secure a majority of the representatives in Parlundertake to look after these lists, with but a single revisliament. I cannot fancy a more unfortunate condition of ing officer for the purpose of preparing it. Under the prethings than the one contemplated by the Gerrymander Act sent system a dishonest or unscrupulous assessor will be put and by the Bill now before the committee, that the condition of the electorate shall be so changed that a majority of the electorate will not be able to secure a majority of the representatives on the floor of this House. It is impossible to suppose that the people, under that state of things, would respect laws made under such circumstances. The moment you produce such a condition of things you strike at the root of the constitutional system; you prepare the way for revolution, and instead of having an orderly condition of things and respect for the laws, you cannot have any respect for the laws. That is what is proposed by this Bill. Look at the provision in respect to tenancy. If a man comes forward and proves that he pays $20 a year rent, or produces a receipt to that effect, he shall be placed on the voters list. The Ontario law provides that if he is the tenant of property of the value of $200 he shall have a vote. Under the Ontario law the amount of property for which a man is assessed determines his right to vote. The provision in this Bill is the amount of rent he proposes to pay; but he may not pay any rent. A landlord may place on the voter's list for an ordinary dwelling house twenty tenants. This Bill contains a proposal to have a fraudulent voters' list. When you depart from the present system there is no standing ground except, manhood suffrage. I believe in that principle, and I will support that proposition, if the present amendment should fail. I am willing to leave this matter in the present hands, because it is then in the hands of the people, not because they are represented in the Local Legislatures, but because we can appeal to the same people who sent us here. The Legislature has nothing to do with the preparation of the voters' list, that being entrusted to the hands of the people. The people elect the council; the council appoints the assessor; the assessor is sworn to fix the value of property fairly, and in the great majority of instances does so. The people have an appeal from him to the municipal council, and, if they think that they do not act fairly, to the county judge. The whole thing is in the hands of the people themselves, and from the ministerial act of the original preparation of the list there is an appeal to the representative of a judicial body, the judge of the county court. Let us take a practical view of the matter. We say, in the first place, that the preparation of the voters' list is a matter of fact proceeding, and you take the local authorities because they live on the ground and they know the people. The assessor has seen everybody, he comes in contact with everybody, and if, by accident, he leaves off a name, the chances are ten to one that some member of the council will put it on, without interference on that part of anyone; and if there is afterwards any ground of complaint there is an appeal to the county judge. Supposing you were to name a sheriff, or a warden, or some other party, how is he going to prepare the voters' lists in a county of 50,000 people, in which he probably does not know more than 2,000? The chances are that the list will be exceedingly defective. I say this law is essentially defective, no matter whether you put the appointment of the revising officers out of the hands of the Government or not, and as a first condition of justice it should be out of the hands of the Government. Apart from that, unless you have some local authority in every municipality to prepare the list, in every instance you will have a defective list, or else an enormous expense in preparing that list. It is my strong feeling and conviction, and I believe it is the feeling and conviction of every hon. member in this House, except it be some man who expects to have a friend or a partisan appointed to the position of revising officer, to prepare the lists in his behalf, that there is not a member of this House but would rather incur the expense of an ordinary election than out, or punished, because the council who appoint him are responsible to the people; and if you look at the number of appeals you will see how small the number is, compared with the total number of persons who are emyloyed in the preparation of those lists throughout the Dominion. I say, in the next place, that the preparation of the lists should be in the hands of a ministerrial, and not of a judicial officer. You do not deal with a judge as with an ordinary ministerial officer, for you cannot make him responsible if he goes wrong; you cannot punish him if he gives a wrong judgment, as you could a ministerial officer, who is responsible for his conduct. The preparation of voters' lists should, I say, be made by men who are responsible for what they do, who can be punished if they do wrong, and then an appeal should be had from this responsible ministerial officer, who prepares the lists, to a judicial officer, whose business it is to revise them, and see that names are not improperly put on or left off. It has been said by the Minister of Customs, and other hon. gentlemen on that side, that the Ontario Act has done a great wrong, in depriving non-residents of their votes. The principle of that Act is that one man should have one vote, and that is according to the principles of our constitution, that representation should be based on population. The basis of representation is ascertained by dividing the population of Quebec by 65, the number of members allowed for that Province, the number for each being about 20,000. Under such a system, why should you give 20 or 30 votes to one man, who may have his property divided into so many village lots, in different counties, while you only give one vote to another man, who has ten times as much property in one county. It is contrary to the theory of our constitution—contrary to the principle of representation by population. When an election was held, some twelve months ago, in West Middlesex, I had an opportunity of examining the voters' lists, and I found there were 128 voters who had been residents there before, but who were then residing in the State of Michigan. Now, it was possible to bring every one of those who had been placed on the roll when the assessment was made back to the riding to give their votes. There was the possibility of buying those votes; they might be bought while residing outside of the constituency. These men could vote and return, and if you should contest the election you had no means of bringing them back to give evidence, to ascertain whether there was bribery in the election or not. This non-resident voting is one of the most fruitful sources of bribery and corruption in elections. It is highly undesirable that at every election a large number of people should be brought in from the United States for the purpose of voting for members in the Parliament of Canada; and yet that has been done again and again. Now, the law of Ontario proposes to remove that, and it does so, not by disfranchising any man, but by saying no man shall have more than one vote.

Mr. SPROULE. What do you do for the electors of Toronto? You give them two. That is an exception to your rule.

Mr. MILLS. It is in this sense: that two or three members are given to one constituency, and an elector votes for the members who represent that constituency.

Mr. SPROULE. You give each elector two votes.

Mr. MILLS. Well, the hon, gentleman can make a speech when he is ready.

Mr. SPROULE. I am helping you.

Mr. MILLS. I call the attention of the committee to this fact, that there is no vote outside of a single contituency. If there are three members in a constituency, the elector will vote for the three, but that is a wholly different thing Mr. MILLS.

from allowing him to go from constituency to constituency in order to poll his vote. Whether constituencies should be separated or grouped is another and different question.

Mr. BOWELL. Why do you not carry it out in the municipal elections?

Mr. MILLS. That is a representation of property.

Mr. BOWELL. What is the difference?

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman ought to know that representation in municipal bodies is a representation of property, not of persons. Representation in this House is representation of persons, and not specially of property. In municipal bodies the principle is nearly the same as in the case of banking institutions; you deal with taxation of property, and you say that if a debt is to be incurred, unless a man has a lease running as long as the debt, he will not have a right to vote on the question of the debt.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman knows that in a city having seven wards, if a man is assessed for $200 in each ward, and there are three aldermen for each, he votes for twenty-one aldermen, but if he is assessed for $100,000 in one ward he only votes for three.

Mr. MILLS. That is a reason for changing the municipal law in that particular.

Mr. BOWELL. Well, why did you not change it?

Mr. MILLS. I am not sitting in the Local Legislature. The hon. gentleman may address this observation to me when I am defending that defect in the municipal law.

Mr. BOWELL. You just defended it on the principle that, in municipalities, there was direct taxation and the votes were given on property.

Mr. MILLS. So they are, and because it is not carried out with mathematical exactness the hon. gentleman assumes that the rule is different from what I have stated; but it is exactly what I have stated. Now, the principle of represention in England itself has undergone very great changes. When Mr. Burke was discussing the question of parliamentary reform it was pointed out to him that the county of Devonshire returned as many members as the whole kingdom of Scotland, and he defended that condition of things, because, he said, each member was returned, not for the particular locality in Devonshire, but for the whole United Kingdom; and if he was returned for his own locality the danger was that he would, in time, regard himself as simply the representative of that locality instead of the entire kingdom. Mr. Burke was combating—and a great many of the statesmen of his day held the same view the doctrine of representation by population. Sir James Mackintosh, in his Essays on Government, points out that there ought to be representation, not of population, but of classes, and that each class should be so represented that no one class, whatever might be its numbers, could command a majority in Parliament, and therefore its representatives could not devote themselves exclusively to their own particular interest. Now, the hon, gentleman who proposed this Bill-in an imperfect way it is true, and to a very limited extent-spoke in defence of this Bill on the lines indicated by Sir James Mackintosh. It was the views of the world fifty years ago and not the views of to-day-it was the constitutional system of fifty years ago and not the constitutional system we have now—that the hon gentleman put forward as his defence of this Bill. He spoke in favor of uniformity in the franchise, and the representation of different classes. Now, all that is at variance with the declaration of our constitution. Our constitution recogare not paupers the elective franchise and representation on the floor of Parliament that you give all classes representation. But when you propose to divide the community into classes, and to give representation to those different classes, then you seek to revive a condition of things that the force of the industrial changes that society is undergoing has swept away. It has gone in England. Everybody knows that the old views of parliamentary government, with regard to representation, have all been swept away, and that no one at the present day is disposed to question the propriety of the principle of representation of the people. The representation of the aristocratic class, of the mercantile class, of the manufacturing class, and of the agricultural class, is all gone. There is no defender or advocate of that view in the British Parliament. The prevailing view is the representation of the people as a unit-not a representation of the people divided into classes or orders; and in a democratic country like this, it is preposterous to seek to establish such a system: yet that is what is proposed in the section now before us. I have pointed out why that section ought not to be adopted. There will be a great cost in the preparation of the voters' lists; count the cost of 210 revising officers, of 210 clerks, of 210 constables, and all the other officers who are required, together with the cost of printing everything connected with the voters' lists, and I think $500,000 is a very moderate estimate of that expenditure. Are we in a position to incur that expenditure at the present time? Is the condition of the country, financial and otherwise, such that we ought to engage in experimental legislation of this sort, altogether apart from the pernicious features of the Bill? I say we ought not to do so. We have voters' lists now prepared for us without any additional cost to the Local Governments, and we do not require any other lists. Not a word has been said in defence of the Bill. The plea of uniformity has been abandoned.

Mr. McCALLUM. No.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman knows that it has.

Mr. McCALLUM. No, I do not.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman knows less than I supposed he did. Does he not know that in this Bill it is proposed to give the sailors and fishermen the right to vote on personal property, and it is denied to the cabmen and the owners of bank stock and the men who have money deposited in the savings banks.

Mr. McCALLUM. You can be a fisherman if you like; you are fishing for information now.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon gentleman not know there is no class entitled to vote on personal property except fishermen. Why should they be so entitled to vote, any more than cabmen, or than the men who have money deposited in the savings banks? There is no uniformity in the Bill. It is merely intended to promote the interests of party for the purposes of party, after public confidence has been withdrawn from that party.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon, gentleman any further information from the North-West?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not that I am aware of.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 18th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to enquire whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session the Franchise Bill, of which notice was given in the Speech from the Throne.

ENQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to bring before notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the fact that a return asked for some time ago has not yet been brought down, although I have asked four times respecting it. It is a return respecting the accountant of the Ministers' Department, who is now Deputy Minister of Fisheries. It involves a charge of a very serious character.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon, gentleman is speaking of any serious charge his remarks will call for a reply. He must therefore confine himself to enquiries respecting the return.

Mr. McLELAN. I was not aware that the return was in connection with a serious charge against any individual. When the hon, member called attention to it last week, I told him that the document had been sent over to the Secretary of State's Department. I have forgotten to make enquiries since; but I will do so, and have it brought down immediately.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Customs, who, I presume, is acting for the Minister of Finance, to the fact that a return, several times promised, as to savings banks, has not been brought down. It has been ordered a couple of months, and the first half, which relates to Government savings banks and to the post office savings banks also, I think might have been procured by this time.

Mr. BOWELL. I will make enquiry, and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Was there any correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government, subsequent to the 18th March, 1885, on the subject of the proposal for a change in the arrangements between the company and the Government? Was there any report from the chief engineer in connection with the matter? Was there any report from any Minister on the matter? Was there any Order in Council on the matter? Was any report from any officer of the company laid before the Government? Has the Government the balance sheets prepared by Mr. Miall, but not appended to his letter?

Mr. POPE. I thought the hon, gentlemen's question was respecting correspondence "previous" to the 18th March, 1885, and not "subsequent" to that date. I will give the hon, gentleman the information to-morrow.

Mr. BLAKE. I call attention to the fact that this question was put on the Paper on 8th May. I have already postponed it once, and now that I am asked to postpone it a second time, I hope full information will be given.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—RECEIPTS AND EXPENSES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What were the receipts and expenses of the Intercolonial Railway from the 1st day of July to the 1st day of May, in the years 1884 and 1885, respectively?

Mr. POPE. When the question was asked a few days ago, I informed the hon, gentleman that we had not received returns up to 1st May this year. The hon, gentleman then asked me to get the return for 1884.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Both were asked for.

Mr. POPE. I could not see that would be of any service to the hon. gentleman if he wants to make a comparison. Consequently, I obtained the latest information I could for the two years, namely, up to 1st April. The figures are as follows: 1884, working expenses, $1,858,760; earnings, $1,739,357; 1885, working expenses, $1,966,147; earnings, $1,727,357. The working expenses have increased this year on account of the very severe winter we experienced—the worst ever known in the experience of the Intercolonial.

GOVERNMENT LOANS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What additional sum or sums (if any) have been borrowed by the Government since the 1st day of April to the date of this enquiry, and from whom and for what length of time have they been borrowed?

Mr. BOWELL. In reply to this question, I have to inform the House that it has been deemed advisable to request the Finance Minister to proceed to England to arrange for the redemption of the 5 per cent. loan, and to provide for the short time loans, and that between the 1st of April and the date of his departure he airanged for advances to the extent of about $2,000,000, to meet the expenses of the Militia Department in connection with the North-West difficulties and the subsidy and loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, falling due under the contract in the Act of the last Session of Parliament. With regard to the latter part of the question, as to the parties with whom the arrangements were made, I have simply to repeat the answer I gave to almost a similar question a short time since—that the banks and others object to their names and the terms upon which these arrangements are made being made public, and it is not deemed advisable in the public interest that they should be given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose that answers my question up to the 8th May.

Mr. BOWELL. Practically so, although the answer I have before me says to the 1st April, in accordance with the question:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Since the 1st of April

FRENCH CANADIAN OFFICIALS IN THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES asked, How many officials are there now employed in the inside branch of the Customs Department at Ottawa? How many of these are French Canadians?

Mr. BOWELL. There are twenty-seven employés in the inside Customs Department, two of whom are French Canadians, precisely the same number that were in the Department when I took charge of it.

SERVICES OF SURGEON-GENERAL BERGIN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether Dr. Bergin, Surgeon Fisheries, in relation to s General to the volunteer forces in the North-West, is in receipt etc., purchased in Halifax?

of pay for services connected therewith, while in Ottawa drawing indemnity for parliamentary duties? If not, has pay been promised him, or is it the intention of the Government to give him pay?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame.

Mr. CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that Dr. Bergin, Surgeon General of the volunteer forces in the North-West, has rendered invaluable service to the Department of Militia, in organising the ambulance corps and the medical staff. He was required to look after our volunteers who were fighting the battles of our country. He is on active service, like any other gentleman who has joined his regiment and is now at the front, and as such he receives pay, as the other gentlemen who are now on active service receive pay.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

HALF-BREED SCRIP.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many half-breeds have been already enumerated and are declared entitled to receive scrip—(1) for 160 acres, and (2) for 240 acres, under the Order in Council of 20th April, 1885?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Order in Council of the 20th April, 1885, applicable to those who left Manitoba, provides for money-scrip redeemable in land, and twenty-six half-breed heads of families have proved themselves entitled to $160, and 422 minors, $240. There are some cases in which additional evidence is required before they are finally disposed of.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—RAILS FOR THE GOVERNMENT SECTION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government supplied the rails for the Government section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia? Whether the contractor for the construction of the railway has the right to use these rails for the transport of traffic over the unballasted line, without the consent of the Government, and on his own terms as to freight charges?

Mr. POPE. The Government did supply the rails for that portion of the road. With respect to the right of the contractor to use them, there is nothing stated in the contract with regard to it, although I have since heard considerable complaints about it. I thought of asking the opinion of my hon, friend as to the legal points, as the Minister of Justice being away I have not had an opportunity of consulting him.

Mr. BLAKE. I can tell the hon, gentleman now, that if there is nothing stated in the contract the contractor has no such right, so that there is no necessity for him sending for an opinion.

AUTOMATIC BUOY-LIVERPOOL HARBOR, N.S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to replace the automatic buoy which went adrift in November last from the entrance of Liverpool Harbor, Queen's County, N.S., this season, with another automatic buoy or a bell buoy?

Mr. McLELAN. It is intended to replace it by a bell buoy, for which tenders are now being asked.

PURCHASE OF MARINE STORES IN HALIFAX.

Mr. FORBES asked, When may I expect the return asked for on 6th March last, from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in relation to stores, galvanised and tinware, etc., purchased in Halifax?

Mr. McLELAN. When the return was moved for, the official at Halifax was instructed to send the information immediately, but as it has not been received it has been telegraphed for.

PURCHASE OF RAILWAY SUPPLIES IN HALIFAX

Mr. FORBES asked, When may I expect the return moved for 6th March last, in reference to hardware and railway supplies purchased in Halifax by the Railway Department, etc., for the Intercolonial or any other Government works?

Mr. POPE. If the return has not come down I will enquire into the matter.

PROTECTION OF LIGHTHOUSE, COFFIN'S ISLAND.

Mr. FORBES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to build a timber protection along the seaward face of the lighthouse on Coffin's Island, Liverpool Bay, during the coming season; if so, what is the estimated cost of such work?

Mr. McLELAN. The inspectors have reported in the matter, plans are being prepared, and I think they are about ready. I have not yet got an estimate of the cost.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Have the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company agreed to the terms of the resolutions of which notice has been given by the Government? When was such agreement signified to the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Protracted negotiations were going on with the authorities of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and principally with the president and vice-president, as to the relief of that company. The company desired better terms—a greater amount of relief than was finally agreed upon. The agreement was verbal, and was of course arranged finally immediately before notice was given by myself.

USE OF THE NORTH SHORE BY THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any arrangement has been made at the instance of the Government, between the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the North Shore Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the use of the North Shore Railway; for purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Negotiations have been going on between the Grand Trunk, the North Shore Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or by persons appointed by them, discussing the possibility of an arrangement. Several papers were signed, I believe, between the two companies; but they are not satisfactory to this Government, and I fancy are considered as confidential arrangements, which have not as yet resulted in any conclusion.

EMPLOYMENT OF LOUIS SCHMIDT AND OTHERS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any, and if so, which of the following persons have been in the employment of the Government in the North-West: Louis Schmidt, James Isbister, Gabriel Dumont, Moise Ouellette, Michael Dumas, all of the Prince Albert district? If so, when did such employment begin what was its nature and when did it end?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Louis Schmidt was appointed clerk in the office of Dominion Lands, Prince Albert, on the 1st of May, 1884, and has been so employed ever since. None of the others mentioned have ever been employed in the Department of the Interior—nor, so far as I know, in any other Department.

NORTH-WEST PAPERS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, When will the North-West papers be laid on the Table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are to be very soon ready, and will be brought down at once.

DOMINION LANDS-ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Have frauds and irregularities been discovered in connection with the preparation and issue of patents for Dominion lands in the Department of the Interior? Has any and which of the clerks in the Department supposed to be implicated in these matters left his situation within a short time? At what time and under what circumstances did he leave? Are his whereabouts known? Where is he supposed to be?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certain irregularities have been discovered on the part of a clerk in the Department of the Interior. These irregularities are the subject of strict investigation by the Department at the present time. It would not be in the public interest to make any further statement in connection with this matter until the investigation proceeds still further.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Has it been charged that individuals have received patents for Dominion lands, to which they were not entitled, and without authority; and that bribes have been taken by a clerk in the Department in connection with the transaction of business in the land granting branch? Have such charges been investigated?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has not been charged, nor is there, so far, any reason to believe that patents for Dominion lands have been issued to persons who have no right to them. The subject matter of the rest of the question is now under investigation.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is one aspect of this Bill which has certainly been alluded to not infrequently during the discussion, but which cannot be said to have been discussed in any proper sense; and to which I desire on the present occasion to call the attention of the committee, inasmuch as it is one which, in my opinion, affords an extremely powerful argument why the amendment of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should be adopted in place of the propositions contained in the Bill. It is one of the most remarkable circumstances attendant on the presentation of this measure, that, long as it has been discussed, most meagre explanations were given in the first instance, and exceedingly meagre explanations have been given up to date, not merely by the First Minister, but by his colleagues. With respect to various important questions connected with and arising out of the measure, I do not think that anything can show more clearly the disregard-I might almost say the insolent disregard-of the liberties of the people, than the course which has been pursued in reference to this matter. If ever a measure was presented to Parliament with regard to which the represenpossible information on every point connected therewith, it was surely this measure. Now, Sir, we have had no sort of information, more particularly from the Minister in charge, as to a great many very important points. That hon, gentleman did not give us the slightest idea when he presented this measure, how it was going to affect the various constituencies in the various Provinces. Neither did he condescend to give us any calculation whatever as to the added burthen likely to be inflicted on the people of this country, if this measure became law; and as to introducing the Bill at the period of the Session at which the hon. gentleman chose to introduce it, and in the conditions of public business which then prevailed, and as to the determination to force it through at all hazards, I need hardly remind the House that neither he nor his colleagues have condescended to give any rational or reasonable explanation; while, as to the grave constitutional questions which are involved, and which, even the youngest and least reflective members of this House must see are of far-reaching character, likely to affect the future of this country for many years, it is equally unnecessary for me to remind the House that hon, gentlemen on the Treasury benches, from first to last, have been equally reticent. No provocation, no challenge, no offers, no proposals or suggestions, which were made from this side of the Houseand he cannot deny that he has had offers and proposals and challenges enough—have had the least effect in inducing, not only the hon. gentleman himself, but his colleagues and the more prominent members of the party, to break the silence which, for reasons best known to themselves, they have seen fit to preserve on all these questions. They have not attempted, any of them, to give the slightest forecast as to how all these alterations are likely to affect the future of the electorate of this country. Probably they did not wish to do so; probably they had no desire that the attention of the House should be drawn to the enormous importance, even from a merely numerical or financial point of view, of the alterations they propose to effect. Sir, it would appear that their sole object was simply to obtain, in any shape or form, a measure which would place the electoral lists at the disposal of a number of unscrupulous political hacks. Were this measure, in place of being, as I and many other members of this House believe, an exceedingly bad measure—were it as good a measure as we conceive it to be bad—still at this moment it becomes a material question for us to decide how far this country is in a position to bear, without serious inconvenience, the additional cost which it is clear this measure is about to impose upon us. Now, I want to call your particular attention to this. There have been times in our history, no doubt, when the question of cost was of much less importance than it is to-day. There have been periods when we could have calmly con-templated the addition of several hundred thousand dollars to the annual expenditure of Canada, and have been able to show that we were in a situation to afford it without grave inconvenience. But my position is this, that there are circumstances connected with our financial position to-day which render it to the last degree inexpedient and improper that we should incur any unnecessary additional expenditure; and I propose to show you, Sir, and the committee, at some length, that the existing financial circumstances of the country are such as to afford an exceedingly strong argument in favor of the adoption of the proposition of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and against the adoption of the proposal made by the Government. Now, I somewhat regret that the extraordinary and unpre-cedented conduct of the Government has compelled me to bring up this matter in this shape and at the present moment. Had the Government, as I conceive they ought to have done, when they found that this measure could not regard to the cost and expenditure, than might have been be put through without an exceedingly protracted discus-Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

tatives of the people had the right to ask for the fullest sion, had they then proceeded to consider the general position of the finances of the country, had they gone on, as I think was their duty, with the discussion of the Estimates, we might have then, to more advantage than I can now, discussed those circumstances to which I have alluded, and which, in my opinion, make this an exceedingly improper moment for further increasing the burdens of the people. It is possible, at least, that the conduct of the Government in this respect may have been of set purpose and design. I can very well understand how they may have thought, and in particular why the First Minister may have thought, that it was better, at any cost, at any hazard, to occupy the attention of the country with this measure, which he knew full well could never be expected to pass this House without a most determined opposition, rather than allow public attention to be called to various other matters for which the Government were plainly responsible, and a discussion of which he thought, perhaps rightly, would be exceedingly inconvenient to himself and colleagues. You are aware, Sir, that although the Government, as I contend, in entire dereliction of their plain and manifest duty, have not, up to the present moment, vouch-safed any explanation whatever to the House as to the cost of this measure; although, as I have said, they have neglected to do what they should have done at the very moment this Bill took its second reading, and have not placed in possession of the House a fairly digested estimate of what the cost of this measure would be, we have had from a considerable number of gentlemen on this side, although, as far as I recollect, the matter has not been discussed from the other benches, various estimates of the probable cost of the measure, varying from $200,000 or $250,000 to $300,000 and $400,000 and $500,000. Now, I am not, at this moment, going to say which of these estimates I think, on the whole, is most likely to be verified in fact. The point to which, in the first instance, I desire to call your attention is this: that the Government, whose plain duty it was to do so, have entirely neglected to give us any information or data on which we could compute with reasonable accuracy what this measure is likely to cost us. As regards the First Minister, I dare say he neither knows nor cares what the cost of the measure may be. He has always been, within my recollection, exceedingly reckless, how any act or proposal of his may affect the financial position of the people; his motto has always been: "After me the deluge;" and I do not believe I do him any injustice at all when I say that, provided the thing lasts his time, it will give him no concern or compunction whatever to what extent the burdens of the people may be aggravated by any act of his. I took occasion, a couple of months ago or more, when the Budget of this country was under discussion, to point out to this House that I regarded the situation as one of very great gravity; I pointed out then, and no answer has been made to it from that day to this, that of one thing there could be no sort of doubt, that the debt of this country and the expenditure of this country were increasing in an exceedingly rapid ratio, out of all proportion either to the population or to the resources of the country. I further took occasion to point out that, not only had there been an exceedingly rapid increase in the expenditure of the country, but that there had been a very great and rapid diminution in the receipts from various portions of revenue; and I pointed out that, under those circumstances, we were running a very great risk, more particularly as it was well known that we were about to go into the English market, for the purpose of affecting large loans; that even a trifling accident might very seriously interfere with the calculations of the Finance Minister; and that consequently we were bound in all things we were then proposing to do to pay a much closer purposely forebore to comment at length on many things which might justly have attracted attention, because I thought it was perhaps as well that the House should see how the proposals contained, and the statements made on that occasion, would strike impartial observers at a distance; and because I was perfectly aware myself that the situation was of such gravity that, in all probability, but a very few months would elapse before even the least observant and intelligent among the supporters of the right hon, gentleman would wake up to the conviction that the whole future of this country had been very seriously put in peril by the unparallelled extravagance with which the Administration had been conducted for the past few years. If that was the case on the 3rd of March of this year-two and a half months ago-I need hardly say that the situation since that period has altered immensely for the worse; I need hardly point out to any man who sits in this House that all the calculations on which our receipts of revenue were then based have been most seriously deranged; and that enormous and probably permanent additions to the expenditure of this country have been made which it will take the best energies of the Government to provide for in any shape or manner whatever. Many of the resources on which we relied have vanished, many new demands have arisen. I am not going, at present, to base my argument at all upon the contentions made by my hon. friends behind me, or on any assumptions of my own; I am going to base my argument wholly and entirely on the the 31st March of last year we had a nominal surplus statements formally made to this House and the country by the Minister of Finance himself. I do not pretend to be responsible for these statements, I do not guarantee them, That is for the hon. gentleman's own friends, colleagues and supporters to do; but I say that their lips, at any rate, are shut in this matter, that it does not lie in their mouths to contradict the statements to which they then gave their assent; and I think that nobody who choses to pay careful attention to the statements that were then made by the Finance Minister, and who will consider how seriously our resources have been impaired and how enormously our expenditure is likely to be increased, will be disposed to gainsay my proposition that since that time circumstances have so seriously altered that we are doubly and trebly bound to see to-day that no single dollar of unnecessary expenditure be inflicted on the people of the country.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon, gentleman is going outside the question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am quoting, in proof of my statement that it is not fit or proper that any additional, unnecessary expense should be incurred, from what is equivalent to a State paper, the official statement made to us by the Finance Minister of the probable expenditure and receipts for the current year. I am going to show that these statements have been, by force of circumstances, greatly modified, and that unfortunately we are less able to incur the expenditure about to be inflicted upon us than we were then. If anything is relevant to an argument of this kind, this is relevant. If the hon gentleman will look at the report of the Finance Minister's speech, they will find that he estimated that our revenue from Customs would be $19,500,000; from excise, $5,400,000; from postal service, $1,900,000; railways and canals, $3,000,000; and here is an item to which I desire to call your attention especially:

"The interest which last year was put down at $750,000, will amount to $1,900,000, with however more than an equivalent increase on the other side, because, under the authority of this House, the Government floated a loan by which money was raised to be advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This increased, of course, the amount of interest payable by us, to a very considerable extent, but it increased on the credit side the receipts from the estimate of $750,000 to $1,900,000."

In other words, the Minister of Finance at that date expected to obtain nearly $1,200,000 from the interest due from the Canadian Pacific Railway within the current year.

"From the miscellaneous items we expect to obtain $800,000, as estimated last Session; and the lands in the North-West, from which I estimated we would obtain nearly $1,000,000, I now have to estimate at $500,000, making altogether $33,000,000 revenue with an estimated expenditure of $32,850,000. The estimated expenditure is $32,850,000, leaving $150,000 surplus for the present year."

It can hardly be expected that I, in any respect, will agree with a policy of charging $300,000 expenditure for Dominion lands to capital on one side, and crediting $500,000 in regard to receipts from Dominion lands on the other side to income; and, consequently, according to my contention, instead of a surplns, as shown by this statement, of $150,000. there would be a deficit of $350,000, even if all the other items named by the Finance Minister realised the sum which he anticipated at the close of the year. But I call your attention to this fact—I have pointed out the various items from which he expected to obtain his revenue—I now call your attention to the fact that there can be no sort of doubt, on the one hand, that the expenditure for this year, wholly apart from the expense of the expedition to the North-West, will fully equal and indeed will probably considerably exceed the $32,850,000 estimated by the Finance Minister on the 3rd March; and, in order that the House may fully understand the situation, I call your attention to the returns of the three months ending respectively on the 30th March. 30th April and 30th May, in 1884 and 1885. On the 31st March, 1884, our total revenue amounted to $23,445,000 and our expenditure to $20,691,000. In other words, on of $3,000,000. On the 30th April, the revenue amounted to $25,602,000, and the expenditure to $22,698,000, giving as before a nominal surplus of nearly $3,000,000. On the 31st May, our revenue amounted to $28,527,000 and our expenditure to $25,792,000, being again an apparent surplus of nearly $3,000,000. When, however, we came to balance accounts on the 30th June, we found that the expenditure amounted to $31,861,000 and the revenue to $31,107,000. So the apparent surplus of $3,000,000 had shrunk to one of $754,000. I am not going to detain the committee by pointing out that a great deal of that surplus was really fictitious, and that a more accurate statement would have reduced it enormously, if not disposed of it altogether, but I do desire to call attention to this: that, whereas on the 31st March and 30th April, 1884, we had an apparent surplus of nearly $3,000,000 in this present year, though the receipts were about precisely the same, our surplus of $3,000,000 has shrunk to barely $1,000,000, and that our expenditure is quite $2,000,000 in excess of our expenditure of last year, and that there is the strongest probability, apart altogether from the cost of the North-West expedition, that our ordinary expenditure for the year 1885 will exceed that of 1884 by $2,000,000. The figures show that our revenue on the 31st March, 1885, was $23,249-000, and our expenses $22,525,000, being very nearly $2,000,000 more than on the corresponding day of On the 30th April, the revenue amounted to $25,-717,000 and the expenditure to $24,687,000, showing as nearly as possible there also a difference of $2,000,000 between the expenditure of 1884 and in 1885. You will also observe that our revenue remains constant, although that is largely due, as the Finance Minister explained, to the increased amount of interest we receive on certain investments. Still, taking it altogether, it remains constant. At the same time, there is an increase of $2,000,000 in our expenditure, and, when you recollect that our nominal surplus was barely $750,000 and that no provision has been made to bring in any increased revenue, and that the Minister does not himself estimate any increased revenne, you will see that I am perfectly correct in my statement that the probabilities are that, wholly apart from the expenditure on the North-West expedition, there will be a deficit on the 1st July of not less than $1,250,000. In 1884, our expenditure amounted to $31, 107,706. If you add the $2,000,000 additional which we are known to have expended up to the 1st May and the vote which we passed of $700,000, according to the Government's own statements and according to the votes passed at their instance, we are likely to expend not less than $33,807,000 for the service of this present year. And, if the receipts for 1875 remain as at present, precisely similar to those of 1884, and amount to $31,861,000, we would have a total deficit, on the Finance Minister's own showing, of not less than $1,945,000, a circumstance which, I contend, adds enormous force to the strong arguments laid already before the House by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr.Charlton) against substituting a most expensive mode of registration and of compiling voters' lists, for the cheap and expeditious mode which we, at present, possess. I repeat that in all probability, further expenses will be incurred, but I prefer throughout to base my argument entirely on the facts which the Government, speaking through their authorised Minister, have laid before the House. If they know of any reason why these facts should not be held good, if they have any ground to present to this Parliament showing that the expenditure will be less, or that the receipts will be more, I call upon those gentlemen to rise and to give us their reasons for entertaining such opinion. Until they do so, I must persist in pointing out that, even on the Finance Minister's own showing, we are threatened, in the year 1885, with a deficit amounting in round numbers to $2,000,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You might add another $500,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I will not add any more than what is in sight; I desire to understate rather than overstate the case; and for that reason, I confine myself to those statements, which can be clearly deduced from the statement of the Finance Minister himself, and from the other official information which the Government Well, Sir, I pointed out, even at that have laid before us. time, that we have really a deficit of $350,000, and I may observe that, if the estimate made by the Finance Minister of $500,000, which he expected to receive from Dominion lands, be not realised, then it is quite clear the receipts will be considerably less, and the deficit will be larger than I have stated. I have come, on this occasion, to take the receipts of last year for the reason that, up to the present time, our receipts exactly that there is every reason, judging from the Finance Minister's own statement, to anticipate a deficit of $2,000,-000, or thereabouts, in the present year. But when we come to the much more serious consideration of how recent events are going to affect our position next year, then the case becomes very much stronger—I may truly say, almost overwhelmingly strong, in favor of the contention of my hon. friend for North Nortolk. Sir, it must be remembered that the Finance Minister himself, in the calculation which he submitted to this House, as showing his probable receipts and expenditures for the year 1886, did not venture to estimate that he would have one farthing of a surplus except from the sum that he expected to receive from North-West lands. His statement is as follows:-

"The estimate for the current year and next year of the proceeds from lands in the North-West amounts to $700,000. Our expenditure is estimated at $31,757,000, leaving an estimated surplus—

On the supposition that he would receive this $700,000. " of $1,247,000."

He says afterwards:

"The Supplementary Estimates may reduce this surplus to $700,000." Now, you will observe, the Finance Minister, unless he receives $700,000 from capital account for the year 1886, barely expected that he would be able to make both ends he is barely able to make both ends meet under the circummeet. You will further observe that in expecting to make stances— Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

both ends meet, he relied on receiving, at least, one million and a quarter, or one million and a-half, as interest, from his statement here, from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the members of this House, I want to ask any independent-minded man from one end of this country to the other, is there a rational human being to be found in Canada to-day, who believes that the Finance Minister, as matters now exist, looking at the circumstances which have since transpired, can with any degree of safety reckon on a receipt of a million and a half dollars from the Canadian Pacific Railway during the year 1886, unless, indeed, the Government advances the money to pay that interest. If the Government choose to go through that feat of legerdemain, if the Government choose to hand to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company one, two, three, five or ten millions of dollars, for the purpose of enabling them to pay the interest due to us, then, Sir, that thing may be done; but otherwise, as every man in the country knows, the whole of that million and a half must be struck out of the expected receipts of the Finance Minister, as must also, I believe, the whole sum of $700,000, or, at any rate, very much larger part of the $700,000 which he expected to receive from Dominion lands, and which he proposed, improperly, in my judgment, to charge to the credit of ordinary receipts, while, at the same time, he was charging the expenditure to capital account on the other side. Now, there is another thing to be taken into account. We have propositions laid on the Table but not yet discussed by which it becomes-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I am afraid you are going a little too far.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Sir, I am pointing out to you the strong reasons which exist for refusing to lay upon the people of Canada the additional burdens which this Act will inevitably impose; and in order to do that, I must show you, Mr. Chairman-I am doing it with extreme brevity; I could extend this to almost any extent, if so disposed—I must show you what are the burthens which the Government themselves have stated that they propose to impose upon this country. Now, we know perfectly well that we are going to be asked to add about a quarter of a million of dollars to our permanent debt for the purpose of providing for a loan of $5,000,000, or more, to the Canadian correspond with those of last year. I have pointed out Pacific Railway Company. You must, therefore, add to the expenditure which I have mentioned, a quarter of a million more for the expected grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and I am sorry to say you must make up your minds for several years to come, to incur a very large unforeseen expenditure in maintaining law and order in the North-West. We have, Sir, also, a proposition from the Government, which will add, probably, half a million to our annual expenditure for an additional force of mounted police. It is perfectly well known that a very considerable additional expenditure will also have to be incurred for the maintenance of other garrisons in that territory for a considerable time. Those I estimate, and I place the sum within the mark, at $500,000 more; and no hon. member who has paid the smallest attention to the question of the Indians or to the position in which we stand with respect to the Indians of the North West to-day, will, I think, rise to dispute my proposition: that the expected reduction of half a million which was to be made in the Indian grant is entirely illusory; that in place of spending $700,000 or thereabouts as we expected to expend for 1886, we shall have to spend $1,200,000 or so, which was the amount heretofore for that service. The result of all that is this: that the Finance Minister's calculation has been disturbed in two different directions; that while

Mr. McCALLUM. I submit that the hon gentleman is out of order. He is giving a financial statement which has nothing to do with the question before the committee. If the hon gentleman's object is, and I hardly think it is, obstruction, then well and good. No doubt he belongs to the obstructionist party.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand the hon. member takes the point of order that a financial statement, which the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) was making, is not pertinent to the subject before the Chair, and is therefore out of order. As I understand it, the hon. gentleman's line of argument is this: By the propositions in this Bill, the Government are proposing to add to the annual burdens of the people about half a million of money a year. The hon, gentleman says we cannot afford to do that; the country is not in a position to do it, because the burdens of the country have been so enormously increased within the last few years, and are now so great that our financial position will not stand it. Surely that is a fit subject for discussion. It appears to me to be a pertinent subject, an essential subject before we pass this legislation; and that, before we pass such legislation, we should thoroughly understand whether or not the financial aspect of the country would fairly warrant the additional expenditure asked. How can you decide that question unless you ascertain by facts and figures the exact financial position of the country now. I find the point laid down in Cushing, who I suppose is an authority, as he is quoted in the valuable work by Mr. Bourinot. At page 634 I find the doctrine laid down. And here let me say that I think the hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) is about the last man who should raise the point of order as to taking up the time of the House.

Mr. McCALLUM. I want nothing but what is fair and right.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman is out of order himself.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That has nothing to do with the question before the committee.

Mr. CAMERON. This authority shows how far a member of the English House of Commons was allowed to go in discussing a substantive proposition before the House. He says:

"The question was whether that Parliament was to be dissolved and the members sent back to their constituents because they had pronounced an opinion that the English representation should not be reduced."

The petition was a petition in favor of the Reform Bill.—

"Being called to order, on the ground that there was no question before the House on which they could be addressed in that manner, the Speaker, Mr. Manners Sutton, said: 'The question arising out of the petition was parliamentary reform. The question for him to decide was whether or not the observations of the members speaking had a proper application to that question; not whether he had strictly adhered to what was contained within the four corners of the petition, but whether the general tenor and scope of his speech did not come within the subject matter introduced to the House by a petition on the subject of reform; and he must say that, according to his opinion of the rules and orders of that House, he could not see that the observations of the member were not applicable to it.'"

I submit that any question that affects the financial position of this country as bearing upon the proposition contained in the Bill, is pertinent to the Bill itself. The authority I am quoting goes on further to say:

"So where a member addressing the House on the subject of a petition complaining of distress was called to order on the ground of the irrelevancy of his remarks, the Speaker, Mr. Manners Sutton, said that 'when a petition was on the Table, complaining of distress, it was very difficult to say what members should not speak of as occasioning that distress. He could not, therefore, support the member in rising to order.""— machinery for making out voters' lists; it provides for a new class of electorate, and must necessarily entail additional expenditure. In fact, I believe the First Minister has a resolution before the House in connection with the increased expenditure. Surely it is a proper question as to whether the country is able to stand the expenditure, and whether the Government have, by their extravagance, reckless and unnecessary expenditure so added to the public burdens that we cannot afford it. That is clearly a pertinent argument which can be used against the Bill. The authority whom I am quoting goes on to say:

Further, by this proposition, the expenditure of the country, burdens of the people must necessarily be increased. The Bill provides new man is quite in order.

authority whom I am quoting goes on to say:

"In another case when a petition has been presented for the better observance of the Lord's day, and a member, in speaking upon it, took occasion to make some remarks upon two petitions of a similar description presented the day before, and upon the motives of the petitioners, the member was called to order on the ground that it was disorderly to impute motives to the petitioners, whose petition was presented on a former night and was not then before the House. The Speaker, Mr. Manners Sutton, said, that, with respect to the reference of a petition presented on a former day, if it were on the same subject as the present petition he could not say, that, applying motives to those petitioners was disorderly. In all these matters, a good deal must be left to the good sense, the good feeling, the taste and the propriety of hon. members themselves. If then a member is called to order on the ground of the irrelevancy of his remarks, all that can be said is that it does not appear in what manner his remarks are applicable to the question, the member will be allowed to proceed; the Speaker sometimes reminding him of the terms of the question, or informing him under what circumstances his remarks would or would not be in order. Thus, a member being called to order on the ground that the member interrupting him could not see in what manner the circumstances he was mentioning could apply to the question before the House, the Speaker, Mr. Manners Sutton, said, that he took it for granted that the member would bring his observations to bear upon the motion before the House, and that he meant to make some proposition for the consideration of the House."

That is the position here. The hon, member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is discussing the financial position of the country. And he says that with the enormous burthens on the people you cannot afford this additional burthen of $500,000 a year, or whatever it may be. Surely that is pertinent.

"So, again, a member being called to order and enquiry made of the Speaker, whether the argument of the member, with respect to the monarchy and the House of Lords, had anything to do with the question before the House, the Speaker said, that 'if the member made the supposition alluded to for the purpose of reviving a discussion which had already been terminated, he was out of order; but if he considered his supposition pertinent to the question before the House, he was quite in order."

When the remarks of a member are strictly relevant to the subject of the question, but are extended into a wider range than seems necessary, the member will nevertheless be allowed to proceed, unless restrained by the House. Thus, where, on the motion for the production of a paper relating to the volunteer force a debate on the general subject ensued, and a member rose to order, and objected that if the motion was merely for the production of papers, it was wrong to go into the subject of it (the volunteer force) at such length, the Speaker, Mr. Abbott, ruled that:

"The motion had certainly branched out into a more general range than such a motion seemed to require; but, it was in the discretion of the House to permit or restrain such extraneous proceedings; he did not feel warranted in interfering to check it before, and he did not now."

Now, I say that those authorities make it clear that the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has a perfect right, in view of the fact that you are proposing by this Bill, admittedly, to incur an enormous additional expense—he has a right to point out that you are not in a position to do so, that the country cannot stand it, because by the course you have been pursuing for the last ten years the burden of the country and its annual expenditures have very largely increased. I say that is an argument which comes properly under the 3rd clause, when the Government proposes to introduce a new franchise and thereby to increase the burdens of the people. I submit that the hon. gentleman is quite in order.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon, member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has taken the opportunity of making a long speech upon the point of order. I contend that this question of expense was all discussed on the second reading, and I hope, if the hon. member for South Huron wishes to go over the entire expenditure of the country for the last forty years, that he will take another time to deliver his financial statement. Until to-day the obstruction which has been going on in the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MULOCK. On Saturday, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) discussed for the information of the committee the probable cost of putting this measure into operation, which he estimated altogether at $100,000. The financial view of this measure has been discussed on both sides of the House, and almost every hon. gentleman who has spoken has been permitted to treat the question from a financial standpoint. It has been admitted throughout the debate that this Bill would involve an expenditure of public money, and if at this stage of the debate we are not allowed to proceed on that line, we will have a most incomplete debate. It has been conceded that this Bill will cost a large sum annually to put it in force, a sum which will add permanently to the capital debt of the country, and if that is the case, surely it is perfectly germane to this motion for us to stop and look at our resources and see if we are able to put this Bill in force. Surely, we are entitled to take the same view of the measure which a prudent man would take, if he contemplated embarking in any enterprise, such as building a house. Such a man sits down and counts the cost, he sees what resources he has, what other claims he has upon him, what debts he owes, and the necessary expenditure he is liable for. If he is a prudent man, does he not consider all these matters before he embarks in a new enterprise, especially if it is one which is not necessary, or, at all events, is of doubtful utility. Under these circumstances I can scarcely conceive of anything more germane to this measure than the consideration of the resources of the country. It has not been conceded that the Bill was necessary, and the question is: Can we afford to adopt such a measure? Instead of this point being discussed, in this third or fourth week of the debate, it might better have been discussed at an early stage, but it is never too late to mend, and in view of the turn which the debate has taken, it is better that we should discuss this important feature late than never. Supposing we put this view of it—that there is no money in the exchequer, what becomes of your Bill? It could not be put in force, because it is admitted by all that it involves the expenditure of money to put in force.

Mr. MILLS. You have in your hands a proposition to adopt a new franchise with new machinery, and another proposition to retain the provincial franchise. One of the arguments pressed on the committee by the hon, member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the propriety of adhering to the provincial machinery, which costs the Dominion nothing, and, for the purpose of showing the desirability of adhering to the provincial franchise, my hon. friend has undertaken to point out what was the present financial condition of the country. That was a perfectly legitimate proceeding on his part, for if he can show that the finances of the country are in an unfavorable condition, and that the country is financially in straitened circumstances, that would be an additional reason for our rejecting this third clause and adopting the amendment. It is perfectly obvious that there is nothing in the point of order raised by the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum), and that my hon. friend from Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is adhering strictly to the rules of debate in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Cameron (Huron).

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think that the remark of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) had a bearing on the question, when he said that, if a man was commencing to build a house, he would count the cost; for we took into consideration that question when we adopted the principle of the Bill, by passing the second reading, and we are now perfecting the details. I cannot, therefore, understand how the minute financial statement which the hon. gentleman was making had any reference to the qualification of voter. If his argument is applicable to this question at all, it would be on the second reading of the Bill. I think there has been great latitude shown with reference to this debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Longitude you mean.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman spoke of its never being too late to mend, but I certainly think it is time they were commencing to mend. The principle of the Bill was fully discussed on the second reading, several amendments were offered and voted down, the principle was carried, and in committee we are now perfecting details.

Mr. BOWELL. It strikes me that the precedents read by the hon, member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) are If I understand him, not relevant to the present subject. the points to which he directed his attention and the decisions which were given upon them, were with reference exclusively to debates which took place in the House with the Speaker in the Chair, and not in committee where the debates are more restricted in their character, though members addressing themselves to the subject can speak as Those who have paid any attention often as they please. to parliamentary practice, know that when the Speaker is in the Chair, and any new principle is brought before the House, you can discuss it at any length. And you can bring in almost any subject or point which has reference to the subject before the House. But I think, on consultation of parliamentary authorities, it is very clearly laid down that, after the principle of a measure has been affirmed by the House, as this has been, then the House goes into committee, and as each clause is taken up for consideration, you must confine yourself to the subjects involved in that clause. The proposition now before us is that contained in the third clause, to adopt certain qualifications for voting, with the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk to retain the provincial franchises, and the amendment thereto by the hon. member for West Elgin to exempt Ontario from the operation of the Bill. These I think are the questions now before the House, and the only question it appears to me for the Chair to decide is whether the elaborate statement now being made by the member for South Huron upon the finances of this country is at all relevant to those questions. I know it was argued by the hon. member for Bothwell just now that as the proposition is to exempt Ontario from the operation of the Bill, therefore the country would save whatever expense is to be incurred by the new system. Whether that argument is legitimate or not, it is for the Chair to decide, and whether the course pursued by the ex-Finance Minister is strictly within his right. If I were uncharitable, and if it were not unparliamentary, I might say that I thought he had some other object in view; but that would not be arguing the point now before the House. I rose expressly for the purpose of pointing out that the precedents read from the authorities by the hon. member for West Huron were not at all pertinent to the question before the House. Apart from that, I do not believe any good can result, particularly at the present time, from the statement which the member for South Huron is attempting to get before the country, and I believe he has other objects in view than the Franchise Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. The motion I had the honor to place in your hands was to the effect that it would be in the public interest to retain the provincial franchises instead of substituting for them a Dominion franchise. That resolution was based upon certain reasons, and one of these reasons is that it would be a saving of public expense to retain the provincial franchises. Sir, that is one of the most powerful arguments that can be offered in favor of that motion. Nothing more pertinent could be brought before the Chair than the question as to whether the financial position of the Dominion warrants us in incurring the expense that my amendment proposes we should not incur; and in order to make up our minds on that question, it is reasonable and proper that an examination of the financial position of the Dominion should be made. I think nothing could be more pertinent to the question than the very statement of the hon. member for South Huron.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It seems to me that the test to apply as to whether this discussion is in order or not, is the discussion which it is likely to lead to. Everybody will admit that it is quite pertinent to the discussion of this question to say that this country is heavily burdened, and that we cannot incur additional expenditure; but it is an entirely different thing when an hon, gentleman undertakes to deal with the Pacific Railway policy and the burdens which it is going to bring upon us, with the North-West policy and the expenditures connected with that, with the general proposition of the Budget Speech delivered by the Finance Minister, and the disappointments which current events are likely to bring to the country through the expectations held forth in that speech not being realisedall these questions are involved, unless they are prevented from going to the country, and, what is worse, going across the Atlantic to head off the Finance Minister, whose success depends more thoroughly and completely upon misstatements not being uttered upon the floor of Parliament without an answer than almost anything else; so that you will see that by permitting that kind of discussion you are going to have a discussion, not on the Franchise Bill at all, not on the qualification of voters in towns and villages, but upon the Pacific Railway policy and the whole financial position of this country; and if, under these circumstances, you can possibly permit an elaboration of argument upon questions of that kind, such as the ex-Finance Minister has ventured to indulge in to-day, without being interrupted up to this time, then all I can say is that upon going into committee upon any Bill, a member can discuss anything he pleases. The House of Commons has determined, by assenting to the principle of this Bill, that it will have a Dominion franchise upon the general lines of this Bill; it has submitted that Bill to this committee to arrange the details; we are bound by the reference which has been made to us; and while I think a great deal of the discussion upon this question has been utterly out of order, the question of order has not come so prominently forward as it comes to-day, when we are at the third week of this discussion-

Some hon. MEMBERS. The fourth.

Mr. WHITE—and when we are presented with a new class of argument altogether, which hon. gentlemen now tell us is the chief ground of opposition to this Bill. think there can be no doubt whatever, if the rule is to be allowed to permit that kind of discussion, that there is no means of progressing with measures before Parliament. The rules of Parliament are based upon the assumption that we are all gentlemen, influenced by the courtesies that characterise gentlemen, and that we will not attempt, by means of a strained interpretation of the rules, to impose inconvenience on members, or permit a violation of the large additional annual expenditure on the country, and to manifest intent of the rules of Parliament; but up to this say it is not relevant to discuss our ability to bear this time that has hardly been the result of this discussion. Increased expense seems to me absurd. In fact, if any one Certainly, if this is to be permitted to go on, we shall have were to attempt to deny it was necessary that we should have subjects, greatly to the detriment of the progress of public business, and greatly to the detriment, I believe, of the interests of the country as well.

Mr. DAVIES. I failed to follow the argument of the hon. gentleman fully. If I understand it, it amounts to this: That because the House has acceded to the second reading of the Bill, there will be no opportunity of discussing thoroughly the questions involved in the clause before the Chair, and the two amendments are out of order. He says: You have acceded to the principle of the Bill; therefore it is not reasonable to argue whether or not you should adopt the provincial franchises or the new franchise proposed in the Bill—that is what it amounts to. We are now considering whether the machinery proposed in the Bill should be adopted by the House; it is admitted that the carrying out of that machinery will involve a very large expenditure of money; the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk says that money can be saved by the adoption of the provincial franchises, and that the expenditure of that amount of money in the present condition of the country is unjustifiable. Therefore it is not only proper that we should discuss it, but it is necessary. Supposing that the hon, member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) proves to the satisfaction of the committee that the financial condition of the country is such that it will not justify the expenditure of $200,000 or $300,000 additional a year—what then? Are we not to discuss that? It is not only pertinent, but it is also necessary. No person who listened to the hon. Minister of Customs can doubt the kindliness of the motives which prompted him to state that the hon. member for South Huron had some ulterior object in view; everybody who knows the hon. gentleman knows he had the kindest motive in suggesting that. Suppose it were necessary to thoroughly discuss the financial condition of the country, would not such discussion be in the interest of the country, if it were proved that this proposed additional expenditure of $200,000 or $300,000 was both unnecessary and improvident? That is the point. Hon. gentlemen opposite may have, as the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) put it, the right to reply. Doubtless it will be necessary, but what the committee has to discuss is not whether certain time will have to be taken up or not in making a reply, but whether the discussion is pertinent and necessary; and inasmuch as the discussion involves the decision of the question whether we can afford this extra expenditure or not, it is not only pertinent and proper but it is the only means by which we can arrive at a fair and honest conclusion, and is therefore absolutely necessary.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The question is not only whether the remarks of the hon, member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) are relevant. I think the case is very much stronger than that; there cannot be two opinions as to their being relevant. They certainly could not be ruled out of order on that point; but they are more than relevant, they are positively necessary. The Bill con-templates a great annual increase in the expenditure of the country, and various figures have been given. We cannot arrive at a definite conclusion as to the cost until we have the figures placed before us by the Government, but hon-gentlemen on the Government side who have at all entered into detail of the cost have estimated it from $75,000 to $100,000. We believe this to be far below the mark but are not arguing it now. It is conceded on both sides that the rejection of the amendment of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) will entail inevitably a very to go into the discussion of an entirely different line of such discussion, he would be taking an indefensible position,

It would be necessary, not only to discuss our financial condition, but to discuss it minutely for this reason: Not only the present condition, but the prospective condition of the country will be affected by this measure, because the expenditure it will create will be an additional annual expenditure, and not an expenditure simply for one year; it will be an expenditure that will go on until the law is repealed. As to the statements which my hon. friend from South Huron will make will call for a reply or not is a matter which must be left to hon. gentlemen opposite. If they cannot deny the position taken by the hon. member for South Hurnn, and contend that under that condition they are justified in creating this additional expense, of course they will have to defend it; if, on the other hand, they consider the statements of the hon. gentleman and his conclusions incorrect, it will be their bounden duty to point that out and if they fail the responsibility will be upon them. The point of order is this: Is it proper for the hon. member for South Huron to point out that he is in favor of the amendment moved by the hon, member for North Norfolk, on the grounds that the Bill will add a large amount to our burdens which, in our present financial condition, it is both unnecessary and inexpedient to add, and which, by the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk, will be saved to us.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I cannot follow the argument of the hon, member who has just sat down. I submit that the discussion into which the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) proposes to enter strikes at the very root of the Bill, and this is not the time for such When the Bill was before the House on the second reading was the time for the hon, gentleman to discuss that question. It is a part of the principle of the Bill that it is going to cost a certain amount of money; and when that Bill was discussed on the second reading, it was affirmed that we should have the Bill and that the cost was not to interfere with our having it. Now the hon, gentleman wishes to discuss on the amendment of the hon, member for North Norfolk the whole question of the finances of the country. I submit with great deference to hon. gentlemen opposite that such discussion is not in order, because it strikes at the very foundation of the Bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, and I dare say they have got it into their heads, because they have been allowed to go beyond the proper limits in discussing this measure-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I submit nevertheless that if this discussion is allowed to continue and this point is carried, as suggested by an hon. member from one of the ridings of Prince Edward, then as a matter of course, the Bill must be thrown out; whereas it has been read the second time and its principle affirmed.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. There is no question about the amendment before the committee being in order and regular. There is an amendment which virtually embraces the proposition of substituting the provincial systems and qualifications for the Dominion system as proposed in this clause 3 of the Bill. The question of expense naturally arises under that, and a reference to it can certainly be made; a reference to it has been permitted, and a large amount of latitude has been taken and given during the debate. At the same time I think the question of expense is but a subsidiary one, and I do not think it would be regular for an hon. member to make it a pretext, or a reason and ground, for entering into a full elaboration of the financial condition of the country. I raised the question as to the relevancy, or rather as to whether the hon. gentleman was not referring to a previous debate, and I permitted a short reference to former debates as it bears very largely on the question of expense, and I think the hon, member for South Huron cannot now be called strictly to order; but, at appreciated the result of my ruling, because to go fully into Mr. PATERSON (Brant.)

the same time, my ruling is this: That an elaboration of the financial condition of the country would be out of order, and that only in so far as it affects the main question before the House can a discussion of our financial condition be permitted. I would ask the hon. gentleman to bear that in mind in further discussing this point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If permitted to say so, I will recall to your recollection, Sir, the fact that I stated in the fullest and most emphatic manner what my intentions were before I proceeded and called your attention to the point. I do not propose to discuss the financial condition of the country in what is called minute detail, but I do propose to point out the expenditure and the probable burdens that will be laid on the people and also to point out how much those burdens have been increased by certain unforeseen circumstances which were not in the mind of the Finance Minister and which may not have been in the mind of the First Minister when he introduced this measure, and I do so on the ground that I called your attention to it. I do so because my contention is that even if this measure were a good one, in the present condition of the country the question of expense has assumed a vast importance. Within those limits I will make my remarks as short as I can, but you will see that they cover a considerable amount of ground; if it be your decision I may go on those lines, on those lines I will go on, and you will judge how far I exceed them or not. If it be your decision that I am not to go on upon these lines, I will have to make some other arrangements.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. When the hon. gentleman travels beyond the clause under discussion I will take leave to call him to order. When he goes beyond the discussion of the condition of the country as affected by the expenses of this Bill, or the expenses which it is supposed will be caused by this Bill, I shall ask him to stop, because I do not think that an elaborate statement of the financial condition of the country, which would then become the main question of the discussion instead of the provisions of this Bill, could be permitted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I must go on and see where your views and mine coincide. I had pointed out, when my hon. friend from Monek called your attention to the question of order, that, according to the Government's own official statements, a very serious deficit for the year 1885 was impending. I had pointed out that that was a circumstance that must be taken into account in deciding on the advisability of adopting the suggestion of my hon. friend from Norfolk. I am going to point out that the case for 1886 is much worse than that for 1885, and that therefore a much stronger case can be presented in regard to that year against the proposition of the Government and in favor of the proposition of my hon. friend from Norfolk than could heretofore have been supposed. I call the attention of the Government especially to it because I suppose they have not been able to pay sufficient attention to it. I am aware that there is a great and growing disposition in members of Government to pay attention to their own Departments alone, and, knowing that some of them, and the Prime Minister in particular, are rather reckless in regard to any questions of finance, I desire to draw especial attention to it. In 1886, the calculations of the Finance Minister were sure to have been disturbed by two very important circumstances, one that the large amount of revenue he had calculated on receiving from Dominion lands in the North-West cannot be expected, and the other that the interest due by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company-

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But cannot he ask a question? Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. PATERSON. Simply ask a question?

Mr. CAMERON. Well, Sir-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled, and therefore the hon, gentleman will be out of order in referring to the ruling.

Mr. CAMERON. I only want to know how far your ruling goes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman has heard my ruling, as other hon, gentlemen have heard it.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, it has been—

Mr. CHARLTON. Can be not raise another point of order?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose I am still permitted to appeal to the House. I regret to say that my view is different from yours, and the question is one of so much practical importance that I think it is sufficient to justify me in appealing to the House.

Mr. PATERSON. It is not that, Mr. Chairman-

Committee rose, and House resumed.

Mr. DALY (Chairman of committee). I have to report from Committee of the Whole, that the member for South Huron having, in the course of his remarks on clause 3 and the amendments thereto proposed by Mr. Charlton and Mr. Casey, discussed at length the financial position of the country as pertinent to the subject under consideration, a question of order arose, whereupon I ruled that reference to the expenditure of the country, except as a subsidiary question, could not be allowed, and that a full and elaborate statement of the financial condition of the country was out of order, which decision the committee has desired me to report to the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Am I permitted to——Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. PATERSON. Am I permitted to make one remark?

Mr. SPEAKER. No, the question is simply an appeal to the House. I must take the report of the Chairman as to what the point of order is.

Mr. PATERSON. I just wish to remark that I understood from you, the last time this course was pursued, that you ruled that the Chairman of the Committee should have the point to be submitted to you, argued, and that has not been done.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chairman of the committee has ruled, that, in discussing the 3rd clause of the Bill, now in committee, a reference to the financial position of the country is allowable as a subsidiary question, but that a full and exhaustive discussion of the finances of the country, is out of order; from which an appeal has been made to the House. The question is, shall the ruling of the Chairman be sustained.

House divided on the ruling of the Chairman of Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, in obedince to your decision, sustained by the House, I shall not proceed with this discussion; but I take this opportunity of stating to hon gentlemen opposite, that I think this matter is so important that I shall, on the earliest possible opportunity when the rules of the House will permit, complete the discussion which, according to your ruling, I cannot now proceed with.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There are two aspects in which I wish to discuss this clause and the amendments thereto, namely, the practice of Parliament, and the duty of the Government. I propose to point out the duty of this Government, or the duty of any Government, in submitting to Parliament a measure of the revolutionary character which is involved in this Bill. I propose to discuss this aspect of the Bill in the light of English history, and the practise of the English Parliament, and I wish to show that the Government in introducing this measure, have not followed the practice of English statesmen. I propose to show by the clearest authority on constitutional practice, that the course of the Government with respect to this Bill is not sanctioned by the history of similar legislation in the English Parliament, nor, so far as I am aware, by any previous legislation in this Parliament. I propose showing, in the second place, that the franchise proposed by this Bill is not the best franchise. Now, the first step suggested is to enquire, what is the duty of the Government, if they are to follow the example of the English Parliament? It is stated by hon gentlemen opposite, that a large majority of the representatives of the people in Parliament having approved of the principle of this Bill by assenting to its second reading, that therefore it is the duty of the minority quietly to submit, no odds what their own views may be, as to the injudiciousness or the injustice of this Bill. Now, Sir, as a general rule, one may admit that, in matters of ordinary legislation, I had urged that he, in order to cut off discussion upon this Mr. SPRAKER.

the proposition is correct that the voice of the majority in Parliament ought to be submitted to cheerfully and gracefully. But I say there are questions, and there are times in the history of the country, of such gravity with respect to legislation changing the constitution, or making changes in the fundamental principles upon which the constitution is founded, that it becomes the imperative duty of the representatives of the people in Parliament to consider with the greatest possible care the necessity of such legislation; and if the minority think that such legislation is not in the public interest, it becomes the imperative duty of the minority to protest in the strongest possible way known to the constitution and to parliamentary practice and usages, against such a proposition. We, the Opposition, although we are charged with having obstructed this legislation, say we have not done so. We have discussed this important question in the sense I have just indi-We propose to discuss it in the same way to the end. We thoroughly believe its principles are bad, that its details are vicious, and so believing, although a majority of the representatives in Parliament have pronounced in favor of the principle of the Bill, we think we are within our rights and doing what is only proper for us to do, representing as we believe we do the voice of the majority of the people, in protesting against this Bill. We know as a matter of fact and as a matter of history that majorities are not always right. We know on the contrary that as a general rule that majorities are wrong, that they are seldom right. We know further that majorities are not only not always right, but majorities are occasionally tyrannical. The committee will recollect what Mr. Gladstone, in one of his great orations, said upon this point: The tyranny of the majority was detestable and odious. We see that the tyranny of the majority of the representatives in Parliament is detestable and odious. They have no ground for pursuing the course they have been pursuing during the last five weeks; no warrant from the people for taking the course they are taking with respect to this Bill; and to deal with it in Parliament without the voice of the people having been pronounced in favor of it, is absolute tyranny on the Opposition. Thoroughly approving the doctrine laid down by Mr. Gladstone, we oppose this Bill. We have opposed it in the past and we propose to oppose it until it becomes the law of the land. An hon. member on the other side of the House, laid down a very simple rule as to the duties and responsibilities of the representatives of the people in Parliament. According to that hon, gentleman's primitive views as to the responsibility of the representatives of the people, we are here simply as recording scribes of the decrees of any administration that may occupy the Treasury Benches for the time being. We do not so believe and understand our duties in Parliament. As representing the people, and in this respect we believe we represent the majority of them, we think we have higher and nobler duties to discharge, and we propose to oppose this Bill and to discuss it upon its principles and details according to the light we possess. We heard some evenings ago from the First Minister warnings. We were appealed to by the right hon, gentleman to cease discussing this Bill. We were threatened, or half threatened at all events, by the First Minister that our discussion upon this Bill was verging upon the dangerous. We were reminded it is true in very delicate language, but all the same, we were reminded of the fact that in England there was such a thing as a clôture, that the United States Congress had adopted the gag law, which was more effectual in preventing a thorough and exhaustive discussion upon a given proposition than even the English cloture. Parliament is reminded by the First Minister that many of his followers, Now, Sir, as a general many of his followers in Parliament and out of Parliament, Bill, should adopt either the English cloture or the American gag law. We have been reminded over and over again of it, not only by the First Minister, but by the press supporting hon gentlemen opposite. The Montreal Gazette, the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite in the Province of Quebec, delicately told us there was such a thing as the clôture in England, and it might not be improper to have a clôture in Canada. We were told by the Toronto Mail that there was another and more summary and more effective way of ending this discussion in Parliament. We were threatened with an army of 5,000 men to dispose of the people's representatives on this side of the House, and when they were disposed of, the First Minister could pass his Bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think the hon, gentleman is in order.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why not?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. These remarks are irrelevant to the question before the committee.

Mr. CAMERON. We are discussing the details of the Bill. The First Minister reminded us the other day The Montreal that there was such a thing as clôture. Gazette reminded us of the same thing; and the Mail, the organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite, threatened us.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That matter is not under consider-

Mr. CAMERON. What I am pointing out is, that not only are hon, gentlemen opposite trying to force this legislation through Parliament

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. If you rule, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot state that the Mail newspaper said that if we do not cease our opposition we will hear the tramp of marching feet, then I submit. We have been protesting against this Bill on principle. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) took occasion the other evening to refer briefly to the very important constitutional question that I propose to discuss and cite authorities to sustain my position, that no Government is justified in introducing and carrying through Parliament a measure of kind without having first submitted it to the people Parliament. Now, Sir, you will find that in 1852, Lord at the polls. It is laid down in most standard works John Russell introduced his first Reform Bill, after the Bill on constitutional law in England, that no Bill of of this Bill, making such radical character changes as this Bill makes, ever was passed through Parliament, at all events within 100 years, without having been submitted to the people at the polls, or without there being a strong public opinion pronounced in favor of the proposition before the Bill became law. We protest against this Bill, because we say that public opinion has not been pronounced in favor of it. We protest against it, in the second place, because we say public opinion, so far as it has been pronounced, is adverse to the principle of this Bill. We protest against it in the third place, because we say that the protest against it in the third place, because we say that the measure has not been submitted to the great tribunal of the people, and that the people have expressed no opinion in favor of the principle of the Bill—in favor of a Dominion franchise. We protest against it also, because we say that the period selected by the First Minister for introducing this Bill is a period exceedingly inopportune, in view of the difficulties, the trials, and the troubles which now exist in the Dominion of Canada. We say that it is an inopportune period for the First Minister to present such a proposition to Parliament, and cause throughout the country an amount of excitement which the hon. gentleman will find it difficult to allay. Now, the First Minister knows—hon. gentlemen opposite know, or at all events those of them that ever trouble themselves about questions of this kind, that in England, Parliament has over and over again refused to pass measures that the mass of the people have not pronounced in favor of, which the constituent body had approved of, because the principles of the measure had not been sanctioned by public opinion. I say that the Parliament of England has rejected over and over again public measures of the first consequence to the country, because the people at the polls had not been consulted with respect to them, and no strong public sentiment had been expressed in their favor. We say further, that the Parliament of England has passed public measures which the representatives of the people were not strongly in favor of, simply because there was a strong, emphatic, pronounced, public opinion in favor of them outside of Parliament. Now, Sir, no hon, gentleman in this House will pretend to say, no hon, gentleman does say, that any public opinion in any portion of Canada has been evoked in favor of this Bill. On the contrary, as far as a public has found expression in Parliament, it is all against the principle and the details of the Bill; and with that certainty staring us in the face, it is not fair or just or right that the First Minister should seek to force this Bill through Parliament. say that in dealing with a question of such magnitude, one affecting the large interests which this Bill proposes to affect, a Bill which may have the effect of disfranchising thousands and tens of thousands of electors who have votes under former laws in the Province of Ontario, as well as in the Provinces of Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and British Columbia-

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. CAMERON. An hon. gentleman says no, which shows that the statement we have made over and over again is correct—that one-half the hon members of this House do not understand the provisions of this Bill, and it we discussed it six months they would not understand it, simply because they do not take the trouble to read the Bill, to digest and understand its provisions. I was pointing out to you that no English Government has ever done what the First Minister proposes to do in this casesubmitted to Parliament, and forced through Parliament, contrary to the will of the people, without the voice of the people being pronounced in favor of it, any great proposition which affects the representation of the people in of 1832. That Bill was objected to by the Opposition in Parliament on two grounds. It was pointed out that the Bill was a Bill which ought not to become law, because it had not been submitted to the people at the polls, no strong public opinion was expressed in favor of it outside of Parliament. Syme, in his valuable work on representative government, at page 100, lays down the rules which English statesmen have invariably followed with reference to any proposition affecting the representation of the people in Parliament, or any proposition which affects the great mass of the people in the country:

a Bill which one might suppose would be certain to be carried; the a Bill which one might suppose would be certain to be carried; the country had pronounced in favor of it at a general election, and a majority of members had expressly, or tacitly, given their adherence to it on the hustings; and the Ministry had pledged themselves through their chief to carry it into law. It was not carried into law, however, and no serious attempts were ever made to discuss its provisions. Its rejection was a foregone conclusion; it was laid aside by general consent of all parties, and for no other reason than because there was an absence of enthusiasm in favor of it out of doors. The House would not bother itself shout a measure when there was no violent agitation out of bother itself about a measure when there was no violent agitation out of doors in favor of it.

Lord John Russell's second Reform Bill, introduced in 1854, was, in many respects, an improvement on the first. It provided for the extension of the franchise in counties and boroughs, for the disfranchisement of boroughs having fewer than 300 electors; boroughs not having more than 500 were to return only one member, and cities and counties having a population of 1,000, and returning only two members, were to have three under the Bill. The measure appears to have been carefully prepared, and its provisions were fully and ably discussed by its author; but like the previous Bill on the same subject, the House would not entertain it."

Now, here is a proposition for the first time seriously introduced by the First Minister, with a view of crystallising it into an Act of Parliament, a Bill on which the people of this country have never been called on to express, and have never expressed, a favorable opinion, a Bill that never was submitted to the people at the polls, and a Bill which, in its most material parts, involves grave and serious changes from the former Bills introduced by the First Minister. And yet, Sir, the First Minister introduces the Bill two months after the House is in Session; he attempts to force it through Parliament without having a single tittle of evidence to show that the voice of the majority of the people of this country is in favor of either its principle or it details. Now, Sir, in 1854, two years after the first Reform Bill was withdrawn from Parliament because public opinion was not sufficiently pronounced in its favor, Lord John Russell introduced the second Reform Bill. It was a great improvement upon the previous Reform Bill. It enormously extended the electoral franchise; it disfranchised several rotten boroughs; it made vast strides in advance of the Bill of 1832 or the Bill of 1852. The Bill was discussed in Parliament; it was discussed in the constituencies before it was introduced; many of the members returned to Parliament had pledged themselves to support a Reform Bill, and the Government to a large extent were pledged to bring it in. The Bill was introduced, read the second time, and exhaustively discussed in Parliament; and yet it did not become law; it was abandoned for two reasons-first, because England was then engaged in a deadly conflict with Russia, and both the people and their representatives deemed it an inopportune time for a question of this importance to be discussed in Parliament when every power and energy of the British empire was strained to repel a foreign foe, and in the second place, because the representatives of the people in Parliament were not convinced that the voice of the people at the polls was sufficiently expressed in favor of the Bill. Mr. Syme discusses the action of the representatives of the people at the time as follows:

"The Bill was objected to as inopportune (owing to the impending war with Russia) and uncalled for, there being, it was alleged, no agitation for it out of doors. To these objections Lord John Russell very forcibly replied: 'I cannot think,' he said, 'there is any danger in discussing the question of reform during the excitement of a foreign war. The time that is really dangerous for such a discussion is the time of great popular excitement and dissension at home.'"

Now, if it is true that the time to discuss a Reform Bill is not when the country is disturbed by an armed outbreak at home or by any other cause, surely that argument would apply to the present Bill with added force. The hon. First Minister knows perfectly well that every power he and the Government possess has been strained the last three or four weeks to its utmost tension to quell the outbreak in the North-West; and yet that is the very moment he selects for introducing this Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Bill into Parliament The Bill I have referred to was not the only Bill affecting the representation of the people that was introduced into the English Parliament and abandoned. In 1860 Lord John Russell introduced his third Reform Bill. It was objected that public opinion had not been strongly pronounced in its favor.

Mr. SMALL. I rise to a question of order. What has that to do with the matter before the House?

Mr. CAMERON. I dare say the hon, gentleman cannot

Mr. SMALL. Yes, I can see. I can see that there is a good deal of obstruction on the other side.

Mr. MILLS. It is perfectly relevant. There is nothing in the point of order the hon, gentleman has stated. My hon, friend is pointing out why the amendment proposed by the hon, member for North Norfolk is preferable to this Bill. That amendment has had popular sanction; the present Bill has not been supported by the constitutional

Mr. BOWELL. What the hon, gentleman is pointing out is the desirability of withdrawing the whole Bill from the House for certain reasons which existed in England at the time the Franchise Bills were withdrawn there. The question before the House is whether the provincial franchises shall be retained in preference to this Bill, or whether Ontario shall be exempt from the operation of the Bill in case it becomes law, and not as to the whole principle of the Bill, or whether it should be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON. That is not what I am pointing out at all. It is proposed by the third clause of this Bill to adopt a Dominion franchise—an expensive franchise. That is a new experiment—a change in the constitution that we have had for the last eighteen years. I say an important change of that kind should not be made unless it is submitted to the people at the polls and a majority of the people are in favor of it. I say further that this Bill should not be passed because the practice of English statesmen and the English Government has been not to force changes of this kind through Parliament without submitting them to the polls and obtaining the sanction of the people.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman has not exceeded the limits of order so far.

Mr. CAMERON. I am going into a history of this question in England, but it is perfectly pertinent to the question before the Chair. I was pointing out that the Conservative party objected to Lord John Russell's third Reform Bill on the ground that there had been no clearly pronounced indication that public opinion was in favor of it. Now, I say that this is a much stronger case than the three cases I have cited, because in all of those cases the principles of the Bills had been discussed, and some of the Ministers had pledged themselves to Parliamentary Reform; but in this case, it cannot be said that the First Minister or the Government have in the slightest sense pledged themselves at the polls that this Bill should become law. They have not even submitted it to the people: I venture to say that the First Minister, in the manifesto he issued at the last election never referred to this measure. Lord Derby's Government succeeded the Liberal Government, and in pursuance of the pledges which had been given by himself and some members of his Government, introduced what is called the fourth Reform Bill. That Bill met with practically the same fate as the previous Reform Bills. Mr. Syme points out with respect to this Bill:

"Lord John Russell's third Reform Bill was introduced on the 1st of March, 1860, and experienced the same fate as the two previous ones. Some time before this, the Derby Ministry being in office, Lord John Russell moved at amendment on Earl Derby's Reform Bill, as follows:

— 'That it is neither just nor politic in the manner proposed in the Government Bill with the freehold franchise as hitherto exercised in the countries of England and Wales, and that no re-adjustment of the franchise will satisfy the House or the country which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure. This amendment was carried, in a full House of 621, by a majority of 39. The Derby Ministry thereupon dissolved Parliament, and the result of the appeal to the country was 302 Conservative and 350 Liberals, or a majority of 48 against the Ministers On the assembling of Parliament the Ministry was defeated on the address by a majority of 13. Lord Derby thereupon resigned, and the Palmerston Ministry took office. Soon afterwards Lord John Russell, who was a member of the new Administration, introduced a new Reform Bill in accordance with the terms of his amendment. Having by that amendment defeated the late Ministry, and the country having subsequently marked its approval of the policy of the Opposition by returning a majority in their favor, the new Ministry were in honor, as well as by constitutional usage, bound to stand or fall by their measure."

It was not until after the people at the polls had an opportunity of pronouncing upon the question, until a Reform Bill had been four times before Parliament and four times withdrawn, and until the question had been fully discussed in Parliament, both in principle and detail, that the fifth Reform Bill met with any measure of success. Now, Sir, that is not the course that hon, gentlemen opposite propose to pursue here. Without any reference to the people at the polls, we are asked to give our sanction to the provisions of the Bill; in fact we are told that having sanctioned the principle of the Bill, we are to be debarred entirely from discussing at length its numerous details. Speaking of the Reform Bill of 1860, Mr. Symes, in his work on Representative Government, says:

"The measure was introduced by Lord John Russell in a speech which occupied an hour in delivery, and which was said to have been listened to with a decorous calmness that almost amounted to indifference. The debate was adjourned six times before the 3rd May, when it was read a second time without a division."

Is that the way the Opposition are treated? Why, the very moment the First Minister moved the second reading of the Bill, he warned us that he proposed to proceed de die in diem, and he not only proceeded day in and day out, but night in and night out with the Bill. When, in England, the Reform Bill was before Parliament, the discussion was adjourned different times in order that the representatives of the people might have an opportunity of making known their views to their constituents in order that the people might judge whether or not the Bill in principle and detail was such as commended itself to the country.

"The Bill," says Sir Erskine May, "was received with coldness in the House and with indifference out of it. It had not been haired by popular acclamation. The cause of reform, which once had aroused enthusiasm, now languished from general neglect. The press was silent or discouraging; petitions were not forthcoming; public meetings were not assembled; the people were unmoved."

What is the condition of affairs with respect to this Bill? One would naturally suppose that nobody wanted it but the First Minister and his colleagues. No response outside has been given to their speeches in favor of the Bill, nor has any petition reached this House asking for it. Where are the public meetings throughout the length and breadth of Canada protesting against the stand taken by the Opposition? Where are the countless petitions that should encumber the Clerk's Table if the people wanted the measure? There are none. It is evident that this Bill has not only not evoked enthusiasm in its behalf, but, on the contrary, has aroused public indignation against it, and this ought to be sufficient to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite that it should not be allowed to become law. Sir William Molesworth, dealing with a similar question, says:

""The people, though by no means indifferent, did not feel strongly on the subject, and did not give the Government any warm support; and, referring to the absence of excitement out of doors on questions of this nature, he adds unfortunately it is only when a very strong feeling on the subject prevails that Parliament can be induced to deal with them. The very strong feeling was not forthcoming in this instance, and the Bill was accordingly lost. Yet there had been appeals to the country on this very question, and the result of these appeals proved beyond a doubt that the country was in favor of the policy embolied in the Ministerial measure. Nevertheless, as we have seen, the Bill was withdrawn, and solely because there was an absence of outside pressure in favor of it; and notwithstanding the terms upon which they obtained office, the Ministry made no further attempt to carry out the wishes of the country in this direction."

There the question had been before the country for years, and because there was no enthusiasm in the country the proposition was dropped. In 1866 Mr. Gladstone introduced another Reform Bill; it was submitted to Parliament and discussed in Parliament, but did not become law for precisely the same reasons, because it excited no interest and was considered inopportune; thus this Bill which had been submitted several times to the people and upon which public opinion had, to a considerable extent, been pronounced, was dropped for the fifth time, simply because the voice of the people was not sufficiently pronounced in its favor. What voice has the First Minister heard in favor of the Bill before us? What public representation has been made to him to warrant him in assuming that the voice of the people is in its favor? The First Minister has not given us any evidence to show that the people are at all interested in this matter, to show he is legislating in the interests of the people and not for some particular purpose of his own. All these Bills were discussed exhaustively in the British House of Commons and were all abandoned. In 1866 the Conservative Government was defeated and Mr. Gladstone, who succeeded to office, introduced the seventh Reform Bill. The same objections were made to it in the House, but public opinion was then pronounced in its favor. The immense gatherings held from one end of England to the other, the enormous gatherings at Hyde Park, Marble Arch, Manchester, Rochdale, Liverpool, and other places, convinced the Government that at length public opinion was sufficiently far advanced, and that it became absolutely necessary the Bill should pass. Still that Bill did not become law. When the Reform Bill of the Conservative Government was introduced, which was, perhaps, not as liberal as the Bills which were introduced by the preceding Liberal Governments, Mr. Gladstone moved ten amendments, nine of which had to be accepted by the Conservative Government. This Bill became law in consequence of the enormous pressure brought to bear from outside, and this author says that four solid months were consumed in the discussion of the Bill in Committee, that is of the details of the Bill, and the discussion of the principles of the Bill occupied several days on the second reading. That Bill was eight times before the people of the country, was favorably pronounced upon by the people, and yet that same Reform Bill was discussed four months in committee, but when we had been discussing this Bill one week, we were called obstructionists, and were told that we were not discussing it upon the merits. In 1832 Lord Althorp introduced a resolution into the British House of Commons to abolish church rates, and that was carried by 256 to 180, but the resolution was abandoned because Parliament was convinced that the public sentiment of the country was not sufficiently pronounced in favor of the proposition. Nine years afterwards Sir John Trelawney introduced a Bill sweeping away the church rates altogether, which received its second reading but went no further, because the mover of the Bill was satisfied that public opinion was not sufficiently pronounced in favor of it. For the third time, a Bill for this purpose was introduced into the Imperial Parliament, but was not pressed, for the same reason. Here we have no expression of opinion in favor of this Bill. has not been a petition in favor of it, not a constituency or an individual or a Province has pronounced in favor of it, and yet the First Minister seeks to force it through Parliament. The same thing took place in England with reference to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It was passed in the House of Commons and rejected in the House of Lords once or twice, and then they yielded because of the pressure of outside opinion, and it became the law of the land. The First Minister's conduct is in striking contrast with the conduct of any statesman in England in passing an important Bill through Parliament. He selects the moment when the people of Canada have their energy and their attention strained to the utmost, in regard to other matters, as the appropriate one to introduce this Bill and force it upon the people. Instead of a feeling existing in favor of this Bill, a feeling has been aroused, in one Province, at any rate, and I believe in others, against it, and I believe that, if it is forced through the House, it will raise a whirlwind of indignation in this country that may prove of very serious consequence to the people, and will tend to weaken the bond several Provinces together. binds the the hon, gentleman knows perfectly well that not only has there been no public opinion pronounced in favor of this Bill but that in so far as it has been expressed, public opinion has been decidedly against this Bill. Now, under these circumstances, what course ought the First Minister to take? I say that if he desires that peace, prosperity and harmony shall prevail throughout this Dominion, if he desires that the bonds which bind the Provinces to the Dominion shall be strengthened and confirmed, instead of loosened and weakened, there is only one course for him to pursue, and that is to submit this Bill to the people at the polls. Sir, if the electors of this Dominion, after this question has been submitted to them at the polls, and they have had an opportunity of pronouncing upon it, if they pronounce in favor of it I say that we, the Liberals in Parliament assembled, will submit cheerfully to the will of the people in that respect. Let the First Minister follow the example of English statesmen in regard to similar great questions. I have shown that almost invariably these great propositions affecting the representation of the people in Parliament have never received the sanction of Parliament unless the people at the polls have pronounced in their favor. We have heard the First Minister boast, over and over again, that he draws his inspiration from English sources; then, I say, let him follow the example of English statesmen and let him not force upon the people of this country, without consulting them, such propositions as are contained in this Bill. The hon. gentleman knows that the voice of the people of this country, so far as it has found expression on the floor of Parliament, is opposed to the principle of this Bill. He knows that the unanimous voice of the Conservatives in the Province of Ontario, as represented in the Local Legislature, has pronounced in favor of a different franchise from the one submitted in this Bill, and in favor of manhood suffrage. He knows that the unanimous voice of the representatives of the Conservative party in Parliament assembled has declared in favor of a more liberal and broader franchise than the one proposed in this Bill. We know, also, that in the Province of Quebec public opinion does not justify the course of the First Minister; we know that one organ of the Government after another has declared that the First Minister ought to throw this Bill into the waste basket. We know that another organ of the Government declared that legislation of this character and of a kindred character was straining the constitution and weakening the bonds that bind the Provinces to the Dominion, and that it was high time a danger signal was creeted We know that the Montreal Gazette, in its wiser days, took the same ground; we know that the hon, gentleman who has controlled that organ, and who is still reputed to influence its course, was in favor of a provincial franchise. We know that other papers, usually supporting the Government, have taken the same ground. We know perfectly well that the supporters of hon. gentlemen in this House are not a unit on this question, and that two hon. members who usually support the Government have refused to sup-Mr. CAMEBON (Huron).

that among nearly all of them there are grumblings loud and deep against the proposition of the First Minister. Therefore, I say, in view of all these facts, the First Minister ought not to force this Bill through Parliament. The First Minister has had, in his long life, many opportunities of doing what a great statesman ought to do in dealing with questions of this kind, that is, to take the people of the country into his confidence; but he has invariably failed to do so whenever he had any political object to gain. I say the First Minister has now the opportunity of following the illustrious example of English statesmen, by submitting this measure to the decision of the people. He has now a chance of earning for himself a reputation and a character which he has not earned for himself in his long political career, by taking the people into his confidence and acting in accordance with their decision. And when the First Minister is satisfied that the will of the people justifies him in submitting this proposition to Parliament, and carrying it through, I, Sir, shall record my vote in favor of that proposition. Sir, I repeat that in view of the position in which the country is placed to-day, in view of the difficulties that surround us on every side, it is inopportune to force this Bill upon Parliament, and to force it through, as the First Minister is endeavoring to do. If the First Minister will not listen to the voice of the people at the polls, or even to the voice of his friends, or be guided by the expressions of public opinion received thus far, but will shut his eyes to the lessons taught by English history and the course pursued by English statesmen, then it is the desire of the Liberal party in this House and the country that this Bill, when it goes through Parliament, shall be shorn of all its objectionable features and made as little objectionable as possible to the people. The First Minister has now an opportunity to give the people such a Dominion franchise, if he is bound to give them a Dominion franchise, as the majority of the people can approve. By accepting the amendment of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) he can adopt as the franchise for Ontario the franchise recently adopted there, a franchise broad enough and liberal enough to cover almost every class in the community. If the First Minister will not accept that proposition, other propositions will be submitted, to which the hon. gentleman should assent. What I am mainly concerned with at this moment is, that the franchise as laid down in this Bill is not such as should be adopted in a free country like this. The proposed franchise is in startling contrast with the franchise recently adopted in Ontario. The Ontario Bill enfranchises the laboring classes, the wage-earners of the country, this Bill disfranchises them. Too little attention is paid in Parliament and elsewhere to that important element. We know it is an intelligent element, a progessive element, and therefore it ought to be considered with great care and deliberation; in fact, it is an absolute necessity to give some recognition by legislation to the interests and rights of the wage-earning class. They live in our midst, they contribute more or less to the revenue of the country, they earn their incomes by manual toil, but they are not to be disregarded on that account. Any franchise adopted by Parliament should be extended as far as to cover the wage-earners. What justification has the First Minister in not extending the franchise to this class of the community? Upon what principle did he base this measure? There must be some ground on which you can justify an electoral franchise. You cannot justify a property qualification on any reasonable or sensible ground; the only franchise you can justify is a franchise which will include every one of the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the country, and who is freed from mental or legal port them in carrying this measure through Parliament. disabilities. The true principle appears to be laid down by We know that there is dissatisfaction and discontent, and Mr. Gladstone, in one of his able speeches, when he says that every man is entitled to exercise the franchise, unless it is proved that his exercise of the franchise is dangerous to the State. That is the principle we should adopt in extending the franchise, and the present Bill does not go far enough to cover that principle. It is a self-evident proposition, that if a man lives in the country the interest of the country is the interest of the individual. Mr. Kinnear, in his work on principles of reform, says:

""The poorest man is concerned just as much as, perhaps more than, the rich man in the law that affects his domestic relations, such as the laws of marriage and divorce, of guardianship of children; or the social relations, such as those of master and servant; or the civic relations, such as those of pauperism, of education, of the church, of the punishment of crime, of taxation; or the national relations, such as those of peace or war, alliance or treaties. Where expenditure at all enters into these questions (and it does into only very few of them) the poor man's interest is, in proportion to his livelihood, almost the same as the rich man's; nor, while he is relieved of only a small proportion of taxation, such as income and assessed taxes, he pays beyond his proportion of the customs and excise duties, which form the bulk of our revenue. And any error in our fiscal system, or extravagance of expenditure, while it soustoms and excise duties, which form the bulk of our revenue. And any error in our fiscal system, or extravagance of expenditure, while it only diminishes the rich man's profits, is liable, by injuring trade, to deprive the poor man of his livelihood altogether. His stake therefore being that of life, is undeniably at least equal to that of the rich man's, and therefore neither on the ground of legislation being only or chiefly concerned with property, can we find any just reason for excluding household suffrage. How then can we exclude universal suffrage, by any other than an arbitrary, irrational and unconstitutional test, such as that of penalties."

You can find no authority for giving the franchise upon the basis of a property qualification; nevertheless, by this Bill such is made the test. It is an arbitrary and illogical test, it is a test not justified by any constitutional authority within the last fifty years. The only franchise possessing the principles of equity and justice is a franchise of a broader nature than is proposed by this Bill; and the only franchise you can justify is the one laid down by Mr. Gladstone. (The hon. gentleman again quoted from Mr. Kinnear's work; and continued): Now, I say that is the position—that there is no principle upon which you can justify giving the vote, except on the principle that every man is entitled to the franchise when the giving of it does not endanger the safety of the State itself. The giving of the franchise is not an abstract or a prescriptive right. It is a right given for the safety of the State, and no man can rightly exercise the franchise otherwise than for the interest and benefit of the State. The benefit of the State is the ground upon which you can justify the extension of the franchise to those who are citizens of the State, enjoying the protection of the law, and who are bound to serve the State in times of war as well as in times of peace. That proposition is very fully and very ably laid down in the following statement from this text-book. (The hon, gentleman here quoted from the same volume.) Now, if you pass the Bill, what will be the effect of it? It will be to deprive almost every laborer in the country of his vote.

An hon, MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, yes. The fact that the hon. gentleman says no, no, is only another indication that he has not read the Bill. Everybody knows perfectly well that at least 70 out of 100 of the ordinary laborers of this country do not get $400 a year for their labor. I refer to the wage-earning class, the unskilled laborers, the men who work on ditches and roads, but who nevertheless consume dutiable goods and thereby contribute to the revenue, and dutiable goods and thereby contribute to the revenue, and are just as much entitled to votes as the hon. gentleman, with his millions. You treat that man who pays taxes, who is a citizen of the country, who has taken the oath of allegiance, or perhaps was born in the country—because every man who is born in the country is not born with a silver spoon in his mouth—you treat him as an infant, a minor; any, Sir, you treat him as a slave. You do not give him the rights of a free man, living in the country; he is outside the pale of citizenship, and you propose to treat him so to the end. Still, hon, gentlemen in this House and their organs outside have posed as the friends of the working-men. We were told by the Mail newspaper that we were fighting a battle against the wage-earners when it is well known to the country that we have been fighting their battles, and the battles of the great majority of the people. Instead of treating these men as children you should adopt the more liberal franchise, treat them as free men living in a free country, enjoying the blessings of free government -for we are supposed, at all events, to have free government; treat them in this way and you make them self-reliant and independent. They become part and parcel of the country, they have an interest in the country and its legislation, and a voice in moulding the laws under which they are governed. You give them an interest in the preserva-tion and support of the State, and in the peace, prosperity and progress of the country. Let me read again what this writer says on this subject. (The hon. gentleman quoted again from the same volume.) Sir, there never was sounder or more constitutional words penned than those of this text-writer. It is not when the feelings of the people are aroused, when they are excited, but when we may discuss calmly the principles of such a measure, as free representatives of a free people, that we should deal with a matter of this kind, and lay down rules which we can justify to our own consciences, to our constituents and to the people at large. I commend the views of this writer to the careful consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially those sitting on the Treasury benches, as the true grounds upon which the representation of the people in Parliament should be based—the true ground upon which you can justify a franchise that should be broad and liberal enough to cover the great mass of the people, and which shall not exclude any man on account of his occupation or his position in life, a franchise which will be open to the day laborer, with his spade in his hand, or the navvy on the railway earning $1 a day, living in our country, enjoying the protection of our laws, contributing to the revenues of the country—give him the franchise just as freely and fully as to the millionaire who possesses his carriage, and has his coachman, his footman and his liveried servants. In this country there should be no distinction, and no distinctions are known to the law, except what are purely arbitrary distinctions. We boast that the law is open to all, to the poor as well as to the rich; and if the law is open to all, why should not the right to vote for the representatives in Parliament who make the law be open to all. Let me make another reference on this subject, because it is an important subject. We are starting out on a new line, and the more fully we discuss this proposition the better for this country. If we adopt a new franchise now without consideration, without care, and without caution, what may be the result? The result may be that year in and year out we shall be tinkering with the franchise, whereas if we adopt a sound franchise now, and one which will meet with the approval of the great mass of the people of this country, with its foundations laid broad and deep in the respect and the affections of the people, we shall have a franchise that will not require to be changed at every meeting of Parliament. Grey, in his "Parliamentary Government," deals with the question as to whether there should be manhood suffrage or a suffrage based on property qualification.

Mr. Grey points out that the importance of a franchise that will leave no man discontented, that will leave no substantial grievance in the breasts of any considerable portion of the community, cannot be over-estimated. Another authority, whose utterances are received with great respect, discussed this question, a man who thoroughly knew and appreciated the working classes—the day laborers and the wage-earners—that great mass that the franchise of England does not even yet reach, and the mass that this Bill does not propose to reach. Richard Cobden, who was a statesman of wonderful power, who understood and appreciated the working classes better than any statesman of his day, has given expression to his views on this question over and over again. In one of his speeches, delivered in 1849, he referred to the subject, and advocated a wide extension of the franchise. (The hon, gentleman quoted from the speech). The ground on which Mr. Cobden justified a liberal extension of the franchise is very clearly understood. It is better for the State, because it gives every citizen an interest in the laws passed by Parliament, and leaves no element of the population any ground for dissatisfaction or discontent. At a public gathering held at Leeds, in 1862, shortly before the death of Mr. Cobden, he also discussed the question of extending the franchise to the laboring classes. (The hon. gentleman quoted from the speech). Now, I do not propose at this moment to discuss in minute detail the various sections of the different classes in the community who are disfranchised under this Bill, nor do I propose to discuss the various sections of classes who have not had the franchise extended to them by this Bill. All I say on that subject is, that if you adopt the franchise provided by the present law of Ontario you will have a broader and more liberal franchise than that proposed in this Bill; you will have a franchise that will emb nearly all the classes I have named. The inc franchise is reduced to $250 in the Province will embrace The income Ontario, and there is the wage-earners franchise of $250; and although it is probable that there is a large number of the wage-earners class whose wages do not extend to $400. there are very few whose wages do not reach $250 a year. Take, then, the Ontario proposition, and you will extend the franchise to a large number of classes that ought to be enfranchised now; or if you do not propose to adopt the franchise of Ontario, adopt a more liberal, a more extended franchise, one that will embrace the class I have just spoken of. It is plainly the duty of the Government, unless they see insurmountable reasons against it, which they can make plain to Parliament, to leave no class entitled to the franchise deprived of it. There is another class in the community which the First Minister by this Bill will deprive of the right to vote. The principle of property is the foundation of this Bill; it contains no test of intellect, so that no matter how wise a man may be, no matter whether he be possessed of all the knowledge of the ancients and the moderns, though he may be the man in the community, above all others, best capable of judging between the respective merits of the two candidates, from his intelligence, position and circumstances, yet unless he possesses $150 worth of land or has $400 a year income he is not entitled to vote. The Bill ought to go turther, if the hon, gentleman is bound to have some test of capacity besides the test of manhood, responsibility, citizenship, and being a British subject, and of his living under the law, and submitting to the law, and serving his country in time of peace or war; the hon, gentleman ought not to limit it to a property qualification. There are other tests of qualification, apart from the necessary property qualification, will be entitled to vote. If the hon, gentleman purposes to adopt any test of capacity, besides the test of capacity provided in the Bill, it ought to be a test that would embrace the laborers, the wageearners and the learned professions in the community. There ought to be educational qualifications—I do not mean an educational test of capacity—as well as qualifications upon property pure and simple. I say that this educational test of qualification is one that has been discussed for years by the first minds in England and elsewhere. It has been adopted in some of the United States of America and has worked satisfactorily there. In the colony of Victoria, Australia, there is, besides the property test, an educational qualification, and so far as I have been able to learn, the principle has worked satisfactorily. In this Dominion the First Minister ought at least to adopt, if he is bound to persevere in the proposition he has submitted to Parliament, an educational and professional test of qualification.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron.) When you left the Chair, Sir, I was pointing out the propriety of extending the franchise to classes not provided for by this Bill. I was pointing out, that according to the laws of several of the other Provinces, Ontario, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, the franchise was much broader and more liberal than the one proposed in this Bill; I was pointing out that in the colony of Victoria, Australia, the franchise was, in some respects, much more liberal than the one under discussion; that although in that colony the possession of property is made the test of capacity, still there are other tests provided. There is the educational qualification, so that men without the property qualifications are entitled to vote if they have the educational test of capacity. It appears to me it is well worth the serious consideration of Parliament that men of education should not be deprived of the right to vote. which is conferred on men without education who possess the property qualification. I wish here to draw your attention to the observations of Mr. Cobden on this subject, taken from a speech of his made at Leeds, in 1859. (The hon. gentleman read an extract from Mr. Cobden's speech). When people have arrived at that stage when they are fairly entitled to exercise the right of the franchise, when we have some guarantee, some reasonable security, that they are intelligent enough to understand the great political questions that are constantly agitating the country, they should be given the right to vote. In the colony of Victoria the law provides a property qualification as a test of capacity, but it also gives a vote to those who are educated, so that there is not only a property qualification but an educational test of qualification as well. In the colony of Victoria every graduate of the university in any part of the British Dominions, every barrister, solicitor, attorney, proctor, medical practitioner, minister of any church, and every schoolmaster possessing the necessary testimonials, and every officer or retired officer of Her Majesty's land and sea forces, has the power to exercise the franchise. In some of the States in the neighboring Republic I believe the same right is given, and I believe that, if this clause had provided for that class, the hon. gentleman would have made a step in the right direction. I trust that he will even yet adopt the franchise which exists in some of the States and in the colony of Victoria, and in that way test of capacity, which the hon. gentleman has signally will add to the electoral list a very large, important and ignored in the provisions of his Bill. The professional man, the man who has gone through college and obtained his now before the House. In the Province of Ontario there degree, who may be a professor, may not be entitled to vote are nearly 5,000 teachers who receive less than $400 under this Bill, while a man utterly illiterate, if he has the a year. Of course, a number of these are females, but there are large number of males, and if the income franchise were put at a lower figure they would be entitled to vote. The Ontario wage-earners' hon gentleman might adopt that, or the franchise which, I think, can be justified on every ground—manhood suffrage. I think, can be justified on every ground—manhood suffrage. In that way he would be acting on the maxim laid down by Mr. Gladstone, that everyone is entitled to exercise the franchise whose exercise of it would not be injurious to the end they triumph. Now, I am sure that whatever dispositively in which he lives. franchise whose exercise of it would not be injurious to the State in which he lives. We should not be afraid of the great mass of the people in this country. We ought to trust them. They defend our persons and property, and yet we do not allow them to exercise the franchise, which would encourage and elevate them. The true principle to adopt is that described by Lord Ashley in an address which he delivered to the working classes in 1845, and one delivered in the House of Lords by Lord Shaftesbury in 1867. Lord Ashley said:

"The growing demands, and, indeed, the exigencies of the realm, require an occasional adaptation to the necessities of the times; and I rejoice, and we may be thankful, that our system of polity is capable of a safe and most beneficial expansion. You may lengthen your cords, and strengthen your stakes, and in the very elongation of the supporting power, make the edifice you would sustain more erect and symmetrical."

This Bill would deprive a number of these people of their natural and inherent rights as citizens of Canada. If you give them the franchise you make them free men indeed. Give them the electoral franchise, give them all the rights of a British subject, and you make them men in every sense of the term; you give them an interest in the representation of the people in Parliament, and rest assured, when you give them that interest, they will take an abiding interest in public affairs. What does the workingman care now for what we are doing here? What do the laboring classes care? They say: We have no right to vote; we have no voice in making the laws of the land. But give them an interest in the representation and you give them an interest in the progress and prosperity of the country. Now, Sir, "Lorimer on Constitutionalism," in discussing the rights of men to the franchise, lays down a doctrine well worthy of consideration. (The hon. gentleman read from pages 165, 166 and 167.) Sir, we see here the doctrine laid down that the true basis of the electoral franchise is citizenship, free from the disqualifying accompaniments of pauperism, crime or minority. By adopting that foundation we elevate the popular element. We give them a sense of their importance, we give them a sense of their responsibility, and we remove from them the standing grievance of which, to some extent, they now complain. In the language of Lord Ashley again, "You may lengthen your cords and strengthen your stakes, and in the very elongation of the supporting power make the edifice you would sustain more erect and symmetrical." More than that; in adopting manhood suffrage you lessen the cost to the candidate and to all others concerned in the matter. It is admitted that the cost of the proposed Bill will be very considerable. You have, first, the preparation of the list itself; you have the preliminary revision, and you have the final revision, all of which will cost considerable. Then you have to pay the revising officer, the clerk and the bailiff, and all these things will make a very considerable charge. By adopting a more liberal franchise you can lessen expense and minimise, to a large extent, the chance of committing frauds. stated by hon, gentlemen opposite that the Opposition in Parliament, for the last four weeks, have been struggling against the enfranchisement of the people, the laboring classes and the wage-earners. Now, Sir, you know perfectly well that, on the contrary, we have, to the utmost of our ability, been fighting the battles of the great wage-earning classes of the country, and asking that the franchise bers, and the city of Toronto sends three representatives to be made liberal enough to include them. We have been this House.

fighting the battle of provincial rights against this attempt to centralise the whole power of the electorate in the Dominion Government at Ottawa. Sir, we may fail in this. The clause at $250 a year instead of $400 admits them, and the champions of popular rights have failed before now. The political exigencies of hon. gentlemen opposite may make tion may be made of this Bill, whether it carries or not—and carry, I suppose, it will, if hon. gentlemen opposite persist in forcing it through—hon. gentlemen may rest satisfied that the masses who are excluded from the right to exercise the franchise under this Bill will ultimately obtain the franchise. There will be discontent, dissatisfaction and grievances in the meantime, but ultimately popular rights will prevail, and so sure as daylight succeeds darkness, so sure will the rights of the people have to be ultimately accorded to them.

> Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Before the vote is taken on the sub-amendment in your hands, I wish briefly to give my reasons why I support that sub-amendment, which asks that the Province of Ontario be exempted from the operations of this Act. If this amendment is carried we will preserve the franchise to a large number of our fellow citizens in the Province of Ontario, who, by this Bill, will be deprived of it. In the city from which I come, steps have been taken to ascertain what the effect of this Bill will be as compared with the operation of the Ontario Act. The information I have is, that in one industrial establishment alone in that city 78 men, who will be entitled to vote under the Mowat Act, will be deprived of the franchise under the Bill we have now before us; and in another industrial establishment in that city 74 men, who will have the right to vote under the Mowat Act, will be deprived of it under this Bill. In taking these two industrial establishments, that employ two or three hundred hands each, I have given you the effect this Bill will have, and it is estimated that the total number will be some hundreds in that citynot a very populous city—who will be deprived of a vote under this Bill, but would have it under the provincial law. That is one of the reasons why I support the sub-amendment—in order that these men who, I consider, are entitled to the franchise, should be allowed to retain it. Another reason is, that the machinery under the Mowat Administration to secure the preparation of the voters' list is simple and inexpensive, those entitled to get on the roll being able to do so without expense to themselves, and without there being much danger of their names being omitted; while under the present Bill the machinery leads to very great danger that names may be left off, even where this Bill, with its more restricted suffrage, designs that they shall be on the roll. The present system of registration in the Province of Ontario is so complete that it is by a mere accident that a name can be left off. Even with a careful officer, and one desirous to do what is right, there is danger, under the machinery of this Bill, that names will be left off. It is answered that those men can easily have their names put on the roll. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) told us that all such a man would have to do would be to take his counsel with him and have his name put on. The men whose names are most likely to be dropped are those engaged in manual toil, and it is absurd to say that such men can take counsel with them and have defects so remedied.

Mr. PATERSON. I have explained the result in the city from which I have figures. My third reason is, that under the operations of the Bill it will tend to increase the feeling of partisanship that exists, and intensify the strong party feeling in the different communities. It is not to be wondered at that the independent press of the country, without a single exception, all denounce this Bill as one that should not pass, because one of its effects must be to destroy, as far as possible, anything like independence of party. If those journals are true to the principles they enunciate, if they will view questions from an independent standpoint and not bind themselves to either party, but create an independent sentiment, to hold the scale between the parties, they must feel that this Bill is an attempt to destroy that feeling of independence. A laboring man or a mechanic, on finding his name off the roll, cannot take counsel to have it inserted, and thus be driven to go to the managers of one of the two great parties to ask aid to have his name placed there. He should not be compelled to ask such a favor. Having, however, secured their services, he might, in a measure, feel under an obligation to that party and vote for its candidate. I give these three, among other reasons, as forming one strong reason why I prefer the amendment before the committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman had always addressed the committee with the same brevity and the same point as he has done just now, we would have made considerable progress with this Bill. He has stated very shortly two or three points of objection to the Bill. Had we proceeded regularly and discussed the clauses, each according to its intent and purpose, we would have arrived at those special clauses to which the hon. gentleman took particular objection; and then the Government, and I, as representing them, would have had an opportunity of exchanging, without political acrimony of any kind, our views across the floor as to the various points in this Bill. Although the remarks of the hon, gentleman do not all apply to this clause, the first reason given certainly does. He says this Bill establishes a restricted representation in comparison with the late Bill of the Province of Ontario. We must remember that this Dominion Bill has been before the country-we will not look back to when it was first introducedfor the last three years, and this Bill, the hon. gentleman must admit, is much more liberal than the Bill under which he and I were sent here as representatives of the people. After our Bill was introduced and was before the country, the Government of Ontario introduced their Bill and carried it; after seeing our Bill and that we were greatly advancing on the present legislation, the Government went one more, to use the phrase of the gamester, and enlarged the franchise in some particulars, restricting it in others. But at this moment the Ontario law recently passed is not in force; and if there were elections to-morrow, either for the Provincial Legislature or for this Legislature, they must be held under the restricted franchise, not under the enlarged frenchise of this Bill or the new Bill passed in Ontario. That Bill does not come into force until 1st January next, and is not the law, therefore; and we are to be called upon to wait quietly and patiently until that Bill comes into force. Supposing that hon gentlemen should defeat the present Government, supposing that hon, gentlemen should succeed in robbing us of the confidence of the majority in this House, and that we should say: That may be, but we still retain the confidence of the people, and should go to the We must go to the country on the present franchise, which is a much more restricted franchise than the one under this Bill. Then the hon gentleman says that the process is going to be expensive and difficult. I do not see the difficulty at all. I think, if the hon. gentleman will county judges, are many of them—of course, I have not fairly scan the Bill, he will find that there is no such heard from all, or nearly all—but many of them would be Mr. Paterson (Brant).

difficulty in parties desiring to have a vote getting their names put on the roll. The Bill provides simply this: that the first duty of the revising officer, the county judge, or a superior court judge, or a barrister of five years' standing, is to send to the officers of the different municipalities and get the finally revised assessment list from each of those officers. He takes all the names that he finds on those lists who have a right to vote, according to the franchise of this Bill—he takes that as prima facie evidence. Then, under the Bill, all parties have a right to send in by mail, if they do not go by themselves or by counsel. After making out the lists, taking all the names he finds on the assessment roll as prima facie evidence, he posts them up in certain public places, where every person can see what names are there, and the committees of the different political parties can see in what respect it is deficient. The different parties, and everybody else who takes an interest in the matter, will send in a list of objections, as to names put on the list or as to the names of parties omitted. The course of the revising officer is plain. He adds all those names to the list, and he marks opposite to the names those that are objected to, and he publishes that as the preliminary list. After that preliminary list has been published, and the people are fully notified, he goes to the different municipalities and he finally settles the list. That is the process for settling the first list. If the hon, gentleman looks at the Bill he will find that in all subsequent years the double process will not be required; because, when a list is once settled, especially in the older parts of the country, which are well settled, the judge will only be obliged to strike off the names of the dead, of those who are gone away, or who have ceased to hold the franchise from year to year—a matter, as in England, of only a few days. As to the expense: hon, gentlemen of course have spoken very strongly on that point. I believe that their statements are altogether mistaken, altogether exaggerated. I believe that the county judge, with one clerk, can do the whole work, and do it easily, and speaking for those Provinces which have county judges, such as Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the county judges will only be too glad to do the work for a small additional amount. In fact, it will not increase the expenses materially. if at all, in those Provinces, because, as perhaps hon. gentlemen coming from those Provinces know, there is a universal cry among the county judges that their salaries are insufficient. They are asking and pressing that their salaries be increased, and at an early day the Government will be obliged to grant an addition to their salaries. Some of the judges have already stated that a small addition to their salaries would be very acceptable, and they would be glad to do the work for such small addition, so that the expense has been altogether exaggerated. Now, I cannot avoid breaking a rule which I have been rather speaking against, but I will speak further on that point. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have opposed this Bill—and it is rather remarkable on that point that the opposition comes altogether, or nearly altogether, from the Province of Ontario—are very much afraid that the revising barristers will be mere partisans. Well, I think, Sir, that the present Government — and I may say the same of the Government which preceded us—both Governments have naturally been anxious, for their own credit and the good of the country, to appoint good judges, and the same principle which would actuate both Governments in that respect would call upon us-they would feel themselves called upon—to appoint equally good revising officers. But, Sir, I took early occasion in this discussion to state that, wherever it could be done, the judges would be utilised, and from the advices which I get I find that glad to do the work, and they think they could easily perform all the duties, without materially or at all affecting their usefulness as judges. I learn further that several of the judges, who know their own counties, have stated that they could do more than one constituency, and certainly in those counties where there are several ridings-I believe almost all, with one or two exceptions—as a general rule there are junior judges, and the county judges and the junior judges could do the work. Then, Sir, I have consulted, as it was my duty to do, my friends who do the present Government the honor of supporting them, and after full discussion of the matter we have come to this conclusion: that in all those cases where the revising officer is not a judge of the Superior Court, or a county court judge, there will be an appeal to that judge, and it shall not be discretionary on the part of the revising officer to refuse an appeal. I think it well to state that to the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I call the Premier's attention to the 15th section of the Bill. The right hon, gentleman stated that, in the case of a preliminary list, it would be the duty of the revising officer to go on circuit in every municipality in the disfranchise a large number of electors in the Province of the preliminary list in his remarks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, not the preliminary list, but the final list. The process is simply this: he will take one municipality in, say, the hon. gentleman's own riding. He will get the list from the township clerk, or whoever is the officer who has the list. He takes every name that is on that list, that appears on the assessment list—which is prima facie the list-every name that appears to enjoy the franchise according to the Bill. He hangs that up in certain places; everybody sees that; and then they send to him. They need not go—not one of them; they send by letter the list of names they object to and the list they wish to be put on. He then adds all those names requested to be put on the list and marks those objected to at his preliminary sitting. Of course, people can go to him if they like, at this preliminary sitting, held in his office at the county town; but all others send in their lists. He publishes the list again with the additions, and then he goes and visits the municipality, hears objections and applications, and settles them. As the hon gentleman knows, there is no appeal from the county judge in Ontario. It is true, he only sits on appeals made to him in individual cases. In this case he gets the assessment list, and there is an appeal on the whole list. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that it would be only adding expensethe hon, gentleman might think that an objection—and it would enable rich candidates to bother poor ones, if there was an appeal from the county judge to the Superior Court.

Mr. MULOCK. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that there is to be an appeal on questions of fact. In the Province of Ontario to-day, when there is an appeal on the voters' list, the county judge goes on circuit to convenient points throughout the riding, where appeals are made to him, and he sits and hears cases, having original jurisdiction. It is a cheap and inexpensive system; those claiming the right to a vote appear before him, and he hears evidence and decides; and if there is an equally cheap and convenient machinery in this case, the appeal would be of value. I presume it will be as simple as it is to-day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Quite so.

Mr. MULOCK. Then these details will be modified?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think they require modification; but when we come to them I will be glad to consider them.

Mr. MULOCK. But the system will be as simple as the present system?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, I hope so.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Casey) negatived.

Mr WATSON. I beg leave to move in amendment to the amendment:

That none of the provisions in the following sections of this Act, in reference to the qualifications of voters, shall apply to the Province of Manitoba; but in that Province the persons entitled to be registered as voters under this Act, and, when so registered, to vote at an election, shall be those persons who are entitled to vote at any election for the Lagislative Assembly of that Province and no others. Legislative Assembly of that Province, and no others.

I move this because I believe that, if this Bill passes, it will Manitoba. The qualification of an elector to-day in that Province is as follows:--

Mr. MULOCK. I thought the hon. gentleman spoke of the Legislative Assembly of this Province unless his name appears at the time of the voting on the list of electors then in force; and no person shall be admitted to vote at the election of a member of the Legislative Assembly of this Province unless his name appears at the time of the voting on the list of electors for any electoral division unless he fulfills the following conditions, that is to say:

"1. He must be of the male sex, twenty-one years of age, and a subject of Her Majesty by birth or naturalisation;
"2. He must be legally in appointed."

of Her Majesty by birth or naturalisation;

"2. He must not otherwise be legally incapacitated;

"3. He must have been, in such electoral division, for a period of at least three months, actually and in good faith owner of real estate of the value of $100 or upwards, or tenant for the year or by the year of real property of the value of $200 and upwards, under an annual rent of at least $20, or the occupant and bond fide householder, by the residence of himself, or himself and family, if he have any, on land in the electoral division, of the annual value of at least $20."

The persons who are not entitled to vote in the Province of Manitoba are:

"Indians, or persons of Indian blood receiving an annuity from the Crown, so long as said Indians or persons of Indian blood receive such annuity; and if any of the persons set forth in this section vote, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding twelve months, in default of the penalty imposed, and his vote shall be null and void."

I do not propose this amendment in opposition to the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), for I am in favor of the provincial franchises in all the Provinces being used for the election of members of this House. The hon, the First Minister has just stated that in all the older Provinces, after the first list is made up, it is changed very little in following years; but this is not the case in Manitoba. There the population changes very rapidly. You may see a voters' list one year, and again two or three years afterwards you would hardly recognise it as the same list. Therefore, I have some hope that the hon, the First Minister will exempt Manitoba from the operation of this measure. The present franchise in that Province is broader than the franchise proposed in this Bill, and it works very well. This Bill, if passed, will create great confusion, owing to the existence of two lists of voters. A man who has a vote for a local member may not be allowed to vote for a member of the House of Commons, and vice versa in some cases. The only Dominion franchise I am in favor of, if the provincial franchises are not to be used, is manhood suffrage, and I will support the amendment to that effect, which I believe is about to be moved by my hon, friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). As we have a very high protective tariff in Canada, and as every man living in the country, who is a wage-earner, is a consumer, and necessarily contributes to the revenues of the country, every man ought to be qualified to vote for a member of this House. 1 believe that my hon, friend from West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) was correct the other night when he said he thought that a man who owned $1,000 worth of property was as equally entitled to vote as a man who owned $50,000, because the one who owned the smaller property felt probably as great, if not a greater interest, in it than did the one who owned the larger amount in his. I believe that principle to be correct; I believe that a man who owns but $100 worth of property has as good a right to vote as the one who owns $300 worth, and therefore I am opposed to this Bill applying to Manitoba. In that Province there is a large number of young men, some of them school teachers, who are not householders, who do not pay rent, and who do not earn $400 a year, but who still own real estate to the value of $100 or $200, and therefore would not come under the $300 qualification. It is well known that two or three years ago nearly every young man who went to that country invested his all in town lots, but unfortunately for them these speculations did not turn out the best, and to-day town lots which cost $400 or $500 would probably not be assessed at $300, so that these men would be deprived of the right to vote at the Dominion election. I do not think that is right. These properties are all these young men own; they look foward to reaping something in a future day from their investments, and therefore have as keen an interest in the country as anybody whom this Bill would include. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that the Government had the power to pass this Bill, but it is not always advisable for the Government to pass Bills because they have the authority to do so. It has often occurred that Bills which the Government introduced and which the Government had the power to pass have, after some discussion, been withdrawn, and I hope the Government will see fit to place this measure in the same category, by withdrawing it. In the Province of Manitoba, as in Ontario, for the laws of the two Provinces are a good deal the same, we have a capital system of getting out voters' lists and arriving at the qualifications of men who should be entitled to vote. The municipal councillors are elected, as a rule, irrespective of their political prejudices, and it is they who appoint the assessors. The assessor is selected as being a man who is intelligent and competent and who will do his duty and, as a rule, there are very few objections to the voters' lists as prepared from the assessment rolls. The assessor is sworn in, as I believe he is in all the different Provinces, and I have yet to learn that he has wilfully neglected to do his duty. I was surprised to hear some hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), a few nights ago, state that the elections of councillors in his county were run as political elections, on political basis, so that an assessor might be appointed who would not act impartially, but would favor one side or the other. That is not the case in Manitoba, that I am aware of; as a rule, we have very fair assessors, whose work gives general satisfaction. The voters' lists are based on the assessment roll, and any person owning $100 worth of property, or paying a rental of $2 per month on $200 worth of property, is entitled to vote. The chances are that those assessors will perform the duty much more fairly than would any revising barrister appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite; for, as a rule, these barristers will be partisan. The First Minister has told us that judges, as a rule, will be appointed. That is welcome information to hon. gentlemen on this side, for we have always been under the impression that, not the judges, but barristers of five years' standing, would be appointed. In this connection I may say that some hon, gentlemen opposite have a higher opinion of the revising barristers than we on this side have. In my opinion, no revising barrister of five years' standing, with more brain than cheek, would take the position vations on the subject of revising barristers, to which, I Mr. WATSON.

of revising barrister, unless he had reason to believe he would receive indirectly some further remuneration than what he would receive directly from the position. I do not think that the revising barrister is likely to be a person qualified to value property in the different municipalities. As a rule, when barristers want valuations to be made of property, for the purpose of insurance or other purpose, they employ the assessors of the municipalities, whose judgment is looked upon as pretty accurate. A revising barrister would not be acceptable to the people at all. I do not think the people would wish to see a young lawyer value their property and decide, on his own fiat who shall and who shall not vote. I do not know how it is in other Provinces, but in Manitoba lawyers are looked upon in pretty much the same light as General Sheridan is said to have looked on an Indian. "I know of only one good kind of an Indian," said he, "and that is a dead Indian." So in Manitoba the people have about the same opinion of a lawyer. I do not think it is necessary that I should occupy the attention of the House at great length, and I hope, after this short explanation of matters in Manitoba, relating to voters and voters' lists, the First Minister may see fit to exempt our Province from the action of this Bill. I know that its application there would create a great deal of dissatisfaction. Its provisions are not in the best interests of the Dominion, but apparently have been framed solely for the purpose of maintaining hon gentlemen opposite in power. Unless they have some such object in view I cannot understand why they should persist in forcing this Bill through at this late period, after the House has been in session over three months, and when it will require at least six weeks longer to get through with the other business before us, independent of the Franchise Bill altogether. It looks as if we were to have two months extra session, solely for the purpose of passing this Bill, which has not been put before the people, which the people have not had an opportunity of pronouncing on, and against which, at this late hour, when the people are becoming awake to its provisions, petitions are pouring in by the hundred. The people of the Province of which I have the honor of being one of the representatives have hitherto known little or nothing of the Bill, but those who do know anything of it write me very strong letters, saying the Opposition are perfectly justified in the course they have taken to protect the interests of the people. I hope the First Minister and this House will see fit to exempt Manitoba from the operation of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I am sure that those gentlemen in this House, on that side or on this side—and I do not think there were many on this side—who were under the impression that the Prime Minister was disposed to make some concessions to the views of hon, gentlemen on this side of the House, must have been very much disappointed after hearing the observations which he addressed to the committee. I did not expect that he would recede from the position he had taken, upon the subject of the appointment of revising barristers, or any portion of the Bill, which is obnoxious to hon. gentlemen in this House, as publicly expressed on this side and privately on that side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

An hon. MEMBER. Speak for yourself.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman need not be uneasy. I am not speaking for him.

An hon. MEMBER. Whom are you speaking for?

Another hon. MEMBER. He is speaking for no one.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman has made some obserthink, I may be allowed to make some reference, before I pass to the other portions of the question more immediately concerned in the motions which are before you. The hon. gentleman spoke of those whom he intended to appoint as revising barristers. Hitherto, the appointment of revising barristers has been an act of the Parliament of Canada and not an act of the Government of Canada. They have been designated in the Bill passed by Parliament and not by an Order in Council or a commission from the Government. In the first place, we would make very strong objection to that. In the next place, the hon. gentleman has stated that he proposes to provide for revising officers who are not revising officers. The duties of revising forms a very small portion of the duties that will devolve on the officers appointed under this Bill. The hon. gentleman knows that neither in England nor in any of the Australian colonies nor in any of the States of the American Republic nor in this Dominion, heretofore, has the work of revision been performed by the parties who prepare the lists. If the the hon, gentleman were to withdraw his proposition altogether with regard to the appointment of revising officers, if he were to say that these officers shall be designated in the statute that they shall be the judges of the country, so far as they are personally concerned I would not make any objection to their fitness, so far as their good intentions are concerned, but I still say that they would not be competent officers to prepare the lists. It is necessary that the parties who prepare those lists should be personally acquainted with each separate community. I say that no judge possesses that qualification, and that work can only be done, as it is now done in Ontario, by legal officers in each municipality. When they have prepared a list, knowing, as they do, the individuals in their community, knowing their qualifications, knowing whether they are entitled to go on the list or not, in general terms, then there is very little difficulty in the revision. We know that in the Province of Ontario a great majority of those lists are never revised. There is no appeal to the county judge, or to any party, to put additional names on the list, because they are fairly well prepared by those local officers upon whom this duty devolves. I know that, generally, the year before an election takes place there is a little more attention paid than in other years. If the bon. gentleman's plan were carried out, I do not know whether, when he speaks of county judges being the revising officers, he means that the district of each judge in his ordinary capacity shall be that over which he is to have jurisdiction as revising officer. He has not stated that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had not had time.

Mr. MILLS. He informed the House the other day that there were ninety-two constituencies and only forty judges. What are we to infer from that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not necessary to infer; that is the fact.

Mr. MILLS. Everyone of these ninety-two constituencies is embraced in the jurisdiction of those forty judges. Why did the hon. gentleman make the distinction? The county of Bothwell, for instance, is made up of a part of the county of Lambton, and of a part of the county of When a revision takes place of the voters' list, part is revised by the judge of the county of Lambton and part by the judge of the county of Kent. Does the hon. gentleman intend that that shall continue, or that the county of Bothwell shall not be one of those included under the jurisdiction of the county judge, but shall be given to a revising officer appointed by the Government? Does he propose to give us a revising officer, as he gave us a returning officer?

his statement that there were ninety-two constituencies and only forty judges? Did he mean that the forty judges were to operate in forty electoral districts, and that fifty-two districts would be left in which he would appoint revising officers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see, if he looks at the Bill, that a revising officer can hold a commission for more than one district.

Mr. MILLS. I know he can, but the hon gentleman can appoint them as he pleases Under this Bill he retains a power which he ought not to possess. He does not say that he will abandon a power which no Government can decently exercise, no Government has a right to claim, as it is an interested party. The revising officer should be as independent of the Government as of the Opposition. The statement made by the hon, gentleman will not impose upon any member of this House who does not desire to be imposed upon. Barnum has said that it is wonderful how many people are fond of being humbugged, and if any-one accepts the statements of the First Minister it will be only some gentleman who is anxious to be imposed upon, in view of the fact that the First Minister retains this unjust, this atrocious provision, which he has proposed.

Mr. FOSTER. Carried.

Mr. MILLS. No; it is not carried. This is a practical question, and I am addressing myself to the merits of the question.

Mr. ABBOTT. For the first time.

Mr. MILLS. I am calling the hon. gentleman's attention to something which he has not generally stopped in the House to hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Lost.

Mr. MILLS. Although this Bill has been a long time before the committee, the hon, gentleman himself has not been very often present in the committee. I have no doubt he has recuperated and is refreshed, and has returned here on the first day of the week, invigorated by his long rest. The hon, gentleman has said this evening: Suppose we were to adopt the Ontario law. Why, it does not come into operation until January next, and see the extraordinary position we would be in. We would be obliged to go to the country under a new law. Mr. Chairman, let me observe that if we had legislation here it will not come into operation until 1887, while the Ontario law will come into operation next January; and so the hon. gentleman says it is absolutely necessary that we should go on in midsummer and legislate upon this question, although our law cannot come into operation until twelve months after the Ontario law is in operation. That is a most extraordinary argument to address to this committee as a reason for proceeding with this Bill. The hon. gentleman says: It is true that this Bill is not as liberal as the Ontario law, but then you must remember that the law of Ontario is made more liberal since I proposed this Bill two years ago. What does the hon. gentleman intend we shall infer? Does he intend we shall infer that the people of Ontario are in favor of an extension of the franchise, and that the Provincial Legislature has gone still further in the way of meeting the popular wishes than he has gone in this Bill? If I understand the law of Parliament, this Bill is before us for the first time. The hon. gentleman never took the opinion of the country upon his Bill on previous occasions. The very fact that he has withdrawn it on several occasions was the best reason in the world for the opinion that it would not be proceeded with Does he propose to do the same thing in the different divisions of the county of Kent? What did he mean by hon. gentlemen forgets that in 1882, before his Bill of 1883 was before Parliament at all, there was a large convention of the Reform party held in Toronto, attended by upwards of six thousand electors, where it was agreed that a more liberal extension of the franchise should take place. The Government went to the country upon that question, and the hon. gentleman's friends, his lieutenant in the Local Legislature, Provincial Legislature at its last Session is the outcome of that appeal to the electors. The Tory party in the Local Legislature voted for manhood suffrage. Then, what are we to infer from this appeal to the country and the action of both parties in the Local Legislature? We are to infer that the country was prepared to go, at least, as far as the Government did, and possibly farther. Now, Sir, I say that upon this Bill the hon, gentleman has never appealed to the country. I gave several instances on Saturday where, in England, the Government had appealed to the country on proposed constitutional changes. I showed that in nota single instance, within a century, was any considerable alteration made in the constitution without an appeal to the country. My hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has referred to a great number of instances to-day in detail. The obvious reason is, that under the English system an alteration of the constitution is made by the same machinery as that which carries on or inary legislation. But in order to protect the people against alterations in the constitution, against revolutionary measures, there is no instance of any such change having taken place without an appeal first having been made to the country. Now, the hon gentleman has not asked the opinion of the people of this country upon this question. In 1874 we did appeal to the country. We proposed that the Parliament of Canada should, from time to time, adopt the law of the various Local Legislatures for the election of local members as the law for the election of members to the House of Commons. The people did sanction that appeal; they returned a majority to Parliament in favor of it, and the legislation that is now on the Statute Book was in consequence of that appeal. But the hon, gentleman now proposes to change the constitution radically, without giving the people an opportunity of saying whether they approve of this change or not. Then the hon. gentleman seems to have lost sight altogether of the fact that our whole system is based upon the principle involved in the law now on the Statute Book. Take the question of the trial of controverted elections. You refer these to the provincial courts, and you do not object to their trial by these courts, because the courts are provincial. You admit that that was tried, and the Privy Council decided that this matter lies wholly within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, that it is right and proper for the Parliament of Canada to declare that the provincial courts shall try these cases. The Parliament has as much right to name a provincial court for the purpose of carrying out their law as they have to create a separate and independent tribunal. We do the same with regard to summary convictions. I have here the statute which the hon, gentleman himself put upon the Statute Book. Who does it authorise summarily to try and convict for petty offences? Why, the magistrates. Who appoints them? They are appointed by the Local Governments; they are not officers of the Parliament of Canada; and yet you administer your laws through them. Now, is there any impropriety in saying that the clerk of a municipality, or assessor, or other local officer, shall prepare the voters' lists? What objection is there? We are here elected under laws of the several Provincial Legislatures. We have, by our law, declared that that shall be our plan, and we have elections under it; and we can, in the same way, declare that a certain municipal officer, designating him by his office, shall prepare the voters' lists. There is no more difficulty than in saying a provinMr. MILLS.

cial judge shall try controverted Dominion elections. The hon. gentleman knows it. one is as clear as the other. He knows we have the same jurisdiction in one case as in the other, and he knows that if we were to act on the principle he has laid down in this Bill we would radically change our whole machinery for the administration of our laws. If the hon, gentlemen says he does not like the provincial also went to the country in favor of an extension of the franchise. Both parties did that, and the legislation of the franchise and wishes to have a separate and independent franchise for the Dominion, and that the Ontario franchise is too wide, he can still use the provincial machinery for What advantage is the hon. preparing the voters' lists. gentleman going to gain in taking the duty of preparing the list from parties who know all about it and placing it with persons who do not? Take the county of Kent, with a population of 55,000. No doubt the county judge will know a great many people, but, of course, only a small number in proportion to the population. There is only one common sense way for making up the voters' lists, and that is the way that experience has pointed out in every country. In England such lists are prepared by the overseers of parishes and the clerks, and the appeal is to the revising barrister appointed by the judge during the summer assize. The hon, gentleman seeks, however, to do away with all the local machinery by which the lists are prepared, and place the whole matter in the hands of a revising officer. Where are the lists to come from that the officer is to resize? come from that the officer is to revise? It appears, however, that he has to prepare the list. How is he to know the names to put on? The hon. First Minister says he may take the assessment roll. But that does not contain all the names. They can only be known by people residing in the locality. The hon. gentleman has complained of this being a protracted Session and of the length of this discussion. Let him consider the length of the discussions on the Irish Church Bill, on the Reform Representation Bill and on the Irish Land Bill. I am happy to say that a new era is dawning upon the legislation of Canada. I look for better things hereafter. The hon, gentleman has been himself the legislator, instead of having legislation carried on by the Parliament of Canada. In England every Bill is thoroughly discussed on the second reading, and if there is no popular demand for it, although a majority in Parliament may be in favor of the measure, it is usually dropped. The hon. gentleman brought in this Bill at the end of ten or eleven weeks of the Session, after the period when the close of the Session has usually arrived. The hon gentleman proposed to push the measure through the House without discussion, and he gave us no opportunity of discussing it. No one but the leader himself had an opportunity of discussing the Bill on the second reading. The hon gentleman refused to allow the House to adjourn, and insisted on our continuing the discussion, although we had had no opportunity of consulting the country upon it. Have there been petitions presented in favor of the Bill, or public meetings held? Has the hon, gentleman had any evidence, since this discussion began, that the people demanded the Bill? We have had nearly 4,000 names attached to petitions presented to-day; there were 3,000 names on Saturday's petitions, and I dare say as many more were received to-day by the last mail. So, the hon. gentleman is evidently determined to push this Bill through against public opinion,

Mr. McCALLUM. Against the opinion of the Grits.

Mr. MILLS. I presented a petition to-day with 70 Reform names and 28 Conservative names, and it is so marked on the petition. I strongly suspect the hon. member's own constituency does not support this Bill. It has already been gerrymandered twice, and no doubt the hon. gentleman will ask to have it gerrymandered again.

Mr. McCALLUM. I never asked for it.

Mr. MILLS. I am simply stating that in 1882 a township from Haldimand was attached to Monck, and it was gerrymandered a second time.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon, gentleman is mistaken as to the facts. The hon, member for Haldimand went to the First Minister and requested that to be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear; that is true. Mr. Thompson asked for it.

Mr. MILLS. It was done, all the same.

Mr. McCALLUM. You said I asked for it. It was done at the request of the hon. member for Haldimand, not at my request.

Mr. MILLS. We all know from experience how very anxious the First Minister is to make constituencies safe for hon. gentlemen on this side.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have made a good many.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; more than the hon. gentleman will ever have opportunity of doing again. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) stated that this would not be a party voters' list that would be prepared under this Bill, but it would be a people's list. Yet the people prepare the lists now. Neither the Local Government nor the Dominion Government interfere. One hon, gentleman said the councillors are respectable men, but the assessors are rascally, unscrupulous men, who are ready to commit perjury for the purpose of making a bad voters' list. But who appointed these rascally assessors? They are appointed by the respectable councillors, whether Conservative or Reform. The council appointing the assessors have both parties represented in its members. If one party happens to be in a minority they are there, at all events, to know. They are the watchmen; they are able to tell whether there is any improper conduct on the part of the majority; they are put on guard, and it is possible for them to make an appeal to the proper officers. But in this case how is this list prepared? By a man who is a stranger to the great majority of the people; by a man who is a partisan of the Government, when he is not a judge; by a man who, if he wishes to do right, is not able to do so, from the want of the necessary knowledge, and who, if he is disposed to do wrong, can do so without the attention of the community being called to his conduct in time. The chances are that in order to prevent an improper list from being prepared it will be necessary for every candidate and every member of Parliament to spend as much time and incur as much expense as he would in the conduct of an ordinary election.

Mr. McCALLUM. You have to do that now.

Mr. MILLS. No, we have not. I say the great majority of this House do not look after the voters' lists. The great majority of this House rest upon their general confidence in the fair play of the men by whom the lists are prepared, and it is a rare exception, and not the general rule, that the list should be revised by the judge at all. But that condition of things will continue no longer. The moment you adopt this law you make it necessary to spend more time and incur more expense each year, in revising that list, than in the conduct of an ordinary election. I say that the expense is a very serious matter, and that it will be far greater, taking the country collectively, than the expense incurred by the Government in the payment of the officers called upon to prepare these lists. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have addressed to the committee the remarks which I wished to make upon this portion of the Bill. I called the attention of the committee to the fact that in passing the law we now we are adhering to a law which is perfectly consistent with the general policy of our jurisprudence; that just what we have done every year in the trial of contrcverted elections, in the administration of criminal justice, is precisely what we are doing in this case, in avoiding expense by using men who are acquainted with the people and who are infinitely better qualified to prepare the voters' lists, in the first instance, than the revising officers the hon. gentleman proposes to name, whether they are named in an unobjectionable way, by Parliament, in the Bill, or in an objectionable way, by the hon. gentleman himself. In that respect there is a very great distinction. I would say this that if the hon. gentleman persists in his adherence to this clause I shall favor an amendment, when we come to the proper part of the Bill, providing for the appointment of the reeve, the assessor and the township clerk, for the purpose of preparing the original lists. I say we can name them in the Bill, and we can impose on them the duty which is now imposed on the municipal officers, of preparing the list in the first instance. I say it is of the utmost consequence that the preparation of the lists should not be in the hands of the revising officer, but in the hands of parties who are acquainted with the ground.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find, Sir, that I made a great mistake. Seduced by the dulcet tones of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), I broke the rule which I had set for myself, which I found it necessary, as the leader of the House, to set for myself, and that was to obey the rules of Parliament. When we went into committee I stated from the beginning that we should adhere to the rules of Parliament, and that when in Committee of the Whole we should discuss, clause by clause, on its own merits, and not anticipate arguments on the very first clause, which might be brought against the very last. I laid down that rule; it was my bounden duty to do so. If the leader of the House desires to perform his duty he should see that he, at all events, should not consciously break any of the rules of Parliament. Now, during the whole debate we have broken the rule by which each clause should be considered on its own merits, without entering on a discussion of the whole measure. However, early that rule was broken. I could not help it, and on both sides we have had very instructive, though premature, speeches on various clauses of the Bill. It is my duty, however, to adhere to the rule which I laid down for myself, that when in Committee of the Whole we should discuss the single question before us at the time, and not diverge into a discussion—very proper when the Speaker is in the Chair, on the first, second or third reading, or on concurrence, but certainly a breach of the principles and practices of Parliament when in committee. I adhered to that, but I was seduced by the reasonable speech of the hon, gentleman to go further than the resolution which was before the committee. I did so with the best intention; but it only shows that I was wrong, and that I should have adhered to the rule, because, instead of being received, as I thought my remarks ought to have been received, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), he takes up the whole discussion again, opens it up ab initio. and shows that the present system—I will will not call it obstruction, but the system of lengthened and continued discussion—should be still continued. It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman has not adopted the moderate and, in my opinion, the wise tone of the hon. member for Brant, in limiting himself to a short and succinct statement of his objections to the Bill. I apologise to the committee for making that mistake. I find that the hon gentleman has not reciprocated. The hon. gentleman is resolved —I do not know whether those around him will follow his track, but certainly his leader shows that he will not follow in that track; I say I do not know have on the Statute Book, and in adhering to that law, I whether the remainder of the committee will pursue this course or not; but if it is so, we must submit with all Christian resignation. I stated my reasons why I would oppose the adoption of the same rigid rules which exist in England, and which were forced on Mr. Gladstone, and I am strongly of opinion that I was right then, and I shall not—so far as I can help it—be induced, by any continued discussion, to attempt to introduce new rules in this House, until we find that legislation is put an end to by the acts of a minority. I hope that is not going to be the normal state of the Parliament of Canada—I hope so in the interests of Canada and the prosperity of Canada. I suppose it will last my time, but if this kind of obstruction goes on, why, those who follow me will not have such a happy 40 years as I have had during my parliamentary experience. It seems that the hon gentleman wishes to make it a trial of physical endurance. Well, if that is the case, we must put up with it the best we can. I told the hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) a story the other day, when we were taking luncheon, illustrative of what physical endurance means, and I will repeat it for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. There was an Indian in the county of Prince Edward, now represented by Dr. Platt, who had murdered a farmer and his wife. He was caught in the act; there was no hope for him; he was certain to be convicted and to suffer the extreme penalty of the law; and as he was an Indian—perhaps not enfranchised, and not able to vote against the hon. member for Bothwell-of course all the clergy, both Catholic and Protestant, were anxious to bring him to a sense of his state, and they went to see him. One day he said to the gaoler—the gaoler was my informant—said he, "Mr. McGuire, what kind of a place is hell?" "Well, John," "Has it been long there?" asked the Indian. "Oh, yes; before the world was created." "Many people there?" "Oh, yes; all the bad people go there?" "Who was the first man there?" "Why," said the gaoler, "the devil." "Is he there yet?" "Yes, he is there yet." "Well," said the Indian, "if he can stand it, I can."

Mr. FAIRBANK. I wish to ask a question relating to the working of the Bill. The revising officer is to get the assessment roll and the list of voters, and from them is to prepare his first voters' list. At present the assessment roll makes no reference to the amount of rent that is paid; and how is the revising officer to get such information as to enable him to decide whether a tenant shall have a vote or not? This somewhat extensive class could only be put on the list upon personal application afterwards. I have a list in my hand relating to one constituency, on which there are over 700 names of persons of that class. Are those 700 to be left off the first list and only to be put on upon personal application to the revising officer?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I must adhere to the rule just laid down. I shall be very glad to answer the hon. gentleman when we get two or three clauses on, when this question will be appropriate. I shall then be glad to enter fully into the discussion, to give such explanations and to receive such suggestions as may be made on both sides.

Mr. MILLS. With reference to the observations the hongentleman addresses to me, I have to say that whatever he may have been, I deny that I was out of order. I discussed the clause before the committee; I incidentally alluded to the observations the hon. gentleman made; but what I said was strictly pertinent. I have nothing to say about the hon. gentleman's Indian story. That was quite as pertinent as his speeches usually are in this House. But if any of the Indians commit acts of that sort to day he would not regard them as murder, and I suppose he will not send any of them to Hades on account of them.

.Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend has asked for the bread limit my remarks, as far as possible—indeed, I hope to do of information, and the hon. gentleman has only given him so entirely—to the particular amendment which I have the Sir John A. Macdonald a very good story—a story I have heard before with some amusement; and it has two morals to it. The one is, that which I suppose he wished to draw from it, that that side of the House could stand the discussion of this Bill as long as we could; and the other, which I think also follows from it, is, that we have been making it particularly hot for the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is your future, not your present.

Mr. CASEY. Well, they may be, perhaps, expiating now something of what they might otherwise have to endure in the future. At all events, it has been extremely hot for them, and if there were any proof of that needed, it might be found in the statement the hon. gentleman has made this evening, in regard to the changes he proposes to make in the Bill. Under these circumstances, the moral is very clear, and it is not very discouraging to this side of the House either.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Watson) negatived. Yeas, 40; nays, 65.

Amendment (Mr. Charlton) negatived. Yeas, 40; nays, 70.

On section 3,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that in the first paragraph the word "November" be struck out and the word "January" be inserted instead, and that the word "five" be struck out and the word "six" be inserted instead. The rolls in the cities, I believe are made up in December, and it is most convenient, therefore, that the starting point should be on the 1st of January instead of on the 1st of November.

On sub-section 2, section 3,

"Is a British subject by birth and naturalisation."

Mr. MITCHELL moved:

That all that part of section 3, after the word "and," of sub-section 2 of section 3, be struck out, and the following substituted: Has been a resident of the electoral district for twelve months, and has been assessed for and paid his taxes for the current year.

He said: I have followed with much attention and a good deal of regret the course this debate has taken, and I hope I will not be violating the rules which have been laid down, and particularly laid down to-night, by the right hon. the Premier, in suggesting that hon. gentlemen should confine themselves to the particular paragraph or section that is under discussion. I will endeavor to follow that rule as closely as circumstances will allow, but I may be permitted to make this observation in relation to the course this debate has taken, that I look upon the debate with extreme regret, as a constitutional man. I could make great allowance for the opposition of hon gentlemen on the other side to this Bill, believing, as they do, that the independence of the country is assailed by its provisions, if they had only confined their course to lawful and parliamentary opposition. But I must say that in the earlier part of the debate the opposition, in my opinion, went beyond that, and took the character of obstruction, a character which I regretted much to see it take. During the last three or four days of the discussion, however, I am pleased to see hon. gentlemen have returned to what they believe to be their constitutional right, to discuss the Bill without obstruction, but to discuss it fully and effectually and completely. I hope that during the rest of the discussion on this Bill that course will be pursued by hon, gentlemen on both sides, and that we will endeavor, as closely as we can, to confine ourselves to the particular paragraph or section which may be under the consideration of the committee for the time being; and, following out that course, I will limit my remarks, as far as possible—indeed, I hope to do honor to propose. There is no measure that could come in America for a long time, and has prevailed in several before this House which could be more fatal to the independence and to the prosperity of this country than a Franchise Bill which would declare who should and who should not be elected to sit in this Parliament. It is well known arose as to whether a Bill at all should emanate from this Parliament, whether we ourselves should regulate the franchise and the conditions upon which persons should be elected to sit and vote in this House, I then declared my opinion to be most decidedly in favor of a Franchise Bill which should emanate from us; I then declared that we ourselves should exercise the right of saying who should elect us, and that the right should not be given to any minor Assembly in this country to make restrictions which would affect or control the election of people to sit here. On the other hand, while taking that view of the case, I stated frankly that although I supported that main principle of the Bill I should oppose the details of the Bill, because I looked upon them as very cumbersome, as very expensive, and as entirely unsymmetrical. I have not changed my opinion from any discussion that has taken place since. I believe this Bill could be simplified very materially by the adoption of the resolution I have proposed. The advantages of the system I propose over the system provided in the Bill are, in my opinion, numerous. In the first place, the system I propose will be much more economical than the Bill before us. The right hon. First Minister has stated that the cost of the revising officers and the clerks is much exaggerated; possibly it may be. No person can tell what the cost of that staff of officers will be; but one thing we do know, and that is, that there are upwards of 200 constituencies in this country, that we have a revising officer for each constituency and a clerk and a bailiff, as provided by the Bill; these people must in each constituency have an office; there will be rents to be paid, stationery to be provided and printing to be done, and I am of opinion that the whole of this will reach certainly between $150,000 and $200,000 a year. If that be the case, it will be adding to the cost of legislation in this country a very considerable item which, I think, ought to be avoided if possible. Let us see how it can be avoided. Under the Bill, the extension of the franchise in individual instances is quite as comprehensive and goes quite as far as the amendment which I have the honor to propose. For instance, this Bill allows people who pay $2 a month rental to vote, and we all know the class of people who pay $2 a month rental; we know it is the very lowest and most impoverished class of people in this community who would live in houses for which they only have to pay $2 a month rent, and if that is the case, if that class of people are as low down in the scale of society as the class that I propose to enfranchise here, surely we cannot, on the ground that they are beneath those to whom we are going to give representation, refuse them the right to vote. The objection to this amendment, as I understand, is that it is too comprehensive. Well, the same applies to a certain class enfranchised under this Bill, and we have this difference between the two cases, that in one case you adopt an extensive machinery, with a large amount of cost, and a complicated measure for the consideration and discussion and judgment of these revising officers, and of the people themselves who may vote; you have a number of sections in this Bill which it is very difficult to understand, and all this would be removed if the amendment which I propose were substituted, and you would have the advantage of a measure simple in its character, uniform in its constitution and inexpensive in its operation. There is a principle underlying this amendment which I think is worth the consideration of this House. It is that we are gradually drifting towards universal suffrage, not here alone, but in Europe. It has existed !

of the Provinces of this Dominion, and we have never found any very serious objection to its working. If, therefore, it were extended to the whole Dominion, and the right were given to every one who contributes to the taxation of the that at a very early stage of the debate, when the question country to say how the taxes should be applied, it would have the advantage of giving satisfaction to the people, and would forever put an end to the agitation which must arise when this Bill is passed, and which is necessarily created by the passage of this Bill. It would create a finality in regard to any attempt to broaden the franchise, because the franchise could not be broadened; it would put an end to agitation on that subject, and would give, I am persuaded, very general satisfaction to the people of the country. Where is the great difference between the sons of farmers and the sons of mechanics? It is true that, under this Bill, some sons of mechanics may vote if their fathers possess freeholds, but there are many mechanics who do not own freeholds, whose sons are as capable of discriminating as to the proper person to be elected as the sons of farmers. If the franchise is given to one class of young men, no more intelligent than others, is it likely that a Bill of that character will give satisfaction and conduce to the harmonious working of our elective system? I do not think it will, and therefore I propose this amendment. I know some objections are raised to it in reference to its detail. I am not tied to the particular form. Some say that it should not be limited to the tax-paying element. I believe that is a sound principle. I do not believe in giving to paupers and others who do not contribute anything to the revenue of the country the right to say who shall distribute those revenues; but, on the other hand, I believe that the principle is just as correct, that everyone who does contribute to the revenues of the country should have a right to say how they should be distributed and who should be the people to distribute them. I am not going to take up the time of the committee. There has been too much time taken up already in the discussions which have taken place. I have simply stated the reasons which have induced me to submit this amendment, and I would say to the right hon, gentleman at the head of the Government that, if he would accept the amendment, I believe it would give satisfaction to the country, I believe, though I am not authorised to speak for them, that hon. gentlemen on the other side would accept it, that it would stop this long discussion; and I say further that, if the right hon. gentleman would declare that this is not a party vote, that it is a question raised above party, and would leave the gentlemen who sit behind him to exercise their judgment upon it, I believe he would find that a large majority of them would sustain the principle of manhood suffrage based on taxation.

Mr. DAVIES. When the hon, gentleman first introduced his amendment I understood it was one in favor of manhood suffrage, pure and simple. I did not particularly examine the resolution which he placed in your hands, and so understanding his object, I told him I would be most happy to second it. It seems to me, however, on a critical examination of that amendment, that it does not go as far as I would wish it to go. That may be a fault of mine, but it does not cover the whole question of manhood suffrage. It necessitates the possession of property on the part of the British subject of twenty-one years of age; it pre-sup-poses the possession by him of property in order that he may get on the assessment roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; a man paying a poll tax of a shilling or a dollar would have a vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are very few poll taxes in the Dominion or in the Provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL. They can adopt them, then.

Mr. DAVIES. If poll taxes were universal, and the hon. gentleman had said that those paying a poll tax should be included, I would have been glad to adopt it; but this amendment requires that the voter should have been assessed and paid taxes for the current year. That necessitates his having property, and places the right to exercise the franchise upon the same basis as the right hon. gentleman proposes, though in a different way. The Bill now before us necessitates the possession by the voter of a certain amount of real estate or the receipt of so much income.

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The Bill pre-supposes that. He must be the owner of land worth $150 in cities and $350 in counties. or a tenant paying monthly rental of $2 or a yearly rental of $20. He must be an occupant, in the actual possession of land worth $150 or in receipt of a yearly income of $400. The classes reached, therefore, by this Bill, are nearly as extensive as those who would be reached by the amendment of the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). I think he has worded his resolution unfortunately, and that it would not embrace those classes that he seeks to embrace. Therefore, I shall be obliged, in order to put my views on record, to move a small amendment to that—although I may say that when listening to his remarks I found that he and I were perfectly in accord. There is no doubt, as he says, that we are now arrived at a very important stage of this Bill. The House, by agreeing to the second reading, has affirmed a principle that this Legislature alone shall settle the franchise of those electors who are to vote for members here. And we are now face to face with the still more important question, in my view, of what that franchise shall consist of. I think the basis the right hon. gentleman has laid down is an unfortunate basis, and that it cannot be logically defended. I think, in a new country like Canada, we ought to have a more liberal and a more radical basis, and I propose that this Bill shall affirm that every free citizen of this Dominion, not disqualified by law, being 21 years of age, and having resided in the district for twelve months, shall have the right to vote. Sir, it is a new principle as regards some of the Provinces of this Dominion. It is not a new principle to myself and my colleagues from Prince Edward Island, nor is it new, I believe, to the members from British Columbia. We have had that principle in force for twenty-five or thirty years, and I will venture the assertion that after the experience of a quarter of a century no public man can be found who will express his opinion that it has failed. I think there has been a concensus of opinion from all parties, politicians and thinking men, statesmen of all kinds, who have any knowledge of Prince Edward Island politics, that the system of manhood suffrage in Prince Edward Island has been a great success. Now, when we lay down the basis of a new franchise for the whole Dominion I think we commit a cruel wrong if we make it higher than the one which has been in operation in those two Provinces. It is a good principle, that once men have votes they should always have votes. You have no right to take from these men the rights which they have heretofore possessed, unless you can establish the fact that they have abused the trust which the Legislature reposed in them. No man dare say, no man has said, that the electors of Prince Edward Island have ever abused that trust. No man has said—or, at any rate, successfully said—that it is right or just to disfranchise that class. Sir, I ask that the principle we have had in operation in that Province be extended all over this Dominion. I say it is the only true basis upon which you can rest. You are now enacting, for the first time in this new country, the there? You are going to exclude from the exercise of that violence and by tyranny. Such has not been the case; dearest right of a Briton a large portion of the population. Do you think those whom you are going to exclude will be satisfied? Do you not know that the experience of past countries will be repeated? That from year to year there will be an incessant agitation carried on by these people to obtain the same rights as are enjoyed by their fellow citizens. the right to say who shall represent them and who shall tax them? Now, we have had the experience of other countries as to the effect of this system of manhood suffrage. The argument against it has been that there are, in cities, large floating populations who are not intelligent enough to exercise the franchise. But we have only to look across the line, to the great country south of us, and what do we see there? We see one of the greatest countries in the civilised world, where the principle of manhood suffrage has been in operation for nearly 100 years. After that experience of a century, is there a public man in the United States who would dare to stand up to-day and advocate a return to a more liberal franchise?
Mr. Davies.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes, thousands.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, of course my assertion, and the denial of my hon. friend, do not amount to a great deal; but I have read American history wrongly, and I have read the utterances of their leading men wrongly-

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Have you read an article written by Francis Parkman?

Mr. DAVIES. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. You surely do not infer that he is in favor of manhood suffrage?

Mr. DAVIES. I did not know that Francis Parkman was a political man at all.

Mr. WOOD. His opinion has all the greater weight.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think so. I say no politician of any standing, no public man-using the word in the sense of a man who takes part in the politics of the country—will be found who will advocate a recurrence to a more limited franchise. Take the public men of the Republican party, or of the Democratic party: Did you ever see a plank proposed to be inserted in the platform of either of those two great parties that asked for a limited franchise, that would exclude any class of their fellow citizens from that franchise? Why, Sir, it would be the death knell of the party who proposed it. Looking at the broad results of one hundred years' experience, has the faith which the founders of the American constitution placed in the people at large been justified by the facts? I say it has. I say that, although that country has been the recipient of the floating population of almost every part of the globe; although I think I am not exaggerating when I say that millions have poured into that country for the past fifty years from the old world; although what is called the scum of the population of some of those countries has gone into the United States, still, Sir, when they once land upon that soil and reside there twelve months, they become citizens and find that they have the same rights as the millionaire, or the man who is born there, and the result has been that they become amalgamated with the people, and become lovers of the country which they have adopted; and I suppose that to-day you will not find any people more loyal to the flag they have chosen as their own than the immigrants from Ireland, England, Germany, Italy and other European countries. Sir, I say that their experience furnishes one of the most magnificent spectacles that the world has ever presentedthe whole of that immense mass of people marching to the polls once in four years and electing its chief magistrate; and yet one would suppose, from the predictions who were basis for a franchise. Is there any hon, gentleman within uttered with reference to universal suffrage, that the reach of my voice who thinks you are going to rest the exercise of that right would be accompanied by such was not the case. That country was brought face to face with one of the greatest revolutions the world has ever seen. The North and South were pitted against each other. The wiseacres of the old countries of the world shook their heads and said: The end has come; the Republic is a failure; disintegration has already set in, and this is owing in part to the system of giving every man a vote. What has been the result? No other country could have grappled with a rebellion of the same magnitude so successfully as the United States did in 1860. I invite attention to the opinion expressed by the greatest living statesman at the time he introduced the celebrated Franchise Bill in 1864. Mr. Gladstone referred to the rebellion in the United States, and pointed out that the result obtained was the result of every capable citizen being enfranchised and having a direct and energetic interest in the welfare of the State:

"Never was a great truth so vividly illustrated as in the war of the American Republic. The convulsion of that country between 1861 and 1865 was, perhaps, the most frightful that ever assailed a national existence. The efforts which were made on both sides were marked. The exertions by which alone the movement was put down were not only extraordinary, but they were what would antecedently have been called impossible; and they were only rendered possible by the fact that they proceeded from a nation where every capable citizen was enfranchised and had a direct and energetic interest in the welfare of the State."

Such was the result of the experience and reflection of the greatest living statesman of this age, and perhaps I am not far wrong in saying of any age. When we look at am not far wrong in saying of any age. the facts of history as he has looked at them and accept the conclusion he has drawn, that that country was enabled to conquer from the fact that it gave every capable citizen a right to vote and take part in the Government, we have the nucleus and basis of a thought which should guide us in deciding what basis we should put the franchise upon in this Dominion. In the magnificent institutions of the United States and in the manner in which they amalgamate immigration coming to their shores, in the wonderful appreciation of their institutions, we see the solution of the problem how to govern a country by the people and for the people. (The hon, gentleman read from Mr. Mathew Arnold's work, being the result of his American tour, to show the homogeneous character of the American nation. Continuing, he said): The experience of the country lying alongside of the Domin. ion, with which we are most directly connected, about which we individually know the most outside of Canada, is one which affords to us a solution of the problem now under consideration. We have there a century of the most trying experience, and yet to-day it is a homogeneous people marching on in the race of progress at an unprecedented rate, and bidding for the supremacy of the world. We find the United States attracting immigration more than any other country attracts it, and I believe one reason for that is that every man who goes there knows that he becomes a full-fledged citizen, with all the political rights and privileges accorded to Vanderbilt or any other millionaire. We are competing with the United States for a portion of this immigration, and if we want to compete and succeed we should let immigrants from the old world know that when they arrive in Canada they are enfranchised and possess the same political privileges as they would in the United States. We are taking a retrograde step, one we shall regret, and one which, in a very few years, we shall have to recall, which, until it is recalled, will be followed by agitation, year after year, until we lay down the basis that every capable citizen has a right to take part in the government of the country. If we turn our eyes from the United States to England we find that an agitation has been going on in the same direction. That agitation has not reached its final point but is coming near to it. A political revolution has taken place during the last fifty years, not accompanied by bloodshed, but none the less a revolution. The people were fifty years ago excluded from the Government; those who had the right to vote were a very small class, and the result was this, that those elected by them legislated for the class and not for the benefit of the people at large. We know the result of the class legislation in England fifty, sixty, or seventy years ago was, that the people were brought almost to the verge of rebellion, and those who are conversant with the history of that country, about the year 1832, know that the concessions of popular rights which were then given were given almost at the point of bayonet. We know, Sir, that since that time, and in fact in that year, England went through the throes of a new birth. We know that since that time the harsh, cruel, and unnatural laws which were then in force have been nearly all repealed. We know that year by year the legislation of that country, instead of being behind the genius of the age, has been in advance of it, and has been an example to other countries; and when we look at the manner in which that legislation has been brought about, we see that it has been almost coincident with the extension of the franchise. I took the trouble to look up the number who had the right to the franchise in that year. I find, Sir, in that Bill, which has been characterised as the new magna charta of British liberty, 500,000 were added to the electorate, and 500,000 only. Why, Sir, the statesman of that day, Lord John Russell, who carried the Bill through, thought he had done something marvellous; he thought he was taking a dangerous step in admitting these 500,000 of the middle classes, educated people, to the exercise of political rights, which to us, seem almost as proper for them to enjoy as the right to breathe the air or enjoy the sunshine. But, Sir, he did admit them, and he advised his party to rest and be thankful. He thought he had done all that was necessary. According to his political light, that was all right, but what do we find? Do we find, Sir, that any of the evils which were predicted by the Conservatives of those days followed? On the contrary, we find those very gentlemen, or their successors, to-day, proclaiming that the step was in the right direction. We find their leader, many years afterwards, adopting the role of a Reformer himself, and opening the political portals still wider. We find that between 1866 and 1869 a very much larger number were added to the electorate. In 1866 the electorate of the United Kingdom reached 1,364,000 people, and that was a very small proportion of the popula-tion of the country. The Reformers of the country were not satisfied. They felt that a wrong was being done, that the mass of the people were not being represented in Parliament, and that not being represented, their interests were not attended to, because, disguise it as we may, if a small class have the right to elect a Parliament, Parliament will reflect the views of that class to a very large extent. The Reformers went on with the agitation until, as I say, between 1866 and 1869 a very large number were added to that electorate. Well, Sir, they adopted the principle of household suffrage. But they did not adopt it out of pure reasoning. They did not concede those rights to the people because it was proved to them in Parliament that the people should exercise those rights, but they conceded them to a large extent out of fear. I remember when I was in London in 1866, when thousands of people were parading the streets, when Hyde Park railings were pulled down, when it was thought the mob were going to take possession of London, I wondered what the row was about. I went to their meetings, I listened to their orators, and I came to the conclusion, as I think every man here would have come to the conclusion, that they were only asking what was fair, right and proper. There were hundreds and thousands of well dressed artisans, clever, intelligent men, who were excluded from the franchise. But between 1866 and 1869 the portals were thrown open, and they adopted the principle of household suffrage. But they have gone on since that time, and we find in 1884 there were 3,000,000 of electors. The agitation has been going on since, and unrest and disquiet have been the condition in the manufacturing towns of that country and those portions of the country where the people were massed together, because millions of people were excluded from this right. They had adopted the principle of household suffrage, the same principle which the hon, gentleman is introducing in this Bill, but that was not going far enough. Thousands and millions of capable citizens were still excluded; the agitation rolled on year after year, until in 1884 we find Mr. Gladstone introducing his new Franchise Bill, and upon what does he base it? Does he base it on household suffrage? No; but he has come to the conclusion that the only fair basis on which to place a right of this kind is capability, and he declares that every capable citizen of the United Kingdom, by this Bill, shall have a right to exercise that great boon of every British subject, the franchise, and he admits by the Bill of 1884 over 2,000,000 of electors to the franchise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Household suffrage.

Mr. DAVIES. The principle is not household suffrage simply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman must know that his Bill is simply extending to the agricultural laborers, the householders of the country, what the householders of the town had.

Mr. DAVIES. I am speaking of the principle which the right hon, gentleman who introduced the Bill, and who knows as much about it, certainly, as the right hon. gentle-man opposite, claims to base it on. Technically, the right hon, gentleman is right, but household suffrage has been construed to mean in England the smallest room.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. DAVIES. That has been affirmed by half a dozen judicial decisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A house may be one room.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). That is the lodger's suffrage

Mr. DAVIES. The meaning of the word house has been construed to cover a small room.

An hon. MEMBER. A single room in a house?

Mr. McNEILL. Do you mean that each of a number of rooms in a house has been construed to mean a house?

Mr. DAVIES. Yes; there may be more than one house under one roof. It has been so decided by the unanimous decision in Common Pleas, that the owner of one room in a house comes within the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. One room may be a house, and one room may not be a house.

Mr. DAVILS. One room in a house is a house within the meaning of the Franchise Bill. We find that in the English Parliament men like Mr. Lowe, who had formerly been Liberals, shrank in terror from the idea that household suffrage should be conceded. Mr. Lowe said it is time we educated our masters. Well, it was time, but the moment we admitted the people to the franchise they sent men to the House of Commons who introduced an education Bill, which is now educating the whole people of England. After the household suffrage was introduced the greatest reforms of modern days have been introduced and carried—in what is called the golden era of liberalism. Since that time the most liberal measures have been carried—the measure for the abolition of the Irish State Church, the measure for the reform of the Irish land laws-all those laws which have marked and distinguished Mr. Gladstone's Administration as the golden age of liberalism have been carried since the capable of exercising the franchise? Mr. DAVIES.

franchise was widened. Now, I want to come to the point I was at when I was interrupted a moment ago, that the underlying principle of Mr. Gladstone's Bill is the conferring upon every capable citizen of the state the right to exercise the franchise. I will quote the right hon. gentleman's own words, in the speech in which he introduced that measure:

"I take my stand on the broad principle that the enfranchisement of capable citizens, be they few or be they many, and, if they be many, so much the better, gives an addition of strength to the State."

There is the principle stated broadly and clearly; every capable citizen, he says, not every man who occupies a

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not every citizen.

Mr. DAVIES. Every capable citizen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the evidence of capability? A house?

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Gladstone did not leave things in the dark, for he defined what he meant by a capable citizen. He referred to the condition of matters in the United States, and went on to say:

"The strength of the modern State lies in the representative system. I rejoice to think that in this happy country and under this happy constitution we have other sources of strength in the respect paid to various orders of the State, and in the authority they enjoy and in the unbroken course which has been allowed to most of our national traditions, but still in the main it is the representative system which is the strength of the modern state in general and of this State in particular."

The true principle has been recognised and applied by Mr. Gladstone in his Franchise Bill, that every capable citizen in the State should have a voice in the affairs of that State. Every man who is taxed should have the right to a

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask one question? If capability is the foundation of Mr. Gladstone's suffrage, what is the test of that capability which he applies in his Bill?

Mr. DAVIES. I do not know what the test is; I am speaking of the principle. As he applies it at present in England, it is the extension of what is called household suffrage to every part of the United Kingdom. But he lays down, as the right principle, that every capable citizen has a right to a vote. The hon memter for King's (Mr. Foster) will not contend, nor, I think, will the right hon. the First Minister himself, that it is any test of capability that a man occupies a house and pays a rental of $2 a month. Is that any gauge of his intelligence?

Mr. FOSTER. What is Mr. Gladstone's gauge?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman knows, or ought to know, that Mr. Gladstone is a practical statesman, and that while he may himself believe in a further extension of the franchise than has been accorded in his Bill, he only introduced a Bill which he was able to carry. He finds that in England the majority of Parliament are only ready at present to concede an extension of the suffrage to those who are known as householders—that is, those who occupy the whole or part of a house.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I am a practical statesman, and I take that gauge.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman says he is a practical statesman, and that he has a gauge. I want to know if there is a member behind him who will accept his gauge as a fair one of a man's capability to vote?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon, gentleman say that because a man pays $2 a month for a room that that shows he is Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That man would not have a vote under Mr. Gladstone's Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon, gentleman mean to say that a man who has passed his examination and is receiving $300 a year as a schoolteacher is not qualified, while an ignorant man, who pays $2 a month for a room, is? Why, there is no gauge or test at all in his Bill. It is because he has introduced a lot of fancy franchises, and has refused to adopt a fair test that I am attacking his Bill. Although Mr. Gladstone was not able to carry out his principle as far as he wished, he has carried it further than any English statesman ever did before, and at one stroke of his pen has admitted 2,000,000 electors to the exercise of the franchise who were previously excluded. I say, then, let us adopt the principle Mr. Gladstone lays down, and make a test of its application. The tests you have laid down in this Bill are unfair, unjust and tyrannical. They ignore intelligence; they exclude thousands upon thousands of the most intelligent young men of the country, and they admit thousands upon thousands of those who are less educated. Mr. Gladstone goes on:

"We are ready to take in the peasant as he is, and joyfully bring him within the reach of this last and highest privilege of the constitution. The whole population, I rejoice to think, have liberty of speech, they have liberty of writing, they have liberty of meeting in public, they have liberty of private association, they have liberty of petitioning Parliament. All these privileges are not privileges taking away from us, diminishing our power and security; they are all of them privileges on the existence of which our security depends. Without them we could not be secured. I ask you to confer on these very same classes the crowning privilege of voting for a representative in Parliament, and then I say we, who are strong now as a nation and a State, shall, by virtue of that change, be stronger still."

In that language the hon, gentleman can recognise who and what people Mr. Gladstone regarded as capable citizensthose who had the liberty of speech, those who had the liberty of writing, those who had the liberty of meeting in public, those who had the liberty of private association, and those who had the liberty of petititioning Parliament; in other words, he recognised manhood, citizenship, as the test of capability to exercise the franchise. Now, having before us the example of the United States, which has had universal suffrage for 100 years, and the example of the United Kingdom, which is yearly marching in that direction, and will march on until it reaches that consummation, we should not hesitate for a moment as to the principle we should adopt. We are a new country; we have not got the large residuum which is sometimes spoken of as existing among the English classes. We have not got that gross ignorance which seems to be almost inseparable from the aggregation of millions of people in towns and cities, such as we see in the great city of London; and the introduction of a new franchise into this Parliament, for the first time, should be marked by faith in the people we represent. Why should we be afraid of the people? Why, in this new country, should we be afraid of any class?

An hon. MEMBER. We are not.

Mr. DAVIES. Then why exclude them from this privilege of a free man? Why say they shall not have a voice in the affairs of the country? I say we should lay the foundations broad and deep, on a basis we can justify now, and where they will remain for many years to come. You may put up your fancy franchises to-day, you may exclude your thousands of young, capable citizens, from the exercise of their right, but how long will it last? Do you think they will be satisfied to remain outside the pale while their fellow citizens are marching up and electing members of Parliament? Do you think, while the great country to the south of us recognises the rights of every citizen, you can adopt a narrower principle here and have it remain? No; you are not only adopting a principle which is unsound in itself; you are showing a want of faith in the people which before long they will resent, and you will be forced, in a few years, to adopt that principle, which is the only true and just principle. It you want to have a test, take the test of intelligence. But the right hon, the Premier ignores that. He had the courage and the manliness to propose it to this House when he asked the adoption of female suffrage. I, myself, voted in favor of it, and would like to see it carried into effect; but hon, gentlemen opposite chose to ignore that principle, and refused to give women the right to vote.

An hon. MEMBER. Did Gladstone take that test?

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Gladstone's test was that every capable citizen should have a vote, and he wanted to apply that principle, but all he could induce his Parliament to do was to come down to household suffrage. Have we any class in this country such as that of which Mr. Gladstone and his friends were afraid? Have we this great mass of people who were never educated and never had the chance of being educated? No; we have not. In this new country, where education is almost universal, where there is no large, ignorant, floating population, we are bound by the test, which experience has shown in the United States to be a true test, to confer upon every capable citizen, every young man of age, every man who bears a share in the burdens of the State, the privilege of taking part in the government of the State. Prima facie every free citizen has a right to vote. If you want to exclude him you are bound to justify his exclusion. On what principle do you justify it here? None has been offered. Are you afraid Justity it here? None has been offered. Are you afraid of the people? Has the result in those Provinces where manhood suffrage has prevailed been such as to justify your saying: We will not apply it over the rest of the Dominion. I say it has not. As a country, it is remarkable to what extent education is diffused among the mass of our people. In Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, the means of obtaining a fair education are within the reach of every man, and our young men have taken advantage of those means. There is no part of the world, in my opinion, where the people have the means of education freer at hand than the people of this country, and I doubt if there is any country where they are taken more advantage of. We have an educated people, not only educated at the public schools, but educated by the public press, which in this country circulates in almost every house. We have also the education which comes from our many-sided colonial life, and which is very different from the education accorded to those who grow up in the countries of the old world. We glory in our free institutions; we are proud of talking of them. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about this great Canada with its iron band from end to end, and its free institutions all over the land. Why then do they not give effect to their panegyrics? Are they afraid of the people who have developed these institutions? Ought we not, instead of fearing them, be proud of them, and grant to them the rights of full citizenship, and have as much confidence in them as the American Republic has in her sons? Until we do that we will not have reached the proper basis, we will not be laying down the proper line, we will not be doing what we will be bound to do in a few years. We drink in freedom at our every breath, and if hon. gentlemen think they are going to exclude free enfranchised Canadians from the exercise of the franchise they are mistaken. They may keep them out a year or two, but the people will press on with irresistible force, the portals of Parliament will be opened, and those men will have to be accorded rights which hon, gentlemen opposite only intend to grant to a favored few. These young men have taxes to pay, they respect the laws, and when the country is in danger it is to them we look for support and succor. When maintain the integrity of our country and the honor of our flag? You appealed to the young men, and they responded, from one end of the country to the other; and they sprang to the front, at the first call, to discharge their duty, and yet you tell me you can put the onus of citizenship on the young men and refuse them the right; you can give them the burdens and not give them the privilege. I tell you you cannot do it. There are thousands of young men who went away at the call of duty to the North-West, leaving their families behind, leaving their loving wives or old mothers, those who depend upon them for support. You are not ashamed to call upon them to shoulder the rifle, to discharge the duties of citizenship. Why are you ashamed to give them the rights? Those who bear the burden, those that discharge the duty, should have the right to vote. I say there are hundreds in the North-West who, when they return to their homes, whether in Ontario or Prince Edward Island, will find, should this Bill pass, that while they are obliged to fight for their country they will not be allowed to vote for those who make the laws. Of the batallion that the Minister of Militia has ordered out from Prince Edward Island, one half of the men, when they come back from the North-West, will be disfranchised. You are inflicting cruel wrong on those poor men, which it may take years to right, but which will be righted, either in this House or by the people who send you here.

Mr. PAINT. That speech will help you at the next election.

Mr. DAVIES. Who are these men you are going to exclude? You are excluding all the workingmen in this country who are not householders.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No.

Mr. DAVIES. You are excluding all the farm laborers.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No.

Mr. DAVIES. You are excluding all the household servants.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, member from British Columbia does not appear to know what he is talking about.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I do know what I am talking about.

Mr. DAVIES. He will please not contradict me.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. That statement is not true.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon. gentleman has any convictions, if he has the courage of his convictions, let him rise up and express them, and not sit there shouting "no, no," and interrupting the speakers. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. So do I.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman does not even appear to understand the Bill before the committee.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The statement the hon. gentleman makes is not true.

Mr. DAVIES. I make the statement, which you must admit, that those who own real property in cities of $300 and in counties of $150 are given the franchise by this Bill, and that does not include the farm laborer.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Yes; it does.

Mr. DAVIES. If you know anything about the condition of farm laborers in this country you will know that there are thousands who do not own property at all. I know hundreds of them in my own Province.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. You do not know yourself what you are talking about. They get a vote by their earnings; that is how they get a vote.

Mr. DAVIES.

Mr. DAVIES. That proves the crass ignorance of the hon, gentleman still more, because he should know that the farm laborers do not earn enough money to entitle them to a vote.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES. It is time that you should, and that you should know several other things. I say the farm laborers, as a class, will be disfranchised by this Bill.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE, No. no.

Mr. DAVIES. I hope the hon. gentleman will have the courtesy not to interrupt.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. Do not make false statements.

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Chairman, I submit that I have no right to be charged with making false statements.

Mr. PAINT. Will the hon, gentleman allow me to make a statement? The laborers in British Columbia receive day wages of $1.50 to $2.50, my hon. friend informs me.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman from Richmond, N.S., who is interrupting me, informs us what the laborers receive in British Columbia. I should like him to tell us what the rate of wages is in the county from which he comes, and in any of the Maritime Provinces. I should like him to tell us what the men get who are laborers on the wharves in the cities of the Maritime Provinces, and whether they will not be distranchised under this Bill.

Mr. PAINT. In the city of St. John, N.B., they get $2 a day.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman appears to have a great aversion to his own Province. He wants to get away from home. He will not refer to his own Province at all. I assert that the farm laborers in those parts of Canada that I am acquainted with are disfranchised by this Bill, and if there are any in this House who will venture to say that farm laborers in this country get more than $400 a year, I want to see them, and I want to know the parts of Canada they come from. I want to see one individual who will get up and say so. There is not one. Then I repeat what I was saying, when I was so discourteously interrupted, that domestic servants will be disfranchised, and that all laborers in the cities of the Dominion will be disfranchised, unless they happen to own real estate, and that the workers in the manufactories of this Dominion will be disfranchised, and that the workers on the wharves of this Dominion and in the mines of this Dominion will be disfranchised, unless they receive $400 a year. I venture the assertion that none, unless they are skilled workmen, will have the vote, and a very large number of those do not receive $400. Fishermen's sons will be disfranchised. The schoolteachers of Prince Edward Island, an educated class, licensed to teach, receive—a great many of them less than $400 a year, and they will be disfranchised. Clerks, employees in the cities of the Dominion—large numbers of them-receive less than $400 a year, and they will be disfranchised. Journeymen, mechanics of all classes, receive less than $400 a year, and they will be disfranchised. In a word, all unskilled labor will be disfranchised. It is true you may say that, if a man has $300 worth of land, he can come in, but I am not arguing on that basis. I say that is no test of the right to vote or of the ability to exercise the vote properly. You are excluding thousands and hundreds of thousands of the bone and sinew of the country in whom you ought to have confidence. Why should you be ashamed of the people? Go forward; take them by the hand; show your confidence in the young men and in the intelligent men; treat them as they should be treated, and you will win their confidence in return. But this attempt to exclude them from the dearest right of a Briton will recoil on the head of the Tories who are attempting it. No statesman ever trusted the people in vain. No Government ever enfran chised the people and repented of it. I ask you to throw off the shackles which now seem, at any rate, to tie up the hands and the mental faculties of the right hon. gentleman opposite. He is so full of old time beliefs, he so clings to his ideas of a past age, that he refuses to recognise the progress of modern times, he refuses to recognise the logic of facts as they exist in the country south of the line, as they are showing themselves day by day and year by year, in the mother land; he refuses to go forward in the march of progress, he refuses to place his trust and confidence in the people of the Dominion. He is not ashamed to call upon them in his hour of trouble, and he will acknowledge that they have responded manfully and nobly, that they have shown a love of country and a patriotism which is beyond all praise, and these young men, who have been willing to give up their homes, and their labor, and their families, and to sacrifice their lives on behalf of their country—this is the class of men you are disfranchising, and this is the time you take to do it, and to proclaim that you have no confidence in them, and that you will not give them the right to exercise the franchise. I have faith in the people. I have seen manhood suffrage worked out. I believe in it, from what I have seen and from what I have read. I believe that all thoughtful men of modern days, who are in accord with liberal ideas and who live under popular institutions, have the trend of their ideas in that direction. We ought not to be behind in the race. We ought not to lay down a wrong basis and to exclude thousands of people from the franchise that we know are as capable of exercising it as those whom you are admitting. I object to the words in the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell): "and has been assessed for and paid his taxes for the then current year." Those words would disfranchise as many as the present Bill does; therefore, I hope he will see his way clear to amend it, by adopting these words I suggest.

Mr. MITCHELL. My object in introducing this amendment was to meet the moderate views of the gentlemen who might object to universal suffrage, because universal suffrage would include paupers and every person, My desire was to make such a restriction as, without impairing the effect of it-perhaps not even, to any extent, the extent of it—would meet the views of gentlemen opposite also. I am quite prepared to change it in such a way as will meet the wishes of the House.

Mr. DAVIES. Then I would suggest that this would meet the hon, gentleman's views as an amendment to the amendment: strike out the words "and has been assessed for and paid his taxes for the then current year," and insert in lieu thereof the words: "and has not received aid as a pauper, or been convicted of a felony, and is free from any legal incapacity.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will see that if an election were to take place early in the year everyone in the constituency might be disfranchised, because it says "paid his taxes for the current year," and the taxes for the current year might not have been collected in any instance.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is just one of the difficulties that may be presented against the amendment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Put "taxes due at the time of voting."

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well. As the right hon. gentleman is disposed to help me, and has made a suggestion, and a very capital one, if he will accept the amendment thus improved I will agree to it.

Mr. SMALL. The hon. gentleman who has just taken city of Toronto who would be disfranchised under this Bill. I in the passage of this Bill, adopt a system of franchise which

He seems to know a good deal about Toronto and the volunteers, more than his remarks appear to justify. I am satisfied that not fifty volunteers who have gone to the front now will be disfranchised under the present Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. Why will it disfranchise fifty? Will the hon, gentleman, now standing here as a representative of Toronto, justify the disfranchisement of these fifty young

Mr. SMALL. The hon, gentleman said they were all disfranchised. He said they would not have votes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I would not have the slightest alarm if universal suffrage were adopted, but I cannot help reflecting, after hearing the speeches that have just been made, upon the discussion we have had here during the last three weeks. I have been convinced, from the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is absolutely necessary that we should have regard, as far as we possibly can, consistently with a uniform Dominion franchise, to the expressions of public opinion from the several Provinces. Now, if this question of universal suffrage excites so much popular interest in the country, how is it these hon. gentlemen, with the influence they possess in their several Provinces, have not succeeded in getting their friends in those Provinces to adopt universal suffrage? When this Bill finally passes this House I believe it will approach very much nearer to universal suffrage than does the law under which we were elected at the last election. There is no doubt whatever that in the Province of Quebec, for instance, the number of young men, those volunteers over whose exploits the hon. gentleman grows most justly enthusiastic—I venture to say that at least four to one of them will have votes under this Bill who had not votes at the last election. In that Province there is no such thing as an income franchise; there is practically a property qualification, and nothing else-not a personal property qualification, but simply a property qualification. But there is no income franchise, and therefore all the young men, no matter what their salaries may be-and all the old men either, for that matter-who happen to be living in boarding houses, who are not domiciled in the house for which they are assessed, are prevented from voting under the present provincial franchise. Now, under this Bill, we have a very great extension of the franchise for the Province of Quebec. And we have had the statement made in the leading organ of the Liberal party in the Province of Nova Scotia, that the franchise, as fixed by this Bill—and I think I may say that when the Bill finally passes that will be undoubtedly true-will practically rather extend than diminish the franchise in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KIRK. It will not extend the franchise.

Mr. WHITE. I take the statement of the Halifax Chronicle, which has been quoted on two or three occasions during this debate, that the franchise will not be materially changed, either in the way of extension or restriction, by this Bill, from what has been fixed by the Local Legislature. In the Province of Ontario we find that during the last Session, less than two months ago, in fact, the Legislature, led by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, rejected a motion for universal suffrage and adopted a franchise which, whether it be more or less liberal than the franchise proposed by this Bill, is, at any rate, based upon a property qualification, either a direct property qualification or one which indicates in the voter the possession of such intelligence as enables him to be a wage-earner or the earner of an income. That is the position of the Province of Ontario, as determined by its Local Legislature. Now, at a time when, I think, I may fairly say, so far as the subject of universal suffrage has been discussed at all, the expression his seat made a broad assertion about the volunteers in the of public opinion has been against it, why we should, the largest Province in the Dominion has just rejected, and which none of the other Provinces have recently adopted, is something I cannot understand, especially when the argument in favor of it comes from those who, for the last three weeks, have been doing all they possibly could to prove to us that we ought to adopt the provincial franchises. Then, we have had an argument drawn from the United States. But there is one very important fact which has been overlooked, namely, that universal suffrage does not prevail in all the States. In some States there is a property qualification, and manhood suffrage does not prevail. Now, it is a singular fact that some of these States have maintained their property qualification in spite of the fact that the States surrounding them had manhood suffrage, and yet there seems to have been no serious agitation in favor of manhood suffrage in those States where the property qualification existed.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the hon, gentleman tell us what States he referred to as having a property qualification?

Mr. WHITE. The hon, gentleman himself has given us the statement during the elaborate speeches which he has made. He has pointed out, as one of the strong arguments in favor of adopting the provincial franchises, that in the United States they have different franchises in different States, and that the federal power has never attempted to interfere with them. That seems to me to be an argument which should lead us to hesitate, at all events, in adopting, at this time, the principles of universal suffrage. I have no hesitation in saying that we will come to universal suffrage; that in this country, as in England, every change made in the suffrage is in the direction of extending and widening it, and that ultimately the principle of manhood suffrage may possibly be adopted. But no one can look at this Bill and at the condition of the suffrage in the various Provinces, or in the Provinces in the aggregate, without feeling that we are making quite as important a step in the direction of widening the suffrage by the adoption of this Bill as ever was made by the adoption of the great Reform Bills passed from time to time in England. The hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) got rather into a difficulty when he referred to the position taken by Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone did not take the ground, although he is undoubtedly a very advanced Liberal, in favor of manhood suffrage, in favor of every citizen having a vote. He took care to qualify the term "citizen" by using the word "capable citizen;" and it seems to me that where we have the suffrage given to every man living in a house for which he pays $2 a month as rent, we may fairly say we have universal suffrage for every married man. There is no question about that. Moreover, when we declare that a man earning $300 or $400 a year is to have a vote, we declare universal suffrage for every man, wageearner or income earner, who has intelligence enough to exercise the vote intelligently, and we practically have adopted in this Bill that franchise which the leader of the Opposition referred to when he indicated that one of the tests of qualification in a voter, which he would adopt if he were framing a Franchise Bill, namely, the qualification of intelligence. Under these circumstances, it seems to me we have a Bill so far in advance, taking the Provinces in the aggregate, of the suffrage under which this Parliament was elected, that we may fairly leave the question of manhood suffrage to be considered hereafter, when it comes to be more generally discussed in the country. And while I believe, as I have said, that we will ultimately come to that, after discussion has taken place, and while I have the most unbounded confidence in the masses, in their intelligence and instincts to do right, I believe the true policy to-day is to adopt the Bill before the committee, fixing the franchise as therein stated, and leave the question of the discussion of a broader franchise to a subsequent period. Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Mr. McNEILL. One word about what Mr. Gladstone said as to capable citizens. After using the language quoted by the hon. member for Queen's, Mr. Gladstone said:

"Sir, the only question that remains in the general argument is, who are capable citizens? And fortunately that is a question which, on the present occasion, need not be argued at length, for it has been already settled—in the first place by a solemn legislative judgment aquiesced in by both parties in the States; and, in the second place, by the experience of the last more than 15 years. Who, Sir, are the capable citizens of the State whom it is proposed to enfranchise? It is proposed, in the main, to enfranchise the county population, on the footing and according to the measure that has already been administered to the population of the towns. What are the minor tradesmen of the country population? First of all, they are the minor tradesmen of the country, and the skilled laborers and artisans in all the common arts of life, and especially in connection with our great mining industry. Is there any doubt that these are capable citizens. You, hon, gentlemen opposite have yourselves asserted it by enfranchising them in the towns; and we can only say that we heartily subscribe to the assertion. But besides the artisans and the minor tradesmen scattered throughout our rural towns, we have also to deal with the peasantry of the country. Is there any doubt that the peasantry of the country are capable citizens, qualified to make good use of their power as voters." "Sir, the only question that remains in the general argument is, who

That is what Mr. Gladstone meant by capable citizens.

Mr. MILLS. No doubt the hon, gentleman is quite right in his quotation from Mr. Gladstone's speech; but Mr. Gladstone, in a controversy with Mr. Lowe, which appeared in the Fortnightly or Contemporary Review, goes much further than that, and declares that every citizen must be assumed to be capable, and that the burden of proof falls on those who deny his capability.

Mr. McNEILL. I was simply dealing with the question before the House. If the controversy with Mr. Lowe was submitted to the House it might not bear out the observations of the hon gentleman, any more than the present statement of the hon, gentleman has done so.

Mr. MILLS. I will read that statement at the proper

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I remember very well the speech and the controversy about the franchise from a theoretical standpoint; but when, on his responsibility and as the head of the Government, Mr. Gladstone proposed that all capable men should have a vote, he lays it down with that qualification so clearly that I am surprised the hon. gentleman who first quoted his speech did not read the whole portion. That hon, member tried to make the committee believe that when Mr. Gladstone said capable citizen he meant every citizen; whereas, it distinctly appears that he meant those who gave evidence of capability by coming within the franchise of the Act. The hon, gentleman tried to mislead the committee—I make that as a charge—by omitting that portion which showed that Mr. Gladstone meant those men whose capability was shown by their qualifications for the franchise under the Act.

Mr. MILLS. I am not going to enter into a controversy as to what the hon. gentleman has said in reply to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). That hon, member is thoroughly competent to defend himself. But I wish to refer also to a speech Mr. Gladstone made at Liverpool, shortly after the close of the American war, in which he went on to say, that if the United States had not had manhood suffrage he did not believe they would have had strength to suppress that great rebellion; and he declared in that speech that the success of the United States in putting an end to that rebellion, and the patriotism exhibited by the people, made him a convert to the principle of manhood suffrage. No doubt the hon, gentleman remembers the speech.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. McNEILL. I recollect very well the speech in which Mr. Gladstone spoke of a man and a brother as being the reason why the franchise should be extended. That was before 1866, and before Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill of that year; but I have no recollection of a speech to which the hon. member refers, but I will endeavor to look it up. I do not impugn the veracity of the hon. member in any way, but I shall be pleased to obtain information as to where the speech can be found.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White), a few months ago, in referring to the motion now in your hands, Mr. Chairman, informed us that in the United States, where the principle of universal suffrage prevailed, this principle had not become universal. The hon. gentleman did not designate the States that had failed to adopt universal suffrage; but he did state, when I asked him to name some States, that some of the States did not have universal suffrage, giving my words in a speech made in an earlier stage of this debate as his authority. When I was discussing the question some days ago I said that at the time when the constitution of the United States was adopted there were differences of suffrage, but since then the suffrage in the States had become nearly, if not quite, universal, with one or two exceptions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There are at least seven States where there is a property or assessment qualification.

Mr. CHARLTON. The suffrage is practically universa in all the States. There is no property qualifications in any of the States. The hon, gentleman also informed us that he had no doubt that the country would come to the adoption of this principle of universal suffrage, and that it was a matter that might very well stand until it had been considered by the country, until the country had time to pronounce an opinion upon it and bring pressure to bear upon this House. That is the argument which has been urged by the Opposition with regard to the whole Bill-that the whole Bill might properly stand, that there has been no pressure felt with regard to this Bill from the country, no manifestations of the popular will, either with regard to universal suffrage or a Dominion franchise, and that the whole Bill might stand, as the hon gentleman says the principle of universal sufferage might stand. He tells us that the First Minister had expressed himself in favor of an intelligence qualification. Well, Sir, if he has, his conduct is singularly at variance with such an expression of opinion. Why, he proposes to confer the franchise on the most ignorant and debased portion of our population—the Indians. The hon. member for Cardwell takes the ground that the Liberal members from Ontario stultified themselves in their advocacy of universal suffrage in this House,

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I made no reference to the Liberal members of the House. I was speaking of the Legislature as a whole, and not of its party character.

Mr. CHARLTON. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the members from the Province of Ontario, in advocating universal suffrage in the House, were advocating a measure which the most Liberal party in Ontario had not advocated, Now, I say, it is not necessary to take the ground per se, as an abstract proposition, that universal suffrage is desirable. Many hon members who may doubt its propriety as an abstract proposition may, with perfect propriety, advocate its adoption in a Dominion franchise, on this ground, that even admitting that it was an evil, it would in that case be the lesser of two evils, and that it would be better for the Dominion to adopt universal suffrage than the suffrage contained in the present Bill, for the reason that it would deprive the Bill of its objectionable features. We know that if we adopt universal suffrage the objection with regard to the revising barristers, the objection with regard to the different wants of the various Provinces, the objection with regard to the different wants of the various Provinces, the objection with regard to the variation of the franchise throughout the Dominion, the status of Athens among the States of antiquity? Why, the objection that the franchise of the Dominion would be less liberal than the franchise of the various Provinces, The adoption of universal would fall to the ground. suffrage, although we might not wish it as an abstract proposition, would put an end to the objections urged against the Bill. It would, in the event of our adopting a Dominion franchise at all, reconcile the differences of opinion which exist, by removing from the Bill those features which are held to be objectionable by those who are opposing it. In taking a position in favor of universal suffrage I do so because I believe that if we are not to have universal suffrage in this Dominion then the matter of the regulation of the suffrage had better be left to the Provinces: because, I believe if this Dominion assumes to regulate the suffrage, it is inevitable, as my hon. friend from Cardwell admits, that we shall speedily reach universal suffrage. The pressure of public opinion, the difficulties which will exist with regard to the working of this Bill, the expenses which will attend its working, these, and other reasons, will irresistibly impel public opinion in this country to demand from the House that the suffrage should rest on the basis of manhood. I say, if we are going to have any other suffrage than that we had better leave the matter with the Provinces to regulate as they choose. There is a divergence among the Provinces at present. Two Provinces have universal suffrage-British Columbia and Prince Edward Island. The greatest Province of this Dominion has practically universal suffrage, for under the Franchise Bill of the Legislature of Ontario a very small fraction of the population of that Province will be without the franchise. Now, Sir, I repeat that if we are to arrange the suffrage for the Dominion that suffrage should be as liberal as the most liberal suffrage in any Province in the Dominion. If we do not adopt a suffrage which is as liberal as the suffrage in Prince Edward Island, British Columbia or Ontario, we are inevitably adopting a measure which will create dissatisfaction and discontent in the mind of every individual who is disfranchised under that Bill. If there are any classes, any elements of society, possessing a provincial franchise in any of the Provinces, which will be denied it by this measure, we have right there the elements of discontent which it would be unwise and unjust to create.

The belief in universal suffrage is one which is widely prevalent, and it may not be unreasonable to spend a few moments in looking at some of the States, in the past and present, which have adopted this principle, because this is a question of the very highest importance; we never have approached the consideration of a more important question in this House. It is a question concerning which all social, all political progress, in all ages, may give us lessons. Now, in the Jewish commonwealth they practically had universal suffrage, because there was no distinctions of citizenship in the eye of the law, and although it was a theocracy, at the end of a certain number of years a man who had temporarily been deprived of the enjoyment of his rights, as to property, might return to his enjoyment of civil and property rights. Take the case of Greece, and take, as an instance of the most liberal of the States of Greece, the city of Athens. You will find that up to 776 B.C., that State was governed by kings, and that a certain class of officers, called Archons, were elected by the nobles. Solon, who lived 638 B.C., divided the population into four classes, which were graded according to income. The first class were eligible to the highest offices, the second and third classes to the interior officers, and the fourth class were not eligible to any office, but were exempt from taxation; but the members of all classes had votes for the election of Archors and magistrates. Another of his the election of Archons and magistrates. Another of his provisions was the establishment of a Senate, to consist of

Sir, that State was noted for the wisdom of its philosophers and lawgivers, and statesmen, for the talent of its bards, the eloquence of its orators, the extent and opulence of its commerce, for the great development of its arts, for its literature, for its magnificent architecture, and it stands in history to day as the most eminent instance of a State celebrated for the monuments of its civilisation. Take Rome, the only other State of antiquity I shall allude to, the great mistress of the world. She commenced with a government of kings, with a population divided into two classes, the patricians and the plebeians, the former exercising such a despotic rule over the plebeians that it led to a rebellion, leading to the appointment of ten tribunes by the plebeians who had the power to set aside any law of the Roman level with the patricians. If we remember the privileges of the Roman citizen, defended as he was by the whole power of the Roman Empire; if we remember that the Roman populace, in consequence of their position as citizens, were maintained and fed by conquered Provinces, we will come to the conclusion that the States of antiquity attaining the greatest development, and famed for their later progress, and their understanding of the principles that underlie human progress, were the States that had the greatest degree of human liberty—the States that had universal suffrage. The Roman code, although Rome was a heathen State, is the foundation of all the laws of European States to-day. When we turn from the history of those ancient States to the condition of things which followed, when Rome was subjugated by the horde of barbarians that swarmed down upon her in 410; when we consider the darkness that settled down upon Europe in feudal times, when lords held their estate from kings and those estates were hereditary; when every yeoman held his estate from his lord, and had to yield a certain number of days' service in the year in return; when the daughter of a serf could not be given in marriage without the consent of the lord; when none but nobles held fiefs, and the great mass of the population were thoroughly enslaved; and, when we remember that some of the principles of these feudal States have come down to our present day; when we look to the time of the Saxon heptarchy, with the Witenagemote, consisting of knights and lords, who came together in the capacity of a great Parliament to levy taxes on the people, who were not represented at all; when we look at the conquest of England under William the Conquerer in 1066, and the introduction of feudalism and the system of slavery in England; when we remember that in 1215 there was scarcely a free man in England, outside of the nobles; and when we come down to this century, and find that in the year 1800 there was less liberty in England and her colonies then existed in Athens and Rome, the only improvement in the condition of society being in the fact that christianity is ameliorating the condition of mankind; when we look at all these things, and consider the improvement which has taken place since 410, they all point to the fact that there is such a thing as political progress, that man has been making progress to a better condition, and that we, standing here as the representatives of 5,000,000 of people, and settling what shall be the franchise for the millions of people who are to settle Canada, it behooves us to look over this vast field of progress and ask ourselves the question: Have we gone as far as human weal requires us to go, or can we go farther, with benefit to the mass of mankind, and in the proper discharge

The progress in this century, both material and political, has been very rapid. This century has seen the inaugura- mander Bill; and we have what promises, unless it

tion of many great discoveries—the railroad, the telegraph, the steamship, appertain to this century. The poorer classes enjoy many luxuries that were not even attainable by the wealthy some years ago. All this progress has been made since 1800. An event which occurred just at the commencement of this century gave a great impetus to human progress—that was the American revolution. When the declaration of independence was made at Philadelphia, which declared that all men are created free and equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these were life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, the old world listened with wrapt attention to that declaration, and its promulgation had a most marked effect on the progress of the world in succeeding Senate. This was followed by the opening up of the Senate, in 421 B.C., to the admission of plebeians; and this was followed by the Ogulman Law or Constitution of 300 of mankind has been and will be very rapid. Let us B.C., by which plebeians were placed on an absolute look for a moment at the progress made in England during the lock for a moment at the progress made in England during the last 60 years. Sixty years ago two-thirds of the House of Commons were the appointees and tools of the aristocracy of that country. At that time there were three peers in England who appointed 26 members to the House of Commons. Sixty years ago 300 members were returned by an average of 160 electors each; the great mass of the people were totally unrepresented; the members went there to represent, not the mass of the people, but a very small fraction of the people; 60 years ago the county vote of the whole kingdom of Scotland was only 2,000; 60 years ago the 100,000 inhabitants of the city of Edinburgh were controlled by 50 electors; since 1828 the Dissenters of England have been relieved from their disabilities; since 1829 Catholics have been relieved from all disabilities; in 1836 the newspaper tax of 8 cents a newspaper was removed; and it is only since 1844 that England became enlightened enough to escape from the condition of semi-barbarism under the corn laws into which we relapsed a few years ago.

If we look at the history of Canada, we shall find even here a tolerably satisfactory record of progress; we shall find that the family compact has been broken; that seignorial tenure has been abolished; that the clergy reserve question has been settled; that the confederation of these Provinces has been consummated; that representation by population, which was long struggled for, has been secured; within a few years the franchise has been materially extended in all parts of the Dominion; a law has been passed designed to secure the independence of Parliament, which has secured it to a large extent; we have a law providing for simultaneous elections, and taking out of the hands of the Government that dangerous power they possessed of bringing on the elections first in the ridings which they were sure to carry, thus becoming enabled to exercise influences in the remaining doubtful ridings that no Government ought to make use of-a very important reform, for which we may thank the Government of Mr. Mackenzie; we have also had introduced vote by ballot. In additition to these measures, which stand as milestones in the course of progress, we have had some events that stand against the stream of progress. We have had that principle of representation by population violated almost immediately after its adoption by the Government, in the case of British Columbia, giving British Columbia six members when they were only entitled to one; and, in the case of Manitoba, giving Manitoba four members when they were only entitled to two. We have had a long career of financial recklessness, that has brought us now to a condition in which we have $100,000,000 of pressing immediate liabilities to provide for, including the savings bank deposits and legal tender currency. We have had that blot upon the reputation of Canada, the Pacific Scandal; we have had the Syndicate Contract; we have had the various attacks upon Provincial Rights; we have had that great case of political rascality, the Gerry-should be very much modified in its provisions, to be a still greater piece of iniquity, the present Bill. Nevertheless, we have made in Canada, even under these unfavorable circumstances, substantial progress; we have been drifting along abreast of other nations, and are approaching the realisation of a greater degree of liberty and prosperity in this country, which we shall certainly reach sometime, when we get a change of Government.

The tendency of the whole civilised world is to be found in the words "universal suffrage." It is the result that has been reached by many nations. It has been reached by two Provinces of this Dominion; it has been substantially reached by the greatest Province-Ontario! It has been reached by thirty-eight American States and eight American Territories; it has been attained in the great Kingdom of France, in the Empire of Germany, in the Empire of Austria, and the existence of universal suffrage in Germany and Austria shows clearly that the principle is not in any degree incompatible with monarchical institutions. If we consider universal suffrage on its abstract merits, we find, as I have pointed out, that in ancient times it has produced beneficent results; if we examine the field more fully we will find many States besides those to which I have alluded that have had free institutions and have benefited by universal suffrage. The only reason they were submerged in the flood of barbarism is probably they had not, in addition to human liberty, the great advantage we possess, the possession of the Christian religion. Had the Empire of Rome, had the States of Greece, possessed the religion we possess to-day, with the liberal institutions they possess, we can reasonably suppose that their fate would have been different from that which befel them. We have glanced for a moment at the sad history of the ten centuries which followed the submersion of liberty in Rome; the dark ages were alluded to and the gradual advance from slavery and servitude to liberty and equality, and where are we now? We are in the last quarter of the 19th century, with all the wisdom of the past ages at our command, with all the developments the christian religion gives to us, with all the advantages and the achievements of science, literature and art, with all the gathered treasures of the past centuries concentrated among us—we are here, in the last quarter of this century, with all these accumulated blessings at our disposal. That is the position we occupy, possessing all the advantages of material progress and social progress, of intellectual progress and of the christian progress of this century and of all the centuries that have passed. Have we any remnants of the old condition of things? Have we anything to remind us that we once possessed less freedom and less advantages of every kind than we have to-day? Yes; we have many things to remind us of that, and there is nothing that is cal-culated to remind us of that truth more forcibly than the fact that we do not possess to-day a full measure, a full degree, of human liberty. There is nothing more calculated to impress that fact upon the mind than that there are differences in the condition of free-born British subjects in this land to-day.

There is a principle the violation of which led to a great war, about 100 years ago, which led to the erection of a nation and the dismemberment of an empire, and it is a principle that meets with the approbation of every British citizen on the face of the globe—that is the principle that there should not be taxation without representation. Upon that distinct and particular principle the American colonies revolted, because an attempt population of the Dominion in the position of men who are taxed without representation in this House? He will not. This Bill violates that fundamental principle of human liberty; that there should not be taxation without representation; because there is not a man in the Dominion who does not pay taxes, who does not contribute to the revenue that my friend the Minister of Customs collects. Who are tax-payers with us? Every man who uses a pound of tobacco or a pound of coffee, who makes use of any article that is imported, who makes use of any article that is rendered dearer by its importation, is a tax-payer, and there is not a man in the Dominion who is not a tax-payer to-day. There is not a young may 21 years of age, whether he has a vote or not, that does not contribute some dollars to the revenue of the Dominion every year. Last year the taxation from Custom duties was $4.75 per head, or $22.50 per head of a family of five. There is not a young man in this Dominion who does not pay taxes, direct and indirect, for we must add to the amount that is paid per capita 50 per cent., being the increased cost of the article before it reaches the consumer. You have the wholesale dealer's profits assessed upon the duty, and the retailer's profit assessed upon the wholesale dealer's profits and the duty, and the two amount to 50 per cent. of the original cost; so that there is not an individual in Canada who does not pay taxes every year to a considerable amount, and that individual is entitled to a vote on that account. The Bill imposes a great injustice upon any free-born British subject 21 years of age who has not a vote and who pays taxes into the Customs. Will we be told that an individual who has to pay taxes in the shape of Customs duties upon the goods he consumes, has no direct interest in the policy of the Government, and should have no voice in its policy? I hold that his interest is almost as great as the interest of any other man, so far as the value of taxes is concerned, because this Dominion levies no direct taxes; the tax is paid in the shape of Customs duties, and all who pay taxes are entitled to representation. All men should have a vote, all free-born citizens should have a vote, for a higher reason. Is there such a thing as an inferior race? If there is, the Anglo Saxon does not belong to it, and there should be no castes, no grades among Anglo-Saxons. All are free-born, all belong to a noble race, all have the advantages of citizenship and of our common school system, all possess the degree of intelligence which fits them for the duties of citizenship, all stand invested with the rights and privileges and dignity of manhood, and that is the best reason for giving them a vote. No other reason can be assigned so great as this, that all men were created free and equal. The bible says that God made of one blood all nations of men, and in another place it says that God made man a little lower than the angels, not one a little higher than the other. We have no classes, no grades, no castes, and it is an injustice for the Government to act as if there were castes, as if some were pariahs, and others were fitted for the rights of citizenship. Are men or is money to have the right to vote? If one hon, gentleman opposite should be qualified to vote now, and a reverse should overtake him next year, and he could not qualify, who would have the vote? It must be the money; it is not the man, because he, though invested with his manhood, would not be qualified, unless he had the money as well. Does money represent character? I do not think it does, necessarily. Does money represent honesty? I do not think it does. Does money represent independence of action? was made to tax them without the giving them representation in the British Parliament. Under this Franchise Bill this principle will have no consideration to-day. Is there any class in this Dominion that will pay taxes and will not have representation under this Bill? Will my right hon, friend the Premier venture to say that the Bill he is forcing through this House will not place any portion of the intelligence, than the man rolling in wealth-much better fitted than the man who has property enough to qualify a

What is the poor man's relations to the State? Has he any interest in the State if he has not a little money? Is he likely to be destitute of love of country unless he has $400 a year? Is he likely to be destitute of pride n his native land unless he has the money which this Bill says n his native land unless he has the money which this Bill says shall qualify him for the exercise of the franchise? He has not the poor man a great interest in the State? Suppose in his heart, as strong as you or I, the love of home, be it ever so humble, the love of family the love of country. It is the land of his birth or adoption, it is his own home, it is interest as much as the interest of the rich man. It affects his children's home, it is that around which all his affections cling, and the man who is not a villain, the man who pos sesses intelligence and average honesty, is the man who will take an interest in the good of his country and will seek to promote it. And it does not require that he should have a few dollars, more or less. He has that love voice in the affairs of the State. We cherish the liberty of country, and that pride of country, and that pride in of the press in this country. We cherish it wisely. of country, and that pride of country, and that pride in the history of his country, that every British citizen has, a pride that will lead him to labor and to hope for, and to have a sincere desire for the good of that country in every respect. A couple of stanzas, written by Mrs. Hemans, just occur to me. In "The Graves of England," she imagines a stranger visiting England, and asking where the great men of England are buried, where those who are worthy of rememberance have their graves, and the individual who is supposed to be interrogated, thus replies:

> "The warlike of the isles, The men of sea and wave,
> Are not the rocks their funeral piles,
> The seas and shores their grave?

"Go, stranger! track the deep,
Free, free, the white sail spread,
Wave may not foam, nor wild wind sweep,
Where rest not England's dead."

Yes, they sleep on every shore, they slumber beneath the waves of every sea, they have laid down their lives in every clime under heaven to promote England's glory and to ensure her triumph; and these men, who have given their lives to uphold the glory of England, and to push forward the glorious career of their native land, are to be held under our system incapable of voting unless they possess an income of $400 a year. I scout the idea that money is required to make any free-born British subject worthy to exercise the franchise. The poor man's labors, are they in any degree essential to the prosperity of the State, even if he does not possess money? What function does the poor man possess in building up the State? If he labors in the field, in this Dominion of Canada, does he not labor for and add to the greatness of the State. Take the broad expanse of field and meadow, take the improvements and the farm buildings and the beautiful homesteads, and how are these created? They are created by labor, and by labor alone. And the men who labor in our forests and in our fields, no matter how humble may be the capacity in which they labor, are intimately associated with the prosperity and growth of the State; they are the pillars of the State, they are the foundation upon which the prosperity of the State rests, and to refuse to give to these men a part in the management of the affairs of the country is a grievous wrong. And in the workshop, too, they perform their functions as the most important of the creators of wealth and prosperity. What has labor created, or, you might say, what has labor not created? It has created all things. There is nothing to-day that marks the difference between our condition and the condition of primitive man that is not the result of labor, whether it is city or cultivated field, or railroad, or steamship, or workshop, or work of art, or the fabrics of commerce; there is nothing that pertains to civilisation and characterises civilisation that has not been created by labor. It is labor that marks the difference | yet the subjects that these laws may affect are to have no Mr. CHARLTON.

between the cultivated man of the nineteenth century and the savage of primitive ages. Do we propose to invest labor with the dignity that belongs to it? No; we propose that the man shall not be judged by his manhood, not by the principle that, being a free-born British subject, he shall be entitled to a voice in the affairs of the nation, but he must have a certain amount of money, and the money must it to a greater degree, because the unjust tax may be a far greater burden on the poor than on the rich man, who may not feel it as much. In unjust tariff laws the poor man has a direct and intimate interest in the State, as well as a great interest in the State, and he is entitled to a of the press in this country. We cherish it wisely. It is one of the bulwarks of British liberty. Is the poor man interested in the liberty of the press? Sir, there is not a citizen of the broad empire, there is not a citizen of Canada, who is not just as much interested in the liberty of the press as you or I are. But the Government, in which they have no voice, may attack that liberty, and the man who is, above all others, the most interested in preserving that liberty of the press, may be powerless to defend that great right, because he is not in possession of the franchise. have liberty of conscience. Every man thinks as he pleases. Every man can express his opinions. We have freedom of worship. We are not compelled to worship according to any particular creed. We may worship in the Catholic church, we may worship in the Protestant churches, or we need not worship at all. We may be agnostics or christians. We have freedom of conscience and freedom of worship, and the poor man has as much interest in these great blessings as the rich man. It is something that it is in the interests of the poor man, as well as of every other citizen of the State, to preserve, if we deny him the franchise, we take from the poor man the power he ought to possess to enable him to conserve this great right as well as others.

It is very important that the country should be properly governed. A reckless or an incompetent Administration may plunge a country into war, may pile upon that country much debt, and may visit it with great and grievous ills, and the poor man, above all others, is liable to suffer from the ills that war would produce. He is liable, above all others, to be, perhaps, conscripted and dragged to the battle field, and forced to fight in a war brought on by the action of the Administration with which he had nothing to do, and could not exercise his rights as a free man, in any degree or sense, to control or modify it. In this respect the poor man's interest in the State is an intimate one, and one which ought to be respected. We have in this country popular education. Liberal grants are made to our educational system, and the great mass of the people of this country are the most intimately interested in that system of popular education. It is to their interest that it should be kept up, that the grants for the purpose should not be diminished. It is to their interest that the efficiency of the school system shall not be in any degree diminished, and we deny to the class that are most interested in that popular and free education the power to exercise any influence by their votes, or by political influence to conserve and preserve the educational institutions of the country. The State may enact unjust and oppressive laws—I do not know that there is any danger of its doing so, but it may do so. It may enact laws in the highest degree oppressive; it may even enact laws that will take from a subjest his liberty, that will take from a subject his property. And voice in the affairs of the country, no vote for the representatives of the people in Parliament, no influence, direct or remote, upon the legislation of the country, although they are equally affected by this legislation. Their interests in the legislation are as great as any class of people in the country. I will take the liberty of reading to you from Mill one or two extracts with regard to this matter of the exercise of the suffrage by the people. (The hon. gentlemen read several extracts from Mill). So the writer takes the ground that neither the ordinary test of intelligence, nor a property qualification, should be required, but that all who are under the obligations of the law should have a voice in making the law. Now, Sir, another interest, every man has in the State is his interest in that great heritage of all, the public domain. There is not a man in this country who has not an interest in our public domain; it is the heritage of all the people of Canada. There is not a man in this Dominion who is not affected by the management of the public domain. He has a direct property interest, as a member of the State, in that property which belongs to the State. Now, in the management of that great heritage I believe that in the past mistakes have been made; I believe that in the future mistakes are liable to be made, and where the mistakes are made they are sure to be made against the interests of the poor man. If a colonisation company is organised, it is not organised for the benefit of the poor man. If lands are withheld from settlement it is not for the benefit of the poor man. Whatever land regulations we may have had in the past, whatever land regulations we are likely to have in the future, in so far as they are divergent from the policy that ought to have been pursued, they have been made in favor of the rich and against the poor. And for that reason every man in this Dominion should have a voice in the Government that controls that great heritage of millions of acres of land in the North-West, that is to be the home of the poor of this country, and of their children. He has an interest in the great heritage of the people, the public lands.

He has another interest. The Government may subsidise corporations and invest them with power to plunder the Treasury and trample on the rights of the people. If a Government so far forgets its duty as to be guilty of this, does not that act affect the interests of the poor, and of every man in Canada? It certainly does. And we have an instance of that. We have an instance in the Government subsidising a corporation and investing it with power ment subsidising a corporation and investing it with power to plunder the Treasury and trample on the rights of the people of the country. In the North-West to day, the people have not the privilege of using their own money and deciding where to build a railway. If they attempt a rival line against the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly, the Government here would disallow the Bill. It has established a great corporation, has taken upon its back an old man of the sea, and given it power to endanger the liberties of the people of the North-West. The Government have invested the company with power to enable it to squander millions of the money of Canada, and there is not a man in the Dominion, twenty-one years of age, who has not a direct interest in that matter, if he has any regard for the interests of the country or of his posterity. All these are reasons why we should invest every man of twenty one years of age, and a British subject, who is not an idiot, a pauper or a criminal, with the right of the suffrage, because those men stand on a common platform with the rich, and their interest in the State is almost in every respect, equal to that of rich men. The most sacred interests are those which we possess in common with all other men, and it is clearly an act of injustice to deny them the right to vote for representatives to the House of Commons.

The Government may do other things not in the interest of the public. It may squander the public money, not in the public interest, but to support candidates in various counties. The Government have done that to some extent. It may do that on the eve of an election, by organising 300 or 400 colonisation companies and making those investing in them the political friends of the Government. It may do that by a system of issuing timber licenses, by issuing coal and pasture lands. On many occasions useless grants for public works have been made in ridings, which were not in the public interest, but which were made for the purpose of strengthening the hands of Government nominees. If so, the Government are doing something as much opposed to the interest of the poor man as of the rich man, and every citizen has as much right to express his condemnation of colonisation land grants, or any other policy calculated to sap the independence of Parliament. In all the highest functions of government, in the preservation of liberty, in the making of laws which have to go down to posterity, and in regard to all other functions, the poor man has as much interest as the rich man. The poor man is equally proud of his country with the rich man, and desires to see it prosper and be blessed with good laws; and I repeat that in all the high functions of government the poor man is interested with the rich man in having those functions properly discharged. It may be true that property qualification should be applied in municipal elections, where a direct vote is taken for taxation purposes. I do not go so far, as an advocate of universal suffrage, as to say that in municipalities the man who pays no taxes should have the right to vote for a measure to impose taxes on thepeop'e; but in broad, national matters, all have nearly equal interest, and they should have an equal voice in the affairs of State. It will not be asserted that the poor man is not as patriotic as the rich man; it would be insulting to the poor man to make that assertion. Is the poor man not as ready to give his life in the national defence? The great majority of those who come forward in times of danger are poor men; and those who are patriotic and desirous of promoting the interest of the country should be invested with the evidence and safeguard of liberty—the franchise. When the United States Government liberated millions of slaves, although it was not claimed that the negroes were thoroughly well qualified for the granging of the franchise, yet it was given to them because exercise of the franchise, yet it was given to them, because it was thought they could not hold their liberty unless they had the full responsibility of freemen, and had the right to exercise the franchise. If that franchise was the indispen-sible accompaniment of the liberty of the black, if that was a sound principle in the United States, surely it should be a sound principle here. If the evidence and accompaniment of liberty there was the vote to the negro, surely it should be given to the free-born British subjects of twentyone years.

Another argument in favor of universal suffrage is this: That the broader the basis upon which the institution of any Government rests the more security those institutions possess. The broad basis is the better basis than the narrow one; and the whole population invested with the franchise gives the broad basis, which means security. The hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), in the course of his remarks, referred to the case of the United States during the civil war. He gave an extract from Mr. Gladstone's speech, with respect to the great influence exercised in that struggle by the fact that all the inhabitants in the United States possessed the franchise. I believe that Mr. Gladstone's opinion is right, when he declares that the United States would not have preserved the Union if there had been restricted franchises in that country. But when the institutions of the country were imperilled, when Fort Sumpter was attacked, every man in the North felt he was individually interested in the struggle; that it affected a country in which he was a citizen; that he was one of the citizens who formed the State, and his interest was as great as that of any other man in the State; and in consequence of that feeling pervading the entire mass of the American population, that great struggle was inaugurated, sustained and carried through in those years of trial to a triumphant consummation; and standing in my place here, I do not believe that there is any other free country in the world that would have gone through that struggle in the same manner as the United States, simply for the reason that there is no free State in the world that has laid the basis of its constitution on so broad a ground as the whole people, all possessing the franchise, all possessing equal rights, no man possessing privileges in the country superior to those possessed by the meanest citizen in the country.

Now, there can be no doubt that the possession of the franchise educates and elevates. There can be no doubt that a man invested with the franchise will take a greater interest in public affairs than if he were not; that he will become a more intelligent man, better fitted to exercise the rights of citizenship, and will acquire a degree of education and familiarity with public affairs which will enable him properly and judiciously to exercise the right with which he is invested. I shall ask the privilege of reading an extract on this subject from that greatest of political thinkers of this age, John Stuart Mill. (The hon. gentleman here read from an article on the Extension of the Suffrage, pages 66 and 74.) I hold that, if we are to take on ourselves the regulation of the franchise for this Dominion, we will not act the part of wisdom if we do not move forward with the spirit of the age. We have a great nation near us, that must exert a greater or less influence on our affairs, and the fact that that nation, with its 55,000,000 of inhabitants, has universal suffrage, will have a most potent influence upon us. Any attempt we may make to fix a franchise that comes short of universal suffrage will be an arrangement of a temporary character. If we adopt the franchise based upon this Bill it will not be a permanent franchise; it will only be a short time until popular pressure and popular demand will insist on the extension of that franchise to the degree of universal suffrage. If we insist on a Dominion franchise we may as well accept the inevitable now; if we wish to delay the adoption of universal suffrage we should leave the matter with the Provinces. Even admitting that evils attend universal suffrage, which I deny, I hold that the evils of the system we are about to introduce will prove to be much greater than any evil that could attend the adoption of universal suffrage. The measure before us is going to introduce a franchise different from the franchises that now exist in the various Provinces. It is a measure that is going to place in the hands of the Government a power which may be exercised, not in the public interest, but the interest of a party; it is a measure that will place upon this country the necessity of incurring a heavy outlay in working it; it is a measure that will create confusion in the minds of the electors, and men will be years in becoming accustomed to the change; it is a measure that will admit to the privilege of voting a class of people, the Indians, who ought not to be admitted, while it will exclude thousand upon thousands who now possess the franchise in the Provinces. It is a measure entirely uncalled for; none of the Provinces have asked for it, and the great majority of the people of this Dominion do not desire it, and would vote against it if it were submitted to them. For all these reasons, if we are to take the step of making this Mr. CHARLTON.

as liberal as the provisions in the most liberal Province in We should adopt a franchise that would this Dominion. not disfranchise one voter in this Dominion, that would not create discontent in any part of the Dominion, that would recognise in the broadest sense the principle of human liberty, and the right of every citizen who contributes to the State, in the form of taxes, to have a voice in public affairs; and if we recognise these broad principles, which are recognised to day in the United States, in Germany, in Austria, and substantially in Great Britain, as well as in the Province of Ontario, and some other Provinces of this Dominion, and if we act the part of wisdom, we shall accept the amendment of my hon, friend from Northumberland.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). In discussing this question for a short time, I shall glance for a few moments at the surrounding circumstances, more particularly as they affect the Province I have the honor to represent. If I had my individual choice I should still prefer the ground taken from the first, that we should maintain in the separate Provinces the franchises to which those Provinces are accustomed. When we remember that three of the Provinces have felt it to be their interest to extend the suffrage to the widest possible degree, and that those Provinces have found that suffrage to work satisfactorily, after a lengthened experience, it occurs to me that any system that we adopt which will have the effect of restricting the privilege of voting in any of those Provinces will be inacceptable, from the simple fact that you always find the difficulty in taking from any portion of the community a privilege they have heretofore enjoyed. I should have been pleased to have seen any principle adopted that would have left those Provinces that have aleady adopted manhood suffrage in possession of that boon, and I think that if the supporters of the Government were free to express their sentiments, without those trammels which are imposed on them by party allegiance, I think those gentlemen would say that the franchise they at present enjoy is best suited to their particular wants, and therefore I feel that it is in some ways a questionable expedient to endeavor to apply the principle of manhood suffrage to some of the Provinces who have strong feelings of repugnance against it. From the expressions which have fallen from the supporters of the Government from the Province of Quebec—it is true they have not been very numerous, I regret to say—I gather that the representatives of that Province are disinclined to see the basis of representation broadened to the extent that this resolution proposes; and while we are bound to respect the feelings and perhaps the prejudices of that particular Province, it is for that reason that I hesitate to become an advocate for thrusting upon those people a franchise which they perhaps feel that their people are not ripe for. This is another strong argument why it will be found impracticable to have anything like an effective administration of one franchise for the whole Dominion. Speaking for the Province with which I am more intimately connected, I confess, without hesitation, that after the discussion which has taken place in our Local Legislature I would have preferred to have applied to my own Province the result of the labors of the Local Legislature, as developed in the last franchise Act of Ontario, than the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). Not that I am apprehensive of the working out of manhood suffrage in my own Province; far from it, but because I think any individual who calmly considers the effect of the provincial franchise, shortly coming into force in Ontario, will agree with me in saying that in its broad and general principle it is virtually almost manhood suffrage. Let me take a passing glance at the provisions of the Ontario Act and see what they really are, because I believe that hon. constitutional change, to remove the control of the franchise members have not really considered the divergencies from the Provinces, we should certainly make the franchise | between that Act and the Bill proposed to night. Practically, the application of the Ontario franchise is manhood suffrage, with the proviso that, in one form or another, all these parties will be entered on the assessment rolls of the various municipalities. I need not refer specially to the property qualification, but will speak more particularly of the land-owners' sons and the wage earners and the income class. In these respects the Ontario Act is very broad in its application; "householder" covers every individual who is an occupant of a dwelling house, without regard to valuation and qualification; "land-owner" covers not only owners, but tenants of property, and all their sons at home. Those and the personal and income qualification of $250 are wide enough to include, practically, those who are disfranchised under the Dominion Act, and to whom reference has so often been made, the volunteers who are to day fighting the battles of their country. The result of these varied qualifications in the Ontario Act is this, that practically the Act takes in almost every citizen of that Province, with this advantage, that we have the guarantee he has a certain local standing by his being placed on those assessment rolls, either as a wage-earner or property owner's son, or for income tax. In this respect, this is a much broader basis than the basis provided by the Blil under consideration by this House. The provisions of that section of the Act——

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman is going beyond the question. The amendment before the House and the clause of the Bill to which it refers is what the hon, gentleman must confine himself to.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman is merely contrasting the proposal to substitute manhood suffrage for the arrangement proposed in this clause.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, gentleman has heard what I said, and will govern himself accordingly.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth.) I presume I will be in order in referring to the provisions of the Dominion law, as covered by this section. I do not think that they are quite as wide as hon, gentlemen opposite would have us believe. If we would accept the statements interjected by the hon. gentlemen opposite, by way of interruption to speakers on this side, we would be led to believe that the proposed Dominion. Act is a very wide extension on the franchise as at present enjoyed in Ontario. I confess in some respects it is an enlargement. It is an enlargement in this respect, that it will reduce the property qualification in cities and towns from $400 to $300, and in rural districts from $200 to $150. I has applied the old principle of farmers' sons' franchise to property owners both in cities and rural districts; but in that respect it is limited compared with the Ontario Act, because it provides the old restrictions that exist in the Ontario law, namely, that these sons shall be only qualified provided the property divided would give each individual a property valuation of $300 or $150. That is quite a limitation of what is apparently an extension of the suffrage in that direction. Again, the income qualification is limited to $400 per annum. I do not know what it may be in the Province of British Columbia, because in those western Provinces $400 does represent as earnings more than the same value in the older Provinces, and it is just possible that an income of $400 might cover a very large wage-earning class in British Columbia and in some parts of Manitoba. But in the older Provinces this income franchise of $400 will exclude a great number of very desirable citizens, many of our mechanics and wage-earners, not to speak of our school teachers, intelligent people earning from $300 to $350 per annum. I admit that there is a wide extension in giving a vote to very tenant at $2 a month in a city, but I do not think this will bring within the range of the Act as desirable a class as would have been brought within it if the income franchise had been reduced from $100 to $250. I can see no object in extending the franchise to a class paying only $2 a month, and occupying only miserable hovels or tenements in cities and towns, and refusing it to a large number of persons earning less than $400 otherwise well qualified to vote. Another extension under this Act, to those who have not exercised the franchise before, is that which gives the vote to Custom house and Excise officers, and I do not think that an extension in that direction is likely to prove beneficial. I do not care how independent a man's thought or feeling, the fact that he is an employé of the Government and is dependent upon his superior officers for his position, though he may hold it during good behavior, does not put him in a position to vote freely and independently, as he otherwise would. I have already referred to the objectionable extension of the franchise to Indians, and I cannot understand the reason for the introduction of this clause, unless on the supposition which has been mentioned that they are entirely under the Government. The amount of $400 of income may take in a large section in British Columbia, but will exclude a large section in the older Provinces. Though you may have nominal uniformity, you cannot have practical uniformity. I think it would be far better to adopt manhood suffrage at once, and for that as applied to the Dominion you have had a great deal of encouragement. We deal less with property and civil rights than the respective Provincial Legislatures. I believe that every class in this Dominion, without regard to the social position they occupy, will, if combined in a general system of manhood suffrage, bring to bear upon the community at large, through the expression of their sentiments upon the representatives they elect, and do a great deal of benefit in building up this community. There are some social questions of vast importance that only men outside the present parties can take up and comprehend. I refer to those various questions that are pressing more and more every season upon this and other Legislatures, relative to the position of labor and capital. We have seen, in the Legislature of Ontario, that the interest of the mechanic has been recognised by the extended principle that the laws were made to protect him in his earnings against the property holder, who might have been, for the time being, his employer. And will any gentleman tell me that this class, because they do not happen to be represented in the way of occupation of property or holders of real estate, should not have a voice in saying who shall make the laws and who shall administer them as applied to the Dominion? In that respect we may profitably glance at the attitude of the Conservative party in the Province of Ontario. That party has a wide and strong influence in the Province. Although for the time being they do not control the Local Legislature, no man can deny that the Conservative party is a power in the Province of Ontario. Last Session this question of manhood suffrage came up in the Local Legislature, and how do we find the leader of the Conservative Opposition, Mr. Meredith, expressing himself on that occasion? I find a report of his speech in the Mail newspaper, from which I will read. (The hon. gentleman read the report of Mr. Meredith's speech on the subject of manhood suffrage, in which he unreservedly advocated and offered an amendment in favor of it in the Ontario Legislature.) Now, bear in mind that these words were spoken by Mr. Meredith in the face of a Franchise Bill that will become law in the Province of Ontario on the 1st of next January. Gentlemen here tell us that the Dominion Act does not exclude our volunteers, that are fighting our battles in the North-West. But, Sir, Mr. Meredith, in the face of the fact that he knew what the provisions of that Ontario Act were, distinctly declared that even with the broad provisions of that Act, a young man was still excluded from having a control or say in the affairs of his country. Yet hon, gentlemen opposite tell us that an Act which is far more restrictive than the

Ontario Act gives to these men that representation which Mr. Meredith says was denied in the provincial Act. say there could be no more convincing proof than Mr. Meredith's own statement, that hon. gentlemen opposite have not considered the Bill before the House; they have not considered the limitations and restrictions that are imposed upon the young men of this country by that Act. If this Bill is as broad as they claim it is, where would have been the necessity, when Mr. Meredith was speaking of an Act still broader, to use the language I have just quoted? If Mr. Meredith had been discussing an Act such as we are discussing to-night, he would have said that it was an utter fraud on the rising men of the community to say that it gave them rights and privileges to say who shall make and administer the laws of the country. In the course of his remarks Mr. Meredith further declared that this was a democratic country, socially and politically, and that the franchise should be based on the broadest possible lines, so that every man who was a good citizen should have a voice in public affairs; and that hon, gentleman placed himself on record by moving an amendment in favor of manhood suffrage. It is sometimes said that such a broad franchise would involve an interference with the rights of property. But our laws, even as they exist, interfere very largely with the rights of property. We recognise that while an individual has a right in his property, that right is held subject to the good of the community at large; and we have seen in England, recently, legislation which, if applied to landed property in this country, would be deemed little short of revolutionary. I refer to the recent laws affecting real estate in Ireland. In regard to property qualification, we are liable sometimes to run to an absurdity, especially as regards the rural districts. A man may own real estate worth $200 and may let it to a tenant who may be worth nothing. Both the owner and the tenant vote on that real estate, and yet a man, probably a school teacher, who earns $350 a year, has not a vote. That is not an equitable distribution, and in common parlance it is running the property qualification into the ground. Property is a suitable qualification as regards local taxes, both municipal and provincial, as real property is peculiarly under provincial control, but when you come to the principle of taxation as regards the Dominion, we find that it cannot be fairly applied. There is no direct tax on property levied by the Dominion; they are all indirect taxes, which are levied on goods consumed by all citizens whether property holders or not. Is it not just and reasonable that those persons who are compelled to pay taxes directly to the Dominion Government, on the articles they consume, should be given an opportunity of voting for representatives in the Dominion Parliament. It must be remembered that no one class is fit to make laws for another class These men stand too close to their personal interests to see the interests of a class below and beyond them; and I say that a Government such as this, that claims to have originated the National Policy, ought to be a Government which should extend to the wage-earners and mechanics the broadest and freest opportunity of saying who should make and administer the laws of this Dominion. Sir, this Government has seen fit to extend the franchise to the tribal Indians, a class which is not amenable to our social laws, and takes no interest in the social well-being of the community, beyond their own tribe or reserve, who are wards of the Government, who have no independent existence; and yet the Government proposes to refuse the vote to our fellow citizens whose income is less than $400, and amenable to our laws and to all the responsibilities of citizenship. I say, Sir, that is inequitable, unjust, a blot upon the commonwealth, and a discredit to the laws of our community. In the mother country the relations between capital and labor, and their relative positions, are very different from what they are here, and yet how has the extension of the franchise Tuesday Mr. Bain (Wentworth.) operated in that country, even under the conditions that exist there. Mr. Hughessen, in a recent debate on the extension of the franchise, spoke thus:

"He believed that every man who paid taxes and discharged his duty as a citizen had prima facie a right to a share in the appointment of those who were to control the Government of the country."

Mr. Gladstone, in that noted article in the Nineteenth Century, in his discussion with Mr. Lowe respecting the extension of the franchise, used these words:

"Two Parliaments of very different complexions and merits have been returned under the influence of the constituency furnished by the household suffrage. Both of them have shown, in their respective ways, an attention to the interests of labor, which was greatly needed and more than amply justified, but neither of them has so much as supplied a shadow of a shade of warrant for the charge that the workingmen would combine together in the interests of their own class to wage war upon other classes. The marvel is that they have been unable or unwilling to combine so as to place half a dozen of themselves in the popular chamber, and thereby usefully to enlarge its means of acquaintance with the ideas, wants and tendencies of the people."

That, Mr. Chairman, is the matured expression of a statesman who has ideas broad enough to look beyond party, and take into account the influence which the extension of the franchise in England has had, and we find him to day extending that franchise so much that, at the next election in England, 2,000,000 of electors, who never before had the opportunity of giving their votes, will have an opportunity of saying who shall administer the public affairs of that country. I say that if leading statesmen in England, after the experience they have had—because it is a question which was fought there inch by inch against the claims of the privileged classes—if they extend the franchise to those beyond and below them, why should we hesitate, in this Dominion, where the property qualification is so widely distributed and so easily acquired, to confer on every good citizen the right to say who shall administer and make the laws for the well-being of society. I say that we should not hesitate to adopt the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, and step out on the broad principle that every man who bears the burthens and responsibilities of citizenship should have a voice in the making and the administration of the laws; and I, for one, have no fear for the result. I have no fear that the extension of the franchise will produce a war against the class who have hitherto administered the affairs of the country. Hon, gentlemen opposite boast of their National Policy and of the number of wage-earners it brings to our country and employs in our midst, while they refuse to give those men the right to vote, and at the same time extend that right to the tribal Indian who assumes no responsibilities as a citizen, and call that justice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). There was one statement made by the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with which I entirely agree, and that is, that the question before the House is of a serious and important character, and that it ought not to be disposed of at this late hour, and I think there is ample room for further discussion upon it. I do not know that I agree with any other statement my hon friend made, but that I agree with, and I therefore support the proposition that the committee now rise.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 2.05 a.m. Tuesday

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 19th May, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

ENQUIRIES RESPECTING RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to call the attention of the Government to the fact that I have not yet received some returns ordered at the early part of the Session. One was for correspondence in regard to the northerly boundary of Ontario, and another was in relation to the cost incurred by the Government in regard to the boundary case.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think they have been presented. At all events, I brought them here.

Mr. CHARLTON. An order was passed for certain returns in regard to timber limits. The non-essential portion was brought down some time ago, but the essential information as to the timber limits actually granted has not

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—INTEREST PAYMENTS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What payments and at what dates have been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in respect of interest on the 5 per cent. loan - (1) prior to 1st November, 1884; (2) on or since 1st November, 1884? And to what date do such payments settle the interest on such loan?

Mr. BOWELL. On September 13, 1884, there was paid $273,750.78; on February 20th, 1885, $92,357.31. These two amounts meet the interest up to 1st November, 1884.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I desire to call the attention of the House to a certain matter. In the Ottawa Citizen of this morning there is an editorial article to this effect:

"Mr. Mills presented a petition in the House of Commons yesterday afternoon on which he said were the names of a number of Conservatives who protested againt the Franchise Bill. We should be glad to hear of that petition being closely scrutinised by some one familiar with the so-called Conservative signers thereof. We do not hesitate to say that such an examination would prove either that the names were forgeries or that if any Conservative was foolish enough to be caught in a trap by the hired Grit canvassers for signatures, he was the victim of false representations. Judging from past experience, however, we are false representations. Judging from past experience, however, we are inclined to the opinion that the names were forged. Grit agents are quite equal to that sort of work at a time when the interests of the party demand the performance of that or any other kind of rascality.

Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as this matter is concerned, I assume the entire responsibility, because I handed the petition to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to present as I had some others to present, and he had none. As to the charge that the signatures were obtained by false representation, of course, nobody will mind that, because charges of that kind are made by one party and denied by the other, and we cannot tell as to that charge except by looking at the signatures and assuming that they mean something. But when it comes to a journal charging the hon, members of this House with presenting petitions which are filled with forged names, I think the matter requires to be laid before this House. Now, that petition was sent to me by a gentleman with whom I had no communication, and whom I know only by reputation—a gentleman living in Wiarton, in the constituency of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Mc Neill), who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place. This no right to address me in that tone. It is unparliamentary, gentleman, Mr. Campbell, accompanied the petition when it improper, and ungentlemanlike.

came to me with a letter, with part of which I will trouble the House, as it is in connection with this matter:

"I have stiff Conservatives on that petition, and they will not elect a member again that is supporting such measures as they are proposing at this Session. Furthermore, will you kindly show this petition to Mr. McNeill, and ask him if he knows all the parties that signed. He knows them all, and are bond fide signatures. I can swear that the names are correct, and that they are the parties' own signatures. I can affirm that with an oath before a justice of the peace if required. I have marked on that petition a cross with red ink, which indicates all the Conservatives." Conservatives.

Now on that petition, which is in possession of the House. any hon. gentleman can see that there are twenty-eight red ink crosses opposite the names, and under the authority of this letter and the examination of the petition, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), at my suggestion, mentioned that there were twenty-eight Conservatives who signed that petition. The hon member for North Bruce was not in the House when the petition was presented, but as soon as he was in his place, I sent a note across the House to him, stating that I had been asked to call his attention to the fact that Conservatives had signed the petition, which I asked him to look at, and if he has done so he will be able to say, I hope, whether there are Con-servatives' signatures on that petition or not. When the hon. gentleman does so, I hope he will have the goodness to state to the House what the result of his examination is.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Will the hon, gentleman read Mr. McNeill's note to himself.

Mr. EDGAR. I have not got it here—in fact I have not got it at all, but I remember it perfectly well. Later on in the evening I got a note from Mr. McNeill, thanking me for my note to him, but stating that he had heard of the signatures before, and of the means used to obtain them. That is another matter, as everybody knows. He did not dispute the names, but thought perhaps they were signed in mistake. That is a matter we cannot discuss now, but we must assume that these names are genuine, as the parties signing are not idiots.

Mr. DODD. I may say that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNoill) showed me the letter from Mr. Edgar. He told me, furthermore, that he had received a communication from one of the so-called Conservative signatories, in which it was stated and alleged that those names were procured entirely through misapprehension and misrepresentation to the parties signing them.

Mr. BLAKE. That of course is a matter to be decided on evidence, but the question which is brought forward by my hon, friend is the statement in this journal, twice repeated—not that the names were improperly procured, but that they were forged names—not that Conservatives were persuaded by mistake, or misrepresentation, but that they did not sign, and that the petition presented to the House is a false petition by forged names. Now, the statement of the hon. member for North Bruce, as stated by the hon, gentleman opposite, the statement which my hon. friend says he communicated to him, has nothing to do with that statement in the newspaper that the signatures are false, because it is acknowledged that the signatures were obtained from the gentlemen whose names appear on the petition, but it is contended that they were improperly

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the case stands, then, it is either forged or fraud—one or the other.

Mr. BLAKE. No, it is alleged to be a fraud, but it is not. If the hon, gentleman takes the responsibility of saying it is a fraud, let him do so.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman stated across the House that the case stands thus—that either those signatures were forgeries or frauds. I answered him that it was not so, that it was alleged that they were forgeries or frauds. That is what I answered him, and if it is to be a charge in this House that they were forgeries or frauds, the hongentleman must take the responsibility of making that charge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And the hon. gentleman is on the same footing. He must take the responsibility of stating that there is neither forgery nor fraud.

Mr. BLAKE. No, Sir, I made no such statement.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad that the amendments now before the committee have opened up a really broad question; a question which deserves and will no doubt obtain the careful attention of the House; a question which requires the fullest and most searching discussion. I have hopes, from the remarks made by the hon, member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), at the adjournment of the last sitting, that it is the intention of hon, gentlemen opposite to debate this question. That hon, gentlemen said that this was a question of such importance that it should not be disposed of at that hour of the morning, and that it required full discussion and explanation before it was settled. I hope, then, he is going to give us his views on the question, and that his example will be followed by other hon, gentlemen opposite. It is all the more reasonable that this question should be discussed on both sides, because it is not in itself a party question. The proposal to introduce what is practically universal suffrage comes from a gentleman on the Government side of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Excuse me. I imagine the hon, gentleman would not place me in that position exactly. I happen to be independent in this House.

Mr. CASEY. My hon, friend from Northumberland puts in his claim to be considered independent. Well, he has certainly shown a great deal of independence in connection with this Bill, but I only speak of him as generally supporting the Government, and as one who has been a colleague of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who is looked upon by the country as a possible future colleague of theirs.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you.

Mr. CASEY. This may be said without detriment to his claim to be considered an independent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, because we find that it is generally the most independent supporters who have the highest claims upon them, and who are generally given seats in the Cabinet. I do not think the hon. seat in the Cabinet, or diminish his influence in the country. Indeed, I am bound to pay him the compliment that I believe his action on this occasion will improve that Delieve his action on this occasion will improve that Delieve his action on the country. A proposition coming from such a gentleman can hardly be looked upon as a party proposition. On the other hand, the amendment to the amendment to the amendment as expressing more fully the views he wishes to put before the House. If any further proof were needed that this is not a party question, it is found in the Province of Ontario have put themselves formally on Mr. Blake.

record by a party vote in the Assembly in favor of manhood suffrage for that Province, while the Conservative members from the same constituencies in this House have put themselves on record, by a formal vote, as not only opposed to manhood suffrage in Ontario, but opposed to even as low a franchise as Mr. Mowat's recent Act introduced. If we were to look for a question that should be discussed with an utter absence of party bias, we could not find one better adapted to such discussion than the present. The opinions of members on both sides are individually as divided upon it as possible. I am glad to have such a question before the House, and I hope to discuss it with as near an approach to freedom from party bias as can be expected from one who declares himself to be thoroughly a party man. The discussion opens two questions: First, as to the absolute advantages of manhood suffrage—its absolute claims to acceptance; secondly, as to its comparative claims to acceptance under our present circumstances. It is quite possible that a thing may be theoretically proper and desirable without being practically applicable at any given moment to the affairs of the country. It is possible, on the other hand, that a thing not in itself theoretically desirable may be expedient for the time being. We have, therefore, to discuss this question from both points of view. First, then, as to the absolute merits of manhood suffrage. I think a great deal can be said in its favor; I think indeed, with Mr. Gladstone, that the burden of proof lies upon those who wish to restrict the franchise within narrower limits than those of the whole adult male population—that the burden of proof rests upon those who say that such and such classes of the community are unfit to have the franchise, rather than upon those who say that the people, as a whole, should possess it. This claim is particularly strong in this Dominion. When we consider that every adult who is not a pauper, who is living upon his own resources, must contribute to the extent of the duty on every dutiable article he purchases to the revenue of this Dominion, we have one claim to his right to the franchise established. There is a well known maxim of constitutional government that representation and taxation should go together. When we find that every citizen of the Dominion is taxed for Dominion purposes, we must admit that there is strong reason for giving every citizen the franchise. Again every citizen is subject to military duty, and a responsibility of that kind should be accompanied with the right of the franchise. The burden of proof is thrown upon those who say that certain citizens who are subject to military duty or to taxation are not fit to have a voice in directing the affairs of the country. I shall not enlarge on other reasons for giving the franchise to every citizen. I shall not go into the question of abstract right, because I am not a very strong believer in the doctrine of abstract right in regard to political franchises. I believe in abstract right in policy, but I do not think we have much to say as to the absolute right of this or that class to this or that privilege. I think Government is to a large extent a question of expediency. In some cases certain classes of people who might be theoretically considered to have a right to the franchise, are not practically fit to exercise that right. We may find illustrations of this in certain foreign countries; but I do not think that can be said about Canada. I do not know of any class of citizens in Canada of whom it can truthfully be said that, as a class, they are unfit to exercise the franchise. Such a thing can certainly not be said by either party in this House of those who now exercise that privilege; we should stultify ourselves by saying so; they are those who sent us here.

of $150 in the country or $300 in the city, or who is a tenant at a monthly rental of $2, or a yearly rental of $20, is fit to exercise the franchise, I do not think we can stop there. I do not think we can take those figures as a distinguishing test of capacity for exercising intelligently the franchise. If we admit that which is admitted by the promoters of the Bill, I do not think we can go further and say that a man who has only $100 worth of property, or $200 of income, or who pays a monthly rental of only $1, is not fit to vote. Indeed, I do not think we can help saying that every adult citizen of the country who is not a pauper or a criminal or a lunatic, may be assumed, with every probability, to be as capable of exercising the franchise as the men belonging to the classes so near to him who are enfranchised by this Bill. In the Province with which I am best acquainted, there is practically no difference of intelligence between those who are now enfranchised and those who would be enfranchised by universal suffrage. In Ontario under the existing law, every farmer's son, every land-holder's son, every householder, and every person deriving $250 income either from investment or as the wages of his own work, is entitled to vote. That includes practically everybody in the Province; but even if it did not include practically every adult male in the Province, I think nobody from Ontario will venture to assert that the few who are left out are inferior in intelligence to those who are included by the Act. I cannot speak with so much personal knowledge in regard to the other Provinces, but my opinion of them is formed largely from the representatives whom I have met here; and if we may judge from the representatives sent here by those Provinces in which the suffrage is the lowest, in which the suffrage is universal, I do not think we can claim that our Ontario electors or Quebec electors who have hitherto been qualified on a higher basis, have shown better judgment in the selection of representatives than the electors of those Provinces where universal suffrage has prevailed. I consider that on the abstract ground that taxation and liability to the duties of citizens should confer a right to have a voice in the government of the country, a very strong case is established in favor of universal suffrage. I do not consider that the case is absolutely convincing; I do not consider that we are absolutely forced by that argument to accept the principle of manhood suffrage. In fact, I am prepared to say if the question before us was simply a Bill creating de novo a universal suffrage for the whole Dominion as an alternative to the present state of things under which each Province regulates its own franchise, I should not support that Bill. I have strongly supported the propositions that each Province should manage its own franchise; that each Province knows what will best suit the genius of its people in the way of qualification; that each Province has, under the spirit of the constitution, the right to say on what basis its people should be represented. I conclude, then, that if the question before us were simply one of manhood suffrage versus the existing franchises, I should not feel bound to support that Bill. I should, indeed, feel bound to oppose it. I should oppose it, first, for the reason I have given, that the provincial franchises should be retained; and, secondly, for the reason I have given in opposing this Bill as a whole, that I do not think we should effect any extensive change in the basis of the franchise without consulting the electors as to whether they want that change or not. That objection, of course, applies with special force to the proposal to restrict the franchise; but I think it also applies to the proposal to enlarge the franchise; for such extension would undoubtedly diminish the electoral power of those who are now electors; but when the proposition comes before us in its present form, as an alternative to something else, I do feel that my duty compels me to support it. The proposal now before us is not to abrogate provincial franchises in favor of universal suffrage, but to substitute an uniform system of universal suffrage for another proposed uniform system of regard to the franchise more than those from other Provin-franchise which we, on this side, do not consider fair and equitable. Under those circumstances, I shall support this amendment. I have done my best by voice and vote, as other members of this side have done, to secure the retention of the existing franchises; but the House has decided otherwise in committee, and it is probable they will also decide otherwise when they come to vote on the third reading of the Bill. They have decided to adopt what is called an uniform franchise for the whole Dominion. I have tried to demonstrate that it is not uniform, but an attempt to secure an uniform franchise. That principle being established, I am prepared to argue that, if we are to have something which is meant to be a uniform franchise, it should be really so, and I hold that the only franchise which can be uniform is manhood suffrage. We have discussed in detail already the qualifications proposed in the Bill for electors. We have found that in no case do they agree with existing provincial franchises. We have found that those qualifications which have been thought best by the people of the different Provinces, are in some cases very much more liberal than in others. In the Province of Quebec, they are considerably less liberal than those in the Bill; but in nearly all the other Provinces they are more liberal. We have found also a general admission that no property qualification can be considered truly uniform throughout the Dominion; that if you take property as a test of qualification to vote, the ownership, say of $300 worth or $150 worth of real estate may mean one degree of intelligence in British Columbia, a different degree in Manitoba, a different degree in Ontario, a different degree in Quebec, and a very different degree in the Lower Provinces. We have found it admitted that an income qualification does not mean the same thing everywhere; in fact it is with regard to income especially, that the proposed franchise varies in uniformity. The earnings of the laboring classes, the receipts of professional men, the returns from investments, are so extremely varied in the different Provinces that the mere fact that different persons in different Provinces receive $400 income is no proof that they stand on the same social plane, or possess an equal amount of intelligence. No property franchise, no income franchise, no tenants' franchise, can secure real uniformity throughout the Dominion. If we are to secure that, we are thrown back to the basis of representation of the individual man. There we find, as the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Mitchell) said, that we reach a finality. This is one of the strongest arguments in support of his supposition. He said his amendment tends to secure finality for the franchise, and I think it does, since it asserts the proposition that a citizen of British Columbia is equal in intelligence to a citizen of Prince Edward Island and has an equal right to a share in the government of this country. You cannot tinker with that franchise; you cannot go into the question of a man's complexion or height or weight. When once you have manhood suffrage, you have reached finality, and you have also arrived at fair play and justice. The deprivation of the right to exercise the franchise in the case of any class which has heretofore exercised it, is without precedent in constitutional government in England, in the United States or in Canada. If we are compelled to move away at all from the provincial franchises, we should take a step not backward but forward. I do not know that the people of Canada are prepared for universal suffrage, I do not know that it would be popular even the Liberal electors, but ₩e Ì with possess Provinces already universal suffrage, and there is therefore no escape from the position that, if we give up the provincial franchises we must go the whole length of manhood suffrage or else disfranchise large numbers of voters. I wish to impress upon our friends from Quebec, without discussing the wisdom of the Conservatism which I know characterises them in ces, that, if they adopt this system of uniform franchise, there is no stopping short of universal suffrage, whenever a majority of the other Provinces may demand it. If they prefer a high qualification for the suffrage, they have a right to adhere to it, but, if they give up that right by voting for this Bill, they must be prepared to go further when the newer parts of Canada, which will outnumber Quebec as well as Ontario and the other older Provinces, insist upon the basis of the vote in the whole Dominion being universal suffrage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentlemen from Quebec cheer me. I suppose they have decided to vote for this Bill whether it leads to universal suffrage or not. I conclude that they are more liberal in their views than we have given them credit for, and I am glad to find that the Conservatives of Quebec are standing side by side with the Conservatives of Ontario in favor of universal suffrage, that, in fact, they are more radical than the moderate Liberals of Ontario.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, it would appear that the Bleu of Quebec and the Tory of Ontario are in favor of even more radical changes than the moderate Liberals. I say this, not with respect to the provisions of this present Bill, which I maintain are less liberal in most of the Provinces than the existing franchises, but because it will lead ultimately to the adoption of radical changes in the constitution. If we are to have an uniform franchise for the Dominion, it should be, and must be, if the rights of the people are not to be outraged, one which will take away the vote from no one who now possesses it. have shown in a former debate what a tremendous number of people in Ontario would be disfranchised by this Bill. I have shown by two modes of calculation, one rather loose and depending upon guess work, the other more accurate, and depending upon clearly ascertained figures, both of which methods led almost to the same conclusion, namely: that 125,000 people in the Province of Ontario, are likely to be disfranchised by this Bill; that almost one in three of the present electorate will be disfranchised, the most wholesale disfranchisement that ever took place amongst any civilised people. I will not say amongst any self governed people, because we have no historical records that any such disfranchisement ever took place among self-governed people at all. It is the most wholesale wiping out of voters of which we have any record; and when the true effect of this measure comes to be known among the people; when they see the difference between the voters' lists under the Mowat Act, and the voters' lists under this Bill, the indignation among them will be boiling over, and gentlemen opposite will have ocular demonstration of its existence, and will find it so hot-I am referring now to the right hon. Premier's humorous story last night—that the temperature will become quite unbearable. We will then be able to afford them absolute demonstration of that which we have now proven theoretically, and they will have most indubitable evidence that my figures are correct. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) endeavored to show the other day that they were not correct, but when I spoke next, I was able to prove that his calculation did not affect their correctness. More than that, the line of calculation which he adopted, when carried to its logical conclusion, established the correctness of my figures. I take it, therefore, that it is the admitted opinion of the House, since my figures have not been disproved, that the consequences which I pointed out will follow in the Province of Ontario. Therefore, I feel that, as one of the representatives of that Province, I should be grossly failing in my duty, I should be committing or municipal elections, such does not apply in the case of high treason to the Province, if I did not vote and Dominion elections. The feeling against universal suffrage Mr. Casey.

speak, and do all in my power, to prevent the passage of a measure which will disfranchise nearly one in three of the electors of that Province. I have the alternative before me of the disfranchising Bill proposed by this Government and a system of universal suffrage—which may not be, in itself, desirable, which may not be theoretically the most perfect system of representation for the people of Canada-I should be committing high treason to my Province if I did not accept that alternative which was the most liberal. Practically, Mr. Mowat's Act does give what is very near universal suffrage; it is only one step from that Bill to universal suffrage. But even supposing this proposal would admit a class of voters inferior to those now admitted by the provincial Act, I would sooner take the step to extend the franchise than to restrict the franchise; and I believe that every single voter, Reformer or Conservative, in my constituency would endorse me in that action. I believe that every single voter in the constituencies of hon. gentlemen opposite will feel, that in supporting this disfranchising proposal, their representatives have taken a step backwards, that they have taken a step entirely contrary to the genius of people of Ontario. I may be told that Mr. Mowat refused to give universal franchise at the last Session of the Local Legislature. Well, Sir, in the first place, I have never claimed that the people of Ontario preferred universal suffrage to the one they now possess; I think they have shown through their representatives that they prefer the system they now appears to show the system they now appears the system they now appears to show the system they now appears to the system they now appears the system they now appears the system that the people of the system they now appears the system that the people of the system they now appears the system that the people of the system that the people of the system that the people of the system they now appears the system they now appear the system the system they now appears the system that the system the system the system the system that the system the system that the system th enjoy. But I say we have refused to allow them to continue that system, and we have now the choice of giving them either a vastly more restricted franchise, or a slightly more extended one. I have not the slightest doubt in the world, that the people of Ontario would infinitely prefer to have universal suffrage rather than the enormously restricted franchise which it is intended to impose upon them by the usurped power of this House. Now, Sir, there are reasons why universal suffrage might be more objectionable for the Local House than for the Dominion House, why it might be advisable to have universal suffrage here, while it would not be advisable to have it for our provincial Assembly. We all know that the Provincial Assemblies deal with property and civil rights, and there is some reason in contending that no man who is not an owner of property should be represented in an Assembly which deals with the tenure or transfer of property, and which can in the last extremity tax property. The Local Legislatures have power to levy a tax upon every man's farm or other property. They are, to that extent, in the position of a municipal council, and nobody imagines it would be fair to give universal suffrage at municipal elections, or that it would be fair and just to allow a man having no property to impose taxes upon the belongings of his neighbor who has property. It has been felt by many that in a Legislature which controls the tenure of property, and which might, in the last resort, impose a tax upon property, it would not be fair to allow a man with no property to be represented; and, therefore, Mr. Mowat's Bill, although going to the very furthest extent of admitting everybody who owns property, or had any income or any direct interest in property that might be assessable for municipal or provincial purposes, stopped short of giving the franchise to people who had no property or no interest in property. We have nothing to do here with the tenure or transfer of property, except in those territories directly under our control, and which, in a short time, will be organised as Provinces, and have a chance of establishing their own franchise. What we have to deal with is indirect taxation, and the responsibilities of a citizen to the State. While there is danger in the application of universal suffrage to provincial among Conservatives has largely arisen from its abuse in American municipalities, and that argument has some force. Municipal government in New York city is considered to be a hotbed of corruption, and this is justly held to be largely due to the system of universal suffrage. Penniless voters maintain certain officials in power in order that they may obtain employment from them. No such results could follow the application of universal suffrage to Dominion elections. We need have no fear that the penniless class, if there be any such—say rather the more dependent working class—will ever control Dominion affairs. This is a question we can fairly consider without party bias. As a party I do not believe we would be better off for the enfranchisement of every individual voter than we would be under a high property qualification, as Liberals are equally well-to-do with Conservatives. Apart from considerations of party interests, or of how it will affect my own election, I support the amendment in favor of universal suffrage.

An hon. MEMBER. Do not be too venturesome.

Mr. CASEY. Such a remark should not come from any member on the opposite side of the House, when the Government is afraid to consult the people. If there is any conduct that could more properly be termed out of this House by the name cowardly, I do not know such conduct. Let the Government at least have the courage of their convictions; let them go to the people at the polls, or declare that this Bill shall not come into force until after the next general election. The truth is that hon, gentlemen opposite know that the majority of the people are against them on this Bill, and they simply dare not go to the polls before it

Mr. BURPEE. I am a little embarrassed with the amendment. I scarcely understand the position we occupy, or the position of the mover of the amendment. The amendment proposes universal suffrage, and it proposes a Dominion franchise of universal suffrage. I am opposed to a Dominion franchise in any shape. I do not believe it was intended when we inaugurated this Confederation. I believe, Sir, in a federal union, and that each Province should fix the franchise for the election of its own members. For that reason I can scarcely go as far as the hon, member for Northumberland, who proposes a Dominion franchise, and, besides, he is somewhat mixed himself with reference to this franchise. It is true that in the paper for which he is responsible, he denounced this Bill in the strongest language, and called upon the leader of the Government in almost peremptory language to withdraw it, and yet he voted for the second reading and swallowed it by wholesale. Now, this appears to me to be inconsistent, and I hardly feel like submitting myself to his lead, as I hardly know where he will land me. The fact is that if I were to accept his amendment it would only be as a choice between two evils, as I think I should prefer his proposition rather than the proposition of the Bill, though I have not quite made up my mind that universal suffrage is the best for this country. I think it is preferable, because it would minimise the evil consequences which might arise from the appointment of partisan revising officers, because they would not have the same chance of manipulating the lists in the interest of one party. I know it is said that if judges were appointed there would be very little risk of their doing injustice, but at the same time, many of them were politicians before they were appointed, and when it came to deciding whether a piece of land or other property should be valued above or below $150, as these officers would necessarily be chosen from the legal fraternity, they would not be very familiar with the value of property in the country, and they might be led more or less by their political friends in the constituency. It is quite possible that instead of taking the assessor's list they might take a list made up by a candidate who is running an election, and thereby put on or off what names they with inconsistency, or with not having spoken in frank and think proper. In that respect I think the proposition of the hon, member for Northumberland is an improvement on the Bill. If the Dominion Government adopts a franchise of its own and appoints officers of its own-partisan officers, who should do injustice to one party or the other in making up their lists-and if the Dominion Government held an election under those lists, and it could be shown to the country that injustice had been done to the party which controls the Local Government, it will be a temptation to the Local Governments in the several Provinces who are opposed politically to the Dominion Government to retaliate by framing an election law that will work to the disadvantage of the Dominion Government; and in that way very serious friction between the Provincial and Dominion Governments will be the outcome of this system of party revising barristers, which may work disaster to this Confederation. I think this view of the case should not be entirely lost sight of. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee. I only rose to explain why I shall vote for the proposition of the hon, member for Northumberland; it is only because it is preferable to the Bill introduced by the Government, and that it will minify one at least of the evils which I apprehend from the revising barrister clause; and I hope it will be carried, although I gather from the few remarks the hon. gentleman made on introducing it that he had not very much hope of succeeding. I think, however, that he has struck the right chord, If we are to have a Dominion franchise at all, it is the only uniform Dominion franchise we can have; and I think sooner or later it will be adopted. We may have one election under this Bill, and great evils may arise out of it; but they will excite the indignation of the people to such an extent that they will never be satisfied until a Dominion franchise is instituted upon the basis of the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland.

Mr. MITCHELL, I cannot allow the remarks of my hon. friend from Sunbury, to pass without notice, inasmuch as they reflect upon my consistency, in the course I have pursued on this Bill. Now, I value the hon. gentleman's good opinion; I have sat in Parliament with him for over twenty years; I have always found him an advocate of liberal views and ideas; I had the honor to be supported by him for many years while I was in the Cabinet of the Province from which we both come, and I do not like the hon, gentleman to make the remarks he has done, in relation to my course on this Bill. Now, I beg to tell the hon. gentleman, and I appeal to the testimony of hon. members, that I am consistent on this Bill. The hop. gentleman says I am inconsistent, because I supported the second reading of this Bill. I made, I think, the third speech that was made on the Bill, and in that speech I indicated the course I would pursue. I stated that there were several issues raised by the introduction of the Bill, and that the greatest one was whether this Parliament should decide for itself who should have the power to elect members to sit in this Parliament, and who should dictate the terms on which they should sit here. That was the vital principle of the Bill; and at the very earliest stage in the debate, which has now lasted for three weeks, I took the position that this Parliament alone should dictate who should, and who should not vote for members to sit in this Parliament. Am I inconsistent because I supported the principle of the Bill and opposed its details? Did I not, at that time, say that I was opposed to the details of the Bill? Did I not point out in general terms why I was opposed to the details, and state that when we came to the particular clauses I would state in what respect I was opposed to them, and why? Then, why should the hon. gentleman, who has known me so long, and known me not to wear two faces under one hat, charge me candid terms in relation to the course I intended to pursue with regard to this Bill. I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House whether I have not been frank and candid in every position I have taken in this matter; and why the hon, member for Sunbury should arraign me before this committee at this time and charge me with inconsistency, I cannot imagine. I am in favor first and above all of the principle of this Bill, that this Parliament should dictate who should sit in this House; but I am opposed to the details of the Bill and I have submitted an amendment, and notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman charges me with inconsistency, he winds up by saying he is going to support my amendment as the lesser of two evils. I am glad the hon, gentleman has taken that position, and I only rose to vindicate the consistency of the course I have pursued. I am against the details of the provisions of this Bill, and I believe that the amendment I have proposed will give practically manhood suffrage, still, I am not tied to it, and, for the sake of harmony, am willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). I want to see manhood suffrage throughout the country, and if we can get it, either by amendment or by the suggestion of my hon friend from Queen's, P.E.I., it is not material which of the two is adopted, provided one of them be carried. I think my hon friend (Mr. Burpee), in justice to me, ought to withdraw the implied censure he has cast upon me by the imputation that I have been inconsistent with my course in regard to this Bill.

Mr. BURPEE. I have no idea of casting any imputation on the hon. gentleman, but I could not understand that, while he is in favor of universal suffrage he should vote for a Bill which is founded on property qualification. The principle of the Bill is property qualification, the principle of his amendment is universal suffrage, the one in direct opposition to the other. I am glad the hon gentleman has explained his position, because I found it difficult to understand how he could vote for the principle of the Bill and then propose his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. The principle of the Bill is not property qualification alone. There are several features in it, but the main principle is, whether this Parliament of Canada should itself decide who will have the right to elect members to sit in it. That is the main principle, and that principle I support. The other principle, that of property qualification, I have opposed from the first, and the resolution I have submitted gives effect to my opposition. My hon, friend is, therefore, a little mixed when he charges me with inconsistency.

Mr. WILSON. Before this amendment is disposed of, I wish to place on record the views I entertain in reference to it, and I may here say, in passing, that I am very much pleased indeed to have heard the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) deny, as he had a perfect right to do, any insinuation that he was in any way acting inconsistently in moving this amendment. I agree with him that he is consistent; he has from the very outset declared his intention to move an amendment at the earliest opportunity. I, therefore, fully agree with him in reference to the course he has taken in that respect, but I cannot agree with him that the question is whether this Parliament has or has not the right to legislate in this matter. We, on this side, have not pretended to deny that the Dominion of Canada has the right to legislate in this direction, but we questioned the expediency of so doing; we questioned whether it was necessary, whether the Dominion of Canada had suffered sufficient abuses to require that it should take into its own hands this legislation at the present time. Therefore, I do not think that the hon, gentleman is quite correct in stating that the question involved was whether there should or should not be a Dominion franchise; but I am strongly of opinion that if we should not extend the franchise to women that they did Mr. MITCHELL.

we take into consideration all the facts, whatever slight objection, or whatever grounds of hesitation there may be in supporting manhood suffrage, these objections will be removed on account of the greater importance, under existing circumstances, of accepting manhood suffrage in preference to this Dominion Bill. We know very well that if we accept the Bill in its entirety, as it has been presented to this House by the Government, it will entail a very large expenditure, and that if we accept the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), there will be no expenditure. That of itself is, to my mind, sufficient reason why we should regard the amendment with favor. I was also pleased to hear the hon. gentleman say that he was opposed to the details of the Bill. True, this is not the proper time to discuss them, but no doubt, being true to his word, when we come to the details of the Bill, we will find that hon, gentleman working cordially with the hon, members on this side, and by means of the united efforts of the two parties, the Independent party and the Opposition, we may be able to make the proposed Bill a passable measure; and I have no doubt the Government will be grateful to the hon. gentleman, because they need assistance to make this Bill even acceptable to the general public, to which it is at present very objectionable. The question of manhood suffrage is perhaps, of all the questions that have been discussed in this House, the most important one. We are perfectly well aware that, unless other circumstances were favorable, the introduction of manhood suffrage into the politics of this country would be a dangerous step. We find that it is absolutely necessary there should be something to accompany the right of every man to vote, and I contend it would be a dangerous principle to grant manhood suffrage unless we had accompanying it an almost universal education. Now, the question that naturally arises is, whether we are sufficiently advanced in the Dominion to grant manhood suffrage, so that every man would have a right, in common with his fellow men, in saying what form of government should prevail. I think hon, gentlemen will agree with me when I say that perpaps there is no country under the sun where more general educational facilities are afforded than in Canada. The school system of Ontario is not only admired by the old world but by our American cousins; our school system is such that it offers facilities to every individual who will take advantage of them for education; I believe that if a comparison were made our people would compare favorably in this respect with the people on the other side of the line; I believe our educational institutions to-day are equal to the educational institutions in the United States. The United States have had experience as to the working of manhood suffrage under a liberal system of education, and if they have found that it has been a success why should we have anything to fear here? I believe that you may go to any Province of the Dominion, and you will find there a school system so extensive that no one may be deprived of a liberal education, that no one need be deprived of becoming sufficiently intelligent to be able to go to the polls and cast his vote intelligently. That being the case, and I do not think anyone doubts it, I think that even those who are opposed to the principle now before the Committee will hesitate to say that our people are not sufficiently educated to exercise the franchise. We know that there may be some cases, we know that there are some who do not take advantage of the educational facilities offered them, who are unable, perhaps, to read or write, and to whom all ordinary rules of arithmetic are unknown, and thus we might say that if we are to make a national standard of education, as to the right of exercising the franchise, some would be debarred. We ought to adopt whatever means we can to educate the people and induce them to take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the country. It was given as a reason why not take an interest in political affairs, but, if you withhold the franchise from any number of the citizens, you withhold a powerful stimulant to induce them to take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the country. Is it not the duty of a Government to try to educate the public upon political questions? If those on the other side are so well satisfied as to the manner in which they have been conducting the affairs of the country, why should they adopt this means of withholding from the electorate the political knowledge they ought to have? If you go in the direction of the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), you will go a long way to induce the people to take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the country. The hon member for Cardwell (Mr. White) last evening said we should try to approach as near as practicable to the views expressed by the Local Legislatures. It is true that the Ontario Legislature have refused to adopt manhood suffrage, but they have virtually adopted it, for they have given a vote to a wage-earner who may receive $100 a year as wages, which, with his board, will amount to $250. If my hon, triend from Cardwell is sincere, why should he record his vote against the adoption of the provincial franchise of Ontario? The time has passed for it to be claimed that property is the basis of the vote. We believe that a man with ordinary intelligence should be entitled to vote. What right have we to disfranchise any of those who are compelled to observe the laws enacted here and to pay 25, 30 or 50 per cent. taxes upon the articles they are compelled to consume and not have the vote? It is a vicious principle to disfranchise these people. I say that every man who is compelled to pay, has a right to say what shall be done with his money; every man who is called upon to perform military service has a right to say how and why he was callled upon to perform that service. I say if we adopt the principle now before the House, you adopt a principle founded upon no logical fact. say that a man who is assessed in a city for $300 has a right to vote as the owner of the property, and you say that the man who is a tenant of that property can also have a right to vote. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, what right has a tenant, if you regard property as the basis of the franchise, to record his vote? You thereby give up the principle of property being the basis of the franchise, and the only reasonable conclusion is that we should go still further and place the vote in the hands of every intelligent person who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a resident. There are other strong reasons why we should extend the franchise in the manner I have mentioned here. We know that all trusts placed in the hands of the powers that be, are given them to use for the benefit of the people. being the case, every individual has a right to enquire whether that trust is properly or improperly used, and of saying in what manner that trust shall be used. I am well aware that there are strong arguments against the doctrine of manhood suffrage, but I think that the objections to it are counterbalanced by the benefits that would accrue to society, if we are going to enact a Franchise Bill at all. I believe it would be much better to allow each Province to control the franchise, because we know that in many Provinces the people are opposed to manhood suffrage, while in others they may desire to have manhood suffrage. I believe that sooner or later manhood suffrage will be the law of this land. We know that in the Province of Ontario, the Conservative leader in the Legislative Assembly has given it as his opinion that the franchise should be extended to every male subject 21 years of age, and if that opinion be shared by the Conservative party of Ontario, it will only be a matter of time when they will come down to this House and insist upon extending the franchise so as to make it practically universal. That is, indeed, the tendency all over the world. We find that the leading minds of the day, place because I believe that every man living in this who have considered the matter in all its bearings upon Dominion, who is a taxpayer, ought to have a vote, and I 246 society, agree in saying that the time has arrived, that intelligence has become sufficiently general, when it is advisable to give a vote to every individual who can exercise it in an intelligent manner. Now, we know well that there is a very large class of men whom we do not reach by our present franchise. Every hon. member in this House will admit that when he is canvassing, he does not pay the same amount of attention to a man who has no vote as he does to the man who has a vote. Go to any constituency, and the first question that arises with the candidate is: Has that man a vote? If that man has not a vote he is treated with apparent indifference; if he has a vote you court him, you take opportunities of meeting him and of conversing with him on the political topics of the day. Now I ask if it is right or just that we should treat in this manner a man who happens, for the time being, not to possess the franchise? If certain duties are imposed upon a portion of the population, those individuals should have a voice in the elections. This House has no right to pass legislation that will disfranchise a large number of electors. This will specially apply to school teachers, who certainly have an equal right to vote with occupiers of houses at a rental of $2 a month. This House should consider whether the time has not arrived, in view of the intelligence of the people and the educational facilities possessed in this country, to adopt manhood suffrage. All human beings should be placed upon the plane of equality. It is not right that because a man possesses a considerable amount of money he should have special weight in public affairs, or because a man possesses a large amount of property he should possess additional influence in the selection of the people's representatives. The principle of property qualification is not a correct one. If we are to have a Dominion franchise, and if we cannot retain the Ontario franchise, I prefer manhood or universal suffrage, to the franchise contained in the Bill now before the committee.

Mr. McMULLEN. This motion, which is proposed by an hon, member not connected with the Opposition side of the House, is a very important one and should be fully discussed. I hope that hon, gentlemen opposite will take the opportunity of expressing their views on this subject. I hope the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) will do so, and that we will also find him recording his vote in favor of this progressive movement, On a former occasion, he expressed his views very strongly in favor of a provincial franchise, and although he has now chosen to change his views, he may find it convenient to change them back again and adopt the views of this resolution. This important question has been discussed in every Parliament on this continent, as well as in Great Britain at great length It has been before the Home Government for many years, as questions of this kind often take a great many years before the public realise their importance, and before they become law. In the old country, we know that they have been making great advances in this subject, and I believe they will continue to make progress. Now that the question of manhood suffrage has come before us, it is well that the people of this Dominion should knew what are the views of the members of this House on this question, and I hope that before the discussion has closed, hon. gentlemen opposite will have the manliness to get up and express their views upon it, and say whether they are in favor of extending the franchise or restricting it. I look upon the present B II as rather a restrictive measure, and although perhaps there may be something in connection with manhood suffrage that we are not all prepared to see adopted, I freely confess that I would be prepared to vote for manhood suffrage rather than the Bill now before the House, and for two reasons. I would do so in the first place because I believe that every man living in this contend that every man living, whether he be a laborer, a mechanic, or belongs to any other class, that in any way contributes to the revenues of the country is a taxpayer, and has a right to be represented on the floor of this House. Why, as far back as 1291, Edward the First laid down as a maxim that that which touches all should be approved of by all, that every man who is the subject of taxation should be permitted to express his views as to how those taxes shall be extracted from him. It is absurd to say that a man who is the owner of $150 worth of real estate is entitled to be represented, while a man who is the owner of only $100 worth should not be represented. If you admit that it is the man who is to be represented and not the property, why hold to the property qualifications? I admit that in municipal organisations it is necessary that property should be represented, for the purposes of municipal taxation, as for instance, with regard to by-laws for the creation of debt, as to which only those who would be responsible for a portion of that debt, as the owners of property should have a vote. I hold, however, that when you come to the election of members of this House the franchise should be wider than in the case either of municipalities or Provinces. I hold, for instance, that we should have a more extensive franchise here than we have in Ontario, because in the Provincial Legislature the measures are largely confined to municipal Acts, and Acts relating to the holders of property, while here we deal with the rates of duties on imports, and other matters of that kind, and every consumer is subject to the operation of our laws. I hold that the poor man who wears a common cotton shirt, or a pair of Derry pants as he has to pay a certain amount of taxation, has a right to be represented. It is not money which is represented, for if it were we would have a plurality of votes, and the man who owned $100,000 worth of property would have more votes than the man having $1,000. If, then, it is the individual who is represented there should be no restriction, and so long as a man is a resident, and is registered, and so long as he is a naturalised or a natural born subject, he should have a vote. In the second place I prefer manhood suffrage to the provisions of this Bill, because it would be more cheaply operated. The First Minister yesterday gave us an expression of his views with regard to the cost, and he said it would be merely trifling; and that it could be very likely performed by adding a small sum to the present salaries of the judges. I do not know what the judges may be disposed to accept; but I may say that I was pleased to learn that it is the intention of the First Minister to appoint judges, for I believe there will be more satisfaction in the appointment of judges, than there possibly could be in the appointment of revising barristers. I believe that, on the whole, the county judges will perform their duties with credit to themselves; because, from the position of a county judge, he tries to cultivate the respect and esteem in which he should be held, as one occupying a high official position, and consequently he will be more chary of doing anything which would reflect upon himself, than the revising barrister would be. I contend, at the same time, as I have contended on every opportunity heretofore, that there is no necessity for placing such enormous powers in the hands of one man, whether he is a judge or not. I say that no one person should have the right to exercise such an arbitrary power as will be placed in the hands of these officers. I say, notwithstanding the statement of the First Minister, I believe the cost to the country will be a considerable sum. I have before expressed the opinion that it would amount to $400,000. It may possibly be done for less. Supposing the revising barrister only got $400—and I do not think any judge could be found disposed to perform the duties of the position even for that sum—he has to have a clerk, who will Mr. McMullen.

tuency. I certainly hope the cost will be less, but we have a right to express our fear that instead of being less it may possibly be more. If these estimates are correct, the cost of this Bill in the first year will be $253,000, and for the Parliament, $1,266,000. If this Bill is going to impose on the people of the country any such burden as that, it is wise and prudent on our part to consider whether it should become law. There has been a great deal of discussion about the indebtedness of this Dominion, and conflicting statements have been made as to what it amounts to per capita. I think it can fairly be estimated that the debt of this Dominion is equal to, if not in excess of, the debt per capita of the United States.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman will please confine himself to the amendment and to the particular clause before the Chair.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am trying to do so; but if I am not even to draw an inference as to the question of cost, and must confine myself strictly to the words of the amendment, I will do it. But I do not think it will tend to advance matters by being too strict. Now, I simply say I think it we should consider whether it is wise in the interests of our people to incur that additional expense. If the people of this Dominion had the opportunity to cast a ballot for or against this law, I believe they would oppose it on the ground of expense. Consequently of two evils I am willing to choose the less, and therefore the motion for manhood suffrage is decidedly preferable to the Bill. I believe there is nothing to be risked in granting to the laboring classes of this Dominion the privilege of voting. The experience of England during the last twenty or thirty years teaches that that class regard the franchise as a trust and wisely exercise it. I do not think there is any evidence in the civilised world to show that once men are clothed with the right of recording their votes, that right has been abused. The progress of our country is largely due to the poorer classes who have built our railways and canals, cleared our forests, and turned our uncultivated country into a fertile field. The more of that class of men we have in our country the better, and after they come here, we should confer upon them the right to record their votes, as is done in the United States. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that from the progress made in the past on this question, we must look forward to the time when we shall have to introduce manhood suffrage. In the face of that statement, I ask if it would not be wise, in inaugurating a new system, that we should go slowly and carefully. We should consider in the first place the state of the franchises in the different Provinces; we know that there are two Provinces, in which manhood suffrage is now in force, and which have elected their representatives to this House on that basis; and we should think seriously before we disfranchise a portion of the inhabitants of those Provinces by this Bill. If we do, from year to year, Bills will be introduced to extend the franchise, and eventually we shall have to adopt man-hood suffrage; and would it not be better for us to take in the entire population at once and avoid the cost it is now proposed to incur? Now, take the basis upon which we sit here as the people's representatives. There is no qualification attached to a member of Parliament; we may not even be taxpayers; we may not even be enrolled as paying a poll tax; there is no evidence require that we are the holders of property, that we have any personal property, or that we are directly or indirectly interested in the State at all. When such is the fact with regard to ourselves, on what principle, should we be disposed to deny to the people the same rights. Some years ago an Act was passed by this House doing away with all qualifications of members; the people sancperhaps cost $400 more; a constable will require to be paid away with all qualifications of members; the people sanc-$200 or $250; and printing will cost about $150 a consti-tioned that Act; they raised no objection to it; and any man, aged 21, who is a British subject, can occupy a seat in this House without any property qualification at all, or any evidence that he has paid his taxes. It is nothing but fair, then, that we should consider the question whether it would be wise to extend the same privileges to the people as regards the right to vote, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will give expression to their views upon that point. Now, the First Minister said something with regard to the assessment rolls, and he assumed that the revising officers would be supposed to accept those rolls as the basis on which he would prepare their lists. I must say that if the revising officer were absolutely committed to the acceptance of the rolls made out for municipal purposes, it would be an amendment to this Bill in the right direction. I am sorry to say, however, he is not compelled to do so. He merely takes them as a guide in forming an opinion with regard to the value of property, and if he comes to the conclusion that on the whole the roll is such that he can endorse it, he is supposed to accept it. But it is not absolutely binding on him to accept that

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question before the Chair.

Mr. McMULLEN. I shall try to confine myself to manhood suffrage. It appears that any reference or attempt at a reference to any other point is not to be permitted. I must say that I believe it is in the interest of the people that the utmost latitude should be granted their representatives in the discussion of this question. However, Sir, if you decide that we must confine ourselves closely to the question of manhood suffrage, I will do so, but I think an opportunity should be at least allowed to draw inferences from facts connected with the Bill under discussion, and to show why we consider it would be prudent to accept manhood suffrage in preference to it. We are discussing manhood suffrage as compared to the suffrage in the Bill before the House. The hon, gentleman who moved the amendment said his reason for moving it was that while he accepted some principles of the Bill, he was opposed to others, and as an alternative he would preter manhood suffrage to the Bill itself. I think, therefore, we should be allowed to discuss the amendment from that standpoint, and it is that I have been endeavoring to do. However, if I am to be limited, I will confine myself to the question of manhood suffrage. I say it is the duty of every man, whether he be rich or poor, whether he has the privilege of sitting in this House or not, to advocate those principles which extend to every man British liberty, British fair play, and British rights. I hold that every man in the country who pays taxes, who contributes to the progress of the country, whether as a producer in the factory, or the humble laborer, or in any other capacity, should have a voice in the direction of its affairs. By granting the franchise to the poorer classes, you will give them a deeper interest in the affairs of the Dominion, you will give them a desire to become educated on the political issues of the day, and they will become more fitted to exercise intelligently the duties of citizenship. In England, when important changes in the laws of the state are proposed, when any great question arises, whether of home or foreign policy, the people assemble together in mass meetings and give expression to their views, the poorer classes as well as the richer; and this is one of the results which naturally flows from the extension of the franchise. He franchise electors, and ascertaining whether they are prepared to Were we to include in the franchise all the people endorse that measure. Now, Sir, I am glad to be able to of this Dominion that could be reasonably expected fall into line with the hon. member for Northumberland the included and the could be reasonably expected fall into line with the hon. to be included under the amendment before the Chair, it would tend largely to give them that interest in the manhood suffrage. I am sorry that in connection with country which would be the means of inducing them to some other measures that he has brought before the House, take a very decided interest in public questions. Every I have not been able to fall into line with him, but on this man in this Dominion is liable to be called on at any time particular question, I am glad to be able to say that I fully to bear arms in defence of this country; among our volun teers in the North-West there are many no doubt who have not the franchise, but who are just as zealous and honest in the defense of their country as those who have, and no doubt also among them, fighting side by side, are the poor men and the sons and heirs of millionaires. I can see no reason why, when all feel an equally strong interest in the country's welfare, all should not have the right to vote; we know that love of country is not confined to people of independent means; we know that people from the old country, who have probably been driven from their homes by stress of circumstances, oft in memory revert with affection to the hills and meadows of their native land, and we know that in this country the poor cotter who struggles hardily for an existence by the hill side, feels as much pleasure in his humble cot and as much pride and love for his country as the man who lives in a costly residence and has all the comforts that wealth can provide at his command. We make laws here for the poor as well as the rich, every man is amenable to the laws, and it is only right that he should have a voice in the making of those laws. Every man who contributes to the taxation should have a say in the election of members who impose that taxation. If any class suffers by the taxation, it is the poor class.

Mr. McCALLUM. What about the poor Indian?

Mr. McMULLEN. I believe the Indians do not pay

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Yes, they do.

Mr. McMULLEN. They may, in some cases, but I believe not as a rule. The poor man, who contributes to the revenue in a small way, has a right to say in what way he would be represented in this House. It is our duty to look after the interest of the poor as well as the rich, and a law based upon a property qualification is an unjust law. In every Franchise Bill in England, the property qualification has been reduced, and that shows that any franchise based upon property is liable to change, while, if the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland is adopted, we shall save the cost involved in this measure and the necessity of change. This is one of the most important questions involved in this Bill. I admit that the question of the revising barrister is one of the most serious points, but, on the other hand, this is one of the important points. The statement that manhood suffrage is a question to which we will have to look forward and deal with at no distant day, comes from a gentleman of extended parliamentary experience, who is looking forward to become a Cabinet Minister, and we must expect, from the drift of things across the Atlantic, that in a few years this must be adopted. Should we not begin to educate the people of this country on this point? There are a great many in Canada who do not understand what manhood suffrage means, a large percentage of the people do not know what it means. Should we not, then, give full expression to our views on this question in order to educate the people of this country as to what it does mean? I hope that before we have manhood suffrage rushed upon us, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has announced, may possibly be the case, the people will have an opportunity of discussing it, and that no Government, no matter which party may be in power, will bring in a Bill of that important character without first appealing to the (Mr. Mitchell) in his proposal for what is, practically, a manhood suffrage. I am sorry that in connection with endorse his amendment, and prefer it to the Bill that is now before the House. Now, while we are discussing this question of manhood suffrage, I think we should discuss it from a taxation point of view. We have had several arguments presented to the House to show the amount of taxes levied upon the people of this country, and it has been shown that the Customs duties for the year amount to something like $4.45 a head. No doubt there are some who do not pay $4.45, but there are others who pay three times that amount. Now, every man who contributes to the support of the Government has a fair claim to be allowed to exercise the franchise, and I hold that is one of the strongest arguments that can be adduced in favor of universal suffrage. I think that it is wise and prudent and just that a man who pays taxes should have the franchise—I care not if it is only 10 cents a year. The widow who contributed her two mites was just as much appreciated when she cast them into the treasury, as would be the man who cast in his £10; and in that view of the case, we ought just as much to consider the interest of the poor man who contributes his two mites as that of the rich man who contributes his £10. I hope, with the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), that the time is not far distant when we shall be able to take this matter up and deal with it satisfactorily. It would be well for us, perhaps, to have universal suffrage now, while the country is new, than later on when the population becomes dense. Take into consideration the North-West, for instance. Along the whole line of the Canadian Pacific Railway there are a large number of trackmen who will, no doubt, erect their houses along the line. We know that the land along the line is exempt from taxes for twenty years, and there will be no assessment of property for taxation not even for municipal purposes. There will, therefore, be no means of ascertaining what number of those men should be put on the roll so as to have the right to vote. I regret that hon, gentlemen opposite have not discussed this question individually and that the duty has devolved on hon. members on this side of the House. It is too early in the Session to begin to offer interruptions because a large amount of business remains to be done. I congratulate the Chairman on the evident desire he has manifested to maintain order throughout this discussion. I admit he has done so to the best of his ability. We have been occupied during three weeks in endeavoring to make converts of hon. gentlemen opposite and I regret, so far, with little effect. We are not, however, discouraged, and we are still prepared to remain here and do our duty to the country. Before this discussion closes I think hon gentlemen opposite will be compelled to admit that within a very few years manhood suffrage must be adopted in this Dominion.

Mr. MILLS. The great majority of members who have sat here during former Parliaments must have come to the conclusion that we have had far too much legislation. It is the fault of our country at the present time. Legislation is scarcely considered: measures are suggested by some clerk in a Department to a Minister; they are prepared by the law clerk, submitted to the House at the close of the Session and passed into law. This has been a very serious evil. Looking at what has transpired during the present Session, I think we are making a new departure, and that in the future the utmost care and attention will be given to measures, and consequently we shall have fewer measures, but less objectionable measures from this time forth. The time we have given, Sir, to the consideration of this question is not longer than is usually given to the considerations of this sort in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The First Mr. MOMULLEN.

perhaps identical in their views with either the Conservative party or the Reform party of England, agree with both parties in this: That they undertook to make the Parliament of England and its proceedings the model of its procedure here. Now, Sir, I do not think that was a fair or a candid representation. I think it was an atrociously unjust statement.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would call to the recollection of the hon, gentleman that the question before the committee is the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland, to sub-section two, of clause three, and as far as I can gather from his present remarks they are not relevant to the

Mr. MILLS. It is not my intention to travel outside the record, and I think I will show you the perfect relevancy of my observations. As I was pointing out the hon. gentleman made this statement. I am now pointing out to you that we, on this side, are adopting the view which he says prevailed in England, with reference to this very Bill, in our discussion of this measure, and the care and attention we give to this subject. We propose to examine it with the minute care and impartiality which an important measure of this sort deserves at our hands. Sir, there is no doubt that we are obliged to enter into this discussion more minutely because this Bill and this very clause propose to enfranchise a class of people who have not hitherto been enfranchised, and to disfranchise a large number of people who have enjoyed the franchise for a long time, and this is being done contrary to that practice which the hon gentleman says he implicitly respects, by dealing with the question without the sanction of the electorate of his country. The hon, member for Cardwell, yesterday, stated that he was not going to support the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland because he saw that in the Province of Ontario the opinion of the country had been taken by the Level Level tree large. of the country had been taken by the Local Legislature, and that the Local Legislature had not gone so far as the hon, gentleman's own motion goes. The hon, gentleman says that he will not go in favor of manhood suffrage, he will not support that proposition, because he wishes to respect public opinion in the Province of Ontario, and yet while he is ready to accept that public opinion for the purpose of voting against the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, he will not accept it for the purpose of sustaining the very motion to which he appealed. Now, I say that it is impossible for any hon. gentleman to take a more illogical position upon any question than that which the hon, member for Cardwell has taken upon this question. The franchise of manhood suffrage in the neighboring Republic has been referred to. It has been spoken of as prevailing there for more than a century. Well, it has prevailed for a long time, and so far as I remember there is not a State in the American Union where at this moment the franchise is based upon property. There are some States where parties are required to pay a capitation tax, and in Massachusetts they are required to be able to read the constitution. Now, the Province of British Columbia has manhood suffrage, and at the other extremity of the Dominion the Province of Prince Edward Island has manhood suffrage.

Mr. McCALLUM. What about the city of Toronto?

Mr. MILLS. That is beside the question. In both those Provinces the principle of manhood suffrage is in operation. In the Province of Prince Edward Island it has been in operation for thirty years, according to the hon. member for Queen's. Has it produced any mischievous results? Minister, during the visit he recently made to England, Queen's. Has it produced any mischievous results? Has addressed a public assembly in that country, and he told it led to corruption in the Government, or to putting in them that one great distinction between the party which he charge of public affairs or returning to this Parliament, represented and the party which sits on this side of the men disqualified to sit here and act as legislators? Will the House was this: That those who followed him, while not hon, member for Monck who interrupts meMr. McCALLUM. I did not interrupt you; I asked you a question—how the city of Toronto stood under the Mowat franchise? According to the Act of the Local Legislature——

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order. The hon. gentleman had better not interrupt the speaker.

Mr. McCALLUM. If he allows me, Mr. Chairman, I think I have the right.

Mr. MILLS. Let him go on.

Mr. McCALLUM. As the hon, gentleman allows me I will go on. I ask him what position would the city of Toronto stand in to-day, under that beautiful Franchise Bill of the Local Government. The city of Toronto sends to this House three members, but I understand that by that Bill the electors in the city of Toronto can only vote for two, so that one-third of them are deprived of representation in that Bill; and that is what the hon, gentleman wants us to accept in place of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman proposes that I shall make a speech for him. I am perfectly willing that he shall, without interruption on my part, state his views on the Ontario measure; but I am here to state my own views with regard to this measure and the amendment. I was calling attention to the fact that Prince Edward Island has returned six members to this House under manhood suffrage. I ask the hon. gentleman who objects to the motion of the hon, member for Northumberland, whether he thinks these hon. gentlemen are less qualified by education, by standing, by intellectual capacity, or by culture than any other hon, members to sit in this House. The hon, gentleman may think that Prince Edward Island has returned men so ill qualified to sit in this House that he is anxious to disfranchise a large number of the inhabitants of that island. I do not take that view; I believe manhood suffrage has worked satisfactorily in Prince Edward Island; and the proposition of the hon, gentleman who has moved this Bill is, to take the right to vote from 125,000 people of this country, who now enjoy the electoral franchise. Besides these, there are a large number of people in the various Provinces, who are, in my opinion, qualified to exercise the franchise, who are not enfranchised by the Bill; but would be under the motion of the hon, member for Northumberland. The principle of manhood suffrage has prevailed in almost every State of the American Union for more than half a century, and when we consider the very large extent of foreign population which has poured into the American Republic, I think we might safely adopt that principle here without injury to the state. There are many reasons why we should adopt it. In the first place, the hon. gentleman proposes to take into his hands the appointment of revising officers, and to give them the power not only to revise the lists, but to prepare the original lists; and that provision affords such great facilities for fraud and partisanship, for doing more than justice to one party and less than justice to another. That in my opinion if we were running much greater risks than we should be by adopting manhood suffrage—the importance of getting rid of so serious an evil as that which the hon, gentleman proposes to inflict upon us, would be sufficient to justify us in taking all the risks, and more, that are presented in the motion for manhood suffrage. Under that principle there would not be the same opportunity for partisanship. All the revising officers could enquire into would be whether a person was a natural born or naturalised British subject, whether he was 21 years of age, and whether he had resided 12 months before the application was made within the constituency or the municipality where he desired to vote. That would be an easy matter; there would be no room for the exercise of discretion; the questions would be simple and plain, and the answers to them yes or no; and, no matter how biassed the officer might be, he could not do an act of injustice to one party more than to the other. I say, then, that it is the action of the hon. First Minister himself that makes it, apart from the merits of the question, a matter of immense consequence that we should adopt the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland rather than the proposition embraced in this third section. What is the theory on which the hon gentleman starts out in proposing this measure? It is that there should be a uniform franchise for the Dominion which it would not be in the power of the Local Legislature to alter in any way; yet the hon. gentleman has not consistently carried out this provision. The third clause relates to cities and towns. Yet what is a city or town? It is what the Local Legislature chooses to make. For instance the town of Bothwell, which contained a large population during the oil boom, at the present time with 1,000 inhabitants, will have a more restricted franchise than the village of Wallaceburg with 2,000 inhabitants. That is an anomaly. I remember calling the hon, gentleman's attention to this provision thirteen years ago, when he introduced a Franchise Bill; and the hon, member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has given many instances from the census returns of 1881, in which the population of villages was two or three times as great as the population of towns. Now, whether a municipality is called a town or a village depends not on the action of this Government but on the action of the Local Parliament; and the hon, gentleman in undertaking to deal with municipalities as such, and designating them by the class to which they belong, is himself violating the principle on which he sets out, that he is going to remove the voters under this Bill from any action of the Local Legislature. He has not done so; he has departed from that principle. The question of property is wholly under the control of the Local Legislatures. The question of property is wholly under the control of the Local Government; we have nothing to do with it; we cannot say who shall be the tenant or what shall be the condition of tenancy; we have nothing to do with making laws regulating the relations between landlord and tenant. All these matters are under the control of the Local Government; so that, when you refuse to do what the United States did. after long and careful consideration, when you reject the provincial franchises and undertake to establish a franchise independent of those which the Local Legislatures have provided, you have no logical standing ground on which to proceed other than that of manhood suffrage. Look at the provision of the constitution and what do you find? You will find that we have representation given us here by population. It is the persons who are recognised; we have nothing to do with the question of property; we are as completely dissociated from that as we would be if the local powers were vested in a foreign country. There is another reason why it is of vast consequence we should confer upon all the people of this country the power of the electoral franchise, if we are to adopt the principle of this Bill and prepare an independent franchise, as the hon. member for Northumberland thinks we ought. If we are to have a separate franchise, it ought to be based on population. What are the functions of a citizen in connection with this House? Apart from those commercial pursuits in which we are engaged, we deal with the subject of crime, the responsibility of man to man, with the subject of defence, the responsibility of each individual to defend his country. It is not a question of property, but a question of inherent personal rights that belongs to every man as a man, and I say the man who is compelled to go to the front and risk his lift for his country's sake is as much entitled to vote as the man who stays at home and pays the taxes to meet the expense connected with the defence of our country. Look at the history of the neighboring republic. We know there have been poured into that country half a million of people a year, for the last 30 years, people of foreign birth, who have been born and brought up under different systems of government, and in many cases have not had the training which free institutions give. Yet those people have been converted into American citizens; they have acquired the habit of self government; they have lost their nationalities and become unified with and merged into the population of the country. That process would not have gone on with the same rapidity or to anything like the same extent, if it had not been for the adoption of the principle of manhood suffrage. It has been a common thing to refer to the city of New York, and to speak about the extravagance of New York, as if the conditions of things in New York were the conditions of things throughout the American republic. But we have to bear in mind that the people who have gone into the United States have generally come from the poorer people of Europe, who made little or no progress in their own country, who had few opportunities in their own country, and the remarkable thing is, not that the American Government has been as honest, capable and efficient as it has been under the existing constitution, but the marvelous feature is that it should have succeeded in so educating and improving all classes of its population, when you consider the character and the materials upon which its institutions have operated. I say that this influence upon foreign populations is of immense consequence, now that we are seeking foreign immigration. It is true the condition of things at this moment, owing to the incapacity and mismanagement of hon. gentlemen opposite, is not favorable to immigration; but we are not to look at the condition of things at this hour, but at the condition of things that existed formerly and is likely to exist again. I say that in order to people our North-West we are seeking foreign immigration. How are we going to promote the settlement of that country? How are we going to convert thousands of people into Canadians, into men who will pay some regard to our institutions, and forget the country from whence they came, and think mainly of the country to which they have immigrated. It is by giving them the rights of citizenship at a period when they have few cares and responsibilities devolving upon them. If you will show me a man in this country who has not taken any part in its political affairs when young, I will show you a man who has taken but little interest in its public affairs, and who, in many cases, would not hesitate to ask compensation for the day before he would be willing to go and record his vote. That is not the class of men we want here. We want men of public spirit who will take an interest in the country, who have opinions and will seek to express them, who will not wait to be dragged to the polls, but will be prompt and anxious to record their votes in favor of the candidate they prefer. To attain that result you must give them the right to vote early in life, when they have few cares and anxieties. One of the great advantages of the system of parliamentary government is its educating influence; it is a school for our people in which their minds are developed, scarcely less so than by the various churches which are established throughout the country. In order to serve this, the highest purpose of constitutional government, it is of vast consequence that the people should have an opportunity of exercising the franchise at an early period in life. Mr. Maine says, in his work on "Ancient Law," that the human race may be divided into two great classes, the progressive and the non-progressive. What we are seeking to we do not seek to enfranchise the non-progressive class, the class that have a passive existence, that may exhibit in some instances a very considerable amount of subtlety of intellect, but are wanting in physical energy and the Mr. Mills. attract to this country is the immigration of the progresmaterial enterprise which is necessary to develop the resources and contribute to the wealth and progress of the country. The right hon gentleman in this Bill refuses to enfranchise the Chinese. I do not object to that, for they belong to the class we designate as non-progressive; and I say that the Indian population, except in so far as they will show fitness to be enfranchised, also belong to the same class, and the same rule applies to them. But that rule does not apply to the young men of the country; it does not apply to the Europeans who come here to carve out homes for themselves. The very fact that they come here is proof that they are not wanting in energy. A man does not dissociate himself from the country of his birth, the church in which he has worshipped, the neighborhood where he is acquainted, and come to a strange country to carve out for himself a home and improve the condition of his family, unless he has, in a large degree, within himself the elements of enterprise and progress. That being the case, we can with perfect safety adopt the principle of manhood suffrage set forth in the resolution the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has submitted. What is the first condition or evidence of fitness? Is it property? No, Sir; the right hon. the First Minister himself has admitted it is not when submitting this Bill. He said he did not require it of the Indians because it was no test. If property is no evidence of fitness, why insist in putting it in the Bill and regarding it as an evidence of fitness? It is clear, if the hon. gentleman is consistent with himself that he must agree to withdraw these provisions of his Bill, and support the proposition of the hon. member for Northumberland. He told us that Charles James Fox was a spendthrift, that he could not take care of his own estate, and he gave that as an evidence that property was no test of a man's capacity. If that be so, why is that test included in the Bill. We look at history only to profit by it and in order that we may learn the causes which have contributed to the greatness or decay of nations, so that we may profit by the lessons which it affords. In Rome, the important element was the public spirit of its citizens, the enterprise which characterised them, their confidence in the destiny of the country to which they belonged and their disinterestedness in supporting and maintaining the institutions under which they lived. The hon, gentleman last night charged my hon. friend beside me with disingenuousness in his quotation from Mr. Gladstone. He said that Mr. Gladstone did not hold the views which my hon. friend attributed to him and that the quotation was a garbled quotation, calculated to mislead the House as to what were Mr. Gladstone's views. I said then that Mr. Gladstone did hold the view which my hon friend had attributed to him. Everyone who has watched Mr. Gladstone's course and read his utterances, whether in contributions to the magazines or in speeches on the hustings or in Parliament, will see that that great statesman has advanced, if I may say so, to the view in favor of manhood suffrage. It is true that Mr. Gladstone did not propose manhood suffrage in the Commons of England, but that was not because it was not his own opinion, but because he believed that the Parliament of the United Kingdom would not support that proposition. He proposed what he thought was the best which it was possible to carry, and not what he believed was just and proper in itself. He has declared that the burden of proof is upon him who would refuse to any party the franchise. Let me read an extract from an essay of Mr. Gladstone's in the Nineteenth Century of November, 1877. In discussing this question of the franchise, he says:

That is, there may be other than those parties whom he has named who individually may not be qualified to exercise the elective franchise, but they form so small a proportion that it does not justify us in rejecting the mass on account of the defects of the few.

"That in practice the question before us is simply that of household suffrage in the counties."

That is the practical question, but the abstract question of right is that mentioned before. (The hon. gentleman quoted from "Gladstone's Gleanings," pages 142, 143 and 144.) In a speech delivered at Liverpool shortly after the close of the American war, Mr. Gladstone stated that he had come to the conclusion that manhood suffrage was a source of immense strength to a nation, created a public spirit and an interest in the Government, and without it the American republic could not have succeeded as it did in suppressing that great rebellion. It is sometimes said that the great masses of the people are not qualified, that it is only the educated, the trained classes that are qualified to judge of the affairs of state. This argument is also met by Mr. Gladstone in a way, I think, that is eminently satisfactory and conclusive. There are other than intellectual reasons for the adoption of particular courses in public matters; there are other considerations than those of a mere intellectual character which ought to influence the conduct of men. There are moral considerations, and the man who is poor, the man who is in straitened circumstances, the man who has suffered the consequence of being poor, is likely to have a much stronger sympathy with those who are in that condition, and is much more likely to propose practical legislation of an ameliorative character, than those who are not in such a condition. Mr. Gladstone says on this subject—(the hon. gentleman read several extracts from a speech of Mr. Gladstone's). Then Mr. Gladstone goes on to observe that upon all the great leading constitutional questions, for 100 years, which have divided the people of England, the masses were right and the select few were in the wrong. He mentions, amongst these, the question of Catholic emancipation, the question of parliamentary reform, the question of the repeal of the corn laws, the question of the adoption of free trade as against protection—on all these questions the great masses of the people of England were on the side of these views which were ultimately triumphant, and which experience proves to be right; while the cultured few who some think should alone possess the franchise, were entirely in the wrong. This rule is not confined to political matters alone. It is perfectly obvious that in the progress of the world this same rule holds good to a large degree. Why, Sir, in the very ques tion of our holy religion, how was it? Did the Scribes and the Pharisees, did those men of culture and of leisure, did those men who were the guides of the people on questions of religion—were they the first to accept the doctrines of the Saviour of mankind? We know to the contrary. We know that the disinterested teachers, the men who lead the world into the adoption of a higher faith, were regarded as ignorant fishermen; they were men who were without culture and without training. They forsook their boats and their nets, and they repeated the precepts and although the founder of the religion; and although they were opposed by the educated part of mankind, we know that these rions altimately promised we know that those views ultimately prevailed. How did this progress of reform begin? Did it begin at the top? Did it begin amongst the intellectual and cultured? No, it began at the bottom. Society was improved from below; society was illuminated from below. And, Sir, I say there is no difference in this country, where education is widely diffused, between the cultured few and the great mass of mankind, which would justify us in withholding the franchise from the young men of this country. Sir, the present time Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and what is the object of our educational system? Why do we British Columbia have manhood suffrage laws, and to adopt undertake to diffuse knowledge? Why have we established schools of learning from one end of the country to the other? It has been for the purpose of diffusing knowledge. Lord Macaulay observes that the inequalities of intellect, like the inequalities of the earth's surface, bear but a small proportion to the whole mass, that they may be safely neglected. The light of the sun illuminates the hills but a few minutes before it does the valleys. And so truth is sometimes perceived by great minds before it becomes perceptible to the multitude. They are merely the first to catch and reflect that light which, without their assistance, would bye-and-bye shine upon all. Now, Sir, I say that the condition of things here is such that we are entitled to extend the franchise. I say that the motion made by my hon. friend, if we are to have a Dominion franchise at all is the only logical basis for that franchise, and I trust that the hon. gentleman will secure from his own side of the House so large a number of supporters that it will be substituted for this particular section of the Bill. Then we are to observe this one great advantage that will arise from the extension of the franchise. It prevents the growth of a dangerous class in the country. Mr. Lowe sarcastically said, after the adoption of household suffrage in the boroughs of England, in 1867, that it would be the duty of the gentlemen of England now to educate their masters. Well, Sir, it is a great thing when those who are educated, and those who have property, have a great personal interest in looking after the well-being of others. I say it is of immense consequence in a Government, and it contributes to the well-being of the Government, that those who are themselves in good circumstances should have every possible inducement brought to bear upon them to educate and improve the condition of those who are not so well off as they are themselves. Then the interest of the wealthy classes and the well informed classes, is identical with the general interests of the country, with the general well-being of the country. Every gentleman who sits in this House, when he goes to his electors in order to inform them upon public questions, is he not anxious that they should have facilities for acquiring information, that they should form correct judgments upon public questions? Does he not get on much more satisfactorily with those who are intelligent and well informed, than with those who are not so? And, Sir, by the adoption of the amendment put into your hands by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) the interest of the whole community will be identical with the wealthiest section of the community.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

Mr. FISHER. During the discussion that has taken place, members of the Opposition have attempted to retain the provincial franchises, but they have been unsuccessful in that struggle. The principle of a universal Dominion franchise has been accepted, and we must bow to that That being the case, it is desirable that the franchise should be as simple in its provisions, as inexpensive in its application, as possible. I see, therefore, the necessity of accepting the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). The expense necessary to carry out such a franchise will be very small indeed, very little more than the present expense of the municipal electoral lists, and presenting a marked contrast to the expense involved by the complicated machinery necessary to carry out the provisions of this Bill. But there are other reasons why the amendment should be adopted.

the present Bill would be to disfranchise a large number of people. If we adopt a uniform Dominion franchise, we should adopt the franchise most extended in any of the Provinces. The member for Cumberland, N.S. (Mr. Tupper), at an earlier period of the debate, announced as one of the reasons why the revising barrister clauses were inserted in the Bill was, that they were necessitated by the fact that we were creating a Dominion franchise, and we must provide machinery to carry it out. I could easily conceive more easily worked machinery than that proposed in the Bill, even if manhood suffrage were not accepted. If there are to be revising barristers or judges acting in every constituency, there must be salaries attached, and secretaries, bailiffs and other officers must likewise be paid. Not only will there be the expenses consequent upon the salaries of officials, but there will be great expense incurred by the electors themselves. This would be obviated by adopting universal suffrage as provided by the amend-There is a still greater objection to the machinery provided by this Bill, and that is the partisan character of the revising barrister. I am well aware it is in the power of the Government to modify these clauses to such an extent as to render them much less objectionable; but the leader of the Government cannot change them so as to make them unobjectionable. It is in consequence of this-

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I wish to call the hon, gentleman's attention to the fact that we are not discussing the revising barrister clause at present.

Mr. FISHER. I understand that, but it is because of the objectionable character of this clause that I am desirous of supporting the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, and I am explaining my objections to the clause, which, I think, is relevant to the question before you. If you think, however, that my remarks are not pertinent to the question, I will submit to your ruling. I do not support manhood suffrage because I think it is the best thing we can have in this country, but because, if manhood suffrage was introduced into this Bill, it would remove many objections, and in that case I would be forced to accept what I consider the lesser of two great evils. In the Province of Quebec manhood suffrage is not acceptable to the people; it has not been proposed in the Local Legislature, and I have no idea that any responsible individual in that Province would undertake to support or propose manhood suffrage. One of the objections I have to this Bill is that, in consequence of the uniformity of franchise which is insisted upon over the whole Dominion, some, and perhaps all, of the Provinces will suffer as to their particular conditions and circumstances. In the Province of Quebec the genius of the people has been against the principle of manhood suffrage. The people have been wedded to the principle of property qualification, and it is because this Bill departs from that principle that I support the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland. If that principle is departed from, if that step is once taken, I do not see why it should not be taken further and longer than in this Bill. It is true that in this Bill there is a property qualification, but there are so many other qualifications—

Mr. PAINT. I rise to a point of order. I am credibly informed that the hon gentleman is repeating a speech which he made at a mass meeting in Montreal the other evening.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask if that is a question of order which it is proper for an hon, gentleman to raise in this House.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think the hon. gentleman. has raised a point of order.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. FISHER. I may tell the hon, gentleman that he has been mistaken, or that his informant has been mistaken on that point.

An hon. MEMBER. It was not a mass meeting.

Mr. FISHER. I was proceeding to show some of the reasons why I consider that manhood suffrage is not so unacceptable as it would be had not the provisions of this Bill been laid before this House and apparently insisted upon by the majority of this House. In this country, Sir, manhood suffrage is not so objectionable as it would be in the older countries of Europe. We have here, Sir, no such depths of ignorance among the people, no such large masses of people, who are not entitled to the franchise, as there are in the large cities of Europe, and as to the country parts of the Dominion, the provisions of this Bill are so extended that a far greater number of people will be enfranchised than there are at present. In the large cities of the mother country there is, no doubt, a large mass of the people who are not entitled and are not fit to enjoy the franchise, but I am glad and proud to be able to say that in the country parts of Quebec there are few people who, under the provisions of this Bill, will not have the franchise, and that being the case, I think it is but a short step to go as far as the hon, member for Northumberland proposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to see that this sentiment meets with the approval of hon. gentlemen, and perhaps there may be a larger support of the amendment than I had anticipated. One reason why it is necessary that this amendment should be adopted, is that the complicated machinery which is necessitated by the fancy ranchistes of this Bill may be done away with. If, Sir, this amendment is not going to make a great deal of difference in the number of people enfranchised, it is all the more reason why it should be adopted, because it will remove many of the objectionable features and obviate many of the difficulties of the Bill. I want it thoroughly understood that I believe the Provinces should be allowed to regulate their own franchises according to the circumstances and conditions in each Province, and I believe the Province of Quebec should be allowed to have such a franchise as it thinks desirable—such a franchise as it has heretofore enjoyed. It is not that I desire to force upon the Province of Quebec the franchise proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland, but I support it as being a lesser evil than the Bill we have before us, with so many objectionable features with regard to revising barristers and the manipulation of voters' lists. I thought before this amendment was put to the vote that it was my duty to myself and my constituency to make these few remarks in explanation of my position with regard to it. I therefore trust that the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland will be adopted.

Mr. CURRAN. I do not think it is fair that the hon. gentleman should take his seat without giving us the true state of the indignation in Montreal Centre.

Mr. FISHER. Perhaps if the hon member for Montreal Centre will go to Montreal and face the electors, he will find out what the true sentiment is.

Mr. CURRAN. I happened to be there.

Mr. EDGAR. In discussing the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland, I cannot forget that I have already voted in favor of retaining the various provincial franchises for the purposes of Dominion elections. I did so because I believed that if the Provinces themselves had been consulted, they would still desire to retain their provincial franchises. That a uniform franchise for the Dominion is not preferred by Prince Edward Island we know from the unanimous vote of its members—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman has finished his speech, although he has continued standing, I may venture to address the House.

Mr. EDGAR. I have not finished my speech. I am only waiting till the First Minister induces his friends to keep order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No hon, member can stop and stand as long as he likes, and say because he is standing that the House is to remember that he is speaking. The hon, gentleman has been standing for a minute——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order. The right hon, gentleman is not in order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The right hon, gentleman has risen to a point of order, as I understand.

Mr. EDGAR. If the right hon, gentleman cannot assist the Chairman to keep his followers in order, I shall stay here—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I consider that I had a right to speak, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman had ceased.

Mr. MILLS. That is not a point of order at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not rise to a point of order; I rose to speak.

Mr. MILLS. You have no right to speak.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman has no right to address me across the floor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I took the point of order, because my hon. friend behind me was simply waiting until the disorder you yourself noticed had come to a close. When that had come to a close my hon. friend was ready to address the House, and the hon. First Minister had no right to interrupt him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I speak to that point of order. It is well known in parliamentary practice, that when an hon member has not the ear of the House, and the House is disinclined to hear him, the House allows it to be known by unmistakable signs of inattention, or other means well known to parliamentary men; and no one knows better than the hon, gentleman that it is well understood in England, and ought to be understood here, that no hon, member is to force himself against the will of the House, and continue to preach against the stomach of the House. No hon, member has a right to stand and fold his arms and say: I shall stand here and prevent the debate going on, because there happen to be noises, showing disapproval of the language or the course of the hon, gentleman. That is the settled parliamentary practice, and the hon. gentleman knows it right well.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman did not stop for any such length of time as to warrant the hon. First Minister to raise such a point. The hon, gentleman stopped in order that order might be restored so that he could proceed, and the hon, gentleman knows that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I shall withdraw my claim in favor of the hon. gentleman, hoping that he will not make such long pauses hereafter.

Mr. EDGAR. The right hon, gentleman will find that if hon, gentlemen opposite do not keep order, the debate will be much longer than it otherwise would. My objection to supporting the amendment of my hon, friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), is that it will apply an absolute uniform franchise to the Dominion. I think it is a much less objectionable form of uniform franchise than that which is proposed by the Bill, as it is now before the Committee, and I am free to admit that that form of franchise has been preferred by several of the Provinces. It has been preferred by Prince Edward Island, which has adopted it for provincial purposes, and under it all the members from that Province in this House have been elected. It has been preferred by the Province of British Columbia, because, whatever hon, members from that Province may think about it, and however they may vote upon the subject, the Province of British Columbia has adopted manhood suffrage as the franchise for their own provincial elections and also as the franchise which they consider applicable to the election of members for this House. The Province of Manitoba has practically adopted it. The Province of Ontario, however, has not adopted that suffrage; I may say it has not considered the question yet. There has been no agitation in Ontario for manhood suffrage, it has not been asked for, and has not been discussed at the polls. I dare say the feeling of that Province when the matter shall be discussed will be in favor of manhood suffrage; and one reason why I think so is that within the past two months the Conservative party in that Province has, in the Local Legislature, taken very strong ground in favor of that franchise. The right hon. the First Minister said yesterday that when Mr. Mowat saw what franchise was proposed by this Bill, he adopted a larger franchise, or, to use the classical expression of the First Minister, he went one better. Well, it Mr. Mowat went one better, the right hon. gentleman's followers in the Local Legislature, the leader of the Opposition there, went one better than Mr. Mowat by proposing a manhood suffrage amendment. Now, when we see all that happening in the Province of Ontario, it is quite possible that that Province, when it comes to consider the question, will decide in favor of manhood suffrage, but it has not yet asked for it. Then there is the great Province of Quebec, a very large Province, and I would like to know what indications we have that the Province of Quebec is in favor of manhood suffrage? I think the indications are that it is not. They have not adopted it in their own Local Legislature, where they have entire control, there certainly has been no agitation for it throughout that Province, and I think that, like the Province of Ontario, the Province of Quebec can afford to wait a little while before they have manhood suffrage thrust upon them by this Dominion Parliament without their asking for it, and undoubtedly against the will of the majority of the people. I am not at all against the abstract proposition of manhood suffrage. Probably it is the most logical of all suffrages. I will not now discuss it, although I believe it is sure to be adopted in Canada, if for the whole of Canada we will have a uniform franchise. If we do not have that uniform franchise, the different Provinces will carry out their own views about the franchise; some will continue having manhood suffrage, as they now have, and others will avoid it altogether. I am not at all surprised at the hon, member for Northumberland making his motion and advocating this franchise, because it is a uniform franchise, and he has declared himself, from the first, in favor of a uniform franchise for the Dominion. I will feel that I have to vote against the amendment, in the first place, because manhood suffrage has not been demanded by the people; then it has never been made the subject of any agitation through the press or by any public meetings or petitions or otherwise; and thirdly it has never been made a question at the polls in Canada; and I am sure, when so very revolutionary a measure as this is proposed, it is only reasonable that the people should be given an opportunity to express their views on the subject at the polls. I object to it also at present because it is the adoption of a of uniform franchise to which I am principle the Dominion is not in favor of it. Another reason which influences me, and I should not wonder if it influenced other hon, members here, before giving a vote in favor of so important, so radical measure of change, is that I would like to have an opportunity of knowing what my own constituents think about it. Of course, it is argued very plausibly that manhood suffrage is very necessary to protect us from what may be done by the revising officers, but that part of the Bill has not been adopted, and I have still faith in this House to believe that we are sufficiently amenable to the wishes of the people, that there is sufficient judgment and patriotism left in hon. members, not to pass the Bill as it is. Therefore, until I see that this clause of the revising barristers becomes law, I shall not feel that, in order to defend myself against its defects, it will be necessary to adopt at once manhood suffrage. Perhaps by the time the Bill comes up for its third reading, when we will see what it is as regards the revising barristers, we will be able to form an opinion, and then many of the arguments I have heard in favor of manhood suffrage will have great influence upon my mind in inducing me to adopt this franchise in order to avert the evils which will flow from the clause creating revising barristers.

Mr. McCALLUM. Before you put that motion, Sir, I desire to make a few remarks, and I promise you I will not long detain the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) the other day, when some dispute arose about petitions, said there were Conservatives enough in my riding asking that this Bill should not pass to defeat me in my I think uniformity is very necessary as far as we county. can possibly get it. In all the provinces of this Dominion, the qualifications of those who send members to this House should be as nearly alike as possible. The hon, gentleman got offended with me because I said that, under the former franchise he was a much defeated member. It was true, but I did not explain to the House how much he was defeated under that franchise. I can tell you out of the "Parliamentary Companion" how much he was defeated under that franchise of which he is now so fond. In 1871. he was defeated for the Local House in Monck; in 1872, he was elected to this House for a short time; in 1874, in Monck, he was defeated, and again same year was defeated in North Oxford; in 1875, he was defeated in Monck; in 1876, he was defeated in South Ontario; in 1878, he was defeated in Monck; and in 1882 he was again defeated, and all under the same franchise.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I must ask the hon. gentleman to keep to the question.

Mr. McCALLUM. I will keep to the question. In 1882, under the same franchise, he was defeated in Centre Toronto. It is very extraordinary that he should desire to preserve that franchise. I am referring to a personal attack, and I think I have the right to do that. The hon. gentleman said the other day that the Government had paid me $8,000 for my vote, to keep me in this House. That is a reflection on the Parliament of this country. Whatever I got was by a vote of this House. It is true that a vessel which I owned was damaged in the Welland Canal in 1874. It is true that, after the Government had kept me out of the money for eight years, they paid me, and did not pay me the interest. I have no desire to refer to these matters. The hon, gentleman has come to this House, not over the boom, but through the cabin windows. He says I am here because my county was gerrymandered, but he knows there was no gerrymander from 1872 to 1882, and he has been defeated this number of times under the same franchise during that period. The hon. gentleman thinks he has suffered largely for his country. He told the hon member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the Mr. EDGAR,

Mr. TROW. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. McCALLUM, And I say that, under this franchise

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon, member is travelling very far from the subject under discussion.

Mr. McCALLUM. I say it is a wonder that he should be so anxious to keep this franchise that he was so much defeated under.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McCALLUM. He should be anxious to get some other franchise. I could not hear very well what he said, from the applause he met with from this side of the House, but, as I understand it, he was not in favor of the motion of the hon, member for Northumberland. He speaks of my having got $8,000 from the Government. It lies well in his mouth to make a statement of that kind, for if there has ever been a political Lazarus in this country, feeding on the crumbs which fell from the table of the Ontario Government, it is that gentleman, and the accounts of the Ontario Government will show it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I desire to give my reasons for voting for this amendment. It is one of the most important nature. It is almost radical in its character. It proposes something which the larger part of this Dominion has not yet adopted, in fact it is proposed to adopt universal suffrage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I intend to be very brief, but I hope hon, gentlemen will have the manliness and the gentlemanly feeling to keep order while I am speaking. During the few years that I have had a seat in this House, I have never interrupted an hon, gentleman while he was speaking, and, if I should have the privilege of sitting here a few years longer, I never intend to abuse good manners so far as to do it. The mover of the amendment, in his remarks in support of it this afternoon, stated his belief that this House ought to fix a Dominion franchise for itself. It is strange that the hon. gentleman, like all others on that side of the House who have preceded him, overlooked the fact that this Dominion has a franchise now, that Parliament has adopted the franchise under which we have been acting without friction or trouble for the last eighteen years. So the mere fact that this House should have a franchise fixed by itself cannot be adduced as a valid reason why this Bill should become law. I have never been an advocate of universal suffrage, and, under ordinary circumstances, I would not vote for this amendment; but, under present circumstances, I shall feel it my duty to do so. One of the reasons why, under ordinary circumstances, I would not vote for it, is that I understand, on good authority, that universal suffrage is distasteful to one of the most important Provinces, the Province of Quebec. I hold it to be a vital principle that, unless some strong necessity exists, we should not do anything in opposition to the feelings of the people of any large Province, unless some great good is to be gained, or some great evil is to be averted. I believe the people of Quebec generally are opposed to universal suffrage, and under ordinary circumstances I should, for that reason, feel it my duty to vote against this amendment. But, Sir, as the gentleman against this amendment. But, Sir, as the gentleman who last spoke remarked, I have always found it a good rule between two evils to choose the least; and I find, in the Bill before us, objection so great that I am unwillingly compelled to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). In the first He told the hon, member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), the other night, that before Confederation he was assisting his party to carry Confederation.

Place, this amendment will save the Dominion a large amount of expense, and will simplify the matter exceedingly. It is the duty of this House, so far as we can, to save the people from expense, trouble and annoyance. Reference has all these reasons I feel it my duty to support the amendbeen made to the trouble of getting up voters' lists. No matter how simple the machinery may be, so long as you impose any qualification, there must be more or less trouble in enjoy the franchise if this Bill did not become law. In British Columbia and Prince Edward Island every adult citizen has a right to vote for members of this House. Now, to deprive any large number of this privilege must be a grievous hardship. Although people who do not possess the franchise may not esteem it very highly, and may not make any great efforts to obtain it, still, when once the privilege has been conferred upon them, and you deprive them of it afterwards, you give them a large grievance. The right hon, gentleman who has charge of this Bill stated last night that the Bill passed by the Ontario Legislature would not become law until the end of the There is a sufficient reason for that. It is well known that the franchise has been largely changed, and that the amended voters' list made out under that franchise, cannot be available until the end of the year. But the very same objection will act against this Bill. The right hon. gentleman claimed that, if an election were to take place during the year it would have to be held upon the old voters list, and under the old franchise law. Well, Sir, if this Bill becomes law to-morrow, the very same thing would happen, because the lists would not be available until the end of the year. In the Province of Ontario, people who are disfranchised under this Bill that are enfranchised by the Ontario Act, when they come to exercise the franchise under both Acts, will want to know the reason why they are allowed the priknow the reason why they are allowed the privilege under one law and denied it under the other. I wish again to draw attention to the classes that are largely going to be disfranchised in Ontario under the present act. First of all, there is the large class whom the raising of the franchise above that of the Ontario Act will deprive of their vote; then there is a large class beside who will be disfranchised under this Bill. These are the the teachers in the rural districts not alone in Ontario, but through the Dominion, the great majority of whom are going to be disfranchised by this Bill. Now I need not tell this House that these are a very intelligent class. They are gentlemen who exercise a great influence in the community; they are gentlemen who, next to the mothers of the land, exercise, probably, the greatest influence in moulding the thoughts and ideas of the youth, those who, in a few years will be voters. I say it is monstrous that they should be deprived of the franchise which they now enjoy. Then, again, there is in Ontario the class of wageearners, which comprises a vast number of farmers' sons, who are independent enough and manly enough to hire out with the neighboring farmers in order to earn something with which to start in life. These intelligent young men will be completely disfranchised under the present Bill if it becomes law. I wish again to impress upon the committee that it is a serious matter to deprive any class of the community of the right to exercise the franchise without good and sufficient reason. It is a measure which ought not to be resorted to under any ordinary circumstances. As regards the present Bill, I have only to point to the vast number of petitions that have been laid before the House, signed by Conservatives and Reformers alike; to the meetings that are being held throughout the country; to the language in which the Bill is denounced by the Independent as well as the Liberal press; to show that the Bill is have, to a man, supported the provincial franchise. I need ment of the hon. member for Northumberland.

Mr. FAIRBANK. In the few words I shall address on making up a list. We have to make up one voters' list this subject I hope I shall not be open to the charge of obnow, and if this Bill passes we shall just double structing the business. That charge has been frequently made that trouble for the people of this country. I also since this discussion commenced. To it, we, on this side of the feel it my duty to support the amendment because House, plead not guilty. In the best sense of the word the Bill disfranchises large numbers that would be for problem if this Bill disfranchises large numbers that would be for not public business. It is a next the franchise if this Bill disfranchises large numbers that would be for not public business. partisan measure. We have asked for public business to be brought down; we have repeatedly urged that it be brought down. What has been the answer? Not a thing shall be touched, not a particle of business shall be done, until you have swallowed this infamous measure. The interests of the country are nothing; it matters not what the country suffers; this Bill must be passed; this House must sit day in and day out, and week in and week out, until this Bill becomes law. We are told that hon. gentlemen opposite must be first confirmed in their seats by legislation and not by the votes of the people; nay more, we are practically told that some hon. members on this side must first be legislated out of the House before public business can be done. From half-past one p.m. till two a.m. we are kept at the grind, with the avowed intention of breaking us down. Hon, gentlemen opposite have tried this for a considerable time, they may be better satisfied with the trial further on. It is from the Ministerial benches that business is being obstructed, not from this side. We are willing that this charge should go to a higher court, the court of the people of Canada, and let the people decide which party it is that is obstructing business. What is our condition at the present time? Is it the wish of this side to force upon any Province a franchise that is obnoxious to them? By no means. For days, yea for weeks, we have contended day and night for the provincial franchises. What assistance have we received from Ministerialists? What assistance have we obtained from the great Province of Quebec, whose people, I believe, are more closely wedded to their provincial franchise than perhaps those of any other Province of the Dominion? It is true that two gallant sons of Quebec have opposed the adoption of this measure—only two, and one Independent has added his weight to the motion now before the committee. Why have not the hon members for Quebec, who really wish to preserve their provincial franchise, spoken on this measure and given the House their real inward sentiments? We know what those sentiments are; but the members are silent. We have been desirous of retaining for the various Provinces each its own provincial franchise. We desire it for Ontario and the other Provinces; but it cannot be obtained. Then it becomes the duty of each Province to obtain a franchise as near the franchise that suits the particular Provinces as possible, and what is the position of the representatives of Ontario upon this question to-day? The representatives in the Local Legislature, the representatives fresh from the people, have taken this in hand, and they, for the time, have decided it. We have no reason to suspect that that decision has not been in accordance with the wishes of the people. The decision arrived at was manhood suffrage, all but in name, and the only division in the Legislature was that those who entertained the same political opinion as the hon. gentleman opposite wished it to be manhood suffrage pure and simple, and voted accordingly. But when the Bill, as it now stands, which is, as I have said manhood suffrage in all but name, was finally submitted, it was passed unanimously. Such is the position of the representatives of Ontario in the Local Legislature. What is the position of their representatives here? They, on this side of the House, extremely distasteful to the great mass of the people. For not ask where hon, gentlemen opposite are. We always know where to find them. We find them hanging on exactly the same peg that the First Minister last put them on, until he takes them down and puts them on another. This franchise of Ontario was adopted with the clear knowledge that it applied to the election of members to this House; thence it became the franchise for the purpose for which we are dealing. Such being the public will of Ontario, recorded on that occasion, it becomes my duty to attain the nearest possible franchise to that franchise, and the provincial franchise being denied and manhood suffrage coming nearest to it, it is my duty to support the amendment and maintain manhood suffrage here. Unlike the hon member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty), I am not an advocate of legislative union. Hence I cannot agree with him in the arguments he gave, all of which centred upon and clustered round the principles lying at the base of and sustaining a legislative union. I do not feel prepared to consent willingly or silently to the disfranchisement of tens of thousands of the people of Ontario. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) referring to the Ontario franchise, last evening, referred to the matter whether it increased or diminished the number of voters. He knows as well as any one the extent to which the people will be disfranchised, to the extent of thousands and tens of thousands. Thousands of small property owners will be disfranchised. I do not propose to enter into all the details. I will merely refer to small property owners, to the large wage-earning class, to the large class of young men who will be disfranchised under the Bill and who have votes under the Ontario Bill. It appears to me as a particularly ungracious action in regard to our young men, particularly those engaged at the front, those who are now engaged at the front, many of whom may return to their native Provinces more or less disabled. These men who sprung to arms for the restoration of law and order in that country had votes under the Mowat Bill, and it is not particularly graceful, that because these young men may become incapacitated by their services to the country to earn $400 a year, they will return to find that by our Act they are deprived of their votes. The young men of Canada are as intelligent and as capable as the young men of any other country in the world. Under our excellent educational system they have a capacity to intelligently exercise the franchise, which is not surpassed by any young man on this continent, or any other. In the neighboring Republic they find ready employment and the best positions, and they stand higher as a class than any others. I shall not argue the point that this Bill extends the franchise. Although it perhaps does so in some Provinces, that is a poor compensation to those whom it deprives of the franchise. It would be a small consolation to you or me, if we were robbed of a certain sum of money, to be told that somebody else had been given twice as much. I would ask if there is any Ministerialist—for of course it could not be carried by this side—who is prepared to move a provision in words similar to these: provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this Act shall prevent any citizen of any Province from exercising the franchise which he would have been entitled to exercise under the laws of that Province. If there is, I shall be happy to second it. Ministerial members for Prince Edward Island have spoken in high terms of this measure, but always at the conclusion they express the hope that they will be exempted from it. It is much like the statement that boils are excellent things, but the best place for them is on your neighbors. I was surprised last evening at the temper displayed by the junior member for Victoria, B.C., in relation to the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. He seemed particularly annoyed on that occasion. Last Session that hon, gentleman, in able and eloquent terms, urged the limiting of Chinese immigration into British Columbia, views which I humbly supported him in and spoke briefly who is unfortunately overcome by the habit of drink; he is Mr. FAIRBANK.

in favor of. I shall quote briefly some of the reasons he gave for his course on that occasion:

gave for his course on that occasion:

"Various reasons might be given why such a law should not be enacted. One is because the Chinese labor is brought into competition with the labor of the white man. The Chinese work for wages which will not support a white laborer's family. They bring with them none of the responsibilities of our civilisation. They have no wives or children to support, and hence they come stripped, as it were, to do bettle with white labor. The white man has his family to feed, to clothe, to educate, churches and other institutions to maintain; and in a thousand other ways, he is called upon to contribute. The Chinaman, his rival in the market, has none of these responsibilities. He has only himself to provide for, and hence he is prepared for the combat; and, however much the Chinaman may desire to get for his labor, he will work for what he can just get. He will not be put on one side on account of the price. The white man, handicapped with the responsibilities of his civilisation, the Chinaman prepared to struggle for his solitary existence—the result is inevitable; free white labor gives place to the slaves of the companies, who are prepared to work at a rate for which the white man cannot subsist, with the cheap and dirty mode of living and their capacity for living in swarms, in wretched dens, where a white man would drop if he did not suffocate."

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I hope the hon gentleman is going to make his quotation relevant to the motion.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I think you will find that it is quite relevant. The hon gentleman was stating that the present Bill did not disfranchise to any extent in British Columbia, and he had reference specially to farm laborers. I understood him to say that the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's were not correct-indeed, he said they were not true. Now, one year ago he made these remarks with reference to the Chinese, and I cannot understand how it is that a Bill which gives no vote on an income less than $400, even supposing that at a subsequent stage it should be made to embrace the wage-earner, I cannot see how the Bill would enfranchise these men in British Columbia, if, as he said at that time, Chinese labor was pressing so severely on the white labor of British Columbia that it could not compete with it. The hon, gentleman said further:

"In the Province of British Columbia, white men have had to leave on account of the Chinese monopolising the labor market. It is impossible for white labor to compete with men who work sixteen hours a day, who sleep on shelves in the shop, and who live or a little rice flavored with a chunk of pork.

I know that it is argued by some hon. getlemen that they are a necessity, that their labor is required to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mr. Speaker, I differ entirely from that view. They are not a necessity. I received a letter to-day, the contents of which I was very sorry to read; it was from one of the largest employers of labor in that Province, and he says that there are a great many men there who cannot get employment."

I am astonished to learn that in British Columbia there are a great many men who cannot get employment; and still no laborer will be enfranchised who earns less than $400 a year. I do not say it is not the case; but following the gentleman, as I did a year ago, and supporting the principle on the ground that I believed the Province was capable of judging of its local affairs for itself, I find the gentleman who proposed that measure desiring to force an unacceptable franchise on the Province I represent. I do not propose to discuss the abstract question of manhood suffrage. The United States has been referred to. I know that all the people in the United States do not approve of manhood suffrage, principally on the ground of the large immigration of persons into that country who are uneducated in the art of self-government. All here are not in favor of it; but from the expressions of opinion in my own Province, I conclude that the majority of both parties there are in favor of it, or something so near to it that it only lacks the name. in this connection I wish to enquire what objection there is to manhood suffrage that does not apply with equal force to the $2 rental suffrage. I am not making objection; I am simply pointing out that those who object to manhood suffrage have an equal ground of objection to the $2 rental franchise. Let us test it. Take the case of a man useless; he does not earn $50 a year; his wife, by hard of the objections that I urged against this Bill was that labor, supports him, and pays the $2 a month rental; he is who works every day in the year, and earns $1.25 a day, a high rate of average wages for the Dominion of Canada, and owns and occupies property of his own, which is valued at a little less than $300. He has no vote, while the other man has. That is a test of the application of one of these fancy franchises. The world is made up of details, and you have to test the thing by actual practice. I allude to this, more particularly on account of the misconception of the measure by some hon gentlemen opposite. At a previous stage of this discussion the hon member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) stated that the revising officer would not have more than 1 per cent. of the voters to deal with. Let me call his attention to the fact that about 25 per cent. of the names on the assessment roll are those of tenants. How is the revising officer to ascertain who, in the entire list of tenants on the voters' list. and on the assessment roll, are entitled to be placed on the list of voters he prepares, on the ground of paying a rental above $2 a month. To do this he has to become an assessor; he has to go to all these parties and enquire what rent they pay. Will it be said that he will send his clerk or his bailiff? Is it the clerk or the bailiff we employ to make the list? In my constituency I found on going over the voters' list that over 700 of I found, on going over the voters' list, that over 700 of those upon it were marked as tenants, which, I presume, would not be perhaps over one-half of those on the assessment roll. I refer to that as one of the practical difficulties of this measure, and an argument that may be urged in favor of the amendment proposing manhood suffrage, which would of necesity require some cheap and easy method of registration to be made of voters. Now, hon. gentlemen must not suppose that this lengthy discussion we have had on the Franchise Bill is the beginning and end of this measure. When the Bill was introduced it laid the foundation of work not only for future Sessions but for future Parliaments. At every Session of every Parliament for years and years to come we shall have the franchise question before us. Had we left the matter with the Provinces—where it ought to have been left, and where the best precedents on the face of the globe say it should have been left-we should have been relieved of this labor, had our business done, and been home long ago. But henceforth this question will be cropping up at all times, until it is finally settled by perhaps the adoption of manhood suffrage.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I rise to support the amend ment of the hon, member for Northumberland, and in doing so I fully acknowledge that the objections which have been urged against this measure from this side of the House equally apply to that amendment; but I recognise as well the fact that we are now face to face with the question, what shall be the franchise for this Dominion? This committee having refused to endorse the position taken on this side of the House, that the different local franchises in the Provinces should be the franchises for this Dominion, I think that we can travel in no better direction than that indicated in the amendment to which I have just referred. I recognise the fact that no opinion has been had throughout the country on this question; I recognise as fully as any hon, gentleman can the force of the objection, that without having the consent and sanction of our constituents to this proposition we are doing them a great injustice in supporting it. But, Sir, we are obliged to choose between alternative propositions; we are not left free to say whether we shall retain the franchises that now exist in the different Provinces or not, but we have to decide whether we shall have a franchise such as is proposed in this Bill or accept that proposed in the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). One the amendment before us. I have other reasons, that may it involved so many different propositions that it became a full-fledged voter. In the same town is a wage-earner exceedingly complicated. There is no one feature which can be more strongly urged on the attention of this committee than the advantage that will result from having a plain, practicable, simple, common sense franchise for the election of members to any deliberative body. The more a franchise is complicated the greater are the difficulties that will arise in its practical working, and as between the franchise now under discussion and the amendment proposed, I say there are sufficient distinctions to warrant us, if no other reason existed, in supporting the amendment. Independent of that, we have, in the Province of Ontario, and in the Provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island as well, justification in supporting the amendment, in the fact that the people of these Provinces have endorsed franchises which are much more liberal than that proposed in this Bill. We have debated for a sufficient length of time, possibly, the question as to the relative liberality of the franchise in this Bill and that lately adopted in the Province of Ontario, and it is not my desire, at this particular juncture, to enter into that phase of the case more in detail; but I say that the fact of the existence of more liberal franchises in the Provinces I have mentioned is an additional justification for supporting the amendment. If I were left free to choose the franchise that I consider most suitable to the requirements of the Province from which I come, I would prefer that recently adopted by the Ontario Legislature as the more suitable. Why? Because it has been recently adopted by the majority in that Legislature. Because it has been adopted in the face of an amendment supported by gentlemen representing the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which was similar to that embraced in the amendment of the hor, member for Northumberland, dealing with manhood suffrage. Consequently, whatever may be my own personal feelings on that question, I concede at once that the decision of the Ontario Legislature determines, to my mind, what Ontario desires as her franchise; but the recent determination of that Province indicates with equal distinctness that they do not want to travel backward in the direction of restricting the franchise. Their recent legislation has been very materially in the direction of extending it, and I say that every hon. gentlemen here, from Ontario, at least, ought to recognise the action of the deliberative Assembly of that Province, and ought to allow that action to influence him in determining here what the franchise should be. I have said that another objection against the franchise proposed in this Bill is the fact that it is involved and complicated, and that as between it and the one embraced in the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland there is a decided advantage in the latter. We know how many difficulties arise in the administration of a franchise law at any election. My experience may not be a very extended one, but it is sufficiently large to warrant me in saying that there is always a good deal of difficulty in determining any act of Parliament dealing with the franchise, and that difficulty is proportionate to the number of franchises that are created. When there are real property franchises, household franchises, and such others as are created by this Bill, the result necessarily follows that the different men charged with making out the voters' lists, under this Bill, will construe its provisions differently. I am aware that the same objection will apply to the franchises in the majority of the Provinces, but the fact has to be recognised, that these are the franchises of the Provinces, and that by adopting the franchise proposed in this Bill we duplicate that difficulty. Those facts furnish a good and sufficient reason, to my mind, why, if we abandon the principle that has been already urged but refused to be

be considered personal to myself, why I believe the franchise should be broadened in the direction suggested in the amend-Within the years that would have elapsed from the birth of a young man until he is entitled to vote, supposing he were of age and was going to vote this year, the different Provinces of the Dominion have spent something in the neighborhood of $167,000,000 in educating the youth of the country. Now, we have heard a good deal said about franchises based upon property, based on some consideration or other looking in that direction. But I ask you if it is not a matter of considerable consequence to us to bear in mind the fact I have stated, the fact that we have, within the years during which a young man would have lived to entitle him to vote, spent on education a sum nearly equal to what we are given to understand approaches the net amount of our national debt to day. That being the case, these young men who have had a share in that expenditure, who have acquired a property in the disbursement of that, should be recognised in any franchise that is to be adopted by this House. A man paying $4 a month rent will earn, if he spends all he earns, an income of about $256 a year. I base that estimate on what I think will be admitted as a very general experience, that house rent represents about one-seventh of a man's average expenses. Then, the man who pays $2 a month rental would not have been more than half the earnings of the man who gets $390 a year, and yet the man who pays $2 a month rent will have the franchise, while the man getting less than $400 a year income will not have a vote. The proposed franchise is illogical, and the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland is preferable to it. In dealing with a question of this kind we cannot forget the circumstances of the country contiguous to us, and there we know manhood suffrage practically prevails. The hon. member for Cardwell stated that the franchise would be materially enlarged in the Province of Quebec by this Bill, but if that is a justification for supporting the Bill, is it not an equally good reason for adopting a still more liberal franchise in other Provinces where the present franchise is broader? The Toronto Globe the officials in Boston, Lowell, sent circulars to St. Louis, Pittsburg, Louisville, and other cities in the United States, asking for information in reference to the prevailing franchise for municipal purposes. In answer to the question whether the citizens would favor giving the vote to property owners or a vote representing property, the answer invariably was "by no means," and in one case the answer given was, "every man in this country is a sovereign, though poor as a church mouse." In Boston and Lowell the qualification for the franchise for municipal purposes was citizenship, sixty days' residence, with the payment of some one tax, no matter how small, and the ability to read and write. It is possible that a franchise of that character is the truly equitable one. We recognise the value of intelligence as a factor in the creation of the franchise, and it is possible that that is the closest approach to a purely correct franchise. We are now confined, however, to two propositions, and we have to determine whether we will accept the very limited franchise proposed in this Bill or the more liberal franchise which I have announced myself to be in favor of. There is an additional reason why we should follow the more liberal franchise in preference to the restricted franchise proposed in this Bill, and that is that as electoral corruption is lessened the wider the franchise is made. I sincerely believe that the greater the number of those to whom we give the right to vote the more difficult it will be to influence the election by means of corrupt practices. We are aware that one of the strongest reasons for the adoption of the Franchise Bill in England, in 1832, was the scandals of Old Sarum, and some other constituencies in that country, which led public opinion strongly in the direction, not only of wiping out the pocket boroughs, but in the direction of an statement he refers to? Mr. CAMEBON (Middlesex).

enlarged franchise as well. Another reason for broadening the franchise in that country was that it would materially lessen corruption in elections. Now, we ought to keep in view the same reason as applicable to our circumstances. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are, no doubt, sincerely desirous, unless personal interest sways them too strongly, of seeing the will of the people prevail. Well, Sir, if that is the case, their will is much more likely to prevail where the constituency is sufficiently large to have all interests represented, and to prevent the successful operation of corrupt influences. I believe that if our franchise is broadened in the direction suggested by the amendment, it will afford additional security against electoral corruption. It has been well said that where a man has no particular interest you will generally find that he will determine on the side of what is right; and in sitting here and thinking over the circumstances, not as they may apply to ourselves, when we are in the heat of a contest, but as they may apply to others who will succeed us, we shall see in a factor of this kind an additional reason for adopting the amendment. Now, one gentleman who spoke in favor of the English Bill in the British Parliament urged its adoption on the ground that it would admit men to the exercise of the dearest right of a freeman, who would, in consequence, feel the added responsibilities that were imposed by the Act. In doing so he used this language: (The hon. gentleman read an extract). I believe that in admitting as many of our people as possible to the exercise of that right we are giving an assurance for the continued progress of this country, such as no other Act of ours could confer, and therefore I shall vote in favor of the amendment of the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I rise to make a few remarks, in consequence of some misstatements, which have been made by some hon, gentlemen opposite. The hon, member for East Lambton (Mr. Fairbank) referred to a matter in which he showed his ignorance, because it his no reference whatever to the Bill before the House. He referred to a speech which was made in this House last year on the Chinese question, when I stated that a number of men in Victoria were unable to get employment. That might very well be, and yet not be an argument against these men having the franchise. The men I referred to came to the Province at that particular season and could not get employment just then, and they had to leave, and so were not residents of the Province. Now, he also made reference to what I said last evening in answer to the hon. member for Queen's, P.E I. (Mr. Davies). I simply corrected that hon. gentleman for making misstatements on the matter which had been before this House, statements which had been made by other hon, gentlemen opposite and which had been already corrected. I thought it was very unbecoming the hon. gentleman to repeat a statement which he must have known to have been incorrect.

Mr. DAVIES. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is distinctly out of order in imputing to me the making of a statement which I knew to be incorrect.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. No, Sir what I said was—

Mr. DAVIES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.
Mr. CHAIRMAN. The hon. gentleman has a right to explain what he did say.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. What I said was this: I think the hon. gentleman must have understood that that statement had been made before, and it was very unfair for him to make a statement which had already been corrected, and which he must have known was incorrect.

Mr. DAVIES. Will the hon, gentleman explain what statement he refers to?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I refer to your statement that this Franchise Bill before the House would disfranchise a large number of people in British Columbia.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman will see that I made no special reference to British Columbia in the connection in which I spoke of the disfranchising clause of that Bill.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE, Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. I said, in my remarks to which he takes exception, that this Franchise Bill would disfranchise a certain number of farm servants in this country. When I made that statement the hon. gentleman corrected me and said "no," and he kept repeating "no," evidently under the impression that I had confined my remarks to British Columbia. I made no special reference to British Columbia at all; I was speaking of the farm servants of Canada.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I am under the impression and belief that the hon. gentleman mentioned in his speech British Columbia; hence I interrupted him.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon, gentleman is wrong.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The Hansard will prove it tomorrow.

Mr. DAVIES. The Hansard is out now; I have it here' Mr. WOODWORTH. Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman opposite, the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Woodworth), has no right whatever to interrupt an hon, member without rising from his seat and stating the point of order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon, member for King's has a right to say "order" when an hon, member is out of order; and the hon, member for West Huron has just shown his unacquaintance with the rules of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We want your ruling on the point, Mr. Chairman. No member sitting in his seat has a right to interrupt another hon, member.

Mr. WOODWORTH. That is not the question. The hon. member for West Huron, with an unfairness all his

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I repeat, with an unfairness all his own, puts to the Chairman a question that is not before the Chair, and that is, whether a member has a right to interrupt another hon. member. That is not the question. The question is, whether a member in his seat has a right to say "order" when another member is out of order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question, as I understand it, is whether the hon. member for King's was in order in calling from his seat, "order, order." That is frequently done, and is in order. If an hon, member wants to take a point of order it is his duty to rise and state the point of order; but the hon, member for West Huron said the hon, gentleman had no right to interrupt another hon member. If an hon. member was doing that he was out of order.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I rise to refer to some remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to the Province of British Columbia. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) stated a few days ago, in his speech, that the members for British Columbia were bartering away the rights of the people of that Province by supporting this measure. I should like to know how we are bartering away the rights of the people of that Province? Has the hon. gentleman been over there; if not, where has he obtained his information which led him to make such a statement? That statement is incorrect. The Franchise Bill now before the committee, to my own knowledge, will Columbians were opposed to that.

not disfranchise any man who works in the districts which I represent-not a single man. And yet the hon. gentlemen, who know nothing of the circumstance of that Province, have the audacity to rise in this House, one after another, after they have been corrected, and state that we are bartering away the rights of the people and disfranchising those who voted for us at the last election. I say we are not. The hon. member for North York also stated that we gave our assent to the Bill because Chinese are not to have votes. How does that hon, gentleman know that? Who gave him that information? That statement is incorrect, every word of it. That hon, gentleman also stated that we applied to the First Minister to have the Bill amended so that Indians could not vote. Who gave the hon, gentleman that information? That is incorrect, every word of it. We have never applied to the Premier to change the Bill in that particular; and yet we are to sit here and listen to such statements, made by hon gentle-men opposite, without the statements being answered. Not only the member for North York, but other members opposite, have made similar statements. The hon. member for West Huron yesterday repeated the statement, that this Franchise Bill would disfranchise a large number of electors in British Columbia. He was told it would not; but he repeated it three times. How did the hon, gentleman get that information? Surely the representatives of the Province ought to know whether this Bill will disfranchise any voters or not better than those who have never been in the Province. The hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) stated, in reply to what I said, that I had not the moral courage to rise and state my views. I would be very sorry to have the cheek and audacity that some hon. gentlemen opposite have, to rise, day after day and night after night, and obstruct the business of this House, talking sheer nonsense, not for the purpose of obtaining information, not for the purpose of enlightening members of this House, but for the purpose of killing time.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Question.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. We have had to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite, who have done nothing but talk for the sake of killing time.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Question.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. There are some very fine men on the opposite side of the House, and for some of them I have very great respect, but they have got into very bad company.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I find an article in a paper edited by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I am told the hon. gentleman wrote the article, from which I am going to read, while sitting in this House. In referring to the members for British Columbia the article says: "They are opposed to the enfranchisement of the Chinese and the enfranchisement of the Indians." Who told the hon gentleman that we are opposed to the enfranchisement of the Indians. Did any member for British Columbia state that in this House? Not one. We are not opposed to it; we are in favor of it. We have never asked that they shall not be enfranchised.

An hon, MEMBER. He will write it to-morrow, all the

Mr. SHAKESPEARE, The article further says: "Upon both these points the Government have yielded to their representation." These statements are incorrect.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman asks me a question. He asks me who gave me that information, that British Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon, gentleman objects-

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The article continues: "But British Columbia members continue to vote that Indians shall have the franchise in the other Provinces." Certainly we do. But we do not do, as the hon. gentleman said we did, ask that they shall not have the franchise in our Province. I believe in doing what is right to every one—I would advise the hon, gentleman to do as Shakespeare said, "tell the truth and shame the devil." He says: "These men are determined to impose on the other Provinces a franchise which they are not willing to accept themselves." Sir, that is not correct; it is not true. I am not at all surprised, if that is the course which gentlemen opposite have pursued in the past—making such misstatements from day to day—I am not at all surprised that they have been in the cold shades of Opposition for so many years, and I can tell hon. gentlemen that if they continue the course they have been pursuing they will ever remain there. I had no intention of saying so much as I have said, but I simply intended to rise to correct the misstatements which have been made in regard to the representatives of that Province, and the effect the franchise will have on the people of that Province.

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will inform the committee, before he takes his seat, how many Indians in British Columbia vote now-whether the law in British Columbia allows the Indians to vote?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. They are not allowed to vote at any election, but this idea of raising provincial rights in connection with this Franchise Bill is to me simply so much clap-trap, because there is no question of provincial rights in the matter at all. It does not belong to the Provinces—it is a right belonging to this House. We are here to legislate for the Dominion and not for any particular Province. We should have a franchise of our own, and we should not be dictated to by some subordinate body, as has been the case in Ontario and Nova Scotia, we may be elected on one franchise to-day and to-morrow we would be at sea. We would not know upon what franchise we would have to be elected. So far as the Indians in British Columbia are concerned, though they have not the franchise at the present time, I, for one, would be glad to see them have the franchise, and as I told the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) in the corridor, when the Bill came up in the House, to my mind the clause referring to the enfranchising of the Indians was one of the most important clauses of the Bill. I believe it will be one of the grandest influences in the Dominion towards settling the disputes, the difficulties and the claims they may have, to allow these men to have votes, so that they would have some person or persons to look after their claims and insist upon their rights.

An hon. MEMBER. What about the Chinese?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I have no doubt the day will come when the hon, gentleman will have enough of the Chinese.

Mr. TROW. It is unaccountable that the hon, gentleman should sit in his seat, night after night and week after week. and even lie on pillows, hearing these incorrect statements, and still he did not come to the defence of his own Province.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say a word with reference to the observations made by the hon, gentleman from British Columbia. He says that I have misrepresented the views of the members from British Columbia on the subject of the Indian franchise. In the first place, I did not for a moment suppose that the members from British Columbia would under-this House. The hon, gentleman knows that in his Province it is a penal offence to put the name of an Indian on the voters' list. He knows that that list is prepared for the election of members to this House as well as for the election of members to the Local Legislature. The hon, gentleman shakes his head, but how came he here? By what authority does he sit in this House?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. If you sit down I will explain it. Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman will have to keep quiet for a few moments, when he will have an opportunity of unburthening himself. The hon. gentleman says there is no list for the election of members to the House of Commons. How came he here? Is he an intruder here? Has he no business in this House? Was he not sent here by certain electors of British Columbia, and if so, how came they to be electors? The local law is the law for the election of members to this Parliament, the law which excludes Indians from the franchise and which makes it a penal offence to put the name of an Indian on the list—that is the law on which the hon. gentleman was elected to this House. Does that law express the public opinion of British Columbia? If it does not, how is it that it has continued on the Statute Book? The hon, gentleman cannot impose on this House by making clap-trap observations, such as those he has addressed to the committee. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that a representative from British Columbia, who has been quite as long in this House as he has, informed me that the members from British Columbia were opposed to granting the suffrage to the Indians. That is my authority; a gentleman who sits here as a member in this House, and was elected by a constituency in British Columbia. We have, besides that, the declaration of the First Minister-although this Bill extends the franchise to the Indians of British Columbia—that it was now his intention not to extend it to them. Is the First Minister disregarding the views of the hon. gentleman? Is the First Minister striking off the Indians in British Columbia from the classes of enfranchised persons against the wishes of the representatives of British Columbia? Is he violating this principle of uniformity which he holds so dear, which he considers of so much consequence to continue in this Bill-is he violating that principle, not only against his own convictions but against the convictions of the representatives of British Columbia? The hon, gentleman will require to make another explanation. He will require to tell the House how it is that the people of British Columbia have been so much opposed to the enfranchisement of the Indians of that Province, that they have made it a penal offence to put the names of Indians on the voters' lists, even if residing off their reservation and paying their taxes—quite as decidedly opposed as they have been opposed to putting the names of the Chinese on the lists. In the face of the statute of British Columbia, in the face of the law on which the hon. gentleman was elected to this House, how is it that he so far disregards the public opinion of the Province and the public declaration of the Prime Minister, that he declares that I have misrepresented the position of the members of British Columbia upon this question?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The hon. gentleman says he was told by some member from British Columbia, who had been in this House as long as I have. Now, Sir, that is not the question. What does he say? He says the members from British Columbia had, interviewed the Government, or the leader of the Government, and that the Government had yielded to their request. I say that is not true. Now, Sir, with regard to the Indians not having a vote in British Columbia, and as to myself being an intruder here, I am no more an intruder than the hon member for Bothwell is. I understand perfectly well that until this Parliament enacts a franchise for itself we have take to misrepresent their own Province on the floor of to be elected under the franchises of the several Provinces.

But the British North American Act gives this House the power, at any time it sees fit, to enact a franchise for itself. We are doing that to-day. Therefore, I am no intruder; I know whereof I speak; and I am responsible to my constituents and not to the hon, member for Bothwell.

Mr. PLATT. The hon, gentleman who has just taken his seat may be justified in resenting the accusation that he has bartered away the rights of his Province; that is a question which I presume he will have to explain to his constituents when he returns to them; but while he accuses members on this side of audacity, and uses other harsh terms, because they have ventured to refer to British Columbia, still, in his capacity as a member of this House, he has not hesitated to assist the Government of the day in forcing on the various Provinces of the Dominion, other than his own, a franchise which is objectionable and obnoxious to them. With regard to the amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland, I must say that the debate thus far has shown that among hon. members on this side of the House there is, on the abstract question of manhood suffrage, no concensus of opinion. It is quite evident from the tone of the debate, that the question has been forced upon the House by the Bill of the hon. First Minister. It is true many on this side have spoken in support of the amendment; but the reason generally assigned for doing so is that they have to choose between two evils. The question of manhood suffrage is rapidly forcing itself upon the attention of the people of this country, but nothing could have been done to bring it so speedily to their attention as this measure. I am not prepared to declare in favor of manhood suffrage in the Provinces; but in common with the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, I have to make a choice between a restricted franchise and an extended franchise, and I say if we are bound to make a change at all, let us extend the franchise rather than restrict it. The great argument advanced in favor of a Dominion franchise is that of uniformity; and if we are to have a uniform franchise for the Dominion, nothing short of manhood suffrage can give us anything like uniformity. It has been urged by those who have spoken on this side, and it has not been answered, that where property is made the basis of the franchise nothing like uniformity can exist. The differences of valuation in the different Provinces and in the different municipalities render uniformity in a property franchise impossible. I presume that when the hon member for Northumberland proposed this amendment he had in view both the establishment of the principle of manhood suffrage, which he seems to favor, and also the adoption of a uniform franchise, which seems to be the only ground on which he supports this Bill. Property qualification for voters is supposed to be based on the principle that the protection and security of property is the chief object of all legislative bodies; but I question whether we are here to preserve the security of property in this country any more than for the protection of labor. Is not the power to labor as much property as acquired wealth? Every person who has power to support himself and his family, who takes an interest in the affairs of the country, and bears his share of the taxes of the country, can as readily demand, at the hands of this Assembly, protection of his rights, as the man whose property consists in something else than the manner in which he is able to use his hands for the welfare of the nation and his family? If property is taken as a basis of the franchise, on the ground that it is a test of intelligence, then in this country it is an improper basis. The accumulation of wealth may, to a certain extent, indicate intelligence; in years gone by such a test might have been necessary; but at the present day, when the school-master is abroad in the land, when the press finds its way into every hamlet in this Dominion, and when so many facilities exist for education and for our people to become whether the capital of the Dominion was at Bloomfield or acquainted with the public questions of the day, it is unnecessary for us to apply any test of intelligence to voters. Besides, an extension of the franchise would necessarily reach the younger class of the community; and although the privilege might fall in the hands of some who are unable to read and write, and who are not informed, yet in general you will scarcely find a young man to whom the franchise would be given who would not be able to read and write, and form an intelligent opinion of the questions of the day. I believe that the payment of taxes into the public Treasury should be made the basis of the franchise in this or in any other country. We know that there is not a man, whom the application of man-hood suffrage would enfranchise, who is not a tax-payer in every sense of the word. That might not be the case if we were regulating a municipal franchise or a provincial franchise, in the case where direct taxation is imposed; but when we are regulating a franchise for the Dominion and making taxation or the payment of revenue a basis, every man in this country should be enfranchised, because every man is a tax-payer. In support of that opinion, I refer you, Sir, to the remarks of the right hon. the First Minister, when he was addressing the committee on this subject. He then gave us to understand, with reference to the Indians, that it would be an inhuman thing and an unheard of thing to deprive the Indians of the franchise, because they paid taxes into the coffers of the country, since they bought taxed goods and paid excise on the whiskey they consumed, and so forth; therefore, he said, they should be enfranchised. I will read the hon, gentleman's remarks. They are to be found in the Hansard of 30th April:

"We are actuated, I believe, by the same desire to give British subjects, red or white, if they have the property qualification, the right to vote as such. The Indian contributes to the revenue just as well as the white man. He buys taxed goods, he wears taxed clothes, he drinks taxed tea, or perhaps excised whiskey, just as well as the white man; and according to the Liberal principle, we are to have taxation without representation in the case of the poor Indian."

Then he goes on to say:

"How hon, gentlemen opposite would exclaim against the crushing tyranny of depriving a man who contributes to the revenue of the right to vote for representatives in Parliament; we should hear the Liberal drum rub-a-dub dubbing round the country that here was an instance of oppression and tyranny—here, in a country that boasts of representative institutions; here under a Superintendent General who said, in England, that his party drew their inspirations from England, that I imposed taxation on men and then deprived them of representation."

If because the untutored Indian pays taxes into the coffers of this country he is to be given a vote, why, in the name of common sense, should not the laboring class, who pay taxes into the Dominion Treasury and are subject to all the laws of the land, be deprived of that right? Are not the wage-earning classes as well fitted to exercise it as the Indians on the reserve? The hon, gentleman is making a distinction between the Indian and the laboring classes of this country, and he prefers the Indian. I cannot better illustrate the position I take than by repeating to this committee what an old farmer told me a few days ago, and no doubt every hon, gentleman who has visited his home and talked to any of his constituents has heard many similar comments. I was asked by an old and wealthy farmer of my constituency whether the Indians on the reserves were to be enfranchised, and I told him what the First Minister had stated. "Well," said he, "that is one part of the Bill, at any rate, that all reasonable men must be opposed to. So far as I can learn the wage-earners of the country are not to be enfranchised;" and then he proceeded to give his illustration of the absurdity of this measure. "Last summer," said he, "I had working for me on my farm an Indian from one of the adjacent reserves; he proved to be a worthless creature, was drunk whenever he could get the chance, and as for public matters, did not know the difference between the town council and the Parliament of Canada, or at Ottawa. I had to dismiss him in the middle of the summer, and he went back to the reserve, where I suppose he gets drunk as often as he can get whiskey. This summer I have employed a young man, the son of a poor man, to be sure, who works for me by the year at $15 a month. He is an intelligent, bright youth, takes two newspapers, and is better up on public questions than I am; yet this Bill will disfranchise this young man and give the franchise to the Indian I had to discharge." Now, I think that is the position in which this question stands before the House to day. If we are to enfranchise everybody, except the wage-earning class, why not enfranchise them as well? And if they are enfranchised, no class will be excluded, so that we might as well accept the amendment and establish manhood suffrage, the more especially as it will only require very simple machinery to set it in operation. I would like to ask hon. members opposite to explain what classes of the community they are desirous of depriving of the franchise, what class they are afraid of? Is it the wage-earning class? If so, let them acknowledge it and give us some reason for the exclusion of this class. They have seen fit to extend the franchise to those who are considered the most degraded and ignorant of our population; then, why debar any class of that right? If we are to have a Dominion franchise, uniform in all its features and extending as far as possible, give us manhood suffrage and provide suitable machinery to carry it into effect. All these circumstances justify me in concluding, in concurrence with the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, that if hon. gentlemen opposite were left free to vote in accordance with their consciences they would vote for the amendment.

Mr. MULOCK. The junior member for Victoria (Mr. Baker), after a good deal of reflection and time, has referred to a debate that took place in this House the 8th of this month. If he will look at the debate he will find that the reference I made to the members for British Columbia on that occasion and the charge I made against them was that they were said to have agreed to disfranchise a certain number of the citizens of British Columbia. That was the statement I made, and the hon gentleman asks me what my authority is for that. I read my authority to the committee at that time and I will not again trouble the committee with reading it; but, for the hon. gentleman's information, I will tell him that my authority way the public press. I read to the committee on that occasion an extract from the Montreal Herald, which purported to give an account of the transaction as I gave it. That account stated that at a meeting of the Conservative representatives in this House the Premier stated that the members from British Columbia had assented to his Bill, although it disfranchised a few of the citizens of that Province. That statement received publicity, and was brought to the notice of hon. gentlemen within a very short time after it was published, and it has never yet been denied. It has been stated, and not contradicted, that the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia have given their sanction to a Bill which will disfranchise a certain number of the citizens of that Province, by whose votes they sit in the House to-day.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Hon gentlemen from British Columbia are in the habit of saying "no, no," but they do not venture to give an argument. A mere denial proves nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. If it is "no," I ask them to get up and state that the report in the Montreal Herald is incorrect, which says that the effect of this Bill will be to disfranchise a certain number of people in British Columbia. It has Mr. PLATT.

disprove that statement. What is the position of the members from British Columbia on this Bill? The hon, member for Victoria spoke of them as "we," assuming to be the mouthpiece of the members from that Province. When he came to the Indian question he also said "we," but when called to question on that point he said that, speaking for himself at least, he was in favor of the enfranchisement of the Indians in British Columbia. Is he going to support a Bill which does not enfranchise the Indians in British Columbia? What are the members from British Columbia in favor of and what are they not in favor of? The Bill originally contained the enfranchisement of the Chinese, and yet they voted for it on the second reading, with all its imperfections. Did they rise then and defend the interests of their Province? No; British Columbia to-day stands without a defender. I think the committee has reason to be grateful to the hon. member for Northumberland for having made this motion. He saw that this Bill contained most objectionable features: he saw that the people took different views as to the propriety of adopting it; he conceived that it was not in the interests of the country that a measure of such importance, and to which there was so much objection by a large portion of the community, should be forced upon an unwilling public, and he therefore proposed this amendment which, in his opinion, would solve the problem. I was not at one time in favor of manhood suffrage for Canada and would not vote for it now except in order to prevent a bad measure being placed upon our Statute Book; but when we look at that principle and become more familiar with it, we find that it has been adopted in every Province of Canada. In Prince Edward Island, the principle of manhood suffrage prevail. The same principle, I believe, prevails in British Columbia and in Manitoba, while in Ontario manhood suffrage prevails to day to a certain extent. In the Province of Quebec, and I believe also in New Scotia and in New Brunswick, we have the principle of manhood suffrage recognised to a certain extent, and it is a new feature that something in regard to which the Provinces have shown their approval protanto should be disregarded. The tendency in modern times has been to depart from the property qualification and approach to manhood suffrage. In early days, in England, there were no easy means of communicating between one country and another; the only property which added dignity to a man was real estate, and the feudal system prevailed, and there may have been a reason for making the franchise depend, at that time, on the ownership of real property. But as wealth increased, as the means for the interchange of ideas increased, we find a new kind of property springing up, personal property, and so, step by step, we have found that, whilst real estate has never ceased to furnish a qualification whereby to enfranchise an elector, yet other classes of property have been also considered proper subjects of qualification. We meet this proposition with a certain degree of prejudice, no doubt. But, I ask, what harm has been done by the extension of the franchise to its present degree? It is within the memory of hon, gentlemen in this House when real estate formed the only basis of qualification. Has the State suffered anything because another class of property has received equal importance? It is but a few years since manhood suffrage, to a certain extent, was introduced into the Province of Ontario. Has Ontario suffered anything in any respect by that system?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is very unfair for hon. gentlemen to interrupt the speaker in this way. We know we are a minority in this House who are in favor of manbeen stated by the Prime Minister himself that this will be hood suffrage, but I think it is a matter of fair play that the the effect of this Bill, and merely to say "no, no" does not gentlemen who are making these noises should give the minority an opportunity of being heard. If order is maintained we will very likely get a vote in half an hour.

Mr. MULOCK. When we find that representative institutions have not suffered in those countries where the franchise has been extended, I think we should have no hesitation in going forward in the same direction. Now, what danger is there in adopting manhood suffrage? What is the experience of other countries? Take the great United States, to the south of us. A liberal franchise has existed there since the commencement of that nation. The moment a man lands in the United States and has resided there long enough to be naturalised he enters into the full enjoyment of the rights of citizenship; and the result is, that if we can believe the utterances of the press and statesmen of the United States, there is a national spirit in that country; every man feels that he has a voice in the government of the country. If we take our own Dominion, what has been our experience? Take the Province of British Columbia, a Province that sends to this House such representatives as we find here. Take the Province of Prince Edward Island. Have either of these Provinces suffered from the system of manhood suffrage? Has any country suffered under that system? Can any hon. gentleman point to any country in the world, where representative institutions exists, based on manhood suffrage, and show any evil that has arisen therefrom? Surely we have nothing to fear. There is no evidence that in an intelligent country like Canada, with a stable and loyal population, we have any reason to apprehend the slightest danger from adopting this liberal principle. Observe the inconsistencies a restricted franchise leads us to. Here we have a proposal to enfranchise the Indian because he has a house over his head, and in the same Bill it is proposed to disfranchise the teacher because he does not own the house he lives in. There are armies of men engaged in the various professions of this country between the two oceans who will have no vote under this Bill. Is it a reasonable thing for us deliberately to enfranchise the untutored Indian and to disfranchise the teaching profession of this country? See what inconsistencies an arbitrary principle like this leads to. In view of such inconsistencies and absurdities, I think it becomes us to enquire whether we cannot adopt a system that is founded on a more reasonable basis. Now, what is the object of giving a man a vote? Is it not that he shall exercise that power for the common good? Is it not that he may have a voice in making the laws that are to govern all? The interest of the State is the sole interest, and each individual in the State suffers or profits by the result of his vote. Now, in what class of people is that power likely to be the safest? Is it necessarily the safest with those who have to own property worth $150 or $200? In these days, when education is so general, when we have half a million children attending the public schools in Ontario alone, and when that has been the system for the last twenty years, is there any reason in telling the people of Ontario to-day that they are not sufficiently intelligent to exercise the franchise? What is it that awakens in a man the highest feeling of love to his country? Is it the bit of property that he owns? True, he can say of that property: This is my home—my castle. But, above all that, does he not feel, when exercising the franchise, that his citizenship is recognised that he, by his vote, aids the state, and that in return it affords him protection. If patriotism, if love of country, is promoted by intelligence and education, then intelligent men ought to be considered in a measure of this kind. For these reesons I am an entire convert, under the circumstances, to the amendment of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and I thank him for having given us the opportunity of discussing it. On this question, at least, harmoniously and agreeably as those who wish well to I trust there is no party spirit involved. The last speaker the United States could have desired. The great war who spoke on this side was against the amendment, and some hon. members opposite are against it. I, for one, offer my tribute to the member for Northumberland for having endeavored, at this crisis, to solve this problem on a basis so fair and just, and so well calculated to promote the best interests of the country.

Mr. DAWSON. The question of universal suffrage is one on which members must naturally desire to record their opinions. For my part, I think the country is hardly ripe for such a sweeping measure. I think this Bill goes quite far enough in the extension of the franchise for the present. As to the future, we cannot say what it may bring forth. I have listened very attentively to the arguments brought forward in favor of universal or manhood suffrage, without being impressed in its favor. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made a very eloquent speech on the subject, and fortified what he said by the examples of other countries. But some of the authorities he referred to were not, I think, so eloquent in arguing that point as were the writings of the Chartists in England many years ago. They dwelt very much on the inalienable rights of man, and that the suffrage should be universal; and though great strides have been made in England since that time, in the direction of universal suffrage, they have not got quite there yet. I hope the day is very far distant in Canada when we will come to such We have heard hon, gentlemen become very eloquent as to the extension of the suffrage, as it will affect the farmers of the country. I hope the farmers throughout the Dominion will consider well to what such a measure as universal suffrage would lead us. A farmer, when he has the suffrage, possesses a farm and a house, and his vote represents property. Extend the frachise and give it in the cities, where tens of thousands of people, under manhood suffrage, would exercise it, and the effect would be to swamp the votes of the farmers and the pioneers who have built up this country. A year's residence by foreigners or by navvies working on the railways would enable them to have votes. Members of the Opposition say the navvy has as great an interest in the country as anyone. Go and tell the farmers that those laborers, who have no stake in the country, have as great an interest in the country as they, the farmers, have, and that the franchise should be conferred upon them, and what will be the effect on the farming interest? Take 1,000 farmers, and consider what they represent. They represent a large amount of property. Take 1,000 laborers who would be enfranchised under the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and what do they represent? Their interests may possibly be antagonistic to the country; and under these circumstances the farmers have a right to be protected to the extent they are at present. It is rather singular to see how this idea of manhood suffrage has taken hold of members of the Opposition. There has hardly been a word said about Indian suffrage during this discussion. Would this universal suffrage extend to the Indians, or would there be a special clause depriving the Indians of this manhood suffrage? The amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) would have the effect of giving the Indian a vote as well as the white man. You would have to make it general; you could scarcely do otherwise. A good deal has been said about the working of universal suffrage in the United States. I do not think that should be taken altogether as an example. The circumstances of the United States have been very peculiar, and the century during which universal suffrage has been in operation is but a short time in the life of a nation. As regards the United States, we do not know what this universal suffrage may bring forth in the future. It has not always worked so had the effect of enfranchising four millions of negroes under manhood suffrage. Should we deny it to the educated Indian, when the United States gave it to four millions of illiterate negroes? Are we, in Canada, to adopt the system which has certainly not worked there with such satisfaction as is generally supposed. The United States have prospered under their system of government, among other reasons, because they have had immense tracts of unoccupied land, where the population could spread out and not be crowded, and the States now form a very rich country. A great deal of anxiety has been manifested about the volunteers. We have been asked: Would you deprive the gallant defenders of our country of the vote-which it is said this Bill will do. I do not think it will do so. But a great point is supposed to be made out of this. I happened to read in a paper—the idea is not original with myself-a much more reasonable way of recognising the volunteers' services than by adopting universal suffrage. The article conveys an idea that could be very reasonably acted upon, and it is this:

"All of the volunteers who have gone there are delighted with the country, and there can be little doubt of many of them remaining there as settlers. Having regard to the public spirited manner in which they responded to the Government's call, and the splendid courage and dash they have shown throughout the campaign, we should hope that the Government would present each one of them with a prairie farm; and it would be a most fortunate thing for the North-West and the Dominion if the man who as callently rushed to the assistance of their country. if the men who so gallantly rushed to the assistance of their country were to become permanent settlers in the North-West. This is the kind of loyal spirit and blood that the North-West needs, and the location of several thousands of these young men there would be a loyal influence that would be a guarantee of future peace."

Mr. MITCHELL. From what paper is that article?

Mr. DAWSON. It is from a paper called the Montreal Herald. That is a capital idea, and will be a much more satisfactory way of dealing with the volunteers than by establishing universal suffrage, in order that they may have the franchise. The hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in his speech, spoke a good deal of the franchise as it existed among the Romans. It certainly did not extend very far in ancient Rome; but there was a system which existed extensively, and that was the system of military colonies. We might have military colonies in the North-West, by establishing some of our volunteers there, and doubtless they would form a very loyal community. In the district which I have the honor to represent we have had household suffrage, and it has worked remarkably well since the district had the privilege of sending members to this House. Many people there have examined this Bill very carefully, in order to asertain whether it would extend or curtail the franchise, and they all agreed that it would make exceedingly little difference; that there was hardly a householder in Algoma but would have a right to vote; in fact, every householder who had a right to vote at present would have a right to vote under this Bill, and it was perfectly satisfactory to them. The experience I have had of the household franchise leads me to believe that it would be far more advantageous to the country, and that it would work far better at all events in the country districts and be much more desirable than universal suffrage.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the hon, gentleman who has just sat down on one or two points. The hon, gentleman has called attention to what he is pleased to refer to as an inconsistency in the amendment which I have proposed to the Bill. Then, in dealing with the question of manhood suffrage, he says we have heard little else but manhood suffrage; we have heard would have the effect of giving the suffrage to the Indians, if I understood him aright. Sir, if I recollect the position taken by the hon. gentleman at an early stage of this dis-Mr. DAWSON.

He would give the suffrage to those thousands of roaming tribes in the west, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and still he refuses the white men, those very volunteers to whom he has referred, who have gone to defend their country, to put down rebellion in the great West—he would refuse those men the right to vote, and yet he would give it to these Indians. Sir, I would tell my hon. friend that the amendment which I have had the honor to propose does not admit the Indians to the right to vote, as he assumes it does. Indians who are civilised and settled, Indians who have assumed a postion in society or in the community such as white men postion in society or in the community, such as white men have assumed, and such as entitle white men to vote, would also have the right to vote. There is no exclusion of the Indian because of his race, or his blood, but it is because of his condition, his want of intelligence, his want of assimilation to the usages of civilised society in which he happens to be placed. I would not give the Indians who have not taken that position the right to vote, but I would give to every one who has assumed the same position as the white man, who places himself in the position to contribute towards the revenues of the country, towards maintaining the institutions of the country—I would give those Indians the right to vote, but I would not give it to the numberless tribes which my hon friend, in an earlier portion of this discussion, claimed had the right to vote.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as to my position with regard to the Indian.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, my hon. friend has chosen to refer to the fact that the country was not ripe for manhood suffrage, and he hoped it would be a long time before he would see manhood suffrage adopted as the principle of election in Canada. Sir, in what position does he stand here to-day? Is it not patent to everyone that in the election which resulted in the hon, gentleman occupying a place in this House these very railway pavvies, to whom he refers, came down by the carloads and voted for my hon. friend.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman is entirely misinformed as to there having been carloads of navvies who came down to vote for me. That was a ridiculous story got up at the time, before the railway was finished, and it was given out here by an abandoned man, that the navvies had come down from Rat Portage to Port Arthur to vote for me. No train had gone over that portion of the road when that story was got up. I did not require navvies to come to vote for me, for in every little hamlet, every village and place in me, for in every little namet, every vinage and phace in Algoma, with few exceptions, I had majorities. I had majorities in forty-five polling places, and I did not require to resort to any such means. With regard to my position with respect to the Indians, I took the position that our Act should be assimilated with some amendment to the law in existence in Ontario. was the position which I took, and I have an amendment on the Paper which shows my position. As to depriving the volunteers of a vote, as the hon gentleman suggested just now, I suggested or said nothing of the kind. Instead of depriving them of votes, I said they should each and all not only have a vote, but further that a lot of land in the North-West should be granted to the gallant defenders of the country. I cannot allow any hon, gentleman to so far misunderstand me as to say that I spoke in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon friend has made a second speech, and he has corrected himself. I am bound to take his explanation with regard to what he said about the nothing about the Indians, and he says that this amendment | volunteers. Does he mean to imply that I was wrong in assuming that he was opposed to manhood suffrage? Does not everybody know that the class of men who have gone to the North-West within the last few weeks, to fight for cussion, he was in favor of giving the Indians the suffrage, and defend their country and put down rebellion, that a large number of them are men who have not the property qualification contained in this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen say no; I say yes. Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no. Yes, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say that large numbers of them have not; and if that is so, do I understand from the hon. gentleman that he is willing to give to those volunteers who have shown their manhood and love of country and bravery, which does credit to themselves and this countrydoes he mean to say that he will admit these men to the suffrage, whether they have the property or not, whether they have the income or not, that is required by this Bill? If he does, then I am glad to class him among the defenders of the principle which I have advanced in this amendment, and in which I believe. Sir, with regard to the position which the hon, gentleman took in relation to the Indians, I may have misunderstood him, or the hon, gentleman may have changed the position he took at that time; but I am glad to know that he does not advocate extending the franchise to the Indians, except, as I stated, when they occupy positions which entitle white men to vote, and that then he would be willing that the vote should be given to the Indian. I wish to observe, with regard to the question of the navvies who, it was reported, came down by hundreds to vote for the hon. gentleman, that all I can say is, that that was a statement extensively circulated through the press of this country, and believed. It was pretty generally circulated at the time that my hon. friend's large majority was enhanced very materially by that class of voters-voters on manhood suffrage alone. The hon gentleman says that is untrue. I am bound to accept his explanation; and therefore I withdraw that part of my remarks; but I was going to observe, in relation to it, that I am sorry it is not true, and for this reason: That if that class of men could make a selection like my hon, friend, who brings so much information and intelligence to bear on every question on which he addresses the House, I say it is but another evidence to show how important it is that we should extend the suffrage to that class of people.

Mr. JENKINS. I am in favor of manhood suffrage, and from an experience of over thirty years of that system in Prince Edward Island I am satisfied that the fears expressed by some hon, gentlemen, that the manhood suffrage vote would swamp the vote of property holders, is a theory which has no foundation. Property holders and the employers of labor will always, unquestionably, to a great extent, affect the votes of those they employ. I have no doubt that the experience of Prince Edward Island has been that property holders and employers always have an influence on the votors on manhood suffrage. Under this suffrage people are clevated, and the privilege is looked upon with great favor. They esteem it very highly. But I feel that I cannot support the amendment of the hon. gentleman, for this reason: that it is very well known that in many of the Provinces manhood suffrage is not looked on with favor. In Quebec, it is very well known, the feeling against manhood suffrage is almost unanimous.

Mr. DAVIES. It has not been expressed in this House. Mr. JENKINS. Well, the feeling in Quebec is well known to be against it; in the Legislature of Ontario a vote has been recorded against it; and in Nova Scotia, when the Conservative Government, many years ago, brought in a Bill establishing manhood suffrage, a Liberal Government which succeeded abolished it. Therefore I do not think I should be right in giving a vote to force manhood suffrage course of time, and when the people see the advantages of tell us coolly that they are prepared to withhold that prinmanhood suffrage, it will become the suffrage of this Dominion; but until the people of the different Provinces are educated up to it, I think it would be injudicious and unwise, on the part of this House, to force manhood suffrage upon those Provinces. Therefore, I shall vote against the

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not exactly understand the reasoning of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. Because one of the Provinces of the Dominion, he says, is opposed to the principle of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Northumberland, although he thinks it is a true principle, a good thing and a just thing, yet he will sacrifice his own views, and the interests of his constituents, and the views held by his own Province, a Province having the same provincial rights—he will sacrifice all that in order to please the sentiment which he says prevails in another Province. That is a great piece of self-sacrifice. That is really a position which, in one acting for his own interests, might be commended; but when one is in the position of having the interests of his Province com-mitted to his hands, I do not know that one is to be as generous with trusts committed to him by others as with his own. Therefore, I cannot see the position the hon. gentleman takes to be a good one. Nor can I understand, from what has taken place in this House, that the Province of Quebec, to which he has made allusion, is opposed to the principle of manhood suffrage. I have noticed that the representatives of the Province of Quebec at the back of the hon. First Minister-and they comprise, I think, nearly three-fourths of all the representatives from that Provincehave, as far as I could judge, wholly and unreservedly endorsed the principles of this Bill. They have been among the strongest advocates and supporters and defenders of the

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). They have a right to; it is their privilege.

Mr. PATERSON. I thought that it was the First Minister who was speaking, or I would not have paused. They had a perfect right to do so; but finding them defenders of this Bill, the main defence of which is the principle of uniformity in the franchise in all the Provinces, I cannot see any evidences from the hon, gentlemen opposite representing Quebec that Quebec Province is opposed to the principle of manhood suffrage. By their votes and their declarations they say we want this uniform franchise; and having said that, they are prepared to accept the consequences. They have not expressed any dread that a franchise might this year or in any subsequent year prevail in this House that they are opposed to. They have not stipulated that manhood suffrage should be a tabooed subject for all time to come; they know, as well as any member of the House knows, that if we pass a Franchise Bill the franchise there laid down and the qualifications therein established may not remain so for more than one year. They must know, as an almost absolute certainty, that in every succeeding year there will be amendments and alterations proposed in this Franchise Bill; and they have declared that they are willing to take all those risks. It really, I think, should not concern the representatives of other Provinces so much, having regard to that fact. It is necessary, of course, for them to reflect the views prevailing in their own Provinces, but they would not feel it their duty to force those views on another Province. For these reasons, I cannot see the logic of the hon, gentleman's position. He says he is in favor of manhood suffrage; we knew that ali the representatives of the Province from which he comes favor the principle of manhood suffrage; we had it emphatically declared by them on the floor of this House; and yet, knowing that to be the universal view of their constion any Province that is opposed to it. I believe that in tuents—their supporters as well as their opponents—they ciple from the Province of Quebec, although, so far as we can judge from the action of the representatives of that Province in this House, it is not opposed to manhood suffrage. Have we heard a member opposite from the Province of Quebec declare that he is opposed to it? Not one of the gentlemen from the Province of Quebec supporting this Bill has given us to understand, in any form whatever, that he is not in favor of manhood suffrage.

Mr. WHITE. We can tell by their votes.

Mr. PATERSON. But we have not had their votes yet on the subject, and I am not to judge that they are not in favor of the proposition. I suppose, from the remarks of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), that it might fairly be said that he almost claimed to carry their votes in his pocket. I have noticed, and it has been rather remarkable in this debate, that although we had an explanation from the hon. the First Minister last night, with respect to one alteration he proposed to make in this Bill, yet up to that time the hon. Minister of Public Works, who has been constantly in his place, did not seem to be in the confidence of the Government sufficiently to give us the slightest knowledge of the alterations intended to be made in the Bill; and I wondered how the hon, member for East Hastings could tell us, across the floor, that the $400 franchise was going to be reduced to $300. The hon. Minister of Public Works did not say it, but the hon. member for East Hastings did. How did he know it? Was he speaking authoratively? Then, when the hon, member for North Wellington was speaking about the judges, the hon. Minister of Public Works sat still in his place, and gave us no intimation of anything that might be done. But when the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was speaking about the undesirability of these revising officers being appointed, the hon, member for East Hastings (Mr. White) felt himself to be in the position in which the hon. Minister of Public Works did not feel himself to be, for he said, across the floor of the House: Oh, we will give you the judge in your county. Of course it is to be determined by the Governor in Council; it is not to be declared by Act of Parliament, and this hon. gentleman rose and said: Oh, we will give you the judge in your county. On different occasions I have noticed the hon. member for East Hastings has said: We will do so and so; we are going to do this and we are going to do that. should not wonder but the circumstances will justifiy the hon, member for East Hastings and show that he is right; I should not wonder but they will show that he knew what would be done in advance; but I say it is very remarkable that a private member of the House, for we have always considered the hon. gentleman to be a private member, should be in a position to make declarations as to what the policy of the Government would be, when the Minister of Public Works, who was leading the House, was unable to say a word in reference to it. So the hon. gentleman tells us that the members from Quebec will show, by their votes, what they are going to do. As much as to say, that he understood what they would do; as much as to say: I understand what they will do; they will stand up and vote as I do on this question; they will vote down manhood suffrage or any proposition you will bring in; we have laid down a line, and that line will be followed out. Strong objections, it is true, have been urged against this measure; there has been some effect produced in the country; public opinion is pressing upon us the fact that this is a restrictive franchise, that it shuts out many men who would be enabled to vote under the Ontario franchise, and therefore I presume that the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) must have conferred with the First Minister, when he can tell us authoritatively: Oh, the qualification will be reduced from $400 to $300, and that will bring them in, and therefore you are talking when there is no need to talk.

Mr. Paterson (Brant).

But we did not recognise the hon, gentleman's authority so fully; we did not know the position he occupied in the House. The Minister of Public Works, who was leading the House, was not prepared to say a word about it, and we did not feel warranted in accepting the statement of the hon. member for East Hastings. So, to resume the subject, I find myself, with reference to this amendment, in this position. It has been my individual opinion, for a great many years, that it would be a desirable thing, as soon as the country was sufficiently advanced, if I might use that expression, as soon as the country had arrived at the conclusion that it would be desirable that a man, being a man and a citizen of the country, with all the rights, liberties and responsibilities—mark you, all the responsibilities—of manhood upon him, it would be a wise thing, especially in elections for the Dominion Parliament, to make a citizen of him in every sense of the word: to give him, in addition to all the other rights, privileges and responsibilities, the right you and I prize so highly, of saying who shall be elected to make the laws under which he dwells. While that has been my individual opinion, an opinion which I have never hesitated to express in private, still the question has not been fully discussed before the electors. The extension of the franchise was discussed in Ontario at the late provincial elections, and I believe that the people of that Province are of opinion that an extension is desirable; but whether it should go the full length of adopting resident manhood suffrage, without restriction, has not been discussed, and I am now brought face to face with the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland, without the opportunity of knowing what the views of my constituents are on that particular point. As a representative of a constituency in this House, I do think it is my duty, as I conceive it to be the duty of other representatives, to ascertain, as well as may be ascertained, the wishes of my constituents in regard to this extension of the franchise; but the question is before us, and I am not prepared to shirk any question that may come before us. In the absence of that opportunity, and believing the people of the country are now more ready to accept a very broad franchise than they were, and as my views go in the direction of the hon. gentleman's amendment, I feel disposed to support it. I have another reason. It is charged that we are somewhat inconsistent in arguing for the maintenance of the provincial franchises, where manhood suffrage, in so many words, does not prevail, and in being still prepared to accept manhood suffrage under this amendment. It is true that the people of Ontario; as well as the people of all the other Provinces, I believe, have been content to have the provincial franchises, and on that question I have no difficulty whatever; but that having been voted down, and this question being before the House, I am in the same position as others. I must give my vote, and that is the re son I cast it in that direction; and I do it further, for the reason that the Bill before the House restricts the franchise in Ontario most materially. I pointed out that in one industrial establishment in my own city seventy-eight men would be disfranchised, and seventy-four in another, under the operation of this Bill, who have a vote under the Ontario Act; and I have a letter from a law student in Toronto, a young gentleman who can go out and discuss public questions on the platform, who is one of the rising young men, in which he says, that under this Bill he will be debarred from exercising the franchise, although he can do so under the Mowat Act. Some of our volunteers in the North-West, and many others, will also be cut off by this Bill. The First Minister proposes to enfranchise the Indians, who cannot make their own wills or deed their own property, who are minors in the eyes of the law, and whom he is going to keep in a state of tutelage, and yet he will cut out from the franchise the hard-working mechanics I have referred to. It is a fact that in the towns and cities throughout Canada the franchise will be taken from men who have the responsibilities of citizenship upon them, and yet it is proposed to confer it upon those who have not the responsibility of citizenship, whom the First Minister will not allow to have the responsibility of citizenship. That is the position of affairs we are under, with reference to this Bill, and for that reason, among many others, for I will draw my remarks to a conclusion, not desiring to occupy the attention of the committee at this late hour, longer, though I have much more to say on the subject, I shall give my support to the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). When I made a remark about the Quebec members, the hon. gentleman went on to make a speech upon my remark, and would not allow me to make clear what I meant. When I said, across the floor of the House, that the judges would be appointed in Ontario, I knew what I was saying was correct. The First Minister announced that that would be the case, and hon. gentlemen opposite, after having abused and insulted the revising barristers, saw they were going too far, and now they hark When I said the qualification would be reduced to $300, I only supposed it would be, and that was the only authority I had. I think there is more said in opposition to this Bill than hon, gentlemen opposite are warranted in saying. I was in the county of Hastings the other day, and though I travelled over forty or fifty miles of the county, I did not hear any one person mention the Franchise Bill. The hon, gentleman has said more against the Indians and their qualifications than it becomes him to say. I think the Indian is sufficiently intelligent and well qualified to have a vote. The hon, gentleman says forty mechanics in one shop will not have a vote. The establishments in that county must pay the mechanics very poorly. Of those I employ, not one will be without a vote.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to say one word.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived. Yeas, 37; nays, 81.

Amendment (Mr. Mitchell) negatived. Yeas, 33; nays, 86. Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 20th May, 1885.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST-VICTORIA RIFLES.

Mr. CURRAN. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to a statement which has appeared in certain newspapers to the effect that the Victoria Rifles were ordered out for duty at the front, and that a number of bankers and merchants of the city of Montreal forwarded a petition to the Minister of Militia, asking that that regiment be not ordered to the seat of war, irasmuch as it would inconvenience them in their business. As representing the electoral district in which all the banks are situate, and the great body of the mercantile community, I would like to know if any such petition has been received, as 1 have been informed, on good authority, that the statement is without foundation.

Mr. CARON. In answer to my hon. friend I must say that no such petition has been forwarded to me. No order was given to the Victoria Rifles to go to the front, and if such an order had been given I know perfectly well that it would have been carried out with as much promptitude as by any other battalion in the city of Montreal. It is one of the very best battalions, and I am glad to say that the merchants and bankers have not in any way expressed their unwillingness to allow those who are employed by them to take part in the events which are taking place in Canada at this moment.

FORTY MILE RAILWAY BELT, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish once again to call attention to the fact that the question which I put with reference to the correspondence between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government, and as to the 40-mile railway belt in British Columbia, have not yet been answered.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With reference to the 40-mile railway belt, I have received this memorandum:

"The Government have received from Mr. Pierce S. Hamilton, a well-known journalist of Nova Scotia, but now, it appears, residing in British Columbia, a memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor in known journalist of Nova Scotia, but now, it appears, residing in British Columbia, a memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor in Council, respecting the claims of squatters within the unsurveyed portion of the railway belt in British Columbia. Mr. Hamilton, in the memorial in question, represents himself as secretary to a meeting held at Port Moody, at which the resolutions contained in the memorial were adopted. In reply, Mr. Hamilton was furnished with a copy of the Dominion Lands Act, the provisions of which, he was informed, in so far as they are applicable, would be extended to British Columbia. He was further info med that it was the intention of the Government to protect bond fide squatters upon the agricultural land, within what is known as the railway belt in British Columbia, and that surveys of the belt were then, as they are now, being prosecuted under instructions from the Department of the Interior, and so soon as they were sufficiently advanced to permit of claims being adjudicated upon, such claims would be at once disposed of. The Surveyor General of Dominion lands is now, and has been for some time, in British Columbia, personally supervising the prosecution of these surveys. The Government have no means of knowing how many people have settled on the unsurveyed lands in the belt, and there is no reason why there should be anxiety or discontent among these settlers. The regulations for the survey, administration and disposal of these lands have been adopted by the Governor in Council, and published in the Canada Gazette and British Columbia Gazette; and, as already stated, the surveys are now, and were, during the season of 1884, being vigorously prosecuted. Until surveys have been made, it is out of the power of the Government to grant patents to lands, but the Dominion Lands Act and the regulations make ample provision ior the protection of the claims of persons settling in advance of survey."

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps it would be well, if it does not invite premature discussion, that I should mention at once what amendments I propose to the whole of this third section, and then we can discuss the various paragraphs without wandering over the whole clause. I was a good deal struck with the remarks made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) last night in reference to the Ontario Act, to the effect that the Ontario Government, whatever their individual opinions might be with regard to manhood suffrage, had gone as far as they thought would ensure the success of their measure, which was a step towards, perhaps, the ultimate result of man-hood suffrage. In perhaps the same sense I have had occasion to consult the representatives of the people in this House giving their confidence to the Government; I have carefully considered all the clauses and all the suggestions; and I think I have come to the conclusion that in order to ensure the safety of the measure, the Government have gone as far as they can well go in order to secure that support for the measure in this House which is essential to its becoming law. As regards the clause now before us, which provides that the owner of real property in any city or town must be the owner to the actual value of $300, after full consideration I have come to the conclusion, so far as towns are concerned, to reduce the value to $200. It being the general opinion, so far as I have gathered it, that the value of $200 in what is ordinarily known as a town would be about equivalent to the value of $300 in a city. Then, as regards the next sub-section, that referring to tenancy, there is no alteration in the amount of rental, but there is a verbal alteration in the month, as we consider November and January should be fixed as the date of payment. Hon, gentlemen will see that, according to the 23rd line, the rent must be paid on the quarter day that occurs next before the first day of November in each year; instead of that, I propose that this part of the clause shall read: "Shall be the year's rent up to the last yearly, half-yearly, quarterly, or monthly day of payment, as the case may be, which shall have occurred next before the date of the certificate of the final revision of the voters' list hereinafter mentioned, by the revising officer." As regards the fifth sub-section, that relating to occupancy, I make the same alteration in the date, and change the qualification to $300 for cities, and $200 for towns, instead of $300 for cities or towns. With respect to the income sub-section—sub-sectowns. With respect to the income sub-section—sub-section 6—I propose to make an important amendment. I considered at first that there was no necessity for the words I propose to insert, but the discussion-especially the comparisons between this Bill and the Ontario Bill-has shown, I think, the necessity of making this alteration. I propose that the 6th sub-section shall read as follows: "Is a resident within such city or town, or part of a city or town, and derives an income"-I propose to add these words: "as earnings" or-"from some trade, calling, office or profession."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is there any change in the amount?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; as regards the income, it is reduced from $100 to $300. Then as regards the sons of owners, it was stated in discussion that the absence was too short. The last proviso of this sub-section, sub-section 7, provides that "the occasional absence of a son from the residence of the father or mother, for not more in all than 4 months in the year, shall not disqualify such son as a voter under this Act." It has been expressed strongly and, I think, reasonably, that in certain avocations, 4 months is not sufficient, and I propose to extend that to 6 months.

Mr. MULOCK. Both in sub-sections 7 and 8?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course; although it will be 6 months, and I have adopted a clause which I shall propose for the consideration of the Committee—a clause which I find in the Nova Scotia Franchise Bill. I think it is a very good one, and I shall submit for the favorable consideration of the committee:

"The time spent by mariners and fishermen in the transaction of their occupations, and by students in institutions of learning, within the Dominion of Canada, shall be considered as spent at home."

These are the amendments I am going to propose. We will now take up the third clause. I move that it be altered to read as follows:—

"Is the owner of real property within such city or part of a city, of the actual value of $300, or within such town or part of a town, of the actual value of $200."

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest that the amendment go a little farther with regard to cities. In Quebec, the amendment will be very good in so far as it affects cities already constituted by themselves electoral districts, such as Quebec and Montreal. But there are other cities which are rather towns than cities, such as Sherbrooke, Hull, Three Rivers, St. Hyacinthe, whose population are not, in some cases, over 6,000 or 7,000 and in others 3,000 or 4,000. Bill in some shape or other.

Sir John A. MacDonald.

In all those the qualification is $200 by the Quebec law. The qualification in all cities entitled to return one or more members is $300, but in others, such as those I have mentioned, it is $200, so that if the amendment proposed be carried as it is, a number of voters in the latter will be disfranchised.

Mr. LANGELIER. In support of what my hon, friend has urged, I might say that in the Province of Quebec it is more a matter of fancy than of permanent rule, whether a place be called a city or town. When I had a seat in the Legislature of Quebec, I have seen places insisting on being called cities, although their population was very small, and they obtained the name of cities by getting an amendment to their charters of incorporation. For instance, Hull was incorporated a city in 1874 or 1875, although its population was then scarcely larger than when it was a town; while Levis, which is a much larger place than Hull, and especially much larger than Sherbrooke and Three Rivers, is only a town by its charter, and does not return a member. The suggestion made by my hon, friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) is entirely in the spirit of the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, which were to the effect that a higher qualification should be had in larger places, but not in places which were only towns. In the Province of Quebec that distinction does not exist, for a city there is not supposed to be a larger place than a town. As a matter of fact, there are towns which are much larger than cities.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I dare say that is quite true, but we must proceed upon some general rule. Cities are supposed to be towns of such importance that they claim to be elevated in municipal rank, and I am afraid that those cities which have too much ambition must pay the penalty of their ambition. It is something like some merchants and bankers in London, who, in order to raise their credit, pay a larger income tax than they would otherwise pay. I think I must adhere to the general principle that cities are more important than towns as a general rule, and that the property in cities, as a general rule, is more valuable than in towns. Hereafter ambitious towns will think twice, perhaps, before they seek a more important name.

Mr. LAURIER. There is a general rule which can be very easily applied. There are cities that have been deemed so important that they have been constituted electoral districts, such as Quebec, Montreal and Toronto. There are other cities which, though they have the name, have not been entitled to the same privilege, on account of their minor importance. I think, therefore, that you might adopt the language which I find in the Quebec electoral law: "Any city having the right to return one or more members to the House of Commons." That is a general rule which might be applied in this matter.

Mr. GILLMOR. I would ask the First Minister whether he has considered the personal qualification which has been in operation in New Brunswick for a long time, and in regard to whether some of my associates from New Brunswick think a large number will be disfranchised under this Bill. I do not think it will disfranchise as many as some of my associates do, but I think it will disfranchise some very worthy voters. We have many voters on vessel and other property whom we expect to be disqualified under this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After full consideration, we thought it better to adhere to the Bill as it is now. It is true that there are persons who have a large capital invested in ships, but those persons are all householders or have sufficient income or are occupants, so that they are sure to have a vote. I do not believe there is a single man in Canada who owns a ship who has not a vote under this Bill in some shape or other.

Mr. GILLMOR. I think myself that the Bill will embrace a good many who will not depend altogether upon their property, Still many worthy persons will be dis- find that Marshall is called a town, with a population of franchised under this Bill.

- Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That may be, but we cannot provide for every possible case.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to ask the First Minister in regard to the occupant clause, whether he is going to require residence for any particular time before the election at which these people vote?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When I made this general statement, it was with the expectation that we would not go over the whole of the sections at once, but would take them up as they came. The proposition now is in regard to the ownership in cities and towns. When we come to the occupant clause, I will be glad to discuss it with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. I approve of the suggestion of the First Minister as far as it goes, but the other day I looked through the census returns to see how the population of towns compared in the different Provinces, and it seems to me that, if it were possible to put into the clause some figures as to population, it would be better. The greatest inequalities exist in the various Provinces as to the population of towns. In New Brunswick for example, I find a place described in the census of 1881 as a town, having a population of 318. I find a great many towns in the Province of Quebec having a population of some less than 1,000 and a great number under 2,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Where are these towns in New Brunswick?

Mr. MULOCK. There is Milltown, with a population of 1,664, and there is Upper Milltown with a population of Mr. FOSTER. They are not towns.

Mr. MULOCK, They are described as towns in the census. The difficulty arises from adopting the denomination of the municipality, which is entirely the creature of the provincial Legislatures. The First Minister will see that, if we give a qualification to a place called a town, it is necessary to remember that it is a town by virtue of some local Act, and the Local Legislature may, to a certain extent, modify the effects of this legislation by altering the denomination of that place. It may unmake towns and re-convert them into villages, and the moment it does so by a local Act it would enfranchise in that way more than were at first enfranchised by this Bill, and vice

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You do not object to that?

Mr. MULOCK. I hope my remarks will be considered in the same way in which I intended them. As we are trying to apply a general system through the various Rrovinces, and as there is no uniform practice as to what shall entitle a place to be called a village, or city, or a town, I suggest whether it would not be possible to put some limitation into the Bill. In Ontario the Legislature has refused to incorporate a village into a town unless it has, I think, 2,000 population.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have a right to claim to be a town if they have a certain population.

Mr. MULOCK. They apply for a special Act.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). No, not in towns; only in cities.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the population required?

Mr. HICKEY. 2,000 for a town.

Mr. MULOCK. I thought that was the number. There cannot be a general rule, however, throughout all the Provinces in that respect, because we find many towns with very different populations. For example, in Nova Scotia I 1,077.

Mr. VAIL. That is not a town.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, in New Brunswick, is Milltown

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. In the census of 1881 it had a population of 1,664. In the Province of Quebec, Rimouski is described as a town; it had a population of 1,417. St. Ours is a town with a population of 808. Iberville, in the Province of Quebec, a town with a population of 1,847; Beauharnois, a town with a population of 1,499; Louiseville, a town, 1,381; Terrebonne, a town, 1,398, and so on. If we go from Province to Province we find that what makes a town in one Province will not make a town in another Province. Now, it seems to me it would be reasonable to put in a limitation of what should be a town. Say, any municipality not having a population of 2,000 at the time of a certain census, should be a village, because, I presume, it is the number of people who are congregated together that gives value to the property in their midst on which the voter is to qualify. I have an amendment which I intend to move, namely, that the word "three" in the sixth line, on page 4, be struck out, and the word "two" be inserted in lieu thereof. That would reduce the property qualification required in cities and small towns. The First Minister says he is opposed to that view; but it seems to me that we should adopt it, and require a smaller qualification. We find the qualification in cities and towns in the Province of Ontario, to-day, is $200; in Quebec cities it is $300, as proposed, and in towns, $200; in New Brunswick, $100; in Nova Scotia, $150; Manitoba, $100; Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, manhood suffrage. So that throughout the whole Dominion no property qualification to the extent of $300 is required, except in cities and towns in the Province of Quebec; and if the Premier would reduce that qualification from $300 to $200, the only Province that would be affected by it would be Quebec. I think that would be striking a middle course better than to adhere to

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is $300 and $200 in Quebec.

Mr. MULOCK. So I said, but that is the only Province in which $300 is required in cities.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Four hundred dollars is required by the present law in Ontario.

Mr. MULOCK. When the new law comes into force, it will be $200. Therefore, to day, a $300 property qualification may be considered as a thing of the past in every Province except Quebec.

Mr. CASEY. Before we settle the amount of the qualification, I wish to move an amendment in regard to real property, namely: That the words "or real and personal" be inserted between the words "real" and "property," in the first line of this third sub-section. A subsequent clause of this Bill, confers the franchise upon fishermen who possess a certain amount of real and personal property combined, the value of their boats and fishing tackle being added to that of their real property. It is proper enough that fishermen should have this privilege, but there are other classes who should have it also. There are in cities and towns small tradesmen and mechanics, whose real estate might not be sufficient to qualify them under this clause, and I think they should be allowed to make up the amount by counting in the value of their machinery, tools or stock-in-trade, or, in fact, that whatever they may have to assist them in carrying on their trade shall be counted, just as in the case of Mr. IVES. I am opposed to that amendment, because it would practically create the greatest possible confusion in the formation of the list. Any man, the merest tramp, coming along to the revising officer, could insist that he was entitled to registration, because he had an old horse somewhere, or an old cart, though not within the knowledge of the officer preparing the list. In the case of fishermen, there is some way of arriving at the amount of their personal property, their boat and tackle are to be seen; but if that privilege is to be extended to others than fishermen, it will create the greatest possible confusion, and I think it is entirely unnecessary. If we are to go beyond the very liberal provision for the franchise, as laid down in the Bill, and as the Prime Minister proposed to amend it, I think we had better adopt manhood suffrage at once.

Mr. MULOCK. The other evening the First Minister was kind enough to endeavor to satisfy the House upon a certain point, and he did satisfy me; but since then I have noticed in the public press that it has been stated that the amendment which he intended to offer to a certain section, did not fully meet the case. I think the public is, to some extent, under a misapprehension as to the right hon. Premier's statement. Perhaps his words did not fully convey his meaning, though they satisfied me. Therefore, I would take the liberty of asking this question: Where a revising officer is appointed who is not the county judge, I understood the right hon. Minister to say that, in that case, there would be an appeal allowed from the finding of the revising officer on all questions of law and fact, to the county judge; that the judge would visit the various municipalities in that riding, and there sit with original jurisdiction. I wish to ask the right hon. Premier if I understood him correctly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is not relevant to the present clause, but the hon. gentleman told me he was going to ask this question, and I have no objection to answer it. He is quite right in his idea. In counties where the revising officer is not a judge, there will be an appeal from the revising officer to that judge, both on questions of fact and of law, and the appeal can be made without the discretion of the revising officer, and, as a matter of right; also, on the final revision, he shall go and visit each municipality and have original jurisdiction as well as in appeal.

Mr. CASEY. I think the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) are beside the case. He has conjured up the bugbear of a tramp proposing to qualify on an old horse, which he tells the revising officer he possesses somewhere else. My amendment provides that a man shall qualify on real and personal property, not on an old horse alone. In the first place, we hope that the revising officer would know better than to take the word of a tramp as to the possession of an old horse in some out of the way part of the country, and to give him a vote on the horse. Almost every one will have in mind the case of persons in business, in a small way, in cities and towns, and especially in villages, who would not be able to qualify on real estate alone. For example, small shoe-makers, whose real property was not worth $200 or $300, would be able to qualify if stock-in-trade and implements were included. The same is true of blacksmiths, though, as a rule, their places of business are of some value. The number would not be very large, but I mention these cases for the sake of the principle, and in order to secure uniformity. The proviso with respect to fishermen, one might almost suppose to be a bid for the support of that class. Possibly such is not the case, and it has been inserted with a view to doing justice. If so, there can be no objection to extending the same measure of justice to other classes following different callings. I ask to have the amendment amended so as to read as follows: "or real Mr. Casey.

property and implements of his calling or stock-in-trade." These words to be inserted after "real property" in the first line of paragraph three.

Mr. WILSON. The First Minister will find that in many incorporated cities the value of property is not higher than in towns. No doubt many small store-keepers will be disfranchised if the qualification is held at $300 assessment. I hope the First Minister will see his way to make the concession asked. In the city of St. Thomas there are a number of people who would have a vote under the Ontario Act, and yet would not have a vote at Dominion elections.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the condition of things that would exist under this clause of the Bill. Sandwich is the county town of Essex, and its population is less than 1,000. The population of the village of Essex Centre is 2,000. Under this Bill a person in that village would have the vote if assessed for $150, while in Sandwich he would require to be assessed for $200 to obtain the franchise, In the county of Bothwell, the town of Bothwell has a population between 800 and 1,000. The village of Morrisburg has a population of 2,000. The qualification in the former is $200 and in the latter $150. The First Minister is sacrificing a principle to an end. We do not determine what places shall be a town. If the hon, gentleman were to say that in places having so many thousand population, the qualification should be a certain amount, and in places with a less population it should be a different amount, there would be something definite about the proposition, and we would be conforming with the principle on which the Government set out. I hope, however, the hon. gentleman will agree to abandon the multiplication of qualification. The Ontario Bill provides that $200 shall be the qualification in towns and cities, and $100 in villages and rural districts. It is perfectly obvious we are attaching very little importance to the possession of property. That being the case, a great inconvenience arises from the adoption of the principle of the Bill. A few men may get control of the village council for the time being, and in order to obtain a mayor or police magistrate, they get incorporation as a town. A large number of persons who at the time were qualified might be thereby disqualified by the action of a few men. I am sure if the hon. gentleman will consult the member for Essex, he will find the facts to be as I have stated with regard to that county, and I know them to be as I have stated, in my own constituency. The instances mentioned by the hon. member for North York from the census, show that there are many places under 1,000 inhabitants which are called towns, and many places that have at least 2,000 inhabitants that are still villages.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). So far as my section of the country is concerned, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is quite correct. Take for instance the village of Leamington, or the village of Essex Centre, the population of either of those places is double the population of the town of Sandwich, the county town.

An hon. MEMBER. It is not incorporated.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). It is one of the oldest incorporated towns in Ontario; it has a mayor, a reeve, and all the paraphernalia of a town. I do not know how the matter will affect the other Provinces, but so far as my own part of the country is concerned I think they might be placed in the same category, for it is a very rare thing for a village in Western Ontario to be incorporated unless it has a large population, and, on the other hand, there are many towns that are decaying, while villages are springing up and becoming large places around them. Take, for instance, Tilbury village, which is unincorporated. It is partly in Essex and partly in Kent, and still it has a much larger population than Sandwich. I believe that the qualification of $200 in a place like Sandwich is a much higher qualification than $100 in Leamington or Essex Centre, which are prosperous places. I know I would rather have $100 worth of property in Essex Centre than $200 in Sandwich.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot settle any franchise based on property so as to meet every possible case. The only way we could have dead uniformity would be to have universal suffrage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not prepared for that, and I want to carry this Bill this Session, and if we commence to re-arrange the franchise de novo, I think the Session would be a long one. With respect to Sandwich, it has been unfortunate from a variety of circumstances. From being on the frontier, at the very outside edge of the country, it has not progressed to such an extent as it promised originally. But this is a very young country, and I hope, before my hon. friend who represents that part of the country so worthily, departs from political life, Sandwich will rise with the general progress of the country to its old position.

Mr. MILLS. It is only a suburb of Windsor, now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman speaks about Leamington and its population. Leamington gets the population of a town it will soon have the ambition to be a town, and then the property, no doubt, will rise in value, and the amount required by the franchise will be equalised. Really, I have considered well how far I can go with any prospect of carrying my Bill, and I cannot yield personally—I do not feel authorised to yield to these suggestions. I will try, as far as possible, to liberalise the Bill, and meet the views of all hon, gentlemen opposite, and some of the hon. gentlemen on this side, as we have heard the argument advanced, and with some force, that we must eventually come to manhood suffrage, we had better go on now, and it will be the agreeable duty of the hon. member for Bothwell, when he gets on this side, if he does not go quite as far as manhood suffrage, to liberalise this measure still further. We must leave something for our successors to do, and we are making substantial progress in the direction in which these hon, gentlemen desire to go.

Mr. MILLS. I must say that the hon, gentleman appears to me to take an extraordinary way of liberalising the Bill. In one case the qualification under the law, as it now stands, is $200, and he proposes to make it $300. In another case it is $100, and he proposes to make it $150. That may be his notion of liberalising the franchise, but it is not mine. The hon, gentleman refers to Leamington and other places, and says they will be ambitious to become towns, but as the conditions upon which they can become towns is the disfranchisement of a considerable number of the poorer classes, it is one which is not likely to be hastily complied with.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows that in his time and mine a great many towns have become villages, and a great many cities have become towns, and they have done this notwithstanding the different qualification before them. They have not been prevented from changing their condition by the fact of their being obliged to have a higher qualification.

Mr. HESSON. I think it will be found that as it is well known that under the Ontario law property is generally assessed much below its value, to avoid additional taxation the variations which have been spoken of will be adjusted, and that there will be practically no difference as to the classes of property upon which votes will be allowed.

Mr. AUGER. One of the grounds upon which the hon. leave the amen gentleman wished to pass this Bill was that we might have can be got over a uniform franchise, but I think if we cannot have a uniform the suggestion.

franchise all over the Dominion we should at least have i uniform in the same county. But according to the Bill a man in one part of the county will have the right to vote on a property worth $150, while across an imaginary line, in the same county, his property will have to be worth $300 in order that he may have a vote. That is rather incongruous. The Bill will be known for its uniform want of uniformity.

Mr. MITCHELL. I entirely approve of the principle of the amendment of the hon member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), but it does not go far enough. Now, in the Province to which I belong the franchise is $100 real estate, $400 personal estate, and $400 income. The experience of the people in that Province has been that the franchise in personal property has not been objectionable in any way. I have had a good deal of experience, I have been thirty years in Parliament, I have run a good many elections, and have had intercourse with most of my constituents, so that I know a good deal about their feelings and wishes, and I believe it is their desire not to limit the franchise, but to widen it if possible. So far as my Province and my county are concerned, this Bill makes a distinct limitation of the franchise, and therefore I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to add the words "or personal property of the value of $400." That qualification has been in existence in New Brunswick for thirty or forty years, and has worked well. I can see no reason why a person who is a good citizen and owns personal property of the value of $400 or $500 or $1,000 should not have the right to vote as well as the owner of real property. So far as the Bill is concerned there is no uniformity in it; I do not expect to see any uniformity grow out of it; but we have determined to adopt it, and it is our duty to make it as perfect as possible in its passage through the committee, without outraging the rights of any individuals anywhere in the Dominion.

Mr. BURPEE. I have great pleasure in seconding that motion. In fact, I have in my hand a motion drawn by the hon. member for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon) to the same effect, which I shall put into your hands. In New Brunswick we have a personal property qualification, under which a great many exercise the franchise; and a franchise that does not provide for personal property qualification will exclude a great many from the vote. Even if the amendment is adopted, a great many in the city of St. John will be deprived of the franchise. There they have a freeman's qualification, under which any freeman, who has taken out a license to do business and who has personal property to the value of $100, is a voter.

Mr. DAVIES. I would suggest to the hon. member for Northumberland, that perhaps it would be better for him to withdraw his motion as an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin. I think that he will find that the wording of the amendment of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Burpee), will attain the object he has in view better than his own, because it provides that the vote on personal property must be based on residence and assessment in addition to ownership to the value of $400. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to consider those two ingredients which are absent from his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought of the point my hon. friend mentions, because it comes right home to me in my own constituency. There personal property is subject to assessment, and the assessment list is the basis of the list on which we vote. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's; but we are met with the fact, that in the Province of Quebec, which seems to be the bête noire in the way of obtaining manhood suffrage, personal property is not assessed. Therefore, I think it would be better to leave the amendment as it is, although, if the technicality can be got over in some way, I have no objection to accept the suggestion.

Mr. DAVIES. I think there is a good deal in the objection of the hon. gentleman. I did not think of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MITCHELL. You have always to think of the Province of Quebec in this House.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, I would ask whether it would not be well to amend the amendment to make residence an essential.

Mr. IVES. I would suggest that the party should put his personal property into a piece of land, and that would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. DAVIES. That is all very well, but we must consider the circumstances of the various parts of the Dominion as they are. All fishermen—and these are the kind of men who have personal property—must not necessarily have real estate also. In the Province of New Brunswick, I am given to understand, there are a large number of persons whose property is personal and who now possess the franchise, and I am sure the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe would not desire to exclude them.

Mr. IVES. I do not desire to exclude them, but if the qualification is based on assessment that gets rid of the difficulty I find with the motion of the hon. member for Northumberland. In most of the Provinces, so far as I am aware, personal property is not assessed and is not the basis of taxation, and how are you to fix the franchise on personal property when it can only apply to a certain portion of the Dominion where it is assessed?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would point out that the hon. gentleman's amendment is not an amendment to the amendment. It would come in properly after the amendment of the hon. member for West Elgin is disposed of.

Mr. MITCHELL. If it is not strictly in order, I will withdraw it until it is, and then propose it as a substantive amendment.

I quite agree with the proposal that per-Mr. CASEY. sonal property should continue to form a basis of qualification in New Brunswick, and it would be a pretty fair basis of qualification in other Provinces where it does not now form such a basis. I do not see why a man who has personal property, say in the shape of machinery in his trade or stock in a store, should not be entitled to vote. I do not see why such a person has not as much stake in the country as one who is merely living here for a time and earning a certain income. I think a person who has any kind of property, either real or personal, is more likely to remain a permanent resident than one who is merely living here or there while earning a certain income. I put my motion in its present restricted shape, not because I was opposed to the wider proposal, but to make it exactly parallel with the fisherman's franchise.

Amendment (Mr. Casey) negatived.

Mr. MULOCK moved that the word "three" in the sixth line on page 4, sub-section 3, be struck out, and the word "two" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that this amendment proposes to substitute, in place of what the First Minister proposes, a uniform franchise of $200 for both cities and towns. Now, the First Minister himself must be aware that one of our main objects, or one of his main objects, is to produce a franchise as uniform as is possible. It appears to me that the introduction, as matters stand in Canada, of a franchise of $300 for cities and $200 for towns, makes a very needless confusion; and also, that we must consider that proposition in connection with the next clause which fixes the qualification of tenants of real properties in cities and towns. Anybody who is prac-Mr. MITCHELL.

who are less likely than others to form desirable voters, it is precisely that class of persons who occupy small tenements in cities. I can only speak with knowledge of the class who occupy tenements in the cities of Ontario, and I say, without fear of contradiction, that the possession of the smallest portion of property is a better qualification, if you have a property qualification at all, for the exercise of the franchise, than the fact that men are occupying, as tenants, single rooms very often in cities, at a monthly rental of $2, or an annual rental of $20. Whoever has inspected the poorest quarters of our cities, knows perfectly well that the class of persons who have tenements of that description are, as a rule, very decidedly inferior to that class of voters who have either such qualifications as my hon friend behind me proposes to insert or the qualification of owning property of the actual value of $200. I can see no consistency or principle whatever in refusing to the owners of real property in cities to the extent of $200 a franchise which you are willing to give to the tenant who may occupy a single room in a lodging house, such as is the only accommodation offered to too many of our people in many quarters of large cities. It appears to me that there is no sort of reason or justification for refusing the qualification to the real property owners of the value my hon. friend proposes to enfranchise, and which if my memory is correct, is that to be used under the Ontario Act, and giving it to the class of persons whom the very next section proposes to enfranchise. This is a matter in which you must have regard to the classes of persons to whom you are about to grant the franchise. I believe that the proposition introduced by the hon member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), although I could only support it as an alternative, although I greatly preferred leaving the matter with the Provinces, would have given the franchise to a great many persons more desirable than those the very next clause desires to give it to. I do not see the slightest reason for giving it to tenants at such a very low value and refusing it to proprietors of property worth $200 in cities.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The principle of uniformity is not carried out in the Ontario Bill, as the hon. gentleman will see since, in cities and towns, the qualification is $200, and in incorporated villages $100; and, as we have heard from several hon, members, there are various incorporated villages much more prosperous than the towns. I think we must adhere to the proposition on the paper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was not precisely the argument to which I was calling the attention of the committee. I was calling its attention to the class of persons to whom the hon gentleman proposes to give the franchise, under the tenancy clause; that is to say, the occupants of rooms at a very low rent; and I do not see why we should exclude the owner of property, which is a much better qualification than tenancy.

I quite agree with the hon. member for West Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). If the right hon. gentleman is willing to let in tenants who may only hold a single room at $2 a month, he should not object to letting in the freeholder who owns $200 worth of property. It is noteworthy that in cities and towns, the very places where he requires an extra freehold qualification, this extremely low tenancy qualification is admitted. The Bill admits the very lowest class of tenants in cities and towns, in point of financial resources, but requires a much higher qualification for freeholders than is required in other places. Apart from that, I think the greater uniformity in the Ontario Bill as between cities and towns is worthy of imitation for this reason. I do not think there is any such clearly drawn distinction between cities and towns, taking them merely as they are named cities and towns, as the Bill would seem tically acquainted with the operation of a franchise knows to imply. Is there any reason why the moment a perfectly well that if there be any class in the community town attains a population of 10,000 and becomes a city, as it can under the law of Ontario, the qualification should he raised one-third? Certainly, the value of property does not go up one-third in that time, and there is no reason why the qualification should be raised one-third simply because the place is called a city, while it remains with exactly the same population, and property has exactly the same value as it had before being incorporated. On the other hand, even in a large city, there is no such great difference between the value of property, of the class of properties that would be covered by this clause, as the hon, gentleman seems to think there is. Of course, in the better parts of large cities, property is vastly more valuable than in towns, but the only class of property to which this clause will apply would be very small properties in poorer parts of the city, or perhaps the suburbs; and I do not think that property in the suburbs of a city, where you can get lots for $300, or in the slums of a city, is one-third more valuable than in the best parts of our prosperous towns. Therefore the distinction on that ground is illogical. If you mean to have a distinction between the two, let the higher qualification apply only to such cities as form electoral districts. There you have a perfectly logical and reasonable line of division, because the cities would undoubtedly be much larger than any merely incorporated

Mr. IVES. Question.

Mr. CASEY. We are speaking to the question. The hon, member for Richmond and Wolfe seems to be tired.

Mr. IVES. I have heard you make forty speeches on it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon, gentleman says he is tired of hearing me. He need not hear me. He need not listen to me. He can quietly pay his attention to something else, as he generally does, but, if he persists in introducing his criticism of me while I am speaking, he will simply delay the proceedings.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. CASEY. I have been put off the line of argument which I was following.

Mr. BOSSE. Louder, I cannot hear what you say.

Mr. CASEY. I do not suppose the hon. gentléman feels the loss. There are other people who wish to hear me also, and, if the hon. gentlemen will cease to interrupt me, they will hear me much better. There is no logical reason for the increase in the amount of qualification following the mere fact of a town becoming incorporated as a city. I can conceive that there would be some reason when a town became a really large city, an important place, an electoral district, but to make the mere fact of incorporation as a city raise the qualification by one-third is illogical and unfair. It has been pointed out by quotations from the census that very frequently you will require the higher qualification from so-called cities which are smaller than so-called towns, and that would have an effect directly the opposite of the intention which the First Minister seems to have had in view. It is true, as he says, that you cannot make a Bill which will cover all possible cases, but, when it is pointed out that there is a way of avoiding certain injustice, I think he should give it due consideration, and I do not think the change could, on any reasonable grounds, be objectionable to those gentlemen behind him whom he has consulted. It is simply a further step in the direction of uniformity.

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister proposes that the property qualifications in cities shall be $300, and by the next section he proposes that the qualification of a tenant shall be $2 a month. There are many cases in which the proprietor might be disqualified, while the tenant would have a vote. There are many cases where the property has to be valued at less than $300, where the rental would be more than sufficient to give a vote to the tenant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Twenty dollars a year is about 7 per cent on $300.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The First Minister must know perfectly well that the rents paid by these poor people in large cities are out of all proportion to the selling value of the property. There are a large number of rookeries which, I am sorry to say, are beginning to exist in our own cities, where people are obliged to content themselves with the occupation of one or two rooms only, and in such cases—in the case of joint ownership, for instance—it would be found that the rent demanded was decidedly more than even 10 or 12 per cent. That is a well-known feature in connection with that kind of property, and the hon. gentleman is much too intelligent not to know it, as he is also much too intelligent not to know that the particular class of persons paying the rents which he names are—although I do not want to deprive them of the franchise—probably the class who offer the least security of any for the right of exercising the franchise.

Mr. HICKEY. I do not think we are here to level existing distinctions, if the people choose to make them. If a place calls itself a city, it is for some advantage, and I think we are in duty bound to accept these distinctions here. Hon, gentlemen say it is unjust that a man on one side of an arbitrary line should not have a vote on the same amount of property which qualifies a man on the other side of that line, but we find these arbitrary distinctions in law. There is a six years limitation in regard to a debt, and a ten years limitation in regard to the possession of land. These are arbitrary provisions. It might be unjust that a debt one day over six years could not be collected, but that is the law. It is quite as unjust in the one case as in the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When this Bill was first drawn, it is to be supposed after being reasonably well considered, it did not appear to the First Minister that there was any difference between towns and cities. He made the qualification the same, $300, and I think he was right in making it the same. I do not think that, in a great part of Ontario, at any rate, there is any difference in the value of property in the moderately prosperous town and in the moderately prosperous town and in the moderately prosperous town and cities the value originally the doctrine that in towns and cities the value should be uniform, does he depart from the principle which he himself set out with? I agree that it is right to reduce the amount, but I think it is better to make the reduction uniform in both cases.

Mr. WILSON. If the First Minister has been in the habit of renting property, he would find that it would be difficult to charge even as little as $2 a month for a property worth $300 in order to make anything out of it. I believe this will disfranchise many of those living in small tenements in cities, and, I think, if you are going to do what is right, you will reduce the amount to $200, especially in cities which are not of a sufficient size to entitle them to send representatives to this House. If the First Minister owned houses and attempted to rent them, he would find that he would require more than 7 per cent. if he was going to make any money out of it. I know of many places which are assessed at less than $300 but which are renting for $2.50 and $3 a month, and in those cases the owner would be disfranchised, while the tenant could record his vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have in my mind's eye a case in my own town. There is a factory in connection with which eight or nine small houses were built, the man who put them up intending to rent them to operatives in his factory. In some cases he has sold the houses to men who work in the factory. I know that those houses are assessed for $150 each, and for the houses that are not sold he gets a rent of $2 a month. Now everyone of those tenants at $2 a month will have a vote, while those which have bought the houses, which are only assessed for $150, will be deprived of vot-

Mr. WATSON. I think the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Quebec should be adopted, as to the size of the town. For instance, there are three towns in my county that are incorporated, and I do not think the population of all of them amounts to more than 1,500. Unless a town has a population of, say, 1,500, it ought to be classed as a village, and the qualification should be $150. At present, in Manitoba, $100 is the qualification in country or town, without distinction. But, according to the explanation of the First Minister, this Bill will provide that in cities it shall be $300 and in towns $200, while in a village it is the same as in a country municipality. A distinction ought to be made as to the size of the town. Most people in a new country are ambitious and get incorporated as a town before they have a sufficient population. I think these small places should be considered the same as a rural municipality, and not counted as a town.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived. On Mr. Mitchell's amendment, p. 1987.

Mr. VAIL. I mentioned the other day that in the Province of Nova Scotia we have a personal property qualification of $300, or a combined qualification of real and personal property of $200. Now, if we are to have a personal property qualification at all, I think it should be reduced to $300 instead of $400, which would cover New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I quite approve of the proposal that only residents shall be allowed to vote on personal property; I do not think any man living outside the polling district, or village, or town, should be allowed to vote on personal property. If my right hon, friend would reduce that to $200, it would satisfy my hon, friends from New Brunswick as well as those from Nova Scotia. I am aware that objections will be made to making changes in the Bill, but there are a good many people in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia who will be disfranchised if they are not allowed to vote on a personal property qualification.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not find fault with the remarks of hon, gentlemen from the Lower Provinces, who ask that the franchise based upon personal property, that now exists in the Lower Provinces, should be continued. But I have noticed all through the discussion, that an attempt has been made to make out that a large number of people are being disfranchised by the present Bill. Now, I think that is creating an unfair impression. I have had some experience in regard to the franchise in New Brunswick, at least; and I have no hesitation in saying that, from a pretty close examination of the facts, there will be a considerable increase in the number of voters in the whole Province, as compared with those who are now allowed to vote under the provincial law, and that increase will amount to 16 or 17 per cent. In my own county, the increase will be very much larger. Now, I think when the hon, gentleman stated that a large number of people are going to be disfranchised by this Bill, he ought to qualify that by stating that a much greater number of people are going to be enfranchised by the Bill.

Mr. VAIL. That does not help those who are dis-

Mr. COSTIGAN. But that is a fairer way to treat the Bill. Having established the fact that this Bill does enfran chise a large number of men who could not vote before, then the question comes up: How many are going to be disfranchised? After looking into the matter I must confess that I can hardly find anyone who is going to be dis-franchised under this Bill; I cannot imagine a case, You have a franchise there that you never had before; you have

ing. I know these facts personally, and I think it is an had before, to any extent, in the Lower Provinces, an income injustice. In New Brunswick the income clause of the provincial law which was $400, was a dead letter, except You will not find in rural constituencies in large cities. ten men who ever voted under the income clause. This Bill opens it up very widely, and brings in the laboring classes, it brings in every industrious mechanic, and every industrious laboring man in the country. My hon. friend from Queen's—whom I do not see present now—speaking to me the other night about this very clause, said the great objection he had was that a large number of men in his county had invested their capital in ships and coasting vessels, they were assessed upon them as personal property, and these would be excluded from voting. I said: Don't you think these men will come in under the income clause? He said: They will, but that income now is too high, and a great many will be cut off. The right hon. Premier has announced that that clause will be reduced from $400 to $300, so I think all proper cases will be covered. All wage-earners will be included who earn an income of $300, and all who are owners or occupants of real estate to a certain amount. It has been clearly admitted that the assessed value of $100 does not represent the real value of the property in the Province of New Brunswick, and no disqualification will arise on that account.

Mr. GILLMOR. I agree with the Minister in a good deal he has said. I think that this Bill will add a good many to the voters' lists who did not vote before. But I do not agree with the Minister in regard to the personal property qualification. He underestimated the number of those who will be disfranchised if the personal property qualification is not included in the Bill. I believe many who have personal property will vote under some other qualification; but, notwithstanding that, the hon. gentleman admits he is going to disqualify some people. It is a mere matter of opinion as to how many; he thinks very few. I do not think the number will be so many as some of my friends think it will be; but the hon gentleman does disqualify a number of men whom, I am sure, he would not desire to disqualify. They have exercised the right of the franchise for many years on a personal property qualification. There cannot be any desire to disfranchise those who invest in small Those do not come under the class of shipowners, who, as a general rule, have some other qualification which would entitle them to vote. This clause might, however, disfranchise a class of men who, above all others, have enterprise and energy, and have invested their earnings in personal property, that is in coasting vessels, for a number of those men have no other property upon which to qualify. If you examine the lists made up from the assessment rolls you will find a large number assessed on personal property. By this Bill you disfranchise them, unless they have some other kind of property. I admit that a great many will have some other qualification, but a large number will not. But by this liberal measure is it nocessary to disqualify any men having that qualification and those energies and abilities? What injustice will be done if you insert an amendment that will qualify those who have voted on a personal property qualification? Such will not interfere with the Bill or with its objects. The hon. Minister gave a very fair view of the case; but he admitted too much, for he admitted it would disfranchise some, although a very small number. I think it will disfranchise more than he thinks, and I live on the seaboard, and am in a position to know. It will disfranchise some fishermen who have intested in fishing vessels, and some persons investing in coasters or in shares in large vessels. There is no necessity to disfranchise those people; and the hon, gentleman is doing so to some extent, it may not be to a very great extent. That is only a matter of guesswork. You would have to go over the farmers' sons, you have the mechanics' sons, you have is only a matter of guesswork. You would have to go over the mechanics themselves, and you have what you never the list and find out who were voting on the personal qualication, and whether, under this Bill, they could vote under some other qualification, and that would involve considerable trouble. I asked the First Minister if he had considered this matter, and he told me he had done so, and therefore I thought it useless to say anyhing more about it; but I am quite satisfied from the desire manifested to enfranchise, so far as he can under the system he has adopted, all who should vote, he would be doing a just thing to admit the personal property qualification so far as regards the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MILLS. In this modern age it is an extraordinary practice to adopt that a portion of a community who have hitherto qualified on personal property should now be disfranchised. Formerly, more importance attached to real property than attaches to it at the present time. This was due to the system of feudal obligation. There was very little personal property then in existence. Under the modern condition of things, personal property is increasing in importance, and the amount, as compared with real property, is beyond anything known to the people in former times. If a man invests $1,000 with other partners to buy a ship worth $5,000 or $6,000, he has no vote on that account under this Bill; yet, if he had invested $1,000 in wild land he would have had a vote. Is not that legislative discrimination against the investment of money in particular callings? Now, that is a rule which is not based on equitable principles, to say nothing of common sense, and it seems to me that the hon gentleman has lost sight altogether of the circumstances of the population of the Maritime Provinces. Experience has shown that the rule which is now in force in those Provinces is a fair rule. They have representative government in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The law has been made by legislators who understand the circumstances of the people, and who seek to meet the condition of things as it prevails, and if any evil has grown out of that rule it would have been remedied long since. If the hon. gentleman will consider the circumstances of the population for a moment, he will see how widely they differ from those in the fertile Province of Ontario, and he will see that there is good reason for adopting the rule which prevails there, and it seems to me to be one which might be fairly adopted through the entire Dominion. Upon what principle does the hon, gentleman propose that a man shall have a vo'e on his fishing tackle, while the man who invests $1,000 or $2,000 in ships shall not have a vote on that property? It does seem an extraordinary proposition that a man should have a vote upon $150 or $300 worth of real estate, and that he should require to have $5,000 in bank stock or other personal property, yielding him $300 a year, before he can have a like privilege. If there is any difference as between the holders of real estate and the holders of personal property, it is in favor of the holders of personal property, because it is less certain, more precarious, more destructible than real property, and the hon. gentleman seems to me to be reversing the rule which ought to be applied, if there is to be any difference.

Mr. PAINT. The hon, gentleman is astray in his calculation. In Nova Scotia we seldom invest in shipping unless it pays 40 per cent. a year, especially in the cod fishery on the Grand Banks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PAINT. In the first place we have to pay 14 per cent. for insurance, and if your profit would only be 10 per cent. where would your venture be?

An hon. MEMBER. Did you say 40 per cent?

Mr. PAINT. I say 40 per cent. and I challenge investigation.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish the hon, gentleman would make they have always had the designation of towns, having a public the particular investments that can be made for that population varying from 1,000 to 5,000. I wish to know return, as I know that there are many in other parts of the Dominion who would like to get even 20 per cent., and I know ship-owners in Prince Edward Island who would be glad to get 10 or 5. The hon. gentleman knows that for some years back, many of them have been running their ships at a loss, and it is perfect nonsense to talk of investments in shipping paying 40 per cent.

Mr. PAINT. If the marine insurance is 14 per cent. per annum, and they would be glad to make 5, as the hon. gentleman says, they would lose 9 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES. I know lots of them that have insured their own ships because they cannot make profit enough to pay the companies. I am astonished that a practical man like the hon, gentleman should talk to the committee in this way, as it is calculated to mislead. I am not quite satisfied with the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland, because I think residence should be annexed, and I intend to move the addition of the following words: "And is a resident within such city or town." I do not put in assessment, because in the Province of Quebec they do not assess personal property at all. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), I think in the absence of the First Minister the other day, gave a list of those who would be disfranchised in his own county in the absence of a personal qualification. This list he obtained from the secretary-treasurer of his county, and it showed that ninety-eight votes would be disqualified in that county, though it is not a very large one. Now that seems to me to be a hardship, and it was no answer to his argument that, as the Minister of Inland Revenue stated. twenty or thirty others would be enfranchised. I do not know that the First Minister has had these facts brought to his attention.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I heard the hon, gentleman,

Mr. DAVIES. It seemed to me that he made out a strong case on these facts, and upon them and upon facts within my personal knowledge I should support the personal property qualification.

Mr. BURPEE. I think the amendment of the hon, member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the other amendment might be joined. The hon, gentleman proposes a property qualification without residence, but with assessment. The present amendment includes both. The amendment the hon, member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) now proposes is to require residence alone, leaving out the assessment, which will obviate the difficulty in the case of Quebec.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would have no objection whatever to that. But I would object to the hon, gentleman's motion requiring both residence and the location of the property in the district. A man may, for instance, have $1,000 worth of bank stock situated in St. John, while he may live in Northumberland. I have no objection to the residence clause and will amend my motion in that respect.

Mr. VAIL. And reduce the amount to $300?

Mr. MITCHELL. Every reduction is a step in the direction I desire. If the right hon. Premier will consent, I will.

Amendment to amendment (Mr. Davies) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Mitchell) negatived. Yeas, 33; nays, 53.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the right hon. Premier what definition is given to towns under the term used here. I am not speaking now for Ontario or Quebec, but for the Province I know most about, my own Province. We have places there that have been called towns for the last 50 or 60 years; they have never been incorporated, but they have always had the designation of towns, having a population varying from 1,000 to 5,000. I wish to know whether that group of houses will comprise what is known under this section as a town. Because it may be claimed that it requires to be an incorporated town.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, "A town means a place incorporated as a town or recognised as such by or under any Act of the Parliament of Canada or the Legislature of the Province in which it is situate."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) is a very reasonable one, and I can conceive no reason on earth, if we depart from the provincial franchises, why we should not introduce a limit of this kind. Everybody knows that there are a large number of towns and villages scattered all over this country, especially in Ontario, and everybody knows that there is no practical distinction between them other than that of population. Moreover, a great many are in a state of flux, as the hon. Premier admitted; the population of many of the villages is rising, and the population of a considerable number of the towns, I am sorry to say, is shrinking, so that on every possible ground the limitation proposed by my hon. friend ought to commend itself to the committee. It is especially desirable in such cases as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) mentions. Everybody who has been in Manitoba knows that the towns there are laid out in the most ambitious fashion. I have known three houses to be designated as a city; indeed, I have known places to be designated as cities where there was not a house.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There will not be many people disfranchised there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; but there are a considerable number of small places in Manitoba, and I suspect in the Territories, which have got themselves incorporated as towns, which will not attain the size of ordinary villages in other parts of the Dominion for many years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To fortify myself, as I do sometimes, by referring to the legislation in the Province of Ontario, I would point out that the Bill recently passed there makes no such limitation as the amendment proposes.

Mr. MILLS. There is this distinction between this Bill and the Ontario Act. The Local Legislature has the power of saying what shall be a town or a village; this Legislature has no such power. The hon, gentleman told us he was bringing forward this Bill to emancipate himself from the thraldom in which he has been so long held, and he now wants to insist that he shall not be emancipated. He proposes by the very clause under consideration that this Legislature shall continue in that position of dependence which he declared himself so anxious to emancipate it from. The hon, gentleman pretends that he has been long suffering and wishes to release himself from the thraldom of the Local Legislatures, yet he proposes that the Local Legislature of each Province shall have an opportunity of altering its franchise by declaring that some village shall be a town and some town a village. He, therefore, is continuing a portion of that dependence, to release himself from which he gave as a reason for bringing forward this Bill. We were to have here an independent Legislature elected by independent electors, made independent by the hon gentleman's independent revising barristers. We see now how much force there was in the observations which the hon, gentleman has been pressing on our attention.

Mr. DAVIES. The First Minister will see that the exceptional circumstances called to his attention by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) and justly insisted on as a reason for this amendment, do not exist in Ontario, to the same extent at any rate, as in a new Province such as Manitoba; so that while there might not be necessity for from Marquette had the same idea in his mind. I think Mr. MITCHELL.

this in the Ontario Act, it does not follow there is no necessity for it in a Bill which includes the whole Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to correct my hon, friend who says this provision would not affect Ontario. I know of several towns in Ontario that will be affected by it; and I should therefore very much like to see the alteration suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), adopted. The Ontario law provides that, when a village has a certain number of inhabitants, it can be erected into a town by proclamation; but when it has not that number, it requires a special Act before it can be incorporated into a town. I know of several cases where villages have been erected into towns, under special Acts, and owing to special circumstances, such as railways running through them; and which, instead of doing good, have done harm to those places, and their population has not increased as expected. These places, of course, cannot be expected to humiliate themselves by going back to the Legislature, and asking to be incorporated again into villages; but, at the same time, it would be very unjust to disfranchise a number of their inhabitants, as this Bill will do, unless the amendment of my hon, friend be adopted.

Mr. WATSON moved in amendment,

That after the word "town," in the 6th line of section 3, the following words be inserted: "With a population of not less than 1,200."

He said: I think this proposition is a reasonable one, in view of the fact that many places in a new country, such as the Province of Manitoba, being ambitious and expecting to grow rapidly, have become incorporated as towns, although their population is by no means large; for instance, the town of Gladstone has its mayor and councillors although its population is but about 400. The town of Birtle and the town of Minnedosa and Rapid City, each of which has not over 500 or 600 inhabitants, also come within the same category, and under this Bill, as they would have to qualify under the term of town, the qualification in those places would be $200. I do not think that this is right, in view of the fact that in villages which have equally as large populations the qualification is lower. The amendment I propose would give the First Minister a better chance of keeping within the meaning of towns by providing that any place with a less population than 1,200 should not be considered a town, but should be recognised in this Franchise Bill as a village.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that confusion will arise from our adopting a term which is entirely the creature of the Local Legislature. What is the distinction between a town and a village? It is a matter of population. The theory as regards qualification is a question of population. It is said here that the reason for having a different property qualification in cities and towns is because in the larger places property is worth more than where there are less people. The whole question is therefore a matter of population. Now, if that is correct, the mere fact that a Local Legislature chooses to call one community a village or a town or a city, cannot be considered in a matter of this kind. If population is to be the basis, we ought to provide against the real object of this measure being defeated by the action of any Local Legislature. The right hon, the Premier states that the Act of the Local Legislature of Ontario is a reason for the adoption of a similar provision in this Bill, but it is to be remembered that we are now dealing with places that, so far as this Bill is concerned, are not to be amenable to the Legilature of any Province. The Local Legislatures can make and unmake towns; the term "town" is a creature of the Local Legislature; but when we are considering a measure applicable to the Dominion, I think the reason for following the legislation of a particular Province ceases to exist, and I moved my amendment, not knowing that my hon. friend unless we adopt some such suggestion, we shall be passing owner of the property. Before a man can be an elector in a measure that is not going to be uniformly general in its application, and I think it is conceded that uniformity is desirable, so far as can be acquired by this measure.

Amendment negatived.

On sub-section 4

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose an amendment to this clause. In the 7th line, I propose to strike out the word "November" and substitute "January." In the 14th line I propose to make an alteration, so that it will read:

Before the date of the certificate of the final revision of the voters' list bereinafter mentioned, made by the revising officer.

That is to say that the voter will be qualified if his rent is paid up to the time when the vote is registered.

Mr. VAIL. That will open the door to a great deal of fraud. Any one can come in and qualify before the final

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If a man has occupied a house for a year, and pays his rent before the final revision, he certainly ought to have a vote,

Mr. CHAIRMAN. There is a motion of Mr. Lister to strike out all after the word "and" in the 13th line.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I propose an amendment in substitution of the whole clause.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. That will come at the end, when it is proposed that the clause shall be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. My hon, friend proposes to substitute another clause instead of this. If the committee do not approve of that, they can then go on to amend the clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be the more convenient plan, because there would be no use in amending the clause and afterwards substituting another clause. Although it may not be strictly correct it would be more convenient to discuss the proposed substitution first.

Mr. BAIN. When the First Minister spoke, I hoped he would have dealt in some manner with the mode by which the tenant is to be placed upon the voters' list. The concession that was made a few days ago on a previous clause provided, as I underetood, that, to a certain extent, the basis upon which the revising officer should first construct the voters' list should be the assessment roll of the municipality. By this clause the qualification of a tenant is the payment of a certain amount of rent. There are a large number of persons on the assessment roll who are placed there as tenants in occupation of real property of a certain value. It seems to me that, if it were possible to readjust the qualification of tenants in this clause, in such a form as to keep the valuation in sight, it would be an improvement. As the Bill now stands, the entrance of these parties on the roll will give no indication of the amount of rental they pay, by which alone they can here vote, and it appears to me that, in making up the first lists, either the tenants must be entirely left out or they must be all put on, and then application will have to be made to the revising officer to correct them afterwards. This would involve a large amount of trouble, and I therefore intend to propose that the tenants shall go upon the assessment rolls in regard to property similar in valuation to that which would qualify proprietors in cities and towns. We would thus have a basis of tenancy that would be, to a certain extent, uniform. Another difficulty as to the qualification for tenancy is, that while a tenant may be paying rent, either in kind or in cash, there is no provision for a tenant who gives work in exchange for the occupation of his property. In large cities and towns, where there are tenement houses occupied by very many families, and sub-divided very much, this will have a tendency to bring under the provisions of this Act a class very much below the qualification that we require from the ment roll, will he be able to ascertain anything in rela-a city as a proprietor, he must own $300 worth of real estate, but a man paying $2 a month rent, which must be for a very small piece of property in a city, can be qualified as a votor. There are other reasons why it is undesirable that the relations between landlord and tenant, as to rent being paid, should have to be shown in order to entitle a man to a vote. A landlord might exercise undue influence over his tenant, either by inducing him to vote in a certain direction by giving him a certificate that he had paid his rent, or by refusing to give him a certificate, perhaps, in case of a dispute, when, perhaps, he had fairly paid his rent. It seems to me, that in all these cases it will make it more difficult to prove his right than if the tenant was simply placed upon the roll as the tenant of property of a certain value. I presume that one object of the First Minister is to simplify as much as possible the working of the Act, so as to make it possible, without undue friction, or undue trouble on the part of the individual, to prove his right to vote, but who, under these circumstances, I think, would have considerable additional trouble in proving his right. Because if tenants, as qualified on the assessment roll, are not to go on the primary list, it is plain there will be a large number of persons who will be obliged to make special application to the revising officer to be put on. On the other hand, if they are put on indiscriminately as tenants, unless this qualification is broad enough to cover every tenant, then there will be the same difficulty in readjusting their rights, and proving that they have no right to be on. It was with that view that I move this amendment:

That sub-section 4 of section 3 be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:—Every male person entered as a tenant on the last revised assessment roll of the city or town in which he tenders his vote, and who is residing at the time he tenders his vote within said city or town, and who is rated for real property on the last revised assessment roll of said city or town, of the actual value of not less than $200, and has resided there continuously for at least twelve months next preceding the election at which he votes.

I prepared this clause before the First Minister had made a difference in the qualification of $300 in cities and $200 in Otherwise, the restriction as to residence and other matters in this original clause, I think we all approve of. But I would suggest to him whether it is not desirable to change the basis as I have suggested.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman prepared that amendment with a view to the Province of Ontario only. It is inapplicable to some of the other Provinces. However, Sir, with respect to this clause, I would ask that it be postponed and we go on to the next.

Mr. EDGAR. I wish to draw the attention of the First Minister to one point with reference to that clause. While the assessment roll is made a means of information to the revising barrister, and will give him the information desired, under this clause it would not give him any information whatever. Of course, I am speaking of Ontario, and if the right hon, gentleman will refer to the Revised Statutes of Ontario, page 1876, he will see the form which is to be filled in by the assessors, which gives the names of the owners, the names of the occupants, or rather taxable parties, stating whether they are freeholders, tenants, etc., and gives all the particulars; but it does not give any information as to the amount of rental. Therefore, a very important fact on which the franchise is based under this Bill, could not be ascertained except by special evidence before the revising barrister.

Mr. FAIRBANK. Before that clause is laid over, I wish to remind the First Minister that I called his attention to this matter a few evenings ago, by a question which he said he would answer at the proper time. This matter brings that question up again. With the information which the revising officer can obtain from the voters' list and the assess-tion to rental? Now, the extent to which that applies is, for certain values. The qualification now proposed is not a perhaps, greater than the First Minister would at first suppose, as I mentioned on that occasion, I had gone over the voters' list, not the assessment roll, own constituency, and I found upon it over 700 names returned as tenants. Now, upon that voters' list there would only be the names of tenants occupying enough property to give them a vote; upon the assessment rolls there would be a much larger number of names. Hence, the possession of the voters' list and the assessment roll by the revising barrister would give him no information whatever in relation to those he wished to put upon the list in consequence of their paying sufficient rent. In that position, what would he do? He would have to get other information, which would amount, virtually, to making, at least, one-fourth of a new assessment. Without that information his first list would have to leave off all that class, or include all that came under that head, and would virtually make the first list of no value what-ever. One point further. The intention is, evidently, to base the vote largely upon the fact of the man being a citizen and an occupant. Under the provision of rent the franchise may rest really upon the existence of a debt due from the tenant to the landlord which may not exceed $2. If the tenant is indebted to the landlord to the extent of $2, he is deprived of his vote. The fact of his being a citizen, the fact of his paying taxes, and all that, does not give him the vote, provided he owes his landlord $2.

Mr. McCALLUM. In assessing property in the Province of Ontario, the assessor goes around and generally assesses the man in occupation, so the point taken by the hon, gentleman does not apply at all. The amount of money that the occupant is assessed for will guide the revising officer as to whether he has a vote or not.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose the First Minister reserves this clause for the purpose of further considering it, and I wish to call his attention to this fact: Apart from the objections made by my hon. friend, which seem conclusive against the present plan, in case there was a dispute between the landlord and tenant with regard to his rent, or in consequence of an unsettled account, that tenant would be disfranchised under the provisions of the Bill as it stands.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to draw the First Minister's attention to another point, which I consider a very radical change in the paragraph. Under the Quebec law a tenant not only has to pay a certain amount of rental per annum, but the property on which he pays it has to be of a certain value. This is a very important item in the property qualification, and I trust that whatever may be the new clause the right hon, gentleman intends to draw up, he will keep this in view. As it is now, a tenant may pay an annual rental on a property which will amount to an enormous annual interest. I know many cases in the assessment of my own county, where a tenant pays a rental of $20 a year on a property which is assessed for only $50 annual value; and in that way a good many men will get the right to vote under this clause who really ought not to have it at all, because the property on which their franchise is based, is not of sufficient value to give them a vote. I think the clause ought to be drawn so that the actual value of the property would be the same as would give a vote to the owner.

but to enlarge. A tenant pays on rental, and has nothing to do with the value of the property. As a general rule, people do not pay ridiculous rents in this country.

Mr. FISHER. A tenant ought not to have the privilege of voting on property on which if he were owner he could not vote. The hon, member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) Mr. FAIRBANK.

qualification on the assessed value, but it is a question as to whether the tenant pays a rental of $2 a month. The assessment roll furnishes no information as to the amount of rental a man pays. We can assume that a man on the assessment roll as tenant of property worth $500 is absolutely and clearly within the range of the Act.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I wish to suggest to the Minister as to whether he cannot readjust the clause so that in some way the value of the property put down on the assessment roll in the tenant's name shall be an indication of his right to vote. A man might pay a rental of $2 a month and yet the property if sold might not be worth $200; and another man occupying property worth four or five times that amount would not be paying rent equivalent to the value of the property. Such a case might occur in regard to partly improved property. A man might occupy a piece of that property with the house and pay $2 or $4 a month rental; yet the property might be worth $2,000, that part of it lying idle not adding to the value of the rental. I have made the suggestion with a view to obviate the difficulty that is apparent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is worthy of consideration.

Mr. EDGAR. The remarks of the hon, member for Monck may have been very profound, but unfortunately they had not the remotest bearing upon either the clause under discussion or upon the amendment. I do not think the hon. gentleman, although he is familiar with the assessment roll and voters' lists for Monck, and I happen to be so also, never saw the amount of a tenant's rental put down on an assessment roll, and so he could not see it on the voters' list. We have been discussing that question and trying to find a remedy for it. The assessment roll gives no information as to the amount of rental paid by the tenant. We think it will be more easy to get at the value if the tenancy were based on value not on rental.

Mr. McCALLUM. With all the profound knowledge of the hon, member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) I can say this: That to-day in Ontario, if a tenant's name is put down for property worth $200 and the owner's name is put down for the same property, they both can vote on that property. The hon, member who got into this House by the grace of God and of Oliver Mowat can again attempt to give us a profound statement.

Mr. VAIL. I will give the First Minister a point to consider in regard to Halifax. There the assessment is based altogether on real estate, and it is debited against the owner of real estate. I occupy a property, the assessed value of which is $8,000. Under this Bill I will not have a vote, because I am not on the assessment roll, the owner of the property being assessed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You will be entitled to a vote under this Bill.

Mr. VAIL. I do not think so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If you are a tenant and pay $20 and upwards you have a vote.

Mr. VAIL. But I am not on the assessment roll.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is to do away with the assessment roll.

The First Minister might meet the Mr. FLEMING. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not want to restrict, views of all parties by adding to the fifth clause the words "as bond fide occupant or tenant of real property," and then insert a provision for a change of tenancy during the year. The matter would then be settled and all persons would stand on an equal footing.
